> Because it is difficult to explain the words in Art. III. of the treaty under interpretation 'country . . . together with its bays, harbours and creeks' otherwise than that all bays without distinction as to their width were, in the opinion of the negotiators, part of the territory;
> Because from the information before this tribunal it is evident that the three-mile rule is not applied to bays strictly or systematically either by the United States or by any other power;
> Because the practical distinction for the purpose of this fishery between coasts and bays and the exceptional conditions pertaining to the latter has been shown from the correspondence and the documents in evidence, especially the treaty of 1783, to have been in all probability in the minds of the negotiators of the treaty of 1818;
> Because the tribunal is unable to understand the term 'bay' in the renunciatory clause in other than its geographical sense, by which a bay is to be considered as an indentation of the coast, bearing a configuration of a particular character easy to determine specifically, but difficult to describe generally.
> The negotiators of the treaty of 1818 did probably not trouble themselves with subtle theories concerning the notion 'bays'; they most probably thought that everybody would know what was a bay. In this popular sense the term must be interpreted in the treaty.

So they go on to make their award in these words:

> For these reasons the tribunal decides and awards:
> In case of bays [the three marine miles are to be measured from a straight line drawn across the body of water at the place where it ceases to have the configuration and characteristics of a bay.] At all other places the three marine miles are to be measured following the sinuosities of the coast.

They go on after that to make the recommendations to which my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries called attention. Those recommendations are to be distinguished altogether from the terms of the award. In this respect the award was what I have read. The boundaries referred to by the minister this afternoon are not binding on either country. They leave the matter over for further negotiations in that regard. The positive, direct, unmistakable award of the tribunal is that 'the three marine miles are to be measured by a straight line drawn across the body of water at the place where it ceases to have the configuration and characteristics of a bay.'

Now, let us see whether or not the Bay of Fundy was worth including—and I would like to make this observation just here. Neither my hon. friend the Minister of Justice nor my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries seems to claim that any attempt whatever was made to include the Bay of Fundy in the terms of this reference. I have not heard it so far throughout this debate. I waited to hear it from either of the hon. ministers. The nearest we got to it was, that the Minister of Justice said that Mr. Root seemed to take for granted from the very first that the Bay of Fundy was not to be included, and the Minister of Justice seems to have acceded to that at once. When the whole question of rights in every one of these bays was to be opened up, why should the Bay of Fundy be excluded? For the moment just let me refer to the value of the fisheries in the Bay of Fundy. From a statement made up by my hon. friend from Digby, from returns to be found in the government blue-books, I take the following figures: Number of vessels and boat fishermen employed in the Bay of Fundy, 5,357—2,508 from Charlotte, New Brunswick; 574 from St. John, New Brunswick; 246 from King's, Nova Scotia; 751 from Annapolis; 1,728 from Digby. The total amount invested in these fisheries is $2,016,772; and the value of the catch in 1909 was $2,812,486. Considering the number of people employed, the amount of capital invested and the product of the fisheries in the Bay of Fundy, I think we were entitled to receive from the Minister of Justice, or from the Minister of Marineand Fisheries an assurance that some bona fide and earnest effort was made to have this question of right respecting the Bay of Fundy determined by the Hague Tribunal. Why should it not have been determined? The Minister of Justice and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries have given us the American contention in that regard, and have referred us over and over again to the letter written by Lord Aberdeen in 1845. I think they have been answered in that regard by hon. gentlemen who have preceded me; but let me point out this. If that was a good ground for giving up the Bay of Fundy, it might have been a good ground for giving up something else. Let us look at that for a moment. We find that the instructions issued by Mr. Mitchell, Minister of Marine and Fisheries in 1870, were first framed in this way:

> Until further instructed, therefore, you will not interfere with any American fishermen, unless found within three miles of the shore, or within three miles of a line drawn across the mouth of a bay or creek which is less than ten geographical miles in width. In the case of any other bay, as the Bay of Chaleurs, for example, you will not admit any United States fishing vessel or boat, or any American fishermen, inside of a line drawn across at that part of such bay where its width does not exceed ten miles.

On June 6, 1876, Lord Grenville telegraphed to the Governor General as follows:

> Her Majesty's government hopes that the United States fishermen will not be for the present prevented from fishing, except within three miles of land, or in bays which are less than six miles broad at the mouth.

The result was that the Hon. Peter Mitchell modified his instructions on the 27th of June, 1870, making the last paragraph read:

> In the case of any other bay, as Bay des Chaleurs, for example, you will not interfere with any United States fishing vessel or boat, or any American fishermen, unless they are found within three miles of the shore.

As far as I understand the practice, from that time up to the present the instructions then given by Mr. Mitchell have been followed. So that if there was good ground for giving up the Bay of Fundy by reason of Lord Aberdeen's letter of 1845, there was equally good ground for giving up the Bay of Chaleurs and every other bay, because these instructions had been definitely given at the request of the British government that American fishermen were not to be interfered with, unless found fishing within three miles of the shore. Further than that, with respect to the Bay of Fundy, and the strong view expressed as to Lord Aberdeen's language in 1845, let me refer to the position taken by Mr. Phelps in 1886.

Mr. Phelps, the American Minister at the Court of St. James that year, after stating the regret of the United States government that the Royal assent had been given to the Act of this parliament passed in the previous year, touching fishing by foreign vessels, proceeded to state as follows:

> It has been pointed out in my note to Lord Iddesleigh above mentioned that the three-mile limit referred to in this Act is claimed by the Canadian government to include considerable portions of the high seas, such as the Bay of Fundy, the Bay of Chaleurs and similar waters, by drawing the line from headlands to headlands. And that American fishermen have been excluded from those waters accordingly.

This indicates in the clearest possible way that whatever the contention of the British government was regarding the Baie des Chaleurs in 1886-7, it was asserting the same contention as respects the Bay of Fundy.

My hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Sir Allen Aylesworth) asked how we could have expected the authorities of the United States to enter into any agreement regarding the Bay of Fundy when they were perfectly satisfied with the position as it was. Of course they were. They had been fishing in that bay without restriction or interference; and if they could persuade this government to be foolish enough to submit the question of right in respect to all the other bays and leave out the Bay of Fundy, they naturally would be extremely well satisfied. They would then have the opportunity of making good their claims in respect of all the other bays, and Great Britain would have no opportunity whatever of making good her claims in respect of the Bay of Fundy. There was no need for my hon. friends opposite to assure us that the United States authorities were perfectly satisfied to leave that matter as it was. We understand that, but the question is could the people of Canada be perfectly satisfied that, when this question of right was put forward, our government should have consented that the Bay of Fundy—perhaps the most important bay on the coast of Canada—should be absolutely put aside and not be submitted to this tribunal. The treaty of arbitration, under which this agreement was entered into, gave no excuse whatever for excluding the Bay of Fundy. Article 1 says:

Differences which may arise of a legal nature or relating to the interpretation of treaties existing between the two contracting parties and which it may not have been possible to settle by diplomacy, shall be referred to the permanent court of arbitration established at the Hague by the convention of the 29th July, 1899, provided nevertheless that they do not affect the vital interests, the independence, or the honour of the two contracting states, and do not concern the interest of third parties.

There you have a definite, distinct agreement to submit the differences. Was there not a difference between the government of Canada and the United States with respect to our rights in the Bay of Fundy? Was there not exactly the same difference between the government of Great Britain, as represented by the Canadian government for the time being, with respect to that bay as there was with respect to the Baie des Chaleurs? What was the difference between the two cases? Absolutely none, and the treaty called for a submission of such differences.

My hon. friends the Minister of Justice (Sir Allen Aylesworth) and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) did seem to rely to an undue extent on Lord Aberdeen's letter. True, the Minister of Justice said in December last that:

The result of the argument made during the present summer and the award pronounced two months ago has been to uphold to the fullest extent the British contention, and to demonstrate I think, that if the concession regarding the Bay of Fundy had not been made in 1845, that bay, as well as the other large bays of our maritime provinces, would to-day be declared British territorial waters.

I have dealt with the character of the relaxation very briefly, but I would like to read just in this connection the reasoning of the tribunal itself with regard to relaxations of a similar character. The counsel for the United States had put forward an argument based on a relaxation by Great Britain of its rights with regard to other bays, and the tribunal disregarded that claim for this reason:

Because neither should such relaxations of this claim, as are in evidence, be construed as renunciations of it; nor should omissions to enforce the claim in regard to bays as to which no controversy arose, be so construed. Such a construction by this tribunal would not only be intrinsically inequitable but internationally injurious; in that it would discourage conciliatory diplomatic transactions and encourage the assertion of extreme claims in their fullest extent;

As has been well pointed out by my hon. friends who preceded me on this side (Mr. Jameson and Mr. Maddin) the relaxation of Great Britain in that regard was not accepted by the United States subject to the stipulation which accompanied it. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Sir Allen Aylesworth) has construed that stipulation in a very different sense from that placed upon it by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries because, quoting from revised 'Hansard,' page 671, I find him using this language in referring to the opinion given by the Attorney General of Nova Scotia, the Hon. James W. Johnson:

That opinion having been pronounced by the responsible law officers of the Crown of that day, the colonists of Nova Scotia, I have no doubt, felt their case immensely strengthened, and thought they would have behind them all the prestige and power of the British government itself in defending the claim they were making to the Bay of Fundy as part of their territorial waters. But in 1845, the Lord Aberdeen of that day, then Foreign Secretary of Great Britain, wrote a letter which had been prepared as a piece of diplomatic correspondence, after the most careful and matured consideration, in which while affirming the right of the colonies, while standing upon the opinion which had been expressed by their legal advisers and by the legal advisers of the British government, none the less, on the part of His Majesty's government, as a pure matter of grace and concession, he expressed his willingness to forego, so far as the Bay of Fundy was concerned, the extreme right of the British subject in that regard, and assented to the use, by the fishermen of the United States, of the fisheries in the Bay of Fundy, in common with the inhabitants of the British colonies, upon the stipulation that as to the remainder of the maritime coasts of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Quebec, the claims of United States fishermen should cease.

That is the plain, distinct construction placed upon that letter by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, and it is a construction entirely inconsistent with that placed upon it by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur).

We are asked: What injury has been done by not including the Bay of Fundy? But an equally pertinent question would be: What injury would have been done by including it? My hon. friends the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries argued that the British case would have been greatly handicapped by the inclusion of the Bay of Fundy. As I understand it, that supposed handicap would have arisen either by reason of the shape of the bay, the different character of the bay or by reason of the letter of Lord Aberdeen in 1845. So far as the character of the bay is concerned, any one who examines it upon the map can see that just as powerful an argument could have been made with respect to that bay on the part of Great Britain as with respect to Placentia bay, or any of the others. And any one who examines the argument made before the tribunal and the reasons given by it will see that two great factors entered into consideration.

One was the width of the bay at the mouth, and the other the depth of the bay. Taking it from shore to shore across Grand Manan, it does not seem to be wider than Placentia bay. But the depth of the Bay of Fundy is greater. Placentia bay is only 70 miles deep until you reach the ten mile line, whereas the Bay of Fundy is at least 100 miles deep before you reach the ten mile line. Therefore, so far as the character of the Bay of Fundy is concerned, there is no reason to differentiate it from the other bays that were brought before the tribunal. We are told that it would have been a handicap had the Bay of Fundy been brought into the discussion, that the British argument would not have been so strong and cogent as it was. As a matter of fact, it was brought before the tribunal. The letter of Lord Aberdeen, written in 1845, was canvassed before the tribunal. Bates' decision was canvassed. Everything was urged by the Americans at this hearing which could possibly have been urged by them if the Bay of Fundy had been included in the arbitration. The Minister of Justice practically admits this. In one part of his speech, he says that if the Bay of Fundy had been included, some great disadvantage would have been sustained. But in another part of his speech he admitted that everything was brought in question with regard to that bay. At page 4707 of the Unrevised 'Hansard,' he said:

> I venture to think our position was better before the tribunal without any reference to the Bay of Fundy being included in the matters for decision, the arrangement being that nothing in the proceedings should prejudice our claims with reference to the Bay of Fundy or the claims of the United States in reference to the Bay of Fundy.

Then, he says, at page 4696:

> The attitude of both parties in the previous years in the course of the prolonged diplomatic discussion, while it related immediately to the Bay of Fundy, had the most important possible bearing upon the general question of the interpretation of this clause of the treaty, and just for that reason every word, I may say every letter, of that long diplomatic correspondence was scrutinized with the utmost care, was presented before the tribunal and was discussed over and over again on both sides of the question by the various counsel who were concerned in the case.

So, as a matter of fact, we had all the handicap in regard to the Bay of Fundy that we could possibly have had under any circumstances, and we had not the advantage of obtaining an award with regard to that very important body of water. The injury to Canada to-day is in not having the question decided one way or the other. Hon. members opposite have spoken of the importance of having this question settled. Well, is it settled to-day? Have they given up our rights in the Bay of Fundy? Do they stand in the position in which they seem to have stood in these negotiations, that we have absolutely relinquished all our territorial rights in the Bay of Fundy, though under the terms of the tribunal, we have absolute rights in these territorial waters? Has the government of this country given up the Bay of Fundy, with its marvellous fisheries, in which more than five thousand men are engaged, in which more than $2,000,000 of capital is invested, and whose annual production is nearly $3,000,000? Have they given up our claims with respect to that? If so, why has the claim of this country been abnegated in regard to the Bay of Fundy when it has been asserted before this tribunal in regard to other territorial waters? The injury is in not having the question of jurisdiction settled. That has two aspects. In the first place, it is in the interest of friendship between the two countries, that the question should be settled. I offered my congratulations to the government in the early days of the session, that many questions had been settled. It had not then dawned upon me that the Bay of Fundy had been excluded in the way it has been. It is in the interest of good relations between the countries that it should be settled; and I should have thought that, unless the government propose to absolutely abandon all our claims in regard to that bay, they would have persisted for that very reason even if they thought we had not a good case, upon having the Bay of Fundy included in that arbitration, in order that we might have a definite and clear decision in regard to the rights of the fishermen of both countries in these waters. What does the government propose to do about it? The Minister of Justice said, in one part of his speech, that he was glad the Bay of Fundy had not been included, and in another part, he said that we stand in a better position in regard to it than before. If it be true, as he stated, then the tribunal has confirmed in the most complete manner and to the fullest possible extent our contention with respect to these bays, including the Bay of Fundy, what does the government propose to do about it? Are they going to open up the matter again with the United States? Or have they estopped themselves from doing this, by neglecting to have this bay included in this reference? I do not know the exact character of the negotiations in that regard. They have not been brought down in the form of written documents, other than the memoranda which have been read. But I do most sincerely trust that no steps taken by this government in that respect, will have precluded this country from asserting its rights in this connection.

One other question only I would like to allude to. Having regard to the decision of this tribunal upon the second question, the position of Canada and Newfoundland acting jointly seems to me to be a very strong one. Question 2 was as follows:

> Have the inhabitants of the United States, while exercising the liberties referred to in said article, a right to employ as members of the fishing crews of their vessels persons not inhabitants of the United States?

I understand perfectly that this is a question which touches Newfoundland more than it touches Canada, but, I take it that the answer to that question, coupled with the control of the bait supply, made Great Britain—that is, Canada and Newfoundland—complete masters of the situation. The control of the bait supply is a very important thing indeed. My hon. friend expresses surprise and disappointment because the tribunal did not proceed to deal with the reasonableness of certain regulations made by Canada and the United States.

I touched upon the main question in connection with that, and I pointed out that the tribunal made a certain disposition by which it would be determined whether any regulation was or was not reasonable. I am inclined to think if the Minister of Justice had taken the trouble to make himself a little better acquainted with the situation than he seems to have been, he might not have expressed so much surprise nor so much disappointment with the tribunal at the course it did take in that regard. I will not say anything more than that. As a matter of fact, I think that after the government had given away our case to some extent, as it seems to me they did, by the shape in which they put the question touching the reasonableness of regulation, it was exceedingly fortunate for us that the tribunal took the course it did take. As a result of that, Newfoundland has still the right to control its bait supply; and the tribunal has decided that Canada and Newfoundland have the right of control over their own citizens being employed upon United States fishing vessels. If my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and other members of the government will put these two things together and see what they amount to, I think eventually they might come to the conclusion that so far as these fisheries are concerned we have the situation in our own hands, and that the fish of the maritime provinces would at no distant day have entered the markets of the United States free of duty, even if no reciprocity treaty had been made. That is the conclusion I have come to after considerable study of this award, and of what it means to the people of this country and the people of Newfoundland.

Now I am glad that these matters were submitted to this tribunal. I regret the form in which some of them were submitted. I regret that the government did not follow the example of the United States, and put its contentions in every respect at the highest point at which they could have been maintained. They failed to do that, and the result has not been helpful to the cause of Canada. However, it is a desirable thing that these disputes should be settled, I rejoice that some at least have been settled. I hope the government will take the opportunity at no distant date of announcing to the House what its policy will be with regard to the Bay of Fundy, in view of the fact that the waters of that bay are territorially the waters of Great Britain, under the reasons advanced by this tribunal, and under the award based upon those reasons.

THE TYPHOID EPIDEMIC IN OTTAWA.

Mr. BLACK. Having failed at a previous stage of this sitting to say a few words on this subject, I will ask the House to listen to me now, and I do so the more readily because I seldom take up the time of this House. I would not have returned to the subject were it not that I consider the editorial criticism in the Ottawa 'Citizen' of my remarks as unfair and unjust, and that I should reply to them. There seems to be a feeling in the city that nobody outside has a right to discuss this question at all. The Ottawa 'Citizen' insinuates that I made remarks unfair to Ottawa. A gentleman speaking at a meeting on Friday evening, I think it was, and who I believe is a reporter in this House, said that I put it over Ottawa too strong. Now if my language was too strong, what must we say of the language of the gentleman who addressed a meeting n the Young Mens' Christian Association on Saturday to which I listened. My remarks were as the moonlight to the sunlight, or as water to wine compared with theirs, or as water to hot Scotch compared to what was given out there. I think that I, as well as every other member of this House of Commons, has a perfect right to take part in a discussion of the water we are compelled to drink. If it is a family row in the city of Ottawa, I represent here a family of 225 persons who are obliged to drink the water of the Ottawa. So far as I am concerned personally, I do not drink it, and never have since I first came here. I tried it twice, and I was so sick each time that I have abstained from it ever since. I have lived in this city during the last six years as much of the time as I have lived in Nova Scotia, and I claim the right to criticise the nature of the water we are given to drink. Coming back to this editorial, the editor says that I have made an unfortunate attack, and given much publicity, 'unfair publicity,' I believe he says, to the conditions of the Ottawa water supply. Why, Sir, before I had ever said a word, the 'Citizen' itself had been spreading the news from Vancouver to Halifax. There was hardly a paper but that has published news in regard to the typhoid epidemic at Ottawa. Then the 'Citizen,' after helping along this publicity, turns around and blames me for the few gentle remarks I made here. It says:

Dr. Black asserts that it is known where the present outbreak has originated. If it is not a matter of common knowledge, and Dr. Black is not using the city fairly by withholding such information particularly at this time. We may be getting poisoned, as Dr. Black intimates, but we can still conscientiously plead that we don't know how any more than at the beginning of the present outbreak.

Well, I regret very much the ignorance of the editor of the 'Citizen.' The report published in Toronto of the health officer who has examined the Ottawa water, says that the typhoid epidemic comes from that water. Dr. Bryce at a meeting on Friday says:

It is a water epidemic pure and simple. He placed the responsibility entirely on the water.

Dr. McCullough says :

The chief cause of the typhoid in Ottawa is the water.

Now I think these are pretty good proofs that somebody besides Dr. Black knows the location. I was going to say, when I was stopped as trespassing on the orders of the day, that there were four and possibly five modes of carrying typhoid. First, there is the water, which is the great carrier. Typhoid is a water-borne disease. Every man who has studied public health knows that typhoid is essentially a water-borne disease. Secondly, it is carried by milk, and it gets into the milk only by being carried there, by washing the milk cans or milk pitchers in polluted water that has not been boiled.

It might be introduced into the milk by a fly dropping into it and carrying the poison with it. That is No. 2, and No. 3 is, the fly which carries the bacillus from the excrement to our food dropping it into the milk pitcher, the sugar bowl, candy or anything else. The fourth is contagion where an individual comes in contact with a person affected with typhoid. Possibly the fifth, and probably the fifth, is wind-carried bacilli. This can be excluded because the earth is covered with snow at the present time. Flies can be excluded because there are not many around Ottawa at the present time. I am afraid there are some on the man who wrote that editorial. Milk is certified in Ottawa as pure. Now, by the laws of exclusion, we come back to one cause and one only. We must take the analysis of the water, and, taking the opinion of Dr. Bryce and of Dr. McCullough—not mine—we must come to the conclusion that the source of this disease is in the river. If it is not, in heaven's name, why is everybody crying out to have the water purified? Ottawa is trying to do the impossible. You cannot run two trains in opposite directions on one track without meeting disaster and death. You cannot soil and pollute the water of the river with the by-products of the human body and drink the same water without disaster and death. There may be let-ups, there may be periods when nobody is being killed, but every once in a while there will be an outbreak such as we have now. Let us see what is the history of Ottawa in regard to this very thing; this attempting to pollute the water and to drink it also. I have not had a great deal of time to look up the public health reports but I have looked at some of them. In 1895 there were 195 cases of typhoid in Ottawa, and in 1889—22 years agao—there were 2,000 cases. Have there been any since those years? What has there been between those years? Here is a sentence in the official report of the medical health officer for Ottawa. He sadly says 'typhoid fever is a yearly visitor to swell our death-roll.' That is the health offcer's report. I think that with the statement that we have had typhoid every year and with the records of the other years, it is about time that Ottawa had decided that it is doing the impossible, that it is trying to drink water that is being polluted. It is further giving to all the communities down below the poison from here. The result is that typhoid has broken out at Rockland. I think I have shown my justification for the remarks I have made, that the poison is properly located, that the river has been polluted for years and that somebody else started the publicity before I did. I have no advice to give to Ottawa, but there are only two things for Ottawa to do—stop having this river polluted or take the water from somewhere else. London, England, has a river flowing through it but it never thinks of drinking the water. It goes away back to the principality of Wales for its supply. New York has the Hudson river flowing past it, but it never attempts to tap that source of supply; it goes fifty miles away for water. Vancouver does the same. Yet, we adopt the slip-shod trick of our forefathers, who took their water wherever they could get it handiest without knowledge. That has been tried by different cities all over the continent of America. The result has been thousands and thousands of cases of typhoid fever, and the cities all along the great rivers, such as the Ohio, Mississippi and the Missouri, have wakened up to the fact that it is impossible to pollute their water and drink it too. They have gone elsewhere for pure water or they have gone to enormous expense in counteracting the pollution that has been going on in the rivers.

We are not half as wise in these things as the ancients were. I might quote from Dr. Montizambert's speech on Saturday in saying that 2,500 years ago the Romans would not drink the water from the Tiber but they built that magnificent aqueduct that still has water flowing through it. Jerusalem, he also stated, went away where it could get pure water and brought it at great expense through an aqueduct. You cannot pollute the water and drink it without disaster, and Ottawa must either purify the water above the city or she must go somewhere else to get pure water. If the pollution above the town is stopped the pollution at the town must be stopped in fairness to those below. I am very sorry to have had this much to say but I thought it was only right that I should say this in justice to myself considering the way in which my remarks had been received by the ' Citizen.'

Mr. JAMESON. Mr. Speaker, I must say that I think that the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Black) has been discharging a great and important public duty. I think that he deserves the gratitude, not only of the members of this House, but of the citizens of Ottawa. We are all proud of the national capital and we want it to have a good name. I do not think, however, that attempting to conceal the unfortunate conditions which exist is going to do any good. The only thing to do is to correct them if possible. To-day the typhoid outbreak has actually reached such a state that the question is asked by people throughout the whole city: Who will be next? If the discussions in the House and the discussions in the press can do anything I think that the movement which has been set on foot and which has been so much stimulated by the action of the hon. member for Hants will work for that end, and I think he deserves, as I have said before, the thanks of the House and the citizens of Ottawa for the action which he has taken in that regard.

Mr. BLACK.

FLYING OF FLAGS IN CANADA.

Mr. DANIEL. I was in hopes that the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) would be in the House, but I see that the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Frederick Borden) is here. I was going to refer to the fact that a few days ago we had a debate with reference to a resolution moved by my hon. friend from London (Mr. Beattie), in which the hon. Minister of Public Works stated that he was going to have the Union Jack flown, among other places, at all the seaports in Canada. He gave a list of the special days when the flag would be flown. I think the Minister of Public Works said that the flag was also to be flown every day at the seaports. I read from the St. John ' Globe ' of a recent issue the following:—

Sir, I notice that during the debate in parliament on the subject of flying flags the Minister of Public Works stated that hereafter flags would be flown daily on all public buildings at seaports, and also that St. David's day shall be a special day for the display of flags. The latter regulation was not carried out yesterday (St. David's day) and so far the only public building to fly the flag daily is the customs house. Why is the Union Jack not seen on the post office, railway buildings, etc?

(Signed) WELSHMAN.

I may add that the flag is not displayed on the militia buildings, and I understand it is only flown at Fort Dufferin when there is an inspection or something of that kind. The Minister of Public Works when he made his statement gave rise to anticipations which have not materialized. What is the explanation?

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (Minister of Public Works). I endeavoured to convey that the flag should be flown daily on all public buildings under the control of my department in border cities and towns, and at the principal seaports, and also, upon all public buildings on special days. I do not know that it has ever been the custom to fly a flag upon the Intercolonial Railway buildings on special days, and the Militia Department has certain rules which govern the display of flags on the buildings under its control. I issued instructions that the flag should be flown upon all the post offices and custom houses on St. David's day as well as upon other special days, and that in border cities and towns the flag should be flown every day in the year on these buildings. Some of the officials did not apparently understand the order with reference to St. David's day, which would account for the flag not being raised on the post office in St. John on that day, although it was displayed on the custom house. I have had a peremptory order sent out by the chief architect, and I do not think it will be misunderstood in future. I was sorry that on St. David's day the flag was not hoisted on the Ottawa post office, but there was some misunderstanding on the part of the official whose duty it was to attend to the matter. As soon as my attention was called to the fact that it was not flying on the parliament building on St. David's day I gave orders which were at once attended to. I trust that in future the orders will be well understood.

Mr. DANIEL. I am glad to hear the statement of the minister in regard to the buildings over which he has control. What is the rule in regard to the militia buildings?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I am under the impression that the flying of the flag on forts and military buildings has some special significance. I do not think that either in England or in Canada it is customary to fly the flag from forts or military buildings as on other public buildings. However, I will get the information and let my hon. friend know at some later date.

Mr. DANIEL. I think the flag flies from forts every day they are occupied or garrisoned, and of course Fort Dufferin is only occasionally garrisoned. On military stores buildings and such, I should think the flag ought to be displayed as on other public buildings.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. There are certain regulations governing such matters and I do not think there is any intention of changing them.

SUPPLY.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Supply.

Civil government, Department of Indian Affairs, salaries, $118,225.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior). There is no increase of numbers, and the increased amount of $2,825 is entirely accounted for by the statutory increases, being 12 at $100, 44 at $50, 2 at $25 and one at $12.50. The deductions for different reasons make the net increase $2,825. The number of employees is 78.

Mr. DANIEL. There appears to be 77, or one less, for 1911-12.

Mr. OLIVER. That is an error in the printed copy, due to the allowance for the private secretary having been shown in the current year as a vote for a separate official, while for 1911-12 it is properly shown as an allowance to an official.

Department of Indian Affairs, contingencies, $13,050.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What does the item of sundries cover?

Mr. OLIVER. Chiefly travelling expenses.

Mr. CAMPBELL. For whom?

Mr. OLIVER. For officials of the department, such as inspectors of timber and inspectors of agencies.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Is any part of this to be charged to the travelling expenses of a man called Leach?

Mr. OLIVER. No, Mr. Leach is employed in the Interior Department.

Department of Interior, salaries, $919,798.77.

Mr. OLIVER. There is an increase of 21 clerkships over last year, of which 17 are new appointments and 4 promotions. The increases are as follows: Statutory increases, $22,825; 36 promotions, $9,625; readjustment of clerkships in the second and third divisions, $2,300; 17 new appointments, $15,700; miscellaneous increases, due to changes occasioned by death, resignations, promotions, &c., $4,950; total, $55,400; decreases due to changes occasioned by deaths, resignations, promotions, &c., $14,487.50, making a net increase over last year of $40,912.50.

Mr. DANIEL. What is the reason for increasing the clerical staff?

Mr. OLIVER. The increased business of the department. I might read, for the information of the committee, a memorandum which was placed in my hands to-day by some of the officers of the department, as it bears on this point. First, there is a memorandum to the commissioner from the deputy commissioner, which says:

I again desire to bring to your attention the necessity for additional assistance and accommodation for the staff of this branch of the department. The work has increased during the past ten years from 471 per cent under one heading to as high as 734 per cent under another; and there is every prospect of it becoming heavier, as settlers begin to apply for patent for the homestead and other entries made since immigration assumed its present large proportions.

It is of course impossible to provide more staff without somewhere to put them. At the present moment we are crowded to a degree which is not only embarrassing and detrimental to the work but absolutely dangerous to the health of the clerks. Our sick list during the past year has been very large, and no doubt is attributable to some degree to the lack of space and defective ventilation of the offices occupied by our staff. I attach hereto a schedule showing the increase of work, and also a description of the rooms which we occupy. You will see that the average floor space allowed to each is only 56 square feet.

The Commissioner of Dominion Lands, Mr. Greenway reported to me that he fully endorsed this statement, and that the correspondence was bound to increase very largely when applications for patents under the new Act would come in. In 1900 the number of files handled in the Dominion Lands branch, the Assistant Commissioner's branch, was 29,263, and in 1910, 227,538. In 1900 the letters were 20,869 and in 1910 167,960.

Mr. DANIEL. Are these applications for homesteads?

Mr. OLIVER. No, they are letters with regard to homesteads. In 1900 the applications for patents were 5,601 and in 1910, 32,012. New patents recorded, 1900, 3,320; 1910, 19,352. Notifications of approval issued, in 1900, 2,746; in 1910, 19,247. The committee will thus see the enormous increase that has taken place in the past 10 years; and according to the commissioner, that increase will be much greater during the next two years, because of the very large immigration of the last two or three years, the work arising out of which has not yet reached the department.

Mr. DANIEL. I suppose all these new appointments are made after examination by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, we are asking the House to provide the money to make them, and we have no authority to make them, except through the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. DANIEL. Does the hon. minister find any difficulty in getting suitable young men to take these positions? The Postmaster General told us the other night that he had a good deal of difficulty in getting suitable men for the position of railway mail clerk.

Mr. OLIVER. The appointments we have received from the Civil Service Commission are, generally speaking, satisfactory, and we have no serious reason to complain.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I find an allowance of $600 for private secretary. Is that his salary?

Mr. OLIVER. Each department has its own private secretary, and because of the confidential position he holds, and the special work he does he receives an allowance of $600, over and above his ordinary salary.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What is the salary of the man who acts in this case and who is he?

Mr. OLIVER. His salary is $2,300 and he gets $600 in addition, and his name is J. B. Harkin.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Is he the same gentleman who appears in the different departments of civil government, Indian Affairs, and Interior?

Mr. OLIVER. The Indian Department has its own private secretary and there is another for the Interior Department, and there is an allowance in each case of $600 for the private secretary, and each department has its own private secretary.

Mr. ROCHE. Are there any employees who do not get the statutory increase this year?

Mr. OLIVER. We are asking for a statutory increase for all the employees which are not at the limit of their class.

Mr. DANIEL. Does the department make any attempt whatever, to get immigrants into the eastern part of Canada. In the maritime provinces we have been suffering from loss of population, and we want immigration there just as much as in any part of Canada. I know that some time ago complaints were made, that people could not obtain any information whatever in the immigration office in London, with regard to the advantages open to settlers in the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. There was not a paper or a word of any kind about these provinces and no inducement held out to immigrants to settle there, and there are immigrants who would prefer to settle in the east, rather than in the west. I would like the hon. minister to give us some idea as to whether he has been doing anything in that respect lately, and what he has been doing.

Mr. OLIVER. I am sorry that I am not in a position to give any details at the moment. I am only now asking for the votes for civil government and I have not the assistance here which would enable me to reply to my hon. friend's question. But I may say that we have been paying some attention to the maritime provinces during the past two or three years. We have two publications in regard to Nova Scotia, two in regard to Prince Edward Island, and one in regard to New Brunswick, publications that, I think, are fairly creditable, both to the Dominion and to the provinces concerned,—at least, I have never heard of any fault being found with them. I do not think we have any delegate now working in Great Britain from the province of New Brunswick. We have one from Nova Scotia and one from Prince Edward Island, and my information is that the results of their work have been reasonably satisfactory. Of course, the work is very different from that which is done for the rest of the Dominion. While there is the room for population in the maritime province, it is not the same kind of room as is available in the prairie provinces,—it is probably easier to attract immigrants to the prairie provinces than to the maritime provinces. But we realize the desirability of increasing the population of the maritime provinces in a desirable manner, and we are paying some degree of attention to it in the way I have stated. Of course, I can give my hon. friend more detailed information on another occasion.

Mr. DANIEL. Is it the intention of the minister to appoint one official from New Brunswick?

Mr. OLIVER. That is our intention. We had made arrangements for the appointment, but, if my memory serves me well, the gentleman we had chosen would not accept. We have not made arrangements for a delegate from New Brunswick yet, but our desire is to have one or more delegates from each of the maritime provinces.

Mr. DANIEL. When some other of the minister's estimates come up, perhaps he will be in a position to give more detailed information in regard to the efforts to obtain immigration for the maritime provinces.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). I understand that the province of New Brunswick have an immigration agent of their own in the old country, that province and Ontario being the only ones that have such agents. It was stated before the committee that they were working in harmony with the Dominion officials. Does the minister's department lend its assistance to these agents?

Mr. OLIVER. Any literature we publish is at the service of the provincial agent, and I am under the impression that the New Brunswick agent does use the literature we publish.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). Do they get any other, any financial, assistance from the department?

Mr. OLIVER. No.

Mr. BLAIN. Did the minister give the names of the new officials?

Mr. OLIVER. No, we are asking for a vote which will enable us to appoint seventeen.

Mr. BLAIN. Have they been selected?

Mr. OLIVER. No, we are not able to select them. We apply to the commission and they send us the candidates they approve of. Of course, we can reject these candidates after trial if we see fit. But, as I have said, we have found them generally satisfactory.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It is not seventeen, as I understand it; the minister is asking salaries for twenty-one new clerks. But in the vote for contingencies there is an item 'Clerical assistance $15,000.' Last year, this was $10,000.

Mr. OLIVER. The amount voted for clerical assistance under contingencies is for the employment of clerks temporarily engaged during the session or in other times of rush. This is provided for under the Civil Service Act. The seventeen clerks—

Mr. CAMPBELL. Is it not twenty-one?

Mr. OLIVER. There are seventeen new appointments, and four promotions. Provision is made under contingencies for the appointment of extra clerks to take care of the increase of business when it is not considered desirable to make permanent increases in the staff to that extent.

Mr. CAMPBELL. As I understand these appointments, four of them are creations of new clerkships to be filled by men now in the service, leaving their present positions vacant for new appointments. It means twenty-one new appointments, and four of the clerkships are to be filled by men who are now in the service.

Mr. MEIGHEN. I assume from what the minister stated that he is in favour of the extension of the Civil Service Act. He expressed his satisfaction with the results of that Act in the inside service, and I assume that he is in favour of extending it to the outside service. May I ask what progress he has made in persuading his colleagues to adopt the provisions of the Civil Service Act in the outside service. One reason why I urge this is that there appears to be a great disparity between the salaries obtaining in the inside service and those of the outside service. I have not the figures to enable me to speak authoritatively of the salaries in the outside service, but I know from instances in my own city that they are not at all in accordance with what they are in Ottawa. In going through this list I find there is a lot of 16 clerks who are receiving an average salary of $3,400. I question very much if that is fair; I think it is unfair relatively to the salaries obtaining particularly in the outside service in the western country. The criticism I make would apply in both ways; first, that these salaries are too large, and secondly, that in some cases in the smaller towns they are too small. Then, going on to the next item, there are 43 clerks with an average salary of $2,500 each; next, 81 clerks with an average salary of almost $2,000. Now, taking into consideration the very large number, it is impossible to come to the conclusion that so many high priced officials are necessary in the department. I am not criticising the staff the minister has under his control. It is no more than justice to say, as one who has considerable to do with that staff, that I have found them exceedingly courteous and exceedingly fair. But it does appear that there is a tendency here in the city of Ottawa, in this department, and, perhaps, more so in other departments, to run the salaries beyond what would be proportionate to those obtaining throughout the length and breadth of Canada, both in the outside service and in commercial life generally. I fancy that if the minister will look this country over, even in those parts, where living is higher than it is here, he will find that men doing the class of work that is done in his department do not receive salaries at all proportionate to these figures. It seems to me that the government has run wild, and are not considering the financial standing of the average man in Canada when they fix the salaries at such disproportionate figures. I am appealing to one of the members of the government who has had some struggles in life, perhaps, himself, the best one I can appeal to along this line, and I would ask him, first, what progress he is making in convincing his colleagues of the advisability of extending the operation of the Civil Service Act to the outside service, and, secondly, whether he does not think that, all things considered, the salaries obtaining in his department are away out of proportion, not only to those obtaining in the outside service in his own department, but to those allowed among the commercial interests of Canada to men who do the same class of work.

Mr. OLIVER. I regret that, as has so often happened before, it is my misfortune in life to be a disappointment to my friends. I regret to have to say that I have not exerted myself to any serious extent to secure the application of the Civil Service Act to the outside service. It has not appealed to me as likely to be a satisfactory working proposition. As to the respective salaries of the inside and outside service, I am not able from my own knowledge to make comparisons between them, or to compare them with salaries paid in other lines of life. But I would remind my hon. friend that in the Department of the Interior we are transacting the land business of, I might say, half a continent. That business is all concentrated and handled right here in Ottawa. I do not think it can be expected that business of that character and of such volume can be handled satisfactorily except by high priced men. It may be that we are paying higher salaries to some of our officials than their merits or their duties would warrant. But I will say with all candour to the committee that it is, in my poor judgment, by all odds in the best interest of Canada that where we are handling so much and so important business we should pay salaries high enough to get men competent to handle that business. I think that is true economy and that to keep up the standard of efficiency is more important than to keep down the standard of the salaries we pay. As to salaries in the outside service, it may be that they do not compare favourably with those of the inside service in merely setting one column of figures opposite the other. I would not say that the outside service is not in many cases entitled to increase of remuneration. But there is all the difference in the world between the responsible man who is collecting the business and the man who is handling the business after it is collected. It is the difference in responsibility that is being paid for, as I understand it. I know that the salaries paid to the heads of branches here are certainly higher than the salaries paid to men on the outside, but these heads of branches have the responsibility not only for their own work, but for the work that is done by the large staff under them, and also the responsibility for the work that is done by the men in the outside service. We may be paying some of these men more than they are worth, but as an administrator of the public business I would say that the country is pursuing the line of true economy in paying sufficiently well to secure competent service.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Will the minister tell me what progress is being made towards settling the claims of applicants for homesteads in the New Westminster districts?

Mr. OLIVER. There are several different classes of applicants for homesteads in that district. As my hon. friend knows, the matter is one that is complicated with timber matters. He has already brought to the attention of the House one of these cases and there are others. In so far as the applications which are located within timber berths are concerned, we are not in a position to deal with them at the present time. As I have already informed my hon. friend we have had this matter under consideration for a considerable time. We find that there is a very great difference of opinion between the different interests concerned, and we have recently had representations from a deputation from one of the important interests—the lumbermen. They expressed very strong objection to the action that we had taken, and they pressed their views so strongly that we felt it was only right that we should give the matter reconsideration. Until it has become possible to give that reconsideration I cannot say how we will be able to deal with those applications.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I would like to call the minister's attention to the serious position in which he places these settlers. Their case is a very extraordinary one because nearly all of these settlers were placed on the lands by the minister's own agent at New Westminster. They went on these lands with his full knowledge and consent, and in the cases to which I refer particularly the settlers had no reason to suppose that if they fulfilled their homestead duties they would not get their patents. I have had a ream of correspondence from these settlers, and the minister has on his files a ream of correspondence setting forth the position in which they are placed. A sample case that I will relate to him is that of George Bellrose which was the subject of inquiry during this session. This man went on his land in 1896, speaking from recollection. The land was open for settlement. It was not part of a timber berth, but he was told when he made his application that there was reason to suppose that correct surveys would show that an adjoining timber berth overlapped the land upon which he desired to settle. He knew that at the time but he did not know the extent of the overlapping which he had reason to suppose would be very small. It has now been determined that it extends over ten acres of the 160 which he attempted to take up. As to the other 150 acres there is no obstacle whatever to giving that man his patent or dealing with him in some way. The man has built a house, has brought up a family, has made an orchard, has performed all the duties that any settler could be expected to perform, he is one of the best settlers in Chilliwack, he is one of the most respectable men there, and yet in all that time he has not been able to get a title to his land. Worse than that, recently the British Columbia Electric Railway Company had occasion to cross his land. They destroyed his improvements to a large extent, they were perfectly willing to pay for the improvements as they paid all other settlers upon whose land they entered, but they found that they could not deal with Mr. Bellrose because he had no title to the land whatever. He could not be represented, as I understand it, in any negotiations respecting the amount they were to pay for the improvements that they had destroyed, but by some process they arrived at a value of $260. That value which he had created by his labour has been taken from him. The company have paid the money into the Dominion Lands office in New Westminster or elsewhere to the credit of the government. It is not the government's money, it is Mr. Bellrose's money, but he cannot get any satisfaction as to whether or not this money will be paid to him or, if it will be paid, when it will be paid. Worse than that still, Mr. Bellrose is in this position with scores of others that if the minister's new regulations go into effect at any time before he is dealt with he will be deprived of three-quarters of his holding and, as the minister stated in this House a short time ago, under the new regulations the minister will have no power to deal with an applicant for a patent whose application has not been finally disposed of at the time the new regulations go into effect. The minister has been a pioneer himself and he can picture to himself the position in which these scores of applicants are placed through no fault of their own. It may be that the agent at New Westminster acted beyond his authority when he allowed these men to go there. I would not like to urge that upon the minister, however, because I know his agent at New Westminster is a very faithful servant of the department, and has spent the greater part of a lifetime in the service. I know him to be a thoroughly conscientious man, and I am quite sure that he felt that he was doing the right thing by these settlers when he placed them in the position they are now in. I am quite sure that these men were justified in relying upon verbal promises and irregular notes which they had from this agent assuring them from time to time that they were all right and that no person could turn them off their land. If the minister desires to see some of these communications I have in my possession here quite a sufficient number of them to convince him of the nature of the correspondence passing between the agent at New Westminster, and the settlers on the lands. They run something like this. The agent would write to a man who inquired why he could not get his patent: I cannot give you that patent because there is a new survey being made; Mr. So and so, of the department has been up here running lines; those lines are not yet quite completed; his report has gone to Ottawa, and since it has gone there, I have not heard anything about it; I can assure you that just as soon as I get the lines from Ottawa I will attend to your case and we will issue your patent. In several cases, he has gone further and assured the man who was anxious about his holding: You can rely upon it that no person can come between you and your claim. I have correspondence like that in this very Bellrose case, but when they write to the department they are met with an answer to which the signature of high officials of the department is attached, telling them they are mere squatters. Man after man, whose case I have brought to the attention of the department, has received a letter from the office here, that he is a mere squatter on the land, and that the department does not recognize that he has any claim at all. I feel quite sure that the minister has no desire to leave settlers in that position. These men have committed no offence against the Dominion of Canada when they came to the province of British Columbia in answer to the minister's invitation, published in all the newspapers, to come and get land and settle upon it. They come here and they go to the office advertised, they ask the agent where they shall go, that agent puts them on a plot of land and says in the course of time, if you stay there, I will give you your patent. They have been there as long as 15 years in the Bellrose case, and nearly as long in other cases, and these men cannot get their patents. I appeal to the Minister of the Interior that he will give some assurance that these cases will be dealt with. I am not speaking now of men settled on timber lands, where there are large quantities of timber remaining, although I think these men should have some information as to what their rights are. But, there are a number of men settled on lands not covered by timber berths and they simply have been delayed by the unravelling of the red tape of the department, and they have nothing to blame for their lack of patents, except the dilatoriness of the department based upon reasons which I cannot fathom. I would appeal to the Minister of the Interior to make some promise that whatever rights these men have, will not be jeopardized by any new regulations, and that they will remain in their present standing. That is the point of most importance to my mind, namely, to assure these men that the minister will do the square thing by them, and that if they were entitled to 160 acres under the old regulations, they will be dealt with just as effectively for them as if these old regulations had not been altered. It seems to me that is a simple thing for the minister to do, and I believe the minister has authority to do it. If the minister would only make a statement like that, it would bring comfort to a great many deserving settlers in the New Westminster district.

Mr. OLIVER. It would be very unwise for me to make a general statement that might be mistranslated. I wish to deal with all these settlers on a fair basis, but of course there may be a great difference of opinion as to what a fair basis is. With regard to this particular case, that my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) mentions, I cannot understand how, if the railway company damaged Mr. Bellrose's property, the damage should be paid into the department, instead of being paid to Mr. Bellrose.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). That is where it is.

Mr. OLIVER. If that is where the money is now, I can assure the hon. gentleman that Mr. Bellrose will get it without any delay, because I think it is entirely unwarranted that the money should be paid to the department at all, it being, as my hon. friend says, Mr. Bellrose's property that was destroyed.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Subsequent to the questions recently answered by the minister about Mr. Bellrose, I sent him a copy of these answers and he acknowledged their receipt and then mentioned to me for the first time, this $260. He said: I wish you would find out if there is any prospect of my getting the $260 that the electric railway paid into the department for the damage to my property.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not see that the department has any claim on the money in any way, shape or manner, and certainly if Mr. Bellrose is entitled to it, he will get it. As to going beyond that and giving a general statement that would be assumed to be a settlement of this very complicated case, I would not like to do that, and I think my hon. friend would hardly be fair in urging it too strongly.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I ask the minister to say that these cases shall not be prejudiced by the change in the regulations, because these men have done everything in their power to have their cases settled before the regulations were changed. For instance, the present regulations were virtually suspended last July and these men have been pushing their claims actively from July to the present, which would seem to be long enough to secure settlement one way or the other, but nothing has been done.

Mr. OLIVER. I have only apologies to offer for the fact that these matters are not settled. I do not often apologize, but I apologize in this case. There are many divergent interests to be considered and I would not wish to be tied up to a general statement, but any specific case, I would be glad to discuss. Mr. Bellrose apparently, was a squatter before the survey, and owing to the fact that part of the land he claims, is included within the timber berth, he has not so far, obtained entry for that kind, and, therefore, is not in a position to apply for a patent. I do not know what improvements he has, but there is no doubt that whatever improvements he has, he will certainly be maintained in these improvements. There will be no question about his right to that, whatever else there may be, I myself am a pioneer and my sympathies are entirely with the pioneers, but I have to be guided in administration by all the rights and interests that are concerned, and therefore, I do not wish to go too far in making a promise.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Would it be too far for the minister to go, to say that these claims, whatever they are worth, would not be prejudiced by the changes made in the regulations, and that if these men had any rights before the regulations were changed, these rights would remain?

Mr. OLIVER. There has been no change in the regulations. We proposed to make a change, but the change has not been made and I am not able to say just whether the change that we propose, will be made. So far as that is concerned, all the rights that were at any time existing still exist without being affected in any way by the proposed regulations which were expected to go into effect last July, but which never did go into effect.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). May I go further with the minister, and ask him if he will remove the inhibition he has placed on his agent at Westminster from dealing in any way with these applications under the old regulations, because while it is technically correct that the new regulations have not gone into effect, in another sense it is not accurate to say that, because they have been advertised as something that may go into effect at any moment, and are only temporarily suspended. As I understand it, the agent has explicit instructions not to do anything at all under the old regulations. I know that is the way he understands it—whether he has got those instructions or not—because he tells every person who goes in there, that he cannot give them any information; he cannot dot an I or cross a T or do anything that may be required to perfect any case before him. That is what these men are concerned about. If they had no rights before, they would have none now. But they see it advertised that while they have settled on 160 acres, cleared, improved and fenced it, they are likely to get patents for only 40 acres. I am sure the minister does not want to bring a man to this country on the expectation of getting 160 acres, and then pay him off with 40 acres.

Mr OLIVER. If a man has settled inside a timber berth or partly inside a timber berth, I do not know how far we would be warranted in recognizing him as a legitimate squatter. If he settled entirely outside of the timber berth. I presume we would be entitled to recognize any rights he might be presumed to have; but I do not give any assurance on that point. The assurance I am quite willing to give is that any settler outside of a timber berth, that is a man who has not trespassed on the rights of another, will get consideration for all the improvements he has made. I may say that our agent at New Westminster, although he is an old servant of the department, and I believe with the best intentions, does not perhaps fully appreciate the intricacies of the situation, and we are at present taking measures to clean up the matter and to see that people get their rights. I do not think I would be warranted in going further than that.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). It seems to me that the minister might say that he would implement the promises of his agent at New Westminster, which is all that I am aiming to get. In a great many of these cases the settler has the specific assurance of the agent at New Westminster, the only man on whom the settlers can rely, and who, so far as they are concerned, is the government of Canada. They have letters from him assuring them that they will be all right. Now the minister says they will be all wrong, because his agent placed them on timber berths. The settlers did not know that he had no authority to do that; all they know is that they cannot get the papers until the timber lease is disposed of. They are quite content to wait a long time if they think they will eventually get their land; but when told that they will only get one-fourth, and that somebody else will get three-fourths of the land when divided, they feel that that is not a fair position to be placed in. It savours of repudiation of contracts which they have made with the government agent at New Westminster. The only fault that can be found with the agent is that he has been too long in the service. He has aged rapidly in late years, and is now very feeble, and the task of settling these cases is at present beyond him, because he is not physically fit to go out and make the inspections.

Mr. OLIVER. I am quite aware that the physical infirmities of the agent have been growing upon him recently, and he is not physically able to deal with these intricate and difficult questions, and we are taking measures to have them dealt with. The clerk of the department who is in charge of that work has gone to New Westminster to try to straighten them out. As to the word of the agent binding the department, the position taken by my hon. friend is to a great extent correct; but where the agent has seen fit to locate a settler within a timber limit, we cannot guarantee to the settler that we will step in and take from the berth holder the right for which we have taken his money. If the agent made such a promise to any settler, he stepped outside not only of his authority, but of his right, and however willing we might be, I do not think we would be able to implement a promise of that kind to the full. All I can assure my hon. friend is that we will take into consideration the promises made by our agent to the settlers, and will implement every promise so far as it seems reasonable.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Is this $7,000 for sundries to be expended in sending some one out in behalf of these settlers?

Mr. OLIVER. No. That amount relates only to the travelling expenses, telegrams, postage stamps and other sundries required at the head office. It has nothing to do with the service in the west.

Contingencies, $67,000.

Mr. OLIVER. This amount is made up of clerical assistance, $15,000; printing and stationery, $45,000; sundries, $7,000. The clerical assistance is required for the service of thirty temporary clerks whom it will likely be necessary to employ during the fiscal year 1911-12. These temporary clerks, in accordance with an amendment to the Civil Service Act passed last session, can be employed for a period of six months instead of four months as heretofore. We get them from the Civil Service Commission, just as we do permanent clerks. We are asking for provision for that many, but we may not require them. If not, the money will not be used. We expect, however, a very large increase in our work during the coming year.

Immigration, $1,066,250.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox and Addington). I think it is the duty of the hon. minister to make a general statement such as the Minister of Railways gives us before his estimates are passed. This is a very large expenditure, and it is now too late to discuss it properly.

Mr. OLIVER. I would be very glad to make a general statement to-night but of course I have no desire to force the House to go on.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox and Addington). If my hon. friend would fix a day for the discussion, that would be a considerable convenience.

Mr. OLIVER. Unless something unforseen should occur, we will say Friday next.

Some resolutions reported.

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. PERLEY. The leader of the opposition has requested me to give the following notice on his behalf: As the pending reciprocity proposals have not been carried into effect by the Congress of the United States at the session which has just terminated, he intends to move on Wednesday next for the postponement of the further consideration of these proposals in the parliament of Canada.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.23 p.m.

Mr. OLIVER.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, March 7, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 133) to incorporate the Alberta Saskatchewan Life Insurance Company.—Mr. Ruttan.

Bill (No. 135) respecting the Western Alberta Railway Company.—Mr. Douglas.

Bill (No. 136) to correct a clerical error in the title of the French version of Chapter 142 of the statutes of 1910.—Mr. Brodeur.

THE QUEBEC BRIDGE.

Mr. MONK. Before the orders of the day are called, I would like to inquire from the government if the contract for the reconstruction of the Quebec bridge has been granted, and upon whose recommendation. I understand there has been a division among the board of advisers?

Mr. GRAHAM. The contract for the Quebec bridge has not been signed. When it is concluded, it will be on the recommendation of the board of engineers as established under order in council, and approved by this House.

Mr. MONK. Do I understand that the contract has been awarded for the reconstruction, irrespective of signatures?

Mr. GRAHAM. There are details in connection with that contract that it would not be in the interest of the public to mention at the present time. The only reply I can give to my hon. friend is the one I have given, that the contract is not yet signed.

Mr. MONK. I would like to ask the government, because we understand that there has been a disagreement among the members of the board, whether the chairman of the board has been furnished with a copy of the recommendation made by his colleagues, and if he has been asked to have a report upon that?

Mr. GRAHAM. The report of the board, the majority of the board, became part of the record of that board, and so long as the chairman was chairman he had full access to the minutes of that board, as full as any other member. Any report that has been made since he was chairman has not of course been submitted to him.

Mr. MONK. I beg leave to ask a further question in connection with the same matter. Was not the tender of the Imperial Bridge Company, the English Company, the lowest tender?

Mr. GRAHAM. In a very short time I expect to have this matter closed up so far as the signing of the contract is concerned, when all papers in connection with it will be laid on the table.

THE FARMERS' BANK.

Mr. FOSTER. I am afraid my hon. friend the Minister of Finance has not understood my request. What I wanted was a transcript of the whole minutes of the Treasury Board of November 30, not simply the extract referring to the matter of the Farmers' Bank, also, all the component members of the Treasury Board, not simply those who were present at that meeting.

Mr. FIELDING. If there were other minutes of the same date, I will be happy to bring down a supplementary return; and also to indicate therein the other members composing the board at that time.

INTERNATIONAL WATERWAYS COMMISSION.

Mr. MONK. I have been requested to ask the government if it is true that Sir George C. Gibbons has been offered and has accepted the chairmanship of the International Waterways Commission; and also, if there have been any other appointments?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend is in rather an inquisitive mood to-day. I can inform him with regard to the question he has just put that Sir George Gibbons has not been appointed to the chairmanship of the Waterways Commission, and cannot be appointed, nor can any one else, until the Bill which is before the House has been passed into law.

WAYS AND MEANS—RECIPROCAL TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES.

House again in Committee of Ways and Means.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). Mr. Chairman, it is now a full month and more since my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) laid upon the table of the House the agreement which he and my hon. friend and colleague the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) had concluded with the President of the United States, for the improvement of the commercial relations which have long existed between us and our neighbours. From that date to this that agreement has been reviewed, discussed and canvassed, in the press of the country, in meetings of public bodies, and in parliament; and unless I greatly misapprehend the trend of public opinion, unless I fail to read aright the signs of the times, I think I can venture the assertion that the policy which is therein involved has met with the approbation, nay, with the enthusiastic approbation, of a majority of the Canadian people.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh. Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Against this statement of mine I understand that I hear some protest. I shall not stop, Mr. Chairman, to discuss the merits of the respective opinions on that point which we on this side and our friends on the other side of the House entertain. No word of mine, I am sure, would change their views, and I know full well that they will persevere in their views until the evening of the next polling day. I am perfectly aware that the policy has not been universally accepted, that it has met in some quarters, and I may say rather unexpected quarters, rather stubborn opposition. It is a well known fact that at present an organization has been created in the cities of Montreal and Toronto for the purpose of fighting this agreement. To this I have no exception to take, those who do this are perfectly within their rights. Neither will I underestimate the importance of such a movement, and still less the importance of the men who have placed themselves at the head of it. But even whilst fully recognizing the importance of that movement, I do not think there is any serious cause for alarm. General Grant in his Memoirs narrates that during the Mexican war he was in the army of the United States as a young lieutenant. He was riding towards the front in company with a friend. when all of a sudden they heard in front of them a most unearthly howling of wolves. His friend asked him how many he thought there were in the pack, and not wishing to exaggerate he said he thought there must be at least 20. His friend smiled and said nothing. In a few minutes they came in sight of the wolves and there were just two, which had made all that noise. General Grant observes that he thought of this incident in after life when he heard the noise made by some disappointed men, and he adds they were always more numerous before they were counted. I believe that what is true of the United States is also true of this country. Of the objections that we have heard to this agreement some there are which seem to me to lack singularly in force or appositeness; others on the contrary are worthy of consideration, not from any inherent strength, but from the circumstance that they are inspired by a strange misconception as to what would be the result and the consequences of the agreement which is now before us. The wonder to me is that there should be any objections at all. Who can deny that we have now reached a stage in our relations with our neighbours which all parties in this House have been seeking for the last 40 years? Who can deny that if, 40 years ago, in the early days of this confederation, if 30 years ago, or 20 years ago, or even 14 years ago, when we took office, it had been possible to obtain such an abatement in the American tariff as is embodied in this agreement, there would have been universal rejoicing in this country. The fact, Sir, cannot, be denied, the evidence of it is to be found in this that the two parties into which the people of this country are divided, apart on all other questions, were always agreed in the opinion that the relations which existed between us and our neighbours, were a blot on our common civilization. There is further proof in this that these two parties in succession, wore a good deal of shoe leather travelling from Ottawa to Washington in order to obtain, if possible, an improvement in these relations. Still better evidence is to be found in this that when Sir John Macdonald introduced the National Policy in 1878 in this House he did it as a means to an end, with a view of obtaining ultimately reciprocity of trade with our neighbours. The other day I listened with pleasure to my hon. friend the member for Peel (Mr. Blain) narrating the manner in which the National Policy had been brought into the world. He dilated upon everything, he stated everything except this thing, the last of all, that this was, in the mind of Sir John Macdonald, to be a means to the end of obtaining reciprocity of trade which up to that time had been denied to us. My hon. friend's memory was short upon this, the memory of his friends is also short and perhaps it would not be amiss if I read him and his friends the motion of Sir John A. Macdonald, if only to show him the immensity of the distance which now separates him and his party and its leaders, from that party and its leaders of that day. This was Sir John Macdonald's motion:

That this House is of opinion that the welfare of Canada requires the adoption of a national policy, which, by a judicious readjustment of the tariff, will benefit and foster the agricultural, the mining, the manufacturing and other interests of the Dominion; that such a policy will retain in Canada thousands of our fellow countrymen now obliged to expatriate themseleves in search of the employment denied them at home; that it will restore prosperity to our struggling industries, now so badly depressed, will prevent Canada from being made a sacrifice market, will encourage and develop an active interprovincial trade and moving—as it ought to do—in the direction of a reciprocity of tariffs with our neighbours, so far as the varied interests of Canada may demand, will greatly tend to procure for this country, eventually, a reciprocity of trade.

Here was the policy laid down by the party in 1878 and carried into effect the following year, in 1879, when the Conservative party had been placed in office upon that very identical policy. In the Act bringing that policy into effect, section 6, of the Tariff Act, 1879, was embodied the following permanent offer of reciprocity:

Any or all of the following articles, that is to say: animals of all kinds, green fruit, hay, straw, bran, seeds of all kinds, vegetables (including potatoes and other roots), plants, trees and shrubs, coal and coke, salt, hops, wheat, peas and beans, barley, rye, oats, Indian corn, buckwheat and all other grain, flour of wheat and flour of rye, Indian meal and oatmeal, and flour of meal of any other grain, butter, cheese, fish (salted or smoked), lard, tallow, meats (fresh, salted or smoked), and lumber, may be imported into Canada free of duty, or at a less rate of duty than is provided by this Act, upon proclamation of the Governor in Council, which may be issued whenever it appears to his satisfaction that similar articles from Canada may be imported into the United States free of duty.

That was in 1879, and we are now in 1911. And what was sought for in 1879 we may now have, and yet men there are who doubt and hesitate and falter and who would erase thirty years of our past history from the book. Pages after pages could be quoted from speeches delivered by members of the Conservative party in which the American tariff was denounced as unjust, as unfair, as hostile, and now that it is in our power to remove the injustice, the unfairness, and the hostility, men there are who rise against us and tell us: Stop, proceed no further, let the injustice remain, let the hostility remain because upon injustice and hostility the Canadian confederation depends for its existence.

It may be asked: What is the cause of this change of attitude, and how is it that men who all their lives have been in favour of the policy which we now propose to parliament are all of a sudden found to be against it? The other day my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster), in his address to this House said: that the Conservative party had in 1891 said good-bye to reciprocity. I must confess that I was staggered at that statement coming from the hon. gentleman, because my reading of history is that the Conservative government of which my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) was a member, and an important member, when they went out of office in 1896, were just as much in favour of reciprocity as they had been at any period of their lives. I must say that the memory of my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) is not always uniformly good—it is good sometimes, but not so good at other times—and I hope my hon. friend will not be offended if I tell him that his memory on this point is singularly treacherous. Shall I review with him the history of his past career upon this point, but before I do so it would be better if I should give to the House the very language he made use of a few days ago:

In 1891 the Liberal-Conservative party made its last endeavour for reciprocity with the United States of America, and after the negotiations were ended and we returned home to Canada, the Liberal-Conservative party declared itself as done with reciprocity from the United States of America, and that henceforth its duty was to develop Canada on the lines of its own self-dependence, and to look to the British market as the great, steady, stable market for our products. The old heresy had not yet been quite purged from the Liberal party, which pursued the quest until 1897. They went to Washington; they tried their efforts; they failed. They came back, and they made declaration in this House of Commons and elsewhere, that as far as they, as a party, were concerned, they were done with reciprocity negotiations with the United States of America.

Now, Sir, let us review the history of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) upon this question. He is aware, as everybody is aware, and no doubt he remembers it very well, that in 1891 parliament was dissolved by the government of the day, of which my hon. friend was a member, for the purpose of placing before the Canadian people the doctrine of reciprocity—not unrestricted reciprocity, as was contended by the Liberal party, but a limited reciprocity, a renewal of the treaty of 1854. The Conservatives carried the elections upon that policy, and as soon as the elections were over my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) and his government made a bee-line for Washington to interview Mr. James G. Blaine, who was then Secretary of State for the United States. But, the excursion of my hon. friend on that occasion was not a happy one. Julius Caesar said: I came, I saw, I conquered; but my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) might have said after his trip to Washington: I went, I was seen, I came back; he was ushered in and shown out. But the following year—not abashed at all, not at all discouraged by the cool reception of the previous year, the following year, in 1892, the hon. gentleman made another trip to Washington, and though he was more cordially received on that occasion, still the results were no better. Then, I suppose it is that my hon. friend would have us believe that the Conservative party and the Conservative government, after this last trip to Washington, abandoned for ever the doctrine of reciprocity. On that I take issue with the hon. member (Mr. Foster), and I will show him how treacherous his memory is. In 1894 Sir John Thompson, then Prime Minister, made this statement on the floor of the House, speaking from the very place I now occupy:

I may say, Mr. Chairman, that communications were indirectly made with the United States government to the effect that Canada would be glad to know of any desire or willingness on the part of the United States government to take measures towards the extension of trade between the two countries, and that Canada would be willing to reciprocate with due regard to the interests and industries of Canada, and with due regard to the revenue which would be necessary to Canada. At a subsequent stage an officer of this government went to Washington for the purpose of seeing whether it was the desire of the United States government or of the committee then having charge of the subject in the House of Representatives, to enter into communication with the government of Canada on the subject of tariff concessions on either side of the line.

Remember, that was in 1894. And, my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) also spoke in that debate. I may say that the occasion of the debate was a charge against the Conservative party by Mr. Charlton, then a prominent member of the Liberal party, that the Conservative government was insincere in its efforts to obtain reciprocity. And, the hon. member (Mr. Foster) spoke for about an hour to convince the House that the charge of Mr. Charlton was unjust to him, that he was perfectly sincere in wishing for reciprocity with our neighbours, and, though I cannot quote the whole speech, I may with propriety cite a few sentences of his peroration:

When they, the people of the United States, look over the items in our tariff as it shall have passed this House, they will find that line after line, article after article, grade after grade, we have given them a better chance to get into our market than they have given us to get into their market; consequently legislative reciprocity so far as trade is concerned, shines out from the propositions that the government put before the House to-day in a far greater degree than it does out of the legislation which they have proposed, and which is in progress through their Congress.

Now, Mr Chairman, you will see at once how treacherous is the memory of my hon. friend (Mr. Foster). He told us the other day that the Conservative party had said good-bye to reciprocity in 1891, but in 1894 he was proposing to this House resolutions from which, to quote his own words: reciprocity shines out brightly before the eyes of the American public. Then, in 1894, my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) introduced a revision of the tariff, and I have here the Act entitled 'The Customs Tariff of 1894.' It is quite true, and I must give my hon. friend this credit, that in that last Tariff Act which he submitted to this House he removed from it the old standing offer of reciprocity which had been introduced in 1879, but that old section of the Act which I have read to the House and which was introduced in 1879 if put aside was immediately reproduced by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) in another form, Section 7 of the Act which my hon. friend's government passed in 1894 contains this disposition:

> The whole or part of the duties hereby imposed upon fish and other products of the fisheries may be remitted as respects either the United States or Newfoundland, or both, upon proclamation of the Governor in Council, which may be issued whenever it appears to his satisfaction that the governments of the United States and Newfoundland, or of either of them, have made changes in their tariffs of duties imposed upon articles imported from Canada, in reduction or repeal of the duties in force in the said countries respectively.

Here, then, in the tariff of 1894, is an offer to the United States of reciprocity in fish and fish products. Here are other offers in the same Act: Section 8—eggs to be free, when free in the United States; section 10—shingles and pulp wood to be free in Canada when free in the United States; section 11—green or ripe apples, beans, buckwheat, pease, potatoes, rye, rye flour, hay and other vegetables to be free in Canada when free in the United States; section 12—barley and Indian corn to be free in Canada when free in the United States. Sir, this is the way my hon. friend turned his back upon reciprocity in 1894. This is the statute of 1894; and in 1896, when my hon. friend's government went out of office, that was the policy of himself and his party.

My hon. friend was also good enough to review our career, and he stated that in 1897, when we came into office, the old heresy of reciprocity had not been rubbed out of ourselves. It had not been rubbed out of his own composition either. But when he said that we abandoned the policy of reciprocity in 1897, I take issue with him altogether. We did not abandon our policy of reciprocity in 1897. We made application to the United States, but when we found that we had been rebuked, that our advances had not been received as favourably as we thought they should have been, then we thought it was consistent with our dignity not to make any further efforts to obtain reciprocity; and I stated then, speaking for the government, not that we had changed our views on this subject, not that we had ceased to believe that it would be in the interest of the country to have reciprocity, but that we would make no more advances to our neighbours to gain that boon, but that if it came, it would come from them, and not from us. This is the explanation of the change we have had—no change of principle or policy, but simply a position which we thought to be more consistent with our own dignity.

Why, Sir, do I state these facts? Is it simply for the purpose of showing my hon. friend that his memory is at fault? No, Sir. I state these facts to show that the position taken by my hon. friend, that we have no mandate to negotiate with our neighbours, has no foundation whatever. My hon. friend tried to show, from certain words of mine, at the last Imperial conference in 1907, that we had abandoned our position on reciprocity. The words which he quoted were as follows:

> There was at one time wanted reciprocity with them (the United States) but our efforts and our offers were negatived and put aside, and we have said good-bye to that trade, and we have put all our hopes upon the British trade now.

My hon. friend concluded from these words that there was an abandonment of our policy; but my hon. friend did not do me justice in quoting simply part of a sentence. No one knows better than my hon. friend that it is hardly fair to a man to extract a sentence from a whole passage and quote simply that. I will quote the whole passage, and then the House can draw its own conclusion. This is what I said at the conference:

> Between the preferential tariff and the general tariff we have now an intermediate tariff. The object of this intermediate tariff is to enter into negotiations with other communities to have trade arrangements with them. It has been supposed that this was to hit our American neighbours. With our American neighbours we should be only too glad to trade on a better footing than at the present time. We are next door neighbours and in many things we can be their best market, as in many things they can be our best market. We should be glad to trade with them, but it never was intended, nor thought at the time, that this intermediate tariff could apply to the United States. There was at one time wanted reciprocity with them, but our efforts and our offers were negatived and put aside, and we have said good-bye to that trade, and we have put all our hopes upon the British trade now.

Sir, there is a different meaning in the words which I uttered at the conference from the meaning sought to be conveyed by my hon. friend. I was not surprised, however, at the attitude taken by my hon. friend on that occasion. He and I have sat opposite one another for a long time; he knows me and I know him. But I must say that I was more than astonished when I heard my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Sifton) the other day take exactly the same position. My hon. friend from Brandon, in the course of an able speech, for which everybody will give him his due, said that he had long ago had his doubts about reciprocity, that he had begun to doubt about it as far back as the campaign of 1891. I believe that my hon. friend's conversion has not been so gradual. It has been more sudden than he thinks himself, because my hon. friend was at the Liberal convention of 1893, and he agreed to this resolution which was adopted as part of the policy of the party to which he then belonged:

That a fair and liberal reciprocity treaty would develop the great natural resources of Canada, would enormously increase the trade and commerce between the two countries, would tend to encourage friendly relations between the two peoples, would remove many causes which have in the past provoked irritation and trouble to the governments of both countries, and would promote those kindly relations between the empire and the republic which afford the best guarantee for peace and prosperity;

That the Liberal party is prepared to enter into negotiations with a view to obtaining such a treaty, including a well considered list of manufactured articles, and we are satisfied that any treaty so arranged will receive the assent of Her Majesty's government, without whose approval no treaty can be made.

My hon. friend from Brandon, like my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster), has asserted that we have abandoned that policy. I am not conscious of it. It has been dormant, I admit, because we had taken the ground that we would make no more efforts to obtain from our neighbours what had been refused to us. But I deny altogether that there was ever any change by the Liberal party of the policy they laid down in 1893. My hon. friend from Brandon also took the ground, as my hon. friend from North Toronto had done before him, that we had no mandate on this subject from the people, in the last general election. It is true that in 1900, 1904 and 1908 the question of reciprocity was not an issue at all because at that time there was no difference of opinion between the Liberal party and the Conservative party upon that question. There was none so far as I knew, and so far as everybody knew.

I take issue with my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) and my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Sifton) when they tell us that the parliament of Canada is debarred from dealing with any question which has not been discussed at the previous general election. That is not in accord with the constitutional history of Great Britain or of Canada either, as I have read it. Let me ask my hon. friends what mandate had the government of Lord Elgin in 1853 when it went to Washington to obtain reciprocity? Had that question ever been put before the people? Had it been an issue the last time the people's representatives had gone before them? Not at all. Let me ask, further, what mandate had the government of 1864 to put through parliament the resolution which proposed confederation? Had the question of confederation ever been put before the people of united Canada? No, not a word about it had ever been heard. The only question then raised was that of representation by population. Yet the government of Sir John Macdonald and the Hon. Geo. Brown —because the two men were united on that occasion—brought in a resolution which was nothing more nor less than a complete transformation of our then condition. When Canada assented, in 1871, to the fishery stipulations in the Washington treaty of that year, had that question ever been put before the people? No, it was unknown to them. It never had been debated before. In the face, therefore, of these precedents, it is childish for any man to challenge the right of this government to follow the course it is doing.

But, again, I ask what is the cause of the change of attitude which we see on the other side of the House? That cause cannot but be flattering to this government. The only reason given is that Canada today is prosperous as she never was before. If Canada were still in the position in which we found it when we took office in 1896, with its vast fertile lands still unoccupied and untilled, with its natural resources dormant as they had been since the early days of creation, with its transportation facilities still in the most rudimentary stage, with industry stagnant, with agriculture unremunerative—were Canada still in that position, I have no doubt that to-day the policy we are proposing would be received with favour and the air would resound with pæans of exultation. But instead of being in that condition the country is prosperous, extraordinarily prosperous, and we are told by hon. gentlemen opposite: Do not go any further, fold your arms and let well enough alone. Well, what is this country? What are we? Is this Canada, or is this China?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The Chinese have left well enough alone for 4,000 years. 4,000 years ago they were probably the first nation on earth, and so satisfied were they that they refused to move. They let well enough alone for 4,000 years. If a reformer showed his head among them he was ruthlessly put down and told to let well enough alone. It is said—and I believe it is historically true—that gunpowder was invented by an ingenious Chinaman, but the people of China never used gunpowder for the defence of their territory, though often exposed to invasion. They depended on the great dragon to sweep off their enemies from the face of the earth by the fire from his eyes. They let well enough alone. It was an ingenious Chinaman who invented the compass, but they never used it for navigation, and for 4,000 years their little junks circulated around their shores, never getting away from the sight of land. They let well enough alone.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. And we are asked to adopt this Chinese policy. But, Sir, this is Canada, and we shall have to go on whether hon. gentlemen opposite will follow or not. We will drag them on, even against their will.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That is our policy. We must go on. Some years ago a young lady showed me her album, which, as a young girl, she had shown to Sir John Macdonald, and asked him to write in it the motto of his life. And he wrote on it this motto: Hope on, hope ever. How far the Conservative party is from that motto to-day!

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. But we shall go on with our policy. Our policy is 'advance,' and if it be wrong we shall submit willingly to the judgment of the Canadian people, and to the punishment which ought to be given every man who brings in a wrong policy. But this is our policy. Our policy has been, is, and will be, so long as the Canadian people continue to place in us the confidence they have shown us during 15 years—and that policy is to seek markets wherever markets are to be found. We are above all an agricultural people, our chief wealth is the growth of those products of the temperate zone, fruits, cereals and vegetables, and it is our boast—not an idle boast, but a boast founded on actual experience—that in cereals, vegetables and fruits we can, without exaggeration, beat the world.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. At the northern extremity of the temperate zone, our cereals have more strength, our fruit has better flavour, our vegetables have more delicacy than similar productions from other parts of the world, and under free competition, not barred in any way by tariff legislation, they will displace all other products on the tables of the wealthy. Our object to-day is to open the door of the American market, to open the door of a nation of 90,000,000, which has been closed to us for the last 50 years, and when we are now on the eve of reaching that long sought goal, we are met by objection after objection, we are deluged by a plethora of sophistry, we are told that if such an arrangement is to go into effect and Canadian vegetables, cereals, and fruits can cross the boundary line and be eaten free of duty by the American people it will be all over with the Canadian confederation, and even the British Empire will reel and rock upon its foundations.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Sir, let us discard these freaks of unreasoning panic, let us approach this question from the point of view of common sense, from the basis of first principles.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Let us, I say, approach the question from the point of view of common sense—and I am glad that my remarks on that point evoke some response from the other side; we will see how far they will go. If, Sir, I were to state to my hon. friends on the other side that amongst civilized mankind, all those who work, work with the object of disposing of the product of their labour, I should be told, this is a truism that is running in the street. If I were to add that the man who works has the legitimate ambition of getting the greatest possible remuneration for his labour, I should be told, this is a mere truism. If I were to say that the man who works, will be better remunerated the more clients he has, seeking the products of his labour, I should be told, this is a truism. And yet, this is the very thing, this very truism, which is embodied in the proposition now before you. All that we ask under these resolutions is to obtain for the man who works in the fields, the best possible remuneration for his labour. And does that proposition require any defence? Is it not simply on the line of common sense? Is it not the first of all principles? How, then, is it that it is not accepted at once? I will give the reasons. I will try to be fair in giving these reasons. But, before I proceed further, I must say that it seems to me that the House of Commons and the Canadian people at large, owe a debt of gratitude to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and my hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) for having obtained from our neighbours, such an advantageous arrangement, and having obtained it without the sacrifice of any Canadian interest. Mr. Chairman, here perhaps I may be permitted to say that, in my opinion, the discussion which has taken place up to this time, has been carried on upon a high level. Of course, I do not agree with my hon. friends on the other side who have taken part in this discussion, but I pay them the tribute, one and all, of having carried on the discussion in a fair manner, in a manner which, I think, deserves acknowledgment on our parts, and reflects credit upon themselves. I am sorry that to this I have to make an exception in the person of my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster). My hon. friend from North Toronto was not satisfied to criticise the arrangement, in which, indeed, he would have been within his right, but he was unduly unfair in trying to depreciate not only the agreement, but those who had made it. He spoke of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, and my hon. friend the Minister of Customs, as being very ordinary men. He repeated this two or three times, speaking pointedly of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. Well, if my hon. friend from North Toronto has not learned it yet, he may learn it now, that if he had to his credit one-half the achievements of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, he would have reason to be more proud of his career than he can be. Then, he went over the members of the cabinet, this one and that one, and at last he came to my poor humble self; and of my poor humble self he spoke as follows:

> Men of such fine financial mind and business acumen as the right hon. gentleman who leads the government and the party.

I have never posed as a man of fine financial mind or of business acumen; but when I see the pretensions put up by some men who dabble in finance and business, I am surprised at my modesty. If I had dabbled in finance and business, I am prepared to admit, I should have perhaps made a sad mess of it. But I could not have been worse than my hon. friend. If, after having posed as a business man and financier, I had nothing to show but a record of failures, I would go and hide myself for very shame, and be very chary to throw stone into other people's gardens, for fear they should be returned to me with compound interest.

I stated a moment ago that the agreement we made, is simply to get better prices for the product of the Canadian farmers. This is a proposition so obvious that I am surprised it should have received the treatment it has received on the part of our friends opposite. But the objections made to this agreement are not to be found within the four corners of the same; they are all based upon extraneous grounds. The opposition, the Conservative party, are against this agreement because, as they tell us, it will produce consequences which will be deplorable for this country,—I have listened with some care to nearly all the speeches that have been delivered in this House on this question, and those which I had not the opportunity to hear, I have read with equal care; and I think I am fair in stating that the objections made to this arrangement are fourfold. The first objection is that the effect will be to deflect the carrying trade from Canadian channels to American channels. The second is that it will destroy our natural resources. The third is that it will imperil our industries. And the fourth—and certainly not the least—is that it will dissolve our autonomy and land us ultimately in the American Republic. I think I have there fairly stated what are the objections of hon. gentlemen on the other side; and the House will perhaps permit me to discuss them. Let us take the first—the objection that this arrangement is going to deflect trade from Canadian channels ino American channels. This question is to be discussed from two points of view; from the point of view of goods going from Canada into the United States for the purpose of being carried over to Great Britain, and goods going from Canada to the United States for consumption therein. Now, regarding the first, those goods sent from Canada to the United States, to be carried to Great Britain, in what way does this arrangement undo the system now in existence? It does not affect it one iota. At the present time, goods go from Canada to be shipped from Boston, New York or any American port without paying duty. In the same way, American goods come to Canada to be shipped out by Montreal, Halifax, or St. John without paying duty. A cargo of wheat can leave Winnipeg for New York, and there be discharged and put on board ship without duty being demanded. A cargo of grain can leave Minneapolis to be taken to Montreal and shipped thence without paying duty. This is by virtue of the bondage privilege which has been given by each government to the other, for the purposes of transportation. It has been in existence for something like sixty years, and I have never heard a complaint that it was unfair to one party or to the other. There was a time when I felt nervous on reflecting that the bonding privilege was simply an act of good will on the part of the United States towards us. That was the time when we had no communication of our own to the sea. But now that we have a continuous communication on Canadian soil from sea to sea, we feel that the United States can remove the bonding privilege at any time they please, and if they do so, they will suffer more than we shall. But Sir, our condition in that respect is absolutely safe, whether this treaty passes or not.

Now, Sir, it does not follow that for my part I am opposed to the policy of retaining in our own channels Canadian trade; on the contrary, I am very solicitous in that respect, and I think I can show by the records of this government that we have favoured the building of lines through Canadian territory from east to west with the intent of keeping trade in our own channels. But I may say this to the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden), and to the member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton) especially, that if they expect to keep trade within Canadian channels by legislative enactment, by trade impediments, they make the greatest of all mistakes, a mistake which was tried once and had to be abandoned. Sir, when the Canadian Pacific railway was created in 1881 it was with the avowed policy of creating a channel of communication between east and west; the policy was to keep, so far as legislation could do it, Canadian trade in Canadian channels. Now my hon. friend from North Toronto commented upon the aspect of our policy rather severely, and with great force of language as to the results upon the credit of Canada, as to those who had invested their money in these enterprises, when they learn that by this legislation the lines east and west could be diverted from channels running east and west to channels running north and south. This is the language which the hon. member for North Toronto made use of on that occasion, and I quote it in view of what I shall say a few minutes later:

> Take the capital invested in your east and west lines of communication: Was it ever dreamed in Britain, Sir, that the time would come when a change of policy would be inaugurated by the men who petitioned for the money, who pled for the investment of capital and got it at long last? Was it ever dreamed that when this capital was severely fixed and invested, the long lateral lines of railway should be tapped every few miles by communication to draw off the trade intended for them to southern routes and do away with the long haul of the east and west lines?

My hon. friend should have had in his mind when he spoke that way the circumstance that in the contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company precautions had been taken to keep the trade flowing east and west. In that contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company the following clause was inserted as clause 15:

> For twenty years from the date hereof no line of railway shall be authorized by the Dominion parliament to be constructed south of the Canadian Pacific railway from any point at or near the Canadian Pacific railway, except such line as shall run southwest or to the westward of southward, not to within fifteen miles of latitude 49.

Mark the words. The men who invested their money in that enterprise had this inducement, that the Canadian government would not for twenty years permit any railway to be built south of the line of the Canadian Pacific railway, and that for fifteen miles south of the boundary line there should be absolutely no railway at all. Therefore, under those circumstances, trade could not be diverted from Canadian to American channels, there could be no possible communication. That was the extreme precaution which was taken by the government of that day, that was a restriction upon the energy, upon the enterprise of the people of the west which was to last for twenty years. Under that restriction the capitalists of the world were invited to put their money into the enterprise, and they did it, upon the faith of the Canadian government. How long did this restriction last? Did it last twenty years? Sir, it lasted just six years, and at last, after six years, the Canadian government had to recall that legislation. And how did it occur? This is one of the most dramatic pages of the history of our country, and no one knows it better than my hon. friend from Brandon. I do not know if he was then in the legislature, but I know he was a young politician, and he could not have been indifferent to what was taking place. There was a restriction put upon the energy, upon the enterprise of the people of the west, and of the province of Manitoba in particular. The people of Manitoba wanted power to trade north and south, they wanted to trade with their neighbours, the American people, they wanted to have railway communication with them. But there was a statute, there was an Act of parliament, there was the authority of the Canadian government which prevented them from trading with their neighbours to the south, and the Canadian government attempted for six years to keep that legislation in force. The legislature of Manitoba passed Acts chartering railways, allowing them to cross that zone of territory which the government was attempting to reserve from civilization and from the benefits thereof. The legislature of Manitoba wanted railways to communicate north and south, they chartered railways to that effect, and these charters were disallowed one after another, disallowed in 1881, disallowed in 1882, disallowed in 1883, disallowed in 1884, disallowed in 1885, disallowed in 1886, disallowed in 1887. Year after year the legislature of Manitoba petitioned this government, petitioned parliament, to do away with this restriction, and year after year that prayer was denied. At last in 1887, after this restriction put upon their energy, the government of Manitoba, with the assent of the whole people of Manitoba, passed another Act authorizing a railway to run from Winnipeg to the boundary line where it could reach the American system of railways, and this Act was disallowed. The province passed beyond that disallowance, and proceeded to build the railway, though there was no legislation empowering them to do so. It was practically an act of rebellion. My hon. friends from Manitoba, my hon. friend from Brandon, remembers that on a certain day in the month of October, 1887, when the Canadian Pacific Railway Company challenged the right of the province to cross their line towards the south, 200 citizens from the city of Winnipeg, members of the government, members of the legislature, financial men, professional men, merchants, bankers, went in a body to the point of crossing determined to repel force by force, to allow the crossing of the Canadian Pacific railway by the provincial line. Then, Sir, the Canadian government came down, and at the following session the privilege was repealed, a privilege that had to be bought back by the Canadian government from the Canadian Pacific railway. Now I ask the hon. member for North Toronto, what became then of those investors who had put their money into the Canadian Pacific railway upon the faith of the Canadian government. Were they ruined by it? What became of this turgid rhetoric of my hon. friend which I read a moment ago:

Take the capital invested in your east and west lines of communication: Was it ever dreamed in England, Sir, that the time would come when a change of policy would be inaugurated by the men who petitioned for the money, who pled for the investment of capital and got it at long last?

No, they did not dream of it, but it was done all the same, and the result was that their stock, which was worth at that time 30, has now reached 213. I repeat, if you attempt to prevent the people from trading in natural channels, no amount of legislation will accomplish that object, but let nature alone, and then the trade will be carried on on Canadian lines. Why? Because we have the interior and the shorter and the better lines. Take the condition of things to-day; Winnipeg can trade with Europe by way of the United States, it can trade with Europe by way of Canada. The line of railway from Winnipeg to Montreal is 1,414 miles, and from Montreal to Liverpool 2,760 miles, a total of 4,174 miles. From Winnipeg to New York by way of Minneapolis, Chicago and the American lines, the distance is 1,790 miles, and from New York to Montreal 3,026 miles, a total distance of 4,826 miles. The American line is 4,826 miles, the Canadian line 4,174 miles, a difference in favour of the Canadian line of 652 miles. Do you require any legislation, I want to know, to compel trade to choose the Canadian channel? Is it not obvious that for very self-interest trade will always take the Canadian line, because it is the shorter one? Well, Sir, that is not all. We have had experience as to what has happened, and our experience has been that our trade over the Canadian channels has increased by leaps and bounds as against the trade by the American channels. In 1900 the total amount of Canadian wheat exported from Montreal was 4,000,000 bushels; in 1910 it had increased from four million bushels to 14,140,000 bushels. Of American wheat the total number of bushels exported from Montreal in 1900 was 5,000,000 bushels, and in 1911 that had increased to 10,000,000 bushels. So, therefore, there is no doubt on this point, the Canadian line must have the preference, because the Canadian line is the best and the shortest. But, Sir, the question now has to be examined from the point of view of goods which are exported from Canada to the United States with a view to consumption in that country. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax), when he spoke upon this subject, stated that our policy ought to be to favour interprovincial trade. To this, Sir, everybody agrees; we all favour interprovincial trade in preference to trade with other nations, and I am prepared to admit with my hon. friend that the home market is the best for all kinds of products. But I have to observe to my hon. friend that this whole amount of our natural products, and my hon. friend will not contend that the Canadian people can consume the whole production of our natural products. My hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Sifton) the other day stated that the home market would require about 80 per cent of our products. It is difficult to secure reliable statistics upon this point, so as to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion how much of meat, of eggs and of fruit is consumed by a population. This depends much on the means and wealth of the population, but it is possible to obtain not only satisfactory, but conclusive evidence and statistics as to the amount of wheat which is consumed by a population, and it is far less than 80 per cent of our production. Thirty years ago, or thereabouts, the opinion was held that the consumption of wheat was about five bushelsl per head, and to-day I am satisfied it is much larger. I discussed the matter some few weeks ago with a prominent miller, and his opinion is that at the present time the consumption of wheat is between 6 bushels and 7 bushels per head. If that be the case, the Canadian consumption of wheat, assuming a population of 8,000,000, would be about 50,000,000 bushels. If that be the proportion of the consumption to the production of Canada, then Canada consumes only 50 per cent of her production of wheat. Where is the balance to go? My hon. friend will tell me we have the English market. So we have, the English market is quite ample enough to take the surplus production of wheat in this country for many years to come, although we are sure the production will increase tenfold by and by.

But, Sir, there are other products than wheat, which the British market cannot absorb, or cannot absorb with the same convenience as the American market can. The hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton) spoke of hay in Quebec, and rather hinted, although he did not say so, that the sending abroad of hay is bad business for the farmer. I can tell my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Sifton) that no hay will be exported from the hillsides of the eastern townships of the province of Quebec, but as the Minister of Agriculture reminded my hon. friend from Brandon, we have in the province of Quebec natural meadows, which require no tillage, and upon which the best of timothy has been grown, not for 50 years, but for 100 years. Along the two shores of Lake St. Peter there are natural meadows a few inches only above the level of the water, which are yearly flooded, and which, to the knowledge of every one in the province, have been for a hundred years or more growing hay and nothing else. The counties of Berthier, Montmagny and St. Maurice, on the north shore, and the counties of Nicolet, Yamaska and Richelieu on the south, are so situated that they have a population of, perhaps, 1,000, who are growers of hay and for whom this treaty, if it becomes law, will be the most positive boon. To-day they cannot sell any hay in the United States because there is a duty of $4 a ton. Let the duty be removed and immediately there will be an immense trade in that section of the community, as there was some 30 years ago. The same thing applies in the case of eggs, poultry and mining products. For this reason it is to our advantage that we should have not only the British market, but the American market also. The hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton) made the argument that if you were to adopt this arrangement our present facilities for transportation to Great Britain would become useless. I differ from him altogether. The trade will go on just the same, but we will raise more of those commodities than we raised before.

Then there is the cattle trade. Years ago we had a cattle trade with Great Britain. We have some yet, but it is not as large as it ought to be, because everybody knows that it has been constantly retarded by the embargo put on it some 20 years ago or so, and, therefore, if we are not able to sell all the cattle we can raise in Great Britain there is a ready market in the United States.

Now, I come to a very important point. It has been stated in this discussion, and repeated in the press; indeed, the statement has been alluded to in Great Britain, that by this arrangement we were putting an end to every possibility of mutual preferential trade with Great Britain. My hon. friend from Brandon made that argument, and I have heard it from the other side of the House. I take positive issue with that statement, and I say more: that statement does not bear criticism; it has only to be analysed for its falseness to be shown. Sir, we on this side of the House have never taken part, we have refused to take part, in the controversy which has been long going on in England on the question of mutual preferential trade. We would not take any part in the contest between the tariff reformers and the free traders. We thought it would not be dignified, we thougnt it would not be any part of our business, we thought it would be an act of impudence for us to take part in this controversy, whether on the one side of the question or the other, and we preferred to remain silent upon that point, having laid our policy before the English people. And what was our policy? Our policy was set forth by the Canadian ministers in Great Britain at the conference of 1902, and it was in these words:

> The Canadian ministers stated that if they could be assured that the imperial government would accept the principle of preferential trade generally, and particularly grant to the food products of Canada in the United Kingdom exemption from duties now levied or hereafter imposed, they (the Canadian ministers) would be prepared to go further into the subject and endeavour to give to the British manufacturer some increased advantage over his foreign competitors in the markets of Canada.

This was our policy laid down at the Imperial Conference of 1902. This is our policy in this year 1911 at the conference which is soon to take place. We have been told by the other side of the House that the action we have taken with regard to this agreement has made it impossible to implement the policy thus laid down. How can that be argued seriously? The Canadian ministers at the conference in 1902 stated that they were prepared to give to Great Britain a preference on manufactured goods in our market if Great Britain would give us preference on our natural products in her market. Great Britain does not export many natural products; on the contrary she is a large importer of natural products. We are exporters not of manufactured products, but of natural products, and we are large importers of manufactured products, and we have given to the Americans a free entrance to our markets only for their natural products as they have given us a free entrance to their market for our natural products and how can that affect the British Islands? Surely in no way at all can it affect our trade with Britain. The United States can enter our market with their natural products, but it is certain that England will never send a bushel of any kind of grain to Canada. However, England can give us a preference in her market for our natural products if she chooses to change her policy, and then we are prepared to give her upon her manufactured products a corresponding advantage. Sir, the policy of Canada is just the same as it was three months ago when this arrangement was made; nay, it is the same to-day as it has been for the last 12 years and it will be the policy of the Canadian government at the next Imperial Conference which will open in May next. What then of all the shrieks and lamentations and imprecations we have heard from all sides upon this point? Surely the question has not been properly thought out for if it were it would have answered itself. Perhaps it is just as well now, since I am reviewing all the objections to this agreement, that I should take up another point which has been made against it and which has drawn many a tear from the eyes of some gentlemen sitting on the other side. I refer to the consequences of the agreement on what are known as the Most Favoured Nations. There are in existence certain old treaties between England and other countries in which it is provided that if England or any of her colonies should give a preference to any country in the world the same treatment shall be given to those nations with which England has these old treaties. These treaties were in the past of so little consequence that we never troubled about them. When in 1896 we found in our way the treaty with Germany and the treaty with Belgium we asked for the renunciation of these treaties. Similar treaties with other countries were not in our way, and, therefore, we did not trouble about them. However, all of a sudden these treaties have assumed enormous magnitude in the eyes of some, and a few days ago we heard a gentleman on the other side of the House say that we were practically opening our doors to the whole world. Well, the whole world is a big phrase, but let us examine in detail what it is composed of in this sense. The whole world in detail, so far as these treaties are concerned comprises, Venezuela, Switzerland, Sweden, Spain, Russia, Japan, Denmark, Colombia Bolivia (and who ever heard of any trade with Bolivia) Austria-Hungary, and the Argentine Republic. Let us see what our trade is with these nations. All told last year we exported to Venezuela $14,000 worth and we actually imported from Venezuela $53,000 worth, a trade which would probably supply the next corner grocery. And, in this $53,000 worth of trade of Venezuela there is not included any of the natural products we mention in our agreement with the United States. Then from Switzerland we imported $2,633,000 worth and we exported to Switzerland $10,000, worth, and our imports from Switzerland were chiefly silks and cottons and manufactures of silks and cottons. Sweden our exports last year were $111,000, and our imports $207,000, and there was not a dollar's worth of anything included in the agreement. We exported to Spain last year $51,000 worth and imported from Spain $1,040,000 worth, and our imports included fruits, but they were oranges and tropical fruits of that character such as are not provided for in the agreement at all. With Russia, our exports were $59,000 last year and our imports $138,000 and I cannot find among them a single article which would come within the scope of the agreement. To Norway and Sweden our exports were $487,000 and our imports $168,000, and amongst these there are some fish, and Norway would have the benefit of free fish under this agreement and that is the first item we find which is at all affected. Then, we have some trade with Japan, but does any one imagine that Japan will send us wheat or butter or cereals? With Denmark we had some trade, but not very extensive, our exports being $425,000 and our imports $86,000, and while Denmark is a butter exporting country not a pound of butter came to Canada from Denmark. Then, with the State of Columbia our exports were $42,000 and our imports $28,000, but they included nothing mentioned in the arrangement. Bolivia—we have not any trade with it; we do not import anything from it or export anything to it. Austria-Hungary—our imports are $1,410,000 and our exports $60,000; the imports are chiefly laces and things of that kind. Then I come to the last—the Argentine Republic; our total exports are $2,869,000, and our total imports $2,181,000; but I find that we have not imported from the Argentine a single article that is included in this agreement. The Argentine, however, is a wheat-growing country, and it exports wheat; but if ever the Argentine Republic sends wheat to Canada, there is no reason why Canada should not send wheat to the Argentine. so that objection is wholly exploded and may be dismissed without further reference.

Another objection which has been taken to this agreement is that it will destroy our natural resources. My hon. friend frim North Toronto was particularly indignant on this point. He grew eloquent and asked us what we meant by establishing a Conservation Commission for the preservation of our natural resources and then proceeding with ruthless hands to destroy their work. I have to say to my hon. friend that the Commission for the preservation of our natural resources was intended to deal not at all with questions of political economy, but with questions of physical science. My hon. friend told us that we should preserve our natural resources for our children and for our children's children; but I ask my hon. friend, what is the object of these natural resources? Soil, water, forests, minerals, have been given to man by the Creator for the use of man, and all civilized nations have acted accordingly. Why did our ancestors leave their respective lands and come to this country and take it from the Indians if it was not for the purpose of taking hold of the natural resources of the country and using them for their benefit? The Indians were men after the heart of my hon. friend from North Toronto—they were great preservers of natural resources. They kept them not for themselves, but for their children and the children of their children. They never used them to any great extent. The territory they inhabited contained many minerals; but when our ancestors came here, they found the Indians using implements made of bone and stone. They never cultivated the soil; they lived on fish and game. They were in the midst of immense forests, but they never felled a tree to build a house. They lived beside the most noble streams in the world, but they did not use them to turn a wheel; they never even used water to wash. They were people after the heart of my hon. friend from North Toronto. Our ancestors who came here, came to enjoy the natural resources of the land. Unfortunately, they not only used, but also abused them. It is the reproach of the white settler that if he has used these natural resources, he has been imprudent, and has destroyed them much more wantonly than he has consumed them for his own benefit. It is charged to-day against the Canadian farmer that he is not cultivating the soil, but mining it, and taking all the fertility out of it. It is charged against the Canadian lumberman that he is not only cropping the lumber, as he should, but in his operations, is destroying much more than he uses. I think it is admitted that in this valley of the Ottawa, where timber has been cut for the last one hundred years, the lumbermen have destroyed more timber than they have ever carried away. Sir, the object of the Conservation Commission is simply to instruct the farmers the lumbermen, and others, how to use the natural resources of the country. But if that be the case, the Commission, which is ably presided over by my hon. friend from Brandon, will do an immense service in showing all our people how to use these resources with prudence, so that they will be preserved for our children and our children's children.

But, Sir, what has this to do with this agreement? My hon. friend says that our resources will be taken by the Americans. Well, the Americans will take them if they pay for them; but whether they take them or not, whether this agreement goes into force or not, the natural resources of the country will be made use of, and I hope in a more prudent manner than they are at the present time. My hon. friend from North Toronto need have no more apprehension on that point.

I pass to a more important objection, really the only objection of any consequence that I know of. That objection is that this agreement will imperil our industries. How will it imperil our industries? This agreement is concerned chiefly with natural products. There are no manufactured products dealt with in it, except agricultural implements. In negotiating this agreement we have adhered strictly to the terms of the resolution which was adopted at the Liberal Convention of 1893, in which the Liberal party declared for a treaty of reciprocity in natural products and a carefully-considered list of manufactured products. Why did we put this restriction in our resolution? Why did we state in so many words that the reciprocity which we would negotiate, if it ever became our lot to do so, would be general for natural products, and would be confined to a carefully prepared list of manufactured products? Because, Sir, there is a vast difference between reciprocity in natural products and reciprocity in manufactured goods. This is the reason we have acted with this prudence. I was not present at the Conference which took place between my two friends beside me and Mr. Knox; but it is not a great effort of imagination to suppose that the Americans were far more concerned about obtaining reciprocity in manufactured products than in natural products; but our negotiators would not consent to any reciprocity in manufactured products, but insisted on limiting the agreement simply to such manufactured products as agricultural implements.

Well, we limited our negotiations to that; and in doing this, I know that we have not gone as far as certain sections of the community wanted us to go. A certain section wanted free implements altogether, but we did not think it prudent or advisable to go that far. And why? The reason is that the men on the treasury benches, who are responsible, recognize in tariff matters the wide difference between manufactured and natural products. It is easy enough to put up a customs duty or enact a protective duty, but it is always a difficult task to decrease or remove such a duty. The reason is well known. It is obvious that if you raise the customs duty or impose a protective duty you create at once a fictitious economical atmosphere; and if the industries established under that tariff and under that temperature and condition, have to face suddenly a removal of the duty, you might annihilate in the course of one night millions of capital and reduce to non-employment thousands of operatives. That is why we have acted as we have done. We have gone very cautiously, with great care into this agreement. When we came into office in 1896, we had the same problem before us, the same consideration weighed upon us, and we took the utmost possible precaution—whilst giving, as we were bound to do, to the consuming public an abatement of the tariff—we took every precaution in so doing not to injure any existing industry, and I think we have been successful.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Although it was part of our policy to obtain reciprocity with the United States, we have acted carefully in so doing and have not injured any industry. The only industry affected is that of agricultural implements, on some of which the duty has been reduced from 17½ per cent to 15 and on others from 20 per cent to 15 per cent. It would have been pleasing for myself at all events to have gone beyond that, but we considered that if we did, we would perhaps not do justice to the large number who have invested money in these establishments.

This government does not exist for the farmers alone or the manufacturers alone or for any one class, but for the manufacturers and farmers and for all the classes which compose our nation.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not admit that there should be any antagonism between class and class. I do not admit that there should be any antagonism between the manufacturer and the farmer. The manufacturer is the best friend of the farmer, and the farmer is the best friend of the manufacturer. Let them walk hand in hand, let each profit by the trade of the other; but so far as we are concerned, for 14 years we have administered the government of this country on these lines, trying to do away with collisions between class and class, trying to keep all abreast of one another keeping always in mind the motto: Freedom for all and privileges for none. That has been our policy and that policy we shall continue. There are men who believe that we are going to recklessly ruin industry and capital. Capital is timid under all circumstances and the man who is at the head of affairs and the ministers who assist him, would not be worthy of the public confidence if they were not always careful to see that capital will be safe, whenever it is invested in any industry in this country.

Mr. BURRELL. Would my right hon. friend permit me one question ? Does not the very argument he has put up on behalf of the manufacturers apply with crushing force to the fruit industry?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Not in the least. My hon. friend will observe that we have not obtained for the manufacturers a free market on the other side of the line, but we have obtained a free market for the fruit growers.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Might I ask a question?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. One is enough, I think.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I think so, too.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not object to interruptions, but when a man has been on his feet for some time and is anxious to get through, he does not care to enter into a controversy which would force him to more exertion. But I may say to my hon. friend that when in committee, I shall be very happy to answer all these questions.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I understand that under the rules, when a matter is being discussed in committee, a minister of the Crown, if he is asked a question, is bound to answer, and has not the right to dispute the right of any member to ask a question. I have never heard of such a thing; it is an innovation.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. There is no such rule. The hon. member who has the floor is the only one who has the right to speak to the question. No other member has the right to interrupt either with a remark or a question. Such interruptions are permitted frequently, and parliamentarians have said that they are the spice of debate, but they are entirely limited to such interruptions or questions as the speaker who has the floor at the moment will allow. There is no distinction in that respect between a minister and an ordinary member.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I am quite willing, Mr. Chairman, to bow to your ruling, but I say that it is an innovation in parliamentary practice.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman does not accept the ruling of the chair, he is at liberty to appeal to the House but not to discuss the ruling.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I may say to my hon. friend that it is not an innovation and that of course a minister is bound to answer questions, but there is a time to answer them and when that time comes, I shall be happy to reply. Before I depart from this subject, let me say that to carry out this agreement, everything has been done, we were careful of all interests and followed in the line established in 1896, namely, that stability of tariff is one of the elements of success in all enterprises.

I now come to the last of the objections raised against us. If it is difficult to find within the four corners of this agreement the latent, the insipient destruction of our industries it is still more difficult to find therein the fatal germ which is to dissolve our autonomy finally landing it into the American Republic. Autonomy ! They speak of autonomy. Why, it was only last year we heard the same men rebuke us because we paid too much attention to autonomy.

But, whether they approve of autonomy, or whether they combat it, they show clearly, in one instance as in the other, that they never understood or appreciated the true meaning of the word. This new-born zeal for autonomy, when reduced to actual exposition, is generally expressed somewhat in this way: There may be, perhaps, no danger to our autonomy in this agreement itself; but this is only a first step that will be followed by others. This, they tell us, is a trade agreement confined to natural products; another time the agreement will be extended to manufactured products; this will be followed by commercial union and lastly by political union. Such logic, Sir, will carry you any distance, in any direction, to any conclusion which hope, fear or any other passion may suggest. With such logic the world has long been familiar. Was there ever, in any land, at any time, a reform proposed which was not immediately denounced as revolution by all the forces of reaction? With this logic we have been particularly familiar in this country ever since the first days of responsible government. Open the records of our own old discussions, and you will find that when the reformers of that day were asking for responsible government, all the Tories denounced the idea as being the first step towards annexation. It is not, therefore, to be wondered at that, if, upon this occasion, the whole Conservative party have been moved by the old instincts of Toryism. But the manner in which this reform which we now bring forward is opposed, will be seen by anybody who examines the question, to be an insult to the intelligence and character of the Canadian people. What are the arguments we hear against this agreement to justify the position which is taken that this is a first step towards the dissolution of our autonomy? We are told that this agreement may, perhaps, lead to certain satisfactory results for some time, but that later it may be removed, and if removed, may be followed by a high protectionist tariff, and under such circumstances the Canadian people would not have the stamina to resist the dislocation of trade but would be forced to seek refuge in the American union. This is the argument which we have heard from the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax); this is the argument of my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster). Nay, this is even the argument we have heard from my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Sifton), who, on this occasion of all occasions, has deserted the principles of Liberalism to join the principles of Conservatism. Let me refer to the resolutions of the Board of Trade of Toronto,—I take these because they contain in condensed form all the arguments with which we have been deluged in this House. The third resolution says:

3. That any present benefit to any section of Canada or to any interest therein which might accrue from said agreement would be more than offset by the loss and injury to other sections and interests.

There is an admission that in this agreement there will be a benefit at least to some sections of the community. It may be qualified, but it is there all the same. And the fourth and fifth resolutions read:

4. That the proposed agreement would weaken the ties which bind Canada to the empire.

5 That to avoid the disruption of trade which after some years under said agreement would result were said agreement terminated and a protective tariff against Canada established by the United States, Canada would be forced to closer trade relations with them, which would still further weaken those ties and make it more difficult to avert political union with the United States.

Mark those words—'Canada would be forced to closer trade relations.' Well, Sir, if Canada would be forced, what would force it? Nations there have been which, in the face of a great emergency, a great national calamity, would rise to the occasion, and even the women throw their jewels and ornaments into the common fund for the protection of the country. But we are told here by Canadian Tories that if a crisis, an economic crisis, were to arise in which their pockets would be liable to suffer, they would hesitate between their pockets and their loyalty.

Sir, the Tories of fifty years ago were made of sterner stuff. In 1854, the treaty which was negotiated by Lord Elgin, with Francis Hincks as his Prime Minister, resulted in immediate prosperity. Ten years afterwards the treaty was repealed, and a high protective tariff substituted for it. At that time, did Canadians falter? Did they hesitate? Were they forced into closer relations with the United States? Did they seek a refuge in political union? No, in the face of that action they conceived and organized the Canadian confederation.

The treaty of 1854 was negotiated by Lord Elgin, when, as I have said, he had as his First Minister Francis Hincks. It was ratified in 1854 by the first Liberal-Conservative administration that we had. That administration was presided over by that staunch, stalwart Tory, Sir Allan Macnab, and one of its members was the young man, John A. Macdonald. Did Sir Allan

Macnab, or did John A. Macdonald falter? Did they say to Lord Elgin that they would not advise the ratification of the treaty for fear that, if it were afterwards abolished, the Canadian people would be forced into closer relations with the United States? On the contrary, their advice to Lord Elgin was to ratify the treaty. It never occurred to them that, even if the treaty could be repealed, as it was repealed ten years later, there would be a single Canadian who would be led by the dislocation of trade to seek to change his country's allegiance. But imagine what would have been the colloquy between Lord Elgin and his advisers, if, instead of being advised by such men as Sir Allan Macnab and John A. Macdonald, he had been advised by the present leaders of the opposition, my hon. friend Mr. Borden and my hon. friend George Eulas Foster. 'Sir,' they would have said, 'do not ratify this treaty.' Lord Elgin would ask them, 'Why; will not the treaty be a cause of satisfaction to the people?' 'It would,' they would answer; 'but that is the very thing we dread. It may bring us prosperity. But, after prosperity comes, the treaty may be repealed and replaced by a high tariff: and we are not sure that our knees would be firm enough and our spines strong enough to resist the aggression of the Americans.'

Away with this timorous advice of faint-hearted men, we stand by the example of the stout-hearted men of fifty years ago. Reviewing the situation as it is placed before us, far from sharing the forebodings, the lugubrious forebordings, uttered concerning what is to follow the application, not of a new principle but of an old policy, it seems to me there are evidences not a few that we are now entering upon a new era in our relations with our neighbours, that we can see already whitening on the horizon the dawn of a brighter day. One thing is certain, one thing cannot be denied, that the relations which have existed between the two countries for the last fifty years, especially for the last twenty years, still more for the last twelve years, and which almost came to a crisis a year ago—those relations have been a blot upon the civilization of the two countries. They have amounted practically to a proclamation of noncommercial intercourse between the two countries, so far as legislation could bring that about. Another thing cannot be denied, that the man who raised the Conservative party to the highest pitch of power and influence, the man whose name is still revered, though his example is not followed, Sir John A. Macdonald, deprecated and dreaded that situation. He did all that man could do to change it and improve it. To that end he made many sacrifices, and to that end he made his last appeal to the Canadian people.

One other thing cannot be denied, that at this moment, amongst the thoughtful men of the American union, the feeling is growing up that the policy which they have pursued towards us for the last fifty years has been wrong, that it has been injurious to themselves as well as to us, that it is selfish and narrow; and they are prepared to retrace their steps and to enter with us into a mutually profitable commercial intercourse. Now, when we reach that stage, it is inconceivable that we in Canada should be told that this retrograde policy, long followed by the United States and which they are now on the eve of abandoning, should become the Canadian policy, and that we should follow a policy of non-commercial intercourse with them. It is incredible, and yet we have heard that idea proclaimed again and again in this House. We are told that unless this retrograde policy is maintained Canada is exposed to danger, and we are threatened that unless this policy of non-intercourse is maintained we are doomed to annexation. Annexation! Annexation! Once upon a time there was a very strong annexationist movement in this country, and it received its first check when Lord Elgin brought back from Washington the reciprocity treaty of 1856. From that day to this the desire for annexation has dwindled and dwindled, until there is not a vestige of it left in any part of this country.

Once upon a time—this is also a matter of history—the conviction of every American citizen was that the Canadian confederation should become a part of the American union. Recent events have shown that there are still men in the United States who harbour that hope. But there are also men who are beginning to perceive that the republic, though its career has been glorious, has yet many questions to solve and many dangers to face; and many of them are beginning to recognize that the solution of their difficult problems would be seriously complicated, perhaps fatally impaired, if, in the territory of the republic, was to be included another territory as large as their own, with a people not yet as numerous, but destined to be as numerous as their own, with problems of their own also to solve, and whose union with the United States would only add to the complications which the American people have to meet. If my poor voice could be heard throughout the length and breadth of this country, and if, without any presumption, it could be heard also beyond the frontier, I would say to our American neighbours: flattering as may be to your pride, the idea that the territory of the republic should extend over the whole continent from the waters of the Gulf of Mexico to the waters of the Arctic ocean, remember that we Canadians were born under the flag of your ancestors, a flag under which perhaps you may have suffered some oppression, but which to us has been, and is more than ever, the emblem of freedom. Remember that if you have founded a nation upon separation from the motherland, we Canadians have set our hearts upon building up a nation without separation; remember that in this task we are alreay far advanced, that with our institutions, with our national entity as a people, and with everything that constitutes our national home we are just as devoted as you are to yours. Remember that the blood which flows in our veins is just as good as your own, and that if you are a proud people, though we have not your numbers, we are just as proud as you are, and that, rather than part with our national existence, we would part with our lives. If my voice could be heard that far, I would presume to say to our American friends: There may be a spectacle perhaps nobler yet than the spectacle of a united continent, a spectacle which would astound the world by its novelty and grandeur, the spectacle of two peoples living side by side along a frontier nearly 4,000 miles long, with not a cannon, with not a gun frowning across it, with not a fortress on either side, with no armament one against the other, but living in harmony, in mutual confidence, and with no other rivalry than a generous emulation in commerce and the arts of peace. To the Canadian people I would say that if it is possible for us to obtain such relations between this young and growing nation, and the powerful American republic, Canada will have rendered to old England, the mother of nations, nay, to the whole British Empire, a service unequalled in its present effects, and still more in its far-reaching consequences.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE (North Simcoe). Sir, it would be well if, upon a question of this kind, which touches the heart-strings of the nation, each one of us here in this House spoke his mind freely without partiality or prejudice. Some have done so, and have broken with their party. But, Sir, the great majority of us are swayed largely by personal interests, and perhaps more so by party prejudice. It will, therefore, remain for the electors of this country when they calmly enter the polling booth on next election day, to pass a sane and sound judgment on this question. Now a reference has been made by the right hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat to the defection among the members of his party; that reference was such as to classify those gentlemen who left his party as wolves.

I think that analogy was pretty far drawn, because it is a well established principle of parliamentary government that on all questions of a domestic character or relating to home affairs a member of parliament is in duty bound to follow his leader, and his party, but it is as well established a principle in the mother of parliaments to which the right hon. gentleman has appealed, that when a great question arises involving international or constitutional matters, a member of parliament is entitled to, and should of necessity pay his first allegiance to his country, and follow the dictates of his conscience. If I desired to delay the House I could give many examples of great men who have bulked large in the history of the mother land who have found occasions on which they have had to leave their party and turn their allegiance to another party. I could mention the names of Gladstone, and Chamberlain, and should I seek to enter into the Red Chamber, and into the very cabinet councils of the right hon. gentleman, I could also find a great name, and a great man who, on a certain occasion, left his party because he could not see eye to eye with that party on a great question. Sir, what happens when a man leaves his party on what is a national question, a question that touches the heart strings of the country? There is a duty on the other party in that case, it is their duty to support him, it is their duty to admit him, if he so desires, into their councils. I have read the history of the mother land very conscientiously, and consistently, and I have never seen anything but the highest respect paid by members on both sides to those men who have seen fit to leave their party on a matter of conscience, and national sentiment. It very ill became the right hon. gentleman to cast the reflections he did on those followers of his who cannot see eye to eye with him on this occasion. I think, Sir, this is one of the greatest questions that has ever come before this House or the country. The right hon. gentleman quotes ancient history. The situation to-day is entirely different. The men of the past are not the men of to-day, business is carried on in an entirely different way, and any man who reads and seeks to apply to present conditions rules derived entirely from the past, is bound to be mistaken. This question is one which involves principally the young men of the country, it is a question which involves a change of the entire trade relations of Canada; it is a question which endangers the national spirit and life, and every man is entitled to look on it in a new and original way. There is bound to be a great shifting of political views. I have no doubt in the world that there will be Conservatives in the country who will support the right hon. gentleman, prompted by a selfish interest thinking that they are going to make a dollar to-morrow. But there are others in his party, as he can see if he reads the press to-day, and they are the leading men of this country, who are leaving his party and who tell him they do not want any more of this reciprocity question. We read in the government newspapers immediately after defections of this kind that these men did not amount to anything after all. I like to take a cool, level-headed view of political questions, and I will give the party of the right hon. gentleman this credit that it must have had some very good men in it or it would not have lived as long as it has. These men who are leaving his party are the leading men of the country, and if the defection continues, there will not be many prominent men left in it, except those who represent it in parliament.

I have pointed out, I think clearly, that it is the duty of every man in this country on any question of this kind, not to be governed entirely by his ancient party allegiance. The question is a vital question, it is a national question and not a domestic question, and any man is entitled to take any position he desires on it. In so doing, he is following what has been known from time immemorial as the proper parliamentary practice.

The right hon. gentleman quoted history to point out that the treaty of 1854 was a very good thing and also that there was a very strong sentiment in favour of annexation previous to the enactment of that treaty. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) referred to that famous despatch of Lord Elgin, in which Lord Elgin pointed out that unless free navigation and reciprocal trade with the United States were granted, the people of Canada would rebel and annex themselves to the United States. I have taken the trouble to examine carefully the history of that period. Any one who knows the contemporary events and conditions of that day will understand the great difficulties under which Canada laboured. How were these difficulties brought about? For many years previous to that the Canadians had enjoyed the privilege of a preference in the British market for everything they produced. Their goods were carried to Great Britain in British ships, and in addition to that, there was a bounty on a number of articles that they produced such as spars and potash and the alkalis which were large products of this country at that time, amounting to $4,000,000 or $5,000,000. In 1847 the Corn Laws were abrogated in England, which gave to the United States free access to the English market. It was not until 1849 that the Navigation Laws were abrogated, and during those two years the people of Canada had to compete with the Americans in price for their produce in the old country, and in addition, they had to pay excessively high freight rates to the old country for the stuff they shipped there, owing to the Navigation Law much higher rates were paid by the Americans, who had free trade with Great Britain. Consequently this country was under a tremendous handicap and the statement of Lord Elgin was absolutely true at that time.

Let us follow another little bit of history. I like to correct my right hon. friend's history, because I know he is a good historian, but sometimes he overlooks some aspect of the matter under discussion. During the course of his speech he asked the House what demand there was for a reciprocity treaty in 1854, what mandate had the Governor General of that day to go to Washington and carry on the negotiations? The right hon. gentleman must have known, certainly he should have known, that the then parliament of Canada, before the question was taken up at Washington at all, had passed an address to Her Majesty to permit negotiations to be opened. Would it not have been fair to the House to call attention to that fact? That was some eight years before the treaty was finally carried through. So during the eight years the matter had been amply discussed by the people of this country, considered on every side and everybody looked forward to the passing of that treaty with a great deal of hope.

From that he drew the lesson that all his government had to do was to ask to have a reciprocity treaty put through immediately because, he said that reciprocity had always been the policy of his party. To-day the right hon. gentleman gave us many selections from his former speeches, and good speeches they were, much better than those made by him since he formulated these proposals, because after all I think he has a soft spot in his heart in favour of his country, and possibly there may be some slight doubt in his mind—slight doubt mind you—that after all this treaty is not as good as it ought to be. The right hon. gentleman argued that the views of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) on the subject of reciprocity were the same as his own, but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) has had fifteen years experience in opposition in this House to enable him to change his mind on the subject of reciprocity while the right hon. gentleman has evidently not studied out the question to enable him to come to a proper view of it yet. We all remember the occasion when Professor Bryce was sent to Washington as ambassador. Mr. Bryce is a well known free trader, a great friend of the United States; his principal income is derived from the sale in the United States of his book on the American constitution, and there is an American saying, that if you earn a dollar in America you ought to be an American. I do not say that Mr. Bryce follows that example to any great extent, but there was a feeling of uncertainty in this country when he was appointed British ambassador, and a fear that as soon as he got to Washington, being a pronounced free trader, being a believer in the annexation of this country to the United States, and being in favour of continentalism, that he would seek to carry out the same old plan that is embodied in this agreement. So strong was this feeling, and so loudly was it expressed in the newspapers that the Prime Minister of Canada thought fit, at a public dinner given to Mr. Bryce on April the 1st, 1907, to warn that gentleman. The right hon. the leader of the government spoke as a good Canadian then, and he told Mr. Bryce where he should expect to get off at, and these are his words:

We are turning our hopes towards the mother land; we have introduced the doctrine and policy of preference to Great Britain and towards all the British Empire and this is the policy by which we stand at the present time; not, for my part, that I do not value American trade——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). That's nice, keep on 'hear, hearing,' until I get through.

—not for my part that I do not value all that we would have to gain if our relations were on a better footing,——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Now, be careful, dont hear, hear too much.

—but this is a matter on which we shall have no more pilgrimages to Washington.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe)—continuing quotation:

This is the simple message I have to convey to our guest at the present moment.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Now, I remembered that phrase vividly when the Minister of Finance rose in this House to tell us he had been on a pilgrimage to Washington, and that Mr. Bryce had helped him to get the treaty. Does it strike anybody in this House as strange that there should be a total reversal of the view of the leader of the government on this question.

An hon. MEMBER. Not a bit.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Of course not. The right hon. gentleman cannot blame this House or the country if he is accused of not following out the principles of the Liberal party, and with not pursuing the path that was blazed by Sir John Macdonald, and Sir George Brown when they formed confederation. One point in this treaty which has been emphasized by the Minister of Finance is that this is concurrent legislation, and that it can be wiped out at any moment. That we are told by hon. gentlemen opposite, is one of the chief points in favour of this arrangement; it is the only thing they can bolster it up with, namely, that if it is no use we can wipe it out at a moment's notice. Well, there was something of this kind before. It is all wrong to say that the treaty of 1854 was a great success, but nevertheless when that treaty was abrogated the best elements in both parties formed a great coalition to bring about confederation as the antithesis of reciprocity. And, Sir, there is another great coalition on this occasion, and the evidence of it is that the leading Liberals of Canada are joining with the Conservatives in opposition to this policy. On the occasion to which I refer the leading men of both parties united and in 1864 George Brown formed a coalition government with Sir John Macdonald and they accomplished confederation. A strange thing happened immediately after confederation, for George Brown the founder of the 'Globe' newspaper resigned his office in the coalition government. And, Sir, the reason that great man left his party was because the government of the day had sent delegates to Washington to negotiate a treaty by concurrent legislation good only for a short period, as this treaty is said to be. It may be well to put a few expressions of the founders of the Liberal party on 'Hansard' so that Liberal members may cogitate over them. Mr. Mackenzie who later became the leader of the Liberal party, and Prime Minister of Canada, wrote a life of George Brown, and at page 103 I find this:

On the 19th December, 1865, the Hon. George Brown resigned from the coalition ministry of George E. Cartier on account of the reciprocity negotiations that had been carried on at Washington the previous summer by Howland and Galt.

In discussing this incident Mr. Mackenzie says:

It was, therefore, with a sense of relief that he felt bound, a few weeks after the confederate council adjourned, to adopt such decided views on the question of reciprocity with the United States, against the views of his colleagues, as to render his resignation necessary. This was the immediate cause of his resignation. During Mr. Brown's absence from Ottawa on public business, Messrs. Galt and Howland were sent to Washington, and were negotiating there with the Committee of Ways and Means. The ministers subsequently agreed to accept the scheme of concurrent legislation for the interchange of commodities instead of a treaty. Commercial intercourse by reciprocal legislation would inevitably disarrange our trade relations with the United States. Stability is an element that cannot be dispensed with in commerce, and so Mr. Brown considered.

These were the views of the two great chiefs of the Liberal party at that time, the founders of the party led by the right hon. gentleman. I hope we shall hear not much more about concurrent legislation in reciprocity after I get through. The right hon. gentleman did not read his history, or he would not have gone on with this measure, for the whole sentiment of the Reform party, from the time George Brown resigned his seat in the cabinet until the right hon. gentleman took the seals of office, was contrary to concurrent legislation in this matter. Let us see what Mr. Brown himself said. Here is a letter which he wrote to George E. Cartier on December 19, 1865, which is to be found on page 104 of 'Mackenzie's Life of Brown':

'The interests involved are too great. I think a very great blunder has been committed in a matter involving the most important interest of the country and that the order in council you have passed endorses that blunder, and authorizes persistence in it. I confess I was much annoyed at the personal affront offered me, but that feeling has passed away in view of the serious character of the matters at issue, which casts all personal feeling aside.

'I desire to leave you in perfect harmony. I shall, of course, place in writing my grounds of resignation, but seeing the prejudicial effect their present publication might have on the negotiations, I propose that no reason be given for my resignation until the reciprocity question is settled one way or the other. I propose to state in to-morrow's 'Globe' that my resignation has occurred from a grave difference in the cabinet in which I stand alone on an important question; that the explanation will be given in parliament in due time, and that it would be inexpedient for the public interests that they should be given sooner. I make this suggestion, believing it the best thing for the public interest, and on that ground alone; but any other proper course of procedure I am ready to adopt at the wish of my late colleagues.'

The next quotation which I desire to place on record is from George Brown's speech, delivered in the Senate in 1875, on the subject of reciprocity with the United States. In 1874 George Brown was sent to the United States to negotiate a treaty of this kind. He succeeded in negotiating a treaty, which was for a period of 21 years. The reason for that period being fixed was that he realized that such a treaty must not be subject to the will of the American Congress to change it at a moment's notice. Mr. Brown, in his speech before the Senate, which can be found in the records of that House, said:

In the negotiations of 1865-6 for a renewal of the treaty, offers were made to the American government by our then Finance Minister, Sir A. T. Galt, which in my opinion ought not to have been made. The government then existing in Canada was the coalition government formed in 1864 for the special purpose of carrying confederation of the whole British North American provinces. I was a member of that government, and, as is well known, it was in consequence of the policy adopted by my colleagues and the conduct of the reciprocity negotiations that I felt compelled to resign my position as president of the Executive Council. I resigned because I felt very strongly that, though we in Canada derived great advantage from the treaty of 1854, the American people derived still greater advantage from it. I had no objection to that and was quite ready to renew the old treaty or even to extend it largely on fair terms of reciprocity, but I was not willing to ask for renewal as a favour to Canada; I was not willing to offer special inducements for renewal without fair concessions in return; I was not willing that the canals and inland waters of Canada could be made the joint property of the United States and Canada and be maintained at their joint expense; I was not willing that the customs and excise duties of Canada should be assimilated to the prohibitory rates of the United States; and very specially was I unwilling that any such arrangement should be entered into with the United States, dependent on the frail tenure of reciprocal legislation, repealable at any moment at the caprice of either party. I firmly believe that good as a reciprocity treaty had been for Canada, in the event of repeal, we had a commercial policy of our own open to us for adoption not greatly inferior to that we should be deprived of; and unless we got a treaty for a definite term of years and conditions of fair reciprocity, without such embarrassing entanglements as were proposed, I was willing that the treaty of 1854 should be repealed, and each country left to follow its own course. My colleagues, determined to proceed in a matter I deprecated, I could not be responsible for such a policy, and to avoid responsibility for it I resigned office. The government sent deputies to Washington to obtain, if possible, legislative reciprocity—they did all they could to obtain it, but without success, and the treaty of 1854 came to an end on the 17th March, 1866. I have not changed my opinions from what they were in December, 1865. I still believe that Canada largely profited by the treaty of 1854, but that the Americans profited by it still more, and we all know—for we have tested it—that Canada has a commercial policy of her own but little if at all inferior to that you were deprived of in 1866.

Does not that cover the whole argument of the Conservative party in regard to the present agreement? That was the policy of George Brown, and the policy of the great Liberal party for many years. I am free to admit that there were a few Conservatives who desired reciprocity at that time, just as there are, perhaps, to-day a few Conservatives who desire reciprocity; but this country has advanced very greatly since that time. Were it not that a great deal of stress has been put upon the history of this movement, I would not trouble the House with so much about it Now, the treaty of 1854, which it took eight years to negotiate, unlike this treaty, which took eight days, or, perhaps, eight minutes, did not bring about that great amount of prosperity for this country which it was expected to bring. In the very first year of the treaty the carrying trade of Canada from Sarnia to the sea was taken over by the United States. I have to ask the House again to bear with me while I place on record some figures, because this is a subject on which a great many beautiful arguments have been framed upon a merely hypothetical basis. I have here a memorandum which gives the total trade of the St. Lawrence route in the year previous to the adoption of the treaty of 1854:

In 1849 the British navigation laws were repealed. Then this country had free trade and free navigation with Great Britain, and Canadian goods were carried by American vessels in competition with English vessels over the St. Lawrence route to Great Britain. There were no navigation laws to prevent that. Trade on the St. Lawrence grew enormously. In 1854 it amounted to $42,000,000. The first year of reciprocity—the Canadians gave the United States one-half the carryinig trade from Sarnia to the sea, and in all likelihood history will repeat itself. Here are the figures:

TOTAL TRADE, ST. LAWRENCE, QUEBEC.

Trade..	$ 33,633,128	$ 15,208,600
Ships..	1,416	742
Tons..	618,926	348,800
Sailors..	20,301	11,902
Exports and imports, Montreal and Quebec..	$ 42,000,000	$ 28,000,000

The total exports from Montreal and Quebec for 1854 were $42,000,000 in rough figures and in 1855 they had declined to $28,000,000. It is quite safe to say that the same result which occured in 1854 will occur once this treaty comes into force. Those figures were compiled, and recently published in the Canadian 'Century' in an article by Mr. G. D. Griffin, a well known journalist of that period. So that the treaty did not in that way benefit Canada to any extent. If I desired to do so, I could show in 1857 there was great distress throughout Canada. You can turn up the files of the 'Globe' and read about soup kitchens, about the people being in a starving condition, and about suggested legislation to relieve distress; but the great year of Canada was the last year of the treaty. It is true there were good prices in 1861 because the war in the United States had caused a great demand for cattle, hogs, sheep and other products raised in Canada. The last year of the treaty was the year of reconstruction in the United States. The war was then over. The fields which had been left untilled during the war were being again brought under cultivation, and the abandoned farms were being restored to their former condition. The great waste in cattle, hogs, sheep and poultry and other farming stock which occurred during the war had to be replaced, and in addition there was the speculative element which arose at that time and increased the trade with this country, so that in that year the balance in our favour rose to very large proportions.

When we read the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite delivered in this House and those spoken outside this House and many of the newspaper comments, which were made throughout the green and salad days of commercial union, we find that the great argument advanced was that the trade balance in favour of this country, while the reciprocity treaty was in force, was so great that we would be very foolish if we did not secure another treaty of the kind. Well, in my investigations of the records of this House, and of the United States Congress, I discovered what I consider one of the strangest things in connection with this matter which has ever occurred in connection with an international question outside of that red line map which we are told Mr. Webster used when he stole from us the northern part of the state of Maine. I find that throughout the discussion a certain statistical table was used. That table was first published in Canada and most of the figures were supplied by Mr. Paterson, of the Montreal Board of Trade. That table showed a very large trade balance in favour of Canada and it has been republished by a gentleman in the United States for the benefit of the United States government, a Mr. Larned. He published that statement in a report he made to the United States Congress on the question of reciprocity. The Hon. George Brown had a vague idea in his mind—as anybody who reads his speeches will see—that the figures they were using were all false, but he could not apparently get at the true figures because I have not been able to find in the journals of this House, or the Senate, that the true figures of the trade were ever placed on the records of either House. But a strange thing occurred. About 1880 there was some talk of reciprocity, and for the first time the actual figures were published in the journals of Congress. They were given by Mr. Nimmo, who was then secretary of the Bureau of Statistics of the United States Treasury. The Americans have means for obtaining absolutely accurate statistics of their trade which we lack. If you ship anything out of the United States you have to make a sworn declaration and manifest as to its value just as if you were entering it at an American customs house, so that their figures of export and import must be correct. In this country we are supposed to give export value, but anybody who knows anything about the business will not for one moment imagine that the figures in our blue-book of the exports of Canada are at all accurate. Take the figures of exports of the items mentioned in this schedule and compare them with the actual sworn fact. Suppose you take the Canadian figures of exports from Canada to the United States and compare them with the American figures and you will find a discrepancy. The United States have the exact figures and it is my intention to place on record in a few minutes both tables, I shall give the facts to show that the leaders of the Liberal party were entirely opposed to concurrent legislation such as we are now asked to enact, and now I am going to show that the figures of the trade from Canadian sources are all wrong. Let me now give the false statistical table of trade with the United States, 1854-1866 accompanying the report of J. U. Larned to the Secretary of the United States Treasury, July 3, 1871. These are the Canadian statistics used in the reciprocity controversy. Canadian figures were prepared by W. J. Patterson, secretary of the Montreal Board of Trade:

That is the false table. Now I intend to put the actual figures on record. It will take only a few moments, and I hope that before the House resumes at eight o'clock hon. members will think these figures over. The table is as follows:

At six o'clock, committee took recess.

After Recess

Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CURRIE. When the House rose at six o'clock, I had had the pleasure of placing upon the records two tables of statistics, giving the trade of this country with the United States during the period of the old treaty. I stated that one of those tables was absolutely false, and that was the table which had always been used in the discussion upon the question of trade relations with the United States from the time the old reciprocity treaty was abrogated. Now, the figures of that table, which table I would call the greatest statistical lie of the nineteenth century, showed that there was a balance of trade in favour of this country for that period of $31,955,131. On the face of it, that would appear to be a good thing for Canada, because in those days we did not have that heresy proclaimed that it is a good thing for a country to have a balance of trade against it. In fact, the doctrine used to be preached by those high priests of the Liberal party, by those great financial lights of the Liberal party, that if a country did not have a trade balance in its favour sooner or later that country would go to ruin; in other words, that commodity must pay for commodity, which is a doctrine of free traders from time immemorial. I find that that false statement was the statement upon which commercial union and reciprocity were fought, and which I may say was sanctioned by the United States, which published it in its records, showing that they deliberately intended to falsify the facts, I find that according to the true statement, the actual American figures showed, during the period of the treaty, a balance in favour of the United States of $34,520,007. So the treaty was not quite so good for Canada as it appeared on the face of it.

The right hon. leader of the House took issue with the members on this side of the House, who declared that this government and this parliament had received no mandate from the people to negotiate this treaty. The Prime Minister took exception to that statement, and said that neither was there any mandate for the old treaty, that there was no mandate for confederation, in fact, that there was no mandate for any great piece of legislation that had been passed in this country. I pointed out in the earlier portion of my speech that before the old treaty of 1854 was arranged an address was passed by the parliament of Canada on May 12, 1846, which address was forwarded to Great Britain. Negotiations followed, with the result that a treaty was concluded in June, 1854, ratification was exchanged at Washington on September 9, 1854, it was proclaimed September 11, 1854, and took effect March 16, 1855. Now, throughout the whole period of that treaty after it was consummated by the United States, the arguments were that it would only be a very short time until Canada became a portion of the United States. Did I wish to do so, I could take an hour in placing on the 'Hansard' extracts to show that the leading American newspapers and writers took that view of the question. The prevalent view was expressed by the 'North American Review,' which was at that time the leading exponent of public opinion in the United States. The chief writer in the review laid down the doctrine that the treaty had been given to Canada in order that Canada might be led gently into annexation.

Now, Sir, we have had some experience of attempts to force us into annexation. Four times, by force of arms, attempts were made to bring about the annexation of Canada to the United States. Those who visit Quebec can see a bronze plate beneath the ramparts of the city showing where Montgomery fell in the first great invasion. If you go to Niagara you will find a monument erected to Sir Isaac Brock, which commemorates our deliverance from the second invasion. You will find there was an invasion in 1837, at least an indirect invasion, backed up by the United States, to bring about the independence and ultimately the annexation of this country. I am not speaking my own words in recounting these facts, because any one who reads the chief authors on Canadian history will find these facts for himself. Read McMullen, or any other historian that is recognized as an authority, and you will ascertain the facts I mention. In 1866 there was a direct invasion; that followed the abrogation of the treaty. Now, what occurred during the existence of that treaty? The American Congress was constantly threatening to abrogate it. Early during the existence of the treaty we had to place a tariff on the manufactures of other countries in order to raise a revenue. Mr. Galt, who was then Finance Minister, framed that tariff, and he had a very hard time of it. He had to meet the opposition of the free trade element in Canada, who were largely pro-annexationists at that time. He had to meet the opposition of the English merchants, and if you will read the history of that epoch you will find that he went over to England and expostulated with the clothing merchants of Manchester, and excused Canada, and said it was impossible for this country to get a revenue unless they put a tariff on British goods as well as goods from other countries. He had also to meet with great opposition in the United States. The American papers discussed this question, and I find in the columns of the Toronto 'Globe,' which at that period was a very good journal, extracts time after time from the American papers. The Chicago 'Journal' was one of them; it stated that unless Canada changed her ways and took the duties off American manufactured goods coming into Canada the treaty would be abrogated. I do not wish to burden 'Hansard' with all these details, but I merely state what took place.

Now, I find that as the time approached for the abrogation of that treaty, which broke up the commercial relations existing between the two countries, it was found necessary, owing to the fact that there was a small number in the Conservative party and a small number in the Liberal party who were very noisy, and continually crying out for a reciprocity treaty, and even for annexation, it was found absolutely necessary, I say, for the great chiefs of both parties to form a coalition to bring about confederation. I find, also, that it was the party to which I have the honour now to belong, and which then called itself the coalition or Liberal-Conservative party, that was chiefly instrumental in bringing about confederation. That party, Sir, bore the brunt of the struggle in favour of the confederation of Canada. It fought another great battle in 1878, and it fought a battle in 1891.

Whatever fault there may be with our leaders, and we are all weak men and liable to make errors, the dominant note in the life and history of the Liberal-Conservative party from that date has been Canadianism. Not going too far pro-British—why, Sir, Sir John Macdonald, on one occasion had to say that if a certain Act of his in the way of duties on British goods was going to hurt British connection, it was so much the worse for British connection. Again, that policy has been constantly to prevent any shifting of the position towards the United States, constantly leading along the middle path that was blazed out by George Brown and Sir John A. Macdonald. That is the path we are treading to-day, and that is the path you will find the young men of this country are going to follow. They are not going to follow any by-roads towards reciprocity of tariff or anything else, they stand first for Canadianism and they intend to remain Canadian. As one of the younger element it shocks me to think that gentlemen will get up in this House and plead that 50 years ago this desire was so and so, that it still remains strong, and that it is hoped to accomplish it now. I heard the Finance Minister and his colleague, the Minister of Customs speak. What was the burden of their speeches? That a duty had been laid on the Liberal party many years ago and also on the Liberal Conservative party to bring about reciprocity of trade between the United States and Canada and the Minister of Finance says: I am pleased to say I can now come into this House and say that my labours are done, I have paid my debt. It reminded me very much of the story so eloquently told by Balzac, the great French novelist, of the young couple who were married. The young man had received an appointment under the government, and they were invited to a ball. The bride was anxious to appear as handsome as possible at this official ball, and borrowed from a friend of hers a diamond necklace. Terrible to relate, at the ball, or on the way home the necklace was lost. The young couple discussed the matter and decided not to say anything about it to the friend who had lent the necklace, but to go to a jeweller's purchase a similar necklace and mortgage their whole life's work to pay off the debt. They carried out that programme. Throughout their whole lives, they starved and slaved and saved every dollar. They did not have sufficient food or clothing, and finally when they were both old and decrepit, the day came when at last they had paid their debt. And then the lady thought she would go and tell her friend the whole story. She told the whole story and her friend after hearing the story of her life work and sacrifice, informed her that the diamonds she had lent her were paste, an imitation, and that the necklace was worth only 35 francs. We have here a tragedy of a similar character. Here are two honourable gentlemen who all their lives have been slaving, struggling, labouring, saving up every copper, waiting every moment patiently for a call to come to Washington to accomplish a treaty of this kind. They come back to this House and the Minister of Finance says: The debt is paid, I have finished my work for the right hon. gentleman as he also wanted to finish his work. These hon. gentlemen are no doubt staggered and shocked to find that the country does not appreciate that sacrifice, that this House does not appreciate that tragedy, and that everybody is really laughing at them for being such fools as to go over to the United States and bring back what is in reality a pinchbeck, an imitation treaty. From the time that the first treaty was negotiated until the negotiation of this treaty there was not a moment when the United States would not have given concurrent legislation in this matter of trade. Why? Because they have failed four times to annex this country by force of arms. The people of this country having suffered the torch, the destruction of their homes, the death of their nearest friends and relatives, and failed to accede to the demand for annexation. The Americans had decided to adopt other methods. I am not waving any old flags, but I will try to place before the House the reason why thinking men say that this treaty will ultimately lead to annexation. I acknowledge the fact that on the face of it a person will be very much inclined to say: What harm is there to trade between these two countries; there can be no question, but it will be a benefit to both of them. That is a sensible question to me. But I find that on every occasion when an attempt was made to bring about a crisis in the commercial affairs of this country, the Americans had in view to coerce us commercially which is the method adopted by the United States so successfully to coerce other countries to come into the union. They succeeded in the case of the Sandwich islands. There is one man in the United States Congress, in the House of Representatives, Mr. Champ Clarke, who, whilst he may have the reputation from the hon. gentlemen opposite of being a humorist, has the reputation of being the best posted man in history in the whole United States. Without exception there is no man who knows the history of the operation of congressional and state government in his country better than Mr. Champ Clarke. When this matter was under discussion in the Senate of the United States, Mr. Clarke let fall one simple remark which the newspapers of this country published but which very few people recognized, as being of importance. This is what he said, speaking of this treaty:

> The agricultural schedule is largely a humbug, a delusion and a snare. We had a reciprocity treaty with the Sandwich Islands, because from the first, we intended to swallow them.

Now, Sir, what are the facts of the case. I am going to tell you the facts, to recite them to this House, in order to show you that there is a very strong analogy. A reciprocity treaty was made with the Sandwich islands in 1875. Sugar is one of the principal products of the Sandwich islands, and one of the principal products of the United States. There was no necessity for reciprocity in that case any more than there is necessity for reciprocity in wheat, but a reciprocity treaty was established. The treaty was for seven years, to be abrogated on twelve months' notice. In 1887, after a great deal of grumbling, President Cleveland said he would not grant a new treaty because he was opposed to a reciprocity treaty on principle. But he had a sudden change of mind, and granted a new treaty without any reason being given. But here was a reason of the treaty of 1887. The United States was given a harbour on the Sandwich islands known as Pearl River harbour in perpetuity. In that way they got the first small portion of land from the Sandwich islands. The treaty expired in 1891. Its abrogation was subject to one year's notice. I wish to tell the House that during all the time that that treaty was in force there was not a session of Congress in which some blustering Senator or representative did not threaten to dissolve the treaty between the United States and the Sandwich islands.

There was a continuous panic all the time in the Sandwich Islands; sugar lands declined in value, and property generally was depressed, because they could not tell what moment their chief market would be destroyed. Talk of analogy, is not that analogy enough. Before the McKinley Bill was passed we had a trade with the United States in barley, but when the duty was raised our farmers suffered, and there was a tremendous dislocation in trade and hard times. Well, in the Sandwich Islands reciprocity organizations were formed but the United States would not annex the Sandwich Islands off the bat because they would not honourably accept the bonded indebtedness. Their plan was to let the trouble go on, and there was a revolution, and a protectorate government was formed which disavowed largely the debt of the island, and, after the process had continued long enough to tire out the bondholders the United States quietly annexed the Sandwich Islands. We are told by writers on the subject that with the single exception of Spreckles, the Americans came over to the Sandwich Islands without a shinplaster and they were no sooner there than they married natives, grabbed all the lands and property, seized all the banks, and when the protectorate came they were in possession of the whole situation. We see in that instance a short term treaty; we see constant threats of abrogation; we see commercial coercion more successful in the Sandwich Islands than a straight war would have been. Now, let us see what about Cuba. At one time Cuba and Porto Rico belonged to Spain, and I do not now refer to the Philippine Islands because they were conquered by force of arms. In 1891 there was an agitation in Cuba for the enlargement of the sugar market; something similar, only stronger to the agitation we have had for this treaty. The sugar planters and the tobacco planters had a splendid market in Britain, and all the better grades of tobacco were purchased in Europe, as they are purchased to-day, only second grades reaching the United States and Canada. The planters had a market in Great Britain but they wanted a wider market, just as our farmers in the Northwest seem to want two markets where now they have one. At last in 1891 a reciprocity treaty was consummated between the United States and Spain, but it was not long in force before there were threats in the American Senate to abrogate it. The sugar interests in the United States were all the time looming up on the horizon, and as soon as the trade had been established by American traders and Hebrew dealers in tobacco, the question arose among the Cuban planters: are we going to lose the American market? But, agitation did not go swift enough; arms were sent from the United States to the half black natives; blacks there sent from San Domingo as workmen and were no sooner landed than they were prepared to fight, and a revolution was fomented. And what for? To bring about annexation to the United States in order, as they said, that Cuba should have a free market in the United States. The Spanish American war followed. Spain ceded Cuba to the United States, and the United States turned Cuba over to the tender mercies of a native government. Why was this done? It was because if the United States remained in possession of Cuba the foreign bondholders might have come on the scene to ask that their bonds be paid, but by turning the country over to a provisional government the debt of the country was discharged by that very act, and when the foreign bondholders are all dead and forgotten, inside of possibly ten years, Cuba will have the same destiny as the Sandwich Islands. A writer on this question, Mr. Lawrence Laughlin, of Chicago, pointing out the ultimate end of the Sandwich Islands, states that what had been foretold from the first, viz., that the reciprocity treaty would bring about annexation, had come true. Here we have two outstanding examples; we have a reciprocity treaty, connection is formed between the two countries of a commercial character, commercial coercion from the United States follows, and the national entity of the other country is wiped out. Now, in our own country, why did they seek confederation in 1866. I will place upon the records of the House an extract from the speech of a great Liberal of those days, and it is an argument against this treaty more eloquent and potent than anything I could say. I quoted from the same authority this afternoon, I quote him again, so that his remarks may sink deep into the heart of my free trade friend from Nova Scotia. And, that reminds me of the great convention of the boards of trade of Canada and the United States held in Detroit in 1866, and at that convention speeches were made by prominent Americans in which they invited Canada to join the United States and partake of the pleasures of annexation and the free markets they could afford. There was at that convention a great Nova Scotian, Joseph Howe, and when he rose to speak on that occasion he told the Americans present how his son had gone to the United States when the civil war broke out, and how he had fought for the union, and how he had come home with an honourable discharge, and Joseph Howe said: I tell you gentlemen that if I should do anything to bring about the annexation of my country, and to haul down the British flag that floats over Canada, the very first man to blow out my brains would be my beloved son who fought so gallantly for your union. Well, Sir, we have not such Nova Scotians to-day.

Mr. McKENZIE. Why not?

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I cannot understand why; they are largely free traders. Let me tell you something about the Nova Scotians we have to-day. Nova Scotia came into the confederation in good faith, but unfortunately for that province there has always been a free trade element among its people; a free trade element that believes in the doctrine that what money is made by one industry must be lost by somebody else, because they cannot understand that there may be a profit at both ends of the bargain. The hon. gentleman who went to Washington to negotiate this treaty is one of these men, and I say without any hesitation whatever, that Nova Scotia with her splendid harbours, and her wealth of coal and iron, and her intelligent population, had she the proper men to lead her in her legislative halls, would be to-day greater than any state in the union, for not only would she be manufacturing goods for Canada and Canadians but she would be manufacturing goods in competition with Germany and every country in the world. But, that narrow spirit which keeps constantly agitating against the condition of things that exist, that narrow spirit has dominated Nova Scotia and its politics and it is only within recent years that successful industries have been established in Nova Scotia, and which to-day I am happy to say are so prosperous.

Now, let us see what confederation has done for Nova Scotia. We men in the middle west are not narrow or provincial; we are willing at all times to hold up our end of the log, and when it comes to paying the piper, we are willing to pay our share fairly and justly. The workingmen of the province of Ontario, whose children eat the bread that is baked with soft coal, have been paying three and a quarter millions of dollars a year in coal duties—why? In order that their brethern in the coal mines of Nova Scotia might have protection and labour. They have paid three-quarters of a million dollars a year in bounties on iron and steel in order that the men who work in the iron mills of Nova Scotia might have protection and labour. Is that selfish? Have hon. members ever read a word in the newspapers of my province against that proposition? But Nova Scotia continues to send to this House, free traders, men who are constantly attacking the best interests of this country, and seeking to destroy its industries and to prevent our workingmen in the Central West from having employment, men who believe that what is good for one part of the country must be injurious to the other. If Nova Scotia continues to send such men to this House—and there is no doubt, from the signs of the times, that there will be a change in the next parliament—I for one, staunch protectionist as I am, will have to consider whether it will be worth while for the rest of the country to grant a duty of 50 cents a ton to Nova Scotia on soft coal, and a bounty on her steel in order that she may send free traders to the parliament of Canada. I think that is a fair proposition, and, I say it unreservedly, that if such a state of affairs occurs after the next election, and I belong to the dominant party, I shall be one of the men to stand up in this House, and say: No, Nova Scotia does not want protection; take the duty off her coal—she sends free traders here; Nova Scotia does not want protection on her steel—she sent here a man, a free trader, who threw the markets of Canada open to American farm products. Let Nova Scotia play fair in this matter and send men here who are more in touch with the true interests of Nova Scotia, not men who come and talk free trade and practice protection at the expense of the rest of the country. I hope the hon. gentleman has now heard enough about Nova Scotia. He can take that and find out if he can get elected on it in Nova Scotia after this; because he is elected by the coal workers of that province.

There is one thing which I very much deprecate in discussions of this kind, and that is, that the tone of the discussion should be lowered to any personal note. I was deeply grieved this afternoon to hear the right hon. gentleman who leads this House, and who happens not to be here at the present moment, state that the members of his government were great financiers, and that the hon. member for North Toronto, when he was in office, and since then, had not to become a great financier that he could pose as a millionaire. Now, Sir, that is going a long way from the proper and legitimate sphere of discussion—and I always find that those people who live in glass houses are the people who throw stones. When the hon. member for North Toronto was Finance Minister of this country and sat on the treasury benches, the discovery had not been made of how ministers could get rich quick with purses of $150,000 from their friends. They did not know how to take houses and automobiles from their friends. Now, I think we are even on that question. If I desired to go further, I could entertain the House for a long time along these lines. I trust there will be no more sneers of that kind from the right hon. gentleman who leads this House.

Now, let us see how this treaty was made. We have all heard the ministers of the day discuss the question of treaties and treaty making. It must have occurred to hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House that the outstanding feature of the speeches of the members of this government is that the making of a treaty involves the granting of a favour. No sooner did they come into power than they granted a big favour to Great Britain by which they foreswore three and a half millions of revenue ever since for the sake of a preference. Whether that is good policy or not, I am not at this moment going to say. I am going to say this, however, that the favour granted has never brought a single favour from the British government in return, because in that country they conduct their business on the principle that the making of a treaty is a bargain in which there is no such thing as the granting of a favour. When our ministers went to Washington to negotiate this treaty, they went with the idea that they were going to give a lot of favours and get some in return. I want to point out to you that from the very beginning the principle of American diplomacy has been that in the making of treaties there should be no such thing as the granting of any favours. George Washington laid down a very sound principle in his farewell speech. He was laying down a policy which his country should observe for all time; and I want to say that the study of the life of that man will leave any one amazed at the shrewdness of his policy and his prophetic vision. He laid down certain rules for the government of his country, and the Americans have followed those rules unhesitatingly. Anything that George Washington has said is almost as sacred to any American as a decree of the highest court of the land. Now, George Washington, the first president of the United States, recognized this very danger which our kindergarten legislators, negotiators and ambassadors have never yet discovered, the danger from regarding anything done in a treaty as a favour and not a bargain. In his farewell speech he said that the negotiators of treaties should keep constantly in view that it is folly for one nation to look for favours from another.

And they went to negotiate with the other nation with that standing in front of them. President Washington recognized the danger of sentiment in treaty making and warned his countrymen against it. In his farewell address occurs the following passage:

> . . . constantly keeping in view, that 'tis folly in one nation to look for disinterested favours from another; that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character; that by such acceptance it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favours, and yet being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more. There can be no greater error than to expect or calculate upon real favours from nation to nation. 'Tis all illusion which experience must cure—which a just pride ought to discard.

Let me ask what insane idea possessed our ministers of the Crown when, in every treaty they have made, they saw fit to insert that foolish favoured nation clause in general terms, which opens the markets of this country to other countries as is done by this proposed agreement. Any one who knows anything about treaty making, knows that there are two forms of drawing the favoured nation clause. There is one which says that this favour being freely granted, will be freely granted to every country. There is another form known as the reciprocal, which is always adopted by the Americans. That form states that this favour will be granted to every country which grants similar favours to us. Is not that the proper form which should have been inserted in all our treaties. But in what situation are we now placed? We find a great many countries that are manufacturers and shippers of goods such as we have, on the free list. Denmark is a large producer of butter and eggs, and so is France, and the Argentine Republic is a heavy producer of wheat. Now what have we? We have made no treaty with those countries, but this very foolish kindergarten favoured nation clause, in the form in which it has been swallowed by the Minister of Finance —the great Grotius of this government, this high authority in international law and treaty making—what does it lead to? This is the logical result. A Canadian farmer can send his wheat into the United States free of duty and American wheat can come into Canada free. But under this favoured nation clause, so also can the wheat of the Argentine Republic. You would naturally suppose that this clause must be reciprocal and that the Argentine Republic must reciprocate in kind. Nothing of the sort. If a Canadian wants to send any wheat, except seed wheat, to the Argentine Republic, what happens? A duty of 20 per cent ad valorem meets him at the door. The same is true of France. France is a large producer of wheat, and ships millions of bushels occasionally to Great Britain. If France desires to ship wheat to Canada, she could do so free of duty, also butter and cheese which she produces to a large extent. She is also a large producer of eggs. All those articles find, as a rule, a ready market in Britain, but sometimes that market is glutted, and there is a good market in Canada. France can ship those products into Canada free of duty, but if a Canadian farmer wants to ship anything into France, he is confronted with a very heavy duty. How extremely one-sided is not this arrangement. Not only is that true of France, but also of other nations. And yet but three or four words added to the favoured nation clause would have avoided all that difficulty. And this mighty mind, this genius of finance who has brought this reciprocity treaty into this House and disturbed the whole of this country, did not know there was such a form as a reciprocal form of the favoured nation clause.

An hon. MEMBER. Ask him.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I do not think he did. He could not tell us of any treaty in which there was one. I would like to hear from him so that we might test his knowledge of this treaty making clause. When a man sets about making treaties, he ought to be acquainted with the treaties of other countries. Can the hon. minister tell us off-hand of one or two in which this reciprocal form is used?

Mr. FIELDING. I much prefer to let my hon. friend keep on with his argument. He is doing remarkably well.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Yes, I have evidently floored the hon. gentleman on the simple question of treaty making.

Mr. FIELDING. He shall see

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). If the hon. gentleman had his deputy here, he might find out from him. I shall now pass from that form of treaty making and discuss what this particular arrangement is going to do for this country. Coming down to the Atlantic, I find that this proposed treaty deals with the fisheries there. Now Canada possesses the last great fishery on the Atlantic. There is no other great fishery left. The north sea fisheries have been destroyed by trawlers. Everybody knows how these trawlers kill the fish and the spawn by dragging their nets over the bed of the sea. In like manner the Norwegian fisheries have been destroyed, and the only great fisheries left are the Canadian. The American fisheries have been ruined, and the Americans have none, except the artificial lobster and oyster, which are grown just as we grow chickens. The Atlantic fisheries are then the most valuable asset of this country. If this country were to take possession of them in a truly national sense and organize them in a national manner, instead of our poor fisherman down east getting only 1 cent a pound off his hook, he would get 4 cents or 5 cents per pound. Mr. MacGrath of St. John, Newfoundland, who is one of the best authorities on the fisheries to-day on the Atlantic sea-board, who is a public man, and a journalist of well known repute, has stated that the Atlantic fisheries are worth $12,000,000 per annum. He has stated also that there are 50,000 people employed in that industry and he points out that when you divide the value of those fisheries by the number of men employed in them, the fishermen of to-day only earn $240 a year. Will any workingman say that that is a fair wage for these men who toil in this arduous and dangerous work. They should be earning each at the least an average of $1,000 a year. And they could easily do that if the government had only sufficient courage to take hold of our fisheries in the proper manner.

We can remember when every man employed in the lumber business in Ontario was paid a dollar a day and board himself. That was all he could get. The Americans controlled our forests, and they were ripping out the trees and shipping the logs over to their own side, where they were manufactured and where the high-priced labour was employed, but we had courage enough in Ontario to stop that, and compel the logs to be manufactured at home. But that is what they are doing with the fisheries on the east coast. The Americans go there with their vessels and their gear. They employ our men to do the fishing, and they take the fish over the side. They have a close corporation, which is not above carrying on its business in this respect on a fraudulent construction of the laws of the United States. Yes, Sir, they actually perjure themselves by that false construction in the treasury board of the United States. If that fish is brought into the vessel they can carry it into American ports duty free. Why is it that there is only $3,000,000 worth of fish shipped out of the maritime provinces into the United States that pay duty? Everybody knows that the quantity that goes is nearer $10,000,000 worth. We have had a similar experience with the fisheries in Ontario and in Manitoba. And this government stands supine, and by its supineness enables the Americans, by their regulations, to come in, throttle our fishermen and squeeze the last drop of blood out of them. They come in and virtually take possession of our fisheries as if in fee simple, and compel our men to slave for them, paying them the price that goes to the mere hewers of wood and drawers of water, and as middle men they make enormous profits. They are the master's and we are the peon's. This is the condition that exists in our Atlantic fisheries. All this would be remedied if the government would form co-operative societies amongst our fishermen, organize our fisheries in the proper manner, put in freezers and give these men a chance to get their fish to market; and, above all, put an export duty on every pound of fish that went off the banks or out of the country except in a Canadian bottom. The application of the good old navigation law—that is what would build up this industry. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) laughs. He would not raise a hand, as did the knight in the other chamber, Sir George Ross, who, when Prime Minister of Ontario, declared to the Americans that they were not to take our logs out of our forests unless they manufactured them in this country. These men do not understand the principle of a great national policy developing industries of size and consequence.

I pass on now to other industries. I have pointed out that the strength of the nation lies in iron and steel. And all honour to the men, I say, who have established great iron and steel works in Nova Scotia—mostly western men, it is true, but also including eastern men, who have made money out of it, as we are glad to know. So we have the example not only of the Nova Scotia iron and steel works, but of the car works, of the stove works and many others. And yet these men of the east send men to represent them in this House, a majority of them rank free traders, as I regard them.

The hon. member for Carleton, New Brunswick (Mr. Carvell) told us that it was too bad the duty should remain on shingles, and said that he was interested in a shingle mill and a lath mill.

An hon. MEMBER. And in pretty nearly everything else.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Yes, I suppose in nearly everything in the province he is interested in some way. He told us that they could get so much more for their stuff if they had the stuff on the American side. Why, let him follow the natural course of the policy of this government that he supports—move his shingle mill across the line and then ship the logs over and cut them there. There is no string on the logs, and this exportation of logs in an unmanufactured state is the very thing that this policy is intended to bring about from start to finish.

There are other articles on the free list, such as talc, asbestos and gypsum. There are vast deposits of gypsum in New Brunswick and around the Bras d'Or lakes in Nova Scotia—the best, possibly, in America—and some in Ontario also. Now, a strange thing about this gypsum situation is that we shipped $221,000 worth of gypsum last year out of this country in the raw state, and we brought back $75,000 worth of—not gypsum—but of plaster of Paris, which is gypsum under another name. That tells you the whole story. Then, if you read the 'Mineral Industry,' published in the United States—if the House requires I will send to the library and get a copy—you will find that they have great hopes of the gypsum industry in the United States, because the Payne tariff had reduced the duty, and they hoped to get gypsum from Canada. And they expected to be able to mine it cheap, because they could employ labour in these mining operations at $1.20 and $1.35 a day—that is what they wanted to pay our men for mining. I give these figures in the hope that the miners and labourers in Cobalt will read them.

Now, we come to asbestos, another item we are going to be given the privilege of sending free into the United States—a most marvellous thing, that the United States will allow our asbestos to go in free. As a matter of fact, statistics show that 85 per cent—80 per cent at the very least—of all the asbestos of the whole world is produced in Canada. The figures also show that 95 per cent of the asbestos consumed in the United States is brought into that country from Canada. The Minister of Mines (Mr. Templeman) is in his seat, and I will ask him to correct me if it is not so.

An hon. MEMBER. He does not know.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Then, again, I have to fall back on myself as an authority.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. What would you do with it?

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). We have an absolute monopoly of asbestos—and the great thing has been accomplished of getting asbestos into the United States free. And the minister asks me: 'What would you do with it?' What would I do with it? I would try to manufacture it. Let me tell the minister exactly all about that: If you look through this treaty you will find that a long, lean, dark, hairy hand has manipulated every part of it. I wonder whose it is. Let me put the House onto it. You find its work in the pulp schedule, but not in that schedule alone. Sixty per cent of the asbestos that goes into the United States goes to be manufactured into paper. The Minister of Mines asks me what I would do. I would say to the Americans: Gentlemen, there is going to be an export duty on asbestos, and if people want asbestos paper to line their walls, or put under their floors to make their houses fireproof so that they can save one-half of one per cent on their insurance, they will have to come to Canada to get it, and if they want to tax themselves 50 per cent on the import, why, they will add just that much more to the cost; that would be the effect under the economic law which everybody knows and which even Adam Smith himself, strange to say, acknowledges.

And then there is the talc industry. The hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) is not in his place. He was asked what talcum was used for. He sits at the receipt of custom, he knows what goes in and what goes out, what everything is used for and what duty it ought to pay. He said that he understood that talcum was used for 'dressing for the person.' I do not need to turn up 'Hansard' to verify that—fortunately my memory is pretty good; I do not think the minister would deny what I have said, even if he were here. I find that they have talcum mines in the United States. They have very large mines of this material in the state of New York, one in Michigan and Texas, and others in other states of the Union. And the funniest thing about these talcum mines in the United States is that they are all controlled by one corporation. What corporation? The American Paper Company. What do they use talc for? The Minister of Customs evidently did not know, for the talcum used to make what he sees advertised on the blind walls—'Jones's Borated Talcum Powder'—is all imported from Italy; there is nothing on this continent that is fine enough and white enough for this purpose. That talcum is worth $60 a ton, ours $3.50.

The American Paper Company makes asbestos roofing paper. That great American paper trust figures there again. So in respect to all these minerals that are going to make us all happy, all these great industries in which our workingmen are allowed to make $1 a day and board themselves in mining, they are all really controlled by one great trust on the other side of the line. How much do you think Canada is going to get out of it? I agree with the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), that this policy, in spite of anything that is said by the Prime Minister, is going to be a disastrous one. He tried to teach the chairman of the Conservation Commission his duty, and what a foolish and silly way he used in trying to teach him. He said his business of Chairman of the Committee on Conservation was political science, but that the things we discussed in this House pertained to political economy. Now I have a recollection of reading in books that nobody has yet decided whether political economy is a science or not, and I would like the right hon. gentleman to explain, if he were present, the difference between political science and political economy.

Well, we all know that the true policy of this country is not to allow anything to go out of the country that is not manufactured, when it can be manufactured in this country, more especially those articles of which we possess an absolute monopoly. We have virtually a monopoly in fish, and still this government invites all the nations of the earth to come in here and fish, to deplete our fishing waters, and destroy this great article of commerce in order that we may worship at the altar of some free trade fetish. We have a monopoly of all the asbestos in the world, but it is going to be sent out of this country, and none of our young men are to be trained to grind that stuff up and manufacture it into paper. The same with gypsum, that also is to be taken away from us; so with our salt mines, they are to be closed down although we had hopes of a great industry from the by-products of salt, and all that will be left for us are the by-products of the salt. We are to be allowed to send away the raw materials for the benefit of the foreigner. The right hon. gentleman said that his ancestors came to this country and dispossessed the Indians of their lands, that the Indians were the true conservators of the land, and the settlers were those who wished to use them. He drew the analogy to represent our conservation idea, as opposed to his pro-American idea. Now let us follow the analogy out. We are to be the Indians, and we are to be treated as savages and barbarians, and allow those gentlemen to the south to come in here and take away our raw materials, to take them over to the United States and manufacture them. If that is the policy, then I say what is the use of encouraging our young men to study engineering science in order that they may oversee the development of our industries? What is the use of McGill? Why is there a technical school in Nova Scotia? Why is there a technical school in New Brunswick? What is the use of Laval and McGill, with their hundreds and thousands of young men studying technical science in order to become engineers? Yes, and what is the use of our Toronto university, which has the greatest number of young men attending scientific classes of any school in the world, except one, that is the scientific institute in Glasgow? What is the ambition of these young men? They live in hope of achieving the scientific knowledge which will make them leaders in the industries of this country, enable them to superintend the poor foreigners who come here to use the pick and shovel, building our railroads and developing our natural resources. I say if this policy is to be carried out, then shut the doors of all these scientific schools, throw the keys into the sea, and let all these young men go back to the woods and prepare to handle the pick and the shovel themselves. That is the way this policy impresses itself on my mind. There is nothing in it for this country, either for the present or for the future.

Now let us come to the province of Quebec. Great stress has been laid on the fact that the people of Quebec can export their hay. Well, now, in regard to hay, I have a distinct recollection of reading in some musty text book of English law that in the old country for many years no leases were made unless they contained a clause forbidding the tenant to take a pound of hay or a pound of straw off the land. Hon. gentlemen here who are members of the legal profession will tell you that the same thing obtains in the province of Ontario, where the tenant is not allowed to take a pound of straw or a pound of hay off the farm. Quebec has a great future before it as a farming country, it has a tremendous future before it as a manufacturing country. It has resources of cheap power much greater even than that of the great province of Ontario from which I come. It has a skilful class of people; no people in the world are so deft with their fingers, or so skilful in handling machinery, so quick to learn, so studious and faithful, as the men of Quebec. The forest from which they used to get their livelihood is retreating farther and farther back, and little villages are deserted for six months in the year while the fathers and sons leave their homes in order to work in the forest. Would it not be the proper policy to encourage industries for these villages so the people would not have to leave their homes for employment.

And let me point out that another question arises here. I have shown that the men who organized confederation did it with a set purpose, which purpose is the very antithesis of the policy which underlies this reciprocity treaty. I say that so far as I am concerned, I have not lost faith yet in confederation. Men who have lived in Canada for forty years find that the constitution under which they are living is becoming more and more dear to them. There seems to be something in it which touches our hearts. It meets every varying condition of our life, it deals fairly and squarely with all classes. Whilst we may grumble once in a while, I do not think there is anybody who could draw up a better constitution than that which was drafted by the fathers of confederation. Under that constitution certain privileges were justly granted to the French Canadians, their language and their religion, the same as certain other privileges were granted to the people in my province, and to other provinces. Now, Sir, I assert that confederation is directly challenged by this reciprocity agreement, it is the first great challenge confederation has received since it was consummated.

I would ask these men from Quebec if there is analogy, if there is anything to show them what would happen to them if confederation is set aside. I say yes there is. At one time the state of Louisiana belonged to France. It was sold by Napoleon to the United States. It contained a population exactly of the same race and of the same people as the French Canadians. They spoke the same language, they observed the same doctrine and had the same rights and the same social customs, and they bore about the same proportion relatively to the population of the United States as the present population of Quebec would bear to the population of the United States if Canada were annexed. What has happened to Louisiana? Why, Sir, you can go on the streets of English Toronto and you will hear more French spoken than you will hear on the streets of New Orleans. What has happened to those parish churches built by the fathers? The Yankees in the south used those old churches for what purpose? To search their registers so that if a man with French Canadian blood attempts to rise in politics or otherwise, if they can find from the register that there is a drop of black blood in an ancestor, ten or twelve generations back, the man is put into a Jim Crow car. Many of these French Canadians came from Demerara, Martinique and Dominica, and to-day every one with a French name who cannot show a clean bill of health is under suspicion as to his colour and we all know how strong the colour feeling is in the south. It would be the same here. If a French Canadian who voted for this agreement, bartering away the rights of confederation for a bale of hay, asked me to vote for him and I were a French Canadian, I would say, if you think that I would vote for you after you have done that, you must think I am only fit to don a pair of long ears and eat a bale of hay.

Now we come to the great province of Ontario. That province can pretty nearly take care of itself so far as any Americans are concerned. We are not afraid of them, we will welcome them, we will take them in on any deal from a game of poker up. Some of our best men from the province of Ontario are building their great railways. Jim Hill, who is from Ontario, taught them how to build railways, and he was the first man who taught the United States managers how to manage railways, the first to teach them railway statistics. I could point to other eminent men in the United States from my province. This arrangement touches my province closely. The one thing about the treaty is that there is not a single word from end to end as regards the working men. That is a serious thing. We will take one class, the truck gardeners. Possibly there may be other gentlemen in the House who can deal with that better than I can, but having lived in the south of the United States for a while, and knowing the conditions, perhaps I may be pardoned if I enlarge a trifle on it. Many people have asked why the Ontario intensive farmers or truck gardeners are opposed to this arrangement. They say that our truck gardeners can grow stuff as cheaply as in the United States. On its face that seems a plausible argument, but let us examine it. The man in the south, in Florida, starts growing his truck in January. He does not have to pay any big money for a house for himself and family. I have ridden along in the Southern States and counted the pickaninnies through the chinks in the logs. He has not to buy expensive clothing, he has not to sit in the house for six months while the soil is covered with snow, and he has not to buy coal. He starts things growing on his truck farm early in January and he can get coloured help, men, women and children at fifty cents a day or less. They grow their truck in every month in the year, they get three or four crops a year, because there is no snow, and the conditions for growth are ideal. You ask me, can a man in Ontario do that. The grower in the south does not have to pay for glass or hotbeds or steam, but the man in Ontario has, and the only profit which the Ontario man makes is the little profit off the first three or four weeks of the early crop; the rest of the time he is simply turning his crop over and perhaps paying expenses. You take away his little profit, his means of livelihood. I have had to make my livelihood and I know what touches the heart of every worker; and the man who has worked for hire, when he sees one of his fellows injured, says: That injury is to me also—and that is why Ontario is against this agreement. If it hurt only that one class of man, every worker in my province in his heart feels sore. He would say: Why should we injure these men and deprive them of their livelihood? It may be my turn next. We have not heard any promise here to-day that it would not be our turn next. We were told by the right hon. gentleman who leads this government that these ambassadors had not gone as far in the way of taking duties off manufactured goods as he might have gone. That, I take it, is a plain intimation of what he may do if he had another chance at it. We have heard a great deal about transportation systems. We have two roads that can take care of themselves. Who is going to be hurt? Not the two big railway companies, because the two chief men have said that they will take care of themselves and no doubt they can, they have the money and resources, they are building lines to Duluth to-day, endeavouring to meet this crisis. It is the thousands of men employed on the railways of Canada who are now deriving a living from this traffic who will be hurt; they will be deprived of their labour, they will have to sell their houses for nothing and leave the country and go to the United States if this traffic goes to the United States, as it will, because, as I have shown, the moment a treaty of this kind comes into effect, 50 per cent of our traffic will go south of the St. Lawrence. It was so before, it will be so again. As I said, there is nothing in this for the working man, who sees his fellow touched all along; he is told this is going to make the prices higher for the farmer, but that means that living will cost more to him. He will not get more wages, because his wages are dependent not on protection or free trade to any large extent, but largely upon the situation of the labour market itself. I have said that the livelihood of these men will be taken away. The moment the labour of a man in Ontario is displaced by that of a man in the United States we initiate a period of hard times. If you take away a quarter of the work given in a factory in Canada and give it to the United States you may not hurt the man who owns the factory but you hurt one-quarter of the workmen, and they are the people who are the ultimate sufferers. That is the secret of the whole thing.

We hear a great deal about the cattle trade in Ontario. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) told the House with a great deal of chest beating, that he would warrant that the statistics of the 'Mail' were very reliable, and that if one opened the 'Mail' he would find that at any time in the last ten years the price of beef cattle was higher in Chicago than in Toronto.

That seemed strange to me, because when I was a young newspaper man I used to write the market reports for the 'Mail,' and I knew a little about the business. However, I went to the library and I hunted up the files of the 'Mail,' and I took the prices at haphazard during May in these several years, and I have prepared a table, and that table shows among other things that when a professional man talks to an intelligent audience like this he ought to speak the truth, because I never heard, in all my life, so many absolutely improbable and untruthful—if that is a parliamentary expression—statements made with regard to any question as have been made about this treaty. To get these prices I took the steer weighing about 1,100 pounds, which would average about 70 per cent of the cattle. Of course, there may be a high priced bunch that would fetch a dollar a hundred weight more than the ordinary animals, for Christmas beef or something like that, but I took the prices for the standard animal in Toronto and Chicago, from the files of the 'Mail and Empire,' from 1901 to 1910, and this is the result:

TABLE OF PRICES, 1901 TO 1910.

	Toronto.	Chicago.
May 4, 1901..	$ 4.25	$ 3.95
May 14, 1902..	5.25	5.00
May 13, 1903..	4.90	4.06
May 11, 1904..	4.80	4.90
May 9, 1905..	5.70	4.50
May 9, 1906..	5.10	4.00
May 17, 1907..	5.12½	4.90
May 15, 1908..	5.50	5.00
May 25, 1909..	5.75	5.10
May 13, 1910..	7.00	6.25

Now, I will quote the following paragraph, which will show the kind of accurate reports you got in the 'Mail and Empire' in these days, and I merely take this paragraph as a sample of several others of the same sort:

I quote from the 'Mail' of May 13, 1903:

Mr. W. H. Dean stated to the 'Mail and Empire' that he had bought several carloads (of steers) in Buffalo at about twenty cents per cwt. less than he would have to pay for the same cattle here.

In the face of the wild general statements made by gentlemen on the other side, the best answer is to put these figures on record. Now, with reference to the price of barley before and after the McKinley tariff, I quote as excellent evidence the following letter from the secretary of agriculture for the province of Ontario, who has the facts and figures at his fingers' ends:

Toronto, February 2, 1911.

Dear Major Currie,—I herewith beg to forward you the figures in regard to barley production for which you asked in conversation a few days ago.

The production in 1890 was 15,600,169 bushels from 701,326 acres, value $7,831,285. Then came a big drop in 1892 following the enaction of the McKinley Bill. The low mark was reached in 1893, when the production was 9,806,088 bushels from 467,315 acres, value $3,932,241. After that date, as farmers began to find new markets for their barley, the crop increased. In 1910 there were 19,103,107 bushels from 626,144 acres. While the figures of value are not officially available, it is safe to estimate it at about $13,261,864.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe).

Hoping this will be of some assistance, I am, yours very truly,

W. BERT ROODHOUSE,
Secretary to the Dept.

This shows that the production of barley in Ontario, instead of decreasing, has increased by nearly four million bushels per year, and that the increased production is gathered from a less area under cultivation, which shows that the Ontario farmers are fertilizing the soil and improving its productive powers, and that the value of the crop per acre to-day is greater than it was before we lost the United States market for our barley. The facts with regard to our production of barley were set out very clearly by the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro), but I would emphasize that the barley quotations given in the United States newspapers are for what is known as malting barley, which grades No. 1, while out of the three or four million bushels of barley grown in the northwest and Ontario over 90 per cent of it does not grade up to No. 3, and there is the additional fact that if the barley is fed to hogs and cattle it is worth one dollar per bushel to-day under any condition of market, as compared with 85 cents paid in the United States for malting barley. Now, this treaty will be a serious injury to the horse trade in Ontario, which does a very large trade in horses with the northwest. The best explanation of the injurious effect of the treaty on the horse business comes to me from a gentleman who is not exactly a dealer, but who (as did his father before him) has done more to improve horse breeding in the province of Ontario than any man I know of; I refer to Major Wm. Hendrie, of Hamilton, who, when he learned about this reciprocity treaty, sent me a note, in which he says:

Free entry of horses into our Northwest will put horse breeding back 20 years and will destroy that market for the Ontario farmer.

That is what Major Hendrie has to say about it and he has put the whole thing in a nutshell. A word about the effect of this treaty on our transportation interests and especially with reference to the carriage of freight on the Great Lakes. Anybody who knows anything about the Great Lakes traffic knows that 15 years ago our freight carriers on the Great Lakes consisted of a few wooden scows of the type of Dr. Drummond's 'Julie Plante.' To-day we have over 70 fine steel vessels engaged in that traffic, none of them less than 2,000 tons capacity, and probably 20 of them built in Great Lake ports, where employment is afforded every day in the year for 1,200 men. That traffic has grown and increased enormously, until now it is estimated that there are over 5,000 men employed on these boats, and from 12,000 to 15,000 men employed in the trade altogether, from stevedores to captains. The Minister of Customs pointed out that a certain amount of grain automatically found its way to Buffalo at any rate, and asked: 'What does that mean? It does not mean that there is going to be anything to hurt this trade.' But I notice that while there is reciprocity in agricultural products in this treaty, there is not reciprocity in the coasting laws which are in force on the Great Lakes, and once the grain goes south of the line before it reaches Fort William, a Canadian vessel will not get a pound of that freight, but it will go to Chicago or Buffalo, and most of it will be ground into flour. It will act simply as a displacement, that is to say, you will put in so much Canadian wheat at one end and they will send out so much American wheat at the other end. The Americans will use our wheat simply to improve their grades, and they will benefit by it. They will benefit to the tune of exactly $30 a car on every carload of our grain that they take their way, because the only places where they grow No. 1 hard is in Dakota and in other states bordering on Canada, and as these states do not supply the whole market they have a monopoly, which enables them to raise the price above that of our No. 1 Northern in Manitoba. But No. 1 Manitoba wheat is superior to any other class of wheat in America, and the moment we give the Americans access to our market, No. 1 Manitoba wheat will come down to the price of ordinary American wheat, and will not grade higher. At the same time, the moment this treaty goes into force one-half the St. Lawrence trade will be cut off and we will not have one-half the ships built in our shipyards that we have now, and that is something which affects me very seriously. We all hoped to see the shipbuilding industry grow up on all our coasts, but this treaty will prove to be a great disaster to that industry. You might as well dump the elevators at Fort William and Port Arthur into Lake Superior, because our grain, instead of going to these ports, will find its competitive point at Duluth, and the elevators there will get all the benefit of it, and if it can be shipped via Duluth without having to be bonded, the shippers are not going to ship it by Fort William or Port Arthur when they can ship it by a route 70 miles shorter. That is what is going to happen to that traffic.

The whole appeal to the people in support of this compact is that if it is put into force prices will go up. I think it is important for us to know what the prices of farm products in the two countries are before this treaty goes into force, and I quote the following prices on January 2, taken from the 'Mail,' of Toronto, and the 'Tribune,' of New York respectively:

	Toronto.	New York.
Bran, per ton	$24 00	$24 00
Hay, No. 1	18 00	16 00
No. 1 dairy butter, per lb.	0 30	0 22
Eggs, new-laid, per doz.	0 50	0 35
Ducks, per lb.	0 17	0 10
Chickens, per lb.	0 16	0 12½
Turkeys, per lb.	0 22	0 18½
Geese, per lb.	0 14	0 14
Apples, Spy, per bbl.	4 50	3 50
Onions, per bush.	1 00	0 75
Potatoes, per bag.	0 90	0 73

The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), in the course of his speech, stated, and it was one of the chief points he made, that in a protected country there were two prices, the export price and the home price, and he gave some quotations to show that iron was sold at a higher price in the United States than in Great Britain or elsewhere. That argument would have a great deal of force with an ordinary individual who did not understand the statistics of the iron trade. If the hon. gentleman had taken the trouble to examine the statistics on the subject he would have found that free trade England, in nearly everything it ships abroad, has a home price and a foreign price. A few years ago a well known British iron firm was fined heavily for dumping into Canada. The 'Ironmonger,' the official organ of the iron trade in Great Britain, gives prices current for iron and steel in every issue under the heading of 'For Home Trade and for Export.' The following were the figures given in that paper for October 2, 1909, being prices current in the northeast district of England:

	Home prices. £ s. d.	Export price. £ s. d.
Crown bars (iron) per ton.	7 0 0	6 0 0
Best bars, per ton	7 7 6	6 7 6
Angles (iron) per ton	7 0 0	6 0 0
Ties (iron)	5 15 0	6 10 0
Steel—
Bars	6 2 6	5 10 0
Angles	5 7 6	5 5 0
Ties	5 17 6	5 15 0
Channels	5 12 6	5 10 0
Plates (ship)	6 0 0	5 17 0
Plates (boiler)	7 0 0	6 7 6
Rails	5 5 0	5 2 6

Thus we see that in free trade England the system of a home and a lower export price is practised openly. To use this fact as an argument in favour of protection or free trade is consummate folly. The reason for the difference in price is plain: it is all a matter of the cost of production. The Tariff Reform Commission in Great Britain took the trouble to inquire into this system, and they had before them as a witness a man in the iron trade, who worked out the whole question in the best way, and I do not think I can do better than put on 'Hansard' what he said as to how they happen to have a home price and an export price: The phenomena of selling at a lower price for export than for home consumption is not due to any influence of home tariff. An English manufacturer of ship plates who was examined by the Tariff Commission, in fact the first witness told how this was worked in free trade England. He explained that if his works were running to their full capacity they could turn out ship plates at £5 per ton, while if the mills were running only half time the cost was £6 12s. He presented the following statement to the commission:

Working half time—
Weekly output 500 tons sold at £7 per ton..	£3,500
Less cost of production at £6 12s.	3,300
Profit..	£ 200
Working full time—
500 tons sold at £7 per ton at home.	£3,500
500 tons dumped abroad at £4 10s. per ton..	2,250
	£5,750
Less cost of producing 1,000 tons at £5 per ton..	5,000
	£ 750
Profit full time dumping half product at a loss..	£ 750

The above figures will explain why factory managers when times get a little dull at home prefer to maintain the home price and sell at a loss abroad.

It is not a question of free trade of protection at all, but of economics and common sense, and if those gentlemen who talk so much free trade, would talk a little more common sense, they would not be such impracticable theorists.

We heard something to-day from the right hon. gentleman about the home trade. He said he realized the importance of that trade, and he indulged in a psychological calculation. He could not understand how it was that when, as free traders told him, every man consumed five bushels of wheat, every Canadian consumed six or seven bushels. But he forgot altogether that in growing these five bushels of wheat two or three were planted annually increasing our acreage which accounted for the other two.

He also tried to make some calculation about the home trade. Well, I have taken the trouble to go into the home trade question. There are no statistics available to show the interprovincial trade. That trade does not cut any figure. It is a question of the ton exchange unit. If a ton is moved it is sold and bought, and the ton is the basis of the home trade just as it is the basis of the foreign trade. I find that every ton moved by rail or canal means a ton unit of exchange because every time it is moved it is bought and sold once. These distinctions of foreign tonnage moving through the country, local or interprovincial do not, therefore, cut any figure in the tonnage business of the country at all as regards its trade generation. There is a table of statistics published by the Railway Department called canal statistics. It is rather venerable and moss grown and not very reliable, and we have to take these statistics as we do sausages. There are also several other publications, among them the Year-book. From these I compile the following statistics:

HOME VS. FOREIGN TRADE.

Statistics of Canal Tonnage.

	Tons.
Canadian, 1899..	3,363,906
Canadian, 1909..	13,371,044
Canadian, up, 1909..	3,758,827
Total Canadian and foreign, 1899..	6,225,924
1909..	33,720,748
Grain via canal to Montreal, 1909.	652,742
Grain via C.P.R. and G.T.R. to Montreal, 1909..	285,262
Total grain to Montreal..	938,004

Out of 13,321,004 tons moved via canal only 938,004 tons were grain.

Railway statistics of home trade for 1909 show as follows:

	Tons.
Grain moved..	6,837,506
Manufactured goods..	7,902,258
Total tons moved of freight.. ..	66,822,258
Total canal tons moved..	13,321,044
Grand total tons moved home trade by railways and canals up and down..	80,163,302
Foreign tonnage, ocean—
Outward..	4,001,678
Inward..	2,250,797
Grand total foreign tonnage.. ..	6,252,475

The home trade is thus 13⅓ greater than the foreign trade. The total foreign trade of Canada, represented by the foreign tonnage in and out equals $286,003,050, or $45 per ton. Estimating the home tonnage at $30 per ton although it is just as valuable as the foreign tonnage, the home trade is worth two and one-half billions.

Home trade..	$2,500,000,000
United States trade..	$285,265,717

Our domestic markets and trade are therefore, worth to us ten times as much as our trade with the United States.

The dollar in domestic trade is exchanged ten times oftener.

Why then are we so anxious to get another market when we have now a market worth ten times as much. Adam Smith said in his 'Wealth of Nations,' that a pound in domestic trade was turned over twenty-four times as often as a pound in foreign trade, so that it makes a profit that many times more employed at home than employed abroad. In his day of sailing ships domestic trade, he said, was twenty-four times as much exchanged as foreign trade, but with the fast steamships and railways of to-day the comparison of the trade is reduced, as I have shown in this table, from 24 to 10. I have shown you clearly that the difference in favour of the home trade is as ten to one. That is to say for every dollar you put into the home trade, it turns over ten times faster than if put it into trade with the United States. Consequently it would be far better for us to increase and foster our trade at home than to seek foreign markets.

If I desired to follow this question longer, I could show you how every country in the world tried protection before Great Britain did. Adam Smith and the anti-protectionists wrote, towards the close of the Eighteenth century, and their doctrines were promulgated throughout all the countries of Europe, and free trade was adopted and tried by every other country long before Great Britain adopted it.

It was not until 1847, as I have already told you, that they adopted free trade, and they did not adopt it on many manufactures until years afterwards. They always wanted other countries to give them free trade; and as soon as they got free trade in those countries, they stole their markets and took away their business. They did that with Portugal, by what is known as the Methuen treaty. They offered Portugal free admission for its wine in consideration of free admission of British woollens and other goods. Portugal at that time, had a magnificent trade with her colonies, almost as great as that of Great Britain. Great Britain seized this trade, and not only that, but took away the accumulated gold of Portugal. She bought silks in India and China and sold them in Germany, where they had free trade and put the silk trade of Germany and France out of business, bringing immense profits into England. They are pretty keen traders.

To-day you will find that every country in the world has repudiated free trade. Except Great Britain and Turkey. What is the use of any one trying to deny that and to make pretension of being a free trader? If you are a free trader, you must be a cosmopolitan one, who believes that his own country should throw out lifelines to every other country in the world. But if you are a nationalist in tariff matters, you want to help your own country first. And, so far as this country is concerned, I believe it is better for us to be more nationalist. Did I desire to take up the time of the House, I could give quotations of figures for different countries of the world when they had free trade and when they had protection. I could give figures comparing wages in England with wages in the United States and Canada. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) said that wages were as good or better in England than in any other country, except the United States. I grant you that the trade unions have made wages good in the old country. But the real test of a nation's greatness in industrial progress is the test of unemployment, and England has a greater percentage of unemployed than any other country in the world. There is only one other country that can rank with England in regard to pauperism, and that also is a free trade country—Turkey. When you findthat from twenty-seven to thirty persons out of a thousand in England are receiving charity, in order that they may live and not starve, you find a condition of things which we here wish to avoid. We want to grow up and be left alone, and to develop our own resources along the old line of confederation. The best analogy that I have ever seen given of an industrial nation is a hive of bees. Protect the bees, give them a good hive, and they will look after themselves; they will thrive and lay up plenty of honey and will live through the winter and do their work perfectly. But allow some one to come along and knock a few slats off the hive and what happens? You have a disturbance, and in a few days after free trade has been established with other bees, you have a raid on that hive and the honey is stolen. And that is what will occur in this case. We are getting along very nicely. We had our own walls up and the slats of our hive nailed down tight. We were doing business along our own lines and were learning every day how to do it better. Why, we were learning more political economy in a few years than Adam Smith and all these other fellows ever thought about. You could go to one end of our country and find there the hunter, the earliest economic producer. You could find the hunter giving place to the herdsman, the herdsman giving place to the man who wanted to till the whole earth, the extensive farmer, and you could find the extensive farmer giving place to the intensive farmer. These old professors in the old country who wrote about political economy told about something like this that they thought had occurred three or four hundred years before. Why, we saw these things going on right under our own eyes. We learned, for instance, the lesson of land values as they never could learn it. We have seen western towns grow in a few years from little collections of shacks to great cities. We have learned banking in the same way. We have made the mistakes that led to busted banks, and we have seen them bust. We have learned about wages;—we have learned all these elements of political economy by hard practical experience. And when you come down to hard fact, there is not an educated farmer in Canada. but knows more about practical economy, its facts and its laws, than all the writers that ever came out of Manchester and all the soap box orators that ever came out of Hyde Park. Why, it makes me feel cold to hear these men who have come here preaching to us what we ought to do. It is much the same as if a mandarin from the paddy fields of his native China, were to come over here with his button cap, go into a harvest field in the Northwest, and tell the farmer how to run his reaper; or as if a school teacher who had been instructing a class in physics five hundred miles from the sea, were to go down to an ocean port, go aboard a ship like the Mauretania, and undertake to instruct the chief engineer how to run his engines. These men come over here and from organizations of every kind, and start shouting. In some places they talk on the street corners—and the policeman comes and gently moves them on. But after a while the good wages they get have an effect on them. They become contented, and when they do, they make the best citizens. But I am afraid that in the Northwest the climate has not agreed with some of them, and they have formed organizations there and are trying to show the good old farmer from Ontario how to manage their own affairs and how to be economical.

Let me say to the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who leads this House: After all, the one great thing on trial here, is not so much this trade arrangement as the great compact made between the various portions of the country. Confederation itself is on trial. We have to decide whether we will vote confidence in the constitution that was adopted so many years ago or whether we will vote want of confidence. For my part, I am going to vote confidence in it, and I think the bulk of the men of all parties in this country, whether Liberals or Conservatives, will back up that old historical party that has always stood for the Canadian idea; and, when the day comes to decide on this question at the ballot box, you will find these men voting this government out of office, and you will hear no more of this reciprocity for the next hundred and fifty years.

Hon. WM. TEMPLEMAN (Minister of Inland Revenue). I trust my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) will not deem it discourteous of me, if I do not attempt to follow him in his very interesting and very discursive address. That address contained many statements that would require correction, many that would require further illustration and explanation; but if I were to attempt to deal with the hon. gentleman's argument and also to refer to the question with which I wish to deal. I should be compelled to go far beyond the limited time for which I desire to ask the attention of the committee and would need to take up as much time, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Currie, Simcoe) himself, has occupied.

My purpose in speaking on this question at this time is to direct the attention of the committee to the attitude of the province from which I come towards the trade arrangement that has been made between Canada and the United States. I also desire to point out what, in my opinion, will be the effect on the trade of British Columbia when that trade arrangement goes into force. Many of the speeches which have thus far been delivered by hon. gentlemen opposite have been confined almost exclusively to the denunciation of the agreement because its effect has been to remove customs taxation. They have argued that the effects of this agreement would impair the loyalty of Canadians, that it would cause a deflection of trade from east and west to north and south, and ultimately lead to the annexation of Canada with the United States. Now from the standpoint of the province of British Columbia, I can assure this House that the loyalty of our people does not depend upon commercial relations with the United States. Long before confederation, and after confederation, there was in British Columbia a very extensive trade from north to south, there was no trade whatever from east to west. During the old days there was absolutely no trade east and west, but all the trade of British Columbia was transacted with the state of California. Yet the pioneers of that day did not waver in their allegiance to the British Crown, they were quite as loyal then as they are now. The argument that Canadian allegiance and Canadian aspirations of nationhood under the old flag are such fickle things that they must be kept in the straight and narrow path by the imposition of penalties in the shape of trade restrictions, does not seem to me to be one that will meet with the approval of this House, or of the public opinion of Canada. That argument, or something of a similar character, has been made to do duty in Canada for as long as I can remember. The argument has been used for the purpose of discrediting the Liberal party, for purely party political purposes, but always unsuccessfully, as I am sure it will be on the present occasion.

In confining my remarks therefore to the consideration of the question how this agreement will affect British Columbia, I do not ignore the vaster question of how it will affect all Canada. I simply prefer dealing with one phase of a many-sided question, a phase also which I think is of sufficient importance to merit a little special consideration at my hands. After a careful study of the opinion of British Columbia, as expressed by the press of that province, by public meetings, by letters and telegrams received, I am as confident as one can be that the consensus of opinion in British Columbia is that this agreement is a good thing, that as a business proposition it will be advantageous to that province, that it will accelerate the development of British Columbia, and add very greatly and rapidly to its population. I wish to indicate the opinion of British Columbia in respect to the effect this trade agreement will have on the fruit industry. My hon. friend the member for Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Burrell) delivered a very long and interesting speech a few days ago, in which he dwelt altogether upon the effect of this agreement upon the fruit industry of British Columbia. He placed on 'Hansard' a number of strong petitions from boards of trade, from members of fruit associations and others, and I believe the member for New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) also read several warm protests against the agreement. Now I have in my hand a large number of opinions from prominent men. I will not read them all, but I desire to give the names of those who sent them and the purport of what they say. I think it is important that the House should know that, even in the great fruit growing district of Okanagan, the opinion is not unanimously opposed to this agreement; I rather think that the majority even of the people of the Okanagan country will be found favourable to the ratification of the agreement. I will briefly state the results as I have them. I have in my hand a telegram from the Nelson Liberal Association.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I do not know why a Liberal should not express an opinion upon the effect of this agreement as well as a Conservative. The Nelson Liberal Association state that they believe:

That the reciprocal arrangement means the greatest boon that Canada has received in years, and will result in great benefit to the Kootenay district, and we heartily endorse the act of the government.

Also a telegram from the Liberal executive of Ladysmith; another from the Liberal executive of the city of Nanaimo; another from the Grand Forks Liberal Association; and as Grand Forks is the home of the hon. member for Yale-Cariboo, I will give it in full:

The Grand Forks Liberals believe the welfare of the large majority of our people will be well served by the proposed changes in the tariff, and heartily endorse your course of action.

Grand Forks is the centre of a very prosperous fruit growing district. From Cranbrook, British Columbia, I have a telegram from Mr. E. H. Small, president of the Liberal Association, which I will read:

At a meeting of the Cranbrook Liberal Association the following resolution was unanimously adopted, after receiving the full contents of the proposed trade agreement, be it resolved that we heartily endorse the same as being entirely in the best general interest of British Columbia and Canada, it undoubtedly now is admitted to be most beneficial to the lumbering, coal-mining and coke industries. While there have been some fears as to the effect upon our young and growing fruit industry, we see no occasion for alarm, but on the other hand gratification. The result will clearly be that our local market will be greatly increased by the stimulating of the above industries, and the demand will, as always heretofore, far exceed the supply. Further the new regulation will be a incentive to the better picking and packing of the home produce. Viewing the whole situation we feel that those engaged in the fruit industry have no well grounded fears as to the operation of the proposed treaty, but we might respectfully urge that the regulations governing fruit entering Canada be rigidly enforced.

E. H. SMALL,
President.

Also a telegram from the Merritt, British Columbia Liberal Association; another from Victoria, another from the Vernon Liberal Association—Vernon is the heart of the Okanagan district; another from Prince Rupert, and as Prince Rupert is the newest city we have in the west I will read it:

Resolved that this meeting of citizens at Prince Rupert, held under the auspices of the Prince Rupert Liberal Association, do hereby express our strong approval of the reciprocity or freer trade agreement so skilfully framed by the representatives of Canada, covering the policy approved by both political parties since confederation, the ratification of which we believe will increase the material and financial welfare of all Canadians, while in no way interfering with Canada's autonomy or imperilling the imperial preference which Canada at the instance of the Liberal party has freely given to Great Britain.

There is also a resolution from the New Westminster and Chilliwack associations. I know that my hon. friend probably does not set much store by these, but all the same, even Liberal associations may represent public opinion in the province of British Columbia. I have one from Alberni, another one from the district of my hon. friend from New Westminster, and a letter which I have received from a fruit grower in Grand Forks. It reads:

Dear Sir,—I take this opportunity of placing before you my views in connection with the proposed new tariff and the British Columbia fruit growers. I believe it would help us for the following reasons:

The new tariff would open up a larger and better market for the fruit growers of British Columbia, as the fruit growers of Washington get better prices for No. 1 apples than their neighbours to the north.

The fruit growers of Washington have never been competitors of British Columbia fruit growers in the Northwest markets with No. 1 fruit, but with the new tariff the British Columbia fruit growers can compete with them in their better markets at Chicago, New York, &c.

It has always been conceded that Kettle Valley fruit growers could get a better price for their No. 1 fruit if they had enough apples to interest the large buyers. Under the new tariff the larger buyers in the United States could operate in Washington and in southern British Columbia, and get a very large quantity of fruit operating in a very small radius, thus placing the Kettle Valley fruit on equal footing with the Washington.

Yours very sincerely,

THOMAS A. McINTYRE.

Mr. McIntyre is a fruit grower who lives very near my hon. friend from Kootenay. As I know my hon. friends are prepared to denounce the opinions of Liberal executives in British Columbia I desire to call attention to a meeting of the board of trade in the great city of Vancouver. The board of trade of Vancouver met for the purpose of discussing the proposed tariff agreement, and for the distinct purpose of passing a resolution condemning it. The matter was submitted, a resolution was proposed, moved and seconded and discussed very fully. The board failed to agree and they adjourned for another meeting; they again discussed the question and the motion to condemn the agreement was voted down, thus showing that the board of trade, probably the most important commercial and non-political body in Vancouver, is in favour of the agreement as proposed. Now a peculiarity of the discussion at this board of trade was that the mover of the resolution condemning the treaty was an ex-president of the board of trade, and I want to read you a portion of his argument in moving that resolution:

Mr. H. A. Stone, mover of the resolution, gave a resumé of the principal features of the proposed agreement. He pointed out that on the majority of farm products the United States would forego a larger duty than Canada, and thus Canada would secure a greatly extended market for her products, as well as fish, lumber and coke. As regards pulpwood, it was entrusted to the provinces to protect their natural resources. The speaker thought the Dominion should have adopted a policy so important as the conservation of natural resources without leaving it to the provinces. The cancellation of the duty on fish, he said, would give Canada a commanding preference to the halibut trade, and the speaker did not think that the cancellation of the duty on apples would be very dangerous to fruit growers, while the opening of a large market could not but prove beneficial. On the whole, the agreement on the face of it seemed beneficial.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN.

I submit that that argument having been made in favour of the condemnation of the agreement will indicate to the committee that even those who voted for the resolution disapproving of the commercial agreement were not very enthusiastic in favour of the course they took. Mr. R. H. Alexander, a very prominent Conservative, in supporting the resolution said this:

Looked at simply as a bargain, Canada's commissioners succeeded in this agreement.

Ex-Alderman Hepburn, Mr. Robertson, Mr. Keenleyside, Mr. A. G. McCandless all spoke very strongly in favour of the agreement. Right in the middle of the constituency of my hon. friend for Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Burrell) a resolution was passed approving of the reciprocity arrangement now being negotiated.

That this meeting approve of the reciprocity treaty now being negotiated. That as fruit growers of Summerland we have no fear of American competition; and as Canadians we would gladly see an increased preference given to all British goods.

Mr. BURRELL. What association was that?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. The Summerland Liberal Association. My hon. friend knows that association, and will agree that they are competent to express an opinion on fruit growing.

I have here an editorial in the Summerland 'Review,' published by a Conservative, a supporter of the member for Yale-Cariboo, on February 21. The editorial is arguing in favour of the agreement and reads as follows:

And yet, our fruit men have had to put their fancy fruit on a demoralized market in competition with the 85 cent and $1.25 article shipped in from the States. Has the tariff been of one whit benefit? Could any reasonable tariff be of any lasting benefit in view of the conditions above referred to?

Strictly high-class fruit, such as that produced in the Okanagan, should be sold only on a strictly high-class market. Steinhardt and Kelly, of New York, the most extensive operators of high-class fruit perhaps in the world, buy the entire output of apples of the noted Hood River, and the price paid, we understand, is $2 per box to the Hood River Apple Growers' Union. Apples from the Hood River do not have to seek a market, for there is a high-class market built up, where the demand for this quality of fruit is in excess of the supply and buyers seek the fruit and pay spot cash on delivery.

Without a tariff either way our fancy fruit could find a home on the fancy market of the States at a fancy price, and the product of our orchard which is not up to the fancy standard could be put upon the slough market of the Northwest and Manitoba. There is, after all no sentiment in the matter of markets. The producer will sell in the market, where he can get the most for his product at the least cost to him, and the consumer will buy where he can get the quality desired at the least cost to him.

The editorial goes on to argue that the duty on fruit will not do injury to the people of the Okanagan valley.

I have another authority who I am sure my hon. friend will know, and who I am sure the hon. member for Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Burrell) will not deny is an authority, who has a right to speak for British Columbia fruit growers. The writer of this is the Hon. J. H. Turner, agent general for British Columbia, in London, for many years, and a man very well known in the industry in that province. As agent general, in London, it is part of his duty to further the interests of the fruit growers in that great market, and he has taken a personal and very intelligent interest in doing so. He concludes a letter published in the 'Standard of Empire,' as follows:

'My view of the situation is that the important large fruit growers of British Columbia have so far advanced and so control the market that they will not suffer materially from reciprocity, and as I think it is generally considered that the fruit grown in British Columbia is of better quality than that grown in the country to the south, the farmers of the province may look for continued prosperity.'

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that my hon. friend from Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Burrell), who made a very lengthy speech deploring that this government had inflicted a smashing blow, as he said, upon the fruit industry, will agree with me that some of these authorities are worthy of credence, and that they cannot be laughed away and sneered at. No one knows British Columbia better than the Hon. Mr. Turner, and no one knows better—I will not say the fruit growing industry, but I will say that no one knows better the marketing of the fruit grown in British Columbia than he does. Now, British Columbia is the largest importer of foodstuffs per capita of any province in the Dominion. I have not the statistics for the other provinces before me, but I can hazard the statement that British Columbia imports more food products per capita than any other province. The population of British Columbia is probably one-fifth the population of Ontario, and yet British Columbia imports a great deal more of foodstuffs than does the province of Ontario. In 1901 the population of British Columbia was 178,000, and the occupiers of farms who would be the producers of these days only numbered 5,900, or less than 4 per cent of the total population, and, therefore, it is not surprising that with such a large percentage of consumers and such a small percentage of producers there should be such a very large importation of food products. Of course, since the census of 1901 was taken, the population of British Columbia has probably more than doubled, and it is not unfair to estimate that it is to-day 400,000 or more. We will assume that producers have increased in about the same ratio, and that there are to-day in British Columbia perhaps 10 per cent of the total population, or 40,000 people engaged in agriculture and horticulture, which, of course, is an assumption, but it is based upon the figures of the census of 1901. The Hon. Price Ellison, Minister of Finance for the province of British Columbia, stated the other day in his budget speech, that British Columbia last year produced of live stock, dairy products, meats, fruit, vegetables, &c., some $14,390,000 worth, and that during the same period the importations of similar products amounted to over $14,900,000 worth, or, in other words, British Columbia really imported more food products than she produced. Now, if the consumer pays the duty, then I submit that when these goods are imported from a foreign country, and when the consumers in British Columbia number 90 per cent of the total population they are paying duty to the extent of $2,500,000 upon the $14,900,000 imported.

Mr. BURRELL. Were not these food products imported largely from eastern Canada, and not from a foreign country?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. The importations were very largely from the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Mr. BURRELL. And there was no duty on them.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. The people of British Columbia paid $2,500,000 either in duty or in enhanced price caused by the duty on the importations into the province. I assume, of course, that the duty in the majority of instances enhanced the price to the consumer, even on the home product, and it is not unfair to say that if a ton of hay was brought in from Washington and paid $2 a ton duty, hay coming from Alberta would be sold at the same price in the Vancouver market, and, therefore, that the amount of money contributed by the consumers of British Columbia on imported food products was two and a half million dollars, and that, without any reference whatever to the enhanced price which the producers in British Columbia may have obtained for the $14,000,000 worth of products they produced. These figures are sufficient to show that the cost of living in British Columbia, due to this duty and the enhanced price in consequence of the duty, must be high, as we all know it is, and it may be and in all probability will be very materially reduced through the fact that this agreement will remove the duties on agricultural products.

I desire to say that this agreement, on the other hand, will be of enormous benefit to the industries of British Columbia. We have extensive areas of timber lands, probably the most valuable in Canada, or on the continent, and the lumbering industry is possibly the largest of our industries. For many years the lumbermen of that province have been petitioning this government, and I presume the previous government, to impose a duty upon rough lumber coming into Canada. The duty on rough lumber was removed some 18 or 20 years ago, and since that time rough lumber has entered Canada free of duty, and no government has ever seriously thought of reimposing the duty so long as lumber was such an indispensable article in Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan. This agreement proposes free trade in lumber, and it removes from the United States tariff the $1.25 per thousand on rough lumber going into the United States, and reduces the duty on shingles from 50 cents to 30 cents a thousand. The effect of this will be to give to the Canadian lumbermen the United States market. When this announcement was first made the mountain lumbermen in British Columbia misunderstood its full purport, and came out with a statement against it, but since then, having better information, they have withdrawn their first declaration with respect to the agreement and now approve of it. Let me quote briefly the authorities I have in support of the agreement from the standpoint of the British Columbia lumbermen, and it is from that standpoint alone that I am speaking. Mr. A. D. Macrae, the manager of the second largest sawmill in the world, which is located at New Westminster, makes the statement, and I think my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) knows Mr. Macrae, and will say that he is a man of splendid judgment, whose opinion is of great value. Mr. A. D. Macrae, managing director of the Canadian Western Lumber Company, says:

The British Columbia lumbermen would benefit greatly by reductions made by the United States.

Senator King, of the province of New Brunswick, who is largely interested in the lumber trade of that province as well as the province of British Columbia, has expressed himself as strongly in favour of the agreement. Mr. J. O. Cameron, of the Westholme Lumber Company, who operates in the Island of Vancouver, with headquarters in the city of Victoria, has published a long letter explaining the agreement and strongly endorsing the same. In that letter he says:

The lumber operator who is not pleased at the prospect of having such a market as that of the United States thrown wide open to him must be afflicted with a perpetual 'grouch.'

Mr. TEMPLEMAN.

Mr. Alexander McLaren, of the Barnett Lumber Mills, a very prominent lumberman of the city of Vancouver, with very extensive interests in British Columbia, says:

The agreement will place the lumber business of all Canada in a much better position than before. The removal of duties on the products consumed in our lumber camps and at our mills, which are at all times very high-priced in British Columbia, will have the effect of reducing the cost of production. We do not manufacture shingles, but the reduction of 20 cents a thousand in the American tariff will be a great gain to shingle manufacturers in British Columbia.

While I am uncertain to what extent it will enable British Columbia lumbermen to send their lumber into the American market, I have no doubt that the effect of the agreement on the lumbering industry of that province will be highly beneficial. As it was found impossible to put a duty on American lumber coming into Canada, for the benefit especially of western mills, the next best thing was to secure the free admission of British Columbia lumber into the United States.

That is the opinion of Mr. Alexander McLaren, a member of one of the largest lumbering firms operating both in the Ottawa valley and in the province of British Columbia.

It would be interesting, but I do not wish to weary the House with quotations, to turn to the American side and see the opposition which exists against this agreement both in Congress and in the city of Seattle, because of the disastrous consequences which are going to result from the importation into the United States of British Columbia lumber. The Hon. Wm. E. Humphrey, representative from Washington in the House of Representatives at Washington, spoke in very strong terms in opposition to the agreement, pointing out that it would be very injurious to the lumbermen of the state of Washington. In Seattle the other day there was a meeting of the Chamber of Commerce to consider this question and Seattle bankers, building owners, lumbermen and shingle manufacturers, individually and collectively, sent telegrams to the members of the Washington delegation at Washington urging them to do all in their power to prevent the passage of the measure now before the Senate. A telegram signed by sixteen prominent bank officials, said:

The banking and business interests of Seattle deem the reciprocity measure of especial menace to the Pacific coast industries. Lumber, coal, fish, fruit, shingles, wheat and the Alaska trade are seriously jeopardized, without any compensating features from Canada. The lumber trade in California, worth $20,000,000 a year to us, is jeopardized because our lumbermen must ship in protected American bottoms, as against lesser wages on Canadian bottoms from Canada.

The Canadian wheat territory is the best in the world and will seriously compete with Washington.

Seattle's Alaska business will be divided with Vancouver and Prince Rupert.

The fish business will be diverted to the Fraser river, and eastern British Columbia apples will affect Wenatchee, Yakima and Hood river. British Columbia will harm our coal mines. We are simply turning over the resources of this country to Canada without recompense.

The British Columbia lumbermen, with the opening of the California market, can just as easily send lumber from Vancouver or New Westminster or Victoria as from a Puget Sound port. It is evident that the lumbermen will derive great benefit from the free admission of their lumber into the United States.

Another industry in which British Columbia will gain is that of coke. That province produces something like 250,000 tons of coke every year. Most of that is used in British Columbia, but some 60,000 or 70,000 tons have been shipped to the United States. There is a large market in the United States for coke, while we have unlimited quantities of good coking coal on Vancouver island, and in the Crow's Nest Pass. Many of the coke ovens have been idle, particularly those on Vancouver island, for several years. This agreement removes the American duty of 20 per cent, or about $1.20 a ton, and the producers of coke in British Columbia will certainly benefit to that extent, as there are a great many smelters south of the boundary line which will use coke from British Columbia. The coke producers, then, stand to benefit to a very large degree by the removal of the duty.

But probably the most important feature of this agreement to British Columbia is the removal of the duty on fish going into the United States. British Columbia is unquestionably the largest producer of fish in the Dominion of Canada. Last year it headed all the provinces with an output of some $10,000,000 worth. We have on the coasts of British Columbia immense banks of halibut, cod, herring and other fish. Consider for a moment the halibut industry. The banks of the halibut were exploited for the first time about ten years ago by the New England Fish Company, an American company which operates on the west coast of Vancouver island, in Queen Charlotte Sound, in Hecate Straits, Dixon Entrance, and on the west coast of Queen Charlotte islands. The catch was shipped to the Boston market from Vancouver in bond. This company has been taking out on the average 10,000,000 pounds of halibut per year. I believe that their outlay for transportation and express charges, the outfitting of the steamers, and the paying of their crews, would approximate nearly $1,000,000. They, at all events, pay the Canadian Pacific railway alone, over $300,000 a year for carrying their halibut to the Boston market. That Canada has gained because we gave to this American company the privilege of bonding their fish through Canada to the American markets. The duty of 1 cent per pound imposed by the United States on halibut is prohibitive. With that duty, no fish caught in Canadian bottoms can be sent to the United States. Numerous companies in British Columbia did try the experiment. The first to try it was a Victoria company, but it did not continue the business more than a few months, because it found there was no profit in it. But now what is the case? The success of the New England Company encouraged many other companies and to-day there are at least 200 boats going out of Puget Sound ports, fishing in precisely the same ground, that is, outside the three mile limit of the coast of British Columbia, capturing from 50,000,000 to 75,000,000 pounds of halibut, and shipping it all over the United States. That great industry should be in Canadian hands, and could be very easily placed there once this treaty goes into force. Our Canadian ports are from 200 to 300 miles nearer the fishing grounds than Seattle, and besides, the American fishing vessels have no right to fish inside the three mile limit, or use our harbours for any purpose; and it is very expensive for them to catch the halibut in the open sea and then go to Seattle to discharge their cargo. That entire industry can be monopolized by our Canadian fishermen, and scarcely a year will elapse after this agreement comes into force before the entire halibut fishing industry in British Columbia will be in Canadian hands. If the catch of the New England Fishing Company is anything near as valuable to the country as it is said to be, approximately something like $1,000,000, surely the addition of the catch now going to Seattle of five or six times as much, will be of incalculable benefit to British Columbia.

So I say that on all points, on the ground of the improvement in the coke industry, on the ground of the great improvement that will result in the lumber industry, and on the ground especially of the enormous benefit that will accrue to the fishing industry of British Columbia, this proposed arrangement should commend itself to the province. While my hon. friend from Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Burrell) fears there may be some disturbance in the fruit industry and while quite a number of other very respectable men are of the opinion that that industry will be injured, yet from the facts as we know them, and from the evidence I have, I am bound to believe that their fears are groundless and that the results they anticipate will not follow.

I am sure that whatever may be the opinion in other parts of the Dominion, there is not one good sufficient reason why any representative from British Columbia should do anything else than vote for this resolution. I have purposely, because my voice is seriously impaired, cut my notes very short and put many of them aside. But I feel very strongly that this agreement is one of the very best policies that has ever been proposed so far as the province of British Columbia is concerned. That province is not a manufacturing country but a producer of natural products almost exclusively. We are a very small farming country, we are growing fruits to a considerable extent, we have very large lumber, fishing and mining industries, and surely, with the addition of a market of 90,000,000 people for all these products, the result cannot fail to be very advantageous to all those engaged in these industries. I desire to repeat that I think my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr Taylor), who knows the fishing business much better than I do, will have great difficulty indeed in explaining his conduct to his electors if he does not support this agreement. My hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Barnard) whose constituents stand to gain enormously by the carrying out of this agreement, will also have hard work to explain to the electors of that city, why he voted against it. But I have no reason to know that these hon. gentlemen are going to vote against it. I can understand the fears of my hon. friend from Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Burrell) because he is right in the centre of a fruit growing district, and there is some apprehension there, that competition from the United States may lower prices and injure that business. Nevertheless, I think that all the representatives of British Columbia, should, for the reasons I have offered, give their support to the reciprocal agreement made by the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) with the United States.

Mr. GOODEVE. With the consent of my hon. friend the Finance Minister, I would like to move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. FIELDING. Is there not still time for another speech? It is still quite early. If we are going to adjourn every night at 11 o'clock, we shall be here until October, and we hope for an earlier prorogation.

Mr. GOODEVE. I understood from the whip that the speech of the hon. minister (Mr. Templeman) would end the debate for to-night, and for that reason I have not got my papers here. If my hon. friend insists, of course I shall go on.

Mr. FIELDING. If there was any understanding among the whips, I shall not insist.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Fielding, House adjourned at 10.58 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, March 8, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

NEW DEPARTMENTAL BUILDING.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Some time ago when the items of my department were under consideration, I promised to lay on the table of the House the plans for the new departmental block. I now ask leave to lay them on the table so that hon. gentlemen may have an opportunity of inspecting them. I would like it understood by unanimous consent that they are not to form part of the records of the House, but that when hon. gentlemen have had an opportunity of inspecting them they may be returned to us again.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). I thought that was a petition against reciprocity.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, if it were a petition relating to that subject it would be in favour of it judging from the size of it.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Would the hon. gentleman have the plans placed in one of the committee rooms, because I should judge from the size of them that we could not see them here very well.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is a very good suggestion, and I will ask one of the officers of the House to have that done.

Mr. REID (Grenville). When are the tenders to be called for?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Just as soon as the specifications can be printed. We are ready to call for tenders now.

TRENT VALLEY CANAL—FISH LADDERS.

On the orders of the day being called:

Mr. OWEN. Mr. Speaker, some weeks ago I brought to the notice of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) the fact that there were no fish ladders provided in the dams being erected on the Trent Valley canal between Hastings and Trenton. He promised to look into the matter, and I would ask him with what success?

Mr. GRAHAM. I have looked into the matter and have received a letter from the engineer in charge. I would not dare speak from memory but I shall get my hon. friend a copy of that letter.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

MR. BRISTOL'S INDEMNITY.

*Mr. LANCASTER:

1. Referring to the item on page N-9, of the Auditor General's Report for the year ending March 31, 1909, as follows:—'Bristol, Edmund (special vote), Toronto, $2,500,' for how many days during that session of parliament was the said Bristol in attendance at Ottawa, as shown by affidavit required to be made by every member of parliament, and for which he received the said $2,500?

2. Why was a special vote required in order that the said Bristol could obtain the said $2,500?

3. What representations, if any, were made by the said Bristol in order to obtain the said $2,500, and in what country was he supposed to be during the said session of parliament?

Mr. FIELDING:

1. Mr. Bristol's statement furnished to the accountant of the House of Commons says he was present two days in April and during the month of May with the exception of one day, and that he was abroad during the rest of the session on account of health requirements and illness and by medical advice.

2. There was no special vote to Mr. Bristol by name. There was a special vote to cover days lost by members who were absent through illness or on public business. Mr. Bristol's case came within the terms of that vote.

3. We have no recollection of any particular representations being made in Mr. Bristol's case. Such representations usually come through the party whips and probably did so in this case.

*Mr. SHARPE (Ontario):

1. Was the removal of Wm. R. Travers, former manager of the Farmers' Bank, from Toronto to Kingston Penitentiary, made with the knowledge and consent of the government or any department thereof?

2. Was the action of the sheriff in so removing the said Travers, before the prosecution had finished with his evidence in support of the charges then being investigated, taken with the knowledge and consent of the government or any department thereof?

QUEBEC BRIDGE.

Mr. LENNOX:

1. Have the plans and the specifications of the new Quebec bridge been submitted to the chief engineer of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, pursuant to the agreement or statute? If so, with what result?

2. Has the company been consulted or referred to in any way about the bridge? If so, in what way and with what result?

Mr. GRAHAM:

1. The plans and specifications of the bridge have not been submitted to the chief engineer of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, as the said bridge is not comprised in the eastern division of the Transcontinental railway, as covered by statute.

2. The question of using the bridge has been discussed with the Grand Trunk Pacific, but it was considered premature to endeavour to make arrangements with the railway companies until the construction of the bridge was further advanced.

EXPENDITURE ON NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

Mr. LENNOX:

1. In a return brought down 27th February last, Sessional Papers No. 77, where the expenditure of the National Transcontinental railway to 31st December, 1910, is stated to have been $89,553,740.32, is this correct, or should the amount be $93,920,956.16?

2. In the order of the House requiring an estimate of the amount required to complete and fully equip, does the sum mentioned in the return, $55,785,959.68, include equipment or merely cover construction?

3. Is any portion of the construction of the Quebec bridge included in the return?

4. In the figures given, or in the corrected figures, is there anything included for interest during construction, or the seven years' period after the road is handed over to the company? If so, for how many years, at what rate and what amount?

Mr. GRAHAM:

1. $89,553,740.32 was the amount of money paid out to December 31, 1910, and $93,-920,956.16 was the cost to December 31, 1910.

2. $55,785,909.68 is the estimated amount required to complete the road. The equipment, with rolling stock, is to be furnished by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. See clause 22 of agreement, schedule to National Transcontinental Railway Act, cap. 71, 3 Ed. VII.

4. Have any operations been cancelled under the lease? If not, is it the intention of the government to cancel it?

Mr. BRODEUR:

1. Yes. It is still in the name of Mr. McNee.
2. Twenty-one years, $10 per annum.
3. Yes, up to and for the year 1909. No further payments were accepted.
4. No. Yes.

WAYS AND MEANS—RECIPROCAL TRADE WITH UNITED STATES.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair, I desire to make a few remarks on the proposed motion in respect to the subject that has engaged the attention of the House for the last two weeks. I listened with a great deal of interest to the speech of the Prime Minister yesterday but I trust he will pardon me for saying that in the absence of any convincing argument contained in that speech I am more absolutely opposed to this treaty after hearing it than I was before. The right hon. gentleman is sometimes fond of epithets. He indulged in them yesterday to a very considerable extent. The protests of the market gardeners and fruit growers, the protests of the men engaged in the packing and milling industries in this country, even the earnest views of many men in this country who have as good claim to the title of Liberal as he has, are described by him by no better term than the howling of wolves. I would like to say to the right hon. gentleman that wolves sometimes stand savagely at bay. I observe in the Montreal 'Gazette' of to-day that another gentleman who had not before given his opinions very fully, Sir William Van Horne, has now written a letter indicating his views upon this subject. I suppose that the opinions of Sir William Van Horne as a man of great business experience and knowledge of the conditions of this country, a man who, as he says, has not taken any part in politics, ought to be entitled to some respect. I do not know whether the right hon. gentleman would regard him as an addition to the pack of wolves which he described yesterday, but I do want at the very outset to read one or two paragraphs from that letter which has been made public only to-day, to the end that we may have recorded in Hansard another expression of opinion from one of the leading business men of this country. Sir William Van Horne says:

To my amazement and distress and shame I now see the magnificent work of a generation traded away for a vague idea or a childish sentiment—the splendid commercial and industrial position we have reached and our proud independence bartered for a few wormy plums, and I feel it my duty to join in the protest which is heard from every section of the country.

To-day we are in an enviable position, with a commerce three times as great per capita as that of the United States, and without a cloud in our sky save the one which has just now been raised. Does not common sense tell us to stay where we are and to let well enough alone?

I suppose the answer of the right hon. gentleman to that protest would be some fatuous reference such as he made yesterday to conditions as they are in China. I had not been aware that this country, according to the claims of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House had been governed during the past fifteen years by Chinese traditions and yet that is the direct logical result of the argument the right hon. gentleman made yesterday. I shall read also the concluding paragraph of the letter:

Let us not run away with the idea that if we make a mistake in this matter of reciprocity we shall be able to correct it at pleasure. We may not be permitted to do it. It should be remembered that there are such things as vested interests with nations as with individuals and corporations, and that the vested interests of nations, real or alleged, are terribly binding upon the weaker party. When Mr. Hill has extended his seven or eight lines of railway into the Canadian northwest lines which have for some years been resting their noses on the boundary line waiting for reciprocity, or something of the kind, to warrant them in crossing—and when other American channels of trade have been established, affecting our territory, and when the American millers have tasted our wheat and the American manufacturers have got hold of our markets, is it probable that we shall be permitted to recede? Not a bit of it. We are making a bed to lie in and die in.

A very considerable part of the time of my right hon. friend yesterday was devoted to resuscitating very old speeches of himself and others of twenty years ago. Has the right hon. gentleman been asleep? Must we in future dub him Sir Wilfrid Rip Van Winkle. This is not 1854, this is not 1866, this is not 1879, this is not 1897. Will the Prime Minister wake up and remember that this is 1911? The question is one of national gravity and the country is not very seriously concerned as to whether the member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) has a good memory or a bad memory. About twenty or twenty-five minutes were devoted to that subject yesterday. The right hon. gentleman indulged in an occasional sneer in the course of his remarks; and he sneered at the business ability of the hon. member for North Toronto. It is not very customary in this House to go into criticisms of the private affairs of any hon. member; and I would like to say to the Prime Minister that if any man is unfortunate enough to make mistakes in respect to his own private affairs he bears the penalty, but if a man at the head of affairs in this country makes mistakes, he does it at the expense of the country and not at his own expense.

To come down to a question of reasonable business statement, where do we find the Prime Minister in his remarks of yesterday? Why, Sir, the Prime Minister of this country used as an argument in favour of his reciprocity proposals these statements—I do not know whether he intended them to be serious or jocular.

One thing is certain, one thing cannot be denied, that the relations which have existed between the two countries for the last fifty years, especially for the last twenty years, still more for the last twelve years, and which almost came to a crisis a year ago—those relations have been a blot upon the civilization of the two countries.

Mark what follows:

They have amounted practically to a proclamation of non-commercial intercourse between the two countries, so far as legislation could bring that about.

Later on, in the following column of 'Hansard,' he reiterates the same statement that there has been substantially a policy of non-intercourse between Canada and the United States especially during the past ten years. I take the last ten years and I find that during that period our imports from the United States amounted to $1,555,000,000; our exports to the United States during the same period amounted to $763,000,000, and the Prime Minister of Canada, making I suppose, a serious statement, tells us as an argument in favour of his reciprocity proposals that there has been practically no commercial intercourse between Canada and the United States during that period. Did the Prime Minister intend to be taken seriously? What does he say about the conditions between this country and Great Britain? Has there been a condition of non-intercourse between Canada and the mother country absolutely so, according to his own argument yesterday? Because if you take the total trade between Canada and the mother country during the past ten years, you will find it is about $300,000,000 less than the trade between Canada and the United States. If the Prime Minister desires to modify that outrageous statement to which I have just called attention, I will give him an opportunity to do so at this moment. Why, Mr. Speaker, last year the imports from the United States into Canada amounted to three-fifths of the total imports into this country; and yet the right hon. gentleman as the head of this government declares, as a serious argument that these proposals should be put through the parliament of Canada, that there has been a condition of practical commercial non-intercourse between Canada and the United States in the past ten years.

The right hon. gentleman went on to say that you cannot control trade, you cannot affect trade, by legislation. What, then, is the object of these proposals? Why, at the Imperial Conference of 1907 the Prime Minister referred over and over again to efforts made by legislation in this country to direct trade into British channels, a policy which he has absolutely departed from in bringing these proposals before parliament. At that conference he said:

> So far as legislation can influence trade, we have done everything possible to push our trade towards the British people as against the American people.

Then Mr. Asquith interposed:

> May I say I did not in the least dispute that? My object was not, as I think I made clear, in any sense to complain of the Canadian preference; on the contrary, I recognize both its intention and its effect. My point was that natural conditions were such that it was inevitable that the Americans should get the best of it.

To which the Prime Minister responded, 'exactly.' He went on to say:

> Not only have we done it by preference, by legislation, but we have forced our trade against the laws of nature and geography. If we were to follow the laws of nature and geography between Canada and the United States, the whole trade would flow from south to north, and from north to south. We have done everything possible by building canals and subsidizing railways to bring the trade from west to east and east to west so as to bring trade into British channels. All this we have done, recognizing the principle of the great advantage of forcing trade within the British empire.

To-day he is entering upon a policy which is absolutely divergent from that which he laid down at that conference. Trade cannot be controlled by legislation? Ask the millers of the western United States whether or not trade can be controlled by legislation. Look at the exultation of these men. I have their views under my hand, but I will not weary the House with them, as they have already been quoted. They point out the enormous advantage to the milling interest of the United States and to the industries associated with that interest which would be brought about by their having a supply of raw material from Canada. Ask also the American Newspaper Publishers' Association whether or not these proposals will have any effect upon the manufacturers of the United States in relation to our pulpwood. I will quote a memorandum of these gentlemen under date of January 28, 1911, and signed by Mr. John Norris, chairman of the committee on paper. These gentlemen say:

> This draft is entirely satisfactory to publishers. It will provide for the immediate entry of print paper and wood pulp from Canada. The snarl with the provinces of Canada has been completely avoided by an entirely new turn to the stipulations, which now follow the wood—not the province. If wood is free from restriction, such as wood from private lands, the products of that wood will come into the United States free of duty. A province owning land holds the same relation to the Dominion government that an ordinary land owner maintains. The province has no power to stop the exportation of wood from private lands in that province. Recent tariff legislation in the United States aimed to coerce provinces of Canada to part with Crown land wood and those provinces resented such coercion. In the reciprocity arrangement, each province can do with its own land as it pleases and can do this without affecting the immediate and free entry of paper and pulp made from wood cut on private lands in that province. The distinction between wood free from restriction of exportation and wood that is not free will show itself in various ways. Print paper made from wood cut on lands subject to restriction will be liable to a duty of $5.75 per ton of paper. That duty will be prohibitory in competition with paper made from wood cut on private lands. The provinces of Quebec and Ontario have been offering premiums and inducements for the transfer of American paper industries to Canada. Brown Bros. of Berlin Mills, N.H., recently installed a plant at La Tuque, Quebec, and propose to expand it materially. That plant depends on Crown lands for its timber supply. The International Paper Company has been flirting with the Quebec government for similar concessions. The reciprocity clause will give no encouragement to such diversion of industry from the United States to Canada. A barrier of $5.75 per ton on print paper will confront such products until the Quebec government removes the prohibition. The revenues which the province now obtains on wood cut from its Crown lands and shipped in manufactured form to the United States will be diverted from the Quebec treasury to the owners of private lands. The pressure from holders of Crown lands limits upon the provincial authorities for an opportunity to reach the greatest market in the world, that of the United States, will be irresistible and a diplomatic victory in the removal of restrictions will have been achieved without harshness, or coercion, or ill feeling of any sort. Each side will obtain an advantage, and that is the element of a good trade.

Then the memorandum goes on to show in what respect each side does get an advantage, and I quote its concluding words:

Under the new arrangement, American paper makers will gain a large market for their products in Canada, especially in the higher grades of paper.

The ultimate outcome of the proposed reciprocity arrangement, if ratified, will be a tendency toward the concentration of the pulp business in Canada and the conversion on this side of those pulps into paper, with great growth and advantages for each side.

Every one knows what that means; the finished product is to be manufactured in the United States with a maximum of wages paid to the labouring men of the United States, and the minimum labour on that product will be expended in Canada with a minimum of wages to Canadian workingmen.

My right hon. friend says that present conditions are not really altered by these proposals at all—that we can now export in bond to the United States, and that everything will go on exactly as it does at present with respect to the export of our products through United States ports. I am not going into that subject to-day beyond saying this, that if my right hon. friend will consult any business man in this country who has had any experience in such matters, he will find that he never made a greater mistake than he did when he made that statement. Conditions have been entirely altered, and there will be facilities for exporting through United States ports which are unknown to-day.

My right hon. friend says that these proposals will not affect the possibility of a preference. How is it possible that American wheat can come freely into Canada,—and no restrictive conditions can be imposed under this arrangement—and that Great Britain can at the same time give an effective preference on Canadian wheat? I would like to see how the right hon. gentleman can work that out. That may be his opinion, but it is not the opinion of business men, who, in respect of a matter like this, ought to be able to offer a judgment entitled certainly to as great respect as that of the Prime Minister. Mr. James J. Hill, one of the shrewdest men on the American continent, puts the matter squarely as an issue between Imperial confederation and continental union The two, he thinks, cannot go together. He pays no heed to the effect of the latter on Canada, but thinks only of its advantage to the States. A fifteen cent import tax on grain in England, he says, would retain the whole of the grain industry and all its allied industries to Canada, and develop the all red imperial lines of communication, and the building up of manufactures in Canada and the old country. But if this reciprocity treaty be accepted, such a duty will not be imposed. The grain grown in the central provinces of Canada will be shipped across the border, will be milled there, the flour will be shipped along American lines, and the by-products will be retained to feed and fatten American stock. And so with all other natural resources of this country. So with many articles which we could with advantage work up in this country into the finished product and export to the markets of the world.

Then my right hon. friend dealt with the question of natural resources, and here he was delightfully amusing. He referred to my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) as an Indian, because the Indians had not developed the natural resources of this country. I would like to call my hon. friend's attention to one or two other characteristics of the Indians. In days gone by they owned the whole of this continent, and there are traditions, and even veritable history, that some shrewd trader, with a few old muskets, some gaudy cotton, bright coloured scarves and attractive beads, would often acquire 20,000 or 30,000 or 40,000 square miles of land in exchange for them. Well, unfortunately for Canada, the political Indians of the country are on the treasury benches to-day. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to depart in any way from parliamentary language; therefore I withdraw that expression, and apologize to the Indians, because I am sure that there are thousands of Indians in Canada to-day who would be too intelligent to have embarked this country on such an enterprise as that which is before this House at the present time.

My right hon. friend says that the proposals he has made do not in any way imperil our industries. Well, let us look at that for a moment. Let me read what the right hon. gentleman says with regard to the matter:

There are men who believe that we are going to recklessly ruin industry and capital. Capital is timid under all circumstances and the man who is at the head of affairs and the ministers who assist him, would not be worthy of the public confidence if they were not always careful to see that capital will be safe, whenever it is invested in any industry in this country.

Mr. BURRELL. Would my right hon. friend permit me one question? Does not the very argument he has put up on behalf of the manufacturers apply with crushing force to the fruit industry?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Not in the least. My hon. friend will observe that we have not obtained for the manufacturers a free market on the other side of the line, but we have obtained a free market for the fruit growers.

What, then, will be the answer of the right hon. gentleman when he opens this country to the manufacturers of the United States? Exactly what is contained in the answer he has given to my hon. friend from Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Burrell):—We have opened to you the markets of the United States, and therefore, you have absolutely no ground of complaint. I am taking his own reason and even his very words. In fact, it is exactly along the line of what he said on 17th of November, 1891, in Boston, for I have his words as then reported, and they can be verified:

We are willing, therefore, whenever a new treaty is negotiated between the two nations that it shall not apply to one class but to all classes of goods, whether natural or manufactured.

Well, does the right hon. gentleman imagine for one moment that the farmers of this country will submit to have competition with twelve or fourteen countries in the world, under a system of free trade in natural products when they are called upon to pay taxes on every manufactured product that comes into this country? Will they be willing to undertake this burden for the benefit of our industries? I can best answer that question by a quotation which I will give to my right hon. friend. This is the view, not of farmers in Canada, but of farmers in the United States. It is a reasonable view from the farmers' standpoint, and I think it is much more convincing for the point it makes than anything uttered by my right hon. friend in his long speech of yesterday, I quote from page 241 of the hearings before the committee of Ways and Means in the United States House of Representatives:

This Bill puts the farmers' products on the free list, and taxes the articles in the form in which they reach the consumer. Do you suppose for one single instant, gentlemen, that the farmers of this country who have furnished the money, and are to-day furnishing the money for the best market of our manufacturing interests in this country, do not understand this argument? Do you believe they will ever tamely submit? No; never.

And again:

We insist that there shall be no free trade for the farmers and high tariff for the manufacturers, but that if the farm products go on the free list, manufactured articles must also be made free, and they will, inside of a very short time.

That argument, made by the farmers of the United States is precisely the argument which will be made by the farmers of Canada, and especially by those engaged in every one of these industries which have been injuriously affected by the proposals of the government.

Now, my right hon. friend dealt with the question of imports from the twelve favoured nations to whom our markets will be opened by these proposals. I am not going to spend very much time on that, but what the right hon. gentleman said deserves some answer. What he says amounts to this: Because we have few imports under a protective tariff from these twelve or fourteen countries, therefore we shall have no greater imports when the protective tariff is abolished. What, then, is the object of these proposals? Will these proposals create no changed trade conditions between Canada and the United States? If they are likely to change trade conditions between Canada and the United States, are they not equally likely to produce changed conditions between all the countries I have referred to and Canada. Has the Prime Minister taken the trouble to investigate the products of these various countries? Has he any idea of the wages of labour and the cost of production in any one of the countries he mentioned yesterday? I have an interesting statement under my hand which has been compiled from official sources by my hon. friend from Grenville (Mr. Reid). I will not attempt to give the data with regard to these countries, but only one or two items with regard to one country, and the House can judge as to the value of the argument put forward by the right hon. gentleman yesterday. Argentine, in 1909, exported 461,595,818 pounds of frozen beef, the export value being $20,210,525, or an average of 4½ cents per pound, when exported. The same country exported in the same year 146,555,326 pounds of frozen mutton, having an export value of $5,133,426, or 3½ cents per pound. What is the cost of transportation from Argentine to Canada? What will be the duties on these meats when they reach Canada? Beef and mutton can be laid down from Argentine in Canada, freight and duty paid, at between 6 cents and 7 cents per pound. And the Prime Minister seriously assured this House in his speech of yesterday that conditions in this country are not likely to lead to any competition with the products of Canada. Further than that, Argentine exported in 1909, 8,799,764 pounds of butter, the export value being $1,459,591 or 17½ cents per pound. Under these circumstances, it is utterly idle for the Prime Minister to pretend that trade conditions between Canada and the various countries which have been enumerated will not be altered by the consummation of these proposals.

Now, I come more particularly to the matter which is touched by my motion. The Prime Minister thinks that he has had a mandate for these reciprocity proposals. He admits that no election has been held at which that subject has been discussed, since 1891. He admits that his own government took off the statute book the standing offer of reciprocity in 1897. He admits that there was no discussion and no issue raised in the elections of 1900, 1904 and 1908. Yet, for some mysterious reason, he finds a mandate where no one else in the whole country can find it. I venture to say to the right hon. gentleman that he had a better mandate at every one of these elections to abolish the Senate than he had to make this arrangement so seriously affecting the business of this country. He says he merely discontinued his efforts for reciprocity. He never asked or received a mandate to renew them. Did he receive a mandate to restore the standing offer of reciprocity? That is what he proposes to do. He abolished it in 1897 and, in addition, as has been pointed out over and over again, in this House, he most distinctly gave a pledge to this country that there should be an investigation by royal commission before any substantial change was made in the fiscal conditions of this country. He proposes now a standing offer of reciprocity—because that is the result, now that the Congress of the United States has declined to ratify these proposals and to put them into effect. Would it be wise and dignified for us in this country to put out another standing offer of reciprocity, after having maintained one on the statute-book of this country without effect for more than twenty years? Congress has declined to carry out the proposals. Another party has come into power in Congress, and it is altogether uncertain that the special session will pass these proposals. Meantime, we are to pass them and to wait the pleasure of the United States, as we did in the thirty years between 1866 and 1896.

My right hon. friend the Prime Minister says that we wore out a good deal of shoe leather between 1866 and 1896 in endeavouring to get reciprocity. He now proposes to wear out a little more. Well, I respectfully submit that the time has come when we should wear out no more shoe leather in endeavouring to obtain reciprocity, and that it is now the turn of the United States to wear out some of their excellent shoe leather in coming to this country for reciprocity if they desire it. What is the present situation? Is there anything to be lost by holding our hands? Let us look for a moment at the programme of the Democratic party in that country. Every one who has followed political events and political agitation in the United States knows that the Democratic party has been pledged for many years to a lower tariff. The platform of that party has been a lower tariff and a reduction of the high cost of living. What does their leader in Congress say on that point? I shall quote from Mr. Clark, of Missouri, who, I understand, will be the next speaker in the House of Representatives, and who is the virtual leader of that party in the United States Congress at present. Mr. Clark said on the 14th of February last:

I wish to suggest to my party fellows that if this Bill is passed it is not the end of the chapter, or the end of the world. At high noon on the 4th day of March we shall come into the possession of this House, and if this treaty does not go as far as we want it to go, we can then make it go still further. (Applause on the Democrat side.)

Mr. DALZELL. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman says his party will come into power after the 4th of March?

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. In this House.

Mr. DALZELL. Suppose this treaty does not pass at this session of Congress. What will his party do with it if it is put up to them at the next session of Congress?

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof. (Laughter and applause.)

Mr. DALZELL. Would you pass this Bill?

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I think we might amend it and pass it. The chances are that we would pass a tariff Bill that would very largely take the place of this Bill; a Bill that, to say nothing of this Bill at all, will go into every branch of the subject; a Bill or Bills. And I want to say that while I am in favour of taking a separate Bill for a separate schedule, in order to expedite revision downwards, in the end 14 separate Bills for 14 separate schedules would amount to an entire tariff Bill. The Democrats are committed to a revision of the tariff, and so far as this House is concerned, we are going to revise, wisely and thoroughly, according to promise.

Further on he says:

Mr. KENDALL. I want to inquire if the gentleman is accepting this Bill as a substitute for a general tariff revision?

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. Good heavens, no. (Laughter and applause on the Democrat side.) I am accepting this for what it is worth, and no more, as a step in the right direction.

Then further on at page 2626:

Reciprocity is a good Democratic doctrine in spots, and until we can get a general Democratic tariff Bill perfected and put upon the statute-books I am going to stand by this treaty.

Further on in the same page:

In levying a tariff I am in favour of putting the highest tariff on the luxuries of life, except in those cases where the luxury is of such a character that it would incite smuggling. I am in favour of putting the lowest tariff, or none at all, on the necessaries of life. (Applause on the Democrat side.) And just exactly in proportion as things become necessary I would take the tariff off them and put them on the free list, or lower the tariff on them to the vanishing point. I do not think anybody can misunderstand that or misconstrue it.

It is perfectly plain, therefore, that the Democratic party in the United States is committed to a lower tariff, and it was most inopportune for this government to have entered into this treaty on the very eve of that change in the American tariff. As things now stand, the Democratic party has a majority in the House of Representatives, and they propose to bring in a tariff Bill, a general tariff Bill, on a lower basis. In those circumstances it seems to me that as this Bill has failed to pass Congress at the session which has just come to a close it would be absolutely inopportune for us to put on our statutes a second standing offer.

I desire now to make a general objection to this system of making tariffs. I am opposed to any system of secret tariffs. I am opposed to any system of making tariffs by convention with another country, which cannot be altered in this parliament. What is the difference in principle? In the one case the government brings down its tariff; it can be amended in parliament, with the consent of the government, when difficulties and injustices are shown to result from it which were not in the minds of those who framed it. But in the other case we must accept or reject the tariff as a whole. It is an ironclad scheme, not susceptible of any alteration. Such a tariff is not consistent with democratic government, and my right hon. friend has always claimed that he stood for democratic government. Let me give the opinion on the subject of a man of great eminence who was speaking from his experience in South Africa, when he was high commissioner in that country. He was dealing with the conditions which had obtained in South Africa and which led up to the South African union; and he pointed out the difficulties which always surrounded the making of secret tariffs.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). What name?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It is a state paper which Lord Selborne submitted to the Imperial Parliament in 1906. Speaking of the results of the conference in South Africa which had brought about the South African customs tariff, he said:

The proceedings of the conferenec were private and when it was closed, the strictest secrecy as to the nature of the results produced had still to be observed by some forty persons for several months. The new convention had then to be carried through five different legislatures, and each of these public assemblies were told that they might discuss the details, but they could not be allowed to alter one of them. The convention was cut and dried, and they must each and all take or leave it as a whole.

Compare this procedure with the process by which a customs tariff would be framed in the United Kingdom, if the government had decided to embark on a new fiscal policy. To begin with, it is probable that either the government would appoint a royal commission or parliament itself would appoint a select committee to investigate the question, and the whole proceedings of that body would be open to the public, the evidence placed before it would be the subject of public discussion. When the actual proposals were framed, they would be framed by the government itself, and the greatest attention would of course be paid to the claims of each business and industry and also to the views put forward by the various interests and parts of the country.

Then he goes on to deal with the other side of the case. He said:

A customs tariff, framed as a treaty between independent states, must not only be a compromise, but is likely to be one which its authors know to be in some respects bad in itself.

Further on:

If the conference succeeds in producing a unanimous result, the scheme is taken as a whole, and submitted to the various legislatures of the country, simply for acceptance or for rejection. Whatever may be the constitutional law on the subject, the elected representatives of the people have in practice no power to modify the details because the alteration of one item by one state would, unless agreed to by all the others, render the whole scheme unworkable and be tantamount to rejection by that state. The members of the legislatures know that the scheme must be taken or left as a whole.

Further on:

The details upon which the whole depends and which ought to be settled, and which could be settled by the representatives of the people themselves are taken out of their hands. It is difficult to imagine a less democratic, or indeed—

I invite the special attention of my right hon. friend to these concluding words of Lord Selborne:

It is difficult to imagine a less democratic, or indeed a more dangerously undemocratic method of dealing with one of the most important departments of public business.

Now, some reference has been made by hon. gentlemen opposite to an increase of the British preference. I do not know whether the gentlemen who spoke on that subject were inspired or not. I have expressed my views on this subject eight or nine years ago in this House, and I stand by them to-day. I stand, in the first place, for the empire as against the world, and within the empire I stand, first, for Canada. I believe that a mill or a factory in Canada is worth as much to this great empire as a mill or a factory in Yorkshire or anywhere else in England.

Our transportation lines run from east to west, and we are establishing many others. In connection with what Sir William Van Horne has said in his letter with regard to Mr. Hill's lines of railways, reaching up to tap Canadian trade, I would like to point out that he has very much understated the actual conditions. Here is a railway map of the west of Canada from the Great Lakes to the Pacific ocean, and looking over that, I find there are no less than 19 lines, all of them I believe controlled by Mr. Hill. A few of them have entered Canada, and the others, as Sir William Van Horne says, are standing there with their noses resting on the Canadian boundaray line, all ready to tap the traffic of this great western country. Well that was not the object with which we undertook this Canadian confederation, that is not the object for which we have poured out treasures untold in time past, that is not the object the Prime Minister had in view when he used the words I have quoted at the Imperial Conference of 1907.

We have accomplished a great work in Canada. The project of creating the Canada of to-day was a great, even an audacious one. It has well been said by a great writer of modern times that as providence is on the side of the big battalions, so providence is always on the side of a great idea; and Providence was on the side of the great idea of building up a Canadian confederation on the northern half of this continent. Let us continue the work so well begun. The same writer to whom I have alluded has said that the United States have been fortunate in the possession of a great and constant tradition, compounded of an intense belief in their institutions, in their destiny and in themselves. An equal tradition is the birthright of every Canadian. I realize that Canada has a plain duty and a grave responsibility in one important respect. She ought to be, I trust that she will be, a bond of union and of amity between the empire and the republic. But I believe that this high mission can best be fulfilled when Canadians are inspired by a belief in their institutions, their destiny, their country and themselves as intense as that which pervades the people of the United States. Our strong determination to work out our own destiny with a firm heart by our own efforts and along our own lines, will most surely win the respect of our neighbours who have given us therein an inspiring example. Let each country adopt towards the other a trade policy as generous as its true interests will permit; but let this be done without entangling engagements or indefinite understandings. No Canadian should be told that although he presents a substantial grievance it is too late to redress it, because a secret and unalterable tariff has been made at Washington. No Canadian should be told that our parliament is not free to redress the grievances of the Canadian people, because its hands have been fettered by an entangling trade alliance. Let our fiscal policy be worked out, not by secret diplomatic tariffs whereof no injustice can be redressed, but by the ordinary parliamentary methods which permit mistakes to be rectified and injustices to be removed. Thus and thus only can we preserve and maintain the true fiscal independence, and autonomy of the Canadian nation.

Now, Sir, I regard these proposals as reversing the policy of the people of Canada for the past thirty years, given by an unmistakable mandate at every election which has taken place during that period. What should be the course of the government at this time? Take the census, give the west its increased representation, then submit this question to the people of Canada and let them decide. We held out to the United States for twenty years a standing offer of reciprocity, and they did not accept it. It will not lessen their respect for us if we permit them for a few years to put a standing offer of reciprocity upon their statute-book. We have worn some shoe leather in going to Washington; as I said before, let the Americans wear out some shoe leather in coming to Ottawa. They are submitting these proposals to a new Congress; let us in Canada submit these proposals to a new parliament. I therefore beg to move:

That all the words after the word 'that' in the proposed motion be omitted and the following substituted therefor:

The reciprocal agreement embodied in the resolutions submitted to this House by the Minister of Finance on the 26th day of January last was also submitted on the same day by special message of the President to Congress of the United States of America which was then in session.

That the said session has now expired and Congress has failed to approve and carry out the said agreement.

That a considerable length of time must necessarily elapse before the said agreement can be dealt with by Congress at a special session.

That the fiscal changes proposed by the said agreement are of a far-reaching character and constitute a substantial reversal of the policy which has been approved by the people of Canada.

That in the opinion of this House, the said resolutions should not be proceeded with until the electors shall have had an opportunity of pronouncing upon their merits.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). It does not seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that the motion which my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden) has placed in your hands calls for that general discussion of the question upon which he has entered at considerable length. We have been discussing this agreement day after day, we shall continue to discuss it, we shall continue to discuss it for a sufficient time, I trust, to give the people of this country the fullest possible knowledge of its contents. We are satisfied that there has been a vast amount of misunderstanding—I do not wish to say misrepresentation, it is too harsh a word—there has been a vast amount of misunderstanding as to the contents of this agreement; and we feel that day by day the people are being made acquainted with the facts of the case, and that every day is increasing the number of the supporters of this proposition. We have been proceeding with the discussion of the question in the manner which the hon. leader of the opposition himself desired and suggested. It was his suggestion that we should take up and discuss this matter in Committee of the Whole. We were proceeding, Sir, to debate the question while you were in the chair, but the hon. gentleman asked that you leave the chair in order that we might continue the discussion in Committee of the Whole. It was his proposal, we have assented to it, we have carried on the discussion for over a month, and why my hon. friend should again and again want to break away from that arrangement is difficult to understand, except upon the one theory that the hon. gentleman knows that the country is against him on this question, and it is the desire of some hon. gentlemen on that side to, if possible, dodge a vote on the main question. We want to say in all frankness that we do not sympathize with that object. We, on this side of the House, desire that the discussion shall continue soberly, quietly, regularly, for a sufficient time to have the question thoroughly threshed out. Then, we on this side, who believe in this agreement, want an opportunity to vote for it, and it is our intention that hon. gentlemen opposite shall place themselves on record. The motion that the hon. gentleman has made, I say, does not call for discussion of the whole question, and I am not going into a discussion of the whole question at this stage. Much that my hon. friend has said to-day has already been dealt with effectively by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and that portion of it which has not been dealt with, that portion of it which may be deemed to deserve further consideration, will no doubt be dealt with in the usual way at a later stage. Again I say I do not propose to enter into the general discussion of the question to-day at this stage not even to oblige our respected friend, Sir William Van Horne, whose letter was dragged into the debate here in a way that was somewhat remarkable. Sir William Van Horne is a distinguished citizen of our country and we are glad to have his opinion on any other question—on any question. This is not the first time we have had the misfortune to differ from our good friend Sir William Van Horne. There have been occasions when we have been obliged to differ from him in the past; I shall regret if we have to differ from him in future—I suppose it may be unavoidable—but, if this matter shall take such a shape that on the one side we have Sir William Van Horne and various other estimable sirs, and on the other side the toiling masses of the people of Canada, there is no question as to which side the Liberal party is going to be on. As I said, Sir, I think the moment is not opportune, but when you leave the chair, when we take up the consideration of this subject in the way chosen by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, and for which he seems to be so frequently sorry, when we get into the ordinary course of debate, I am sure that the whole matter will be threshed out thoroughly. At the present time it seems to me that the only thing to be considered is whether or not we shall proceed with the discussion of this question of vast importance, or whether, as the hon. gentleman suggests, we shall abandon it and throw it overboard. Upon that question there cannot be a doubt as to the wish of the people of Canada, or as to the wish of the members of this House. There was an agreement between the government of the United States and the government of Canada not only as to the details of tariff arrangements, but as to the manner in which this debate, this discussion, this negotiation should be carried on. In the official copy which I hold in my hand of the letters which created the agreement I find, in a letter addressed by my colleague, the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) and myself, to Secretary Knox, and confirmed by him as a correct statement of the arrangement, the following:

13. It is understood that upon a day and hour to be agreed upon between the two governments, the President of the United States will communicate to Congress the conclusions now reached and recommend the adoption of such legislation as may be necessary on the part of the United States to give effect to the proposed arrangement.

14. It is understood that simultaneously with the sending of such communication to the United States Congress by the President, the Canadian government will communicate to the parliament of Canada the conclusions now reached, and will thereupon take the necessary steps to procure such legislation as is required to give effect to the proposed arrangement.

The President of the United States has loyally lived up to that agreement. If the government of Canada, or the parliament of Canada which supports this government, should deviate one step from this arrangement it would be a breach of faith which would dishonour the government of Canada——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FIELDING. A breach of faith which would dishonour the government of Canada and through the government, the parliament and people of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. FIELDING. Yes. Whether or not this agreement is a wise one is a proper matter for debate, and the fact that so many hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have differed from us is the best evidence that there must be a difference of opinion on that. But whatever our views may be with regard to the arrangement itself there should be no difference of opinion as to the obligation which the government of Canada entered into with the government of the United States to conduct this negotiation, to press it forward and to obtain the judgment of the Congress of the United States, and the parliament of Canada upon it.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. Speaker, does the minister give the House to understand that he and his colleagues entered into an obligation to deny the people a free opportunity of voting upon this question?

Mr. FIELDING. I have read the obligation within the last few minutes, and I will leave my hon. friend with his knowledge of the English language to understand it. I desire to repeat that it would be a gross breach of faith. My hon. friend opposite (Mr. Borden, Halifax) has stated that Congress has declined to pass this agreement. That is not an accurate statement.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I said at the session just terminated.

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. gentleman says at the session which has just terminated.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I said that before. I said there was no action at the session just terminated.

Mr. FIELDING. Congress did not decline to pass the arrangement and when my hon. friend says that Congress declined to pass it he is not putting it fairly before the House. Congress has, I say, not declined. The President of the United States has loyally kept faith. The President of the United States sent a message to Congress cordially recommending the measure to the two branches of the National legislature.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Will my hon. friend permit me to interrupt him for a matter of personal explanation? The words of my motion are:

That the said session has now expired and Congress has failed to approve and carry out the said agreement.

That, I say, is absolutely correct.

Mr. FIELDING. I was not referring to the words of the hon. gentleman's motion. I was referring to the words of the hon. gentleman's speech. I quote him correctly. I took down his words and he stated that Congress had declined to pass this measure. My hon. friend will see upon reflection that that is not a correct statement of what happened.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What did happen?

Mr. FIELDING. Does my hon. friend say in view of my correction that he does not understand what happened?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I say in effect that Congress at the last session declined to pass this measure.

Mr. FIELDING. I am not talking about effect. The hon. gentleman's statement is that Congress declined to pass it. I say that the hon. gentleman knows that Congress did not decline to pass it. He knows that the House of Representatives by a substantial majority passed the Bill, he knows that, in regard to the case of the Senate, the Senate did not decline to pass it, he knows that by a system of filibustering, which may exist on that side of the line and which we have known in times past to exist here, what was understood to be the deliberate judgment of the Senate of the United States was frustrated by their not having a vote upon it at all, and if they had never voted upon it how did they decline to pass it? The readers of the American press, the readers of our Canadian papers which pay any attention to American affairs, know perfectly well that it was generally understood that there was a majority in the Senate in the United States who were ready to pass the Bill but by the filibustering methods of a few senators, some of whom have left the Senate of the United States never to return, a vote on the question was prevented.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). So they will in the future.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend should not be a prophet; it is not wise to prophesy, unless you know, and my friend's knowledge is no greater than that of the average of mankind. The matter does not rest there. I assure you the president of the United States has loyally kept his part of the bargain; we are asking the parliament of Canada to see that for the honour and good name of Canada, no matter what we may think of the details of this measure, this parliament will keep the engagement which in the name of the Canadian people we made with the government of the United States. What do we find? No sooner had it been determined that this filibustering movement at Washington was to be successful, no sooner had it been made apparent that the good intentions of the president of the United States were to be frustrated by that movement, then President Taft in his anxiety to keep faith with the Canadian government and people, called an extra session of Congress.

Mr. HUGHES. The minister referred to something being frustrated by some movement. Would he tell us what movement?

Mr. FIELDING. By the filibustering movement at Washington. I am not referring to the filibusters of this House; we may have to pay some attention to them later on. My hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, has placed on 'Hansard,' the letter of Sir William Van Horne, a gentleman whom we highly respect, but I am not aware that his letter is of any more importance than the letters of many estimable gentlemen who have written on the other side. We can quote many letters written in cordial support of this agreement, but it does not strike me that the moment is appropriate for reading such letters. I think the president's proclamation has an important bearing on the question and I desire to put it on 'Hansard,' for convenience of future reference. No sooner had the president found that his efforts to keep faith with the Canadian government were prevented by filibustering than he took the extraordinary step of calling an extra session of Congress to deal with the agreement. Let us look at it from our own point of view; let us suppose that a question of importance had failed of success in this parliament, that parliament had been prorogued, and suppose the government of Canada should advise His Excellency to call a special session of parliament for the consideration of that question. I would say that in the taking of that step the government was proving its strong determination that that particular measure should receive their fair consideration and should engage the best attention of parliament and the country.

Mr. AMES. Do I understand that this special session is being called for the special purpose of dealing with this? Is it not a fact that the new Congress may deal with any question and refuse to deal with this question?

Mr. FIELDING. This Congress is to be called for the special purpose of dealing with this question; they may deal with other questions surely, a thousand.

Mr. AMES. And may they not leave this question entirely alone if they see fit?

Mr. FIELDING. They may leave it alone, Congress is a free body just as this parliament is, but as my hon. friend asked the special purpose for which this Congress was called, we will let the president speak for himself, let the document speak for itself:

THE PROCLAMATION.

The President's proclamation reads:

'Whereas, in a special message dated January 26, 1911, there was transmitted to the Senate and House of Representatives an agreement between the Department of State and the Canadian government in regard to reciprocal tariff legislation, together with an earnest recommendation that the necessary legislation be promptly adopted; and

'Whereas, a bill to carry into effect said agreement has passed the House of Representatives, but failed to reach a vote in the Senate; and

'Whereas, the agreement stipulates not only that the President of the United States will communicate to Congress the conclusions now reached and recommend the adoption of such legislation as may be necessary on the part of the United States to give effect to the proposed agreement, but also that the governments of the two countries will use their utmost efforts to bring about such changes by concurrent legislation at Washington and at Ottawa;

Now, therefore, I, William Howard Taft, President of the United States of America, by virtue of the power vested in me by the constitution, do hereby proclaim and declare that an extraordinary occasion requires the convening of both houses of the Congress of the United States at their respective chambers in the city of Washington on the fourth of April, 1911, at twelve o'clock noon, to the end that they may consider and determine whether the Congress shall by the necessary legislation make operative the agreement.

'All persons entitled to act as members of the sixty-second Congress are required to take notice of this proclamation.

'Given under my hand and the seal of the United States at Washington the fourth day of March in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and eleven, and of the independence of the United States, the one hundred and thirty-fifth.

WILLIAM H. TAFT.'

By the President.

P. C. KNOX,
Secretary of State.

I hope I have satisfied my hon. friend from St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) that this Congress is called in special session to keep faith with the government of Canada in this important matter. A duty rests upon this government. A duty we believe rests on the parliament of Canada, so far as it is willing to give us its support; whether the members agree with this agreement or arrangement or not, there should be no division of opinion as to the obligation which we, as a young nation, have entered into with the great nation beside us. The president of the United States is loyally doing his part, it remains with us to loyally do ours. How? By throwing it overboard and saying we will have nothing more to do with it?

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Yes, we have that right.

Mr. FIELDING. Shame on that suggestion. It finds no favour here. We desire that this matter shall be discussed, as I stated in the earlier stages of the debate, not hastily, not in a rush, not unduly; we desire that every member of this House shall have abundant opportunity to form and express his views, we desire that every member shall have abundant opportunity to give his free and untrammelled vote, but we say we should, day by day, not to the exclusion of all other business, but to the exclusion of things of less importance, keep this measure before us, and prove to the people of the United States that we are going to keep faith and to fulfil the contract we made with them. We believe, Sir, that that is the only true policy to adopt. Somebody must move first. It is childish to say that one side must wait for the other to move; if that policy were adopted we could do nothing. If the United States Congress had debated that matter and voted against it, if the Senate of the United States, after what had occurred in the House of Representatives, had declared it would not pass this measure, if there were good reasons to believe that the United States Congress were refusing to implement the president's engagement, that would be the time for us to consider what next. That time has not arisen. The president has tried his best to have it passed in the Congress that has just transpired; he means to do the same in the Congress that is to meet very shortly. We say, let us put this measure on our statute-book, and then, if within a reasonable time the United States Congress fail to do their part, we shall be free to consider what next. In the meantime, I say that the honour of the Dominion government and through the Dominion government the honour of the country, is pledged to this arrangement with the United States. While I quarrel with no man for differing from us on the merits of the agreement, I say there is no room for difference as to our condemnation of the motion which the hon. leader of the opposition has placed in your hands.

Hon. GEORGE E. FOSTER (North Toronto). There is nothing, Sir, in the argument which has been addressed to the House by the hon. Minister of Finance that calls for a reply from this side of the House. If there was needed any single indication of the position in which Canada was placed when my hon. friend and his colleague went to Washington and made this compact—if there was anything needed to show why these two men should not have gone, or more particularly why the present Minister of Finance should not have gone, it was amply supplied in the remarks he has just made. I can hardly trust myself to characterize my impressions and my feelings at the effort which has been made by the Minister of Finance. After the argument which was put up by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, short, pertinent, and especially strong, we naturally looked for the Finance Minister to make some rebuttal of that argument—to at least attempt to answer it; but I leave it to you, Mr. Speaker, and to this House and to the country, if the hon. gentleman made any attempt to answer a single one of the strong positions taken by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. Instead of attempting to argue upon the merits of the case, he has made three or four genera. assertions, and I would not have been on my feet at this moment if it had not been for the bad doctrine, the inadmissible doctrine, which my hon. friend has put forth. What are those assertions, in brief? In the first place, the general assertion was made, and not qualified, that it is quite sufficient on every occasion to give time for the discussion of a measure in parliament, and that if that is done the people have no right to complain that the matter has not been submitted to them for their approval. What does that mean, Sir? It means that once a parliament has been elected the people count for nothing. It means that mandates are not necessary. It means that two men in a government can bind the country by their sign-manuals, that they can deliver the goods, and that, provided you give parliament a reasonable length of time to discuss their proposal, the people have no concern in the matter at all, and ought not to be applied to. You only need to state that doctrine to see how untenable it is. Is my hon. friend afraid of the people? He was very brave in declaring that they were going to make every man on this side of the House poll his vote. Every man on this side is willing and ready to poll his vote; but, different from my hon. friends opposite, every man on this side is willing that the people shall poll their vote too. The hon. leader of the opposition has put it up to my right hon. friend to go to the people as the final court of appeal, and let the votes be polled where the people are free, and not bound, as representatives of the people often are in the House of Commons. Now, that is the position which is democratic; that is the position which will appeal to the country, and again I state, and will state it to the end of this debate, instead of two men binding the country to a reversal of the policy of this country for 30 years, let the people say whether they wish to have that policy changed or not. It is arbitrary, it is tyrannical, it is the very opposite of responsible and free government, to take the position which my hon. friend has taken to-day.

The Finance Minister also said that the hon. leader of the opposition and other gentlemen on this side of the House knew that the country was against them. Well, Sir, whether the country be against us or not, we take the fair position that we are willing to submit the matter to the country to see what their real views are. In that we differ from hon. gentlemen opposite, who are not willing to submit it to the country, who fear of all things an appeal to the country on this matter at this moment. What folly it is to say that because 200 members of parliament, for ten days, twenty days, two months, three months, debate a matter in parliament, that gives the people sufficient knowledge, and that is sufficient to preclude your going to the people. Suppose that does give the people sufficient knowledge, suppose that the object of a two months' debate here is to give the people knowledge, why are you giving the people knowledge if not to know what the people think about it? And how are you to know what the people think about it if you do not submit the matter to the people and get their vote upon it? So that the very doctrine implied in the argument of the Finance Minister, that we should give leisurely time for the information to filter through the country, involves as a necessary consequence the conclusion that the reason for giving the information is that the people may know how to cast their ballots when they go to the polls to decide this question for themselves.

The Minister of Finance had so little thought of the dignity of his position and of what ought to weigh with him and other men on a question like this that he endeavoured to array the 'knights' against the 'horny handed sons of toil.' If that is the issue, says my hon. friend, if it is Sir Van Horne against the man with the smock frock and the cap on his head; if it is these 'estimable Sirs' against the horny handed sons of toil, we welcome the issue. Well, it is only necessary to state this position to stigmatize it for what it is worth. It is worth absolutely nothing; it is worth less than nothing. It is a bad doctrine, one which no people like the people of Canada will stand. For how long has my hon. friend had such a deep contempt for 'estimable Sirs'? He has eaten at their boards, he has sat beside them at their council table, he has even ridden with them on the public highway. But to-day he has found out that these 'Sirs' have no standing when compared with the horny handed sons of toil. I doubt if there is a man in this House, or a man in this country, who has put more hard work into a lifetime than Sir William Van Horne himself; and it does not remove him from the category of industrious and honourable citizens that her late Majesty saw fit to recognize his great services by conferring a title upon him. This appeal of the minister is to be characterized simply as an unworthy appeal.

Now, the minister lays down this doctrine: can we for a single moment adhere to it? Here we have this agreement: it is not for us to ask whether there was a mandate for the agreement, or even whether the agreement is a good one; it is not for us to ask whether it twists the destinies and fortunes of this country in the wrong way or not; all we have to look at is, was there an agreement between the government and Mr. Taft?—if there was we are not to look at the agreement, we are simply to be loyal to the gentlemen who have signed with the President of the United States. Why, then, are we discussing this matter at all? What was the necessity of having a single hour's discussion upon the merits of it? According to the Minister of Finance, the only question at issue is this: Shall we loyally carry out what two men promised Mr. Taft we would carry out?—it is this and this alone that parliament has to think about and vote upon. I deny this wholly, for my part; I deny it for gentlemen on this side of the House; and I think I can deny it for every man of common sense in the country. The question really is: By what right did these gentlemen make that agreement?—who authorized them to sign an agreement with Mr. Knox and Mr. Taft pledging the two countries to carry out this trade arrangement? These two gentlemen purported to sign something for the good of their country; but it was to be determined by this parliament in a constitutional way. Now, the minister tells us that it does not matter at all as to the agreement at issue; the only point is that the faith of the Dominion of Canada, is pledged. Who pledged it? And what mandate had they to pledge it? I thought we were discussing this agreement as to whether it was beneficial to the country or not. But now we are told—and the government evidently stand behind the Finance Minister—that the thing we are discussing, the thing we are asked to decide, is as to whether we shall keep faith with Mr. Taft or not. Now, my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) did not do justice to himself when he quibbled on the point as to whether the Congress has passed this agreement or not. Has Congress passed it?—that is the only question. Before which Congress was this agreement? Before the 61st Congress, 3rd session. Did that Congress pass it or not? Is this session of Congress now in existence? The next Congress that comes into existence, will not be the 61st Congress. The 61st Congress is functus offico and can do no more legislative work. It is dead, and it has not passed the agreement. Therefore, just exactly as my hon. friend (Mr. Borden, Halifax) said, the Congress has declined to pass it.

Now, my hon. friend talks about filibustering tactics. As it happened, the matter got before the Senate of the United States in the late hours of the session, when there was a congestion of business, and the Senate declined to take this up in preference to other measures which had been sent it by the House of Representatives. Not ten minutes was spent in the Senate in the discussion of, or attempt to get a discussion of this question. Senator Gore attempted to get in an amendment when the Tariff Commission Bill was being passed through, but he was ruled out of order by the Speaker. The few minutes consumed by Senator Gore in trying to get his amendment before the Senate and the ruling of it out of order is all the time given by the Senate to this subject. So it was not talked out or filibustered out. But it makes no difference; the 61st Congress did not pass it, and the 61st Congress is dead. Now, Sir, there is just this difference.

If the Governor General of Canada had pledged himself to Mr. Taft, or anybody else, to call a session of this parliament and bring the measure before this parliament and do his utmost to have it passed, such a pledge would have some force in it. But Mr. Taft has no more power over the 62nd Congress than has any official in the administration of the United States. Their system of government is absolutely different from ours. Consequently, no pledge which President Taft can give need necessarily be implemented by the Congress of the United States. The next Congress will be one outside of the Republican party, to which the President of the United States belongs. It will take its own course and do such work as it pleases entirely regardless of any pledge President Taft may have given. Of what effect or force, therefore, has the proclamation of President Taft as read by my hon. friend the Finance Minister? My purpose in rising was to protest against what I consider to be two bad points of doctrine. One, that the people need not be consulted provided you give parliament a certain length of time to discuss the question; and the other, that because two or three members of the government, without a mandate from the people, choose to commit themselves to an arrangement with another country, this country is bound in loyalty and good faith to carry that out. It is for this parliament to go down into the essence of the question itself, and if the thing itself is not good for this country to decline to pass it and throw the responsibility on the gentlemen who made the agreement without a mandate.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York). The question submitted to the House involves a great organic change in the constitution of this country. It involves the idea that hereafter the tariffs of Canada are to be made in secret negotiations with other countries. That is a change of the most momentous kind. It is an organic change so sweeping in its character that the people of Canada ought to be consulted before it is made. There is a proverb which says that he who gives quickly gives twice, but there is also a proverb which says that those who act hastily rush in where angels fear to tread. Now, there is no reason under the sun why this matter should be rushed through. If this is a democratic country and the people ought to rule, should we not consult the people before we enact such an organic change in our constitution? I am ready to trust the people of Canada, but I am not ready to trust the three tailors of Tooley street, who say that what they propose is what the people of England want. There sits the master tailor and his two apprentices on either side. No harm can be done by the fullest deliberation of this matter, but a great deal may be done by rushing it through. In fact, the future of our country is at stake. If this measure be a good thing it will stand all the deliberation we can give it. We can go to the country on the question this coming fall if we wish. The people would be quite willing that a redistribution measure should be introduced and a proper representation given to the west and the cities of this country. We hear about the insolence of the cities and manufacturing towns in criticising this policy, but take Toronto and the suburban riding I represent; what have we there? We have a population of 400,000. With what representation? With six members only, or one member for each 60,000. The same in Montreal, the same in Vancouver, Winnipeg and the other cities of this Dominion. Yet the people who live in these cities are stigmatised as not being the equal of those who live in the rural parts. Let us have a proper redistribution Bill; let us give representation by population; then let us go to the country, and let every man's vote be as good as every other man's. What we want is deliberation. We do not want to be rushed into an agreement that involves the very future of the country and our alliance with the mother land. What are we asked to do? We have had a National Policy in this country during a great many years, and that policy succeeded so well that two of the leading provinces have adopted it from a provincial point of view. The provinces of Quebec and Ontario have adopted the National Policy with regard to the pulp-wood and paper making industry, and have declared for a policy of their own to encourage that industry within their own respective provinces. And that policy has been successful.

What has happened on this occasion? Two men in the government of this country go to Washington and sign a secret treaty which puts a big stick in the hands of President Taft with which to club two of our provinces into making concessions to the United States. Is that patriotic? Is that a precedent to establish hastily? The President of the United States is given a club by two representatives of the government of Canada with which to coerce our provinces into any policy he may see fit to impose on them. Surely in a matter of that kind the fullest deliberation ought to be given. The people of Canada do not want to be rushed into this bargain. They wish to be heard before it is completed, and they wish to have full time to discuss it. They wish to have it discussed in the schoolhouses of the back concessions and townships. That is their right, but we are taking from them the right of public meeting and discussion. I say that we should have public meetings all over this country for the discussion of this measure before we decide to adopt it. And I pledge myself to do what I can to keep this question in this House until the people of Canada have had the opportunity of discussing it from one end of the country to the other. British Columbia wishes to discuss it in detail; so does Nova Scotia. I met some men from Nova Scotia interested in the fishing industry, who told me that after considering this thing a second time they thought it was wrong. But they are to be denied the privilege of sober second thought, according to the speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), and we are simply to be rushed into this thing because two or three members of the government made an improvident deal with the President of the United States. The honour of the country, I say again, is not involved, but the discretion and the wisdom of those who made this bargain are in question. They talk about keeping their word with the United States, and about a breach of honour. But what about their disregard of the rights of parliament to fully discuss this matter and pass its opinion on any tariff Bill introduced into this House? One of the serious objections to a measure of this kind is that not even parliament can alter it. The people are to have no say about it, parliament is to have no say about it, even the followers of the government are to have no say about it, and the consequence is that Liberals all over the country object to going into a proposition on which they cannot be heard.

A while ago I was discussing a question in this House which involved the idea of responsible government. I believe it is the right of a government to assume responsibility upon matters which they introduce into this parliament. They may have to do it in matters of war; they may have to do it in matters of policy; but when a great organic change is proposed, when the relations of this country to the mother land are involved, then I say time must be taken, the people must be consulted, and an opportunity must be given them to pass upon it. To-day they are to be denied the privilege of passing upon this question, and they are asked to rush it through. Why this haste? Cannot President Taft deliver the goods he has signed to deliver? He is an important man. I had occasion to say the other day that he is the only man in diplomacy to-day whose name and whose signature is not worth the paper on which it is written, because he cannot deliver the goods. All he says is, I will undertake to do it, I will submit it to Congress. But Canada is bound to pass it through, according to hon. gentlemen opposite. All Mr. Taft undertakes to do is to submit it to Congress, but we are asked to put it through parliament. He has delivered the goods when he has submitted them to Congress, but according to the Minister of Finance, we have not finished our part of the contract until we have put it on the statute-book. President Taft has less power in the new Congress than he had in the old one. The new Democratic Congress is committed to reduce the tariff all round, and they will do it. If we had only waited until the Democrats had had an opportunity of reducing the tariff, there would have been no need of this upset in our public affairs. Let the Democrats reduce the tariff as far as they like, and after they have gone as far as they wish, we may get far more than we are getting under the present proposals. In fact, if hon. gentlemen want to get wider markets from the United States let them withdraw now and put the responsibility on the Democratic party.

Mr. KNOWLES. Does the hon. gentleman want more? I understand that he is displeased at getting so much.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Let the Americans make their tariff and we will make ours, and what we want we will get. Let them reduce the tariff as much as they like, but for God's sake let them mind their own business, and we will mind ours. Now the Minister of Finance talked about filibustering in the United States Senate. That has always prevailed in the United States Senate; and shall we make the greatest interests of Canada, the control of our tariff and the maintenance of our connection with the mother land, subject to filibustering in the United States Senate? That is the doctrine that is preached here to-day. That is not Canadianism, that is not the British idea of constitutional government. Surely there never was in the United States the slightest approach to national magnanimity. Look at the proclamation that was signed and read by the minister to-day. 'Signed and sealed in this 135th year of American independence.' Is the political salvation of the world dependent upon the United States in that way? As I said the other day, the hope of the world and of its progress lies in the British constitutional system and in our own methods, and we ought to strive ever to come within the filibustering methods that prevail in the United States.

Now is this proposal the government has submitted to us, the logical outcome of our history for the past 25 or 30 years? Is it on the line of that National Policy which has obtained in this country, of which we are all so proud, and to which both parties and all the people have now subscribed? This proposal is an absolute contradiction of that policy. It has been brought into this House under a secret agreement. It is not a natural and logical consequence of what has taken place in the past, but it is a proposal surreptitious in its origin, and it is a straight contradiction of the policy that we have been hitherto pursuing. Now there is something happening to-day that ought to make all Canadians pause. The record of the United States in regard to national magnanimity is not anything to be proud of. At this very moment the whole of America is disturbed by the report that the United States government is massing 20,000 troops on the Mexican border. Some day when Canada does not do as she is bid in regard to our tariff, will there be a massing of 20,000 American troops on the Canadian border? The Canadian people do not like that idea. Let them go back, let them decline to have further tariff negotiations with the United States. After vested interests have been created, as Sir William Van Horne has said, would it not be a likely thing for the United States government to mass troops on our border if we chose to assert our tariff independence? I say this thing ought to be considered with the greatest deliberation, it ought to be taken to the people, it ought to be taken to the farmers of the west, it ought to be taken to the manufacturers, it ought to be taken to the men who work in factories, it ought to be taken to all our people. In all fairness, I suggest to the Prime Minister that, inasmuch as the late Congress failed to pass this agreement although the president did his best, we should take time, we should avail ourselves of the constitutional practice of declining to go any further with this proposal before it is submitted to the people of Canada. Let every man who is interested have an opportunity to discuss it with his neighbour, then public opinion will be elicited, and we can come back in a new parliament, which can assemble here before Christmas if necessary. We can sit here and deal with public business until May. The government can send their representatives to England if they wish; they can come back here in July, and readjust the representation according to the new census, the voice of the people of Canada can be taken on this question by September, and parliament can be called in session in December, when the whole thing can be threshed out according as the people have expressed their views. Then parliament will have a mandate on this great question, which it does not have to-day. Surely this proposal is in line with our constitution, it is in line with our rights, and especially is that the right course to take, when a great organic change is proposed like this. I read in one of the great Republican papers of the United States, the Chicago 'Tribune,' of yesterday, something that will interest the House. It seems that the 'Saturday Review,' published in London, had the misfortune to criticise these proposals, and because the 'Saturday Review' had the temerity to do so, the people of the United States are asked by the Chicago 'Tribune' to 'look at this enemy of the United States.' The 'Saturday Review,' a British newspaper, is called the enemy of the United States because it objects to these proposals, and notwithstanding the fact that the 'Saturday Review' is a very friendly paper to Canada. That sums up the attitude of the American people. They have no regard for other people's ideas, they have only regard for themselves and they believe themselves to be the greatest people on the face of the earth. If we undertake to deal, in relation to the tariff with people of that class of mind, who do not respect the rights of others, we will at all times be subject to their idiosyncrasies. Let us keep the making of the Canadian tariff actually in the hands of the Canadian people. If you propose to take the right to make our tariff away from the people first let us have the judgment of the people upon the question. I intend to vote for this motion and I intend to ask the people to support us in declining to allow these proposals to go through this House until the people can be consulted in a general election and until after a proper redistribution has been effected.

Mr. W. B. NORTHRUP (East Hastings). Mr. Speaker, I would not have ventured to occupy the time of the House at this stage of the session had it not been for one observation made by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), when he lately addressed the House. I differ from my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) who expressed his surprise that the Minister of Finance had no argument to advance in answer to the admirable speech made by my hon. friend the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax). I differ from my hon. friend from North Toronto in that respect; I did not expect any argument to be advanced by the Minister of Finance in answer to those supporting the motion when he would dare to come before parliament with the most important piece of legislation that has been presented in years, and not even pretend to advance any argument in its support except to offer the suppositious history of the negotiations touching reciprocity. This tragedy of errors, I think I am justified in calling it, has become more and more complete, and perhaps the most remarkable feature of the minister's answer was that, in pointing out why the motion should not be adopted, he was very careful to throw away from himself the belted knight and to declare to this House, and the country that he represented the toiling masses. I wrote down his exact words, and so I am prepared to pledge my faith that he said that in introducing and supporting this agreement he was doing so in the interest of the toiling masses. I suppose that it is perfectly reasonable to say that when the Minister of Finance spoke of toiling masses he was speaking intelligently having reference to a certain definite class of people in his mind, or else he was talking unpardonable twaddle. I do him the justice to believe that he thought he was speaking of them in the former way. Who would the toiling masses be in the Dominion of Canada for whom he presumes to speak? Who would they be down in his own province of Nova Scotia? I suppose it would be fair to assume that the men who are toiling in the coal mines of Nova Scotia would be included among the toiling masses, and he stands here to show his love and devotion to them by reducing the duty on coal eight cents a ton in the interest of that portion of the toiling masses who work in the mines of Nova Scotia. That is the way that he represents that section of the toiling masses. He will find in his own province men toiling in the iron industry. While the iron industry is perhaps not very much affected, yet rods are put on the free list and whatever protection there is in that item for the iron industry, and, therefore, in the interest of this portion of the toiling masses who are engaged in the iron industry, is taken away. If there is anything in this treaty, this pact, for the farmers of Nova Scotia it must be because they will get more for their products hereafter than they have been able to get heretofore. I do not say that will be the result, but if there is anything in it, it must be that, and so the hon. gentleman stands up here and assumes to speak on behalf of the toiling masses who are to be benefited by decreased wages, and an increased cost of living. Then, we come westward to New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario, dotted with manufacturing towns and cities, and I presume that any man who understands the English language will admit that the men who are working in our factories are a portion of the toiling masses. I cannot imagine what justification the Minister of Finance has for standing up here before this intelligent House, and saying that this pact is introduced in the interest of that portion of the toiling masses that we find in the workshops and factories of Ontario. Has there been anything coming over the ground from the various workshops and factories? Is it possible that he reads the papers? Has he received any communications, is he not aware, as I believe he must be aware, that the practical men who are working in the workshops and factories of Ontario are opposed to this pact? Then we go to the west; we go to the prairie farmers—the grain growers, perhaps I should say. I cannot believe that, as a matter of accurate description, he would be justified in calling the men who are becoming rich—as we are all glad to see by growing grain in the Northwest, the toiling masses. I am afraid that the farmers of my own province of Ontario, who are an industrious, prosperous and contented people, would be offended by being described as a portion of the toiling masses. In the far distant province of British Columbia again we have our mines, and we have a portion of the toiling masses at work in them. If my description be true—if not I hope to be corrected—I would like to ask what possible justification the Minister of Finance could have for saying that, in introducing this pact to this House, and in opposing the suspension of a consideration of it, he was standing up for and supporting the interests of the toiling masses of this country. If the hon. gentleman had not the faintest idea whom he represented as he has not, if the hon. gentleman who made the bargain has not the faintest idea what his bargain is, I ask, is it not a reasonable proposition that other people who have not had the same opportunity that he has had should have an opportunity of studying so wide-reaching and far-spreading an agreement as this? When I say that the hon. gentleman does not understand his own bargain I justify that statement by his own speech in which he introduced the bargain to the House. After the Minister of Finance had used up column after column of 'Hansard' with an historical retrospect, very interesting, but unhappily inaccurate, he, in a half dozen lines at the end of his speech, referred in a rather contemptuous way to a few old musty, almost forgotten treaties which Great Britain had made, and which would allow a few countries other than the United States to enjoy the advantages of this pact. Ought not any man, as honest as I am sure the Minister of Finance is, as appreciative of his responsibilities to this House as I am sure he is, as regardful of his reputation in the country as he must be, in introducing any important piece of legislation of this kind involving an agreement between Canada and the United States which also brought in twelve other countries at a cost to them of not one penny, and to whom we open our doors, to have called the attention of the members of this House to that fact, that it might honestly and intelligently consider the question, especially in view of the circumstance that by reason of this pact, whatever we might receive from the United States, we could by no possibility receive anything from these other countries to whom our doors are thrown open. I feel that I am all the more justified in assuming that the Minister of Finance was acting honestly, but under a misunderstanding of his own bargain from what the right hon. gentleman said only yesterday when he pointed out, that, even if the Argentine Republic had the advantage of the Canadian market, and could send her wheat into Canada, Canada on the same principle could send her wheat into the Argentine Republic, and that was an ample and a perfectly satisfactory explanation in the mind of the hon. gentleman.

When I hear such statements I feel justified in saying that no wiser motion could be made than that the consideration of this important measure should be postponed for at least a time in order that the Finance Minister might learn that in the Argentine Republic labourers are content with about 45 cents a day, and until we are ready in Canada, as the government has declared it is ready, to reduce the wages of the men employed on our farms to 45 cents a day, we cannot compete with the Argentine Republic. And even when we have reduced our wages to a point where we can compete, we are met with a duty when our wheat reaches the Argentine, which their wheat does not when it reaches Canada. So under no possible combination of circumstances can we deal in wheat with the Argentine Republic. The Minister of Finance pointed out that President Taft had agreed to recommend this pact to Congress ,that Congress had died without discussing it and he had recommended it to a second Congress and he said that therefore we were in honour bound to keep on with the consideration of the case. Does it not strike him, if his argument is sound and his logic worth listening to, that if our American friends discuss this and do not actually kick it out of doors, if the Democratic party choose to go on with its own measures without refusing to consider this, we are bound to stay here until Doomsday to keep our faith or else must pass this enactment without having the faintest idea of what they intend to do. Would not one think that when such an opportunity was offered to the government of reasonably postponing the decision of the question, they would have discovered that no other party in the world but the present government would have made such a bargain as this with a high tariff party, already defeated when their successful opponents were elected, pledged to a low tariff. When they had once made the mistake of having a bargain with the high tariff party instead of with the low, if the interests of the country appealed to them, they would be only too glad now, the President having done his part and failed, to carry out all he agreed to do—for all he agreed to do was to submit the matter to Congress and recommend its adoption—the President having failed in what was expected on his side, one would expect that the government would have taken advantage of these facts and if they were bound to make a bargain would have made it with those who would be a thousand times more willing to make a bargain than the Taft administration were before the present Congress came into power. That would seem self-evident and if the government had been acting in the interests of the country instead of from some motive I cannot explain, they would have adopted the course I have suggested.

I do not pretend to say why they have acted as they have done but it is common report from one end of Canada to the other that the only reason the pact was made was in order to divert the attention of the people of Canada and particularly of the right hon. gentleman's own province of Quebec, from the unhappy naval policy to which this country is pledged. I cannot vouch for that but from end to end of the country it is said that this is another price we are paying for our Canadian navy. Knowing the feeling of the people of Quebec and other provinces against this extraordinary expenditure of $22,000,000 on the army and navy, the government wished to draw a herring across the scent and so sent ambassadors to the United States to make a bargain. By doing so, they have attracted a good deal of attention for a little while, the people have forgotten the navy, although when an election comes on they will remember it again; but would it not be worth while for the government to abandon for a while their personal interests and consider the interests of the country and if they are bound to make a bargain make it with the party pledged by Champ Clarke, in the House of Representatives, to reduce the duties on the necessities of life as soon as they came into power to the vanishing point or remove them altogether. If they removed the American duties on the necessaries of life we would have all we have got to-day and more. The Canadian farmer would have better access to the American market under what Champ Clark promised to the House of Representatives under this agreement. Strange to say there are gentlemen sitting behind the government who, after carefully avoiding listening to the debates, up to ten minutes ago actually had not the faintest conception of what the objection of Canadians to this agreement is. The hon. gentlemen seem to think that as long as Canadians get access into the American market they should be satisfied. No one on this side of the House is objecting to any admission of Canada to the American market. The Americans have control of their tariff and can remove the duty on everything tomorrow and we would have no reason to object but surely even some of the hon. gentlemen opposite should be able to understand the difference between getting access to the American market and the Americans and 12 other nations getting access to the Canadian market. I apprehend that before the country has finished discussing this question, many hon. gentlemen opposite will find that the constituents who sent them here perfectly understand the difference between getting admission to the American market which the leader of the winning party in the United States says they are obliged to give us anyway, and giving the Americans and 12 other countries, for nothing, admission to our markets. If hon. gentlemen could only for once take their eyes off the foreign country and fasten them on their own they would see that the interests of Canada are as they have been admitted to be by this and preceding governments, to keep the Canadian markets for the Canadian people.

Although I do not pretend to stand here on behalf of the toiling masses, I do represent an agricultural constituency and therefore, I am prepared to support the motion made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden) because I stand here to protest, as the representative of an agricultural constituency, against the compact made in 1878 and renewed in 1897 being violated by the hon. gentlemen opposite; I stand here to protest against the bargain by which the province of the Minister of Finance gets a duty on coal and iron which is of no benefit to my province of Ontario and by which Ontario is given a duty on her breadstuffs being violated, it being understood that the duty on breadstuffs was a sort of bargain, Nova Scotia being given one thing and Ontario another. I warn the Finance Minister that if he is as regardless of his own province as he apparently is of the Dominion as a whole, the farmers whom he has selected as the particular objects of his animosity, who, of all people, are to be deprived of protection, whose markets are to be given not to the United States but to the world, I warn that hon. gentleman that if he really is true to his newly found and oft-professed although rarely acted-up-to belief in the doctrine of protection, the day is not far distant when the farmers of Ontario will say: We only bear the duty on coal and iron in consideration of a duty on our products and since that was the direct bargain made in 1878 and renewed since, as you have broken the bargain, and removed our duties, we will insist that the duty on coal and iron be removed in order that justice may be done. I, as a protectionist, would be exceedingly sorry to see a movement of that kind on the part of the agricultural element of this country. I think perhaps the most dangerous feature in this measure is the unhappy setting of one class against another, for nobody can possibly argue, even the Finance Minister, and the Prime Minister know it is impossible to argue this agreement on any platform without denouncing the manufacturers and appealing to the farmers. If it is to the interests of this country to set class against class, let us proceed with this discussion, but if not, let us know that the true basis of our national prosperity is a protective policy, then let all classes enjoy it, or as the farmers say, either all shall have it or none, and I am sure there is no man in Canada so rampant a free trader, except possibly the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), as to believe that it is the true interests of Canada that all protection should be removed from all industries.

One other word. It seems to me that the Minister of Finance threw out a hint that while he intended to give ample opportunity for every member to discuss the question, the House was not to sit here indefinitely. I take his hint to be that if necessary a closure would be applied in order to secure a vote on this important question. I sincerely hope that I misunderstood the hon. gentleman. I am not going to ask him whether I understood him rightly or wrongly. If I understood him rightly, I would be sorry to have him repeat the statement and be bound by it. But in the discussion of a question like this, on which the people of this country are more excited than on any other, because there has perhaps been a time when their pockets have been so immediately touched, whether we are right or wrong, if the discussion were to be shut off by the application of a closure, I am inclined to think that we would come nearer to a rebellion in Canada than we have been for many a day. It is bad enough to have the rights of this House taken away; it is bad enough to have two gentlemen go to Washington and sign a treaty which binds every man in this House, which for the first time in Canada compels us to vote for items whether we like them or not——

Sime hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. TALBOT. How is the hon. gentleman going to vote against it if he is compelled to vote for it?

Mr. NORTHRUP. If I were able to vote for such a measure as this, I would not think it necessary to call attention to myself in public. I would retire to the remotest privacy, and would hope that I would not be discovered. I was appealing to those who have to accept this measure as a whole or oppose it as a whole. Surely hon. gentlemen opposite can see if they lay aside party feelings and apply their common sense to the question, that it is a monstrous thing to be placed in this position, when deliberating in the interests of the country, for each man here, though elected by a single constituency, represents the whole electorate of Canada. Therefore it seems extraordinary that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, who represent British Columbia, are obliged to vote to kill one of the greatest industries of that province, or else refuse to accept the bargain as a whole. If this House undertakes to amend a single clause in the agreement, the whole thing has to go back to the United States again for their ratification. The right hon. the Prime Minister represents the fruit growers of British Columbia as much as the hon. member for Yale-Cariboo, and the Minister of Finance represents the milling interest just as much as any man from Manitoba; and they must either vote to kill the industry which is interested, or to take back this agreement as a whole. I, therefore, hope that the government will see that there are advantages, and very great advantages, in withdrawing the measure for a time, as it is quite possible that the American Congress may not agree to it all. If this House should pass this measure, in the opinion of many of the best financiers in this country—and surely they are more competent to judge of a question of finance than even the toiling masses whom the minister so much respects—the very passing of it by this House would have an injurious effect on the country. This measure affects the banks, the transportation companies, the investment of capital from the mother land and even capital from the United States, which has been coming here so rapidly of late; and if it is true that the mere passing of the measure by this House, irrespective of carrying it out, is liable to cause tremendous injury to Canada, why not let it stand until we see whether the American Congress will pass it? If they fail to pass it, we shall have done no harm; and if they pass it, the right hon. the Prime Minister will still have an opportunity to have it dealt with by this House. It must be borne in mind that the Democrats have a majority in the House of Representatives, and that while the Republicans have a majority in the Senate, it is a very uncertain one, being only eight or nine, including the insurgents; so that it is by no means certain that this measure will pass the Congress of the United States. It cannot be too well remembered also that their system of government is very different from ours. If the right hon. gentleman insists, this Bill must sooner or later pass this House, but it is not so in the United States. The President might use every means in his power to secure the passage of the Bill, and yet it is not certain that it will pass. For these reasons I appeal to the right hon. gentleman to let the measure stand at all events until the American Congress decides what it will do. If it should pass that body, I can quite understand that the right hon. gentleman might feel bound to endeavour to have it passed by this parliament. But in the meantime the country will have an opportunity to consider it; and if the measure is, as he seems to think, so transparently in the interest of this country, and the people express their approval of it, he will then be able to have it passed by parliament, supported by a majority of the people of this country, and all criticism from this side of the House will of necessity be closed.

Mr. DEVLIN. If action is delayed here, and the United States Congress passes the measure, will the hon. gentleman then favour the proposal before the House?

Mr. NORTHRUP. Most certainly not. I would not act so illogically, I hope.

Mr. H. GUTHRIE (South Wellington). Mr. Speaker, the question before the chair seems to be a simple one, and not one which invites a general discussion of the main issue. Therefore I think we might limit ourselves to discussing the single question whether, in view of what has recently transpired in the Congress of the United States, it would be well for the parliament of Canada now to halt, or whether we should proceed. I believe the wording of the motion is that in view of the failure of the United States Congress to approve of the proposed trade agreement, the discussion of the matter in this House should be postponed, and the matter should be referred to the people. Now, we must all agree that the question is to-day fairly and squarely before the parliament of Canada. I think it came properly before us. It was the result of negotiations which took place between Canadian ministers and negotiators on behalf of the United States government.

It does come before us and is launched in the regular form, and we are discussing it, I assume, as a serious matter and one on which we expect to reach a definite conclusion one way or the other. Is it not more dignified to discuss this as a matter pertinent to Canada and Canadian interests, independent altogether of what in the meantime Congress may or may not do. The fact that the 61st Congress has not seen fit to deal with the matter ought not to influence this parliament. If this proposal be a good proposal for Canada, why halt in the discussion? If it be not a good proposal, then let us refuse to entertain it; but to my mind, no proper logical reason has been offered for postponing that discussion. The 62nd Congress will be just as powerful and potent as the 61st. Its session will probably last two, or three, or four months. True, it may deal with other questions besides the tariff. That is the privilege of a special Congress of the United States; but it has been convened for a single purpose, the trade arrangement with Canada, and it is very probable that that arrangement will be given precedence. We can, therefore, reasonably expect that the Congress about to be convened will pass upon that arrangement one way or the other within a very limited range of time. Then why should we halt or hesitate in dealing with it or discussing it? There has been no attempt on the part of this government to limit the discussion in any way. I have heard no threat of closure, and I think I am correct in saying that there is no rule of closure really applicable to the proceedings of this House. We can, I think, fairly say that it is the desire, not only of the government, but of all members on this side, to have this matter most fully threshed out before a vote is taken, and we are having a most full discussion of it, not only here, but throughout the country, and in the press of the country, so that all the people and their representatives, if they pay any attention to what is going on, will be fully aware of all the aspects of the proposed bargain now before parliament.

My hon. friends opposite, however, give as their reason for delay that they want to submit the question to the people before this House passes on it. Well, I am just as thorough a believer in the voice of the people as any hon. member of this House, and, perhaps, just as often as any other hon. member have I consulted my constituency with regard to matters which come up in this parliament, and I would have no hesitation in submitting this matter to my own constituents at any moment. I am satisfied that there is a very strong opinion, in that part of Ontario at least, in favour of this proposal. But is it proper or necessary that in so many of these questions the will of the people should be directly taken? I submit it is not. I cannot accept the doctrine that we are mere delegates of our constituents. I believe that we are here in a representative capacity to exercise our own judgment, after discussion and deliberation, and we are in a position to do this more fully and effectively than our constituents, and we are consequently in a better position in all probability to pass on this question. But if we are mere delegates to register the wishes of our constituents, there is no necessity for our being here at all. A letter would serve the purpose just as well as our presence. We are here, however, as representatives, and as such we have the right to deal with this matter if we see fit so to do. During my experience in this House I remember that when the Transcontinental railway question was up it was said that we should have had a mandate from the people. Again, when the new northwest provinces were being established, it was said that we should wait for a mandate from the people. And, lastly, when the naval proposals were before the House, we were equally told that we should have waited for a mandate from the people before submitting them to parliament. Why, if appeals to the people had been granted in all these cases, we would have had a succession of general elections and no time to discuss the business of the country. For these reasons I submit it is not necessary that on a question of this kind we should go back to the people for a mandate. Surely we have a mandate with regard to the regulation of trade, the raising of taxation, the arrangement of our fiscal policy. Surely the arrangement of our fiscal policy is one of the first reasons for sending us here at all. On this matter, therefore, if on no other, we have authority from the people to act as in our best judgment we feel warranted in doing. I think that is about all that can fairly be said on the motion before the Chair. Are we to postpone or go ahead? I see every good reason for our going ahead with this discussion without curtailing it in any way, and I see no good reason for postponing it. It is said that when the 62nd Congress of the United States meets, in all probability we shall receive better terms from that country than under the proposed arrangement. Well, if I understand the arrangement, better terms will not affect it so far as Canada is concerned. The tariff may be lowered, the free list may be as much more extended as the United States Congress may see fit to enact, but so long as we get what we have agreed for the agreement will stand. In other words, there may be as much plus as possible, but no minus.

Mr. AMES. Does my hon. friend realize that by this arrangement we allow all parts of the British Empire and 12 of the most favoured nations in on the same terms? Whereas if the United States, of their own volition, give any of these privileges, we do not have to extend them to other countries.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I realize that situation quite well, but I really have so little regard for that favourite argument of my hon. friend that I pay absolutely no attention to it. I think that this objection has no weight. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Northrup) talk of the Argentine Republic and the 45 cents per day labour in that country and ask how Canadians could compete against that labour. I do not know the rates of labour in the Argentine Republic, but I do know that the chief exports of that country are cattle and wheat, and that we are competing with them and beating them every day in the British market, and I do not expect to see the day when cattle or wheat from the Argentine Republic, or Bolivia, or Colombia, or the eight or ten other countries mentioned will ever come into Canada in serious competition with the products of this country.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Might I interrupt? What authority has the hon. gentleman for stating that Canadian cattle are beating the Argentine cattle every day in the British market? In stating this he is stating what is absolutely not the fact, and I would refer him to the hon. member for St. Lawrence division of Montreal (Mr. Bickerdike).

Mr. GUTHRIE. I can answer my hon. friend that the county of Wellington sends beef to the English market labelled Wellington beef, and it commands the highest prices in that market to-day. I have never discussed the question with my hon. friend from Montreal (Mr. Bickerdike), who is well up in the cattle business, but I do say that the general price of cattle, as between Canada and the Argentine, is regulated in Liverpool, or, at least, in Great Britain, where we are selling our cattle, day after day, in competition with the Argentine and with the world. I suppose that, in regard to the general grades of cattle, prices will be about equal. But my point is that this 45-cent-labour which my hon. friend from East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) states will be ruinous to Canada has never been ruinous to us in the past.

Mr. NORTHRUP. We have always had a tariff.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Not in Great Britain—we have never had the benefit of a tariff there, and yet we compete in that market, and compete successfully. And, if we can compete in the market of Great Britain, three or four thousand miles away from Canada, surely we can compete right here at home where we save that long haul. I have more faith in the Canadian farmer, and the Canadian stockmen than to be afraid of the competition with which my hon. friend from East Hastings threatens us from the Argentine Republic. Now, to come back to the question immediately before the committee, and avoid discussion on the general issue, what is the dignified course for Canada at the present moment?—to cry 'Halt!' or to go ahead? We have launched on the consideration of this question, and not any action of the United States short of refusal should terminate these proceedings in this House. To take the other view, it seems to me, might be called accepting the dictation of the United States. I think our proper course is to go ahead—either to enact the arrangement or to refuse the arrangement; at all events, do not let our action be dominated to the extent suggested by possible action of the United States. If they give us what we think they will give us on this arrangement, well and good; if they do not, as I understand it, the arrangement falls to the ground. There need be no unsettling of trade, no uncertainty about the matter. If it should be that we approve this arrangement before Congress approves it, as my hon. friend from East Hastings well knows, it will not come into force until this government is assured that it has received the sanction of Congress. So, there need not be any uncertainty or any unsettling of trade about the matter. Why should we hesitate? It is possible, if not probable, judging by some statements we have seen in the newspapers, and even statements made in this House, that this discussion will be a long one. It may be that Congress will decide this matter on their side before the House decides it on this side. If I am to take serious meaning from the statements of the hon. member for East Hastings, we are almost face to face, in this country, with something like rebellion. I do not like the idea of rebellion against the authority of the Crown coming from any member of this parliament of the standing of the hon. member for East Hastings. My solution of the matter would be a simple one. I think we should proceed. I have not the power my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) has in regard to those members on the other side of the House. I cannot turn around on this side and declare that every man will stand up and support this agreement as he announced that hon. gentlemen on that side would vote against it. I have no doubt that the real idea of the hon. member for North Toronto and of his leader (Mr. Borden, Halifax) is to obtain what might be called a snap verdict in this matter without experience or full consideration; and what they most fear is that there will be a ratification of this arrangement between Canada and the United States, and that the arrangement may have one or two years to operate and bear fruit before there is a general election. And, while predictions do not count for much, I can at least give my prediction that, if an election comes on only after this agreement has been ratified, and has had a fair opportunity of working out as between these two countries, there will come back to this parliament after the next general election only the wreck of the Conservative party.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to correct my hon. friend (Mr. Guthrie) on a point of fact. If he questions it, I suppose we shall have to leave it to 'Hansard' to-morrow. I did not undertake, in my own right, to say how hon. gentlemen on this side would vote. What I did say is that every member on this side of the House would be ready to cast his vote——

Mr. BELAND. On the measure?

Mr. FOSTER. On the merits. We never cast our vote on anything but the merits.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). Before I address myself directly to the motion of my hon. friend (Mr. Borden, Halifax), I think it would not be amiss if we had a word of discussion upon the assertion which has been made several times in this debate by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax), and repeated, I think, by almost every one on that side who spoke after him to the effect that, in asking parliament to ratify this agreement, we are departing from true constitutional principles. It was stated that we had carried out a new idea, the idea that tariffs could be made in secret and brought before parliament to be ratified or rejected. If there were anything in this statement, you would have to come to the conclusion that this is the first time in any British parliament in which a treaty of commerce was ever presented for ratification. The treaty of commerce necessarily implies a change in the tariff of the country. Well, is it the first time that such a thing has happened? You have to-day twelve treaties, which have been spoken of in this House, and which are still in force. These at one time or other have been negotiated by Great Britain as this treaty was, and presented to parliament and accepted by parliament.

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask the Prime Minister how many of them defined specific duties and contained tariffs?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. These treaties are tariff legislation as affecting relations with these countries, with which they are made. I will go further and call my hon. friend's attention to a treaty which was negotiated by Mr. Cobden, in 1863, between England and France, and which certainly affected the wine duties of England. It was negotiated just as this was, secretly—if you choose to call it so—and brought to the parliament of Great Britain and by that parliament ratified. We have even heard in this debate of the treaty of 1854, which was accepted unanimously by the parliament of Canada. Was this treaty negotiated by Lord Elgin and Mr. Hincks in any manner different from this arrangement which was made by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and my hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson). The procedure was exactly the same. In the face of these historical facts, which are known to every schoolboy, it is idle to say that we are introducing any new departure in constitutional government. And I am reminded by my hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) of a case which applies, if possible, even more directly. My hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster), when he was acting Prime Minister, was one of those who ratified a treaty which had been negotiated by Sir Charles Tupper, in secret—to use the words of hon. gentlemen opposite—with the French government.

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask a question? There must be a limit somewhere——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FOSTER. What I want to ask is this: If the right hon. gentleman claims that right in regard to the items of the tariff changed by this agreement, does he claim the right in this way to change the whole tariff? For instance, would he make a treaty in the same way, including manufatures as well as natural products?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. All this is subject to parliamentary approval. And what we have done has been done again and again, and done by my hon. friend himself, although he has forgotten it in a moment when he is served by a treacherous memory. But he knows he did this very thing in 1893, which he now reproaches us for doing. But my hon. friend knows that they did this very thing in 1893 which he now reproaches us with doing. There was a treaty, not a secret arrangement, but an actual treaty negotiated in secret by Sir Charles Tupper with the French government, which was brought here and accepted by the whole Conservative party. So I say that it is childish to present such an argument at the present time in opposition to this agreement.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

House divided on amendment—(Mr. Borden, Halifax).

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

Amendment negatived.

Motion agreed to and House went into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. LLOYD HARRIS (Brantford). Mr. Chairman, I think that the question before the House and the country is perhaps the most important question that we have had to consider in Canada since confederation. I have one of the hardest tasks of my life allotted to me to-night, for the simple reason that I find I am not able to support the government on this important proposal. I have reached this conclusion with very considerable regret. It is not easy, I think every one will admit, to cast off party ties on an important issue of any kind, and I deeply regret the fact that I have been forced to the conclusion that I cannot support the government in this proposal, because I do not think the proposal is in the best interests of Canada. Ever since the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) made his announcement in this House, I have been endeavouring to get a sane and safe view from a Canadian standpoint as to the effect of this proposal on our present national life and on the future development of the national life of Canada. When the announcement was first made, I had a very strong impression that it was a departure from a policy which I had thought had been the policy of the Liberal party, but I also thought that it was a departure which would lead us into ways and in directions which would not be for the future best welfare of Canada. At that time I was apparently alone on this side of the House because the announcement was greeted, I thought, with considerable enthusiasm on the part of members on this side, but since I find that the views I formed at that time are shared very largely by very many people throughout the country. I do not consider that all the brains of Canada are confined within the four walls of this room. I think there are men engaged in large undertakings who are just as good Canadians, who have just as good, and perhaps a great deal better opportunities of sizing up the real conditions in Canada and the real facts of an issue of this kind as we have in this House.

I have purposely refrained from making any public utterance on the question until I had an opportunity of listening to the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I listened to him yesterday with a very great deal of interest and with a very great deal of pleasure. I think I might say that I have always been an admirer of the right hon. the Prime Minister. I have been very glad indeed to serve under him, because I think that he has done as much for Canada as any man whom we have ever had here, and I listened yesterday with perhaps more admiration than I have ever had for him before for the simple reason that he made certainly a magnificent speech; he aroused the enthusiasm of our friends on this side of the House. He covered every aspect of the subject, excepting the one important one. I was glad to see the right hon. the Prime Minister very frank about this, because he frankly admitted that he was not a business man. I must confess that the only training I have ever had has been along business lines and perhaps I look at things from too practical a standpoint, there may not be enough sentiment in my makeup. However, I think what we need in this country is a good practical business consideration and discussion of a measure of this kind before we allow it to become law. I had intended saying a few words on the amendment, which was introduced by the hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden) before the recess; I thought an opportunity would have been given for the members to speak on that after dinner.

Apart entirely from the economic features of this case, I have four good and sufficient reasons, at least they are sufficient for me, for opposing this measure. First of all I do not think that this government has any mandate from the people. The main arguments that have been advanced in favour of this measure have been the fact that this is an historic policy, a policy of both parties in Canada for the last 50 or 60 years. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) in making his announcement reviewed the history of the different negotiations which have taken place between Canada and the United States with reference to reciprocity between the two countries. Other speakers have done the same thing. I am not going to weary the House by going into the details of these different negotiations, but all the speakers who have touched upon the subject, have brought down the history of these negotiations from 1854, the time of the first treaty, to 1896. Since 1896 I do not think that any case has been made out. For my own part, I can only say that unfortunately I was absent from Canada from 1889 to 1900 and have only been familiar with Canadian conditions and politics in the last 11 years, and I know positively that in that 11 years reciprocity has not been an issue with either party in this country. I have no mandate from the people of my own constituency to support this measure. If I go back to my own constituency and tell the people exactly what I think of the effect this is going to have on that particular constituency, and say that I have supported it, I do not think they will have any use for me in future.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish). Have you a mandate to oppose it?

Mr. HARRIS. That is an easy question to answer. A man always has a mandate to oppose anything he has not a mandate to vote for. I have been a little surprised that no authorities have been quoted on this subject. I have been looking up the question, and I find in a work entitled 'The Government of England,' by Lovell, who, I believe, is a recognized authority, under the head, 'The Doctrine of Mandate,' the following:

> Another sign of the times is found in the doctrine, now sanctioned by the highest authority, that parliament cannot legislate on a new question of vital importance without a mandate from the nation. The theory that the individual representative is a mere delegate of his constituents, so that he is bound to resign and submit to re-election if he changes his views, has long been a subject of discussion; but the idea that parliament as a whole exercises a delegated authority in the sense that it is morally restrained from dealing with questions that have not been laid before the people at the preceding general election would formerly have been regarded as a dangerous political heresy. Yet during the recent agitation in regard to fiscal policy, Mr. Balfour, while repudiating the suggestion that the existing parliament, having been elected on the single issue of the South African war, ought to be dissolved when peace was made, refused to grant time for a debate on free food on the ground that it would be constitutionally improper for parliament to act on the question until it had been submitted to the people at a general election, and that it would be unwise for the House to discuss a subject on which it could not act.

I think we are wasting time in discussing this question, because we have not any mandate from the people of this country with regard to it.

My second reason for opposing it, is the method of doing it. If the government had a mandate, the method would have been quite correct, but the government having no mandate, the very fact that we in this House, who have been elected by our several constituencies to represent the people of this country, have never even been called into consultation, that we have never been asked to express our views on a measure which is perhaps the most radical departure in policy that we have ever had in this country, and the fact that two men went to Washington and made this arrangement and have come back to this parliament and are practically trying to force this measure through the House, is a method which I, personally, cannot support. Let us consider for a minute the procedure in the case. It has not been brought out in the debate, I think, up to the present time, what really has happened. As I understand it, a year ago representations were made by President Taft through Mr. J. A. Macdonald of the Toronto 'Globe,' to this government, that he found himself in a difficult position, owing to the Payne-Aldrich tariff having in it a clause which required him to penalize Canadian importations into the United States. I do not know whether it is known or not, but I have heard, and I think it is quite correct, that this clause in the Payne-Aldrich Tariff was copied from the Canadian tariff. We had such a clause in our tariff for some time. We had it several years ago when Germany found it necessary to attack us in its tariff, and what was the answer that Germany got? We simply put the Act into force as it was, and we said to Germany: Very well, if you want to penalize us, we will penalize you, which we did; and I think that action had the support of everybody in this country. And when the United States made representations that it was necessary to have legislation put through at Ottawa to save the president of that country, I think we should have given them the same answer that we gave to Germany. Now, what consideration has been given to this arrangement? I have been very much interested in these negotiations ever since they commenced; and as far as I can find out, the two ministers returned from Washington on a Wednesday, and at that time apparently the other members of the cabinet, or at least those that I spoke to, knew no more about the conditions of this compact than I knew myself. The council evidently met on Thursday for an hour—if I am wrong in this, I hope I shall be corrected; this proposal was evidently considered by the council for one hour, at three o'clock this House met, and at 3.30 the hon. Minister of Finance came in and laid the agreement before the House. I am only speaking for myself, but personally, I do not think that any man should be asked to support a measure which is forced through in that way, and which means so much to this country.

The third reason which I have for opposing it, is the one to which I attach the most importance. No doubt all of the hon. members of this House have had the same experience that I have had while these negotiations were in progress. I had letters and interviews, and when I went to western Ontario, I met a great many people who expressed their anxiety that something might happen which would effect them or their interests adversely. To one and all of such requests for information, I said: You need have no fear whatever, because there will be no revision or alteration of the tariff of this country without a thorough investigation. I want to state my reasons for having given that answer, and if I make a longer quotation from 'Hansard' than I would like to do, I hope the House will bear with me. The right hon. the Prime Minister, on the second day of this session, speaking in the Debate on the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne, referring to his visit of last summer to the west, made this statement:

The people of the west are now asking for a reduction of duty on certain articles which they consume. That is a very proper subject of investigation, and we intend to investigate it. But at the proper time. My hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) is very impatient. We who have been in office for a certain number of years know that if there is one thing more than another essential to the business prosperity of a country it is stability of character. And my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) who has special charge of these matters on his side of the House will not dispute this, although when in office he was delinquent on this point—he tinkered with the tariff year after year. But with the warning before us given by his course, we were particularly careful not to fall into his error. It has been our policy to have a revision of the tariff periodically, but not year after year. I stated to the people of the northwest during my recent trip that it would be our duty to consider their requests and to deal with them in the spirit in which we have always dealt with requests from the people. And I repeat that now. I stated, and my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) quoted my words, that we would have a commission of investigation before we undertook a revision of the tariff. I noticed that that evoked a cheer on the part of hon. members on the other side of the House. And may I be permitted to say without offending my hon. friend, and with every hope that he will pardon my pride in the matter, that the parts of his address that were most applauded were his quotations from my speeches. I trust that this flattery will not make me vain; I mention it only as a fact which is within the knowledge of all who heard the hon. member's speech. The statement made by myself and quoted by the hon. gentleman that we would have an investigation by commission before we altered the tariff called forth a special cheer from hon. members opposite. Does any hon. member on the other side take issue with the promise I made? Would any of them advocate rushing into a revision of the tariff without previous investigation?

That I consider a statesmanlike utterance. I was perfectly satisfied with it. I took it as a distinct and definite promise, and I made other promises on the strength of it.

The fourth reason that I have, is one which may not perhaps appeal to some members of the House, but I do not think we should look upon this reason in too light a way. It is that it has hurt the pride of Canadians. Some of my hon. friends laugh.

I think a glance over the history of Canada since confederation will prove my point. For many years we felt that we were absolutely dependent on the United States, and we had these pilgrimages to Washington, for the purpose of negotiating free trade relations. But every time that we went wearing out our shoe leather, as one hon. gentleman has put it, what was the result? We simply met with one rebuff after another. Every time we knocked at their door, we were refused admittance; and the load we had to carry in Canada for a great many years seemed greater than we actually could bear.

Had we got, however, what we wanted at that time, the whole course of Canadian history would have been changed. We would not have had a country such as we now have. Our maritime provinces would have been connected by trade and commerce with the eastern states; Ontario would have been dealing entirely with the state of New York and the adjacent states and in the Northwest of Canada, I doubt if we would have built a railway around the north shore of Lake Superior. But not having been able to get what we wanted, we were forced to initiate a policy of our own, and that was to take off our coats and seek to bind this country together and create a nation. We have done this. We have done perhaps what no other country in the world has accomplished. You all know what it means for a man when he feels he has done something. It makes him a better in every respect. One of the good things that has come to us in recent years is the knowledge that we have a separate and distinct entity. The word 'Canadian' stands to-day for something. Years ago it did not stand for much. At present, however, it means that Canadians have done something that they have accomplished things, and that means a great deal to a people just as it does to an individual.

I claim that this measure—the method of doing it, and the measure itself—is one that will have far reaching consequences on Canada perhaps more than anything that has ever happened. I give these four reasons for opposing it, which perhaps will not be considered sufficient by my hon. friends on this side. But for these four reasons alone I have made up my mind that I cannot support the government in this measure. I propose now to deal with its economic features, and shall have to do that in my own way. Each one approaches all these questions from his own standpoint, but I think every one will agree that we should approach the discussion of a measure of such importance as this in a sane manner. I cannot say that some of the arguments and remarks of the advocates of this measure are made in that spirit. I was reading in the Toronto 'Globe,' of March 4, an account of a meeting at Woodstock the other night at which the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. King) was present. The article is as follows:

VOICE OF CANADIAN TRUST.

In this agitation against the agreement we find the beginnings of the subtle and skilful manoeuvrings of the Canadian trust. We are being warned to-day to beware in this arrangement that we do not deliver ourselves into the hands of the American trusts, but I sometimes think that we hear in this warning the voice of the Canadian trust speaking not so much for the Canadian people as for its own selfish interest. What is the first principle of a trust? It is monopoly of the market, complete control of the sources of supply. What is one of the most effective weapons in combating that influence? It is the opening of new markets, the giving to those who have products to sell other and wider markets in which to make their sales.

I wonder if the so called Canadian trust was responsible for the unanimous resolution of the Berlin Board of Trade condemning the proposal.

Mr. KING. Will my hon. friend permit me to say that the Berlin Board of Trade did not pass the resolution attributed to it, according to a statement made subsequently by the secretary of that board.

Mr. HARRIS. I think I got the information in both cases from the Toronto 'Globe.' I did not read that, however, to in any way belittle my hon. friend the Minister of Labour. What I read it for was to contrast the utterances of one of our Canadian ministers with those of one of the American ministers, which were delivered a few days ago at a public meeting in Chicago. At a dinner given by the Chicago board of commerce on the 15th February, at which one of the speakers was Mr. James J. Hill and Mr. Knox, Secretary of State for the United States, the latter spoke to this large and important gathering of Chicago's best business men on the question of reciprocity as follows:

BUSINESS KNOWS IT WANTS RECIPROCITY.

This function could cease now and here without a moment of speech, and still go down in history as almost epochal, because when has it occurred that a matter of such grave economic significance as the one which is now not only being considered by the Congress, but by the people, has gathered together such an assemblage as this, men whose hands are upon the throttles of great enterprises for the development of our country, and who are worth more to its ultimate and its present prosperity than a thousand times as many politicians going up and down the land demanding that something shall be done for fear something will happen.

The point I was making was this, that there is a great deal of opposition to this measure throughout the country, not confined to any particular class. The opposition to it is not restricted by any means to the business, manufacturing, financial and commercial interests, but it also extends to the farmers.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. HARRIS. I have been interested in following several of these ballots which have been taken by different newspapers. In one Canadian Agricultural journal which I was reading to-night, I find that the number of votes throughout Canada apparently in favour of this measure was about 1,000 and against it 600, so that the opposition to it is not, as some hon. members would have us believe, coming from the one quarter. But even if it did come from one class, every Canadian has the right to make up his mind on any important question, and in so doing he shoulld not be subjected to the imputations of unworthy motives. We have in Canada all classes of people. We are not purely and simply an agricultural country. Manufacturing is a necessity. At least I think that we require manufacturing industries, but if it be not the policy of the Liberal party to have manufacturing, I suppose I shall have to remove myself from Canada. But I submit that one man in one industry in Canada is just as good as a man in another industry. We are all Canadians working together for the general benefit.

I have listened with a great deal of interest to all the arguments which have been put forth in defence of this measure. I listened with great pleasure to my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark), the other night—I always listen with pleasure to the hon. member because he always says something good, something of interest. But, in reading his speech next day, I found that it was one of his characteristic speeches. He quoted Peel, and Cobden and Gladstone. I am interested, as much as anybody possibly could be, in the free trade history of England. The men who inaugurated the policy of free trade in England were doing exactly what we at the present time in Canada are trying to do. They were trying to frame a policy which will make England a great country. Their policy, I believe, was the best that could possibly be pursued for that country at that time. But the fact that that policy was a good thing for England seventy or eighty years ago is no reason why we should accept it as the policy for Canada in 1911. We have to study the conditions of our own country.

I have given a great deal of thought to what I suppose is the real policy of the Liberal party. When the present government came into power, the existing policy was one of protection to all industries. That policy, I think all will agree, has been retained. It has been changed to suit the conditions arising from time to time—I do not believe in a hard and fast policy of any kind. Added to that fiscal policy, however, the government immediately inspired a new faith in the future of Canada. They undertook a vigorous programme of development of our natural resources. We advertised in a large and comprehensive way, and in the proper places, our potentialities. We undertook in a large way additions to our transportation facilities. We have followed a policy of encouraging agriculture, the growing of products for our available markets; and, what was more important, a policy of transportation facilities which would carry our surplus products to the best markets of the world in the best possible condition. The government granted the imperial preference. They made very large expenditures on agriculture, in order to give information to the farmers of this country of the best methods of growing and putting up their products so that they might command the highest price. This, I consider, has been the policy of the Liberal party, and that policy has been eminently successful. I can remember twenty-five or thirty years ago—though I am a young man yet—when the farmers came on our market in Brantford and sold chickens at 10 cents each; to-day they are getting in the neighbourhood of 75 cents. They would sell butter at 10 cents to 12 cents a pound, we are paying 30 cents to 40 cents per pound to-day on the Brantford market. Eggs were sold in those days from 8 cents to 10 cents a dozen; now we are well off if we get them at 50 cents to 60 cents at certain seasons of the year. What is the reason of this? The first reason is that we have built up a consuming population in Canada which is the best market our farmers have, and any surplus products can be shipped and delivered and sold in the best markets of the world where they will command the highest prices. We have done all this without any assistance from the United States. We were forced to do it on our own account. Now we have got the home market, and, what I have always felt as to the future policy of this country—and this is the crux, I think, of the economic situation in connection with this measure—is that our agriculture should be put in such shape that nothing should go out in its crude condition. I do not want to see the wheat of our Northwest go through United States channels. If it must go out of Canada in its raw state, I want to see it go through Canadian channels. But I want to see as much of it milled in transit as possible. That is building up our own country. I do not want to see that second grade wheat they have in the west sold on the market at all—it is not going to give us a good name for our Canadian wheat. I want to see the meat industry established in such a way that such wheat should go out of the country in the shape of dressed meat, bacon, hams, and other similar products. In the province of Ontario, where we are at present growing $200,000,000 worth of field crops,—first, I want to see that raised to $1,000,000,000,—I do not want to see one dollar's worth of it go out of Ontario in its crude state, but in its most highly finished condition. And that, I think, is an ideal worthy of any Canadian, and a policy that any party should be glad to maintain.

A great deal has been said to prove that the effect of opening up our market in this country to ninety millions of people in the United States and to other nations which can send in their products here on the same terms as the Americans can, will have no effect on the farm produce of this country. First, I wish to take up the question of our own production and export. Many hon. members who have spoken on this subject, ridicule the home market. They want to know what the home market is worth anyway. Well, here are some figures which I think will be of interest to the members of the House. In the year 1908 the estimated value of the field crops of Canada was $432,534,000. In the Trade and Navigation Returns for the year ending March 31, 1909, the total exports of field products from Canada for the year—which would be the crop to which I have just referred—were $82,718,926, leaving a total of $349,815,074, which was consumed in Canada. In other words, for every $1 of field produce raised in Canada, 80 cents worth was consumed and only 20 cents worth exported. That is what all this noise is about— to get markets for that 20 cents worth. Now, included in the exports are the following which have gone through a process of manufacture—I wish to show how closely agriculture and manufacturing must come together in this or any other agricultural country:

Flour	$ 7,991,517
Indian meal	4,818
Oatmeal	535,963
All other meal	58,104
Cereal foods	1,380,507
Bran	858,900
Canned berries	204,246
Total	$11,064,055

Those products all went through a certain form of manufacture. I use those figures for comparison. In the following year, 1910, the amount was much larger in every way so far as crops in Canada were concerned. The total value of the crops was $531,690,000. The exports were $102,747,694; consumed in Canada, $229,342,406, or exactly the same percentage as the year before, notwithstanding the fact that the value of the crops was $100,000,000 more than the year before. Our home market increased in one year from $349,000,000 to $429,000,000. The total amount of exports which had undergone a partly manufactured state, was $19,866,653 as against $11,000,000 the year before. That is what our home market consumed in field crops alone. Now in animals and their products, in 1909, the exports were $52,026,710, and of that sum $38,144,107 went out of this country in the form of finished products, leaving only $14,000,000 which went out in the raw condition. I will submit the following tables in support of the remarks which I have just made:

It has been stated that the favoured nation clause would have no effect on prices in Canada for farm produce. It is a very peculiar thing, but it is a fact, that every country in the world with the exception of Denmark, which is known as an agricultural country, has high protection. I have schedules here showing for several of these countries the duties on the different articles of produce going into them. As I interpret the Act, Australia is not a favoured nation country, I do not think they get favoured nation treatment that other British colonies get.

An hon. MEMBER. All British possessions.

Mr. HARRIS.

Mr. HARRIS. As I interpret the Act, I do not think Australia is included, New Zealand is.

Mr. EDWARDS. In answer to a question I put the other day, the Minister of Finance said that all British possesions came in.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). They do not come in under the favoured nation treaties, but under a policy which the government has announced.

Mr. FIELDING. The policy which Canada has always adopted is not to give to a foreign nation any advantage which is not given to the whole British Empire.

Mr. HARRIS. Then Australian produce comes into Canada free of duty.

Mr. AMES. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I will read the clause in the original resolution which refers to that. It will be found in the motion moved by the Minister of Finance on the 26th of January to go into Committee of Ways and Means:

That the advantages hereby granted to the United States shall extend to the United Kingdom and the several British colonies and possessions with respect to their commerce with Canada.

Mr. HARRIS. Australia has a very high protective tariff on all articles of farm produce:

Then I have a table relating to Austria-Hungary which I will not take up the time of the House by reading, but will hand it into the 'Hansard'.

Mr. FIELDING. The other day the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) objected to anybody handing anything into the 'Hansard' which was not read. Therefore I hope my hon. friend will read it, because I would like to have it on 'Hansard'.

Mr. HARRIS. I may say that I have not had time to get information about all the countries, merely about those which are the largest exporters of agricultural products.

Mr. HUGHES. I think the same courtesy should be extended to the member for Brantford (Mr. Harris) that has been tre-quently extended to the Minister of Finance on many occasions.

Mr. FIELDING. I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I will hand the table for Austria-Hungary to the 'Hansard'.

Then I come to Denmark. Denmark is practically the only agricultural country which admits agricultural products free. Probably Denmark is the most highly educated country agriculturally in Europe, or possibly in the world.

Their agriculture is carried on under the most perfect system. The Technical Education Commission propose to visit Denmark and they will find so much of interest and gain so much information that will be of importance to Canada that I hope that when they come back with their report the people of Canada, the government, and this parliament will recognize the necessity, up to a certain point, until we get our agricultural and technical education thoroughly well established, of protecting the agricultural industry. With the permission of the House, I will submit the following tables:

The United States are producing exactly the same class of agricultural products that we produce, and in 1908 they produced over $400,000,000 worth. I do not think the area of Denmark is as great as that of our maritime provinces. With reference to Australia, included in the item of animal products is $5,932,987, which is the value of the frozen mutton which was exported during that year. In Australia sheep are grown for wool and not for meat. The meat is really a waste product. In so far as the sheep industry is concerned, with our farmers trying to grow sheep for the wool and the meat as they do in this country, the sheep industry would be wiped out of existence. It may be said that the sheep industry does not amount to anything any way. I know it does not at the present time, but I would like to see it properly developed as well as other branches of agriculture. France is not regarded by us as an agricultural country, but it really is one of the greatest agricultural countries in the world. I have only given these figures to show the competition that we will have in agricultural produce, not only from the United States, but from a great many other countries. At the present time New Zealand buttter is finding its way to this market, and if the duty should be off New Zealand butter I am thoroughly satisfied it will reduce the price of butter in Montreal by at least four cents a pound. The price of New Zealand and Danish butter in England at the present time is from 21 to 22 cents a pound, and in Montreal it is from 26 to 27 cents a pound. It can be brought over here for about one cent a pound.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). Has my hon. friend a table showing the imports into Canada from these countries for the last year, of butter and eggs?

Mr. HARRIS. No, I have not. I cannot prophesy what will really happen from allowing ninety millions of people access to our market, but if it does not mean very strong and keen competition with the farmers of this country I do not know anything about the business.

Then, there is another point. The treatment we have had from the United States in fiscal matters has been of such a character that we have resented it at different times. I think, of course, that they were doing exactly as they had a right to do. They were engaged in exactly the same problems that we are engaged with at the present time. From the time they started in the development of their country until they reached what is practically at the present day their maximum development they brooked no interference from anybody, they allowed no one to come into that country and have their markets, they insisted that the people of the United States should have the markets themselves. As a matter of fact, the home market is the only market that any nation has absolute control over. We have not any control over the United States market. Now, when they come to a point in their development when it is to their interest to allow Canadian goods to come in they are willing to let us come in. But, we are in the same position that they were in—I do not know just how many years ago it would be—but we have got started in our development, we have not reached our maximum development, and will not reach it for a great many years to come. I have the highest kind of regard for my United States friends, I have a great many friends over there, and I have had a great deal of business to do in that country.

An hon. MEMBER. You are still loyal?

Mr. HARRIS. I am still loyal. I am not dealing with the loyalty feature of this question; I am dealing with it from the business standpoint. I think our best plan is simply to keep as closely as we possibly can, and as closely as we dare to the plan that they themselves have laid down. While they were developing they would brook no interference from us; while we are developing we do not want them to come in and interfere with us. When we get to the state of development in this country where we have given our agricultural population and the people generally every facility to acquire the best, the most scientific and the most intelligent methods of agricultural production so as to enable them to turn their products out in the most highly finished condition, I am perfectly willing that we should trade with the world.

Mr. TALBOT. How long will that be?

Mr. HARRIS. I do not know, but we certainly are not there yet. My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) made a very excellent speech the other evening, and I think he has been the only speaker on this side of the House who has attempted at all to touch with any detail on the economic feature of the different articles which would naturally pass from one country to the other. The minister in his statement the other night said that the farmers will get the American price for wheat. What is the American price? I have here an extract from a speech made by Mr. J. J. Hill, in Chicago, the other night, at the Chicago Chamber of Commerce dinner. He said:

The price of any commodity of which a country produces a surplus for export is fixed in the market where it must be sold. The demand of the whole world for wheat meets the supply of the world in the Liverpool market. To that, Russia and Argentine and Canada and the United States all send their surplus. The visible supply is noted, the probable demand computed, the prospects of growing crops taken into account, and these automatically determine the price.

The Farmer Gains Either Way.

This Liverpool quotation regulates wheat prices in all the markets of the world. It is cabled daily to New York, Chicago, Minneapolis, Duluth, Winnipeg and the other primary markets of wheat-exporting countries. The price in each of them varies daily with the Liverpool advice. It is, therefore, impossible that this price should be affected by the trade relation of any two of the countries to each other. It can make no difference in the total stock of wheat for sale, which fixes the price, over what route it goes to market. The quotations would not be changed by the fraction of a penny if all the wheat of Canada went abroad by way of Minneapolis, Chicago, Duluth and New York——

Which Heaven forbid.

—instead of by way of Winnipeg, Port Arthur and Montreal. But every bushel milled in transit helps the price, by withdrawing from the visible supply, on which prices are based, the wheat that has been turned into flour.

That is exactly the situation so far as wheat is concerned. Everybody knows that, so that any advantages that our western farmers may gain in price of wheat are purely imaginary.

I wish to emphasize the point that I want to see every bit of wheat exported from this country sent out in no form less crude than flour.

I now come to barley. The minister stated that on account of the McKinley tariff our farmers lost a great deal of profit. He quoted the amount of profit they have lost by taking the figures that they had received in a certain number of years for their barley. I know something about the barley country in Ontario; I know that when the McKinley tariff was put into effect the farmers along the north shore of Lake Ontario were almost stunned, the blow had been so heavy. But I also know that since that time those same farmers have changed their methods of farming and are producing crops at present which give them more money than they got for their barley, and in addition their land is in much better condition.

Now the meat trade. The minister apparently would be glad to see the whole of our meat trade thrown over to the control of the United States packers. I do not take this view of it at all. I want to quote a resolution which was presented to the government by the farmers' deputation in December on the chilled meat industry:

Whereas it is of very great importance to the whole of Canada that prompt government action be taken towards establishing a complete chilled meat system on a sound and permanent basis, with the interests of the producers adequately protected; and

Whereas, the live stock industry of Canada has been neglected, and if the neglect is continued it will soon result in impoverished farms, and the live stock industry of the country will make no headway until it is made worth the farmers' while to produce and furnish more and better stock; and

Whereas the farmers are on account of the unsatisfactory market going out of the meat producing business, and will not again take it up until the market is placed upon a stable basis, and further that under the present system of exporting there is always a danger of the markets of the world being closed to us, which would result in ruin to many; and

Whereas on account of the danger of encouraging monopolies the farmers cannot be satisfied with anything short of a meat curing and chilling process inaugurated by the Dominion government, and operated in such a way that will guarantee to the producers the value of the animals they produce.

Of all the memorials they presented, I was most in sympathy with that one, because if we are to build up a big meat industry in the west and assist the farmers in getting the prices they should it is necessary that this industry should be carried on by either private enterprise or government assisted enterprise. I do not believe in the government going into the meat business, but no private company or firm or individual can attempt to establish a meat industry in the west at the present time on account of the enormous amount of capital it would require. I think it is an industry that we should encourage, and it should be under Canadian and not under American control.

Now take the packers. They came to Ottawa, they presented their memorial. They were practically told that they did not know what they were talking about, that they would not be hurt. I do not know much about the packing business. I did have a large investment in a packing house once, and lost it all. But the packers of Canada have done good service. They have spent large sums of money in good faith, they have done as much as any other class of people to make a name for Canadian farm products, and they should be considered; they should not be left in such a position that their business is going to be jeopardized. The present situation, if this goes through, is that the American packers can come to Canada and get all the hogs they want, while our packers cannot bring over a single American hog, as every hog coming to Canada must be held at least 30 days in quarantine and must be accompanied by a certificate.

The minister also mentioned hay. I quite agree with him that it is good farming to grow hay on certain kinds of land, just as it is good farming to grow wheat on certain kinds of land, but I do not think it is good business to grow hay and ship it out as hay. I think it is better to encourage the farmers who do grow hay to feed stock and ship it out in a finished state. That is the argument I am trying to make all the way through.

This question of competition is also dealt with by Mr. Knox in that same Chicago speech. He says:

In making a reciprocity agreement it is proper and right that we should consider the market which our neighbour has to offer us as well as the market which we offer her. Thus, we provide that the agricultural classes of a great section of our country should have the benefit of the free admission of cotton seed oil into Canada. We also obtain the exemption from duty of all fruits and vegetables and various other agricultural products of which some sections of the country as widely separated as California and Florida have a surplus at certain seasons, while we are not unmindful of the producers of the border states who at times have large quantities of surplus products which will be benefited by free entry into the Canadian market.

Mr. Knox himself thinks that this will be of assistance to the American farmers along that side of the line. He also says:

The free admission of grain from Canada thus meets the present situation and provides against contingencies when the Canadian surplus becomes greater by placing the control in the hands of our own grain growers.

In the hands of our own grain growers!

They have no cause to fear a demoralizing influx under the conditions which result from the reciprocity agreement.

The proposition with which we have dealt is economic, not political.

The horse industry is a very important industry. Every farmer in the province of Ontario at the present time is following the system of mixed farming. Every farmer is raising one or two colts every year, and they bring a good price in the Toronto market, which, I believe, is the best market for horses on this continent. We have greatly improved the breed of horses in the province of Ontario, and our horses are very much superior to those we would naturally get from the south. The horses we would get from the south would have a deteriorating effect on all Canadian horses in the west if they were allowed to come in free.

Now, to sum up the result of this change of policy, as I see it, so far as agriculture is concerned. It causes us to send out everything in the crudest possible state instead of in the most highly finished state.

It is a serious blow to several important branches of agriculture. It seriously injures the hog industry. It prevents the development of the chilled meat industry under Canadian control. It gives a premium to the farmers to export hay instead of sending it out in the finished product. It bonuses the cheese factories and creameries to close up. It causes the farmers to send out their cattle in frames rather than finished. It kills incentive to more intensive farming. It puts a premium on the mining of the lands of the west rather than farming it. It destroys our hopes and ambitions for better technical agricultural training. It destroys the salt industry. In other words, I look upon the whole measure as a raw deal for Canada—we get the husks and they get the substance.

Conservation has not been spoken of very much during this debate. I was reading the other day in the Ottawa 'Citizen' a report of a speech which had been made by Professor Robertson before the Canadian Club of Ottawa, and some of the things that he said placed this conservation question, so far as farming is concerned, in a much better light than I could do it. We have heard of conservation of our natural resources, but there is conservation of farms as well. Hon. members may not know that there is a department of our Conservation Commission which deals directly with farm conservation. Professor Robertson said:

FARM CONSERVATION.

I happen to serve as chairman of the committee on lands. Let me tell you of two instances that came out in our investigations. On 100 farms surveyed in Manitoba, every man reported that the wild oats were bad and getting worse. There is a how-d'ye-do—wild oats in the land where grain growing is the staple occupation of the people.

You must conserve the land by intelligent methods. I offer two instances of conservation. One farmer came before our commission who was working a farm settled from 68 to 72 years ago under old Col. Talbot. He told us that he had 103 acres which he had been farming for 23 years, and his crop now was more than twice as much in a year as when he began. He told us, if he could get the right kind of labour, he could again double the production in ten years. There is conservation. (Applause). Then in Prince Edward Island a farmer from near Summerside testified. We asked this farmer how long he had been on the place he then held. Twenty-two years. He had 97 acres. Twenty years ago he had a mortgage of $1,100 on the farm. For ten years he just held his own. Then he learned to grow clover, keep cows and make butter. There is conservation—land, cattle and the family. The previous year, 1909, he had sold $900 worth of butter and $300 worth of pork, and he sold a horse every second year. There was no mortgage on his farm.

That is conservation of the farm.

I do not know anything about the fishing industry, so I am not going to deal with that subject.

Much has been said of the fact that this arrangement will change the transportation routes of this country. I think it is absolutely necessary that we should have legislation which will as far as possible keep the trade and commerce of this country within ourselves. I do not mean to say that I would put up a high wall. so that no one could come in; but we must provide every possible encouragement for the people of Canada to trade with each other. I do not know why it should be a hardship to the people of the west to trade with us in Ontario; I do not know why it should be a hardship to the people of the maritime provinces to trade with us in Ontario; but apparently it does not mean anything to have the pleasure and privilege of living in a country like Canada. I think that all the statements which have been made about the effect which the measure will have upon our east and west routes cannot be too lightly put aside.

Now, I do not want to conclude my remarks without touching upon the subject of agricultural implements. Some members of this House attribute my opposition to this measure to the fact that I am unfortunate enough to have an investment in a business which manufactures agricultural implements. I hope that the members of this House will give me the credit of not allowing any reduction of the duty on agricultural implements to influence me on this matter in any way, shape or manner. The fact that I happen to be interested in the manufacture of agricultural implements does not, I think, make me any worse a Canadian. Much has been said on the subject of implements, and much has been done that I do not think has been altogether fair to the implement industry of this country. It is strange that any government should pick out one industry and make a political football of it; but I think I have to charge both political parties with having done that with the implement industry. The duty on implements was reduced by the Conservative government from 35 to 20 per cent, and I do not think there was any investigation held. The government simply thought that the reduction was a good thing to catch votes with in the west.

Mr. FIELDING. Did they have any mandate?

Mr. REID (Grenville). Yes, they had the National Policy mandate.

Mr. FIELDING. To reduce?

Mr. REID (Grenville). Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. Then, when this government came into power, they thought they might get some more votes by hitting the implement industry another crack of 2½ per cent. Well, I have no objection at all to the government doing anything with the tariff, provided they know that what they are doing is right and proper and just to the thing done.

Mr. MACLEAN. And give every one a chance to be heard.

Mr. HARRIS. Yes. So far as protection is concerned, I am not a high protectionist and never was. I do not think any one has ever heard me make any utterance in that behalf, but I do think that we require a tariff in this country. I think it is the only practical way of raising our revenue. If any government would even make the suggestion to change our system and raise revenue by direct taxation, I do not believe it would last 24 hours. We must have a tariff and raise our revenues under it. The agricultural implement industry is perhaps one more indigenous to the soil than many others, and therefore should not enjoy so high a tariff. But the inconsistency of our tariff is this, that when the duty was reduced on agricultural implements from 35 per cent to 20 per cent, the manufacturers of these implements were still paying as high as 50 per cent on their raw material. When the duty was reduced from 20 per cent to 17½ per cent the government took the ground that 20 per cent was a revenue tariff and made a concession on the raw materials for implements on which the tariff was reduced —there were only two or three of them. Binders, mowers and rakes. The government made a concession in the duty on the raw material of these implements which compensated the manufacturers to some extent for the reduction from 20 per cent to 17½ per cent in the duty. At present these same implements are being manufactured, and the manufacturers are paying duty on all the raw materials, with a few exceptions, as high as 50 per cent although they only get a protection of 17½ per cent.

Again, the manufacturers of implements in this country have to pay 27½ per cent duty on every bit of machinery which they import for their plant and on all the materials which go into the construction of their plant. About 40 per cent I think would figure out as duty on their coal because I do not think coal is worth more than $1.10 at the mine mouth; and on their factory supplies, which would amount to a very large aggregate, they pay duties varying from 25 per cent to 35 per cent.

My hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) introduced a motion this session to which he and some other hon. members spoke. I intended following him if I had had the opportunity, but not having that advantage, I would like to make a few explanations and corrections with regard to the statements he then made, and perhaps I may be able to give my hon. friends on this side a little more satisfaction than I have given them so far. The hon. gentleman made the statement that under the late Conservative government, the binders imported into Canada came in at a fixed valuation of $80. He quoted the imports of binders in 1897, 1907, and 1910, and taking these three years he made an average valuation of the binders and the average duty. I might say now, for his information, that the statement he made was not correct. The late government never had a fixed valuation of $80 for binders imported into Canada. In 1907 he said the average valuation was $144.44. The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) thought that in this he had made a mistake because he questioned him about it. He evidently did make a mistake in his arithmetic because the figures themselves show that the average valuation of the binders that year was $109.70. I have gone to the trouble of looking up this question, and I have a statement here showing the average value of binders from 1890 down to 1910.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Would the hon. gentleman be good enough to put on 'Hansard' the total valuation of the imports of binders for that year and the total number of binders so that I can check the figures. Since making my speech, I went to the trouble of rechecking my figures and found them absolutely correct.

Mr. HARRIS. I have the statement here:—

Average duty paid per binder for seven years under Conservative rule, $31.39.
Average duty paid per binder for fourteen years under Liberal rule, $19,60.

giving the total importations from 1890 to 1910. This gives the number of binders imported, their values, the average value, the duty paid and the average duty. But for the information of the House I would like to point out the results of this statement. The result is this. The average duty paid per binder for seven years under the late government was $31.39 and the average duty paid for 14 years under this government was $19.60, so that there was quite a reduction. I also want to correct my hon. friend in the statement he made with regard to drawbacks. He made the statement that the total drawbacks paid to the International Harvester Co., the Massey Harris Co., Frost and Wood, and Noxon Manufacturing Co., amounted to $217,458.99, and then proceeded to work out the drawbacks per machine. But this included the drawbacks paid on machines manufactured in Canada for export as well as for home consumption; and in the year 1909-10—which is the year he had under review—the drawbacks paid the implement manufacturer on the machines manufactured in Canada and exported was $128,134, and on the machines manufactured for home consumption was $83,569, making a total of $211,703. My hon. friend constituted himself the judge, jury and counsel, he tried the manufacturers of agricultural implements and found them guilty, but with extenuating circumstances in favour of the plough manufacturers because 60 per cent of the total imports consisted of ploughs. But the plough importations into Canada will now be absolutely taken care of by the manufacturers with the new plants they are erecting.

Mr. HUGHES. In the debates in the United States House of Representatives, the statement has been made over and over again that the American agricultural implement manufacturers do not recognize the Canadian manufacturer of agricultural implements as a quantity to be considered. They say that they can export into Canada against the duty without fear of competition from the Canadian manufacturer.

Mr. HARRIS. I was just coming to that. I have been investigating the conditions of the plough business because I am not interested in that line and have been looking it up more than the others. The American manufacturer of ploughs at the present time, with a duty against him of 15 per cent, is in just about as good a position to supply the Canadian western trade as will be the manufacturer in Ontario with freight and other things against him. I represent a constituency where we have 6,000 men employed in the factories, and, of these, I suppose 5,000 are engaged in the agricultural implement industry. These men are the best class of mechanics, I believe, that we have in any factories in Canada. This arrangement is going to mean that the development of the agricultural implement business in Canada will stop. We are not going on to develop the agricultural implement in Canada. The concerns I am connected with have found it necessary, on account of the agitation and the trouble which they think will come, to remove part of their works to the United States. They do not want to do that.

Mr. MILLER. May I be allowed a question? Did they remove any part of their Canadian works, or did they simply acquire works in the United States?

Mr. HARRIS. They find now, and have known for many years that, for their foreign trade, which is 50 per cent of their entire trade, they could manufacture in the United States cheaper than in Canada. They have preferred to manufacture in Canada, and, with the concessions that the government gave in the way of drawbacks of duties on raw material, they have up to the present time, been able to continue their industry in Canada. But my own conviction is very strong that from now on, the development of this particular industry will not take place in Canada, but will be on the other side of the line.

Mr. FIELDING. Did not they secure this plant in the United States before this treaty was negotiated?

Mr. HARRIS. They did. But they secured it because there had been so much agitation on account of the implement duty. I have no objection, if the implement duties are too high, that the government should lower them. If the duties are too high on anything let the government lower them. I do not believe in a protective tariff that will create conditions under which one man or group of men can get rich at the expense of the people. I do not care very much about discussing this question, but I thought I ought to put myself on record in connection with it in this debate.

Now, Mr. Chairman, my people in Brantford are in a different position perhaps from those in almost any other constituency. We have, as I have stated, large implement industries; we have two flour mills; we have one large pork packing industry. On looking over the list of industries of the town, I find that nine of them are directly affected by this proposed change. Therefore, I do not think that you can expect them to look with a great deal of favour on this agreement. I have had a great deal to do with the getting of American concerns established in Canada. I have many friends in the United States, and these men, several of them, at my request, have come over and looked into the conditions existing here, and have established plants. I had a long letter from one of them early in November last, and I would like to read it, so that hon. members will know what opinion on this question is held by some of our American friends who at present have interests in Canada:

I read newspaper accounts and hear considerable talk in Brantford regarding the proposed revision of tariff between Canada and the United States. We are not students in political economy, but as manufacturers and employers of labour in Canada and also manufacturers of the same class of work in the United States it appears to us that it would be disastrous to our Canadian interests to make any change in the tariff. From Buffalo we can reach all the important points that the Brantford plant reaches for a less freight rate than from Brantford. We can also manufacture malleable iron very much cheaper per ton in Buffalo than in Brantford. The above are absolute facts relating to our business and it appears to us that should the tariff on malleable iron or agricultural implements be removed it would necessitate closing our Brantford plant and transferring the business to Buffalo.

Looking at the whole thing broadly Canada is where the United States was fifty years ago. The Canadian farmers can buy better implements much cheaper than the States farmer could when this country was at a corresponding period in their development, and they certainly can sell their products for more money, making a very attractive net income. On the other hand, if the manufacturing industries of Canada are given proper support, we feel that it would tend to increase the population and thereby increase the welfare of the country at large.

That is a sample of several letters I have had. This same party sent me a wire on the 27th of January, this, I think was the day after the announcement was made in this House of the proposed arrangement:

Kindly wire my expense your opinion as to the possibility of the proposed reciprocity agreement going into effect. We have an option to take over property in Canada for our business employing four hundred people. This option expires on Monday. Should not accept if duties going to be modified. The courtesy of your opinion will be greatly appreciated.

This plant, the purchase of which he had in prospect, was for the purpose of supplying implement manufacturers in Canada with parts of their raw material. I had to advise him that, on account of the reduction of duty from 20 per cent to 15 per cent, I thought the government, in justice to the implement manufacturers, would necessarily have to make reductions in the steel schedule, and, if they did that, he would have to consider it and deal with it himself. As a result, he gave up his option.

I think the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has stated that he does not intend to do anything with the duties on manufactured goods. I believe that is his firm intention, but I tell you that no power on earth can keep any government from giving the farmers, who are now going to have every vestige of protection taken away from them, their just claims, when they come down here and demand that every other interest be put on the same footing. It would not be fair, it would not be right. The farmers are not asking for this reduction in duty on their products. The very class of farmer whom we in Ontario, at any rate, think most of, the people who have been literally practising the doctrine which we have been spreading throughout this country that the man who will make two blades of grass grow where one grew before, is doing the most for agriculture in this country, come down here, and what do they demand? They do not come to ask for a reduction in the duties, but to ask the government to give them fair and moderate protection on their investment and on what they are producing. Now, my friend Eugene N. Foss is a manufacturer and a very capable, clever business man. He is now governor of Massachusetts. Mr. Foss and myself have discussed the question of his establishing a factory in Canada, at different times during the past ten years, I have done everything I could to get Mr. Foss interested in establishing in Canada a branch of their large works which are situated outside of Boston. I believe that Mr. Foss, at the present time, would not consider for one moment following out that advice, because he knows—and every American manufacturer knows—that the government having gone thus far, are bound to go further. And Mr. Foss has stated that:

The present tariff system has resulted in sending approximately $300,000,000 of American capital to Canada to build up branch industries which compete with American factories in foreign markets. It has resulted in stifling the growth of Massachusetts and kept us out of the business and commerce which belongs to us by every right. It has kept the great Canadian railroads from our ports.

That is exactly what I want the Canadian policy to do. I want the American manufacturers to be forced to establish plants on this side of the line and provide work for our Canadian workmen if they want to have the advantage of supplying our home markets.

Mr. BEST. Are there any producers in Canada to-day except the farmers who have to pay a duty on everything they consume, and have no protection whatever on what they produce? We have to pay a duty on everything. Is that right?

Mr. HARRIS. That is absolutely right, and that is the point I was trying to make. Now, I want to refer to one other memorial which was presented by the farmers' deputation in December last. I was acquainted with one member of that deputation, a gentleman who came from my own county, and I want to place on record my opinion of the memorial which he presented to the government on that occasion, in which he attempted to give the facts existing with regard to agriculture in Brant county. This is from Colonel Fraser:

Treating on the question of turnips, I have frequently seen paid in customs and freight dues nearly four dollars for every dollar paid the producer. This is only one of the many like instances I could enumerate. It is no wonder then that the farming interests in my district are depressed; that the bailiff's business is largely on the increase; that merchants are unable to collect their bills, and that the general conditions of the farmer call loudly and piteously for a change. The conditions as outlined in the contemplated changes of the tariff would, I believe, largely eliminate the existing conditions and place on a sound foundation our agricultural interests, on whose prosperity the condition of all classes so much depends.

As the government has apparently taken this statement as literally true, I want to say that it is not at all correct in regard to the county of Brant, and I think the Minister of Customs will bear me out in saying so. I do not think there is a farmer in the whole county of Brant that will subscribe to what is said there. Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, I want to say that I have tried to impress upon the House the fact that we are all working together to build up a great nation. We want everything of the very best. We want our people equipped with the best educational knowledge; we want them to turn out the best goods of every kind. We want our farmers to be the best farmers; we want them to turn out their products in the best possible condition; we want them to pay more attention to quality than to anything else. If we can build up the country along those lines we shall succeed in making of Canada a great nation. But if we follow the policy of sending out of our country all its raw materials in the crudest possible condition we shall never succeed in building up a great nation.

Mr. H. H. MILLER (South Grey). The hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean), in speaking this afternoon, said that we were rushing in where angels feared to tread. I see in front of me many men who are filled with fear; I see two or three such men about me on this side of the House. But while the fear is very apparent, I have not discovered the angels among them.

They are filled with fear, and yet I find their fears do not run along the same line. For instance, my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Harris), who has just spoken, is filled with fear lest the manufacturers of agricultural implements are not getting enough protection. My hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) is filled with fear to an equal degree, because he thinks the manufacturers of agricultural implements are getting too much protection on what they manufacture. Let us analyze the fears of these gentlemen, and see whether anybody in connection with this whole proposal has anything really to be afraid of. Sir, in speaking to-night, I purpose meeting the objections to this proposed trade agreement as I find them contained in the speech of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), not because it was that hon. gentleman who made the speech, but because, after speaking for four hours and a half, he travelled over the whole ground, and made, I think, all the points that have been contained in the speeches of those who have followed him on the other side of the House in opposition to this agreement. I find it more convenient to take all the objections from the one speech than to take them from several speeches. The hon. member for North Toronto said in the first place:

The situation is one of extreme gravity. I may be wrong, but I have given a great deal of thought to this matter in the course of my political life, and the conviction that is within my heart is that we have never had in Canada any question quite so important as this present one—no issue upon which hang larger and greater consequences.

Sir, the hon. gentleman has had a longer political career than I have, and has had a somewhat remarkable political career. I am not willing to say with him that there never has been in Canada any question quite so important as this; I think there have been other questions of even greater importance. Yet I am willing to say with him that if this cannot properly be termed a question of extreme gravity, it may, indeed, be termed a question of great importance. It is a question so important to the people of Canada that I think we may well brush from our eyes the cobwebs of partisanship and refuse to allow any party feeling to warp our judgment on this matter, but simply consider the question from a large, broad and lofty national viewpoint. The hon. member for North Toronto began his speech by making some rather belittling remarks as to the hon. the Minister of Finance and the hon. the Minister of Customs. Now, Sir, if I thought that the member for North Toronto meant those remarks as a personal slight and a jeer, or as an insult to those two gentlemen I would not notice his remarks at all. But I do not think that his remarks were intended in any such way; I do not think that he intended to be personal in his remarks further than that he intended his statements as a logical argument upon this question upon the principle: Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles? The hon. gentleman proceeded to argue that because this was a trade arrangement made by two estimable men, yet not by any extraordinary men, but two simple-minded men, it could not be an agreement that would be of advantage to Canada. The hon. gentleman said:

Two men started out of Ottawa, two very estimable men but not in any way extraordinary.

Again he said:

These two men, consulting with nobody, except with fourteen or thirteen other equally ordinary men—or I might say not more extraordinary men.

And again the hon. gentleman said:

Why, when this pact was made I can imagine the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Justice, two good men, two simple-minded men, two men of fair but limited knowledge, with two clerks with them, facing the trained men of business at Washington, going down there with fear and trembling, wondering if they could get a little bit of a slice so as to justify their going.

The hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton) makes use of language very similar when he says:

I do not believe that in the recent history of Canada anything has happened which has given to the thinking people of Canada so painful and so sudden a shock as the sudden realization that four or five gentlemen who, by reason of their ability, their years of service and their high position in their party, are in control of the affairs of the dominant political party, can suddenly, of their motion, without discussion, without debate, without the knowledge of the country, commit the country to a radical change of fiscal policy.

Now, Sir, the fact that the hon. member for North Toronto three times refers in his remarks to the lack of ability or of capacity upon the part of Canada's two commissioners shows that he was endeavouring to build up such a logical argument as I have stated. Mr. Chairman, I am not intending at this time to give my opinion as to the business ability of the Minister of Finance or of the Minister of Customs. I may say to the House that not long ago I was talking with one of the sanest, shrewdest, most successful, most influential business men of the city of Toronto, and that gentleman made the statement that he did not think that there is upon the American continent to-day another man so well informed upon the tariff question as the present Canadian Minister of Finance. I have said that this is not an opinion that I give as my own. It is the opinion I quote of a man better able to judge than I, but this I do say and I say it without any intention of being offensive to any one, that the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs were much better able in 1911 to negotiate such an arrangement as his than was the hon. member for North Toronto when in 1891 he endeavoured to make a similar arrangement with the people of the United States. When I say that I do not endeavour to compare the natural ability of the hon. member for North Toronto with the natural ability of the two gentlemen, members of this cabinet, to whom I have referred, I allow every man in this House, I allow every man without this House in the Dominion of Canada to form his own judgment and come to his own conclusion as to that. The men of Canada have formed their own judgment upon this question, and I am quite willing that that judgment should remain as it is and as it will be. But I do say that there is no place perhaps in the political or business life of Canada where a man can and naturally does aquire such a knowledge of tariff matters, and not only of tariff matters, but of the business affairs of Canada as the position which is now occupied by the Minister of Finance, and next to that the position which is occupied by the Minister of Customs. These hon. gentlemen are day by day and every day receiving through their mail communications from business men all over Canada, from ocean to ocean, engaged in every kind of business and in all this correspondence Canadian business men are revealing to the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs the innermost secrets, the requirements and necessities of their several businesses. Not only do they receive these communications through the mail, but they acquire information from the delegations of influential business men who wait upon them day after day. The Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs have upon several occasions gone through the length and breadth of Canada into all the business centres and have consulted the business men, including the farmers—whom I include as amongst the business men of Canada—as to the necessities, requirements and conditions of their businesses.

Mr. BLAIN. What year was that?

Mr. MILLER. Upon different occasions as my hon. friend knows. The hon. member for North Toronto speaks in terms unnecessarily contemptuous of two gentlemen that went with the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs to negotiate this bargain at Washington and to whom he refers as 'clerks.' Who were the two 'clerks' that went with these hon. gentlemen? The Commissioner of Customs, Mr. McDougald, who has been for many long years—for a longer period of years than the Liberal party has been in power—engaged in the Department of Customs where he has obtained a very expert knowledge of the business affairs and conditions of Canada. The other gentleman who was referred to as a clerk is Mr. Russell, who for many years was in the employment of the Manufacturers' Association of Canada, where he acquired expert knowledge——

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend is mistaken. There is a Mr. Russell who is with the Manufacturers' Association. Mr. Russell to whom the hon. gentleman refers was for a quarter of a century in the customs service, and he has now been transferred to my department. He is not the gentleman who is connected with the Manufacturers' Association.

Mr. MILLER. Then, for 25 years he, with Mr. McDougald, has been engaged by this government as a trade expert. So, I say that no one could have found within the borders of this Dominion four men better able to go to Washington and negotiate such a bargain than the four who were selected. Messrs. Fielding and Paterson in 1911 had been nearly 15 years in their respective cabinet positions. In 1891, when he went on his mission to Washington, had been Minister of Finance for only three years. The hon. member for North Toronto says: How could these two men succeed facing the trained men of business at Washington? But, Sir, he does not name the trained men of business at Washington and I would ask him or any other hon. member on that side of the House to name the trained men of business at Washington who would be more capable of looking after the affairs of the United States in this arrangement than were our commissioners to look after the affairs of Canada. The hon. member for North Toronto contradicts himself in this part of his speech as he does in many other parts. He speaks somewhat belittleingly of the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs, and the colleagues of these two hon. gentlemen in the cabinet when he says that they consulted with nobody except fourteen or thirteen other equally ordinary men. Then he goes on to prove that these men are not ordinary men, that they are not simple minded men, but that they are men of extraordinary business ability, and let me read to you the language by which he gives us the evidence of their ability. The hon. member for North Toronto in his speech says:

> It was significant that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, began his history at 1897——

The year when the Liberal government came into power and began to manage the affairs of this country.

—since then Canada has made great progress, signal progress, despite the burdensome load it has had to carry in the shape of a rather poor administration.

The latter part of that remark is an opinion that we may accept or reject as we choose. In the first part of his statement the hon. member for North Toronto says that Canada since 1897 has made great progress, signal progress. This is a statement of a fact, and facts are stubborn things. The hon. member goes on further and says:

> There were no compelling conditions to force you on this question. What were they, if there were any? Production was good. Never in the history of Canada has its production, in all its varied interests, been larger or richer. No blight then had fallen on the productive powers of Canada, in any respect, owing to conditions which the government might remove. There was no lack of market for everything that Canada produced. There was quick sale, easy sale, no glut in the markets, no lying in our bins and cellars, no rotting in our fields. Everything that Canada produced, and she produced richly, found a market and a ready market. There was no compulsion in that respect, there was no lack of transport, everything ready for market had means of transport, there was no compelling condition which sent these gentlemen to Washington. The prices, too, were good, they were never better in Canada.

Sir, if this debate serves no other good purpose it will have served at least this purpose that it brings from the opposition the hon. member for North Toronto and every other hon. gentleman opposed to this agreement the greatest tribute to the business ability of the Laurier cabinet given to them in a long time. What does the member for North Toronto say? That from 1897 to 1911 production in Canada was good. The production of the field was good, the production of the factory was good the production of the mine, of the forest, of the sea, production all along the line, was good. Markets were good, prices were good. This government had found for every man with anything to sell a good market in which to sell at a good price. He says: That in 1911 after fourteen years of Liberal administration, there was no difficulty on the part of any man in getting what he had to sell to the markets for lack of transportation. The government had provided transportation by the improvements of canal systems, by causing to be built new railway lines. He says that after fourteen years of Liberal administration, there was absolutely nothing to find fault with, to grumble about, to condemn. The hon. member need not tell us in one breath that this cabinet was composed of simple minded and ordinary men and then recite such a statement as to the condition of affairs which this cabinet has brought about in the Dominion of Canada. That is a state of things that does not come by luck, it does not come as a mere accidental thing. The condition of affairs described by the hon. member for North Toronto is a condition that can only come as the result of the most excellent administration and business management. The hon. member makes this argument which has been made by every speaker since, that the foreman to-day is not in Canada, and that perhaps is one of the things which the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Harris) had in view when he said this agreement has hurt the pride of the people of Canada. The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) speaks of the grievance of the fruit growers and the grievance of the grain growers and then he pictures these men as coming to the Prime Minister here, asking him to remedy their grievances and in reply the Prime Minister folds his arms and says:

> There is a different foreman in charge now; before this trade arrangement passed we could have given you a remedy, Canada could control her own, but to-day the foreman to whom you must plead is not Canada, with its 8,000,000, but the United States with its 93,000,000. There is the party to whom you must appeal, and if that predominant party does not agree to what you ask we can do nothing. I say that is rank injustice.

If that hon. member or any other member who makes that argument will think for a moment he will see that there is no rank injustice, he will understand in a moment that if any kind of trade agreement had to be made or was to be made between these two countries, when the commissioners had completed their work it must be set before the people of both countries as a completed arrangement. If that arrangement was open to change upon either side then if men in Canada having grievances, whether manufacturers or agriculturists, could come and have the agreement opened up in one place they could have it opened up in a hundred different places and there could be no finality and no agreement. If there is any humilitation on this side of the line, if a man coming to this government says: I want you to remedy this grievance, and if the reply is as it must be: We cannot remedy that grievance, this must go through as it is, or not at all, what must be the position of the American who goes to Mr. Taft and points out some grievance he wants remedied? What must be the position, what must always have been the position of Mr. Taft in this matter. He would have to fold his arms and would have to say to that United States citizen, according to the hon. member: There was a time before we began to negotiate when I could perhaps remedy your grievance, but not now, you are too late, and now I, the President of a republic of 90 million people, cannot change or alter one single jot in this arrangement until or unless I consult Sir Wilfrid Laurier, premier of the country to the north of us, with eight million inhabitants. If there is humiliation on our side of the line surely there must be humiliation on the other. I do not think there is any humiliation at all, but if there is, it is as 93 to 8 greater to the United States government than to the government of Canada to-day.

What is the proposal we are discussing and what led to it? In 1846 the British government repealed its corn laws. In 1849 the British government repealed its navigation laws, and then American vessels were permitted to register in British ports, and American shipping was permitted to compete with colonial shipping for the carrying trade of Great Britain. This brought about a sad condition of things for a time in Canada. There was a general prevailing spirit of discontent, there were those in Canada who said that England was forsaking her colonies. If it is the duty of the daughter nation to be loyal to the mother land it is equally the duty of the mother land to be loyal to the daughter nation. There were people in Canada in 1846 and 1849, and the years immediately following who said that England was not being loyal to her daughter, her colony. England was not disloyal. England said to us at that time: We are not willing to sacrifice our greater interests for your smaller interests, but while we are bound to look after our own interests we are willing to allow you to look after your own interests, and England said to us that she would give us the right to trade where and with whom we liked, and with such a tariff imposed on our importations, as we chose to fix and to make.

In 1854, seeking to better our condition, we, through Lord Elgin, the then Governor General of Canada, made a treaty known as the Elgin-Marcy Treaty and let me call your attention to the fact that Lord Elgin the Governor General of Canada, acted as the British envoy and assisted Great Britain to make for us a treaty of reciprocity with the government of the United States. Lord Elgin at that time advised his home government that if we were not allowed to make such a treaty, he feared that there would be some danger of Canada manifesting a desire to be annexed to the United States. I would like to tell you something of the result of that treaty which existed from 1854 to 1866, and I will give you the testimony of Mr. Withrow, who writes a history of Canada. Mr. Withrow was the son of a successful Toronto contractor, a graduate of Toronto University, a man who travelled throughout the length and breadth of Canada, in England, on the continent of Europe, and in Asia, and a man of very broad information. In his history Mr. Withrow speaks of the treaty as follows:

It was signed on the 5th of June, 1854, by Lord Elgin and the Hon. W. L. Marcy, as representatives of their respective countries. It provided for the free interchange of the products of the sea, the soil, the forest, and the mine. The waters of the St. Lawrence, the St. John and the canals, and the inshore fisheries in the British waters, were conceded to the United States; and the navigation of Lake Michigan was thrown open to Canada. By the provisions of the treaty, it was to continue in force for ten years from March, 1855, and was then terminable on twelve months' notice from either party.

To the agricultural population of Canada, the treaty was attended with immense advantage, and gave an important stimulus to every branch of productive industry.

Mr. Withrow speaks again of the results of the treaty to Canada, and I like to give you his opinion, because it is not a political opinion. This is the language he uses:

Commercial reciprocity with the United States, when finally carried into effect, caused an immense development of international trade, and largely increased the value of every acre of land, of every bushel of wheat, and of every head of cattle in the country. A great impetus was also given to shipbuilding, to milling and manufacturing interests, to stock-raising, wool-growing, and cloth-weaving, to the construction of agricultural implements, and to every other branch of industry.

In another place Mr. Withrow says this of the results of the treaty:

The reciprocity treaty between the United States and Canada was now approaching the period of its expiration by effluxion of time. It had been of immense commercial advantage to both countries.

In 1866 the Elgin-Marcy Treaty was abrogated at the instance of the United States. There were minor reasons, but the chief reason for its termination was that the United States had in the meantime, accumulated an immense war debt; and as it was necessary for them to raise money in every possible way, they increased their general tariff and their inland revenue imposts, and they said that goods coming from Canada must help to pay the war debt as well as goods from every other source. What was the result to Canada of the abrogation of that treaty? Canadians then were stout-hearted men, men who had confidence in their ability as well as in their country, men who were not paralyzed with fear, men whose loyalty was not shaken; and they said: We will go on and develop our country in spite of the abrogation of this treaty, and they did. We have done so well, that the hon. leader of the opposition to-day, and every other man on his side of the House and their friends in the country are saying: 'Why do you not let well enough alone? Our position to-day is so good that there is really no reason why we should seek to improve it.' The Prime Minister speaking yesterday of this argument, put our Conservative friends on the Chinese list, and reminded us that they had said in 1896: 'There is now no necessity of making any change; the conditions are all that we would have them to be, and if you make any change, you are likely to make a change for the worse.' In 1896 our Conservative friends said, let well enough alone; but the people of this country did not say that. They said: Let well enough alone may be the motto of the Conservative party for this year 1896, but it is not the motto of the people; our motto is, let there be greater growth, greater development, greater progress, greater prosperity; and they said: If let well enough alone is your motto, we will put into power in Canada, a party which has our motto. The people did put that party in power, and the growth and development and advancement of the country under that party has been well described by the hon. member for North Toronto. An hon. friend quoted to-day from a letter written by Sir William Van Horne. Let me quote from the same letter these words:

> We are in an enviable position. Does not common sense tell us to stay where we are, and let well enough alone?

That is the doctrine which Sir William Van Horne applies to the political situation. That is the argument of our hon. friends opposite. I have often heard my hon. friend from North Toronto say this, and it was well said, that the principles which actuate a man in the control of his private affairs ought to be the principle of the government in conducting the affairs of the country. What has actuated Sir William Van Horne in conducting his own business or in conducting the business of the great company of which he is a valuable official? In this letter he says: 'Does not common sense tell us to stay where we are?' Sir William Van Horne was a citizen of the United States. He did not say to himself, Let me stay where I am. He said, Let me go to Canada, and he came here, and he made a great deal of money in Canada, and I am free to say that he benefited Canada as well as himself. But he did not then say to himself, Let me stay where I am; but he went to Cuba, and with the hundreds of thousands of dollars which he made in Canada from the farmers and toilers of this country, he developed the island of Cuba and increased his own fortune; and as he basks under the palm trees of Cuba, he says to us, I am sick and ashamed, and tells us what we should do in the conducting of our political affairs. When Sir William Van Horne says, I am sick and ashamed, I remember that there is a sickness that sometimes comes to men from surfeiting in the good things of life. There is no other kind of sickness that I know of that a man should be more ashamed of. If Sir William Van Horne is surfeited with the good things of the United States, with the good things of Canada, and with the good things of Cuba, and is ashamed of his sickness he had better stay where he is. He was perfectly loyal when he left the United States to come to Canada; he was loyal when he left Canada to go to Cuba; but I do not think he is the man to say to us, stay where you are, be loyal and let things alone. The railway company of which Sir William Van Horne is an official, is before our Railway Committee session after session. His company has been doing well and showing large profits. It has been doing its share towards the development of Canada; but does Sir William Van Horne say to the Canadian Pacific Railway: You are doing well, just let well enough alone, do not attempt to make further progress. No, on the contrary he comes to this government for charters to extend the lines of that company in every direction so that it may grow and add to its business and its profits. If that is good business for a railway company, is it not equally good business for a government to conduct the affairs of the country along the same line?

Let me look at the history of the Conservative party, and its endeavours to make just such an agreement as is now proposed. In the library the other day I looked over some of the old newspaper files, and I turned to the Toronto 'Empire' of February, 1891. The 'Empire' was then the chief organ in Canada of the Liberal-Conservative party. The Conservative party had just determined to appeal to the country in a general election, and the Toronto 'Empire' was full of campaign literature and campaign articles. Turning to the 'Empire' of the 4th of February, I found an article on the front page that reads in part as follows:

> The 'Empire' is privileged to publish a copy of the despatch from His Excellency the Governor General to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, showing the nature of the government's proposals to the United States, and indicating the earnest desire of the administration for the development of trade between the United States and Canada.

This despatch is dated Government House, Ottawa 13th December, 1890, and the first clause of the government's proposal read as follows:

> Renewal of the reciprocity treaty of 1854 with the modifications required by the altered circumstances of both countries and with the extensions deemed by the commission to be in the interests of Canada and of the United States.

So that the Conservative party of that day, endeavouring to make a trade arrangement, realized that any agreement to be made must have advantages to the United States as well as to Canada. They realized that a treaty arrangement could not be a one sided one. The 'Empire' of that same day went on as follows:

The Dominion thereupon asked the imperial authorities to remind Mr. Blaine that Canada had always been ready for a fair reciprocal arrangement and had made repeated offers to that effect, which, however, had been ignored or refused by the United States.

In an editorial in the same issue the 'Empire' said:

There is no reason why a fair and honourable reciprocity, advantageous to both Canada and the United States, should not be the issue of such a discussion as is proposed.

The treaty might be fair and reasonable and yet be advantageous to both countries. They do not seem so willing to admit that to-day. The 'Empire' of the 7th February, 1891, gives a report of a meeting in Toronto at which Sir John Thompson, then Minister of Justice in the Conservative government, made a speech. He is quoted as saying:

A little over three years ago it transpired that negotiations were being entertained by the United States for the making of a treaty of reciprocity with the colony of Newfoundland. These negotiations have not yet ripened into a treaty, but they were proceeding upon lines which were not unlike, so far as they went, the lines which Canada would be willing to pursue in any negotiations with that country, and not, mind you, at the dictation of the British government, as has been asserted in the press opposed to us, but on our line.

Sir John Thompson was then not as superloyal as our Tory friends to-day are. He said that he was willing to negotiate—'and not mind you at the dictation of the British government, as has been asserted by the press opposed to us, but on our own lines.' We in Canada are running our own establishment, he said; we are not being dictated to by Great Britain, and we are negotiating on our own lines for ourselves, independent of Great Britain altogether. He proceeded further:

He said that Mr. Blain had intimated willingness to make a wide treaty for reciprocity and enter upon separate negotiations with Canada. That statement being made, we are bound to avail ourselves of that to extend our trade. We have never declared our willingness to trade with them. On the contrary, we are seeking extension of our trade in every direction.

Was Sir John Thompson disloyal in saying this? I submit he was not. That was a logical position to take and a logical argument. Sir John Thompson said we are seeking extensions of our trade in every direction, we are seeking to extend our trade with foreign nations long distances away, then why, in the name of common sense, should we not endeavour to extend our trade in the United States? That speech of Sir John Thompson, was delivered in the loyal, the ultra and patriotic city of Toronto. I did not read that he had brick bats thrown at him or eggs or that he was even hissed on that occasion or that our Conservative friends in Toronto accused him of disloyalty. I ask my hon. friends whether on that occasion Sir John Thompson was a simple-minded, ordinary and unpatriotic man.

If my hon. friends would turn up the Toronto 'Empire' of the 11th February, 1891, they would find an article with large heavy black headlines. Let me read them:

Canada's tenth fair offer. A brief history of reciprocity since 1865. Canada always willing; the United States always turning a deaf ear.

Listen to this if you will:

Nine out of ten offers made since 1865 came from Conservative ministries.

Here is the boast made by the leading Conservative paper in 1891 that whereas the Liberals on one occasion had offered to make a reciprocity treaty with the United States, the Conservative party on nine different occasions had tried to make such a treaty. Then the 'Empire' went to work and tabulated the offers made in these ten different times to the United States. The first was in 1865 when Sir John Macdonald, and the Hon. George Brown went to England to seek the aid of the British government, and when Lord John Russell, the British Prime Minister, approached Mr. Adams the United States minister at London, and Mr. Adams said that he was not authorized to give any assurance on behalf of the United States. Thus in 1865 these gentlemen approached the British government to get such a treaty arrangement as we are endeavouring to have enacted. Was the old hero of the Conservative party, who said: 'A British subject I was born and a British subject I will die,' disloyal on that occasion? He was not then accused of being disloyal to Canada and Great Britain.

Mr. BLAIN. What was the policy of the hon. gentleman's party in 1891?

Mr. MILLER. I am quite willing to discuss that, but I think it is of small importance what it was. In 1866 the 'Empire' tells us that the Canadian government sent in January, M. M. Howland, Henry, Galt and Smith to Washington to negotiate such a treaty as we now have, but they were not successful. In 1868, the year after confederation, a standing offer was inserted in our customs tariff of a reciprocity arrangement, to be proclaimed by order in council on the United States concurring. I ask what mandate had the Conservative party then to make that standing offer in their customs tariff. That offer had not been discussed at any general election.

In 1869 Sir George Cartier and Mr. Macdougall, two members of the Conservative government, being in England, urged the British government to try to obtain a treaty of reciprocity, and in June of that same year Sir John Rose, the Conservative Minister of Finance, was sent to Washington, and he met with no success. Was Sir John Rose sent single-handed to Washington to negotiate such a treaty—was he a less 'ordinary' man than my two hon. friends of the present cabinet? Was he a 'simple-minded' and only very 'ordinary' man? Was he a disloyal man? And were Cartier and Macdougall, the two members of the government, who, in England, tried to get the British Government to make such a treaty, disloyal to Canada or to Britain and Britain's flag? And had Cartier and Macdougall any mandate from the Canadian people when, in 1869, they sent Sir John Rose to Washington? In 1871 Sir John Macdonald, the old hero of the Conservative party, when negotiating the Washington treaty, offered to exchange the rights of the fisheries for reciprocal trade arrangement, but the American commissioners refused to negotiate. That was after a general election, but the people had not discussed the question on the hustings. In 1873, a further offer was made by a Conservative government. On this occasion boards of trade in Canada and in the United States had passed resolutions favouring a reciprocity agreement, and then the Conservative government passed a resolution in favour of such an agreement, and the 'Empire' refers us to the Canadian Sessional Papers, No. 40, of 1873 to prove what it states. In 1874 a Liberal government under Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, sent Hon. George Brown to Washington to negotiate such a treaty. He succeeded. The American Congress passed the treaty, but the American Senate refused to ratify it. In 1879, in adopting the National Policy, the Conservative government of Canada placed, for a second time, upon the statute-books of Canada a standing offer of reciprocity with the United States in natural products whenever the United States declared for a similar reciprocity. Now, what were the conditions of that time? There had been a general election in 1878. And what was discussed at that election, and what did the Conservatives under Sir John A. Macdonald lay down as their platform to be carried out if returned to power? What was discussed in that election was not a proposal to reduce the tariff, but to increase the tariff. But Sir John Macdonald prior to the election discussed the proposal to increase the tariff, and the first thing he did, after the election without a mandate from the people, was to make a standing offer to the United States to reduce our tariff, in an endeavour to make such an arrangement as we are making to-day. Was he disloyal in 1871, when he made, or in 1878, when he repeated, his offer? In 1888, when the fisheries dispute was under discussion in Washington, Sir Charles Tupper, the old Cumberland war horse, another hero of the Conservative party, desired to settle this matter on the basis of a reciprocal trade treaty. But the American plenipotentiaries refused. Had Sir Charles Tupper any mandate from the Canadian people in 1888 for such an arrangement? Had this matter been discussed in the election campaign? Not at all. Well, was Sir Charles Tupper disloyal, when, in 1888, he proposed such an arrangement as this? I have never heard it so stated. Then, in 1891, the tenth offer was made, this time by Sir John Macdonald again. He again offered to make a reciprocity arrangement, and representatives were sent in that year to Washington, and went again in the following year, 1892. The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) was one of those who went to Washington in 1891. If hon. members will refer to 'Hansard' of 1891, page 59, they will read the remarks of the hon. member as he tells of the desire of the Conservative government of that year to make a reciprocity treaty with the United States. And if they will turn to 'Hansard' of 1892, pages 330-1-2, they will read the account that was given by the hon. member for North Toronto of his journey to Washington, of what he sought to accomplish there, and they will read this statement of the hon. member, that he regretted that they were not able to make such an arrangement. The hon. member for North Toronto, who, as Finance Minister of Canada in 1891, had endeavoured to make a reciprocity treaty with the United States, and who in 1892 regretted that he had not been able to make such a treaty, in 1911 wrote an article to the 'Canadian Century.' That article appears in the issue of 18th February last, and in it the hon. member states that the present proposal will be the enemy of interprovincial trade. Now, I ask this question: If this arrangement will be the enemy of interprovincial trade in 1911, would it not much more have been the enemy of interprovincial trade in 1891? In 1911 we have railway communication, we have river and canal communication, between the several provinces of Canada that we had not in 1891. We have facilities for carrying on interprovincial trade to-day that we had not then, and I repeat that if there is any danger of this arrangement being the enemy of interprovincial trade in this present year, it would have been twenty times more the enemy of interprovincial trade twenty years ago, when the hon. member for North Toronto endeavoured to make such an arrangement.

The argument has been made in this House before that the Conservative party from 1866 to 1891, and up to 1894, were willing to make such an arrangement with the people of the United States. That argument has been met with the statement that conditions have changed in Canada since 1891, but only in this way—every change in conditions indicates that, if such an arrangement as this would have been profitable to Canada in 1891, it will be much more profiable to Canada in 1911. There is not one single argument based upon the fear of annexation or upon the plea of loyalty that will apply to-day that would not have equally applied in 1891. There is not a single economic argument that could be applied as against this arrangement that would not have applied with even greater force to the proposed arrangement in 1891. It is not enough for my hon. friends who oppose the agreement to say that conditions have changed since 1891; they must show what are the changes and must show that these changes make an arrangement injurious to Canada in 1911 that would have been beneficial to Canada in 1891. They have not even attempted to do that, and they cannot possibly do it. And, let me say in passing, I am very glad indeed that conditions are as good in Canada as they are. While we are willing to trade with the people of the United States to-day, and to enter into this proposed agreement, I am very glad, as a Canadian citizen, to know that we do not have to go to the people of the United States, and do not go to the people of the United States, as suppliants; we do not go as a matter of necessity; we do not go asking for alms or charity; but we go to them as man to man. We meet them as they have come to us, business man to business man, to make, if we can, a trade arrangement that will be to our mutual advantage. If we cannot make such an arrangement with our neighbours, if the United States refuse to make such a bargain with us, then we will not feel ourselves crippled, or feel ourselves paralyzed. We will say, we might have got along better with this agreement, but still we can go on and develop our country and our interests; even without such an agreement we can make this a great nation.

Now, Sir, I call your attention to the manner in which the member for North Toronto complains of the ill-treatment which we have received from time to time from the people of the United States; and this is not only the argument of one gentleman, it is the argument of every gentleman who has followed him in this debate on the other side of the House. The hon. gentleman says in his speech:

> It was the conquest of Canada aimed at in 1775; it was the conquest of Canada aimed at in the years around 1812, and since; it was the conquest of Canada and its incorporation with the United States aimed at by the methods I have spoken of in respect to our trade and fisheries; and the dominant spirit in the United States that is pushing reciprocity through to a successful enactment is not economic, it is political. It is still the conquest of Canada. But it is conquest of Canada by peaceful means and large gifts.

The hon. gentleman says again:

> In all this trouble and toil, when was the hand of the United States extended to us with helpful aid? Not in one single case.

Sir, in answer to that question of the hon. member for North Toronto I ask him another question; I say, when was the occasion, when was the time, that the people of Canada asked the United States to extend to them a helpful hand? I say not in one single case; and I am glad that the time never was when Canadians were so lacking in spirit, when Canadians were so lacking in confidence in their own ability, so lacking in confidence in their own country, that they went to the United States as beggars and asked them to hold out to us a helpful hand. Sir, the United States, through all these years, has been busy, as it had a right to be busy, in developing their own country, as we have been busy in developing our country. What is the good of any man to-day rising in this House to complain of the ill-treatment that he fancies we have received from the United States in 1775? The people who endeavoured the conquest of Canada in 1775 are dead to-day, they got their answer when they endeavoured to conquer Canada in 1775. The people who endeavoured to make trouble for us in 1812 got their reply, and they are dead. Why then endeavour to reopen old sores? Why then endeavour to visit the sins of the fathers upon the children, and upon the children's children. There are men who never forget an injury, there are men who never overlook a mistake, but these are not the best men. The member for North Toronto endeavours to incite and provoke the feeling of the people of Canada against the people of the United States by a comparison of trade, and he says:

> And there was, in the third place, the wide spread dissatisfaction with the condition of things imposed upon us by the United States of America in accepting a $104,000,000 free list from us and giving us but a $33,000,000 one in return, in buying from us a paltry $10,000,000 worth and of selling to us $223,000,000 worth; of meeting a Canadian tariff of 26 per cent by a United States tariff of 41½ per cent. There was a feeling in the country that that was not a neighbourly thing for them to do, not fair business treatment, not what we would expect from a great and rich and powerful neighbour. These were the three things that were mooted as grievances in the country.

Sir, we make our tariff and the United States makes its tariff. We impose upon our people a burden of 26 per cent, the government of the United States impose upon its people a burden of 41½ per cent, and that is what the people of the United States are complaining of to-day, that they have been carrying a burden too great for them to bear. That is what has put the Republican party out of power in the United States, and brought into power the Democratic party. Sir, if the United States, through all these long years, have been patient enough to bear the burden of 41½ per cent, while our people were only bearing a burden of 26 per cent, that is a matter for the people of the United States to regulate, as they are doing it to-day. It is perfectly true that we sold to the United States only $100,000,000 worth of goods per annum, while they have been selling us goods to the amount of $223,000,000 per annum. Is there any fair and just cause for complaint in that? When you analyse the figures what do they mean? They mean simply this, that every Canadian citizen, upon an average, sold Canadian goods to the United States to the amount of $12.50 apiece, but that every American sold only $2.48 worth of American goods to the people of Canada; in other words, that the Canadians sold between five and six times as much Canadian goods per head to the people of the United States as they had sold to us.

But then we are met with this argument: Mr. Taft seeks relief from a nasty position, Mr. Taft is in a rather bad predicament in the United States. Why relieve Mr. Taft? Why should we, the Canadian people, relieve Mr. Taft from the nasty position in which he finds himself? They would not trade with us when we wanted to trade with them, now let us refuse to negotiate with them. Sir, I say that that is nonsense, I say that that is the talk of children, not the talk of business men. We are used to hearing a child, with frowning eye and with pouting lip, say: You would not play with me, now I will not play with you. But that is not the talk of a business man. Suppose I desire to buy my neighbour's farm. I feel that if I bought that farm from my neighbour, I could use it to advantage. I go to the old man and make him a good offer for his farm, he refuses to sell. I go to him a second, third, fourth and fifth time, and he refuses to sell. The old man passes away, his son inherits the farm. I go to him and make him an offer the sixth, seventh, eighth or ninth time, and he refuses those offers. I then say, I will not go back to that man again. I would like to have his farm, it would be profitable for me to have it, but he and his father before him, have refused nine offers, ten offers, I will not go back to him. But that man passes away, and a grandson inherits the farm. Then he comes to me and he says. Now I have not the same ideas that my father had and my grandfather had, I have not the same intentions or inclinations, I am willing to sell to you my farm, I would like to sell it to you. Now if I am a fool, I will say to that man, No, I tried to trade with your father, I tried to do business with your grandfather, and they refused to do business with me, now I will not do any business with you. But if I am a wise man, I will not talk like that, I will say: Now I am glad that conditions have changed, I am glad this young man looks upon the matter differently from what his father and grandfather did. If I can buy this farm now at a fair price, if I can make a reasonable bargain, I have now a good opportunity, and I will do so. That is the manner I think that we as business men should adopt in regard to this matter. We should not be children, we should approach the people of the United States as we are doing, as man to man, in a business manner; and realizing that if we are to make a bargain with the people of the United States, it must be a bargain that will be an advantage to them as well as to us. No one can make a trade that will be a lasting arrangement unless it contains mutual advantage. This is true of school boys when they swap their jack knives; each one must hope to get an advantage from the trade or he would not make the trade, and as it is true of school boys swapping their jack knives, so it is equally true of nations when they undertake to make international treaties. Now, I have reached a point in my speech where I can conveniently stop and as it as after eleven o'clock I beg to move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House. He said: Before the adjournment I desire to say that there was an understanding that on Friday my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) would make a statement upon matters connected with his department. He desires to vary that now and I therefore beg to say that on Friday my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) will make a statement concerning his department and the Minister of the Interior will postpone his statement until Monday. I would be very glad if hon. gentlemen who are interested in those two departments would be kind enough to observe the change.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.30 o'clock p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

2. What localities in the province of Quebec at present conform to these conditions and enjoy free delivery of mail matter?
3. Has the department granted free delivery in any locality which does not conform to conditions it has established? If so, in what cases?

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Free delivery is established in places where the population is 12,000, and the revenue is $20,000.
2. Montreal, Quebec, Sherbrooke.
3. Yes. Free delivery has been established at St. Hyacinthe, Quebec, Three Rivers, Quebec, and Hull, Quebec.

WEST INDIES STEAMSHIP SERVICE.

Mr. CROSBY:

1. What arrangements are being made, if any, for steamship communication between Halifax and the West Indies?
2. As the present contract expires shortly, when will the tenders be asked for the new service?
3. What specifications will be placed before the public regarding boats for the service?
4. What will their passenger accommodation and freight capacity require to be, and what will be the speed required of the boats?
5. Has the government decided whether we are to have a weekly or tri-weekly service instead of the present service?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER:

1 and 2. The government is awaiting a call for tenders which the British government, who will pay half the subsidy, has informed the Canadian government will be issued simultaneously in the United Kingdom, Canada, and the British West Indies.

3 and 4. Adequate passenger and freight accommodation will be required, and tenders, including speed, will be considered upon their respective merits.

5. Alternative tenders will be asked as to frequency of the proposed new service.

ESCOTT POSTMASTERSHIP.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds):

1. Who is the present postmaster at Escott, in the county of Leeds, province of Ontario?
2. What was the date of his appointment?
3. Who was the postmaster at the said office up to the appointment of the present incumbent, and how long had he occupied the position?
4. Was the retiring postmaster dismissed, or for what reason was he discontinued?
5. Under whose representations, and at whose instance was he so retired?
6. Had any complaint as to incompetency to discharge the duties of the said office been made against the retiring postmaster or his assistant? If so, what was the nature of such complaint, and by whom was it made?
7. Is the government aware that the postmaster who has been retired is said to be an old man, a cripple, and a man who was in need of the income derived from the position he occupied?

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Mr. F. T. Hutchison.
2. January 27, 1911.
3. Mr. George Dowsley, since December 1, 1891.

4, 5 and 6. It having been brought to the attention of the department that the postmaster was not giving his personal attention to the duties of the office, inquiry was made in the matter, and the inspector reported that the postmaster had not attended to the duties of the office for a long period. He farmed the office out to several persons in succession, and it was learned that the person then in charge of the office was obliged to vacate the premises. As the present location of the office was considered to be wholly satisfactory and very convenient, and it would not be in the public interest to have it changed, and as the postmaster was unable to give any attention to the duties of the office, it was deemed advisable to place the office in charge of some one who would keep it in the same premises and give it his personal attention.

7. The department has recently been informed that this is the case.

IMPORTS OF MEATS, CHEESE AND BUTTER.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds):

1. How many barrels, boxes or packages of pork, beef, mutton, lamb and cheese have been imported into Canada during the months of October, November and December, 1910, and for the months of January and February, 1911?
2. What was the weight and value thereof, and the countries from which the same was imported?
3. What was the number of pounds of butter and number of dozens of eggs, and the value thereof, and the countries imported from, for the month of February, 1911?

Mr. PATERSON:

1. The department has no record of the number of barrels, boxes or packages of pork, beef, &c., imported, the quantity in 'pounds' simply being shown.

2. The quantity and value of pork, beef, mutton, lamb and cheese imported into Canada, by countries, during the months of October, November, December and January was as follows:

2. If so, when and to whom were such grants made, what prices were paid, respectively, and what were the dimensions of the respective lots?

Mr. BRODEUR:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.

BRIER ISLAND LIGHT.

Mr. JAMESON:

1. Has any application been received from the keeper of the Brier island light for the erection of a new light?
2. If so, when was such application received, what steps have been taken in the matter, and what is the intention of the department as to the erection of a new house?

An application was received through Mr. A. J. S. Copp, M.P., from keeper, dated 17th March, 1906, for repairs to old dwelling. Repairs were effected. Under date 12th February, 1911, the agent of the Marine Department, Halifax, recommended that a new dwelling be erected for the light keeper. This matter is receiving consideration.

Mr. JAMESON:

1. What was the salary paid to the lightkeeper at Brier island at the time of his appointment in 1901?

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—MR. GERMAN.

Mr. W. M. GERMAN (Welland). Before the orders of the day are called I wish to make a statement explanatory of the vote that was taken last night on the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the opposition on going into Committee of Ways and Means. When you Mr. Speaker, left the Chair at six o'clock the position of things was such, that as I apprehend every hon. member of this House had no idea that the vote would be taken immediately after your taking the chair after the dinner hour, at least I, with several others, had no such idea. I reached the House about twenty minutes past eight, and came to the door just as you, Sir, had finished putting the question, and being too late to vote on the question I followed the usual rule, and did not attempt to enter the Chamber. But I wish to place myself on record, Mr. Speaker, that had I been here I would have voted for the amendment of the leader of the opposition, and if it were possible I would like my vote so recorded. I think it is due to myself to make this statement, and I am glad to have an opportunity of doing so.

APPOINTMENT OF COLOURED PERSONS TO CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. DANIEL. There is a statement in this morning's paper to the effect that a young coloured man who had passed first on the list for a certain position in the naval service, was, on making his appearance to take his position, not allowed to do so. The article is headed: 'Negro did not get the job;' is colour line drawn in naval department; officials deny there is any discrimination, but man qualified is transferred elsewhere.' There are in the article other statements giving certificates of character to this young man. It says:

R. B. Nelles, secretary of the Y.M.C.A., has a high opinion of young Simpson. I cannot see any reason for refusing him, he said, as I think him an exceptionally capable young man and fit to associate with any one. He has a room here and is an exemplary fellow.

I wish the Minister of Naval Affairs to state whether objection has been taken to this young man on account of his colour.

Mr. BRODEUR. This is the first time the matter has been brought to my attention, and I know nothing about it. Had my hon. friend given me notice of the question I would have made inquiries.

Mr. DANIEL. I thought the minister might have seen it in the morning paper.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I draw the attention of the Prime Minister to another case where a coloured gentleman who was at the head of the examination list for the Census Department, instead of being put in that position was given an inferior position by the Minister of Agriculture, looking after the black Minorca hens on the farm. I trust the Prime Minister will not allow that kind of thing to spread throughout the departments.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I never heard of it.

RECIPROCITY—STATISTICAL INFORMATION.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Before the orders of the day are called I wish to mention to the Prime Minister that very important and valuable statistics have been brought down to the Senate of the United States, compiled I believe by the Statistical Department or the Tariff Board, and that we seem to be entirely without similar information in this House. I have not had an opportunity of looking over all of this pamphlet which I received only this morning, but it seems to give a great deal of information as to industrial conditions, as to wages, and more than that as to the price of commodities in both countries. I would ask whether or not any information of a similar character is available here, and if so, whether it is the intention of the government to lay it on the table of the House?

Mr. FIELDING. I have not seen the pamphlet in question. The United States government has a tariff board which is at all times gathering information more or less relating to tariffs. There is no similar organization here. Whatever information has been available in reference to the reciprocity matter has already been placed before the House.

Mr. REID (Grenville). There has been none.

Mr. FIELDING. I differ from my hon. friend on that; we are each entitled to our opinion.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Perhaps I have overlooked it, but I would ask whether any information has been submitted, with regard to wages, price of commodities and things of that kind.

Mr. FIELDING. One hon. gentleman in debating the matter in the House referred to information to some extent of that character which will be found in the book of the Minister of Labour which is accessible to us all. The question of prices was dealt with rather fully and statistics brought down by the Minister of Agriculture. There is no other information available.

BRITISH NATIONAL SONGS.

Mr. HUGHES. I understand that a gentleman named Armstrong is a member of the commission on technical education which is now in the city. I wish to ask if any inquiry was made as to the stand taken by Mr. Armstrong in the west a short time ago in relating to the singing of British songs in the schools. Did any one catechise this gentleman as to what he meant by his statement in that regard.

Mr. REID (Grenville).

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. So far as I know, nobody has catechised Mr. Armstrong as to the opinions he expressed in the west or elsewhere, nor do I believe that it is a matter on which he should be catechised. Mr. Armstrong is an independent citizen, he happens at present to be a member of a commission and I do not think we would have reason to question him as to his private views.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Were the remarks made by him when he was discharging his duty as commissioner, or were they made by him outside altogether of his official functions? That is an important consideration, The Prime Minister says that, being a citizen of this country, he has a right to express his opinion.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That is entirely correct, but the situation may be altered a little if he expresses those opinions in the course of his duties as a commissioner. I would like to know if the Prime Minister has any information as to that?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have no information as to either that or the other fact. I shall have the matter looked into.

Mr. HUGHES. I asked a question at the time. It was in the official discharge of his duty. He had a number of gentlemen before him, and it was he who volunteered the statement that he did not want the intrusion of any British songs on these dear, good people from the United States. I subsequently ascertained that the people from the United States had never directly or indirectly objected to the British songs, but that Mr. Armstrong had objected, and had raised the point that British songs like 'Rule Britannia' should not be sung, but that they might sing Canadian songs. A gentleman like that is not fit for a commission.

Mr. MACDONALD. I happen to know the Hon. Mr. Armstrong, the gentleman referred to. I know that the sentiments attributed to him in that newspaper report are entirely unworthy of the sentiments he entertains. I had an opportunity of speaking to him, and he stated that the newspaper report was absolutely untrue.

Mr. HUGHES. Why did he not contradict it?

Mr. SPEAKER. The point cannot be discussed now.

Mr. HUGHES. I am asking a question.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Probably he did not think it worth while.

APPOINTMENT OF CENSUS OFFICIALS.

Mr. BLAIN. What is the policy of the Department of Agriculture in respect to the selection of census commissioners and enumerators, and on whose recommendation are these appointments made?

Mr. FISHER. The policy is to secure the appointment of efficient, trustworthy people and to get such information as will lead to such appointments. The appointments are made on the recommendation of the minister, based on information acquired by him.

WAYS AND MEANS—INFORMATION RE RECIPROCITY AGREEMENT.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I wish to revert to the question of information respecting these tariff resolutions. The Minister of Finance brought down a little pamphlet showing the alterations that would be made if this agreement went through, but outside of that there is practically no information that we can get unless we go to the several blue-books that are brought before this House annually. What is the result? The result is that members on both sides of the House derive their information from blue-books, and contradictory statements are consequently made, so that the public are not sure who is right. Why should we not have supplied by the government full and definite information such as the House at Washington had when these matters were placed before them? The refusal of the Minister of Finance to furnish such a statement convinces me that the minister does not want to give the public the information necessary for them to judge whether or not this is a correct bargain. Why should the minister try to blindfold the people, or not to give information? In making his announcement, the minister did not inform us as to the other favoured nation countries that would enjoy the benefit of this agreement, but when the member for South Ontario asked what other countries would be affected the answer was such that the people could read it either one way or another, and a newspaper in eastern Canada quoted that statement to show that statements made in this House that other countries would have the benefit of this arrangement were not true. We must see the effect of every change in each item on the different parts of the country. The Minister of Finance deliberately, and, I might say, if it were within parliamentary rules, wilfully tried to keep information back to prevent us properly enlightening the people of this country. I, as a member of this House, demand as a right that we should receive this information. I think we are entitled to it, and if the minister wants to get these resolutions through in any kind of reasonable time, if he will give this information he will get them through a great deal quicker than by holding back this information. We should have the amount of imports and exports of each of these items, and we should also have the exports from other countries, with the rates of duties, prices, &c. If the minister thinks that he can drive these resolutions through by blindfolding the people he is making an awful mistake. I am going to get this information; if we cannot get it one way we will have to keep at it until we do. The minister must give us the information in his possession, and if he will not give it in pamphlet form, so that we can read it intelligently, he will have to give it in the House. That is what he is paid for by the people of the country, and he has to do it. I will do my duty in seeing that he does do it.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). The Prime Minister, in making his speech two days ago, referred to the fact that we, by this bargain that has been made by the United States, have admitted some countries under some old treaties. He made very light of these old treaties. He did not inform the House that by this bargain he admitted Great Britain and the British possessions as well as these foreign countries into this market, and that by this arrangement he had lowered the protection to the farmers on the great part of their products. He has not brought down any information to us, but I have asked a few questions on the Order Paper, and I wish to read a list of some of the articles produced in this country that have been brought in even with the present rate of duty, which the minister wipes out altogether on some lines and reduces on others. I asked the following questions:

1. How many barrels, boxes or packages of pork, beef, mutton, lamb and cheese have been imported into Canada during the months of October, November and December, 1910, and for the months of January and February, 1911?

2. What was the weight and value thereof, and the countries from which the same were imported?

3. What was the number of pounds of butter and number of dozen of eggs, and the value thereof, and the countries imported from, for the month of February, 1911?

The minister gave an answer covering all these months except February, the figures for which he says will not be available for ten days, but we have been given some figures, and by these I find that in October, 1910, there was imported into Canada of pork, beef, mutton, cheese:

	Lbs.
From Great Britain..	24
United States..	812,893
China..	271
Hong Kong..	100

In November, 1910:

	Lbs.
From Great Britain	420
United States	299,258
Belgium	35
Hong Kong	455

I want to pick out a few of the principal items. Take mutton and lamb, in October, 1910, the United States sent us 76,027 lbs. and Australia 217,266 lbs. Australia is one of the countries which, under this proposed agreement, will get the benefit of the reduced tariff; and yet, in the face of the high tariff at present existing, that country sent into Canada in October, 1910, 217,000 lbs. of mutton lamb, in December, 1910, 179,470 lbs., in November 1910, 163,909 lbs., in December, 1910, 179,470 lbs, and in January, 1911, 157,927 lbs. But these products are now to be allowed in at reduced duty to the detriment of Canadian farmers.

Take pork barrelled, in October, 1910, the United States sent into Canada 1,121,100 lbs., China 66 lbs.; in November, 1910, the United States sent 824,265 lbs., in December, 1910, 467,820 lbs., Newfoundland 2,916 lbs., China 291, and Hong Kong 3,499 lbs. These are all to be allowed in at a reduced tariff, under this proposed treaty, to the great injury of the farmers of this country.

Take cheese, another one of the most important products of the farmers of this country. The imports of this into Canada was as follows in October, 1910:

	Lbs.
Great Britain	8,967
United States	21,716
France	15,879
Italy	72,709
Belgium	1,489
Switzerland	30,197
Holland	2,400
Germany	1,960

These were the imports during October last, yet the right hon. the Prime Minister with a wave of the hand, says that these countries export nothing to Canada of the articles mentioned in the schedule of this agreement. Why, here we have a list from the Customs Department as long as your arm of the articles which have come into Canada from these countries even in face of the high duties; and under this proposed agreement they will come in free, by virtue of the favoured nation clause, from all these countries, as well as from the United States. Take our imports in November, 1910. In the month we imported as follows:

	Lbs.
From Great Britain	10,161
United States	19,539
France	22,482
Italy	23,224
Switzerland	36,317
Germany	18,449
Belgium	963

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds).

And in December we imported:

	Lbs.
From Great Britain	5,184
United States	20,274
France	44,559
Italy	66,775
Aust.-Hungary	3,439
Turkey in Asia	850
Switzerland	31,873
New Zealand	260
Holland	3,543

Yet the Prime Minister says that these do not amount to anything. These were allowed into Canada under the present tariff, but after this proposed arrangement comes into force they will be let in practically free. Then take our imports in January, 1911, of cheese:

	Lbs.
From Great Britain	979
United States	18,261
France	1,810
Italy	18,280
Switzerland	33,519
Turkey in Asia	538

The products of all these countries are henceforth to be allowed into Canada free because we are to get a free market with 90,000,000 people, and these 90,000,000 people are to get a free market with 8,000,000, but they have three times the quantity of goods to export that we have. Yet the right hon. the Prime Minister tells us that the shipments from these countries I have mentioned will not amount to anything under the favoured nation clause.

Mr. PATERSON. Give the values. You will find them in the list.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). I have not added up the totals. But let me just give one value, namely pork, $114,523.

Mr. PATERSON. From what country?

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). The United States.

Mr. PATERSON. That alters the case.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). The total amounts to over $1,000,000, but I have not had time to add them up.

Mr. PATERSON. Of that amount, how much would come in under the favoured nation clause?

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). The United States is made a favoured nation as well as the others. Before to-day these people had to pay a duty on this pork, yet in the face of that duty they sent it into Canada to the injury of our farmers, and under this agreement they will send in considerably more, and my hon. friend will find how the farmers will resent this policy at the next elections.

WAYS AND MEANS—RECIPROCAL TRADE WITH UNITED STATES.

House again in Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MILLER. When the committee adjourned last night I was making the argument that an arrangement, to be of lasting benefit and permanent, must be a bargain that will give advantages to both sides. Let me give one or two instances to show how the benefits, under the proposed agreement, will accrue both to the United States and Canada. Some time ago I read an address to the right hon. the Prime Minister in pamphlet form against this proposed arrangement, and in that address I noticed particularly some words spoken by Mr. Wm. White, vice-president of the Canadian Pacific railway. Mr. White said:

That the Canadian Pacific railway has had to purchase in Winnipeg for their dining cars chickens from Chicago, and were also importing cream from the United States.

I suppose it is fair to presume that if the Canadian Pacific railway had to buy poultry and cream for use in Winnipeg from the United States, other residents of Winnipeg had to do likewise. This we can readily understand because we know that the farmers around Winnipeg are not engaged in raising dairy products, but rather in growing grain and feeding stock. Had there been no duty, the Winnipeg people would have been able to get their cream and poultry from the United States at so much less. But, Sir, at the very time when the people in Winnipeg were finding it to their advantage to buy poultry and cream in the United States, the farmers of Ontario and Quebec were selling their cream in large quantities to the people of the United States just across the border. The people of the province of Quebec sold in the United States last year, even with a small duty in the way, cream to the value of nearly $1,000,000; and the dairymen of Ontario shipped cream to the United States last year to the value of between $500,000 and $1,000,000. Then, the removal of the duty on this item of cream would be to the advantage of the United States farmers who sell cream and also to the advantage of the Canadian farmers who sell cream as well as to the Canadian and American consumers of this article. Let me mention another similar case . I have here a brief account, which appeared in the Montreal 'Gazette' February 4 last, of a meeting of the Boston Fruit and Produce Exchange, held the day before. It says:

The members of the Boston Fruit and Produce Exchange voted to petition the Massachusetts senators and representatives in Congress to support to-day the Canadian reciprocity agreement. A resolution was adopted declaring that the members heartily commend the terms of the agreement. The resolution points out that thousands of barrels of apples are yearly shipped from Canada to Europe, and expresses the belief that if free trade is established Canadian producers will ship their apples to the middle west, leaving a large portion of the foreign trade to New England farmers.

This is a declaration by the practical fruit growers of the eastern states, that, if this agreement were in force, they would find a better market for their apples, without the competition of Canadian fruit growers, in the markets of Europe, and that the Canadian apple grower would find a market for his fruit in the middle states, thus benefiting the producers of apples in both places, and not raising the price to consumers in either country, but probably having the contrary effect of reducing the prices. The hon. member for North Toronto argued, and several other hon. members have made the same argument, that the reciprocity secured under this agreement will be largely a sectional, occasional reciprocity. The hon. member (Mr. Foster) instanced hay, as an illustration. He said when, in case of drought or for other cause, hay was a short crop in the United States, the Canadian crop of hay would find a market across the line. But he said that if, under such circumstances, the United States required our hay, they would buy it and pay the duty. But he pointed out—and to some extent he was right—that, under this agreement, we not only obtained a market in the United States, but that we give a market in Canada to the people of the United States. This arrangement, in exceptional years and under exceptional circumstances, will have the tendency to regulate prices and to prevent the prices being exorbitant in any part of either country. For instance, I remember, and other members of the House I am sure will not have forgotten, that in 1895 and 1896, in the western part of Ontario, and also extending into the Kingston district and other parts of eastern Ontario, long-continued dry weather caused hay and straw to be very short crops. If, in these two years, we had had no duty upon any hay coming into Ontario from the United States, it would have been a very great benefit to the men who owned cattle on this side of the line at a time when many cattle perished in Canada because of lack of food. The hon. member for North Toronto argued, and others have followed him in this argument also, that the advantage we shall obtain will be a fitful and constantly-changing advantage. Let me read what the hon. gentleman said as to this:

Reciprocity, I think, has this as a prime condition—that it shall be between two countries, each producing a surplus, but a surplus in a different line of articles, and each wanting articles of which the other's surplus is made up. More than that, for ideal reciprocity, this should not be a mere occasional surplus, but should be the result of fixed conditions of climate, soil, and so on, that will make the surplus permanent. Two countries that show ideal conditions of reciprocity in trade would be the West India islands and Canada. The West Indies produce a surplus of tropical fruits, of which we produce none. But they produce absolutely no dairy products, none of the food products of the temperate zone, of which we produce a great surplus. These are examples of two countries between which a reciprocity trade arrangement could be made with great profit. In the same way, reciprocity between us and Great Britain is possible in lines or articles which will readily suggest themselves to the minds of hon. members. But in the case of the arrangement we are now discussing, you are trying to establish reciprocity between two countries, each of which has a surplus, and a surplus of exactly the same products. With the exception of cheese and fish, the United States of America has a surplus of every article which goes from Canada, under this arrangement, into the United States. And not a slim surplus, but in every respect a substantial surplus, and in some respects a very large surplus.

The argument, then, is that in Canada our farmers export to Britain products of the farm; the farmers of the United States export the same thing to the same market and, as they are growers of like produce, and exporters to the same market, this arrangement cannot be of any permanent and steady advantage to Canada. Sir, that is not the case. I will admit, as everybody must admit, that at the present time, the United States is exporting large quantities of certain lines of farm produce. But I argue—and I can substantiate my argument—that the surplus of the United States is very rapidly decreasing, and it will not be very long until that country has no surplus of farm produce to export. My hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) helped me in substantiating this argument. He quoted from the speech of Congressman McCall, who introduced this resolution in the United States Congress, as saying:

> The Canadian surplus of wheat is steadily increasing; ours is steadily diminishing.

That is the fact as to wheat, and it is equally true as to almost every other farm product that the United States is to-day exporting. Let me quote some figures in proof of what I say. I will not go further back than the year 1906, but I give the figures from and including that year, showing the United States exports of farm produce in certain lines:

	$	$	$	$
Cattle	42,081,170	34,577,392	29,339,134	18,046,976
Hogs	630,998	309,440	307,202	144,605
Sheep	804,090	750,242	589,285	365,155
Fresh beef	24,310,038	26,367,287	20,339,377	12,698,594
Canned beef	6,430,446	1,615,808	2,467,895	1,645,822
Salted and pickled beef	4,697,742	3,740,212	3,213,480	3,438,048
Otherwise cured beef	22,063	107,956	106,470	34,319
Fresh pork	1,261,412	1,143,886	1,551,450	938,025
Butter	4,922,913	2,429,489	1,407,962	1,268,210

My hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule), and, I think, also my hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) argued that, while the United States was not exporting as much in live cattle to-day as it did a few years ago, it was exporting chilled and frozen meat in larger quantities than formerly. But the figures prove exactly the contrary. But, Mr. Chairman, if we desired any further evidence as to the falling off in the exports of farm products from the United States, let me refer you to the British Journal of the Board of Agriculture. Speaking of the matter of bacon, this report says that there was a great falling off in the export of bacon from the United States to Britain in the year 1910. There was exported in that year only 1,307,000 hundred weight, as compared with 2,858,000 hundred weight in 1908. Speaking of the matter of cattle, the above report says:

> The past year has seen a further decline in the number of live cattle imported into the United Kingdom, the number received being less than in any year since 1877. Only two countries (apart from the Channel islands) participate in this trade, namely, the United States and Canada, and the diminution in the export is no doubt attributable to the increased demand for cattle in the United States.

Then as to the matter of cheese just referred to by the hon. member for Leeds, this journal speaking of the imports of this item, says:

The supply of cheese showed a small increase, Canada maintaining its position as the principal exporter. An increase is noticeable in the receipts from New Zealand, while those from the United States have now become of little importance.

Speaking again of flour, this British journal says:

The receipts of flour were less than in 1909, owing to a further falling off from the United States.

Then speaking of the British imports of oats, the journal says:

Germany furnishes 2,822,000 hundredweight, while the imports from the United States were insignificant.

So we see from this British authority that the imports of Britain of farm products from the United States is very rapidly decreasing. Let me quote from another authority, I quote this from an address delivered by Professor Cyril Hopkins of the University of Illinois. This address was delivered by Professor Hopkins on the 15th of June last, to an association of bankers in the state of Illinois. Professor Hopkins, speaking of the very matter to which I am referring, the rapidly decreasing export and the rapidly decreasing production of food stuffs in the United States, says this:

If we take two five year averages in relation to our exportation of corn and wheat, the two greatest sources of food stuffs in the United States, taking the average for the last five years in the old country, and compare that with the average of the last five years up to the present time, we have figures that are pretty reliable, and exportation products are weighed, and not guessed at, as you know. The products that go out of the country are determined with a high degree of accuracy. The report on crop statistics within the United States is an estimate, but the exportation is not an estimate, it is weighed product. We find by comparing those two five years averages that the exportation of wheat from this country decreased from 37 per cent to 17 per cent of our total production, over a ten year period. We find that the exportation of corn decreased from 9 per cent to 3 per cent of our total production during the same period. Now, those two sets of statistics ought to mean a good deal to us. Our population has been doubling every thirty years for the last century, and the increase is being maintained at nearly the same rate, so far as we can learn yet. And our exportation has decreased until at the present time we export almost no food stuffs compared with what we produce in America.

Mr. William C. Brown, president of the New York Central lines, in an address delivered to the Railway Business Association on the 10th of last November, said:

If our decrease in exportation continues, and if our increased consumption continues, as compared with our production, before the middle of the next decade the great exporting grain elevators in the sea-board cities will stand empty, and this country, like those of the old world, will be looking for a place to buy the necessities of life.

Now, Sir, these figures mean something to us, as they mean something to the people of the United States. They mean to us that Canada will have an increasing market for her farm products in the United States as the years go by. These figures mean not only that we will have an increased demand for our farm products in the United States, but they mean that the arrangement we are now entering into will be a permanent arrangement. For, Sir, as the years go by, and the United States are less able to produce within their territory the food with which to feed their own people, they will not be so unwise as to cancel an arrangement that enables them to buy food for their people that they will be unable to produce themselves.

Sir, if we will refer to the very able speech made in this House a few evenings ago by the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), we will find that we are just beginning to cultivate the soil of Canada. We will find that there is only a small fractional part of the fertile lands of our northwestern country that has yet been disturbed by the plough. In the years shortly to come we will be producing in Canada a hundred times more farm products than we are producing to-day. But that is not the condition in the United States. Professor Van Heis, of the University of Wisconsin, has recently written a book upon the conservation of the natural resources of the United States; and Professor Van Heis writes as follows:

It is not so many years since we heard the song 'Uncle Sam is rich enough to give us all a farm.' The better part of the public domain has now passed to private parties, and during the closing years of the nineteenth century the land hunger of hundreds of thousands of the citizens of the United States was for the first time unsatisfied.

The hon. member for North Toronto in discussing the matter of natural resources felt justified—and I will not say that he was wrong—in considering the people that are to live in this country a thousand years hence. If any hon. member of this House, in considering the question of the preservation of our resources, is wise in considering the people who shall live in this country a thousand years hence, then surely we are not less wise in considering what shall be our condition ten or fifteen years hence. It is a matter of importance to secure a trade with the United States that will be of great benefit to us at once and of immensely greater benefit to us in ten or fifteen years hence.

Mr. BLAIN. Has my hon. friend the figures of the United States production of wheat in 1908, 1909 and 1910 before him?

Mr. MILLER. No, I have not, but I have given to my hon. friend and the members of the committee the figures of the exports. I have given them the statement that their surplus is decreasing very rapidly year after year.

Mr. BLAIN. The production of wheat in the United States in 1909 was 713,000,000 bushels and in 1908, 648,000,000 bushels, an increase in one year of 65,000,000 bushels.

Mr. MILLER. Yes, but if my hon. friend will take a number of years he will find that the production of wheat in the United States has not been increasing although an increase may be shown by taking an exceptional year. I have pointed out that in one or two other instances the hon. member for North Toronto contradicted his own argument. Let me give the members of the committee a further contradiction, and a very distinct contradiction by that hon. gentleman. He has argued that as Canada is exporting farm products and as the United States is exporting farm products the people of the United States will not require the products of Canadian farms. Then the hon. member for North Toronto in the same speech quotes the following language from President Taft. He says:

> And President Taft, in his message to the United States Congress, says that what the United States must set itself to do is to increase its exports on the line of manufactured goods. That is its future. It cannot expect to make large exportations of food and other products. What we want, he says, is raw material close at hand; what we want is cheap foodstuffs so far as we can get them from the northern country in order that we may be better provided and furnished for this increased product and increased export of the industries of this country, in which our future lies in our record of the world trade.

If any hon. member of this House, whether upon my own side or the other assures me that the United States will not want to buy our farm products, but on the other hand, quotes to me the words of President Taft who says that the people of the United States will want to buy our farm products, I prefer to take the statement, and the opinion of the President of the United States. But, then, Mr. Chairman, there is the mournful argument of Canada becoming the backyard of the United States. I quote from the Toronto 'News' the following clipping from a speech of the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton). The Toronto 'News' gives prominence to this statement of the hon. member. It is printed in large black type and the item is headed 'Backyard of Chicago:'

> I cannot tell you how I feel about this country being made the backyard of the city of Chicago—Hon. Clifford Sifton.

Sir, I happen to own a little backyard behind my own residence, and if somebody will find in that back yard a gold mine or a diamond mine that will make me rich I will not be particular if you call it a backyard or what you call it. That argument has been made by a great many persons. The states of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Nebraska, Kansas, Missouri and the other western and middle western states were once in the same way the backyard of the Atlantic manufacturing states of the American union. But while they were in the same sense the backyard of the manufacturing states of the union they grew farm products which they shipped and sold to the manufacturing states of the union, and with what result? While they were thus the backyard of the manufacturing states of the union, the land in these states to which I have referred, which was worth $5 or $6 per acre forty or fifty years ago, is worth to-day $100 or $200 an acre simply for agricultural purposes. You may call the western plains of Canada, you may call the farms of Quebec, of Ontario, of the maritime provinces, backyards if you like, but if you can make the value of these backyards $100 or $200 per acre for growing food products that shall be sent to the very same markets to which these western states that I have spoken of have sold their farm products, if the result will be the same—and who will say that it will not be—then I say that the backyard argument has no force at all. Sir, I have said that these states of Illinois, Indiana, and other western and middle western states became prosperous and their lands increased in value while they grew food products for the manufacturing states. But while they were growing these food products they became manufacturing states as well, and they built up within their territory such cities as the very city mentioned by the hon. member for Brandon, the city of Chicago, a great manufacturing city, St. Paul, Minneapolis, Omaha, and all the other large manufacturing cities that are now situated in what was once a purely agricultural district of the United States. The same thing will be true of the western plains of Canada, and the same thing will be true, even more largely than it is true to-day, that as the farmers of the several provinces of Canada prosper, grow wealthy and add to the value of their soil, by cultivation, as their prosperity increases, as the value of their property increases, and as the population of these districts increase they will build up flourishing manufacturing cities and centres, and will not deserve, as they do not now deserve, the term of backyard to the United States.

I am told that under this agreement the railway interests will suffer. Well, Sir, I take it that the railways of Canada were built for men, and not men for the railways. If either has to suffer, Canadian railways or Canadian men, then I prefer to let the railways suffer, but I do not think there is any evidence at all that the Canadian railways, upon which we have spent a great deal of money, which have done a useful work for Canada, and which are doing it well, will suffer as a result of this agreement. My hon. friend from Humboldt (Mr. Neely), in a speech which he made in this House, pointed to the fact, as other hon. gentlemen have since done, that the Canadian Pacific Railway stock is soaring to-day, that Canadian Pacific railway is worth $25 per share more than it was when we began to discuss this resolution. What does that mean? It means that Canadian business men, that United States business men, that the business men of the British Empire and the business men of Holland, in all of which countries Canadian Pacific Railway stock is held, have not one single bit of confidence in that argument, and do not attach any importance to the statement that Canadian railway interests will suffer by this proposal. My hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) quoted the opinion of Sir Donald Mann as to the effect of it upon the large railway line in which he is interested. We have had a woeful letter from Sir William Van Horne.

Mr. BRADBURY. Does the hon. gentleman say that Canadian Pacific Railway stock has advanced $25 per share since we started the discussion of this question?

Mr. MILLER. That is what I did say. I think that Canadian Pacific railway, when this resolution was first spoken of, was about 185; to-day it is worth 214.

Mr. BRADBURY. I would like to say to the hon. gentleman that he is entirely mistaken.

Mr. MILLER. I will not dispute with the hon. gentleman as to the exact figures, but he will admit that Canadian Pacific railway stock has very rapidly increased in value since the resolution was introduced into this House.

Mr. LALOR. That is hedging the question.

Mr. MILLER. I have referred to the dcleful letter of Sir Wm. Van Horne, and in contradistinction to that let me quote what was said by Mr. Thomas Skinner, the English director of the Canadian Pacific railway, as published in the Montreal 'Gazette' of the 4th of February:

Thomas Skinner, the English director of the Canadian Pacific railway, in an interview confesses that he views the agreement with mixed feelings. If ratified, he said, the agreement would have a disturbing effect on the Transcontinental railway, but the growth and development of the northwestern provinces of Canada were so great and rapid that he had no misgivings that this would more than meet the change arising from the agreement. On the whole, Mr. Skinner thought this agreement advantageous to Canada, and though politically somewhat dangerous he was perfectly confident of Canada's loyalty to the mother country.

Mr. James J. Hill was speaking a few months ago as to the present condition of United States railways, and he said it would take an immediate cash expenditure of six billion dollars to put the American railways in such shape as that they could properly carry the traffic there is for them to carry. And such will be the condition of Canadian railways. As Mr. Skinner has said, with the development of our western country, all our present existing railways would be overtaxed and we would have to have new railway lines. It has been urged by some, and I think it was stated in the letter of Sir Wm. Van Horne, that Mr. Hill's roads have now their noses resting on the international boundary line ready to cross into Canada and take Canadian trade to the south. But I would ask Sir Wm. Van Horne at how many places does the Canadian Pacific railway cross the international line for the purpose of carrying trade from Canada into the United States? Hon. members on the other side, and opponents of this measure in the country have a great deal of concern as to our natural resources. The member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) says:

That is the policy shining out in every line and article of this proposed agreement. The United States knows what it is after. With a tariff wall against the world, desiring to preserve its own unused natural resources so far as it can, dipping into the natural resources of Canada so far as it may be able to, fortifying itself by the conservation of its own and by the destruction of ours, making itself the great manufacturing country of the world and increasing its wealth and its power in that way.

Sir, the hon. member for North Toronto was wise enough not to argue that we in Canada have any control whatever over the United States tariff. For many years rough sawn lumber has been admitted free of duty from the United States into Canada, and I do not know that we ever had a custom tariff on lumber entering this Dominion. Every member of this House must realize that the United States have quite as good a right to place lumber on their free list as we have to keep it on our free list, and if the United States have the right to place lumber on their free list then they have the right to place on that free list every other natural product we have in Canada. But the member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) made this argument. He said:

If this agreement goes into force, a year from now this government may find, and the Conservation Commission may advise this government that certain of our natural resources should not be exported except under such and such conditions, or that they ought not to be exported at all, or that such of them as are made should be made under regulations and made in this country alone. As we are now we have a perfect right to pass that legislation; we have given bonds to nobody.

That is a perfectly fair statement of the case; that while this parliament has no right whatever to interfere with the tariff of the United States we have the power, and if we choose to exercise it the right to impose export duties or to prevent or impede export of any of our natural resources. But while we have that power and right I will ask the member for North Toronto and every other member on that side of the House whether they think they would now, or in one year, or fifty years hence, advise the Canadian government to take that action. Sir, that is a game at which two can play. I do not think it wise for us to provoke such a war as that. If the government of the United States, of their own initiative, should prevent the export of their raw products it would be our part as men to meet them and checkmate them, and act as independently as they; but, Sir, the United States are not making any attempt to pass any such legislation, or to in any such way restrict the export of their natural resources. I have quoted from the work of Prof. Van Heiss on the conservation of the natural resources of the United States, and in that work he advises that it might be best for the United States to prohibit the export of many of their minerals especially, and other of their raw materials. And what would be the consequence? As I go through my own province of Ontario I find Ontario builders using Georgia pine. I have no doubt we could get along without that particular kind of lumber, but our builders use it because they find it convenient and profitable to use it. Canadian furniture manufacturers use large quantities of oak imported from the United States and not grown in Canada.

Last summer I was at Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario, in the very large works of the Iron and Steel Company there. I saw their vessels bringing in United States ore which they mixed with Canadian ore to produce a better product. Their vessels were also bringing in immense quantities of United States coal, not obtainable in Ontario. How would this company, paying wages to many hundreds of workmen in Ontario, and other similar Canadian concerns exist with the United States prohibiting the export of its raw products? I go through the cement factories in the province of Ontario and I find them using United States coal and United States coke. I ask the members of this House who have knowledge of the subject how they think these Ontario cement companies could continue their business if they were deprived of the use of that coal and coke? In different parts of Canada there are large cotton factories, and we cannot grow cotton in any part of Canada, and if the United States prohibited the export of cotton these mills would have to shut down. Last night my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Lloyd Harris) said it ought not to be the policy of Canada to permit the export of unfinished products, but here are several instances in which the United States does permit the export from its territory to ours of raw products, so that we may make the finished article. Also, in the case of imported corn from the United States; the hon. member (Mr. Lloyd Harris) would not permit the Canadian farmer to sell his low grade wheat or barley, but would compel him, by legislation, to feed it to his stock on the farm. But the Canadian farmer to-day is importing corn grown in the States, just because the Canadian farmer finds it many times the cheapest food he can feed to his animals. The natural resource of which we are in the greatest danger of being deprived is our timber, and I would call attention to the fact that in 1899, three years after the Laurier administration assumed the care of the business affairs of Canada, they established a forestry branch, and through our Canadian forestry branch we are now encouraging the planting and preventing the annual loss of more timber than we are likely each year to export to the United States. Let me point to another contradiction in the speech of the hon. member to whom I have so often referred. The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), after pointing out that the Canadian government is thus encouraging the depleting of our national resources, then argues that the United States would have reduced their tariff any way whether we had taken any action or not. He says:

That insurgent force that swept the Republicans out of power was pledged to a diminution of the tariff especially on food stuffs. The Republican party in that position, the Democratic party were pledged to a revision downward of the tariff especially on food stuffs. It was known by all men that the coming Congress soon to go into power would deal with that matter and it was known that it would deal with it in the line of taking off and diminishing duties especially upon natural resources and food stuffs. No one can deny that.

If no one can deny that, and no one has denied that the United States would have so reduced or taken off the duties, then how can any man blame this government for what it is said the United States would have done anyway? I do not know whether the United States would or would not have done so, but that is the argument that is made by our friends on the other side and they cannot argue along both lines. We have heard a good deal of the word trustees and our friends opposite have argued that we, the people of this day, and especially the government of this day are the trustees for the Canadian people, and that as trustees we ought to preserve to the people of Canada the natural resources of our own Dominion. Sir, if we are trustees in 1911 for the people who shall live in Canada a thousand years from now, was not the hon. member for North Toronto equally a trustee of the Canadian people in 1891, was not Sir John Macdonald equally a trustee of the Canadian people in 1891, and was not Sir John Macdonald equally a trustee of the Canadian people in 1871, when he proposed just such an agreement as this? And Sir, will it make any difference to the people who live in Canada one thousand years from now whether such a bargain as this was made in 1911 or in 1891?

I have spoken of members blaming the government. It is the business of the opposition to blame the government, and they are very diligent in exercising that function. The leader of the opposition, in the speech which he made on the 26th of January, blamed the government, and particularly the Minister of Finance, and the Minister of Customs, for what he termed their surrender last year, in 1910. The language of the leader of the opposition was as follows:

> The negotiations, in short, (that is the negotiations of this date) are a sequel to the surrender which this government made last year. I am, at the same time, of the opinion that if they had resisted firmly the government of the United States would never have imposed this maximum tariff against Canada.

That is the opinion of the leader of the opposition. It is the opinion of a political partisan, as we are all political partisans. If I expressed a contrary opinion that would also be the opinion of a partisan. But as to the negotiations in question let me quote the opinion of a man who is not a partisan; I refer to a work recently published by Professor T. W. Taussig, Henry Lee, professor of economics in Harward University, entitled: 'The Tariff History of the United States'. Professor Taussig, speaking of these very negotiations, says:

> Negotiations with Germany and France led to some relaxations of their duties and regulations as to American products; and, in true mercantile spirit, these were held forth as great gains to American industry, and inferentially as causes of detriment to the foreign countries concerned. Negotiations with Canada led to but the slightest concessions. That country refused, as already stated, to modify her regulations as to wood pulp, or to make any changes of moment in her general tariff system. Some minor changes were secured, which enabled the administration to make a respectable show of having gained something in the way of lower duties; and a tariff war, which at one time seemed probable, was averted.

The statement of Professor Taussig exactly agrees with the statement of the Minister of Finance that President Taft was friendly to Canada, that he did not desire to impose the maximum tariff, that under the circumstances there was nothing else left for him to do, and that a tariff war was inevitable unless we afforded President Taft some shadow of an excuse that might enable him to avert that tariff war and by making slight concessions, termed by Professor Taussig minor concessions, we made changes that did no harm to any man in Canada, that did no good to any man in the United States, so far as the economic aspect was concerned, but that gave President Taft the excuse he desired to avert a tariff war, which I am sure every man in Canada, whatever his politics, would say, would have been unwise and would have been a calamity.

Now, Sir, I come to the attitude towards this proposal of our Canadian manufacturers. The manufacturers of Canada are making a very strong appeal to-day. They made a very strong appeal to Sir Wilfrid Laurier and we found that appeal in the Montreal 'Star' a few weeks ago. That article which first appeared as a paid advertisement in the Montreal 'Star' has since then appeared as a paid advertisement in many other newspapers. We have had articles in the Canadian 'Century', and articles clipped from the Canadian 'Century' have appeared in the local press from one end of this Dominion to the other, also as paid advertisements. The Toronto 'News' has contained editorials and other articles in opposition to the treaty and let me read a part of a circular dated February 8, that was recently sent to an Ontario manufacturer from the office of the Toronto 'News:'

> We are devoting considerable space daily, both in our news columns and editorially, to this question, and we have taken the liberty of placing your name on our mailing sheets for one month. No charge will be made for the paper, but we hope you will be able to find time to read it each day.

I was lately in an Ontario factory, and in the office of that factory I saw several hundred pamphlets, neatly and attractively bound, containing speeches in opposition to this proposal, delivered by Mr. Russell. These were sent out by hundreds not only to this factory but, I suppose, to every factory in Canada for free distribution among the workmen in the factories. By these means and by expending many, many thousands of dollars in printer's ink, and paid advertisements, the opponents of this proposed agreement have sought to create and have for a little while created a public opinion in opposition to this proposed arrangement. Let me say that this public opinion that has been created by the expending of so many dollars in printer's ink and newspaper advertising is but a temporary public opinion, it is frothy and on the surface and will not have any lasting effect in influencing the judgment of the Canadian people.

Now, Sir, I have not the slightest prejudice against Canadian manufacturers. We have in Canada great natural resources. We have great forest wealth, we have great mineral wealth, and there is no country in the world with greater water-powers. But we have something better than forests and mines and water-powers, we have men of manufacturing skill and ability, of business ability and of commercial enterprise. We have men of inventive genius, and, I am glad to say, of large capital, and there is no reason why Canada should not become a great manufacturing nation. My hon. friend from Hastings (Mr. Northrup) I think it was, said yesterday that no one could intelligently argue this matter without putting the manufacturers on one side and the farmers on the other. In that I do not agree with him. In my opinion, if this arrangement will benefit the farmers, it will also benefit our manufacturers. I have no patience at all with those who call manufacturers thieves and robbers, who say that they are parasites preying upon the people. I respect a man, be he manufacturer or farmer, who is doing an honest day's work for an honest day's pay, and helping to build up this country. Some manufacturers are charged with being selfish and no doubt they are, just as are some of our farmers, and some of our members of parliament; and it may be that the manufacturers, through the manufacturers' association, occasionally give prominence to their selfish instinct. But while we require revenues for the building up of our great public enterprises—for the building of the Hudson Bay railway, the Georgian Bay canal, the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Welland canal, for the extension and improvement of our rural postal system, for everything necessary to develop this great country—while we require revenues for these purposes, I believe it will be the will of the Canadian people, for many generations at least, that a large part of this money shall be raised by means of a customs duty. While this is the case, we ought to regulate our tariff and collect our duties in such a manner as will afford reasonable protection to the manufacturers and other industries throughout the limits of our Dominion. But where or how, under this proposed arrangement are manufacturers hit? If I refer again to the Toronto 'News,' and its report of the speech of the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton), and if I were to accept his statement, I might be led to conclude that our manufacturers are being hit. Well, I have great respect for the hon. gentleman, and that respect is not diminished because he has chosen to leave his party on this occasion. That is the right of every one sitting on either side of the House. I remember the time when, in his palmy days, the hon. gentleman had a good deal of influence in Canada; I remember when the name of Sifton was one to conjure with, but I do not agree in everything he said a few evenings ago. I find in the Toronto 'News' this quotatioin from his speech:

> Let me enumerate what I think will be a few of those effects. Some industries will be destroyed, there can be no doubt about that. What reason can be given for drawing your pen through an item of the tariff and shutting up an industry which is not accused of combining as against consumers, which is not accused of charging illicit prices or of any other evils; what reason can there be for selecting that industry and wiping it out of existence I cannot see. I am bound to say that it does not appeal to my common sense.

In reply to this, I will say that had my hon. friend made his customary use of his common sense, he would not have indulged in any such language. He said that some industries will be destroyed. What industries? What reason had he for stating this? He asked what reason can be given for wiping an industry out of existence? Well, I cannot see that any industry will be wiped out of existence under this arrangement. What manufacturing or other industry will even have its profits lessened by this proposed arrangement?

Mr. BLAIN. What about the salt industry?

Mr. MILLER. That is not a fresh question nor is it a large industry. The manufacturers themselves do not go nearly so far as my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Sifton) did. I have referred to the appeal to Sir Wilfrid Laurier which appeared some time ago in the Montreal 'Star.' In that appeal the 'Star' says:

> So they disarmed suspicion by not betraying any great greed in 'taking,' and then deftly secured the assent of our representatives to a 'gift' of such far-reaching effects that it engulfs our commercial independenec and endangers our national existence.

Then the 'Star' says in that appeal:

> Oh! but the tariff on manufactured goods remains, it may be said, for the present it does.

The manufacturers therefore, admit that they have not been hurt and the tariff has not been changed in any way to do them injury. Evidently, the troubles that afflict our manufacturing friends are not real but imaginary. I do not believe that our Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has the slightest intention of making any bargain that will operate to the detriment of any manufacturing concern in this Dominion. I believe further that hon. members on this side would not support the government in any attempt to do material injury to Canadian manufacturers. In my opinion the manufacturers of Canada will be helped by this agreement. They will be helped in this way. As you help the farmers, as you more thickly populate our western country, as you give the farmers better prices and better markets for this produce, you make them better purchasers of manufactured products. In helping the farmer, you enable him to buy more manufactured goods and of better quality and pay better prices.

My hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) referring to the American newspapers said:

To-day, when I read the American papers and scan the American speeches, and look at the American arguments, I do not find that they are saying very much as to the employment of American capital in the establishing of American industries in Canada. In the past and present condition of things we have noticed that as a factor, and a very important one, in the development of this country. It is stated, and I think without doubt, that at least $226,000,000 have been transferred in equipment and plant from factories in the United States towards the establishment of branch factories in the Dominion.

My hon. friend did not of course find it possible to read all the American newspapers, and I would draw his attention to the South Bend 'Tribune,' published in South Bend, Indiana, on the 30th of January last. This gives an account of an interview with Mr. Oliver, who is at the head of the largest plough works in the wide world:

According to Mr. Oliver, the reciprocity measure introduced in Congress last Thursday does not affect his concern to such an extent that he should show more than passing interest in the legislation and consequently the plans of the Oliver industry relative to Hamilton will not be changed in the slightest degree. Should the measure as now constituted become a law the duty on ploughs would be lessened only from two and one-half to five per cent, the intention being to reduce the tariff from 17½ and 20 per cent to 15 per cent. This charge it appears is too small to warrant the Olivers altering their plans at Hamilton.

'The reciprocity treaty does not affect us,' said Mr. Oliver, 'and there is absolutely no truth sent out in the report from Ottawa that we have ordered work stopped on our Hamilton plant. We will go ahead with all our plans in the spring and rush our factory to completion. The proposed change in the tariff on ploughs is so small as not to affect us.'

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. MILLER. I agree with every member of this House and every citizen of Canada that we like to see American capital brought in to establish industries in this country. But, if I am to make a choice as between a large factory built in Canada with United States capital, and a large factory built in Canada with Canadian capital, I will every time choose the latter. And why? Because every manufacturing establishment is built to secure to the owners a net profit. In the case of a factory backed by American capital it is true, money from outside will be spent in erecting the building and paying wages, but the net profit from that American institution will be taken to the United States to further develop that country, while in the case of the factory built with Canadian capital, the net profit will remain in Canada for the development of our own country.

Sir, on a recent visit to my own Ontario town of Hanover, I found that the Knechtel Furniture Co., was about to construct a new factory to build a new line of goods. I was informed also that the Spiesz Furniture Co. was preparing to build, next year, a large addition to its present works. The Hanover Specialty Works are making plans for a large extension of their plant. And it was rumoured on the street, whether truly or not, I do not know, that Mr. Ball, who was my opponent in the last election and will be my opponent in the next election should I run again, is intending to build next summer a large addition to his factory. In Neustadt, another town in my riding, six miles south of Hanover, a large chair factory that is in operation there intends to construct a large addition to its works. Also the Durham Furniture Co. in South Grey intend greatly extending their works next year. And this sort of thing is not confined to the towns of South Grey alone, but applies to every other manufacturing town in the province of Ontario.

Mr. BLAIN. If I may be permitted, would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Miller) state whether the manufacturers he has referred to are in favour of this trade arrangement or not?

Mr. MILLER. I will come to that, and I will tell my hon. friend (Mr. Blain) exactly what they say about it, most of them. What does this development of manufacturers show? Whatever may be the effect upon United States manufacturers, the Ontario manufacturers who fully understand the situation, are not alarmed by this agreement, nor do they believe that it will cripple their business or lessen their profits. But there are other factories in Canada that will be helped by this agreement. I refer to the barns, the stables and the silos of the Canadian farmers. I refer to the tile-draining that is to be put down by the Canadian farmers. I say that the Canadian farm is a Canadian manufactory and is manufacturing products that bring greater wealth to the Dominion than do even the products of the factories which we usually call factories.

Is it true that United States manufacturers are in doubt to-day about coming to Canada to start branch factories here? If they are timid, why are they timid? The blame is not to the government, the blame is not to the friends of this measure; but the blame is to the opponents of this measure who are creating a panic by their unfounded cries and unreasoning alarms; these are the men who are keeping American capitalists from investing their money in this country.

Speaking of the Oliver Plough Works brings me especially to the matter of agricultural implements, concerning which we heard a great deal from the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Harris) last night. Now, I would like to know where our hon. friends on the other side really stand as to this matter of agricultural implements?

Mr. LALOR. Where do you stand on that question?

Mr. MILLER. I am always willing to tell the hon. member where I stand. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) speaking in this House on the 26th January, and referring to the reductions proposed to be made on agricultural implements, said that he did not believe the change proposed would yield the slightest iota of relief to any farming population in this country. At that time, he appeared to think the occasion demanded relief, but said that the reduction of two and a half per cent and five per cent was not sufficient relief. I remember when, a couple of years ago, the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner), a Conservative, introduced a resolution in this House to reduce the tariff on agricultural implements to ten per cent. But my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, who to-day tells us that a reduction of two and one half per cent and five per cent following a similar reduction made two or three years ago, will not give sufficient relief, when the hon. member for Souris, two years ago, moved his resolution to reduce the duty to 10 per cent, voted against that resolution. If he thinks two and half per cent to five per cent repeated is not sufficient reduction, and if he thought that the 10 per cent reduction proposed by the hon. member for Souris is too much, I would like to know where he stands.

Mr. BRADBURY. I would like to know how the hon. member himself voted on that resolution.

Mr. MILLER. I will tell my hon. friend (Mr. Bradbury) frankly that I voted the same way as his leader (Mr. Borden, Halifax) did, and I would so vote again. If hon. members ask how I voted, and what I think of the duty. I reply that I think exactly as the 'Farmers Advocate' does upon this subject. The 'Farmers Advocate' is, perhaps, the leading farm journal published in Canada. It welcomed some reduction in the duty on farm implements, but said in an article on this very subject: It is hardly fair to single out any one industry for sacrifice. And with that I quite agree. I quite agree in the policy of a reasonable reduction, but I do not think it would be right to single out that interest and make a sacrifice of it. The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Harris) last night, said: If this government is to be opposed to manufacturing in Canada, I will have to remove myself from Canada.

Well, the hon. gentleman need not remove himself, even though the company to which he belonged a little while ago did remove a large part of its capital from Canada to the State of New York. The Massey-Harris Company, of which my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Harris), for whom I have great respect, is a member, has made a very large amount of money in manufacturing in Canada a very good class of agricultural implements. With the money they made from Canadian farmers they recently purchased in Batavia, New York, a plant that cost them, I think, something more than a million dollars—several millions, I am informed. That was before this proposal had been made, before my hon. friends the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs had gone to Washington, or had thought of going to Washington. I think that the government of Canada had a fair warrant and a good reason for making a slight reduction in the duty on agricultural implements when they saw the evidences that appeared about them on every hand. If a Brantford agricultural implement manufacturing concern can take its capital and compete in the United States against its United States rivals, without even one per cent of protection, surely they can compete, as Mr. Oliver says, they can in Canada, with a protection of fifteen per cent. Then let me say that in the very city from which the hon. member for Brantford comes, the Cockshutt firm, manufacturing ploughs, have for some time been sending Canadian ploughs into the United States and selling them at a profit in large numbers, in spite of the duty they have to pay.

Sir, I do not know where the opposition stands in the matter of agricultural implements and the duty thereon. I do know what the government has done. The government reduced the duty from two and a half to five per cent two or three years ago, and they have reduced the duty again this year, or will by this proposal, a further two and a half to five per cent. If any one were to ask me what is the position of the Hon. Mr. Borden on this question I would say: Well, I do not know. If a manufacturer asked me if I thought that Mr. Borden would be an advocate of a greater reduction, I would say: Well, by his speeches in the House I would think that he would. But if a farmer should ask me what Mr. Borden would have done, I would say: Well, by the vote he gave upon the resolution of the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, I would think that he would be opposed to any reduction. I do not know, I am sure, where he is, because he seems to speak in one way and vote another.

Let me now touch upon the question of loyalty. The poet Cowper, in his poem, I believe it is in 'The Task,' says:

> Patriots are grown too shrewd to be sincere,
> And we too wise to trust them.

Dr. Johnston said: 'Patriotism is the last refuge of a scoundrel.' Sir, I do not believe that all are insincere scoundrels, who, in this day, are crying loyalty and waving the flag, but some of them are. I say there are men who are loyal to-day for financial gain, that there are other men to-day who are loyal for political profit and advantage, and I say further, that there is another class of men who are loyal to-day, really and sincerely loyal, but who are nervous and frightened by the panic that our friends of the opposition endeavour to create. I say further that he who will readily wave his country's flag for material gain, or for political advantage, will not always be the last to trample it in the dust for a like consideration. Let us not make too cheap the flag for which our fathers fought, some of them, and for which we would be willing to fight again. We are all loyal on both sides of the House, Grits and Tories in Canada are loyal, and let us not talk or speak otherwise. Sir, the agriculturists in Canada—and my hon. friend from Lambton, if he were here, would agree with this—know that some years ago the British government imposed on Canadian cattle what is called the embargo. We know that the British government years ago, by that embargo, barred out live cattle. They did it to protect their own agriculturists, and they maintained it to protect the British farmer and the British breeder of livestock. Sir, we do not quarrel with them; we do not say that the people of Britain are not loyal because they do that; but we do say that if the government of Britain seeks to protect its cattle raisers and cattle breeders by imposing and maintaining that embargo, they are far too fair and generous, and far too sensible, to blame the Canadian government for endeavouring to protect the interests of Canadian farmers as they do under this agreement. My hon. friend opposite asked me about the manufacturers in my own town. Let me read him a letter from a German Canadian manufacturer in the riding of North Waterloo. This man says:

> I still have confidence that the future of this great country of ours is safe in the hands of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his followers at Ottawa, and I believe the Liberals of North Waterloo—which is a large manufacturing district—feel the same as I do, that the reciprocity agreement with the United States will be a good thing for Canada as a whole. I do not for a moment believe in the blue ruin cry, and that Canada, by entering into a freer trade arrangement with our cousins to the south of us, will in the end become part of that country. The German-Canadians of North Waterloo will remain loyal to the British Empire no matter if we have free trade with the United States or a high tariff wall. Annexation has nothing whatever to do with this undertaking.

Sir, I commend these words of a German Canadian, whose fathers and forefathers spoke not the English language; I commend the loyalty of this German Canadian to my friends of the opposition, of British parentage, whose fathers came from the old land. The letter of this German Canadian expresses, I believe, the sentiments and the feelings of German Canadians generally, and I say that the loyalty of this German puts to shame the fears and anxieties of our British Canadian friends on the other side of this House. I see before me on the opposition benches men who are engaged in agriculture, men who are engaged in businesses of different kinds, and I ask if there is one of them who will to-day admit and confess that if he sells in the United States market an article for which he can find there a higher price than he could anywhere else, will that make him less loyal? Will it make him feel like severing the ties that bind him to the British flag? If any hon. gentleman opposite can purchase an article he desires in the United States market to better advantage than he can purchase it in any other market, will it make him less loyal? If there is such a member on the opposite benches, I would like him to stand up for a moment that we may gaze upon him, and see what manner of man he is. Not one Conservative in this House, not one opponent of this agreement in this House, will make any such admission as that. I say ask them how these men dare to insult the people they represent, how they dare insult the people of their constituencies, by thinking for a moment, by saying with their tongue, that the men whom they represent are less loyal than they themselves?

Sir, I say that this trade arrangement will help the farmers of Canada, and with this argument I close my speech. The opponents of this measure say that the hon. the Minister of Finance and the hon. the Minister of Customs ought to have shown in greater detail what will be the results of the working out of this proposed agreement. It is impossible to give statistics that any one can say will turn out to be correct, because this agreement will affect different parts of Canada in different ways, and it will affect Canada differently in different years and under different circumstances. We are like a man who is looking out for an opening for his business. He goes to a place where everything would indicate that there is a good opening. He cannot tell what his first year's sales will be, and what his second year's sales will be; but he says: The conditions appear to be good, and I know that I can do a good business here, and here is where I am going to locate.

Now I know that the hon. member for North Toronto, when he was Finance Minister entertained the House and the country oftentimes with very neatly compiled and tabulated figures which he called statistics. They might better oftentimes have been called guesses and my hon. friend was frequently a bad guesser. My hon. friends opposite, say that this agreement will not benefit the farmers, but I say, Sir, that it is worth noting that there is not a Canadian farm paper published in any province in Canada that is devoted to the interests of agriculture, that is not upholding this agreement, and is not in favour of its being completed. The hon. member for St. Antoine, Montreal (Mr. Ames) says that you cannot protect the manufacturers of this country and not protect the farmers, that if you do not protect the farmers, they will demand, and you will have to yield to their demand, that every vestige of protection be taken from the manufacturer. I can understand that you can protect the Canadian manufacturer to some extent and to a great extent, it may be, but I say that a protective tariff upon food stuff would be just as much use to the Canadian farmer as a coon skin coat would be to the hon. member for St. Antoine on a July day with the thermometer at a hundred in the shade.

This agreement will give to the Canadian farmer additional markets. It will not deprive him of one single market that he has to-day. We grant subsidies to-day to steamship lines running to every distant part of the globe, and if we do all that, surely we cannot justify it and refuse to make every effort to trade with our nearest neighbours. Let me read to you—and I will not weary you with long figures—a statement of the subsidies we are paying to-day to assist steamship lines running to these several different countries:

France, at the rate of $100,000 per annum for 18 voyages, not to exceed $133,333.33	$100,000 00
New Zealand	50,000 00
Australia	180,509 00
Mexico (T. H. Worsnop)	50,000 00
Mexico (Elder, Demspter & Co.)	125,000 00
China and Japan	48,666 66
South Africa	146,000 00
West Indies and South America	79,500 00
Cuba	25,000 00
Jamaica	13,800 00
Newfoundland (Reid, Newfoundland Co'y)	18,000 00
Newfoundland (Pickford & Black)	4,000 00
Victoria (San Francisco)	3,000 00

Making a total in steamship subsidies to countries other than Great Britain of $843,475 a year. In addition to these annual subsidies to steamship lines, we have trade commissioners in the Argentine Republic, Australia, British West Indies, China, Cuba, France, Germany, Holland, Japan, Mexico, Newfoundland, New Zealand, and South Africa and Canadian commercial agents in Jamaica, Trinidad, Bahamas, Colombia and Norway. In addition to paying the salaries of these trade commissioners and commercial agents and the expenses of their offices, we also, through the Department of Agriculture, maintain at very great expense, Canadian exhibits wherever there is a large world exhibition in any part of the globe. We have had exhibits in Japan, Belgium, Italy, Scotland and other countries. Not one single member of this House has made any objection to the payment of these steamship subsidies, not one member of this House has made any objection to the establishing of these commercial agencies, not one member of this House has made any objection to the expenditure for the making of Canadian exhibits. The hon. member for Brandon was a member of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's cabinet when these steamship subsidies were agreed to, when these paid agencies were established, and yet the hon. member for Brandon, while he was a cabinet minister and since he was a cabinet minister, has made no objection whatever to any of these expenditures. Now, Sir, if it be common sense, if it be good business to pay out these tremendous sums of money for steamship subsidies, for trade agencies and to maintain Canadian exhibits in different parts of the world, why in the name of common sense is it not good business, is it not good economy, is it not good politics, to make every possible effort, although without that large expenditure, to trade with our nearest neighbours, especially as our nearest neighbours are a very populous and wealthy people, who can afford to buy and pay good prices for that which we produce and that which we have to sell?

I have said that this agreement will benefit the farmers. My hon. friends opposite endeavoured to make a point against my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) yesterday, by saying that he had referred to the grain growers and the fruit growers of Canada as wolves. He did nothing of the kind. Sir, my right hon. friend the Prime Minister saw wolves nearer to him than the fruit growers or the grain growers of the west. He saw wolves sitting on the opposition benches and their wails and cries and howlings have been heard now for many, many weeks.

An hon. MEMBER. A few over there, too.

Mr. MILLER. Well no, there are no wolves, but there are for the moment, some two or three sheep in wolves' clothing. I have said that the proposed trade arrangement will increase the price of wheat to the farmer in the west. That has been denied and it has been argued the other way. A few years ago a personal friend of mine, who was in the employ of the Customs Department, had just come down from doing duty along the southern line of Saskatchewan and the international line between Manitoba and the United States. That gentleman told me when he came back to Ontario, that a great many Canadian farmers living near enough to the American line, were smuggling their wheat from Canada, and selling it to the United States elevators in Dakota. Why? —not because the price of wheat was quoted higher on the American market than on the Canadian, but because dishonest Canadian elevator men were falsely grading their wheat and the Canadian prairie farmer was obliged to sell wheat that was really No. 1 at the price of No. 2 or 3 because it was given a lower grade by the elevator man, while by smuggling his wheat across the line the Canadian farmer escaped the false grading and got 10 or 12 cents a bushel more for his wheat on the American side than he could get on the Canadian side. I leave it to hon. members from the west to say whether or not this practice has been pursued by the elevator combine.

The hon. member for St. Antoine, Montreal, said that this agreement would destroy the identity of our exports. It will not destroy the identity of our exports. The hon. member for St. Antoine, Montreal, is a manufacturer of boots and shoes. He knows that there are some men, whether they are right or wrong, who prefer an American shoe to a Canadian shoe, but they will not buy an American shoe, simply because they know it is an American shoe. They realize that there are good American shoes and there are very inferior American shoes. The Canadian buyer, who wants an American shoe, wants one with a brand or name on, that he knows is the brand or name of a superior shoe. So, if any of my friends desire a bottle of English pickles, it will not be enough to know that it is an English pickle; they want to know if it has the label of Crosse & Blackwell, which is an assurance that it is a superior article. The Canadian shipper of superior Canadian product gets a good price in the British market, because of the individual brand that his produce bears when he exports it.

It is said that this arrangement will destroy the market of the Ontario and Quebec horse breeder in the Canadian west. Well, I do not believe that. At present, and may be for a few years to come, the Ontario and Quebec horse breeders will have a market in the Canadian west, but how long will that continue? We know there is no country in the world better adapted for the raising of horses than the prairies of the west, and we know that the farmers there are paying a great deal of attention to the industry, and it will only be a few years when the Canadian west will have horses to sell rather than horses to buy. And then, how important will it be to the horse breeders of Ontario and Quebec, and of Canada generally to have the advantage of the tremendous markets afforded by the large cities of the United States. This arrangement will benefit the raiser of Canadian cattle and Canadian lambs. It will also benefit the man who raises barley in Canada. The hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) and the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Lloyd Harris) told us that the Canadian farmer ought not to sell his barley and low grade wheat, but rather feed it to his stock. Well, while these two gentlemen may be good business men and while the one may be a clever manufacturer and the other a clever lawyer, I think it would be better for them not to oblige the Canadian farmer by legislation to do anything he does not wish to do with the produce he raises. I think we may give the Canadian farmer credit for having enough intelligence to know whether it would be better for him to sell his grain or to feed it. I would remind these two hon. gentlemen that possibly the Canadian farmer would have enough business ability and intelligence to realize that it is to his profit to sell his barley, and to buy American corn with the money he gets, and feed his animals just as well with the corn, and have a good cash balance left in his pockets besides. My hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Taylor) spoke of the purchase by Canada of United States cheese, and he pointed out that Canada buys cheese from Britain and some of the countries of continental Europe, but the hon. gentleman knows that the cheese bought by Canada is not similar to the cheese that Canada produces.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). I do not know anything of the kind, and neither do you.

Mr. MILLER. If my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) will go to the dinner table of the House of Commons restaurant and ask for some of the cheese of continental Europe he will learn something that for many years he has neglected to learn. A prominent business man of Brockville told me the other day that a farmer of the county of Leeds came to his office and said: I have been all my life a Conservative, but do you see yonder across the St. Lawrence river the American town of Morristown, from that town runs a cold storage train every day down to New York city and that train carries cheese, and butter, and milk, and cream, fruit, and meat. All the products of my farm would be worth more money to me loaded on that cold storage train (if there were no duty in the way) than they would be in any part of the world. And this farmer said: Sir Edmund Walker through his banking institution may take in hundreds of thousands of dollars of the hard earned money of the farmers and other toilers of Canada, and upon one-third of it pay no interest, and on the other two-thirds pay three per cent interest, and he can take that money down to the same city of New York and lend it to United States stock speculators at the rate of 25 cents per annum, so that his banking institution may pay a dividend of 16 per cent per year, and Sir Edmund Walker will still be a loyal Canadian and lecture me upon my lack of loyalty, but if I send a calf across the St. Lawrence river and sell it in Morristown for $6 more than I can get for it in Brockville I am accused of disrupting the British Empire.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). Name that gentleman.

Mr. MILLER. I do not choose to name him.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). He is an imaginary man.

Mr. MILLER. Not at all. I will tell my hon. friend in private who the prominent business man is, and I will tell him further that before he left the office that farmer said: I will never cast another Tory vote while I live.

Mr. STANFIELD. What bank in Canada pays 16 per cent?

Mr. MILLER. That is the story as this man told it to me, but my hon. friend can look at the report of the bank with which Sir Edmund Walker is connected and he will probably find that if it does not pay 16 per cent it earns 16 per cent. Now, in discussing the fruit question, I shall refer principally to apples, which taking the Dominion over is the fruit of greatest value and greatest profit. In the Portland 'Oregonian' of the 4th of February, these figures are given by Mr. E. H. Shepard, a man of experience, the editor of 'Better Fruit', a paper which is published on the Pacific coast:

A few statistics which are pertinent and to the point are given below; statistics from the year 1896 to date, covering the United States apple crop:

Year.	Barrels.
1895	60,540,000
1896	69,070,000
1897	41,556,000
1898	28,570,000
1899	37,560,000
1900	47,960,000
1901	26,970,000
1902	47,652,000
1903	45,000,000
1904	45,300,000
1905	23,500,000
1906	38,000,000
1907	29,069,000
1908	25,500,000
1909	25,415,000
1910 (estimated)	23,825,000

Does this look like over-production?

Bear in mind that with the decreasing apple crop, and this decrease is principally in the east and west, there is an increasing population, and President Kerr of the Oregon Agricultural College in an address last year at the Commercial Club in Portland, made the following statement, and I am sure I quote him correctly: 'During the last 30 years the consumption of fruit has increased five times as rapidly as the population of the United States.'

Here we have the population of the United States increasing very rapidly, but notwithstanding, the product of apples in 1896 was 60,000,000 barrels, and in the year 1909 it was only 25,000,000 barrels. In view of this increased population and decreased production of apples surely the people of the United States will consume their own product and buy many many millions of barrels of apples from Canada as well. I have quoted an opinion from British Columbia, but let me quote an opinion from my own county of Grey, and particularly that part of it represented by my hon. friend from East Grey.

Mr. BURRELL. Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say he quoted an opinion from British Columbia?

Mr. MILLER. I quoted from the Portland 'Oregonian,' I thank my hon. friend for the correction. In the Toronto 'Globe' of February the 11th, Mr. G. J. Mitchell, general manager of the Georgian Bay Fruit Growers of Clarksburg, Ontario, writes a letter in which he refers to something that had been said by Mr. E. D. Smith, of Winona, and in that letter Mr. Mitchell says:

Mr. Smith also stated that the fruit-growers of Canada were a unit in regard to the opposition of the proposed new tariff. When he says that, he is either not candid or he does not know it all. Now in regard to apples: generally speaking, the best apple men are favourable to the tariff. In view of the proposed changes there is more interest taken in the apple industry in this Georgian Bay section than for many years. Hundreds of acres will be planted with varieties specially suited to both the western and American markets. We ourselves have in view the planting of five hundred acres. When I say I am satisfied with the tariff proposals, I am voicing the sentiments of a great many apple-growers, representing many thousand acres of orchards.

J. G. MITCHELL,
General Manager.

The Georgian Bay Fruit-growers, Clarksburg, Ont., Feb. 11.

If our Canadian farmers complain of this proposal let me read you the opinion of an American farmer. I take this from the Ottawa 'Citizen' of February 14. This is the opinion of Mr. Bachelder, Master of the United States Grange. The article with its headlines is as follows:

FARMER MADE THE SCAPEGOAT.

Master of United States Grange Objects to the Agreement.

Low Price of Land in Canada Quoted as Reason.

Tariff of 25 per cent was Moderate Enough.

(Canadian Press Despatch.)

Concord, N.H., Feb. 14.—The proposed Canadian agreement is attacked in a letter sent yesterday to Secretary of the Agriculture, James Wilson, by ex-Governor James J. Bachelder, of this city, National Master of the National Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, and chairman of the legislative committee of that organization. The letter is in reply to a communication favouring the agreement sent by Secretary Wilson to Mr. Bachelder on February 9. Mr. Bachelder declares that the agreement is unfair to the farmers of the United States who 'ask for nothing but a square deal—equal protection for all classes and interests.'

'We can only conclude,' said Mr. Bachelder in his letter, 'that you have been deceived by the special interests, which have cunningly plotted to allay the country-wide clamour for an honest revision of the tariff by making the farmer the scapegoat for the sins of the high protection system.' * * * * * *

'You know that the price of land is much lower in Canada than in the United States,' he continued. 'You know that the wages of Canadian farm labour are much lower than we have to pay. You know that the Canadian farmer buys his manufactured articles cheaper because his tariff duties on foreign goods are lower. You know that the farm lands of Canada are mostly virgin soil, requiring no fertilizer, while our lands have been cropped so long that we must use immense quantities of fertilizer. Yet knowing all this you would strike down the very moderate tariff, averaging about 25 per cent, which they now receive, without giving them the benefit of any real reduction of duties on manufactures.'

So while our friends endeavour to persuade the Canadian farmers that they will get the worst of it by this arrangement the Master of the United States Grange assured the United States farmers, and I think with a good deal of reason, that they have ground to fear the competition of the Canadian farmer who farms at so much greater advantage.

Sir, I believe that this agreement will promote immigration to the Canadian west; I believe that it will add, as Dr. Withrow said the reciprocity treaty did from 1854 to 1866, to the value of every acre of farm land in Canada. Sir, if that is the case the Canadian farmers will be more prosperous, and I say it is time they should prosper. Who, Sir, is the Canadian farmer? He is a man who toils with his muscle, and also with his brain. The farmer to-day is not only a muscle worker, but he is, and must be, to be successful, a business man and a scientist, and if this gives to the Canadian farmer a greater degree of prosperity it will enable him the better to furnish his own home, it will enable him to better provide his wife with the help she requires, it will enable him to purchase books and newspapers for his fireside, more than that, it will enable him to give to the teacher in the rural sections, and to the ministers of different denominations who preach in the country pulpits better salaries, and they ought to have better salaries. It will enable the Canadian farmer to give to his hired man twelve months employment where now perhaps he can give him only eight months, and to give him better wages. It will enable him to build better roads, to better equip his public schools and as the Canadian farmer prospers, so do we all prosper; as the Canadian farmer increases in his prosperity so does the Canadian manufacturer, and as the Canadian manufacturer increases in his prosperity so he is better able to pay a higher wage to the man who toils and labours in his factory. If a Canadian farmer once in a while be enabled in this day to ride in his automobile as the Canadian manufacturer frequently and habitually does, why need we all gaze in astonishment as though we were gazing on an eclipse of the sun, and by the way it seems to have come to this that the man in the automobile, the man who dwells in the palatial summer cottage, is arraying himself on one side while the remaining Canadian citizens are arrayed on the other. The hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) objected to this. I say it is not the government who are making this division, it is the man who rides in the automobile, who dwells in the palatial summer cottage, who by his lack of common sense is creating that division to-day.

Sir, the member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster)——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. MILLER. Then I will delay what I have to say and give my friends time to get their breath. I say this is an agreement that can at any time be cancelled. We may try this agreement for one year or for five years, and if it does not work to our satisfaction there is nothing that binds us to continue it. The Canadian government have not signed or sealed any agreement, nor has any member of that government, and that is probably the reason why Mr. Harry Corby who lately was a Conservative member in this House, and is to-day a contributor to the funds of the Conservative party, says that he believes this proposal is a good thing and something that we ought to try.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). Have you authority for that?

Mr. LANCASTER. Does he know more about the funds of the Conservative party than he does about the funds of the Fielding testimonial?

Mr. MILLER. I have stated what I believe to be the truth, and the hon. members have not denied it. This is also perhaps why Mr. Haultain, leader of the opposition in Saskatchewan, says he agrees that this agreement should be passed and will give it hearty support.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). I have reason to believe that Mr. Corby never made that statement. I am told he denied it and if Mr. Northrup was in the House he would say the same thing in stronger language.

Mr. MILLER. When the member for East Hastings is in the House he will have an opportunity of giving what information he possesses. I say there is not a thing in this agreement that will compel any citizen of Canada to sell one dollar's worth in the United States market that he can sell to better advantage in any other market or that will compel any Canadian to buy in the American market anything that he can buy to better advantage in another market. The hon. member for North Toronto says:

> We shamed the croaker and the pessimist and the coward into silence, and then recreated him into a good citizen at the glowing fires of optimism and of hope.

I say he did not properly do his work because the croaker continues to croak, and the pessimist and coward refuse to remain silent. But I say that in spite of the croaking of the croaker and the loud wails of the coward and the pessimist, fires of optimism and hope still continue to glow in this Dominion of Canada. I have been accused sometimes of throwing bouquets to the Prime Minister. Well, no one can state the truth regarding the career of the right hon. gentleman without throwing what my hon. friends opposite term bouquets. But I am now going to present him with a bouquet made up of flowers that are not mine, but that were grown in the hot house of the opponents of this measure at their own expense. I take these flowers, which I am about to make into a bouquet, from the appeal to Sir Wilfrid Laurier which appeared as a paid advertisement in the columns of the Montreal 'Star.' In that appeal, I find this rhetorical bouquet, for which their good money was paid:

> But there is no flattery in saying that the Premier is one of three or four great Canadians. He is a constructive statesman with the long vision, the deep insight and the steadfast courage that marks the rare race of nation-builders.

I have said that these flowers are not of my growing but none the less I recognize their appropriateness. But these people have not always had that measure of faith in the Prime Minister. There have been many times when they doubted his wisdom and denied his courage and ability; yet now, after 14 years of his administration, during which their doubts have been proven unfounded and their charges unjust, they thus praise him. Let my hon. friends opposite keep the faith in the Prime Minister and his colleagues which by this language they show they have and they will have had up to the present and which is depicted in the language I quoted last night from the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster). In his eloquent peroration my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) spoke as follows:

> This land is ours, we have made it, we and our fathers—please God we will keep it for our children and our children's children, to the remotest generation. We have not wrought so in order to bestow a great gift upon a rich nation, we are wrought to build ourselves a national home with a fireside and altars of our own for ourselves and for those who come after us in this great far-thrown country that God has given to us for our own.

I agree in every word thus spoken, but I say that if this agreement will help up more quickly and thoroughly to build up our national home, if it will help our manufacturers, farmers and toilers of every kind and class to greater prosperity and luxury, if it will give them a greater sense of content and brighter hopes for the future, as they gather about those altars and firesides then I say it will have my hearty support, and I believe that when it comes into effect and we begin to experience its benefits, even the doubting Thomases of to-day will be brought to realize how unjust was their opposition and ill-founded their pessimistic predictions.

Mr. BLAIN. My hon. friend overlooked my question which he promised to apswer. He was dealing with the manufacturers of canned fruits.

Mr. MILLER. I am glad my hon. friend has reminded me of this omission. Well, I went into the office of one of these manufacturers and he said to me: I have not had the opportunity to study this whole question, but when I heard the opponents of this agreement use the silly loyalty and annexation cry, I made up my mind that if they had any good argument they could use, they would not resort to any such a silly cry as that.

Mr. A. S. GOODEVE (Kootenay) I do not propose, Mr. Chairman, to follow my hon. friend from South Grey (Mr. Miller), in all his wanderings. My hon. friend told the House that on this side they were all sheep, and in so doing he reminded one of that famous text about the sheep that had gone astray. Nor do I think it necessary that I should follow him throughout his arguments because if they are all based on the same foundations as two or three statements he made in the course of his speech, referring to the Canadian Pacific Railway stock, he said it has gone up $25 per share from the beginning of this discussion to the present. they are built on false foundations. Well, as a matter of actual fact, the price on January 26 was 209 and on March 8 it was 213¾ and it had touched 214, so that its greatest variation was four points.

Mr. MILLER. I did not refer to January 26 but to the time when the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs went to Washington.

Mr. GOODEVE. Again my hon. friend said that the banks were paying 16 per cent, but I have not heard of any bank in Canada paying 16 per cent. He further read from an authority which he said was in British Columbia, but when questioned by my hon. friend from Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Burrell), he said it was from Port land, Oregon.

Mr. MILLER. In fairness to myself I should remind my hon. friend that at the beginning of the quotation from that paper, I said it was from Portland, Oregon. I did inadvertently afterwards say it was from British Columbia, but I did not make any endeavour to deceive anybody.

Mr. GOODEVE. Well, I have just taken these three instances so that the House will have an idea how much weight it should attach to the argument we have had during the last three hours and a half.

I do not propose either to follow the hon. Minister of Mines (Mr. Templeman) through all the details of his argument. He brought down quite a sheet of recommendations from the various liberal associations in British Columbia regarding this agreement to which we need not attach much weight. One from the Agent General in London of the British Columbia government, Mr. James Turner. The hon. minister quoted from a letter which Mr. Turner has written with reference to the effect this proposed pact would have on the fruit industry of British Columbia. I tried to find the newspaper from which my hon. friend quoted but found it removed from the files in the library. But taking the quotation as correct, all I can say is that the comment made by Mr. Turner in London was what one would expect under the circumstances. Mr. Turner was representing British Columbia, and he felt that it would not be fitting for him to state that the fruit industry of that province was not able to compete with that industry in any other part of the globe, so he endeavoured to make the best of the situation. But looking after the files of the standard of empire, I found another opinion of our agent general in London, and this is what he said in effect:

> There is not the slightest doubt that the ultimate effect will be to divert the great bulk of Canada's food supplies to the United States, and that he believes that the preferential scheme, as outlined by Mr. Chamberlain, is the only possible way to overcome the serious effect of the new agreement on Canadian relations with the mother country.

It is my intention very briefly to discuss what, in my opinion, are some of the reasons which have brought about this ill-considered, unexpected and almost complete reversal of the fiscal policy of Canada, which we have had during the past 45 years. It is true that from time to time there have been requests for readjustment and alterations in its fiscal arrangement. It is true that, owing to the rapid increase and growth of our western provinces, certain abuses have developed in the marketing of their products, both grain and wheat. But I venture to suggest, in regard to the latter, that, if prompt action had been taken when these were first brought to the attention of the government, by the enactment of strict regulations, rigidly enforced, in regard to grain elevators, and the establishment of public abattoirs, or the encouragement of private abattoirs under strict government inspection, and the extension of cold storage and refrigeration, these abuses might have been remedied. In 1891 the Liberal-Conservative party made its last appeal for reciprocity, and in 1897-8 the Liberal party, through the right hon. leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), as clearly demonstrated by the hon. member from North Toronto, declared that they, too, were done with it. Allow me to again refer to his words. In 1898 he said:

> Canada to-day is not in favour of reciprocity. There was a time when Canadians, beginning with myself would have given many things to obtain the American market, but thank heaven these days are past and over.

Ten years afterwards, at the Imperial Conference in London, he made this statement:

> There was a time when we were wanting reciprocity with the United States, but our efforts and our offers were put aside and negatived. We have said good-bye to that trade, and we now put all our hopes on the British trade.

And, later, in 1909, in the House of Commons, the right hon. gentleman said:

> Canada has opened her doors to Great Britain in the hope that she would ultimately receive similar preferential treatment from the mother country.

I am bound, therefore, to agree with those who take the position that the people of Canada as a whole had declared against reciprocity, and that there has been no mandate from them since to reopen the question. Then, what was it that brought about this sudden change in policy? It is true that there was a growing feeling of uneasiness in the minds of the people of Canada regarding the large and ever increasing expenditure; a feeling of uneasiness over the wanton waste and extravagance in those expenditures; a feeling of uneasiness over the exposures of maladministration that were taking place in one department after another—the Marine and Fisheries, Militia, Public Works, Railways and Canals, Printing Bureau, &c. All of this was brought into life and action when the Naval Bill of last session was forced upon the people, a Bill by which a heavy burden was placed upon the country with no compensating advantages.

The trained ear of the right hon. leader of the government was first to hear the storm-waves rising on the Atlantic, a storm which the First Minister feared would, with ever-increasing strength and vigour, sweep across this country from Halifax to Vancouver, until it broke upon the Pacific, sweeping from power the men who failed to hear his voice. Something must be done and done quickly. A hurry call was issued. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) were ordered to pack their grips and hurry off to Washington and bring back something that would distract the attention of the people. They went, all their movements wrapped in secrecy. After the curiosity of the country had been properly and duly aroused, back they came. The stage was set, the galleries crowded, the claquers in the rear ready to applaud. At the proper moment the Minister of Finance makes a dramatic entrance. He lays his Pandora box carefully on his desk; amidst an expectant silence the spring is touched. The trojan horse springs out and all his followers clap their hands and laugh. Now, says the Finance Minister, see what I have brought for each of you: For the maritime provinces free fish and potatoes; for Quebec, free hay; for Ontario, well, you may not be quite pleased, but really I did not hurt your manufacturers as much as I might have done, that is, not yet, and look! I got for you free cream—and you can keep the skimmed milk. For the prairies—now, I know you will be good; I knocked a little red paint off your mowers and binders and gave you free wheat and free livestock. For British Columbia, ah, well, you see you would not be good, and sent five bad Tories down here to worry us. And we had to give something, so we just gave them your fruit lands. They don't amount to much anyway. Their crop is only valued at $2,500,000 for 1910. We tried to give them your pulp lands, too, but that bad man, McBride, won't let us.

But, Mr. Speaker, this is a serious question and I would like to deal with it for a few moments from a broad national standpoint. In doing so, I would take my text from the words spoken by President Taft in delivering his message: 'They (Canada) are coming to the parting of the ways.' This is not the first time that we have come to the parting of the ways. We came to the parting of the ways in the long fight for confederation in 1840 to 1867, when the best men of both parties laid party affiliations aside and fought for what they believed to be in the best interests of national life. There were men then, as now, who opposed confederation. Some who would have preferred annexation, commercial union, call it what you will, but the broader minds triumphed, and confederation became an established fact in 1867. It was just a year previously that the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854 was abrogated. No one will attempt to deny that at that time it spread consternation throughout all Canada, and it is for that reason that so many on the government side argue that the desire for renewal of that bargain is general. I would like, therefore, to consider for a moment. the then conditions.

In 1866, Canada was composed of a number of scattered and disconnected provinces. The maritime provinces were not connected with Quebec and Ontario until the completion of the Intercolonial railway. Our present great west was then only isolated settlement on the Red river and Pacific coasts, totally unconnected and separated by what was then considered a great barren land. British Columbia in addition, was separated by the great range of mountains. When in 1853, the railways of Upper and Lower Canada were amalgamated under the name of the Grand Trunk Railway, it was not to carry traffic to Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, but to Portland, Maine. The Welland canal had not been enlarged and could only take vessels of four hundred tons. Railway and canal traffic in Upper Canada and the western states drifted naturally to New York and Boston. The home market, owing to long distance and comparatively slow means of communication, seemed impracticable. During the latter part of the treaty of 1854 to 1866, from a succession of unusual causes, among them the Crimean War and the War of Secession, accompanied as they were by the stoppage and devastation of agricultural industry in the United States, gave an unusual demand and high prices for the products of this country, but with the settlement of these disturbing causes, and the renewal of her industries there arose in the United States a demand for its abrogation. Did they consider Canada for a moment in the matter? No, the treaty was abrogated. It was largely because of the abrogation of that treaty that the Imperial Loan Act was passed, whereby the British people advanced £3,000,000 to complete the building of the Intercolonial road. But after the building of that road, we find the trade of western Canada and of the western states flowed not to the maritime provinces but to the ports of the United States. I would like to quote from Sir George Ross to show the position of affairs at that time and also how he regarded this matter. Here is what he said before the Canadian Club in the city of Toronto:

In 1866, when the old treaty was repealed, we were poor in banking capital, in skilled labour, in agriculture and in manufactures. A treaty then would have afforded some relief—to-day conditions are different—different because the repeal of the treaty removed every prop on which we had formerly leaned and the true temper of our Anglo-Saxon spirit was roused to action. I think no country in the world affords a better illustration of public spirit than Canada when the United States in 1866 flung our poverty in our faces and told us our only choice was starvation or annexation.

That was the attitude of the United States at that time. But while we were developing these scattered provinces and endeavouring to bind them together by this road, let me ask the leader of the government: Was it the Yankee dollar or was it the British shilling, was it the Munroe doctrine or was it the Union Jack, that was protecting our trade while we were taking the surplus agricultural products of this country across the water? That is the question for the House to consider at this time. We have expended enormous sums of money and we have assumed very heavy obligations in building up these trade routes east and west. To-morrow, if this agreement goes through, the trade routes will be north and south. I only partially agree with those who say that the natural trade route is north and south. If by trade they mean local trade, then that is correct; but if they mean the broad national trade of the empire, then I say the natural trend is east and west. The trade of the future is going to be on the Pacific with these great Oriental countries, Asia, India, Japan and Australia. And where does Canada stand in the route between those countries and Europe? I say that Canada is the very heart and nerve centre of that trade. Vancouver is the first point reached and the last point touched on going to or coming from Australia, China, Japan, India, and it is through Canada that European trade ought and must go. Shall we then, by our own act, transfer this trade from Halifax, St. John, Montreal, Winnipeg, Vancouver, and Prince Rupert, to New York and Boston, to Minneapolis and Chicago, to Seattle and San Francisco ? We have during all these years been building up that trade, and to-day we have those magnificent steamers, the 'Empresses' of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, bringing that trade through the Port of Vancouver and to the port of Montreal. I ask you then, are we voluntarily going to turn that trade north and south? That is the question that is before the House at this time. Are we going to force an entire change of that trade now going from east and west, to north and south? Mr. Chairman, there was another time when Canada came to the parting of the ways, and with your permission I would go back and review one or two other incidents in order that you may better understand the attitude of the two parties. In 1870 when the question of taking British Columbia into the confederation arose in order that we might have this outport on the Pacific which some men to-day are endeavouring to force into a closer relationship with the nation to the south, the same men then said that the cost of securing the trade of British Columbia for Canada would be too great, that the province was not worth it. British Columbia was then separated from the rest of the confederation by at least two thousand miles of unknown territory, then, largely a wilderness. There were a few isolated settlements here and there along the Red river. There was between the east and west the Rocky Mountain range. On the Pacific coast there were a few settlements. One of the conditions under which British Columbia agreed to enter into the confederation was the building of a transcontinental railway. It was absolutely essential, if she was to trade with the rest of Canada, that that undertaking should be completed. When the hon. the Minister of Mines (Mr. Templeman) was speaking the other day, almost his first words were that he remembered the time when there was no trade east and west with the province of British Columbia, but when all the trade—'all the trade,' and he repeated it—was north and south, and he seemed to be proud of it. Well, Sir, there were men in those days as there are men to-day, who were turning away from the promised land, and looking back to the flesh pots of Egypt, men who preferred to trade north and south rather than east and west. There were men in those days, on that side of the House, who said the task was too great for the people of Canada to undertake. They said: Even though we succeed in this vast undertaking the results will not be worth the while. They said British Columbia was nothing but a sea of mountains.

But, Sir, we are glad to say that the same spirit of Anglo-Saxonism, the same spirit of British statesmanship, that animated the Liberal-Conservative party of that day when they gathered together to bring about confederation, that same spirit animates the Liberal Conservative party to-day. The building of that road was indeed a huge and difficult task. You must remember that not only had we to build the road, but we had first to take population into that wilderness before any natural products could be secured to bring out on the road. But there were men then, as there are now, who were ready to undertake the task; they knew that if they sowed in the evening they would reap a harvest in the morning. But there were other men who said: You have burdened this country with an enormous debt, you are assuming large obligations, but you are not getting the results which you expected. And so we find these same hon. gentlemen to-day, opposite always ready to complain, always ready to find fault. But at the same time we find also the broad-minded men of Canada coming to the fore. Now the time came that one of those crises that come to all nations, came to Canada, as it has come to every nation in the world, when there was a world-wide depression in trade, when we found our farmers working unprofitably early and late, when we found these scattered villages along the frontier of this enormous territory for four thousand miles, when we found many of our mechanics without work. Then the same men who were trying to build up Canada stepped into the breach and they said: If we are to become successful in building up a nation we must round out the country, we must build up our industries and our factories; and so they fought the great fight we are fighting to-day, and they adopted the principle of a National Policy. How did they do it? By one or two men in a dogmatic way bringing down a resolution and asking this House to support it, without consulting the people at all? No, but they formulated a National Policy, which was discussed freely and frankly in the House; it was discussed on every platform in Canada, it was discussed in every newspaper in Canada, and finally they issued a manifesto to the people of Canada, relying on their sound sense and good judgment, and the result was that they were returned to power on the great question of a National Policy. Sir, that day there came a change into the affairs of this great Dominion of ours. The small and scattered villages lying along our shores grew from villages into towns, and from towns into cities. Everywhere we saw the smoke and steam of industry and heard the sound of the hammer. We gradually evolved a home market for our people, and those farmers who heretofore had been complaining, and justly so, of lack of a market commenced to sell their home products to the artisans, labourers and mechanics in these growing towns. The result is that gradually but steadily they removed the mortgages from their farms and there grew up confidence in the power of the people of Canada. They felt that this was the policy for them, that no longer would they look to the nation of the south, that they were able, as their fathers had been before them, as the great pioneers and colonizers of the world, to build up their own national life and so they continued along that line.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GOODEVE. Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I had briefly traced the history of this country from the date of the union of the scattered provinces under one political constitution. I had mentioned the taking in of the outposts on the Pacific coast and the binding together of these provinces from Nova Scotia to Vancouver by a great transcontinental railway. In each of the three great crises of our history since then there rose up broad-minded Canadians, men who put principles above partyism, men who were prepared to sever their party ties and affiliations in order that they might do what they believed to be in the best interests of true Canadian nationalism. I am glad to learn that at the present hour, when we have arrived at another crisis in our history, there are still great Canadians, men in all walks of life, who are prepared to look on this question from a broad national standpoint, men who are prepared to absolve themselves from their party allegiance to further what they believe to be the welfare of our country. I have said that I would deal with this question from the point of view of the statement made by the President of the United States, and in order that we may understand what President Taft meant by that statement I shall read it, with its context, and I shall also read the opinions of other men who are in a position to speak on this subject. President Taft said:

> The identity of interests of two peoples linked together by race, language, political institutions and geographical proximity offers the foundation. The Dominion has greatly prospered; it has an active, aggressive and intelligent people. They are coming to the parting of the ways. They must soon decide whether they are to regard themselves as isolated permanently from our markets by a perpetual wall or whether we are to be commercial friends.

In connection with those words of the president in his message, let me read the opinions of others who are in a position to interpret the meaning of these words and the meaning of this reciprocity pact with the United States. Mr. McCall, Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, said:

> The benefits to us would be enormous, if we could sweep away all tariffs between the two countries. It would have the effect on our trade of another Louisiana purchase.

Again, in the closing paragraph of his report:

> The Bill takes a long step towards establishing for this continent and North America a policy of unrestricted trade and commerce.

Senator Sherman made use of these words:

> Now, Mr. President, taking a broader view of the question, I submit if the time has not come when the people of the United States and Canada should take a broader view of their relations to each other than has heretofore seemed practicable.
> Since the conquest of Canada by Great Britain in 1763, she has been a conclusive warning that we cannot be at peace with each other except by political as well as commercial union. Canada should have followed the fortunes of the colonies in the American revolution. The way to union with Canada is not by hostile legislation, not by acts of retaliation, but by friendly overtures. This union is one of events that must inevitably come in the future. The true policy of this government then is to tender freedom in trade and intercourse, and to make this tender in such a friendly way that it shall be an overture to the people of Canada to become a part of this nation.

Lord Milner said:

> Nothing one says can make things any better. It is idle to shut our eyes to the fact that the proposed treaty, like that already concluded with France, must tend to diminish British preference, and is, to that extent, detrimental to the policy of closer union.

Lord Strathcona, one of Canada's greatest statesmen, made use of these words:

> The Canadian ministers allowed themselves to be hypnotized by the brilliance of the American offer and have fallen into a trap. Imperial preference is more urgent than ever.

Mr. FIELDING. Would my hon. friend give me his authority for that quotation?

Mr. GOODEVE. It is a cable in the Canadian press despatch, dated London, February 3.

Mr. FIELDING. I am quite sure Lord Strathcona would not use these words.

Mr. GOODEVE. Well, there is the press despatch. The Minister of Finance seems to object to my quoting these words, but there are many equally strong and even stronger statements on the subject.

Mr. FIELDING. I was not objecting to my hon. friend reading it; I merely interfered, as I thought, on behalf of Lord Strathcona, who, I think, has been misunderstood. That was my only object.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). The sentiment is all right anyway.

Mr. GOODEVE. In the 'Congressional Record,' one of the senators from Wisconsin is reported to have said:

> There is not a citizen of the United States who would raise his voice against the admission of Canada to the Union, thus bringing about almost the identical conditions to be achieved by this treaty.

Can anything be more emphatic; could anything be stronger as to this man's idea of the meaning of the treaty? I have quoted the remarks of a western senator, and I now take the following extract from the speech of Mr. Young, of New York, an eastern senator:

Fifty years hence the population of the United States will probably be 200,000,000 and the American people will cross the border in steadily increasing numbers, so that the population of the Dominion is likely to be made up largely of Americans, possibly a majority, and who can tell what may come through the friendly relationship with the mother country of both the United States and Canada? It seems as though in the course of time—it may be 50 years, it may be 100 years, but ultimately—that the American continent will be one people, living under one flag, and by her influence, bring about amity throughout the world which is the desire of all thinking, God-fearing men.

There is another opinion as to what this reciprocity treaty will lead to. I will now quote a man, who, under the peculiar constitution of the United States, occupies an almost similar position to that of the Premier of Canada. I refer to the Speaker of the new House of Representatives, Mr. Champ Clarke. It is true that Mr. Clarke has been cited before, but we cannot impress on the minds of the people of Canada too often what he says was intended by this reciprocity pact. Mr. Clarke spoke, not in a joking way, I assure you, but as a shrewd, capable, careful legislator, a man who occupies the highest position in the American Congress:

I look forward to the time when the American flag will fly over every square foot of British North America up to the North Pole. The people of Canada are of our blood and our language. If the treaty of 1854 never had been abrogated, our countries would be much further advanced than now towards this end.

In that particular I agree with Mr. Champ Clarke, and you will remember that I have already said that in my opinion the abolition of that treaty was a blessing in disguise and has done much towards the upbuilding of the great country we have to-day. Mr. Martin, of South Dakota, interrupted and said:

Will the gentleman favour the abrogation of our tariff law entirely so far as Canada is concerned, and make free trade on all products?

Mr. Clarke—By taking Canada in to become a part of the United States—Yes.

Then Mr. Norris, of Nebraska, asked: As I understand it, the gentleman favours the Bill for at least one reason, that it will have a tendency in the end to bring Canada into the union?

Mr. Clarke replied—Yes, I have no doubt about that.

Now mark, the statement is here made that he favoured the Bill for one reason, and what is the one all-compelling reason that influences this man, who occupies such a high position in the United States, viz., to bring Canada into the American Union? His one all-prevailing reason is that it will have a tendency to, in the end, bring Canada into the American Union. Now, Mr. Chairman, if that should be the result of this treaty, and honestly and sincerely I fear that is its tendency, then I would like to ask every Canadian throughout the Dominion if they are in favour of such a thing? In that connection I would like to cite a statement which has not yet been published, and which should have the greatest possible weight with this government, with the Finance Minister, and with the Minister of Customs. It is the statement of a man who was a Liberal and a free trader, a man who did more than any one man in the great British Empire for the building up of that empire, a man who almost unaided and alone has brought an entire Dominion under the Union Jack. I refer to the late Cecil J. Rhodes, of South Africa. The words of Mr. Rhodes are almost prophetic. When I read them a few months ago I never expected they would apply as they do on the present occasion; I never looked forward to the time, and I hoped I never should see it, when these words would have the bearing on our country's position that this pact gives to them. On the 8th of May, 1891, Mr. Rhodes wrote a letter to Sir John A. Macdonald, and in it he said:

Dear Sir,—I wish to write and congratulate you on winning the elections in Canada. I read your manifesto, and I could understand the issue. If I might express a wish, it would be that we could meet before stern fate claims us. I might write pages, but I feel I know you and your politics as if we had been friends for years.

The whole thing lies in the question:

And note this:

Can we invent some tie with our mother country that will prevent separation? It must be a practical one, for future generations will not be born in England. The curse is that English politicians cannot see the future. They think they will always be the manufacturing mart of the world, but do not understand what protection coupled with reciprocal relations means. I have taken the liberty of writing to you, and if you honour me with an answer I will write again.

Yours,
C. J. RHODES.

It is a marvellous thing and it appealed to me as a young Canadian. Fancy those prophetic words, and think of a man who has done so much for the empire. He asks! Can we invent some tie with our mother country that will prevent separation; it must be a practical one. Now take the explanation given by Rhodes himself of what he meant by a practical one. He says that he is both a free trader and a Liberal and he presses this not only in his words but in the message he gives. He says he is inclosing a cheque for £5,000 to assist the Liberals in the election at that particular time. He says further:

The labour question is an important one, but deeper than the labour question is that of the market for the products of labour, and as your local productions can only support about six millions of people, the balance depends upon the trade of the world. . . . .

If you had had statesmen you would at the present moment be commercially at war with the United States, and would have boycotted their raw products until they came to their senses.

I ask the House, is that not a marvellous prophetic utterance. He says:

If you had had statesmen you would have boycotted their raw products until they came to their senses, and I say this because I am a free trader.

Later on he says:

I am horrified by Morley's speech on Egypt

You know what that speech was, Morley was willing to let Egypt go, he was not willing to shoulder the burdens of the empire. And see what this great statesman says:

If you think your party hopeless, keep the money, but give it to some charity you approve of. It would be an awful thing to give my money to breaking up the empire.

Mr. Chairman, I fear, and I say it in all sincerity, that we have reached that point to-night that was certainly the position when the commercial war was brought on in 1891. This letter was written in the fiscal year 1891 and those were the words of this statesman. He made these remarks after discussing the whole question, he feared it might mean the breaking up of the empire and he said: It would be an awful thing if I should be a party to the breaking up of the empire.

I appeal to you and to every member of this House having the interest of Canada at heart, looking back at her history for the last 150 years, realizing the difficulties we have come through, that we should be careful before casting our vote on a question of this nature. Who of us has not stood on the ocean shore? We have watched the waves as they come and go, coming in nearer, nearer and again receding and it has been difficult for us to say at times whether the water was rising or receding. Thus it has been with the history of Canada. There have been times in the history of Canada when the tide of trade, the tide of commerce and the tide of prosperity has risen and come near, and again there have been times of trade depression when the tide seemed to recede, and finally, like these waves of the ocean, have come in those mighty waves of prosperity until we of all nations of the world have been prosperous. Our banks, our saving banks, our trade, our commerce, our workmen, our artisans, everybody has been successful and prosperous and just when this tide of prosperity is at its very height, like a bolt from the blue, without mandate, without consultation with the people, without consideration of the requirements of this country of ours, without asking or seeking that they might be guided in this great undertaking, in the reversal of this policy, they have cast this bolt, upseting, endangering and interfering unless we check it now, retarding the wonderful development that we have made up to the present time.

I have endeavoured very broadly to lay down the foundations from which we are to discuss this question, and I would like to discuss one or two of its economic phases. Before I do so, will you permit me to puncture three or four of the free trade air bubbles of my hon. friend from Red Deer? The first argument he advanced will be found at page 4239 of 'Hansard.' When he was describing the wonderful prosperity and progress of the manufacturers of Great Britain, he took as his best illustration of that progress the great manufacturing establishment of Lever Brothers, the head of the Sunlight Soap works. He said they had built up such a great industry in this line that it was one of the largest in the world, and he attributed that result to free trade; but he ended by saying that they had branch factories in the United States, in Germany, in France, in Switzerland, in Belgium, in Australia and in Canada. Did the hon. member stop to say why they have factories in all these highly protected countries? Would they have built a branch factory in Canada had it not been for the duty and the protective tariff on soaps in this country? That little factory here in Canada to distribute this great product employs several hundred hands, who in turn make a home market for the very agriculturists to whom my friends were referring. We have the home market of the masons, the bricklayers, the carpenters, who erected these buildings. We have the home market of the mechanics, who built and installed the machinery in that factory. Carried to its logical conclusion, all of that trade, all of that home market would be still in Great Britain had it not been for the protective policy adopted in Canada in 1878. What would we have had? The farmers for whom he was speaking, would have simply had the price of their wheat less the cost of carrying in competition with the surplus wheat of the entire world and the British workmen would have formed the home market for the products of the British agriculturists and thus we break the first free trade bubble of my hon. friend.

I now come to the second argument. He referred to intensive farming. He referred many times according to the habit of hon. gentlemen opposite, to the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster). I find, however, that they invariably fail to answer the arguments advanced by that hon. gentleman, and it was so in this case.

Intensive farming was subject which I had hardly expected to hear my hon. friend from North Toronto growing eloquent upon. He did, however, seem to hint that intensive farming would be hurt by this reciprocity arrangement. He did not give any facts to support that idea.

Then he goes on to quote Cobden as usual, and he ends up as follows:

In free trade Britain to-day—if I am wrong, the Minister of Agriculture will correct me—33 bushels of wheat to the acre are grown on the average; in protected America the average is 14 bushels to the acre, and in Canada, with our virgin soil, it is only 17 bushels. What is the matter. I ask my protectionist friends, with little Britain as a country where intensive farming is carried on under free trade?

And my hon. friends opposite actually cheered him. I would ask any man is there absolutely any argument in all this, anything but a mere statement of fact, a mere statement of the fact that in Dakota they raise 14 bushels of wheat to the acre, and in our Canadian Northwest 17 bushels to the acre while in Great Britain they raise 33 bushels per acre? But let me give the argument which my hon. friend failed to make. If there be any logical deduction to be made from these facts it is this. It is that the Dakota farmer has robbed his soil of its fertility and destroyed its value and that the Canadian farmer in our Northwest is rapidly following in his footsteps, whereas the farmers of Great Britain, by keeping their by-products at home and feeding them to their stock, have enriched and increased a hundred-fold the value of their land. That was the argument made by my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster), and that is the argument which my free trade friend (Mr. Clarke) failed to see. And so I have pricked another of these airy bubbles.

But a little later at page 4246 of 'Hansard' my hon. friend said:

This empire has grown up on the basis of absolute freedom of its component parts. Would you have us repeat the experiment that Great Britain tried with her American colonies and which lost them to the empire? Was it not this very mistake of mixing up trade relations with politics? Was it not that which led George Washington——

My hon. friend is fond of quoting Cobden and these other men who are long past and gone.

—to advise his countrymen so earnestly not to become entangled with the politics of foreign nations? Now, the rule in Britain is to make her own tariffs, and what is good for Britain is good enough for Canada.

And again we heard the cheers of my hon. friends opposite. Why, if there is anything in it, that is the very argument we have been endeavouring to put forth on this side of the House ever since the day this proposed treaty was brought down. We have been urging that we should make our own tariff, free from the politics of the United States, free from their influence, and free from any complications with that country which must eventually lead to trouble and disorder.

Again we break the third bubble of my hon. friend the free trader.

As a fourth argument he said:

What are the facts? Mr. Cobden, in a speech which he delivered after the repeal of the corn laws, drew attention to the fact that the most notable thing after the repeal of those laws was the improvement of agriculture in Great Britain.

Well, it is one thing to make an assertion and another to prove it. Let us see if there was any improvement in agriculture in Great Britain. I have here extracts from an expert report on the agricultural conditions in Great Britain. They are in newspaper form and not tabulated, but I shall give some of the results:

In 1873 Great Britain had 3,670,259 acres under wheat. Whereas in 1908 she had only 1,664,860 acres under wheat. During the same period her acreage under barley has shrunk by 750,119 acres; that under beans has shrunk by 401,203 acres; that under peas has decreased by 156,824 acres; that under potatoes has declined by 264,598 acres; that under turnips has shrunk by 641,850 acres.

During the last fifty years the number of agricultural labourers in the United Kingdom has decreased by more than a million.

Ireland's acreage under wheat has shrunk from 743,871 acres in 1847 to 43,600 acres in 1909. Ireland's agricultural labourers decreased from 850,100 in 1851 to 212,200 in 1901.

The agricultural area of Germany is only about one-third larger than is the agriculture area of the United Kingdom. Yet for every single sack of bread corn, produced in Great Britain, Germany produces ten sacks for every ton of potatoes produced in Great Britain, Germany raises seven tons; for every pig raised in Great Britain Germany raises six pigs. Free trade has ruined the agriculture of Great Britain and especially that of Ireland.

Free Trade Accused.

Since the introduction of free trade, about twelve million British people, a population larger than that of Scotland, Ireland and Wales combined, have left the United Kingdom. The population of Ireland, which came to almost nine millions when free trade was introduced in 1846, has declined to about 4,300,000 at the present moment. Many of the British manufacturing industries have experienced a similar decline. Between 1851 and 1904 the workers employed in the British silk industries have decreased from 130,723 to 30,184.

And note this:

On the other hand in the United States, under protection the workers employed in the silk trade have increased from 1,723 in 1850 to 79,601 in 1905.

Thus in the United States, under its high protective system which my hon. friend so strongly condemns, the silk industry made marvellous progress. This was a new industry in the United States. Britain had had a long start, Britain had her silk mills well established and was supplying the markets of the world, yet the workers employed in the British silk industries had decreased from 130,000 to 30,000. On the other hand the workers in the silk mills in the United States had increased in numbers from 1,743 in 1850 to 79,601 in 1906. I do not think I need labour that argument any further. These are authentic statistics showing the results of free trade in Great Britain; and as one hon. member on the other side pointed out the other evening, there is probably no country in the world where there are more people living upon charity than in the United Kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland.

I want to give another evidence to my hon. friend because I want to prove very fully this particular argument I am making:

A Gratifying Comparison.

In ten years from 1898 to 1908, the commerce of Canada has increased 88·14 per cent, and that is a greater increase than any other country in the world with the exception of the Argentine Republic, which shows an increase of 164 per cent. The increase in the commerce of the United States for the same period was 55·19 per cent, while that of Great Britain was 37·81 per cent.

I think that is a conclusive proof that the bubble I have referred to, bubble No. 4, is completely exploded.

He made one other argument, and it also was based on what had been said by my hon. friend from North Toronto. He made quite a pretty figure on the 'preference wax doll.' Well, the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) has so effectually melted this wax doll that there is not even the smell left—so it is not necessary to deal with that argument further. Having dealt with the only points he has made, I will now leave him in his lonely furrow, and pass on to the hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell). That hon. gentleman went out of his way to scold the banks for paying the farmers only three per cent interest, forgetting that this was brought about by the government he supports reducing the interest paid in the government savings banks on July 1st, 1897, from 3½ per cent to 3 per cent. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Carvell) quoted many statistics in regard to his own province. But, when questioned by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) he did not seem to be quite sure of what his statistics meant. I would only remark to the hon. member for Carleton that I know of no two things on which so many false doctrines are built up as the misuse of statistics and the misuse of the scriptures. Let me give one illustration. The hon. gentleman took the trade returns in potatoes, which, he said, was one of the important points—and hon. members will recollect that I pointed out that the hon. Minister of Finance had brought back free potatoes for the maritime provinces. And, after quoting certain figures, the hon. member for Carleton said, 'This is a complete history from the Canadian standpoint, of the exportation of potatoes to the United States up to 1910.' Now, I took the trouble to hunt up the figures of the imports of potatoes into Canada from the United States for six of the years covered by the quotation of the hon. member for Carleton. In his discussion of the matter, the hon. gentleman said that there had been only one year during his lifetime when potatoes had been lower in the United States than in the maritime provinces. Now, I have put the figures as given by the hon. member and printed in 'Hansard' alongside the figures of the Trade and Navigation Returns showing the imports of potatoes for these six years. And I find the remarkable fact that, for four of the years that the hon. gentleman himself selected, we imported more potatoes into the Dominion of Canada than we exported. In other words, we are throwing open the market of Canada to the United States, and no doubt the whole country will realize before they get through with it that this Canadian market in agricultural products has been exposed to competition from every agricultural country in the world. Here are the figures:

Year.	Potatoes exported to the United States. Value.	Potatoes imported from United States. Value.
1905..	$ 18,301	$179,853
1906..	128,363	131,891
1907 (9 months only)..	4,250	72,284
1908..	15,459	203,018
1909..	251,907	129,001
1910..	345,903	182,160

What does this prove? It proves simply the doctrine we laid down in the beginning: that there are bound to be times, along the border of four thousand miles long, when their local fluctuations will cause the advantage to be now on this side and now on that. What, then, is the argument that follows? Why, it is that we must deal with these questions from the broad national standpoint, considering, not local conditions, but the good of Canada as a whole. It is absurd to deal with a question of this nature along narrow lines. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) read to-day in this House a statement which completely refuted the allegations with regard to the prices of butter and other agricultural products. I intend to deal with that more fully a little later on. In dealing with this question of the importation into Canada of agricultural products from the United States, I would like to quote a gentleman who, in 1903, was secretary of the Minnesota branch of the National Reciprocity League. He made an exhaustive study as an expert on behalf of this league, taking evidence on the whole question. Let me give some of the facts he gathered:

Our farmers should understand that in opening up our markets to Canada's natural products, we are also getting a big market there for our natural products. We hear very much about how the agreement is inimical to the interests of the barley raisers, but our attention has not been called to the fact that last year we exported 164,000 bushels of barley to Canada and paid thereon a duty of 15 cents a bushel. Canada removes this duty under agreement. Last year our farmers shipped 7,680 tons of hay to Canada——

This is the very argument the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Miller) was trying to make this afternoon, and here is the expert answer:

—and somebody paid a duty of $15,360 on that hay. Last year Canada bought 215,000 bushels of potatoes from us, and a duty of $43,000 was paid thereon. Of other fresh vegetables, Canada bought from us last year $652,000 worth, and had to pay on them tariff taxes of $195,000. Of apples alone——

This is another argument of my hon. friend from Carleton, N.B.:

—Canada bought last year from us 59,071 barrels, and the duty thereon was $24,000.

These apples will come in absolutely free under this arrangement, and then where will this market be to which my hon. friend refers?

Canada bought from us last year several thousand head of cattle, 121,000 horses, 104,000 sheep and 24,000 other live animals, and a vast quantity of poultry, the total duties levied on which amounted to $175,000. All of these now go on the free list, and the Canadian market for them is to be as untrammelled as the market in any part of the United States.

While meats are not placed on the free list, the reductions offered by Canada are so sweeping that there must inevitably be an immense increase in our exports of such products to Canada.

Then he goes on giving statistics. We have had so many statistics read in this House that I dislike to weary the House by reading any more; yet it is necessary to do so in order to make clear our arguments. He says:

What this means to our market for meats can be inferred from the fact that last year the imports of these articles from the United States into Canada were so enormous that the total duty collected by the Canadian government amounted to more than $600,000. The amount of the duty Canada remits on these products—based on last year's figures—will be almost $400,000. Last year Canada imported 750,000 dozen eggs from the United States, and paid a duty of $23,000 thereon. Eggs go on the free list now.

So I could go on all through the list of agricultural imports into Canada. Thus we see how strongly this arrangement is going to work against the interests of the agricultural classes of Canada. Now let me for a moment refer to the trip west of the right hon. the leader of the government. He spoke at Nelson, British Columbia, in the district of Kootenay, my constituency, and was reported in the Daily 'News'. Speaking of myself he said: 'He is a Tory, that is all the reproach I have to make against him, but it is a very serious reproach'. Well, I am glad I do not look upon it as such. He went on to say:

May I be pardoned if I go one step farther and say that in other respects the people of this section of British Columbia did not consult their best interests. Why how old is this city? Ten, fifteen years at most. This town owes its existence largely and its prosperity certainly to the policy of the government, which by the grace of God and the will of the Canadian people has been at the head of affairs for the last fourteen years at Ottawa. How so? Well sir, three things have characterized the policy of this government. Transportation, immigration and their fiscal policy. In all these things I claim that the policy of the government has largely contributed, not only to the existence but still more to the prosperity of this city and all the cities of the Kootenay valley.

Here the leader of the government makes the claim of building up all the cities of the province of British Columbia. He also claims credit for his fiscal policy. Now, I want to show the right hon. gentleman what the people of Nelson think of this marvellous fiscal policy of his, which he claims has built up the entire province of British Columbia. The night this treaty was announced by the press despatches, the people of Nelson, not waiting to write, realizing the gravity of the situation as it would affect that district, immediately called a meeting of all classes of the community, regardless of politics. The fruit growers of that district met and passed this resolution, which they sent by telegram:

A meeting of fruit growers this district here to-day, following resolution unanimously passed: Whereas the fruit growers of the Kootenay have invested heavily in developing orchards, relying upon the government of Canada to maintain existing tariff conditions as affecting their products, or in case of any modification affecting fruit to benefit to an equal rate by modification of the tariff on other articles affecting the cost of production of fruit; and, whereas the cost of production in this district is increased by the fact that labour and all supplies are higher by reason of a generally productive tariff and of the distance from eastern Canadian manufacturing centres than it would otherwise be; and, whereas, the industry being as yet in the early stages of development in this district, the costs are higher than in the older established districts in Washington and Oregon, from where the fruit comes into competition with ours, while there is nothing in the proposed reciprocal arrangement to reduce the cost of production; and, whereas, the proposed reciprocity arrangement with the United States would remove the protection which we now enjoy and would doubtless lower the net profit (taking as an instance on our apples by the amount of the present duty, viz., 13 cents per box); and, whereas, our orchards have been planted with varieties more suitable to the Canadian markets, which are our best market, under our tariff system, and it would be impossible for us to take advantage of the market for special varieties of fruit in the eastern cities of the United States which would be opened to us by the reciprocity arrangement, without in most cases sacrificing existing orchards and developing new ones; and, whereas, we do not consider it wise or safe to develop orchards requiring years of labour and large expenditure, depending upon a condition which might be terminated at any time by a foreign power; and, whereas——

Now note this, because I consider it is an absolutely proper and common sense way of looking at the question. This is not a pro forma resolution passed to bolster up the government, it is a declaration of men whose very bread and butter are at stake. And what do they say:

—there is no compensating benefit to us in the proposed reciprocity arrangement, and the result will be injurious and unjust to us; therefore, be it resolved that we, the fruit growers of the Kootenay in mass meeting assembled, do protest against the proposed reciprocity arrangement as regards fruit being put into force, and do respectfully request the government of Canada not to make such reciprocal arrangements regarding fruit at this time.

Have wired this to Minister of Customs, kindly hand on our behalf copies to Finance Minister, Senators Templeman and Bostock and Burrell; other resolutions by mail.

I immediately had copies of this resolution made and forwarded to the parties mentioned, from whom I received replies saying they had received it. Now, Sir, look for a moment at this remarkable situation. These men, whose means of livelihood were absolutely threatened, wired down to their representative, as they had a just right to do, asking me to endeavour to protect their interests. And what was the result? Why, if I am to take the answer of the leader of the government to the fruit growers of Niagara district: 'It is too late'. Did you ever hear of such a thing, Mr. Chairman, at any time of your life? I ask you if that is a constitutional method of procedure? No one can be heard. Who are the people of this country? They are not the government. As I said before, the government stands for the whole people, it means the people in this democratic country of ours, and no two men, and no set of men, have any right to put the country into this position. Having forwarded their message to the gentlemen they mentioned, I was forced to write back to them: 'I am utterly helpless in the situation'. I appeal to you, I appeal to any one in this House, if that is a democratic form of government. Now we have two additional resolutions which were forwarded to me by mail, and here is one:

Moved by N. Wolverton, seconded by C. F. McHardy,

Whereas various fruit pests exist in the United States of which we are fortunately free, and,

Whereas the diseased and hence inferior fruit from the United States is our worst competitor,

Therefore be it resolved that this assembly of fruit growers of the Kootenays earnestly petition for such a rigid inspection of imported fruit as exclude all defective fruit.

Now let me explain that to the Minister of Finance who negotiated this treaty. We have in the province of British Columbia fruit inspectors on whom we spend large sums of money annually. I have seen in my own town, box after box of apples that came from Washington and Oregon, burnt by the fruit inspector because of their diseased condition. This is what makes every British Columbian proud of the fruit industry of that province, the superior quality of our fruit to that grown south of the line. I myself have walked, ridden and driven hundreds of miles through the beautiful valleys in the very district here referred to. The Prime Minister himself went through that region, and in beautiful language described its beauties and wonders. Yet he comes down here, and with one fell blow is about to destroy the livelihood of those people.

What is the position? I have gone there and I have driven through those remarkable orchards. One thing that strikes a man from the older settled parts of Canada or the United States is the absolute freedom from disease of our fruit there. It is marvellous to see the thin skin of the fruit. Any man who has been accustomed to the older orchards will be immediately struck with the marvellous freedom from disease of any kind when he sees the pear, plum or apple trees there. The skin of the peaches is absolutely transparent, the fruit is perfect to look upon, and yet I regret to think that fruit is to be allowed to go and come by the removal of this tariff. I see my friends smiling. Of course, we can continue to have our inspectors there and we shall continue to have them, but I say that it is the part of this Dominion government to assist us with regard to that question. Now, Sir, I would like to read another resolution passed by a board of trade—a public, non-political body —with regard to the effect of this treaty. In passing, let me say that it is a remarkable thing that the Minister of Inland Revenue, in reading those resolutions in favour of this proposal, which he had to admit, in answer to a question from this side of the House, were all from Liberal associations, failed to read this resolution. We have been inquiring day after day and the government are failing to bring down information with regard to the other side of the question.

Mr. FIELDING. Has not the information that my hon. friend quoted been brought down? The papers which he states he has, have been brought down.

Mr. GOODEVE. I have not seen them yet, but this resolution was not quoted by the Minister of Inland Revenue.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend says information has not been brought down. He was good enough to send me a resolution received from his constituents and if that is not in the return before the House, and if he does find it is not there, then it is a mistake, and I will see that it is corrected.

Mr. GOODEVE. Then, I will gladly apologize to the Minister of Finance, because I wish to make no unfair statements My hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) informs me that the resolution was brought down two days ago, although it was received over a month ago. Now, I will read the resolution of the Nelson Board of Trade:

Moved by F. A. Starkey, seconded by W. B. Farris, that in the opinion of this meeting the proposed reciprocal tariff between Canada and the United States is one of the most important questions that has come before the people of Canada, and in view of the fact that British Columbia has the prospects of great future industries in fruit-growing, mining and lumbering and that sufficient time has not been given the people of this province to carefully consider all phases of this great question and they are not in a position to know what effect such a tariff would have on the industries of British Columbia, therefore, the government should give further time to the consideration of this question, and that a special investigation should be made as to the effect that this tariff, if passed, will have upon the future development of British Columbia. Carried.

I would like to know how hon. gentlemen feel with regard to the resolution they voted down yesterday in which we asked, in the very language of this resolution, for more time to consider the question. I have another resolution which was wired to me by the Creston Board of Trade. Creston, in my opinion, is quite equal to the celebrated Okanagan Valley. It is at the head of Kootenay lake and they have made a wonderful success of the cultivation of fruit at that place. I know in one instance personal to myself, of a man who squatted there without a dollar and who took off, in 1908, $1,275 per acre in strawberries and, in 1909, $1,400 per acre. I think this is one of the best parts of British Columbia. Here is a resolution from their Board of Trade:

Creston, B.C., Feb. 2, 1911.

A. S. Goodeve, M.P., Ottawa,—Following resolution passed by this Board. Kindly pass on to Messrs. Burrell and Bostock: Whereas proposed reciprocity agreement introduced by Mr. Fielding will inflict severe blow to fruit and lumbering interests of province without giving any equivalent, and whereas the fruit industry is in its infancy and requires fostering, and whereas fostering these industries of vital importance to welfare province, and whereas proposed agreement would imperil capital investment of those interested in this industry, now be it resolved that this Board strongly condemn proposed agreement as far as applied these industries.

CRESTON BOARD OF TRADE.

I have here a personal letter from a fruit grower, Michael Phillips. He sends me a long letter in which he sets forth similar reasons why this proposal should not be adopted. I have also a resolution from the Victoria Incorporated Co-operative Fruit Growers' Association, Limited, which reads as follows:

That we, the directors of the Victoria Incorporated Co-operative Fruit Growers Association, Limited, hereby view with alarm the contemplated removal of the duty on American fruits, as explained in the daily press, under the proposed reciprocity agreement between the Canadian and American governments, and believe that such abolition of the tariff on fruits will greatly retard and depreciate, if not utterly destroy, the fruit-growing industry in British Columbia.

I have a similar resolution from the Central Farmers' Institute, a public non-political body representing the whole province, the resolution having been sent here by the deputy minister of the province. It is as follows:

Resolved, that the Central Farmers' Institute views with alarm a movement recently advanced by the grain growers of the prairies for reciprocity in natural products with the United States, as such an adjustment of the tariff would be of material disadvantage to the horticultural industry of this province, and this meeting is strongly of the opinion that not only should no reduction of duty on fruit be permitted by the Dominion government, but that immediate steps should be taken to place our duty on a parity with that of the United States, which in several instances is considerably higher on various kinds of fruit than ours.

Further resolved, that a copy of this resolution be sent to the Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the hon. Minister of Customs, the hon. Minister of Agriculture, the Hon. R. L. Borden, and the several representatives of British Columbia and constituencies in the Dominion House of Commons and members of the Senate from this province. Carried.

I have the honour to be, sir, your obedient servant,

WM. E. SCOTT,
Deputy Minister.

I have also a resolution which I think has already been put in by my hon. friend from Yale-Cariboo, from Nanaimo. Now then, I just wish to say a word or two, because this aspect of the question has been fully and fairly dealt with by my hon. friend from Yale-Cariboo. The right hon. leader of the government took credit for building up and developing this particular district; yet, by the carrying on of this pact they will retard to a very great extent its further development. I do not wish to be placed on record as saying that we will be utterly ruined, because I believe that the free spirit of these western Anglo-Saxon people will rise above every difficulty and obstruction, but I do claim that the Dominion government should not do anything that will retard in the slightest degree the development of this great industry in that district.

That particular district needs special nursing, for the reason that these are small valleys scattered along a series of very beautiful lakes, and there being the difficulty of getting a very large acreage in one district the transportation problem becomes acute. There is also the fact to be found in all new countries that it is difficult for the people to get together to find a particular kind of fruit that is best located for a particular district, and along that line the provincial government is spending a large sum of money. They have established numerous experimental stations which become necessary because the conditions of soil and climate vary very materially within a short distance owing to air currents and the influence of the varying altitudes. All these are difficulties which call for special sympathy, special aid, and special assistance but instead of rendering us that sympathy we have received no consideration from this government. I shall not labour that argument because it is very ably presented to the House by my colleague (Mr. Burrell), and I shall briefly sum up the reasons against this arrangement, taking as my basis the many resolutions that have been received, which on examination will be found to be not exaggerated in any way.

This arrangement will be most detrimental to the agricultural interests of our province, and will be a disastrous blow to the fruit growing industry if carried into effect.

1. The result of prices obtained by fruit growers for the past four year's crop has shown very small profit over the cost of production, owning to keen competition from the American States. 2. Western American growers can secure their labour for orchard work fully 25 to 30 per cent cheaper. The cost of material, fruit boxes, wrapping paper, &c., is quite 25 per cent cheaper in the American States. 3. The cost of production of a box of apples to the grower in the foregoing States is approximately 40 cents. It costs the British Columbia grower, owing to the causes advanced, from 60 to 65 cents. 4. The present duty on a box of apples is 13 cents. It will thus be seen that the duty as now imposed is not nearly sufficient to compensate for the cheaper labour and material which the Americans have. 5. By the removal of duty imposed on American fruit entering Canada under present conditions, the American States will be able to undersell British Columbia in the markets of the middle west, as also in the home market. 6. Large sums of money have been invested by land and irrigation companies and private individuals in developing the fruit industry of the province, and their interests should be protected. 7. The provincial government has spent a considerable amount of money in recent years in advertising the fruit growing possibilities of the province, and have thereby attracted men with capital who have planted out large areas in fruit. 8. If the proposed tariff agreement becomes effective, a check will be put on men with capital coming to our province, thereby materially retarding the exploitation of our agricultural and fruit lands. 9. We have been struggling during the past ten years under somewhat adverse and difficult circumstances to develop our fruit industry, thereby bringing a yearly increasing revenue to the province. Abolition of the duty at present imposed means fiercer competition from the American States and we receive in return absolutely no equivalent advantage. 10. The great fruit growing districts of the interior, where fruit growing has been made a speciality, will receive a serious setback if the present duties are abolished, and this will result in a lowering of land prices all round. 11. Men who have settled in our lands, putting labour and capital into them, and thereby developing our agricultural resources, should be protected. 12. The problem in British Columbia at the present time is that of settling our lands, and thus developing our agricultural and fruit industries. Too much of what should be produced in the province is imported from the United States, and this is increasing each year. Any course of action such as the proposed tariff agreement, which will discourage land settlement, is against the interests of the province, and should be strongly opposed. 13. An agreement which has been advanced by those in favour of a free interchange with the States, is that British Columbia will secure cheaper fruit, and that it will not interfere with provincial grown fruit. This is not correct, as our principal competitors are the States of California, Oregon and Washington, whose fruit comes into the market practically at the same time. As a matter of fact, it comes into the market shortly beforehand, and this consequently lowers the price for British Columbia fruit arriving immediately after. 14. It will divert interprovincial trade between the eastern provinces of Canada and British Columbia to the States, thus sending money to the American side which, as loyal Canadians, we would wish to see stay in our great Dominion. 15. It will materially affect traffic on our own transcontinental lines, by diverting a portion of such traffic to foreign railways. 16. It will be a setback to imperial preference, and federation of the empire which we all, as component parts of the greatest empire the world has ever seen, look forward to in the near future. 17. It is altogether a one-sided arrangement. We gain practically nothing, and lose much. 18. Let well alone. Our Dominion, and British Columbia in particular are entering on an area of unprecedented prosperity. Capital to develop our great natural resources is pouring into the country. The tide of immigration has set our way, and under existing conditions our future is assured.

The following figures furnished by the Inspector of Fruit Pests regarding imports into the city of Vancouver, are interesting. There were 79,388 boxes of apples imported; 14,367 of pears; 14,186 of plums; 655 boxes of prunes; 64,702 boxes of peaches; 12,699 of apricots; 473 boxes of crabapples; 25 boxes of quinces, and 11 of nectarines. These amounts would represent 266 full carloads of fruit of ten tons each. When you consider the other cities of the coast, and the interior, one realizes what a very large amount of fruit crosses the American side into our local markets. The present proportion of fruit marketed by British Columbia in the middle west does not reach 25 per cent of the total amount sold there.

Now, just a citation from the budget speech of the Minister of Finance of the province of British Columbia which was submitted to the legislature a few days ago. It will be interesting to every member of this House, as it is to every Canadian who is interested in the development of our western provinces. It is rather a remarkable statement. I may say that the Minister of Finance in introducing this subject gave the source from which he took his figures and like our own Minister of Finance he explained that it was difficult to get statistics of that nature bearing on agricultural products, but he took his information from the railroads and the express companies, and he had his figures rechecked, and he says he thinks he can safely say that they are at least approximately accurate. The provincial Minister of Finance finds that for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1910, British Columbia produced $14,399,000 worth of agricultural products and there were imported into that province $14,962,904 worth of the same products. It will be noted that the province imported approximately the same amount as she produced. Now I appeal to every member of this House, and particularly to the members from Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. We have here an interprovincial trade with British Columbia of over $14,000,000 consisting of horses, cattle, sheep, swine, poultry, butter, cheese, milk, bacon, meat, lard, pork, fruits, vegetables, eggs, honey, hay and grain; all of which can be raised in the western prairie provinces, and can be exchanged for the fruit of the province of British Columbia, because as we know the prairie provinces do not produce fruit. And yet at one stroke this interprovincial trade will be very materially injured if not practically ruined, temporarily at any rate. So much for the local side of that question.

Thus far I have been dealing rather with the sins of commission of this government, and if they have done many things that they ought not to have done I may say that they have also left undone many things that they ought to have done. When the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs were down at Washington, did it not occur to them that there was something else they might have offered from the province of British Columbia in exchange for this free fish instead of our fruit industry? It did not occur to them that last year, in this House, we very properly voted $50,000 for experimental purposes to discover a way of treating the zinc ores of that province. Did they not realize, because they have the statistics, or could get them from the Minister of Mines, of the enormous value of those zinc ores in British Columbia, what it would mean to the Dominion of Canada if we had a successful treatment of those ores? They must have known, or should have known, before going into a question of this kind, of what immense value that would have been to this great district, with its newly developed, complex, mixed lead and zinc ores. Yet I find no reference in this treaty to these ores. Under the Dingley tariff ore was admitted free to the United States, but under the Payne-Aldrich treaty of 1909 the duty on mixed zinc and lead ores carrying over 25 per cent of zinc was one cent per pound on the zinc contained in the ore. There were certain reductions from this on ores carrying less than 25 per cent of zinc. As a matter of fact, the class of ores we have in that province are such that we could not export any that did not carry the amount set forth, so for practical purposes on all we can export the duty will be one cent a pound under the Payne-Aldrich tariff. In consequence of that, we deal only with that duty. The reason given for the imposition of this tax under the Payne-Aldrich tariff was that they were in competition with the zinc ores of Mexico, where they had low-priced coolie labour, and that this was being done on behalf of the American miner. I would call the attention of the minister to the way in which the Americans guard the interests of their miners, their workmen, their artisans and mechanics. The reason advanced did not apply in any particular to the province of British Columbia, because, as I will show you, not only do we pay as high wages as the Americans, but better wages. The British Columbia miner receives 50 cents to a dollar a day more in the zinc districts than the miners receive in the zinc districts of the United States. This refers to New Jersey, Missouri and Wisconsin. It is to be noted that considerably more than two-thirds of the zinc in the United States comes from New Jersey, Missouri and Wisconsin, and in none of these states are the wages paid as high as in British Columbia. The 'Engineering and Mining Journal' of January 11, 1911, page 25, says that the wages of miners in Wisconsin were $2.50 a day, and of muckers $2 a day. The muckers in British Columbia get $3 a day of 8 hours. It is necessary for the Canadian producers to sell their zinc ores in the United States, or ship them to the United States for smelting in bond for sale in Europe; there is no other way in which we can treat one pound of those zinc ores. So they are absolutely lying idle. If the Minister of Customs was in his place I would call his attention to an argument he made in this House, when he said: Do the people of Frontenac county want their iron ores, forsooth, to remain in the ground, because, possibly, at some future time their great-great-grandchildren might take them out? Let me give him his answer back and ask him: Do the people of British Columbia want their zinc ores to lie idle in the ground, because, possibly, their great-great-grandchildren may take them out? Yet neither hon. minister gave any attention to this great industry. The production of zinc ores in the United States, Mexico and Canada has been as follows:

	Tons.	Tons.	Tons.	Tons.
United States..	905,000	903,000	838,000	1,000,000
Mexico.....	89,000	109,000	66,000	100,000
Brit. Columbia.	600	1,100	6,100	10,000

We produced these amounts notwithstanding the fact that we have to fight against this duty and to go to foreign zinc smelters to have our ores treated, to send them through in bond, and to pay all expenses and send them to the European market. Did it not occur to either minister that they might fairly and justly ask the United States in adjusting their tariff to remove that duty? The Americans themselves now want it removed, and I feel satisfied that if the ministers had merely suggested it it would have been done at once. The unpopularity of the zinc tariff in the United States is shown by the following comment of the 'Engineering and Mining Journal' of January 7, 1911:

> The results of 1910 showed that the tariff on zinc ore has not benefited the miners, the prices of zinc and zinc ore having averaged no higher than formerly, while it harassed the smelters. Thus it has helped nobody and has hurt somebody.

There is this difference in regard to lead. The government of Canada gave a bounty of $5,000,000, and very properly so, as they did in the steel bounties, and if it were not for that bounty, under the conditions we have in the United States, it would be impossible to operate our lead mines. As a matter of fact, a very large proportion of the zinc mines we cannot operate at all for the reasons I have stated. That is one of the sins of omission, and so it is in regard to this whole question. The more we see of it the more we find that they seem to have given it little attention and not to have studied it in all its relations. I would like even now, under the circumstances I have placed before the minister, to see the minister endeavour in some way, without putting it into this compact, if they are bound to force it through, that some arrangement is made whereby that duty could be removed from the zinc ores of Canada. The smelters themselves on the other side, as set forth by the 'Mining and Engineering Journal,' are quite prepared to bring their influence to bear in that direction.

A word in regard to lumber. Let me say frankly it is a difficult question to deal with, or to argue about. You see the difficulties here. Our government had already removed the duty on lumber, and the result is that our markets, particularly our western prairie markets, have been flooded with the surplus products of rough lumber of the western United States. I was talking to a lumberman in this House to-day, and any lumberman will tell you that there is invariably a surplus of rough lumber at any mill. It is like the rough meat. The packers will tell you to-day that the reason of the high price of meats is because they can only sell the choice cuts. It is the same with the lumber industry. The Americans had plenty of rough lumber, which it was often difficult to dispose of, and whenever there was a glut in their own market they dumped it into the prairie provinces of our northwest. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) knows that delegation after delegation of lumbermen brought pressure on the government to have a duty put on, but he said they could not do it in the interests of the prairie provinces. Well, I am not here to discuss that question, but I am only saying that the supposed advantage given by the Americans in taking the duty off lumber is of no benefit so far as British Columbia is concerned. The Americans always have plenty of rough lumber, and it is impossible to send ours into their market and compete with it.

Mr. SMITH (Nanaimo). Will my hon. friend tell the House who took the duty off rough lumber?

Mr. GOODEVE. The Conservative government took it off in the interests of the prairie provinces when the settlers came into these provinces in the early days. At that time the great spruce areas in that district north of Edmonton had not been opened up; at that time we had not developed the lumber industry in British Columbia to the same extent as to-day. Neither had we the same transportation facilities, and so the Liberal-Conservative government, as it has always done in dealing with these tariff questions, took off the duty in the interests of the people at large.

Let me now give you an extract from a letter written by Sir William Van Horne. In that letter he quotes what Senator Beveridge said with regard to the point I have made. Sir Wm. Van Horne quotes Senator Beveridge as saying:

We should freely admit Canadian lumber to American planing mills in return for Canada's freely admitting other American manufacturing products to Canadian markets. We should have a special tariff arrangement with this intimate neighbour and natural customer. This would mean millions of dollars of profit every year to Indiana's factories. Reciprocity would mean vast increases in Canada's purchases from us.

I would like now to quote two Liberals in reply to the position taken by my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Templeman). I shall quote a Liberal premier and a Liberal minister of a Liberal government in Canada. Let me first take Sir George Ross, ex-premier of Ontario, who in turn quotes from the ex-Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton). He said:

The question of our lumber industry has also its future aspect. No doubt the admission of lumber into the American market free of duty would enhance the value of lumber and probably the value of all standing marketable timber in Canada. But the personal interests of the lumbermen are not to be alone considered. One of the greatest questions now before the people of Canada is how to conserve their forests. Mr. Clifford Sifton, chairman of the Conservation of Natural Resources, speaking before the Empire Club, on the 20th ult., said. 'At the end of twenty years the United States would have no timber for sale in the ordinary way. In Canada the supply was large, but if the supply in the United States ran out, the supply in Canada would last the United States for only seven years. The time must come, however, when the people of Canada would demand legislation prohibiting the export of marketable timber.' This is the national view and the only view which will do justice to Canadian interests. Can this view be maintained under a treaty?

Can this view be maintained after the treaty is ratified? The answer given by Sir George Ross is no. I have here a very strong resolution condemning this proposed arrangement from the lumber men's association. The Minister of Inland Revenue told us that they have since somewhat modified their views and I may frankly say that I understand such to be the case, and I have already explained why. They say that as the duty is taken off in Canada, it cannot hurt us if the Americans take it off in the United States. But argueing from a national standpoint, treating this matter from the point of view of using our own natural resources in our own industries, if you say: Well, we did not take off the duty, my answer is this: Either this pact meant something or nothing. If you found it necessary to give something—I do not care how little—to induce them to take off the duty, you should not have consented; but if you did not find it necessary to give anything you should never have gone there. That is the position, as I take it.

Let me read just one extract from the resolution passed by the lumbermen to show the promises which had been made to them and which have not been kept:

Whereas the hon. Mr. Fielding assured the lumber manufacturers of this district some years ago that the Dumping clause would give us ample protection from American lumber, which is not the case for the reason that during the past 18 months the American market has been so demoralized that her mills have been selling lumber for less than two-thirds of its cost, and consequently exporters to Canada are willing to make affidavits that the price at which they are dumping lumber into this country is the 'fair market value if sold for home consumption.

That is to say the Americans gave the affidavits required by our customs laws because they felt they could conscientiously do so on account of the surplus they had to sell, and they made a dumping ground of the four prairie provinces against the lumber of the Pacific coast.

Allied to this trade is the paper and pulp industry, and that industry will be ruined. I talked to one of the largest traders in Canada only yesterday in this House, and he told me incidentally that he was investing in a large pulp and paper mill out in British Columbia but that it would be impossible for him to go on with that enterprise if this arrangement went through. As I was anxious naturally to get in touch with men who had actual knowledge of this business, I asked him to explain the situation exactly and he did so. He explained that there was a surtax of $2 per ton imposed by the United States on pulpwood cut from Crown timberland in Canada in addition to their tariff duty of $3.75 per ton, making $5.75 per ton; and the Dominion government, under this pact practically held a club over the various provinces to force them to allow their pulp wood to be exported free of duty to the United States in order to build up American factories.

Mr. MARTIN (St. Mary's). What is the name of that gentleman?

Mr. GOODEVE. I think that is an entirely private matter but the hon. gentleman can take my word. I would be very glad however to give him the name personnally after the adjournment. I may say, however, that he is a gentleman who I am sure would command the respect and confidence of my hon. friend.

I have here a photograph which I would like the House to see in connection with a letter sent to the Minister of Finance by the Western Canada Bag, Envelope and Box Board Company, to protest against this proposed arrangement. This is a picture of a new building in the process of erection in the constituency represented by my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) for making coarse paper, roofing paper, felts, box boards, &c. In their letter they say:

If the reciprocity agreement, so far as it pertains to building paper, roofing paper, sheathing, &c., is adopted as proposed, it will positively kill this industry and prevent the operation of the plant.

Here is a letter which they sent me to show the impossible position in which they will be placed:

I take the liberty of enclosing herewith a copy of letter which we have just forwarded to the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier in reference to the removal of the duty on building, roofing and sheathing paper, deadening felt, carpet lining, box board, &c. We are also pleased to enclose herewith a photo taken sometime ago of our plant which is now under course of erection at New Westminster and which we wish again to emphasize we will be unable to operate if the proposed reciprocity agreement is adopted.

A copy of that was sent to the minister, and here is the letter to the Prime Minister himself:

The Honourable Sir Wilfrid Laurier,
Premier of Canada,
Ottawa, Ont.

Honourable Sir,—In reference to the communication which we addressed to you under date of February 9, protesting against the removal of the duty on building paper, roofing paper, sheathing, deadening felt, box board, &c., we wish to say that the removal of the duty on the above products will have such a vital and disastrous effect upon our industry, that we take the liberty of suggesting, that if in your opinion you deem it advisable, we shall be pleased to come at once to Ottawa in order to present all information direct to you, as to the exact manner in which the proposed treaty will seriously and permanently affect us.

Yours respectfully,
W. C. Bag, Envelope and Box Board Co., Ltd.
(Sgd.) GREELY KOLTS,
President.

Now, again, I say I do not wish to reiterate. But is not this an awful thing? We in British Columbia have been offering all kinds of inducements to capitalists to establish industries to work up the millions upon millions of tons of pulpwood that we have in our province. I was myself a member of a Royal Commission to inquire into the handling and conservation of our whole timber resources, and I could occupy this House for hours on that subject alone. We have done everything possible to induce capitalists to establish these industries. We have not only these great supplies of raw material, but we have, as hon. members know, the finest water-powers in Canada, and also the coal, and we are there at tidewater. Yet, in the face of these advantages, it has been impossible to get men to go in and start these mills. And to-day we are just beginning. The difficulties of the situation have been set forth here to the Minister of Finance. In the United States the mills have a population of five millions of people immediately surrounding the mills, and forming their home market, while in the province of British Columbia, there is a population of only 300,000. And these people whose letter I have quoted say: If necessary, we will come to Ottawa, not to ask favours, but to explain to the minister. And they get the same answer—'Too late.' I say it is an awful thing! Why did not the government consult the people of this country? Let me bring this case home to people here—and I am not going to labour the argument. Here we are in the city of Ottawa. Suppose any newspaper to-morrow were to suggest the taking away of the pulp paper industries of Hull, the Eddy and the Booth mills, wiping out the opportunities of employment for the people, but leaving the farmers and owners of pulpwood free to send their wood direct to the United States. Now, I ask: Is there a man, woman or child in Ottawa who would vote in support of that proposition. Yet, that is exactly the position in which we stand in British Columbia. We have all the conditions there for the inception of a successful industry, and we have the capital ready to embark on the enterprise. And yet the minister is prepared by this pact to wipe out the factories we see in imagination and even the one already started, a photograph of which I have shown. I say again, is not that an awful thing? I am amazed that we should hear from the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Miller), and even from a minister of the Crown, references to the difference between the automobile owner and the labourer. I say that we are all labourers in Canada, and the man who does something to build up the industries of Canada is deserving of the respect of every man—and I venture to say he receives respect from the vast majority of our people. Every true labourer is working for the good of this great Dominion of ours. I say all honour to the men who, starting with only their brains and their hands, have succeeded in building up industries here in Canada. If they have got wealth, I say, God speed and prosper them, for they have helped to build up this Dominion. I would be the last man to destroy these industries. I hope that there is no man in Canada whose vision is so limited, whose sight is so obscured that he would try by any such argument to sow the seeds of dissension amongst our people. Now, I do not know whether I should go on with these matters——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. GOODEVE.

Mr. GOODEVE. I would like to deal with several other subjects in the same practical everyday way. I have briefly touched the main points on the lumber and pulp question. I could cover 'Hansard' with the representations of these industries of our province, but I will pass on to deal with other matters that interest every man in Canada. The other day I read a paragraph in a newspaper giving facts which struck me, as having a vital bearing on this question. They were all the more important because they were given by one who had no thought of the particular question that is now before us. This item told of Mr. W. S. Workman, of the City Line, speaking at Glasgow on cheap sea-carriage, and the probable effect of oil fuel. Evidently, this gentleman is the manager of one of the large steamship lines in Glasgow, and he was dealing with the outlook of ocean transportation, pointing out that when oil fuel comes into use in vessels, the carrying capacity of the vessels will be materially increased. He gave the number of vessels on the stocks in the different shipbuilding yards of the old country that were to be equipped with the means of using oil as fuel, and went on to show how this would reduce the cost of carriage. This newspaper says that Mr. Workman—> —pointed out that soya beans are brought all the way from Manchuria, a distance of 11,000 miles, for 30s. per ton, while the freight on grain from Glasgow to London is from 10s. to 12s. per ton. Oil, again, is carried from New York to Japan, a distance of 14,000 miles, for about 22s. per ton weight. But the thing comes nearer home when butter, meat, and tea are the subject of examination.

> Mr. Workman points out that last year no fewer than 36,000,000 pounds of butter came to us from New Zealand at a freight of only ½d. per pound, and 3,356,000 carcases of lamb at the same rate per pound. While, too, a pound of tea can be posted to any part of the country for 3d., the shipowner brings it all the way from India for ½d. per pound, and pays Suez Canal dues into the bargain.

He goes on to argue that when the new vessels are put in commission even these low rates of freight will be reduced. What does that mean? The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Harris) gave the statistics last night, and I do not need to repeat them. All these twelve agricultural countries that are put on the free list by this pact will be in competition with us, not only in the markets of the world, but absolutely in our own markets, right here in Canada. This fact is brought home to us by the information that we get from this absolutely independent and correct source.

Now I want to read a little history of Argentine, and show how that works out. Here is a letter that was handed to me and that illustrates the argument I am making:

Replying to your letter having reference to the importation of chilled meat into Canada under the proposed new reciprocity duty of 1¼ cents per pound.

We regret very much that we are unable to give you any figures which would indicate the present price of beef in the Argentine. We hope to be able to do so in the course of the next few days, when we will write you further.

At the present moment there are 1,500 New Zealand (Canterbury) or Australian lambs on the way to Canada.

1,500 New Zealand lambs on the way to Canada. This is official:

The owners, of course, are figuring on bringing these in paying a 3 cent duty (2 cent preference to New Zealand), and selling them in the eastern provinces at just a little better than the price ruling for Canadian lambs. If the duty now 3 cents was reduced to 1¼ cents it would mean that the Canadian market would have to reduce or decline 1¾ cents to meet the differential.

Last winter quite a few New Zealand lambs were brought in by the Pacific Coast, and we are informed were sold as far east as Winnipeg.

The lot we have referred to as now on the way to Canada is coming via London, and will arrive at St. John, so that as far as this country is concerned we will be equally affected in the east and in the west by the reduction of this duty. To-day choice young New Zealand mutton, 35-50 pounds, average, are selling in London for about 6 cents, freight and storage ⅝ cents, duty 1¼ cents, proposed, net cost per pound here 7⅞ cents per pound.

Canadian stock of the same class and description is now bringing in from 9 cents to 9¾ cents in Montreal.

Yet men will stand up in this House and say that it is absurd to talk about the competition of Argentine, New Zealand, Denmark, and all these other agricultural countries. I have shown you the actual facts of the present position. Now I want to give you another fact:

From the point of view of the manufacturer of meat food products, two facts in connection with the proposed reciprocity movement are not, we think, sufficiently well known.

There is in Canada a meat inspection law which requires that all meat to be shipped out of the country or to be shipped from one province to another shall have passed a post mortem inspection, and shall have been prepared in a proper and sanitary matter. This law co-operates with similar legislation in the United States, and recognizes the inspection certificate of the United States government when attached to the product. This means that American product can come into Canada, into any province, and be reshipped from that province to any other province.

The United States has a similar law, but they do not recognize the inspection certicate of the Canadian government, so that while it might seem to an ordinary observer that the Canadian packer would have at his door, under this proposed reciprocity agreement, a very large market on which he could sell some finished product, yet, on examination, this market is found to be absolutely blocked—as small packers in the United States who do not operate under government are few and far between——

That is just like the case when they let us have free fish and put a duty on the cans; it is something similar. Under their law they have a right to keep them in quarantine for thirty days, and you will see what that means:

—while those who do not operate under government inspection could not handle the products of Canadian packers, because their government will not recognize the certificate of inspection of the Canadian government, and would not allow products so marked to enter the United States inspected packing houses, nor could it be shipped from one state to another.

Here I am minded to ask the question, is that reciprocity? I think not. It is the old jug-handled policy over again, the same old thing I heard of as a boy:

The other point we wish to mention particularly is the stand taken by the Department of Agriculture in regard to the importation of American hogs. The department considers these hogs are not of a sufficiently healthy type to be allowed to come into Canada except after quarantine of sixty days. This would make the import of American hogs impossible—comparatively small packing houses require at least 1,000 per day—to bring in hogs from the United States at the present time would necessitate 60,000 hogs held up in quarantine and a perpetual investment of say $1,000,000 for live stock, which could not be used for two months from date of purchase. This would be a hardship no packing house could exist under.

Now just another item in regard to butter. I hold in my hand an original telegram absolutely authentic:

Monday, Chicago, March 6,

Lang Packing Co., Mill St., Montreal, offer 300 tubs or less, June or Sept. storage, creamery 60 pounds ash tubs, medium colour and salt, our score 90 points, 18 cts., Chicago.

P. H. WEAVER & CO.

That butter could be laid down in Montreal at 18½ cents, American butter: I find that the price of a similar quality of butter in Montreal is 24 to 25 cents, and here is a bona fide offer in the ordinary course of daily business of 300 tubs at a price that would lay it down at 18½ cents. I ask the Canadian farmer what he thinks about that kind of reciprocity. Does he consider that his interests have been protected in this matter? Here is another quotation from the New York 'Commercial,' of February 14, 1911:

The total exports of butter from Canada to Great Britain in 1909 were 5,353,770 pounds and to the United States 92,468 pounds. The latest available figures for the United States are contained in the census reports for 1900 when New York state alone produced upwards of 70,000,000 pounds and the aggregate production of the entire United States was more than a billion pounds.

All this billion pounds of butter comes into competition with the dairy products of the agricultural people of Canada. And here is what they say:

In the year 1909, we imported from Canada less than 100,000 pounds of butter, Canada imported from this country 473,805 pounds. Now when Canada removes her four cents a pound duty upon this product who can measure the amount of butter that this wider market will create for our own farmers? It will be our butter that will be flooding the Canadian market instead of this country being overwhelmed with the Canadian article.

The egg statistics are equally illuminating. in 1909 Canada's total exports of eggs amounted to about 552,000 dozen, the amount coming to this country being about 52,201 dozen. In the same time her imports of eggs aggregated 1,136,120 dozen, so that it appears the country bought twice as much as she exported. The Canadian duty on eggs amounts to three cents a dozen, and with this duty removed the burden is on the political farmer to show why he would not be benefited by this greater market instead of being injured by competition.

And so I could go on all through these statistics. All these favoured nation countries are highly protective, yet we have given the absolute freedom of our market to these twelve countries. No wonder the Finance Minister hesitated to give that information to us.

I think that if I had gone down and made a bargain of that kind I would have been very loath to tell the people about it. It has been said over and over again that Argentina will have no effect on our trade. We have had so many statistics quoted to us that I will not weary you with statistics, but I want to give one or two concise arguments that are based on these statistics and that I know are absolutely correct. I hold in my hand an intensely interesting article that I read several months ago from the 'Journal of the Royal Society of Arts,' published in London, and dated December 10. When first I read it I had no idea of this treaty coming on. There is an article written for this society by one Campbell J. Ogilvie. It is a most intensely interesting article and covers the whole history of the growth of the agricultural production of Argentina, beginning at the beginning, it is full of illuminating statistics, it contains documents and maps, and it is absolutely accurate. I find that until 1876 Argentina imported wheat for home consumption.

Argentina exported wheat and food products to Great Britain in 1908 to the amount of one-quarter of the total food products imported into the United Kingdom. Yet that market is absolutely in competition with this market, as I have shown by the transportation route, by the prices and by the conditions. Now, let us see what Argentina says. The people there are alive to the situation. This subject is so broad that one could take a single phase of it, occupy this House for several hours, and occupy it well, in placing this argument before it. But here is the summing up. After pointing out that they send 25 per cent of the total food products into the United Kingdom and that the United States sends in 33⅓ per cent, the writer of this article says:

The lesson shown her is one worthy of attention. We see that Argentina supplies England with one-fourth of her imported food, and the United States of America supplies nearly one-third. Therefore, it behooves both England and Argentina to see that America does not so manipulate things that she acquires the control over our meat and food supplies.

If it behooves Argentina and Great Britain to see that America does not acquire control over their meat and food supplies, how much more does it behoove the Dominion of Canada to see that America does not acquire control over that trade? Yet, in that connection, what are the facts? I can prove to you by the documents here that that is the exact position and the effect of this treaty. Let me quote again Sir George Ross in regard to it.

We must not forget that the mere exchange of certain articles may involve a great deal more than appears on the surface. For example, to abolish the duty on wheat on both sides of the line looks fair, but to accept an offer of that kind pure and simple would, in my opinion, be a poor bargain for Canada. I believe that the longer the American tariff of 25 cents a bushel on Canadian wheat is maintained the better for us—Canadian wheat has now a distinct place in the British market; if the market of the United States were freely opened it would be impossible to maintain its identity in passing through American elevators, and Canada would be the loser to the extent of any reduction in price.

Following up the contention of Sir George Ross, I want to read from an official document the statement of the Hon. Philander C. Knox, who made this bargain with the ministers from Canada. What does he say with regard to that?

In providing for free wheat we also take into account the facilities which the United States possesses for handling a part of the surplus of Canadian crop and thus preventing the demoralization of prices which results through the dumping of large quantities upon the European markets, where the world's price is fixed. The free admission of grain from Canada thus meets the present situation, and provides against future contingencies when the Canadian surplus becomes greater by placing the control in the hands of our own grain-growers.

I especially call your attention to that. Mr. Knox says that

The free admission of grain from Canada provides against future contingencies when the Canadian surplus becomes greater by placing the control in the hands of our own grain growers. They have no cause to fear a demoralizing influx under the conditions which will result from the reciprocity agreement.

He says fairly and unmistakably in that paragraph that the result of this agreement willl be to place control of Canadian grain absolutely in the hands of American elevator companies. To show that that is a fact here is what the 'Northwestern Miller' says:

The disposition of Canada's surplus is a question upon the answer to which depends the future, not only of the milling interests of the (American) Northwest, but indeed of the United States. Should this surplus be shipped abroad, it must inevitably mean the destruction of the American export trade, the shifting of the American milling centre, the gradual decline of the American milling interest to a purely domestic basis, and its ultimate retrogression to a comparatively unimportant place in the list of large American industries. . . . The miller who is able to grind this enormous (Canadian) crop will be the miller of the future; and, where he is, there will be the great mills of the world.

I commend that to the grain growers of the Northwest, but I shall prove it by the farmers' delegations themselves because I want to take their authority. Here is what they say as quoted from the official document:

All we have said in regard to the elevators at Fort William and Port Arthur, applies equally to elevators that must be constructed in the near future at Hudson's bay and particularly at Pacific coast terminals. The reasons are even more urgent in respect to the Pacific coast than have been advanced for acquiring those at Fort William and Port Arthur. The reasonable and logical way for the grain produced in Alberta and even in the western portion of Saskatchewan to find its market is via what has been termed the 'western route.' The western development that is bound to take place in British Columbia in the next decade, assures us that a very large portion of the farm products of Alberta will find a market in this province.

Yet, this pact would force British Columbia to give its $14,500,000 worth of agricultural products not for the wheat of Alberta but for the wheat of Washington, Oregon and other American states. But they said more than that. Mr. Richardson, speaking on behalf of the grain growers, page 25, said:

I noticed a statement in a newspaper some time ago that it might be good policy to adopt the Minnesota law. Gentlemen, I think our trouble is all from Minnesota. All the wrinkles, all the knowledge gained in 35 or 40 years of elevator terminals there has been brought to Canada and used in Canada. We were doing much better before the Minnesota people came in. Do not let us go there to look for help. Surely, we are able to help ourselves.

So say I. But that is not all.

I think that our No. 2 Northern to-day is equal to Minnesota No. 1 Northern. I think that if I were to lay these two grades down before a miller in New York State, he would give ours the preference. Now, we want to keep it that way; we do not want to weaken our grades. I have always said that we have the best climate, the best people, we can raise the best wheat, and we have the best waterways,—let us keep on doing. We are a great country, and we can afford to buy these terminal elevators.

He is asking for terminal elevators, but I say the whole argument bears out what the Hon. Philander C. Knox says, what Sir William Van Horne, in his letter. says, what Sir George Ross says, what Mr. J. J. Hill says and what I do not hesitate to say. Mr. Hill has demonstrated a fact which I always believed, namely, that it is not the tariff that has made the difference in the prices of grain products in the west; that it is due to local conditions of transportation and matters of that kind, and he has proved that beyond all question, by the fact that there is a greater difference in the price between the various states of the union, than there is between the prices in western Canada and the prices in the western states. The position is that if we remove this tariff as the agreement proposes, then the American millers will get in our No. 1 hard northern wheat, mix it with the softer, inferior grain, skin it down as the technical term is, and it will go out to the Liverpool market as No. 1, but barely passing that grading, and it will take a reduced price. The very argument that the millers present for government owned elevators, will be absolutely out of the control of Canada, and it will reflect back on the Canadian farmer, and instead of getting a higher price, he will get a lesser price. There is a blue-book issued by the Dominion government giving the case of the Manitoba farmers and when you look at their case, and look at what the government has given them, you will see that the western men have literally asked for bread and they have been given a stone. I have here a letter received by the leader of the opposition which is very apropos of the situation, and which reads:

Montreal, March 2, 1911.

R. L. Borden, M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Mr. Borden,—If the Hon. Mr. Fisher is correctly quoted in the Ottawa 'Citizen' of the first instant, he made a statement to the effect that I had succeeded in getting a resolution passed by the Montreal Board of Trade condemning the proposition before the House, but that two weeks later the 'loyal and imperial Board of Trade of Montreal rescinded that resolution, realizing that the Canadian millers would not be injured; inasmuch as they realized that the same agreement opened up to them for their flour a market of ninety millions of people.'

This sentiment apparently was cheered in the House.

I seconded the resolution brought before the Board of Trade by the council at the annual meeting on February first last, and this resolution has not been rescinded. It has been presented to Sir Wilfrid Laurier in its original form.

I am not aware of any Canadian millers realizing that by the proposed agreement a market of ninety millions of people to the south of us would be opened up for their flour products. The fact stands out preeminently that the Americans, as mentioned in my recent letter which appeared in the press, maintain a duty on Canadian flour entering their market of 50 cents a barrel and 12½ cents per hundred pounds on by-products, or $2.50 per ton.

Surely the Hon. Mr. Fisher was aware that in the agreement now before the House there is a prohibitory duty on both flour and by-products entering the United States from the Canadian miller.

Also as reported in last night's 'Star,' the Hon. Mr. Fisher mentioned my name, that I had headed an article which appeared in the press lately, 'Preserve the Integrity of the Empire,' and stated that he would rather substitute the words, 'Preserve my Preserve for the Benefit of Mr. Meighen,' that the free trade policy would interfere with the monopoly enjoyed by the millers in the northwest in purchasing wheat from the farmer.

The millers are purchasing their wheat in the open market in competition with the wheat buyers of the world. There is no monopoly. I deny the assertion that the company I represent is in any combination with any other milling company or private individuals for purchasing wheat either high, or low, or uniform. We run our own business quite independently.

Therefore, the Hon. Mr. Fisher has made quite a mistake in stating that I am striving to preserve a monopoly in the northwest in purchasing wheat.

If his theories are correct, that the arrangement now before the House will give the farmer a higher price for his wheat, thereby raising the value of farm lands enormously and also enhancing the value of timber lands covered with a crop of puly wood, then I will inform the Hon. Mr. Fisher that my holdings of farm lands west of the Great Lakes and of timber lands covered with a crop of pulp wood east of the lakes, even at their present value without any alleged enhanced value on account of reciprocity or the trade agreement with the United States, are ten times larger than my interests in the milling business of which I am president.

Therefore, according to the hon. gentleman's theories, I am working decidedly against my own interests in opposing the agreement.

I take my stand, however, against the present agreement from national and imperial and commercial grounds, entirely apart from prospective values of the properties in which I am interested.

Is it asking too much of you to have a member on your side read any portion of this letter in the House when you may think it favourable, and make my denial as public as the remarks of the Hon. Mr. Fisher have been made, as I believe it is not customary for a member of the House to use the name of a private individual as mine has been used by the Hon. Mr. Fisher.

Yours faithfully,
ROBERT MEIGHEN,
President and managing director Lake of the Woods Milling Co., Ltd.

I have here an official statement containing a message from the president of the United States, entitled, 'Reciprocity with Canada,' transmitting in response to Senate resolution of February 23, 1911, a report from the tariff board relative to various commodities proposed in the Canadian reciprocity measure,' and I shall quote from this, as they bear on my argument, some figures. The prices on February 11, were as follows:

—	Chicago, Ill.		Toronto, Can.	Montreal, Can.
	$	$	$	$	$
No. 1 beef carcass	.....	9 50	9 50	9 50	10 75
No. 2 "	...	8 00	9 00	.....
Lamb.....	8 50	9 00	12 00	.....
Mutton.....	.....	6 00	9 00	8 00	8 50
Pork.....	10 00	12 50	10 50	12 00	13 00

On page 112, this report says:

With the increase of population dairying is year by year becoming a more important industry in both countries, and in many sections of our north central states, where beef making or sheep rearing were once in vogue, dairying, with its logical attendant industry of pork making, is rapidly extending. The lack of corn, the existence of a well-established dairy production, and the availability of suitable forage has led to the introduction of another agriculture speciality in which Ontario excels, to wit, the breeding and rearing of bacon pigs as contrasted with the heavy corn-fed lard hog of our middle west.

Coming to the general matter of meat production, we find that Ontario figures more as a breeding ground for animals of the beef and mutton types than as a commercial factor of special importance in the actual marketing of meat on the hoof.

Here is used the very argument I used the other day at Brockville, that our farmers in Ontario, particularly during the last 25 years, have gradually developed a class of hog which produces the best bacon in the world. It is a hard grain fed hog, and there comes into competition with it the soft corn fed hog of the United States which is sold at a lower price. To-day, in my own town of Rossland, our lumbermen and miners buy the American hog at a cheaper price than they can purchase Canadian raised pork, and that is the situation all over the country and it is stated here officially in this United States report.. One other statement, and I have done with these statistics. This I also know, because several of my friends have been fortunate in making a fortune in dealing along this line.

6. Live Stock.

The accompanying table gives a comparative view of the number in 1909 and the value in 1910 of live stock.

Prices of horses range from $106 to $125 per head in Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont and New York. In Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota and North Dakota the range is from $111 to $126, and in Montana, Idaho and Washington from $80 to $108. In eastern Canada prices of horses range from $107 to $139 per head, while in western Canada the range is from $107 to $156. In the great agricultural states of Indiana, Illinois and Iowa prices range from $120 to $124. In all the Canadian provinces except Prince Edward Island, Manitoba and Nova Scotia the prices are higher than in any of our states.

Prices of dairy cows range from $33 to $39 a head in Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont and New York. In Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota and North Dakota the range is practically the same. In the western border States of Montana, Idaho and Washington the range is from $41.80 to $46.50. In eastern Canada prices of dairy cows range from $32 to $48 and in western Canada from $39 to $41. The highest Canadian price quoted is $48 in Ontario as against $46.50 in Montana, the highest American price.

I have endeavoured to make a fair argument, taking all my statistics from official sources. I think I have shown that in every particular this compact, if carried out, will work to the detriment of the agricultural classes of the people of Canada both east and west.

That is undoubtedly the case, and I think I have proved the case. I have proved that it will work very detrimentally to the interests of the mechanics, artisans and labourers in every part of Canada. Over and above all that is the fact that from 1763, from the treaty of Paris, when this country was ceded to Great Britain, we, under the ægis of the mother country, have built up this great empire. We have occupied the whole of the northern half of the northern portion of this continent of America. Under her care and protection, through the assistance of her money, we have developed this country until we have one of the greatest inland carrying waterways in the world to-day. We have three great transcontinental railroads about to be completed; we have, as I pointed out before, a through route between three great continents. Then I ask you, as loyal Canadians, whether you, at one fell stroke, at the dictation of two men, or thirteen men, or any body of men, without consulting the interests of the people of Canada, without hearing their views on the matter, will cast aside those traditions that have made up a great Canadian people, so that the eyes of the nation to the south are turned upon us, the eyes of the whole world are turned upon us, the mother country is looking to this young giant at this time to assist her in building up that great empire to which Cecil Rhodes has referred in such splendid language. I looked to-day for a quotation, which I have mislaid, from one of the great American magazine men, who spoke before the Canadian Club, Mr. S. S. McClure. I wish you would remember those words of patriotism and faith. He says: There has been nothing in the history of the world that has stood for the civilization and advancement of nations in religion, morality and freedom like the great, mighty Union Jack. He, an American citizen, made use of these words. I ask you, then, as members of this House of Commons of Canada, are you going to cast aside all these traditions, are you carelessly and thoughtlessly and without due consideration to lose all the efforts of the last 150 years? I think not, I think that to-day, as in the earlier days, in those other three times, when we came to the parting of the ways, in 1867, in 1870, in 1878, if Canada, in 1911, is left to herself the better judgment will prevail and we will stand as we have ever stood for an independent Canadian nation within the British Empire; we will stand to carry out the great destiny that has fallen upon us. Thus we would be doing the duty that those who have gone before have left to us and those that come after will realize that at least this House, this parliament of Canada, has stood for the best interests that go for the making of a nation.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton). Mr. Chairman, we have listened for quite a long time to the hon. member for Kootenay (Mr. Goodeve), but I regret to say that I did not hear anything new during his three-hour speech. He has told us that he did not want to put anything on 'Hansard' that was there already. Of course, that is a matter of judgment for himself, but I venture to think that he has put very little on 'Hansard' that has not been put on 'Hansard' quite a number of times already. The hon. member spoke about making arguments and backing them up. The hon. gentleman is a lawyer, and I volunteer if there is any characteristic of a lawyer at all it is that he has a keen sense of what argument is, and I am sorry that the speech of my learned friend was not—

Mr. GOODEVE. My hon. friend the Deputy Speaker knows I am not a lawyer; I am only a plain, ordinary, business man.

Mr. FIELDING. He is not guilty to that extent.

Mr. McKENZIE. I am glad he has made that explanation, for I was sorry for the sake of the profession that it would require so many words from a lawyer to put forward the very meagre ideas that were brought forward before this House. There are very few things in my hon. friend's speech that are really of importance and serious. He says that this agreement, if it goes into force, is going to stagger and break up our relations with the mother country. If that is true it is a very serious matter. He makes another charge against the members of this government, who have made the agreement, that they bound us hand and foot to the American government and sacrificed our autonomy, so that we will have no control whatever in future over the making of our own tariffs. That is another very serious charge. He made another statement that this compact was holding a club over the heads of the different provinces of Canada in respect to the question of pulp wood. That is another charge made by the hon. member, which, if true, is very serious. There is nothing better in cases of this kind than to go right to the very source of the matter and find out what is in this agreement to corroborate, or to carry out, or to sustain the statements made by the hon. member for Kootenay (Mr. Goodeve).

On the question of being tied hand and foot and our autonomy being hampered in any way let us read the fourth paragraph of the agreement as set forth and signed by the Canadian plenipotentiaries. Will any ordinary man, whether in this House or out of it, say that there is anything in that paragraph to back up the statement made not only by the hon. member for Kootenay (Mr. Goodeve) but by the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) and the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster)?

The only allusion to that phase of the subject is to be found in section 4:

> 4. The governments of the two countries having made this agreement from the conviction that, if confirmed by the necessary legislative authorities, it will benefit the people on both sides of the border line, we may reasonably hope and expect that the arrangement, if so confirmed, will remain in operation for a considerable period. Only this expectation on the part of both governments would justify the time and labour that have been employed in the maturing of the proposed measures. Nevertheless, it is distinctly understood that we do not attempt to bind for the future the action of the United States Congress or the parliament of Canada, but that each of these authorities shall be absolutely free to make any change of tariff policy or of any other matter covered by the present arrangement that may be deemed expedient. We look for the continuance of the arrangement, not because either party is bound to it, but because of our conviction that the more liberal trade policy thus to be established will be viewed by the people of the United States and Canada as one which will strengthen the friendly relations now happily prevailing and promote the commercial interests of both countries.

I ask you what there is in that section to support the very serious charge made against this government by that hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Goodeve). Let us see how that compact is understood by the United States government. Mr. Knox, Secretary of State for the United States, tells us in his letter, and that letter shows that they understand the pact exactly as it is expressed. He says:

> Department of State, Washington,
> January 21, 1911.
> The Hon. W. S. Fielding, and
> The Hon. William Paterson, > Washington.
> Gentlemen,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of this date in relation to the negotiations initiated by the President several months ago for a reciprocal trade arrangement between the United States and Canada, in which you set forth and ask me to confirm your understanding of the results of our recent conferences in continuation of these negotiations.
> I take great pleasure in replying that your statement of the proposed arrangement is entirely in accord with my understanding of it.

There it is set forth clearly and distinctly by our plenipotentiaries that no such binding, no such tying up can possibly be the result of this agreement. The plenipotentiaries of the United States, speaking on their own behalf and on behalf of the President of the United States says he understands the agreement precisely as it is expressed by our plenipotentiaries. There can therefore, be no such binding or trammelling of our rights or interference with our autonomy. I submit, therefore, that the charge made on that point is without foundation so far as the agreement is concerned, and we have nothing else to draw upon but that agreement as submitted to us. A very serious charge was made by the last speaker (Mr. Goodeve), namely, that we were interfering seriously with the autonomy of the provinces and were putting a club in the hands of the people of the United States by which they might force our provinces into sending pulp wood free of duty into that country. I submit that that charge is just as unfounded as the other. Paragraph 10 of the agreement deals with that point. It is well the people should know exactly what the agreement is and what foundation there is for such serious charges as are made by gentlemen who are opposed to this arrangement

10. With respect to the discussions that have taken place concerning the duties upon the several grades of pulp, printing paper, &c.—mechanically ground wood pulp, chemical wood pulp, bleached and unbleached, news printing paper and other printing paper and board made from wood pulp, of the value not exceeding four cents per pound at the place of shipment—we note that you desire to provide that such articles from Canada shall be made free of duty in the United States only upon certain conditions respecting the shipment of pulp wood from Canada. It is necessary that we should point out that this is a matter in which we are not in a position to make any agreement. The restrictions at present existing in Canada are of a provincial character. They have been adopted by several of the provinces with regard to what are believed to be provincial interests. We have neither the right nor the desire to interfere with the provincial authorities in the free exercise of their constitutional powers in the administration of their public lands. The provisions you are proposing to make respecting the conditions upon which these classes of pulp and paper may be imported into the United States free of duty must necessarily be for the present inoperative. Whether the provincial governments will desire to in any way modify their regulations with a view to securing the free admission of pulp and paper from their provinces into the market of the United States, must be a question for the provincial authorities to decide. In the meantime, the present duties on pulp and paper imported from the United States into Canada will remain. Whenever pulp and paper of the classes mentioned are admitted into the United States free of duty from all parts of Canada, then similar articles, when imported from the United States, shall be admitted into Canada free of duty.

I submit that nothing could be plainer or stronger than the statement there made by the Canadian plenipotentiaries. And that statement is that there is no desire to interfere in the slightest degree with the full powers of the provincial authorities to deal with this question. If the provinces, which now have those regulations, wish to continue them, there is nothing to prevent their doing so. And if any other province sees fit to make such regulations, there is nothing in this compact to interfere with that right in the slightest degree. I submit, therefore, that there is not the slightest ground for these two grave charges made by the hon. members opposite in connection with this agreement.

A further charge made is that this agreement is going to strike at the loyalty of the Canadian people, that it will switch them off from their attachment to the mother country, and make them Americans. Well, the quotation I am about to make from the report of the British ambassador to Washington will no doubt be accepted by the people of this country, and his opinion is very much stronger than anything I could say. What does Mr. Bryce say on this point. I suppose it would be quite unnecessary to give any certificate of character to this witness, as to the force of his observations or his credibility. But, in case there might be, I will read what was said about him in this House a couple of days ago by no less a personage than the hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden, Halifax). That hon. gentleman said:

The Minister of Marine and Fisheries has stated that some people in this country had apprehensions as to what might be the result when Mr. Bryce was named the British ambassador at Washington. So far as I am concerned, I have heard of none of these apprehensions and know of no one who entertained them, unless it be the Minister of Marine and Fisheries himself. I believe that Mr. Bryce has acted conscientiously and with ability and energy on behalf of the interests of the mother country and of Canada throughout the course of these difficulties at Washington.

That is the man whose evidence I wish to put before the House in connection with the charge of disloyalty to the interests of the Canadian people as alleged in connection with the negotiations of the agreement which is now under consideration in this House. This is the despatch:

London, March 8.—Ambassador Bryce's reports to the foreign office on the subject of the United States-Canada reciprocity negotiations were issued in a white paper this evening. The most interesting communication is under date of January 22, the day following the conclusion of the agreement. In this the British diplomat says:

This is the part I particularly wish to bring forward in answer to my hon. friend from Kootenay:

As at present advised, I am disposed to believe that British interests are not to any appreciable extent prejudiced. No opportunity was lost in the course of the negotiations of reminding the Canadian ministers of the regard which it was right and fitting that they should have to the imperial interests. The arrangement still rests in reality on a growing realization of the fact that a high tariff wall between contiguous countries whose products are economically interchangeable is an injury to both and opposed to sound fiscal principles. In so far as the arrangement oversteps this basis it is probably influenced and will at any rate be publicly justified and defended in the United States, by the traditional policy of the United States of promoting close economic relations with the states of the western hemisphere.

That such a policy is not counteracted by and does not check the rapidly growing sense of national consciousness and international importance in the peoples of those states has of late been abundantly proved.

No more in Canada than in the republics of Latin America to which the United States government has sought to extend its pan-American propaganda, does there seem a likelihood that a freer interchange of commodities will lead to closer relations of a political kind.

That is the opinion expressed by the right hon. gentleman who occupies the very high and honourable position of Ambassador from His Majesty's government in Great Britain to the United States government at Washington. He is responsible for advising his government and his King as to effect this agreement is likely to have upon the attachment of this nation to the Crown. If it has any tendency to break up our loyal connection with the Crown of England, it would be the duty of this man, his special duty, to so report. He reports to the very contrary. Therefore, I think the people of Canada, and the people of the British Empire generally, will accept the opinion of so notable a representative of the British nation as Mr. Bryce in preference to any opinion that may be expressed by gentlemen in this House who cannot be expected to have such a wide knowledge of the subject in hand as did the gentleman whose business in particular it was to hold close supervision over this question.

I do not propose to follow any further the observations of my hon. friend from Kootenay. As to whether the interchange of products between this country and the United States is a good thing or a bad thing, I am not in a position to say with any authority. I do not profess to be an expert in questions of trade. But, as an ordinary individual having ordinary knowledge of the commonplace things that govern trade. I should suppose that this arrangement ought to be a good thing. I believe it is a good thing; and for that reason I intend to support the motion before the House. A great deal has been said, and I suppose a great deal more will be said hereafter, to show that the men we sent to Washington were not fully equipped for the very important business they had in hand. All I have to say is that, if we are to enter upon any agreement at all with a foreign country to extend our trade and better our conditions, in this case we did the very best we could. In the party to which I belong, I cannot put my hand upon a better equipped set of men than those we sent to Washington. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), has been for the last thirty years in training in this line of work. For the last fourteen years he has held the position of Minister of Finance of the Dominion and for fourteen years before that he was Prime Minister of Nova Scotia, having charge of its finances. Since he took charge of the finances of the Dominion, he has on two occasions carried on inquiry all over the country on fiscal questions including every subject that possibly could come under consideration at Washington. He was assisted by the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), a man of almost the same length of training and of immense experience. And these gentlemen had two experts at their elbows. I submit that the Dominion of Canada was as well represented as we could hope it to be—we had no better men. I feel about sending the Minister of Finance to Washington much as the English people felt when they sent their best man to command in the Boer war. They had sent one general after another into the field, and at last they brought forward the veteran, Lord Roberts. We felt that we were in the last ditch, that we had strained every nerve, and that if Lord Roberts could not do the trick we had no one else to send. That, I believe, is the way the people of Canada felt about the negotiations at Washington—if the Minister of Finance could not succeed, we had nobody else to send who would better the situation. I am satisfied that the Canadian people, at all events the friends of the government and those who can approach this question without bias, will be satisfied that the very best thing had been done for the Dominion of Canada and that the future operations of this agreement will show that the best agreement of a commercial kind for the Dominion of Canada has been made that ever was entered into between this country and any foreign nation, and that another wreath will be placed upon the head of the Minister of Finance as the man who has ably looked after the affairs of this country and in whom the people of this country have good reason to place implicit confidence.

Now, Sir, I cannot understand why it should be a bad thing for us to make a trade agreement with the United States. It will not be said by any person that we should not trade wherever we can do so profitably. It will not be said by any person that when we have seven or eight million people alongside a nation with 90 million we should not trade with them, particularly when it is taken into consideration that we have just as great and just as productive a territory as they have, that our object is to grow and become just as large as they are. It must be admitted that our ambition is to grow, and expand in every direction. I would like to ask those hon. gentlemen who oppose this agreement and ask us to let well enough alone, how they propose to reach that high state of nationhood which all patriotic Canadians have in view. Therefore, if it is right and proper that we should seek expansion of trade, where can we more reasonably hope to obtain it than with our neighbours alongside of us? I think it will be admitted that the 90 or 100 millions of people in the United States, are good customers. They are men largely of our own blood, speaking our own language, having our own high ideals, and they are prepared to use anything that we can supply to them. I think it is admitted that there is abundance of room in the American market for anything we have to sell. We are a new country, and we are not exporting largely the finer class of manufactured goods, but we are exporting largely the products of the sea, of the farm and of the forest. I think it will be admitted that there is abundant room in the United States for the sale of all these articles. If that be true, and if the American people are willing to buy and to pay the price we ask, can there be any serious objection to trading with them? I submit there is none.

Now, Sir, another objection that is put forward by the opponents of this agreement is, that it will undermine the loyalty of the Canadian people to the British flag. It would seem that if we can assure our Conservative friends that there is no danger in that direction, they would be quite willing to allow this agreement to go into force. We are already dealing with the United States in exports to the extent of something like $114,000,000 per year. For many years we have been doing a profitable trade with the United States, and as a consequence, I do not think there is the slightest trace of disloyalty in the Canadian people. We are also importing into this country something like $250,000,000 worth of goods, and I submit there is not the slightest trace of disloyalty in the Canadian people in consequence of that trade. Now if we can do this enormous trade that we have done in the past without any harm to our loyalty, is it reasonable to suppose that a still larger trade with our United States neighbours will have any such effect? Who can really argue, that a much large trade with them than we have been doing, will have any effect upon our loyalty to the Crown to which we owe allegiance? I say it is a sad reflection on the Canadian people that any person should talk in that way. Where are our Conservative friends going to find those disloyal people of whom they talk so much? Are they going to find them in British Columbia? I guess not. The people of British Columbia pride themselves on their English origin and their English ideas. Are they going to find these disloyal people in the province of Alberta? There are no such men in that province. Are they going to find them in Saskatchewan or Manitoba? Certainly not. Are they going to find them in the great and loyal province of Ontario? No one supposes for a moment that there are any in that province. Are they going to find them in Quebec? We never heard of any. The people of Quebec have stood their baptism of fire and showed their loyalty to the British Crown more than once. It is not likely that the sale of an ox, or a cow, or a barrel of potatoes, or a ton of hay, by the people of Quebec to the United States, is going to vary that loyalty which has stood the test for 150 years, and no more strenuous circumstances are likely to arise again. In New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, I am sure the people have proven their loyalty and their love for the old flag for nearly 200 years, and they are not going to change now.

Now if these things be so, and we can find no trace, no seed of disloyalty in this Dominion, where is the danger of having the fullest and amplest trade with our neighbours? Is there any danger in giving a man who has wheat to sell an opportunity to sell it in England, to sell it in Canada, or to sell it in the United States? Have not our people a right to trade to any extent with any of these countries? Have not the men who raise wheat in the Northwest a right to sell it in Winnipeg, or in Montreal, or across the border, wherever they could get the best price? No one will make the assertion that the Canadian farmer is incapable of competing with the American farmer, or any other man on earth, in the production of grain. He has the capacity to bargain for the sale of it, he has the capacity to arrange for its transportation. If that be the case, if we have the transportation facilities, and if we have the products, why should we not seek a market for them? If the English market is open to us to-day, and if it is the best, surely we have common sense enough to hold it. If we can get more money for our wheat in the Canadian market, surely we can trust the Canadian farmer to sell it in Montreal, Winnipeg or Toronto. If he finds that he can sell his wheat in the United States to better advantage than in the Canadian market, whose business is it to interfere with him? Is it not the duty of this government to place the widest possible market at his disposal? That has been the theory of the Conservative party as well as of the Liberal party for the last forty years, at all events, ever since confederation. There has been no party in power or in opposition in Canada that has not been favourable to better trade relations with the United States than we could usually have.

There is a great cry that we have no mandate to make this agreement. If this is a good bargain, if it is a good proposition for the Canadian people, if it is a good thing for the farmer, for the lumberman, for the men who have manufactured goods to sell, if it gives the manufactured article any advantage, is the manufacturer or the farmer going to say to the Canadian plenipotentiaries: True, I can sell my wheat, my horses, my sheep, or my goods better, but I do not think I will take advantage of this agreement because you had no mandate from the people when you made it. That would be carrying the matter to an extreme absurdity, and I am reminded of a story of the man who was so extremely strong on the eight-hour law that he allowed himself to drown after he had been eight hours in the water rather than transgress it. He said that he would not break the eight-hour law, but that he would rather die in the water than try to save himself he had struggled for eight hours. That is a very extreme case, but it would appear to me that the farmer, or mechanic, or lumberman who wished to find fault with this agreement by saying that there was no mandate would be in the same class as the extraordinary man who would not save his life, after he had struggled in vain for eight hours.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to pay a little further attention to some observations that were made about the prosperous condition of this country, and before I reach that I wish to say something about the province of Nova Scotia, and the coal question. I suppose the coal industry is the largest of any one industry in Canada. The coal industry of Nova Scotia has a capital invested in it of something in the vicinity of $100,000,000, it has 10,000 or 12,000, possibly more, men directly dependent upon it, and for us in Nova Scotia the coal question is a very important one indeed. At the same time, we realize that we are part and parcel of the country, that it takes all kinds of people to make a world, and that all manner of agreements, give and take must be made in order that we shall get along peaceably and harmoniously the one with the other. That being the case, and knowing that there must be revenues raised in this country and that the consumer must also be taken into consideration, the consideration of this question all manner of agreements, give and take, must be made. Speaking as one representing the coal industry of Nova Scotia, while we would like to have seen the duty remain as it was, and while we think it would have been perfectly justifiable to let it remain, we are content to take our share of the burden of taxation upon the people, and if eight cents a ton has been taken off that coal we must put up with it, and do the best we can. I think that with the fair start the coal industries have made, with the standing they have attained now, and the character of the article that we are producing, we will be able to stand the strain that may be cast upon us by reason of this reduction. However, I notice in a paper published in Sydney that it is cast up to the premier of Nova Scotia, and my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) that they have never done anything for the coal trade, and that they have always been trying to hurt it. I want to state that in so far as I can learn there is nothing on record in the history of the Conservative party that would indicate or in any way satisfactorily prove that they have ever done anything for the coal industries of Nova Scotia. The coal industries of Nova Scotia have a history, and that history shows that nothing was done for them worthy to be mentioned by the National Policy. Our friends speak of the National Policy as the only thing that they ever produced that is worthy of praise or mention. What is this National Policy? A stranger coming into this country would think that it was some great, herculean act performed by the Conservative party of that day that had brought about the greatest possible amount of prosperity and expansion in this country. What does it amount to? Before the adoption of the National Policy in 1879 we had a tariff of 17½ per cent, and the Conservative party raised that to something around 25 per cent. That is all that the National Policy is, nothing else; no great statesmanship about it, no great difficulty about raising a tariff from 17½ to 25 per cent, or a little higher, or as high as you like. There is nothing wonderful about it. That is all the National Policy is, and what has it done for the coal industry of Nova Scotia? I am talking here in the presence of members of this House, what I say will go before the coal owners of Nova Scotia and the people I represent. Talking, therefore, in this place and subject to criticism, I submit, Sir, that while the coal industries of Nova Scotia had nothing to go upon but the National Policy it was simply dragging along, and starving. You will find the Halifax 'Herald' of September, 1906, reporting that in those days of the National Policy coal was simply capable of giving half time and half pay to its people, and that it was on the ragged edge of poverty. That is the way that paper speaks in an article written by Mr. Milner who professes to be an authority on the coal question. From 1878 to 1893 we had nothing in Nova Scotia, but the National Policy in so far as the coal industry is concerned. During the whole of that period the highest year's output in the Island of Cape Breton was only 700,000 tons—a very small output and produced by half time and half pay, according to the Halifax 'Herald.' In those days the hon. gentleman who is now the Finance Minister was the Prime Minister of Nova Scotia. He came to the conclusion that something had to be done, and that an improvement ought to be made in the conditions of affairs in Nova Scotia. He set about bringing American capital into Nova Scotia for the purpose of improving the conditions of the coal trade.

What happened in these days is just what is happening in this House to-day. He was met with the most strenuous opposition from the Conservatives in the local legislature; he was told that what he was doing would reduce the thousands of miners of Nova Scotia to the position of serfs, depriving them of their manhood and liberty; that they would be subject to the combines and monopolies of the United States; that the Americans were purchasing the Cape Breton mines to close them down and that ruin would follow. Any one who reads the speeches of the then leader of the opposition in the local House, Mr. Cahan, will realize that I am not overdrawing the picture. In the face of all that, the Hon. Mr. Fielding, then Prime Minister of Nova Scotia, went on with the agreement, and as a result $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 of capital was invested in this industry, and where we were then exporting 700,000 tons of coal per annum we are to-day exporting over 5,000,000 tons, and the towns and hamlets which had then a population of two and three thousand are to-day cities of twenty thousand people. Where we then had many disjointed companies with small mines we have to-day this magnificent development of the Dominion Coal Company, and the Dominion Steel Company, and the Tar and Chemical Company, and the cement companies and others, none of which would be in existence were it not for the policy laid down by the Hon. Mr. Fielding, who was then in charge of the destinies of Nova Scotia. At that time, Senator MacKeen, who was then a member of this parliament, and whose Conservatism will not be questioned, because he vacated his seat in this House to make room for Sir Charles Tupper when it was found necessary to bring him back into politics to try and redeem the fortunes of the Conservative party; Senator MacKeen, because of the character of the Tory opposition to this great scheme, found it necessary to write, in the interests of Nova Scotia and of Canada, as follows:

> I believe that legislation by which alone it was possible to bring capital into the country for the development of our coal and iron industries to an extent far beyond the capacity of Great Breton capitalists to invest, is, and must be, for the good of the whole province, and should not be condemned but encouraged by every one having an interest in the prosperity and welfare of our country.
> I have no sympathy with parties who, prompted by political passions, deliberately denounce measures which, if successfully carried out, must result in public good; and such a course seems to me to say very little for the intelligence of those persons who pursue it.
> They still hold them and with the exception of two small mines which could not be worked to a profit, they are working more vigorously than ever. A company which only purchases mines in order to close them does not commence to build forty miles of railroad at a cost of upwards of half a million dollars and push the work forward with the utmost despatch. Nor does it entirely rebuild a large shipping pier at a further outlay of nearly $300,000, and this is what the Dominion Coal Company are doing with the railroad from Bridgeport to Louisburg, and with the old international pier. Surely this alone would by all reasonable men be accepted as a sufficient contradiction to this mean slander.
> Depend upon it, this company has come to stay, and the above facts should effectually silence those cavillers who for purposes of their own have tried to arouse the fears and stimulate the hostility of the miners of Cape Breton by falsely alleging that the policy of the company would deprive them of employment in the future.
> I think those who seek for any reason to stir up opposition to a company which has introduced such an enormous amount of capital into the island, and which is laying itself out to provide employment for a far greater number of miners than are at present employed in the industry, is no friend to the inhabitants of Cape Breton, and fails altogether to appreciate the important consequences which I firmly believe will follow the establishment of this concern.

That was the language Senator MacKeen used under conditions which to my mind were very similar to the conditions which exist to-day. We were then in Nova Scotia bringing about a new condition of things, we were getting more capital into the country, and the Conservatives told us as they are telling us to-day: leave well enough alone, what we have we hold, don't do anything for the advancement of this country but just stand where you are. Well, the Liberals went on with their policy in Nova Scotia and development and progress followed, and it was due not to the National Policy but to what is known as the Whitney legislation and the enterprise and foresight of the Minister of Finance, who to-night leads this House. Our Conservative friends have criticised the representatives from Nova Scotia in this House because we are willing to agree to a cut of eight cents a ton on the duty on coal and they tell us what marvellous things they would do for us if they had control. There is no better means of arriving at what people would do if they had the power than to take what they say when they are out of power, and, when a few evenings ago this very important question, the member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) was put up as the representative of the opposition to reply to the First Minister. We have a right to assume that the leader of the opposition did not put up the hon. member for North Simcoe without some consideration to answer the most important speech that will be made on this great question, and which was delivered by the Prime Minister, who was listened to with greater interest on this question than would be any other man in the country. I suppose the leader of the opposition did not mean any discourtesy to the Prime Minister when he put forward the hon. member for North Simcoe, on the contrary I would expect that the hon. gentleman submitted to the leader of the opposition what he was going to say, and that anything he did say on so grave an occasion had the full sanction of his leader. On the question of protection for coal this is what was said by the hon. member for North Simcoe, who represented the leader of the opposition on that important occasion:

> If Nova Scotia continues to send such men to this House, and there is no doubt from the signs of the times that there will be a change in the next parliament, I for one, staunch protectionist as I am, will have to consider whether it is worth while for the rest of the country to grant a duty of 50 cents a ton to Nova Scotia on coal and a bounty on her steel.

That is the threat which is held over our heads by the gentleman who spoke for the opposition in answer to the speech of the Prime Minister. Later on, I think it was yesterday, another front bencher of very high standing I suppose in the Conservative party, evidently very close to the leader of the opposition, and, I presume, when talking on trade questions, voicing the ideas of that hon. gentleman; I refer to the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Northrup), spoke on the question of protection to coal, and said:

> We only bear the duty on coal and iron in consideration of a duty on our products, and since that was the direct bargain made in 1878 and renewed since, as you have broken the bargain, and removed our duties, we will insist that the duty on coal and iron be removed in order that justice may be done.

That is what we have to expect if our friends on the other side should come into power, and I submit, Sir, that on the question of coal, as I have already explained, whatever is done to-day in the province of Nova Scotia, whatever strides the industry has made, have been made, not because of any assistance or support received from the national policy, as I have pointed out that during the ten years of the national policy the great property now known as the Dominion Coal Company coal areas, and that of the Nova Scotia Steel Company across the water, together only produced 700,000 tons of coal, whereas to-day the same properties are producing, under the new legislation, something over 5,000,000 tons, all brought about by what is known as the Whitney legislation, a new departure from the old road, in which we travelled for 20 years before that departure was made. I submit that the occasion was much like the present, and that we in Nova Scotia followed the Premier in those days and followed him to success in the teeth of the most vigorous opposition the Conservatives could make to the project. I submit we have a perfect right, and we are bound, I think, to place every confidence in the scheme that the Finance Minister has set before us to-day, believing that the same results will follow.

Mr. BLAIN. When was the duty put on soft coal?

Mr. McKENZIE. A duty was put on soft coal as far back as 1870 or 1871. It was taken off by our Conservative friends when they were in power before 1878, and in 1878 it went on again, but my submission is not that the Conservatives put the duty on or took it off; I am arguing, and I think successfully, that the duty was not sufficient and did not give any impetus to the coal industry in Nova Scotia, and the standing of the coal industries in Nova Scotia to-day is not due to the national policy, but to the Whitney legislation introduced and carried forward by the Hon. Mr. Fielding, then Prime Minister of the province of Nova Scotia. I said, further, that the cry then was to be satisfied with what we had and go no further.

There is one thing more that I propose to say in connection with this matter while we are answering the charges made against us by the Sydney 'Post' on this coal question. They say that the Minister of Finance and the Premier of Nova Scotia were always the enemies and never the friends, and that the duty was, of course, the saviour of that coal question, and that were it not for the duty the death knell of the coal industry in Nova Scotia would have been struck long ago. What did Sir John Macdonald say about the coal duty when we in Nova Scotia were told by the Conservatives that we could not get along without the coal duties, but that every miner would be thrown out of employment, that the pit mouths would be closed if the duty was taken off? On the 30th day of July, 1890, in the midst of this condition, and when our Conservative friends were holding forth that the only friends of this industry were Sir John Macdonald and his government, he writes this letter to an American gentleman of high standing in the cabinet of that day:

My Dear Sir,—In answer to your esteemed note of this day, I desire to say that I am fully assured that the parliament of Canada will be ready to take off all duties on coal, ores and lumber imported from the United States whenever Congress makes these articles free of duty. The Canadian government has already authorized Sir Julian Pauncefote to state to the American government that they will be prepared to take off the export duty on logs whenever Canadian lumber is admitted into the United States at the reduced rate of one dollar per thousand board measure. You are at liberty to show this to the members of Congress and the President as you please. It should not, for obvious reasons, be published in the press or quoted in Congress. In the United States Tariff Act provision might be made for making the above-mentioned articles free whenever they are made free by the Canadian parliament.

I remain, my dear sir, faithfully yours,

(Sgd.) JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Mr. LENNOX. I would call my hon. friend's attention to the fact that a few moments ago he referred to the hon. member for East Hastings as saying:

We only bear the duty on coal and iron in consideration of a duty on our products and since that was the direct bargain made in 1878 and renewed since, as you have broken the bargain, and removed our duties, we will insist that the duty on coal and iron be removed in order that justice may be done.

Mr. McKENZIE. That is exactly what I quoted.

Mr. LENNOX. The hon. member quoted that as being a statement made by the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) as a proposition that he advanced. That was not fair to the hon. member for East Hastings. I think my hon. friend intended to be fair, so I will read what the hon. member for East Hastings said leading up to this:

I warn the Finance Minister that if he is as regardless of his own province as he apparently is of the Dominion as a whole, the farmers whom he has selected as the particular objects of his animosity, who, of all people, are to be deprived of protection, whose markets are to be given not to the United States but to the world, I warn that hon gentleman that if he really is true to his newly found and oft-professed although rarely acted-up-to belief in the doctrine of protection, the day is not far distant when the farmers of Ontario will say: We only bear the duty on coal and iron.

And then follows the quotation which the hon. member read. My hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie)—

Mr. McKENZIE. Is my hon. friend going to break into my speech?

Mr. LENNOX. I do not wish to. I am only calling the attention of the hon. member to the fact that the hon. member for East Hastings was not giving that as a statement of the attitude he or any member on this side would take, but merely as what the farmers would probably say as the result of the Finance Minister's action. I think it fair to say that.

Mr. McKENZIE. The hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) stated positively what he believed would happen, and to this he gave the force of his opinion, whatever that may be worth.

Mr. LENNOX. That is not fair.

Mr. McKENZIE. I do not wish to have patch work made of my speech by quotations of this kind.

Mr. LENNOX. I submit that that is not fair, and as a question of fact——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman cannot interrupt except with the permission of the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie).

Mr. McKENZIE. I have granted, I think, all that can fairly be expected of me in the way of interruptions.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) must resume his seat. There is a well understood rule that whenever the Speaker or the Chairman has occasion to rise to order, any hon. gentleman who is endeavouring to address the House, must stop speaking and resume his seat. The hon. member knows the rule. The hon. member for North Cape Breton has given way to the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) for a considerable length of time, and now he objects to do so any longer. Therefore, the hon. member for South Simcoe has not the right to interrupt unless he rise to a point of order.

Mr. LENNOX. I rise to a point of order. I do not propose to take a lecture from the Chairman in a matter of this kind.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must resume his seat. It is not permitted to criticise the action of the Chairman. That will not be allowed unless the House itself will change its rules. If the hon. gentleman has a point of order to raise, he must raise it concisely and distinctly and specify the point he raises, but he cannot be allowed to criticise the action of the Chair.

Mr. LENNOX. I rise to a point of order, perhaps two points of order. One is that when I am speaking, and am in the midst of a sentence the Chairman has no more right to interrupt me than has any one else.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. On that point I rule that the Chairman has the right to intervene at any time any hon. member is out of order, and if the occasion requires it, will do so.

Mr. LENNOX.. The next point I wish to raise is that the statement made by the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) is not correct as a matter of fact.

Mr. FIELDING. That is not a point of order. My hon. friend knows that.

Mr. LENNOX. And therefore I have a perfect right to call the attention of the Chairman to the fact that the hon. gentleman who has the floor has misstated a matter of fact. I wish to proceed now to point out in what respect the hon. gentleman has misstated the fact.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has not the right to correct any misstatement of fact made by an hon. member unless it brings into question his own word. In such a case, he may deny the accuracy of the statement affecting himself personally, and have the words withdrawn, but he is not at liberty to interrupt an hon. member who has the floor because he believes that that hon, gentleman is making a statement which is not correct.

Mr. LENNOX. I wish to appeal from your ruling, Sir. The point I wish to make is this——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman wishes to appeal from my ruling he has the right to do so, but he has not the right to debate it. My decision has been given. If he desires to appeal from it, I shall refer his appeal to the House through Mr. Speaker.

Mr. FIELDING. I would ask my hon. friend not to press his appeal. On reflection I am sure he will see that an interruption can only be allowed by consent. I do not suppose he is anxious that we should have appeals in points of order, and I would ask him not to press it.

Mr. LENNOX. I suppose I have the right to state what my point of order is. It is this. The hon. gentleman, in dealing with the statement which he attributed to the member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup), misrepresented what was said by that hon. gentleman. I am quite prepared to assume that he did so inadvertently, but I desire to call attention to the misstatement of fact, and I submit that under the circumstances, as a member of this House, I am entitled to have that misstatement made right by appealing to the records of the House. But I understand that you, Mr. Chairman, hold that I have not the right to do so. If that be the case, with the greatest respect to you, Sir, and the Minister of Finance, I propose to prosecute the appeal.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The committee will now rise in order that I may report to the House with the Speaker in the Chair, the point of order taken and the ruling I have made, namely, that no hon. member has the right to interrupt an hon. gentleman who has the floor for the purpose of denying a statement of fact not personal to himself or affecting his own words.

The committee rose and the Speaker took the Chair.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. member for South Simcoe, Mr. Speaker, having claimed the right to interrupt the speech of the hon. member for North Cape Breton in order to correct a statement of fact not affecting himself, and permission being denied by the hon. member for North Cape Breton, the Chairman decided that the hon. member for South Simcoe was not entitled, under the rules, the privilege of so interrupting. Thereupon the hon. member for South Simcoe appealed from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question is shall the ruling of the Chair be sustained.

Mr. LENNOX. Before you put that motion, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SPEAKER. No debate can be allowed on that motion.

Mr. LENNOX. I do not wish to debate it. What I wish to say is that the reference made is not, in my opinion, a true and correct summary of the position.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am sorry, but I have to take the statement as given me by the chairman.

Mr. LENNOX. I wish to enter my protest in that way.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Perhaps I might be allowed a word. If in writing it, I have not correctly reported the position, I would be very willing to ask that the hon. gentleman be allowed to correct me.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the chairman wishes to correct his report, that is another matter. I have to take the statement as made to me by the chairman.

Mr. LENNOX. I wish to explain, Mr. Speaker, but I realize that it would not be in order for me to rise while you are standing——

Mr. SPEAKER. There is the difficulty. Under the rules no debate is allowed on this motion. The question is: Shall the decision of the chairman be sustained?

Motion agreed to, and decision sustained.

The House again resumed in Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. McKENZIE. I am sorry that there should be any such interruption or difficulty. I should expect fair treatment from the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox), but I am interrupted by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Campbell) in characteristic style——

Mr. CAMPBELL. I rise to a point of order. I absolutely object to being referred to when I am not interrupting. I did not speak to the hon. member (Mr. McKenzie) who has the floor. I made a remark to the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox), and suggested that he hand 'Hansard' to the gentleman who has the floor so that he could correct himself, if he had made a mistake.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Evidently, a mistake has been made; but there is no point of order.

Mr. McKENZIE. It is my experience in addressing this House to be interrupted by the hon. member for South Simcoe. I presume he does not do it with malice aforethought. But he seems to fall into the habit of interrupting me frequently, and, I believe, without sufficient reason. However, I do not object very much, but I wish to put myself fairly before the House and the country. I quoted remarks in 'Hansard' complete in themselves, made by the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup). I could not put his whole speech again on 'Hansard.' I did not garble the paragraph, but quoted it complete. To put myself right before hon. members, I will quote it again. I do so for the purpose of showing that the coal duty has no friends among the Conservative party. These are the words of a gentleman in good standing in the party on the left of the Speaker. I submit that he is a man who takes a very active and prominent part in the debates of this House, and seems to be regarded by his friends as an authority. When he speaks on a question of this kind, we his opponents have a right to believe that he is stating the view on the trade question of the party to which he belongs. His words are:

> We only bear the duty on coal and iron in consideration of a duty on our products and since that was the direct bargain made in 1878 and renewed since, as you have broken the bargain, and removed our duties, we will insist that the duty on coal and iron be removed in order that justice may be done.

That is word for word as it is in 'Hansard.' The difficulty with my hon. friend from South Simcoe is, that he wishes, evidently, to put on 'Hansard' the whole of the speech of the hon. member for East Hastings in the midst of my speech.

Mr. BLAIN. Will the hon. member (Mr. McKenzie) permit me a word? I would not interrupt without permission.

Mr. McKENZIE. I am willing to be asked a question, but I do not wish, if I can avoid it, to have more of somebody else's speech in the midst of mine.

Mr. BLAIN. The point is that in the very next sentence the hon. member for East Hastings gives his own opinion, I am sure my hon. friend has overlooked that.

Mr. McKENZIE. All that has been put on record by the hon. member for South Simcoe.

Mr. BLAIN. I understood it was not. That is the very point of contention. I am asking my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie), with his permission, if he will allow the opinion of the hon. member for East Hastings to go on 'Hansard,' in conjunction with the statement made. If he is unwilling, I will not press it.

Mr. McKENZIE. A good deal of the speech has been read by my hon. friend from South Simcoe, as much as I thought was fair to be interlined in my own speech.

Mr. LENNOX. We will have it to-morrow.

Mr. McKENZIE. My hon. friend is quite welcome to have it to-morrow, or every other day of the session. If he thinks there is anything more in the speech that is of advantage to him, he cannot be prevented from putting it, in the proper way, on the record. But I do not think it fair that I should be asked to sit down that the long speech of the hon. member for East Hastings may be read into my own.

It is growing late, and as it is impossible for me to finish my observations this evening, I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. FIELDING, House adjourned at 11.48 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, March 10, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FISHERY REGULATIONS.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) whether the regulations under the Fisheries Treaty of 1908 with the United States have been proclaimed, and if not, what is the obstacle to their proclamation?

Mr. BRODEUR. They have not yet been proclaimed. I have been informed that a message has been sent to the President of the United States to the Congress recommending the passage of the necessary legislation to put these regulations into force, but I have not been informed that the necessary legislation has been passed. So that the matter is in statu quo for the present.

Mr. BRADBURY. When may we expect the report down with regard to the Manitoba Fisheries Commission? I have had a wire to-day from Manitoba asking for it. As it is pretty late in the season, the people there are getting anxious about the matter.

Mr. BRODEUR. A report was received by me a few days ago, and I immediately transmitted it to the Printing Bureau to be printed. As soon as it is printed it will be brought down. I expect that it will be ready in a few days.

Mr. BRADBURY. Is it possible to get a copy before it is printed, as the printing may take some time?

Mr. BRODEUR. Only one copy was sent to me. I expect that it will be ready in a few days, as it is not very voluminous. I will call the attention of the Secretary of State to the matter

PRIVILEGE—MR. NORTHRUP.

Mr. W. B. NORTHRUP (East Hastings). Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called, I rise to make a personal explanation as a question of privilege. Last evening, while I was absent from the House, certain references were made to myself and to some remarks which I made last Wednesday, by the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie). So deep is my respect for the dignity of this House, and so sincere my regard for the maintenance of the good reputation of its members, that had the references been only to myself, rather than have marred the pages of 'Hansard' with the proofs which I shall be compelled to give this afternoon, I would have preferred to have lain under the imputation of being the hypocrite and fool which I must have been had I made the remarks attributed to me. But as the remarks of the hon. gentleman not only related to myself, but reflected on the honour of the leader of the opposition, and on the fair fame of the Conservative party, I am compelled, however reluctantly, to lay the facts before the House. The hon. member for North Cape Breton, according to 'Hansard,' at page 5124, spoke as follows:

> Later on, I think it was yesterday, another front bencher of very high standing I suppose in the Conservative party, evidently very close to the leader of the opposition, and, I presume, when talking on trade questions, voicing the ideas of that hon. gentleman; I refer to the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Northrup), spoke on the question of protection to coal, and said:
> We only bear the duty on coal and iron in consideration of a duty on our products, and since that was the direct bargain made in 1878 and renewed since, as you have broken the bargain, and removed our duties, we will insist that the duty on coal and iron be removed in order that justice may be done.
> That is what we have to expect if our friends on the other side should come into power, and I submit, Sir, that on the question of coal, as I have already explained, whatever is done to-day in the province of Nova Scotia, whatever strides the industry has made, have been made, not because of any assistance or support received from the National Policy, as I have pointed out that during the ten years of the National Policy the great property now known as the Dominion Coal Company coal areas, and that of the Nova Scotia Steel Company across the water, together only produced 700,000 tons of coal, whereas to-day the same properties are producing, under the new legisaltion, something over 5,000,000 tons, all brought about by what is known as the Whitney legislation, a new departure from the old road, in which we travelled for 20 years before that departure was made.

The hon. member who spoke, being not merely a distinguished member of this House, but a gentleman who enjoys the experience of having occupied a seat on the bench for many years, and being therefore acquainted with the consideration of questions of evidence and the construction of documents, when that hon. gentleman chose to say, in the first place, that I was voicing the sentiments of the leader of the opposition, and that, I take it, could only mean the Conservative party—and were there any doubt on this point it is put beyond question by his final words: 'That is what we have to expect if our friends on the other side should come into power'—I think the House will allow me to state what I did say on the occasion in question. Referring to the unrevised 'Hansard' of last Wednesday, at page 4962, I quote my remarks as follows:

I warn the Finance Minister that if he is as regardless of his own province as he apparently is of the Dominion as a whole, the farmers whom he has selected as the particular objects of his animosity, who, of all people, are to be deprived of protection, whose markets are to be given not to the United States but to the world, I warn that hon. gentleman that if he really is true to his newly found and oft-professed although rarely acted-up-to belief in the doctrine of protection, the day is not far distant when the farmers of Ontario will say: We only bear the duty on coal and iron in consideration of a duty on our products and since that was the direct bargain made in 1878 and renewed since, as you have broken the bargain, and removed our duties, we will insist that the duty on coal and iron be removed in order that justice may be done.

I went on:

I, as a protectionist, would be exceedingly sorry to see a movement of that kind on the part of the agricultural element of this country. I think perhaps the most dangerous feature in this measure is the unhappy setting of one class against another, for nobody can possibly argue, even the Finance Minister, and the Prime Minister know it is impossible to argue this agreement on any platform without denouncing the manufacturers and appealing to the farmers. If it is to the interests of this country to set class against class, let us proceed with this discussion, but if not, let us know that the true basis of our national prosperity is a protective policy, then let all classes enjoy it, or as the farmers say, either all shall have it or none, and I am sure there is no man in Canada so rampant a free trader, except possibly the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), as to believe that it is the true interests of Canada that all protection should be removed from all industries.

I leave the alleged quotation given by the member for North Cape Breton and the full 'Hansard' report of my words to show whether or not I am justified in calling the attention of the House to what I would consider certainly a misquotation of my remarks. The hon. gentleman, as a judge, knows perfectly well what perhaps some men may not know, but in order to make perfectly clear to him, the difference between a partial and a complete quotation, let me give him an illustration. If I were to look at my hon. friend in the eye and say: The Good Book says: 'All men are liars,' probably he would counter on me by saying: Yes, but the rest of the quotation is: 'I said in my haste, all men are liars.' And, therefore, the Psalmist meant exactly the opposite of what the garbled quotation would have indicated. I trust I have done my duty in laying before the House this alleged quotation of my remarks and my actual remarks as reported in 'Hansard.'

REPORTS OF BANK CURATORS.

On the orders of the day being called.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to revert to the return to an order of the House of Commons dated February 6, 1911, for a copy of the curators' reports in the cases of all banks for which curators have been appointed. I mentioned the other day, and the Finance Minister took note of it that with reference to the Bank of Yarmouth, instead of the return including the curator's report, it simply included a synopsis of the curator's report what I want is not a synopsis which may be very different from the report itself, but that which is provided for in the Banking Act, and which the Finance Minister has a right to have, and which the member of parliament has a right to call for. Coming then to the Bank of St. Johns, and the St. Hyacinthe Bank, I think that the only thing brought down is a small page of statistics giving a financial statement, that and that alone. With reference to the other banks, the curators give reports upon the conduct of the banks, and causes that led to the failure and they detail the delinquents and in what matters they have been delinquent, which of course is the only thing that a curator's report is meant for, to give to the Finance Department, after it has given it to the Bankers' Association, an idea of what were the defects, what were the faults, what were the delinquencies, so that, having this knowledge, the department can do what is considered proper either to punish in these cases or to provide that such things shall not easily occur again. Therefore, in the case of the Banque de St. Hyacinthe and Bank of St. Johns I want the curator's report upon the nature of the transactions and the causes that led to the failures. They are given in the case of the St. Stephen bank with great particularity, and I may say that they furnish food not only for consideration, but for legislation. I am certain that the full report from the Bank of Yarmouth will do the same, and I shall be very much mistaken if we do not get profitable information from the curator's reports in reference to the other banks. Therefore, what I want from the Finance Minister is first the full report of the curator in the case of the Bank of Yarmouth and the full reports of the curators in the cases of the Banque de St. Johns and the Banque de Hochelaga.

APPOINTMENT OF COLOURED PERSONS IN THE CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. DANIEL. Is the Minister of Marine and Fisheries prepared to give an answer to the question I asked yesterday in regard to the colour line in the naval service?

Mr. BRODEUR. I thought at first from the remarks of my hon. friend that he referred to a man who wanted to come as a recruit in the navy, but I understand it is the case of a man who wanted to pass his examination for the inside service. It appears that this man had not passed his examination for the inside service, but had passed the qualifying examination for the outside service and consequently was not qualified to come into the inside service.

Mr. REID (Grenville). What about the coloured man the Minister of Agriculture sent out to the agricultural farm?

Mr. FISHER. The gentleman in question has been sent by the Civil Service Commissioners for temporary service at the experimental farm. He is doing there most excellent service, and everybody there is perfectly satisfied.

Mr. REID (Grenville). He is looking after the black Minorca hens? Is that it?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). In the outside service or the inside service?

INQUIRY FOR RETURN.

Mr. JAMESON. When may we expect a return in regard to the bait freezer at Barrington Passage ordered on the 21st of last month?

Mr. BRODEUR. I shall make inquiries, I thought that was down.

SUPPLY—TRANSPORTATION IN CANADA.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals). Mr. Speaker, in taking advantage of this opportunity to make a few observations in reference to the transportation problem of the Dominion of Canada, I presume no apology to the House is needed. I admit at the outset that I fear what I have to say will prove dry and to a certain extent uninteresting in comparison with the discussions that have taken place in the House in the past few weeks; but the facts that I will try to place before the House may be useful in further discussions and although some of the figures I shall give may be found in the annual reports at various places, I think probably that if they are placed on 'Hansard' it will be more convenient for hon. members to get at them, and that they will be of more practical use than if members are obliged to find them by looking through the reports.

I am of the opinion that transportation has as much to do with the success of a country as tariff has. These two are interwoven in a measure, but, certainly, if we do not provide the methods by which the wealth producers can get the products of their labours to market at a reasonable rate, with fair speed and in good condition, there is little use of having any tariff, and less use of hunting for markets for these products. I think it is no exaggeration to say that in the matter of perfecting transportation facilities by aid from various sources, Canada, possibly, leads the world in the courage she has shown. There is a difference of opinion as to the propriety of further encouraging these great transportation companies by cash subsidies, by land grant, or by guarantee. It is not the policy of the present government, as I understand it, to any more give aid by way of land grants for the extension of transportation facilities. The land of the Dominion of Canada has become too valuable to give in this way, and the potentialities of increase in that value are so great, on account of the rapid development of the country, that it is more practical to give in dollars and cents any aid we have to give. And, besides, when it is given in this way, the people know exactly what they are paying for the benefits received. I have no fear of the success, present or future, of the railway companies of the Dominion of Canada. If there be north-and-south lines we must not forget that a line running south that can take traffic from Canadian roads also runs north, and can bring traffic to Canadian roads. And, Canada having the geographical position on this continent that she enjoys ought to be able to more than hold her own in the carrying trade of the continent, other things being at all equal. Our rail routes are shorter and we own the largest portion of the waterways that lead from the west to the east. Under these conditions, it rests, I think, with the people of the Dominion of Canada themselves to say whether they shall maintain their carrying trade, and also to say whether they shall, in the future, do their own carrying trade, and also a portion of the carrying trade of the great country to the south of us.

Let me for a moment refer to the Board of Railway Commissioners. I need not take up much time in pointing out the beneficial work being done by the board for this country. It is admitted everywhere in Canada, I think it is admitted outside of Canada, that the Board of Railway Commissioners as now constituted is doing better work than any similar body in the world. And it is the most popular tribunal for the settlement of difficulties in which the people are concerned that exists to-day. I will not go into details to show how many applications have been received during the year. The figures will be found in the report. Day after day the department receives word of approval of the work being done by this body. The fact that the humblest citizen in the Dominion can come either by letter or personally before this board and get his grievance adjusted, is, to my mind, the outstanding beneficial feature of the board. It has been suggested that counsel should be engaged to protect the interest of the public in cases coming before this tribunal. In any large cases, such as investigations of express companies, this is necessary, and it has been done, but where a farmer has a grievance about a crossing it is not necessary, before this democratic board, that he should have any counsel. He merely writes a letter, and probably by return mail, has the satisfaction of having his grievance redressed and of learning that the railway companies have been asked to do what he wants them to do. There has been added to the staff of the board an operating department, presided over by Mr. Nixon, a very active and prominent railway man. The difficulty heretofore in deciding cases, particularly those between the railway companies themselves, was the absence of a head who had had a great deal of practical experience in deciding what was practical operation of railways. Consequently railway companies, with their ablest counsel and their own operating men present, were in the position to take strong ground either way, and it was difficult for the board to arrive at proper conclusions. The chairman of the board, ex-Judge Mabee, suggested that an operating department should be established, the head of it to be a practical man, who could give the board advice, and who would know what was practical or not practical in any orders given by the board, or any requests made. The working of that department has proved very beneficial in disputes arising between railways, or between railways and private individuals, as to operation, the work of the board in this respect has been greatly simplified, and it is much easier to get an early decision than it was some years ago.

It may be of interest to the public to know just the situation of the railways of Canada. The following figures afford a comparison of mileage of main track in operation:

MILES OF RAILWAY TRACK IN OPERATION.

	Miles.
1901	18,140
1909	24,104
1910	24,731

Increase in one year 1909-1910, 627 miles.
Increase for ten years, 1901-1910, 6,591 miles.

In this mileage, the Grand Trunk Pacific line is not included, it being yet operated as an uncompleted road. The mileage under construction on June 30th last was 4,500 miles. If we add the lines under construction to those already in operation we have a total mileage of close upon 30,000 miles in the Dominion of Canada.

The capital invested in railways in Canada is shown by the following figures:

CAPITAL INVESTED IN RAILWAYS.

1909	$1,308,481,416
1910	1,410,297,687

Increase for one year, $101,816,271.

1901	$ 816,110,837

Increase for 10 years, $594,186,850.

Sir, when you look at the comparatively small debt of the Dominion of Canada, and compare it with the amount alone invested in railways in this country, I think it will be recognized that, for the advancement we are making in our transportation facilities, for the advancement we are making in other lines, the debt of Canada has been kept down remarkably well. Let me now submit to the House some tables bearing on this question:

AID TO RAILWAYS.

1909	$188,963,339
1910	190,753,062
Increase	$ 1,789,723

This increase was made up as follows:—

By the Dominion	$1,382,192
provinces	248,531
municipalities	159,000

In addition to the foregoing cash subsidies, the Dominion in 1910 made a loan of $10,000,000 to the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Land subsidies to the extent of 55,292,321 acres have been given by the Dominion and the provinces, of which 32,040,378 acres were granted by the former.

TRAFFIC.

Passengers carried:

1909	32,683,309
1910	35,894,575

1901	18,385,722
1910	35,894,575
Increase for 10 years	17,508,853

Tons of freight:

1909	66,842,258
1910	74,482,866
Increase	7,640,608
1901	36,999,371

EQUIPMENT.

The railways of Canada added last year to their equipment:

Locomotives	110
Passenger cars	138
Freight cars	1,934
Company's cars	789

These additions brought up the available rolling stock to the following numbers:

Locomotives	4,079
Freight cars	119,713
Passenger cars	4,320

Now, the question of transportation is very important as regards the men who are working with their hands as well as with their heads in this work throughout the Dominion. It is customary, in discussing transportation problems, to refer to them as being the property of capitalists, and dominated by them. They are to a certain extent, but the development of our railways, the development of our waterways, is of vital interest to the men who find employment on these railways and on these waterways. Here are the figures: There were in the service of Canadian railways on June 30 last 123,768 employees, whose wage bill amounted to $67,167,703. In addition, there were 16,709 employees engaged in outside operations such as steamers and hotels, whose remuneration amounted to $5,169,923. The aggregate would therefore be 140,477 employees, with a total wage bill of $72,337,626. Assuming that each railway employee represents five persons, it is obvious that about one individual in 10 of our total population finds a livelihood from the railways of Canada.

Now, to put it briefly, these figures show I think these facts: The year 1910, measured by the increased volume of traffic measured by the earnings, economic administration, satisfactory maintenance, and swelling mileage, and measured by every proper standard, appears to have been the best year in the history of Canadian railways.

Now, leaving railways for a moment, I want to place on record the figures in connection with the canal traffic of the Dominion; because, discuss it as you may, increase our railway facilities as we must, one thing to my mind is absolutely necessary, and that is that Canada must not lag behind in keeping her waterway transportation as fully developed as possible. It is a curious coincidence, perhaps not so curious when you come to go into it in detail, that the greater the increase in railway traffic the greater the increase in canal and waterborne traffic. That arises from the fact that the volume of traffic is greater and that the regulating force of the waterways on the rates of railways attracts traffic to those particular routes that are so governed. I would like to say, Mr. Speaker, that the way for Canada to secure and to keep for herself an ever-increasing trade is to be alert on the question, not only of railways, but the development of harbours and waterway transportation. Following is a statement of tons of freight passed through the various canals during the years 1909 and 1910:

	1909.	1910.	Increase.
Sault Ste. Marie	27,861,245	36,395,687	8,534,442
Welland	2,025,951	2,326,290	300,399
St. Lawrence	2,410,629	2,760,752	350,123
Chambly	752,117	669,299	82,818
Ottawa	336,939	385,261	48 322
Rideau	91,774	134,881	43,107
St. Peter's	79,850	85,951	6,101
Murray	102,291	177,941	75,650
Trent Valley	59,952	46,263	13,699
St. Andrews	.....	8 283	8,283
Total	33,720,748	42,990 608	9,269,860
1901		5,665,259
1910		42,990,608

Increase for 10 years.. .. 37,325,349 tons.
Equal to 660 per cent.

It will be observed that while the railway traffic increased 101 per cent the waterborne traffic through our canals increased 660 per cent. This emphasizes what I have said that Canada can keep her carrying trade and add to it if she is alert to the privileges that providence has placed in her way in developing the resources and waterways that we have.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). That waterway traffic, the minister must remember, is not Canadian traffic.

Mr. GRAHAM. Well, Mr. Speaker, I would be happy if it were all Canadian, but I am gratified to know that my prophecy has been carried out, and that in addition to carrying Canadian traffic we are also handling a lot of American traffic through our waterways.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). We are not carrying it; it is the Americans who are carrying it through our waterways.

Mr. GRAHAM. It is going through our channels at least. It went through the Sault canal.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It seems a remarkable increase. Can the minister give us any figures with respect as to just how much of this remarkable increase is due to the conditions pointed out by my hon. friend from South Lanark?

Mr. GRAHAM. What conditions?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). American traffic from American ports to American ports passing through our canal at the Sault.

Mr. GRAHAM. I have not those figures with me. Perhaps I can get them when we are in supply.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). They are very important.

Mr. GRAHAM. I do not know that they are important to my argument. I am pointing out the necessity of the continued improvement of our waterways, and I have shown conclusively that our waterways do carry the traffic and that the people get the benefit of it. If we are to continue to have this traffic borne through our canals we must develop this branch of our transportation system. I have the figures here for all the canals, not only for the Sault but for the Welland, the St. Lawrence, Chambly, the Ottawa, the Rideau, St. Peter's, Murray, Trent and St. Andrew's canals, and these figures show that these waterways have increased more rapidly in their carrying capacity than the railways of which they are the regulators and that if Canada is to retain her hold on the carrying trade she must be alert to the greater improvement of her waterways.

Now, I want to point out how the railway traffic is divided. This is a matter of deep interest at the present time to the House. I dare not travel afield to get into some other discussion, but I merely point this out to hon. gentlemen who have been discussing at some length the question of transportation from another standpoint. For the year ended 30th June last following were the classes of commodities carried by the railways of Canada:

	Tons.
Products of Agriculture	12,891,351
" animals	2,765,006
" mines	26,152,022
" forests	13,068,940
Manufactures	10,014,279
Merchandise	2,518,190
Miscellaneous	7,073,078
Total	74,482,866

Mr. FOSTER. Is this dealing with Canadian products solely?

Mr. GRAHAM. This is dealing with traffic on Canadian railways without any division as to where it comes from. Put into percentage form, and carrying the comparison back to 1907, the result is as follows:

	1907.	1908.	1909.	1910.
Agriculture	16.85	14.91	17.91	17.31
Animals	4.37	3.92	4.21	3.71
Mines	32.68	35.92	35.81	35.11
Forests	14.11	10.56	11.82	13.44
Merchandise	4.08	3.18	3.58	3.39
Miscellaneous	9.79	11.02	9.32	9.50

Joining products of agriculture and products of animals, and classifying them as products of the farm, the showing is as follows:

	1907.	1908.	1909.	1910.
Farm products	21.22	18.83	22.12	21.02

There is no means by which the volume of farm products shipped to the United States over Canadian railways can be ascertained. Turning to the Trade and Navigation returns, however, it is seen that for the year ended 31st March, 1910, the value of products of agriculture exported to the United States was $8,204,250, and of animals and their produce $10,629,614. It is not known what was the value of the commodities of these classes carried by the railways. Only the tonnage is reported. It was impossible to trace this out and to find what proportion foreign agricultural products bore to the Canadian traffic, but I would presume that the great bulk was of Canadian production.

I tried to get some figures as to the shipment of our wheat through Canadian and American ports. The figures are a little difficult to get at, and from various sources I find that they come to varying conclusions, but the figures given to me, I think, are practically correct. Of course, it must be borne in mind that these figures include wheat shipped to Buffalo also, and from there to New York and other American ports, while the figures with respect to Canadian ports will include all shipments, I presume, which go to Montreal. The total shipments of Canadian wheat to Canadian and American ports by rail and water for the crop year ending August 30, 1910, are:

	Total. Shipments. Bush.	To American ports. Bush.	To Canadian ports. Bush.
1908	65,629,873	10.515,264	55,114,609
1909	87,121,814	21,423,530	65,698,284
1910	101,468,538	29,717,525	71,751,013
	*44,396,047	*17,032,391	*27,363,656

(*Three months ending November 30.)

Shipments to Duluth, contained in above totals.

	Bush.
1908	1,571,940
1909	1,566,700
1910	4,500,000

The bulk of the shipments to the United States were exported from that country either as flour or wheat. Dutiable wheat imports into United States from Canada:

	Bush.
1908	114,956
1909	650,601
1910	1,856,181

These are a few general figures as to the traffic which I wish to place on record, and I think they will, perhaps be of use to members of the House in discussing various matters.

Now, Sir, looking to the second point with which I wish to deal, namely, the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, hon. gentlemen understand that I am not going into detail on this subject now, because probably later on there will be a discussion on this question and it would only be repetition were I to enter into details to-day. But, for the benefit of members of the House, so that they will know exactly how the progress of the work stands, I wish to present the following general statement:

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mountain Section.

Total expenditure as certified to by the chief engineer..		$18,765,330 20
Total payments made to the company..		11,763,509 61

Prairie Section.

Total expenditure as certified to by the chief engineer..		$34,436,168 48
Total payments made to the company upon guarantee.... ..	$10,735,482 92
Total payment made to the company on account of special loan..	10,000,000 00
		20,735,482 92

The amount spent by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company for rolling stock, locomotives, &c., up to date is $14,744,253.14.

The progress of the road on the Mountain section is given to me thus briefly:

It will be noticed that the road is progressing from the terminus of the prairie division west and from Prince Rupert eastward. During the last few months, I had the privilege with the Prime Minister and others, of visiting Prince Rupert and going out on this line for a number of miles towards the mountain pass. It may seem peculiar to those who are not in a position to know, when I say that there are sections of the Transcontinental east of Winnipeg much more difficult of construction than any section through the mountains from Prince Rupert east. Going along the Skeena river there are distances of several miles absolutely level and the difficulty the contractors have is not to overcome obstacles of grade so much as to overcome the difficulty of draining the railway owing to the level country. We went out for a good many miles over this section, and I believe it will be found in the years to come that this portion of the road running from Prince Rupert east, will tap many fertile valleys of British Columbia, and of course, we do not know what it will open up in the way of mineral and timber wealth. From Wolfe Creek west the road is ballasted as far as Edson for several miles; track laying has been completed to the 57th mile and grading, &c., has been completed to the 65th mile and at intervals as far as the 117th mile. The contract for the work has been let as far as the 180th mile, and at Edson there is under construction a station house, one engine house, and one machine shop.

Mr. FOSTER. That is up to what date?

Mr. GRAHAM.

Mr. GRAHAM. Up to December 31 last; I think that is the date speaking from memory. Track laying has been completed as far as mile 102 east from Prince Rupert, and grading, &c., is completed as far as mile 102 and at intervals as far as mile 184. The contract has been let for work as far as mile 240, the contract dating from the 1st November, 1909. At mile 8 (Zanardi Rapids), a 625 foot steel bridge has been completed. At mile 147 the portals of a 700 foot tunnel have been completed. At mile 135 a 180 foot tunnel has been completed.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Would the minister give the percentage of the work done and how long it will take to complete?

Mr. GRAHAM. The percentage is not nearly so large as we would like it to be, but I hope to be able to give a statement as to that later on. The contractors believe that the work will be completed in three years. They make the statement that they have had great difficulty in obtaining labour for that section. When we visited the west they were offering as high as $3 a day for the ordinary labourers, and the statement of the contractors was, that while men who had taken up farms and desired to earn money on the railways, were easy to get on the prairie, these men would not leave the prairie and take employment in the mountain sections. Of course, there are two or three sides of the story of the difficulty. It is contended by some people that the difficulty is, that the men are not treated right, but I will not now discuss that phase as it is foreign to the subject I am now bringing before the House. It is certain, however, that they are offering very high wages, and the reason they give for not being able to get on more rapidly is the difficulty of finding labour. We are in hopes that this season will find the contractors with a full staff on hand and rapidly constructing the road.

Now, coming to the Transcontinental: The portion of the road being constructed by the government from Moncton, New Brunswick to the city of Winnipeg, about 1,804 miles, I have a statement made by the Transcontinental Railway Commission concerning the various contracts.

This statement shows districts, mileages, &c., percentage of work done on each contract, miles of grading done, miles of track laid, miles of telegraph line completed, percentage of steel bridge superstructures completed and total percentage of work done to December 31, 1910, on all these 21 contracts, which appears to be 67·62 per cent. It is as follows:

H. MACPHERSON,
Asst. Chief Engineer.

Mr. AMES. Does that include the interest charged?

Mr. GRAHAM. I do not think it does.

Mr. AMES. Will the minister let us have a statement of interest to date, to show how much the money has cost us?

Mr. GRAHAM. I think there is now on the Order Paper a question as to that, which the Finance Department is to answer. This statement is, I think, more complete than any I have been able to give to the House before, as previous statements did not include the terminals.

In this connection I might mention that the portion of the line from Winnipeg, or, more strictly speaking, from a point east of Winnipeg, to Superior Junction has been operated during the last few months in assisting to carry the wheat crop of the west to the east, joining with the Grand Trunk Pacific's own line at Superior Junction, and the traffic being carried from there to its own elevators at Fort William. The arrangement made with the Grand Trunk Pacific Company I have not yet laid on the table, but I propose to do so.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it operating regular passenger trains?

Mr. GRAHAM. I think not. It is operated rather as a contractor's road than as a finished line; but we were anxious that the people of the west should have the benefit of this other line.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar). How much did they carry?

Mr. GRAHAM. I gave that a few weeks ago.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar). What rates did they charge?

Mr. GRAHAM. I have no information as to that, but I imagine they would have to be the same as those of the Canadian Pacific railway and the Canadian Northern. I can ascertain that for my hon. friend.

Another question of great importance, which has been discussed a good deal in the House, is that of the settlement of disputes between the Grand Trunk Pacific Company and the Transcontinental Company as to overclassification and overbreak. The inspecting engineers of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway and the engineers of the Transcontinental Railway Commissioners met and adjusted some of the differences. These settlements involved reductions from the contractors' estimates as follows:

District 'F'—Contractor J. D. McArthur, $73,022.20.

District 'A'—Contractors Lyons and White, $16,219.10.

District 'B'—Contractors M. P. and J. T. Davis, $1,714.60; Contractors Macdonell and O'Brien, $22,116.02. Total, $113,071.92.

The chief engineer of the company and the chief engineer of the commission were also able to agree in the determination of a portion of the disputes with respect to overbreak on the McArthur contract, which involved a deduction from the contractor's estimates of the sum of $173,667.09. The other point, which is not yet determined, is in reference to 106 cuttings on the McArthur contract. On this the engineers could not agree and they called in the arbitrator, Mr. Collingwood Schreiber. Mr. Schreiber has made a report, which was concurred in by the chief engineer of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, and the chief engineer of the commission. It is difficult for a layman like myself to arrive at the exact meaning of the report on account of its technical nature; but in discussing the matter with the chief engineer, I find that, in order to ascertain definitely the result of the award in regard to these 106 cuttings, the engineers are now busy figuring it out, and I hope to have their report at an early date.

Mr. LENNOX. I have heard it stated that there had been a reduction made of about $500,000. Is there any report to that effect?

Mr. GRAHAM. Is that including classification, rock cutting and over-break together?

Mr. LENNOX. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM. I think not. I asked the engineers to put this in figures as they had it the same way, and I was at a loss to give the House what I thought information, and they put this part of their agreement into figures for me. The chief engineer of the commission the other day said he was unable to tell me what this would amount to. I could make a guess but it would not be information to the House, and might only lead the House astray, but as there are disputes on 106 cuttings, one would suppose it would be quite a considerable amount. This note is given me:

Mr. Schreiber's award was made on the 19th of January, ultimo, and was concurred in by the chief engineer of the company and the chief engineer of the commission. In regard to this award the chief engineer of the commission reports as follows: With reference to the award on the 106 cuttings which were referred to the third arbitrator, I am unable to say what amount will be deducted until the various awards for solid rock, loose rock, common excavation, train-haul and over-haul on train-hauled material has been worked out by the division engineers for their respective divisions.

These 106 rock cuttings and over-breaks with the items in reference to over-classification covered all the objections raised by the Grand Trunk Pacific as to classification and over-break and practically will form a settlement of the difference between the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental Railway Commission.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the minister given the figures with reference to the eastern section between Quebec and Moncton?

Mr. GRAHAM. They are all in the return which I placed on 'Hansard'.

Mr. DANIEL. Can the minister give more information with regard to the time of completion of the Quebec bridge?

Mr. GRAHAM. I have not been discussing that topic, but expect before long to satisfy all curiosity and place the papers on the table. The time given by the various tenders runs from three to five years.

Another question of vital interest to the people of all Canada is the Welland canal. This canal has a very interesting history. It forms one of the most important links in the waterways transportation on this continent. There has been a good deal of discussion as to the proprietv of further developing this waterway and in order that I may say a few words intelligently about that I wish to read a concise history of the size, capacity and cost of the Welland canal as it is to-day.

The Welland canal has two entrances from Lake Ontario, at Port Dalhousie, one for the old, the other for the new canal.

From Port Dalhousie to Allanburg, 11¾ miles, there are two distinct lines of canal in operation, the old line and the enlarged or new line.

From Allanburg to Port Colborne, a distance of 15 miles, there is only one channel, the old canal having been enlarged.

From the head of the Welland canal there is a deep water navigation through Lake Erie, the Detroit river, Lake St. Clair, the St. Clair river, Lake Huron and River St. Mary to the Sault canal, a distance of about 580 miles. From the Sault the distance through Lake Superior to Port Arthur is 266 miles, and to Duluth, 400 miles.

Amount spent in construction, $7,693,824.03; enlargement, $20,644,791.99; total, $28,338,616.02.

My reason for pointing out the difference in distance from the Sault to Fort William, Port Arthur and Duluth is that grain carrying vessels in the busy season desire to make all the trips they can and while a few miles by rail-haul can be overcome in a very brief space of time it is not so with ship carriage, and Port Arthur and Fort William have the advantage in allowing vessels to carry grain to and from these ports and make a greater number of trips during the season than they could make if they go all the way to Duluth.

It may be of interest to point out to the House that for some years surveys have been going on in connection with the Welland canal but more activity has been shown during the last two or three years; we have had special parties surveying in order to, if possible, find a route for a better and bigger canal, if it is deemed better to build a new canal than to deepen the old one.

Now, at this point, I cannot define the policy of the government as to what is to be done on the Welland canal; or, rather, I am not in a position at the moment to indicate the time at which it will be done. That it must be done sooner or later, I think everybody in the Dominion of Canada will admit and it is of greater interest to no other people than to the people of western Canada that the Welland canal should be deepened so as to allow large vessels to go at least to the foot of Lake Ontario without breaking bulk. Three routes have been surveyed, and difficulties have been found in each one. I think that, especially for the benefit of members from that portion of Ontario, the House will bear with me, while I read briefly from the report made by Mr. Sullivan, one of the engineers in charge, who, by the way, is a son of our old friend, Senator Sullivan:

On Route No. 1. Following the present canal from Port Colborne to about three miles below Welland, thence towards Fonthill and via the Twelve and Fifteen Mile creeks to Lake Ontario, extensive surveys had been made, and a good location accompanied by some not insurmountable difficulties obtained, when borings taken at the sites of two dams located on the Twelve Mile creek developed a heavy bed of quicksand underlying both foundations. Since Mr. Weller's report of October 8, 1910, a readjustment of the location of some of the locks was considered, with the object of utilizing a very probable site for a dam, which would have a less head acting on it and which was located further down the creek. Borings taken at this point developed quicksand quite as extensive as at the original site. As the feasibility of this route depends very much upon the construction of these dams further borings are to be made in an effort of finding or exhausting the means of building them. These borings I expect to have started in a week or ten days.

Route No. 2 follows the present canal to Allanburg, thence along the level country west of Thorold to the escarpment, the descent of which would require locks in flight, thence to the old canal at St. Catharines and via it to Port Dalhousie. Some borings have been made at probable lock sites on this route with the result that in some cases rock was found at too great a depth to be used for a foundation, and at other points quicksand was developed. A personal examination of the conformation of the escarpment indicates difficulties in locating the flight of locks. However, it is intended later on to have a line run over this route which, with the information obtained from the borings, will demonstrate whether it is at all feasible.

Route No. 3 commences at Lake Erie, east of Morgan's Point, thence across the marsh to Chippewa creek, east of Marshville, thence curving to the west, in the vicinity of Boyle, through the divide by a deep cut to the rocky gorge on Twenty Mile creek near the village of Jordan.

Since Mr. Weller's report on October 8, 1910, except as mentioned above, the survey work has been confined to this route and the location has been determined and plotted on the plan. Alternate lines through the divide were investigated and the one in the vicinity of Boyle offers the advantage of considerable less excavation and the borings now in progress indicate an entire absence of quicksand.

Thirteen borings to rock in all cases were made between Lake Erie and the source of Fifteen Mile creek, north of Boyle. There will be a small rock cutting about one mile in length at the Lake Erie entrance, and the remainder of the material as indicated by the borings will generally be a firm clay. Borings intermediate to the above, and carried a little below grade of bottom of canal, are in progress and so far confirm the above results. Another boring machine is employed in determining the surface of the rock in the gorge between Jordan and Lake Ontario.

Advantage is being taken of the presence of the ice to take soundings, and two parties are now engaged at this work, one at Jordan harbour and the other at the Lake Erie entrance.

Of field work there remains to be done the completion of a survey for the location of the necessary pondage area at the head of the locks, which will be taken up as soon as the soundings at Jordan are completed. Also borings south of the escarpment are necessary to determine the character of the material to be excavated, and at the lock sites borings throughout the depth of the rock to determine its character will be required. To date this route is meeting anticipations. The quantity of excavation has been taken out over almost the whole line.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Can the minister say how far from Port Colborne is the entrance to this third route?

Mr. GRAHAM. Several miles, I think.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). It would not be possible to utilize the entrance there?

Mr. GRAHAM. No, that would be one objection, to my mind, to this route. Of course, I am not speaking officially, but personally and without having gone into it in detail on the ground. But the advantages of this route would have to be very great, to my mind, to justify us in giving up the work done at Port Colborne.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). I think it is the best route, and the one on which the canal ought to have been built at first.

Mr. GRAHAM. There may be advantages sufficiently great in this route to justify us in going to another point than Port Colborne.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). It would mean the abandonment of an expenditure of nearly $5,000,000.

Mr. LALOR. Has any investigation been made of the Port Maitland route?

Mr. GRAHAM. Is that covered by this route No. 3, which commences on Lake Erie, east of Morgan's Point? My hon. friend knows the locality better than I do, and can inform me as to that.

Mr. LALOR. That is a little west of Port Colborne.

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, a few miles west.

Mr. LALOR. I may be prejudiced, and so may other people in my district, but Senator McCallum, who was one of the best authorities on navigation and shipping, always maintained that the Port Maitland route, was the best. I hope the minister will take that into consideration, as he promised he would.

Mr. GRAHAM. I made a note of it at the time, and called the attention of my engineers to it. Before finality is reached in regard to this matter, we must gather all the best opinions we can. In a former construction of the canal, the matter was regarded as of such importance, I believe, that the government of that day appointed a commission to make investigation.

Now, the objection has been raised that, even if the Welland canal were enlarged, wheat would go through that canal and go to Oswego and be there transferred for New York. Personally, I cannot agree with that opinion. The new Erie canal from Buffalo to New York is to be only 12 feet draught. We now have a canal of 14 feet draught. It is true that a considerable portion of our grain goes through Buffalo, to New York—not so much as it did a few years ago. But, it takes the Buffalo and New York route, not because that is a better water route, for it is not. To my mind, the fact is, that up to the last few years, we have not had the terminal facilities at Montreal and elsewhere to handle the grain coming from the west. And I believe that this parliament is justified in dealing liberally with the harbour commissioners of Montreal, to provide all possible facilities for handling the grain traffic which comes from the great west. With that done, there is no danger, to my mind, that a longer, slower and dearer route can ever compete with the Canadian waterways route.

Mr. CAMPBELL. May I ask, has there ever been, within the knowledge of the minister, any congestion of the wheat traffic at Montreal?

Mr. GRAHAM. I am informed that congestion is one of the greatest difficulties. And while, there is a very marked improvement, and while a lot of money is being spent there, yet, that being the outlet for traffic coming through from all Canada west of Montreal, it is in our own interest that we make it as perfect as possible. My hon. friend will agree with me that what did yesterday in the west will not do at all to-day. Conditions are changing. It is a marked fact that in Montreal, which is the gateway to Canada from the east during the season of navigation, the value of property has gone up as rapidly as it has in the city of Winnipeg, or in any western city, and largely due, to my mind, to the enormous growth of western Canada, as well as to the development of other parts of Canada. But what I was trying to point out was that we must not neglect that part of our transportation facilities, and while we are bringing traffic to them, we must be liberal in our expenditure in our own interest, and see that every facility is afforded in order to ship these goods as quickly and as cheaply as possible through the Canadian gateway to the great European market.

Now let me go back to the Welland canal proposition. I have had some correspondence—I am not at liberty to give the names of the gentlemen with whom I am corresponding—but I say to the House that they are in touch absolutely with the grain carrying trade of Canada and of the United States. They know the Oswego situation, perhaps better than any man in the House. I have obtained some information from these gentlemen as to their idea concerning the expressed fear that if we deepened the Welland canal, traffic would go down through that canal and then to New York via Oswego. Personally I have not the faintest fear of that. All these past years it could have gone down in a small canal as opposed to our greater one. But as I am pointing out, by having waterways and a clear open lake and river channel down to within a short distance of Montreal, even if the St. Lawrence canal were never deepened, grain can be carried from Oswego to Montreal as cheaply and more quickly than it can be carried to New York, even by their enlarged canal. So there is no fear on that score. As I have pointed out, if we look after our business properly, the transportation facilities will be to our advantage, because grain can be handled more cheaply in Montreal than it can be in New York city. Now let me tell you something of what I have learned. That canal is limited to a depth of 12 feet, ours is 14 feet now. If ours were enlarged, there is no doubt that we would take the traffic through the Welland canal any way to some point down on the lake at the foot of lake navigation.

Mr. CAMPBELL.

Mr. LALOR. Are you speaking now of the new Erie canal?

Mr. GRAHAM. It was rumoured years ago that they were going to make that canal 14 feet, my information is that the probabilities are it will be confined to 12 feet. That was the original idea, that was the depth proposed when the grant of $101,000,000 was made for the construction of that canal.

Mr. LALOR. What is the proposed depth of the Georgian Bay canal?

Mr. GRAHAM. The figures are given for 22 feet.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Twenty-two feet on the mitre sill, and a 20-foot or 21-foot navigation.

Mr. GRAHAM. Sometimes you can drag it over a little more.

There seems to be no estimate of the amount of traffic that the new Erie canal is expected to carry. But let me point out that a great many of our best transportation experts think that the railways, even if that canal is constructed, would continue to carry the greater amount of agricultural products, such as grain, from Buffalo to the east. Now, let me give the distances, and point out just what the situation is; because we in Canada have the natural advantage and we dont want to be driven away from that fact, we possess the natural advantage and our duty is to see to it that we make the best possible use of that advantage. The distance from Oswego to Albany by the new canal is about 170 miles from Albany to the Battery in New York 150 miles. Now, by the Hudson river, from New York to Poughkeepsie is 75 miles, and has an 18-foot depth; from Poughkeepsie to Kingston 20 miles, 14-foot depth; from Kingston to Albany the distance is 55 miles, where the canal is only 10 feet. On the old canal it takes about 10 days for a boat to go from Oswego to New York with a towed cargo; they must carry this in barges, because a vessel that can only go through ten feet of water is not big enough to be called a ship in these days. On the old canal it takes 10 days to go from Oswego, and on the new canal it would take them about seven days. Now, compare that with the time it would take to convey a cargo bigger than that from Oswego to Montreal, and the difference is altogether in favour of the St. Lawrence route. Now, you may ask why does it take so long to go that distance. On account of the great locks, it is necessary to go from Oswego up 175 feet, and then you have to drop 420 feet before you get to New York, and in a canal going over that height of land and down again, a canal of ordinary capacity, one can understand the time that would be necessarily taken up in the lockages. That is one of the things we are going to try to overcome in the construction of the new Welland canal, to reduce the number of lockages, because every hour saved in transportation of the people's produce means an addition to the price the people will get.

Mr. LALOR. Why do you mention Oswego? Would not Buffalo be more likely to be the port for western grain?

Mr. GRAHAM. The reason I spoke with reference to Oswego was this, that a strong argument has been put up against deepening the Welland canal, the argument being that we would assist the Americans to bring wheat down through the Welland canal, and ship to New York via Oswego. They would use our Welland canal to bring their ships through, and not break bulk until they got to Oswego. But I say there is no danger, even if they brought them through that way, because Montreal can be reached much more quickly than New York.

There is another thing. I believe that to develop the cost of terminal facilities that would be necessary for a greatly improved traffic, or increased traffic, would be so enormous in the city of New York that it would far more than overcome any difference of rates that may exist by the St. Lawrence route. At the present time there is a difference, there is a large charge in the city of New York, amounting to quite a tax on the transfer of grain. The charge in the harbour of Montreal, although complained of by some, is comparatively light. It has been stated, and is true, that for a portion of the year, and a portion of the year only, the insurance rates by the St. Lawrence route are sufficiently high to make a difference. But the improvements that have been made in the St. Lawrence, and are being made, and are still to be made, will positively reduce the necessity for an increased insurance. So if at the port of Montreal, taken in connection with the St. Lawrence route, we do our duty as Canadians, the St. Lawrence route will be placed in a far superior position to any American route that can be proposed. I have some figures in reference to that question, but I will not enter into them at the present time.

My hon. friend behind me has said that the Georgian Bay canal route is the route. I would discuss the question of the Georgian Bay canal route at greater length but for the fact that it is not in my department, and I am supposed to be discussing questions connected with my department. I might say distinctly that I believe it is in the interest of Canada from one end to the other to enter upon both enterprises and at a not very far distant date. We must remember that when we bring the products of the great west to the east the products of the east are carried back to the west, and if we could take the time to go into the prospects for increasing that trade in a few years, we would arrive at a conclusion that it is necessary—in the interest of the Canadian carrying trade?—no, it is necessary in the interest of the people who produce in Canada, as well as who buy goods in Canada, that these two great waterways should be developed by the people of Canada, and I believe that no greater interest would accrue from any investment that the people could make than that which would result from the development of these two waterways. My hon. friend will see that I am quite clear upon this subject, and that the diffidence I have about discussing it in detail only arises from the fact that it is not in my department, but I believe in this project just the same.

There is another transportation problem that is opening up before us, and I hope the House will allow me to digress for a moment semi-seriously, because I am at a loss what to call this new project—whether Hudson's bay or Hudson bay.

Mr. HENDERSON. I would call it the Taft canal—Taft's big scheme.

Mr. GRAHAM. I am not referring to that; I am referring to a Canadian scheme. I am at a loss whether to call this new project the Hudson bay route or the Hudson's bay route. The division in the government will not be serious.

Mr. HENDERSON. I notice that one of them is going to resign over it.

Mr. GRAHAM. My colleague the hon. Minister of Justice (Sir Allen Aylesworth) has a great number of authorities for saying that it must be Hudson's bay. I might make a slip in not calling it by the right name, but I am confronted with the fact that away back in 1897 the following order in council was passed:

His Excellency, by and with the advice of the Queen's Privy Council.

And so on, and this is the concluding paragraph:

His Excellency is further pleased to order and direct that all questions concerning geographical names in the Dominion which arise in the departments of the public service shall be referred to the Board, and that all departments shall accept and use in their publications the names and orthography adopted by the Board.

I find on page 46 of this publication that the board says that we should say Hudson bay and straits, and not Hudson's bay; so, I am in a quandary to know which authority I should follow. In order that there may be no misunderstanding, I will refer to it as the new route to be opened up between the great west and the European markets. To begin at the beginning would be a serious proposition. That route has been used for many years by traders and by companies—I think I might say a particular company—and I may be pardoned for adding that I believe that company has not been awfully anxious for any of the rest of us to make any particular investigation of its possibilities. What is known as the Hudson bay route, in so far as the waterway is concerned, has been used before we were born, particularly those of us who are young. The question of building a railway to Hudson bay is not at all new. I suppose that if we were to mention the name of a particular individual in connection with the project of building a railway to Hudson bay the man whose name would be mentioned would be Mr. Hugh Sutherland.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Oh, long before his day.

Mr. GRAHAM. This is recent history. Away back about 1882, I think, he was discussing it. He obtained from the legislature of Manitoba in 1885 a bonus of a million dollars, but he was to complete the road within five years. He failed to get the capital. In 1886 the offer of aid was altered to a guarantee of four per cent on $4,500,000 for 25 years. Even with this pledge of assistance he was unable to proceed. Some years later, I think about 1890, perhaps a little later—that was changed again, and the government offered to give 12,800 acres a mile and $6,400 of a subsidy. That also failed. I think I may safely say that, all private effort having failed to get the railway to Hudson bay, the government shows its usual wisdom and courage in taking up the matter itself. The federal government has at different times sent four or five expeditions up to the bay and the straits. As a matter of fact, the question of the ice difficulty is not at the bay, but is in the straits.

Mr. HENDERSON. Does there exist at the present time any land grant subsidy to aid the construction of the Hudson Bay railway?

Mr. GRAHAM. No, I think not. As indicated in reference to one or two other projects, hon. gentlemen will, I think, not find in the main estimates an item for the Hudson Bay railway. I think there is no large item for that work, but I am not giving away any secrets when I say that the House will be asked to discuss and consider a vote for the construction of the Hudson Bay railway before we rise. Just two or three figures from a pamphlet that was issued by the Department of the Interior and prepared by Mr. McKenna. The figures are approximately correct, but changes in routes of railways and certain surveys they have made may, perhaps, not exactly correspond with these figures. However, I have chosen these because they are the most convenient, and I therefore propose to use them:

The Canadian Northern has reached the Pas on the Saskatchewan river, and from there to Churchill is some 467 miles. With that distance spanned, Winnipeg, which is, via the Canadian Pacific railway, 1,422 miles from Montreal, would be within 945 miles of Churchill. Brandon is 1,555 miles from Montreal, from Churchill, 940. Regina is 1,780 miles from Montreal, from Churchill, 1,200. Medicine Hat is 2,082 miles from Montreal, from Churchill, 1,500. Calgary is 2,262 miles from Montreal, from Churchill, 1,682. Prince Albert is by the shortest rail routes, 1,958 miles from Montreal, from Churchill some 717. Edmonton is, by the shortest rail routes, 2,247 miles from Montreal, from Churchill, 1,129. And these distances by rail to Churchill are measured over existing railways that were built for carriage east and west. With a railway from the Pas to Churchill, roads would be built over the shortest routes between important centres and that port. With a direct connection between Regina and the Pas the distance to Churchill from that centre would be 774 miles, from Medicine Hat it would be 1,076, from Calgary, 1,256 miles.

Churchill is 2,946 miles from Liverpool, while Montreal via Belle Isle is 2,761 miles and via Cape Race, 2,927 miles; and New York by the northern route is 3,079 miles from Liverpool.

In a recent trip to western Canada this question among others came up at an interview held with the Prime Minister in Brandon, and in the course of the short reply which I made I intimated that this would be a magnificent route for the carrying of cattle from the west, a remark which then caused a smile, and some of my confreres of the press looked upon it as sufficient of a joke to record it. Now, I would like to call the attention of them all to the fact that this is one of the principal statements made by the Grain Growers' Association of western Canada. I want to say to the farmers of Ontario that in mixed farming, cattle raising and dairy products, the province of Alberta in a few years to come will be one of the greatest producers in the known world. That province is not given up so entirely to wheat raising as is Saskatchewan, but, the character of its rolling land, its ample supply of water, its stretches of bush land, all point to it as a magnificent country for mixed farming and a great producer of good stock and of the best dairy products. While in that country I asked to be given samples of the butter produced at the creameries, and while in several places I found creameries working under government supervision, there was one large creamery run entirely independent of government recognition by a gentleman whose parents, if not himself, were natives of Denmark. I am somewhat of a judge of dairy products, living in the centre of a splendid dairy district in Ontario, and it is just as well for us in the east to know that the butter produced in Alberta is equal to the butter produced in any other part of the Dominion. You might call it gilt-edged butter, it is of fine flavour and splendid texture. I take it that the development of the dairy industry in Alberta will result in a great increase in the profit from farming. That country is splendidly adapted for stock raising, and what is more natural, where you can place live stock on a train to-night and have them carried to an ocean port in a journey of one or two cool nights and one comparatively cool day, and shipped by a comparatively cool water route, than this that live stock will be taken to the markets of the world in better condition than by a long hot rail haul. That idea certainly seems most reasonable.

Sir, the Hudson Bay railway will afford an outlet for the products of the farmers of western Canada; it will carry their dairy products, their live stock, as well as their grain products, quickly to market, and perishable goods will be landed in a much better condition on the consuming markets of the old country than could possibly result from transportation by any other route. It is considered by some to be an experiment. Well, be it so, but the government that hesitates to make even an experiment in what it believes is not worthy the confidence of the people. I believe the Hudson bay route will prove beneficial to the people of the west, and the people of the west being prosperous and getting more money in their pockets for the sale of their goods, they will be able to spend more money in eastern Canada for the purchase of goods there. Well, Sir, the government propose to proceed with this work. It is not a small task; it is estimated that it will cost well in the vicinity of from $25,000,000 to $30,000,000, which will include, I believe, elevators, wharfs, &c. But, if we add to that—and my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) will agree with me that I generally do add to the engineers' estimates—if we add to that five or six million dollars I believe the money would be well expended. If it were the railway alone it would be a comparatively small project, but in working out the enterprise arrangement has to be made for a steamship service, so that the produces of the country may not only be carried to an elevator on the banks of the Hudson bay, but that they may be taken the speediest way to the markets of the world, so that the farmers will get the highest price. The Hudson Bay railway will not only enable the western farmer to ship his goods by a quick and safe route, but I believe the opening up of the Hudson bay will benefit the coal areas in the eastern part of the Dominion, which is a matter of interest to my hon. friend from North Cape Breton, and indeed to all hon. members from eastern Canada. I am informed by those who have given this matter some study that the opening up of the Hudson bay route will enable vessels sailing with a cargo from the old land to make Sydney a port of call, where they will take on a cargo of coal and proceed to the Hudson bay, thus giving the people of the west the advantage of the splendid quality of coal that is produced in eastern Canada and developing that interprovincial trade about which we have heard so much during the last few weeks.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the distance from Sydney to Hudson bay?

Mr. GRAHAM. I will get that information for some other occasion, when I will deal with this question more in detail. I understand, however, that Churchill is practically the same distance from Liverpool as is Montreal.

Mr. STANFIELD. Has the minister any information as to the rate of insurance on cargoes by the Hudson bay route?

Mr. GRAHAM. It is possible and probable that at first the rates of insurance may be a bit heavy, but, during three or four months of the navigation there is no reason why they should be any heavier than by the St. Lawrence route. There are optimists, and I am inclined to believe a little with them, who say that with the advances we are making in science it will not be many years until a way will be found to keep the Hudson straits open for a great deal longer time than four months.

Mr. LALOR. Has the minister any information as to the amount per bushel of wheat, or per 100 pounds, the Hudson bay route will cheapen transportation?

Mr. GRAHAM. Unless it be for the higher insurance there is no reason why a bushel of wheat should not be carried as cheaply from Churchill to Liverpool as from Montreal to Liverpool. The insurance may have some influence on it, but we hope to be able in a few years to so improve that channel, if the project proves a success, as I believe it will, that even the insurance will not militate against the route.

Mr. FOSTER. One or two points I would like the minister to address himself to. First, as to the time when cattle are shipped from the Northwest. I suppose they would have to be ready for shipment by the first of September at the latest in order to get them out by the Hudson bay route. Then, I suppose it would be impossible to have the grain of one season shipped out the same year? Would not the cost of storage and the depreciation of grain at the elevator count as a factor in the increased cost? The third point is this: The vessels which are built for that service must be of a peculiar kind, and they will be employed there only four or five months of the year. What is the possibility of their obtaining paying traffic for the other seven months of the year?

Mr. GRAHAM. There is a difference of opinion among the shipping men with whom I have discussed the matter as to the necessity of peculiarly constructed ships. But even if they were peculiarly constructed, that would not render them useless at another port, though they would perhaps, not be so useful as they would be if otherwise constructed. With regard to shipping cattle, I understand that in Alberta cattle are fattened on June grass, and if they are fattened up to September, the navigation of Hudson Bay is open till November.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART. Till October.

Mr. GRAHAM. The reports say that it is open till November. Then, we may be able to do some of the Dakota trade as well as our own, as it may come on a little earlier. I think you can commence shipping wheat in September at least, which would give two clear months to rush the wheat traffic, and I think facilities should be provided for rushing that traffic in those two months as rapidly as possible. But there is to my mind, no reason why wheat will deteriorate in an elevator at Fort Churchill any more than at Port Arthur.

My hon. friend mentioned a few moments ago the question of the Trent canal. I admit that I had not that question in my notes, but if I did not refer to it, my silence might be misconstrued. The question of the Trent canal is one which has been before the country for a great many years. This much I wish to say concerning that work, that it will open up one of the most beautiful tourist countries on the continent of America; and, outside of any traffic which it may bring to the people of the section through which it runs, or from lake to lake, I believe a great good will come to them from it. It is a work to which we have been committed for years, and the more I see of it, the more I am convinced that it is going to be money well expended; and the more I see of what is done in other countries, in connecting waterways by means of even shallow canals, the more I am convinced that the money spent on that work will bring a good return to the people of Canada.

I would like to refer to the development of the water-powers along the Trent canal. I think it was in the year 1905 that the Ontario government, by an arrangement, handed over to the federal authorities the different works that had been constructed along the chain of lakes which form part of the Trent canal system. For years the Ontario government, in connection with the lumbermen, I think, maintained certain dams and other works along those lakes and streams. Negotiations were begun in the time of the Ross administration between the Public Works department of Ontario and the Department of Railways and Canals at Ottawa. It was contended by the Ontario government that when these works were given over to the Dominion, the province ought to be allowed to retain any water-powers which would be developed by the construction of more dams or the enlargement of existing dams. Although I was a member of the Ontario Legislature at the time I do not think that was a good contention. The Dominion government, in taking over all these works had the right, it seems to me, to the water powers which accrue from the taking of them over. However, the present Ontario government dropped that contention and came to an arrangement by which all these works, with the control of the water-powers, came to the Dominion government. I found this situation when I took office, and there was a most peculiar condition of things along that route. There were old patents, nearly a hundred years old, which gave to the riparian owner not only his land, but the bed of the stream, the water-powers, and every other right in the land. I found some of these men enjoying absolute ownership of water-powers without any development. There was a different situation arising every few miles, as the patents were issued at different times. It was a difficult problem to work out. I believed then, and I am confirmed in that opinion to-day, that the water-powers along that route, should be developed only incidental to navigation. May I give to the House a little idea of my own in political economy on this subject? We have in our hands in Canada a means, in addition to tariffs and in addition to transportation, of protecting our manufacturers and making them equal if not superior in productive capacity to any others in the world. We have in Canada sufficient water-powers, I believe, to make this country the manufacturing centre of the world.

Mr. BRADBURY. You are giving the western water-powers away.

Mr. GRAHAM. To whom are they given?

Mr. BRADBURY. To companies.

Mr. GRAHAM. For what?

Mr. BRADBURY. We do not know yet.

Mr. GRAHAM. Every one that is leased, I believe, is given on the condition that it must be developed, on the principle that the man who develops that water-power can produce goods as cheaply as they can be produced anywhere else in the world.

Mr. BRADBURY. You are not giving the water-powers to manufacturers, but to companies to sell the power and speculate with it. They have control of the whole Winnipeg river.

Mr. GRAHAM. If there is a condition that a water-power must be developed, then the development must bring the return, otherwise the grant will be cancelled. I do not believe that conservation of water-powers means tying them up and looking at them. That would be acting on the same principle as the miser who puts his money in his sock, instead of using it or depositing it in the bank and getting interest on it, or putting it into business. There is no use of our saying that we own millions of dollars' worth of water-powers. They are not worth five cents to Canada if they are simply left to run down the rapids. They only become valuable as we utilize them in a way to get the best returns from them for the people of Canada to whom they belong. Believing in that, I attempted to work out a policy along the Trent Valley canal. I found that the Hydro-Electric Commission had made some investigation there and had arrived at the conclusion that the only way to do it, was to have all under one control, at least for transmission; that to leave the powers in separate entities would not mean the development of all the power or the transmission to the municipalities in the district., I might say in this connection, that notwithstanding what has been said, I believe that no person will be found in the Ontario House or in the Ontario government to say that when I was a member of that legislature I opposed their cheap power project. As leader of the opposition, I did nothing of the kind and I refer my friends to the record. I always said that it was a big problem; I disagreed in some very minor details with the powers taken by the Hydro-Electric Commission, particularly in reference to private property, but on the general principles of giving the people cheap power, I encouraged the Hydro-Electric Commission in the Ontario legislature, and said if they could do that for the people, they would accomplish a great good. I believed that along the Trent Valley system, we could work out, without resorting to public ownership, a scheme which would give the people cheap power. Two policies were presented to us. One was to put the various powers up at auction and get the most money we could for them. That might have been good policy for the finances of Canada, but it would be an ancient and retrogressive policy. I wanted to get a policy that would first ensure development and secondly send the power to the greatest number of communities. I found that the Ontario government at Healey's Falls had certain rights, but had leased them to the Northumberland Power Company. The Northumberland Power Company was composed of a large number of shareholders from different parts of that section of the country and they waited on me on two occasions, the deputations being so large that I had to take them to a large committee room. We discussed it and I found that they were much interested not to make money personally, but to get water-power to the various municipalities; that was their chief object. In general this was the plan we adopted. We came to a man who owned a water-power who had been owning it and using it for years; we said to him: Make over to the government of Canada your vested right in dam and water-powers, and we will develop with our new dam, which we need for canal purposes—as we built only those needed for navigation and the water-power development was incidental—and we will. with our extra development, hand back to you all the water-power you have now and are enjoying, free of cost and we will charge you $2 per horse-power for and give you the first right to get the surplus. We thought that was fair. It would look as if we were giving the water-power cheaply, but in doing that in every one of these leases, to these men, I put in a clause that the rates to be charged for the water-power thus developed, must be regulated by the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada. The result has been that another question arose. They said: Now we want to get a large company to take charge of these powers, and control them, if it is possible, so as to make one transmission line to distribute the power as far as possible. My advice was asked and while hon. gentlemen may not agree with me, I said: Yes, I will take no objection to it; but on one consideration, you must not over-capitalize the company and the rates of the company must be subect to the Board of Railway Commissioners in every instance. That plan is now being worked out and the result is that while it is in a way a bold policy, because those who object to water-powers being given at a low rate, can criticise and they have some argument on their side, the policy in my mind is favourable to the people getting cheap power, because we keep control of the price of that power in every instance. What is the result? That the power being distributed by that company to-day in central Canada, I believe, is the cheapest power, all things considered, that there is in Canada. That may be putting it strongly, but I believe not too strongly. The rates collected are very cheap. They are now distributing power in several centres, they have made contracts with a large number of municipalities from which these gentlemen came, who were the original shareholders in the Northumberland company, and when I tell the hon. gentlemen that the largest vote polled in any municipality against giving a franchise to this company at the price named was only 19 votes, they will agree with me that the people of that section think we are doing a good thing for them in the power problem.

Mr. SPROULE. Is it a perpetual franchise?

Mr. GRAHAM. I do not know the arrangement, but I imagine that under the new Ontario law, a perpetual franchise would not be allowed. I think I am safe in saying that in no municipality have they asked for a monopoly or exclusive franchise, so sure are they that they can compete with any company.

Mr. SPROULE. Has the minister ever considered how far the federal government are justified in taking possession of streams, diverting them for navigation purposes and then selling the power developed by these canals to private individuals, without making any return to the provinces from the revenues thus derived?

Mr. GRAHAM. Navigation, of course, comes under the federal authority and any work that is necessary for navigation would be under Dominion jurisdiction. However, I do not care to discuss the constitutional question. Along the Trent special conditions existed and any rights the provincial government had, they gave to us by agreement.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Has the minister considered that where he provides cheap power for a particular locality, he should in principle, supply it to the whole Dominion?

Mr. GRAHAM. If it could be done, I would be glad to attempt to work out that problem, and if the House would let me, development on the Rideau might be considered, I am sure it could be solved, so that we could supply power east to Smith's Falls, Kingston, Perth, Kemptville, Merrickville and Gananoque, and possibly Brockville. It is a subject that is worth looking into and discussing. We find in Ontario that the west particularly, is getting cheap power; Toronto, for instance, gets cheap power. The distance from Niagara to the central part of Ontario is so great that if power could be developed cheaply in that district, it would be a great advantage. I believe it would be one of the best ways to assist the manufacturers and those needing any power if where we have power in sight, we should develop it and place the control of rates under the Board of Railway Commissioners, so that our manufacturers will be able to compete with any people in the world.

Mr. SPROULE. Reverting to the Hudson Bay railway, has the government decided whether the terminal will be at Fort Churchill or Fort Nelson?

Mr. GRAHAM. We have not decided which would be the proper port—Nelson or Churchill. The surveys of the Railway Department show that, from a railway standpoint, Nelson would be the port. There are a great many people who consider that Churchill would be better. The Marine Department sent out parties to make a thorough examination. They have been able to make a partial report, but not a complete one. But the fact that we have not that report at the present time will not interfere with the beginning of construction; because, for a distance of 170 miles from Pas mission to Split Lake, the route will be the same which ever port is chosen. So we can go on with the present construction, and when the port is determined the road can be continued.

Mr. SPROULE. Before the minister leaves the subject of canals, he should deal with the Newmarket canal.

Mr. GRAHAM. My hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) never lets me forget that. We will discuss it in detail if he desires, when we get into Committee of Supply.

Mr. SEXSMITH. Before the hon. minister leaves the subject of canals, can he tell us what the government charges the Seymour Power Company for power?

Mr. GRAHAM. The companies owning power were given the balance of the power at $2 per horse-power. I believe the Seymour Company is the large company. What arrangements they have made with private holders for power I do not know.

Mr. SEXSMITH. There is only the Seymour Power Company now. They control the power of the Trent canal.

Mr. GRAHAM. The Seymour Power Company originally had certain water-powers in that locality. They may have acquired others from private holders. What arrangement they have made with those private holders, I do not know. But we in dealing with these companies, placed an upset price of $2 per horse-power; and, at that figure, speaking from memory, the income derived by the government from power developed along the Trent canal will pay a respectable interest on the dams erected.

Mr. SPROULE. Is that for a 24-hour day?

Mr. GRAHAM. I shall be able later on to give details as to the figures to be paid.

Now, coming to the Intercolonial: if there is any gentleman in this House, or elsewhere, who has conceived the idea that it is an easy thing to manage, either through a board or in any other way, a state-owned railway in this Dominion, he is seized of a wrong conception. I have discovered two very difficult things to deal with—among the very many difficult things that there are to deal with. One is the Quebec bridge and the other is the Intercolonial railway. I am not sure which of these would take the prize in a competition, but I am sure that each would win distinction. In discussing the Intercolonial railway, the people of Canada who do not live along that railway, and hon. members who have not yet accepted the hospitality offered them to take a trip over it, possibly do not understand the length of the railway—I never had a proper conception of it until I went over it, and never had a thorough conception of it until I tried to manage it. The Intercolonial is not at all a small railway. Its main track has a length of 1,490·67 miles, and its sidings represent 446 miles. Now, you people go between Montreal and Toronto on the fastest train you can take, and you leave Montreal at 9 o'clock and you arrive in Toronto at 4.20, and you travel on one of the fastest trains on the continent. Now, the main line of the Intercolonial railway is more than four times as long as that trip. It covers a distance greater than that from Montreal to Winnipeg. Yet, in discussing this road and all its details, hon. members are apt to imagine that the minister who directs the road at comparatively long range, ought to know the name of every man who ever drove a spike on that line. One of these hon. gentlemen could not take any railway of the same length and get from anybody but the roadmasters such details as the Minister of Railways is asked for in this House. Ask Sir Thomas Shaughnessy with regard to any 1,400 miles of his road, and he would know the details so far as the capacity of the road is concerned, and the quality of it. But, as to anything further than that, he would refer that inquirer to the roadmaster or the divisional engineer, or some other person whose business it was to understand these details. I say this, not to suggest that hon. members of this House should not ask for all this information, but that they should not be impatient, if, with regard to some small section of the road in their own territory, every man engaged upon which they know as Jim, or Jack or Tom, the minister does not know details that have not escaped their own knowledge but needs time to learn them from the man who has had these matters in charge. The Intercolonial is being run, approximately at least, as all other roads are being run. The capital spent on the Intercolonial, up to March 31, 1910, was $82,819,218.52. In 1911, the additional capital expended on the road will be about $1,000,000, the smallest capital expended on the Intercolonial railway for many years, notwithstanding the fact that a great portion of it is being spent on special works at the city of Chatham and at Sydney Mines and North Sydney. The net revenue last year which the Intercolonial was able to hand back to the receiver general was $623,164.66—that is we handed to the receiver general within less than $400,000 of our estimated capital expended during the present year.

In order that there may be some figures in 'Hansard' as to our business, allow me to quote a few. These figures are from a statement by our statistical branch, made up to June 30, which is the end of the year recognized by all railways for making returns to the department. These figures will not coincide with the figures given to the end of our fiscal year, March 31, but they will serve the purpose immediately in hand and I am not using them further than this statement:

TRAIN MILEAGE.

Passenger trains—
1909	2,705,492
1910	2,596,804
Freight trains—
1909	3,568,680
1910	3,805,646
Mixed trains—
1909	487,881
1910	379,227
Total—
1909	6,762,053
1910	6,781,677
Increase	19,624

It will be interesting to know that that increase was all in freight trains. The increase in freight trains was greater than that, because there was a decrease in the number of passenger trains run. My memory is that the mileage of passenger trains was reduced, but we carry more passengers on the trains that we run. Take now the economy in management. I wish to put on record a statement for the benefit of those who make comparisons, and it shows a comparison of our expenditures as respects maintenance of way, equipment and traffic expenditure, between the Intercolonial and the Canadian Pacific railway. I have taken for the purpose of this comparison the Canadian Pacific railway. And while I use the Canadian Pacific railway largely in all my comparisons, it is not at all with the object of reflecting on the Canadian Pacific railway, which is one of the greatest roads in the world, and one of the best managed. But it is the most convenient, as it runs for some distance in the same portion of territory in which the Intercolonial railway runs. Here are the figures:

DISTRIBUTION OF OPERATING EXPENSES.

		Per cent.
Maintenance of Way and Structure:
1909	$1,642,398	18.39
1910	1,755,106	19.91
C. P. R.		23.64
Maintenance of Equipment:
1909	$2,040,824	22.24
1910	1,867,712	21.19
C. P. R.		21.75
Traffic Expenses:
1909	$188,121	2.08
1910	182,808	2.07
C. P. R.		4.22

I may explain that item by saying that it refers largely to the expenditure in looking for traffic, and I admit that the other railways spend a greater percentage than we do in looking for traffic in different parts of the world. The Canadian Pacific railway, for instance, whose expenditure is twice as great as that of the Intercolonial, has its steamship lines running to Europe, has its steamship lines on the Pacific, and has its lines spreading all over the continent, almost, and they have a large and very active staff looking for business. Ours is a comparatively small road with no steamship connections of its own, and no railway connections of its own west of Montreal, except the Grand Trunk railway. So the expenditure for getting traffic is necessarily higher on the Canadian Pacific railway than it is on the government road. Now I will give the balance of the table:

		Per cent.
Transportation Expenses:
1909	$4,959,207	54.84
1910	4,802,924	54.49
C. P. R.		47.47
General Expenses:
1909	$221,972	2.45
1910	206,718	2.34
C. P. R.		2.92

The comparison is hardly fair, but it is the only comparison I could get. I wanted to put something on record, and I have taken the Canadian Pacific railway, which I think shows the Intercolonial railway perhaps at greater disadvantage in that respect than any other road, though I do not think it is discreditable to the government road.

Mr. STANFIELD. Will the minister compare the wages of the officers and men on the two roads?

Mr. GRAHAM. The wages of the men are settled by agreement between the brotherhoods and the management.

Mr. GRAHAM.

Mr. STANFIELD. I merely ask the hon. gentleman if he will compare the wages paid on the two railways without speaking of the unions. Take the engineers, for instance.

Mr. GRAHAM. I do not know what they are paid, but I know they are paid according to agreements made with the officers of the brotherhoods, in each case. I think the rates are higher than on the Grand Trunk railway.

Mr. STANFIELD. Not for the engineers.

Mr. GRAHAM. You cannot say that because a man gets a certain amount per day or per mile from the Intercolonial railway, and a higher amount from the Grand Trunk railway, that the Grand Trunk railway pays the higher wages. It is all controlled by a schedule, and there are some instances where the Canadian Pacific railway men, or the Grand Trunk railway men, I do not know which, run many miles more to be called a trip, and get the same pay that the Intercolonial railway men get for a shorter distance. If my hon. friend will take the Intercolonial schedules, leaving out figures for wages, and take all the conditions surrounding the service on the Intercolonial railway, and the conditions on the company roads, he will find that the Intercolonial railway employees are in as good position as those on any company road in the Dominion of Canada. Requests for increased pay have been made all over the road, some of them have been considered, some of them have been granted, and others will be granted, or are in course of settlement. The Intercolonial railway men are equal to the company men on any road in the Dominion of Canada. With the increase of wages that will have to be given, I cannot hope to be able to make next year a statement perhaps as favourable as this year. But I have this to say that I have been endeavouring to recognize as far as possible the claims of the men to fair wages for the work they perform. But it is not fair to take the rate of wages paid alone as an indication, we must take the whole schedule which contains the conditions, and states what a day's work is, and what a trip is.

Now a question has been asked as to the difficulties the Intercolonial railway has to contend with. In the first place, the Intercolonial has to contend with the keenest competition. I am not complaining of that from the standpoint of the people of Canada, because they get the benefit of keen competition, I am only speaking from the standpoint of the income of the Intercolonial which has to meet this keen competition. The keen competition with water transportation must always tend to keep the rates down low. To Montreal we have to compete with water transportation through a long season of open navigation, and the rates for the entire year, on some commodities on the Intercolonial, have to be made on the basis of water borne competition. Large producers at North Sydney, for instance, say: If you do not agree to carry our traffic at this very low rate the entire year, we wont give it to you at any time of the year, but we will send our summer traffic by the St. Lawrence, and rush it in the fall, and keep it in the spring as long as possible.

Then from Cape Breton to Halifax we have water competition all the year around. I think, on the whole, that the Intercolonial railway has keener competition by water than any other route in Canada. Then, in addition to that, we have between St. John and Montreal, on the state-owned railway, to carry goods 250 miles free. In other words, the distance from Montreal to St. John via Canadian Pacific railway is less by 250 miles than from Montreal to St. John via the Intercolonial railway. Our rates from St. John to Montreal must of necessity be the same as the rates of the Canadian Pacific railway, and it resolves itself into this situation that, of all the traffic carried between Montreal and St. John, the Intercolonial railway carries it more than half as far as the Canadian Pacific railway carries it, and does not get one cent for the service. When hon. gentlemen are discussing the reasons why the income of the Intercolonial railway is not better, let them bear in mind that between that important point and Montreal the Intercolonial railway carries goods more than half again as far as the Canadian Pacific railway carries them, for which it does not get one cent. Then the Intercolonial railway never was built as a road for commercial purposes, I believe. I am not going into that phase of its history, but it would not have been built in the peculiarly meandering way in which it was built if it had been intended as a straight commercial proposition. That is one thing that the management of the Intercolonial railway has to contend with.

Mr. DANIEL. How much shorter will the National Transcontinental railway be from Moncton to Montreal than the distance from Moncton to Montreal via the Intercolonial railway?

Mr. GRAHAM. I am not sure of the distances, but the National Transcontinental railway will open up new country in which there exists to-day a great deal of local traffic; it will haul that freight and its particularly good grades and curves will enable it to do a great deal of business. I will discuss the question of the National Transcontinental railway later.

Then I make this statement, Mr. Speaker, that there is no road in the Dominion of Canada that gives—I am not going to say better—but as good service to the people all along the line as does the state-owned road. What I mean by that is this—

Mr. RHODES. Make that mild.

Mr. GRAHAM. No, I am going to make the statement, and I am ready to give my hon. friend the proof—there is no road that will stop at as many little places for the accommodation of the people as the Intercolonial railway, as my hon. friend knows.

Mr. RHODES. Not at all.

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, my hon. friend likes to have the train stop not too far apart in his constituency, and I am not disagreeing with him.

Mr. RHODES. I have not met with very great success.

Mr. GRAHAM. That shows that my hon. friend is more advanced in his requests than even we are. There is no road in Canada that gives the service locally and practically stops at the people's doors as does the state-owned railway. We have places where the Intercolonial railway trains stop every two and a half miles. I have endeavoured to get the Grand Trunk railway to stop at a distance of six or seven miles in my own constituency, and it took me five years to get them to build a platform and to stop one train a day.

Mr. TALBOT. In what part of the country do they stop every two and a half miles?

Mr. GRAHAM. In several places. They may not do so where the population is sparse, and there is no business to give the road, but there are places where the Intercolonial railway stops to take up milk and all that kind of thing at intervals of two or three miles.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Is not that very objectionable? Is not that the cause of most of your accidents?

Mr. GRAHAM. It is the cause of our trains being delayed and of a slow time table when we might have a fast one. But I do not object to it. I am pointing it out as one of the benefits the people derive from the state-owned railway, enabling them to get better accommodation than would be, or is being, given by any company-owned road.

I make another statement, and I know I will have to substantiate it to the hon. leader of the opposition, because he asked me for it last year. I want to make it strong, because the proof is good and strong. It is that the freight rates on the Intercolonial railway per mile are cheaper than the freight rates on any road in the Dominion. I want to make the further statement that the passenger rates, taken by the mileage, are cheaper than the passenger rates on any other railway in Canada.

Mr. RHODES. In making your rates on the Intercolonial railway, are you striking an average between local and competitive through rates?

Mr. GRAHAM. No, but the way we get at the rates produces accurate results. We take the receipts, the money we get.

Mr. RHODES. And the mileage?

Mr. GRAHAM. The passenger mileage, and we find out how much we actually got in money—no guess at all—for carrying every passenger one mile. We do the same thing with freight tonnage, take the actual receipts, and we know exactly how much we got for the service.

Mr. RHODES. Have you any data to show how your local rates compare with the local rates of other railways?

Mr. GRAHAM. I am going to give a statement all the way from five miles up to 200 miles, comparing the Intercolonial railway rates with the rates of railways in Ontario approved by the commission. I am going to compare them with the rates approved by the commission in New Brunswick over the same mileage of the Canadian Pacific railway, and I am going to compare them with the rates per mile on the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario railway in the province of Ontario.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

ALBERTA ELECTRIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 93) to incorporate the Alberta Electric Railway Company—Mr. McCarthy.

On section 8,

Mr. GRAHAM. The wording of this clause is peculiar because part of the territory through which this railway will run is not yet formed into municipalities and the only way to protect the highway was through the Lieutenant Governor of the province.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). Is there a provision that when municipalities are incorporated the consent should be given by them rather than by the Lieutenant Governor?

Mr. GRAHAM. The consent of the Lieutenant Governor is necessary only where municipalities are not formed ; I assume that when a municipality was formed the railway would come under the Act.

Mr. GRAHAM.

On section 12,

Mr. DOUGLAS. I move that section 12 be stricken from the Bill.

Mr. GRAHAM. Does Mr. McCarthy agree to that?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 13,

Mr. DOUGLAS. I move that the words: 'or in the Telegraph Act' in line one be stricken out, and also the words 'telegraph or telephone lines or any' in lines two and three.

Mr. GRAHAM. What is the purpose of that amendment?

Mr. DOUGLAS. The province of Alberta owns and controls all the telephone lines in the province, having bought out the Bell Telephone Company at great cost, and the government feel it would be against the interests of the people to have any competition in telephone lines which might be given under this section as it stands.

Mr. GRAHAM. It would be a good idea not to put the Bill through its third reading to-night so that the member for Calgary may understand what this amendment is.

Mr. NORTHRUP. The hon. member for Calgary (Mr. McCarthy) is in accord with this particular amendment.

Mr. GRAHAM. All right.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 14,

Mr. HAGGART (Winnipeg). Pursuant to notice, I move, in the absence of Mr. McCarthy, that the following be added as section 14:

The company may lease or otherwise acquire coal mines and coal mining rights, and work, develop, operate and turn to account all such coal mines and coal mining rights held by the company.

Mr. SPROULE. This clause I took objection to in the committee, but my attention was called to the fact that we had given the same right to other railway companies who contemplated operating in that country, where coal is so very plentiful, in order to get traffic. While I still regard it as objectionable, it is not nearly so objectionable as a Bill which preceded it, in regard to a company which proposed to go into the United States and purchase coal. In that case there was really a monopoly of the coal business by the Grand Trunk railway. You might buy coal from a mine owner, but you could not get the Grand Trunk railway to bring the coal across the line for you unless it was bought from the parties with whom they were operating. But in the Northwest there is not likely to be a monopoly of that kind, because coal is so plentiful.

Mr. NESBITT. I was opposed to the clause on principle, but if it has been arranged between the parties, I do not think I should interfere.

Mr. GRAHAM. I think we had better let it pass. It was explained in the committee pretty fully. In the west the railway companies practically all own coal areas, and operate them in connection with their traffic. It may be that in the years to come we shall have to cancel all these rights by legislation if they are abused. If it should happen that the coal companies and the transportation companies should put their heads together so that where you reduce the freight rates they will add them to the price of coal, it might be necessary to pass legislation in Canada similar to what has been passed in the United States, prohibiting coal companies and railway companies from being one and the same people.

Mr. McKENZIE. Under what regulations are coal mines operated in the west? With us they are operated under very stringent laws and regulations adopted by the local legislature. The running of a coal mine is a pretty important thing, and I think it is rather dangerous to allow these mines to be operated without any regulation, or to allow any company to own and operate a coal mine. Coal mines should be operated under regulations that would safeguard the lives and health and general safety of the coal miners.

Mr. NORTHRUP. All that this House is professing to do is to incorporate a company, and to give it power to operate mines. How those mines should be operated would be a matter of local jurisdiction if they come within local jurisdiction, of Dominion jurisdiction if they come within that. We do not interfere with the right the Dominion would have, in the place of a provincial government, to regulate how the mines should be worked. If we incorporate a company and give it power to undertake some manufacturing enterprise, we do not, therefore, exempt it from the right the province would have to regulate how its industry should be carried on. All we do is to give this company a right to do a certain thing, and that must be done in conformity with the law.

Mr. McKENZIE. I do not think my hon. friend's knowledge of everything in heaven above, on the earth beneath and in the waters under the earth, includes a knowledge of how to run a coal mine. If the coal belongs to the province, it may have the right to make regulations; if it does not, it has no right to make regulations as to operating.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Nobody said it had.

Mr. McKENZIE. My hon. friend says this company will be given the right to own and operate a coal mine, and the local government may come in and make regulations.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Not at all.

Mr. McKENZIE. I ask, who is going to make them? We have no law governing this point, so far as I know. The operating of a coal mine is a scientific subject. I have never heard of giving, in this general way in a Railway Act, the right to own and operate coal mines in any province. I am told that the local legislature would have no control over this company or its operations. I am inquiring whether there is any law on the subject. I would like to see the mining laws of this country made as uniform as possible. We have excellent mining laws in the province of Nova Scotia, and I would like to see them in force wherever there is a coal mine. I presume that there are good mining laws in British Columbia and in Alberta, and I would like to know that this right to operate a coal mine is subject to the laws of the province where the coal mine is situated.

Mr. TURRIFF. I have no intention of opposing this clause. Practically all the other railway companies who are doing business in Alberta own coal mines and large tracts of coal land; but I want to point out to the Minister of Railways that what he thinks may possibly exist in a short time is very likely to exist. All the large railway companies own, and some of them operate, coal mines in Alberta, and those who are not operating are preparing to operate. These big railway companies have also bought out practically all the coal mines in British Columbia. Therefore, we are very likely to have in the west the same condition that exists in Pennsylvania and Ohio, where the railway companies own so much of the coal lands that they can dictate terms to everybody else who owns coal lands, and who does not happen to own a railway in connection with them. The point raised by my hon. friend from Cape Breton I think is a very reasonable point, but in Alberta and Saskatchewan, while the Dominion government own the coal lands, the local governments have control of the working and inspection of the mines, and I have always felt that as the local governments have all the expense of these services, it would be better if they had full control and received whatever royalties there are on coal lands. They would thus be in a better position to look after the safety of the working of the mines. The very position feared by the Minister of Railways is likely to arise in the near future and we should be very careful in granting the right to these railway companies to own and operate large coal mines for fear that others who have invested in coal mines may be put out of business, because they cannot compete with mines owned by the same people who own the railways.

Mr. OLIVER. I want to support in every particular what my hon. friend has just said in regard to the undesirability, in the public interest, of a railway company being also an owner of coal mines. While the same men may own the railways and the mines, if they own them under the one organization neither the local government nor the Dominion government can control their operations as effectually as if they were separate concerns. The situation which the Minister of Railways fears must be dealt with by drastic action if it arises. It will arise in the future if it is permitted, and the time to stop it is now and not hereafter. It strikes me that as this charter is for an electric railway, it is reasonable to say that the precedent in regard to steam railways does not apply. It is evident that the coal mine owner who also owns a railway is in a more advantageous position than the coal mine owner who does not. It is in the public interest that there should be as many separate owners of coal mines as possible and therefore when you give a special advantage to the owner of one coal mine because he owns a railway you enable him to monopolize the coal mines which are tributary to that railway, you put the other owners at a disadvantage and put the general public at a disadvantage to that same degree. I cannot allow this charter to pass without entering the most emphatic protest I can against the principle of chartering railways and coal mines together as in this particular case.

Mr. CAMPBELL. This railway may be operated by electricity, steam or other power. Will that alter the minister's opinion?

Mr. OLIVER. That makes no difference in my estimation as to the disadvantage of the owner of the transportation also owning the coal whether the transportation is by steam or electricity.

Mr. BRADBURY. It may be a steam railway before it is completed. I agree with much of what the minister has said with regard to the advisability of keeping the coal lands separate from any great corporations. I believe what the minister has said will likely take place within a few years and that the railway companies have monopolized too much of our coal lands. With regard to this Bill I feel that we have already created a precedent in the west, we have granted several charters and several companies have secured control of coal mines. I understand a compromise has been arrived at in reference to this Bill, and I think it would be hard to create a new precedent.

Mr. NORTHRUP. In the Railway Committee the point was brought out that if a new railway like this is limited to the operation of the small area of coal land required to furnish its motive power the cost of producing the coal will be increased as compared with the cost of operations on a larger scale, and that this will increase the cost of operation of the railway with a consequent increase in the cost of freight to the public. I agree that if the day has come when the railway companies control the coal we cannot move too soon. The minister will see that if we refuse this right the same individuals may still own the coal and the railway, may have their offices side by side, and the result to the public would be the same as if they were given the powers asked under this Act. I hope the minister will see that it is really in the interest of the public as well as of the company that the company should be allowed to operate a sufficient amount of coal lands to produce coal at the least possible expense and thus save coal rates.

Mr. TURRIFF. The argument of my hon. friend (Mr. Northrup) hardly applies. The great trouble experienced by the coal miners in that part of the country is the lack of cars. Often a mine will have orders in hand to keep it going twenty-four hours a day for months, but they cannot get a regular supply of cars, with the result that they may be working only half time. The difficulty is not so much in the matter of freight rates, or in the selling of the coal by the mine owned by the railway at less than the neighbouring mines sell it, but in this lack of a steady supply of cars.

Mr. BRADBURY. The Railway Commission can regulate that.

Mr. TURRIFF. They have control in such a matter. But in a country like that, where there is a tremendous traffic in coal—hon. members hardly realize the traffic there is in coal in the Crowsnest Pass, where there are dozens of mines operating—the success of a mine may depend absolutely upon obtaining cars steadily and in fair proportion and at the right time. It is a pretty difficult matter for a railway commission, or anybody else, to regulate the supply of cars if the railway company are interested in putting cars in any particular place. I am not saying they are doing that now. But I do say there is often a shortage of cars, and there is the tendency of which I have spoken. The House cannot be too careful in legislation of this kind.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Admitting every word that the hon. member (Mr. Turriff) says—namely, that the present grievance in the Northwest is the scarcity of cars, we are not going to correct that by preventing the railway from adding more cars. And if you allow them to operate the mines they will certainly provide more cars.

Mr. OLIVER. I wish to repeat what I said. My objection to covering the two enterprises with the one charter is not met by stating that the same people may operate the same enterprise under two different charters. I am not learned in the law, but it seems reasonable to believe that, if the two separate enterprises are operated under two separate charters, each enterprise will be more amenable to the legislation necessary to regulate and control it than if one charter covered both. If the railway charter covers coal operations there is no doubt that in the legislation to protect the rights of the public we should have more difficulty in reaching the coal operation than if the coal operation were carried on under a separate charter. What my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) has said in regard to the possible condition as to the supply of cars I do not know that it is any breach of confidence to say, describes a condition which has prevailed and which has been a very serious drawback to the development of the coal industry in the Crowsnest Pass. That is a matter of record. Building an electric railway in some other part of the province of Alberta to develop other coal mines would have no effect on the situation in the Crowsnest Pass as it exists. The necessary effect of the linking together of the two enterprises is to give an undue advantage to the coal enterprise which is linked with the railway over the coal enterprise which is not linked with the railway. The railway is, or ought to be, a common carrier, to carry for everybody on equal terms—that is the purpose of chartering a railway; the railway gets special privileges on the theory that it will act as a common carrier and will deal on terms of equality with parties desiring to ship over it. But it will not act as a common carrier and deal fairly between parties if it is interested in one particular enterprise to which it looks chiefly for its traffic. No railway commission, no governmental control can properly protect the public interest in these cases. I speak strongly on this matter, because the coal interest of Alberta is probably the greatest interest in the Dominion of Canada, and it is an interest on whose proper development the whole prairie country tremendously depends. It is of interest to every man on the prairie that coal shall be produced under competitive conditions and delivered to him at the lowest possible rates of transportation. There is sufficient tendency to secure monopoly now, and this parliament should not let any legislation pass that would in any way tend to increase the possibilities of monopoly.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). I would ask the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) if the proper remedy would not be the one suggested by the Minister of Railways and Canals when he said that he intends to build the Hudson Bay railway in order—this is one of his reasons—that Cape Breton coal may be taken up by vessel to Hudson bay and shipped over the railway and delivered to purchasers in western Canada at much lower prices than it can at present be bought for. I see that one of the reasons assigned by the officers of his department for building this railway is that in Edmonton, for instance, where coal is now selling at $9 a ton, he will be able to deliver it, taken all the way from Cape Breton, at $7 a ton.

Mr. SPROULE. That argument was seriously presented to the House this afternoon.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not know whether my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart, Lanark) is serious or not, but the Northwest is a big country, and, while there is enormous possibility of production of coal—and, indeed, an enormous production of coal—in the western part of Alberta, yet the charges for transportation are such that it is not possible to deliver that coal in the city of Winnipeg in competition with the coal which is brought from the middle of the state of Pennsylvania, shipped by rail to the lake port—Cleveland—carried thence by steamer to Fort William, transhipped again, and carried by rail to Winnipeg. The transportation rates are such that that coal from Pennsylvania is laid down in Winnipeg at such terms as to practically exclude the Alberta coal from Winnipeg market. Now, what is done with the Pennsylvania coal may, as far as I am aware, be done with the Nova Scotia coal. I am not familiar with the circumstances, but I do not see any greater difficulty in one case than in the other.

Mr. SPROULE. Does not the hon. minister (Mr. Oliver) believe that that condition is largely due to the fact that the coal in Pennsylvania is anthracite, while the coal from the west is bituminous, and, therefore, not of equal quality?

Mr. OLIVER. What the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) says does not apply, because there is anthracite, as he knows, in the Rocky mountains.

Mr. SPROULE. But not of the same quality.

Mr. OLIVER. But it is anthracite, and is mined and put on the market under very favourable conditions. But the same applies not only to anthracite, but to the whole coal supply.

Mr. SPROULE. But the minister knows that if a party goes to a dealer in Winnipeg and buys coal he is willing to pay $2 or sometimes $3 more for the Pennsylvania anthracite than for the western bituminous coal, because the heating qualities of it are much better.

Mr. TURRIFF. The hon. gentleman is altogether wrong as to the heating quality of Pennsylvania, or Virginia, or Ohio bituminous coal being higher than that of the bituminous coal of Alberta; the opposite is the fact. Take the coal from a number of the mines in the Crowsnest Pass, and you will find it high in steam producing qualities, higher than the ordinary bituminous coal that comes from Pennsylvania, as the Minister of the Interior has said. Hundreds of thousands of tons of bituminous coal come in from the eastern United States to Winnipeg, and many of the railroads use American coal for one or two divisions west of Winnipeg, simply because the freight rates are cheaper, and they find it cheaper to use that coal than to bring coal from western Alberta or British Columbia, where the better quality of steam coal can be got.

Mr. SPROULE. I wish to tell the hon. gentleman that when I was in Winnipeg some years ago, and I met a gentleman who was buying a lot of coal from Pennsylvania for which he was prepared to pay $12 a ton, while he could get Canadian coal for $9 a ton. I asked him why he was paying so much more for the Pennsylvania coal, and he said that it was because it was richer in heat producing power.

Mr. HERRON. I agree with the arguments of the Minister of the Interior, but I cannot agree with his conclusion as to what would happen if we deprived this company of the power of operating coal mines. Now the conditions are such as the minister has stated with reference to railways giving privileges to particular coal mining companies in the way of cars. If that applies to all railway companies who are operating there now, and have the privilege to operate coal mines, and if this railway becomes a competitive railway to the present system, why should you not give the same privileges to this railway? It may be all right to take these privileges away from companies , but I think it should be done at the same time with each and all of them, and that until then this company should have the same privileges as others are enjoying. If they are going to be a competitor in getting low railway rates, they must have the same opportunities in conducting their business.

On section 15,

Mr. NESBITT. Before the Bill is reported, I would like to comment on the remarks of the hon. gentleman with reference to this clause being the same clause that has been in other Bills that we have put through that we should pass this Bill. I do not agree with that? I am not opposing this Bill now, because it is an arrangement between the parties, the Alberta government and the promoters, but otherwise I would oppose it, because I have opposed in the committee all clauses such as this, and I intend to oppose them. It does not make any difference to me that the charters were given with these clauses in that should not have been given; that is no reason why we should continue to give them.

SUPPLY—TRANSPORTATION IN CANADA.

The order for public Bills having expired, the House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion to go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. GRAHAM. In continuing my observations on the transportation problems of Canada, I may remind the House that at six o'clock I was discussing the state-owned Intercolonial railway and Prince Edward Island railways. I had said at six o'clock that among other things characteristic of the Intercolonial railway was the fact that its rates were the lowest in Canada. A practical way to find out exactly what the rates are per ton per mile is to take the actual receipts, the actual tonnage and mileage, and there can be no possible mistake made in arriving at a conclusion. The same thing is done with the returns made by other railways. Having laid down this accepted standard of measurement, how did the Intercolonial railway rate per ton per mile for 1910 compare with the rate of other railways? Here are the facts:

Intercolonial	·553 cent.
Canadian Pacific	·778 "
Grand Trunk	·672 "
Canadian Northern	·734 "

It will be seen that the rate of the Canadian Pacific was 40·6 per cent higher than that of the Intercolonial, of the Grand Trunk 21·5 per cent higher, and of the Canadian Northern 32·7 per cent higher.

Let us see what this difference in freight Trunk 21·5 per cent higher, and of the railways was concerned in 1910.

To proceed with the comparison and to show what condition the state-owned railway would have been in had it received the same revenue, or had it had the same earning power per mile as other roads, I will take the Canadian Pacific railway as an example. The Canadian Pacific railway last year carried 20,551,368 tons of freight. It earned on this $58,904,060. The Intercolonial railway carried 3,984,044 tons, upon which it earned $6,120,692. Suppose the Canadian Pacific railway had carried this freight at the same income per ton per mile as the Intercolonial railway did its earnings would have been decreased by $17,035,236. Reverse it; suppose that the Intercolonial railway had had the same earning power for freight per mile as the Canadian Pacific railway, its net earnings would have been increased by $2,485,000. Or, in other words, instead of a net revenue last year of $600,000, had the Intercolonial railway been possessed of the same earning power for its freight as the Canadian Pacific railway, the Intercolonial railway would have had a surplus last year of over $3,000,000.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Does the minister see that that depends entirely on the class of stuff carried? If you compare a road that carries coal entirely with a road that carries ordinary freight, the comparison would be ridiculous.

Mr. GRAHAM. For my purpose, the comparison is absolutely correct.

Mr. HAGGART. (Lanark). Yes, for your purpose.

Mr. GRAHAM. And for the purpose of my hon. friend when I explain it to him. I am not making this comparison to show that the Canadian Pacific railway is charging too high rates.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). You are making it for the sake of showing that the Intercolonial railway charges less than the Canadian Pacific railway, which amounts to the same thing.

Mr. GRAHAM. No. Before six o'clock I was pointing out the difficulties under which the Intercolonial railway laboured, and one of these is that the freight is of a low class, and in consequence, even if its rates per mile were the same as the Canadian Pacific railway, over all its territory its net revenue would not be the same per mile on account of the low classification of its freight That emphasizes my contention and it is one of the difficulties under which the Intercolonial railway labours. Later on I will prove to my hon. friend that mile for mile, on the same kind of freight, the Intercolonial railway rates are much lower than those of the Canadian Pacific railway.

Let us now look at passenger traffic. In 1910 the rates per passenger per mile were as follow:

Intercolonial	1·691	cents.
Canadian Pacific	1·821	"
Grand Trunk	1·767	"
Canadian Northern	2·184	"

Thus, the passenger rate of the Canadian Pacific was 7·6 per cent, of the Grand Trunk 4·5 per cent and the Canadian Northern 29·1 per cent, higher than the passenger rate of the Intercolonial. Taking again the case of the Canadian Pacific for purposes of comparison, the effect on earnings from ticket sales was as follows: In 1910 the Canadian Pacific carried 11,050,924 passengers, on which it earned $24,428,282. If, however, the Canadian Pacific had carried this traffic at the Intercolonial rate, it would have received $1,743,918 less than it actually did receive.

Reversing this passenger test, the Intercolonial in 1910 carried 3,176,154 passengers, on which it earned $2,653,157. If the Intercolonial had enjoyed the benefit of the Canadian Pacific passenger rate, it would have added $203,968 to its earnings from ticket sales.

Joining the results of these calculations, it will be seen that if the Canadian Pacific had operated in 1910 on Intercolonial rates, its earnings would have been $17,035,236 less from freight and $1,743,918 less from passengers, or a total of $18,779,154.

Putting the case again the other way around, if the Intercolonial in 1910 had been operated on Canadian Pacific rates, its net earnings of $700,278 would have been increased by $2,485,000 from freight and $203,968 from passengers, making a total of $3,389,246, or total surplus of $4,000,000 or about 4½ per cent on total capital.

If the Intercolonial last year realized net earnings of $3,389,246 it would have done relatively as well as the Canadian Pacific, the Grand Trunk or the Canadian Northern.

We have in Canada the case of another government owned and operated line—the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario. Critics are sometimes in the habit of alluding to the results achieved by that road as indicating bad management, by comparison, on the part of the Intercolonial Now, I am not saying anything derogatory to the management of the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario railway. It is a well managed road. I had something to do with its inception, and I am proud to see its success. Again, referring to the remark of my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) that the classification of its freight is very much higher than that of the Intercolonial railway freight one thing is, that it carries silver ore and we carry coal. That is a big difference. I will show, however, that mile for mile, the rates on the Intercolonial railway are much lower than mile for mile for the same classification are the rates on the Ontario road. I do this to show that the Intercolonial railway's earning power, owing to the low classification of its freight as well as to its lower rates per ton per mile, labours under great difficulty as compared with many of the other roads and never could be expected to earn as much money as other roads do, even if we put our rates as high as theirs on similar classification. The Timiskaming and Northern Ontario railway received last year 1·543 cents per ton per mile, as against the Intercolonial rate of 533. At this rate it had earnings of $957,150 from freight. If it had been obliged to carry freight at the Intercolonial price, it would have suffered a deduction of $543,650, leaving its earnings only $422,500 instead of $957,150. Reversing the comparison, if the Intercolonial in 1910 had received for its freight traffic the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario rate, its net earnings would have been increased by $10,957,477. The Timiskaming and Northern Ontario rate on freight was 179·02 per cent higher than the Intercolonial rate for 1910.

The same thing is true with regard to passenger business. While the Intercolonial railway had a rate per passenger per mile of 1·691 cents, the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario had a rate of 2.485. Here was a difference in favour of the latter of 48·1 per cent. I want to bring that difference clearly before the House, and particularly those members from other parts of Canada, because I believe they do not understand the difficulties of managing a government road of this length and under the peculiar conditions and circumstances surrounding it. The rates on the Intercolonial railway are so much less than those on other roads, that the two cannot fairly be compared as to receipts owing to the difference in the conditions. The revenue quality of our freight is lower, and consequently, our rates are lower than those of any other road in Canada.

Mr. CROSBY. Are the rates on the Intercolonial railway from St. John and Halifax to Montreal any lower than those on the Canadian Pacific railway?

Mr. GRAHAM. The rates from St. John to Montreal on the Intercolonial railway are the same as those on the Canadian Pacific railway, but we have to haul the traffic 250 miles for nothing, because our route is 250 miles longer.

Mr. GRAHAM.

Mr. CROSBY. The minister made the statement that the rates on the Canadian Pacific railway are higher than those on the Intercolonial railway; but I understand that the rates from St. John to Montreal, and the rates from Montreal to St. John, for both passenger and freight, on both lines are exactly the same.

Mr. GRAHAM. That only confirms my argument. I have been showing that per ton per mile and per passenger per mile our rates are lower; and one of the difficulties under which we operate is what my hon. friend points out, that we have a haul 250 miles longer than that of the Canadian Pacific railway from St. John to Montreal, and get only the same rate.

Mr. CROSBY. When the Canadian Pacific railway runs from St. John to Halifax, who gets the traffic?

Mr. GRAHAM. We get the local traffic between St. John and Halifax.

Mr. CROSBY. Perhaps I do not make myself clear. If a passenger wishes to go from St. John to Montreal, he gets the same rate whether he goes by the Intercolonial railway or the Canadian Pacific railway?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes.

Mr. CROSBY. If you like to haul him around by Moncton, that is no fault of the Canadian Pacific railway. If the Canadian Pacific railway takes the passenger from Halifax to Montreal, how far does it haul him for nothing? You get the money.

Mr. GRAHAM. No, we make an arrangement by which they pay us so much for hauling the traffic.

Mr. CROSBY. How much do they give you back?

Mr. GRAHAM. I cannot say at the moment. At all events, my hon. friend has made my point clear, that we have to carry the traffic 250 miles farther, or 50 per cent farther than the Canadian Pacific railway for exactly the same rate. That is one of the difficulties I have been explaining, and I am glad that my hon. friend has brought it out so well. Now, I come to the question of the cost per train mile, and I will try to make a fair comparison by taking the cost on the three railways, the Canadian Pacific railway, the Grand Trunk railway and the Canadian Northern railway.

It might be said, and very frequently is, that the Intercolonial railway is conducted with great extravagance and an utter disregard of sound railway methods. The Canadian Pacific railway, for example, is popularly understood to acquire large net earnings by economical administration, while the Intercolonial railway is believed to have occasional deficits because it is conducted in a wasteful way. In short, it is asserted that the Canadian Pacific is run on business principles, while the Intercolonial is not.

Is there any way of determining relative economy in the conduct of railways? There is. Look at it as you may, no matter from what standpoint, all the operations of a railway come down to one thing—the running of trains. If you stop the running of trains you stop everything for which a railway pays out money, no matter what it may be. Every penny of operating expenses goes out to that end. Now, the measure of a railway's operations is expressed in train mileage. Therefore, if you divide the total train mileage into the total operating expenses you have a figure which tells you the cost of running a train one mile.

This cost of running a train one mile is accepted by the entire railway world as an absolutely safe and sound standard for measuring economy of administration. The railway which is operated at the lowest cost is certain to have the lowest rate per train mile. It is known to the last farthing what it cost every railway in Canada to run a train one mile during 1910, and taking the cases of those roads to which reference has already been made the figures are as follow:

Intercolonial	$ 1.300
Canadian Pacific	1.504
Grand Trunk	1.817
Canadian Northern	1.581

This comparison is distinctly in favour of the Intercolonial railway. The figures are in each case taken from the sworn returns of the railway indicated, and are not open to question. They show beyond a doubt that the Intercolonial railway is not wastefully managed; but, in comparison with these roads which are regarded as types of the best conducted in Canada, is carried on in a way highly creditable to those who are in charge of its affairs.

The foregoing observations bring us back to the initial proposition, namely, that the Intercolonial does not earn a large surplus, despite its location and position as the product of confederation, simply because its freight and passenger rates are the lowest in the Dominion. This view, notwithstanding anything that may be asserted to the contrary, will be fully sustained by a comparison of the published freight tariffs of the railways to which allusion has been made.

The comparison I have made is very strongly in favour of the Intercolonial railway; but this much I want to admit, to be perfectly fair, that on account of our comparatively high grades, it may be that we do not haul on an average quite as much per train as the Canadian Pacific railway. But I think the difference will not be found to be very great; and it is a pleasure for me to announce to the House that such improvement is being made every year that our average number of cars per train is increasing, which shows that we are endeavouring to bring the operation of the road down to the lowest possible cost.

Now, I have pointed out that one of the difficulties under which the Intercolonial railway labours is its low classification of freight. I want to substantiate my contention that per mile the rates authorized by the Board of Railway Commissioners for the Grand Trunk railway and the Canadian Pacific railway are higher than the rates charged by the Intercolonial railway on the same articles. The rates I am about to give are the rates authorized by the Board of Railway Commissioners between Ontario towns, in thickly settled districts, where surely the rate ought to be as low as the rate on the Intercolonial railway, if the Intercolonial railway rate were on a commercial basis, which it is not and never has been. It has been said that for short distances the rates of the Intercolonial railway will be found to be as high as the others. That may possibly be true, but in comparing the Intercolonial railway rates per mile with the rates granted by the Board of Railway Commissioners between Ontario towns, I am going to start at 89 miles.

That is a comparison of the rates confirmed by the Board of Railway Commissioners between Ontario towns, but in order that there may be no mistake I am going to come even closer home and shall compare the railway tariff of the Canadian Pacific railway as approved by the Board of Railway Commissioners in New Brunswick and the tariff of the Intercolonial railway for the same distances on the same classification.

With respect to lumber rates, the allowance for excess weight and demurrage by the Intercolonial is much more favourable than the conditions imposed by other railways.

Mr. DANIEL. Was there any competition for either the Intercolonial railway or the Canadian Pacific railway at these places?

Mr. GRAHAM. I think there was practically no competition, but the rates I have read have been approved by the Railway Commissioners.

I shall now make a comparison with the rates on a railway now owned by the Canadian Pacific railway, the Dominion Atlantic, in the same territory:

Dominion Atlantic Railway tariffs in Maritime Provinces as compared with Intercolonial tariffs in same territory.

By these comparisons with company owned railways I think I have maintained my position absolutely and I defy contradiction from the tariffs of any railway from which I have quoted.

In comparing the Intercolonial with the Ontario government owned road, the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario I find that after we get up to 20 miles the rate on every classification on the Ontario road is higher than the rate for the same classification on the Intercolonial railway. The rates are practically the same until we get between 15 and 20 miles, and then I find the Ontario rates are higher.

Mr. GRAHAM.

I say again to the House that if the Intercolonial railway had received per ton per mile the same revenue as the Ontario road, we would have had a surplus last year of $11,000,000 on the Canadian owned road, known as the Intercolonial. It may be of interest to the House to put a statement on 'Hansard' to show the difference in expenditure in the last four years under certain important heads. The following are the figures:

Comparative Statement of Operating Expenses for Nine Months ending December 31, 1907, 1908, 1909 and 1910.

During the past few years, we have inaugurated the system of having a special account, to which I shall refer a little later on. During the nine months ending 31st December, 1910, out of revenue, we have laid 55⅛ miles of 80-pound rails, we have ballasted 135½ miles of track; we have put in track 627,711 ties, and have put in track 314 sets switch ties. We have made heavy repairs out of revenue of $153,446.16. Within the same period we have paid out of maintenance for locomotive repairs. We have spent, in excess of the same period of 1909, under the following heads:

Locomotive repairs	$24,000
Passenger car repairs	2,000
Freight car repairs	70,000
Total	$96,000

In this period of nine months ending 31st December, 1910, we have increased the expenditure of maintenance of way and structures over the same period of 1909 by $236,000. This, with the locomotive and car repairs just given, make a total of $332,000, which means, of course, the keeping up of the equipment and the betterment of the road. Out of this maintenance of equipment fund, we have ordered, to be paid for as delivered, the following:

3 passenger (Pacific type) engines at $22,340	$ 66,720

50 steel frame box cars, 30 tons capacity (wood sheathing to be applied in Moncton shops), estimated at $1,200 each..	60,000
21 steel coal dump cars, 50 tons capacity, at $1,500 each..	23,550
100 box cars (wood), 30 tons capacity, 30 at $1,015, 70 at $1,085.. ..	106,400
50 box cars (wood), 30 tons capacity, to be built at Moncton shops, estimated at $1,100 each..	55,000
Total..	$320,670

This is paid out of renewal equipment fund, made up of a contribution from the revenue of $25,000 a month. In this connection, I may say that we have been allowed to establish two accounts, the rail renewal account and the equipment renewal account. On the rail renewal account we have been putting aside $12,500 a month and on the other $25,000 a month. At the end of the year, the balances in these accounts are not handed back to the Receiver General, but we use the funds to renew rails and equipment as necessary. The amount in these accounts does not appear as part of the net revenue, as they are charged against the revenue. I think of asking the House to allow me to establish another account. It would mean practically an insurance account. The ordinary railway is managed on these lines: Where a large fire occurs, they take out of revenue the value of the property as it was before destruction, and, in the construction of the new buildings they charge to capital account only the difference between the value of the old and the value of the new. I am endeavouring to adopt that principle thoroughly on the Intercolonial railway. I had some correspondence with Mr. Knapp, who is chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which has adopted very strict rules in this connection, and he informed me this was the method the Interstate Commerce Commission adopted, and Mr. Hays of the Grand Trunk tells me the same thing. We had a big fire at Campbellton. I had an estimate made of the value of the buildings that were destroyed, and the amount given was $76,000. We purpose enlarging our yards at Campbellton, and providing for a connection with the International railway, which, we expect, will lead to the handling of quite a lot of traffic. We are changing the location of our yards—I think at the request of the town—and the new yards, station and sidings will cost $250,000. What I propose to do is to pay out of this year's revenue $76,000, the value of the property destroyed. This may be considered a departure. But it is strictly along the line on which railway companies are run, and I think that is the way we ought to run the Intercolonial, even if we do not come out even in so running it. But, as traffic is rapidly increasing, if the Auditor General will allow me, I propose this year to take a further account from net revenue of $100,000 and put it into renewal equipment, so that we may have the funds to buy the additional equipment we so much need. In order that there may be no mistake about having authority to do this, I propose, a little later in the session, if I can possibly do it, with the consent of the Auditor General's Department and the Finance Department, to introduce an amendment to allow us to establish and maintain these funds which we have been maintaining to a certain extent without statutory warrant, but with the consent of the Auditor General. This will make the procedure perfectly legal.

Companies having large fire losses are able to spread these losses over a term of years. An act to be introduced will enable the Intercolonial railway to do the same.

Another question arises: There are differences of opinion as to what ought to be charged to capital and what ought to be charged to revenue. We have endeavoured to make the line distinct and clear, that whatever a railway company would charge to capital or to revenue, we ought to so charge. And I believe that during the past year, the Intercolonial has actually leaned backwards in this matter and has charged several things to revenue that a railway company would have charged to capital, and would be authorized to charge to capital under the Interstate Commerce rules. Possibly I may introduce a measure to make clear the distinction between revenue and capital expenditure and to give us authority to say which is revenue and which is capital should any question arise between the Audit Department and the board of managers. At the end of this year we will have a little money left, by the looks of things. I am not prepared to say so absolutely, but from the figures I have in my hands, and those I have been able to see, if we were not to take the $76,000 for Campbellton, and if we were not to ask for the other extra $100,000 on equipment and renewal account, which I am going to ask for, if I did not make these two deductions, I think possibly at the end of March this year the Intercolonial would show a net revenue of $700,000. It is not the object of the Intercolonial to have a big surplus, we want to give the people a good service, and the situation is such that we never expect to have a very big surplus at the end of the year.

Mr. RHODES. How much will the minister have on equipment account?

Mr. GRAHAM. If we omitted the diversions at Chatham and George's River, which are practically new lines, the service this year would pay probably all the running expenses and all the capital expenditure of the Intercolonial. We have spent money on revenue account that a company road would not have to expend on such account but would have charged to capital, and we have not spent one farthing that a company road would not expend.

Mr. MARSHALL. What do you write off for wear and tear?

Mr. GRAHAM. It is written off under the same rules and regulations that prevail on company roads under the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. MARSHALL. The reason I ask that question is that a few days ago I saw a number of locomotives which I thought were ready for the scrap heap, and I was wondering if you regarded them still as an asset. I suppose there were 25 locomotives.

Mr. GRAHAM. We set aside $300,000 per year to renew equipment. I had an estimate made at one time and I found that our percentage of rolling stock out of commission and waiting for repairs or ready for the scrap heap, as the hon. member says, was a trifle less than the rolling stock of other companies in Canada, by percentage. A good many of our engines are light; we will use some of our lighter engines, that otherwise might not be of much use on the main line, should we take over some of the branch lines where lighter rolling stock can be used.

There is another thing of interest, and that is our relations to the Grand Trunk railway at the city of Montreal. We have been asked what that traffic amounts to. A few years ago an arrangement was made for the Intercolonial to run into Montreal, and by agreement with the Grand Trunk railway their terminals are used, and their line is used from Ste. Rosalie into Bonaventure station, and we have an arrangement for interchange of traffic. Now the total revenue in 1910 from the freight handed to the Intercolonial by the Grand Trunk, gathered up in Ontario largely—and I want the Ontario members to remember this when they talk of the Intercolonial—that freight in Ontario was gathered up by the Grand Trunk and handed to the Intercolonial, making earnings for the Intercolonial of $908,066.35. The Intercolonial handed to the Grand Trunk freight traffic on which the Intercolonial earned $753,452.28. So the total of the interchange would be about $1,660,000. That arrangement has been a good one. But I want to impress on our Ontario friends that more of that traffic is carried over the Intercolonial east than there is of maritime provinces and Quebec traffic carried from the east to the west. So the advantages that may be gained by having the Intercolonial railway run as cheaply as possible go a little more to the province of Ontario, possibly, than they do to the people through whose territory this railway runs.

Mr. STANFIELD. How much has the Intercolonial handed over to the Canadian Pacific railway?

Mr. GRAHAM. By the arrangement with the Grand Trunk we have to hand all our traffic to them that is not otherwise routed, and they have to do the same with us. The most of our traffic is handed over to the Grand Trunk, Montreal being the junction point. I think there is more freight comes from the west to the east over the Intercolonial than comes from the east to the west.

Now, I want to say a few words about the Prince Edward Island railway. For the nine months ending December 31, 1910, the Prince Edward Island railway had a net loss of $53,294.11. That was a decrease in the loss for nine months over last year of $11,114.93. The Prince Edward Island railway does not pay, never will pay, and no one need ever try to make it pay. It is not the intention of the department to try to make it pay. When the island came into confederation we took over this railway, and it is the duty of the parliament of Canada to give the Prince Edward Island people a good railway service so far as that is possible. Although it is a certain contribution from the federal government to the people of that island, I am prepared, so far as I am concerned, and so long as I am a minister, to advocate a liberal treatment of the people in Prince Edward Island in reference to their transportation facilities.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). What was the capital expenditure on that road last year?

Mr. GRAHAM. Approximately $185,000. We are building a new branch line in Prince Edward Island, which is not yet completed. Last year we spent $206,397.

Now, I have been asked: What is the future of the Intercolonial? It stands to reason that it will not be very long, at least it cannot be very long before the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Grand Trunk will come to the government, or to the management of the Intercolonial, and ask to be relieved from their arrangements with us at Montreal to hand us over their traffic. That traffic is very heavy, and they will undoubtedly come to us when the Grand Trunk Pacific is completed and say: We want to take our own traffic down from Montreal to Lévis and hand it over to the Grand Trunck Pacific. I do not know what will happen in the years to come when they make that request. I am not prepared to say it will ever be granted; it will not be unless the terms are right. I believe the future of the Intercolonial is bound up in getting an exchange of traffic with a western through line that runs from the Pacific to the Atlantic, and from the Pacific to the St. Lawrence at least. I believe that is what will make the Intercolonial of still greater benefit to the people of Canada than it has been in the past. The Canadian Northern must shortly have a through line from the Pacific ocean down to Montreal and Quebec, it must get down to the sea-board in some way. I have an idea that in years to come, perhaps before long, the Intercolonial ought to get traffic from the Canadian Northern railway, its through traffic as well as its local traffic; and if the time ever comes when we have to release our arrangement with the Grand Trunk, which may not be for many years, then I think the proper thing for the Intercolonial would be to link up with the Canadian Northern railway, and hand its traffic from Montreal and Quebec, its through as well as its local traffic, over the Canadian Northern as far as possible for transportation west.

Now, I have talked altogether too long. The government railway is not easy to manage. I have to thank hon. members on both sides of the House for the courtesy that they have extended to those in charge of that railway. I live in a town in which are the Grand Trunk, the Canadian Pacific railway and Canadian Northern, and I know the applications which are made to members of parliament and the difficulties that arise sometimes in members being able to have matters adjusted exactly as they would like them to be, in the interest of the locality, and in the interest of the road as well. I have received a great deal of valuable advice from hon. members on both sides of the House, living along the line of railway not for the benefit of any particular individual, but for the benefit of the road and the people whom they represent. In future, we propose to manage the Intercolonial railway for the greatest benefit of the people who travel on it, or whose traffic is carried on it. I believe that the people of Canada have received great benefit from this road in the past and that in the future they will receive even greater benefit so long as we are able to manage it so that it will give them a good service at a reasonable rate and at the same time not put a burden upon the treasury of the Dominion government as it is not doing to any great extent at the present time.

In conclusion let me say, Sir, that there is no danger to Canadian transportation companies or our carrying trade, if we continue in the courageous course already outlined, and develop the national routes with which providence has endowed this country.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART (South Lanark). Mr. Speaker, it is rather late in the evening to commence a detailed reply to the remarks of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham). He perhaps could not help it, but I should judge that he was rather long in making his speech.

Mr. GRAHAM. I agree absolutely.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). It is not customary to present to the House the details in the form in which he gave them to us to-day. It is sufficient that they appear in the reports of his department without wearying the House with a continuous recital of details that it is impossible to consider or to answer at the time. The hon. gentleman began his remarks by pronouncing a eulogy upon the Board of Railway Commissioners. He said that they were the finest body not only on this continent, but in the world, and perhaps the ablest. I do not know all these gentlemen, but I should judge they are fully competent for the positions which they fill. Their duties do not require the most ardent attention or the greatest ability, notwithstanding the statement of the hon. minister, but just such common sense as is requisite for the Minister of Railways and Canals himself. I think they have filled their positions well.

The hon. gentleman verged from that to the question of transportation. He stated that it was the important question of this country, that the tariff was a secondary consideration. I say that the two of them have to go together. In order that we may have transportation, we must carefully look after our tariff arrangements. I agree with the hon. gentleman to a certain extent with reference to what we must do with our canals. He has the modern idea. The modern idea is, that no railway transportation can compete successfully with water, that the two should go together that a railway along a river like the St. Lawrence or the Mississippi is not a paradox. One is essential to the other. The very fact that by a waterway you can carry a certain line of freight in the cheapest manner, gives added value to the railway which parallels it. Railway companies in the United States are advocating the development of canal navigation along the line of their own railways for the purpose of handling such freight. That question has been most fully dealt with in Germany. The Germans are going ahead and developing what was thought a few years ago to be the antiquated system of canal transportation for freight of a certain kind. In order to maintain our position on this continent, as the minister very well observes, we have to look after our transportation facilities. We are placed by nature in the most advantageous position of any nation on the continent of America. Nature has given us facilities for the development of our waterways superior to those of any other nation on this continent. We ought to make full use of them because that nation through which the goods of another nation passes in going to market, virtually controls the political existence of the country which owns the goods. We are now in a position, if we maintain what we have at the present time, to be the controllers of the destinies of that part of North America which lies along our beautiful water system. How can we best do it? The minister suggests two plans with reference to water communication—the building of the Welland canal and of the Georgian Bay canal. It is not with the Minister of Railways, but he loves both of them. He loves the banks of the St. Lawrence, and I do not blame him for favouring the development of what is to my mind, the most magnificent waterway in the world. To live on its banks is something, because it is a beautiful river, but I must cease this flight of eloquence, and try to get down to something more practical. If the minister will take my advice, and I intend to give him reasons, he will be very careful about embarking upon an expenditure upon either of these great undertakings without the fullest possible information. He has the fullest possible information as to what the Georgian Bay canal will cost, while he has not to such an extent information with reference to the St. Lawrence river and the cost of its improvement. I made a statement which I am prepared to corroborate this evening, that the enlargement of the St. Lawrence canals to the capacity which is proposed—21 feet of navigation, or 24 feet on the mitre sills of the locks—will cost double the amount that will be required to build the Georgian Bay canal. Now, that is a strange statement. The building of that canal from the waters above to Lake Ontario, and thence down to Montreal, will cost nearly double what it would cost to build the Georgian Bay canal. I will give the figures and details with reference to this afterwards. What do you gain? The Georgian Bay canal route is 280 miles shorter than the other. It requires the most serious consideration why we should expend a large sum of money for making a ship canal down to Lake Ontario and from Lake Ontario to Montreal, if we do not require it.

We see in the newspapers that a proposition has been made to the Canadian government by the President of the United States for the joint building of a canal from the St. Lawrence river to New York, and of course joint ownership. I am glad the minister has given no intimation that the government will pay heed to such a proposal. We have got into trouble already by making an arrangement with the United States, and if you allow joint ownership of a single mile or a single inch in our territory for the purpose of navigation, you might as well give the Americans the whole country. If they had joint ownership they would have the right to police it, and if they had the right to police it and line it with their troops, they would pretty soon own it. This government has had warnings enough and I do not think they need more, but I solemnly warn them not to enter into any arrangement of that kind. If it is necessary in the interests of the trade of the North American continent that a canal should be built, let us, poor as we are, build it ourselves. With 8,000,000 population we are in the position of the toad under the hat, but Sir, when we are 20,000,000 people in Canada, we can treat with any nation in the world on equal terms, which we do not at present. Let us keep to ourselves what belongs to us; let us keep our waterways and our navigation system for ourselves, and then we can virtually control the destiny of the whole North American continent. Now, to build the Georgian Bay canal it will we are told cost about $120,000,000 as estimated by the engineers.

Mr. PUGSLEY. A little over $100,000,000.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Well, we will put it at the extreme and say $120,000,000, and to build the new Welland canal into Lake Ontario, it would cost about $40,000,000. To build the Georgian Bay canal it would take about 12 years, and five years to build the other canal, the great cost of that work being the deepening and locking of the St. Lawrence river from Kingston to Montreal. The minister is right in having a thorough survey made. Time is a very important thing in transportation and if by any modern engineering device we can save hours and hours in locking, we will divert the traffic to that route. I would advise the minister to make the locks large and, although I do not know how the lift lock we have constructed, is working, something of that kind might be adopted to save time. If you are bound to build the Welland canal from Lake Erie to Lake Ontario, see that it is done on the best possible lines and on the most modern engineering principles. What is the object of getting freight from Lake Erie into Lake Ontario. If you have to scow it from Kingston down to Montreal cannot you carry it by boat or scow as easily as they do now from Port Colborne to Montreal. What is the great advantage of building a canal into Lake Erie unless you continue it down to ocean navigation. I can see no advantage for my part, and if the minister is going to adopt that scheme the $5,000,000 we have spent on elevators and deepening the harbour at Port Colborne will be entirely wasted. That canal if built, will be a mutual benefit to Canadians and to Americans, and does the minister not realize what a large percentage of the traffic from west to east now goes via New York. That cannot be, because the facilities are not good in Montreal because we are told the capacity of Montreal harbour is two or three times greater than the present requirements. I believe, Sir, that the whole effort and energy of Canada should be directed towards intercommunication between the different portions of the Dominion. Without social intercourse, without commerce, without trade between the different provinces you need not have a Dominion at all. What we want to build up in the maritime provinces, in Quebec, and in Ontario, is a feeling of sympathy with the people of the Canadian west so that we may trade between each other, we taking as much as we can of their surplus products, and they buying what we manufacture. Let us have a closer union between all the people of Canada so that we may build up on this northern part of the continent a strong and prosperous nation, which I believe to be the aspiration of every young man in this country. What was it that brought our fathers to the territory north of the St. Lawrence, cold and inhospitable as it was then thought, in comparison with the land they left. Why did they come here, if not with a determination that they and their children and their children's children should build up here a portion of that mighty British Empire of which they were so proud. And that Sir, I believe to be the destiny of the Canadian people.

That ought to be the object, and, as my hon. friend says, it can only be done by improving the means of intercommunication between the different parts of this Dominion. I will not trouble you with many details, but I would like to place upon 'Hansard' my reasons for thinking that the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay canal will be a great benefit to the people of this country. The waterway will pass from Lake Huron at the northeast corner of the Georgian bay, and, following the French river, Lake Nipissing, the Mattawa and Ottawa rivers, will enter the St. Lawrence river at Montreal. In this manner connection will be made between the Great Lakes and the Atlantic ocean for large vessels up to 13,000 tons capacity. The canal will be 440 miles long, 22 feet deep, with a minimum width at the bottom of 200 feet. The rise and fall of the land will be overcome by 25 locks, each 650 feet long. I may state, too, that the whole of the excavation in this 440 miles will not be more than in the neighbourhood of about 25 miles. There may be a little dredging of 25 or 30 miles more, but the water between these excavations is deep, where a vessel can sail at full speed just as she can on the lakes. This was the route by which the people belonging to the Hudson Bay Company, Champlain and others travelled to the northwest; it was the old Indian route, and the shortest route from the east to the upper lakes and Hudson bay. I have not had the pleasure, like the hon. Minister of Railways, of living for any great length of time on the banks of the River St. Lawrence, but though I have a strong feeling of sympathy for that river, I am not speaking from sympathy, but from what I believe in my inmost soul to be in the interest of the people of this country, when I say that we shall never obtain the development we ought to obtain until we build that canal. I do not live near its banks. I am considering the future of this country, and the nation that commands that canal, secure from foreign interference unless by an act of war, will command the shortest possible route into the centre of this continent, and if we want to utilize our waterways we must build that canal. There is no railroad communication that can compete with water communication. You can carry freight by water for one-eighth per ton mile what you can by rail. It is the people's mode of transportation. It is true, companies may be formed to control transportation on water, as anywhere else, but any man can get a boat of his own. It is the mode of transportation that appeals to what the Minister of Finance speaks of as the horny-handed son of toil, as against the millionaire owner of railways and automobiles. Let us all unite to build this canal. It is not a political question, or one that ought to divide the parties in this House. We ought all to agree on some principle of developing this country. If we had used for this purpose some of the money that we have expended uselessly, as, for instance, the $50,000,000 which we have spent on capital account on the Intercolonial railway since 1897, the Georgian Bay canal would have been half finished at the present moment. This canal will give us, as I have said, a national waterway entirely within our own territory, far removed from the international boundary, and free from international complications, a waterway, which, under no conditions, can be used by the United States to assist them in wresting out of Canadian hands the trade of Canada's own Northwest, and it will secure, without possibility of competition, Canadian traffic for Canadian ports. It will foster existing and create new interprovincial trade both east and west, thus drawing closer the bonds of confederation and enormously increasing the national wealth and the power of the whole Dominion. It will greatly reduce the cost of carrying grain. It will open up Canadian Lake Huron and Lake Superior ports to Nova Scotia coal, thereby providing a market for a Canadian product to the extent of over 3,000,000 tons a year. It will very much assist the shipping of grain in winter. It will assist in the development of a million horse-power. As the hon. minister says, the possession by the people of Canada of our enormous water-powers gives us the facilities for being the greatest manufacturing country in the world. There is no doubt the time will arrive when heat as well as power will be developed by electricity, and if we have no coal in this section of the country we have what is more than its equivalent, the power which will produce heat and everything else that coal will produce. Canada to-day is paying away to the United States millions of dollars annually, which ought to be retained in the country for the upbuilding of our own industries. If this is the case to-day, in a few years this state of affairs will be very much accentuated. Every Canadian will agree that Canadian grain exported to Europe should pass through Canadian channels, but what are the facts? In 1909, out of 56,000,000 bushels of Canadian-grown grain exported to Europe, 32,000,000 bushels, or 57 per cent, were carried over United States transportation routes for export at United States Atlantic seaports, which meant a loss to Canadian interests of over $2,000,000 for carriage alone. Why is this? There are many reasons. To state the matter briefly, the existing Canadian routes cannot handle this traffic either as cheaply, as quickly, or in such quantities as the United States routes can.

Take the St. Lawrence river route, this only carried in 1909, 18 per cent of the total grain exported from this country.

That is a disgrace to the country, a disgrace to the conditions of transportation in Canada. If it can be remedied only by the deepening of the St. Lawrence system, perfect that route, if it can be developed better by the plan I propose, build the Georgian Bay canal. I would not like to see the money of the country expended on that canal if I did not believe from the bottom of my heart that it is the cheapest, the best and the only plan by which we can control the exports of the Northwest, and of that part of the United States bordering on the Great Lakes.

We are paying to-day about $13,400,000 annually to the United States coal interests. The greatest portion of this could with proper transportation facilities be retained to our own people, although it might be necessary to put a higher duty on coal and that section of the country which I represent would perhaps suffer the most. Utilize the water-powers we have in this section of the country, do everything that is necessary for the industrial life of the country, encourage the growth in Canada of the necessaries of life, the building of machinery, and the development of every industry that can properly be carried on; finish all our products as nearly as possible to perfection before exporting them from this country. That is the policy that ought to be followed by this and every other government, and I thought it was the policy that was followed by my hon. friend. I might give reasons for the building of the Georgian Bay canal although the hour is late. But there is one thing that sticks out boldly and meets the view. We have surveys of the Georgian Bay canal, we know what it can be built for, we know that it will have the result of benefiting nearly every part of the country. It is not a party question, many of the foremost supporters of the project are on the minister's side of the House; let us unite and add one great scheme of water transportation from the Great Lakes. How the Americans see it! The President of the United States says that what is in the interest of the New York section of the country is the development of the waterways, and if possible the building up of oceanic communication, having ship communication between the Great Lakes and New York, if it is to retain even a moiety of the trade of that country. The Americans see that the only way to do this is not by building railways, but by the far cheaper mode of transportation with which Providence has so greatly favoured us, that of water communication. I earnestly entreat all my friends on both sides of the House—for I have arrived at the stage of life when I have no very bitter political opinions on any subject, I think perhaps good might come even from the Minister of Railways—and I ask him as I ask my friends on this side of the House to do all that they possibly can in developing what I think is of the greatest use to the people of this country.

The hon. gentleman talks about the Hudson Bay railway, and says he is going to build it for the small amount of $20,000,000, I presume exclusive of terminals and steamboat communication between Canada and the old country. The minister must have a power in this House when they talk so lightly of an expenditure of $20,000,000 as nothing at all, and the manner in which my friend introduced it showed that he expected no opposition to it. If he wanted no opposition he should have had a different report laid on the table of the House. His deputy and the gentlemen who examined and surveyed that section of the country reported that they found a good enough route nearly fulfilling the description of my friend the late Mr. Wood, who in discussing the building of the Canadian Pacific railway spoke of Manitoba as being amongst the eternal snows, still further up amongst the avalanches of the eternal snows where woman's sweet voice is never heard nor even the hum of the mosquito. I hope the event will be as opposite to my prophecy as the result of the building of the Canadian Pacific railway has been to Mr. Wood's. The minister's deputy says we may expect a full traffic on the road for a couple of months in the year, and a less amount for three months. He is very chary about what we will have for the remainder of the year. Has the minister, before making an expenditure of $25,000,000, considered how the cost is to be repaid to the people of this country? If it is a thing of benefit that the people of the Northwest expect in cheapening transportation and increasing the value of their farms and products I would have no objection to it. I do not know what the result may be, but I once applied with some others for a charter to build a railway from Winnipeg to Hudson bay. Looking at the map that seems an elegant thing. There were a couple of rival charters, and we came to inquire into the navigation of Hudson bay. We found that the description was very much that of the deputy minister's report, that the navigation ends about October 15, and begins somewhere about the first of August. You would have two or three months of navigation during the year, but even two or three months, if possible and continuous, might be of immense benefit to the country. I remember when it was thought that the navigation of the St. Lawrence would be only four or five months in the year.

I hope to see the day in the near future when, under the Minister of Marine and Fisheries we shall have ice breakers in the St. Lawrence, so that the river may be navigable at least as far up as Quebec for about eleven months of the year. I believe that it is quite possible. And I hope the navigation of Hudson bay will be found such that the evil forebodings of the present may be dissipated. However, the Hudson bay scheme is a large undertaking—$25,000,000 spent for a purpose which is still not beyond the range of doubt. I think the deputy minister says that it is the same distance from La Pas to Churchill as from Winnipeg to Lake Superior. The calculation was made, when I was Minister of Railways, that it would be cheaper to take grain down by the Canadian Pacific railway to Port Arthur, ship it by water to Montreal and thence to Great Britain than to take it by way of Hudson bay. It would cost about the same to leave grain on the shore of Hudson bay as to leave it at Port Arthur. The advocates of the Hudson bay scheme said: You will be in a better position by four cents a bushel than you are at Port Arthur; from Port Arthur to Montreal, it will cost you four cents a bushel, and it will cost you as much from Montreal to Liverpool as from Nelson or Churchill to Liverpool. But it will cost double as much to take grain from Churchill to Liverpool, under any system and with any equipment now known to navigation, as to take grain from Montreal to Liverpool. The minister says that the steamers can be employed for five months in the year. But it was thought in my time that it would require specially constructed steamers, and that they could not be profitably employed for more than three months in the year. That may not be true to-day. All that information the minister should be possessed of before he enters upon this expenditure of $25,000,000; and when he is fully satisfied he should see to it that the thing is done in a way to bring the best results for the people of the great and growing west. For the time will come, development proceeding as at present, when the exports of that country will be immensely in excess of what they are now; and every effort of the people of this country should be put forth in the direction of providing means to carry our surplus products to market. If these products are not to go down by Lake Superior and Montreal, St. John, Halifax and Quebec to the mother country, then, let them go by way of Hudson bay. In any case, let the transportation be over our own routes. As I said before, the country that controls transportation of the surplus products controls political destiny. If our surplus is to go to a foreign country to build up foreign transportation systems and industries, then we may say good-bye to the dreams of our young men for the building up of this country. Your regulations in reference to grain inspection, elevators, and transportation will be useless, for, in case of certain events, which, I hope in my soul will not come to pass, we shall not have a bushel of wheat to put into these elevators and your regulations will be idle wind. I was speaking to-day with a man who is engaged up to the eyes in industries of that kind, and he has come to the conclusion that the industries in which he has such large investments are worthless under certain conditions. But I hope for better things; I hope that something will happen in the meantime to save our country from the disaster which might overwhelm it. And I hope the Minister of Railways will use his influence in that direction. He seems to take an interest in these subjects and studies them up; I must say he does as well as I could expect him to do under the circumstances: He does very well anyway.

Now, a few words as to the Intercolonial railway. You must remember one thing in making comparisons with the past, and that is that you have added $50,000,000 to the capital account of the Intercolonial since 1867. So, if you are making a comparison of two or three years back you should add interest on that $50,000,000. We were promised beautiful results from the acquisition of the Drummond railway with the large expenditure on capital account that was involved. The predecessor of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Graham) gave glowing accounts of how this railway was to be no longer a backwoods railway but was to be a first class road with its terminals in a first class city. And what has been the result of all this? The minister does not even make mention of the past in this connection. And I think he is perfectly right, because after all, the people of Canada—certainly the young men of Canada—do not care a cent for anything that is more than four or five years old; they want something of the present and of the future, what the railway is doing and what it may be expected to do. The minister states that the Intercolonial affords the cheapest transportation of any railway on the continent. He makes comparisons with the Canadian Pacific railway, the Grand Trunk, the Canadian Northern, and, last of all with the Ontario system of railways. Does he think that a railway which has been in existence for about forty years should be compared in freight charges or anything else with a railway which has only been constructed and which is only struggling into existence as a backwoods road? Does he think that it is fair to make a comparison of freight and passenger rates with the Canadian Pacific railway? That road has a similar condition from Winnipeg to the Pacific coast. It is in great part what is called a mountain railway and has exceptional rates. And the Canadian Northern is in the same category. The only fair comparison is with the Grand Trunk. And the rates of freight on the Intercolonial, taking them all in all, are about the same as on the Grand Trunk. In all communications under twenty miles the passenger rates for both roads are practically the same.

I do not know the classification as to freights. What brings down the rate per ton per mile, even in the classification on the Intercolonial, are two or three exceptional things. One is the carriage of coal, which we carry at the least possible rate for the purpose of fostering that industry. The other is the carriage of timber, sawn lumber and shingles, which are carried at a very low rate. But for ordinary traffic, I make the statement in this House that the rate for passenger traffic between way stations on the Intercolonial is as high as the ordinary charge on any other railway. It is as high as the New York Central, as high as the Erie, as high as the Grand Trunk. It is not as high on the whole as on the Canadian Pacific railway or the Canadian Northern. The freight rates that apply in that country are fair freight rates, and so are the passenger rates. I think the minister ought to give other reasons for a shortage in the accounts, or for a failure to balance the two ends. There is one thing I am glad to see, and that is the prosperity in the maritime provinces, as shown by the traffic on the Intercolonial which they afford. In 1909 the collections amounted to $9,600,000, whereas the collections in 1897 were only about $3,000,000 a year. There must have been an enormous development in the wealth of the people of the maritime provinces to enable them to pay to the Intercolonial railway the amount they are now paying in collections.

The minister says that the railway is handicapped by water competition. Water communication between two points develops a trade which railroads cannot do, because you can carry freight by water communication for one-eighth of what it costs to carry it by railway. If you are to build up industries, if you are to develop the resources of that country, you must have cheap communication, a cheap communication which the railroads cannot give. I congratulate the minister on the better showing the Intercolonial is making. It is to the interest of the people of Canada that that road should be prosperous, and that the maritime provinces should be prosperous. It is more necessary now than ever that the central and western provinces should have the closest alliance with our sister provinces down by the sea. The fate of this Dominion depends upon the existence of a similarity of ideas between the people of middle and western Canada with the inhabitants of the maritime provinces. This is absolutely necessary to enable us to build up the nationality on which we have all set our hearts. Mr. Speaker, I have a good many more things that I wish to say, and I may take another opportunity of outlining my scheme for the development of transportation in Canada.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou). I trust that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) who has just taken his seat will not regard me as displaying any lack of courtesy if I fail to follow him in his remarks. Let me say that I share with him in his enthusiasm for the development of a transportation system in this country. I join with the greatest pleasure in his support of the construction of the Georgian Bay canal, which I think deserves immediate consideration at the hands of the government, and which is absolutely necessary in the interests of every part of this country. I am sure the House listened with a great deal of pleasure to the remarks of the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart) in his review of the condition of the Intercolonial railway. On this side of the House we all regard with the greatest respect the venerable representative of Lanark, who in days past has filled the position of Minister of Railways, and who enjoys in a high degree the esteem and respect of those who sit on the right hand of the Speaker.

Now, let me refer briefly to some phases of the situation in regard to the Intercolonial as outlined by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham). Let me say, as I said last year, that I think the surplus which the minister makes out as somewhere in the vicinity of $700,000, is about $650,000 too large, and I will give my reason for saying so. It is a reason not generally understood at first sight; but let me point out that when you make a comparison in the operation of the Intercolonial with the operation of any company road in this country, there is a marked difference between the application of the revenues. At the close of the financial year of any company, if they have a surplus of a million or two, that money is available during the succeeding year for the purpose of renewals, extensions or repairs which are necessary in the interest of revenue. Not so in the case of the Canadian government railway. On the 31st of March next it will be the duty of the accountant of the Railway Department to place to the credit of the Receiver General of this Dominion that surplus of $700,000. It has gone forever from the Intercolonial, it is not available in the succeeding year for any purpose for the improvement of the road. The reason I say that the surplus of $650,000 is too large, is for that reason to begin with, but let me give you another reason. The Intercolonial railway was an interprovincial work. As my hon. friend from South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) well knows, it was one of the propositions that was essential at the time of confederation, included in the British North America Act as one of the very conditions upon which these four provinces decided to group themselves together to form the nucleus which was in time to be the Canada of to-day. It was not on account of it benefiting merely the people of the maritime provinces that the expenditure for that road was contemplated or made, but it was made for the unity and benefit of Canada as a whole. When you come to consider the Intercolonial railway you are coming to deal with a proposition which intrinsically differs from that of any other railway in the Dominion. Had you had no Intercolonial railway you never would have had any confederation. It is at the very basis of the whole system, quite as essential as one of the corner stones of the edifice which was afterwards constructed as any of the other provisions fought for and discussed at great length in arriving at the terms of the British North America Act. It is in the same position as the canals which were constructed in the central portion of Canada and which were then taken over. It was what the transportation system by water was to the centre of Canada; it was essential that we should have communication with the different parts of Canada in order to make confederation a possibility.

The minister has told us the amount which has been expended upon the Intercolonial railway since that time, and which is somewhere in the vicinity, according to the last railway returns, of $82,000,000. During the same period there has been expended $96,000,000 on account of the canals. I am aware that this argument has been made before in this House, but I may be pardoned if I refer to it again. There is this difference, that while nobody in this country expects any revenue from the canals, while they are run absolutely free, while no tolls are charged on the traffic that goes through them, and nobody wants to have tolls charged, we have this remarkable fact that it is regarded as a sin and a disgrace that the minister does not come in and announce a great big surplus on the Intercolonial railway. For that reason, and on account of these conditions, the surplus is altogether too large. If government ownership is of any value, why should it be that the people who are operating a government utility, and more particularly a government utility of that peculiar character, it being an ante-confederation essential, be expected to show a large surplus? That $650,000 of a surplus cannot be used for capital expenditure if it is not spent before the 31st of March of this year, it goes into the treasury and is voted out again by way of capital, if not for revenue. Now, it is a gratifying thing, as the ex-minister has said, that the development of the maritime provinces has produced a condition of affairs in which the road has a revenue three times what it was worth fourteen or fifteen years ago. The extension of the road from Quebec to Moncton was one of the essential things which contributed to that condition. The original road consisted of the smallest kind of a local proposition, ending at Rivière du Loup. Gradually it was extended to Quebec; only within the last twelve years has it run to Montreal, and even to-day it is a local road. It does not share in any of the advancement which has come to western Canada, or to the largest province in the Dominion—Ontario. We never tap directly any part of your business, simply because, when it comes to Montreal, the Intercolonial railway can only get what the Grand Trunk railway or the Canadian Pacific railway give it, and what it gathers from the other railways, local or large as they may be. Being only a local road on that account, that the country should be clamouring for a surplus of half a million, or of any amount, is altogether absurd. It seems to me that the proper view to take of this proposition is that if this road is run so that both ends meet and the country is not called upon to contribute anything for any deficit that may arise you have a proper condition of affairs with regard to the Intercolonial railway. The minister deserves to be congratulated upon the intelligent appreciation of events from the railway standpoint which he has displayed in dealing with railways. But there are one or two things to which I want to call his attention. It is no answer for my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, or for myself as the representative of a constituency supporting him, to go to a district in my county which has had a telegraph station for the last twenty-five years, and which was closed up a year ago, and say: It is true that you have had your station closed up and you have not now the facilities which you have had for twenty-five years, but we have a surplus of $700,000, which goes into the treasury, and which is no good to the Intercolonial railway after March 31. I say that there is a situation where my hon. friend could use a surplus. That is a simple case. Why take away the facilities which have existed in the past, when, by this small expenditure, the whole country would not be affected in any way whatever, and you would have a substantial condition under which both ends would meet?

With regard to the question of freights, my hon. friend the minister produced figures which, as the ex-Minister of Railways says, require a good deal of study to ascertain just what they really mean. There has been an increase of freights on the Intercolonial railway in the last three or four years. With regard to certain local freights for short distances, the freight rates are rather too onerous. It must be remembered that the real manufacturing, or producing, portion of the Intercolonial railway is the extreme eastern part of it, and that there are intermediate agricultural districts which do not produce exportable manufactured articles, or any articles upon which high classification exists. Therefore, it is difficult to make a comparison with the business of other railways, or to ascertain accurately just how these rates work out when applied to the trade of the people who use the railway the most. But it does seem to me, having regard to the premise that I have attempted to lay down and having regard to all the conditions, that it should not be expected that a surplus should be obtained from this road. It may be said it is an anomaly that a representative of the people should stand up in parliament and say with regard to an important public utility that you should find fault with the size of the surplus. But Sir, I seriously contend that the proposition I make is absolutely sound, and that it cannot be questioned from any reasonable standpoint.

There is another thing with regard to the administration of the road that I would like to take the opportunity of referring to. The men who are working on the Intercolonial railway are servants of the Crown, and they ought to be treated as servants of the Crown. When increases in wages are to be given they should be given by the government through the minister, and by the minister through his officials, having proper regard to the best administration of the road. The minister should not give assent to the proposition that conciliation boards would be appointed for the determination of such questions on the Intercolonial railway. Not long ago I was told by the government in answer to a question, a fact which I well knew, that there was no statute which provided for a conciliation board in connection with the Intercolonial railway. Suppose that in the Marine Department the right of the servants of the Crown to strike is recognized (and that is the basis of the Conciliation Act), and you are going to assume they will strike, by appointing a conciliation board, (which is another feature of the Conciliation Act), you have from every standpoint of the administration of the law a most anomalous position. Suppose our friends the men of our fishery cruisers made up their minds when they came to port that they were not getting enough wages, and some enterprising gentleman who was interested in promoting these boards came along and said: Demand an increase of wages from the minister, and if he does not give it have a conciliation board, and the whole operation of the ships was dependent upon the decision of that board, how absurd the situation would be. But it is no more absurd than it is in the case of the Intercolonial railway, because every man working on the Intercolonial railway is a servant of the Crown, and he accepts employment as such, and if he wants to have the advantages which accrue from company operation of a road he should seek employment on a company road. The responsibility of determining what should be done in regard to the servants of the Crown whether employed on a railway or elsewhere, should be exercised by the responsible minister. Suppose the minister had to announce to parliament that by reason of a decision of a conciliation board which compelled him to pay $100,000 more to a certain class of employees there was a deficit on the road, parliament would have a perfect right to say that the minister had no business to accept the decision of such a board, because it does not bind parliament.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Could not the minister delegate his powers to a conciliation board and ask it to make inquiry?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou). That is another thing altogether. I say that the minister acting through his commission who are the best judges in this matter ought in proper cases to increase the salaries of the employees, and whether he did so or not he should assume the responsibility. There is another thing in connection with this comparison between the Intercolonial railway and the Canadian Pacific railway, and the Grand Trunk railway; the Canadian Pacific railway and the Grand Trunk railway have ocean connections, they have steamers in connection with their railway, they have booking agencies in Europe and every facility for inducing passengers to take their lines, all of which the Intercolonial railway does not possess. Our industries in the maritime provinces seriously complain that ocean steamers will carry iron and steel and other commodities from Liverpool right across the ocean and as far west as Toronto, and that the freight including steamer and railway will be less than the industries in the maritime provinces have to pay for the transportation of similar articles for the land journey alone. Why that should be I do not know, but it is a thing the minister should look into.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Did we not give the commission power to control the rates on railways and ocean connections?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou). Not the steamship rates. The question was discussed, but it never was legislated upon. Now, in the last parliament attention was directed to a proposition that the British preference should be extended to only such goods as were brought to Canada through Canadian ports, and hon. gentlemen opposite who three or four years ago took strong ground against that because they wished to get their goods through New York and Boston rather than through Halifax and St. John in winter are the men who to-day are very much excited about the danger to Canadian autonomy and Canadian loyalty, because they claim that under the agreement with the United States goods are likely to go through American ports. These are the men who four years ago opposed a resolution proposed in this parliament by a Nova Scotia member which said that the British preference should only be given to goods which came in through Canadian ports. If, such a regulation were put in force and Canadian imports went through the maritime province ports in winter we would have an advantage for the Intercolonial railway which we have never had since it was built.

Mr. BEATTIE. The maritime ports were objected to because when goods were landed in them, it was two weeks before they reached upper Canada. I know that from my own experience. I shipped my goods for many years through New York and Boston simply on account of the delay in the lower Canadian ports. That was the whole trouble.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou). I do not feel like giving to my hon. friend from London the retort I might.

Mr. BEATTIE. Do not be afraid.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou). There are some gentlemen so excited about sending goods through American ports that their loyalty ought surely to be strong enough to permit them to wait a week or two in order to get their goods through Canadian ports.

Mr. BEATTIE. Sometimes three weeks.

Mr. FIELDING. What is three weeks for the sake of the old flag?

Mr. BEATTIE. I have been in the field sixteen weeks for the flag. If you are in business, and your customers want goods, and you cannot get them by one route you must have them brought in by the other.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou). I do not want to be turned into that discussion, further than to say that I hope that our good friends on the other side will now be found supporting us on this side when we ask the government to put into effect legislation which will give us trade through Canadian ports not only in summer, but for the whole twelve months of the year and satisfied they can get them as quickly through our ports as through New York or Boston. That it seems to me would afford one solution of the Intercolonial railway problem.

Mr. STAPLES. Why did not the government, who had the majority behind them, put it into effect?

Mr. MACDONALD. Because certain business interests of the country, some of whom are allied very closely with my hon. friend and his associates, represented that it would be such an injury to them that the government did not carry out the request made to them by gentlemen on this side of the House. If the hon. gentleman looks at 'Hansard,' he will find the names of the gentlemen who made that complaint.

Mr. GRAHAM. Some of the Toronto gentlemen who are making the greatest noise now came to me and asked me not to do it, as they wanted their goods to come in by way of New York.

Mr. MACDONALD. I am speaking as a Canadian who comes from the maritime provinces, and I say that the problem of railway transportation in this country will not be solved until we see the necessity of applying that preference so as to give the advantage to Canadian ports the whole year round. Following the same line, I think that many of these discussions in parliament would be saved and a great many heart-burnings on the question of the Intercolonial railway would be avoided, if our transcontinental systems were extended to the extreme limit of Canada and were permitted to operate on the lines of railway which are now called the Intercolonial. In the statute which provides for the construction of the Transcontinental railway, there is a covenant under which running rights over the Intercolonial from Moncton east, are accorded to the Grand Trunk Pacific upon arrangements to be effected. Here is the Canadian Pacific railway at St. John, and we have on our Atlantic coast, some 200 or 300 miles nearer to Liverpool, available ports which can be reached at all seasons of the year without any difficulty. Therefore, it seems to me that it would be in the interests of Canadians that the Canadian Pacific railway should also be given the right to run freight and passenger trains over the rails of the Intercolonial railway under conditions fair to the country and to the company. If in this way we had immediate connection with the various transcontinental lines, so that a man in the extreme east of Canada could go on any one of our transcontinental lines to the extreme west, and come back on any one of them without that dislocation which necessarily exists as an impediment to traffic when you have to transfer from one railway to another, and go into the division of payments and the allocations of freight incident thereto, it seems to me that the maritime provinces would be satisfied, and the whole interests of Canada would be advanced.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). We had that in 1897. The Grand Trunk and the Canadian Pacific railway both had running rights over the Intercolonial.

Mr. MACDONALD. I think my hon. friend must be mistaken. The Canadian Pacific railway trains still run on the Intercolonial between St. John and Halifax, under a working arrangement with the government; but these are really government railway trains making connection with the Canadian Pacific railway at St. John.

Mr. HAGGART. (Lanark). The hon. gentleman will remember that the late Mr. Blair, when Minister of Railways, pointed out the monstrosity of the agreement which the late government had made with the Canadian Pacific railway, giving it running power over the Intercolonial to Halifax.

Mr. PUGSLEY. They took the cream of the local traffic.

Mr. RHODES. According to the Minister of Railways, there is no cream down there.

Mr. MACDONALD. I am one of the younger men who look to the future rather than to the past, and I trust that the minister will regard favourably the proposition which I make, which would afford the people of my province the advantages of these transcontinental railway systems. From the point of view of trade and transportation, an immediate connection with the various transcontinental lines operated through the whole of Canada would be an advantage which it is desirable to obtain if it is possible to obtain it on fair terms.

Mr. C. A. MAGRATH (Medicine Hat). I do not intend to deal with any of the questions that have been dealt with by the Minister of Railways, or those who have followed him. The railway question is a very important question in western Canada. Ever since I have been in this House I have not been in sympathy with the methods that are employed here in the granting of railway charters. I remember very distinctly my first visit to the Railway Committee, a little over two years ago, when certain interests were looking for a charter for a railway through the constituency which I represent in this House. I remember asking the gentleman who had charge of the Bill, what his clients proposed doing, when they proposed doing it, and the amount of money they proposed expending. He was very emphatic in his answers. He told me that they were going to commence work at a very early date, that they practically had the money arranged for. I suggested that it would not be amiss to ask those interested to put up say 5 per cent as a guarantee of good faith. The committee did not, however, appear to see eye to eye with me in that respect. Now, I have heard it said in this House that we should not demand from people applying for railway charters any evidence of their good intentions—that there was free trade in railway charters.

Now, I wish to point out to the House the situation in the west. Settlers are going many miles from railway lines. They learn of these charters being granted, and the moment they are granted they begin to look forward to the construction of the roads, and it is easily understood that they are disappointed when year after year passes by and they do not get any portion of the roads for which the charters have been granted. Those interests come back here and get renewals of charters. I remember asking two years ago for a return showing the mileage for which railway charters were granted outside of the three active railway-builders in this country. Between the years 1900 and 1907 we granted charters for a total mileage of something like 37,000 miles, of which something in the neighbourhood of 400 miles were constructed. In the first session that I was here, two years ago, we dealt with some 56 charters, of which 43 were renewals, and 13 new applications. Last year we dealt with 52 charters; 37 were renewals and 15 new applications. I understand that there is a Bill before the Senate which is designed to improve that situation. It appears to me that the question of improving the method of granting charters in this country is a matter that should be dealt with entirely by the government. After the charter is granted the next move is for the railway company to file its route map. That is done with the Department of Railways. I have been present when the Minister of Railways has dealt with these route maps, and I must say, in fairness to him, that he deals fairly with those who come before him. The moment, however, that these route maps are approved, the information goes back to the country where the people are and then they believe, knowing the procedure which is that the maps of location have to be filed with the Railway Department and that these plans cannot depart more than one mile from the line as shown on the route map, they believe they know where that railway is to be constructed, they make their plans, they have been known to buy land and locate along the line where the route is shown on the route map and then we have instances in which these active railway corporations, I know that the Canadian Northern, and I know that the Canadian Pacific railway have come back with amended plans which they present to the Minister of Railways for reconsideration. The minister gives us notice and we are permitted to be present at the time, but in that immense country it is impossible to get at the people in sufficient time to see to what extent they have been led to locate along the line as shown upon the route map. No railway company can undertake to lay down a route on a map from which they cannot deflect more than one mile without making a survey of that route, and I say that something should be done to give these railways to understand that when they come here with their route maps for approval these route maps have to stand or if they are to be allowed to change their route maps and have them amended from time to time I think it would be better to do away with route maps altogether. I know two or three cases where serious injury has been done to individuals in that way, the route map has been changed some six or seven miles. I feel that it is my duty to bring this matter to the attention of the minister in the way I am now doing.

Mr. MAGRATH.

I would say a few words on the general question of railway development in western Canada. What is the situation, for instance, in southern Alberta, and all over the west. We invite settlers to come into that country; they take up our lands, they go very many miles from railways in order to get those lands. The constant cry which I have been receiving from my constituency ever since I have been in this House has been: When are we to receive better railway facilities? Had I known this question was coming up I would have collected some of these letters and placed them on record. We have three active railways operating in that country. They bring into the country large sums for the building of railways. I claim that the railway mileage is not distributed over that country so as to do the greatest good to the greatest area in the shortest possible time. No one would question that statement who knows anything about the situation in that country. I claim that these railways are, to a certain extent, jockeying each other. One railway comes into a certain locality, and the two others appear to think it is necessary that they should come in and run alongside of it. I claim that we have railways bonused, or with bonds guaranteed by the people, running within two or three miles of each other. My view is that as one railway invades a certain territory the other comes in behind it, and possibly the third behind that, and if by any accident there should be a few townships left the first loops back and gets in behind the other two. That is a problem the Department of Railways might take hold of. I see no reason why the Minister of the Interior, who is looking after the lands in that country, should not associate himself with the Minister of Railways and get the heads of the active railways here at the beginning of the year and discuss with them their plans for the current year, and by that means endeavour to get them to spread their energies over a larger territory. For instance, in southern Alberta the Canadian Pacific railway is in the best position to, in a measure, meet the needs of that part of the west, whilst in some other parts of the country the Grand Trunk would be best able to supply better facilities, and the Canadian Northern, in all probability, could pick up another section of country. Then, when these roads had fairly met the needs of the several districts, they could invade the territory of each other as fully as they wished. I venture to question if the Minister of Railways, having given us vast masses of statistics here to-day, is in a position to cite to this House what the Canadian Pacific railway is going to build in the prairie provinces this year, or the Canadian Northern, or the Grand Trunk Pacific. I have been here for two years, and I have never been able to get information of that character. It is all very well to be looking over our shoulder at the past and gathering information of the character we have been receiving to-day from the minister I would like to see more interest taken by looking into the future and knowing something of what these roads propose doing and where. They receive charters from the people. I am not here as being opposed to railway corporations. I believe in bringing the railways and the people together. The farmers cannot do without the railway any more than the railway can do without the farmers. The cry of the farmer in the west is that he is not getting proper attention in that respect. I hope that the minister will take my suggestions in the spirit in which they are given. This is not a political question at all, and I merely say I feel we should know more about what these railway companies are doing, and I see no reason why the government should not, at the beginning of each year, find out from those roads what they are doing, and at the same time endeavour to pull them apart thereby distributing their energies, because looking at their work in the west, it appears that they appear to wish to run in the same channel.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Supply.

Progress reported.

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPROULE. What business will be taken up on Monday?

Mr. FIELDING. It was arranged that the motion for Supply should be made, and the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) would make a statement concerning the affairs of his department. This was arranged between the Minister of the Interior and the hon. member for Lennox (Mr. U. Wilson). That hon. gentleman expressed a desire that the minister should make a statement very much in line with that which the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) made to-day.

Mr. SPROULE. And if the House goes into Committee of Supply?

Mr. FIELDING. We shall proceed with the estimates of the Minister of the Interior.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.38 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, March 13, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PULP WOOD EXPORTS.

Hon. WM. PATERSON (Minister of Customs). I desire to put in an amended answer to a question asked by Mr. Paquet and reported at page 2732 of unrevised 'Hansard.' We made a mistake in putting in the figures of the total export, while the question related only to the exports to the United States alone. The question was as follows:

Mr. PAQUET:

1. To what amount in money did we export pulp wood to the United States during the fiscal years 1908-9 and 1909-10?
2. To what amount in money did we export wood pulp to the United States in 1908-9 and 1909-10?
3. To what amount of money did we export paper to the United States in 1908-9 and 1909-10?

Mr. PATERSON:

1. The exports of pulp wood from Canada to the United States during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1909, amounted to $4,356,-391; and during the fiscal year 1910 to $6,-076,628.
2. The exports of wood pulp from Canada to the United States during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1909, amounted to $3,064,819; and during the fiscal year 1910 to $4,175,309.
3. The exports of paper from Canada to the United States during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1909, amounted to $958,-870; and during the fiscal year 1910 to $1,-297,052.

LORD STRATHCONA—CORRECTION. OF ERRONEOUS REPORT.

On the orders of the day being called.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I crave permission to lay before the House a cable received last Saturday from Lord Strathcona in regard to a statement made by an hon. member of this House in the course of the discussion on reciprocity:

London, March 11, 1911.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Premier,
Ottawa.

The statement attributed to me by Mr. Goodeve in the House of Commons, Ottawa, on ninth instant, as reported in to-day's London 'Times' by their Ottawa correspondent that I had said 'that Canadian ministers had been hypnotized by the brilliance of the American offer and had fallen into a trap,' is entirely baseless and without foundation in fact. It is unwarranted by anything I have ever said in connection with the reciprocity agreement which I have refrained from discussing. Will you kindly make this known in the House.

STRATHCONA.

DOMINION DEVELOPMENT RAILWAY COMPANY.

House again in committee on Bill (No. 113) to incorporate the Dominion Development Railway Company.—(Mr. Smith, Nanaimo).

Mr. McCRANEY. I have been spoken to by the promoter of this Bill who tells me that there has been some discussion with regard to the name. He consents to the name being changed to the British Columbia and Central Canada Railway Company. I move that the section be so amended.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Has there been notice of the proposed amendment?

Mr. McCRANEY. I am not aware of that. If there has not been notice, I suppose it would be better that the Bill should stand.

Mr. PERLEY. This matter was discussed at the Railway Committee, where the desire was expressed that the name should be altered, and I understand that the parties are agreed.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think the change of name is a greater amendment than should be allowed without notice.

Mr. SPROULE. As I understand it, the name could not be changed by the committee, but only by the House, and such changes are usually made in the last stages of the Bill and notice is not required.

Mr. GRAHAM. Is it not customary to change these names on the third reading?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think the change would require to be made in the committee, as the name is given in the section of the Bill.

Mr. GRAHAM. Let it stand, and this proposed change of name can stand as a notice.

Progress reported.

THE GLOBE PRINTING COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 121) respecting the Globe Printing Company.—Mr. Clarke (Essex).

Mr. BLAIN. Seeing this is in connection with the Toronto 'Globe,' I think we should have some explanation of it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

Mr. GRAHAM. The 'Globe' is generally able to explain itself. This Bill relates to matters of internal economy—not political economy—in the management of the business of this company. The Bill affects only the shareholders who are thoroughly protected.

On subsection 3 of section 3: Increase of capital stock.

Mr. SPROULE. It has always occurred to me that there is something defective in the manner of allotting stock. This provides that the directors may make by-laws to allot stock, and it has this redeeming feature that these by-laws must be confirmed by the shareholders. I think the Bill ought to go further and provide that when stock is to be allotted it should be allotted according to the present holdings. There is nothing in this or in any of these Acts to prevent the directors allotting that stock to any one they choose although, the stock may be worth much more than par. The only time at which the shareholders could discuss the allotment of stock would be when they were asked to confirm the by-law, and I do not know if a discussion at that time would be effective.

Mr. NESBITT. I think subsection 3 of section 2 covers that.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). It is only in the event of default being made as to the manner of allotting stock in the by-law.

Mr. BARKER. If subsection 3 is not acted upon in the mode prescribed the directors may do as they please.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). The by-law has to receive the consent of two-thirds of the number of shareholders.

Mr. SPROULE. A by-law is submitted for the approval of the shareholders. Once the by-law is approved the shareholders have no control over it whatever, and the directors can go on and allot the stock as they see fit.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 102) to incorporate the Imperial Traction Company—Mr. Rankin.

Bill (No. 110) respecting the People's Railway Company—Mr. Nesbitt.

Bill (No. 130) for the relief of Matilda Emo.—Mr. Hodgins.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 133) to incorporate the Alberta-Saskatchewan Life Insurance Company.—Mr. Rutan.

Bill (No. 134) to incorporate the Canadian Inter-Mountain Railway Company.—Mr. Goodeve.

Bill (No. 135) respecting the Western Alberta Railway Company.—Mr. Douglas.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

* Mr. LENNOX:

1. In the figures given by the Minister of Railways as the total cost of the eastern division of the Transcontinental railway, down to the 31st December, 1910, viz., $93,920,956.10, is there anything included for interest? If so, what sum?
2. Is there anything included in respect of the Quebec bridge? If so, how much?
3. From what sources does the government obtain the money?
4. If by loans, how much money has been borrowed, in what sums, at what dates, and at what rates of interest?
5. How has the interest been met, out of revenue, out of borrowed capital, by new loans, or in what way?
6. What is the total amount paid to date for interest?
7. What sums have been paid in placing the loans, for agents' fees, commissions, brokerage charges, and other expenses of this kind?
8. Does the Railway Commission make all payments? If so, what is the total amount furnished or transferred by the government to the Commission to 31st December, 1910, and how much since?
9. What is the total amount to the 31st December, 1910, debited against this eastern division in the books of the Department of Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines, or in the books of the Department of Finance, and what is the total amount debited in the books of the Railway Commission?

Mr. FIELDING:

1. No.
2. No.
3. Partly from revenue and partly from proceeds of loans.
4. No loan was issued for the National Transcontinental railway exclusively. Two 3½ per cent loans 1930-50 were issued,—one dated February, 1908, for £3,000,000 (or $14,600,000 currency), to provide for maturing liabilities and obligations in connection with the construction of the National Transcontinental railway and for other purposes; and one, dated October, 1908, for £5,000,000 (or $24,333,333.33 currency), for obligations in connection with the construction of the National Transcontinental railway and for other purposes.

5. Interest on all loans is paid out of revenue and charged to 'interest on public debt.'

6. The total amount of interest paid to date on the two loans referred to, being for National Transcontinental railway and other purposes, as stated is $3,534,366.65.

7. $947,689.50 for the two loans referred to in answer to question No. 4.

8. Yes, by means of Letters of Credit obtained from the Finance Department through the Department of Railways and Canals. On such Letters of Credit the Commission drew to 31st December, 1910, $89,553,740.32, and from that date to 6th March, 1911, $3,863,244.83.

9. In the books of the Transcontinental Commissioners $89,553,740.32. In the books of the Departments of Finance and Railways and Canals, $87,556,522.47. The difference of $1,997,217.85 is accounted for by the system of Letters of Credit payments under which expenditures made by departments are not brought to account in the books of the Finance Department until the beginning of the month following the one in which the expenditure is made by Letter of Credit cheques.

ADULTERATION OF MAPLE SUGAR.

* Mr. MONK:

1. Is it the intention of the government during the present session, to amend the Foods Adulteration Act so as to protect those engaged in the maple syrup and maple sugar industry, against the alleged adulterations of their products, which is said to be openly carried on, to the detriment of their business and the public interest?

2. Will the government cause a proper inspection of maple syrups and sugar to be made, so as to prevent the alleged frauds at present said to be carried on by the marketing of imitations and compounds, which seriously interferes with the progress of the maple industry?

3. What steps has the Minister of Agriculture taken to satisfy, in regard to the above, the petition presented to him by the 3,200 farmers engaged in the said industry?

Mr. MURPHY:

1. It is not the intention to introduce during the present session an amendment to the Adulteration Act for the reason that the provisions of that Act as now constituted, together with the establishment of standards which are now being prepared, provide all the machinery necessary for the protection of the industry referred to.

2. The Department of Inland Revenue purposes having a proper inspection of maple syrups and sugars made this year as it has done in many cases in the past.

3. The Minister of Agriculture states that he has no knowledge of the petition referred to.

LORNEVILLE WHARF.

Mr. DANIEL:

1. Have tenders been asked for the building of an extension to the wharf at Lorneville, St. John county, N.B.?

2. If so, who were the tenders and what was the amount of each tender?

3. Has any tender been accepted? If so, who was the tenderer and what was the amount of the tender?

4. If no tender has been accepted and the work not proceeded with, what is the reason for the delay?

5. Is it considered that the necessity for the work no longer exists?

Mr. PUGSLEY:

1. Yes, tenders were called for on October 25, 1910.

2, 3 and 4. Tender not yet accepted as information is being procured with a view to reducing the size and cost of the work.

5. No.

CHATHAM PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. DANIEL:

Referring to a statement of the Minister of Public Works with regard to the purchase of two lots of land for Chatham public building, one for $2,800 and the other for $200, as shown in the 'Revised Hansard,' page 1610, January 12, 1911, from whom were these lots purchased?

Mr. PUGSLEY. S. Johnson and the estate of the late James Kerr.

NIAGARA FALLS WATER-POWER.

Mr. LENNOX:

1. Under the Statutes of Canada permitting development of power at Niagara Falls or on the Niagara river, what quantity of power has been developed?

2. Of the power developed on the Canadian side, what quantity can lawfully be exported to the United States?

3. Of the power developed on the Canadian side, what quantity is being exported to the United States, and what additional quantity is under contract for export?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN:

1. The total quantity of power developed on the Niagara river at Niagara Falls is 272,000 horse-power.

2. Of the total power developed on the Canadian side 153,921 horse-power may be lawfully exported to the United States.

3. Of the power developed 72,628 horse-power was exported to the United States during the fiscal year 1909-10. The department is not aware that any additional quantity is under contract for export.

TADOUSAC POSTMASTERSHIP.

Mr. MONK:

1. Who was, on the first day of January last, the postmaster of Tadousac, P.Q.?
2. Have the services of said postmaster been dispensed with? If so, on what date was he dismissed and for what specific reasons?
3. By whom was said postmaster replaced, on what date, and upon whose recommendation?
4. Was any petition sent to the government recommending, for the position, any other person than the one appointed?
5. Did the said petition contain more signatures than any other?
6. Is the new postmaster the son of the postmaster recently dismissed, and was the said son previously assistant postmaster?
7. Did the said son and assistant postmaster participate in the acts which brought about the dismissal of his father?

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Mr. Eugene Caron.
2. The postmaster tendered his resignation, which was accepted. It became necessary to make a change in the postmastership, owing to the fact that the postmaster had made use of a stamp, which had already been used in prepayment of postage.
3. Mr. Joseph Eugene Caron was appointed to the office on the 6th instance, upon the recommendation of Mr. Joseph Girard, M.P.
4 and 5. One petition was received by the department in favour of Mr. Joseph Eugene Caron, signed by the parish priest and 58 of the most important citizens of Tadousac. Another petition in favour of Mr. August Gingras was addressed to Mr. Girard, M.P. 12 days afterwards, signed by 60 citizens, 20 of whom had already signed the petition in favour of J. E. Caron, and had not withdrawn their signatures therefrom. Therefore, the department concluded that there were 20 more names in favour of Caron.
6. The new postmaster is the son of the late postmaster, and the department is not aware that he was assistant postmaster.
7. No.

RECIPROCITY—COASTING LAWS; HOG QUARANTINE.

Mr. THORNTON:

1. If the proposed reciprocity agreement goes into effect, will the Canadian vessels under the United States coasting laws, be allowed to carry Canadian grown grain from Duluth to Buffalo, or from one American port to any other American port?
2. If the proposed reciprocity agreement is passed and goes into effect, what will the government do about removing the Canadian quarantine against American hogs?

Mr. MURPHY:

1. The proposed reciprocity agreement does not deal with the coasting laws of the United States in any manner.
2. Quarantine regulations are not affected by trade agreements. They depend upon the conditions as to the health of the countries respecting which they are made.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—HAY CARRIED FREE.

Mr. RHODES:

Has the Intercolonial railway ever carried hay free from Quebec or elsewhere to the maritime provinces? If so, when, for what reasons, what quantities were carried, and to whom were deliveries made?

Mr. GRAHAM:

1. Yes.
2. 6th October, 1904, till 31st December, 1904.
3. On account of hay famine in eastern Nova Scotia and in portions of Quebec, and Prince Edward Island; it being represented that unless relief was afforded to the farmers in these districts, their live stock would either have to be slaughtered or would die of starvation. This was approved by order in council, dated January 18, 1905.
4. 1,691 cars were carried; deliveries being made to the municipalities of Pictou county, Colchester, Victoria, Antigonish, Inverness, Guysborough, Hants, Bonaventure and Gaspé.

A complete return, with all correspondence, in connection with this matter, was laid upon the table of the House of Commons on March 31, 1905.

THE COPYRIGHT LAW.

Mr. MACDONELL:

1. Did the government of Canada participate in the Imperial Copyright Conference of 1910?
2. Did the government agree to the memorandum of the proceedings of the said conference as presented to the Imperial House of Commons, and was a Bill for the consolidation and amendment of the law of copyright, embodying the conclusions of the said conference, introduced into the British House of Commons? If so, when and what has been the fate of the Bill?
3. Will the said Bill, when it becomes law, have effect and operation in Canada, or will it be necessary to pass an Act of the Dominion to give effect to such imperial Act?
4. If the government intends to pass an Act declaring the said Imperial Act to apply to Canada, when is the Act to be put into force with or without any modifications or additions? If so, what are such modifications and additions?

Mr. FISHER:

1. Yes.
2. Yes. 26th July, 1910. The dissolution of the imperial parliament prevented further action on the Bill introduced. We have reason to believe that the Right Honourable Mr. Buxton, President of the Board of Trade, is introducing another Bill in this session of the imperial parliament. We have not yet received a copy of this Bill.

3. The Bill, as introduced, contained a provision that it should not extend to a self-governing dominion unless declared by the legislature of that dominion to be in force therein.

4. The government does not intend to introduce a Bill declaring the imperial Bill to apply to Canada, but does intend to introduce a Bill dealing comprehensively with the question of Copyright in Canada, and following on general lines the resolutions of the Imperial Conference.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY—TOTAL COST.

Mr. LENNOX:

1. In the estimated amount, $55,786,000, required to complete the construction of the National Transcontinental railway, counting from 31st December last, is everything included; for instance, do these figures include amounts required for steel superstructure of bridges, right of way, ties, rails, fastenings, switches, stations, and divisional point buildings, engineering expenses, Red river bridge, locomotive shop, plant and equipment east of Winnipeg, and reservoir pumphouse and other buildings and structures there, entrance to and terminals at Winnipeg, terminals at Moncton and Quebec, expenses of and incidental to the commissioners, legal expenses and all other necessary expenditure before the road is handed over to the company; and what is the estimated amount to complete under each of these headings?

2. What was the cost under each of these headings down to the 31st December, 1910, and if there are any of these items not included in the $93,920,956.16 returned as cost to 31st December last, what are they?

Mr. GRAHAM. I think all that detail will be found in the 'Hansard' covered by a statement which I gave to the House.

Mr. LENNOX. The question might stand until I have time to look it over.

Mr. GRAHAM. Look and see if it is what you want.

MORMON PROPAGANDA.

*Mr. STANFIELD:

1. Is the government aware that a band of Mormon Elders are said to be travelling through Canada preaching their doctrines and endeavouring to obtain converts to their faith?

2. Is the government aware, that according to newspaper accounts, these men have obtained several converts in the city of Montreal?

3. In view of the fact that polygamy is contrary to the civil and moral law of this country, will the government take immediate steps to prevent these elders from preaching their doctrine and personally canvassing in order to obtain converts?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have no information upon that subject.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY, EASTERN DIVISION.

Mr. LENNOX moved for:

A return prepared upon the lines of sessional papers No. 46i of the 26th April, 1909, relating to the eastern division of the Transcontinental railway, showing the actual expenditure upon each of the scheduled items upon each of the 21 contracts for construction of this division, down to the latest estimate made upon each contract, and the estimated quantity of work to be done and material to be furnished as to each of these items, and the estimated cost to complete the contract in each case.

He said: I may say to the Minister of Railways that if one of his officers would call on me I could probably tell him exactly the things I require, and it might save some work.

Motion agreed to.

MOTION AGREED TO WITHOUT DISCUSSION.

Copy of all correspondence, telegrams, &c., during the past twelve months between Mr. E. J. Walsh, C.E., and the Minister or Department of Railways and Canals in regard to the Newmarket canal.—Mr. Wallace.

TREASURY BOARD MINUTES OF 30TH NOVEMBER, 1906.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the orders of the day are called I want a little more information from the Minister of Finance if I can get it. I have a transcript of the Treasury Board minutes for November 30, 1906, and I would like the Minister of Finance to supplement it by having the hour at which the Treasury Board met, put upon it.

Mr. FIELDING. That cannot be done.

Mr. FOSTER. It cannot be done?

Mr. FIELDING. No.

Mr. FOSTER. 'Cannot' is a very hard word.

Mr. FIELDING. We would not be able to give my hon. friend that.

Mr. FOSTER. It is very important that it should be given. I do not see why it cannot be given. Perhaps the minister has a reason—the minister does not choose to answer.

Mr. FIELDING. I thought I did answer. I said I did not think it could be done. I did not mean to be discourteous.

Mr. FOSTER. The minister has a reason?

Mr. FIELDING. No. I have no particular reason.

Mr. FOSTER. It is refused without a reason then. I would like also to ask the Minister of Finance if he has yet got the curator's report from the Yarmouth bank?

Mr. FIELDING. No. We have made a request to the Bankers' Association and I expect a statement.

Mr. FOSTER. The other day when the Minister of Finance was not here I put some additional questions on the 'Hansard.'

Mr. FIELDING. My attention has been called to that and I have given directions to the department to endeavour to meet the hon. gentleman's wishes so far as we can.

FISH HATCHERIES, EAST ELGIN.

Mr. MARSHALL. We have three very large fishing centres in East Elgin and the fishermen are very much handicapped for want of a fish hatchery. Is it the intention of the minister (Mr. Brodeur) to place a fish hatchery at one of these places?

Mr. BRODEUR. The matter has been under consideration, but, in as much as the revenues accruing from the fisheries are collected by the provincial government in Ontario, they claiming property rights in the fisheries and especially in the rivers under the judgment of the Privy Council, there is some difficulty as to the establishment of fishery hatcheries in Ontario. These hatcheries would create a new source of expenditure without any return of revenue coming to this government. The matter is engaging the attention of the department and of the government.

SUPPLY—TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier). Mr. Speaker, I desire, before you leave the chair, to call the attention of the House to a matter which has been interesting the the public for a considerable time, and which, in view of the circumstances which have developed lately in connection with our proposed changed commercial relations with the United States, has become urgent. I refer to the question of transportation. It must be evident to the members of this House that the agreement which has been submitted to us by the government involves a number of questions quite outside the range of the schedules of the proposed agreement, and one of the features of that agreement which has been most largely discussed is the question of the transportation of our traffic, and as to whether the large sacrifices we have made in the past to promote interprovincial trade and to secure transportation through Canadian territory will not largely be nullified by this proposed new arrangement. Of all the things that have been said in reference to the agreement, probably more than one half of them concern that question of traffic, and I, therefore, think it important to call the attention of the House and the country to that special feature of the question. As we are aware, in the United States a very intense interest has been taken in the new arrangement by men who are far more interested in the question of traffic and transportation than in the mere trading aspect of it. Possibly the principal mover in the matter at Washington, at least—and it has even been alleged that he is one of the principal movers in the matter within the limits of our own country—has been Mr. J. J. Hill, who commands a very large influence in the transportation of the neighbouring republic, as well as some influence in Canada. So far as Mr. Hill is concerned it is evident it is the question of the transportation of the traffic that has drawn him into the discussion, and fears have been expressed that there would be a diversion of our traffic in consequence of this proposed arrangement. Under these circumstances it behooves us, whilst we are examining the question to take up the aspect of it at least in so far as it may be necessary to evoke from the government a frank and clear exposition of its opinion in regard to this question of transportation.

Probably the most important aspect of the question is that which arises out of the proposed improvement of our waterways and of our transportation system generally between the east and the west. In that regard great prominence has been given during the past few years to the question of the construction of the Georgian Bay canal as a method of insuring to this country the bulk of the trade of the west as against rival methods of transportation in the neighbouring republic. I do not think I would be justified in taking up the time of the House in discussing the merits of that great waterway, which has been discussed fully in this House on many occasions since I have had the honour of a seat in it and many years before. I find on reference to the records of the House that the discussion of the merits of that great highway of transportation began as far back as 1832, and in almost every session of the legislature since that time the question has been discussed anew and has always been favourably received by the House. I have made a search of all those discussions, with the dates and the principal topics of them. I will not quote the results of that research to the House, but will hand this index, if I may so call it, to Hansard, for the information of those members of the House who wish to study the question from its very inception.

The question of transportation assumed considerable intensity after the present government came into power. I date the practical question of the construction of the Georgian Bay canal from the year 1903, when, after this government had been in power some seven years, it was decided to refer the whole question of transportation to a commission. That commission was composed in the first instance of Sir Wm. Van Horne, Mr. Bertram, who sat in this House, and Mr. Kennedy, of Winnipeg. Sir Wm. Van Horne did not accept, so I do not quote him as an authority in this relation; Mr. Bertram was lost to us while he was proceeding with the study of the question; and ultimately the bulk of the work fell upon Mr. Reford, as chairman, Mr. Frye, and Mr. Ashdown, of Winnipeg. The object of that commission to study the question in all its phases, and make a full report to the government. They did so, and in 1905, two years after their nomination, they presented to the government a full report. It has often been conceded in this House that no commission upon a subject of importance has cost the country so little or has been so painstaking in its work or has presented conclusions with which so little fault has been found. I have on more than one occasion since that commission presented its report called the attention of the government to it in connection with the execution of public works, and on each of those occasions the government has declared that it accepted that report in its entirety, that it has not been shelved, as I sometimes hinted that it had been, but that the government was carrying out its conclusions and intended carrying them out to a finality. Now, let me quote to you the words of that report upon the point which I am now endeavouring to bring to the notice of the House, in the hope that we may have from the government an authoritative statement as to what its present intentions are. At page 21 of the report, it says:

> Your Commission unhesitatingly affirm their belief in the desirability of a through waterway from the head of Lake Superior to ocean navigation, to aid in the carriage of the grain and the regulation of rates of a standard not less than that above set forth, so that the largest vessels navigating the Great Lakes can continue their voyage to ocean navigation or as near thereto as possible. But in view of the fact that the government has undertaken the survey of a proposed route by way of the French river to Lake Nipissing and thence by way of the Ottawa river to Montreal, and as the feasibility of this route from a commercial as well as an engineering point of view, and if feasible, its cost has not yet been ascertained, and further in view of the fact that the government has also undertaken the survey of the Welland canal and its vicinity, looking to its possible enlargement and diversion, your Commission do not see their way clear to any recommendation as to route, but would recommend that, in the case of the Ottawa river scheme because, of want of feasibility from a commercial or engineering point of view, or on account of its cost or for other reason, be not adopted, then the Welland canal be enlarged and deepened to the standard of the Sault Ste. Marie canal, with a view of enabling vessels of the largest size to continue their voyage to Kingston or Prescott, thus bringing their cargo to within, say 180 miles or less of Montreal before discharging the same.

I quote this passage to show that subject to two conditions—ascertaining the feasibility of the route and its cost—the commissioners were unanimous in calling upon the government to construct the Georgian Bay canal as a necessary link in our transportation system and the best and cheapest. Since then Mr. Reford, the chairman of the commission, in view of transportation improvements and canal works going on in the United States, sent an additional report to the government in the shape of a letter, which I have not been able to find, but which was published at the time in the press of the country, in which Mr. Reford anew urged upon the government the necessity of immediately carrying out the work of the Georgian Bay canal. And, as to the two conditions mentioned in that report, these have since been fulfilled in a satisfactory way. We have ascertained by the survey instituted by the government at the time the absolute feasibility of this great waterway. We also have ascertained its cost. That survey has cost us, I believe, not less than $500,000. More than that, on every occasion when it has been possible for the government to be called upon to give an answer to those who were anxious to know whether this necessary link in our purely Canadian transportation scheme would be carried out, the government, and also the Prime Minister, I believe, on more than one occasion, have declared that the waterway must be opened to our all-Canadian traffic; in other words, that the Georgian Bay canal should be constructed. And the last time, I think, when a delegation interviewed the Prime Minister on that point, he added that it should be constructed without delay. In the United States newspapers, in their government reports and in reviews, which undertake to treat the question of transportation, there has been a unanimous agreement and admission that successful rivalry with the route of transportation opened by the Georgian Bay canal would not be possible and that if that great work was carried out, we thereby assure for all time to our country the vast trade of the whole west, not only on our side of the line but of the western states as well. If one takes the trouble to examine the distances, there can be no doubt that a strong presumption is created at once that that admission has not been made without cause on both sides of the line. Let me give the House, briefly, the figures:

UNITED STATES WATER ROUTES.

	Miles.
Duluth by lake to Buffalo, and Erie canal by barge to New York..	1,480
Duluth to Buffalo and thence by rail to New York..	1,445
Fort William to Buffalo and Erie canal by barge to New York..	1,358
Fort William to Buffalo, and thence by rail to New York..	1,323

CANADIAN WATER ROUTES.

Duluth by lake to Port Colborne, and thence by Welland and St. Lawrence canals to Montreal..	1,338
Fort William to Port Colborne, and thence by Welland and St. Lawrence canals to Montreal..	1,216
Duluth to Georgian bay ports, thence by rail to Montreal..	1,023
Duluth by lake to Georgian bay ports, and canal to Georgian bay to Montreal..	1,056
Fort William to Georgian bay ports, and Georgian bay canal to Montreal.	934

You have there the Georgian Bay canal route by water direct, 300 miles shorter than any other Canadian route, and 432 miles shorter than any American route. And there is no transhipment, whereby half the cost is saved, for you can take a cargo by steamer carrying 12,000 tons, without breaking bulk, right through from the the grain gathering ports of the west to the sea-board. In addition to this, you have features of this route which have often been adverted to and are well known. You have the advantage of opening up a country known to us as one of vast resources—a new country; bringing freights through without breaking bulk, you have the assurance of return freight, and you develop great manufacturing power. The result of the very complete survey made by the government engineers is to show that, as soon as this great waterway is established, we should have over 1,000,000 horse-power. In the immediate vicinity of the great manufacturing centre of Montreal is power to the extent of over 70,000 horse-power, ready to be used. In fact, the opinion has often been expressed, and is undoubtedly well founded, that when that immense water-power development which will be made possible by the construction of this waterway is completed, the government can assure itself of sufficient revenue from the leasing of water-powers to pay the interest upon the cost of the canal, which cost has been calculated at about $100,000,000.

I need not do more than point out to the House the immense advantage we should enjoy in having this route exclusively to ourselves, without any interference from our neighbours. Not only is it economically the best and shortest, but it is a route exclusively upon our own territory. There is no danger of any diversion of traffic upon that route to our neighbours. The House must be aware that our neighbours can go through our canals to Lake Ontario as freely as we do; and once traffic from the west has reached Lake Ontario, it is not impossible to carry it to the waters of the Hudson. That question has been studied. Some engineers have difficulties in the way; but, undoubtedly, it is merely a question of money, and there would be that difficulty only to prevent the Americans from taking the traffic that has come to our own canals and carry it from Lake Ontario to the Hudson by American routes, instead of having it go from our head water ports through our own Canadian channels to the ports on the Atlantic. On more than one occasion it has been pointed out that the construction of the Georgian Bay canal involves canal construction for a distance of only 27·5 miles, and improved channel 55·5 miles, and that there are 357 miles of free, open navigation. Under the scheme of construction there would be some 25 locks, while at present in the Welland canal there are 48 locks.

Mr. GRAHAM. There are only 26 locks in the Welland canal.

Mr. MONK. The minister is right, there are 26 in the Welland and 48 in all the canals. I believe in the proposed improved Welland canal there will be fewer locks.

Mr. GRAHAM. In one scheme 6 or 7.

Mr. MONK. What is claimed is that we have in this, partly provided by nature, the shortest, the cheapest, and the best system of transportation, all in our own territory, enabling the largest ships to take freight in large cargoes from the lakes through to the sea, to go as far as the maritime provinces, and return with return freights. Once you have reached the Great Lakes, it is claimed that, if the west turns out to be all that we expect of it, it would be a not very heavy matter to continue that navigation from the Great Lakes into the Lake of the Woods. That has been suggested time and again, it is absolutely practicable, and in fact, I believe formed part of the system of transportation which the Mackenzie government saw fit to resort to, in order to complete the link between the eastern provinces and the sea. Once you are in the Lake of the Woods, you can, without insurmountable difficulties and expenditure, go on to Lake Winnipeg. That also was in the Mackenzie government scheme of transportation. From Lake Winnipeg you have rivers that take you into the very heart of the continent in these western provinces, and even as far as the foot of the Rockies, so that it is quite conceivable that once you have established free communication with the Great Lakes, under the circumstances I have pointed out there is nothing to prevent, with the advance of time and the filling up of the west, continuous water communication from the Great Lakes into the very heart of the western provinces.

It seems to me at this moment, after all that has taken place, it behooves us, in view of the possibility of the establishment of closer trade relations with our neighbours to the south, to make up our minds. We have had the final report of the commission before us for six years. We have the declaration of the government that it adopts that report in its entirety. Its conclusions, have never been controverted. We have been told time and again in answer to inquiries that this canal must be constructed, that it is our duty to construct it. I submit that the hour has arrived for us to decide to move in the matter. Our neighbours do not take that time for delay, they have improved without any such supineness their ways of communication. They have their Erie canal and they are projecting other canals, and we should not hesitate to immediately begin the construction of this one, which by the admission of everybody is to give us the main trade of the west, and place us beyond all possibility of competition, at least to the possible extent of carrying the grain and other products of the west to the ocean ports. Note that on the way of that canal, in places like Montreal and probably here in Ottawa, to perhaps a lesser degree, the cost is increasing by probably 50 per cent every year. In the estimate of the cost of that part of the canal which is in the vicinity of Montreal, it was found that some $10,000,000 was necessary to do the work at that point. I have no hesitation in saying that with the development that Montreal is undergoing at the present moment, and the increase in the value of property, the cost of expropriation and of constructing is increasing on a conservative estimate at the rate of from 30 per cent to 35 per cent a year. In the vicinity of Ottawa there must be a similar condition. It is necessary for us without any further delay to come to a decision and to begin construction in order to avoid the very considerable increase in the cost of the work.

I would not like to be understood as in any way minimizing the merits that attach to the improvement of other methods of transportation, such for instance, as the Welland canal. It seems to me it is our duty to the same degree to improve and make modern and perfect all other canals in which the country is interested, and in respect to the Welland canal we should certainly have it up to date. There is no contention, but that the traffic there, will always be very considerable. We have our St. Lawrence system of transportation and we should not hesitate to improve and perfect it, whenever the necessity arises. I would even go the length of saying that if it is in the interest of the country to open up an entirely new system of transportation, in other words, to build a railway to Hudson bay as has been suggested, I would not be disposed to oppose such a project, if proper proof was made before me that it is not only feasible, but will amply repay the cost of construction.

We have there an unknown quantity, and if we are to abide by the rather superficial report made by Mr. Butler, a very competent authority on the subject, there exists grave doubts. One would have to pursue the history further without being absolutely certain that such a vast expense as is necessary there, would be perfectly justified. We must equip ports in the Hudson bay. We have a distance of some 1,450 or 1,500 miles of unknown navigation through the bay and through the straits, unprovided with the aids of navigation that we have on the St. Lawrence and everywhere else, but which would have to be provided; and we have a prospect of a short period of navigation at that point, Mr. Butler has said some two months at most. That is a matter which would require to be carefully investigated. But in the meantime we have in regard to this particular method of transportation, this particular way, all the information which the government requires. We know its possibility, we know its immense prospect, we know the immense utility it will be to us. I think we should at this moment particularly in no way neglect anything that could assure to Canadian routes the supremacy of Canadian transportation. Members of the House have seen within the past few days that the question has been mooted of a common waterway with our neighbours over the St. Lawrence route. For my own part, I do not think that the history of such arrangements between nations regarding waterways has ever had satisfactory results. However, that is a remote possibility. What we have to deal with are present conditions. We have this waterway, we are satisfied in regard to the information, and we should not delay a single moment in starting the work upon its construction. It seemed to me that the time was opportune to call the attention of the House to this feature of transportation, which has necessarily and forcibly introduced itself into the consideration and discussion of the reciprocity question, and of our relations with our neighbours to the south. I think I am justified therefore in moving:

That all the words after 'that' in the main motion be omitted, and that the following be substituted:

The House, in view of the possible diversion of the country's carrying trade from Canadian channels, and in order to ensure the most favourable conditions of transportation between western points and the Canadian Atlantic seaboard, records its opinion and determination that the construction of the Georgian Bay canal should be commenced forthwith so as to preserve and further facilitate interprovincial traffic and the carriage of freight in unbroken bulk from the Great Lakes to the sea.

When the right hon. the Prime Minister brought before the House the question of the construction of a new transcontinental railway, he insisted greatly upon the necessity of providing immediately an all-Canadian route for our traffic. I remember that on closing his eloquent remarks on that occasion he prayed God that the country was not already too late in the accomplishment of that scheme. I do not know if my right hon. friend has the same pious disposition in regard to waterways, but it seems to me that we are well founded in hoping that we have not waited too long when we have within our reach all that is necessary in order to warrant us in beginning the construction of this great waterway.

Mr. G. V. WHITE (North Renfrew). In seconding the motion presented by my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), I desire to make a few remarks. I heartily concur in the remarks he has made, and in the resolution he has placed in your hands. On several previous occasions I have spoken at some length upon this question, and have endeavoured to urge upon the government the desirability of commencing the construction of this great work. I believe that the time is at hand when the Georgian Bay canal will need to be constructed, and the work should very soon be commenced, and pushed forward to completion with the least possible delay. It has been stated that the work of construction will occupy a period of about ten years. If that be the case every moment's delay means a check in the progress of Canada, especially in so far as our transportion requirements are concerned. It is not necessary for me to dwell at length upon the immense advantages which would accrue to this country by the improvement of this waterway. It is a national project, and will tend to ensure the carriage of our products through an all-Canadian route. It will cement the east and the west by an exchange of products. Our Nova Scotian coal will find a market in northern and western Ontario, and the grain and wheat of the Northwest will be transported to the east. It will effect a saving in the cost of transportation of from two to four cents to the farmers of the west on every bushel of grain which they produce. It will promote the development of our water-powers to the extent of more than a million horse-power, and in so doing will tend to build up industries throughout the country. It will bring Fort William, Sault Ste. Marie and Duluth 282 miles nearer to Montreal than they are by the St. Lawrence route. In short, Mr. Speaker, it will afford the quickest and most direct route from the great lakes to the seaboard. There are a great many other advantages which I could mention, but I do not wish to delay the House more than to bring to your attention one of the resolutions which was adopted recently by the city council of Montreal:

Montreal, Nov. 28.—At a meeting of the city council this afternoon Ald. Lapointe submitted a resolution in favour of the construction of the Georgian Bay canal. The motion which was adopted without discussion and will be forwarded to Ottawa, was as follows:—

Whereas the construction of the Georgian Bay canal would afford for the produce of the northern and western parts of the American continent the shortest and most advantageous route, and would add an incalculable element of progress and prosperity to the commerce, agriculture and industry of Canada, and thereby to the city of Montreal, would accrue immense advantage, be it resolved that the parliament of Canada be requested to carry out this essentially national enterprise with the shortest possible delay.

Within the last month I understand that a petition was presented to this government signed by 60,000 influential men in the city of Montreal urging upon the government the necessity of building this great waterway. In so far as the improvement and betterment of other waterways throughout this country is concerned, I do not wish to place myself on record as being opposed to the improvement of any waterway that is going to be in the interest of the transportation requirements of the country. I believe, as my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier has said, that this country will require the Hudson Bay railway, the deepening of the Welland canal and the building of the Georgian Bay canal, but the Georgian Bay canal project has been before the country for a great many years, it has been proved conclusively that it is a feasible proposition, that it will shorten the distance between the Great Lakes and the sea-board by from 200 to 300 miles, and in view of the fact that it is going to be a great benefit to the country, not only from the transportation standpoint, but from the development which will take place by the improvement of the waterpowers along the route, I believe it is time that the government took action and commenced the construction of this great work. Let us commence its construction to-day, to-morrow may be too late, and let us see to it that Canadian products are transported through Canadian channels to the markets of the world, and in this way bind together the component parts of this great country of ours.

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN (Wright). Mr Speaker, the subject before the House has such a wide scope that I feel that it will require more time and a better occasion to speak upon it than the one which has been offered to us to-day by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). I have so often spoken on this subject of the very early construction of the Georgian Bay canal, that I feel it is somewhat superfluous to put myself again upon record as an adherent of the project. I believe, without any vain boasting, that this House will agree with me that I am as strongly in favour of the construction of the Georgian Bay canal, which has been proven by my words in this House, as is the hon. member for Jacques Cartier. It is so seldom that I am able to agree with that hon. gentleman that I am particularly pleased this afternoon to be able to congratulate him upon his speech although I am not able to congratulate him upon the propriety of the manner in which he has brought before the House this discussion upon the question of the Georgian Bay canal. On Friday last my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham), when making his very able statement in this House, referred in a few words to the policy that it is understood this government would follow in a short time in connection with the Georgian Bay canal. The House will pardon me if I refer to his words which are to be found in 'Hansard' of March 10, page 5161. In referring to the canal system I had incidentally made the remark that I believed the Georgian Bay canal route was the proper route between the Great Lakes and the sea-ports and my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals said in connection with that:

My hon. friend behind me has said that the Georgian Bay canal route is the route. I would discuss the question of the Georgian Bay canal route at greater length but for the fact that it is not in my department, and I am supposed to be discussing questions connected with my department. I might say distinctly that I believe it is in the interest of Canada from one end to the other to enter upon both enterprises and at a not very far distant date. We must remember that when we bring the products of the great west to the east the products of the east are carried back to the west, and if we could take the time to go into the prospects for increasing that trade in a few years, we would arrive at a conclusion that it is necessary—in the interest of the Canadian carrying trade?—no, it is necessary in the interest of the people who produce in Canada, as well as who buy goods in Canada, that these two great waterways should be developed by the people of Canada, and I believe that no greater interest would accrue from any investment that the people could make than that which would result from the development of these two waterways. My hon. friend will see that I am quite clear upon this subject, and that the diffidence I have about discussing it in detail only arises from the fact that it is not in my department, but I believe in these projects just the same.

So we have the statement of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals. My hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux), a few days ago, speaking in the city of Montreal, in a very able speech, also declared that he was strongly in favour of the early construction of the Georgian Bay canal. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) has put himself upon record in the same sense. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) likewise, and when we come to the last and certainly not the least member of the Canadian cabinet we have the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who has said, in the city of Hull, and I believe in other parts of this country, that he was strongly of the belief that the Georgian Bay canal should be constructed at as early a date as possible. That ought to be satisfactory to the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, and to the hon. member for Renfrew (Mr. White). But apparently these hon. gentlemen, seeing a question of vital import before this House, and before the country at the present moment—I refer to the question of reciprocity with the United States and seeing that the country is entirely in favour of reciprocity and that the great majority of this House are in favour of reciprocity, they want to put if possible an obstacle in the way of the carrying out of this agreement by bringing up the construction of the Georgian Bay canal. If, the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) had brought the matter before the House in a sensible way —well, perhaps it is not parliamentary to say that—but, had he brought it before the House in a judicious way, then I am sure he would have every hon. member on this side of the House supporting him. But, bringing it up as a vote of want of confidence in the government, he knows perfectly well that the members of this side of the House who have confidence in the government and wish to see the Georgian Bay canal built are not going to vote against the government so as to kill the project in its infancy. That would not be sane, that would not be judicious, and yet that is what the hon. member (Mr. Monk) asks us to do. Now, I begin to doubt that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) is truly in favour of the Georgian Bay canal, and his action in bringing forward this motion to-day gives me cause to doubt. I shall give my reasons for that doubt—the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) believes in the construction of the Georgian Bay canal and he has submitted to the House on more than one occasion a resolution favouring it, and wishing to assure himself of the support of hon. members of this House he has had the common courtesy to notify hon. gentlemen who are in favour of the canal that he would propose his motion at a certain time.

Mr. FOSTER. It has become so current with gentlemen on the other side of the House, that now when they attack anybody on this side they automatically refer to the hon. member for North Toronto. I do not think the hon. member for Ottawa really means to refer to me; I do not want all the honours.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. He was paying you a compliment.

Mr. DEVLIN. If the hon. member for North Toronto were a very small man perhaps he would not come uppermost in my mind.

Mr. FOSTER. I am modest too.

Mr. DEVLIN. Of course, I intended to refer to the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. White) but I do hope that the hon. member for North Toronto would not object to be connected with a resolution in favour of the Georgian Bay canal. My point was that I would have expected that the hon. member for Jacques-Cartier (Mr. Monk) would have had the common courtesy to notify hon. members on this side who are in favour of the construction of the Georgian Bay canal, that he would bring up this question to-day and that he would expect them to be in their places. I do not mean that we are not supposed to be always in the chamber but there are occasions when through force of circumstances hon. members may be absent, when if they knew such a vital question were for discussion they would make it a point to be in their seats. Now, the hon. member (Mr. Monk) knows perfectly well that the question of reciprocity is not going to affect adversely the Georgian Bay canal. He knows perfectly well that an agreement of reciprocity with the United States will add to the necessity for the Georgian Bay canal. He knows perfectly well that the farmers of this country are clamouring for two things: Reciprocity and the Georgian Bay canal, and he knows that if you add to the wealth of the farmers of this country and to the possibilities of the increased production of grain you will of necessity require increased transportation facilities, and you will have to look for that to an improved waterways system. I have here the report of the Trade and Commerce Department, and I am fairly amazed to see from it the quantity of grain that has been coming from Port Arthur and Fort William by the water route. I find that our exports from Canada to the United States during the year 1907—and I refer now solely to Canadian produce—amounted to $92,283,500 worth, while in 1910 they reached $106,153,900 worth, from which it appears that Canada's trade with the United States is constantly increasing.

Mr. BLAIN. Have you the figures showing the trade the United States did with Canada?

Mr. DEVLIN. Yes. The dutiable imports into Canada from the United States in 1907 amounted to $116,159,883 and the dutiable imports into Canada from the United States in 1910 amounted to the amazing sum of $143,777,541, which, of course goes to prove my statement, that the trade between the two countries is increasing. I am not a believer in the doctrine which is often preached in this House by the hon. member for North Toronto, that an increase in imports means an impoverished country; on the contrary I believe that increasing imports indicates that a country is wealthy. I therefore say that the trade between Canada and the United States is constantly on the increase, and the grain production of Canada also being constantly on the increase, as a consequence we require increased transportation facilities. I find in the Trade and Navigation Returns a statement showing the receipts and shipments of grain at Fort William and Port Arthur from September 1st to January 31st. and in the month of September 1910 there were shipped from Fort William and Port Arthur by rail 241,362 bushels, and in the same month by lake 4,042,958 bushels of wheat alone.

There was a similar quantity of oats, less of barley and less of flax. In the month of September there were 327,599 bushels by rail and 5,256,055 bushels by lake; in the month of October there were 455,709 bushels by rail and 17,765,528 bushels by lake; in the month of November there were 958,915 by rail and 21,279,964 bushels by lake. Now, where is this grain going to? It is going to the United Kingdom and to the United States. The greater quantity is going to the United Kingdom, and the United Kingdom will continue to take a great quantity of our grain—there is no gainsaying that. Any hon. gentleman has simply to refer to the British parliamentry debates to see that Canada will continue through all time to supply, not alone the United Kingdom, but the world, with grain. The production of Canada is constantly on the increase while the production of the United States is consequently on the decrease. Canada's area of grain-producing is a wonderful area. The wheat belt of western Canada is four times the size of the wheat belt of the whole United States; so that hon. gentlemen opposite need not have any fear that our grain production will not constantly be on the increase. That being so, I ask you if it will not be necessary for us to build the Georgian Bay canal? And reciprocity with the United States will only enhance, and will not depreciate, as the hon. member for Jacques Cartier would lead us to believe, the value of the Georgian Bay canal. We have a great many members of the cabinet of this country on record as being in favour of the construction of that great work; we have a great many members of this House committed to its construction; we have the press of a great section of this country, as well as many boards of trade, clamouring for it. The Georgian Bay canal is one of my pet subjects, Mr. Speaker, and I would like to go on speaking on it all afternoon and all evening; but I know that there are a number of other hon. members of this House who are only too anxious to give utterance to their views upon this subject. I see the Postmaster General, (Mr. Lemieux), for instance—he hardly ever misses an opportunity to proclaim what a strong believer he is in the construction of the Georgian Bay canal. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur), who is very familar with the waterways of this country is also a strong believer in it. I know that these hon. gentlemen will give expression to their views on this subject. But I would like to point out another reason not commonly given for the construction of the Georgian Bay canal. We shall require it for the carrying of our minerals; and, as a great portion of the canal will pass through the province of Quebec, let me point out that that province, as a producer of minerals, is getting richer every year. I know that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier will attribute that directly to the fact that in the province of Quebec there is good government. Whatever may be the cause, the mineral wealth of the province of Quebec is constantly increasing. In 1909 the value of the mineral production of Quebec amounted to $5,552,062, and in 1910 it amounted to $7,072,244. That included asbestos, iron, cement and other minerals which will be shipped by water. Therefore, if we wish to carry our mineral production to a successful issue, we must construct the Georgian Bay canal.

Now, Sir, I am not going to support the motion of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, because the hon. member has brought it in for a political purpose. If not, why did he allow so many years to go by without placing a resolution on the Order Paper in favour of the Georgian Bay canal? Why did he bring it in this particular way, just at a moment when he knew that it involved a vote of want of confidence in the government? Does he imagine for a moment that the country, especially that portion which is interested in the construction of the Georgian Bay canal, is so innocent as to believe that a vote for his amendment will mean the immediate construction of the canal? Before I cast a vote upon this amendment, which would mean, if carried, the defeat of the government, I would like to ask the hon. leader of the opposition if, following out the wording of the amendment, he were called upon to form a government, would he immediately begin the construction of the Georgian Bay canal?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If the hon. gentlemen is asking me for some instruction as to how he should vote, I would like to say before I answer that I would require some guarantee that he would follow the advice.

Mr. DEVLIN. The leader of the opposition is a shrewd lawyer, and I know that he does not want to commit himself, and it would be hardly fair for me to try to exact a committal from him. I take it that the opposition have not made up their minds what their policy would be with regard to the construction of the Georgian Bay canal if they came into power, which thank Heaven will not be for many a day; and, therefore, it would ill become me to help to defeat the present government and help to bring the opposition into power in order to delay the construction of that great work. Earnestly believing in the early construction of the Georgian Bay canal, I do not think that I could logically vote with the hon. member for Jacques Cartier. I appreciate his kindly sentiments towards this project and also toward hon. members of this House who favour the early carrying of this project to a successful issue. But Sir, as I have had occasion to say before in this House, timeo Danaos et dona ferentes—I fear the Greeks even when bringing gifts—and I fear the hon. member for Jacques Cartier because of his manner of bringing this subject before the House. I trust that every hon. member on this side at least, who is in favour of the early construction of the Georgian Bay canal will see that we have one hope for the realization of our wishes, and that is to pin our faith to the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who is earnest in his belief that this work should proceed, and who will proceed with it. His life has been given to great works, such as the construction of the Transcontinental road, and the reform which is to bring wealth to the farmers of Canada, improved trade relations with the United States, and who, I believe, as the crowning work of his life, will undertake the early carrying out of the construction of the Georgian Bay canal.

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound). I have no desire to follow the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) in his varied wanderings. Nor have I any desire to cast reflections upon those who are in favour of the early complete deepening of the Welland canal or the construction of the Hudson Bay railway. I believe that all these works will be necessary in a few years to solve the transportation problem of Canada. We heard the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) state on Friday last, that the canal traffic of Canada had incresed from 5,665,259 tons in 1901 to 42,990,608 tons in 1910—an increase in nine years of 660 per cent. According to the reports of the engineers, ten years will be required for the construction of this contemplated Georgian Bay canal. If we increase one-fourth or even one-tenth as fast as in the last ten years, there will be traffic awaiting this canal by the time it is finished. The Georgian Bay canal is in a somewhat different position from any other great work now in contemplation in Canada, including the great works that I have indicated. We have a complete survey of this canal,—and not only one, but many surveys. We have one completed, I think, in 1907, which cost the Dominion of Canada upwards of $1,000,000, a survey in every way complete; and I have yet to hear that any attempt has yet been made to refute any of the statements made in the report of the engineers. In this report, the engineers were unanimous. They agreed in the opinion that this canal would be a great project, valuable to the country, and entirely feasible in every way. The hon. member for Wright has taken occasion to call the attention of the House to the fact that a great many of the ministers of the Crown, have, on various occasions, spoken in favour of this project. I myself, have heard several of them make remarks of that nature. But these were made years ago. They had the facts then that they have now; and I support the motion of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, simply for the same reason that I would support a similar motion if it were made by the hon. member for Wright. Those of us who are in favour of the early completion of this canal—and I think that in this we speak for the majority of the people of Canada—should support any action that will conduce to the carrying into effect of our wishes.

There is another subject mentioned by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, which demands a good deal of attention, and that is the question of cost. It must be evident to everybody that, if the land in Montreal and its vicinity that will be necessary for the construction of this canal were expropriated at this time, it would mean a great saving in the ultimate cost of the canal. There is also the fact that the government has been spending large sums of money for the conservation and regulation of the water flow on the Ottawa river. These works could go hand in hand, with the works for the canal. We had on Lake Nipissing dams put in under the direction of the Minister of Public Works for the control of the waters of the lake. But these were found unsuccessful, and the country was put to the cost of blowing them out with dynamite. I understand that they are being built a second time under the Department of Public Works. All this work would be unnecessary, for the control of the water in these lakes and rivers would be effected by the works in the construction of the canal. There is also the matter of water-powers. Canada has just awakened to the value of the water-powers of Ontario and of Quebec and of the Dominion as a whole. The Minister of Railways on Friday last stated that the expenditure upon the Trent canal, great as it was, and little commercial value as it will have when completed, was entirely justified by the great water-powers that had been developed along that route. Contrast the water-powers of the Trent canal with those along the Georgian Bay canal, whether you consider them from the point of view of accessibility, volume or in any other way.

I have no desire to take up the time of the House further. This matter has been thoroughly gone into on other occasions; and I do not think it necessary that I should place myself further on record in the matter. In conclusion, I might say a word in answer to the hon. member for Wright, when he claims that he is called upon to vote against this motion because it is a vote of want of confidence. A few days ago, the hon member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) brought in an amendment to an exactly similar motion, which amendment was accepted by the government and for which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Devlin) voted. I have no hesitation in saying that the government has the same option to-day as it had at that time; if they choose, they can accept the amendment of my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier and agree to its unanimous adoption by this House.

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY (Minister of Public Works). Intensely interested as I am in the early construction of this most important link in the chain of Canadian transportation, I feel the deepest possible regret that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) has introduced his motion at the present time and in the form in which he has introduced it. Heretofore,—and I speak now of what is within my knowledge of the course of events so far as this great work is concerned, extending over a great many years—never until to-day has the subject taken on a party aspect. Years ago, when the Montreal, Ottawa & Georgian Bay Canal Company first presented its project to parliament, I happened to be one of the counsel employed by the company. I knew what efforts the company had made to bring the matter before the attention of parliament and the public, and it was a matter of gratification to me, as well as to those for whom I was acting at the time, that hon. members of this House dealt with the question from a broad standpoint, entirely irrespective of party. I remember that, on one occasion, upwards of a hundred members on both sides of the House, irrespective of whether they were Liberals or Conservatives, signed a memorial in favour of the construction of this canal. At the last session of parliament, and also, I think, at the session before, motions were made for returns on this subject, and different members spoke in support of the project. I am sure that hon. members who recall those discussions will agree with me that these motions were supported by hon. members of this House irrespective of their party affiliations, and that on each of these occasions the project was spoken of with warm sympathy by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and by other members of the House.

But to-day the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) has chosen, for what purpose I know not, for he certainly does not seem to be acting the part of a friend of this great project, to throw into it an element of partisanship. The very resolution he has moved introduces a matter in regard to which we cannot all agree. The hon. gentleman, instead of urging that the government should seriously consider the early construction of this canal, asks that the House shall, in effect, instruct the government to immediately begin its construction, and why? Because of the possible diversion of traffic to the country to the south. The hon. gentleman knows very well that a majority of the members in this House do not share that view. The hon. gentleman knows that nothing has recently occurred and nothing is likely to occur in the near future which would be likely to divert Canadian traffic to the country to the south of us. This canal, when it is constructed, is intended primarily to carry the products of the west to the ports upon the St. Lawrence for shipment to the markets of the old world; any products of the west which may be required by our neighbours to the south and which may be purchased for home consumption would not pass through this canal for the reason I have stated. If I were framing a resolution in order to bring this matter properly before the House, instead of putting it as my hon. friend has, that there might be a diversion of our products to the country to the south I would rather have said: In view of the anticipated continuation of the rapid development of the Canadian west, and the unrivalled position that the city of Montreal and other St. Lawrence ports will, when the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay canal is constructed, occupy for the export of the products not only of the Canadian west, but of a large portion of the country to the south of us, in the opinion of this House it is desirable that the government should consider seriously the early construction of this canal. If my hon. friend had moved a substantive motion of that character, I have no doubt it would have met with a sympathetic response from both sides of the House. I am sure it would have met with a sympathetic reception on the part of the government and I believe also on the part of all the supporters of the government. I say that because upon the occasion when a very large delegation last met the Prime Minister and some of his colleagues and presented in the very strongest way possible, the importance of engaging upon the early constructiion of this canal, my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) told that delegation that it was not necessary to come to the government with arguments in support of this great project. He told them that he and his colleagues were thoroughly impressed with the necessity of undertaking the construction of the canal at the earliest possible moment, but that it was simply a question of finances, that whenever the Finance Minister, in the exercise of his judgment, informed his colleagues that the time had arrived when the government could safely ask parliament to give it authority to begin the construction of this important work, then at that moment, and the Prime Minister expressed the hope that that moment would soon arrive, the government would be prepared to submit to parliament a project for the construction of the canal. I would ask my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier in view of what has been said by the Prime Minister, in view of the expressions of opinion which have been given in this House by prominent members of both sides in the past, and if he seriously desires to see the early construction of this canal, whether it is desirable that he should at this time introduce into the discussion of this great question, something of partisanship and submit a resolution, in regard to certain parts of which it would be impossible for all the members of this House to agree. I commend the matter to my hon. friend, because as I have said, I am sincerely in favour of the construction of this most important work. I recognize the enormous benefit it would be to the transportation interests of Canada. I recognize that when this canal is built, it is going to command the traffic, not only of the Canadian west, but much of the trade of the States which lie to the south of the boundary line. If my hon. friend had been here on Friday last, I am sure he would have been greatly interested in the most admirable speech made by the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) who has always been a friend of the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay canal. In that speech the hon. gentleman dwelt in the strongest possible terms upon the great importance of this work. He showed how important it would be to Canada, important not only to western Canada, but to eastern Canada as well. He spoke as a friend, as one who for years has been in earnest sympathy with this work, and he did not seek to throw into the discussion of the question with regard to its construction any element such as that which the hon. member for Jacques Cartier has sought to throw into the discussion to-day.

With regard to my own department and to the attitude of the government towards this work, it ought not to be necessary to do anything further than draw attention to the fact that a number of years ago the government decided to ask this parliament for authority to proceed with a most exhaustive survey of the route of that canal. Years have been spent upon that work. A board of engineers was organized and the work was placed under the control of some of the most experienced and capable engineers of the department. I do not hesitate to say that they have done their work in the most thorough and conscientious manner; I do not hesitate to say, and I appeal to the judgment of members who have seen the report that the report they have made and the plans they have submitted, the detailed plans prepared which are now before parliament, show that they have done their work in the most exhaustive and satisfactory manner. Their reports show that the construction of the canal is not only feasible, but that it can be carried out at a cost which no one will say would, now or in the near future, be beyond the financial resources of the people of Canada. The cost is placed at something like $100,000,000. That, bear in mind, is not merely for a 14 foot canal as at first proposed, but for a canal having a depth of 22 feet, over the mitre sills, a canal which will enable quite large ocean steamers to pass right through to Lake Huron and on to the ports on the western shores of our great inland lakes. That canal will be quite capable of giving accommodation to ocean traffic. The project has assumed proportions far beyond what was thought of in the early days when the fondest hopes of the people of this country only looked forward to a canal with a depth of some 14 feet

The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) refers to what the United States has done in the way of building canals, and says that Canada has done little. I entirely disagree in that respect. The Erie canal, to which he has referred, is but little more than a great ditch, having a depth of only 9 feet, whereas our system of canals, extending from Lake St. Clair down to the city of Montreal, has a uniform depth of not less than 14 feet, thus giving accommodation to very much larger boats which are capable of carrying a very much larger tonnage than can be accommodated by the Erie canal. I think there is no reflection to be made on the people of Canada so far as their enterprise in the past in regard to the construction of our great system of canals has been concerned, and I think the very fact that the government had surveys made, shows that we are favourably considering the construction of a great canal which will have a depth not of 9 feet as the Erie canal, not of 14 feet as the St. Lawrence, at the present moment, but a depth of 22 feet capable of accommodating large ocean vessels and enabling them to proceed right up to Port Arthur and Fort William.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, let me say again that I regret exceedingly that my hon. friend has introduced this resolution in the way he has chosen. I regret its terms, and it does seem to me that my hon. friend, upon reflection, knowing what has been the expressed feelings of members of the House in regard to this project in the past, whenever it has been brought to the attention of the House in a non-partisan way, will feel that in thus presenting his motion he is not acting as a friend of this scheme, but he is acting in a way which is rather calculated to retard the undertaking.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I desire to call your attention to the fact that in my judgment the motion of my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) is out of order. By the rules of the House, and by the amended rules of the House also, no private member can make a motion which involves an appropriation of public money or a charge upon the revenue. According to the principles of parliamentary government, the responsibility for all public expenditures rests altogether upon the Crown and its advisers; it is not within the province of any member of parliament to make a motion which involves an expenditure of money by parliament. The principle is so well recognized that it is not necessary to refer to it. Still, I will call your attention to rule 53, which enacts:

It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address, or Bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or of any tax or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to that House by message of the Governor General in the session in which such vote, resolution, address, or Bill is proposed.

This enactment is not new, it is simply a reproduction of a rule which is as old as parliamentary government in England. But the framers of the British North America Act attached so much importance to this rule that they did not leave it to be ordinarily applied as a rule of the House, as it existed in 1867, but they put it in the constitution in still more positive language. Now, the motion of my hon. friend reads as follows:

The House, in view of a possible diversion of the country's carrying trade from Canadian channels, and in order to ensure the most favourable conditions of transportation between western points and the Canadian Atlantic seaboard, records its opinion and determination that the construction of the Georgian Bay canal should be commenced forthwith——

Now nothing could be more positive than these terms, the House is asked to express a determination that without a moment's delay the construction of the canal should be commenced. Now, everybody is aware that it is allowable to a member of the House, not to propose a direct motion such as this, calling for an expenditure of money, but a motion which invites the attention of the government or of the House to the advisability of providing for an expenditure of some kind. In this respect the rights of members of the House are well defined, but they are limited. While a member may, by a motion, express a desire or declare a policy in abstract terms, the moment the motion goes beyond abstract terms, and the moment he goes so far as to enjoin upon the government the immediate duty of providing for an expenditure, then he overrides the rule. Let me call the attention of my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier to the last edition of May, 1906, page 571, where he will find the following words apply directly to his motion:

To a certain extent, evasions are, by usage, permitted of the restriction imposed by the standing orders upon proposals for the expenditure of public money. Bills devising a large scheme for public expenditure, accompanied by provisions for the application of the same, have been brought in upon motion, the money clauses being printed in italics. In such cases, the principle of the Bill is discussed, and, if approved on behalf of the Crown, the necessary pecuniary provision is subsequently made; otherwise further progress of the Bill is prevented by the refusal of the Royal recommendation. In like manner, motions advocating public expenditure, or the imposition of a charge, if the motion be framed in sufficiently abstract and general terms, can be entertained, and agreed to by the House. Resolutions of this nature are permissible because, having no operative effect, no grant is made or burden imposed by their adoption.

Now, if the motion of my hon. friend were couched in abstract terms and made general, it would be in order; but if, as I contend, his motion, far from being abstract and general, is so precise as to make an injunction upon the government at once to enter upon this expenditure, then there can be no doubt that he has gone beyond the rights assigned to a member, and has made a motion which is out of order. Now let me ask my hon. friend to read his motion over again, and he will agree that the terms are imperative, and their effect if the House were to pass the motion, would be to put upon the government the immediate duty of proceeding with this work.

The House records its opinion and determination that the construction of the Georgian Bay canal should be commenced forthwith.

I submit that my hon. friend has gone beyond the rights assigned to a member, and the motion is out of order, and upon this I would ask your ruling.

Mr. MONK. I think it is a great pity that my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) should have gone out of his way to find in this motion a partisan spirit. If the proposed arrangements with the United States are carried into effect they will produce traffic, and if, as is contended, they will produce traffic with the United States, it is quite natural that that traffic would be removed from Canadian channels. I do not see anything in the motion that would lead anybody to believe there was a partisan motive behind the motion I have made. It calls purely and simply for a decision from the government. In answering my right hon. friend, it seems to me he has gone out of his way to avoid giving a categorical answer to the question involved in the motion. I think the public at large would have been much better pleased to see him less punctilious upon the point of order, and more anxious to give the information which is plainly sought for by this motion. We are all familiar with the rule that a private member cannot initiate public expenditure; that has been in the English constitution since 1701, I think that privilege has been with the consent of the House, reserved to the Crown. There is nothing in this motion which calls for an expenditure of money, and that is the only thing which would stop a private member from making such a motion. There is no call here for money, it is for an expression of opinion by the House, and an enjoinder, if you will, to the government to begin the construction of the canal.

But where do you find in that, words which correspond with the rule which my hon. friend quoted about requiring the imposition of a tax or the expenditure of any specific sum of money? That is all I have to submit on that point, Mr. Speaker. You will find authority in Bourinot for the statement that the very greatest latitude possible has been accorded since the House of Commons has existed, in the matters of motions of this kind, a motion which does not go so far as to require the spending of a specific sum of money. That is what Sir John Bourinot says in his work. There is no question of money here and it seems to me that my right hon. friend might very well have answered the question that is sought to be solved by this motion instead of taking refuge in the point of order which has no force with reference to a motion of this kind.

Mr. SPEAKER. If this resolution compels the government to proceed with the expenditure of money forthwith there are rules applicable to it, first, that contained in the British North America Act and, second, a rule of our own House. Section 54 of the British North America Act, which has already been referred to, would prevent the adoption of such a resolution. Rule 77 of our own rules would also prevent the adoption of the resolution if it were not recommended by the Governor General and preceded by consideration in the Committee of the Whole. There are precedents mentioned by Sir John Bourinot of certain resolutions that have been adopted, but Bourinot also states that they were generally evasions of the rule. I may be allowed to read a few lines from it:

A practice has grown up in the House of allowing the introduction of resolutions by private members, when they do not directly involve the expenditure of public money, but simply express an abstract opinion on a matter which may necessitate a future grant. As this is a question not always understood, it may be explained that such resolutions, being framed in general terms, do not bind the House to future legislation on the subject, and are merely intended to point out to the government the importance and necessity of such expenditure.

Referring to this right of members to move such abstract resolutions, all authorities agree that it is one 'which the House exercises, and should always exercise with great reserve, and only under peculiar and exceptional circumstances.' Such resolutions are considered virtually 'an evasion of the rules of the House, and are on that account objectionable, and should be discouraged as much as possible.' Nevertheless, neither the English nor Canadian House of Commons has ever agreed to the adoption of a rule to fetter their discretion in regard to the entertaining of such propositions.

I see by the Standing Rules and Orders of the British House that rule 71, which was passed on the 20th March, 1866, previous to confederation, reads as follows:

If any motion be made in the House for any aid, grant or charge upon the public revenue, whether payable out of the consolidated fund or out of money to be provided by parliament, or for any charge upon the people, the consideration and debate thereof shall not be presently entered upon, but shall be adjourned till such further day as the House shall think fit to appoint, and then it shall be referred to a Committee of the Whole House before any resolution or vote of the House do pass therein.

The only point I have to decide is whether the adoption of this amendment would compel the government of the day to proceed forthwith with this expenditure. I think it would, and therefore it is in violation of the rule that requires previous recommendations of the Crown and consideration by the Committee of the Whole House. Therefore, I declare the amendment out of order.

SUPPLY.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Supply.

Department of the Interior—Imigration—Salaries of agents and employees in Canada, Great Britain and foreign countries, $350,000.

Mr. SPROULE. I thought it was the intention of the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) to give a general statement on this subject before we went into the matter.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior). When the House went into committee last Monday the hon. member for Lennox and Addington (Mr. Wilson) requested that a statement should be made on our taking up the item of immigration. I do not think that it is necessary to detain the committee at any great length in making a statement on this item, and that probably the matters that are of special interest to members can be brought out by questioning rather than by a general statement. However, for the information of the committee, it might be stated that for the first nine months of the present fiscal year the total immigration has been 253,326 as compared with 208,794 in the whole of last year; that is that the nine months of the present fiscal year show 253,326 immigrants against 208,749 for the twelve months of the past fiscal year. Of these immigrants 98,995 are British as compared with 59,790 for the whole of the last fiscal year; from the United States 97,702 in the nine months as compared with 103,798 in the twelve months; European continental immigrants 56,628 during the nine months as compared with 45,628 during the twelve months. There is no doubt that the character of the immigrants who arrive is quite as important, if not more important than the number, and on that point some information may be given. The immigration season of 1911 has already opened and we can compare to some extent the arrivals in March, 1911, with the arrivals in March, 1910. We have taken one vessel which arrived on the 4th of March, 1911, and comparing her manifest with the manifest of the same vessel arriving on the 5th March, 1910, we find that in 1910 she brought 559 immigrants, of whom 139 were from European countries in which we put forth no immigration effort, and this year she brought 632 immigrants, and only 27 were from countries where no immigration effort is put forth by us.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). How many immigrants came from Ireland this year as compared with last?

Mr. OLIVER. The immigration from Ireland in the fiscal year 1910 was 3,940, as compared with 3,609 in the previous fiscal year and 933 in the year before that.

Mr. WRIGHT (Muskoka). Can the minister state if the United States statistics are compiled in the same manner as our Canadian statistics? The reason I ask is that the American statistics show that they received more Canadians than we received Americans, prior to last year at all events; the figures for last year I have not seen I would like to know whether the United States figures are compiled on the same basis as ours because there seems to be a difference of opinion on this matter. For instance, I suppose there is some method of dealing with tourists and transients and others who come from the United States for speculative purposes, and who go back after a few months stay here.

Mr. OLIVER. I think the method of counting is the same and the method of accounting is practically the same. I may mention that during the nine years from 1900 to 1909-10 there were, according to the United States reports, immigrants from Canada to the States—immigrants of countries in which we put forth immigration efforts—to the number of 126,624, and during the same period Canada received from the United States 479,262 immigrants.

Mr. WRIGHT (Muskoka). I was asking the minister as to the total migration between the two countries.

Mr. OLIVER. I am giving the total immigration during these years from the United States to Canada, and I am giving the figures of the United States authorities themselves in regard to the emigration from Canada to the United States, of certain classes of people.

Mr. WRIGHT (Muskoka). What I was trying to get at is the method in which the figures are compiled in each country. I have studied the immigration returns as given by the United States up to last year, and they take credit for receiving more Canadians than there were Americans who left for Canada. Are their figures compiled the same as ours?

Mr. OLIVER. We cannot be responsible for the accuracy of their figures. I do not know how they arrive at their results, and of course if they claim they have received as many Canadians into the United States during the past year as we say we have received American citizens into Canada, we can only say that we believe their figures are incorrect.

At six o'clock, committee took recess.

After Recess.

Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. OLIVER. When the committee rose at six o'clock, I was placing before it the figures of the immigration for the current year. I pointed out not only that the total immigration was larger than that of any previous year in the history of the country, but also, from the evidence that was at hand, that the character of the immigration was superior to that of the previous year as the character of that year's immigration was superior to that of the year preceding. I want to emphasize the fact of the larger immigration of this year, an immigration which, if our estimate of 300,000 is correct, is nearly 100,000 more than that of last year, an increase of 33⅓ per cent, and last year's immigration was only exceeded by that of the year 1907-8. The growth of our immigration is shown by the statement that in 1897 the total immigration was 21,716, in 1900 it was 49,149, in 1905 it was 189,064, and in 1910-11 it is over 300,000. The committee will remember that some years ago the conditions surrounding the immigration into Canada were such as to call for considerable unfavourable comment. There were objections made to the character of the people who were coming: They were not well provided with means; they were not sufficiently well selected as to physical and other conditions. The immigration of the present fiscal year, although larger than that of any other fiscal year in the history of Canada, has called forth less complaint upon any of these scores than has ever before been the case in the history of immigration into Canada. That is to say, there is less lack of employment, and less of unfavourable conditions on the part of the immigrants. I will deal with what appear to me to be the reasons for this in a short time. In the meantime, I will give some information as to the means that are taken by the Immigration Department to secure this large influx of people. First, let me say that it is absolutely contrary to the policy of the Immigration Department of the Dominion government at the present time to give assistance to immigrants—to pay anything to induce an immigrant to come to Canada.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). You never did.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, there was a time when we did. In our present attitude we are pursuing an entirely different policy from that adopted by the States which comprise the Australian Commonwealth. New South Wales offers a passage to farmers and farm servants of £6 provided the immigrant has £4 additional in money, and a passage of £3 to his wife and £1.10 to every member of his family under 18 years of age. To domestic servants it offers a passage of £5 provided the immigrant has £3 additional; and the booking agent gets £1 in each case. Queensland is offering a passage of £5 provided the immigrant has £50 of money in addition, and free passages to wives and children, also free passages to domestic servants provided they are country girls, and 22s. to booking agents for every person, whether free or paid for.

Mr. BLAIN. How does the total expenditure for immigration of last year compare with that of the preceding year?

Mr. OLIVER. I am glad that my hon. friend has reminded me of that, because while the immigration has increased from 21,000 in the year 1897 to over 300,000 in 1910, the expenditure has increased from $261,000 in 1897-98, to $960,000 in 1909-10; that is to say, that while the expenditure has increased fourfold, the returns for that expenditure have increased some fourteen fold; so that to-day the country is getting a proportionately greater value for its money than it did in 1897. I have said that Canada has no policy of assisting immigration. Canada has no money to give to any man to cause him to come to Canada; but Canada spends her money for the purpose of bringing the advantages of Canada to the attention of those who are likely to avail themselves of them. Our immigration policy is in the first instance simply an advertising policy—a means of placing the advantages of Canada before such people in other countries as we desire to induce to come to Canada in the belief that they will do well for themselves when they come here. We, therefore, keep salaried agents, advertise in newspapers, and publish literature in regard to Canada for the information of the public. Speaking in more detail, in Great Britain we have nine salaried agents in permanent offices, whose business it is to distribute literature, to give information, to spread a knowledge of Canada wherever it can advantageously be done, and to facilitate the coming to Canada of desirable people who wish to come. On the continent of Europe we have only two such agencies, one in France and one in Belgium. In Great Britain we find that a great deal of our publicity work is done by the booking agents, who are licensed by the British government to sell transportation. By our arrangement with these people we are enabled to get their special efforts on behalf of Canada. This is where the bonus system comes in. We pay these booking agents $5 on each ticket to Canada sold by them, provided the person buying the ticket is of the class considered desirable by us. This makes the agent interested in advertising Canada. He would rather sell tickets to Canada than to the United States or South Africa, or South America or any other country that does not give him any extra consideration of this kind.

Mr. DANIEL. Is this bonus for men, women and children?

Mr. OLIVER. For all adults; it is £1, and for children under 18 it is ten shillings. We have in Great Britain, therefore, by reason of this bonus system, not only the nine agencies that we have established, but also the three thousand booking agents scattered throughout the British islands, who are working on behalf of Canadian immigration. Not only so, but by reason of the fact that we only pay the bonus on certain classes of immigrants, we have them working to secure that class of immigrants for Canada; because, they do not get the bonus if we consider the immigrant is not sufficiently desirable to warrant us in paying the bonus.

On the continent of Europe, in most countries the conditions surrounding immigration effort are very different from those in Great Britain. We have not the same liberty of action. Some of the countries have very restrictive laws against immigration, and we do not think it is advisable to make the same general arrangement in regard to booking agents that we do in Great Britain. In Great Britain it is assumed that every booking agent is willing to act as an agent for the Canadian government and is suitable for doing so; it is only if we find that he is not suitable that we cut him off our list. But on the continent of Europe, where the governments are more or less restrictive in the matter of immigration, we do not think it desirable to make the same general arrangements with licensed booking agents, and so we only make arrangements with such of them as we are satisfied are of such standing and character that they will not bring us into any conflict with the government of that country. We have arrangements with booking agents in Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, France, Belgium and Switzerland, but in none of the other countries of Europe. With regard to Germany, we should be glad to have arrangements with booking agents there, but the German government is so restrictive in the matter of emigration that we do not think it is desirable that we should incur any possibility of friction with that government by making arrangements with the licensed booking agents. In other countries also, we have not dealt with any booking agents, and therefore no bonuses are paid on immigrants coming from these countries. On emigration from continental Europe we paid last year in bonuses £2,035, distributed as follows:

Norway	£940
Sweden	111
Denmark	97
Holland	210
France	448
Belgium	226
Switzerland	1

In the United States we have seventeen established agencies with salaried agents. Our campaign in the United States is more largely a newspaper advertising campaign than in either Great Britain or the continent of Europe.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the minister tell us where these salaried agents in the United States are located?

Mr. OLIVER. In the following cities: Detroit, Michigan; Spokane, Washington; Milwaukee, Wisconsin; Watertown, South Dakota; Grand Forks, North Dakota; St. Paul, Minnesota; Omaha, Nebraska; Kansas City, Missouri; Toledo, Ohio: Chicago, Illinois; Great Falls, Montana; Indianapolis, Indiana; Syracuse, New York; Boston, Massachusetts; Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, and Providence, Rhode Island.

In the United States we employ sub-agents who are paid an allowance based upon the number of people whom they bring in, the allowance being at the rate of $3 for each adult male person, $2 for each woman and $1 for each child. These sub-agents are mainly useful in giving the people information as to how they can best reach Canada with their effects.

The work of advertising in foreign countries and in the British islands is a large part of our immigration effort and perhaps the most important part. But another very important part is that of dealing with the immigrants after they arrive in Canada. While we do not give any financial assistance,—that is, it is not our policy to give financial assistance, it is our policy to facilitate, as far as possible, the immigrant reaching the destination and the purpose for which he came to Canada. For that reason we have a system in the western provinces of distributing immigrants on the land. There is what might be called a central distribution office in Winnipeg in charge of the Commissioner of Immigration. All railroads of the west radiate from Winnipeg, and, at different points throughout the western provinces which immigrants are likely to seek, we have immigration halls, that is, places where immigrants may be temporarily entertained on leaving the train and before they go out on the land. We have a number of officers known as land guides, who are paid at the rate of $2 per day and whose duty it is to guide parties out to the vacant lands. These land guides are men who are acquainted with the run of the surveys, have some knowledge of the country, and can take a person who is not familiar with conditions in that country—and, naturally a person coming from the British islands or from continental Europe must find things very strange when he goes on the prairie—to the best land available in the neighbourhood. When the immigrant comes looking for land, arrangements may be made with the land guide, who is responsible to the government, and who will take the immigrant out and show him the land and indicate the boundaries and, generally speaking, assist in locating him. The immigrant, of course, has to pay for his own expenses, including transportation, but we give the land guide payment at the rate of $2 per day so as to retain his services.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. How many of these land guides are there in the employ of the government?

Mr. OLIVER. At this time, 65.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. How are they distributed throughout the prairie provinces?

Mr. OLIVER. I could not, offhand, say just where they are located, but, generally speaking, they are located so as to be in touch with the land agencies, because the land agency is the place to which the immigrant must go in order to locate his land after he has decided upon it.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Has the minister any complaints of any of these guides 'working' these immigrants—that is, getting an extra fee for showing them the good land? The minister, I suppose, understands what I mean. There have been complaints that guides would not show landseekers the best land unless they received $100 or $200 extra. Have any complaints of that kind been received?

Mr. OLIVER. I have had no complaints on that line. Such complaints, if they were made to the commissioner at Winnipeg, would not likely reach me through the commissioner at Winnipeg, as I am sure that on receipt of such complaint the commissioner would dismiss the guide before the complaint reached me. If my hon. friend has any knowledge of such cases and the facts can be substantiated, I will guarantee that the guide complained of will be dismissed without delay.

Mr. OLIVER.

In Ontario and Quebec, where the demand is not for free land, but for farm labourers, we have 125 distribution agents in the farming counties, whose business it is to see that immigrants for Ontario are distributed amongst the farmers who desire help. In 1909, we distributed 3,610 farm labourers amongst the farmers of these two provinces, and in 1910, 6,769. Thus the number of labourers supplied to farmers in this way doubled in one year. In Prince Edward Island we have had a Mr. Winfield employed for about two years. The conditions there are different again from those in Ontario and Quebec and the west. There is no great demand for farm labourers and no free land, but there is land which can be purchased at a reasonable price, so that Mr. Winfield's efforts are directed to bringing out a class of practical farmers who wish to buy land at reasonable rates. He sails on the 14th of next month with a party of this kind.

On behalf of New Brunswick, we have had since Christmas, Mr. Craigie, of St. John, N.B., in the old country. We have so far had no returns from him. At the moment we have no person from Nova Scotia, but expect to have before long.

Mr. DANIEL. Is Mr. Craigie working in connection with the local government? The local authorities have cognizance of farms in New Brunswick which can be obtained by immigrants. Would he have a list of these farms?

Mr. OLIVER. I would think it would be part of his business to inform him in regard to the conditions there. Undoubtedly he would be informed and would take the action my hon. friend suggests. He will work in harmony with the provincial government in securing immigrants who will be likely to occupy land in New Brunswick.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Has not the government an agent in Winnipeg who receives $25 from the farmers to bring out labourers to Manitoba?

Mr. OLIVER. We have two agents in Manitoba for the placing of labourers and we have sent farm delegates from Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta during the winter to advertise and bring to the notice of the people of England, Scotland and Ireland the opportunities offered by the three provinces in the way of free land, land for purchase and employment for labourers.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I did not mean that, but before Mr. Smith was sent to London he used to send agents round to the different towns, and the farmers used to give him $25 on condition that he would supply them with the men. Whether that custom is still continued I do not know.

Mr. OLIVER. That is not being done at the present time, unless under very exceptional circumstances; I think it was not found to work out satisfactorily. I think there was a man named Adamson who did that sort of work, and while Mr. Adamson was a very good man, and brought out a number of good men under that system the scheme did not work out satisfactorily with the steamship companies.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). Who got the $25?

Mr. OLIVER. He got it.

Mr. BLAIN. May I ask the minister if there is similar co-operation in the province of Ontario?

Mr. OLIVER. The distributing agent in the country districts is at liberty to use his own judgment. He communicates with our agents in the old country, he tells them there are so many men required in his locality. If a farmer desires to do so, he can avail himself of the services of the employment agent to advance the fare for a man that he wants to bring over. But that is not a part of our system, that is a transaction between the farmer and the employment agent. That is not a part of our business. If the employment agent and the farmer can arrange it between themselves, we have no objection.

Mr. HAGGART (Winnipeg). The minister will remember that before the Christmas holidays I brought to his attention a matter relating to this very point. A gentleman in Winnipeg, Mr. Hutchings, in the saddlery business, had completed a large factory, and he wanted to get a number of operators. The saddlery business in England was dull on account of automobiles taking the places of horses and carriages. He could get good men, but these men could not comply with the provisions of the law which required that they should have so much money in their pocket on landing. The explanation the minister gave at the time, I think, was to the effect that the employer could advance the money. I mentioned the fact to Mr. Hutchings, who seemed to be much annoyed, and thought he was not well treated, and he did not agree with the minister as to the facts. I think the minister said there was an obligation which would prevent them from entering with another man's money in their pockets. Perhaps the minister could make his position clear now.

Mr. OLIVER. There must have been some misunderstanding on the part of Mr. Hutchings. There is no objection to Mr. Hutchings or any one else advancing money to men in England. It is none of our business how the man in England gets his money so long as he comes to Canada with the money in his pocket, and we are satisfied it is his money. We do not care if he has to pay it back afterwards, but if he comes to Canada with the money in his pocket to spend as he pleases, then we are satisfied that he has $25 that will keep him from becoming a public charge until he has a reasonable opportunity of getting work. But we do object to the employer furnishing that money to him at the port of landing, because the inference is that it is only handed to the immigrant to enable him to pass our officer, and then he must hand it back to the agent who is employing him. That is contrary to our policy, and we do not allow it if we can prevent it. But if the man leaves England with the money in his pocket, we do not concern ourselves whether it was advanced to him or not.

Mr. HAGGART (Winnipeg). Suppose the employer of labour here has advanced that money to a hundred different men in different places, and they are able to show the money at the port of entry. Well, if there is an obligation to pay it back, could a conscientious man with the money that was advanced to him for that purpose, and which he knew was not his own, and which had to be earned subsequently, could he make a declaration that that was his money? Then it would be useless to advance him the money. That was the point that Mr. Hutchings made to me.

Mr. OLIVER. I think that is rather straining the point. I cannot imagine many men having so tender a conscience as to be unwilling to say that the money they were entitled to spend as they pleased was not their own money. As a matter of fact, it was their own money.

Mr. HAGGART (Winnipeg). So the employer has got to make a gift of it, and cannot demand it back subsequently?

Mr. OLIVER. He can lend them the money, but the transaction must be made on the other side before he leaves. We do not ask whether the man has to pay the money back or not; the point is that he must have the money, and that he is privileged to spend it as he pleases. If he gets it in England and brings it with him across the ocean, that is evidence that he has had the money in his possession, and the ability to spend it if he wanted to. Therefore, we are satisfied that when he comes to this side he is able to spend it if he wants to. But if the employer is not willing to give him the money until he lands on this side, that is evidence to us that the employer is not willing to trust him with the money, and the chances are that the money is only given to him to be handed back, and, therefore, it did not belong to the immigrant.

Mr. HAGGART (Winnipeg). I have great respect for the minister, but I have not much respect for the law that he lays down. Even if the money is loaned to him, he still has it in his pocket.

Mr. OLIVER. The requirement is that the man who lands in Canada shall not be under the necessity of appealing to charity in case he is not able to find remunerative employment immediately upon landing. Now that is one purpose, and that purpose is served if the man has the money in his pocket when he lands, and can do with it as he pleases, no matter whether he borrows it or not. But if it is only given to him as he lands, and must be handed back to the employer the moment he passes our officer, then that is not his money to do with as he pleases, and is no protection to the immigrant.

Mr. BRADBURY. It seems that this is not a good law in so far as we are concerned. I understand that we have been endeavouring to secure the very best settlers we are able to get from the British possessions. In this case under discussion, these men were mechanics, they were under contract, they were coming out here with permanent employment assured in Mr. Hutchings' factory. I think the law is—I will not say a silly law—but one that is bound to work to the detriment of our country in preventing us from securing a very desirable class of men. I do not think it is wise in a case of this kind to exact the qualification of having $25 in their pockets. I think men leaving England, Ireland and Scotland, especially mechanics, or any other kind of men that come to this country with assured positions, should not be required to comply with that qualification. Mr. Hutchings complained very bitterly, and he stated that he had a factory that would give employment to four or five hundred men. He told me that he had three hundred mechanics employed to go into that factory, and that these men were refused entry into Canada because they did not each have $25 in their pockets. Outside of this case altogether I think the principle is wrong. I think the minister is quite right to apply it to immigrants from foreign countries, Slavs and settlers of that kind, but when you are bringing into this country our own people, because we look upon people from Great Britain as our own people, you should not put such a barrier between them and Canada. If men are enabled to come out here with employment assured there should be no barrier. I can understand that it is necessary to keep out paupers, but there is no danger where men are assured a position, and a responsible man in Canada notifies the department that these men are about to enter his employ. I think the law is a mistaken one when applied in that way.

Mr. OLIVER.

Mr. OLIVER. The law is made to meet a certain condition, it is made for a certain purpose and when the need of the law exists it is desirable that it should be enforced. I quite appreciate the fact that there are times and conditions when it is not necessary to enforce that law, and during a great part of last summer the conditions were relaxed, so that where a mechanic was coming to assured employment the $25 was not insisted upon. But that was during the summer season and when the winter season came we felt that under winter conditions in Canada it was not in the best interests of the country that a man, even if he were coming to what was called assured employment, should come without money in his pocket, because we all know that labour conditions are entirely different in the winter from what they are in the summer, and that if a man is thrown out of employment in the winter he has not the same chance to get employment as in the summer. Although a man may come to assured employment we have no certainty that he will continue in his employment. He may be inefficient, he may have been mistaken in the class of work that he was required to do and the employer would not be warranted in keeping him. Such a man under such circumstances arriving in the dead of winter will be just as hungry if he is out of a job as if he had not been a mechanic or a desirable settler and will become an object of charity. Therefore, we withdrew the relaxation in the fall and it was not until the relaxation had been withdrawn that our friend, Mr. Hutchings, arrived at the conclusion that he needed these men. If he had thought of it a little sooner he would have been able to have got them in without their having the $25; in fact, if I remember aright the relaxation was still in force when my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart, Winnipeg) spoke in the House, and I so informed him.

Mr. HAGGART (Winnipeg). No, the hon. gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, the relaxation was in force until the 10th December.

Mr. HAGGART (Winnipeg). He could not take advantage of it by that time.

Mr. OLIVER. That may be; I cannot say as to that, but if Mr. Hutchings had arrangements made for his men at the time my hon. friend brought the complaint before the House there was no bar whatever to him getting them in. But, on the 10th December the relaxation was withdrawn, and I appeal to the committee if it is not right and reasonable that during the winter months in Canada any man landing in Canada should be in a position to support himself for a little time at any rate without appealing to any one.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox and Addington). The minister has given us quite a rehearsal; he has spoken particularly of what has been happening in this financial year, and no person in this House outside of himself has any opportunity of investigating any thing in connection with it. Then there is another thing that I think we are more interested in perhaps than the numbers he has given us as representing the immigrants who have come into this country. There are only certain classes for which the government are giving bonuses of $5 each to agents. I understand they are farmers, farm labourers and domestic servants. He has told us that they placed over 6,000 in Ontario and Quebec last year, or two-thirds of all they got in of that class. I have here a statement that was made by Mr. Scott, the immigration commissioner. He said that during 1910 we received 9,813 farmers and farm labourers for whom we paid $49,065, that we received 6,015 women for whom we paid a bonus of $30,075 and that we received 2,840 children for whom we paid ten shillings per head, the total amounting to $86,240. As I understand the government's position on this question, it is that they are not supposed to assist any other than these three classes to come to Canada—farmers, farm labourers and female domestic servants. We have 3,000 agents who are paid commissions for getting immigrants, we have nine regular salaried agents in the old country and during last season we sent over forty special agents at a very great cost. We did not accomplish very much. My own impression is that sending over special agents is a farce. It is very nice for a friend who is in ill-health or who wants a trip to go over as a special immigration agent, get $100 a month and expenses. Some of these expenses are exceedingly high. We keep no track as far as I know of the people who leave the country. The minister told us this afternoon that we got 103,000 immigrants from the United States. If you look at the immigration report of the United States you will find at page 142 the figures given with reference to the year's immigration from the United States to Canada and the emigration from Canada to the United States as follows:

Immigrants from United States to Canada—
United States citizens..	78,697
Canadian citizens..	15,203
Aliens..	22,477
Total..	116,377
Immigrants from Canada to the United States—
United States citizens..	22,832
Canadian citizens..	44,328
Aliens..	27,336
Total..	94,496

According to the American statement therefore we had the better of them by 21,496 people. It seems to me there is something very strange about this. We have been told that the exodus has been stopped and that our people are not now going to the United States, but here the American statistics show that Canadians are going in large numbers to the neighbouring republic. Now, to get this number of people from the United States, we spent something over $232,347 according to the answer given to me by the minister a few days ago.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). For 21,000 people.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). For a little over 21,000 people. Then, there is a discrepancy between the immigration report given out by the department and Lord Strathcona's report to the department. The department says we got from Great Britain and Ireland, 59,760 immigrants last year, while Lord Strathcona says we got 66,554 and strange to say, that while we are told it would cost too much to keep track of the people who leave this country so that statistics might be prepared with regard to them, yet Lord Strathcona in his report to the department at page 65 says:

> Some interesting instances of the volume and character of the immigrants from the United Kingdom to Canada, and the return movement to Great Britain from the Dominion are shown by the figures quoted below which have been obtained from official sources.

Then he says there were sent to Canada 113,315 and there returned to the old country 46,791, leaving, as he says, the balance of 66,524. I should like to know why the department does not adopt some system by which we can know the number and character of the people who come to this country, as well as of those who leave this country, because unless we have such information, we are entirely in the dark and we are paying out such large sums of money that I think it is time to cry a halt. From 1897 to 1910 we paid out for immigration $8,847,272.33, and if you add the appropriation for this year which amounts to $1,066,250, you will have $9,913,522.33 expended for immigration from 1897 up to the end of the fiscal year. When we remember that the federal government of the United States has not now and never had an immigrant agent, and when we remember that transportation companies are forbidden under a heavy penalty to solicit immigration, it is a remarkable thing that last year the United States got over one million one hundred thousand immigrants on whom they collected a head tax of $4 each amounting to over $4,000,000, and they spent for the purpose of keeping out of the country—I think that describes it exactly—$2,631,538, leaving them a balance collected on immigrants for that year amounting to $1,533,428. Now, it is strange to me that while we have 3,000 agents in Great Britain and Ireland, and 45 immigrant agents on commission in the United States and 17 on salary, we are not as successful in proportion as is the American Republic. I would call the special attention of the minister to this point, because I think the time has come when there should be a reduction in the amount of money we are spending, especially when we are getting such meagre results in the line of desirable immigrants. I am sure the minister would hardly like to go before a Trades Union and tell them he brought in about 300,000 immigrants last year, only about 10 per cent of whom were farmers, farm labourers, and domestic servants, notwithstanding that the Trades Unions are opposed to bringing in mechanics and the labour unions are opposed to bringing in labourers and the government declares it is their policy not to bring them in. During the last three years the government has spent over $1,000,000 a year for immigration although when we were in power the Liberal party found very great fault with our expending $120,000 a year for the same purpose. Now, I have figures here from the American report at page 55 which tend to prove that we are getting into Canada a great many undesirable immigrants and that the selection made on the other side before they start for this country is not nearly as perfect as that made by the United States. I may state that in 1907 there was a large convention held in New York at which persons of various notions about immigration met, and prominent citizens of the United States discussed the question thoroughly. That same year the Congress of the United States passed a law appointing a commission to investigate the whole matter of immigration and the commission was permitted to go anywhere it chose to pursue its investigation, and to report the result. They say, in an interim summary report, that their complete report will require about 40 volumes, and while I do not expect the Minister of the Interior to read the whole 40 volumes, yet I think it would well repay him to read the summary report presented by the commission. Now, in the figures given below it is shown beyond peradventure, that the United States were called upon to reject fewer immigrants on this side of the Atlantic than Canada rejected, and the reason for that is that the process of selection on the other side before the immigrants start for the American continent, is much more perfect under the United States system than under ours. I quote the following figures:

Mr. WILSON (Lennox and Addington).

Immigrants admitted and aliens deported after admission to Canada and the United States, fiscal years 1907 and 1909—

Country.	Immigrants admitted.	Aliens deported.	Percentage deported.
Canada...	534,044	2,774	1 to 193
United States....	2,820,005	5,188	1 to 544

If this statement is true, it shows a great laxity on the part of our Immigration Department in allowing undesirable immigrants to embark for this country. I am informed that the United States have medical officers in some of the European countries for the past ten years. I believe we have one in New York; I do not know that we have any other. Then, every captain of a vessel bringing immigrants to the United States must make a declaration on reaching port that the medical officer of the ship has examined every immigrant on board, both orally and otherwise, and when they land, the medical officer on shore has to do the same thing. It is said that there are often as many rejected at the port of embarkation as are brought over. The shipping companies have got tired of carrying people both ways for one fare. Besides, if any contagious disease is found among the immigrants that might have been discovered before the ship sailed, the shipping companies are liable to a fine of $100, besides having to take back the affected people to the country from which they came. I made some mention of that last year when the Immigration Bill was before the House, and did what I could to assist in improving that measure. I wanted to have it made as stringent as possible, because I look upon the immigration business as the most important business we have in this country. If we bring into the country a lot of people who are weaklings or insane, we can never correct the mistake, whereas if we spend a little more money on anything than we should, we have only to work a little harder to make up the loss. In the Ontario report on the hospitals for the insane for last year, it is stated that during ten months of that year 168 insane persons were sent back, and that was a saving to the province of $400,000, I suppose taking into account the number of years that these people would have to be maintained if they had been left here. That I think shows that our immigration regulations are too lax. One thing the department has done which I am pleased with, although it costs a good deal of money. It has appointed, along our border, between Canada and the United States, 69 regular preventive officers to prevent undesirable people coming into this country. In addition, I understand, there are 132 customs officers who are required to act as preventive officers for the same purpose. That makes an army of a little over 200, and while it is a little expensive, these people render a valuable service. The department has sent a number of people to the old country as farmer delegates, and it seems to value them all the same, because it pays them all the same salary, except one lady, who is paid at a much higher rate than the others. Donald Irwin, from Lloydminster, Saskatchewan, was employed for four months at $100 a month, and was paid $761.50 for expenses, or over $6.25 per day. Alexander D. Gamby, from Griswold, Manitoba, was paid a salary of $100 a month for three months, and $606.16 for expenses, or about $6.70 per day. S. Larcombe, of Birtle, Manitoba, was paid $100 a month for three months, and $718.28 for expenses, or about $7.98 per day. Rev. J. A. Winfield, of St. Stephen, New Brunswick, was paid $100 a month for four months and $742.68 for expenses, or almost $6 per day. J. G. Turgeon, of Hardisty, Saskatchewan, was paid $100 a month for five months and $885.47 for expenses, or $5.90 per day. Agnes D. Cameron of England was paid $200 a month for four months and $2,592.62 for expenses, or $21.60 per day. H. S. Bardal, of Winnipeg, was paid $100 a month for six months and $1,143.43 for expenses, or $6.35 per day. William Griffith, of St. John, New Brunswick, was paid $100 a month for eight months and $1,613.84 for expenses, or $201.73 per month. That there may be no mistake about this matter, I will read the heading of the statement which Mr. Scott sent to the committee: 'Farmer delegates sent to the British Isles and Europe, fiscal year 1909-10.' I do not know the position this lady, Agnes D. Cameron, occupies, but I can hardly imagine that she is properly described as a farmer delegate. I think the time has come when we should cry a halt in spending money so recklessly in connection with immigration, and for getting into the country many people whom we do not want. What we do want are farmers, farm labourers and female domestics; but I do not think the government can take credit for bringing in a lot of other people who prefer to live in the cities and towns. The United States reports show that about 40 per cent of the immigrants go home again and about 30 per cent stay when they do go. This indicates that the immigrants who are going to the United States now are not the same kind that came years ago. Formerly they came to become citizens and make homes for themselves and throw in their lot with the people of the country. Now many come during the good times when they can get good wages, and then it is so easy to go back that they return home again and take their money with them. I would like the minister to give us a pledge to-night that he will look into this matter and see if he cannot curtail the wasteful expenditure that is taking place on immigration at the present time.

Mr. E. PAQUET (L'Islet). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity of making a few remarks in regard to immigration.

In providing the means for starting an overwhelming influx of immigrants with the object of developing our resources, we have too often neglected to lay down strict rules for the proper selection of such immigrants. Accordingly people have been admitted whose character was not always above reproach.

In the course of the last session, parliament and the government materially improved the law in this respect. However, the form to be filled in and signed by the immigrant is not of a nature to enlighten us as to the latters' character.

The hon. minister should require from the immigrants a certificate vouching for their good behaviour. Such certificate might be delivered by a magistrate, by the physician attending the immigrant, by the clerk of a court, by a clergyman or by the mayor of the municipality wherein the immigrant resides. Such a formality might be readily complied with. Desirable citizens would be proud to hand to the proper officers a certificate giving evidence of their good behaviour. It would be an honourable certificate of registration for each new citizen of Canada.

Last session, I applied for the correspondence which had taken place between the medical immigration inspectors and the superintendent of immigration. I made a special study of the methods of medical inspection followed at Quebec. I appreciate the learning and the zeal of Dr. Pagé, superintendent of the immigration hospital and head of the inspection service at Quebec. I foresee that in the near future satisfactory results will be forthcoming from his work, his researches and his suggestions.

I wish to make a passing reference to the annual report of the Department of the Interior. The hon. minister publishes only the reports of our inspectors, of our immigration agents and the reports of our agents in the British Isles, in France and in Belgium. Unfortunately these reports are oftentimes a mere rehash of the facts already in print. They do not impart any information in respect to our colonization societies or our agents in the New England states. I hope that henceforth the hon. minister will cause to be included in his annual report an account of the work done by all our immigration agents.

We are seeking to blend with our native-born population swarms of foreign elements. We cannot be too careful in the selection of these outsiders. The United States, though their population aggregates 90,000,000, are fearful lest they may be unable to cope with such large arrivals of immigrants, and they are endeavouring by means of restrictive legislation to impede the rush into the country of immigrants from foreign lands.

The Canadianization of foreign elements in this young country of ours, with its immense territory, presents a social problem of the greatest importance. The growing generations of immigrants, constantly increasing, may ultimately have the upper hand in the management of our affairs. It is then incumbent on us to make a most judicious selection of these immigrants. Some political men conceive the greatest fears in regard to the proposed trade reciprocity arrangements between Canada and the United States. They fear the effects of an immigration policy which has attracted to Canada since 1900 close on one million immigrants from the United States. In their opinion, Canadian feeling is not sufficiently developed, is not sufficiently strong, does not exert enough prestige, to allow us safely to go into a business understanding of that kind with our neighbours. But I cannot admit that such an arrangement implies the slightest weakening of our feelings of loyalty towards the mother country.

It is with sadness that I see so many of our Canadians leaving this country for the United States.

Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX (Translation.) Do you mean French Canadians?

Mr. PAQUET (Translation.) I said Canadians.

Mr. MARTIN (Translation.) What about those who are coming back to Canada?

Mr. PAQUET (Translation.) Statistics go to show that during the fiscal year 1908-09, 18,111 Canadians emigrated to the United States for good. In 1908-09, that figure reached 43,805. During the last fiscal year, 53,448 Canadians left to take up their homes in the United States. According to the report of Mr. René Dupont, immigration agent at Quebec, 19,000 French Canadians have left the province of Quebec. Over 11,000 emigrated to the United States. Such figures should induce us to make untiring and strenuous efforts towards keeping in the country the sons of Canada.

Allow me to make a few remarks in respect to the French immigration. In the course of the last fiscal year, we received 1,727 immigrants from France, and in order to attain that result, we expended $10,750.71. In 1909. I voted in favour of the French treaty believing in my heart that it would make for an increase of our trade with France. In my opinion, such an arrangement would develop our business intercourse with France, help in building up the means of communication between the two countries, attract French capital and French immigration to our shores.

If the Dominion government is intent on attaining that goal, they should hasten to reorganize the office of our general agent in France. We should have at Paris, as our representative, an active, able man, thoroughly versed in business matters. We should so arrange that this agency of ours in France may become a powerful means of extending our trade, a centre whence Canadian energy may radiate with irresistible force. French capitalists will look on such an agency with great confidence. The question of Canada's representation in France is worthy of the immediate consideration of the government. I quote the following lines from the pen of Mr. Louis H. Taché in the 'Canada' review:

> The decease of Mr. Fabre has created a vacancy which it will not be an easy matter to fill. His great individuality, his refinement, his remarkable learning, and social qualities which are seldom met with to-day, had thrown on the general commissionership of Canada a glow of which it would have been deprived under ordinary circumstances.
> The powers that be have never done anything to surround their representative in Paris with the necessary prestige and provide him with the means required to show up Canada in the right light and to develop in an effective and systematic way our relations with France.
> It is not a difficult matter to find Canadians capable of representing us worthily. The general commissionership in Paris does not require exceptional qualities; but it is organized in such a manner, its present make-up is so different from what one might expect, that while the post is too important a one to be intrusted to a mere plodding official, it would not be suitable to a man having the ability and the standing expected in one eligible to succeed Mr. Fabre. In brief, heretofore the position has not implied the authority, has not ensured that independence, or that rate of remuneration, or provided the help required towards the fulfilment of its object.

The Dominion government would be meeting the wishes of all the French Canadians and I might say of all Canadians by providing for the maintenance in Paris of a representation worthy of Canada and worthy of France. At the same time it would be the most effective manner in which immigration from France might be fostered.

Mr. C. A. GAUVREAU (Témiscouata). (Translation.) If my hon. friend the member for l'Islet will allow, should he not, in fairness for Mr René Dupont, have added that, following on the publication of the statistics referred to by the hon. member, and seeing that some people were endeavouring to make political capital out of this announcement, Mr. Dupont wrote to the papers in the province of Quebec a letter of explanation, in which he stated that a number of the so-called emigrants were people who had gone to the States, not with the idea of residing there permanently, but to visit relatives or work there for a few months, having the firm resolve of coming back to the province of Quebec? It seems to me that any one mentioning his report should also mention that explanatory letter which Mr. Dupont sent to the papers.

Mr. PAQUET (Translation.). In the constituency which I have the honour to represent, I went to the pains of inquiring from the very people who had furnished that information to Mr. Dupont, and they stated they had mentioned only such as had left for the States with the intention of staying away several years to say the least.

As regards the remark made by my hon. friend on the other side, I may say that Mr. Dupont himself acknowledged that his report was incomplete and that he contemplated continuing and completing his work. That is the reason which prompted me to request that the hon. Minister of the Interior should include in his next annual report, not only the reports of our agents in the British Isles, France and Belgium, but also such as would be forwarded by immigration agents in the New England states and the neighbouring republic generally, as well as the reports of the various heads of our colonization societies. Such a request appears to me to be perfectly justified.

Hon. R. LEMIEUX (Gaspé) (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to the remarks just made by the hon. gentleman from L'Islet. I must congratulate him on the spirit of fairness and moderation evidenced by the manner in which he addressed the committee. He referred to the regulations which were revised last year by the hon. Minister of the Interior in respect to immigrants who come here from the old country. He stated correctly that these regulations had been made stricter and that as a result the moral character of late arrivals was more satisfactory than in former years. As a matter of fact, even a cursory acquaintance with the course of immigration in Canada, within the last few years especially, will satisfy one as to this: while during a period of fifteen or twenty years we may at times have shown too much leniency toward immigrants entering Canada, for the last five or six years, and more particularly within the last two years we have made the regulations such that to-day we can flatter ourselves with having an immigration practically above reproach.

I shall recall to my hon. friend clauses 40 and 41 of the regulations concerning immigration, and he will aver that under these two clauses and subsection 2 of clause 42, the minister is vested with full powers, that is with unrestricted autocratic powers as regards the deportation of immigrants branded as undesirable.

There is no doubt that Canada leads among the countries of the world in looking after immigrants with a view to retaining only the best. It is almost out of the question for an immigrant with some criminal offence chargeable against him or some dark spot in his record to get into Canada, considering that very stringent regulations await him on arrival. I was happy to gather from what my hon. friend said that he gave credit to the government for having done their duty in that respect.

I shall now pass to another point raised by the hon. gentleman. He called the attention of the House to the exit of Canadian emigrants to the New England states. He will agree with me, I think, that in the course of the last fifteen years we have succeeded in checking that exit. He will admit that fifteen or twenty years ago our rural communities were rapidly being depopulated. At the time I travelled through the province of Quebec and I know well that in certain back settlements, and even in the streets of extensive villages, abandoned houses could be pointed to, and they made up one quarter, if not one half of the total, their occupiers having left for the United States. But to-day, thank God, when our fellow citizens leave the province of Quebec, it is to settle on the fertile western plains, in Manitoba, Alberta, Saskatchewan, and even in British Columbia and the Yukon. Only a very small minority, indeed, take to the New England states. They go to work there during the winter months, but they return in the spring to work the land. They still retain a sweet remembrance of home.

Of course my hon. friend is well aware that since the building of the Transcontinental has been started, new parishes have been established in the counties of L'Islet, Temiscouata and others on the south shore, new industries spring up at every point where our French Canadian fellow citizens are called upon to play a leading part.

As regards the work of repatriation, the reports of our agents and the statistics supplied by them do not appear in the annual report of the Department of the Interior, but I shall draw the minister's attention to the wish expressed by the member for L'Islet, and no doubt such information will henceforth be included in that report.

The following is a list of the agents who are appointed especially to look after the French Canadian communities of New England and some of the near-by western states:

Bérubé, Rév. A. P., Vonda, Sask.
Carbonneau, J. B., Biddeford, Me.
Caron, Rév. I., Montreal, Que.
DesRosiers, Nap., Rockland, Ont.
Dupont, René, Quebec.
Gauthier, Rev. E. E., Saint-Alphonse, Chicoutimi, Qué.
Gingras, Elzéar, Providence, R.-I.
Gravel, Rev. L. P., Moosejaw, Sask.
Laurier, C. A., Marquette, Mich.
Laurier, Romuald, Saginaw, Michigan.

Ouellette, Rev. J. A., Montreal, Que.
Robillard, J. E., Lanoraie, Que.

That is a goodly number of agents who for some years past have been doing some excellent work in New England. It is only fair that the reports transmitted by these agents be included in the minister's yearly report.

As regards the grants paid by the department to various colonization societies, the following is a list of the amounts expended in the province of Quebec.

Quebec and Lake St. John, $8,000.

Société d'colonization de Montreal, $4,000.

Société d'immigration de la Vallée d'Ottawa, $2,500.

L'Union nationale française de Montreal, $1,000.

My hon. friend referred briefly to the immigration from France. I concur in the eulogies he bestowed on the work, the zeal, the high intelligence of the late Hector Fabre, whose decease occurred in September last. He was at the time, and had been for a number of years our agent in Paris. We may find a successor for him, but nobody will be found capable of replacing him in every respect. He was a man who, not only in Canada, but in France as well, was held in the highest esteem, a first rate writer, who more than any one else revealed Canada to Old France. Unfortunately he was getting old and his salary did not allow of his advertising Canada on a grand scale, at a time when it was still practicable to do so.

My hon. friend should bear in mind that during the last decade French immigration to Canada has considerably increased. I remember the time when the sight of a French settler coming to Canada had something of the miracle about it. Of course there existed in the Northwest a few small settlements of Frenchmen and Belgians, here and there, but it was an unusual thing. Our trade intercourse with France amounted to very little and we had not yet succeeded in maintaining a line of steamships plying between Havre and Quebec.

Now what do we find in going through the statistics since 1901? The following figures have been supplied to me for France and Belgium respectively by the Department of the Interior:

FRANCE.

	Immigrants.
1901	360
1902	431
1903	937

1907	1,314
1908	2,671
1909	1,830
1910	1,727
Total	14,195

BELGIUM.

	Immigrants.
1901	132
1902	223
1903	303
1904	858
1905	796
1906	1,106
1907	650
1908	1,214
1909	828
1910	910
Total	7,020

It seems to me almost incredible that we should have succeeded in developing French immigration to such an extent in the space of so short a period, and I shall explain why I take that view.

I have made a special study of that question, not only in books, but on the spot, in France, as well as of the means the Canadian government had at their disposal. The problem appealed to me, not only as a Canadian, but as a French Canadian, still remindful of his lineage. I considered that we had a right to our share in that great flow of immigration which is pouring from year to year over this continent of ours. I went to headquarters for my information, and I say to my hon. friend, with the hope that my voice will be heard throughout the province of Quebec, that the directing of a continuous and powerful stream of immigration from France to Canada is practically an impossibility. In the first place, it is admitted that the population of France is decreasing year by year. That is a sad circumstance for our old mother country, but it is the exact truth. In the second place, France is under a regime of compulsory military service; and for these two reasons the French government not only dislikes the idea of Frenchmen emigrating to foreign lands, but frowns on any scheme for recruiting immigrants. Two years ago, I was in Paris shortly after the hon. Mr. Fabre, who was already a sick man at the time, had got communication of a circular sent out from the Department of the Interior in France to prefects, prohibiting all endeavours towards recruiting emigrants for Canada. The French government complained to the British embassy that, notwithstanding regulations to the contrary, our agents in France persisted in carrying on their work. The French government took exception to certain clergymen appointed by the Canadian government travelling through the country with a view to inducing peasants to emigrate to Canada.

They complain also of the activity of our agents who encourage school teachers to promote emigration to this country. The French Minister of the Interior called the attention of our ambassador to this matter which he called a grave irregularity. I thereupon called on the Prime Minister Mr. Briand, whom I had the honour of meeting a few days previously at the Chamber of Deputies and explained to him that our agents did not intend to organize a propaganda, but merely desired to convey to those peasants who desired to emigrate, information which might decide them in favour of Canada. I also left in Mr. Briand's hands a memorandum explaining the nature of instructions given to our agents, and he promised to look into the matter carefully with a view to a future conference.

Some few months ago, I was again in Paris, and in order to make it clear to the committee that it is impossible to us to undertake any propaganda in France, I will state that another circular was placed in my hands, it having been, this time, delivered to our commissioner through the channel of the British Embassy. I carefully read that circular; it confirms the opinion just now expressed by me that the government will not permit any kind of emigration propaganda on the part of Canada or of any other coutnry.

Mr. PAQUET (Translation.) Had that circular been altered?

Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX (Translation.) It has not been altered. In fact the action of our agents is practically paralyzed, as any efforts in that direction might expose them to a fine and even to deportation.

Another fact must not be forgotten when we are discussing French emigration. How can France encourage her citizens to settle in foreign countries, when her own colonies scarcely receive a sufficient number of French immigrants to counterbalance the foreign element? I read the other day an interesting article published in 'La Revue des Deux Mondes'; it may enlighten my hon. friend from L'Islet.

In that article of 'La Revue des Deux Mondes,' the writer recalled the fact, that in Tunis, a French colony whose climate is similar to that of the South of France and only a few hours distant from Marseilles, the French population is in a proportion of 25 per cent, while the Italian element represents 75 per cent; I mean, of course, of the white population, not the native. France being unable to people Tunis, her most valuable colony, how can she encourage her citizens to settle in Canada or in America?

Of course, with due exercise of tact and discretion, our agents in France may be able to direct towards Canada those Frenchmen who have in any case decided to come to America. But as to supposing that any large number of such emigrants may be obtained, that would be an illusion. We may consider ourselves lucky to have been able during the last decade, to increase so materially the figures of French immigration; but once again I say let us not count upon any large increase. As to Belgium, the case is different. The Belgium government is less opposed to an emigration propaganda, yet it must be carried on with due discretion. Besides we must not forget that Belgium is an exceedingly wealthy country and that from such countries emigration is usually limited. Nevertheless, thanks to the Minister of Agriculture, our pavillion at Brussels was the central point of attraction at the last World's Fair. Hundreds of thousands of Belgians have been able to read and study our circulars, atlases and folders published both in French and Flemish describing the wealth and beauty of this land. I am convinced that in consequence of that exhibit, several thousands of Belgian colonists will settle here. It is easier to carry on a propaganda by means of these exhibitions than by agents. Besides such agents are excluded not from France and Belgium merely but from every important country in Europe. In the United Kingdom alone complete liberty of canvass is allowed. In Germany and Russia emigration propaganda is forbidden. Two or three years ago a Russian officer who was quite familiar with conditions obtaining in Germany and Russia, informed me that he could secure for us several thousands of excellent immigrants, I introduced him to the Minister of the Interior who was quite willing to authorize his work in Lithuania, provided he first obtained permission from the Russian and German governments to carry on the work. The officer consulted the Russian and German consuls, and both informed him that their respective governments would forbid anything of this kind. All this tends to establish that it is quite impossible to undertake any such propaganda in violation of the precise instructions given by the authorities either to the prefects or to the governors of provinces. England alone gives us a free hand.

My hon. friend has expressed some fear as to the future of our country. He believes that we are being invaded by Americans and he considers that there is danger of a change in the mental trend of the Canadian people. In my opinion that is a mistake, and the fears expressed by my hon. friend are groundless.

Mr. PAQUET (Translation.) I quoted those words from certain statesmen who feared such a result, but I said that, for my part, I did not believe that the proposed commercial agreement would interfere with our attachment to the mother land.

Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX (Translation.) I agree with my hon. friend. Evidently I had misunderstood him. But I frequently hear it said when I go to Europe and especially to England, that Canada in receiving such a large number of Americans will finish by becoming Americanized and losing her distinct nationality. Invariably I reply to those who express such fears in my presence that they are quite mistaken. It is not so much the true Americans that come to Canada as Germans, Scandinavians and even Canadians who had emigrated to the United States.

Mr. BELAND (Translation.) French?

Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX. (Translation.) Yes, even French Canadians returning to this country. Look over the names of the new so-called American settlers, and you will find that they are not American 'Yankee' names, but those of different European countries. These settlers are fresh arrivals from Europe who have heard that beyond the American frontier, in the western provinces, there are better lands, and that our laws are wiser and more equitable than American laws. Thus it happens that after a few months or perhaps a few year's sojourn in the United States, they cross the line and settle amongst us. The American 'Yankee' colonist is becoming more and more rare. The great adjoining states of Dakota, Minnesota, &c., do not contain a 'Yankee' population; they are peopled by Germans, Scandinavians and other later arrivals. It must not be forgotten that the great majority of our so-called American colonists come from these states.

Mr. Speaker, I was pleased to hear the remarks made by my hon. friend and to find that they were framed not in a hostile spirit but rather with a view to obtaining information on the immigration movement in our country. Will he allow me to state that I have frequently had occasion to confer with the Minister of the Interior concerning the interests of our fellow-countrymen either in matters of repatriation or of French or Belgian immigration. My observations were invariably well received by the minister and I am pleased to be able to add that those members of the clergy who are interested in the grave problem of immigration, have every reason to be satisfied with the treatment they have received from him.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). I have here a return which shows salary and expenses paid to Miss Cameron as different from those given in evidence by Mr. Scott. This return shows that Miss Cameron was appointed on the 20th January, 1910, at $250 a month. In Mr. Scott's evidence, it appears as $200 a month; and the expenses are given as $1,770, against $2,500 in the evidence furnished by Mr. Scott to the committee. I would like the minister to explain that if he can; and also to state what Miss Cameron's duties are.

Mr. OLIVER. I cannot give a satisfactory explanation of the discrepancy offhand. I ask my hon. friend to give me an opportunity to go into the accounts and see on which side the error is. Although Miss Cameron's salary appears in the list of salaries of farm delegates, she is not a farm delegate. The farm delegate is a practical, successful farmer, if possible, of British birth, who is sent, if possible, to the part of the country from which he came. He is not expected or required to be a man of many words, but he is expected and required to be a man of material success, so that when he goes to the place of his birth in the old country and meets his friends, and they ask him what he has done, he will have something to tell them—not what he thinks, or has heard, or believes, or supposes, but what he has done in the way of material success. He is in himself an example to the old countryman of what may be achieved in Canada. For these reasons we do not look for men who have any particular ability in speaking, lecturing or making an appearance before the public. But it is necessary to have also lecturers, people who have the ability to interest audiences by delivering addresses. Miss Cameron has a reputation as a lecturer and also a writer. She is a native-born Canadian, a native of British Columbia, has travelled a great deal in Canada, and has had a great deal of experience both as a writer and as a lecturer. We did not think we were making a mistake—and we do not think so now—in retaining her services at the price paid. We could not expect to retain the services of an experienced writer and lecturer at the same rate as a farmer who had no such experience and qualifications.

Mr. BARKER. Was Miss Cameron a farmer?

Mr. OLIVER. I have just explained that she is a lecturer, a lady of Canadian birth who has travelled a great deal in Canada and knows a great deal of the various provinces, and also has the ability to tell what she has seen and what she knows in such a manner as to be interesting to the listener.

Mr. BARKER. I understood the hon. minister to say that he would not employ a man who had not practical experience as a farmer and knew what he was talking about. Is there any reason why he should employ Miss Cameron, who is neither a man nor a farmer?

Mr. OLIVER. I tried to say that we employed men who are not farmers; we employ them as lecturers. We do not employ a farmer necessarily as a lecturer, but we do employ men who are lecturers whether farmers or not. So, we employ this lady as a lecturer and not as a farmer; and we pay her the salary of a lecturer, and not the salary of a farmer.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). The minister told us a great deal about the number brought to this country. Would he tell us how many farm labourers and female domestics were brought out?

Mr. OLIVER. The farmers, and farm labourers who arrived in 1909-10—

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). I have that. I understood the figures he gave us of immigrants related to the year which expires at the end of this month.

Mr. OLIVER. I gave the actual figures for nine months of this year, and also the estimated figures for the whole year.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). Can you give the number of farmers and farm labourers for the nine months?

Mr. OLIVER. I have not that before me in a form to give it to my hon. friend.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). I suppose that will come out in the annual report?

Mr. OLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). Does the minister think there are more of these classes this year than last?

Mr. OLIVER. Judging from the information I gave the committee this afternoon, regarding the arrivals by one steamship, I would say, 'Yes,' beyond any question.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). Largely?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, I would say a very considerable percentage more of farmers, farm labourers and domestic servants than in any previous year. That is the impression that has been created in the minds of the newspaper people who have seen the immigrants that have arrived this year —that they are much more largely of these classes than in any previous year. We have been bending our energies, as I have already said, entirely to securing that class of immigrant, and we believe that our efforts are bearing fruit in the increase of these classes which come to us year by year. The hon. member (Mr. Wilson, Lennox) will remember that it is only a few years since we undertook this policy. Before that time, ours was a general or indiscriminate policy of immigration. It takes some time before we get full results.

Mr. WILSON. We got something like 18,000 last year, including children. I do not know why the government pay a bonus of ten shillings on a child, who is neither a farmer, a farm labourer nor a domestic servant. And last year the government paid for bonuses, besides expenses, $86,000. It does seem to me that there is an opportunity to look into this matter and cut off the payments to these gentlemen to whom you are giving pleasure.

Mr. OLIVER. I feel very strongly on the point that the money that Canada pays to induce immigration should be paid with particular attention to getting the kind of people we want and need in the country.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). Nobody objects to that.

Mr. OLIVER. In regard to the farm delegates, of whom my hon. friend seems to think so little, he is only one means of trying to reach the actual farmer. Now, I cannot think of any way that is more likely to reach the actual farmer in the old country than sending the actual farmer in Canada to meet him. If the experience of the successful farmer in Canada will not appeal to the successful farmer in the old country—who is a man we want—I do not know any argument that will. The old country farmer, as every one knows, is very conservative in his ideas—very slow to move—he would not be half so good a man as he is if he could be moved easily. It will take time to get a movement amongst these people; but we believe we have taken the right course and that we are starting the movement. It is well known that English and Scotch farmers are the best farmers in the world, and this country needs as many of these people as we can get. And I can conceive of no better way to reach the old country farmer than by sending the successful Canadian farmer to tell him what he has been doing.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). I moved for a return of the reports of these farm delegates. I am sorry to say that in the whole return there was not a single report from one of them. Mr. Walker wrote a little letter about one, some man had given some lectures, another man interviewed a number of people and they expected great results. If we could get returns from these gentlemen to show what they are doing for the money they get it would be of some use. I have not for some years moved for that because the last time I moved for it it was so unsatisfactory I did not think it was worth while.

Mr. BARKER. I listened to what the minister said. I am not a farmer, but I understand the hon. gentleman to argue that the old country farmer is a very conservative individual and hard to move or convince. The minister's theory is that the best way to convince the old country farmer is to send to him a man whom he does not know, a Canadian farmer. I would think the best way to convince the old country farmer would be to get some trustworthy people from there to come here and see what our farming means. Such a man would be far more likely to influence him than the paid employee of this government, and the last person who would be likely to influence such a conservative old country farmer would be a young lady like this Miss Cameron to whom the minister pays a handsome salary, and who delivers lectures on farming in Canada. To suppose that she can convince the doubtful farmer is nonsense.

Mr. HENDERSON. The minister told us that the English and Scotch farmers were the best in the world. I am not prepared to combat that argument with any evidence, but I am surprised to learn that these old country farmers can succeed any better in Canada than our Canadian farmers. I wish the minister would go over and watch the operations of these men and then I fancy he would not make such an invidious comparison as he has made with reference to our Canadian farmers. I would like to know what the minister has done to dissipate the idea prevalent in the old country that this country is so cold and that our people have to work so hard. Do the lectures delivered there give any evidence of the temperature? From my experience in talking with men in Scotland I would think something of that kind was necessary. I was able to tell them that while our temperature may not be as moderately warm as theirs, still we have sunshine which I think makes up for the degree of leisure that they have in the old country. My impression is that the man who gets along here in farming has to work pretty hard. It was a surprise to me to find that the minister was sending farmers from this country who are not as good farmers as those in the old land to instruct them what to do. The minister will have to get a better class of men than the Canadian farmers to instruct these people, if he still adheres to the idea that the Scotch or English farmer is better than the Canadian.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). Would the minister inform me how many agents there are in Canada, and the names and salaries of the agents in Great Britain and foreign countries?

Mr. OLIVER. The number employed in the outside service in general immigration work in Canada outside of Ottawa is 178. There are 190 boundary inspectors, including the customs officers, who receive only $100 a year each. Then there are 52 officials employed in the United States, 42 in Great Britain, and nine on the continent. There are 471 altogether. The assistant superintendent in England is J. Obed Smith; in Belgium, the agent is D. T. de Coeli, and in France, Paul Wiallard.

Mr. ARTHURS. Are there any efforts being made to bring immigrants into the unsettled portions of Ontario? The House has been told at different times that we have a large area of clay belt along the Grand Trunk Pacific, and also along the line of the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario. I have seen several publications of the department describing portions of Ontario, but I have not seen anything describing the unsettled portions of the northern part of Ontario.

Mr. BARKER.

Mr. OLIVER. So far the government has not taken up the question of colonization in northern Ontario. We have, however taken an interest in the colonization of what might be called far western Ontario. We have an agent at Port Arthur, who looks after the Rainy River country, and who has been employed there for seven or eight years. We have not taken up the question of the settlement of northern Ontario for the reason that until the Grand Trunk Pacific is in operation, the clay belt which has been spoken of so much is not available for settlement. There is land along the line of the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario railway between North Bay and Cochrane, but I do not know that the field for settlement there is sufficiently desirable to warrant the government in making any special effort. But as soon as the clay belt is made available by the construction of the Transcontinental and its operation, no doubt the government will be ready to take up the question of directing colonization into that part of the country.

Mr. ARTHURS. I think the minister is mistaken as to the clay belt. A week or two ago thirteen car-loads of machinery from one of the agricultural works were delivered at one of the stations in this clay belt on the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario railway. There is a large settlement, outside entirely of the portion covered by the Grand Trunk Pacific. I think it would be a wise thing for the minister to make some effort to settle up this country. It is very suitable for cultivation.

Mr. MAGRATH. The minister stated that there were 190 inspectors along the boundary; would he say how many there were exclusive of the customs officers?

Mr. OLIVER. Sixty-nine.

Contingencies in Canada, British and foreign agencies, and general immigration expenses, $700,000.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). Would the minister tell us how this money is to be expended?

Mr. OLIVER. Advertising, printing, atlases, pamphlets, &c., $210,000. This is to meet the expenses for general advertising, printing of pamphlets and atlases, copies of papers, &c., in Canada, United States, Great Britain and the continent of Europe. The expenditure for this service for the fiscal year 1909-10 was $214,561.25, and for the six months ended September 30, 1910, $117,815.87.

King's Printer's accounts for printing of stationery, $17,000. This is to pay for books, forms, envelopes and general stationery supplies to head office and agencies in Canada and United States. The expenditure for this service during the fiscal year 1909-10 was $23,823.65, and for the six months ended September 30, 1910, $18,957.88.

Postage on literature, &c., at head office, $6,000. This is to meet the expenditure for postage on literature and immigration letters mailed at Ottawa to points outside of Canada. The expenditure for the fiscal year 1909-10 was $10,377.44, and for the six months ended September 30, 1910, $2,273.29.

Contingencies and general expenses in Canada, $20,000. This is to meet the travelling expenses of head office officials; the expenses of officials in connection with the inspection of British immigrant children; the expenses of officials superintending the location of farm help and domestic servants, and for general miscellaneous expenses at head office and in Canada. The expenditure for the fiscal year 1909-10 was $30,855.45, and for the six months ended September 30, 1910, $5,140.36.

Seaport expenses at Halifax, St. John, Sydney, Quebec, Montreal, Victoria, Vancouver and Prince Rupert, $20,000. This is to provide for the general expenses of the port officers and officials, covering expenses of meeting boats and trains, temporary assistance, uniforms, maintenance of immigration halls and general office expenses. The expenditure for the fiscal year 1909-10 was $17,641.25, and for the six months ended September 30, 1910, $13,200.84.

Commissions for locating farm help and domestic servants, $4,000. This is to pay for commissions to agents appointed in Ontario and Quebec for placing farm labourers and domestic servants at the rate of $2 for each person so placed.

The expenditure for 1909-10 was $3,923.50, and for the six months ended September 30, 1910, $2,542.60.

General expenses of officials in connection with deportation of undesirable immigrants, $15,000. This is to provide for the travelling and living expenses of officials accompanying persons deported, and also for expenses of deportees. Whenever such expenses are borne by a transportation company a refund of same is obtained from the company. The following officials are employed in connection with this service: R. Boston, P. Devlin, R. Dow, A. Blanchet, C. Choquette, Mrs. M. Killeen and Mrs. E. Tasse. The expenditure for 1909-10 was $15,905.91, and for the six months ended September 30, 1910, $6,201.15.

Telegrams, telephones, freight and express charges at head office, $7,000. The expenditure for these services for the fiscal year 1909-10 was $8,797.15, and for the six months ended September 30, 1910, $3,242.57.

Medical services and supplies $3,000. This is to meet the expenditure for treatment of immigrants at the various immigration halls at the eastern and western ports and at Winnipeg. The expenditure for 1909-10 was $869.24, and for the six months ended September 30, 1910, $1,588.50.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. What was the last statement—treating patients?

Mr. OLIVER. Treating immigrants at various immigration halls.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Outside of Winnipeg?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. At Winnipeg they have a regular physician paid a salary?

Mr. OLIVER. There is a special vote for Winnipeg which goes to the hospital and the hospital attends to the treatment of the immigrants.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I understand that, but have you not a physician in Winnipeg paid a salary to treat immigrants?

Mr. OLIVER. There is a salaried physician at the immigration hall.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Why should there be extra treatment in Winnipeg?

Mr. OLIVER. There formerly was a hospital in connection with the hall, but we found it was better and more economical to arrange with the hospitals to treat patients and so the medical man has simply to diagnose the cases.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. The next item covers that?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Then what is this amount for treating patients?

Mr. OLIVER. It is at places outside of Winnipeg.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. And does not touch anything in Winnipeg?

Mr. OLIVER. No.

Customs duty, $1,000.

This is to provide for customs duty and customs brokers fees' on literature, maps, pamphlets, &c.

Boundary inspection expenses $20,000.

This is to cover the expenses of officials employed along the boundary between Canada and the United States for the inspection of immigrants entering Canada. The expenditure during 1909-10 was $59,364.70 (including salaries, which are charged to the salaries vote) and for the six months ended September, 1910, $5,688.87.

Detention hospitals: Halifax, St. John, Quebec, Montreal and Victoria, $10,000.

This is to provide for the equipment and maintenance of the hospitals above named; for the treatment of immigrants who have contracted some minor contagious disease on ship board, and detention of those not receiving treatment. For every immigrant treated, the rate of $1.25 per day is charged and 50 cents per day for those not under treatment. No charge is made for infants under one year. All the amounts earned at the above rates are collected from the steamship companies who brought the immigrants to Canada.

Farmer delegates, $35,000.

This is to cover the salaries and expenses of delegates sent to the old country in the interest of immigration. The men so engaged are all practical and successful farmers. The expenses during 1909-10 were $36,076.57.

Locating settlers in the west, $65,000.

This amount is to cover the expenditure to be made by the commissioner of immigration at Winnipeg, for locating settlers in the west. The bulk of this expenditure is comprised of:

Salaries and expenses of interpreters, land guides, temporary agents and clerks, caretakers, &c.; of contingencies of the Winnipeg and other agencies in the west, including postage, telephones, telegrams, advertising, provisions, and supplies for needy immigrants, homesteaders, equipment, maintenance of halls, uniforms and travelling expenses of officials.

The expenditure for 1910 was $59,766.30 and for six months ended 30th September, 1910, $29,483.36.

Collection of exhibits, $20,000.

This is to cover expenditure in connection with the purchase of fine specimens of fruit, grain and vegetables grown in Canada, to be used as exhibits in the offices of our agents; at fairs in United States; in the offices of our agents and on motor cars in Great Britain. This is thought to be one of the best means of advertising Canada and experience has proved that the sight of those fine exhibits has influenced many to settle in this country. The expenditure for 1909-10 was $23,429.13 and for six months ended 30th September, 1910, $2,449.76.

Contingencies and general expenses in the United States, $60,000.

This is to provide for the travelling expenses of our agents and their living expenses while travelling, especially while attending at fairs; for rent of offices, temporary assistance, telegrams, telephones, postage, office furniture and general expenses of the various offices in the United States. The expenditure for 1909-10 was $64,319.06, and for six months ended 30th September, 1910, $33,922.59.

Commissions on settlers from United States, $9,000.

This is to provide for the payment of commissions to local agents employed in the United States who issue settlers' certificates which entitle the holders to transportation at a reduced rate of one cent per mile over the Canadian Pacific railway, Grand Trunk Pacific and Canadian Northern railways. These certificates are returned to the department by the railway companies and commissions are paid to the various agents who issue them at the following rates: $3 per male; $2 per female and $1 per child under 18 years of age. The expenditure for 1909-10 was $3,900.75 and for six months ended September 30, 1910, $2,162.

British bonuses, $57,000.

Bonuses allowed as follows: £1 on each person 18 years of age or over and 10 shillings on those between 1 and 18 years of age. The expenditure for 1909-10 was $39,145.65 and for six months ended September 30, 1910, $47,989.17.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). That does not correspond with the evidence given by Mr. Scott. The bonus paid agents in Great Britain and Ireland last year amounted to $86,000, according to Mr. Scott's evidence.

Mr. OLIVER. The statement I have quoted is $39,145.65 for 1909-10 and we are asking for $57,000 for this year because they expect a larger immigration of that class of people.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). Is that the amount of money you paid to agents at the rate of $5 per head for adults and 10 shillings for children?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). Well, the statement is certainly greatly at variance with that made by Mr. Scott. There were about 18,000 people that the bonus was earned on last year.

Mr. OLIVER. The number of people does not give you the amount, because some would be children and some adults. I have a copy of Mr. Scott's statement here, and I will turn it up in a moment. My statement here is that the expenditure for 1909-10 was $39,145.65 and for the six months ended September 30, 1910, $47,989.17.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. That is bonus?

Mr. OLIVER. Bonus actually paid.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. For farmers, farm labourers and domestics?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, and we are asking for the same service for the coming year $57,000.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Is it not so that quite a number of these men who have come out and upon whom the bonuses have been paid, as farm labourers, have gone to work on railways?

Mr. OLIVER. It is quite possible.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. That would hardly be the proper designation for them would it?

Mr. OLIVER. No, it would not, but in so far as we are aware, the payment is only made on those who go into domestic service or farm labour. If we find that a man upon whom the bonus is claimed, has gone to railway work, and not farm labour, we do not pay the bonus, or if we have paid the bonus already, we deduct it from the next claim made by that agent.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). How long does it run for?

Mr. BARKER. How many cases have they found where a farm labourer was really a railway workman going to work upon a contract, and how much was deducted on that account?

Mr. OLIVER. It would be impossible to answer that offhand without having an opportunity to get the details in the department.

Mr. BARKER. Are there any such cases?

Mr. OLIVER. Certainly there are.

Mr. BARKER. You found that a number brought out ostensibly as settlers have been really brought out to work on railways?

Mr. OLIVER. No, but they have gone to work upon railways.

Mr. BARKER. I have looked into the matter, and I am quite sure that a large number of these have never done anything else, but work upon the railways and I have reason to believe that as soon as they finished working upon the railways they went back again. If the hon. gentleman says that his department has investigated and deducted the money in such cases or had it refunded, I will be willing to take his word in the meantime.

Mr. OLIVER. I can give my hon. friend absolute assurance as to that.

Mr. BLAIN. The statistics show that from July 1, 1900, to March 31, 1910, 497,390 immigrants came from the United States direct. Of course, a considerable number of these might come through the United States from foreign countries and not be United States citizens at all. Is there any information which tells what nationality these people belong to?

Mr. OLIVER. We take account of the different nationalities of the people who come from the United States, but we have never published it. We have given the United States credit for all those who come from the United States.

Mr. BLAIN. What proportion were born in the United States, and are really United States citizens?

Mr. OLIVER. We have the statistics as to that, but we have not compiled them, although the officer of the department makes a guess that possibly 50 per cent of them would be born in the United States.

Mr. BLAIN. It is misleading to publish that this large number came from the United States when in reality only about half of them are United States citizens.

Mr. OLIVER. Oh, the large majority of them are United States citizens naturalized but a considerable proportion were not born in the United States. If it is thought desirable to compile the figures it could be done.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). In the United States returns they give the nationalities of those who went over to the United States from Canada.

Mr. BARKER. It is important that we should know the origin of these people who come from the United States. For example the Doukhobor and the Norwegian stand on a very different basis, and it is well to know whether out of 100 people who come from the United States we are getting one Norwegian and 99 Doukhobors or the reverse.

Mr. OLIVER. Heretofore it was not considered of sufficient interest to compile that information, but it might be done.

Mr. BARKER. I suppose there is no better settler than the Scandinavian, and other people of northern continental Europe, while there is a prejudice against some other nationalities, and it is desirable we should know whether we are getting what we consider the desirable class or the objectionable class.

Mr. OLIVER. As a matter of fact the immigration that has come from the United States into western Canada has been chiefly or I might say entirely of the desirable class.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. They are mostly Anglo-Saxons.

Mr. OLIVER. Or Scandinavian or German. We have an exclusion service now along the frontier which comes in contact with the undesirable class to such an extent that last year we rejected at boundary points over 14,000. But we have not up to the present time considered it important because the people coming to settle on the land were of the desirable class.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). Will you try after this to keep track of those who leave the country as well as those who come in?

Mr. OLIVER. If it is considered necessary, we will do so, but it would add very considerably to the expense, and I do not know that the information would compensate us for doing so.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). Will the minister tell us how Lord Strathcona collected the information that 46,000 returned to the old country of the 113,000 sent out? That statement is on page 65 of the report.

Mr. OLIVER. The figures were, I presume, secured by Lord Strathcona from the British Board of Trade, which takes account of all the people going and coming from and to British ports.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). How do the Americans get their figures?

Mr. OLIVER. They simply keep a sufficiently large staff to enable them to collect these statistics.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). If you are going into partnership with them on reciprocity, perhaps it would be as well to do so in regard to these statistics. I want to refer to the bonuses. According to Mr. Scott's evidence, we paid bonuses in 1909-10 on 9,813 men, 6,015 women and 2,840 children. If you multiply the number of the men and women by five and the number of children by half that, you will get the same amount of the bonuses paid. I make it $86,240.

Mr. OLIVER. My figures, which are the figures which my hon. friend read, make the amount £17,248 for the calendar year 1910.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). How are we to know about these matters? The minister gives us the calendar year at one time and the fiscal year at another.

Mr. OLIVER. We are trying to give both. There is a bonus on British children of $4,000. These are children taken care of by British philanthropic societies, which under a special arrangement are paid a bonus of $2 for each child under eighteen years of age sent to the distributing homes in Canada. No bonus is paid on infants under one year of age or on children from penitentiaries, reformatories or prisons. The expenditure for 1909-10 was $2,629.99, and for six months ended September 30, 1910, $1,702.02.

Continental bonuses, $10,000.

A bonus of £1 0s. 0d. is paid on adults and ten shillings on children between one and eighteen years of age, as per regulations. The expenditure for 1909-10 was $6,584.61 and for the six months ended September 30, 1910, $5,504.19.

Mr. OLIVER.

Contingencies and general expenses in Great Britain and Ireland, including the London office, $55,000.

This is to meet the expenditure of the London office and of our agents; for rent of offices, taxes, light, postage, telegrams, furniture, temporary assistance, expenses re motor and exhibition wagons, &c. The expenditure for 1909-10 was $55,073.42 (including salaries), and for the six months ended September, 1910, $21,048.29.

Contingencies and general expenses on continent, $7,000.

This is to cover the expenditure in connection with our offices in France and Belgium, including rent, postage, telegrams, stationery, printing, living and travelling expenses, &c. The expenditure for 1909-10 was $12,009.44 (including salaries and for six months ended September, 1910, $1,062.48 (excluding salaries).

Grants to hospitals in the west (not including Winnipeg and St. Boniface), $4,000.

This is to pay for the difference between the provincial government's grant of 50 cents per day in Alberta and Saskatchewan and 25 cents per day in Manitoba for each patient, less whatever may be collected from the immigrants, and $1 per day which is charged by the hospitals on every destitute bona fide immigrant who is treated before he has been one year in Canada. The following hospitals are granted the allowance above stated: The Calgary, Edmonton, Medicine Hat, Regina, Prince Albert, Brandon and Holy Cross, and the Margaret Scott Nursing Mission. The expenditure for 1909-10 was $2,106.13, and for the six months ended September, 1910, $1,588.50.

Grant to Quebec and Lake St. John railway, $8,000.

The above grant is made in consideration of colonization work carried on by the above company in the Lake St. John district. One of the inducements offered to colonists by this railway is free transportation to every bona fide settler locating in that district. The grant is for same amount as for 1910-11.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). Do you also pay a bonus to the agent who causes these people to come?

Mr. OLIVER. We pay salaried agents in the United States to induce them to come to the Lake St. John district.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). Have you not got in that district men on commission?

Mr. OLIVER. No, this is the only local aid we give.

Province of Quebec Repatriation and Colonization Society, $4,000.

This society has been doing good work for many years in the interest of immigration in the province of Quebec and northern Ontario. The grant is the same as for 1910-11.

Ottawa Valley Immigration Aid Society, $2,500.

This society is chiefly operating in the Ottawa Valley, distributing immigration literature and pamphlets, and giving each year a series of lectures on the interests of general immigration and colonization. The grant is the same as for 1910-11.

L'Union Nationale Francaise, Montreal, $1,000.

This is in aid of the above society which has been keeping a house of refuge for quite a number of years, and which makes a special effort to receive, aid and care for French immigrants and to distribute them in various parts of Canada. The grant is the same as has been made for the last six years.

Womens' National Immigration Society, Montreal, $1,500.

This society established a home in Montreal for the purpose of giving aid and caring for female immigrants arriving in that city. The home is comfortable and attractive, and rendering valuable assistance to immigrants in procuring lodging and meals at a very low rate. The grant is the same as for former years.

Womens' Welcome Hostel, Toronto, $1,000.

This Home was incorporated in 1906 and has for its object the reception and general assistance to immigrant women. One day's board and lodgings is given free, very low rates being charged when remaining longer at the hostel. The grant is the same as for previous years.

The Girls' Home of Welcome, Winnipeg, $750.

The above home was established twelve years ago. The object of the institution is to aid and care for immigrant women and domestic servants. Under agreement with the government, female immigrants coming to the home are given one full day's free board and lodgings. This is the same grant as for the last few years.

The Calgary Womens' Hostel, $500.

The aims and objects of this hostel are similar to the Girls' Home of Welcome in Winnipeg. The grant is the same as for previous years.

Canada West Publicity Office, $5,000.

This is an organization of business men of Western Canada and United States, promoting immigration from the western states. Their mode of operation is by having special articles on immigration to western Canada published in newspapers circulated in western states, the aggregate circulation of which amounts to over thirty-four millions in the year 1909-1910. The Canadian Pacific, Grand Trunk and Canadian Northern railways each make a similar grant to this organization. The grant is the same as for 1910-11.

Salvation Army grants, $15,516.66.

This is to cover the different amounts granted to the Salvation Army to help that organization to carry on their good work in the interests of immigration, for the rent of London, (England) office, $4,866.66; advertising in the Salvation Army publications, $2,433.33; special articles in the 'Emigration Gazette', $1,216.67; allowance for distribution of immigrants and domestic servants in Canada, $7,000.

Miscellaneous and unforeseen expenses, $1,233.34.

Total contingencies and expenses for 1911-12, $700,000.

The Canada West publicity office is aided not merely by the government, but, as I have indicated, by the three great railway companies as well. This institution conducts a publicity campaign in the United States through newspapers and magazines. Instead of an ordinary advertisement, an article dealing with the publication of articles setting forth Canada's advantages is secured in different publications in the United States. It is not an ordinary advertising propaganda, but it is very useful.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. The three railways have joined in this?

Mr. OLIVER. They co-operate with the government. Each of the four organizations pays $5,000. The accounts are audited by the railway and the vouchers—that is, the articles clipped from the papers, are furnished to and audited by them.

Mr. BURRELL. What percentage of the large expenditure on advertising, lecturers and so on, is devoted to directing immigration to British Columbia? I am not sure of the position now, but a year or two ago a great many of the lecturers practically ignored the existence of British Columbia. I may tell the minister that it is exceedingly important that we should get all the immigration possible. The labour situation has been rather acute during the last two or three years, and it is getting more acute every year, especially in fruit growing districts. Many of the agents sent over to lecture on Canada have been absolutely ignorant of the conditions in British Columbia. I remember, on one occasion, when in England, I listened to a representative of Australia, who was declaiming vigorously on the advantages of immigrants going to that country rather than to Canada. He spoke of the extremely severe conditions of the Canadian winter, and said that cattle had to be kept housed up for six months of the year, and even then frequently starved to death. I asked him if he would be surprised to know that within a hundred and fifty miles of my home was a place where, to my knowledge, 12,000 head of cattle were kept by one company, and these cattle never had shelter at all. He asked me where this was, and I told him in British Columbia. His answer was: That may be in British Columbia, but not in Canada. I found a great many like that of those who should have given information about British Columbia to people anxious to obtain it, and it seems to me important that they should be familiar with the conditions beyond the Rocky mountains. I know that the minister has had one or two good men there, and has also published some pamphlets, but, I should be glad to have some assurance from the minister that his department is paying rather serious attention to our immigration needs. He knows that in British Columbia we pay a larger share per capita of the Dominion revenues than any other province, and I think that in this matter of immigration we deserve special consideration.

Mr. OLIVER. The conditions in regard to British Columbia are the same as in regard to the older provinces. That is, the attraction of free land ready for cultivation does not exist there as it does in the prairie provinces, and therefore it is not as easy to secure the attention of prospective settlers for British Columbia, Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick or Nova Scotia as for the prairie provinces.

Mr. BURRELL. I am aware of that, so far as the actual settler goes who wants to acquire land. I was thinking, however, especially of the large number of labourers on whom the minister pays a bonus and who go on the land to work but not to take up land for themselves.

Mr. OLIVER. I intended to cover that point. The main purpose of the immigration effort of the Dominion government, of course, is to bring into cultivation the vacant land of the prairie provinces. But, in doing that, we put out literature which covers the whole Dominion. I suppose that all the members of the House are aware of the atlas which was published and which covers all the provinces. The lady whose employment my hon. friend from Lennox (Mr. Wilson) has been criticising is a native of British Columbia, and has been lecturing in Great Britain last year and this year. She has strict instructions to give British Columbia the full benefit of her talents and knowledge.

Mr. BURRELL. I suppose the hon. minister is referring to Miss Agnes Deans Cameron. To what class of people would her lectures be addressed? I can understand it would be that class in Great Britain who are likely to come out with money to invest in fruit lands. But I presume that she would not direct her attention in lecturing work so much to the labouring class.

Mr. OLIVER. My hon. friend (Mr. Burrell) has the idea exactly. But, besides lecturing, Miss Cameron furnishes articles to magazines and newspapers which would be more likely to reach the people he has in mind. Besides Miss Cameron, our arrangement with the Salvation Army is with a special view to their attention to that particular side of the work that my hon. friend has mentioned, always with due consideration, of course, to the other side of the question. Our records show that British Columbia has not suffered so badly in the general effort to secure increase of population. Our statement is that in 1900 and 1901 the immigration to British Columbia of which we had knowledge was 2,600, and in 1909-10 the immigration of which we had knowledge was 30,721.

Mr. BURRELL. Of course my hon. friend would not wish to assume for a moment that that was all due to the immigration work of the Dominion department. I do not wish to minimize the work of the Dominion, but the provincial government has gone to a great deal of expense of a special kind to promote immigration. I want to impress on the minister the strong need of immigration into British Columbia to meet the serious conditions that exist there now.

Mr. OLIVER. I quite appreciate the situation and can assure my hon. friend that our department in Great Britain is co-operating with the British Columbia department in every way possible. Samples of British Columbia fruit are given display in our offices and in every way we are working in harmony with the British Columbia government. I do not wish to claim that this large movement was entirely the work of the Dominion, but I point out that the province has at least had some consideration in the flow of immigration.

Winnipeg and St. Boniface hospital, $15,000.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. How is that divided? It does not seem a large sum.

Mr. OLIVER. Accounts are rendered and checked. This sum is to provide for the treatment of immigrants who have been less than one year in the country. The hospitals charge $1 per day for each immigrant treated, one-half being paid by the Dominion and one half by the provincial government. The expenditure in 1909-10 was for the St. Boniface hospital, 3,590 days at 50 cents per day, $1,795; and for the Winnipeg General hospital, 7,288 days at 50 cents a day, $3,644, a total of $5,439.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. It seems hardly fair to make the province pay one half. Of course they pay all hospitals for all patients but it seems hardly fair to make them pay for the immigrants who have been in the province less than a year.

Mr. OLIVER. Of course it is a matter of compromise.

Mr. MAGRATH. Why is there no report of the Chief Medical Officer in the current report of the department?

Mr. OLIVER. He was in Germany at the time of the compilation of the report, and his report will appear separately.

Mr. BURRELL. The minister said that if a man had $25 it did not matter to the department where he got it, whether it was by charity or not. How does that work in the case of an immigrant helped by a charity society at home?

Mr. OLIVER. There is quite a difference between the man who borrows $25 and the man who is given his passage or assistance out. If the charitable society pays the man's passage and furnishes him with $25 that he would have on his arrival here, we would not question his entry. The exclusion of the charity aided immigrant, was made to meet the case of the charitable society furnishing an immigrant with a passage to Canada, and landing him here without means of support or employment.

Mr. BURRELL. As long as they lend him the extra $25 you accept him?

Mr. OLIVER. If he is sound physically.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I suppose we have fairly definite information as to the number of Americans who have come into Canada as settlers.

Mr. OLIVER. In the fiscal year 1909, 103,798; for the 10 months to the end of January, 1911, this fiscal year, 102,017 people who came from the United States to settle in Canada.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Have we as definite information as to how many people have gone from Canada to the United States?

Mr. OLIVER. No.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Why?

Mr. OLIVER. It would add to the expense of administration and we did not realize that there would be the serious benefit that would warrant us in going to the expense.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Then how would we know what we were gaining? There might be half as many going to the United States as came into Canada. It would be hardly business to say that we were getting 104,000 or whatever the number was, in the year, if we have half as many going from Canada back again.

Mr. OLIVER. It is a matter of judgment whether we should go to the expense or not. No doubt we could get the information, but it would cost something, and the material result would not be altered. If we have the people we have them, whether we count them or not.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. And if they have gone back we have not got them.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). I remember distinctly in the old days when the government used to keep a record of all that came in and no record of those that went out; and I also recollect when the census was taken the very comfortable position the government was in; they would not find their natural increase, and showed nothing but the immigrants that came in.

Mr. OLIVER. I think it would be a great mistake to assume that all the people who have come into the country have remained in it. I am not taking that position; I merely say that we have counted this many people coming in, and we have not taken account of the people who went out. Of course the census will tell the tale. I am afraid that those who have been building on all the people who have come into the country remaining here, will find themselves at sea.

Some resolutions reported.

On motion of Mr. Graham, House adjourned at 11.28 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, March 14, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE, MR. GOODEVE—LORD STRATHCONA.

CORRECTION OF ERRONEOUS REPORT.

Mr. A. S. GOODEVE (Kootenay). Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. On Thursday last, in the course of some remarks on the subject of the reciprocity arrangement, I quoted a statement attributed to Lord Strathcona. Yesterday, the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) read a cable despatch denying that the words quoted had been used by Lord Strathcona. I feel it due to myself to give my authority for making use of that statement. I find it on the front page of the Ottawa 'Evening Journal' of February 3, 1911, column 7. The item quoted appears under the general title 'British views,' with the sub-heading 'Canadian Press despatch.' And the date line is 'London, February 3.' The quotation I made use of is found in unrevised 'Hansard,' page 5075, and it is absolutely identical with the despatch quoted in the 'Evening Journal' of the date referred to. It is also quoted in a great many other daily papers throughout Canada. I further took the trouble to inquire of the chief editor of the 'Journal,' Mr. Wilson, who said that, while he could not vouch for the accuracy of the despatch, he could vouch for the fact that it had been published as issued by the Canadian Press Despatch Agency. I find in the volume of estimates of the current year, the year ending March 31, 1912, page 93, this statement that the said Canadian Associated Press had its subsidy increased from $3,000 to $12,000 by the legislation of last session. Taking all this into consideration, I feel that I was amply justified in regarding this despatch as authority for the quotation I made. Desiring to go further in order to be accurate, I wired the general manager of the Canadian Press Despatch Agency, Toronto, as follows:

Ottawa, March 13, 1911.

C. O. Knowles, Manager, Canadian Press Despatch, Toronto, Ont.

The following appeared in the Ottawa 'Evening Journal' of February 3, also in several other daily papers:—

Then follows a quotation word for word of the despatch to which I have referred, after which my telegram proceeds:

Is it correctly quoted? If not, what is full correct quotation as sent out by your despatch?

A. S. GOODEVE, M.P.

To that message, unfortuately, I have not yet received a reply. I simply desire to make this statement so that it may be seen on what authority I made my quotation.

Mr. FIELDING. I think it may be safely assumed that some remarks made by some other person have been wrongly attributed to Lord Strathcona. That is the most probable explanation, and it is an error which might easily occur.

WAYS AND MEANS—GRANTS TO VETERANS.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac). Mr. Speaker, before that motion is carried, I desire to bring up for a few monents' consideration a matter of which I spoke to the Minister of Militia (Sir Frederick Borden), but which, at his request, I deferred from last Friday until to-day. Some years ago, in fact, away back in 1863, a man by the name of James Thomas, then at the age of 19 years, enlisted in the imperial army. He served seven years and 178 days, and received, at his own request, his honourable discharge and the payment of the regular compensation of some £15. His discharge is dated from Halifax in April, 1871. The small sum to which I have referred, two good conduct badges and a medal are all the compensations that this gentleman received for his services. After serving under Sir Garnet Wolseley, in the corps through the Red River rebellion, in the corps of the Royal Engineers, Mr. Thomas took up his abode in the county of Frontenac, where he has resided ever since, a citizen respected by all who know him. What he and others endured in that expedition under Wolseley is well depicted in a document which is signed with Wolseley's own hand and given to Mr. Thomas at Fort Garry in 1870. As the document is not very long, and as I daresay it would be of interest to many members of the House, I beg to place it upon 'Hansard':

Fort Garry, August 28, 1870.

To the regular troops, Red River Expedition: I cannot permit Col. Fielding and you to start upon your return journey to Canada without thanking you for having enabled me to carry out the Lieut. General's orders so successfully. You have endured excessive fatigues in the performance of a service that for its arduous nature will bear comparison with any previous military expedition. In coming here from Prince Arthur's Landing, you have travelled a distance of upwards of 600 miles. Your labours commenced with those common at the outset of all campaigns, viz., roadmaking and the defensive works. Then followed the arduous duties of taking the boats up a height of 800 feet along fifty miles of river full of rapids and numerous portages. From the time you left Shebandowan lake until the time Fort Garry was reached your labours at the oars have been incessant from daybreak until dark every day. Forty-seven portages were got over entailing the unparalleled exertions of carrying the boats, guns, stores, ammunitions and provisions over a total distance of upwards of 15,000 yards. It may be said that the whole journey has been made through a wilderness where, as no supplies of any sort were to be had, everything had to be taken with you in the boats. I have throughout perceived with pleasure the manner in which the officers have helped with their men, carrying heavy loads. I fell proud to be in command of officers who so well know how to set a good example and of men who evince such eagerness to follow it. Rain has fallen upon 45 days out of 94 that have passed since we landed at Thunder Bay, and upon many occasions officers and men have been wet for days together. Yet there has not been the slightest murmur of discontent heard from any one. It may be confidently asserted that no force has ever had to endure more continuous labour, and it may as truthfully be said that no men on service have ever better behaved or more cheerful under trials arising from exposure to inclement weather, excessive fatigue and the annoyance caused by this. There has been a total absence of crime amongst your advance to Fort Garry, and I feel confident that your conduct during the return journey will be as creditable in every respect.

The leaders of the bandits who recently opposed Her Majesty's loyal subjects in the Red River settlement having fled as you advanced upon the fort, leaving their guns and a large quantity of arms and ammunition behind them, the primary object of the expedition has been peaceably accomplished, although you have not, therefore, had an opportunity of gaining glory you can carry back into the daily routine of garrison life the conviction that you have done good service to the state and have proved that no extent of intervening wilderness, no matter how great may be the difficulty whether by land or water can enable men to commit murder or to rebel against Her Majesty's authority with impunity.

(Sgd.) G. I. WOLSELEY,
Colonel.
Commanding Red River Expedition Force.

This House has given grants of lands to those who took part in the war in South Africa, and I believe that action has been generally commended in Canada. Out of the millions of acres of land that we have in Canada we have given grants to some hundreds of men who on that occasion responded to the call of their country. I make no objection whatever to that, but I say that if that recognition was reasonable and just, and I believe it was, there are reasons as weighty or more weighty why the services of those men who took part in the Red River expedition of 1870 should be recognized in a suitable way by this government. The difficulties they had to undergo on that occasion are very well set out in the document which I have read. Recognition of those few survivors of the Red River expedition should have come years ago. A few years more and recognition will be entirely impossible, because the few survivors will all be gone. To refuse their just claims at this time will, in my opinion, be a blot upon the history of this country. Recognition of their claims by this House will, I feel confident, receive the approval and hearty commendation of every person in this country.

It may be said that hitherto in has not been the policy of the government to recognize any persons who served in Canada on any such expedition, who had enlisted in a country other than Canada. That may have been the policy in the past but in this instance and in others if there are any, where a man enlisted in England, came out to this country, served as this man did and served well, received his honourable discharge and remained all these years in this country, the government should recognize that man's services just as if he had been born in the Dominion of Canada and had enlisted in this country. There are very few of these survivors left, probably half a dozen, and I repeat it does seem to me that their claim is just and that the government should take steps, if necessary, by passing special legislation, to recognize the services performed by those men in 1870.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN (Minister of Militia). Mr. Speaker, this matter is a very simple one. My hon. friend has referred to the fact that land grants have been given to those who served in South Africa in the recent war, but my hon. friend will see in the statute making these grants that it was only given to volunteers who were domiciled in Canada. Precisely the same course was pursued in connection with the grants to the South African volunteers as was pursued with reference to those who served in the Red River expeditionary force. Grants were made to those Canadians who served in the expedition of 1870 under the same rule as the grants to those who served in South Africa. The man to whom my hon. friend refers enlisted as a British soldier and was never anything else than a professional soldier who enlisted in England, and came over here without any idea that he would serve in this particular rebellion. He was called upon to serve in the regular course of his duty. I do not see that we are called upon in any way to make a grant of land to him or to any of the regular troops who served in that expedition. The fact that there are only a few of them left would seem to me to be not a good argument. If there is a principle underlying this we would have to hunt up the heirs of those who have died, and make land grants to them just as to those who survive.

Mr. EDWARDS. My contention was that consideration should be given to the fact that this gentleman has resided in Canada ever since he obtained his honourable discharge.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. That evidently was not considered a sufficient reason at the time or since for granting land to these men. I do not think that at this late date the House of Commons will feel disposed to take up the matter and give a grant of land to this or any other of the regular soldiers who served at that time. My hon. friend has done right to bring the matter up. I have stated the rule under which the grants were given to those who did serve in that expedition, they were given only to those Canadians who left their homes and their regular business in order to aid in the protection of the country and the putting down of the rebellion. That was the special or specific reason. The professional soldier who happened to be in Canada at the time was a part of the British army, he did not participate and the government which was in power at that time did not think that he had any claim to receive a grant.

Mr. BOYCE. Why does the minister not apply the same principle to the veterans who served in 1866 and 1870?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. There were no grants given to British soldiers that I am aware of at that time.

Mr. BOYCE. No, but to Canadian soldiers.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. That is entirely a different question.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I understand from the Minister of War that grants were given to South African veterans irrespective of what section they belonged to. For instance, quite a number of civilians attached to the Army Service Corps in South Africa were given grants. Am I right in that?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. If they were domiciled in Canada.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I wish to call the minister's attention to one fact that I should think he would take into consideration in connection with grants to those who participated in the Red River expedition. The minister has stated that the same legislation was adopted in the case of the Red River expedition as was adopted in the case of the South African veterans. I have had occasion to go into that matter and I find that instead of legislation the grants in the case of the Red River expedition were made by order in council. I think the minister now will remember that I am right in that particular.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Very likely.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). The Red River expedition is unique in the history of British expeditionary forces. It is doubtful if history affords an example of a more difficult expedition into an unknown country. The transportation of the expedition was handled by Canadian voyageurs. Possibly 30 or 40 of these men are still living. They went through with the Canadian militia; they not only took the volunteers from Ontario, but they also took the British army through. They never lost a man, and they carried the provisions with them for hundreds of miles as any one knows who has studied the history of that expedition. Had the same rule applied then as that which applies now these men would all have been enlisted as Army Service Corps men. The minister knows that that unit was added previous to the South African war to the British army and was adopted in Canada. These men would have been forced to bear arms and they were supposed to bear arms all through the expedition. They handled the column which had in charge the transport of the force and their supplies and they did the work well. A great many of them were white men and many of them were residents of the province from which I have the honour to come. I think that if there is any class in a community who have added lustre to Canadian arms it was these men, and in view of the fact that the volunteers of a later day who served in a similar capacity in a foreign country have been rewarded with grants of land these members of the force in charge of transportation, and who carried their work on so successfully under the military law should receive the same consideration as their fellow Canadians. I think it is not too late yet for the department to take this question up. Very many of these men have passed away. A few of them are still living and some in such circumstances that a grant of this kind would be of very great value to them. I have one or two in my riding and I know of a few others. Possibly there would not now be more than 50 or 60 survivors of that force. I think the minister will see the strength of the argument I make. These men went from Canada to do exactly what these others did in South Africa—to serve with the transport column, for which the latter received grants of land from the Canadian government. These men, although the regulations with regard to the Army Service Corps were not in force in those days under that name, placed themselves under the military law, and they should be entitled now at this late date to some consideration. I hope the minister will consider it at a very early opportunity and do something for them.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that the cases are quite analagous, although I admit there is a similarity. It seems to me that the work done by the voyageurs was more like work that would be done by transportation lines, and there were absolutely no transportation lines at that time in that part of the country. Had the voyageurs been enlisted, of course, they would have been paid and would have received the grant of land. Evidently they did not wish to be enlisted, and so they probably received very high pay and did so from preference. Besides that, while it is true that the Army Service Corps, so called, has been organized of late years, nevertheless there are always, or very often, men hired by the corps to do work who are not soldiers and so, to a certain extent, a considerable number of these men might have been, even had there been an Army Service Corps in existence at that time, engaged as ordinary employees. However, I think the suggestion that my hon. friend makes is worth looking into, and I shall be very glad to look up the history in connection with that expedition.

ANNEXATION OF BERMUDA.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) if he has received any intimation that the legislature of Bermuda has passed a resolution in favour of annexation with Canada, and if so what is his intention in regard to the matter?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No communication has been received by us on the subject and therefore no conclusion has been formed upon it.

FISHERIES ON THE GREAT LAKES.

Mr. WILCOX. Mr. Speaker, I desire to bring to the attention of the government and more especially to the attention of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) a matter which I think is of considerable importance, a matter which at the present time is agitating the minds of a large portion of the population in that part of the province of Ontario from which I come. I had arranged with my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to bring this matter before the House yesterday, but to suit my hon. friend's convenience, I postponed it until to-day. It was my intention to deal with this subject at much greater length than I intend to to-day, for I intended to speak upon the administration of the fisheries on the Great Lakes. But for the reason that a number of my friends who wish to take part in the discussion this afternoon, have kindly consented to my preceding them, I have decided to speak upon the subject as it affects the riding which I have the honour to represent in this House. The question arisen out of what is known as 'a system of uniform and common international regulations for the protection and preservation of food fishes in the international boundary waters of Canada and the United States,' and on the 11th of April, 1908 a treaty was signed in Washington a copy of which is found in the fisheries report of 1910. The title of that treaty as given here is:

A treaty between Great Britain and the United States concerning the fisheries in the waters contiguous to the Dominion of Canada and the United States, signed at Washington on the 11th April, 1908.

Article 2 of that treaty reads:

And it shall be the duty of the International Fisheries Commission within six months after being named to prepare a system of uniform and common international regulations for the protection and preservation of food fishes in each of the waters described.

Article 4 describes particular waters over which the commission shall have jurisdiction, and I take particular exception to the regulations which forbid the carrying on of commercial fishing in the Detroit river. Article 4 of the treaty does not mention the Detroit river itself, although it does describe a number of lakes and rivers and streams that constitute the international boundary line between the United States and Canada, but it does say:

And such other contiguous waters as may be recommended by the International Fisheries Commission.

By an order in council of date 29th May, 1909, Professor Prince, of the Fisheries Department was appointed a commissioner, with full power and jurisdiction on the part of Canada, to make these regulations, and clause 44 of the regulations provides that no nets of any sort shall, for commercial fishing, be used in the Detroit river. So, Mr. Speaker, when these regulations are brought into force, the fishermen on the Detroit river will be deprived of that right which they and their forefathers have enjoyed for 200 years. It does seem to me, unless there is some very good reason to the contrary, that such a course should not be pursued by this government. I may say for the benefit of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that the policy which his government is pursuing in respect to the fishermen on the Detroit river, is very different from that laid down by the supporters of his political party when the Liberals were in opposition. In 1895 there were regulations agreed to by the then Minister of Marine and Fisheries in the Conservative government, which regulations provided that for five weeks in the year there should be a close season on the Detroit river, and Mr. William Macgregor, who then represented North Essex spoke in this House, on the 5th of July, 1895, and used these words:

We feel that our people having invested a very large amount of money in the purchase of plant for fishing purposes and then being deprived of the fish are obliged to suffer a great loss. They have not only invested in the land but they have cleared the rivers for the purposes of fishing, and the fact that they have not been able to utilize their means of livelihood has left many of them in debt. They have lost their boats and their docks and many other investments they have made all on account of the extraordinary and ruinous policy of the government of Sir Charles Tupper. Sir Charles Tupper said, 'Canada for the Canadians'; but, Sir, the Hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries has said, 'Canada for the Americans.' It is against the laws of Canada for a Canadian to have white fish in his possession during the close season, but the government come along and take large quantities of the white fish for the ova, and the fish being killed in the process are sold to the Americans. The Canadians who lived there so long and who enjoyed the fishing formerly, are not permitted to buy their fish even from our Canadian government; the Americans have that privilege, and we feel that to be a great grievance. Talk about the Czar of Russia and his severity to the Russian Jews. Sir, no Czar of Russia ever treated the Russian Jews as the people of Essex have been treated by these fishery laws.

That is a citation from a speech delivered by Mr. Macgregor who represented North Essex when a regulation was being put in force only asking the fishermen to cease their operations during the month of November, and for a week or two in October, but to-day by these regulations of which I complain, for twelve months in the year the fishermen will be deprived of carrying on their operations in that river. What is meant by 'a system of uniform and common international regulations'? It is not reciprocal in trade, but it certainly is reciprocal in regulations. Two nations have agreed to a condition that is supposed to work out to the equal advantage of the fishermen on both sides of that river, a term in economics applied to international relationship where two nations mutually agree to a condition that works with equality. Now, what are the conditions which exist in applying these regulations to the fishermen on the Detroit river? There is on the American side, a great city, with a population of half a million people last census, and land has become so dear, that the fishermen cannot buy land to carry on their operations on the American side, and they are not to-day fishing on the American side.

But this compels 20 fish stations, with 150 fishermen engaged and some $20,000 invested by them, to give up rights which they and their forefathers have enjoyed for the last 150 or 200 years on the Canadian side of that river. Let me say to the Prime Minister that that is not fair to those fishermen. They have rights there that ought to be protected. As far as I have been able to ascertain there is no excuse whatever for adopting a regulation which will deprive those people of their rights to carry on their operations on the river. To the mind of some expert in the department, there might be some reason; but I want to say to the Prime Minister, that Professor Prince, who is at the head of the Fisheries Department, does not understand the conditions that exist in the Detroit river. I have here one of his reports, and I am going to read it to my right hon. friend. It is a report made in 1904, when Professor Prince was sent to investigate the conditions among the fishermen on the Detroit river. It is contained in volume 9 of the Sessional Papers of 1904, and is headed, 'Whitefish Close Season on the Detroit River,' and says:

> Detroit, it may be mentioned, has one of the greatest fish markets on the continent.

Allow me to interject here that under the trade arrangement which my right hon. friend has entered into with the United States, fish will be free. At the same time, under these fishing regulations our fishermen will be deprived of the right to fish in the Detroit river; therefore the benefits, if any, that would accrue from that free market, will not be for our fishermen who have carried on their operations in the Detroit river for so many years. Professor Prince goes on to say:

> And the view that prevails there is entirely in favour of the Canadian policy.

The Canadian policy was five weeks of close season. He continues:

> The Canadian side is and always has been the chief resort for the whitefish. . . . Parent fish in rivers and lacustrine waters when ascending to the spawning grounds always take the most direct course and are not easily turned aside, as experienced fishermen are well aware. No more erroneous idea could be entertained than the supposition that whitefish wander aimlessly hither and thither from one side of a river or lake to the other. In these waters, as in other waters, it is certainly not the case that the schools of breeding fish deviate from their usual course and cross from side to side so that fish caught by American fishermen during our close season would be caught by Canadians were they permitted to fish at that time.

The position taken by Professor Prince is that the whitefish in the Detroit river came up from Lake St. Clair, that they keep on the Canadian side of the river, which is 3,000 or 4,000 feet wide, and not more than a mile at any point, and the whitefish will not cross the international boundary line and go to the other side. Upon this mistaken idea my right hon. friend's officer and his department have been making regulations and with this idea Professor Prince goes to Washington; and for some reason that I am unable to ascertain—for the Detroit river was not mentioned in the treaty—he agreed that from the day my right hon. friend stamps his approval upon these regulations, henceforth and forever, while they are in force, the fishermen of the Detroit river must stand back with their arms folded and not any more carry on commercial fishing in that river. This treaty was signed in Washington on the 11th of April, 1908, and these regulations were signed on the 29th of May, 1909.

Mr. BRODEUR. Do I understand my hon. friend to say that the Detroit river was not included in the treaty?

Mr. WILCOX. I understand that the name of the Detroit river is not included in the treaty; but there is a clause which, after mentioning a number of rivers and streams that the treaty does cover, goes on to say: 'and such other contiguous waters as may be recommended.' The Detroit river might be included under the conditions of the treaty; but I take it that the United States government and the government of Great Britain thought that the Detroit river was so insignificant, not as a navigable stream, not for its lack of beauty, but on account of the few fish that were caught in it, that it was not worthy of mention. Professor Prince or the commissioner who might be appointed, was simply given power to take in any stream that he might consider advisable; and the Detroit river is one that Professor Prince jumped on as a foxhound would jump on a rabbit.

Mr. BRODEUR. I think my hon. friend is mistaken. Subsection 9 of the article he has read states that the waters connecting Lake Erie and Lake Huron, including Lake St. Clair, are embodied in the treaty.

Mr. WILCOX. My hon. friend would take it that those waters mean the Detroit river.

Mr. BRODEUR. Certainly.

Mr. WILCOX. Well, probably they do; but it would be reasonable to assume that the commissioners did not consider the Detroit river as important as Lake Ontario or the Niagara river, or they would have distinctly mentioned it. Now, the treaty has been negotiated and the regulations have been signed, but they are awaiting the stamp of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister before they can be brought into operation. After the regulations were signed there were nine months or more, before I came to represent the riding of North Essex in this House. I brought this matter to the attention of the government on the 4th of May last year. But at that time my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) was not able, on account of illness, to be in the House. However the Bill was passed and clause 15 provides:

The Governor in Council may, by proclamation, bring into force the international regulations prepared by the International Fishery Commission appointed under the treaty signed at Washington on the 11th April, 1908, between Great Britain and the United States concerning the fisheries in waters contiguous to Canada and the United States.

The second section of clause 15 provides:

The Governor in Council may make regulations to secure the due enforcement of the international regulations, may prescribe penalties for the violation of such regulations or of the international regulations, but no such penalty shall exceed the sum of $1,000 and costs or in default of payment imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months, or in the case of a continued offence, the sum of $20 and costs for each day the offence continues.

So that, under these regulations, my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) may cause to be issued a proclamation which will have this effect, that my French Canadian friends, who are the chief fishermen in the riding of North Essex, who have been permitted that liberty so many years, should they violate the provisions of those regulations, one or two or half a dozen of those forty men appointed recently will be looking after them, they will be summoned to court, and the penalty prescribed by those regulations will be meted out. Therefore, I would ask the government to give this matter their most serious consideration before they bring down any such regulations.

There is another matter I desire to speak upon, and it is this. I refer to the necessity of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) taking the eggs of those white fish and using them for propagation. It is shown in the reports that whitefish in those lakes and streams are decreasing greatly. In fact, the commissioners, who agreed upon those regulations, have agreed that it is of the utmost importance that the eggs of the whitefish should be taken and placed in hatcheries and the fry deposited in the lakes. I have here the bulletin promoting whitefish product in the Great Lakes, published by the American commissioners. On page 681, I find it deals with this as follows:

In studying the relation of the plant of whitefish fry to the catch, it is found that in those lakes or parts of lakes where there has been a large and extensive plant of whitefish fry (30,000 per square mile), there has been a correlated increase in the catch of whitefish (72 per cent); in those lakes or parts of lakes in which there has been a moderate plant of whitefish fry (10,000 per square mile), there has been a slight increase in the catch of whitefish, or the catch has remained nearly constant; and in those lakes or parts of lakes in which there has been a small plant of whitefish fry (2,000 per square mile) or no plant, there has been a reduction in the catch of whitefish (26 per cent).

The collecting of eggs from the whitefish and placing them in the hatcheries would not be such a difficult task. Then we could have the young fry thrown into the lakes. From every authority I have been able to secure, that would be the proper course for the government to pursue. The whitefish caught, according to the report of 1910, amounted to:

	Lbs.
Lake St. Clair	29,575
Detroit river	24,325
Lake Erie	826,189
Lake Ontario	773,397
In light waters	6,880
Total production, as shown by the report 1909-10, was	1,660,366

From that report I gathered the information that a whitefish will weigh on an average 3 lbs. This would represent simply, by dividing three into the total number of pounds, 553,451 fish taken out of those lakes in 1910. An authority upon the point informed me that one-half of the fish taken would be shiners and would be capable of depositing the usual number of eggs. 553,445 fish taken out of those waters would leave 276,727 fish, capable of depositing their usual number of eggs. I find from the reports of my hon. friend's department that a fish weighing three pounds has a capacity of depositing 30,000 eggs; one weighing three and one-half pounds, 30,000 to 35,000 eggs; and one weighing four pounds can deposit 30,000 to 40,000 eggs. We will suppose that the average fish weighed three pounds capable of depositing 30,000 eggs in those waters. Multiplying 30,000 by the number of fish which we consider capable of depositing that number of eggs, and we have 8,301,814,000 eggs taken from those waters that year. What has the minister of marine done to replenish those waters and make good that loss? I find that 79,000,000 fry were placed in those waters, according to the reports of last year. 8,120,200,000 eggs were taken from those waters which were not replaced. My hon. friend cannot farm the waters in that way. He should collect the eggs and build hatcheries. I understand that we have only one or two hatcheries in Ontario to-day, yet it is of the utmost importance that the government should add to the number.

There is one at Sandwich. There should be one on Lake Erie; there should be one on Lake Ontario; there should be one at Owen Sound. Consult the reports and you will find that the catch of whitefish in Georgian bay has decreased by hundreds of thousands of pounds in the last few years, but in Lake Erie, where the young whitefish fry have been released from the hatchery at Sandwich, the catch has increased within a few years by four hundred per cent. These facts seem to establish beyond a shadow of doubt the necessity and importance of these hatcheries.

Now, in conclusion—and I have spoken longer than I intended—let me say that if my right hon. friend would establish a hatchery on Lake Erie, would allow the fishermen of Lake Erie to collect the eggs and release the young fish into the lakes; and if he would send his officers to collect the eggs from the fish as they are caught by the fishermen and place these eggs in the Sandwich hatchery, and so set the fishermen of North Essex free from this notorious regulation, he would have much better results. He would not be depriving the fishermen of the rights they have enjoyed for so many years. So, I submit, from the evidence I get from the fishermen—and I am very well acquainted with a number of them—they were given to understand, when the original regulations to which I have referred were brought in, that they were only supposed to give up the right for five weeks in the year, and even this was considered by my right hon. friend's supporters, Hon. Mr. McGregor and Hon. Mr. Sutherland, as a most notorious thing. What can we expect they will say when they are deprived for the whole twelve months of the year of the right of carrying on their operations?

I submit these facts to my right hon. friend, and ask the government to give the matter their best consideration. And I want to say to the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that I am not actuated by any political motive in bringing this matter to his attention. I have a real interest in my constituents. I feel that I am the medium through which they speak in this House, and that I should be derelict in my duty if I allowed him to secure approval of these regulations without telling him he was doing wrong. I can remember the occasions when the right hon. gentleman came to North Essex. And I can tell him that he never did come to North Essex but I did him the honour to come out and hear what he said. I can remember the beautiful sentences he uttered—no doubt he can remember them, too. 'There is nothing so dear or sweet to the heart of a man as the land of his birth.' That is a beautiful sentence that inspired us Canadians in North Essex, and it was one of those with which he appealed to his fellow-countrymen in Tilbury in 1908, to give him one more turn to finish his work. I was sitting only four seats away from him at the time. Little did I think that one of the works that he expected to finish was to deprive my fellow-countrymen and his compatriots of the right, which to them is sacred, of carrying on their fishing operations in that great Detroit river.

Hon. L. P. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). My hon. friend from North Essex (Mr. Wilcox) was kind enough to advise me that he was going to introduce this question yesterday. He said there had been some arrangement made by us previous to yesterday. That is right to some extent, but yesterday we made an arrangement that the matter should be discussed to-day. So, my first word should be a grateful acknowledgment of the kindness of my hon. friend in advising me that he was going to discuss this question of the international regulations concerning the Detroit river. My hon. friend finds fault with one part of the regulations made under the treaty. But he forgets, I think, the great importance to Canada of having a treaty on this subject with the United States. Before this treaty was made—and, unfortunately, it is not yet in force, but I expect it will be in force very soon—while our regulations were passed and carried out by the Dominion government, so that we had one policy applying to the fisheries whether in the maritime provinces or in the great lakes, unfortunately this system did not exist on the United States side. On the contrary, the regulations on the United States side were under the control of the several states interested. On the Pacific coast, where our fisheries are extensive and valuable, we had to deal with the state of Washington; on the great lakes we had to reckon with regulations made by Wisconsin, Michigan, Ohio, Pennsylvania and New York; in the province of Quebec, in regard to the fisheries of Lake Memphremagog and Lake Champlain, we were affected by the regulations of the states of New York, Vermont and New Hampshire; and as to the fisheries by the sea, regulations were made by the state of Maine. Each state has its own policy and its own ways of dealing with the fisheries. In some states the regulations passed were enforced, and in others they were not. The result was that any efforts we made on the Canadian side to enforce our regulations or protect the fisheries were handicapped. For years and years the question was discussed and agitation carried on on both sides of the line in favour of an agreement by which all the fisheries regulations should be controlled by the same authority. After a long agitation and negotiation, in which we had the co-operation not only of the Canadian people as a whole but of many on the United States side, we succeeded at last in arranging a treaty which has been called the Boundary Waters Fisheries treaty, which was signed on the 11th April, 1908, by Mr. Bryce and Mr. Root.

This treaty provided for the appointment of two commissioners, one by the British authorities and the other by the United States authorities. The British authorities were kind enough to leave the nomination in our hands and we nominated Professor Prince. The Americans appointed Dr. Starr Jordan of the State of California. I do not think it is necessary for me to say anything with regard to the reputation or to maintain the standing of Professor Prince. He has enjoyed a high reputation in the administration of our Canadian fisheries. He is certainly one of the ablest men we have had in Canada and one who knows most concerning our fisheries, and we thought we could not appoint a better man to frame those regulations than the man who had been connected with the administration of the fisheries for a great number of years, who knew exactly the situation in all parts of the country, and who, at the same time, had had an opportunity on different occasions to acquire not only a general knowledge with regard to the fisheries, but also particular knowledge by the fact that he was appointed a commissioner in several instances. I would be sorry to hear that there is any member of this House who fears that in Professor Prince we have not one of the best men we could secure to fill the position of commissioner under that treaty.

Mr. WILCOX. I do not want to be understood as disputing the ability of Professor Prince, but I do think he does not understand the conditions that exist in the Detroit river.

Mr. BRODEUR. I am sorry to differ from my hon. friend in that respect. Professor Prince knew exactly the conditions in the Detroit river. In the years just preceding his appointment he had been investigating the Georgian Bay fisheries, the North Channel fisheries, and also, at the request, if I remember aright, of a great number of fishermen, some of whom may have come from Essex he was appointed to investigate the fisheries in Lake Erie. Consequently I think he was very well informed as to the nature of the fisheries in that locality, and was as competent as any one else to give a good sound judgment upon the fisheries and their extent in those different waters. Outside of that I may perhaps recall to my hon. friend who I know does not wish to throw any party politics into this question, the fact that some years ago an investigation was made by the Canadian authorities on that question of the Detroit river. In 1892 or 1893, under the Conservative government,——

Mr. WILCOX. Is it not a fact that the Hon. Mr. Sutherland, who represented North Essex, and Mr. Wolfe came here in 1908 and asked that the fishermen be released from this regulation, and the department promised to release them and did not do it?

Mr. BRODEUR. I do not remember exactly to what my hon. friend refers. I shall come later to discuss that phase of the question. I was referring to what had been done by the previous government and trying to show to my hon. friend that in the selection of Professor Prince we have not only appointed a man well versed with respect to the question of fisheries generally, but a man acquainted with the particular situation of the fisheries in the Detroit river, who had at his disposal information which was in the department with respect to these fisheries.

In 1893 efforts were made to investigate the Detroit river. A commission was appointed consisting of Dr. Wakeham and Mr. Rathbun. I do not know Mr. Rathbun, but I know Dr. Wakeham very well. Dr. Wakeham has been connected with the administration of the fisheries for a great many years, he has had a great deal of experience, a great deal of knowledge, and no better man could be appointed for the purpose of making an inquiry into the fisheries. After visiting the Detroit river Commander Wakeham said, when dealing with the question of Canadians not being allowed to fish when commercial operations were being conducted on the opposite side of the line:

At first thought, this may seem to some unreasonable; but when it is known that in most places where our waters join those of the United States, the fisheries on the Canadian side are not depleted to anything like the same extent as on the United States side, it is well to consider why this is so, and if we do we must admit that the reason is that the wise restrictions imposed by the department have prevented our fisheries from being exhausted to the same extent that they are on the other side. No thoughtful fisherman considers the absence of regulations on the United States side as wise and prudent. In view of this, I think it behooves us to look sharply after our Fishery Regulations, and the chief of these must be the close season during the spawning period.

We had at that time a situation as follows: On one side of the Detroit river, on the American side, there were no fisheries, the fisheries had been exhausted. Why? Because there was no close season. In this part of the Detroit river the fish of Lake Erie and Lake Huron come and spawn, that is the spawning ground of this lake and the authorities of the State of Michigan were in the habit of letting their fishermen go and fish there during the spawning season. Is there anything more contrary to the interests of the fishermen than that during the spawning period we should allow netting operations? My hon. friend after giving the matter more serious thought and consideration will agree with me that if the fisheries have been destroyed on the American side it is certainly due to the fact that there was no close season under their regulations. How was it on our side? My hon. friend has referred to the fact that, on the Detroit side there is a city of 500,000 and people could not fish there. That is true as far as the city of Detroit is concerned, but as my hon. friend knows the Detroit river is many miles in length. Below the city of Detroit on the American side there were good fishing grounds at one time. Why were they depleted? Because the state authorities of Michigan allowed their fishermen to fish there during the spawning season. The former government in issuing regulations provided for a strict close season which amounted practically to prohibition, although, it was not total prohibition.

Mr. WILCOX. During what portion of the year was the restriction in force?

Mr. BRODEUR. During the time that the spawning was going on.

Mr. WILCOX. Four weeks.

Mr. BRODEUR. Well, suppose it was four weeks, will my hon. friend deny that it was during the spawning season?

Mr. BRODEUR.

Mr. WILCOX. I do not deny that, but there are a number of the minister's statements that I do not admit. For instance, it is contrary to the view expressed by the most practical fishermen we have in that country to say that fish from Lake Huron come to the Detroit river to spawn. The fish of Lake Erie spawn on the shoals and sand bars of Lake Erie. To some extent fish do come to the Detroit river, but less than two per cent of the fish caught are caught in the Detroit river.

Mr. BRODEUR. There is no doubt that it is a spawning ground. My hon. friend will not deny that, and whether the fish come from Lake Huron or Lake Erie does not matter very much. Will my hon. friend state that the former government were at fault when they enacted the prohibition of fishing during the spawning season?

Mr. WILCOX. I will answer that question by saying that my hon. friends—Messrs. McGregor and Allan—spoke at length on this question and they have always taken that position.

Mr. BRODEUR. My hon. friend does not answer the question which I am putting to him. I am asking him whether he is willing to admit the former government were at fault in instituting this close season.

Mr. WILCOX. Yes, I condemn those regulations.

Mr. BRODEUR. Does my hon. friend favour a close season?

Mr. WILCOX. I am not taking so much exception to the four weeks close season, but you are prohibiting them from fishing during the whole twelve months in the year.

Mr. BRODEUR. We will come to that later on. I am discussing the close season as it was instituted by the former government, and I say that the close season proved undoubtedly of some benefit, but perhaps not to the same extent as we might have expected. However, the regulations went into force and we found that although the Americans could not fish at all on their side, because they had entirely depleted their fisheries, they having permitted their fishermen to fish during the spawning season, we had fishing on our side. If I understand my hon. friend, he wants to put the Canadian fishermen in the same position as the American fishermen have been put in by their lack of regulation.

Mr. WILCOX. No.

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes.

Mr. WILCOX. No.

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes, that is what my hon. friend is contending for. He is blaming this government because of the international regulations which are going to prohibit netting in this river. My hon. friend knows there is no close season under these regulations. I suppose he is aware of that. The only thing that regulation does provide is the prohibition of netting. We are not going to permit, when these regulations are in force, any netting in the Detroit river.

Mr. WILCOX. My hon. friend is making a close season for twelve months in the year instead of four weeks.

Mr. BRODEUR. It may please some of the fishermen for the moment that the fisheries should be depleted, but the government does not exist only for one day or only for one year. We have to look to the future, and I say it would be criminal on the part of the government to allow the fisheries of the Detroit river to become depleted in the same way as they have been depleted on the American side. We want to protect the fisheries, we want to protect the fishermen too, and the policy that we are going to adopt is one far more in the interest of the fishermen than that which my hon. friend is trying to have accepted in this country. It may please some of the fishermen, but those who look into the future, those who are interested in the preservation of the fisheries, will say that it is a wise policy and will stand by it. My hon. friend asks me why we adopt these regulations. I will give him a few reasons. We want first to stop the destruction of spawning whitefish and pickerel in the Detroit river. That is the object of regulation 44. Perhaps before referring to that I may say to the House that in 1902 or 1903 representations were made to us in order to secure the repeal of the close season which had been provided in 1893. We repealed that provision. Those who made the representations said: On the American side they have the right to fish at any time in the year, and we are not allowed the same privilege. There was a great deal of force in that argument and our fishermen were, I am sure, more or less affected by the fact that the American fishermen had the right to fish on their side of the river while we did not allow them to fish on our side. That situation brought discontent, and the government thought of repealing this restriction which had been provided for formerly. But now when we are going to obtain from the American authorities the undertaking to prohibit fishing on their side there is no more reason why we should not adopt the same restriction on our side.

Mr. WILCOX. That is on the Detroit river.

Mr. BRODEUR. On the Detroit river. There was some reason at one time when the Americans were allowed to fish on their side of the Detroit river that the Canadian fishermen should be allowed to fish on our side, but now that we have a treaty, and now that we have by this treaty a provision by which fishing is to be prohibited on both sides we must welcome, in the interests of the country, and in the interests of the fishermen, such a regulation involving as it does the discontinuance of net fishing on both sides. Why should the Detroit river be treated differently from the St. Lawrence?

Mr. WILCOX. There is no fishing on the American side of the Detroit river.

Mr. BRODEUR. There is no fishing on the St. Lawrence? My hon. friend is mistaken. I know some members of the House who are living on the St. Lawrence, and I think they will say that there is a good deal of fishing on the St. Lawrence. I am sorry that my hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Taylor) is not here; I think he would tell my hon. friend there is some fishing on that part of the St. Lawrence.

Mr. WILCOX. My hon. friend did not understand me. I say there is no fishing on the American side of the Detroit river for the reason that the land is too valuable, it all being city property. There are a couple of fish hatcheries operated by the State Fish Commission. All the fishing is carried on on the Canadian side where the land is not so valuable.

Mr. BRODEUR. I misunderstood the hon. gentleman; I thought he referred to the St. Lawrence. There is no more fishing on the American side of the Detroit river, because the Americans had not the necessary restrictions to preserve the fish. In 1904 we repealed the restrictions which were formerly in effect with the result that the catch of white fish in the Detroit river had fallen from 100,070 pounds a year to 24,000 pounds a year. In 1898 the doré caught in the Detroit river amounted to 12,000 pounds, while in 1908 it was only 6,000 pounds, or a reduction of one-half.

Mr. WILCOX. Has not that condition been general on the Great Lakes with the exception of Lake Erie?

Mr. BRODEUR. The reason Lake Erie is not depleted, is because I am glad to say that on the American side the state of Ohio had adopted proper regulations for the protection of the fish. But, in the Detroit river there were no regulations on the American side, and our fishermen having asked us to repeal the restrictions on our side, we did so, with the result that the white fish catch fell from 100,000 pounds to 24,000 pounds, and the catch of dore from 12,000 pounds, to 6,000. Well, if we allowed free fishing without any restriction, it would not be long before the fish would disappear altogether.

Mr. WILCOX. Does the minister contend that that condition was solely due to the fact that our fishermen were permitted to fish for 4 or 5 weeks in the year?

Mr. BRODEUR. We prevented fishing during the spawning season, and as the Americans had no restrictions, the result was that the fisheries were depleted in American waters. Last session these regulations were adopted unanimously by this parliament, and not a man in this House dissented to the treaty or to the regulations passed under it. Indeed I may say there was a general feeling of satisfaction that at last we had reached an agreement with the United States to bring about uniform regulations in international waters. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wilcox) takes a small part of the treaty and he says that it will have an injurious effect upon the fishermen of a particular locality. Well, suppose it has, it is only for a time and in the future it is bound to result in the greatest benefit to the fishermen of that locality. The treaty will last for four years and the fish in these waters having four years rest, they are bound to replenish, and the fisheries will be still more valuable to the fishermen when this treaty expires. The regulations, though not so severe as I would like to see them, have, nevertheless, for the first time brought the fishery regulations of the United States under the control of a central power which in respect to these contiguous waters, is a most important matter. We adopted these regulations because in the first place they will stop the destruction of spawning whitefish and pickerel in the Detroit river, and no sensible person can take exception to that. I believe that the wise fishermen will say that it is good policy to preserve the spawning grounds. Nay, more, I say that if there is a fisherman who is opposed to preserving the spawning grounds, it would be just as well to protect such a man against himself, because he does not know what his best interests are. The second reason for our adopting the regulations is that we may stop the destruction of immature fish which are found in large quantities in the nets in narrow waters like the Detroit river, and the catching of which is of no benefit to the fisherman. The third reason is to restore the more valuable species of fish by stopping netting for market during the four years this treaty is in force. I am quite sure that during these four years the fish will be replenished in these waters as they have in other waters where similar regulations existed, and at the end of that period the fisheries will be more valuable to the fishermen than ever before. Now, we need white fish eggs for the hatcheries, and the hon. gentleman admits that hatcheries are a good thing. I am not at all in accord with the views expressed by some American writers, that if you have a sufficient number of hatcheries, you have no need for a license system or a close season or regulation as to the size of the mesh, because the hatcheries will of themselves, replenish the fisheries. I believe that while the regulations adopted by the commissioners are not up to the standard I would like to see, yet they are a step in the right direction, and I am surprised that there are Canadians who enter objection to them in any form whatever. I may say that the regulations to which my hon. friend (Mr. Wilcox) takes exception, are not yet in force. The parliament of Canada has unanimously passed a law empowering the Governor in Council, to put these regulations in force when the American authorities have adopted similar regulations. Unfortunately the matter is not yet disposed of. I must say, however, to the credit of the President of the United States, that some time ago I had a conference with the authorities of the Department of State with regard to this question of enforcing our regulations, and I was promised that in a short time a message would be sent to the Congress suggesting the adoption of those regulations. I am glad to say, from information that I have received, that the President of the United States has sent such a message to the Congress, but unfortunately it was so late in the session that the necessary legislation was not passed; but I hope that this will be done in the next session. I repeat that if my hon. friend wants to be the friend of the fishermen—and I believe he does and is sincere in his motives—let him work with us in the effort to preserve these fisheries which are now so greatly depleted. If we left matters to go on as they are now going, in a few years, though there might be some fishermen, there would be no fisheries. I think that is not a condition which my hon. friend wants to see in the Detroit river. Let him work with us in the framing of such regulations as are necessary to preserve the fisheries, and if we are successful in having those regulations adopted by the United States authorities, they will be of the greatest benefit to the vast fisheries of this Dominion.

Mr. WILCOX. Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend——

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman cannot speak a second time on this motion except by the general consent of the House.

Mr. WILCOX. I just wish to say that the hon. minister expresses the view that I find fault with the general application of these regulations. I will agree with him that it is a good thing for Canada to have a uniform set of regulations with the United States; but I find fault with the way in which they apply to the Detroit river.

Mr. BRODEUR. Why discriminate between the Detroit river and the St. Mary's, the St. Clair or the St. Lawrence?

Mr. WILCOX. For this reason, that on the south side of the county of Essex the fishermen have a right to fish in Lake Erie as they have always had, while on the north side of the county of Essex, where the fishermen have enjoyed the same privilege, they are now deprived of it. It is only that part of the regulation that applies to the Detroit river that I object to. The hon. minister referred to the question of fishing on the spawning beds. There is a great difference of opinion on the part of the experts on that question. We have high authority in the United States for saying that the best way to propagate these fish is to catch them on the spawning beds and place them in the hatcheries and have the young fry hatched out there.

CAPITALIZATION OF RAILWAYS.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York). Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity to bring before the House a question of great importance, especially to the people of the Canadian west. It has been stated repeatedly, in the press and on the floor of this House, that the tariff is the great grievance of the people of the west. My contention is that their railway grievances are of even greater importance than the tariff. We have full control of questions relating to railroads, while the trade question, as it comes up in this House, is in the jurisdiction of the people of the United States. We can immediately redress the railway grievances of the people of the west if we choose to do so. The Manitoba 'Free Press' not long ago made the assertion, and it has not been denied, that railway rates in the Canadian west today are greater than those that obtain in the American west. I have been informed that the Minister of Railways has made the statement that railway rates in Canada are lower than in the United States. I dispute that statement, and if necessary I will give the facts as presented by the Manitoba 'Free Press,' which gave a great many instances in which rates were higher in Canada than in the United States. This is a substantial grievance, and there is a cure for it, and that cure rests with this House and the Railway Commission which we have created. I purpose approaching this question this afternoon by introducing a motion to the effect that the capitalization of the railways of this country ought to be controlled by the Railway Commission, inasmuch as the basis of railway rates is supposed to be the amount of money invested in the construction of the railway. If the money raised for the construction of a railway is raised in an extravagant way, the railway rates must be higher than they otherwise would be, or if money is borrowed for the improvement of a railway when it is not necessary, the interest on that money must necessarily come out of the people who pay the railway rates. My intention is to show that if the railway companies are forced to submit their capitalization to the Railway Commission instead of to parliament, a great reduction in rates could be effected. For a while the doctrine was preached in this House and in the country, and also in the United States, that the capitalization of a railway had nothing to do with its charges; but at last that doctrine has had to be abandoned, and it is now admitted in all quarters that the first thing to do in order to reduce railway rates is to reduce the capitalization of the railways. I heard the Minister of Justice say some time ago that it was no concern of parliament what capitalization the railways had or what kind of capitalization they had, whether it was stock or bonds. But in the United States, where they have made a great study of this question, they are now reaching the conclusion that the first thing to do with regard to the railways is to regulate their issue of capital stock. In this country the only regulation we have had is the promiscuous regulation of the Railway Commission, which sometimes allows a railway to issue a large amount of stock and a small amount of bonds, and sometimes the reverse, just as the question seizes the committee. No regular system has been adopted, a great many irregularities have occurred, and consequently the capitalization of Canadian railways is not to-day in a satisfactory condition.

In order to make clear what can be done in this case, and show what has been done in other countries, I propose to call attention to the laws at present in the United States on this question. In the state of New York, the people have suffered more from the over capitalization of railways than in any other country. Some time ago they saw that there was only one remedy, and that was to appoint a public service commission, and compel all railway companies, which wanted to increase their capital, to obtain the approval of that board. Here is the law in the state of New York, consolidated statutes of New York, volume 4, 1909. Clause 55 of the public service Commission Act, reads as follows:

> A common carrier, railway corporation, or street railway corporation organized or existing, or hereafter incorporated, under or by virtue of the laws of the state of New York, may issue stocks, bonds, notes or other evidence of indebtedness payable at periods of more than 12 months after the date thereof, when necessary for the acquisition of property, the construction, completion, extension or improvement of its facilities, or for the improvement or maintenance of its service or for the discharge or lawful refunding of its obligations, provided and not otherwise that there shall have been secured from the proper commission an order authorizing such issue, and the amount thereof and stating that, in the opinion of the commission, the use of the capital to be secured by the issue of such stock, bonds, notes or other evidence of indebtedness is reasonably required for the said purposes of the corporation, but this provision shall not apply to any lawful issue of stock, to the lawful execution and delivery of any mortgage or to the lawful issue of bonds thereunder, which shall have been duly approved by the Board of Railroad Commissioners before the time when this Act becomes the law. For the purpose of enabling it to determine whether it should issue such an order, the commission shall make such inquiry or investigation, hold such hearings, and examine such witnesses, books, papers, documents or contracts as it may deem of importance in enabling it to reach a determination.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Does that apply purely to increase of capital?

Mr. MACLEAN (York). No new capital of any kind can be secured without the authority from this commission. The railway company show that this increase is necessary for the extension of the road.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Suppose a new railway is organized in New York state for the building of a new line, would the provisions of this statute apply to its initial capital?

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Yes to everything. Not one dollar of capitalization, no security not even a note issue extending over 12 months, can be issued without the approval of this commission.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If a railway is organized in the state of New York, who authorizes the issue of capital?

Mr. MACLEAN (York). This railway commission also. That does not come within the jurisdiction of the state legislature at all.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This applies to bonds only, and not to the stock of a company.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). It applies to stocks, bonds, notes or other security in any form with the exception of promissory notes for less than twelve months. The companies may give promissory notes provided they are for a short term, but if these notes extend beyond twelve months, they must first be approved by this railway board. That law has proved most effective in the state of New York. In that state there are to-day two railway commissions. One deals with electric companies, whether light, trolley or street railway service; and the other deals with steam railways. I have a summary here of the total applications made and granted with regard to street railways from July 1, 1907, to December 1, 1910:

Total amount of securities applied for..	$361,000,000
Amount approved by the commission..	82,000,000
Amount disapproved..	$279,000,000

Had the commission been in operation at the time the different railways were financed in New York, instead of over $500,000,000 of watered stock being injected into the street railway propositions of that state, less than $3,000,000 would have been advanced. The result of all this water is that the underground system, while it carries more passengers than any other road of the same standing, is to-day in the hands of a receiver. This shows the necessity for some commission to regulate the issue of railway stock. A similar experience has resulted in the case of the other railways. The commission has rejected from time to time various schemes of the steam railways in the way of financing, but its report does not give the amount of the rejections. The commission, however, refused to endorse the issue of capital which it did not consider necessary in the interests of the road. It has said to the railways: We will not allow you to issue stock which may call for dividends of from 6 to 10 per cent, but will compel you to issue instead 4 per cent bonds. Unfortunately the railway situation to-day is so bad in the United States that none of their railways can get a market for their stock. They have issued so much watered stock, that American railway securities are discredited in Europe. Our Canadian railway stocks have good standing to-day; but if we do not interfere with the pernicious practice adopted by the Canadian Pacific railway, our securities will get into the same standing as the American. The other day one of the members of the New York Public Service Commission, Mr. Maltby, gave his opinion on this question. If any one wants to read an instructive article on it, he will find the article in the New York 'Times' annual financial review of this year. I am going to read just two or three paragraphs:

> Government supervision of securities issued by public service corporations is of importance not only to the investor but to the shipper, the passenger and the consumer. It is ordinarily argued that the investor alone is affected, and that reasonable rates, adequate service and proper treatment of the public can be as easily secured without control over securities as where such control exists. This may be true in certain instances, but where there is an efficient government authority with adequate power, rates and service tend to reflect these conditions.

That is the opinion of the most active man on the Public Service Commission of the State of New York, a man who has been for several years actively connected with that commission. Here is another sentence:

In the second place, unregulated public service corporations tend toward over-capitalization, and over-capitalization is apt to have a direct effect upon rates and service. Theoretically, if a company is earning 8 per cent upon a certain capitalization, it will make no difference if the capitalization is doubled and the return is 4 per cent upon the new capitalization. As a matter of fact, however, the tendency will be very strong to boost the 4 per cent return to 5 or 6 per cent.

And again:

Effective regulation contains several essential features. In the first place, bonds should not be sold by corporations for less than their market value and preferably at par.

I will give a remarkable instance of violation of that wholesome rule in Canada. Here is another sentence:

The sale of stock at its market value would also be beneficial to existing companies. The English method of sale in open competitive market seems preferable to the plan whereby the price at which it may be issued is fixed by a public authority.

And again:

Before securities are approved a careful examination should be made into the purposes of the expenditure, but supervision should not stop here. It is essential that the supervising authority should know how the funds are actually expended and that the amounts paid are reasonable, that the property is needed and that the cost should be charged to capital and not to operation. Unless this is done, the public is apt to be misled, believing there is adequate protection when it does not exist.

He shows, that it is in the interest not only of the public, but also of the investor, and, most of all, it is in the interest of the consumer, who, in the last analysis, must pay railway rates, that there should be absolute and practical control of the capitalization of all companies. We have had an instance in this country where we have neglected to make the necessary regulations, and, as a consequence, the consumer and the public and even the railway service itself, suffers from the lack of control.

Now, they have that law in the State of New York. The credit for it is due to that eminent man, Charles E. Hughes, recently Governor of New York, and now a member of the Supreme Court of the United States. He has followed the financial history of the United States very closely. He was the counsel in the investigation of the insurance companies doing business in the State of New York, and he came to the conclusion that the most serious evil in the United States was a lack of regulation of the finances of the great trusts and railroad corporations. It was at his instance that this law was placed on the statute-book of New York state. It is the most satisfactory law they have, and no man would think of repealing one clause or one line of it. So satisfactory has it been that the present president of the United States has taken up the matter and is moving to have it apply to interstate railways which will practically make it apply to all the railways of the United States. It was in the Bill regulating railroads of the year before last and would have become law only that the railroads made a great protest against it. But, as a compromise, it was agreed that a commission should issue to investigate the subject. I have secured a copy of that Act. It is entitled, 'An Act to create a commerce court and to amend the Act entitled, 'An Act to regulate commerce approved February fourth, eighteen hundred and eighty-seven, as heretofore amended, and for other purposes.' This, one of the great improvements of the railroad laws of the United States has been the creation, in the session before the one just closed, of this court of commerce, which has jurisdiction over the decision of the Board of Railway Commissioners. Section 16 of this Act reads as follows:

16. That the president is hereby authorized to appoint a commission to investigate questions pertaining to the issuance of stocks and bonds by railway corporations subject to the provisions of the Act to regulate commerce, and the power of Congress to regulate or affect the same, and to fix the compensation of the members of such commission. Said commission shall be and is hereby authorized to employ experts to aid in the work of inquiry and examination, and such clerks, stenographers and other assistants as may be necessary, which employees shall be paid such compensation as the commission may deem just and reasonable upon a certificate to be issued by the chairman of the commission. The several departments and bureaus of the government shall detail from time to time such officials and employees and furnish such information to the commission as may be directed by the president. For the purposes of its investigations the commission shall be authorized to incur and have paid upon the certificate of its chairman such expenses as the commission shall deem necessary.

This is the Act passed at Washington to authorize the president to appoint the highest-class commission he could secure to investigate the whole question of the issuance of the securities of railways and to bring in a report dealing with the matter. Under this authority, the president appointed president Hadley, of Yale, chairman of the commission. Here is the president's letter of appointment:

Beverly, Massachusetts,
September 16, 1910.

Hon. Arthur T. Hadley,
President Yale University,
New Haven, Conn.

Under the provision of section 16 of the Act of Congress approved June 18, 1910, entitled an 'Act to create a commerce court,' and to amend the Act entitled an 'Act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, as heretofore amended and for other purposes, I hereby appoint you chairman of a commission to investigate questions pertaining to the issuance of stocks and bonds by railroad corporations, subject to the provisions of the Act to regulate commerce, and the power of Congress to regulate or affect the same.

WM. H. TAFT.

Professor Hadley, of Yale, is known as one of the ablest publicists of the United States. Associated with him are other able publicists, and the commission are now dealing with this question. They have had hearings all over the country, and, as far as I can judge, the evidence is all to one effect, and that is that it is absolutely in the interest of the railroads themselves, of the corporations, of the investors, to have complete regulation and control of securities issued by railroad companies. If you ask me what the 'insurgent' movement in the United States means, I say it means a rebellion of the people against the excessive charges of the railroads and a determined effort to bring about reform. They have come to the conclusion that, to strike the evil at its root, there must be regulation of the finances of the railway. And in the United States it is harder to regulate corporations than it is here; for it is provided under the constitution that investors must be allowed a fair return on their investment; you cannot injure a man's investment, and if there has been an extravagant issue of securities, the Railway Commission in the United States is limited by this provision that a reasonable return must be allowed on the investment.

No such law obtains here in Canada fortunately and our commission can regulate, but in all fairness the investor ought to be protected and ought to get a reasonable return on his investment. However, before that security issues, it ought to be shown that it is absolutely in the interest of the undertaking, not of some stock operator or Harriman or some one who wants to make a fortune out of what is called the reorganization of a company. The reason ought to be given and has now to be given in the State of New York, and there is every prospect that the Congress of the United States will add to the general railway law of that country provisions which will secure control of all railway capital. The same thing has been dealt with by other eminent men in the United States, among them Mr. Woodrow Wilson. Mr. Woodrow Wilson, Governor of New Jersey, is one of the new type of public men who are coming up in the United States and Canada ought to watch with the greatest interest the rise of these new public men in the United States who devote themselves to public service; I am glad to say that the legal profession is furnishing the greatest number of these men. Governor Wilson is an excellent sample of this type. At his inauguration as Governor of New Jersey the other day he said that the first thing to which he would devote himself in connection with the legislature of New Jersey would be the regulation of the capitalization of companies chartered in that state. Everybody knows that the State of New Jersey has been abused by men getting corporate powers of every kind with enormous capitalization. The State of New Jersey would give any power to any corporation and give capital by the millions, which only meant water. He is of the opinion that the regulation of the capital of railways must be handled in a scientific way by a well-trained commission, and all the leading magazine articles in the United States dealing with the grievances of the people of the United States in connection with railways have taken the ground that the first essential is the regulation of the capitalization of railways. They have seen that the railway grievance has its origin there, and have come to the conclusion, as was expressed by Mr. Kuhn of the great firm of Kuhn, Loeb & Company, who backed Harriman more than any one else, that the regulation of capital has got to come. The day when one man like Harriman or the Vanderbilts could reorganize a railway with an enormously increased capital and put the increased stock in his own pocket is over. Harriman's last act in reorganizing the railways of Southern California and the west was to make such an increase in the stock that the orange and fruit men of California have to-day to pay $12,000,000 of increased railway rates because of his reorganization of the railways he acquired. He accumulated an enormous sum in the four or five years by what he called reorganizing companies, getting control, making a great bond issue which he gave to the public who bought them and then putting the money in his pocket. That is the idea of his gigantic financing for his own benefit, but he had also a good idea of reconstructing and reorganizing railroads and his policy and the policy carried out by his successors has had the effect of greatly improving the railways, but at the same time greatly increasing the rates on these railroads so that they have become a public grievance to-day.

Now to bring the case right home to us in Canada and to the people who are served by the Canadian Pacific railway in the east or in the west, I would point out that the Canadian Pacific railway in its original charter was allowed to issue I think $25,000,000 of capital. It has now, according to its statement, $150,000,000 of capital out. It received from the Governor in Council not long ago authority to issue $50,000,000 more capital and $30,000,000 of that has been issued. The Canadian Pacific railway has to-day a capital stock of $180,000,000. It has of 4 per cent preference stock $55,000,000, and of 4 per cent consolidated debenture stock $136,000,000, or about $200,000,000 in stock and $200,000,000 in debentures and bonds. It still has a right to issue $20,000,000 more under authority given to it by the Governor in Council, two or three years ago. My contention is that a great corporation like the Canadian Pacific railway to-day can finance itself and build every mile of railroad it requires on the issue of 4 per cent debenture stock on which only 4 per cent has to be earned. But they are issuing stock on which 14 per cent has been paid for several years now and that is a thing which should not be allowed. The Canadian Pacific railway is paying by dividends and bonuses to stockholders on the issue of new stock below the market price, as I can prove by stockholders and the market reports, more than 14 per cent a year on their capital stock. Why should not that money or any new money required by the Canadian Pacific railway be obtained by the issue of 4 per cent debentures if they can float them, and that they can float them is evidenced by the experience in the past. The Canadian Pacific railway is in such a good position to-day that it can put out 4 per cent debentures and get all the money it wants, but instead of doing that it asks to have power to increase its stock. Let me tell you what has happened in regard to this last issue of stock. They came to the Governor in Council and got authority to issue $50,000,000 of stock. If there had been a commission here with full power to investigate, as in New York, they would have gone to the commission and said: 'We want $50,000,000,' 'What for? For the undertaking?' 'Yes.' 'Wholly for the undertaking and no one else?' 'Yes.' When they had proved that that amount was necessary for the undertaking and was to be devoted to the undertaking, they would ask what form the security was to be in. The road might say: 'Oh, we would like it in stock.' Stock? What about 4 per cent debentures? You have a great many out now and the public are satisfied with them, the investor is satisfied. You must put the securities in the form of 4 per cent debentures or bonds. Under existing conditions they said: 'We want stock and the government of the day in the innocence of their hearts, and I know they are not fully informed as they have many things to attend to, although the would have avoided the whole responsibility if they had had a public service commission, gave them authority to issue $50,000,000 of stock some two years, $30,000,000 of that stock was put out on the market a short time ago, and it was all allotted to their own shareholders. Every shareholder had a right to take his proportionate share of this new stock. I raised considerable row about it in this House although I had little support, but my complaint had this effect that the Board of Directors of the Canadian Pacific railway decided to make some concession to public opinion and decided at last to issue to their own shareholders at $125, although the market price then was $175, and the law in England is as it is in the state of New York, that if a company issues stock it must issue it at the market price

It is considered a crime in this country to compel a railway or any corporation that proposes to issue new stock to put it out at the most money it will bring. So, the Canadian Pacific railway which to-day serves more of the people of Canada than any other railway, is allowed by a law of this kind to sell its shares to its own shareholders at $125 for a hundred dollar share when on the market those shares would be worth $175 each. As a consequence the $30,000,000 of shares that were issued put $37,500,000 into the treasury of the company but put $15,000,000 into the pockets of the shareholders as a bonus. That $15,000,000 should have gone into the treasury and been devoted to the purposes of the undertaking. It was a breach of public trust, it was a violation of the rights of the people, it was a violation of the rights of the farmers of the west, who are to-day complaining of the freight rates, that that $15,000,000 should be switched away from the purposes of the undertaking and put into the pockets of the shareholders. What is the result? The stock of the Canadian Pacific railway is worth $215 for a hundred dollar share. Why? Because a rumour has gone abroad that another melon is to be cut, that this remaining $20,000,000 of stock is to be issued at an amount below the market value and that that money is going to the shareholders as a bonus instead of being concentrated to the reduction of the rates charged by the Canadian Pacific railway to the people of Canada for the transportation of their products. It is a crime against the consumer. It is the man who has to pay for what is transported over the railway, the farmer of the west, the man who raises the grain, or the man who buys it to use it, who has to suffer. He has to pay for this money that the Canadian Pacific railway shareholders have unfairly, unjustly, and most improperly been allowed to put in their own pockets. I have here a statement which I read in the House once before, and which I can read again, in which a shareholder of the railway said that he had found that his Canadian Pacific railway investment had netted him more than 14 per cent per annum for the last five years. That has got to be stopped, and if the Canadian Pacific Railway Board now propose to issue that stock, under the present state of affairs and in view of the cry of the people of the west that they have a grievance both with regard to the operation of the railway and freight charges, and if they have a grievance that we can regulate, I say that it is the duty of this House to compel the Canadian Pacific railway when they issue that new stock to put every dollar of it into the treasury and to devote every dollar of it to the undertaking, either to the building of new lines or to the reduction of rates. The Canadian Pacific railway to-day has such enormous profits and resources that it has $20,000,000, or $30,000,000, or $40,000,000 of deposits in the banks of this country. It has even been in a position to lend money to the government of this country. It has become in one case the banker of the government. I do not know whether the people of Canada are aware of that fact. Here is a great corporation which we have created in order to serve the public which has accumulated so much money in the carrying out of its undertaking that it has millions and millions of deposits in the banks. There is no other railway in America that is in the same position. There is no other railway in America but is seeking to borrow money. The Canadian Pacific railway has so much money in its treasury that it could build every line that it requires in the west without issuing another dollar of stock or another debenture. I was in the railway committee to-day, and I found this company applying to issue debentures for branches in the west to the extent of $30,000 a mile, an altogether unnecessary amount. It makes this proposal notwithstanding the immense sums that it has in its treasury, its land grants and all that. My contention is, as I said on the floor of this House the other day, that these enormous assets, these accumulations, should go back to the people in the shape of reduced rates, and that there should be no issue of capitalization hereafter unless it can be absolutely justified by the facts after it has been laid before a railway commission competent to deal with such a question.

Now, we have undertaken to regulate the rates of the railways in this country. Surely it is a reasonable inference from that to say that we must regulate the capitalization of the railways. That is the line of argument upon which they are proceeding in the United States to-day, and that is the line of argument to which we ourselves must come. My motion is to the effect that the issue of securities by the railways of this country should first be approved of by a commission. It is not fair to put this duty on the Governor in Council. I do not know whether it was the present or the preceding government that gave that power to the Governor in Council. I am not criticising any one who gave it or criticising any exercise of it that has taken place so much as I am asserting that it must cease, and that in connection with the issue of this $20,000,000 of new stock the scandal shall not be allowed to continue. It is a great scandal that the proceeds of stock issued to the public for the benefit of the undertaking should be switched into the pockets of the shareholders. No wonder the stock of the Canadian Pacific railway is going up. No wonder the Dutch investors think this is the greatest investment in the world. But it is at the expense of the people who pay the freight rates of Canada that they are enabled to cut melons, not only giving these men 7 per cent on the face of their stock, but giving them a bonus of 7 per cent for five years instead of applying this 7 per cent for the benefit of the people of Canada by way of a reduction in rates. Why, this is a fine investment. No wonder that the Canadian Pacific railway has a fine standing in the money centres of the world. But this is based on a false doctrine, on an unfair procedure, and it discriminates against the public who have to pay the railway rates. The Canadian Pacific railway to-day, by reason of its accumulations, could reduce passenger rates to 2 cents a mile. They could reduce their express rates, they could reduce their telegraph tolls, and they could reduce their freight rates. The freight rates, the telegraph tolls, the express charges, and the passenger rates in the Canadian west and the Canadian east are a great grievance, and they should not continue. Their finances are in such a condition that they could reduce their rates to a very large extent. In fact, I am told that they would like to reduce them only the bogey has been set up in this country that if you reduce the rates of one railway you have to reduce them on all, and as it would hurt some you must not reduce them on any. I do not subscribe to that doctrine. The Canadian Pacific railway is under more absolute control than the others because that was provided for in the original charter. Hereafter there must be regulation of the issue of securities. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals gave me, some time ago, an engagement that he would look into the matter. Perhaps he has got more light on the subject since. But, it is in the interest of the transportation of this country and in the interest of lower rates that the regulation of the issue of securities must be taken up and be taken up in the scientific way in which it has been taken up in the United States, in the way in which it has been taken up by the State of New York, and in the way President Taft proposes to take it up when he gets this report from the specal commissioners who have been appointed to investigate the subject. I have come to the conclusion that if the people of the west wish to have their grievances reduced the first thing for them to do is to insist on parliament placing the control of the capitalization of these railways within the hands of our railway commission.

I am quite satisfied that this commission which the government has created, is more competent than either the government itself or a promiscuous body like the railway commission of this House to deal with such a matter. I believe we should follow what is done in England where all securities that are issued are put up to competition and are not left to the whim or advice of company directors to say how they are to be placed. When the Grain Growers' were here from the west they mentioned incidentally that there were railway grievances in the west although the principal thing they came to complain about, was the tariff, and yet the other day I had to stand up in this House alone fighting for the rights of the people of the Canadian west with the members from that section of the country indifferent to my appeal. However, I got a letter from the west which is one little green spot in a very dark outlook.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). The Prime Minister says 'hear, hear,' but I remember a time when he too was in the wilderness and had not many supporters at his back. I am to-day in the wilderness when urging the rights of the people of the west but the little letter I got was a solace to me and while I read it, I will particularly ask hon. gentlemen who represent western constituencies to listen:

THE NORMANTON GRAIN GROWERS' ASSOCIATION, SASKATCHEWAN.

March 1, 1911.

Sir,—I am directed to forward to you this resolution, which was passed at the last meeting of this association:

Resolved, we the Normanton Grain Growers' Association, wish to set on record our appreciation of your recent address on the floor of the Dominion parliament, on the excessive freight rates now in force, and whi'st assuring you of our admiration and support, note with regret that you received no support, not even from the western members.

Yours truly,

W. J. LAWLESS,
Secretary.

W. F. Maclean, Esq., M.P.,
Ottawa.

The people of the west have grievances against the railways and the root of these grievances is to be found in the system of capitalization which it is time for this parliament to regulate, especially in the case of railroads who are coming along now looking for charters and power to issue capital. My proposal is to put the power of fixing the capital, whether it be stock, bonds, or any other security, under the control of our railway commission, for I believe that the regulation of the capitalization of the railroads is only a complement to the regulation of the rates. We have adopted the principle of regulating railroad rates and as a complement to that, it is absolutely necessary to regulate the caption so that the traffic may not be too much burdened with excessive dividends and excessive returns of other kinds on the stock. Now, I would like to have some supporters for the motion I am about to present to the House; I do not present it as a motion of want of confidence, I urge it solely in the interests of the people of Canada. I move:

That before the said motion pass, this House desires to express the opinion that the control of the capitalization of the railways of Canada should be within the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Hon. G. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals). I have been much interested in the remarks of my hon. friend concerning the capitalization of railways, and which of course, will apply to the capitalization of all companies. I do not think it can be denied that capitalization has a great deal to do with the rates charged and what we might call the necessary cost of operating and managing these utilities. The hon. gentleman has made a comparison between tariffs and transportation and they are connected in a sense. The problem of transportation properly solved will do a great deal to minimize the evils which may come through a tariff or the lack of a tariff. depending upon the point of view you look at it. In Germany the state-owned railways are used in large measure as an adjunct to the tariff. If a German manufacturer is in competition with a foreign manufacturer outside of Germany, I am told he is given very cheap rates on his products to the confines of the German Empire, and conversely if a foreign manufacturer is competing with him in the German market, the state owned railway puts almost prohibitive freight rates on that foreign manufacturer's goods. In that way the railway rates are made to assist German manufacturers and are an adjunct to the tariff. That may prevail to a certain extent in Canada at the present time, but that is a point I shall not discuss. However, a great deal of fear has been expressed in many quarters that any international board that might have the power to deal with two local rates, one on each side of the line, and making one through rate, might interfere in a measure with certain privileges that the railways on both sides have, in regard to high or low rates on products coming in or going out of the country.

Mr. LENNOX. Is it a fact as rumoured that the government has abandoned the idea of an international railway board?

Mr. GRAHAM. My hon. friend asks me a very pointed question, and I would not care to answer him 'yes,' or 'no,' on that particular point. At the present time the question of an international arrangement is not being discussed and is not actively engaging the attention of the government.

Mr. LENNOX. That is a fair answer.

Mr. GRAHAM. My hon. friend (Mr. Maclean) has referred to rates in western Canada. During a recent trip in the west, I had prepared for me a comparative table of rates on farm products from the interior of western Canada to Port Arthur and Fort William, and of rates from the interior of the western states to Duluth and these were the rates I was discussing in the House when I said that the farmers of the Canadian west had cheaper rates on their products to the Great Lakes than had the farmers of the western states, and I have no reason to change my mind on that.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). In special instances.

Mr. GRAHAM. I took a list covering the whole of the west, of rates from the large farm product shipping centres and I found that the Canadian farmer had a cheaper rate on his wheat and oats to the Great Lakes at Fort William and Port Arthur than had the American farmer to Duluth.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Did that include coal?

Mr. GRAHAM. Let me tell my hon. friend that from Fort William or Port Arthur to Winnipeg, although the distance is some miles longer, the rate on coal is 50 cents a ton less than the rate from Duluth to Winnipeg.

Mr. GRAHAM.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). I have the authority of the 'Free Press' for saying that the coal rates to Winnipeg and the west from the country to the south are greater in Canada than in the States.

Mr. GRAHAM. Winnipeg and the west get their coal largely, I think, by the Great Lakes, and the rate from Port Arthur and Fort William to Winnipeg is $2.50 a ton, while the rate from Duluth to Winnipeg, a shorter distance, and mostly through American territory, is $3 per ton; and the commission has refused to reduce this rate on the ground that it is fair as compared with other rates in American territory. Now, there is a difference in the situation in the United States and in Canada as to capitalization. There is also a difference between Great Britain and Canada in this respect. We are a young country, while these two other countries are comparatively old. In the United States railway charters are granted by letters patent in the various states; in Canada they are granted by Act of parliament; and any dangers there may be from over-capitalization are in the hands of parliament itself. It may be that the time is arriving when other steps ought to be taken; but hitherto the Canadian people and parliament have seen fit to keep in the hands of parliament this question of capitalization when companies are organized. In New York state the capitalization of railways is not for the construction of new lines into new portions of the country; it is for old railways, for the development of terminals, the building of large stations, the changing from steam to electricity, or some such purpose. The conditions are different in Canada, where companies are formed to make the experiment of building new lines into new territories, which may or may not be productive. I am glad to say that they have been productive in the past, and, if we may judge by the course of the Canadian Pacific Railway stock, which is going up every day so that men of ordinary means can hardly reach it, the prospect for transportation companies in Canada in the future is really good. The Canadian Pacific railway is in a class all by itself in many ways. This much must be remembered. Although liberal provision was made for the Canadian Pacific railway, although the company got a large grant of land which, owing to the development of Canada, has proved valuable beyond our expectations, no person will deny that in the first place the men who put their money into the Canadian Pacific railway took a mighty big chance.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). How much did they pay for it?

Mr. GRAHAM. They did not pay a great deal, but my hon. friend will remember that at one time in the early history of the Canadian Pacific railway, it was on the verge of not being worth anything, and if the government of Canada had not come to its assistance, it would have gone into bankruptcy.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). How much did they pay for their stock?

Mr. GRAHAM. They put everything they had as financiers and their individual character behind this road, and they made a success of it. In discussing it we should not forget that. I could make a fair argument by saying that it is not altogether unjust that the men who made this experiment should have the first chance to make what profit there was in the investment. I do not see that we ought to give the Canadian Pacific railway more than its share. I am not arguing for the Canadian Pacific railway; but this must be borne in mind, that the greatest benefit that has come to the Canadian Pacific railway has come through the increase in the value of its real estate. If we were to confine them solely to the profits of the railway, I am not so sure that they would have such a good story to tell. But Canada has become a great country; we have done a great deal to develop the railways and other transportation facilities of this country, and the lands in western Canada have become valuable far beyond what any one expected. In discussing such questions as this we are very apt to be guided by hindsight. The Canadian Pacific railway has been a great success, and we are glad of it; but we must not go to the other extreme, and condemn this undertaking merely because it has been a great success. We should bear in mind that the Canadian Pacific railway has been guided through very dangerous times by the aid of the people of Canada; and while we were doing that, while we were maintaining the credit of the country and making the Canadian Pacific railway a standing advertisement of the greatness and growth of Canada, three-fourths of the railways of the United States have at some period passed into liquidation.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Because of overcapitalization.

Mr. GRAHAM. That may be. If that is the case, the Canadian Pacific railway has not been guilty, because it has not had the same experience. Seventy-five per cent of the railways on the continent of America have at some time or other passed into liquidation, and the people who put their money into these railways originally have been wiped out of existence financially. But the Canadian Pacific railway has lost none of its original stock, and I think it is greatly to the credit of the Dominion of Canada that an enterprise of that kind has been carried through, and that the men and the women who have invested in it have had a safe investment. I would like to see all the investments made in Canada, whether of foreign or home capital, so successful that we would never have any trouble in getting all the capital we want.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Does the minister justify, then, the cutting of these melons?

Mr. GRAHAM. I will come to that. My hon. friend's argument has been made from a state law, not a federal law. The new court that has been established by the Congress of the United States has not been established for the purpose of looking after capitalization particularly, and for a very good reason, that most of the railways of the United States get their charters from state authority and not federal authority. This new court has been established—and I think Mr. Knapp is to be a member and perhaps the head of that court—in order to provide for a speedy judgment in the case of appeals from the decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission. That commission, being able to deal only with interstate traffic, does not occupy the same position as the Dominion Board of Railway Commissioners. When our commissioners give a judgment, there are only two things on which an appeal can be made. An appeal can be made on a question of fact to the Governor in Council or on a question of law to the Supreme Court, but they must first obtain the permission of the board. In the United States the position is altogether different. The parties can go from court to court, and the whole procedure is more cumbersome. In order to get over that difficulty, the federal authorities are establishing a new commerce court to deal effectively and speedily with all such appeals.

It must also be borne in mind that in a new country like ours there are difficulties in financing not experienced in older countries. We have railways which are being constructed by the Grand Trunk railway, the Grand Trunk Pacific, and the Canadian Northern railway, and to-day the complaint throughout the west is that the railway companies are not pushing their new lines nearly fast enough. If we insist however on their going faster, they must provide more capital.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). That complaint was made with regard to the Canadian Pacific railway.

Mr. GRAHAM. It happened that the Canadian Pacific railway was up before the Railway Committee to-day. It all depends on whose Bill is before the committee, and we have to be careful not to do anything that may shake the confidence of the financial world in such undertakings in this country. I am not speaking as an advocate at all of any railway company. It does not make a particle of difference to me what railway company may be affected. I am not in the position of my hon. friend who can attack a railway or anybody else solely on his individual responsibility, and his responsibility of course to those he represents; but in dealing with a question of this kind, and holding the position in which I am placed at present, I consider that I am responsible to see that no injustice is done to any part of the community, not even the railway companies.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. GRAHAM. We want to let the world know that in this Dominion men who are induced to make investments shall be treated justly and honestly, and also that the people of the country shall not be imposed upon by these companies to whom we give such great privileges.

But coming to the question as to the granting to our board of railway commissioners the power to deal with capitalization, as I have said, the two systems are before us. In the United States the States themselves—not the federal authority—grant charters to railway companies by letters patent. In Canada the provinces grant charters to local railway companies and the federal authority grants charters to Dominion railway companies by Act of this parliament, and heretofore we have left in the hands of this parliament the right to deal with capitalization. In Canada the increase of capital is largely for the construction of new lines into new territories. In the United States it is largely for terminals or something in connection with old established lines. The conditions in both countries are different; but as my hon. friend points out, we are growing very rapidly in Canada and must soon be looking to the future, because it will not be long before we shall be unable to class ourselves among the young countries. The question to which he has directed our attention is one certainly worthy of being considered. I have discussed it with some of our leading railway men, I have discussed it with the chairman of our Board of Railway Commissioners, I have discussed it with some gentlemen on the other side of the line, and I tell my hon. friend frankly that I have not yet been able to convince myself that Canada is prepared to take the step he recommends at present. Possibly he may be right and I may be going a little carefully, but with the responsibility I feel, speaking for the government and the people of Canada, I think we should go slowly. One of our strong points when asking for money from the financiers of the world is to go slowly and not frighten capital, to do nothing to shake the confidence of the people who hold the purse strings. Our credit must be protected and will be. Let us then be careful in whatever we do so that in the future, as in the past, the capitalists of the world will be prepared to furnish the funds, when asked to do so, for any great undertaking Canada may have on hand.

My hon. friend has brought this motion in a peculiar way; and while I say that the question is one I have been considering, I am not convinced the time has yet come for us to make the move he advocates. I am much obliged to him for the information he has given in a matter for such deep interest, but the government could not accept the motion he has submitted. It is not one which we can amend. It is a vote of want of confidence, and it is asking us to adopt, without the investigation we think necessary, a new departure. I think he would do well not to press his motion to division because we all are anxious to do what is best for the people and to guard all the interests at work in the upbuilding of this country. This matter is under consideration. We are considering it, and wondering if it is the best thing to do. I am not yet convinced that this is the proper time to take such a step in advance, but the government has it in mind, and this, as all other questions connected with transportation in the cheapest way for the people, is receiving serious consideration and will continue to receive that consideration in the future.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

ALBERTA ELECTRIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. SPROULE moved the third reading of Bill (No. 93) to incorporate the Alberta Electric Railway Company.—Mr. McCarthy.

Mr. TURRIFF. In accordance with the notice I gave, I move that the Bill be referred back to the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of striking out section 14.

Motion agreed to, and House went again into committee on the Bill.

Mr. TURRIFF moved that section 14 be struck out.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. member (Mr. McCarthy) who is in charge of the Bill, is not present, and it would be too bad to amend it during his absence. I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again, allowing the Bill to stand until the hon. gentleman is here.

Mr. TURRIFF. This clause would authorize the company to carry on a coal mining business as well as run a railway. I think such a clause should not be passed. There is no objection to these people taking out a charter for a subsidiary company, and operating a coal mine under that charter, but a law should not be passed authorizing a railway company to own and operate a coal mine. I do not think there is much likelihood that this company will ever start a coal mine, but I do not support in this case, and do not intend to support in any case in the future, the proposal to give a railway company power under its charter to go into the coal mining business.

Mr. SPROULE. This Bill was allowed to stand yesterday because the hon. member who is in charge of it was not present. I agree with much of what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Turriff) has said. I contended against this feature of the Bill when it was in committee. But power similar to this has been given to other railway companies in that western country where coal is so plentiful, and there seems to be no very strong reason why we should grant such powers to one company and refuse them to another. We ought to treat all alike.

Mr. TURRIFF. If it is the desire of the committee to let the Bill stand over until the hon. member who is in charge of it is present, I have no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM. Is the hon. member for Calgary away only for to-day?

Mr. SPROULE. He is away temporarily, I understand.

Mr. GRAHAM. The Bill was allowed to stand the other night because the hon. gentleman was not here. I have no objection to having it stand over again if he will be here the next night.

Mr. STANFIELD. The hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) was in charge of the Bill the other night.

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, but the changes made on that occasion were by arrangement with the promoter. This change is one, I understand, which he does not desire to have made. However, if my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) is willing, we might leave it over until the next private Bills night.

Progress reported.

BRITISH COLUMBIA AND CENTRAL CANADA RAILWAY COMPANY.

House again in committee on Bill (No. 113) to incorporate the Dominion Development Company.—Mr. Smith (Nanaimo).

On section 1—corporate name.

Mr. McCRANEY. Yesterday notice of motion was given by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Smith), who is not here at present, to change the name of this company. In his absence, I would move that the section be amended so as to change the name of the company to 'The British Columbia and Central Canada Railway Company.'

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported as amended and read the third time and passed.

WAYS AND MEANS—CAPITALIZATION OF RAILWAYS.

House resumed discussion of the motion of Mr. Fielding that the House go into Committee of Ways and Means and the proposed amendment thereto.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Mr. Speaker, before this resolution is disposed of, I wish to offer a few observations. I have not gone into the subject with sufficient care and analysis to enable me to say whether the tribunal that is proposed to do this work is the best that could be devised, but at least it seems to me to be the best in sight and there would apparently be an appropriateness in assigning the duty to that tribunal because of the nature of their work and functions. Their chief duties are to look into the operations of railways, to deal with their tariffs and with disputes between railway companies and the people. The whole nature of their business is calculated to make them experienced in that line. For instance, in determining what is or is not a proper railway charge for freight or passengers, they are necessarily obliged to know how much money is invested in the railway, how much capital has been put into it by the company, and by borrowing or other means, possibly government subventions. I take it that one of their most important duties would be to allow the company to make such freight and passenger charges as would give them a fair remuneration for all the money that they put into that railway and all assistance that they acquire for that railway from certain sources. In my judgment it should not be from all sources, but I say that the Railway Commission would be bound to look into that carefully before they could intelligently determine the traffic charges that might be imposed. Therefore, if there is any tribunal in the country who ought to be able to analyse the subject it would be the Railway Commission. I am not going to say much about the capitalization of railways at the initial stages because parliament exercises its judgment with regard to the capital of a railway which is being incorporated, but we seem to do that in a very perfunctory way. I have often thought that we fix the capital at an arbitrary amount without intelligent inquiry as to why it should be fixed at that sum. We say it shall be about $10,000 a mile, but if we were asked why it should be $10,000 a mile, I venture to say that not one of the 170 members of the Railway Committee could say why. Therefore, we have arbitrarily fixed that rate and we do not permit them to go beyond that. A few years ago we gave bonding powers to railways of $15,000 a mile. It was afterwards raised to $20,000, since then it has been raised to $25,000 a mile, and this session of parliament we have given bonding powers of $30,000 a mile, and sometimes more, upon the plea that the country through which they must build is expensive to build in, or that the right of way is very dear. But we give very little attention to the bonding powers and do not exercise much care as to whether they are too high or too low. Therefore, as the minister says, parliament has in its own hands, the right to say what the bonding power shall be and we have no right to delegate it to the commission, but I do think that the perfunctory way in which we settle this question is an evidence that we do not go into it very carefully, and it would not be amiss if there was some other authority that would go into it much more carefully and intelligently.

This motion merely says that the capitalization of railways shall be under the Railway Commission. I think that is the best body to have it under and therefore I have no serious objection to the motion. I think there is not a member of this House who will not admit that the capitalization of railways as at present practised is a growing evil and productive of great injustice in many cases to the users of these railways as well as to many investors in railway stocks, because when new capital is issued it is usually gobbled up by the large stockholders who are often directors and have, therefore, power to allot the stock to themselves and deprive the small investor of the benefit to which he is properly entitled. Take the issue of Canadian Pacific railway stock last spring, Canadian Pacific railway is to-day selling at $214, but the stockholder who got that stock at $125 receives $100 to put in his pocket as a bonus. That in my judgment is not fair. It is well known that the railway companies in Canada are paying large interest on the money invested in them.

We give them a great deal of assistance to build these railways. The government give them many subventions, subsidies, guarantees of their bonds and help them in many ways. Why do they do it? —for the benefit of the country which needs a better system of transportation, for enabling these railway companies to carry the produce of the country at a moderate rate, and so as to indemnify the companies against loss on their investment. As a general thing, is money invested in railways lost? Take the history of the railway charters of Canada for the last quarter of a century or more—if you like for the last thirty or thirty-five years—and how many of these companies have lost money? Take Mackenzie & Mann: when I came into this House thirty-two or thirty-three years ago they were ordinary contractors whose financial means were very limited—I have been told, very small. Then, they commenced to build railways. What are they to-day? I suppose it would be very difficult to state approximately what they are worth, but I think it will be admitted that they are worth many millions of dollars, that they are probably worth $40,000,000, or $60,000,000 or $70,000,000. Could they possibly have made that amount by getting a fair return for their labour? No one will assert that they could. Then, how did they make it—by the assistance that parliament and the municipalities gave them, in the way of subsidies, grants of land, guarantees of stock and bonds and in a hundred other ways that the country can help them in order to ensure them a fair return on their money. If these companies were not getting a fair return for their money I could understand why we should give them the privilege of selling stock and allotting that stock to themselves below its ordinary market value. We gave them this assistance in order to make it practically impossible for them to lose money. We put it within their means to get a return of 10 or 20 and of even 40 or 50 per cent on the money they actually invest in the railway and that being the case there is no justifiable reason in the world why we should allow them to turn around and increase the stock of their railway not for the purpose of putting it into the betterment of the road or of extending the road a number of miles in one direction or the other, but for the purpose of putting it into their own pockets. There is no reason why we should grant them this assistance for the purpose of improving or extending the road, and not compel them to put that stock up for sale so that it will realize its full value in the markets of the country. For instance, if they wanted one hundred thousand dollars and they issued stock in the railway, if that stock were selling like the Canadian Pacific railway is to-day at 214, they would only require to issue less than $50,000 worth. because it would bring them $100,000. If that $100,000 were put into the road the users of the road would only require to pay interest upon that amount, but when they allot that stock to themselves and it is put in at fifty cents on the dollar there is only $50,000 put into the road, and yet the users of the road will be compelled to pay interest on $100,000.

That is an injustice which should be remedied in some way. That is one of the greatest evils that the country has to contend with to-day and parliament should address itself to the subject so as to find a remedy.

The Minister of Railways and Canals said that we cannot do what the United States have done because we do not charter railways in the same way as they do. He said that they take out letters of incorporation, practically they simply make their plan and file it. I do not know what control Congress has over stock issues, but in the United States they have found by experience that it is not safe to leave this matter in the hands of the companies. They have taken the right to control issues and properly so. But what difference is there between a railway corporation that gets a charter from us in the ordinary way and one that gets its charter from the United States in the way they grant charters there?—none so far as I can see. We give them the right to sell so much stock, and if that is not enough we give them the right to enlarge their stock as much as they like practically. There is no restraint upon them. Therefore that argument does not hold good. Then the minister said: You are talking about railways in the state of New York, but those are state concerns. He also said that interstate railways would be difficult things to contend with. I have no doubt that they would be, but I think the government of that country will endeavour to overcome that as well and take control of the capitalization of those roads. They have greater difficulties to contend with than we have because of the limited area in which these charter rights are operating. If these railways were under one control fom the Atlantic to the Pacific the question would be much easier to deal with than it is. The very fact that the states are taking up this question and dealing with these companies that are operating in a limited area, and that Congress is extending this control to the interstate railways is the best evidence that the problem that they have to contend with is much harder than the one we have here, and it is no argument against our doing what is proposed by this motion.

I am heartily in accord with the principle of controlling the stock issues of railways. I think it will have to be done earlier or later and the earlier a remedy is found for these things the easier it will be to find the remedy. As time goes on, as greater interests become involved, as vested rights become stronger and stronger, and corporations become more and more powerful, it is always harder to find a remedy and more difficult to put it in operation. Therefore, the earlier we tackle it the better it will be for ourselves and the country as well.

The country has for a long time been under the impression that this is a pernicious system and members are often asked why parliament does not take it up. That question has been put to me a hundred times. I often say that this is one of the things that it is so hard to find a suitable remedy for that parliament is reluctant to undertake it. But the answer comes: What is the duty of parliament? Is it not to grapple with these problems that affect the interests of the people? Should parliament refrain from doing it because it seems a hard task? Not at all, in my judgment. The harder the task is the more we should apply ourselves to it, and the harder we should endeavour to find a remedy. It is no excuse to say that because the task is a difficult one we should not make an effort to find a remedy. I think we ought to do so, and because there is no better remedy in sight I am disposed to support the proposal contained in this resolution.

Mr. THOMAS BEATTIE (London). Mr. Speaker, I have no sympathy with this resolution. It seems to me that it has been moved by the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) to suit his own purposes. I have the best opinion of the Canadian Pacific railway. We have reason as Canadians to be proud of the railway. That stock within my recollection sold for 38 cents on the dollar, and the member for York would not dare to and did not buy thirty-eight cents worth of it, but he comes forward to-day and finds fault with the Canadian Pacific railway. Well, Canada and the British Empire have reason to be proud of the Canadian Pacific railway. No railway has attained the same high position it has, and I venture to predict that if the Canadian Pacific railway would buy that man he would not open his mouth on it.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must withdraw those words; they are not parliamentary.

Mr. BEATTIE. I do not wish to be unparliamentary or rude, but I have that opinion of the gentleman.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. BEATTIE. It is well known he has brought this question up time and time again and what object he has in view, I do not know, but of course it is well known that the hon. gentleman has no love for anything that is good for the country. The hon. gentleman is one of those extraordinary men who finds fault with everything that is good in this country. The Canadian Pacific railway has made its mark in Canada; it has been conducted by wise and honest management and no man in Canada has a right to dare to get up and say anything against that company. The men who have brought the Canadian Pacific railway to its present success, are worthy men, and if they had been men of a different class we would not have such a splendid railway as we have to-day. The Canadian Pacific railway has been conducted by wise, honourable, respectable, responsible gentlemen. The hon. gentleman from York does not bear the best reputation in this world for being honest or straightforward.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member should not use these expressions; they are not parliamentary.

Mr. BEATTIE. I will not use them, but I think so all the same.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. BEATTIE. The hon. member for York came to London some two years ago to oppose me in my election, and I telegraphed him to know what he came for, and he did not answer my telegram, and when I sent to his hotel, he was found locked up in his room and the bell boy could not find him. He had the audacity to state during the election in North York that I was against public ownership and that that was the reason he opposed me. He had no right to say so, because it was a falsehood. He did not know whether I was in favour of public ownership or not, but I may tell him that I am not against public ownership if it is conducted by honest, straightforward men. He ran for York, and the Conservatives would not oppose him, and the Liberals would not oppose him simply because they were afraid that if they did, he could get in between the two. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to say anything unparliamentary, but I can tell you that if the Canadian Pacific railway offered him a sum of money you would not hear from him in this House.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order, these words must be withdrawn.

Mr. BEATTIE. All right, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER. These words should be withdrawn.

Mr. BEATTIE. I cannot help stating my opinion.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must withdraw these words; he cannot be allowed to use such expressions in parliament.

Mr. BEATTIE. Well, when I find a gentleman going to a public meeting——

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must withdraw these words.

Mr. BEATTIE. I withdraw them. The hon. gentleman has no right to go to a public meeting in South York and tell a falsehood about me, as he did when he said I was against public ownership and he said that to the mayor of West Toronto. I am strongly opposed to this motion. I think the Canadian Pacific railway is well managed by honourable men and it is a credit to the Dominion and to the British Empire. There is no railway in the United States or any other country that has had the same success as the Canadian Pacific railway has had. Every man that has invested a dollar in it has done well, and all the financial institutions in this country and elsewhere, are delighted with its success. If the hon. gentleman had gone into Canadian Pacific railway he would be the last man to get up here to say a word against it. He has not gone into it and now he tries to do everything he can against it. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will conclude, but there are a great many things I would like to say of the hon. gentleman if you would allow me. However, I have great pleasure in voting against this motion.

Mr. SPEAKER. I declare the amendment negatived.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Yeas and nays.

Mr. SPEAKER. The amendment is lost on division.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). All right.

Motion (Mr. Fielding) agreed to and the House went into Committee of Ways and Means.

WAYS AND MEANS—RECIPROCAL TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton) resuming—Mr. Chairman, when I moved the adjournment of the debate on Thursday night last, I was discussing the attitude of the different political parties in Canada towards the coal industry. It is well known that in Ontario and in the western sections of Canada fault is found with the Canadian plenipotentiaries particularly with the Minister of Finance that he did not reduce the coal duty more than he did, while the Conservative press in Nova Scotia and in the east, find fault with him because he reduced that tariff too much, and the argument is there made by our Conservative friends that the Liberal government and the Liberal party are not the friends of that great industry. In this way is capital sought to be made against the government. I was pointing out, Sir, when the debate was adjourned, that on every occasion when the coal industry of Nova Scotia required consideration and protection it received that consideration and protection from the Minister of Finance and from this government. I was pointing out further that the Conservative party had no claim to any particular guardianship over that great industry and that their history does not give them any warrant to claim that they have done anything in particular for the coal industry in Canada, and particularly in Nova Scotia, where the industry really had its origin. It is contended by members of the Conservative party that the National Policy was largely created originally for the sake of the coal industry and that it has done it much good. But, I would point out that practically throughout the whole life of the National Policy there was a statutory offer that coal would be made free of duty in Canada whenever it was made free of duty in the United States, an offer which stood on the statute-books of Canada from 1879 down to 1904, two years before the Conservatives went out of office. That offer was allowed to stand on our statute-books for 16 years by the Conservatives, and no advantage having been taken of it, I suppose they got tired of seeing it there and so they took it off. I also pointed out that in 1890 the Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald then Prime Minister of Canada offered free coal to the United States. Now, I do not think there is any responsible person in this House on the Conservative side who will say that coal should be protected to any greater extent than it will be under this compact if ratified, or protected to any greater extent than it is by the tariff as it stands to-day. When I had the honour of holding a seat in the legislature of Nova Scotia this question of duty on coal was under consideration. As the members who represent the coal counties of Nova Scotia are called to task for their support of this government, and as my own course in that regard is called in question, I wish to point out that the position I am taking to-day on the coal question, is but the position I have always taken. Speaking in the local House over ten years ago, as may be found on page 7 of the Debates of the Legislature of Nova Scotia for the year 1901, I said:

> I am in favour of duties upon coal, and of bounties upon iron and steel and of everything that is considered to be necessary for the protection of every industry now established or hereafter to be established in the province of Nova Scotia or in the Dominion.

It is not necessary for me to quote anything further from the address I made to the legislature at that time. The short quotation which I have made shows the position which I then took, a position which I still occupy. I submit, therefore, that it is not fair for hon. gentlemen either in this House or out of it to be claiming for themselves a position in regard to that great industry, in the province of Nova Scotia, in British Columbia, or wherever we have mining coal, to which they are not entitled. It is said in the press of Nova Scotia that the Premier of that province, the Hon. G. H. Murray, is not favourable to the coal industry, and that he is in the compact with those who are making the agreement with the United States to ruin the coal industry. The Hon. Mr. Murray has a record on the coal question that puts him beyond any attacks of that kind. When there was some speculation in 1897, when it was not known what the Fielding tariff was going to be in regard to the duties on coal, the Premier of Nova Scotia dissolved the legislature, called upon the people to pass judgment on that question, and nailed his colours to the mast in favour of a tariff sufficient to protect that great industry. The Hon. Mr. Murray, having taken that position at that time and every time since, has made a record for himself that will not bear any adverse criticism to-day from hon. gentlemen who may wish to make political capital out of the slight reduction in the coal duty now proposed.

So far as the present agreement is concerned, I have heard no specific criticism of it from hon. gentlemen on the opposition side. They make the bald statement that it is a bad agreement, that it is going to disturb conditions in this country, that it is a severe blow at the loyalty of the people of this country. But there is no specific criticism of any particular item of the agreement. Nobody has said, here is something that should be in the agreement that is left out, or here is something in it that should not be there. I have heard no gentleman of responsibility, or indeed no member of this House, telling the Minister of Finance that he has not dealt with the coal industry or the steel industry in the best interest of those industries; and while the hon. gentleman who is responsible for the policy and the destinies of the Conservative party in this House does not venture to say anything against the agreement so far as these industries are concerned, I submit that the press and others outside of this House who speak on the side of that party are stopped from taking that ground. On the question of the tariff generally, the position of the Conservative party is most extraordinary. In 1897, when the Fielding tariff was brought down, Sir Chas. Tupper assailed it on the ground that it was to be the ruin of every industry, every mine and every other work that, according to him, depended for its existence upon the tariff policy of the Conservative party. This chorus was taken up by his friends, who had no doubt that his prophecy would be fulfilled. After waiting for a while, they found that the prophecies did not turn out as they had expected, and they came to the conclusion that they had made a mistake in raising the howl they did against the policy of the Minister of Finance, and that they should have said that there was no change at all, and that it was the same old National Policy. But it took them quite a while to reach that conclusion. We find that in 1903 the present hon. leader of the opposition moved as an amendment to the budget a resolution to this effect:

That the House, regarding the operation of the present tariff as unsatisfactory, is of opinion that this country requires a declared policy of such adequate protection to its labour, agricultural products, manufactures and industries as will at all times secure the Canadian market for Canadians.

It is quite evident that in 1903 the Conservative party did not think that they had the National Policy, because they said: This policy is not satisfactory; it is not sufficient protection; it is going to ruin the country; it is not the grand old National Policy. There was no change in the tariff between 1907 and 1903; and if it was not the National Policy that we had in 1903, and the tendency of the Liberal policy ever since has been to a lower tariff, how is it that to-day, when we have the great and marvellous prosperity so much boasted of by the hon. leader of the opposition, we have it without the National Policy? It certainly cannot be argued that we had the National Policy in 1903 when they moved this resolution. If we did not have it then, we certainly have not got it to-day. It is impossible to argue with any logic that we have to-day any other tariff than the Fielding tariff according to the records of our hon. friends opposite; and if the tariff is satisfactory, it is one to which they have no right to claim any credit whatever.

I have here a record of the position taken by different leading members of the opposition on the question of the tariff. When our friends from the west who support the opposition pretend that they have any expectation of a lower tariff should the party they support ever obtain office, I wish to point out to them the record of their leading men on this question. I have here quotations from speeches made by a number of them. Here, for instance, is what the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain) said in 1903, at page 1499 of 'Hansard.'

That hon. gentleman is one of the leaders of the opposition and we have no record of any change of policy or heart on his part since he used the language I am about to quote, in 1903. This was the position he then took and which he now takes:

I hold that the tariff should be so arranged that every institution in this country that is manufacturing goods to be consumed by the Canadian people will have sufficient protection to keep out the same classes of goods made in any foreign country; and I have no hesitation in saying that if that country should be England, the policy of Canada should be framed in the interests of the Canadian taxpayer as against the people who are producing the same class of goods, even in the old country under the same flag.

There is not a word in all that about this great loyalty to the British flag of which we now hear so much. My hon. friend was then prepared to put a tax on anybody and everybody in order to make this a highly protected country. To-day, however, he advocates reciprocity within the empire. But how can you reconcile protection to Canadian manufacturers against their British competitors with reciprocity within the British Empire. I fail to see how we can have a tariff wall around Canada and at the same time reciprocity within the empire. I fail to see how we can have anything except free trade among Britain and all her possessions. There is no hope of the British people accepting anything but free trade judging by the results of the last election; and if we are going to have an exchange of goods all around between the different parts of the empire and Canada, we must accept free trade in its entirety between Britain and her possessions. I would like to know what my hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Blain) will say to the Canadian manufacturers, who are so strongly in favour of protection when they are told that this policy of reciprocity must mean absolute free trade at all events with Great Britain, although in 1903 my hon. friend was prepared to put up a Chinese wall to keep out British manufacturers from this country.

Let me now quote another hon. gentleman in this House, the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) who stands high in the councils of the Conservative party. He was a veteran in politics in this House when some of those who are leaders to-day were but children in the political field. He does not agree in the cry that we on this side stole the clothes of the Conservatives and confiscated their policy. The tariff policy of this government was too low, and he could not see, therefore, how we could have stolen it from them. This is what he said:

It was said in the early days of the present tariff, that the Liberals had stolen our clothes. I have never said so, but, of course, when the preferential duty was only 12½ per cent, and when on coloured cotton goods, and many other goods the duties were pratically the same as under the Conservative regime, there was some reason for, perhaps, coming to the conclusion, without due consideration that the Liberals had stolen our clothes. But I do not consider that they have done anything of the kind. I am only sorry that they did not, for it would have been better for the country if they had. Their tariff is instead, just the antipodes of ours.

Then my hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Taylor) who is a strong party man, says that he would not consider any tariff too high which was high enough to keep out any competition with our manufacturers even the British. This is what he said:

Thus we sent to the United States last year nearly $2,000,000 to purchase these implements. In a very few years there will be nothing left of them but a heap of iron, and the Americans will have $2,000,000, whereas, if we had a government that would have given adequate protection, every one of these articles would have been made in this country. Employment would have been given to our working men, Canadian farmers would be supplying a home market, and we would have those $2,000,000 in Canada as a national capital to help on our progress and development.

That is the position taken by my hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Taylor). I simply quote these extracts to show my hon. friends from the west, who are in the ranks of the Conservatives, that if they are in favour of a low tariff for the western farmers, they need not expect ever to get it from the party they are supporting, because the policy of that party has been always in the opposite direction, and the position taken by the Conservatives to-day on the resolution before the House shows clearly that they have not undergone any change of mind.

There is just one thing I think necessary to mention to complete the history of our Conservative friends on the coal question. in 1891 they started in to make arrangements with the United States. If ever our coal industry depended on the tariff it did in that year, but that was before the province of Nova Scotia had received the impetus given it by the capital brought into it owing to the Fielding legislation. One of the first propositions made to the United States in 1891 was to renew the treaty of 1854, which of course implied that coal would be made free. Any one who will look over the items on the free list in the treaty of 1854 will find that coal is one of them. Therefore, at all times when negotiations were taking place between the Conservative government in Canada and the United States, our hon. friends opposite were always ready to have free coal, so that I am perfectly safe in saying that there is nothing in the history of the Conservative party to entitle them to make the claim that they, and they alone, are the friends of the coal industry of Nova Scotia.

There is another thing I wish to point out, rather as a personal matter, to show the interest that I myself have taken in the coal industry not only in the legislature of Nova Scotia, but in this parliament as well. On March 26, 1909, in my place in this House as will appear from 'Hansard' of that year, page 3087, I moved a resolution:

That in the opinion of this House such steps should be taken as may be deemed most effective in conserving the home market to the Canadian coal operators.

I supported that resolution with all the power that my poor ability could command, and put upon the records of the House all the facts that I could gather in support of the contention I made in favour of the coal industry of this country. I received from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) on that occasion, the warm, cordial and friendly response that he always gave when this question of the coal industry comes up for consideration. He said:

I take it for granted that the purpose of this motion was to have the opportunity of presenting these very interesting statistics, and to urge, if it be necessary to urge, the importance of this great mining industry. There will be no difference of opinion in that respect. We all recognize that the coal industry of the country, not merely of Nova Scotia, but other parts of the Dominion, is a very great industry, and that whatever may reasonably be done to advance the interests of the Canadian miners should be done.

That is the position taken by the Finance Minister on that occasion, and that is the position that was taken by the same hon. gentleman when premier of Nova Scotia and on every occasion when he had the opportunity of promoting the development of this great industry. On every occasion we found in the Minister of Finance and in this government of which he is a member practical friends to carry out whatever was necessary to be done in promoting the best interests of the workingmen, and of those who had money invested in the great industries of the country.

The point which I have to deal with is the compact before the House. I desire not only hon. members of this House, but also the people of Nova Scotia, and particularly those of North Cape Breton and Victoria, which constituency I have the honour to represent here, should know the things that will be free under this agreement, that they may see for themselves the advantages that will come to the country if this compact is consummated. I have here a list of articles so arranged as to show the duties that are now charged upon them when sent to the United States all of which will be free under this arrangement. The consideration of this list will show the advantages that will come to the people of Nova Scotia by having the American market open to these articles which are so largely produced in Canada, particularly in the maritime provinces:

Many of these duties are practically prohibitive. When these duties are removed for instance, on horses, sheep and swine, a market will be open at the very doors of the people of the maritime provinces of which they will have no difficulty in taking advantage. That is a matter of the greatest importance, that this market is within the reach of the people. One of the arguments presented here is that we have the English market for our horses, cows and sheep, and that this market offers higher prices than are offered in Boston, New York and Chicago.

It is no advantage to the ordinary small seller in the maritime provinces to be told that he can sell his cow or horse or small produce in London because he cannot send them there. It is all right for the man who has large connections and can send full cargoes, but to the small seller or farmer in the maritime provinces it means nothing. If this arrangement is made there is not a port in the maritime provinces that will not become a busy shipping port and a busy haven of industry and commerce, sending our goods across the Bay of Fundy to the New England states. That is the opportunity it gives us and the advantage which is not taken into consideration when we are told that we can secure equal advantage in the English market. This is perhaps a vulgar story, but I wish to tell it because it gives point to what I have to say. It is said that an Englishman came across an old Scotchman driving a cow to market. The Englishman said: If you had that cow in London she would command £50. The old Scotchman was worried trying to drag the cow to market, and knowing he would not get one-tenth of that amount, he said: If I had Loch Lomond in Hades I could get a dollar a glass. He knew he could not get the cow to London any more than he could get Loch Lomond to Hades. It is much the same with the farmers of Nova Scotia. When you say they can get large prices in London it means nothing to them, because they cannot get their produce there. That is why this agreement is so popular in the maritime provinces, that we will be able to get to the market with such goods as we have to sell in small quantities.

This agreement will be of great advantage to the lumbermen, the fishermen and the men who are dealing in coal in Nova Scotia. It may be said that coal will not gain very much by this arrangement, but when we had reciprocity before, from 1854 to 1856, the coal trade in Nova Scotia made rapid strides; we sold large quantities of coal to the New England states. I am not a sufficient authority on that question to say what is going to happen now. All I have to say is that we have a right to suppose that the same thing will happen now that happened then, that we will be able to increase our traffic with the United States, and as we have other trade with them they will deal largely in our coal. That being the case, I have no doubt that everything we can produce in the maritime provinces will be produced in larger quantities and sold at better prices than they are sold now. The opinion of the Hon. Mr. Berry was read in this House by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) so I shall not read it again. Every one who knows Nova Scotia knows that the opinion of that hon. gentleman is well worth being quoted, that there is perhaps not another man in politics in the maritime provinces to-day equally respected by the people. His opinion on any question of business is highly prized by his compatriots in Nova Scotia and well worthy of respect. He gives it as his opinion that this will be a great boon to the fishermen in Nova Scotia and to every enterprise in that province. I have here a letter from a gentleman in business in my county, Mr. McCurdy, who writes in the press giving the conditions in Victoria county, and the conditions in that county are exactly the same as they are in every other county in Nova Scotia. Mr. McCurdy writes:

This question is at the present time taking up almost the entire attention of the Canadian people and may yet result in an appeal to the country.

It is a subject that should be of intense interest, and is of immense importance to the people of this county, perhaps, more than that of any other county in the province. It directly affects each and every existing and prospective industry in Victoria county, chief among which are the fishing, gypsum and pulp wood industries, all of which are to be given the incentive or chance to increase their operations, perhaps a hundredfold. It appears to me the same as a bonus offered by the government to capital to invest in and largely develop the natural resources of this county from end to end. It almost appears as though Mr. Fielding had this county especially in his mind and had particularly favoured it when making this clever bargain with the United States. It is a bargain which, as Hon. Mr. Murray says, may make Nova Scotia the principal fish food producer of this continent, perhaps of the world. We all know that the waters of this county have more fish in them than any other county, and should therefore derive the chief benefit from it, and this does not mean merely fishing alone, but the establishment of many subsidiary industries, such, for instance, as boneless fish factories, boat and schooner building, and possibly rope and twine factories, &c., &c.

The bargain means that every gypsum deposit in the county, where there are good shipping facilities, is likely to be worked, giving employment to hundreds of men and a high-priced home market for the produce of the neighbouring farms.

It means that the pulpwood works of this county, which are now doing nothing, will be rebuilt and on a far larger scale than ever before contemplated.

I believe, Sir, there is a strong probability that what Mr. McCurdy says will come to pass. We have the fish, we have the gypsum, and we have pulpwood, and there is nothing lacking except the opportunity of developing them, and this seems to me to be the opportunity. I wish to point out the industries of Nova Scotia which have given the greatest return for the last year. They will receive great benefits from this arrangement. Our products last year were:

Coal..	$15,675,000
Coke..	1,960,000
Gold, iron and other metal.	379,500
Gypsum, limestone, &c	830,000
Building materials..	260,000
Pig iron..	1,000,000
Steel, steel rails, rods, &c.	14,200,000
Fisheries..	8,400,000
Manufactures, ships & freight.	41,000,000
Products of the farm..	29,100,000
Products of the forest..	5,480,000
Total..	$118,684,500

Those products are quite large for a country of the area of Nova Scotia. But there is no reason in the world under this arrangement why our products of the forest, our products of the farm, our products of the fisheries, and our mineral output should not be three times, if not four times, what they are under present conditions. We are hopeful, therefore, Sir, that the coming into force of this agreement will be of great benefit not only to the whole country but particularly to the province of Nova Scotia.

The leader of the opposition tells us that the country is sufficiently prosperous and he quotes figures to prove the case he makes out. I noticed that the hon. gentleman was making one quotation, or taking the whole stretch of time from 1868 to 1910, without making any subdivision or analysis of the figures. I took the trouble to divide the time from 1868 into three periods which I thought was fair in questions of trade and particularly fair in the matter of pointing out the condition of the country with one party in power, and the condition of the country with another party in power. I divided the time from 1868 to 1878, from 1878 to 1896, the period during which our hon. friends opposite were in power, and from 1896 down to the end of 1910. If my hon. friend the leader of the opposition would make that division it would be a fairer division to show what was done under the different regimes, and he would find that he could not come to this House, and say that we were doing first-class during the eighteen years of the National Policy, and he would not take the responsibility of telling us to leave well enough alone. He would find that, taking these figures from 1878 to 1896, the country made less progress during that period on the average than it was making up to the time of the inauguration of the National Policy. Giving the figures exactly as they appear upon the blue-book from 1868 to 1878 the increase in trade in that ten year period was $44,175,823, or an average increase per year of $4,417,582. During the period of 18 years when our hon. friends opposite were in power, from 1878 to 1896, the total increase was $66,000,000, making an annual increase of $3,666,666, or about a million dollars less per year during that 18 years than during the ten year period following confederation. That is the record which my hon. friend would have to show if he had confined his calculation to the period when his friends were in power. From 1896 to 1910, the proud period of the regime of my right hon. friend and those he has gathered around him, the increase was $457,000,000, making an average increase per year of not $3,000,000, not $4,000,000, nor four times that, but of $326,365,711. That is a record of increase of which the government, the friends of the government, and the country have reason to be proud and satisfied. But, I do not think the leader of the opposition would be satisfied with the advance that was made by the country under the regime of his own friends. But if you lump the whole sum, if you put it altogether it makes a good showing and gives him a better opportunity of saying: Let well enough alone. I do not think in all seriousness that the leader of the opposition is sufficiently ambitious for his party or his country when he asks us, under present conditions, to let well enough alone. The whole country may be making fair progress, but I must say that while I am fairly proud of the conditions in the maritime provinces, and the growth that is going on there, I do not think we have any reason to be satisfied with the progress we are making, and I submit without any hesitation that the progress which is being made in the maritime provinces to-day is not well enough compared with other parts of the country. Within the last twenty years we have lost three of our representatives in this House. We have three members less from Nova Scotia to-day than we had when the population began to go down, or at least when we were unable to hold our own with the rest of the Dominion. New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island have lost members, and, therefore, I submit that the leader of the opposition has no right to say that we in the maritime provinces should sit down and say that we are content with the present conditions when we are not holding our own with the rest of Canada. We have a right to expect assistance from that hon. gentleman, and when he has reason to believe, as he has, that this agreement would help to build up our population, that it would aid our fishing industry, mining, farming and everything else and give an impetus to our prosperity as reciprocity did before, that we would hold our representation in parliament, that we would hold our end up better under this arrangement than we do now, he has no warrant to say to the people of the maritime provinces to leave well enough alone, and not put forward an effort to better their condition.

I submit, Sir, talking not very seriously, that if the leader of the opposition wants to apply that doctrine to his own job, to his own position in this country, we have no objection from the Liberal standpoint as far as my hon. friend being leader of the opposition is concerned, because we are quite content to let well enough alone, and to let him occupy his present position, but we are not satisfied to let him apply that doctrine to the trade, commerce and general prosperity of the country. If it comes to that I think my hon. friend should amend his motto and say: What we have, we'll hold, and what we have not we are after. That is what I think would suit us better in the maritime provinces, and generally all over this country. It will not be contended, Sir, in this tremendously large, prosperous and wealthy country that we occupy—wealthy in natural resources, in area and extent—that we can afford to let well enough alone with a population of only 8,000,000 at the outset when we have a territory capable of supporting a population as large as that which the same area is supporting on the other side of the line. Is it not our duty not to be contented with the growth we are making, but to move along as rapidly as possible, and to build up this country so that without any undue delay we may be benefiting our people side by side with those of the great nation to the south of us, and placing them in a position of equality in every line of life.

I was going to say something more about the figures quoted by the leader of the opposition and those of other gentlemen, but after all his speech and the speech of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) are the keynotes to the speeches made by hon. gentlemen on that side of the House. What did the leader of the opposition say in giving evidence of the prosperity of this country? He said that all we had to do was to look at the speeches of the Minister of Finance in support of the budget for the last fourteen years, and we would see evidences of the great prosperity of this country. So that there should be no mistake about where I am quoting the hon. gentleman, this was on the 7th February, and it appears at page 3366 of 'Hansard.' We were invited to look at the history of the budget of the Liberal party for the last fourteen years for evidences of the prosperity of this country.

It is quite true—in what possibly, from a party standpoint, might be regarded as a moment of weakness in the tactics of the leader of the opposition—that he refers us to the history not of his own party but to the history of the Liberal party. And what is the record that the leader of the opposition invites us to study? It is a proud record for this country and a proud record for the Minister of Finance. Practically the first year the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) was in power he announced a surplus of $1,722,112.33; the next year he announced a surplus of $4,837,149, the next year a surplus of $8,054,714, the next year a surplus of $5,648,333, the next year a surplus of $7,291,388, the next year a surplus of $14,345,166, the next year a surplus of $15,056,984, the next year a surplus of $7,863,099, the next year a surplus of $12,898,719, the next year a surplus of $16,427,167, the next year a surplus of $19,413,054, the next year a surplus of $1,029,171.97 and the last year for which we have a record a surplus of $22,091,184.47. That is the record to which the leader of the opposition invites us to inquire for evidence of the prosperity of this country. The hon. gentleman took care not to refer us to the records of his own party because there we find deficits and not surpluses. In 1885 the Conservative government had to announce a deficit of $2,240,058, in 1886 a deficit of $5,834,571.87, in 1888 a deficit of $810,031.26, in 1893 a deficit of $1,210,332.45, in 1894 a deficit of $4,153,875.58, in 1896 a deficit of $330,551.31. That, Sir, is the record that was presented to us by the budgets of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) when he was Minister of Finance. I suppose it was quite right for the leader of the opposition to refer us to the speeches of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) for evidences of prosperity, and it is only fair that the people of this country should know what that record is as compared with the record of the Conservative party when they controlled the finances of Canada.

Without breaking away from this subject I come to say a word on the question of the authority of the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs to make this arrangement. I hold that when the Liberal party submitted their programme to the country in 1893 and told the people categorically what they intended to do and the subjects with which they would deal if they were placed in power and the Conservatives turned out, then when the people of the country placed Sir Wilfrid Laurier's government in office with a knowledge of the things they promised to do I submit that until that programme is exhausted and everything promised by the leaders of the Liberal party carried into effect this government has a mandate from the people with respect to every plank in their platform of 1893. I do not think there is anything illogical in that; I think it is a position that can be sustained before any jury in this country. I would not hesitate to submit to the electors of any county in Canada, that the Liberal government having had a mandate from the people to carry into effect every item in their programme when they came to power, the Liberal party has a perfect right to go on without any further mandate. Our friends of the opposition profess to be very logical in their reasoning and argument and they often say to the leader of the government: Why dont you carry out your promise to reform the Senate for which you have a mandate from the people. Surely if the Liberal party had a mandate in 1896 to reform the Senate on the platform of 1893, it has a mandate to make a trade agreement with the United States because the two propositions were submitted to the people at one and the same time. If our Conservative friends are consistent and logical in saying that the government have a mandate to reform the Senate, wherein lies the strength of their argument that the government have no mandate to carry out a trade agreement with the United States? For my own part I confess I am not very much concerned whether they have that mandate or not. If this is a good agreement, if this is in the best interests of the Canadian people, if it is calculated to develop trade, if it brings about more friendly relations between this country and the United States I am not concerned very much about whether there is a very full mandate given or not. I submit that we have the power as representatives of the people to do everything which in our judgment is for the best interests of the people, and if this is a good agreement in the best interests of the people that is the only thing I am particularly concerned about. And, Sir, I am satisfied that as time goes on, as day by day this question is discussed in this House and in the provincial legislatures and in the newspapers and on the hustings, the people will better understand this question and so, day by day the policy of the government will become more popular. I believe, Sir, that if the people of Canada were to-day called upon to pass judgment on this agreement an overwhelming majority of them would decide in its favour. While, it is not necessary for me at this stage to trace the history of the effort of the Canadian people to obtain better trade relations with the United States, it is possibly encumbent upon me to point out that the Conservative party as well as the Liberal party have always been advocating better trade arrangements with the neighbouring republic. I have here a quotation from the first budget speech of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) in this House, as found in 'Hansard' at page 449, volume I of 'Hansard' of 1889. On that occasion he had reason to refer to the question of trade relations with the United States, and he said:

The government is ready and willing to come to the aid of the country now and implement to the best of its ability this desire which is growing and stretching out from the true and solid basis of trade prosperity at home, in a foreign trade with other countries, so that we may compete with foreign countries in the different wares that we make and the different products that we raise. This country and this government has always been desirous of extending its trade to foreign countries. In all honesty and candour that can be maintained and it cannot be denied. No matter what government has been on the Treasury benches, no matter what party has been in power, there has been a continuous and a persistent attempt to cultivate better trade relations between this country and the United States of America in a reciprocity that should be fair and equally beneficial to both countries. The negotiations of 1866, of 1869, of 1871, and of 1888, all bear testimony to that. But, Sir, if the country to the south of us will not go upon the lines of the late reciprocity treaty, if it will not trade upon lines which are fair and equal to both countries, and if it continues to show, as it has done in the Senate Bill, and as it has in the President's message, delivered only yesterday, its reiterated adherence to the high and strong protective system that it has placed about its trade—then, Sir, it becomes this country to build upon its own foundations, to develop its own vast natural resources, and to further strengthen the internal industries of the country which will enable her to extend her trade into other countries.

The hon. member for North Toronto, the then Minister of Finance, said that the Conservative government were ready and willing, always ready and willing to make trade arrangements with the United States, but if they could not do so, it was their duty to make trade arrangements with other countries. We hear a great deal to-day about looking to Great Britain and to Great Britain only; but if you look at the speech of the hon. member for North Toronto on that occasion, you will find that the other countries which he mentions do not include Great Britain. They were South America, the West Indies, China, Japan, the islands of the South Pacific, New Zealand and Australia—not a word about Great Britain or about any effort to bring about better trade relations with Great Britain. From the same volume, at page 478, I take a quotation from no less a person than Sir Charles Tupper in support of better trade relations with the United States; and what he says in this:

But no matter how they may endeavour to confuse the public mind, the people understand that the Liberal-Conservative party, as a whole, are still ready to make a fair trade arrangement with the United States, whenever the United States are prepared to enter into such an arrangement. We have said, time and time again, to the government at Washington; we have said it in all the official correspondence as these gentlemen themselves admit, our plenipotentiaries have said it; and true to that policy, we are not taking an attitude unworthy of Canadians, we are not taking a cringing attitude. I believe we will yet succeed in making a fair arrangement with the Republican government lately installed at Washington, and we will do it as men and as Canadians, just as independent in Canada in reference to our future and our present as the Americans to their credit, are independent in the United States.

On another occasion, in 1888, at page 674 of volume I of 'Hansard,' of that year, Sir Charles Tupper said:

I may say that I took the opportunity, when delivering my speech on the financial condition of the country a year ago, to draw the attention of the House to the results of that treaty, and I will just call the attention of the House again one moment to a single extract in that speech, in which I referred to the trade results of what is known as the reciprocity treaty of 1854. It will be found that the United States during those twelve years, from 1854 to 1866, exported to British North America home products to the extent of $300,808,370 and foreign products to the extent of $62,379,718, the total exports to British North America being $363,188,088. The imports from the British provinces into the United States during that period amounted to $267,612,131, showing a balance during the twelve years in favour of the United States of $95,575,975. That is to say, that they sent under the operation of that treaty into the British North American provinces over $95,000,000 more than we sent into that country. I have often been at a loss to know how any person in the United States, and much less how any person in Canada could disparage that treaty, or could speak of it as a one-sided treaty, altogether in favour of British North America, and not equally in favour of the United States. I noticed, shortly after the delivery of the speech, that the Hon. T. F. Bayard, the Secretary of State of the United States, was interviewed in relation to this question, and, so far as the account of that interview went, I understood him to confirm the accuracy of the figures which I had used on that occasion. I say I have been greatly at a loss to know how, under the circumstances, any person can be found, especially in this country, to treat this as a one-sided measure in the interests of Canada. So far as what is known as Canada is concerned, we know that the trade of our country took a very great bound, and that the result of the reciprocity treaty was to give a very sudden and great and steadily continued impetus to our trade with the United States; but, as I said before, the result was to give a still greater expansion of trade to the United States in relation to British North America. I am glad, after spending some three months in Washington, to be able to say that I had very intimate intercourse with gentlemen of different politics holding high positions in the Senate and House of Representatives, that I took many opportunities of discussing this question with them, and that the result is that I did not find one statesman in the United States who expressed his satisfaction with the termination of that treaty. I believe the general expression in that country is that commercially it was a mistake to have terminated that treaty, and that it would have been infinitely better for the United States and for Canada if it had been continued. As I said before, and as I said the other day, I feel it is only right, in passing, to say, that the effort to obtain the freest possible commercial intercourse between Canada and the United States, consistent with the rights and interests of the two governments, is a policy that does not belong to one party alone, but it is the property of both parties in this country. The hon. member for East York showed his hearty appreciation of the value of such a policy, when he was leading his administration, just as much as my right hon. friend showed it on the occasion of going to Washington in 1871, and on all and every occasion when that question has come up for consideration.

I have several other quotations right in line with those, and I submit that if trade relations with the United States were very desirable then, they are equally desirable now. But coming down closer to the present day, since we have been told that what happened in 1888, 1889 and 1903 is ancient history, let me show what stand the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) took last fall when discussing the trade question in a magazine published in this country. He was then quite aware that negotiations were going on between Canada and the United States; he was quite familiar with the conditions, and could not have been ignorant of the effect his words would have. Do we find him taking any objection to trade relations with the United States in December, 1910? Talking apparently to some representative of the United States, he said:

> We owe you much, we admire your enterprise and your wonderful growth, and sympathize with the efforts you are making to grow rightly and develop the best forces of a great democracy. We covet your virtues and try to avoid your faults, individual, municipal and national. If we can make easier channels for trade between the two countries, consistently with the above conditions, we will be glad to co-operate. Meanwhile, as a neighbourly beginning could you not give our products tariff entrance to your market at the same rates which we accord to yours in our markets? You are bigger, older, richer, more skilled, and more populous. What competition should you fear on a basis of equivalent tariffs? If you were to do this it would be an earnest of good feeling and might dispose us to further converse.

That was the position taken by the hon. gentleman last December. If he then thought that, subject to the conditions he mentioned—all of which are conserved in this agreement—that it was a good thing to negotiate a trade treaty with the United States, surely nothing has happened since to make it so disastrous as he would now make us believe it is. A few weeks after, I cut a clipping from the speech made by the same hon. gentleman in this House, and I shall read it to show the tremendous contrast between the two deliverances. In the one I have just read, he talks in a very friendly way to this representative of the United States about trade relations. But in the speech he made in this House, he said:

> They are coming to the parting of the ways. Who? Canada. What ways? One the broad highway that we began to construct in 1867 running transversely across this continent with its east and west lines and ending, for our markets, in the grand old mother country, the emporium of the markets of the world. And what is the other way? It is the way brushed out and trailed by Messrs. Paterson and Fielding, leading off this old and well-beaten highway down amongst unknown obscurities and hazards, but ending in the United States of America. These are the two ways; and we are at the parting of the ways, says President Taft, and something must be done.

You would imagine that reciprocity was the broad way which leadeth to destruction in its most dreadful form and that the opposite policy is the narrow way which leads to life everlasting. The trouble however, is that my hon. friend is influenced solely by party politics in his last deliveries. In the first instance, he was evidently speaking his mind without prejudice, when he did not expect such an excellent understanding to be arrived at and was off his guard. He evidently then did not anticipate that the plenipotentiaries of Canada would obtain such an excellent agreement as they did, and, therefore, was taken off his guard and without having any party consideration before his mind. In the other case he was simply trying to make party capital. In the first instance he was showing what is best in the interests of the country so far as trade relations are concerned, but in the other he said the country was going to the dogs, and was trying to lead the people to believe that this policy of the government was a ruinous one.

I have read sufficient quotations from Sir Charles Tupper and the hon. member for North Toronto to show you what their minds were on this question. But what did the right hon. Sir John Macdonald, when he was leader of the government say:

We said to the Americans, we are perfectly willing to deal with you upon equal terms. We are desirous of having a fair reciprocity treaty, but we will not consent to open our markets to you whilst yours remain closed to us.

It is perfectly clear from all those extracts, that every one of the great leaders of the Conservative party was for reciprocity with the United States. As a climax to all this, let me quote the words of the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden) delivered on the 26th of January last. What did he say, page 2555 of 'Hansard:'

The Conservative party stands to-day, as it has always stood in the past, for the policy of reciprocity within this great British Empire.

Where can you find in the past of the Conservative party any evidence of this? If the Conservative party had any past, surely that will be found in the speeches of those excellent gentlemen I have quoted and I challenge any one to find anything in that past to show that that party ever stood for reciprocity within the British Empire.

Such a policy was not known and has no well founded existence. As was pointed out by a gentleman in Manitoba the other day, it is the ghost of a corpse buried in Britain at the last general election. That was the language used by a gentleman named Scallion, who is the president of the Grain Growers Association of Manitoba.

I submit, Sir, that there is no such policy, as a practical matter under present conditions, as reciprocity within the empire. A bargain can be made only when two or more parties are willing to enter into it. It is impossible for us to make any trade agreement with the British Empire while the British Empire does not want to enter into any trade agreement with us that will suit our conditions. Therefore, I submit, this free trade or reciprocity within the empire is not within the pale of practical politics, and that the people of this country would not be well advised to sit down and twirl their thumbs waiting until the river flowed by or until we could get reciprocity within the empire.

There are many considerations in connection with this agreement which we should take under advisement other than the mere question of dollars and cents. Let me quote the opinion given by so distinguished an American as ex-President Roosevelt:

I feel that we are to be congratulated as a nation upon the likelihood of obtaining a closer reciprocity of tariff and trade relations with Canada. Among all the powers of the earth there is none with which we should desire to be upon more intimate footing of equal rights, to which we should be more closely bound in relations of mutual helpfulness, esteem and good will than in the case of our great neighbour to the north, whose prosperity and growth should be a matter of pride to all who dwell on the American continent. I welcome the proposed reciprocity treaty as marking a signal advance in bringing about the closest and most friendly relations between the two countries.

It is no small matter for Canada to get an opinion of that kind from so distinguished a statesman as the ex-President of the United States. I could quote the opinion of the present President and other distinguished men in the United States, if I thought it advisable to do so. I have opinion upon opinion here from the newspapers of Great Britain scouting this idea of disloyalty being involved in this trade agreement. I have already quoted the opinion of Mr. Bryce, the plenipotentiary of Great Britain at Washington, to show that he does not take any stock in that doctrine. I could quote from such a strong English paper as the Manchester 'Guardian' and other papers of that standing in England that this idea has no justification. Let me quote a few words from an editorial utterance of the London 'Times.' The following appeared in that great newspaper on the 7th of March:

We cannot tell how far the sporadically raised cry of annexation is influencing Canadian opinion, but there is no reason to suppose that the reciprocity agreement would produce any tendency in that direction. On the contrary, bargaining on equal terms with the States might tend to foster rather than diminish the self reliance and independence of the Canadian people.

That, in short, is about the substance of the opinion of the different English papers as far as I have been able to follow them. We are told that the Americans have no purpose in this arrangement except annexation. A Mr. Bennet moved certain annexation resolutions in Congress. And here is a quotation, from so reputable a paper as the New York 'Times.' I do not know the 'Times'' politics, but this is, I think, a fair expression of American opinion on the conduct of Mr. Bennet:

Mr. William S. Bennet, who for a little more than a fortnight longer will represent the Seventeenth New York District in Congress and then retire to private life, has thoroughly justified his defeat at the last election. The impertinent resolution requesting the President to begin negotiations for the annexation of Canada, which he shamelessly introduced Thursday, is an example of a kind of politics that would not astonish anybody if, say, Mr. Macon of Arkansas was the offender. Mr. Bennet, who has hitherto posed as a man of serious character, an energetic if somewhat juvenile statesman looking to the welfare of his country, has fairly put himself in the blatherskite class. A fine ending to his public career this solicitous friend and supposed confidant of Governor Hughes has made!

The resolution was offered only to be rejected. Its sole purpose is to cause trouble in England and Canada. Probably some of the English newspapers which have been opposing Canadian reciprocity will point out that Mr. Bennet's record, until lately, has been fairly good, and that he has won some sort of repute for ability. He has permitted himself to be used as a catspaw. The reciprocity agreement will prevail in spite of a thousand Bennets. Intelligent Englishmen understand the Bennet kind of politics. There is plenty of the same sort of things in parliament. The measure cannot be beaten in Canada. All the mischief it can accomplish has already been accomplished, and that is not worth worrying about. The voters of the Seventeenth District who elected Mr. Henry George to Congress in November will congratulate themselves on their judgment and foresight.

That is the position taken by the United States on this question, and that was their appreciation of the conduct of this cheap upstart who tried to make trouble in both countries by moving that resolution. I am not going to say that we have any such people in this country, but I think we have people in this House who are making opposition to this agreement that the facts of history will not justify. I hate to weary the House, but I have one quotation more, and it is so important and so directly to the point that I feel obliged to put it on 'Hansard.' This is from the Winnipeg 'Free Press,' a newspaper which is supposed to be owned and controlled by the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton). This article appeared in the Winnipeg 'Free Press' the next day after the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) made his celebrated utterance in this House on the 28th of February last. This is what the paper says, and the people can decide for themselves whether the points are well taken or not:

This is a free country and every citizen has a right to make himself heard when a departure, such as is involved in the acceptance of the reciprocity agreement, is proposed. Nevertheless there are grounds for wondering whether some of the principal objectors have calculated all the possible consequences of the action. Without doubt there is a very considerable volume of independent and disinterested opposition to the agreement. A blind man can see that the agitation to a large degree is not spontaneous. It is being planned, nursed, stage managed, financed and advertised. Who are the men on the job? First, of course, the leaders of the Conservative party who, living up to the full opportunities of their positions are there opposing the government with all the resources at their command. The Toronto machinery of the party is an adept at forming raging and tearing propagandas. Kindly recall the Dundonald affair, the school question and the naval controversy. Each of these agitations started off at a terriffic clip with the 'News' and the 'Telegram' pounding on the big war drums and working up the marching posts to a frenzy. They mostly petered out, it will be recalled, and nobody was a bit worse for all the terriffic cursing in which Brer Willison indulged. If the Toronto Conservatives think this the time and opportunity for another spasm let them have it, as possibly they need one so often to relieve the pressure. But it is quite clear that party heat is being powerfully supplemented. Behind this agitation, which starting in Toronto, is involving the industrial and commercial centre of Ontario and is acting and reacting all over Canada, are others and more effective powers. Beyond doubt organized and powerful business interests have thrown the full weight of their enormous influence into the fray to prevent, if possible, the ratification of the agreement. The interests are not difficult to identify. They are chiefly the manufacturers of Ontario. Scratch a manufacturer and you find almost invariably an inveterate foe of reciprocity.

That is the position of the paper said to be owned and controlled by the hon. member for Brandon. I think we can well say that this paper expresses the opinion of the province of Manitoba fairly well. I have here another resolution passed in Manitoba the other day.

RESOLUTION BY MANITOBA GRAIN GROWERS.

Dear Sir,—The following resolution was unanimously passed at a meeting of the executive officers of the Manitoba Grain Growers' Association held on the evening of March 2, 1911, to which we invite your serious attention:—

Whereas the Hon. Clifford Sifton, from his place in the House of Commons, on February 28, claiming to speak for the west, declared that reciprocity with the United States was not in the interest of the western people;

And whereas the Winnipeg Grain Exchange, the Winnipeg Board of Trade, and the Manitoba legislature, by resolution, have also, in the name of the west, declared against reciprocity;

Therefore be it resolved that we, the executive officers of the Manitoba Grain Growers' Association emphatically assert that the above mentioned gentleman and public bodies, by their public utterances and resolutions upon the question of reciprocity have absolutely misrepresented popular opinion in Manitoba;

And we further declare and reaffirm that the tariff resolution placed before the government by the Canadian Council of Agriculture on December 16, 1910, is a correct representation of the opinions of the people of Manitoba to-day;

And we further declare that the people of Manitoba will not be satisfied with anything short of the following action by the Canadian parliament during the present session:—

1. The ratification of the reciprocity agreement now before parliament;
2. The complete abolition of duties upon agricultural machinery and implements;
3. An increase in the British preference to fifty per cent of the general tariff.

Signed on behalf of the executive.

R. C. HENDERS,
President.

Winnipeg, Man., March 3, 1911.

I shall not read you a lengthy manifesto published by Mr. Scallion, a gentleman of high standing in Manitoba who has given his political adherence to the opposition, who has been a strong supporter of the Roblin government, and whose character and business ability cannot be questioned by any Conservative in this House or out of it. He has given his full adhesion to this agreement and has declared himself absolutely opposed to the tactics of the Manitoba legislature and every other machinery put in motion against this contract. I submit that the opinion of Mr. Scallion and of the Grain Growers' Association as represented by Mr. Henders and the other opinions we have seen in the press give us full evidence and full assurance that if any gentleman from Manitoba speaks in this House against this resolution he is not representing the mind of the great province of Manitoba or of the great interests of that province. Now passing through the province of Manitoba I will deal with the resolution that was before the House in Saskatchewan the other day. I am sure it must have been a startling revelation to our Conservative friends to find so prominent a man as the leader of the opposition of the legislature of that great province coming out fearlessly and openly and declaring himself in favour of this compact. I was in this House in 1905 when there was a great controversy in the west and the great leader in the Conservative party then was Mr. Haultain. He was held up as a great man, but I presume he is no less great a man to-day than he was held to be by the Conservative party in this House when we were asked to follow his lead and take his opinion on the great question in the west in 1905. If he was such a leader then I presume our Conservative friends will be prepared to accept his opinion to-day. I submit that there is not a man in either of the western provinces who has had a better training in political matters than this hon. gentleman. He was premier of the Northwest Territories for a great number of years and had an opportunity of studying conditions in that country. There is nothing as far as I know or can judge to indicate that he had any other reason in the world for breaking with his party on this subject. I suppose that everything would be the other way. He was the leader of a great party in a great province, and if he had the right end of it by standing by his leaders in this House and in the country I should certainly suppose he would stand by his party. I submit that the evidence is that in coming out in support of this policy he has given his best judgment to what he conceives to be the best interests of his people. In conclusion Mr. Haultain said:

> We out here are just as able as the magnates in the east to decide what is patriotic and unpatriotic. I am not prepared to sit at the feet of any of these eastern Gamaliels and study loyalty.

Mr. McKENZIE.

But that is a sweeping indictment by so able a gentleman as the leader of the opposition in Saskatchewan. He is not going to sit at the feet of Gamaliel Borden, Gamaliel Foster or Gamaliel Whitney or any other Gamaliel from the east; he is prepared to take his own course. He would not even follow the lead of our hon. friend Gamaliel Maclean, who has been addressing the House. I suppose he would put him in the same pot as the other Gamaliels and pursue his own course. I am satisfied that so far as the west is concerned we have the judgment and opinion of as good a man as can be put on the stand in favour of this agreement and against those who for party purposes are opposing it.

I received from a member for the west this afternoon some evidence that seems to me very striking. In the great province of Saskatchewan they have 51 members, local and dominion. I am told, Sir, on the authority of an hon. member from that province that out of 51 there is only one man who is opposing this contract. That one man is the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Lake) in this House. All the rest are in favour of the agreement. That would look as if, should we accept the challenge that is often thrown out to go before the country, that there is at least one province in which we are sure of a very fair majority because there is in that province only one of those who is elected who dare express an opinion against this agreement.

I do not think that there is very much more I should say in support of this proposal. I have pointed out that everything in the contract which I have read is in favour of the Canadian people and in favour of fair mutual trade relations between the two countries.

Mr. BLAIN. How about British Columbia?

Mr. McKENZIE. I am afraid the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain) falls sometimes into the habit of quoting evidence that he is not sure of. I am not going to quote any evidence from British Columbia because I do not happen to have any. I am satisfied to let men speak for British Columbia who know that province better than I do. On general principles I believe that British Columbia is all right. British Columbia is an immense lumbering country and I cannot understand why this arrangement would not be good for that industry. British Columbia is a great coal country and I cannot understand why an arrangement of this kind would not be good for the coal industry. I do not think any man should be called upon to stand for the condition of forcing a trade or industry in a country for which it is not adapted. If there is any condition in British Columbia which is not suitable to fruit raising, if the conditions are such that a man should give his attention to something else, or put his capital to better use, I am not going to condemn this agreement because it would perhaps strike a forced situation of that kind, but I say that any industry carried on under conditions that are natural to Canada, that are not forced, should be suited and assisted by this trade agreement. I hope that the fruit growers of British Columbia will have very much better success in connection with this bargain than they think. If they are trying to raise fruit where they should be raising barley, wheat or cattle, I do not think that they should find any fault if they are obliged to abandon that and go into something that is suited to the province of British Columbia and in which they may have better fortune. I hope their fears will not be realized, and I cannot see any reason why the opening up of a market of 90,000,000 or a 100,000,000 people should not put them on a better footing than if they have a market of only 8,000,000 people and a very small part of that 8,000,000 people within range of their trade.

Now, there are some other opinions about this agreement which I wish to quote. These are quotations of hon. members holding seats in this House, and I am afraid that the opinions which these hon. gentlemen have recently expressed have not been consistent with those which they expressed at an earlier stage in the session. I quote here an opinion which will be found in 'Hansard', page 408, 29th of November, 1910. It is the opinion of the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) given while speaking in the debate on the address. He is taking the address paragraph by paragraph and he takes this paragraph:

> An arrangement may be made which will admit many of the products of the United States in on satisfactory terms.

Mr. BRADBURY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point or order. I do not think an hon. member is allowed to quote from a past debate in this House.

Mr. McKENZIE. I am not ignorant of this rule, Mr. Chairman, and if my hon. friend insists upon it, I suppose that I will be obliged not to refer to it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. A passing reference to a debate at an earlier period of the session would probably not be out of order, but the rule is, that a reference to a previous debate is not in order.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, if any hon. friend will insist upon it, all I have to say is that this statement was made on the 29th of November last when the hon. member for East Hastings expressed himself strongly in favour of reciprocity. He assured us that he would hold up both hands in favour of such an arrangement. I would ask my hon. friend from East Hastings if he will put up one hand in favour of it if it comes to a vote now. In case anybody may think I am not quoting him properly I have taken the page and day when he spoke, so that anybody will see what the hon. gentleman said. The same thing is true of the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Chisholm) who spoke on November 24, 1910, as reported at pages 258 and 263 of 'Hansard.' The same expression of opinion was given by that hon. gentleman. He thought it would be a splendid thing if we could get it. The only thing that was bothering the hon. member for East Huron was how to get it. He was a man of an independent type—put it before us and I will vote for it! That was the opinion of the hon. member for East Huron. I will expect that the hon. gentleman will show this brand of independence and vote for this agreement if it comes to a vote.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have quoted a great many opinions but I have quoted none with greater satisfaction and greater faith than the two last opinions, because, judging from what has been going on around me here for the last three weeks, the fiery eloquence of the hon. member for East Hastings denouncing and condemning this agreement in all the moods and tenses, I certainly could not think that he had ever expressed a view in favour of the proposal. Then, having discovered this oasis in the desert, I find there are saints in Caesar's house and that from all quarters we are getting support for this agreement. As I said at the commencement it is getting stronger and gaining strength as the days go by. I am not going to quote from this Manitoba paper called the 'Tribune,' but I will ask any hon. gentleman to look at it. It is a Winnipeg paper of some repute, I believe, it is dated the 6th March, 1911, and at page 4 hon. gentlemen from Manitoba who are interested no doubt in what is going on in that province, will see resolutions passed at different points in Manitoba by which the legislature is condemned and in which members are condemned to their faces, being present at these meetings, for the course they have taken and told emphatically that they misrepresented the people of Manitoba when they took the course they did take in supporting the resolution introduced by the premier of that province.

That is the condition there, and in so far as the maritime provinces, Quebec, and I think the most part of Ontario outside of the centres which are on party grounds against us now we have nothing to fear and everything to hope from this bargain. I have here a paper called 'Farm and Home' published in Springfield, Massachusetts, and Chicago which has a circulation of over one million copies in the United States, and on its front page is an editorial stating that this agreement is a bad thing for the American farmer and gives the Canadian farmer much the best of it, and certainly if it is a bad thing for the American farmer according to this newspaper, it must be a good thing for our agricultural community. I now, Sir, have gone over the ground as fully and as rapidly as I could, but I presume my hon. friend (Mr. Bradbury) who follows me will be obliged to take the same course as I did the other night and adjourn the debate. He must excuse me for having taken up so much time, but I can assure my hon. friend that I would like to have concluded at an earlier hour in the evening. I am satisfied, Sir, that upon every ground this is an excellent agreement for the people of Canada, that it gives them opportunities which otherwise they could not have, that it is letting us in on the ground floor of the trade of a great country with a population of 100,000,000, a country that every day is needing a greater supply of the products which we can produce, and a country which before many years will possibly be in the same position as England is to-day, importing enormous quantities of food stuffs while exporting none, and devoting itself entirely to its great manufacturing industries. If that should come to pass, and if Canada for many years to come will be a producer of such commodities as will be required for the supply of this industrial nation to the south, is it not well that we should get in now, and hold that market and develop it, rather than that we should let the opportunity slip, and give a chance to other countries to occupy the field against us. We are told that Argentine grows the same kind of natural products as we do, and is our competitor, and is it not in our interest to see that the Argentine Republic does not get a foothold in the United States market ahead of us. Would it not be a good thing for us to hold that market as against all the world? I can see no ground on which we have anything to fear or anything to lose, but I can see on the other hand that we have everything to gain. Then, so far as our loyalty is concerned I hardly think it is worth while discussing it at all. As I pointed out the other evening, where are they going to find the traitors, where are they going to find the man who will not be true to the British flag? We are getting too old in this country to cast off our allegiance; we are proud of our flag, we are proud of the history and traditions of our country, proud of our institutions, proud of being Britishers. What consolation would I or any other Canadian feel in throwing up our caps on the 4th of July? Surely it would take us a long time to get trained to that. We will not try it, and the American people know better than to try to put that yoke over us. We are willing to trade with them, we are willing to develop with them, we are willing to take advantage of the growth and prosperity that would come to us by reason of that trade, but we shall always be true to Canada, true to our own flag, proud of being part and parcel of the greatest empire the world has even seen, an empire on which the sun never sets. I do not think it is worthy of this parliament to discuss such a question as whether or not we will remain true to our own country. We certainly shall. But, while being true to the British Empire we are also as sensible business men bound to take advantage of every trade opportunity that presents itself to make this a great country commercially, and, Sir, as Canada grows in strength, so grows the strength and the standing of the British Empire.

Mr. BRADBURY moved that the committee rise.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Fielding, House adjourned at 10.46 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, March 15, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS APPOINTMENTS.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved:

That the recommendation of the Hon. the Speaker of the House of Commons, laid on the table of the House on the 21st day of February last, with reference to the appointment of Mr. Arthur W. Glasier as assistant clerk of the Committee on Agriculture and Colonization, be concurred in.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I believe there are a number of these references. Perhaps the right hon. gentleman will let that motion stand until to-morrow.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Very well.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

BEAUSOLEIL INDIAN RESERVE.

Mr. LENNOX:

1. Who is the Indian agent of Beausoleil reserve, Christian island?

2. When was he appointed, on whose recommendation, is he a practical farmer, what evidence had the department of this at the time of appointment; was it made a condition of his appointment that he should reside upon the reserve and instruct the Indians in agriculture, cattle feeding and the like, and has he resided on the reserve at any time? If so, during what periods, and is he residing upon the reserve or the island now?

3. In order to attain his object, did the government erect a residence for the agent upon the reserve, and at what cost; has the Indian agent ever resided in this house, and by whom is it occupied?

4. Where does the Indian agent reside, and when did he last visit the reserve?

5. Who was the immediate predecessor of the present Indian agent, and for what alleged cause was he retired?

6. Does the government propose to insist that the agent shall reside upon the reserve?

Mr. OLIVER:

1. Mr. H. G. Todd.

2, 3 and 4. He was appointed on the 6th July, 1910. His name was suggested by the Indians of the band, who stated that upon the reserve and give the Indians practical advice in farming. For the first two months after his appointment he spent about half the time at the island. Early in the winter he was taken ill and spent five or six weeks at his own home unable to go out. Since then he has visited the island, spending more than half of his time there instructing the Indians, and he has made arrangements to move permanently to the island. During the time the agent was ill, he allowed a man and his wife to occupy part of the house in order to look after his household goods while he was absent. This was for the winter months only. A residence was erected for the agent on the reserve at a cost of $3,470.

5. Mr. Charles McGibbon. He was retired because he had no qualifications to give the Indians practical advice on farming.

6. The government proposes to insist that the agent shall reside upon the reserve.

CANADA AND SOUTH AMERICA STEAMSHIPS SERVICE.

Mr. DANIEL:

1. Is it the intention of the government to subsidize a line of steamers between Canada and South America, more especially to Brazil and Argentine? If so, will tenders be called for the performance of this service?

2. Is it the intention of the government to pay subsidy on any steamer flying the Norwegian or any foreign flag, when British or Canadian steamers are available?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER:

1. The matter is now under consideration.

2. No.

1. What was the date of the appointment of Duncan Graham, of North Ontario, as Indian agent?
2. What was the amount of his salary?
3. Who was appointed to succeed Duncan Graham, what was the date of his appointment and the amount of this salary?

Mr. OLIVER:

1. He was appointed by order in council of 21st November, 1908.

COAL MINING RIGHTS IN SCHOOL LANDS.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar):

1. To whom were the eight leases issued last year for coal mining rights in school lands?
2. How many acres were covered by each lease?
3. What is the respective revenue from each lease?
4. How is the revenue calculated, by the ton of ore mined, or is it calculated at so much per acre?
5. How much ore has been mined under each lease to date?

Mr. OLIVER:

1. The eight leases of school lands for coal mining purposes issued during the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1910, were issued to the following persons: S.W. ¼ 11-39-22, W. 4th, coal berth 54, 160 acres, to William L. Waines; Pt. of 23-9-13, W. 4th, coal berth 55, 120 acres to Jonathan J. Mills; Pt. of 29-8-4, W. 5th, coal berth 56, 160 acres, to the McGillivray Creek Coal and Coke Company, Limited; All of 29-6-2, W. 5th, coal berth 58, 640 acres, to D. Conn and William Kerr; L.S. 4 of 29-10-16, W. 5th, coal berth 59, 40 acres, to George C. Millar; All of 11-10-22, W. 5th, coal berth 60, 636 acres, to the Chinook Coal Company, Limited; Pt. of 29-10-16, W. 5th, coal berth 61, 598 acres, to J. G. Douglas; N. W. ¼ of 29-16-21, W. 5th, coal berth 62, 160 acres, to J. and S. Henderson.
2. Information included in No. 1.
3. The revenue from each of the above leases to date is as follows: Coal berth 54—$160; coal berth 55—$240; coal berth 56—$320; coal berth 58—$1,280; coal berth 59—$80; coal berth 60—$1,272; coal berth 61—$598; coal berth 62—$160. These amounts cover the rental only, there being no royalty, as no coal has so far been mined.
4. The revenue from coal leases of school lands consists of rental at the rate of $1 per acre, and royalty at the rate of 5 cents per ton on the coal mined.
5. No coal has so far been mined.

FAVOURED-NATION TREATIES.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Before the orders of the day are called, I wish to ask the first minister a question. An article appeared in the Toronto 'Globe' of Monday last in reference to the Colonial conference, one paragraph of which I will read:

> When Sir Wilfrid Laurier goes to the Imperial Conference in May next, he will take up with the imperial government the question of the revision or abrogation in so far as Canada is concerned of the favoured-nation treaties with the Argentine Republic, Austria-Hungary, Bolivia, Colombo, Denmark, Russia, Spain, Sweden, Venezuela and Switzerland.

I would like to ask the first minister whether that statement is correct, and whether it is his intention to place before the House a list of the proposed changes that he intends to suggest on various matters, or the propositions which he intends to lay before the Colonial conference?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Such a statement as that which has been read by my hon. friend has not been authorized by me. I never said anything about those treaties except what I have stated in the House.

LORD STRATHCONA AND CANADIAN ASSOCIATED PRESS.

Mr. FIELDING. I have received a telegram which I think the sender must have intended to be placed before the House, because it has reference to a matter which was discussed a day or two ago by the hon. member for Kootenay (Mr. Goodeve) concerning a certain expression attributed to Lord Strathcona, and for which the hon. member for Kootenay called the Canadian Press Association to account. The object of this telegram appears to be to show that the Canadian Press Association was not at fault, and if there is no objection, I will read it to the House. It is addressed to myself:

Toronto, March 15, 1911.

Canadian Associated Press not responsible for error attributing expression of opinion on reciprocity to Lord Strathcona. Cable in question is London 'Standard,' and is cabled as such.

PRIVILEGE—MR. NORTHRUP.

Mr. NORTHRUP. I wished to bring a matter to the attention of the House when the orders of the day were called, and I dropped a line to the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) asking him to be in his place at this time. As he is not in his place, I will let the matter stand until to-morrow, and I again request that he be present then.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. JAMESON. I wish to ask the Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Frederick Borden) when the return relating to the Bear river rifle range will be brought down, in response to an Order of the House passed on February 15th last, asking for all the correspondence.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. The return is being made out.

Mr. JAMESON. Also correspondence in regard to the Deep Brook wharf, ordered on the 27th February.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I will make inquiry with regard to it.

Mr. JAMESON. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Brodeur) with regard to the return relating to Barrington Passage.

Mr. BRODEUR. I made inquiries about the return which my hon. friend is asking for. The papers are somewhat voluminous but they are being copied.

WAYS AND MEANS—RECIPROCAL TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair, I would like to bring to the attention of the government certain utterances by the President of the United States, as reported in the press. Speaking at Atlanta, Ga., on the 10th day of March, he is reported to have used these words:

When we entered upon the negotiations I asked the Secretary of State and his commissioners to offer free trade in everything, but this Canada could not grant us, because she has a protective system and she was afraid of the competition of our better-organized industries.

I would like to ask whether or not this is a correct statement, and I would like to call attention to this further circumstance: We have not, in respect to these negotiations, any information in this House as to offer or counter-offer one way or the other. In that respect the information with regard to these negotiations is very much less than the information which has usually been given to the House when treaties or arrangements of this kind have been brought down. If that is a correct statement of fact the House and the country are entitled to know it, and I think the House and the country are also entitled to know what other oral negotiations in reference to these matters took place. It is not desirable that we should have a one-sided or partial statement. If the President of the United States feels himself at liberty to make this part of the oral negotiations public, I see no reason why all of the oral negotiations should not be disclosed to this House. They would certainly, it seems to me, have been disclosed to this House and the country if they had been conducted in writing. They were not conducted in writing, apparently, but nevertheless they are equally important, and it is equally desirable that we should have the information. I should like also to ask what is the understanding of the government with respect to one further matter. Is Canada, on the one hand, or the United States, on the other, under the terms of this arrangement, at liberty to grant or to continue bounties, or to impose export duties on all or any of the articles and products which are included in the agreement? I mention that because some question has arisen in the discussion before the Committee on Ways and Means in the United States Senate in respect to a matter closely touching that particular point, and I would think it only right that we should have the view of the government with respect to that particular question.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). Perhaps I may be permitted first to answer the last question that my hon. friend (Mr. Borden, Halifax) put. There is no agreement, understanding or anything of the kind as between the Canadian government and the United States that is not set forth in the documents in the possession of the House. That is my best answer to my hon. friend regarding bounties, countervailing duties, export duties or anything of the sort. The document speaks for itself. With regard to the other question, my hon. friend quotes from the President of the United States as follows:

When we entered upon these negotiations I asked the Secretary of State and his commissioners to offer free trade in everything, but this Canada could not grant us, because she has a protective system and she was afraid of the competition of our better-organized industries.

That statement may be entirely correct, and I have no doubt is, as to the instructions that the President gave to his officials. But, as to what actually occurred in the conference, the matter did not advance to a position which would enable these gentlemen to make such a formal offer in that way. At the very earliest stage in the negotiations we certainly gave them to understand that we could not undertake to have any free trade in manufactures, speaking generally. There are certain articles which are on the free list and which were not the subject of discussion, but speaking generally, we gave them to understand that we were not prepared to deal with them on the basis of free trade in manufactures. That circumstance was clearly expressed by us at the beginning and no formal offer such as that suggested was ever made. Yet the statement is no doubt substantially correct as to the willingness of the President of the United States. I do not agree with my hon. friend that the information furnished as to the proceedings of the conference differs in any way from information furnished under similar circumstances at other times.

WAYS AND MEANS—FARMERS' BANK.

Mr. DAVID HENDERSON (Halton). Mr. Speaker, I propose to bring to your attention a matter which I judge to be of sufficient importance to engage the attention of the House for a short time. I refer to the failure of the Farmers' Bank. This question is one of very deep interest to myself, inasmuch as my constituents, whom I more particularly represent here, are very deeply interested. In the small county of Halton, perhaps one of the smallest counties in Ontario, there was subscribed to the stock of this bank $196,200, involving a liability to these shareholders of $392,400 if the double liability of the shareholders should be exacted. Apart from that, there were deposits in two agencies in the county of $69,581, making a total possible loss—and I say possible loss, because I have at the present time very little hope indeed that much will be saved out of this wreck—of $461,981. In a small county like that hon. gentlemen can readily understand that to the farmers who are most deeply interested, they being chiefly the subscribers to the stock, it will almost mean a panic; in fact, if no redress is obtained the county will be paralysed by this loss. The bank was called the Farmers' Bank, a name well chosen to enlist the sympathy of the farmers. The farmers were proud to have a bank taking their own name, and to my mind this was perhaps the strongest reason why these men so largely fell into line and subscribed so liberally to the stock. The farmers, as I said before, were the chief subscribers to this stock. There were others, some business men, some professional men, but chiefly those engaged in agricultural pursuits undertook to float the stock of this institution. Some of those farmers will be able to stand the loss, I have no doubt, but there are many to whom it will mean the loss of the savings of a lifetime, and when the loss falls on old men and old women, who have invested their spare means in this way the matter is one for very serious consideration.

I fear that a mortgage will have to be put on the farm in order to enable them to meet their obligations, and the trouble is that many of these people are too far advanced in years ever to redeem that mortgage. Living in this small county there are four directors who are farmers. One of these was placed on the board only at a late date, and to my mind he could not in any way be held responsible for what brought about the wreck of this bank. The other three were, I believe, directors from the organization of the bank, and these four directors together stand to lose $98,200. The question I wish to discuss is: who is responsible for the trouble that has been brought upon these people. Are the shareholders responsible? No, I look upon them as innocent. They were farmers following their regular pursuits, induced by, I believe, largely the name of 'Farmers' Bank' to engage in this undertaking. They did it in perfect good faith, they thought the matter was perfectly safe. They nominated the directors of the bank, and I believe also appointed the general manager at a meeting held about the 26th November, 1906, a few days before the certificate was given to put this bank into operation. We must bear in mind that until the certificate was granted these directors had very little power indeed. The provisional directors secured the subscriptions of stock and I believe they paid in to the Attorney General of the Dominion a sum of $250,000 in order to secure this certificate. But beyond that, so far as I know, the directors of the bank had no power to spend any money, and I am not aware that they legally spent any other money, although I believe there was some money paid out, not in accord with the terms of the Bank Act. I say that apart from this $250,000 which was paid into the Minister of Finance for the purpose of securing a certificate to enable this bank to go into operation, I do not think the directors had anything to do in the way of expending money. They could do no business, they could not borrow, they could not lend in the name of the bank, and consequently the shareholders up to this time felt a great deal of security in as much as no certificate had yet been granted to do business. All the power they had, to my mind, was to complete the organization up to that date. Without the certificate the shareholders money would have been intact; every dollar they had paid in would to-day have been there because the directors had no power to pay it out. The $250,000 paid into the Receiver General would have been intact had the bank gone into operation and be perfectly safe in the hands of the Minister of Finance and could have been returned and paid back to those who subscribed the money, and thus no loss would have accrued. No branch bank could have been opened until authority was given by the Treasury Board to start business; there would have been no liability to depositors, and that is one of the serious matters connected with the whole affair, namely, that the depositors innocently believing the bank was organized on a sound basis came forward readily and placed their money on deposit in the various branches that were opened throughout the country. Only two of these were in the county of Halton, but I think there must have been some 20 or 30 throughout the province, and the sum of $1,281,774 was deposited. Had the certificate never been granted by the Treasury Board the bank could not have gone into operation. There could have been no such thing as the deal in connection with the Keeley mine, which was one of the unfortunate circumstances which brought the bank to ruin and neither could there have been a Trust Company deal, and I do not look upon that with very much favour. Had the certificate not been issued there would have been no bad debts, there would have been no double liability for the shareholders to meet, and to-day the shareholders would have been in a comparatively happy position.

Mr. LOW. How could the Treasury Board withold the certificate when the money was tendered?

Mr. HENDERSON. Possibly before I finish the hon. gentleman will learn what my opinion is on that matter, and I am under the impression that he will very strongly agree with me. Under the Bank Act $500,000 had to be subscribed and $250,000 of that had to be paid to the Attorney General of the Dominion. That $250,000 could not be made up in any way, partly by subscriptions of stock and partly by borrowed money because every dollar of it had to be money received from payments on stock, and I think if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Low) had read the report of the liquidator in Toronto he would have learned that a very considerable part of that money was not money that was paid in on stock, but money that was borrowed on the strength of notes of those who instead of paying in the money gave these notes for a portion of their subscriptions.

Mr. LOW. How was the Receiver General to know that the money had been received from that source; the curator's report was not out at that time?

Mr. HENDERSON. If the hon. gentleman will bear with me for a few moments I will be very happy to tell him. I said that this $250,000 must be paid out of cash actually paid on stock. If my hon. friend reads the Bank Act he will find there is no doubt about that, and it was the duty of the Treasury Board to ascertain that that was an actual fact. If the Treasury Board did not do so they failed in their duty because that was one of the things it was necessary for them to know before they could issue a treasury board certificate and launch this bank on the country. I have perused the minutes of the annual meeting of the bank and the minutes of the directors' meeting in the early stages of the bank's history, and I have failed to ascertain that either the shareholders or the directors gave any man authority to ask the Treasury Board for a certificate, and I think the authority should have come from that direction. The man who asked the Treasury Board for a certificate was the man who had been appointed as managing director. On the 27th of November, Mr. Travers as general manager, by a letter written from Toronto, applied to the Minister of Finance for a certificate to enable him to proceed to open the bank and to do an ordinary banking business. That letter was no doubt received by the Minister of Finance on the 28th of November, and on the 30th of November the Treasury Board granted the certificate. Evidently very little trouble or time was taken to find out the bona fides of the whole matter, and whether this money was really the money of the stockholders or from what source it came. Now, the certificate granted to Mr. Travers enabled him to do practically as he pleased with the funds of the bank; it enabled him to play ducks and drakes with all the money which the shareholders had paid to him. Only one day intervened between the receipt of the requisition and the granting of the certificate. I think one day was too short. I do not hesitate to say that this man, when he asked for the certificate, misled the Minister of Finance. I would not think anything else. I am quite sure the representations he made were not correct; they are practically admitted to be untrue, and there is no doubt that the Treasury Board, the Minister of Finance particularly, were to a certain extent misled by this representation. I do not think the Treasury Board took the time that was necessary to see whether everything that was put before them was absolutely right, or whether they were justified at all in granting the certificate. The affidavit made by Mr. Travers was submitted to the Deputy Minister of Justice for his opinion as to whether that was sufficient authority for the Treasury Board to grant a certificate, and I want to draw the attention of hon. members to a very significant expression in the answer of the Deputy Minister, a shrewd lawyer who could see through the matter as quickly as any one. He said that the statements of Mr. Travers were sufficient on which the board could exercise their power of granting a certificate 'if they are accepted.' These four significant words in the letter of the Deputy Minister of Justice to my mind were a warning to the Treasury Board to be careful. He apparently did not think that the statements made by the general manager were reliable or acceptable. Now, there is no doubt that there had not been sufficient money paid in to the provisional directors on account of stock to make up the $250,000. I presume that a great many hon. members have read the proceedings of the curator and the liquidator in Toronto, and it is perfectly clear that no such sum of money was available to pay to the Receiver General to obtain this certificate. I contend that in the granting of this certificate there was a direct violation of the Bank Act. That Act is most explicit that every dollar of this $250,000 should be paid in on account of stock, should not be borrowed money or money derived from any other source; and that not having been done in this case was a clear evasion of the Bank Act, and the Treasury Board should have inquired into the facts. I have before me a copy of the 'Monetary Times,' a journal printed in Toronto that devotes attention to matters of finance, and it deals with this question in a better way than I could; so I am going to read from it a few words to show how the government, or those acting for the government in this matter, were warned. The 'Monetary Times' says:

> The day on which the Farmers Bank obtained its charter was the first day of Farmers' Bank deceit. The 'Monetary Times' admits that the government was placed in a delicate position. It could not have gone to Mr. Travers, saying that dishonesty was rampant in his institution, and notifying its intention to withdraw the charter. But the department had six different warnings at various periods of the bank's existence. On October 8, 1906, about a month and a half before the certificate was granted, Mr. Leighton McCarthy wrote to Mr. Fielding that a number of subscribers to the shares of the Farmers' Bank would dispute the bona fide character of the subscriptions. 'Grave conditions have arisen,' he said, 'which require careful consideration before the Treasury Board grant any certificate to the organizing of this bank.' In a subsequent letter dated October 19, Mr. McCarthy again wrote the Minister of Finance formally asking that the Treasury Board stay any action on the application of the Farmers' Bank for a certificate.

Now, I may be told that later on Mr. McCarthy withdrew his protest, assigning as a reason that his clients had been settled with by the bank, and therefore he had no further claim to make, but even supposing that his clients had been settled with the fact remains that the government had information that there was something decidedly wrong.

Mr. Fielding wrote to Mr. Travers, stating that in a previous case there had been an evasion of the intention of the Bank Act, and that subscribers to stock had given their note instead of paying in cash. Mr. Travers replied, 'I have to say that in the case of the Farmers' Bank of Canada the provisional directors did not raise the money in the way maintained by you.'

The information was that the provisional directors or Mr. Travers had raised this money, or a considerable portion of it, by taking the notes of shareholders who had paid for only a part of their stock, discounting these notes in the bank or in a trust company, and using the proceeds for the purpose of making up what was required of the $250,000, after exhausting the money they had from such stock subscriptions. Now there were two occasions on which the attention of the government was drawn forcibly to this very circumstance which Mr. McCarthy complained of, because the trouble with Mr. McCarthy's clients was that they had given notes for part of their stock and discovered afterwards that their notes had been endorsed by the provisional directors and discounted in other banks for the purpose of raising money to meet the deposit necessary to secure a certificate, which was clearly an evasion of the banking law.

I am now going to mention another circumstance, which, I think, my hon. friend the Minister of Finance will quite well remember. As I told you, Mr. Speaker, I felt a very deep interest in the affairs of this bank owing to the fact that so much money was at stake in it from the county I have the honour to represent. I felt very much worried, not because of any personal interest for I had refused to subscribe to any of the stock, although asked to do so. I refused because I had not sufficient faith in the concern to warrant my doing so. It was not, therefore, for any personal reason that I felt so much interested but simply because I had a deep regard for the welfare of the men in my county who had pledged their credit, ranging from $100 up to as high as $22,000, which, with the double liability, would mean a liability of from $200 to $44,000. I went therefore to the Minister of Finance myself and spoke to him about this. I told him that I felt very uncomfortable over the matter and was afraid there was going to be trouble.

An hon. MEMBER. Was that before the certificate was granted?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, and I told him the reason why I was anxious. That the reason was that very many of my constituents were deeply involved in the matter. I said to him: I have personal knowledge of this because I have seen notes in the hands of the solicitor who was acting for some ten or a dozen of these men, and who had taken proceedings against the bank and had forced it to give back the money they had paid and the notes they had signed. He had forced the bank to do this because the provisional directors were not carrying out the spirit and intent of the Bank Act. I had seen those notes. They were endorsed by the provisional directors for the purpose of raising money, presumably to provide the necessary deposit of $250,000 to get the certificate and enable the bank to begin business. Let me now read the answer given by the Minister of Finance to a question asked by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), and I consider that I am justified in mentioning these facts because of the position I occupy in this House as representing these men. Under the 30th January last the hon. member for North Toronto asked this question:

Did the Finance Department, or any of its officials, the Finance Minister or any other member of the government, receive any communication, verbal or written, previous to the issue of the certificate of the Treasury Board to the Farmers' Bank, cautioning, warning or suggesting an inquiry as to the standing or character of the promoters, or the proceedings by which the deposit was procured.

The hon. minister replied as follows:

The government did not receive in any form any information which afforded ground for a refusal of the deposit.

The hon. member for North Toronto was not satisfied with that answer, and later on in the day repeated his question and pointed out that the answer given was not really a reply to the question he had put. He said:

I beg leave to point out to the House that the answer given is not an answer to my question. I think I have a right to an answer to my question, then the House, as well as myself would form its own opinion as to whether it afforded ground for any interference.

To this the Finance Minister replied:

There was some gossip in banking circles concerning the Farmers' Bank, of which we became aware. I do not see how we can take cognizance of that. There is an answer as to any representation that was made in the proper way. There was gossip abroad concerning the Farmers' Bank, I was well aware of it.

I presume that the hon. minister intended to include me among those who were retailing gossip.

Mr. FIELDING. I can relieve my hon. friend's mind on that point. I had no such intention.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am very glad indeed to have that statement because I can assure the hon. minister that I had no intention of retailing gossip. I went to him with a straight fact that came under my personal knowledge, and I felt it my duty, as representing a county in which large amounts of money were at stake in this concern, to make the representation that I did. The Minister of Finance treated me with the greatest courtesy. He told me that he would hold the certificate back as long as he could. That certainly is evidence that my representation to him was made before the certificate was granted.

Mr. MILLER. The hon. gentleman says that he was uneasy and anxious because people in his riding had invested in the stock of that bank. Would he say definitely what information he gave to the minister and whether he asked the minister to withhold the certificate.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think I made my statement sufficiently clear. I shall repeat again so that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Miller) may understand it. I told him I was deeply interested in the matter of the Farmers' Bank for the reason that a very large amount of money, practically almost half the stock of the bank was subscribed in my county. I realized at this time that it might create a panic in the county if the worst came to the worst, and the bank should fail and the double liability be exacted. I told him that I myself, had seen promissory notes made by farmers in my county, endorsed by the provisional directors that had been used, as I was informed and verily believed for the purpose of raising money presumably to make up the $250,000 required in order to get a certificate. No other money was wanted by the provisional directors. They did not require to borrow money for any other purpose; they had no authority to borrow money at all, and this borrowing was altogether improper. Now, I made that statement, and I thought that was a warning to the Minister of Finance to beware of the men with whom he was dealing, and that he should be on his guard. The Minister of Finance accepted my statement in that light, and, as I said, with all the courtesy that was required, he told me that he would hold the certificate back as long as he could. I confess that I left the Minister of Finance feeling quite safe. I thought the matter was in the strong hands of a strong man, who stood between the subscribers to this stock and the government, a man who was in a position to defend my constituents and prevent them being defrauded. Shortly afterward, the minister met me in the corridor—there was no secrecy about this conversation, never so intended by me, or I believe, by the minister—and informed me that Mr. Travers had been down, and that he had brought his money. And the minister said - (I will use his own words)—'I put it up to him and he denied it.' What was it the minister 'put up to him?' What did the minister wish me to understand he had 'put up to him,' but the very statement I had made to him a short time before? And Mr. Travers denied it. He then asked Mr. Travers to give him a letter to that effect, declaring that my statement was untrue. And he accepted that letter and gave Mr. Travers this certificate. He believed Mr. Travers whom he had never met, perhaps, until a few days before—because I believe he was introduced to him by Mr. Calvert,—he accepted Travers' words, and repudiated mine, although I had sat in the House with him for fifteen years and we had always been on the best of terms. I confess that, when I heard the minister say, in answer to a question in this House that 'certain gossip' had come to him, I felt somewhat hurt; and I am delighted today to hear the minister say that in using these words he had no reference to myself, and I candidly believe he had not.

Now, I may as well follow this matter to the end. In fact, I am compelled to do so, because my constituents think I ought to have something done, something to prevent this terrible holocaust. I met the minister, possibly about two years ago, and he confessed to me that he had some alarm about the Farmers' Bank and related to me the circumstance—which had not then come to my knowledge—that the bank had been peddling in the city of New York a deposit receipt for $150,000 and could not find a purchaser. I confess this looked very suspicious as to the standing of the bank. Before the close of last session, I called on the minister and drew his attention to a matter that had come to my knowledge through a gentleman in Toronto—the clippings of the correspondence that took place in reference to the matter that came up in Syracuse, the purchase of some insurance company. I again repeated to the minister my anxiety over the standing of this bank; for I confess I was anxious, I was worried; not on my own account, but for those who lived in my county, many of whom I knew personally, and for whom I had the greatest respect. And I wish to say in passing, that I am not speaking particularly on behalf of my political friends, because the men who stand to lose the most money in that county are men who are the political friends of hon. gentlemen on that side of the House. I make no point of that, but I do not wish it to be understood that I interested myself in this matter along political lines. As I say, I called on the minister and told him that, owing to the correspondence that appeared in the paper, I thought there was danger to the Farmers' Bank. The minister was familiar with what had taken place, and, seeing that I was somewhat worried over the matter, he very kindly said to me, 'Henderson, I don't see why you should worry over this; you are not responsible; besides, you did warn the government.' Those were the explicit words of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. FIELDING. I am bound to say to my hon. friend (Mr. Henderson) that I shall have to take exception to that statement later on.

Mr. HENDERSON. I make that statement of my own knowledge, from distinct recollection;—and you can understand, Sir, and I think the House will understand, how vividly it was impressed upon my mind from what I have said of the anxiety I had concerning the standing of this bank. The minister says he will have to take exception to my statement, but I must ask him, as one member of this House, as one has a right to ask another, to accept this statement. I will not put it in the extreme form, but I adhere to it; the statement I made is absolutely correct.

So much, then, for the reason why the Treasury Board should have been on their guard, and should have refused the certificate at the time. The government unfortunately, did not heed the warning. Had they delayed and investigated, I am hopeful that they would have disovered that this man was not entitled to the certificate to open this bank; and I repeat, if no certificate had been issued, this unfortunate affair would have been avoided.

Now, we ask the question: Who is responsible?—for I look upon this as the crux of the whole matter. I may be told that the officers of the bank named by the shareholders are responsible. I cannot agree to that proposition, because as I have already stated, the officers named by the bank had no power to squander the money of the bank. All the money they could pay out legally was the $250,000. That they had the right to do and did, I think, about the 23rd of October prior to the issue of the certificate. So, I fail to see that the shareholders are responsible in any way because their officers were guilty of wrongdoing. The Bank Act, in fact, delegates to the government, the power to safeguard the shareholders. That is the business of the government. Why was the clause put in the Bank Act forbidding the issuing of a certificate until all the formalities had been complied with? That was certainly to safeguard the public, those who had put their money into the institution, and one of the matters that I refer to more especially is the fact that the money that was sent down here to make the deposit was only in part the money derived from the sale of stock. Those who have been following the reports of the curator or liquidator in Toronto will have ascertained that only $170,000 of the shareholders' money was available for that purpose, and that there was borrowed from another institution $80,000 to make up the $250,000. I assume that if the evidence came out, that money was paid back to that institution which advanced the $80,000 after the $245,000 had been returned by the Receiver General to the bank in Toronto.

Now I contend that the most rigid inquiry ought to be made into this whole matter. I do not think that a liquidator in Toronto, or the curator who is dealing with that matter, has the power to deal with it, as it ought to be dealt with. What right have they to come down here and investigate the doings of this government? To the actions of this government, or to those on the Treasury Board, I think we must look for the origin of the trouble, and for the cause of the calamity. Therefore, I say we must pursue some other course, and my suggestion is that a full and thorough inquiry by a Royal Commission alone could bring out the information that is desired. If the shareholders alone are responsible through the men that they appointed, I could not argue but that they would have to suffer the loss alone; they would have to suffer any loss if they alone were responsible. But if these officers did not do anything that could dissipate their money, if they were not alone responsible, then I believe that we must look further; and if the government of this country was misled or deceived, or through lack of care in any way neglected to investigate the matter before a certificate was given to launch this bank, before giving the general manager power, as I said before, to play ducks and drakes with what was left of the shareholders' money, then I think that not the shareholders, but this country ought to come to the rescue for any loss that has been made. I submit that this country is big enough, rich enough and generous enough to maintain its honour, and I do not see how the honour of this government or of this country could be maintained in this matter unless they came down with something to assist these poor people, and help them out of the difficulty which they have unfortunately fallen into. To do that requires an inquiry over and above anything that could be brought out under the Winding Up Act. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I beg to move:

That all the words after the word 'that' in the proposed motion be omitted and the following substituted therefor:

This House is of opinion that a Royal Commission should forthwith issue to inquire into and investigate the incorporation and organization of the Farmers' Bank of Canada, and the granting of a certificate by the Treasury Board permitting said bank to issue notes and transact business, and all the circumstances connected therewith; and generally to inquire into and investigate the operation and efficiency of the Bank Act in relation to the affairs and transactions of said bank.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). With that portion of my hon. friend's remarks which deals with the misfortunes that have fallen upon these good citizens of Canada, and upon other good citizens of Canada, I am sure we all deeply sympathize. But though we may deeply sympathize with these good citizens in the misfortunes which have come upon them, it does not follow that we would be justified in treating them differently from all other citizens who have the misfortune to make an unhappy investment. A short time ago my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) put a question on the Order Paper, and an answer was given on behalf of the government. I propose to read the question and the answer, because in a very short form they present the case on both sides:

Mr. HENDERSON. What action does the government intend to take on the two requests preferred by the deputation on behalf of the shareholders and depositors of the Farmers' Bank, viz., that a Royal Commission be appointed to make a thorough examination into all matters connected with the incorporation and management of the Farmers' Bank; and that legislation be enacted to relieve shareholders of their double liability and to enable depositors to be paid at least fifty cents on the dollar?

Mr. FIELDING. The government have no reason to doubt that the exercise of the powers given to the liquidator by law, and the performance of the duties imposed upon that officer by like authority, and the proceedings now engaging the attention of the courts of justice in Toronto, will lead to a full investigation into and disclosure of all the affairs of the bank, and that, therefore, there is no need of the appointment of a Royal Commission. Should anything arise later to indicate that the investigation is insufficient, the question can be further considered. Replying to the latter part of the hon. gentleman's question, the government deeply regret that a number of people who are not well able to bear the loss are likely to suffer from the failure of the bank, but in the judgment of the government it would be contrary to public policy to recoup the losses of any class of investors from the public treasury.

There has been no change in the condition of affairs since that answer was given. An investigation has been undertaken in part by the curator, and subsequently in part by the liquidator, the machinery of the courts has been invoked, and has been occupying a great deal of attention of the courts in the province of Ontario, and I see no reason to doubt that the investigation will be thorough. With regard to the investigation of the circumstances connected with the issue of the certificates, all that is a matter of record which is before the House. No investigation would bring forth anything material that is not now in the possession of the House, or is not within easy reach of the House. Therefore, we are unable to see that the situation is in any respect changed, or that there is any need of a Royal Commission to investigate matters which are already being fully investigated in the courts.

There are three stages in the proceedings in connection with the Farmers' Bank. There is, first, the incorporation of the bank; second, the issue of the certificate; third, the operations of the bank after organization. I desire to invite the attention of the House to each of these stages separately. My hon. friend, in his address, made no reference whatever to the incorporation although I see that in his motion he has included the incorporation of the bank as one of the matters which might require investigation

Mr. HENDERSON. I certainly understood the issue of the certificate to be part of the incorporation.

Mr. FIELDING. I am glad in that respect that my hon. friend has mentioned it, because he did not mention it in his remarks. But, inasmuch as the incorporation of this bank has been the subject of very much discussion outside, it is as well that in considering the matter, we should give some attention to the circumstances under which the Act of incorporation was obtained. We have a general Act governing banking operations, but each bank has its individual and separate charter. Each bank comes to this House with a private Bill for the purpose of obtaining incorporation. It is not a matter particularly of government concern. Any individual member has the right, and exercises the right, of bringing in a Bill to provide for the incorporation of a new bank. The matter is usually investigated by the Committee on Banking and Commerce. In that committee the government have no particular rights. A member of the government at the committee has precisely the same right as all other members have. While the government will naturally feel an interest in all legislation, I am one of those who think that in the matter of private legislation, it is not well that the government should at all times project itself into the discussion and endeavour to have these matters take a party turn. So, in private legislation there is always very great freedom claimed by an individual member, which is not always the case with regard to general legislation initiated by the government or perhaps by hon. gentlemen opposite. The government, of course, have an interest in all legislation, and in that sense are responsible for legislation generally, but it is a fact that the method of dealing with private Bills differs somewhat from the manner in which general legislation is handled.

This bank was incorporated in 1904. I do not remember that any exception was taken to the incorporation at that time. The bank was not organized at that time. The promoters came back in 1905 for an extension and received it. In the year 1906 they came back again. Now, as I said a moment ago, that committee is composed of gentlemen from both sides of the House, and if there had been any objection to the incorporation of the bank, it would have been well that we should have heard it and that those who opposed it should have placed themselves on record. As far as my memory goes, the only objection that was ever raised to the incorporation of this bank, came from myself and from some members who may later on, have shared my view. But, to the original incorporation, I do not remember that any objection was taken. We have to consider a moment the general principles governing bank incorporation. The business of Canada has been increasing faster than the available banking capital. It is desirable that we should have from time to time additional banking capital. Whether that should be obtained by increasing the capital of existing banks or by the creation of new banks, is not, perhaps, a matter of great concern, but that the country with its rapid growth should have further capital will be generally admitted. Whenever a proposition is made to incorporate a new bank, the committee is rather disposed to view it in a friendly light. I do not know whether there was any objection taken to the incorporation in 1904 nor can I recall anything in particular with regard to the application which was made in 1905. In 1906 the promoters came back again and I then opposed the granting of a charter. My view was that the fact that they had not been able to organize promptly, indicated that they were having difficulty, and I confess that from the beginning I did not quite like the name of the Farmers' Bank. My fear was, that possibly the granting of the charter in 1905 would have the effect of inducing people to engage in the banking business, who were not likely to realize the responsibility they were assuming in becoming shareholders. However, the sentiments of members differed as they sometimes do in the Banking and Commerce Committee. Some hon. gentlemen were not in harmony with my own view and after some discussion, I found I could not carry my views as to the rejection of the charter, but, it was agreed that they should at all events, be permitted a six months extension and I think I probably assented to that. At all events, I know that I succeeded in obtaining a reduction of the period for which the extension was granted. If it had not been granted what would have been said? At the time this argument was put to me, members friendly to the venture came and said: You must not oppose this charter, Mr. Minister. The country needs banking capital and there is a good deal of feeling in the country that the old banks have a monopoly of the business. I do not quite endorse that, but there is a good deal of that feeling, and these gentlemen said: If you are going to oppose the efforts of the farmers to have a share in the banking business of the country, you will be met with the cry that parliament is giving the old banks a monopoly, and is not willing to give a fair chance to the farmers. In the Banking and Commerce Committee that feeling leads us to grant charters sometimes when possibly some of us would prefer that they should not grant them. At all events under these circumstances and with that feeling on my part, the charters was granted by this parliament after it had been reported by the Banking and Commerce Committee of which many hon. gentlemen opposite are members and for which I take whatever share of responsibility I have as a member of that committee. Therefore, I think I can say at once that in so far as the granting of the charter is concerned, there is no room now for any complaint against the action of this government, or for that matter, against the action of this parliament. I am taking my responsibility as one member of this committee and of this parliament. Although I would have preferred that the charter should not continue to exist I accepted the compromise of a six months extension, and of course, I accept responsibility for that with my colleagues on the committee. Therefore, I say that parliament is responsible for the granting of the charter and I do not think that any reasonable ground of objection can be taken to the incorporation of the new bank in face of the fact that the incorporation of new banks is still regarded as generally desirable.

Now, we come to the second question, the granting of the certificate. I want to say in that connection that my chief regret is that I have to have a difference of opinion with my respected friend from Halton. I know him too well to hesitate for a moment in accepting any statement that he might make. I credit him with all good faith and sincerity, and if he and I do not agree as to what has occurred that does not imply that I for one moment question the good faith or veracity of my hon. friend, but it simply means that I am obliged to say that my hon. friend is mistaken. I am obliged to say when my hon. friend tells me that he warned me against the issue of this certificate that he is mistaken. My hon. friend and I have had frequent conversations over the question of this bank. I do not recall, however, that we met in any formal way, but we met at different times as members of the House do, and we had conversations concerning the bank. That arose from the fact that my hon. friend knew I was opposed to the granting of the charter and that I viewed it with anxiety. The conversations between my hon. friend and myself were always along the line that we regretted the necessity for the creation of this Farmers' Bank, we were sorry to have the farmers of the country engaging in banking when, in the case of many of them, they were not familiar with the responsibilities which would be involved in the acceptance of shares of a bank. All our conversations were along that line. We were feeling sorry that the farmers were going into this matter, but I can assure my hon. friend that when he says that he warned me against the issue of the certificate, although I know he makes the statement in all good faith, I am bound to say that to the best of my recollection he is entirely mistaken. Nothing of the kind occurred.

Mr. FOSTER. Does my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) wish that denial to apply to the three interviews at which there were conversations or only to the last one?

Mr. FIELDING. I do not remember how many conversations I had with my hon. friend.

Mr. FOSTER. There were three that were mentioned.

Mr. FIELDING. No matter how many there were, in so far as they took place before the issue of the certificate, I mean my denial to apply to all. I had conversations with my hon. friend from time to time as to the regret which we both had about the farmers going into this bank, but I distinctly state that my hon. friend is wrong when he says that he warned me against the issue of a certificate. He says that I decided to accept the statement of Mr. Travers as against him.

I am bound to say that if the matter ever did take that shape—with my hon. friend a witness on one side—knowing my hon. friend for many years as well as I do—and having on the other side a gentleman who I did not know at all, I would unhesitatingly accept my hon. friend's statement. But I wish to say that the matter never did take that position at all; there never was any conflict with my hon. friend on one side and Manager Travers on the other. My hon. friend (Mr. Henderson) says that I told him—he is very clear about it, and he presumes to quote the exact language—that I 'put it up' to him (Mr. Travers). Well, if I were not sure otherwise I would certainly be sure from that, because I do not believe that I ever used such a phrase in my life. Whatever faults I have in the elegance of my language, I am quite satisfied that I never used such an expression, and therefore I can say my hon. friend does not recollect that correctly. However, that is not very important.

Mr. HENDERSON. I must say that my recollection of that is very distinct, and I think that the minister ought to accept my word.

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. gentleman must remember that I am no more bound to accept his word than he is to accept mine.

Mr. HENDERSON. I made my statement.

Mr. FIELDING. Well, I make my statement.

Mr. HENDERSON. You have no right to contradict my statement.

Mr. FIELDING. Nor has my hon. friend any right to contradict mine.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am not contradicting yours.

Mr. FIELDING. Well, we need have no conflict over that. I say at once that I have too much regard for my hon. friend (Mr. Henderson) to suggest for a single moment that he would make any statement in this House that he did not make in all sincerity, and believe to be absolutely correct. I would do my hon. friend and myself an injustice if I suggested anything of the sort; but I am bound to say that his memory is wrong as to what occurred.

Mr. HENDERSON. Not at all.

Mr. FIELDING. While my hon. friend and I had occasional conversations about the affairs of this bank they all arose out of the fact that I had opposed the granting of this charter and viewed the matter with some anxiety.

Mr. HENDERSON. I must take exception to that statement. I have no recollection of ever discussing with him the impropriety of granting these people a charter. I was on the Banking and Commerce Committee and supported the granting of that charter which was originally, I think, in the hands of the hon. member for South Wellington, and I representing farmers of Canada never objected to them getting a charter.

Mr. FIELDING. I did not say that my hon. friend objected to giving the charter. I said I had objected to giving the charter, and as hon. members who sat with me on the committee are aware I reluctantly agreed to give them a six-months' extension, and it was out of that discussion arising in that way that my hon. friend and I occasionally had conversation. Certain portions of the conversation he has repeated and certain others he has not, but that is not material. I must say frankly that while I am not complaining of his repeating the conversations, and while I would not think myself free to repeat them under the circumstances, I do not complain. I said nothing to my hon. friend that might not be said from the house tops.

Mr. HENDERSON. Does the hon. gentleman consider that the conversation on a public matter of that kind was private? I certainly never considered it so. When I make representations concerning a public matter of interest to my constituents I would consider that they are perfectly open.

Mr. FIELDING. I am not complaining; I said that I did not consider myself free to repeat the conversation I had with my hon. friend, but my hon. friend has a different view as to that. Might I ask the hon. gentleman how it is, if it was a grave and serious matter affecting his constituents as he now says, he did not take the trouble to put his views in writing so that they might go on record and be beyond dispute) If my hon. friend felt as keenly in the matter as he now does, if he believed that the granting of this certificate was about to come to pass, and if he had good reasons against it, surely my hon. friend would be bound by his duties to his constituents to have addressed me a letter and have his views on record, and then there would be no room for dispute.

Mr. HENDERSON. While I believed there was trouble I was extremely anxious not to say anything more than was absolutely necessary in case that might bring about the collapse of an institution which eventually might work its way through. I considered that my personal verbal statement to the minister which was intended for him as a warning was just as good as if I had put it in writing, and I stated the reason why I preferred that mode rather than putting a document on file which might have been read by others and construed into an attempt on my part to wreck a bank which might otherwise pull through.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend will see that that remark might apply very well after the bank was organized, but it does not apply to a time when the bank was not organized at all, and when there was no bank to wreck. He says it is before the certificate was granted he warned me against it, and if so there is no reason why that warning should not be put in writing. Did my hon. friend then attach the same importance to it that he does now he should have done himself the justice of putting that warning in writing.

Mr. HENDERSON. I did not regard it at the time as a necessity.

Mr. FIELDING. As a rule public business is transacted in writing; as a rule when men wish to bring about important transactions they exchange letters which will make the matter clear and place it beyond the possibility of any dispute, and if the hon. gentleman fails to do that and leaves it to a matter of memory, well, his memory is just as likely to be treacherous as that of any other hon. gentleman. I want to say distinctly that the conversation my hon. friend and I had, had no reference to any warning and that I never received from him any warning as to the issue of the certificate to this bank.

Mr. BOYCE. Is not the minister's memory likely to be treacherous on that point?

Mr. FIELDING. It is possible. I am admitting that my hon. friend from Halton makes the statement in absolute sincerity, but I say that my recollection is that he is wrong. If he wishes to think that my recollection is wrong and his is right we will have to leave it at that. The fact that he failed to put it in writing is rather a misfortune in view of the difference of opinion that has arisen.

Mr. HENDERSON. I would tell the Minister of Finance that I have ere this put my views in writing and a minister of the government of which he was a member, although these views were marked 'private,' published them in a blue-book and sent them broadcast all over the country to try and do me an injury. I do not mean to say that the minister of finance would have published this in order to do me an injury. I am quite satisfied he would not.

Mr. FIELDING. How could I have done my hon. friend an injury?

Mr. HENDERSON. It might be insinuated that I made an attempt to wreck the bank.

Mr. FIELDING. It would stand now to my hon. friend's infinite credit if he had warned me and if I had gone on despite the warning. However, my hon. friend did not take that course, and I will leave that matter as it is. The first stage in this matter of the issue of the certificate is to be found in a communication from Mr. Leighton McCarthy, who says he is instructed by some shareholders, his clients, to object to the issue of the certificate, and he states in a subsequent letter that he complains that in some cases where large sums of money have been paid, notes have also been given. Now, at that time the application for a certificate had not yet been received. Mr. McCarthy was informed there was no application, and that when the application did come his representation would have all due consideration. Mr. McCarthy's letters on that subject were dated October 8th and 19th. My hon. friend (Mr. Henderson) has spoken of very great haste on this question, and he has said that the application for the certificate was written on the 27th, presumably received on the 28th, and the certificate was granted on the 30th November; but if my hon. friend will look through the correspondence he will see that on the 23rd of October Mr. Travers took the first step toward the organization by depositing the $250,000 in the Bank of Montreal, and notifying the department that he deposited it for the purpose of organizing the bank. So my hon. friend will see that we had notice of the application and the money in our possession for some considerable time before the dates he has mentioned.

Mr. LALOR. May I ask the hon. minister if he had any letters warning him as to this bank other than that of Mr. Leighton McCarthy?

Mr. FIELDING. I think I am right in saying that there were no other letters. The day after the certificate was granted, a letter came from the Canadian Bankers' Association.

Mr. LALOR. As a matter of fact, did not a local manager write to you warning you of this bank?

Mr. FIELDING. Any letter written to us by a local manager had no reference to the issue of the certificate at all. I think I know what my hon. friend refers to. It had reference to another matter later. Mr McCarthy filed his objections, and on the 2nd of November Mr. McCarthy withdrew his objections in a letter in which he says:

Referring to my letters of the 8th and 9th inst., with referenece to the application for a certificate made on behalf of the Farmers' Bank, I am advised by those who are instructing me that the claims made by them in the action brought have been settled by their subscriptions being taken up by some parties interested in the bank and refunding the money paid by the individuals or returning the notes which had been given. The objections which I made on their behalf to the issue of the certificates are, therefore, withdrawn. Would you mind therefore returning to me the papers which I forwarded to you?

The papers were, accordingly, returned to Mr. McCarthy. The next stage of the matter was that, anticipating the application, the Deputy Minister of Finance, Mr. Boville, wrote to Mr. Travers that it would be desirable that he should furnish a detailed statement of the actual amount of cash paid up in the case of each shareholder. Mr. Travers, in his affidavit, to which I will come in a moment, gave the most positive assurance that the amounts set forth, had been paid in cash. After the declaration of Mr. Travers had been received, although it was in proper order, I thought it desirable that I should see him on the subject. Mr. Travers came to the department in connection with the certificate, and I had a conversation with him, arising out of this note business. At that time—to the best of my knowledge and belief, the only time in my life that I met Mr. Travers,—I had a conversation with him, in which I called his attention to the fact that there were rumours in banking circles that sometimes the organization of banks was brought about by the use of notes instead of cash. Mr. Travers in the most positive terms declared that there was no foundation for any suspicion of that kind in the present case.

Mr. THORNTON. What made you suspicious of Mr. Travers at that particular time?

Mr. FIELDING. The letter itself says that I had heard of rumours in banking circles that in the case of previous organizations of banks the Bank Act had been evaded by the use of notes. I called Mr. Travers' attention to that and cross-examined him as well as I could on that aspect of the question. He assured me in the most positive terms that the cash was paid in, in every case. I think I had dictated a letter to Mr. Travers that was on its way to him, and I said I would like him to give me a written answer, which he did. So that we had before us at the moment of issuing the certificate Mr. Travers' affidavit and Mr. Travers' letter. Now, before we proceed to quote the statements of Mr. Travers, let us reflect for a moment on his present position and on the position he occupied at the time these events occurred. Mr. Travers is now a convict in prison, a discredited man. When you talk of the testimony of Mr. Travers to-day, you evidently think of him as a convict, the prisoner, the discredited man. But do not forget that at the moment Mr. Travers came before the Department of Finance, he was a man in as good standing as any member of this House, as far as I know. Do not forget that at that time he was the recognized manager of a new bank, associated with reputable men, and that he came to us on behalf of those reputable men in order that he might do business with us. Now, who were the men associated with Mr. Travers in the matter? By reference to the charter of the bank, you will find that at that time Mr. Travers was acting in co-operation with a number of gentlemen who are named as provisional directors: James Gallagher, of the village of Teeswater, John Watson, of the town of Listowell, John Ferguson and Alexander Fraser, both of the city of Toronto, and Alexander Shepherd Lown, of the village of Drayton. I have not the pleasure of knowing any of these gentlemen, but I am told that they are men of good standing in their respective communities. Mr. Travers was associated with these gentlemen in the beginning and when the prospectus of the bank was issued it stated:

The following gentlemen have consented to act as directors if elected:—His Honour A. E. Forget, Lieutenant Governor, Saskatchewan; Major Thomas Beattie, President London City Gas Company, director Agricultural Savings and Loan Company, London; Lieut.-Colonel R. R. McLennan, contractor, Cornwall, Ont., director Manufacturers' Life Insurance Company, director Trust and Guarantee Company, director Cornwall Paper Company; John D. Ivey, president, John D. Ivey & Company, Limited, Toronto; Thos. Charlton, lumberman, Collingwood, Ont., North Tonawanda, N.Y.; H. W. Anthes, president and managing director Toronto Foundry Company, Limited; W. S. Calvert, M.P., manufacturer, Strathroy, president Cameron Dun Company, Limited, president Canadian Oil Company, Limited, vice-president Northern Life Insurance Company; D. P. McKinnon, Finch, Ont., ex-president Board of Agriculture and Arts, director International Portland Cement Co., Ltd.; Colonel James Munro, M.P.P., banker, Embro, Ont.; Hon. A. G. McKay, K.C., Owen Sound, ex-Commissioner Crown Lands; George W. Neely, M.P.P., farmer, Dorchester, Ont.; Thos. Urquhart, ex-mayor, Toronto; D. N. McLeod, general merchant, Parkhill, Ont.; John Ferguson, M.D., M.A., director Excelsior Life Insurance Company; Robert Noble, miller, Norval.

These were Mr. Travers' associates according to the statement furnished us.

Mr. BEATTIE. As my name is mentioned, I wish to make a personal explanation. One Sunday night about 10 o'clock I was rung up by the long distance telephone. I answered the call and a gentleman at the other end said: Mr. Travers is speaking. I know Mr. Travers, manager of the Bank of Montreal, and thought it was he, and did not suppose it was Mr. Travers, manager of the Farmers' Bank, whom I did not know. On the following morning at the breakfast hour a gentleman called on me with a paper which he asked me to sign. He came so sharp and early that I became suspicious and asked him when he left Toronto. He said he left at midnight and went on to tell me that I had spoken to Mr. Travers the night previous over the telephone, and that he had come to see me in consequence. I said to him: When did Mr. Travers leave the Bank of Montreal? He replied that Mr. Travers was formerly in the Merchants' Bank. I then said to him that I had been speaking over the telephone to some man whom I did not know, under the impression that I was speaking to Mr. Travers of the Bank of Montreal whom I knew very well, and I consequently refused to sign the papers. I then went and saw one of the clerks in the Merchants' Bank, and he gave me Mr. Travers' history, and I made up my mind to have nothing to do with the Farmers' Bank of which Mr. Travers was the manager. This Mr. Travers, whom I supposed to be Mr. Travers of the Bank of Montreal, asked me over the telephone on Sunday night if I would take stock in the new bank, and I replied that if he were associated with it I might take some shares, but I had no idea that I was speaking to a man whom I did not know. The following morning when this other gentleman came to London with a prospectus, to which my name was attached, I refused to sign for any stock. and if my name was kept on the prospectus, it was without my authority.

Mr. FIELDING. Of course I am not seeking to make any point against my hon. friend, but I am simply showing that when Mr. Travers came to the Finance Department, he came under these excellent auspices.

Mr. BEATTIE. I quite understand the hon. minister, but I wish to explain that I had not given any authority at all for the use of my name.

Mr. FIELDING. I do not in the slightest doubt the hon. gentleman, but am simply pointing out the names which appeared on the prospectus. Then we come to the names used in the application itself. I shall read the whole application in a moment, but for my immediate purpose I shall simply give the names. I have given the names of the provisional directors which appeared in the original charter, and of those who, in the prospectus, appeared as having agreed to act as directors. My hon. friend has declared that his name was used without his sanction, but the fact nevertheless remains that his name was there.

Mr. BEATTIE. I had no stock in the bank, and they had no right to use my name.

Mr. FIELDING. I accept my hon. friend's statement without hesitation, but what I say is that all these names were those of highly respectable men and calculated to give Mr. Travers strength when he came to deal with the government, and my hon. friend's name was among them, and it was one calculated to give the application some strength. I now come to the names of the provisional directors in that application. They are as follows:

Lt.-Col. R. McLennan of Cornwall, Ontario.
Lt.-Col. Jas. Munro, M.P., of Embro, Ont.
Allan Eaton, Esq., of Mount Nemo, Ont.
Robt. Noble, Esq., of Norval, Ont.
W. G. Sinclair, Esq., of Zimmerman, Ont.
A. Groves, Esq., M.D., of Fergus, Ont., and N. M. Devean, Esq., W. Beattie Nesbitt, M.D., and John Gilchrist, Esq., of Toronto, Ont.

All these gentlemen were at that time apparently the associates of Mr. Travers. Mr. Travers came to us buttressed by all these good names. More than that, he came to us as the agent of the very shareholders that my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) talks about. He could not have come in any other capacity. It was from these shareholders, in one form or another, that the money was obtained which he deposited with our department. He further came to us on his own reputation as a man of good standing—because I had heard nothing to the contrary—with the names of these men associated with him in the charter and with a list of gentlemen who were willing to act as directors and whose names are set forth in the application. Let me now read the application:

In the matter of the Bank Act and amendment and of the Farmers' Bank of Canada.

I, William R. Travers of the city of Toronto, in the county of York, general manager of the Farmers' Bank of Canada, do solemnly declare:

1. Each of the said subscriptions is a bona fide subscription to the capital stock of the bank.

7. In accordance with the provisions of the Bank Act the provisional directors by public notice for at least four weeks, called a meeting of the subscribers to the said stock to be held at the offices of the bank in the Stair Building, corner Bay and Adelaide streets in the city of Toronto, in the province of Ontario, on Monday the twenty-sixth day of November, 1906, at ten o'clock in the forenoon.

A file of the issues of the Toronto daily 'Globe' and of the Toronto daily 'Mail and Empire' containing the said advertisement are produced and marked exhibit 'E' to this my declaration.

9. A printed copy of the said notice was also sent by post letter prepaid to each of the subscribers of the capital stock of the bank at the address of each subscriber upon the books of the bank by depositing the same in the general post office branch B, Toronto, on the twenty-third day of October, 1906. One of the said individual notices is now shown to me and marked exhibit 'F' to this my declaration.

10. I acted as secretary to the said meeting of subscribers holden on the said twenty-sixth day of November, 1906, and at the said meeting upwards of eighty subscribers were present in person and upwards of three hundred and seventy subscribers were represented by proxy. The subscribers adopted by-laws for the bank and determined the day upon which the annual general meeting of the bank is to be held, being the fourth Monday in November in each year, and the subscribers elected nine directors duly qualified under the Bank Act to hold office until the annual general meeting in the year 1907. The directors so elected are as follows:

Lt.-Col. R. McLennan of Cornwall, Ontario.

11. The provisions of the Bank Act as to the subscribers to the capital stock of the said bank and the deposit with the Receiver General and as to the notice of the said meeting of subscribers and the proceedings of the said meeting have been fully complied with, and pursuant to the direction of the said meeting of subscribers and board of directors elected at such meeting application hereby is made for the certificate of the Treasury Board to permit the said bank to commence the business of banking in accordance with the said Act.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act, 1893.

Declared before me at the city of Toronto, in the county of York, this twenty-seventh day of November, in the year of our Lord, 1906.

W. R. TRAVERS.

W. H. Hunter,
A Com., &c., in H.C.J.

Here was, in the most positive terms, a declaration on oath, or its equivalent, by Mr. Travers that this money had been subscribed in accordance with the terms of the Bank Act, and this at a time, I say, when Mr. Travers had the same position before us as a man of good repute, and not only one of good repute but one who was able to associate with himself these gentlemen whose names I have mentioned in one capacity or another. This being the case, I think it would not have been unreasonable if we had given him the certificate without further ado. As it was, we had an exchange of letters with Mr. Travers. On the 30th of November, the day when he came for this certificate I addressed him a letter. In the meantime, I had seen Mr. Travers and discussed the matter with him, but I asked him to confirm his statements in writing. I had cross-examined him, as I say, on his affidavit, and his statements were as complete and full as anybody could desire, but I asked him to put them in writing. The following is my letter as it appears at page 26 of the Return:

Minister of Finance, Canada,
Ottawa, November 30, 1906.

W. R. Travers, Esq.,
General Manager of the Farmers' Bank of Canada,
Russell House, Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—I regret that owing to pressing engagements yesterday, arising out of the budget, I was unable to meet you to consider your application for the issue of a certificate to authorize the Farmers' Bank of Canada to commence business. I shall be glad to see you to-day, at my office, at any time before one o'clock if you can call. Or I might be able to see you later, between four and five, at the House of Commons, if that will be more convenient.

There is a phase of the matter which I should like to bring to your notice so that you may consider it at once. It has been represented to us that in some previous instances where an application was in all respects apparently regular, there was actually an evasion of the intention of the Bank Act in relation to the paid-up capital. We have been told that in some cases the subscribers did not actually pay in cash but gave notes to the provisional directors which were used to raise the money. On account of information of this kind, which has reached us in relation to a previous case, we deem it proper to scan very closely every application for a certificate which comes to us. I shall be glad to have an assurance that nothing of the kind has taken place in relation to the subscriptions for the Farmers' Bank, but that the amounts set forth in the application as having been paid up have in every case been bona fide cash payments.

W. S. FIELDING,
Minister of Finance.

Mr. Travers, replying to me on the same day wrote:

Ottawa, November 30, 1906.

The Hon. W. S. Fielding,
Minister of Finance, Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir,—In reply to your letter of the 30th of November, I have to say that in the case of the Farmers' Bank of Canada, the provisional directors did not raise the money in the way mentioned by you. You will find the statement put in by me absolutely correct as to the amount of stock subscribed and the amount paid up.

W. R. TRAVERS.
General Manager, Farmers' Bank of Canada.

We already had the affidavit of Mr. Travers. This letter adds nothing to it, but it shows that, even after receiving that affidavit, we cross-examined Mr. Travers as to the statements in it.

Mr. PORTER. What does the minister mean by 'cross-examine'? Does it mean that he simply asked him questions and accepted his answers, or does it mean that this was under the solemnity of an oath?

Mr. FIELDING. No. Perhaps the expression 'cross-examine' may be taken by my legal friends in a broader sense than I intended. I mean to say that I discussed the matter with him and told him that it was a subject on which we wished to have information beyond all question. He answered in most complete terms.

Mr. BOYCE. In the letter of the minister to the general manager of this bank, he puts the proposition in the abstract. May I ask the minister why he did not state that the information he had as to the discounting of notes had to do with this bank and not with a previous case? Why did not he use the information he had at his disposal, instead of putting it in that way?

Mr. FIELDING. I am bound to say that I had in mind at that time more the recollection of previous cases than the case of this particular bank. However, 'cross-examination' may not be the proper expression; I used it in the general way a layman would.

Mr. HENDERSON. Had not the minister in mind the conversation I had with him?

Mr. FIELDING. I can assure my hon friend (Mr. Henderson) in good faith, that I had not in mind any conversation with him bearing on the issue of the certificate. The idea that I had in mind, on one side my hon. friend's (Mr. Henderson's) statement and on the other the statement of Mr. Travers is, I am bound to tell my hon. friend, an entire mistake. We had before us the declaration of Mr Travers; we had his letter—if it gave any additional value—and we had the fact that he came to us representing his shareholders, the very men on whose account my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) now complains. Mr. Travers came as their agent. So far as the papers showed, the directors had been appointed at a regular meeting of shareholders, and they in turn had appointed Mr. Travers general manager. So he came to us, not only as a man of good repute—and I want that borne in mind, that he was, at the time he came representing the provisional directors, a man of high standing in the country—but also he came representing the shareholders in the bank. We had before us every bit of information such as we had had in the granting of any previous bank certificate. That being the case, what would have been the result had we refused to grant the certificate as in the previous cases?

Mr. NORTHRUP. Will the minister say that on any previous occasion when an application was made for a certificate the Treasury Board had been warned by such a letter as that of Mr. McCarthy?

Mr. FIELDING. I do not agree as to the 'warning' in Mr. McCarthy's letter. Mr. McCarthy made a statement and then withdrew his objections, But, even then, we had the sworn—because it is sworn—statement of Mr. Travers. I do not see what better evidence you could get. Again, I ask the House to note that he was not a convicted prisoner at that time, but a man of standing; and I had the right to attach the same importance to his statement as I would attach to the statement of any other man of good repute coming before us. That being the case, having before us all the information that we had had in any previous case, if we had not granted the Farmers' Bank certificate, my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) would have been the first to rise and complain that we were not treating his farmers fairly. Surely, my hon. friend must see that when his farmers send to us, through their directors and general manager, an application for a certificate, we ought not to be condemned, by them at least, because the certificate was granted.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not wish to interrupt, or I might give a reply. But I do not wish to break into the hon. gentleman's speech.

Mr. FIELDING. I am not objecting.

Mr. HENDERSON. If I may be permitted to break in——

Mr. FIELDING. Yes.

Mr. HENDERSON—I would ask the minister to explain those words of the Deputy Minister of Justice.

Mr. FIELDING. The Deputy Minister of Justice was asked whether the papers were in proper order, whether the law was complied with, and the Deputy Minister of Justice, who is not the first judge as to the facts of the case, reports that the papers are in proper order. But they have no special significance, such as that which my hon. friend seems desirous to give them. So I claim that in granting that certificate we were simply dealing with these promoters as we have been dealing with all others. I know it is difficult to-day, in view of the calamity which has occurred, in view of the fact that Mr. Travers is now a convicted man, to give the same consideration to Mr. Travers' statements and affidavits that were given to them then. Those who want to look at the matter fairly will say that, whatever Mr. Travers may be now, at the time he made these statements, and wrote that letter, and gave us that affidavit, he was a man in good standing, and he came to us representing men in good standing, and there was no reason in the world why we should not accord to him and to them the same consideration that we accorded to others who came to us with the same information and under like circumstances.

That is the story of the certificate that was issued on the 30th of November. As I have already stated, after it was issued a statement came from the Bankers' Association taking exception to it. There is one point in the case I would like to make. Undoubtedly that certificate, as has since been ascertained, was obtained fraudulently. There was the deception. The minister was deceived, the Treasury Board was deceived, the whole country has been deceived by the whole proceedings of the Farmers' Bank. There is this important point to be borne in mind, that, although there was that irregularity—irregularity is too mild a term—although there was that fraud in connection with the payment of the capital at the beginning, although the notes were given when cash should have been given, and all that was wrong and fraudulent; nevertheless, in most cases those notes were ultimately paid, and the cash went into the bank, and the bank did possess the capital at a later stage, though it did not possess it at that moment. The bank did not get into trouble because of any lack of capital; the trouble with the bank was that although they had the capital, not at the beginning, but later on—some portion of the notes I believe had not been paid—but the curator's report shows that the most of those notes have been paid, and the bank therefore, ultimately got the capital, and that irregularity was ultimately corrected. The bank got the capital, the bank was able to do business, the bank had the cash, and the failure of the bank came about, not through any lack on that score, but because of the mismanagement of its affairs, which might have occurred no matter what had happened with regard to the issue of the certificate. That I think is a point of great importance to be borne in mind.

Now the next and last stage of the bank's affairs is with regard to its operation after it was organized. I confess that I was one of those who did not regard the institution as very strong. In fact I was reluctant to give them a charter, and would have been much more willing to find reasons for refusing the certificate than for giving it.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. In view of the letter written by Mr. McCarthy on the 19th of October, in which he stated that he had brought action on behalf of certain persons, and of the persons who were subscribers to the funds of the bank, does not the minister consider that that was sufficient warrant, notwithstanding the fact that Mr. McCarthy on their behalf subsequently withdrew his objection, for believing that there was irregularity?

Mr. FIELDING. If we had had no later information, I think my hon. friend's criticism would be just, but after that we did receive the solemn declaration of Travers.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Did not that affidavit in itself arouse the suspicion of the minister, seeing it was made before the man's own solicitor who was prosecuting this application on his behalf?

Mr. FIELDING. My knowledge of law is not sufficient to enable me to deal with that aspect of the question. The affidavit appeared to be all right, I think the affidavit was taken before a duly qualified official and sworn to. However, whatever may be said on that score we have the fact that Mr. McCarthy withdrew his objection, and after he had withdrawn his objection, later on we come to the same evidence that was held in every other bank case—in some cases less evidence was afforded.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. My point is this, that the fact that Mr. McCarthy withdrew his objections is proof that the statements which he made were true, because he said that the matter had been settled, and it would have been settled if the affidavits were true.

Mr. FIELDING. I take it that Mr. McCarthy had a number of claims, that his clients wanted to withdraw from the bank, and he wrote on their behalf, and having withdrawn his objections that was the end. Subsequent to that, we had the declaration or affidavit of Mr. Travers. I want to point out that it was in the same form as every similar affidavit upon which we issued other bank certificates; there was no difference, the proceeding is the same, the information was the same. If there was any difference at all it was more complete in this case than in others. Yet time has shown that it was given fraudulently, it was deceptive, and as I said a moment ago, the fact that Mr. Travers is a convicted man, and is now in prison, makes it difficult to-day to give the credence that was given to his statement. But at the time that statement was made, at the time he wrote his letter, at the time he called upon me, when he made his declaration, Mr. Travers was a man in good standing, and we had the same right to treat his representations with respect as we had to treat with respect the representations of the last bank manager who obtained a certificate from us.

Mr. PORTER. Was not that affidavit contradicted and shown to be false by the information given from the Bankers' Association? And if that is so, even although the certificate had been granted, if the affidavit was false, did the minister take any proceedings to revoke the charter that had been granted or to prosecute the man who had made the false affidavit?

Mr. FIELDING. We did not have any such information. We did not think that a statement from the Bankers' Association in general terms afforded ground for prosecuting anybody. The certificate had been issued. I do not hink we had any right to revoke the certificate which, having once been granted, the bank was duly organized I do not think we had power to revoke the certificate.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Who was it that had actual possession of the certificate at the time the minister got information from the Bankers' Association?

Mr. FIELDING. I would have to inquire of my officials; I presume it was given to Mr. Travers who came to Ottawa for the purpose of receiving it. The next stage of the matter deals with the conditions and operations of the bank after organization. I have already stated that I viewed the institution with doubt. I was reluctant to give them a charter, and would have been glad if an opportunity had been afforded to refuse the certificate. But I thought I was doing my duty in giving it to them. I was making no distinction between the treatment accorded to Mr. Travers and his associates, and the treatment accorded to other gentlemen who had come to me under similar circumstances. But after the bank was organized and had been running for several years, and was apparently complying with the law and doing well—at all events, no complaint was made—by and by a difficulty arose in regard to an insurance company in the United States. They had some transactions with the Farmers' Bank, and the Superintendent of Insurance of the state of New York desired to investigate the matter from the point of view of his department. He communicated with our department and wanted us to send a man with a representative of the New York State Insurance Department to Toronto for the purpose of inquiring into the affairs of the bank; and we had to point out that we had no power to send any man into the bank.

We can call for returns of the bank's operations, but there being no government bank inspection, we had no inspector who had the right to go into that bank. We told the insurance superintendent in the state of New York that we could do nothing, but we advised him to go to the bank and frankly ask for the information, and we were satisfied it would be granted. We communicated from time to time with the Farmers' Bank in certain matters with regard to returns, &c, but we did not feel that we had any right to send an officer into the bank as had been suggested by the gentleman from New York state. In the discussion of the correspondence which was published some time ago one of the newspapers said: Well, granting now that the certificate had to be issued, granting that there was no irregularity, why did not the Minister of Finance, knowing that the bank was in a bad position, do something then? Do what then? It is the easiest thing in the world to say 'do something,' but in most cases the man who says 'do something,' has no conception of what you can do. It would have been a very awkward thing for the government to have taken an adverse step with regard to that bank at that time. Those two or three years of the bank's history were rather critical times in finance, it was a period when the bank's affairs were in a very acute position, and if the Department of Finance, exceeding its authority, had cut into the matter, had made any public statement, had made any public demonstration with regard to matters connected with the bank, what would have happened? The bank would have closed its doors, there would have been a run on the bank and every one of these farmer shareholders would have turned around and said: What right had the Minister of Finance to butt into this matter; the bank was getting along well, the bank was having a little trouble, but it would have worried through; the Minister of Finance, in taking this action has interfered with our business, brought on a panic and ruined the shareholders of the bank. They would have held the Minister of Finance responsible for the wreck. We had no right or power to do that, it would have been a most unwise thing to do, and although we knew the bank was not in a strong position, it would have been a great mistake for this government to have brought a panic in the bank's affairs by taking the action that has been suggested by some hon. members and by a portion of the press.

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, that it is necessary for me to say anything further. There are just these three points with which I have dealt; first, that the government do not grant charters, that the charter was granted in the usual way by parliament for which we all, as members, must take the share of responsibility which may fall upon us. I tried to prevent the renewal of the charter but failing in that, I succeeded in cutting down the term of the extension. In the second place it is contended that we should not have issued the certificate. I have shown that the procedure was exactly the same as in all other cases. I have shown that when Mr. Travers and his associates came to us they were men of reputable standing at that time, and that if we had not granted the certificate we would have been giving them different treatment than that which we had accorded to all others. As to the last matter, a moment's reflection will show that it would have been a great mistake for the government to go into the affairs of the bank at a time when it was having trouble, to have brought on a run and to have brought about the close of the bank. It is a misfortune that this thing has occurred and no doubt we will learn some lesson from it. No doubt, in the amendment of the Bank Act we shall be guided in some things by our experience of the Farmers' Bank. We have been in regard to one thing; hon. gentlemen will remember that in the proposed Bill it is provided that a man who takes around a subscription paper to obtain subscriptions for stock in a bank, must inform the prospective shareholder in the most prominent way that by signing that document he makes himself subject to double liability. In other respects, I am quite sure that we will learn something and profit by our experience. I am satisfied, looking back over the whole matter, that, while it is a great misfortune and while we deeply sympathize with the hundreds who have lost money in the matter, the loss is not due to any act on the part of this government or of the Department of Finance, but the loss is due to the fact that people were induced to go into an enterprise that they should not have gone into, because they were deceived and misled by Mr. Travers, but that is no reason why any complaint should be made as respects the government.

Mr. HENDERSON. The minister has detailed at some considerable length the reasons why he did not proceed when he obtained information from Syracuse. He did not want to do anything that would jeopardize the bank or which might bring about a collapse. Can he not give me credit for the very same kind of reasoning, when I said I went to him personally, and did not make a public display of my objections in writing and putting them on file. I think I acted just along the same line as the minister.

Mr. FIELDING. I must say that I did not attribute to my hon. friend at any stage of the matter any action which was not actuated by just that purpose. If it is necessary to deal with the point, let me remind him again that the conversations which he alleges he had with me on that point were before the bank was organized and, therefore, no harm could have been done if he had given the information at that time. The bank did not exist, there could have been no run on the bank and there was no difficulty about the matter.

Mr. HENDERSON. But they may never have got the certificate. It was about the certificate that I spoke to him.

Mr. FIELDING. That is where my hon. friend and I differ.

Mr HENDERSON. All right; we will have to agree to differ.

Hon. GEORGE E. FOSTER (North Toronto). Mr. Speaker, it is an unfortunate thing that two hon. gentlemen differ in their recollections of what occurred three or four years ago, but such is the case. Both have stated their positions and it will simply be left to the House and the country to form their own conclusions with respect to the matter. We have, I suppose, to take the word of both hon. gentlemen in reference to their personal acts at that time. I do not think the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), has exhausted the subject by any means, and I feel exactly now, as I felt when I brought my motion as to the return of papers—that this is a matter which requires careful thought and, as far as we are able to give it, requires just and proper handling on each side of the House. We are not either of us surely animated entirely by a desire to make political capital out of a question of this kind. We are all of us, or ought to be, very desirous of finding out just what are the defects in our Bank Act, if there are defects, just what are the defects in the management of our Bank Act, if there are defects, and we are equally as interested in finding out whether the parties, either members of the governmnt or officials in any of the departments, whose duty it is to stand between the people and possible consequences, have in each case done their whole duty and done it properly. If they have done their duty, they stand all right; if they have not done their duty then they stand for censure and, without attempting to make politcal capital or to make a political defence or an attack, let us settle ourselves down as far as possible to a thorough investigation of the circumstances that have developed in this matter. I will agree with the Minister of Finance and get rid of that part of the discussion entirely, so far as we two are concerned, that as regards the incorporation of this bank, the House is responsible and not the Finance Minister. The House is responsible and not the government, and every member must take his share of that responsibility. So that, it boots nothing for either of us in this investigation we are carrying on as to the incorporation of the bank. That is a non-essential point in my mind. We cannot fairly attribute any fault to the government in the matter and I do not attribute any fault to myself or to other members of the House in that respect. On what ground could you refuse a charter to those who asked for the incorporation of the Farmers' bank? You could refuse it only; it seems to me, on the grounds that we had either enough or too many banking institutions in this country already and therefore there was no room for another. If that approved itself to the committee and the House it would have been fair ground for refusing the charter. Or, we might have refused the charter because of the personnel of those asking for the charter; if we did not think they had a standing, financial or otherwise, which would give fair belief that they would carry to a successful conclusion the important operation of a banking institution in this country. If these two things were not proven in the negative then the parliament had no right, and the committee had no right, to refuse this bank its incorporation charter, and still less had it ground for refusing it because it was called a farmers' bank. That would have been, to my mind, a reason why the Act of incorporation should have been granted if all other things were equal, and the conditions were complied with; so that we may drop that feature of it out of our consideration. Now, when a bank is incorporated under the Bank Act, it is absolutely innocuous until it is allowed to go into operation. When it is allowed to go into operation it may be a medium of great benefit and it may be a medium of equally great harm and damage and wrong. The important part of this discussion is, what was the part enacted by the gentlemen in whose charge the Bank Act places the important responsibility and duty of standing as trustees for the shareholders of the proposed bank and not allowing a single dollar of their money to be put in jeopardy in so far as the working of the bank is concerned until the provisions of the Bank Act are actually carried out—not carried out in a ' prima facie ' way, but carried out in a way which proves their actuality and reality. Now, I think all will agree with me that the incorporation could have lain here, if it had been allowed to, for 100 years, and nobody would have been damaged. The possibility of damage dated from the very day that the certificate was granted which allowed this force to be put in operation and the party to it, that was, and is, and will be held responsible for that certificate, is the party into whose hands it is confided by the Bank Act, namely, the Treasury Board. And if you come to look to the Treasury Board, as you look to a company or to a society, as to where the respnsibility lies, you will always find it lies in one or two, or at least in very few hands. In whose hands did this responsibility lie for the granting of this certificate which gave the power to Mr. Travers and his coadjutors to begin their operations? It lay theoretically in the hands of the Treasury Board; it lay actually in the hands of the Minister of Finance, and I call you, Mr. Speaker, to witness that through this whole discussion not a single allusion has been made by the Minister of Finance to any other member of the Treasury Board. It was he who received the document, it was he who asked the opinion of the Minister of Justice, it was he who conducted the correspondence with Mr. McCarthy, it is he who signed the communications with Mr. Travers, he and nobody else, and it was upon his recommendation entirely that the certificate was finally recommended. Now, I think that commends itself to the minds of those who have heard this discussion as being in accordance with the facts. The things for us to consider, not only in the light of two parties sitting opposite each other, but in the light of the efficiency of the banking institutions of this country, is to look very closely into the conduct of the Minister of Finance, which resulted in this certificate being granted. The Minister of Finance has based his defence on this: I had a 'prima facie' case, I took the evidence given to me in that case, and if I did that I cannot be called upon to go any further; it is as far as ever was gone before in other cases. Well, I do not think that holds good. I do not think we ought to admit it, and for two reasons, one of which will be best put in the form of a question. I ask any member of this parliament if he had half a million dollars which he proposed to stake on a business venture, if he would stake that on the same quality of evidence and no more than the Minister of Finance had in connection with granting the certificate to this bank. I would not; the Minister of Finance himself would not. He said here to-day that he did not know Mr. Travers and never had met him before. Would he entrust half a million dollars to the management of Mr. Travers and gentlemen whom Mr. Travers might tell him were associated with him, when he did not know that a single one of these gentlemen was so associated with him, and when he did not know Mr. Travers himself and had never met him until a few days before the certificate was granted? But, did not the Minister of Finance stand in exactly that position with reference to the $500,000 and more that was subscribed by the shareholders of this bank. Was not that money put in his hands in trust? The promoter of a bank comes to a man and the man says: yes, I will subscribe $5,000, because in this country up to the present time—I am not going to say it is so now—I feel sure that whatever happens after we all get together and are able to make our own board and manage our own affairs, whatever happens after that will be our fault, but up to that the Minister of Finance is my surety, first, that it will not be simply my subscription which goes in there as bona fide, but that $500,000 with mine is to go in there as a bona fide subscription; it will not be only my money that will be paid up but it will be $250,000 which is bona fide put up, and until the conditions of the law are complied with my money is as safe as if it were in the bank, my money is in the hands of the Minister of Finance and it cannot be spent and cannot be squandered in any way. Now, that is the fair play which the Bank Act gives to any man; it is a guarantee that he is protected in that way. Therefore, I say the Minister of Finance should be equally as careful in connection with this money as he would be in the investment of the same amount of money for himself; he ought to be more careful for reasons which will commend themselves to the mind of any hon. gentleman in this House.

Now, the Minister of Finance had certain information, and it was his duty to come to a conclusion from evidence which was satisfactory to himself. I am glad to see that he does not depend on the opinion of the Minister of Justice, as some hon. gentlemen seemed to do when we discussed this question before, because he has acceded to the view that the Minister of Justice simply gave his opinion on the regularity of the papers, and that the matter of fact was to be decided by himself. So it must be. I ask the Finance Minister to correct me if I am wrong: If he asked the Minister of Justice for an opinion on the merits of the case, did he put before him all the information that had been brought to himself? He could have done nothing less if he was asking for an opinion on the merits. But he did not ask for an opinion on the merits. He simply wanted to know from the Justice Department if the papers were sufficient, and the Justice Department told him: The papers are sufficient, if you accept the evidence, for you to issue the certificate upon. The Justice Department threw back upon the Finance Minister himself the duty of seeing whether the evidence were sufficient or not. Now, note this, that the minister had his doubts in 1906 as to this bank. He has acknowledged that to-day. He said in 1906, after two failures to raise the funds: My view was that they were not the men to carry this bank to a successful conclusion, and I did not favour another extension. There is guard number one. The minister knew that this very outfit had attempted twice and had failed to get the money, and two year's time had been spent, and he was of the opinion that if they could not get the capital in two years' time, they were not likely to be successful, and, therefore, he was against granting them another six months. So he was on his guard. Why should we, he said to himself bother with them any longer? There is danger in it; don't let us grant them another term of six months. There was caution number one, and from that time on the Minister of Finance was bound, because of his own impression, to take especial care to see that there was bona fide capital, and nothing less. But there was something else. The minister had knowledge in this case which I had not when I was Finance Minister. He wrote a letter to Mr. Travers on the 30th of November, from which I will read this extract:

There is a phase of the matter which I should like to bring to your notice so that you may consider it at once. It has been represented to us that in some previous instances where an application was in all respects apparently regular, there was actually an evasion of the intention of the Bank Act in relation to the paid-up capital. We have been told that in some cases the subscribers did not actually pay in cash but gave notes to the provisional directors which were used to raise the money.

The Minister of Finance had in his own mind, then, a knowledge that in previous cases there had been an attempt, whether successful or not—this letter would make it appear that it had been successful—to provide capital not in a bona fide way, but by the use of notes. There was guard and caution number two. If there were nothing else, the Minister of Finance, as according to his own letter, should go below what was apparent on the surface. You notice his words: 'Where an application was in all respects apparently regular,' this thing had taken place. Here was an application in all respects apparently regular, yet it might be wrong. Why did he not use the knowledge that he possessed to probe a little into this case to find out whether there was anything wrong underneath the 'apparently regular' application that was made? But the minister had more than that. On the 8th of October, on the 11th of October, and on the 19th of October, he had the letters from Mr. Leighton McCarthy. Now, the minister did not attach all the importance that I think is due to those letters. On the 8th of October came this letter:

My dear Mr. Fielding,—I have been consulted on behalf of a number of subscribers to the shares of the Farmers' Bank, and from the instructions I have received a number of the subscribers will dispute the bona fide character of the subscriptions.

Bear in mind the information that the minister already had. Here was another piece of information which said, not in previous cases, but in this case, some of the subscribers to this bank are going to dispute the regularity of the subscriptions. Mr. McCarthy's letter goes on:

I have not time to-night to give a full statement of the grounds of this request to you, but I beg to assure you that grave conditions have arisen which will require careful consideration before the Treasury Board would grant any certificate for the organization of this bank.

There is no need of reading the rest of the letter; that is the pith of it. On the 11th of October, Mr. McCarthy had not received any word. He gets anxious, and he sends the following telegram to Mr. Fielding:

Please wire me assurance in reference to stay of certificate of Treasury Board mentioned in my letter of Monday night.

He gets the assurance from Mr. Fielding, and that is followed up by a letter from Mr. McCarthy confirming and carrying out the substance of his telegram. Then, on the 19th of October there is this most important letter, which is more than a letter of information from a man. It is the actual transcript of an action undertaken before the High Court, which is more than gossip, more than rumour, more than what you meet with upon the street. I will read that letter:

Re the Farmers' Bank of Canada.

My dear Mr. Fielding,—I beg to inclose the special endorsement upon a writ of summons in the High Court of Justice for Ontario, which will be issued by: William A. Dixon, John Sproat, George Castle, William McLean, Finlay McCallum, Robert Hume, James Murray, George Denoon, John McLeod, Jane Shuert, William Harris, on behalf of themselves and all other persons alleged to be subscribers for shares of the capital stock of the Farmers' Bank of Canada who may desire to come in and be parties to this action, against the Farmers' Bank of Canada, James Gallagher, John Watson, John Ferguson, Alexander Fraser, Alexander Shepherd, Lown, W. R. Travers, C. H. Smith, A. G. H. Luxton, and the Traders' Bank of Canada, and W. J. Lindsay, and I respectfully request that the Treasury Board will stay any action upon the application of persons professing to act in the name of the Farmers' Bank of Canada, or in the name of the provisional directors of the Farmers' Bank of Canada, for a certificate under section 15 of the Bank Act on the grounds alleged in the inclosed special endorsement, and other grounds which may be disclosed upon the examination of the alleged subscribers for shares.

My hon. friend knew Mr. McCarthy, he had met him before, he knew him as a bright man of the party, and a good man in this House, and a stable man in the country. What does Mr. McCarthy say? He says:

I have received information that the alleged subscribers for shares paid a large sum of money in cash and have signed notes for other large sums of money, and that the persons professing to act in the name of the bank have transferred notes and received the proceeds, and that a deposit either has been made or will be made of the cash received and the proceeds of these notes, or sufficient amount to make up $250,000.

That was special information, no rumour about that.

I wish you to have the kindness to acknowledge the receipt of this protest against the granting of a certificate so that I may advise the shareholders who are disputing their legality, and I would be pleased to go to Ottawa upon any appointment you may make for the further consideration of this matter.

What was the reply to that, and I want the minister's attention to this. This was dated October 23:

Dear Sir,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 19th instant, to Mr. Fielding's address, respecting the Farmers' Bank of Canada.

When application is made by the Farmers' Bank to the Treasury Board for a certificate to enable them to commence business, the representations contained in your letter with its inclosure will be laid before the board.

T. C. BOVILLE,
Deputy Minister of Finance.

The Minister of Finance made a point as he thought, against my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) by saying: You are not quite right when you say that only three days intervened for examination, the application being made on the 27th November, and the certificate being given on the 3rd of the same month. The Minister of Finance said: Bear in mind that on October the 23rd the application was in, in the shape of a deposit of $250,000 to my credit. Now I will put this question to the hon. minister. From the 23rd October, 1906, until the 27th of November, 1906, will the minister say that either he or his department took any step whatever to convince themselves of the bona fides of this application or made any inquiry as to the standing or actions of the men behind it? That is a simple question, but there is a good deal in it. I will go further. The information which Mr. McCarthy gave was to go before the Treasury Board. Let me ask the minister if the Treasury Board met to consider this matter before the 30th of November, the very day when the certificate was granted. And I will ask him if he ever put before that board the information which Mr. McCarthy gave him, and which he declared would be put before them? That can be very simply answered.

Mr. FIELDING. I cannot remember what exactly happened between these dates.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend has his deputy there. If the Treasury Board met, and if that board did consider that information, it must be on record, but I am just asking him if that is not the case. So far as we can gather from the whole tenor of this thing, no investigation at all was made, either by Mr. Boville, the Deputy Minister of Finance, or the Minister of Finance himself or any other official with reference to the bona fides of this proposition. If I am wrong, that can be very easily shown. Mr. McCarthy's letter was accompanied by a document, and this is a copy of the document which accompanied it. My hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) tried to justify himself by saying that as Mr. Travers had assured him on the 27th of November that Mr. Beattie, of London, was a director, that was prima facie evidence of the respectability of the whole affair. But in this very document which Mr. Leighton McCarthy sent to the Finance Minister on the 19th of October, there occurs this as one of the indictments or one of the charges in this high court suit:

That Major Thomas Beattie, represented by the prospectus to have consented to act as a director, had not subscribed to any shares, and refused to be a director, and refused to allow his name to be used in any way in connection with the bank; and the plaintiff alleged that the names of other persons were represented by the prospectus to have consented to act as directors, who had not subscribed to any shares or given any authority for any such publication.

That was in the hands of the Finance Minister, and ought to have been in the hands of every member of the Treasury Board, because the minister had promised that it should be. Was it? What does this allege? On every hand it puts the minister on his guard. The minister seemed to think that there was nothing in this question, but this one point: Were those who were alleged to have been defrauded settled with? If they were, the objections were taken away and nothing remained.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. For the Finance Minister, everything remained, and what was removed was nothing, absolutely nothing. What remained? There remained the charge of fraud, the charge of misrepresentation, the charge of having directors on the prospectus who were not directors, the charge of paying immense sums in different ways that were unauthorized—all the grave charges that were made in the suit in the high court remained, and Mr. McCarthy could not and did not take them away. My hon. friend, the Finance Minister, knows that well enough. Did he read the judgment? The judgment was given on the 27th. What does it say, as clearly as any words can say it?

It says: On the 27th day of the month appeared before me, solicitors for both plaintiffs and defendants. The plaintiffs had been bought out and all their claims and obligations had been cancelled, and the two solicitors agreed to remove the case without costs. What does that prove? Would these men have been settled with if they had had no case? What was their case? It was: You got our names and our subscriptions by fraud and misrepresentation; in one case a man subscribed $1,000, and you put him down for $10,000. And other cases were specified of similar transactions. The defendant's lawyer comes and says to the opponent: Let's settle; we have bought out the plaintiffs. If you want to go to the evidence, you will find the evidence. Mr. Travers made a personal loan and sent Mr. Hunter and Mr. Lindsay out to the county of Halton, bought out the claims, squared them up, took away the case from his opponent, and then came back into the court and a settlement took place. And any man who knows anything about these things could judge it to be nothing else than an absolute confirmation of the charges of fraud.

Now, let me put one more case to the Finance Minister,—the confiding Finance Minister, the simple-minded Finance Minister, the man who never looks below the surface, but just sees what is on the top and if that is apparently all right goes no further down. He held in his hand the affidavit of Mr. Travers swearing to a list of bona fide subscribers as of that date who had subscribed what was put opposite their names and had paid what was put opposite their names. And, if he had taken the trouble to make the investigation, he would have found on that list the names of these very plaintiffs who had been bought out, who had no stock and whose names should not have been upon that list.

At six o'clock House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. FOSTER. I shall read to the House the list of subscribers to which I have just referred.

Name and Residence.	No. of Shares Subscribed for.	Amount Subscribed.	Amount Paid.
McLeod, John, Milton, O.....	1	100	50
Sproat, John, Mansewood, O..	100	10,000	1,000

In all 214 shares, $21,400, $6,500 paid.

Now these are in the list which, on the 27th day of November, Mr. Travers swore to be the complete and true list of subscribers, with what they had subscribed, and with the amounts they had paid; and that list was under the hand of the Minister of Finance, or he had it in his possession. Yet on November 2, Mr. McCarthy had written to the Minister of Finance that these had all been bought off, and were no longer subscribers. That was nearly one month before Travers had made his declaration, and on November 27, Travers swore to the list containing these names, and made the affidavit before Hunter, who had gone with Travers or Lindsay and bought these men's claims one month before. Now that is the kind of testimony upon which my hon. friend relied when he took the testimony of Travers, a man whom he had not known until three days before, and preferred to take his declaration rather than look further.

Now, I want to show a little more in detail what the plaintiffs allege in this suit, which Mr. McCarthy had put in the possession of the Minister of Finance. Among other things the plaintiffs allege:

That the provisional directors who professed to act for and in the name of the bank had no lawful power or authority to receive subscriptions for shares or to accept them; and (2) that the subscriptions for shares which were procured from the plaintiffs and others were procured through fraud and misrepresentation, and the plaintiffs allege, amongst others, the following particulars of fraud, viz.: (a) that Robert Noble, whose name was entered in the prospectus as one of those who consented to be a director, had subscribed for shares to the amount of $10,000, whereas he had in fact only subscribed for shares to the amount of $3,000; (b) that John Sproat had subscribed for shares to the amount of $10,000, whereas he had in fact only intended to subscribe for shares to the amount of $1,000, and that he was induced to sign an application in the belief that it was filled up for $1,000, and that the general manager afterwards claimed that it was a subscription for $10,000, and the said John Sproat then repudiated the entire subscription; (d) that James Murray had subscribed for shares to the amount of $10,000, whereas he had in fact only subscribed for shares to the amount of $1,000; (e) that Dr. Stewart was subscribing for shares to the amount of $10,000, whereas in fact he was not subscribing for any shares; and other false representations of a similar character were made by the solicitors and agents in reference to alleged subscriptions of other persons. That Major Thomas Beattie, represented by the prospectors to have consented to act as a director, had not subscribed for any shares, and refused to be a director, and refused to allow his name to be used in any way in connection with the bank; and the plaintiffs allege that the names of other persons were represented by the prospectors to have consented to act as directors had not subscribed for any shares, or given any authority for any such publication.

And the plaintiffs allege that the acts and proceedings of the provisional directors were illegal and irregular; and the plaintiffs allege that the agents and solicitors professing to act under the name and authority of the provisional directors have procured a large number of subscriptions for shares, and have received the sum of $175,000 more or less on account thereof——

Here is the important part:

—and have also procured promissory notes to be signed by persons who were subscribing for shares, payable to the provisional directors of the bank, and the persons acting in the name and under the professed authority of the Act of incorporation and amendments thereto, are endeavouring to discount or procure a loan by the transfer of the said notes;

The plaintiffs further allege that the persons professing to act as aforesaid under the alleged authority of the provisional directors, have unlawfully deducted large sums of money for alleged services and commissions, and other purposes out of the money received by them;

The plaintiffs allege that the shares and the money and the promissory notes procured from them have been procured through fraud, deceit and misrepresentation;

The plaintiffs allege that all money, promissory notes and other obligations received as aforesaid by all persons acting or professing to act in the name and on behalf of the Farmers' Bank of Canada, or of the provisional directors, or any of them, are impressed with a trust in favour of all the subscribers for shares who may desire to come in and become parties to the action.

Now, Sir, those are some of the principal allegations made by these plaintiffs in this suit in the High Court. It was not allowed to come to trial, for this reason, that Mr. Travers and his friends immediately got busy; they procured a loan, visited these men, bought them out, and consequently took over their assignments of shares, and took away their claims and obligations. To use the expressive language of Mr. Travers himself, he took good care to scuttle this law suit so that they would make no headway against him. Now, a peculiar thing happens, I think it is peculiar. On the 22nd day of October this writ issued; on the 27th day of October this judgment was delivered, dismissing the suit, on the ground that the plaintiffs had been settled with, and on the 31st the judgment was signed.

I find that the Finance Department, on the 31st October, the very day the judgment was signed, wrote this letter to Mr. McCarthy:

October 31, 1906.

Dear Sir,—Referring to your letter of the 19th instant, addressed to Mr. Fielding, on the subject of the Farmers' Bank of Canada and the issue of a certificate to that bank to commence business under section 15 of the Bank Act, I notice recently a reference in the newspapers for a judgment given by Judge Anglin in a suit relating to this matter. In view of the decision rendered. I shall be obliged if you will let me know if you still desire the protest contained in your letter to be brought before the Treasury Board upon an application of the Farmers' Bank for a certificate to be considered.

Two things stick out in this letter, first, that up to that date there had been no consideration by the Treasury Board; second, that on the very day that the judgment was signed, and two days after the arrangement was come to upon which the judgment was given, we find the Finance Department in a hurry to invite Mr. Leighton McCarthy to take away this obstacle and remove it from the path of Mr. Travers. To say nothing more in the way of criticism this was a most peculiar letter to my mind. Mr. McCarthy tells the Finance Department that he will be up in a day or two to confer with them. Whether he comes up or not we find that on the 2nd of November he writes this letter to the Finance Department.

Dear Sir,—Referring to my letters of the 8th and 9th inst., with referenec to the application for a certificate made on behalf of the Farmers' Bank, I am advised by those who are instructing me that the claims made by them in the action brought have been settled by their subscriptions being taken up by some parties interested in the bank and refunding the money paid by the individuals or returning the notes which had been given. The objections which I made on their behalf to the issue of the certificates are, therefore, withdrawn. Would you mind, therefore, returning to me the papers which I forwarded to you.

Almost directly after that we find the Finance Department writing to Mr. Travers, on November 7, 1906:

Dear Sir,—Referring to my letter to you of the 2nd instant, inclosing copy of a letter addressed to Mr. Fielding by Mr. Leighton McCarthy by way of a protest to the granting of a certificate to your bank to commence business, I beg to state that I am advised by Mr. McCarthy that the objections which he made to the issue of a certificate have been withdrawn.

That also is significant. Then, on the 27th November, comes the application for the issue of the certificate. The Finance minister based his plea largely for not going behind Mr. Travers and his declarations in granting this certificate, upon the fact that he was associated with respectable individuals. Who said so? Mr. Travers. Did the Finance Minister inquire in any single instance whether any of these respectable persons was really associated with Mr. Travers? Nothing appears in the papers that he did. The Finance Minister says that Mr. Travers was buttressed by these respectable men. So Mr. Travers said. Did the Finance Minister take the trouble to inquire of any one of them whether they were buttressing Mr. Travers in these preliminary acts of his? Mr. Travers said that he was authorized to ask for a certificate to issue in order to enable the bank to do business. What evidence had the Finance Minister that he was so authorized? No one could give authority, but the subscribers meeting, or the directors elected at that subscribers' meeting. At the very moment when these are elected the provisional directors' functions cease entirely. One would have thought that the least the Minister of Finance could have asked was for Mr. Travers to show the resolution of his Board of Directors or of the subscribers by which they authorized him to apply for the issue of a certificate. The Minister of Finance did not do it. As a matter of fact no such authority was ever given to Mr. Travers. If he had taken the business precaution of asking for the resolution of authorization to Mr. Travers to make application for a certificate he would have had the minute book placed in his hands, and in that minute book he would have found no authorization at all. But the minister was above going to minute books or resolutions with the seal of the bank upon them. He would take the declaration of the man whom he had not met except about three days before, and he would make no inquiry. Everything, he concluded, was correct. Now, Sir, I make this contention that when Mr. McCarthy's letters and information came into the hands of the Finance Minister, when that suit and the plaintiff's demands therein came into his hands alleging what the Finance Minister says he had been informed had taken place in other cases on previous occasions, where everything looked apparently right on the surface, it was his duty to make some inquiry as to the doings of these provisional directors and of Mr. Travers. He, at least, I think, should have asked for the minute book of the proceedings of the provisional directors, and, Mr. Speaker, if he had asked for that minute book and had perused its first pages he would have found ample evidence on which to base a negative to Mr. Travers' proceedings from that moment onward, and he would have saved all this trouble that has arisen. The provisional directors began right. Here is their first resolution:

Moved by Mr. A. Fraser, seconded by Jas. Gallagher, that instructions be given to Mr. Travers that no note be accepted in lieu of cash for payments on stock and that no agent or sub-agent employed by him accept the same, but that the conditions set forth in the form of the application be adhered to on a cash basis unless otherwise specially authorized by the board.

That was carried on January 23, 1906. Later, on July 4, 1906, this motion appears:

Moved by Dr. John Ferguson, seconded by John Watson, that the amount of $10,000 on account of commissions for the sale of capital stock of the bank be paid to W. R. Travers.

And along side of that another one:

That the chairman of the board and the secretary-treasury of the board and W. R. Travers, general manager, be authorized to endorse all notes made in favour of the bank——

What for?

—for the purpose of raising money to make a deposit with the Treasury Board of the Dominion government.

There were the resolutions spread on the minutes of the provisional directors' meetings, and all that the minister had to do when these warnings came to him was to ask for these minutes. He could have had them, and if he had had them this trouble would not have occurred. But it went further. On October 8, 1906:

Moved by James Gallagher, seconded by John Ferguson, that the provisional directors——

I want the House to note how far this goes:

That the provisional directors execute a power of attorney to W. R. Travers for the purpose of endorsing all notes in their names as provisional directors and of signing their names to a note or notes for the purpose of raising funds to put up the deposit with the government, and we authorize the secretary to hand over all notes to W. R. Travers for said purpose.

Simple business precaution, especially when aided by the warnings to, and the premonitions of the Minister of Finance, by the statements of Mr. McCarthy, by the writ which was issued, by the result of that writ, would surely have advertised to the Minister of Finance that he ought to take a little trouble to look into this matter to the extent at least of having the minutes of the directors' meetings in his possession. When Mr. Travers was asked in court why this last resolution was passed he was frank enough to say: We could not raise the money in any other way. That is October 8th; on October 15, Mr. Travers took $100,000 odd of the notes of subscribers to the Trust and Guarantee Company, and made his loan personal of $81,000, and $80,000 of that went as a deposit as part of the $250,000 that was to be deposited to the credit of the Minister of Finance. But that was not enough. On October 22, he took other notes (not belonging to the subscribers to the bank), to the same company, raised a loan of $20,000, and had that by cheque sent to the credit of the Minister of Finance as a part of the $250,000 deposit. $100,000 of the $250,000 was not bona fide paid in cash by the subscribers; it was raised as a loan from notes they had given which might be paid or might not be paid, but which were given absolutely in contradistinction to the doctrine of the Minister of Finance as well as to the express provisions of the Bank Act. Now, Sir, that evidence lay close at hand and was easily obtainable, and why in the world—can any one answer the question—with all these warnings, and with the means of getting the information, did the Minister of Finance not take the simple precaution to get it. Mr. Travers brought a stock list to the Minister of Finance, and he swore to it although the swearing was false. That was the stock list about which the Minister of Finance never asked the least question; he simply took Mr. Travers' statement that it was bona fide. Would it have been a difficult matter for him, to have asked Mr. Travers—about whom he knew nothing until three days before the certificate was granted—to kindly bring him the stock list as subscribed to by the subscribers, and if that list had been brought the evidence was all over it that the stock list which was handed in by Mr. Travers was a fake list. How was it done? Mr. Travers describes it—They had not enough money in the early subscriptions, and the early payments to make the deposit; they went to work and got notes from the subscribers, they discounted those notes and raised the money and they took the money thus raised, and to use their own language they spread it over the list of subscribers so that the man who had not paid a cent was credited with one or two or three thousand dollars as paid. John Jones subscribed 10 shares, paid 10 per cent thereon and gave his note for the rest, the note brought in a discount, and the amount of that discount was not written down to this man, but it was placed to another man who had not paid anything. That is the list that the Minister of Finance swallowed, that is the list he raised no question about, and all he would have had to have done was to ask for the original list, and he would find the evidence of the pencillings, and spreading on every page, but, he did not do it. There were officers and directors in that bank. How easy it would have been for the Minister of Finance if he had the least doubt, to write to some of these men and say: I find such and such a state of things, will you give me your view with reference to it. How quickly he would have got an answer from the hon. member for London (Mr. Beattie). How quickly he would have got an answer from dozens and dozens of others. The Minister of Finance has very good financial friends in the city of Toronto; he could easily have written to any one of them, and they would have given him a proper estimate of what this matter amounted to, and what Mr. Travers amounted to. If he had written to any one of the members of the Bankers' Association of Canada they would have given him that information, and would have been glad to have given it. The Bankers' Association is a part of the machinery of the Bank Act, and is at the disposal of the Minister of Finance for information, and if anybody can get information on these things the associated bankers can. Lying there for a month were three cheques, to the credit of the Minister of Finance, one from the Trust Company, for $80,000, one for $20,000, and one I think for the other $150,000; there they were lying in the Bank of Montreal to the credit of the Minister of Finance. Are those things so hidden that bankers do not know what is there? Do you mean to say that the question would not arise: Why, if the Traders' Bank is the bank of the Farmers' Bank do we have cheques from the Trust Company, and the information did get to the banking association as I shall soon show, and the Minister of Finance could have had the information just as easily as not. Did he ever ask any one for it? Now, he read Mr. Travers' affidavit. Let me just recapitulate. Mr. Travers makes an affidavit as to the acts of incorporation. They are plain; they are written in the statutes; he could not make a mistake about those. He makes an affidavit with reference to the prospectus. The prospectus was there to answer for itself—that is all right. But he says:

> Now shown to me and marked exhibit 'D' to this my declaration is a list of the subscribers to the capital stock of the said bank correctly setting forth as to each subscription the name of the subscriber, his address, the number of shares subscribed for by him, the amount of such shares and the amount paid in thereon. Each of the said subscriptions is a bona fide subscription to the capital stock of the said bank.

Travers swore to that; that was a lie. Mr. Leighton McCarthy told the Finance Minister a month beforehand that that was not so; and yet the Finance Minister says, what could I do? I had to take Mr. Travers' declaration. Mr. Travers also swears:

> The provisional directors of the said bank on the said twenty-third day of October, 1906, caused $250,000 of the moneys so paid in and which actually had been received in respect of the shares of the capital stock of the said bank to be deposited in the Bank of Montreal to the credit of the Minister of Finance and the Receiver General.

Mr. Travers swore to that; it was an absolute falsehood. $100,000 of that was money that was not paid in by the shareholders, but was borrowed to make up the deposit under the condition that as soon as the Finance Minister let go the $245,000, this would be paid back, and it was.

An hon. MEMBER. At what interest?

Mr. FOSTER. 10 per cent interest and a bonus of $1,000; and if I had been a lender of money, I should have wanted that much or more on that kind of security.

Mr. AMES. Who lent it?

Mr. FOSTER. The money was loaned by the Trust and Guarantee Company, and the bonus went to that company, according to the evidence. Mr. Travers then swears:

I acted as secretary to the said meeting of subscribers holden on the said twenty-sixth day of November, 1906, and at the said meeting upwards of eighty subscribers were present in person.

According to the minutes of the bank 69 subscribers only were present in person.

The subscribers adopted by-laws for the bank, and elected nine directors duly qualified under the Bank Act to hold office.

They elected only eight directors, but a resolution provided that they should elect twelve. So that they did not elect the directors that were required by the law which they themselves declared necessary. Mr. Travers also swore:

The provisions of the Bank Act as to the subscribers to the capital stock of the said bank and the deposit with the Receiver General, and as to the notice of the said meeting of subscribers and the proceedings of the said meeting have been fully complied with and pursuant to the direction of the said meeting of subscribers and board of directors elected at such meeting, application hereby is made for the certificate of the Treasury Board to permit the said bank to commence the business of banking in accordance with the said Act.

The minute book of that meeting and of the directors shows no resolution authorizing an application for the Treasury Board certificate, which would have been made clear if the simple precaution had been taken of having a certified copy of the resolution or of the minutes. I have already spoken with reference to the stock list. So that all the things that were essential, that were sworn to by Mr. Travers, turned out afterwards to have been falsely sworn to. The Finance Minister says, I could not know that at the time. But he could have taken the precaution to get corroborative evidence which was at his hand and easily obtainable. That he did not do. He preferred to take a simple declaration of a man whom he had not met until about three days before.

Now I come to that wonderful 30th day of November. I do not think any more eventful day than that has for many years dawned upon the city of Ottawa. Business was done with hurricane haste. If the departments of this government always worked with such speed and alacrity, there would be no arrears in the government business of this country. On the 30th day of November an interesting number of people were in this city. Having made the deposit, having had the subscribers' meeting, Mr. Travers makes haste after the 27th of November to come to Ottawa for his certificate. With him came Mr. Hunter and Mr. Smith, who had been the secretary of the Provisional Board. Mr. Hunter came as the legal adviser of Mr. Travers. Mr. Smith came for a far different purpose. He had, figuratively speaking, blood in his eye or money on his heart, and he was to demand of Mr. Travers, before that Treasury Board certificate was got, that he should be paid $2,500, or worse would happen. He employed as his lawyers Guthrie & Pringle of Ottawa. Guthrie & Pringle put the claim before Mr. Hunter, who was acting for Mr. Travers. In the end Guthrie & Pringle settled Smith's claim by taking an I. O. U. for, $1,800 from Mr. Travers who also had to pay the cost, $100; and, to use the expressive phrase of Mr. Travers, 'I got rid of another difficulty.' When pressed to say why he should pay Mr. Smith, he supposed the reason was that Mr. Smith knew the fraudulency of the list, and that if he had told that to the Finance Minister, it would have been all up with Mr. Travers' application for the certificate of the Treasury Board. So that Mr. Smith received his $1,800 of hush money, Messrs. Guthrie & Pringle received their $100 of costs, Mr. Smith hied himself home, and Mr. Travers was happy once more. But a question arises here: Did Mr. Hunter, or did Messrs. Guthrie & Pringle know all the circumstances of the case when they pried that $1,800 of hush money out of Travers' pocket and into the pocket of C. F. Smith? Mr. Travers said they did. If so, that raises another interesting question. Now, all this was taking place on that 30th day of November. But here is a singular circumstance. On the 30th of November the Minister of Finance writes a letter to Mr. Travers. Mr. Travers says that letter was shown to Mr. Hunter. Mr. Hunter left this city on the night of the 28th of November. How did Mr. Hunter come to see the letter written by the Minister of Finance on the 30th of November—how did he come to see it two days before the 30th November? If I understood the minister aright this afternoon, I understood him to say that he had previously told Mr. Travers the nature of the letter he was going to send him. Then Mr. Travers must have had a conference with the Finance Minister, and my hon. friend must have intimated to him what he was going to require from him in the shape of a letter, and must have told him that he would send him a letter on that line. Then, Mr. Hunter, and Messrs Pringle & Guthrie, who were both consulted about that letter, might have seen it two days before.

Mr. FIELDING. The letter was written on the date mentioned, the 30th November, and nobody could have seen it two days before. Mr. Travers came to my department in connection with the certificate and I asked that he be sent in. In the meantime I had drafted a letter to Mr. Travers, because I was not aware at the time that I could have a personal interview with him. When he came I discussed the matter with him along the lines I mentioned this afternoon, and I said to him that I was sending him a letter on the subject, and would like an answer. That was on the 30th of November.

Mr. FOSTER. Then my hon. friend had a conference with Travers previous to Travers receiving the letter, and yet the conference was on the 30th of November.

Mr. FIELDING. On the same day.

Mr. FOSTER. I take the minister's word, but if I take that, the other mystery is unsolved, for I find this letter written from Toronto on November 29th, 1906:

W. R. Travers, Esq.,
Russell House
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Travers,—Mr. Hunter called in this morning, and I was glad to learn that so far things are going on nicely, and trust you will have no trouble.

Mr. Hunter went over all the applications and informs me that they are in first-class shape, and that he would have no hesitation in exhibiting them if called for. At his request I inclose three blank checks out of the check book in case you have occasion to use them.

Wishing you success, I am,
Yours faithfully,
(Sgd.) J. B. FITZGIBBON.

P.S.—Nesbitt has just called to inquire how things were going, and I have given him the gist of Mr. Hunter's report this morning.

So that on this 30th of November we have this interesting lot of business done. The Minister of Finance writes a letter to Travers in which, after regretting that he was not able to see him yesterday, which would be Thursday, the 29th—that was the date of the Budget speech I think—he says:

I was unable to meet you to consider your application for the issue of a certificate to authorize the bank to commence business.

Up then to November 30 the date of that letter, the Treasury Board had not had under its consideration the application for a certificate.

It was not the Treasury Board which was unable to meet Travers, but the Finance Minister. The Finance Minister takes the responsibility and no doubt is quite willing to take it. He goes on to say:

I shall be glad to see you to-day at my office at any time before one o'clock if you can call. Or I might be able to see you later, between four and five, at the House of Commons if that will be more convenient.

There is a phase of the matter which I should like to bring to your notice so that you may consider it at once. It has been represented to us that in some previous instances where an application was in all respects apparently regular, there was actually an evasion of the intention of the Bank Act in relation to the paid-up capital. We have been told that in some cases the subscribers did not actually pay in cash but gave notes to the provisional directors which were used to raise the money. On account of information of this kind, which has reached us in relation to a previous case, we deem it proper to scan very closely every application for a certificate which comes to us. I shall be glad to have an assurance that nothing of the kind has taken place in relation to the subscriptions for the Farmers' Bank, but that the amounts set forth in the application as having been paid up have in every case been bona fide cash payments.

That is the letter to Travers. In a note written the same day, after he had explained the circumstances and got the opinion of Guthrie and Pringle upon that letter, Travers replied:

Ottawa, November 30, 1906.

The Hon. W. S. Fielding,
Finance Minister, Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—In reply to your letter of the 30th November, I have to say that in the case of the Farmers' Bank of Canada, the provisional directors did not raise the money in the way mentioned by you.

Did the minister take that as an answer to his question? Surely not. What was the minister's question? It was this:

I shall be glad to have an assurance that nothing of the kind has taken place in relation to the subscriptions to the Farmers' Bank, but that the amounts set forth in the application as having been paid up have in every case been bona fide cash payments.

He is told, not that this did not take place, but that the provisional directors did not raise the money in the way mentioned by him. And they did not, because in October and July they had given over the raising of money absolutely to Travers himself, and from that time forward Travers used their names. endorsed their notes to which he had signed their names, and got discounts in that way. Travers does not say that the money had not been raised in that objectionable way, but that the provisional directors did not do it. Did the Finance Minister take that as an absolute and definite answer to his question? If he did, I differ with him as to its being an answer at all. It is not an answer but an evasion which, though true in itself as to the provisional directors, did not deny that the thing itself had been done as it really had been done by Travers himself.

Now, I asked my hon. friend to bring down the minutes of the Treasury Board meeting of the 30th of November. The minister brought down an extract, and the extract was that the Treasury Board had met and passed the application and had ordered the Treasury Board certificate to be granted. I then said to the Minister of Finance that it was not an extract I asked for, but the whole minute. And I got the whole minute. And the whole minute and the extract were exactly the same. Does the minister think that is an evasion?

Mr. FIELDING. I desire to say, there is a printed form for extracts from the Treasury Board minutes, and the return was made on that form. The moment the full return was asked for, I inquired, and found that that was the whole record for the day.

Mr. FOSTER. I have the two, and I will give them to the Finance Minister.

Mr. FIELDING. They are both the same.

Mr. FOSTER. No, one is the full minute and the other is marked in writing 'Extract.'

Mr. FIELDING. That is the usual form.

Mr. FOSTER. Printed; but this is written. Here you have it at page 27 of the Return, 'extract from the minutes of a meeting of the Hon. the Treasury Board, held at Ottawa, on the thirtieth day of November, 1906." It is not an extract; it is the whole minute: nothing else was done that day. Now, what I asked the minister was, at what hour was that Treasury Board held, and he refused to give me the hour. Why should the minister refuse that information?

Mr. FIELDING. I told my hon. friend I did not know.

Mr. FOSTER No, the hon. gentleman refused to give it. I refer him to 'Hansard' on that point. If he did not know, he had his office behind him and could easily find out. Why did I want to know that? In the interest of truth. The letter to Mr. Travers says: You may see me up to one o'clock at my office, or you may see me at the House of Commons any time after four o'clock. When did Mr. Travers see the Finance Minister? Was it in his office before one o'clock, or was it not until after four o'clock in the House of Commons?

Mr. FIELDING. I can answer that. It was in my office. I cannot give the hour, but, I should say, probably before the lunch hour. It was not in the House of Commons.

Mr. FOSTER. That is satisfactory. If the minister had told me that before—

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. gentleman (Mr Foster) did not ask it.

Mr. FOSTER. I asked what hour.

Mr. FIELDING. He asked what hour the Treasury Board met, but not at what hour I met Mr. Travers.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, there is not much difference between the two, is there?

Mr. FIELDING. So long as my hon. friend understands it. I give him the facts.

Mr. FOSTER. If the minister had given me this information, it would have been just as good for me as the hour of the Treasury Board. Now, I wish to point out something else. The Treasury Board Act says that the Treasury Board shall consist of the Minister of Finance and any five other ministers. If the Act is lived up to—and if any Act is lived up to, this should be—there will be six members of the Treasury Board. But, by the return I hold in my hand, only three ministers are reported to have been present at this meeting of the Treasury Board on the 30th of November. If that be so, there was not a majority. The ministers noted as present besides the Finance Minister are Sir Richard Cartwright and Hon. Mr. Brodeur. Now, what I want to ask the Finance Minister is this: Was the Treasury Board regularly called for that day, or is this what we would call a hole-and-corner meeting, got up hurriedly? And when it was called and these three members were there, were the facts of the case in reference to this application, as the Finance Minister understood them, laid before the Treasury Board for its consideration?

Mr. FIELDING. Does the hon. gentleman wish me to answer? I cannot say exactly how that particular Treasury Board was constituted. With regard to only three members being present, I shall be happy to show the hon. gentleman many occasions on which the Treasury Board business has been done with three members present. In that respect, there is ample precedent. What probably happened was that this Treasury Board took place at the Council. I wish to be very frank with the House about this matter. When there is abundance of time, the Treasury Board meets at my department, but we occasionally have a Treasury Board at the Council chamber where the members confer and agree upon what is to be done. But there are occasions, both with regard to matters of the cabinet and with regard to matters of the Treasury Board, when it is not convenient or possible to get the members together, and you have to send information round and obtain the report in that way. My impression is that in this particular case the conference probably took place at the Council meeting that afternoon, but I would not speak definitely.

Mr. FOSTER. The minister does not say anything as to whether the precedent history of the matter was laid before the board.

Mr. FIELDING. The whole matter was probably discussed. As to what particular information was laid before my colleagues on that occasion I cannot say. Of course, they would ask for information and I would give it. I accept the full responsibility of advising my colleagues in this matter. They would ask my advice and I would give it.

Mr. FOSTER. That makes it all clear; we have now the modus operandi. I have only a few words more to say. The Minister of Finance says that the same evidence was accepted in this case as in other cases. I wish to ask whether there was any precedent case in which the circumstances surrounding an application were of the same nature as in this? The Finance Minister said: If I had denied this Treasury Board certificate, I should have been accused of not treating the farmers right. I do not think the Minister of Finance would take the position that, in order to parry criticism, or to keep himself from being wrongfully attacked, he should cease to perform his duty of guarding the interests of the shareholders which were confided to his trust. Which would the farmers like better—that he should make a thorough inquisition into this matter, and stop it on the demerits of the case and save them their money, or, for fear of criticism, should allow it to go through and them to be involved in this loss? There is only one answer to that question. It was the duty of the Finance Minister not to look at criticism one way or the other, but to perform his whole duty as the trustee for the shareholders, and that duty was to guard their rights. He says now: I have been deceived. When did the Finance Minister know that he had been deceived? He knew it, or had good reason to believe it, within twenty-four hours after he had granted that certificate, for there is the letter of Mr. Clouston, of the Bankers' Association, making the statement in black and white that he had reason to believe that this deposit was not a bona fide deposit and that therefore steps should be taken to prevent the bank going into operation. If, within twenty-four hours of issuing this certificate in 1906, the Minister of Finance knew that he had been deceived, what has he done up to the present time to punish the men who deceived him? Is it to go forth that in this administration men, in a matter of this kind, can combine and deceive the Minister of Finance, and by reason of that deception bring ruin upon hundreds and thousands of people, and yet the Finance Minister and the government not stir a hand to ferret out and punish the men who deceived him?

Why, Sir, Mr. Clouston wrote a letter on the very day that the Treasury Board issued the certificate. That came to the minister the next morning, the minister read it in his mail. Under that allegation by Mr. Clouston there was only one thing for the minister to do. He had given a cheque for $245,000 of the shareholders' money to Mr. Travers, and it was his duty simply to advise the bank not to honour that cheque, and to have written or telegraphed to Mr. Travers that he wanted to see him immediately, to have brought him here, and to have had that matter thoroughly explained before he allowed the shareholders' money to go into the hands of Mr. Travers. More than that, he knew that the associated bankers sent their man, Mr. Knight, up to Toronto, and Mr. Knight investigated in Toronto, and came to the conclusion that the deposit had been made with borrowed money. He telephoned Mr. Burn, Mr. Burn communicated with the department; and yet, with both Mr. Clouston and Mr. Knight, and the evidence standing out before him, he took no steps to collar that money and to prevent the bank from going into operation. If I am rightly informed, the bank did not open its doors to do business until the 2nd day of January, 1907. On the 18th of December, Mr. Knight made his report to Mr. Burn, and Mr. Burn presumably made his report to the Finance Department, and even then the Finance Minister did not do anything. The bank was not in operation, the money would have been saved, this gigantic series of mal-deeds would all have been impossible.

The minister says that the bank failed on account of bad management. Even though, he says, $100,000 of capital had been depleted, yet afterwards, he does not know quite when, the capital did begin to come in. Good management would have saved it, bad management was its curse. I go back a little further than that, and I say that a bad manager was the curse of that bank, a bad manager was the very man that could have been unmasked by my hon. friend and put out of business, because every transaction that he took in the formation of that bank was accompanied by perjury, and fraud, and misrepresentation. If the Finance Minister had taken hold of it and unmasked Mr. Travers and his operations, there might have been bad management, but it would not have been bad management by Mr. Travers, because Mr. Travers would have been impossible as manager of any bank. There is where I think my hon. friend made a great mistake. Look at it. He had his own opposition to the extension: warning, premonition, No. 1; the other cases previously occurring in his mind, to his knowledge: warning No. 2; Mr. McCarthy's letters, and the judgment: warning No. 3. The appeals and conversations of my hon. friend from Halton, whose word I am bound to take, for this consideration, that while the Finance Minister is busy with many things, my hon. friend from Halton though a busy man, has less business, and would be more likely to follow this matter out in the interests of his constituents. So without any disrespect to the Minister of Finance, I would say that I am bound to think that my hon. friend beside me would not have made the mistake he has made in regard to his memory of those things. But Sir, will the Finance Minister tell me and tell this House that had no other warnings? I asked him again the question whether any of the officers of his department had had interviews and warnings. He never answered that.

Mr. FIELDING. I will answer at once. I certainly had no other warnings—I do not know what my hon. friend refers to—I had no warnings that have not been brought to the notice of the House in the discussions that has taken place.

Mr. FOSTER. Very well, then. I will make what I think is a practical test of that question. My hon. friend has said that there is no work for a commission in this matter, the courts will do all the work that is necessary to be done. I deny that all the facts can be brought out in a police court examination. It does not seem to me that the most important part of the investigation into this business can be or will be taken up in the courts. There is a lot of information which lies at the very essence of this matter that the courts will not look into at all. And with reference to all that has taken place in granting the certificate, my hon. friend dismisses it with the simple statement that it is all a matter of record. It is not all a matter of record. I want to put the gravity of this case before my hon. friend and my right hon. friend. Up to this occurrence, the people of Canada had absolute faith that when the Minister of Finance granted a certificate for a bank to go into operation, everything was perfectly square. They had perfect faith. Have they now? It is absolutely shattered, and until something is done, and a thorough investigation is held, coupled with legislation wherever legislation is needed, to strengthen the preliminary operations, until the truth of the matter is brought out, this country will not have faith in any bank which is put into a position to do work through the Department of Finance of Canada. I believe it is absolutely necessary, no matter whom it hits or whom it hurts, to have a thorough investigation into everything connected with this matter. I would go further, and take in all the banks that have failed during the last four or five years, the curators' reports of which furnish strange reading to any person who will go through them.

I ask the government to grant that royal commission which my hon. friend has asked for in his motion, and I will bind myself to add material evidence in the line of the evidence of my hon. friend from Halton, if an opportunity is given me before that commission. There is other evidence to be brought out, give us a tribunal and we will bring it out. Who is to be hurt by granting this commission? Who can be injured? The government does not mind the expense of it. It is easy to get able men to carry it out; it can be carried out without great trouble and much time. What reason is there at all why it should not be granted? We ask that it be granted. There are questions after questions that we would like to ask the officers of the department, the Finance Minister and the members of the Treasury Board, and numerous others. If there was a tribunal before which these could be put, all the facts could be obtained. Why should we not have that information? It is not for the benefit of my hon. friend or of myself. It is not to pull one down and build another up, it is to get the absolute facts of the case? Why should we not have the commission?

Mr. H. H. MILLER (South Grey). Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) has said that his constituents are troubled over this matter of the Farmers' bank, many of them having become shareholders, many of them having deposits and many of them having suffered severe loss. The hon. gentleman says that it is expected that he shall do everything here that he is able to do. It is the right of every member of this House to keep himself squared with his constituents in any way that he legitimately can and perhaps this is not the only instance where men have occupied an hour or two of the time of the House in an endeavour to square themselves with their constituents at home. The hon. gentleman has said that the name of this bank—the Farmers' bank—won the confidence of the people of his constituency and of the country. It may be that there is something in that, but I take it that there was a great deal more in the prospectus that they issued to the public and in the representations made by smooth tongued and skilful canvassers who were engaged in the selling of the stock. I notice by the prospectus that one of the features of it is the statement of the large returns that have been made by Canadian banks in times past. I find a list of twelve Canadian banks, the first of which is the Dominion bank. The prospectus says that the par value of the shares of the Dominion bank is $100, that at the time of the issue of this prospectus the selling price was $280 and that the dividend paid was ten per cent. Particulars are given with reference to the other Canadian banks showing substantial profits, a large increase in the value of the stock and also large dividends. Some particulars are also given as to a number of United States banks. The propectus also sets forth that:

Bank stocks, therefore, offer to the investor—

1. A profitable investment.
2. A safe investment.
3. An investment increasing in value.
4. An investment easily realizable.

I imagine that this prospectus induced many of the honest, hardworking farmers of Halton county to subscribe for the stock of this bank. The hon. member for Halton asks who is responsible for the loss and for the disaster that the failure of this bank has brought about. He does not directly answer his question but he makes the statement that the shareholders were innocent people. So they were innocent people; perhaps their innocence was greater in some instances than their wisdom. I have known in my own county, and in one instance in the county of Perth, where farmers just as innocent as these, subscribed for stock in cement and other manufacturing industries. They were told that the profit would be anywhere from 20 to 60 per cent. In some cases they mortgaged their farms to invest in these industrial stocks, but because of the bad management which existed in the businesses in which they had invested they lost their money. Yet, I do not think that the governments by whom the charters of these companies were granted were blamed for the loss.

The hon. member for Halton says that he was very uneasy as to what might be the result of the issue of this bank charter. That was very natural uneasiness. When the hon. gentleman says that one man in his riding, as I understood him, invested $22,000 in the stock of this bank, realizing as the hon, member for Halton did, that that meant not only the risk of the $22,000 actually invested but also the double liability making a total of $44,000, unless he were a very wealthy man, I would expect that the hon. member for Halton would be somewhat uneasy. I confess that at first sight it did appear to me that the statement of the hon. member for Halton that he had conferred upon more than one occasion with my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and had given him certain warnings was the strongest evidence, or the only evidence that up to date had been produced to show any lack of precaution on the part of the Finance Minister. But when we look further into that matter what does it amount to after all? Being questioned by my hon, friend the Finance Minister as to why he did not submit his warning in writing, the hon. member for Halton said: I wanted to be very careful not to write or say anything that might blight the prospects of these people in their enterprise; I did not want to say anything in writing or verbally that might prevent this bank obtaining its certificate and going on to do business because there was a probability, or a possibility, that they might make their banking venture a success. That then was the position of the hon. member for Halton. He said: I being a shrewd business man and too cautious to invest my own money in that stock, naturally regret that my friends, no matter what their political leanings, are investing in it; I fear that they may suffer loss. Some of these shareholders living in my constituency are becoming alarmed but there is a larger number of them who apear to be perfectly satisfied. A smaller number may suffer loss, but on the other hand a larger number of shareholders in my riding would be put out and angry if I took any action that would prevent the completion of their enterprise or prevent the issuing of a certificate to the bank. Therefore, while I may speak to the Finance Minister and express to him my uneasy feeling in a casual way. I will be careful not to say anything that anybody might possibly regard as in any way injuring the interests of the subscribers or shareholders in that instittion. If that be the case, and I take it from the hon. gentleman's own words that that is exactly the case, then I say that his words to the Finance Minister did not constitute any warning whatever but a mere expression of uneasiness that this investment might not prove to be a profitable one. I would like to refer for a moment to the provisions of the Bank Act. I take it that the Bank Act, as it is upon the statute-book to-day, is not less stringent or less protective of the rights of the people than it has been for many years. I assume that the Bank Act as we have it upon our statute-books to-day is just as stringent in its measures and provisions as it was, for instance, when the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) occupied the position of Finance Minister of this country. Sec. 13 of the Bank Act says:

So soon as a sum not less than five hundred thousand dollars of the capital stock of the bank has been bona fide subscribed, and a sum not less than two hundred and fifty thousand dollars thereof has been paid to the minister, the provisional directors may, by public notice, published for at least four weeks, call a meeting of the subscribers to the said stock—— and then go on, organize and do business Sec. 15 of the Bank Act says:

No certificate shall be given by the Treasury Board until it has been shown to the satisfaction of the Board, by affidavit or otherwise, that all the requirements of this Act and of the special Act of incorporation of the bank, as to the payment required to be made to the minister——

The payment of $250,000 had in this case actually been made.

—the election of directors——

The directors had been elected in the regular way, —deposit for security for note issue——

The required deposit of $5,000 had been made to the minister.

—or other preliminaries have been complied with——

The other preliminaries, so far as appeared by the affidavit, had all been complied with.

—and that the sum so paid is there held by the minister.

The $250,000 and the $5,000 had been so paid and were so held by the minister. So that as far as all the evidence made it appear, every single possible requirement of the Bank Act had been complied with. But, I am told that the affidavit which the Act stipulates may be accepted, and it is the only specific proof the Act mentions, was not sufficient and that further evidence ought to have been asked for. I claim that the position of the Minister of Finance in this respect is not different from that of the Provincial Secretary in the Ontario government or the Secretary of State in the Dominion government when a number of business men apply for a charter in the one case under the Dominion Companies' Act or in the other case to Mr. Whitney's government under the Ontario Company's Act. They show the particulars on printed forms furnished them for that purpose. They show the names of at least five shareholders, the names of the provisional directors, the amount of stock subscribed, the amount of cash paid in on the stock, and these statements are verified by affidavit of one of the promoters or interested parties. The member for North Toronto says that the minute books of the company might have been obtained and they would have furnished evidence that the certificate ought not to have issued. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) or any other man who has occupied the position of Minister of Finance in the Canadian government, whether in any single instance the minute book of a company has been asked for under similar circumstances?

Mr. NORTHRUP. Was there ever a case like this?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. NORTHRUP. When and where?

Mr. MILLER. There was no case different from this.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Name a single case like this.

Mr. FIELDING. My recollection is that there was no case of the minute book being required previous to this, although in a recent case I think we did require the minute book. I am safe in saying that in no case prior to this was the minute book required or demanded.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Was there ever a case like this before?

Mr. FIELDING. I think that substantially this case is not different from other cases before the board, except in one case where I know a certificate was granted without an affidavit at all.

Mr. MILLER. There were 250,000 good reasons in the shape of the $250,000 deposited to show the bona fides of the men engaged in the transaction. That was far better evidence than any affidavit as to the bona fides of these people. A quarter million dollars is not easily picked up, and there was no source whence the greater part of it could come than from the shareholders of the bank and from the shareholders of the bank it did come. Mr. Travers did not and could not put up $250,000 of his own money; it was obtained from the shareholders of the bank who had subscribed to the stock of the bank. The Minister of Finance has pointed out, and none can deny it, that at this time Mr. Travers had as good a reputation as a financier and man of integrity as has any member of this House. He had been manager of the important branch of the Merchants' Bank in Hamilton, and I am informed that when he left the employ of that bank he took with him from the general manager a splendid testimonial in the shape of a letter speaking highly of his integrity and financial ability. Long after the certificate had been issued and the bank opened for business, the government of Sir James Whitney showed their confidence in Mr. Travers and in the Farmers' Bank by depositing in that bank Ontario government funds to the amount of $25,000. Talk about a trusteeship; the Ontario government were trustees for this $25,000 of public money, and they deposited it in the Farmers' Bank, showing the confidence they had in the institution and in the men by whom it was managed. Mr. Travers, who at that time had the reputation of being an honest business man, was manager of the bank, and the president at that time was Dr. Beattie Nesbitt, in whom, at least a large number of the people of Ontario had confidence. The Ontario government and Sir James Whitney had such confidence in him that they made him registrar in the city of Toronto. Therefore, not only had the general manager of the bank a good reputation at that time, but so had the president of the bank, and, in addition to that, some of the directors and shareholders were amongst the foremost business men of Ontario. The hon. member for Hastings asked was there ever such another case as this, and he proved there never was by his sarcastic laugh, and we were told by the hon. member for North Toronto that the letters from Mr. Leighton McCarthy should have aroused the suspicion of the Minister of Finance. Let us look at the letters. The first says that Mr. McCarthy is representing eleven subscribers of stock in the bank and on the 9th of October he writes:

My dear Mr. Fielding,—I beg to inclose the special endorsement upon a writ of summons in the High Court of Justice for Ontario, which will be issued.

This would seem to contradict the statement of the hon. member for North Toronto that the writ had issued because Mr. McCarthy says that the writ would be issued, and the inference is that when Mr. McCarthy obtained satisfaction for his clients the writ was withheld. But, Mr. McCarthy does not ask the Treasury Board not to issue the certificate; what he asks for is delay. Mr. McCarthy was acting for eleven shareholders whom he named, and 'for all other persons alleged to be subscribers for shares of the capital stock of the Farmers' Bank of Canada who may desire to come in and be parties to this action.' Apparently no other subscribers did come in and the eleven subscribers represented by Mr. McCarthy so far as we know were the only ones dissatisfied. The hon. member for North Toronto speaks of these eleven men having been bought up, which implies that they were bribed not to proceed with the action they intended to proceed with. Well, these men had subscribed for the stock of the Farmers' Bank, and I would not wonder that my hon. friend from Halton or some other equally cautious and shrewd man had advised them that their investment instead of being sure to be as profitable as they expected, was attended with certain risks.

They then thought it wise that they should withdraw, and if possible escape any liability. They engaged Mr. McCarthy. He proceeds to threaten, and possibly he may have issued a writ. The promoters of the bank say: We do not want any delay or litigation; we will go to these eleven dissatisfied shareholders, and we will give them back the money they have paid in, and take over their stock. These eleven subscribers had subscribed for stock to the value of $23,500, but they had only paid on that stock $6,530. So that all that the promoters of the bank had to do to stop the agitation of these eleven men was to raise $6,530, which they did, and took over their stock. Now, Mr. McCarthy's letter shows that eleven men out of a total of 557 subscribers were dissatisfied. There were at the same time 546 other subscribers who apparently were perfectly satisfied with the investment they had made, and were not making any trouble or asking for any relief. These 546 satisfied subscribers had subscribed stock to the amount of $476,500. Now, what were the irregularities pointed out in Mr. McCarthy's letter? The sole irregularities on the part of any person up to that time were that certain subscribers to the stock of the bank who had supposedly paid in $6,530 had not paid in all of that in money, but had paid a part of it in their promissory notes. Had these farmers and others, instead of giving their promissory notes to Mr. Travers, taken them to some bank and discounted them, and paid the money to Mr. Travers on their stock, they would not have been guilty, morally, legally or otherwise, there would have been no irregularities to point out, and no technical reason why they could have evaded their stock subscription. The hon. member for North Toronto asks: Would the Finance Minister in the transaction of private business, have invested $500,000 of private funds in the same careless way? I say, in reply to that, that the Minister of Finance did not invest one single dollar of that $500,000, and he was not in any way responsible for the investment of that or any part of it, to any subscriber of that stock. The man who was responsible primarily and above all was W. R. Travers, and what position did he occupy, and how did he obtain that position? He was general manager of the bank. He had not been made general manager by the Treasury Board or by the Finance Minister, but by the votes of the 557 shareholders, including the shareholders in the county of Halton. They are the men who had given to W. R. Travers the responsibility and the right of handling their money. The hon. member for North Toronto says that the Finance Minister was a trustee, or the Treasury Board were trustees, for the handling of the money, and the hon. member for Halton uses to some extent the same reasoning. He said that if the Treasury Board had refused to issue the certificate, then the $250,000 deposited with the Treasury Board would have been refunded, and could have been paid back to the shareholders. That is not the case. The $250,000 had been paid in by W. R. Travers. If the Finance Minister was a trustee at all, or if the members of the Treasury Board were trustees at all, then surely they were trustees to those who had made the application for the $250,000 paid in, under the law, to the Treasury Board. But I direct the attention of the members of the House to section 17 of the Bank Act, which says:

In case no certificate is issued by the Treasury Board within the time limit for the issue thereof, the amount so deposited shall be returned to the persons depositing the same.

Who in this case was W. R. Travers? Then, subsection 3 of section 17 says:

In no case shall the minister be under any obligation to see to the proper application in any way of the amount so returned.

So not only does the Bank Act not say that the Treasury Board or the Finance Minister are trustees for the $250,000, but it takes especial care, in the plainest and most definite language, to say that they are not trustees for that $250,000, and cannot be so regarded. Then surely they cannot be held to be trustees for a single dollar of the money of the bank. The hon. member for North Toronto says that the hon. Minister of Finance could have had information and advice from the Canadian Bankers' Association, which would have put him upon his guard. I say that if the Bankers' Association, before the certificate was issued, had information which the Minister of Finance ought to have had, and which would have influenced him in the granting of the certificate, then they had not only a financial and a personal interest in seeing that the Finance Minister obtained that information in time to be of some use, but also a public duty in seeing that the information was given to him as quickly as possible. But the Bankers' Association, if they had that information, which I doubt, withheld it until after the certificate had been issued. I ask again if the hon. member for North Toronto, during the time he was Finance Minister, ever asked for the production of a minute book of a bank applying for a certificate or of any other financial institution applying for a charter or a license authorizing it to do business. We believe, and the people of this country believe, that the Minister of Finance is a very careful and capable official; but we do not claim that he is a seer or is omniscient. It is all right now, after loss has come, and there has been calamity, to endeavour to blame the Minister of Finance, it is all right to say that Mr. Travers made an affidavit that was utterly false in this particular, and that particular; but there was no possible way by which the Minister of Finance or any other mortal man could at that time have known that the statements contained in Mr. Travers' affidavits were not correct.

Suppose that this parliament had known years before the certificate was issued, as they know to-day, that Travers was not an honest man, what would have been the power of this parliament and the power of the Treasury Board? I say that the Banking and Commerce Committee, when the charter for this bank was being obtained, might very well have considered the character of the men who were promoting the scheme. I say that the members of this House, who were called on to adopt or reject the report of the Banking and Commerce Committee, might very well have considered the character and business ability and prospects of the men who were asking for incorporation. The Banking and Commerce Committee is composed of members on both sides, many of whom have large business experience, and all of whom have no doubt the interests of the people at heart. Of that committee my hon. friend from Halton is one of the most careful and efficient members. I say that that committee might have refused a charter of incorporation to Travers and his associates if it had any reason to doubt his character or ability. And after that committee had agreed to give these men a charter, the members of this House could still have refused to pass the Act. But when this parliament, under the advice of the Banking and Commerce Committee, did issue a charter to these people, it was beyond the power of the Treasury Board to withhold the certificate because of the character of the men applying for it.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Travers had nothing to do with getting the charter.

Mr. MILLER. It does not make any difference whether Travers had anything to do with getting the charter or not. The members of the committee or of this House can refuse a charter to any one applying for it, but the Treasury Board, once a charter is given, cannot refuse a certificate after the parties have complied with the conditions of their Act of incorporation. In this case, the conditions were complied with to the letter in every particular.

Mr. NORTHRUP. We say that they were not.

Mr. MILLER. I say further, suppose the Treasury Board, with its six members, had taken upon itself to say that they had information as to the character of these men or their lack of business ability and would not issue to them the certificate to enable them to do business, what would have happened? Would this House have been disposed to accept that position of affairs? Would this House be willing to delegate to any set of six men, no matter who, the right to pass judgment on the character or ability of any group of men to whom this House had given an Act of incorporation? In this case Travers was a member of the Conservative party, Dr. Nesbitt, the president of the bank, was also a prominent member of that party; and if the Treasury Board had gone out of its way to refuse a certificate to these men, the Minister of Finance and the other members of that board would have been accused of having been actuated by political reasons in withholding that certificate.

I do not think that anything can be accomplished by a Royal Commissioin. The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) has had the privilege ot examining all the correspondence and all the documents in this whole matter, and I do not think that any commission could make a more searching inquiry into the facts than he has done. Hon. gentlemen opposite will agree that the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) is well able to make an investigation and examine every bit of evidence submitted to him, which is all that could be submitted by this House to a Royal Commission.

There is a lesson to be learned in this, and that is that we, as a parliament, should be more careful when we come to frame a new Bank Act, and I refer hon. members opposite to the new Act drafted by the Minister of Finance. If they will compare the sections of that new draft Act with the parallel sections of the present law regarding the issue of certificates, they will find that the hon. minister has taken many precautions to guard the interests of the public more fully than they are in the present law. But I repeat that every member of this House, who was a member of it when the old Act was passed, is equally responsible with the Minister of Finance for the Act as we have it to-day.

Mr. W. B. NORTHRUP (East Hastings). Perhaps it is just as well that I should read the amendment before the House, as it is some time since any reference has been made to the real question at issue. The amendment is as follows:

This House is of opinion that a Royal Commission should forthwith issue to inquire into and investigate the incorporation and organization of the Farmers' Bank of Canada, and the granting of a certificate by the Treasury Board permitting the said bank to issue notes and commence business, and all circumstances connected therewith and generally to inquire into and investigate the operation and efficiency of the Bank Act in relation to the affairs and transactions of the said bank.

I am free to admit that when an amendment such as this is brought before the House, the responsibility rests on those who bring it forward of making out a prima facie case to justify an investigation. But it would be idle to expect members on this side to prove the point they wish to have investigated. Of course, however, in order to compel even the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Miller) when he comes to read the amendment, to vote for it, as I hope he will, it is necessary that we should show that there is something worth investigation in the transactions referred to. What are the circumstances which we say justify an investigation? The people of this country, through their representatives, have provided that after parliament has granted a charter to a bank, that bank has no power to carry on its business until it has complied with certain formalities. But after it has complied with these formalities, the Treasury Board is allowed to give it a certificate, and on that certificate—and that alone—can it begin business. A great deal has been said about the shareholders, and I do not intend to add to what has been said on their behalf. But what about the depositors? The Minister of Finance may possibly say that he was led astray by Travers, the representative of the shareholders? But what has he to say about the unfortunate depositors throughout the land? What has he to say of those men who were in comfortable circumstances a few months ago and who are to-day in the depths of poverty because the hon. minister blundered. In my own constituency, I met an old soldier, about 75 years of age and his wife of the same age. This man had worked hard during 20 years since leaving the army and accumulated a little property, but he had deposited his savings, some $11,200, in the Farmers' Bank in March last, and all he had left after all these years of industry, was $3. It is such people as those, people who put their money into this bank relying on the Minister of Finance seeing that the law was complied with to the letter, who say, surely we are entitled to an investigation. I am not implying that the Finance Minister himself was corrupt in any respect; but I do say that if he has any proper regard for his own reputation, he should be the first man to ask for a complete investigation into all the circumstances which, to say the least are most extraordinary.

Now, there are certain facts which cannot be gainsaid. They have been laid before the House very fully by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), but perhaps I may be allowed, briefly to refer to some of them. In the first place, as I said before, the responsibility is, by statute, thrown on the Treasury Board. The statute provides that $500,000 must be subscribed and $250,000 paid up, bona fide payments in cash, and certain other conditions complied with without the performance of which the Treasury Board has not the power to grant a certificate. Now, I would like to ask the Finance Minister, sitting in this House to-night: If he had known on the 13th day of November, 1906, all that he knows on this 15th day of March, 1911, about the state of affairs at the former date, would he have granted that certificate to the Farmers' Bank of Canada? The hon. gentleman declines to answer——

Mr. FIELDING. I do not decline to answer. I thought it did not require an answer. Certainly, with the information now available, I would not have issued the certificate.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Well, we have got that far. The hon. gentleman admits on this 15th day of March, 1911, that he issued a certificate under such circumstances that, had he known——

Mr. FIELDING. We can all be wise after the event.

Mr. NORTHRUP. But the Finance Minister was the one man who had it in his power to have the information that would make him wise before the event. And I desire to call attention to the care, persistence and assiduity with which the hon. gentleman prevented his own eyes being opened despite every effort to that end on the part of those who were in possession of the facts. That is the reason why we are entitled to an investigation, to find out what hypnotic power was around the Finance Minister on that unhappy 30th of November, 1906. It was well known that those connected with the bank had had a great deal of difficulty in getting the required stock subscribed. The time of the charter had been extended, I think, twice. So, if ever there was an occasion on which the Finance Minister, on the merits of the case, might well have been justified in looking into the facts, it was this case. But, while proceedings were on, a letter was received by the department from one of the leading lawyers of the city of Toronto; I presume the Finance Minister read this letter—or he did not. Might I ask: Did the hon. gentleman take the trouble to read that letter and the information——

Mr. FIELDING. The information was conveyed to me by my officials in substance.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Then, we find, in substance, the Finance Minister knew that the writ was about to be issued. The names of all the parties were given, some 10 or 11 of them; the grounds of the action were fully set out in the endorsement of the writ, which I will read in a moment, and also stated in the letter itself. In the letter it is stated that this action was to be brought. It says:

I have received information that the alleged subscribers for shares paid a large sum of money in cash and have signed notes for other large sums of money, and that the persons professing to act in the name of the bank have transferred notes and received the proceeds, and that a deposit either has been made or will be made of the cash received and the proceeds of these notes, or sufficient amount to make up $250,000.

This is information coming from a reliable source. He goes on:

I wish you to have the kindness to acknowledge the receipt of this protest against the granting of a certificate so that I may advise the shareholders who are disputing their liability, and I would be pleased to go to Ottawa upon any appointment you may make for the further consideration of this matter.

That was written on October the 19th. The department hurried to reply to it four days later—they acknowledged the receipt of the letter. On the 19th of October, then, this writ had not been issued. On the 31st of October a letter was written by Mr. Boville, the Deputy Minister of Finance, to Mr. McCarthy, in which he said:

Referring to your letter of the 19th inst.——

The one I have just mentioned.

—addressed to Mr. Fielding, on the subject of the Farmers' Bank of Canada and the issue of a certificate to that bank to commence business under section 15 of the Bank Act, I notice recently a reference in the newspapers for a judgment given by Judge Anglin in a suit relating to this matter. In view of the decision rendered, I shall be obliged if you will let me know if you still desire the protest contained in your letter to be brought before the Treasury Board upon an application of the Farmers' Bank for a certificate to be considered.

Was a more remarkable letter ever written? A leading lawyer states facts which the minister and his deputy should have been delighted to receive, if they were facts, and which, if true, disentitled the Farmers' Bank to receive this certificate. This letter made it the duty, beyond all question, of the deputy minister to investigate. Because no one will suggest that when the Banking Act provides for a Treasury Board consisting of the Finance Minister and five of his colleagues, it intends that five wooden Indians with a rubber stamp can transact the business of the Treasury Board. There must have been a presumption somewhere that a little intelligence would be used. And when parliament requires certain conditions as prerequisite to a certificate being issued, surely it expected that the ordinary—I do not suggest extraordinary—amount of intelligence and industry would be displayed by the officials in carrying out that law. Yet, after this extraordinary statement, the only letter of inquiry is to ascertain if, the suit having been settled, this lawyer is prepared to withdraw the protest he had entered for these 10 or 11 gentlemen. But not a thought of the hundreds of shareholders and thousands of possible depositors, but only of the few individuals whose names happened to be mentioned in that writ. It may not be out of place to give a few of the principal charges made, to show how serious this matter was. This is the endorsement on the writ:

This action is brought by the plaintiffs on their own behalf and on behalf of all other alleged shareholders of the Farmers' Bank of Canada who dispute the validity of alleged contracts to take share of the capital stock of the Bank, and who allege that they were induced to subscribe for shares through fraud and misrepresentation, and who may request to be joined as plaintiffs. And the plaintiffs' claim is: (1) for a declaration that the alleged contracts are void: (2) for the rescission of alleged contracts to take shares of the capital stock of the Farmers' Bank of Canada; (3) for an accounting for the money or promissory notes received—or alleged to have been received—in the name and on behalf of the provisional directors of the bank; (4) for an injunction; (5) for a receiver; and (6) for administration. And the following are the particulars of the plaintiffs' claim.

1. That the Farmers' Bank of Canada was incorporated by special Act of the parliament of Canada, passed on the 18th day of July, 1904.

2. The defendants, James Gallagher, John Watson, John Ferguson, Alexander Fraser and Alexander Shepherd Lown, were appointed by the said Act to be the provisional directors of the bank.

Then it recites how the bank was proceeded with, prospectuses issued and stock-books opened. And these are the charges of impropriety:

11. The plaintiffs and others subscribed to shares, and the plaintiffs allege: (1) that the provisional directors who professed to act for and in the name of the bank had no lawful power or authority to receive subscriptions for shares or to accept them; and (2) that the subscriptions for shares which were procured from the plaintiffs and others were procured through fraud and misrepresentation, and the plaintiffs allege, amongst others, the following particulars of fraud, namely:

1. That the agent in procuring the subscriptions for shares falsely represented that persons had subscribed for a larger number of shares than they had in fact subscribed for, and the following are examples of such false representation, namely: (a) that Robert Noble whose name is entered in the prospectus as one of those who had consented to be a director, had subscribed for shares to the amount of $10,000, whereas he had in fact only subscribed for shares to the amount of $3,000; (b) that John Sproat had subscribed for shares to the amount of $10,000, whereas he had in fact only intended to subscribe for shares to the amount of $1,000, and that he was induced to sign an application in the belief that it was filled up for $1,000 and that the general manager afterwards claimed that it was a subscription for $10,000, and the said John Sproat then repudiated the entire subscription; (d) that James Murray had subscribed for shares to the amount of $10,000, whereas he had in fact only subscribed for shares to the amount of $1,000.

(e) That Dr. Stewart was subscribing for shares to the amount of $10,000, whereas he was not in fact subscribing for any shares; and other false representations of a similar character were made by the solicitors and agents in reference to alleged subscriptions of other persons.

Then there is a charge with regard to Major Beattie, which was read before. Then there are a number of attractive inducements held out, and then it is alleged that actions and proceedings were taken, and so forth. Now surely there were charges enough to put any treasury board on its guard, charges explicitly made, and charges which went to court; and when we find that on the 19th of October the writ had not yet been issued, and that on the 31st, the Deputy Minister of Finance could write that the judgment had been given which, as a matter of fact was given on the 27th of October, and when we find all these allegations of fraud against the provisional directors and general manager, that when the writ was not issued on the 19th of October, such haste was made that the judgment was entered on the 27th of October, and the judgment itself recites as follows:

And it appearing that the said plaintiffs John Sproat, George Castle, William A. Dixon, William McLean, Finlay McCallum, Robert Hume, James Murray, George Denoon and John McLeod, have assigned and transferred their applications for the issue of shares of stock of the Farmers' Bank of Canada, and their right to shares in accordance with the said applications, to one William J. Lindsay, and that the claims of the said plaintiffs last above named, and also the obligations and liabilities of the said plaintiffs, have ceased——

2. It is ordered and adjudged that this action be and the same is hereby dismissed out of court without costs.

Now, Sir, if a deputation had come from Toronto with a brass band to serenade the Finance Minister, and had come with the express purpose of calling his attention to the fact that these charges of fraud had been made by Mr. McCarthy and had been substantiated, they could not have given a better evidence of the fact than this judgment which was referred to by the Deputy Minister of Finance in his letter of the 21st of October; and after these people had been settled with, and after these charges of fraud had been made, the minister simply inquired whether the individual whose clients had made these charges and who had been settled with, wanted to press this protest; but that the minister owed any duty to the shareholders or to the people of Canada, never even seemed to have entered his mind. Well, we find then that Mr. McCarthy received back his papers, and there was an interval of time, and then Mr. Travers sends in his application for a certificate and makes his declaration on the 27th of November. Now when the minister had seen the endorsement in this writ, and when there were 8 or 10 plaintiffs in that case whose names were before him, and when Mr. Travers on the 27th of November, this judgment having been entered on the 27th of October, makes his sworn declaration, that on which the minister gave, and could only give, the certificate, would it be believed that neither the minister, nor the Treasury Board, nor anybody in the department took enough interest in the proceedings to read the declaration of Mr. Travers to find out whether these men were still on the list given by him as shareholders on the 27th of November. If he had, he would have found their names still there, and then surely if he had so learned, he would have taken some steps to prosecute the man who had perjured himself in making that declaration. If the minister had only taken the trouble to read the papers put before him by Mr. McCarthy, the papers on which alone he granted the certificate, he would have found that the applicant was a perjurer, and he would surely have been justified in refusing to give to a perjurer a certificate to do business, and all this calamity, and all this loss and suffering which has been entailed on many people of this country, would have been saved; but all this exists to-day because the minister declined to take the trouble to read these papers, or if he did read them, declined to convey the information to the Treasury Board. On the 27th this declaration was made, and it would seem that Mr. Travers came post haste to Ottawa, and apparently a little deputation with him, and if we are to believe what was said by the hon. member for North Toronto, he was here on the 30th of November. Now it is a peculiar thing that the depositors' money had been paid into the Bank of Montreal about a month before. On the 23rd of October the money was paid into the Bank of Montreal, then suddenly on the 30th of November, when the minister was up to his eyes with his budget speech, Mr. Travers and his friends came down here, though it has been said that they had been here for two or three days already; at all events, on the 30th of November, when there was still plenty of time—the certificate did not require to issue until the 18th of January—on the 30th of November there was such urgency that this certificate should be issued, that that very day the minister, in his bustle, and hurry, and excitement, writes to Mr. Travers, and let us see what the minister wrote on the 30th of November to Mr. Travers:

Dear Sir,—I regret that owing to pressing engagements yesterday, arising out of the budget, I was unable to meet you to consider your application for the issue of a certificate to authorize the Farmers' Bank of Canada to commence business. I shall be glad to see you to-day, at my office, at any time before one o'clock, if you can call. Or I might be able to see you later, between 4 and 5, at the House of Commons, if that will be more convenient.

There is a phase of the matter which I should like to bring to your notice so that you may consider it at once.

'A phase of the matter,' only that and nothing more.

It has been represented to us that in some previous instances where an application was in all respects apparently regular, there was actually an evasion of the intention of the Bank Act in relation to the paid-up capital. We have been told that in some case the subscribers did not actually pay in cash, but gave notes to the provisional directors which were used to raise the money. On account of information of this kind, which has reached us in relation to a previous case, we deem it proper to scan very closely every application for a certificate which comes to us. I shall be glad to have an assurance that nothing of the kind has taken place in relation to the subscriptions for the Farmers' Bank, but that the amounts set forth in the application as having been paid up, have in every case been bona fide cash payments.

Now is it conceivable that, unless there is something which we do not know, which is not before the House, and which we would like to investigate, is it conceivable that after receiving such an extraordinary endorsement of a writ from Mr. McCarthy, that when Mr. Travers was applying for his certificate, when he had put in his declaration, the minister fails to read the declaration for fear he might find the list of shareholders which would show the declaration was false, he writes to Mr. Travers and he is so afraid of this financial magnate, that he actually fails to refer to any charges made against his bank, and in the most timid way intimates—what? He intimates that: My attention has been called to the fact that we have been fooled by these declarations before; this is not the first time we have been fooled, we are alive now, we are alert to-day, and we are determined that we will not be caught againt by a false declaration, we will check your declaration by asking you whether it is true or not. I wonder if an investigation would not be justifiable, even to find out the process of logic by which the minister thought he was going to get the truth of a statutory declaration by asking the man who made it whether it was true or not. I think the amendment might be altered so as to give the committee power to inquire into the simplicity of the Finance Minister, to inquire into the reasons of the Finance Minister for making this bargain with Mr. Travers. It is no wonder that we wonder at his capacity for making bargains. But that is not all. This letter was written to Mr. Travers asking him for an answer, and as the member for North Toronto pointed out, the Finance Minister did not even get what he asks for. He was apparently assiduous in his care to ask a question that would be easy for Mr. Travers to answer, and Mr. Travers did not even answer that question. Now the minister ventures to intimate that in the case of the Farmers' Bank of Canada the provisional directors did not raise the money in the way mentioned by you. That is the kind of close, rigorous cross-examination and checking of the affidavit that the Finance Minister enters upon; he decides that the certificate must be given and so it was given. We have really nothing to do with the Finance Minister in this case except that he is chairman of the Treasury Board and except in so far as the correspondence shows that he acted. Our charge is not against the Finance Minister; we want to investigate what took place before the Treasury Board. What has been said by the Finance Minister?—It's not fair to say that the Treasury Board knew anything about the charge which was made.

An hon. MEMBER. He took the responsibility.

Mr. NORTHRUP. It is all very well for the Finance Minister to say that he took the responsibility. He might do that had the statute put it in his power, but the statute says that the Treasury Board shall do so and so. When the statute says the Treasury Board that does not mean the Finance Minister, and when it says the Finance Minister that does not mean the Treasury Board. So, we have first the Finance Minister deliberately shutting his eyes to all the information given him, then we have him writing Travers not saying a word to him about this case, but referring to some suppositious case in days gone by, we have been calling attention to the fact that he had been deceived by declarations heretofore, he asks a question which is not answered, and then runs off to the Treasury Board. He does not even know where he met them, he could not tell whether he met them in his office, or in the council chamber, or where it was, but in some way he met these worthy gentlemen and the Treasury Board agreed to issue this certificate. One would have thought that the Minister of Finance would have been anxious about that certificate. Not he. The very next day he found a letter from Sir Edward Clouston, president of the Bank of Montreal and head of the Bankers' Association, and Sir Edward Clouston puts his case very clearly. Surely a man in the position occupied by Sir Edward Clouston is entitled to a little consideration and respect when he makes a serious charge.

Mr. NORTHRUP.

Canadian Bankers' Association, incorporated 1900.

Montreal, November 30, 1906.

T. C. Boville, Esq.,
Deputy Minister of Finance,
Ottawa.

Farmers' Bank of Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—In connection with the application of the Farmers' Bank of Canada for the usual certificate from the Treasury Board, I have reason to believe that the money lodged, or to be lodged, at Ottawa as stock subscriptions, cannot be regarded as paid-up capital, and that a large proportion of the amount necessary to the obtaining of a certificate is a loan made upon the promise of its payment when returned by your department.

That surely is a specific enough charge.

Permit me to request that, if only for the protection of the public——

Like myself, he has a feeling for the unfortunate depositors.

—the Treasury Board will exercise its right to refuse to issue a certificate if it thinks best so to do, until a thorough investigation has been made into the circumstances stated herein.

When the Finance Minister received that letter, as my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) pointed out, what in the world was there to prevent him from stopping the payment of the $245,000 cheque and demanding back that certificate which had been obtained by fraud? If the general manager had refused to give it back, clearly there are courts of law in the land. He could not possibly be allowed to keep it under such circumstances, and, having obtained this certificate by fraud and perjury, it is not to be imagined that the courts were powerless to cancel the certificate. The Minister of Finance and the Treasury Board had ample knowledge from Sir Edward Clouston that the whole institution was a fraud, that they were not entitled to the certificate, and that therefore the certificate which the Treasury Board wilfully and knowingly gave was a certificate that was not justified by the law of the land. Now, the case would seem to be so reasonably clear so far that an investigation is a small matter. The fatuity with which the Minister of Finance seemed to have followed all the directions of this man Travers is most remarkable. It was not very long after that that the minister received a letter from a very honest young man. At page 29 of the Return we find the following letter addressed to the Deputy Finance Minister:

The Farmers' Bank of Canada,
Milton, April 7, 1907.

T. C. Boville, Esq.,
Deputy Minister of Finance,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—Will you kindly give me your opinion as to the following: Our general manager sends to the different branches lists of notes given in payment of our capital stock. These notes he makes the managers put through as discounts, crediting the amount to H.O. This is figured in the government return as paid-up capital and circulation issued to that amount. If I read the Bank Act correctly, section 76, he is asking us to do what is not right. As I do not wish to do anything contrary to the law I should be much obliged if you give me the ruling on it. With many apologies for troubling you.

G. VANKOUGHNET,
Manager.

That is written on April 17th and gives such a shock to the department that it is two weeks before they recover. On May 1, a reply is sent to Mr. Vankoughnet as follows:

Finance Department,
Ottawa, May 1, 1907,

G. Vankoughnet, Esq.,
68 Howard avenue, Toronto.

Dear Sir,—I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 17th ultimo.

I must apoligize for the delay in replying. Parliamentary business at this time in the session takes precedence over other duties.

While it is not deemed expedient to enter into correspondence at this stage, the matter referred to by you is of sufficient importance to warrant further inquiry. This will shortly be made. I should like to have a copy of any of the notes.

T. C. BOVILLE,
Deputy Minister of Finance.

Well, he gets his copy. That was written on May 1, and the manager, unlike the department, answered promptly on May 3:

Farmers' Bank of Canada,
Milton, May 3, 1907.

T. C. Boville, Esq.,
Deputy Minister of Finance,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—I have received your letter of 1st instant and inclose as requested one of the notes which I referred to in my letter to you of 17th ult.; when we renewed these notes we dated them 2nd Jany., '07, or later, and made them payable at this office.

The amount under discount at this office 30th April was about $111,885.

G. VANKOUGHNET.

I looked all through the book carefully trying to find any further comments, but that note seems to have been a crusher. Apparently there is no further correspondence between Mr. Vankoughnet and Mr. Boville or the Minister of Finance. But we have the fact then that on the 3rd May that letter was written and received on the 4th May giving the minister this information. The letter of Mr. Vankoughnet told about notes being discounted at his office by the manager and the proceeds credited to the head office and he wanted to know whether this was in accordance with the law of the land. He stated that the amount under discount in his office was $111,885. In that one little office in Milton the Finance Minister knew that on the 4th May, 1907, there were $111,885 in discounts of note which had been given for the capital stock. Now, in the meantime not only had Mr. McCarthy questioned it, but Mr. Knight had been very busy. Some demands have been made and so the department is screwed up to the point of venturing to ask for another Return from their friend Travers, and they got it. We have it here on page 35 of this Return. There the minister is told that:

The portion of the $375,473 paid-up capital of the bank, as per Return of March 30, 1907, represented by promissory notes of the shareholders, held by the bank, amounts to $59,110.

That is the sworn declaration of the general manager. On the 10th May there was received by the Minister of Finance the sworn declaration of W. R. Travers that the total amount of these notes held by the bank was $59,000, while the minister had under his thumb the letter from Mr. Vankoughnet, the manager at Milton, saying: 'I have in my branch notes under discount to $111,885, my conscience smites me and I appeal to you as Minister of Finance to let me know if I am doing what is wrong.' How can this House account for the fact that away back in May, 1907, the Minister of Finance had it proved up to the hilt by documents in his own possession that Travers had perjured himself again? Where was the difficulty in bringing this bank to its senses? What possible use could there be in getting bank returns month after month from a man who already had committed, deliberate, wilful, ridiculous perjury? The Minister of Finance does not come before the House and say: I laid that before the Treasury Board, I was over-ridden, they would not listen to me, but he comes here and says: I take all the responsibility. Does he appreciate the responsibility to the widows and orphans of this country who have suffered because of the actions of two classes of men—those who have robbed the people and are now represented in the penitentiary, and those who have failed in their duty to enforce the law of the land—and who have refused to take a single step to save the shareholders and the depositors?

Surely if ever there was a case which would justify investigation it is this, and if ever there was a man who would hail with joy the opportunity of investigation it is the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance must not forget that if in the face of this extraordinary evidence showing the knowledge brought home to him again and again and again and refusal on his part to act, he calls his supporters in and votes down an amendment asking for investigation into the circumstances which led to the issue of this charter, he may not be surprised if strong comments are made in the country and perhaps very great injustice done to himself. There may be a perfectly honest explanation of all this, and I do not say there is not, but I do say that if the Minister of Finance refuses to give men an opportunity to believe the simple, innocent, plain, convincing facts, he cannot be surprised if people draw their own conclusions which perhaps would not be gratifying or complimentary to him. Now, Sir, the last speaker (Mr. Miller) said that the Treasury Board had to give the certificate, and that the very best guarantee that all was well was the presence of the $250,000 deposit. Imagine a man, in the face of what has taken place saying that that is any guarantee. What are you to think of that for logic? Why should this House be compelled to waste time listening to a man who in the face of what has taken place in regard to the Farmers' Bank would deliberately tell this House in the year 1911 that the best guarantee that could be had was the presence of this $250,000. I think, Sir, that the Treasury Board would be bound to grant a certificate to the bank if after making all due inquiries they were satisfied the provisions of the Act had been complied with, but they made no inquiry in this case and they simply wrote a letter to the Justice Department in which they invited just the answer they got. Why they should have gone to the Justice Department at all I do not know; perhaps it is because they always do. An the question submitted to the Justice Department was a peculiar one. Again and again attention had been called to the fact that there was something rotten in the state of Denmark and instead of looking into the actual facts, on the 28th of November a letter was written to the Deputy Minister of Justice which reads:

E. L. Newcombe, K.C.,
Deputy Minister of Justice.

Dear Sir,—I beg to inclose herewith a file of papers, being an application from the Farmers' Bank of Canada for a certificate to commence business under sections 13-17 of the Bank Act. Kindly advise me if on the papers submitted such a certificate may immediately issue.

Here is the Department of Finance appealing to its own solicitor as plain as words can: For Heaven's sake can we give the certificate; say so if you can. And Mr. Newcombe who is an astute lawyer gave them back the letter they desired and it was to this effect:

Ottawa, Nov. 28, 1906.

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 28th inst. and of the inclosed papers, being the application from the Farmers' Bank of Canada for a certificate to commence business under sections 13-17 of the Bank Act, and papers in support thereof.

You ask me to advise you if on the papers submitted such certificate may legally issue.

He is very careful to repeat their question; he takes no responsibility.

In reply, I beg to state that the statements in the statutory declaration of Mr. Walter R. Travers are sufficient, if they are accepted, to show compliance with the statutory provisions, and that the evidence thus afforded is such as the Treasury Board may lawfully accept under the Act, and thereupon issue to the bank a certificate under section 14 of the Act. Papers returned herewith.

E. L. NEWCOMBE,
Deputy Minister of Justice.

Mr. FOSTER. The opinion was given on the same day as the request for it.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Given the same day, November 28. If it were an ordinary case would not any one say that the client had appealed to his solicitor to get just the opinion that was wanted, and that the solicitor gave the opinion that suited them and still kept his own skirts clear because he is careful to say that the declarations of Travers were sufficient 'if they are accepted.' Now why did the Deputy Minister of Justice say to the Finance Minister: 'if you accept these statements.' And even if the Minister of Finance had not been suspicious before was not that sufficient to put him on his guard when a keen, shrewd lawyer like the Deputy Minister of Justice uses such an expression as that. But, the Minister of Finance is perfectly satisfied and at once hies himself forth to get a certificate for Mr. Travers. I do not propose to go into the question which has been discussed so ably by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) but I may say that there were a couple of subsequent suspicious incidents; one in connection with this transaction in New York city when it must have been perfectly evident to the Minister of Finance through the Finance Department that the Farmers' Bank had become a perfect swindle. I can quite understand that directly under the Banking Act there was nothing which allowed the government—inasmuch as there is not an official inspection—to step into the Farmers' Bank and take hold of the business merely because they found them hawking $150,000 deposit receipts around New York and unable to get a bidder, and when they found the manager going over to Syracuse with $150,000 in bills in his pocket to try and buy out an insolvent company. With these facts to their knowledge it is quite true they had no more power to step in under the Banking Act and take possession of the bank than they would have to step into the bank of Montreal. But, they had all the power they needed, and under the circumstances all they had to do was to recognize they had blundered innocently or intentionally in issuing a certificate that never should have been issued. They have perjured declarations received from the general manager of the Farmers' Bank and it would not have taken long to obtain authority to close up the bank when the general manager was liable to be put behind the bars of Kingston penitentiary for a perjured declaration which was in possession of the government. In view of that perjured declaration they had the power to ask for a statement from the bank at any time, and they had learned enough to know that Travers could not possibly put in a true statement of the affairs of the bank without disclosing enough to close its doors. Surely the Minister of Finance will recognize that the longer such an institution was allowed to carry on business the worse it would be for the unfortunate victims throughout the country. Hundreds of people would have escaped if action were taken in May, 1907, only a few months after the banks' doors were opened, when the Minister of Finance had letters from a bank manager that he was compelled to have under discount $111,885 apparently notes given for stock unpaid, and the manager a few days afterwards swore the total amount of such notes was $58,000. Surely in view of this we have a right to ask why it is that this hypnotic influence was exercised by Travers over the Minister of Finance, and why should we not have an investigation to enable the House and the Finance Minister to understand how such an influence was acquired over him in order that he may avoid being subjected to any such unhappy and unhallowed influence in days to come.

Mr. T. W. CROTHERS (West Elgin). Although the facts available have been fully laid before the House by gentlemen on this side, yet, as many people who live in the constituency I have the honour to represent have been very heavy losers in connection with this bank, I desire to say a few words before the debate is closed. In view of the evidence we have heard to-day the action of the Treasury Board in issuing a certificate to this bank on November 30, 1906, establishes beyond any peradventure that we have not a complete record of the evidence before this House. The evidence we have cannot and does not explain the action of the Treasury Board. There is evidence either of record or of an oral character that has been witheld from this House, of that I have no manner of doubt whatever, and the people of this country have the right to know all the facts, in order to secure which a Royal Commission ought to be issued. The Treasury Board who are made the guardians of the public interest in such a matter as this, is composed of the Minister of Finance and five other members of the cabinet, and as we have been informed that this matter was considered when only three members of the Treasury Board was present it is perfectly clear that there not being a quorum or a majority of the members of the Treasury Board present the issuing of this certificate was illegal.

Nothing less than a majority of the six members of the board could have legally issued a certificate to this bank authorizing it to do business. We have been told that there were present on that occasion Sir Richard Cartwright, the Minister of Marine (Mr. Brodeur) and the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding). Well, I do not believe that Sir Richard Cartwright had his attention called to the facts, or he would certainly not have consented to the issuing of this certificate. Parliament has provided that the Treasury Board should protect the public by seeing that the provisions of the Banking Act are complied with before a certificate is given to authorize a body of men to open branches in every city, town and village in the Dominion and secure from a confiding and innocent people millions of dollars. Why it seems to me that if the Minister of Finance had received no warning whatever, it would still have been his duty to have got some evidence corroborating that given by the manager of the bank. You will remember that the manager is not a portion of the body proper of a bank as is the president or vice-president. He is simply a general manager, an official, employed by the directors. His was the only evidence before the Finance Minister with regard to this matter. Now, it is only since a few years that any one was allowed to give evidence, who is interested in the matter under investigation, because it was considered that his personal interest would so affect his evidence as to make it unacceptable. It is only since a few years a man who is interested in the result is a competent witness in a court of justice. I find in the Dominion Lands Act a section providing that a patent shall not issue to a man for 160 acres of land in the remotest corner of British Columbia on his own uncorroborated affidavit. He is required to have his statement corroborated by two of his neighbours under oath. Section 126 of the Dominion Lands Act provides as follows:

Proof of residence or cultivation, required by the three last preceding sections of this Act, and of the erection of a habitable house, shall be made by the claimant by affidavit, and shall be corroborated by the evidence on oath of two disinterested witnesses resident in the vicinity of the land to which their evidence relates, and shall be subject to acceptance by the Commissioner of Dominion Lands or the Dominion Lands Board; and such affidavit shall be sworn, and such evidence given, before the local agent, or his senior assistant, or before some other person named for that purpose by the minister.

So that this parliament has determined that it is not safe to issue a patent for a piece of land worth $500 on the uncorroborated testimony of the applicant, but requires the corroboration under oath of two disinterested people. These witnesses must appear before the agent of this government and give evidence under oath before this government will issue the patent on a piece of land worth $500. So that I say when a man comes before the Treasury Board asking for a certificate to enable him to open the door of his bank and issue notes and receive deposits dealing with millions of money placed in his care by people who believed that the solvency and standing of that bank is vouched for by this government, the Treasury Board should have evidence of some disinterested people, of some one other than the bank manager, before granting this certificate. People have been led to believe that the government looks after the honesty of the banks, and when they hear that this government has authorized a bank to do business in any part of this country, they have the idea that it is backed up by the government. The government, therefore, ought to see that those applying for a certificate have taken the steps provided by the Act in an honest and straightforward manner before giving them a certificate and authorizing them to open their doors.

But here we have a bank which had its charter over two and a half years before it was in a position to ask for a certificate. It had to get an extension of time, but even after the two and a half years it was unable to get the necessary amount paid in or make any show that it had got it. In reality it had not got it when the certificate was issued. That of itself should have been sufficient to put the Finance Minister on his guard, because he frankly told us he was not in favour of extending the time when these people made their last application. Still the time was extended, and I am unable to endorse the opinion expressed by the Finance Minister when he says the government has no responsibilities in the matter when a Bill of this kind is passed in the House. The people have the idea that the government is responsible for all legislation passed by this parliament and so it is. I submit that the government are unable to shirk that responsibility. We find the Prime Minister able to carry through any measure he desires, or defeat any measure to which he is opposed by simply holding up his finger; and if the Minister of Finance felt that a charter should not have been issued to this company, it was his duty to exert his whole influence to prevent its being granted. It was granted, however, and then came the application by Travers in the month of November, 1906, for a certificate. I need not go over what has been so clearly set forth by hon. members on this side. The Minister of Finance had in his possession a copy of the writ issued, or about to be issued by a reputable member of this House at that time and a distinguished lawyer in Toronto, alleging serious charges of fraud in connection with this transaction. Not merely one but eight or ten charges of fraud were before him. The minister told us this afternoon that he never read those charges, he knew that there were charges of fraud made against the institution, but he did not even read them. He consented to the issuing of this certificate enabling these men to deal with millions of public money, and he did this without having read the charges set forth in the writ.

Then the Minister of Finance gives as a reason for not considering these charges of fraud the fact that the solicitor acting for the plaintiffs told him that his clients had been satisfied and that, so far as he was personally concerned. he desired to withdraw any objections to the issuing of the certificate.

The correspondence shows that the Finance Minister at that time thought that that was the only thing which stood in the way. And here was a solicitor in Toronto, acting for eleven of the shareholders, objecting to the issuance of this certificate; and if he withdrew his objection, then all objections were withdrawn, and the Finance Minister had a perfect right to issue the certificate, utterly regardless, apparently, of the interests of the general public who might make deposits in this bank as soon as its doors were opened or might subscribe for its stock. This was not a private matter; it was a matter in which the whole public were interested. A man steals a horse; the Crown Attorney is notified; the man who lost the horse comes back two or three days afterwards and says: The man who stole the horse has paid me, and I have no further interest in the matter; and the Crown Attorney lets the matter drop. There is the case of the Finance Minister—as if the public were not interested in the fraud committed in this case, as if nobody were interested but the solicitor who had brought the action.

Well, there must be something back of this, something that we have not heard yet. I cannot imagine the Finance Minister writing the letter to Travers that he did write on the 30th of November unless there was something back of it. We have been told —I do not remember whether in this House or outside of it—that the person who was chief whip in the Liberal party in this House at that time introduced Travers to the Finance Minister. It has been established that, shortly afterwards, that chief whip made a loan from this bank—stated by some to amount to $5,000, but, I believe, stated by himself at $3,000, and that loan was charged up to commissions. Something occurred we have not learned yet. The Finance Minister never would have acted as he did upon the facts we have and no more; there are other facts we have not got yet. The people of this country have a right to know the whole of these facts, and the only way for the people to secure the whole of the evidence is by the appointment of an honest and capable Royal Commission to investigate the whole case. There is nothing like publicity in these matters. Look at this letter of the 30th of November. You will remember that the Finance Minister, prior to that, had received from Mr. McCarthy this writ charging five or six—yes, eight or ten—different frauds in connection with the organization of this bank. And this is the letter the Finance Minister writes to Travers:

I regret that owing to pressing engagements yesterday, arising out of the Budget, I was unable to meet you to consider your application for the issue of a certificate to authorize the Farmers' Bank of Canada to commence business. I shall be glad to see you to-day, at my office, at any time before one o'clock if you can call. Or I might be able to see you later, between four and five, at the House of Commons, if that will be more convenient.

There is a phase of the matter which I should like to bring to your notice so that you may consider it at once. It has been represented to us that in some previous instances where an application was in all respects apparently regular, there was actually an evasion of the intention of the Bank Act in relation to the paid-up capital.

Notice the kid glove here. 'It has been represented to us that in some previous instances——' It was not 'represented to us in some previous instances'; it was 'represented to us' that, in this instance, you have been guilty of fraud and very serious fraud. Why does not the Minister of Finance say to Travers: You have been charged with fraud by a responsible member of the House of Commons. What have you to say about it? Here is the writ that has been issued against you; here are the several frauds that have been charged against you; what do you say to this one? What do you say to that one? What do you say to the other one? Mr. Speaker, there is no question about it, he had received Mr. McCarthy's letter and a copy of the writ in October, sometime about the 10th if I remember well. And this letter which I am quoting was written on the 30th of November.

It has been represented to us in some previous instances——

'Previous instances!' With all these charges before him, not in 'previous instances' but in this instance. Why did he deal so tenderly and carefully with the manager of the Farmers' Bank? Why is he withholding the facts that these charges have been made in connection with this very transaction?

—where an application was in all respects apparently regular, there was actually an evasion of the intention of the Bank Act in relation to the paid-up capital. We have been told that in some cases——

Some other cases, away up in the moon somewhere.

—the subscribers did not actually pay in cash, but gave notes to the provisional directors which were used to raise the money. On account of information of this kind, which has reached us in relation to a previous case——

How anxious he is to impress upon Mr. Travers' mind, apparently, that he had received no charge of fraud against him in this particular case, but some previous case, away back. Why was that?

—we deem it proper to scan very closely every application for a certificate which comes to us. I shall be glad to have an assurance that nothing of the kind has taken place in relation to the subscriptions for the Farmers' Bank, but that the amounts set forth in the application as having been paid up have in every case been bona fide cash payments.

And then, in order to have a record of Travers' answer, he has Mr. Travers write him a letter back the very same day:

In reply to your letter of the 30th of November, I have to say that in the case of the Farmers' Bank of Canada the provisional directors did not raise the money in the way mentioned by you. You will find the statement put in by me absolutely correct as to the amount of stock subscribed and the amount paid up.

I think the Minister of Finance told us this afternoon that he wrote that letter himself and left it in his office for Travers to sign——

Mr. FIELDING. There is not a shadow of foundation for that statement.

Mr. CROTHERS. I am mistaken, am I?

Mr. FIELDING. No, the hon. gentleman is not mistaken.

Mr. CROTHERS. I understood you to say that you had written this and left it in your office——

Mr. FIELDING. Written what?

Mr. CROTHERS. This letter—for Travers to sign.

Mr. FIELDING. I never made any such statement, nor did I say anything that would lead or give any intelligent person reason for imagining that I had said so.

Mr. CROTHERS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the Finance Minister for the compliment he has paid me; but I think I have a little intelligence, and I do not think he is a better judge of intelligence than a good many other people.

Mr. FIELDING. It is a very extraordinary statement for the hon. gentleman to make.

Mr. CROTHERS. Not an extraordinary statement at all, I submit; it is what I understood the hon. gentleman to say. He did say something about writing a letter—

Mr. FIELDING. If the hon. gentleman will permit me, I said nothing about writing a letter for Mr. Travers to sign. I wrote a letter to Mr. Travers and signed it. I state that he is mistaken—I said nothing about the other letter.

Mr. CROTHERS. Didn't you say you discussed the substance of the letter——

Mr. FIELDING. I discussed the matter with Mr. Travers.

Mr. CROTHERS. The character of the letter you desired him to send?

Mr. FIELDING. No, I did not say anything of the sort. I said I had addressed him a letter and would await his reply.

Mr. CROTHERS. And you got this reply?

Mr. FIELDING. Very well.

Mr. CROTHERS. Now, we have a letter from Mr. Boville, of December 3, in which he says:

> For the purpose of record, Mr. Fielding wrote Mr. Travers a letter, of which I inclose a copy, asking for the assurance that the amounts set forth in the application as having been paid in were in every case bona fide cash payments. I inclose a copy of Mr. Travers' reply.

It seems from Mr. Boville's letter that the Finance Minister was very anxious to have something in writing from Travers to have it on record so that he could show it at some future time if necessary. He not only desired to have that on record, but he desired also, apparently, to have on record an opinion from the Department of Justice whether or not he could legally issue the certificate on the evidence that he had before him. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that any child of ten years would have known that it was competent for the Finance Minister, as a matter of law, to issue the certificate on the evidence he had before him: it was wholly a question of discretion as to whether he should be satisfied with the evidence. And I submit to you that, he having written that letter, I may question the magnitude of the Finance Minister's intelligence just as sincerely as he questioned mine.

Now, with all these warnings, does he ask anybody else for any corroborative evidence? None whatever,—simply calls in Mr. Travers and accepts his uncorroborated statement with reference to matters involving millions of dollars. Did you ever hear of a Crown attorney or a judge before whom a charge was made against a man of stealing or of having committed a fraud sending for the man and saying: I have been told that a man about your size—I have no reference to you now, but in some other case a man stole a horse under certain circumstances, and John Brown lost a horse the other night, and I would like to know what you have to say about it? And the man replies: I did not steal the horse. And the judge says: Very well, let us have that in writing so that we may have it on record. That would be just as sensible as the very intelligent action of the Minister of Finance.

The Minister of Finance, the Treasury Board, do not seem to have realized their position at all—do not seem to have realized the responsibility resting on them to protect the public, as suggested by the president of the Bankers' Association. There is some reason for the issue of this certificate which has not yet been made known. If the Minister of Finance had acted as a man of ordinary intelligence under the circumstances—I am speaking guardedly, Mr. Speaker—I submit that where a man comes before the Minister of Finance asking for power to open the bank, asking to be placed in a position where he can fleece the public of millions of dollars, where the Minister of Finance has been told that this man has already committed many frauds, I say a man of ordinary common sense and intelligence, acting in the interests of the people, would have insisted upon evidence other than that of the man who is making the application himself. I must give the Finance Minister credit for the fact, as he states it, that he did not receive the letter from the president of the Bankers' Association until the day after this certificate was issued. I have no doubt that the Treasury Board, authorized to issue a certificate, had the inherent power to cancel that certificate, if they were satisfied afterwards that it was unwarrantedly issued. We have no evidence that the Minister of Finance took the slightest notice of the warnings that he received from the president of the Bankers' Association the day after.

Mr. LENNOX. Did he take the advice of the Department of Justice then?

Mr. CROTHERS. I am not aware whether he did or not. It is not on record, and we have nothing here to-day except that which is on record, and there is a great deal that is not on record. Now, I have no hesitation in making the charge, I believe the people of this country will make the charge, that the losses that the depositors and shareholders of the Farmers' Bank have sustained are morally owing to the culpable negligence, the criminal negligence, of the Treasury Board. They made a mistake, to say the least of it; certainly they failed to exercise that common sense and that intelligence that any man would who had in his heart the best interests of the people of this country. And having got further evidence, he would have refused to authorize these people to open their doors and be in a position to bleed the public to the extent of millions of dollars. I believe, therefore, it is the duty of parliament to do something for these people. I do not know, I am not prepared to say, that they would have a legal claim against the Crown, because the Crown is supposed to do no wrong, by a monstrous fiction. But these people, having suffered this immense loss by reason of the negligence of the Treasury Board of this government, this government is morally responsible for the losses they have sustained, having taken the course they did.

The Finance Minister says that Mr. Travers came to them as a man that they did not know anything against. Well, that was simply a negative quality, we do not generally trust a man in large transactions of whom we know nothing. This man was charged with a dozen frauds of a very serious character, which may possibly involve millions of dollars. We do not know the man at all, and we accept the word of this man in the face of these charges, and send him out authorized to rob the people of this country as he has done. Now, Sir, I submit that the people of this country, especially those who are interested in the Farmers' Bank, especially the depositors and shareholders, desire to know all the facts in connection with this matter. They are perfectly satisfied that we have not got all the facts this afternoon. The conduct of the government cannot be explained on the facts we have, but their conduct may be explained on other facts. Who introduced this man to the Finance Minister? We have it stated that the chief whip of the Liberal party at that time did so; I think that is not denied.

Mr. FIELDING. I do not recollect whether it was or not. But why should not anybody introduce him? There was an article to that effect in a Toronto paper, it may be quite correct. I do not know.

Mr. CROTHERS. We would like to know, the public would like to know, they have a right to know, all the facts in connection with this matter, what it was that influenced the Treasury Board to issue a certificate under these very suspicious circumstances without making any inquiry whatever to corroborate the statement made by the gentleman who is making the application. As I said a few moments ago, the issue of the certificate I believe to have been illegal. There was no quorum of the Treasury Board qualified to issue a certicate. Of the capital stock of $500,000, $250,000 not having been paid in cash by the subscribers, they were not legally qualified to do business. There is a case which I think establishes that fact, the case of Cass against the Ottawa Agricultural Insurance Company and others, reported in volume 22, Grant's Chancery Reports, where it is held that where a company was required by statute, to raise $50,000 before beginning business to be paid in by those who have subscribed to the stock, and where they borrowed a large portion of that money to make up the $50,000, they were not legally authorized to do business. That is the case here. Those who subscribed for this stock did not put up the $250,000. One can understand why the statute requires subscribers to pay the cash. A later section of the Act provides for double liability in case of insolvency; it therefore becomes important that the shareholders should be men of substance, and hence it is required that they should put up the cash, not simply to give their promissory notes. The most superficial investigation on the part of the Finance Minister would have disclosed that the subscribers had not put up the $250,000, and therefore they were not entitled to the certificate. If the Finance Minister had taken the reasonable course, and had found they had been guilty of fraud in the inception of this institution he probably would have said to them: I shall have nothing more to do with you. It has been shown that you are capable of an attempt to defraud the public, and so far as I am concerned you will never be authorized to open a bank anywhere in the Dominion of Canada.

I take much pleasure in supporting this resolution. I believe the people require a thorough investigation, and I submit that this House should not surrender its right to investigate a matter of this kind because it is in the police court of Toronto or in the hands of a curator there. It is the duty of this parliament to investigate a matter where the officials of this parliament, the Treasury Board which is composed of six members of the cabinet, have shown themselves guilty of negligence in not taking a reasonable course to satisfy themselves that there was no fraud in the matter. If they had taken that course no certificate would have been issued, and thousands of people who have suffered seriously would have been spared. I, therefore, submit that a Royal Commission should issue that we may get all the facts, no matter who is hit or who is hurt.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not intend to occupy much time, because the subject which is engaging the attention of the House has been very thoroughly debated. This is one of the most disastrous bank failures that has ever occurred in Canada. Looking at the statement of the curator one sees that the liabilities of the bank amount to nearly $2,000,000, and looking at his statement of the assets there will be apparently a shortage of $1,250,000 to $1,500,000. The capital stock is gone, and it is doubtful whether the ordinary creditors will receive anything at all, and in any case they are not likely to receive more than a small percentage of their claims. The failure has occasioned widespread distress not only throughout the province of Ontario, but elsewhere in this country, and in the United States. I have received a good many letters on the subject; one of them is so cogent in its terms and so well written, that I will take the liberty of reading it to this House, because it expresses in respect of one locality what has occurred in many localities in the province of Ontario, and elsewhere in this country. This is a lady writing from Lakeside post office in Ontario. She writes in this way:

I write to you on behalf of the 'Farmers' Bank.' I wrote some time ago to Mr. Laurier, also to Mr. Fielding on this subject, and both sent short but courteous replies. I read all the parliamentary discussions this year, and when the time comes for the Banking Act to be ventilated in parliament, come to the rescue and plead the cause of the poor widows and people either paying for, or renting farms, who have lost their whole savings in this bank. Some are in want who are advanced in years, while others cannot meet their payments this spring. If you were to visit Embro and heard the tales of distress, your heart, I am sure, would be touched with sympathy. Our butcher lost $2,000 in it at Lakeside, which he took out of the Imperial in Ingersoll for convenience. His sons have both been through operations this last year, and here this man is without a dollar, and his oldest son and son-in-law are on rented places lately set up and cannot meet their payments, and this, sir, is repeated wherever Travers set his trap.

Then she goes on to speak of criminal proceedings at Toronto, commenting upon them and wanting to know why they are not more effective. She proceeds as follows:

I am proud of my country, but I am ashamed of the way this affair is conducted. Now, sir, if you know any other of the members who know better than you how people are suffering, do please get them to advocate the rights of the people and pay them their hard earned money. Those who stole should be made to refund, and what the Keeley mine does not supply, should be raised by the government, and paid by May at the farthest. You know very well that the people have no way of agitating reforms of any kind but through their public men, both in church and state, and I feel that this has been a clear case of robbery, and is a case of truth and justice, to be rectified by the government, and also things should be put on such a basis that such rascalities could never occur again. You know the government helped the sufferers by the Martinique disaster, and it is quite right, but how much more should our own people, who are industrious and law abiding, be helped, who put their money in the 'Farmers' Bank' believing it to be chartered properly. How soon we should be arrested and fined heavily if we made wine and sold it without paying license to the government. A pedlar cannot travel a one-horse wagon without paying license, and why should bankers be allowed so much liberty which has often driven sufferers to the lunatic asylum or worse than all to suicide. I do hope you will do your best in this matter, and oblige thousands.

That gives an idea of the way this matter is regarded throughout the country, of the suffering which has been brought upon the people, and the question is: How has all this result been brought about? The bank obviously should not have been permitted to commence business. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance himself has admitted that. There can be no doubt at all, as my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) has pointed out, that if he had taken the ordinary business precaution of calling for the minute books of this bank, as one would suppose that any man in his senses would have done, he would have seen that the Bank Act was being violated, he would not have permitted the bank to commence business. Let us see what the real conditions were when the bank commenced business. I am not speaking of my own knowledge; I am taking it from the curator's report, at pages 6 and 7, of the Return which has been brought down. The directors had collected about $211,000 from subscribers in cash. In contravention of the law of this country, a fact that was shown by their own minute books, which were not brought here as they should have been, they paid out improperly for commissions and expenses $41,000; so that they had in actual cash not $250,000, but $170,000. They handed over that $170,000 and turned over subscribers' notes to W. R. Travers, who borrowed on these notes $80,000, which amount, with the $170,000, made up the $250,000 which he deposited with the Receiver General. Travers then handed back the $80,000 which he had borrowed, and thus the bank's capital, after the deduction of the $80,000, did not amount to the sum required by law. Further than that, the actual amount of capital, $211,000 which had been collected by the directors, was further diminished to the extent of $41,000 which it had been improperly paid out. How was it possible under such conditions that the Treasury Board permitted this bank to commence business? Had the Treasury Board any notice that these unlawful acts were being perpetrated? They had the most direct and positive notice, I affirm, in the presence of the Minister of Finance, and I will prove that the notice of the frauds was never from first to last withdrawn.

Mention has been made of the oral notice given to the Minister of Finance by my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson), I can only say with regard to that, without the slightest disrespect to the Minister of Finance, without any desire to impugn his sincerity, that where you have two men, one of whom deposes to a positive and direct recollection of a particular incident, and the other of whom says he has no recollection of that incident and does not believe that it ever took place, according to well recognized rules which prevail in courts of justice, assuming that both of these men are sincere in their statements, credit must be given to the man who has a positive and direct recollection and credit will not be given to the man who simply says that he has no recollection.

Mr. FIELDING. I think that my hon. friend hardly states the case fairly. I did not state that I had no recollection; what I did state was that I had had conversations with the hon. member for Halton, but that the nature of these conversations was not as he had stated it to be. I did not say that I had no recollection.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). All I have to say to the Minister of Finance is that if he will grant this Royal Commission another hon. member of this House will be produced and will depose on oath, as he has informed me, that he gave the same kind of notice.

Mr. FIELDING. Why cannot the hon. member say so here?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Because he is not in this country, or in this House at the present time, but he told me before he left the country that he gave the Minister of Finance exactly the same kind of notice which my hon. friend from Halton gave to the minister.

Mr. FIELDING. Will my hon. friend give the name?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I will give the name; Mr. E. B. Osler was the man who so informed me.

Mr. FIELDING. I am quite satisfied that Mr. Osler will not confirm that statement. I think my hon. friend has misunderstood Mr. Osler, and I am quite sure that Mr. Osler will hardly make the statement in the terms that my hon. friend has stated it.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am perfectly aware that it is possible to misunderstand a gentleman who makes a communication. I do not think I misunderstood Mr. Osler with regard to the matter because the communication was made not in my presence alone, but in the presence of other gentlemen who understood Mr. Osler in that regard in exactly the same way as I understood him. There are gentlemen sitting in this House within the sound of my voice who heard Mr. Osler make that statement when I heard him make it before he went away.

Mr. FOSTER. Give us your commission and we will produce the man.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Further than that I have heard of other reputable men also who, before this certificate was issued, gave the Finance Minister the same kind of warning. There are also rumours throughout the country—I do not know whether they are correct or not—that this matter so impressed itself upon certain officials in his department that they made a rather strong protest against the certificate being granted under the circumstances in which it was granted.

Mr. FIELDING. I can assure my hon. friend that that is unfounded.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Well, I accept the minister's statement at once. I only mention it because it came to me in a way that seemed to give some appearance of credibility. But, we need not debate these things. There was the letter of Mr. Leighton McCarthy, there was the writ, and the endorsement upon the writ itself which, in the plainest and most unmistakable terms, conveyed a warning to the Minister of Finance in this regard. Perhaps sufficient emphasis has not been laid upon one particular paragraph of Mr. McCarthy's letter of the 19th of October, 1906, three days before the writ was issued. He stated the writ would shortly be issued, and three days afterwards on the 22nd of October, it was issued, and in his letter he says:

I have received information that the alleged subscribers for shares paid a large sum of money in cash and have signed notes for other large sums of money, and that the persons professing to act in the name of the bank have transferred notes and received the proceeds, and that a deposit either has been made or will be made of the cash received and the proceeds of these notes, or sufficient amount to make up $250,000.

The intimation conveyed by that to any one who is familiar with the provisions of the Bank Act is simply that these men were conspiring together to contravene and to evade the provisions of the Act which the Minister of Finance was bound to see observed. From first to last Mr. Leighton McCarthy, in the correspondence at least, has never withdrawn the statement made by him in that letter of the 19th of October, 1906. True, he did in a subsequent letter state that his clients had been settled with, but he never in any letter withdrew these statements of fact which he made to the Minister of Finance. The statements in the writ itself are so startling and convey so plain a notice to the Minister of Finance that one would think there could not be the slightest doubt in his mind as to what his plain duty would be. The first charge of fraud is this:

1. That the provisional directors who professed to act for and in the name of the bank had no lawful power or authority to receive subscriptions for shares or to accept them; and (2) that the subscriptions for shares which were procured from the plaintiffs and others were procured through fraud and misrepresentation, and the plaintiffs allege, amongst others, the following particulars of fraud, namely:

1. That the agent in procuring the subscriptions for shares falsely represented that persons had subscribed for a larger number of shares than they had in fact subscribed for, and the following are examples of such false representations.

Then he gives eight or ten cases where men had applied for small sums and had been put down for sums ten times as great, and where men who had subscribed nothing at all are put down on the stock list as actual subscribers. In all the instances so set forth in this writ, as I understand it, the names of these men are on the stock list which the Minister of Finance accepted on the sworn declaration of Travers, although comparison of the writ with the list would have given the plainest possible indication to the Minister of Finance not only of fraud in the first instance, but fraud persisted in up to and at the very time when this certificate was being asked for from the government:

That Major Thomas Beattie, represented by the prospectus to have consented to act as a director, had not subscribed for any shares, and refused to be a director, and refused to allow his name to be used in any way in connection with the bank; and the plaintiffs allege that the names of other persons were represented by the prospectus to have consented to act as directors who had not subscribed for any shares or given any authority for any such publication.

Was it not open to the Minister of Finance to write a letter to Major Beattie and ask him whether that statement was true or false? Was it not competent also for the Minister of Finance to have taken the precaution which Major Beattie took to have looked up the record of Mr. Travers a little and to ascertain whether this matter was not worthy of further investigation by him. There is a further direct charge of fraud which ought to have attracted the attention of the Minister of Finance in an especial manner:

And the plaintiffs further allege that the agents and solicitors who were procuring subscriptions for shares had not lawful power or authority to solicit or accept applications for shares or subscriptions for shares.

And the plaintiffs allege that the agents and solicitors professing to act under the name and authority of the provisional directors have procured a large number of subscriptions for shares, and have received the sum of one hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars more or less on account thereof, and have also procured promissory notes to be signed by persons who were subscribing for shares, payable to the provisional directors of the bank, and the persons acting in the name and under the professed authority of the act of incorporation and amendments thereto, are endeavouring to discount or procure a loan by the transfer of the said notes.

And the plaintiffs further allege that the persons professing to act as aforesaid under the alleged authority of the provisional directors have unlawfully deducted large sums of money for alleged services and commissions and other purposes out of the money received by them.

The plaintiffs allege that the shares and the money and the promissory notes procured from them have been procured through fraud, deceit and misrepresentation.

Finally in the concluding part of the endorsement prayer is made for:

An injunction to restrain the bank, and the provisional directors and the general manager, and their officers, servants or agents, from the publication of a notice to call a meeting of the alleged subscribers of the shares of the capital stock of the bank, and from making application to the Treasury Board for a certificate under sections 14 and 15 of the Bank Act.

The defendants in that suit under the terms of the settlement in court admitted in effect every one of the charges of fraud I have just now read.

I am not going into particulars of Sir Edward Clouston's warning just at this moment, but to be brief let me sum the whole situation in this way. The minister had the following warnings—in the first place he had the warning of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson). Again I repeat that, attributing equal sincerity to each, the testimony of one who has a distinct recollection of a particular incident which impressed itself upon his memory, is always to be accepted against that of the other party who merely affirms that according to his recollection the incident did not occur. In the second place he had the warnings of other similar witnesses who can be produced if inquiry is granted. In the third place he had the warnings of Mr. Leighton McCarthy in the three letters referred to. In the fourth place he had the warnings contained in the writ of summons, and the endorsement. I want to point out to the minister and to the House that the charges in that writ were of a two-fold nature, namely, those which concerned the plaintiff alone and those which concerned the public interest, and the duties of the Finance Minister. Among the latter were the charges that moneys had been illegally paid out by the provisional directors in contravention of the Bank Act, thus impairing the bank's capital. Even if the plaintiffs were settled with, was not that a consideration which should have been before the mind of the Minister of Finance, and which should have impelled him to call for the minute books, and for every scrap of evidence which would bear upon the conduct of the persons which had been promoting the organization of this bank. Another charge made by Mr. McCarthy, and which never has been withdrawn was: That notes of subscribers had been and were being discounted by the provisional directors in order to evade the Bank Act, and to deceive the government, and there was a further charge that fraudulent representations were being made by this man to obtain the money necessary to secure the certificate of the Treasury Board. And, although Mr. McCarthy withdrew his clients' objection to the granting of the certificate by the Treasury Board he never withdrew his statements and representations which disclosed a fraudulent attempt to evade and contravene the Bank Act. Although the suit was settled the allegations of fraud set forth in the writ were never withdrawn, but were rather confirmed by the judgment of Mr. Justice Anglin. The written warning of the Canadian Bankers' Association confirmed all previous warnings, and the Treasury Board should have instantly ordered the return of the certificate and failing compliance the government should have peremptorily ordered the issue of a Royal Commission to investigate the alleged frauds. The Treasury Board had a plain and clear duty before it. We have been asked what could the Minister of Finance do? In the first place he could have ordered the production of the minute books, he should have ordered an investigation, he should have ordered further corroborative evidence, he should not have granted that certificate after warnings which had been conveyed to him unless he was absolutely and positively assured by the evidence as to which there could be no doubt whatever that everything in connection with the Farmers' Bank had been properly done in accordance with the law, and that no fraud was intended upon the government of this country or upon the public. That is what he should have done. But, he says he was helpless when the direct and positive warning of Sir Edward Clouston came to him. I say he was far from helpless.

What should he have done? He should have sent a telegram after Travers. It is said that he sent a messenger after him, and that Travers refused to give up the certificate. That may be mere rumour; there may be nothing in it; and I do not vouch for it. But the minister should have sent a telegram after Travers ordering him to return that certificate immediately and telling him that if he failed to comply, the government would the next day issue a Royal Commission to inquire into all the circumstances attending the organization of that bank and its application to the Treasury Board for a certificate. That is what the minister could have done, but that is what he did not do; and as the direct result of his inaction and neglect, the farmers of Canada, the workingmen of this country, have suffered losses to which they should not have been subjected; the Bank Act of Canada, as to its efficiency and its operation, has received a blow such as it never received before. From one end of this country to the other people are in doubt to-day as to our banking system, seeing that under the operation of that system, under the safeguards which ought to be observed by the Finance Minister and his department, these frauds have been perpetrated. The minister had Travers' affidavit, it is true, but he had the warnings of reputable men that that affidavit did not set forth the true statement of facts. What was the course he took? He took the solemn and serious course of asking Travers in private conversation whether or not his affidavit was true or false, and he received of course the answer that the affidavit was true. He then solemnly determined that that conversation should be made a matter of record and sat down and wrote a letter to Travers and Travers wrote a letter to him, and then he handed over the certificate. Is it any wonder that the other side of the House has lapsed into silence over this transaction? I do not wonder that they no longer have the courage or hardihood to stand up and say a word in defence of the position of the government. I do not wonder that the Prime Minister left this chamber in disgust and only returned a few moments ago. I wonder whether we shall hear from him; but if we do I sincerely trust that he will give some attention to some of the serious matters which have been urged against the administration of an important department of his government in this connection.

Then, as my hon. friend from Hastings has observed, within two or three months after this bank had begun business, the Minister of Finance learned out of the mouths of officers of the bank, by direct statements under their own hand, that these notes which had been discounted for the purpose of raising part of the capital paid over to the Receiver General, were still being held at different branches of the bank. At one branch $109,000 of this paper was even then being held and that was only two months after this bank had begun business. That was confirmation, if any was necessary, of the warnings the minister had been given. It was confirmation of the warnings given by my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson), by Mr. Leighton McCarthy, by Mr. Osler and other persons, by the writ of summons and the endorsements thereon, and last but not least it was confirmation of the direct and positive warning given by the president of the Canadian Bankers' Association. What was the object and purpose of that association when its president conveyed to the minister the positive statement that a fraud was being practised on the government in order that a greater fraud might be practised on the people, if not to induce the government to take some course to protect the public. Yet the minister remained inactive and matters were allowed to drift. This is absolutely an indefensible case, and it will be to the discredit of the government if it should refuse the inquiry demanded by my hon. friend from Halton.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). In approaching the discussion of this question, I think it is advisable in the first instance to examine what are the objects stated by the motion of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson). The motion reads:

That this House is of the opinion that a Royal Commission should forthwith issue to inquire into and investigate the incorporation and organization of the Farmers' Bank of Canada and the granting of the certificate by the Treasury Board permitting the said bank to issue notes and commence business, and all circumstances connected therewith, and generally to inquire into and investigate the operation and efficiency of the Bank Act in relation to the affairs and transactions of the said bank.

In this motion three things are asked. It asks that a commission should be appointed to investigate the incorporation of this bank, its organization and then the granting of the certificate by the Treasury Board permitting it to issue notes and begin business. The discussion which has already taken place has already eliminated from this motion two of the objects sought to be accomplished by it. The first thing to be examined was the incorporation of the bank; but if I understood the speech of my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster), that part of the motion has been abandoned because he said that in reality there was nothing to investigate as regards the incorporation of the bank.

Mr. FOSTER. If my right hon. friend will allow me, I was combatting the argument made by the Minister of Finance. He divided the motion into three sections, namely, the incorporation of the bank, the granting of the certificate and the operation of the bank. I agreed with him, that as far as the incorporation by the commission and this House was concerned, all were responsible. My hon. friend from Halton said that by incorporation he meant all the preliminaries up to and including the granting of the certificate. I was simply replying to the Minister of Finance.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I think that this is really a distinction without a difference. Will my hon. friend tell me now, in the face of the discussion we have had, what would be the object of an investigation into the incorporation of the bank? What would such an investigation lead to? The same thing applies to the organization of the bank. The real crux of the matter is the third part of the motion, the granting of the certificate by the Treasury Board. All the discussion has really been upon this part of the motion and nothing else. Nothing serious has been said about the incorporation or organization, but the whole complaint has been that the Treasury Board advised by the Minister of Finance, made a mistake in granting the certificate. Therefore we can eliminate the other two parts and address ourselves to this alone, namely, what are the facts connected with the delivery of the certificate? My hon. friend from Halton made his motion with an object, and that object was to show that the certificate had been issued erroneously, that it should not have been issued at all, that the Department of Finance and the Treasury Board had been deceived and all this led to the conclusion that the government or parliament or the country should assume the losses incurred by the shareholders. I think I have stated the case fairly when I put it in this way. We are asked to investigate the granting of the certificate in order that such investigation might lead parliament to come to the rescue of those who lost their money in this institution. If such be the case, let us examine the reasons given why parliament should take this extraordinary step. The reason given is that the Department of Finance was deceived. All the speeches made, even the speech of my hon. friend who has just sat down (Mr. Borden, Halifax), have been to this effect, that the Department of Finance and the Minister of Finance, as leader of the Treasury Board, issued a certificate which should not have been issued, that the government had been deceived, and that those who lost by the bank should not bear their losses but they should be borne by the country.

Deceived in what manner? That is the question we have to investigate. That the Minister of Finance and the Treasury Board have been deceived was admitted long ago. But let us go further. My hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) tells us that this is only a preliminary step leading to another whereby parliament should be induced to come to the rescue of the men who put their money in the hands of Mr. Travers and the other directors of the bank. In what manner have the department and the Treasury Board been deceived, and what had the deception to do with the ultimate loss incurred by the shareholders? The deceit consisted in Mr. Travers, manager of the bank, reporting under oath that the bank had received in cash $250,000, half the amount required to be subscribed under the statutes. There is no longer any question about the deceit. When Mr. Travers declared that the shareholders had put into the treasury of the bank $250,000, that was deceit to the extent of about $80,000. That is admitted. Afterwards the bank failed. The question arises: Was that deception the cause of the failure of the bank? Can any one say—I put the question to my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster), to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax)—that this deception was the cause of the failure of the bank and the loss of the shareholders' money? I believe it has been stated and not denied that ultimately the whole of this money was paid into the treasury of the bank. There was a deception at the time, but afterwards the whole $250,000 required for the bank to commence business was actually paid in by the shareholders. If the bank afterwards failed and the shareholders lost their money, it was not because of the deception practised upon the Minister of Finance and the Treasury Board.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). May I be permitted a question? The Prime Minister has put a very relevant question as to whether or not this fraud had anything to do with the subsequent loss. I would ask him: Does he consider that the Department of Finance was doing its duty, that the government was doing its duty, when it permitted the man who, according to the statement of the President of the Canadian Bankers' Association, had perpetrated a fraud by means of perjury upon the department to remain at large and to continue his operations among the various communities of this country, and no investigation instituted? Had that nothing to do with the loss?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The hon. gentleman's question has no relevancy to the subject now before us.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Why not?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Let me read the motion under discussion:

That this House is of the opinion that a Royal Commission should forthwith issue to inquire into and investigate the incorporation and organization of the Farmers' Bank of Canada and the granting of the certificate by the Treasury Board permitting the said bank to issue notes and commence business.

The motion is not to examine what took place after the bank had been organized as now suggested, but to examine these circumstances under which the certificate was granted.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If I understood the motion correctly, it asks for an investigation into the operation and efficiency of the Banking Act in respect of the affairs and transactions of the bank.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Let us read the motion:

That this House is of opinion that a Royal Commission should forthwith issue to inquire into and investigate the incorporation and organization of the Farmers' Bank of Canada, and the granting of a certificate by the Treasury Board permitting the said bank to issue notes and commence business, and all circumstances connected therewith and generally to inquire into and investigate the operation and efficiency of the Bank Act in relation to the affairs and transactions of the said bank.

The fact that the provisions of the Bank Act may be violated is not an argument in favour of the view taken by my hon. friend. We are asked to investigate three things—the incorporation, the organization and the granting of the certificate. As to the granting of the certificate, anything that transpired afterwards, when the bank was in operation, is not relevant to the question.

Mr. LANCASTER. Will the Prime Minister allow me a question? If the Treasury Board had not given the bank permission to do business, could this loss have occurred?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That is very easily answered—certainly not. Had the certificate of the Treasury Board not been granted, the bank could not have begun business; and there would have been no default and no loss. But the object my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) had in this motion is, after this investigation is granted, the treasury of Canada should come to the rescue of the shareholders. My answer to my hon. friend is there is no logic or relevancy in his question. If the shareholders have lost, the man who was their agent deceived the Treasury Board as well as the shareholders, and the Treasury Board is no more responsible for the laches of the agent of the shareholders than are the shareholders themselves. I think that is common sense. The government has been deceived by the agent of the shareholders, by the man whom they selected, and in whom they put their confidence. So, I ask my hon. friend himself: Does he think that, under such circumstances, it lies in the mouth of the shareholder to tell the government: You should relieve us from the effect of the laches of our own agent?

Mr. LANCASTER. If the hon. gentleman is speaking to me, my answer is that in the first place the motion does not say anything of the kind, and, in the second place, in the interest of the people, there should be a full investigation so that a disaster like this could not happen again.

Mr. GOODEVE. May I ask a question? As I understand it, the object of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) is, only if the investigation proves that the issue of the certificate was due to the neglect of the Finance Department, to hold the government responsible for protecting the people.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I say that is the object of this motion, as it was plainly stated by my hon. friend from Halton, who spoke, I think, in very clear language. He made it plain that his object was to come to the rescue of the shareholders. He wanted to show that this investigation was only a preliminary step which would ultimately induce parliament to recoup these people for the losses they have suffered. My answer is, simply, if the shareholders have lost, it is because the agent of the shareholders deceived the government as well as the shareholders. And I think it is not a sound principle that anybody should be recouped for a loss made by his own agent.

Mr. HENDERSON. I dislike to interrupt the Prime Minister, but would he permit me a word?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think you will recollect, Mr. Speaker, that in what I said I divided the question into two parts. I distinctly said that if the loss was all brought about by reason of the action of the men whom the shareholders had put into office, then, they should suffer alone. I was clear on that, I think. But I said that if, on the other hand, the loss was brought about by reason of the action of this government or of the Treasury Board which was part of the government, then I thought this country was big enough, rich enough and generous enough to maintain its own honour and defend these people. That is what I said.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I am quite willing to discuss the question in the light my friend has placed it, that this country is broad enough, rich enough, to correct an error of the government, if an error has been committed. Undoubtedly the government has been deceived in this matter, but by whom? The government has been deceived by the agent of the very men whom my hon. friend now wants to recoup. The government has been deceived by Mr. Travers, if by anybody, and Mr. Travers was the agent of the shareholders who had appointed him to his office. Under the circumstances, I think that the suggestion of my hon. friend that the government should come to the rescue of the men who appointed the very man who deceived the government, is a proposition which no one could on reflection be prepared to admit. Now, it has been stated that there is a further question to investigate, the broader question of the sufficiency of the Bank Act. That is a good proposition, and it may be that an investigation might serve a good purpose. But I am not prepared to say at the present time that a case has been made out against the Bank Act; I do not say that later on something may be disclosed of that nature. But I have to observe that at the present time the matter is being investigated by the courts, and that there is not sufficient evidence yet disclosed by the courts to show that it is necessary to go further with this investigation. My last word is that at this moment no case has been made out why the motion should be granted.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to ask the Prime Minister how he can argue that Mr. Travers was the agent of the depositors.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I did not say the depositors. I said the shareholders.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). But the depositors are the people who are suffering.

On motion of Mr. Edwards, debate was adjourned.

On motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, House adjourned at 12.07 a.m. Thursday.

WATER SUPPLY IN PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS.

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (Minister of Public Works). Mr. Speaker, as the House is deeply interested in the question of the water supply furnished in these buildings, I think it well to read a report from the biologist of the Department of Agriculture, so that it may be placed on 'Hansard' and hon. gentlemen will have information of which I have no doubt they will be very glad:

AGRICULTURE DEPARTMENT—BIOLOGICAL LABORATORY.

Sir,—I have the honour to report as follows on samples of water taken at the parliament buildings on the 8th instant:

2322—Sample taken from drinking water supply in Senate. A non-pathogenic sporulating organism present in very small numbers. No evidence of sewage bacteria.

2323—Sample taken from drinking water supply on the floor of the House of Commons. A non-pathogenic sporulating organism present in very small numbers. No evidence of sewage bacteria.

2324—Sample taken from lavatory on main floor of the House of Commons. Sewage bacteria present.

From the above it is apparent that the raw city water is unsafe for human drinking purposes, while that supplied from the sterilizing machines is a perfectly safe drinking water.

I have the honour to be, sir, your obedient servant,

(Sgd.) CHAS. H. HIGGINS, Pathologist.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

AGRICULTURE IMPORTS INTO CANADA.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario):

1. What have been the yearly imports, quantity and value, for the past six years into Canada from, respectively, Australia, New Zealand, Denmark, Holland, Belgium, France, Argentine Republic and the United States, of wheat, oats, horses, cattle, sheep, lambs, mutton, beef, eggs, butter, cheese fowl, vegetables and fruit?

2. What have been the average prices of butter and of eggs in London, England, for the past five years in comparison with the prices, respectively, in eastern provinces, in Montreal, in Toronto, in Minneapolis, in Chicago, in Detroit, in Buffalo, in Boston and in New York?

Mr. PATERSON. As far as the customs is concerned I have the answer which the hon. member may have. With reference to the second question the Minister of Agriculture tells me it would take a very long time to prepare and he would like it to stand as a notice of motion for a return.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). I think the United States government very quickly got out a comparative list of the prices, and I cannot see why this should stand as a notice of motion. This information is very necessary for the discussion on the question of reciprocity.

Mr. PATERSON. There is no objection whatever to giving it, but I was just intimating to the hon. gentleman that he must not expect it immediately and it would be better given in the shape of a return.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). It would be better to expedite it for the information of hon. members.

Mr. FISHER. I have already given instructions to the department to set a man at work to prepare it, but I was informed that it will take at least a week to get it.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). I would ask to have included in the return the import duties on these goods going into these countries from Canada.

Mr. FISHER. I think we can get that information.

NEW POSTAGE STAMPS.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew):

1. Is the government aware that the governments of Australia and South Africa have offered substantial prizes for the best designs for new postage stamps, emblematic of the present reign, for those portions of the empire?

2. What steps is this government taking to secure a set of postage stamps for Canada which will be characteristic of the country and of artistic merit?

3. Is it the intention of the government to offer prizes for the best designs in order to encourage Canadian artists? If not, who will prepare the designs?

4. Will an opportunity be afforded to the members of the House to inspect whatever designs may be submitted to the Post Office Department, before the selection is finally made?

Mr. LEMIEUX. We are not aware in the Post Office Department of what is being done in this matter by the governments of Australia and South Africa. What we have done is this. We have written to our High Commissioner in London, Lord Strath cona, and he is in communication with the home government in order to arrange for a postage stamp in Canada similar to the one which will be issued at the time of coronation for the United Kingdom. We have not yet received the design, but as soon as received, I shall have no objection to laying it on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS HUMBER RIVER, TORONTO.

* Mr. WALLACE:

1. Is the government aware that a serious obstruction to navigation exists on the Humber river, caused by the middle pier of a bridge being built by the Grand Trunk railway over the river?
2. If so, has the government done anything to remedy it?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No doubt this question relates to the application which has been made by the Grand Trunk railway for the approval of the plan of a bridge which they propose to build across the river Humber in order to take the place of the railway bridge now there. The object of building the bridge, is, it appears, to meet an order made by the Board of Railway Commissioners requiring the company to make a change of grade so that the proposed bridge will be higher than the existing one. Objections have been made to the plan by certain owners of property on the Humber and also by the city of Toronto. All the parties have been given an opportunity to be heard. The matter is now being considered by me, and in the course of a few days I expect to decide what recommendation I shall make to the Governor in Council on the subject.

ACCOUNTS OUTSTANDING.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe):

1. What were the total amounts of the accounts outstanding and unpaid, but since paid, in each department at the end of the last financial year?
2. Were these amounts taken into the accounts in preparing the annual financial statement?

Mr. FIELDING. Stands as a notice of motion for return.

CANADIAN EXPORTS OF HAY—REMISSION OF UNITED STATES DUTIES.

Mr. MONK:

1. When will the commission called upon to decide the amounts to be reimbursed Canadian exporters of hay, from 1866 to 1882, customs dues collected by the United States customs officials, be named under the terms of the recent convention between Great Britain and the United States?
2. What is causing the delay in the nomination of said commission?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. These claims are included in those with regard to which the governments of Great Britain and the United States have agreed on a convention, and will be taken up as soon as the convention sits.

SESSIONAL CLERKS.

* Mr. MONK:

1. At what rate per day are sessional clerks paid, and is the rate uniform for all such clerks?
2. Was the per diem rate of pay for sessional clerks increased last year? If so, by what authority?
3. To what class of such clerks does the increase apply?
4. Do the clerks whose salaries were so increased work more or during longer hours than the others?
5. Why was the salary thus increased for some only?
6. Have the clerks whose salaries have not been increased petitioned for an increase?
7. If so, was the petition rejected as far as they are concerned?
8. Is it not a fact that a number of the sessional clerks whose salaries have not been thus advanced possess technical qualifications not held by those whose pay was increased?
9. What is the reason for this apparently unjust discrimination?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER:

1. There are two divisions of sessional clerks, viz.: 'Post office clerks' and 'sessional clerks'. The rate of pay is uniform for sessional clerks and is also uniform for post office clerks. The rate of pay for post office clerks is $5 per diem and of sessional clerks $4 per diem.

2 and 3. The per diem rate of pay for post office clerks was increased last session by authority of the Board of Commissioners of Internal Economy of the House of Commons. The rate of pay for sessional clerks was not increased.

4. The work of the post office clerks is of an entirely different nature to that of the sessional clerks. As to whether post office clerks work longer hours than sessional clerks it may be stated that in some cases they do and in others they probably do not.

5. Answered in the reply to question No. 1.

6. The sessional clerks have petitioned for an increase of pay.

7. The petition has not been rejected, but is under consideration of the Board of Internal Economy.

8. Some of the sessional clerks are stenographers and typewriters, some are typewriters only and some are neither typewriters nor stenographers. The work required of post office clerks does not require them to possess the qualification of typewriters or stenographers.

9. There is no desire to unfairly discriminate among these officials. The matter of adjusting their pay according to the nature of their work is under consideration.

IMPORTS OF LEAF TOBACCO.

*Mr. MONK:

1. What was the total amount of leaf tobacco imported from the United States for each of the last three years?

2. What is the value of manufactured tobacco of all sorts imported from the United States during each of the last three years for which reports have been compiled?

Mr. PATERSON:

1. The quantity of 'Tobacco, unmanufactured for excise purposes, under conditions of Inland Revenue Act,' imported into Canada from the United States during the last three fiscal years was as follows:

	Pounds.
1908	15,544,752
1909	14,761,094
1910	14,242,809

2. The value of manufactured tobacco imported into Canada from the United States during the last three fiscal years was as follows:

	1908. Value.	1909. Value.	1910. Value.
Cigarettes	$ 2,896	$ 1,530	$ 3,462
Cigars	20,321	20,969	30,852
Tobacco, cut	110,549	40,692	38,217
Snuff	29,903	25,462	4,600
Tobacco, all other manufactures of	57,793	55,577	60,737

INTERNATIONAL PRISON CONGRESS.

*Mr. MONK:

1. Did the government send a representative to the meeting of the last International Prison Congress held at Washington, U.S.A., last year?

2. Was the government invited to participate in said meeting?

3. If so invited, why was not the government represented at said meeting?

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH:

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. See answer to No. 1.

JOHN JARDINE.

Mr. BARNARD:

Referring to questions and answers re Mr. John Jardine set out in columns 3926 and 4762 of the revised 'Hansard,' was the department aware at the time or times of making the payment or payments therein referred to, that payment was being made for work done in excess of his instructions? If not, when did the government first become aware of the fact?

Mr. PUGSLEY:

The department at Ottawa was not aware at the time of making payment that the work done by Mr. Jardine, and for which the resident architect sent in duly certified accounts, exceeded what had been authorized by him, as the resident architect had been instructed to consult Dr. Montizambert as to what works he considered most important and would advise to be done from the appropriation of $28,000 which was available.

SAND SUPPLIED TO KINGSTON PENITENTIARY.

Mr. EDWARDS:

1. How much money has been paid by this government in each year from 1896 to and including 1910, to R. H. Fair, for sand supplied to Kingston penitentiary?

2. Were tenders called in each year for sand supplied.

3. Has the government paid the said R. H. Fair for supplying sand for any other public buildings or works at or near Kingston in the years 1896 to 1910? If so, how much?

4. Has the said R. H. Fair received any money from the government for any other supplies or services? If so, for what, in what years and how much?

CHEESE WEIGHING AT MONTREAL.

Mr. EDWARDS:

1. Has the government during the past year received any complaints from cheese boards or individuals in regard to the weights and quality of cheese as allowed by buyers in Montreal?

2. Has there ever been an official referee at Montreal appointed by the government? If so, what was his name, when appointed and at what salary?

3. What were the duties of said official referee?

4. Is there an official referee at Montreal at present? If not, when were his services dispensed with, and why?

Mr. FISHER:

1. The Department of Trade and Commerce has received complaints from cheese boards and individuals, in regard to the weights and quality of the cheese as allowed by buyers in Montreal during the past year, and the Department of Agriculture received at various times three requests for the services of an official referee owing to disputes between buyers and sellers as to the quality of cheese.

2. The following officers of the Department of Agriculture have acted as official referee of butter and cheese at Montreal: J. A. Ruddick, July, 1900, salary $1,800 per year; A. W. Woodard, May, 1901, to March 31, 1906, salary $1,200 to $1,700 per year; Geo. H. Barr, May to November, 1907, salary, $1,800 per year; Jos. Burgess, May to November, 1908, salary $1,100 per year; J. F. Tilley, May to November, 1909, salary $100 per month. The position was not filled during the seasons of 1906 and 1910.

3. The duties of the official referee consisted of making examinations of butter and cheese on request of both buyer and seller when there was a dispute as to quality.

4. There is no official referee at Montreal at present. There was so little demand for his services in 1909 that there seemed to be no justification for continuing the office.

PRIVILEGE—MR. NORTHRUP.

Mr. NORTHRUP. If in rising a second time, as a matter of privilege, to take exception to some remarks made by the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie), my observations shall be very brief. I trust the House will understand that it is because I recognize the rule limiting the rights of members at such a time as this to a statement of the words actually used. If an hon. member attempts to go any further, he is very apt to be called to order. The particular paragraph to which I take exception is in the speech of the hon. member for North Cape Breton delivered in this House the night before last. I will read the paragraph to which I do take exception. He says at page 5389:

> I quote here an opinion which will be found in 'Hansard,' page 408, 29th November, 1910. It is the opinion of the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) given while speaking in the debate on the address. He is taking the address paragraph by paragraph, and he takes this paragraph:
> An arrangement may be made which will admit many of the products of the United States in on satisfactory terms.

Then follows some interruption, Mr. Bradbury raising a point of order, and the Deputy Speaker ruling upon it. I will omit that and go on with the remarks of the hon. member for North Cape Breton.

Mr. EDWARDS.

Mr. Chairman, if any hon. friend will insist upon it, all I have to say is that this statement was made on the 29th November last when the hon. member for East Hastings expressed himself strongley in favour of reciprocity. He assured us that he would hold up both hands in favour of such an arrangement. I would ask my hon. friend from East Hastings if he will put up one hand in favour of it if it comes to a vote now. In case anybody may think I am not quoting him properly I have taken the page and day when he spoke, so that anybody will see what the hon. gentleman said.

Then followed a reference to some remarks made by the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Chisholm), and the hon. gentleman (Mr. McKenzie) proceeded:

> Now, Mr. Chairman, I have quoted a great many opinions but I have quoted none with greater satisfaction and greater faith than the two last opinions, because, judging from what has been going on around me here for the last three weeks, the fiery eloquence of the hon. member for East Hastings denouncing and condemning this agreement in all the moods and tenses, I certainly could not think that he had ever expressed a view in favour of the proposal.

Then he continues:

> Then, having discovered this oasis in the desert, I find there are a great many other saints in Caesar's house and that from other quarters we are getting support for this agreement.

Turning to the remarks to which the hon. gentleman refers, what do I find? The hon. gentleman professed to quote some remarks made by me in this House, and he himself says: In order to avoid any possibility of mistake I have taken the page and date when he spoke. On turning up page 408, which is the page given by the hon. gentleman, I find that the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Smith) was discussing the Canadian navy. So, we see with what care the hon. gentleman gave his reference.

Mr. McKENZIE. I shall be pleased to hand the hon. gentleman 'Hansard' if there is any doubt about it.

Mr. NORTHRUP. May I ask the hon. gentleman——

Mr. McKENZIE. I may have made a mistake in the page.

Mr. NORTHRUP. May I ask the hon. gentleman does he deny that he made the statement that I am reading from page 5389, March 14, 1911, when he says:

> I quote here an opinion which will be found in 'Hansard,' page 408.

Mr. McKENZIE. I may say that I might have made a mistake in the page, but I have the extract in my hand that I clipped out of 'Hansard' and I will be pleased to give it to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. NORTHRUP. If there is a mistake in the page, so far so good. The only reason I referred to the fact at all was to justify the apology and excuse that I intend to offer for the hon. gentleman before I conclude. It seems impossible for him to quote anything correctly, even the page at which I had spoken. The gravamen of the charge is this paragraph of my remarks:

An arrangement may be made which will admit many of the products of the United States in on satisfactory terms.

Will the House be surprised to learn that I did not say anything of the kind, and that there is nothing at all approaching it in any part of the speech made by me on that day, the 29th November?

Mr. McKENZIE. Read what you did say.

Mr. NORTHRUP. I will read it and read it correctly. The paragraph to which the hon. gentleman refers and in which the hon. gentleman for East Hastings is said to have 'expressed himself strongly in favour of reciprocity', is a paragraph taken not from my speech but from the speech from the Throne. But the House must be reasonable, for certainly the paragraph as quoted by the hon. gentleman bore so slight a resemblance to the speech from the Throne which I quoted that it is no wonder that he thought it was mine. let me give you what the hon. gentleman gives as the paragraph and let me give you what the speech from the Throne gives as the paragraph. The hon. gentleman quoted:

An arrangement may be made which will admit many of the products of the United States in on satisfactory terms.

That is the remark which I was supposed to have made. What I did quote from the speech from the Throne was this:

An arrangement may be made which will admit many of the products of the Dominion into the United States on satisfactory terms.

If there is no difference between Canadian produce going into the United States and American produce coming into the Dominion of Canada, then I am bound to admit that the hon. gentleman quoted me fairly and properly, but if there is any difference, or if the hon. gentleman can conceive or imagine or suppose or dream of any difference, between American products coming into Canada and Canadian products going into the United States, then I think I have surely ground for objection to being reported to have said exactly the opposite of what I did say when I quoted from the speech from the Throne. Then the hon. gentleman also rejoices within himself in the expectation that I would hold up both hands in favour of this arrangement. What did I say? Referring to the correct pages in 'Hansard', November 29, pages 392 and 393, I find that my remarks were along the line that I was finding fault—I merely mention this that what follows may be understood—with the government because there was no mention of reciprocity in the speech from the Throne. I called attention to the fact that while there was ample reference to the admission of our goods into the American market, there was no mention of American goods into our market. That is the point I was making. Then I made the quotation which has been garbled.

An arrangement may be made which will admit many of the products of the Dominion into the United States on satisfactory terms.

And said:

Why, of course, we would all hold up both hands for that. But does any one suppose for a moment that our American friends, the shrewdest, keenest, business men in the world, came to Canada merely to discuss measures by which the products of Canada would be admitted into the United States on satisfactory terms to Canada? Did it ever enter the minds of the right hon. gentleman or his colleagues that perhaps the Americans might like some of their goods to enter Canada on satisfactory terms to them? And, when we are called on to discuss such a question as this surely we have the right to ask that when the question is reciprocity, if it is reciprocity, we should be told so. Everybody will hold up both hands for any arrangement to enable us to send our goods on satisfactory terms to us in the United States, but whether or not we shall agree to let their goods in here is another story.

I think the quotation which I have given is pretty closely what was really said by me on the 29th November. As to the second statement quoted from the hon. gentleman's speech at page 5389, I am not perhaps to blame for not replying to it, because it is so far beyond my humble intellect, so far beyond the grasp or conception of an ordinary mind that I can merely leave it to hon. members to fathom if they can. The hon. gentleman said:

Then, having discovered this oasis in the desert, I find there are a great many other saints in Caesar's house and that from other quarters we are getting support for this agreement.

I do not contradict that, Mr. Speaker. I do not assent to it; but I frankly admit that had the hon. member for North Cape Breton been an Irishman I might have had some suspicion as to the explanation of it, but coming from a Scotchman I can only say, Sir, that I am hopelessly at a loss.

Mr. McKENZIE. As a matter of privilege—if there is any privilege left after the tremendous drain made upon it by the hon. member for East Hastings from day to day,—I suppose I might claim some little of what privilege remains. The hon. member makes a great deal of noise about very little.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Hear, hear.

Mr. McKENZIE. He makes a great deal of fuss, and he quotes scripture with great effect.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Hear, hear.

Mr. McKENZIE. He says that the great offence I committed the other day was to unite his name with that of the leader of the opposition.

Mr. NORTHRUP. No such statement will be found on my part.

Mr. McKENZIE. It will be found on 'Hansard' that he said he would not get on his feet were it not that I united his name with that of the leader of the opposition.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Yes, in the charge you made.

Mr. McKENZIE. Then, he went on to quote scripture. But there is one quotation from scripture which, had he used, he would have shut my mouth completely, and that is the reference to yoking an ox with an ass. Had he cited that as a reason why I should not unite his name with that of the leader of the opposition I would have nothing more to say. I did not get very much information or satisfaction out of the hon. gentleman's repeated speeches. If they are a question of privilege all right, but it is another matter altogether if they are merely made to keep my hon. friend in the limelight, and give him an opportunity to make little fiery speeches which I think is all the privilege he wants. There is another apt illustration that I might put on record in connection with the hon. member for Hastings. A Scotchman had a certain quadruped which he wanted to catch, and he chased it into a house in which there was only one window, and that a pane of glass 9 by 10. When he got the pig into the house he thought: Well, I've got you now, but the pig was not to be trapped, and he jumped through the 9 by 10 window. The Scotchman was perplexed, but he looked after the pig and said: Well, I lost you, but I've got your measure; it's 9 by 10. Well, I have got the measure of the hon. member for Hastings, but it would be tremendous extravagance to say he is 9 by 10 for I believe mathematically speaking he is nearer to 3 by 2. I care nothing for what the hon. gentleman says, and that is all the privilege I require.

Mr. McKENZIE.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE FARMERS' BANK.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Fielding that the House go into Committee of Ways and Means, and the amendment of Mr. Henderson thereto.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac). Mr. Speaker, I regret to say that there was a branch of the Farmers' Bank established in my county in the village of Sharbot Lake; That there were 76 shares of stock held by residents of the county of Frontenac, and that with the double liability caused to these shareholders a loss of $15,-200. That, added to the money placed on deposit in that one branch entailed a loss to certain residents of the county of Frontenac of some $60,000, which although a relatively small sum in comparison with the loss sustained in other parts of the province is nevertheless a serious blow to that part of the county as it was distributed almost entirely over two rather poor townships. But, the sadness of the whole picture is only equalled by the splendid courage exhibited by many aged men and women in bravely facing the loss of all they possessed and of being brought down to penury and want. I desire, Sir, to express in the strongest possible terms my appreciation of the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson), asking for a Royal Commission, and in doing so I am but endorsing the expression of opinion of all the people in my county who have sustained loss through the failure of this bank. I support this resolution, Mr. Speaker, in the hope that if a commission should be appointed certain evidence would be brought to light which would lead to the recovery of some of the money which has been lost, and thus to a certain extent recoup those who have suffered. I also support the resolution in the hope that this Royal Commission may obtain some information which may enable it to give to the Minister of Finance and to the House some definite information which will lead to the improvement of the Bank Act, and in consequence prevent similar loss in the future. Before discussing the Farmers' Bank in particular, I desire to make a few general observations in regard to the working of the Bank Act and to certain losses which have been sustained by bank failures from time to time in Canada. From 1880 to 1906 there were 48 chartered banks established in Canada, and of that number 12 or 25 per cent failed, and others only saved themselves from failure by amalgamation. In the neighourbood of 30 per cent of all the banks which have been established since 1880 have failed and one half of these failures have occurred since 1896 during the time the present Finance Minister has held office. Surely, Sir, it is a sorry commentary on our banking system and on this government, that the percentage of failures of chartered banks in the Dominion of Canada has been greater since this administration came to power in 1896, and under the care of the present Minister of Finance, than in any other country in the world. Mr. H. C. McLeod, former general manager of the Bank of Nova Scotia, commenting on this deplorable state of affairs, used these words:

Most, if not all the above mentioned failures were fraudulent, and it is now plainly evident that a few hours examination by a skilled banker would have disclosed an insolvent condition in any one of these banks years before it collapsed.

This criticism was made some years ago and had the Minister of Finance acted upon the suggestion of this eminent financier, Mr. McLeod, endorsed, as it was, by many others from one end of the country to the other, I firmly believe that the people who are to-day suffering from the failure of the Farmers' Bank would not have sustained loss. The monthly bank statement for the month of December last shows the note circulation of all our banks in Canada to be $87,694,840. To what extent I may ask is that note circulation protected? The deposit with the government known as the Bank Note Redemption Fund, is only a fraction of the note circulation, and that is no use in saving a bank from failure in a time of stringency, because it is not available until the bank has closed its doors and gone into liquidation. The amount of it is so extremely small that it is practically of no use. So far as the Rest or Reserve Fund is concerned, the Farmers' Bank does not appear to have had any. The double liability of shareholders is represented as a very great guarantee of safety to depositors, but not only in regard to the failure of the Farmers' Bank, but in regard to the failures of the various banks which have taken place in this country for years past, the double liability of shareholders is absolutely no security whatever. That has been demonstrated time and again. The assets of the bank are the only guarantee that depositors have, and these assets, unfortunately, are often worthless or of such a kind that it is impossible to realize on them in time of need. What guarantee, I would like to ask, is afforded by the double liability of the stock of the bank when most of that stock is held by the bank itself? Take the case of the Banque Ville Marie, which failed in 1899, and was finally wound up in 1905; the total claims of depositors and noteholders were $1,364,000, and only $96,000 was collected from the shareholders on account of the double liability. Why? Because about $200,000 worth of the stock was held by the bank itself, having been bought up to support the price of the stock in the open market. And the greater part of the $300,000 of stock remaining was held by people from whom the double liability could not be realized—or, at least, was not collected. The paid up capital of this bank was $500,000, and although the Act restricts the amount of the note circulation to its paid-up capital, yet at the time it failed and for some time previously the note circulation was in excess of the paid-up capital. This is managed by the parties making false returns to the government, which, apparently, makes no effort to verify the bank returns made to it. This has occurred time and again. Another point in the failure of the bank just referred to is that the sum of $33,000 went to defray the expenses of liquidation and law costs, a very exorbitant sum, especially when you consider that the creditors, including depositors, received only 30 cents on the dollar.

Another evidence of the looseness of the Fielding Banking Act is furnished by the failure of the Bank of Yarmouth in 1905. This failure, occurring about the time this Farmers' Bank was seeking to get incorporated and before its certificate was granted, should have caused the Finance Minister to exercise caution. In regard to the Bank of Yarmouth, the main, if not the only cause of failure, was found in the large loans and advances to one mercantile house with unhonoured drafts for $249,550 at the time of suspension, and a total indebtedness to the bank amounting to within a very few dollars of half a million. Take the case of the Ontario Bank, which closed its doors in October, 1906. I may say that was about the time when the hon. Finance Minister was receiving warnings in regard to the Farmers' Bank. The 'Monetary Times,' speaking of the failure of the Ontario Bank, said:

This is the story of as miserable a fiasco as contemporary Canadian history affords.

Before the failure was made known to the shareholders, the Bank of Montreal made a private agreement whereby it acquired the business of the Ontario Bank for $150,000. By this deal it bought a business with over $12,000,000 of deposits, of which $3,000,000 were without interest, and a capacity for note circulation of $1,500,000. What was the cause of failure in that case? It bears a very close resemblance to the cause of failure in the Farmers' Bank—speculation by the manager, which began in 1901, but was covered up by such terms in the returns made to the government as 'current loans,' 'other securities,' &c., which the Finance Minister accepts, apparently, without question and without the slightest investigation or inquiry as to their character. No less than $1,784,403 was lost through the speculation of the manager of the bank, and $230,091 by the bank purchasing its own stock in the open market, a practice which, as I have shown, makes the double liability a fallacy, a delusion and a snare. There are hundreds of men in Ontario who believe that, in the interests of the shareholders and of the people in general, there should be a Royal Commission to inquire thoroughly into all these bank failures that have taken place during recent years. The incapacity of the Finance Minister to deal with large financial problems effectively has become painfully evident to hundreds who have lost their all, and the hon. gentleman's indifference has aroused throughout the country the greatest indignation.

It looks to me as if, in the winding-up proceedings of these broken banks, the ordinary shareholder gets unmercifully fleeced, while the solvent banks get whatever assets are worth having. But what can one expect? The Fielding Banking Act is framed to meet the wishes of the Bankers' Association, and grants powers to that association which should be possessed only by the government. Take, for instance, section 117 of the Bank Act. That section authorizes the Bankers' Association, if a bank suspends payment in specie or Dominion notes of any of its liabilities as they accrue, forthwith to appoint a curator to supervise the affairs of such bank, and at any time to remove the curator and appoint another person in his stead. Thus, the affairs of the defunct bank are placed entirely in the hands of its competitors—surely a very illogical proceeding. The effect is that these banks purchase whatever assets are worth having at their own price. The Bankers' Association also have the naming of counsel, who makes the application at court for the winding-up order, and they appoint the liquidator as well as the curator. In the case of the Sovereign Bank, the public knew nothing of the condition of the bank until the morning after it was swallowed up by some of the larger banks. The directors entered into an agreement with thirteen banks, which declared the Sovereign Bank, with $20,000,000 of assets and over 80 branches, insolvent, transferred all that was of value to those thirteen banks, allowed them six months to look over the spoils and throw out anything which carried with it the appearance of liability, leaving the helpless shareholders to bear the brunt of the burden. At a meeting of the shareholders of the Sovereign Bank, a motion was submitted asking for a government investigation, but the president refused to put the motion, and said that he held proxies for the stock controlled by J. P. Morgan & Company of New York, and, if necesary, would exercise his voting power under these proxies to prevent an investigation.

Mr. EDWARDS.

In addition to the indifference of the Finance Minister to the whole disgraceful affair, I may mention that after a delay of almost a year and a half, a warrant was issued for the arrest of Lieut.-Col. D. M. Stewart, the former general manager of the Sovereign Bank, the charge against him being that he had made false returns to the government, and about the same time the militia orders from Ottawa announced that 'leave of absence, with permission to travel abroad, had been granted to Lieut.-Col. D. M. Stewart of the 13th Scottish Light Dragoons.' In the case of the Sovereign Bank there is good reason for suspecting that some of the banks, instead of assisting, actually helped to strangle that bank. At all events, there is little doubt that the Sovereign Bank was in a far more solvent condition at the time of the disclosure of its affairs than several other banks. Taking the percentage, which the reserve of legal tender bears to the liabilities, which I believe is the usual test of a bank's stability, it appears that on December 31, 1907, a few days before the Sovereign Bank was declared insolvent, it was able to liquidate in legal tender 4·1 per cent of its liabilities, and was in a better and more solvent condition than five other banks at the time. Their respective percentages were 1·5, 1·3, 1·2, 2·3 and 3·2. At that time the average percentage of reserve to liabilities in all the Canadian banks was 10·1, the highest of any was 19·1. Compare this with the fact that the Bank of England maintained reserves of fifty per cent, and the Bank of France and the Imperial Bank of Germany from fifty to seventy-five per cent.

Now I contend that these facts have a very important and direct bearing upon the matter we are considering, namely, whether we will grant a Royal Commission in this case. I am giving these facts for the purpose of showing that to my mind there is reason for a very thorough investigation into the whole banking system of this country. I have received from my own county many requests, I have in my possession a letter from a county judge in the province of Ontario, urging that a commission such as the one now asked for be appointed, and that its scope be extended over the failure of the Sovereign and the Ontario banks as well as the Farmers' Bank. It is worth noting that throughout this country vast sums of money are being expended by banking institutions in erecting magnificent buildings; and if you look at the returns furnished monthly to the Finance Minister by the several banks, you will be struck by the very low valuation placed upon these buildings. Another thing which attracts my attention is that the salaries of bank managers in Canada are from two to four times higher than those paid to the highest officers in the Bank of England or the Imperial Bank of Germany.

Another respect wherein I think this government is culpable and neglectful of the public interest, is in regard to the deposits in the Post Office Savings Bank. Now the Post Office Savings Banks are merely a means whereby the people transfer their funds to the regular banks, the post office acting as a medium, that is all. The money paid by the people in the Post Office Savings Banks is transferred to the regular banks, the post office sending deposit slips to Ottawa. The people are paid three per cent interest on their deposits by the post office, and that rate is paid back to the Post Office Department by the several banks to which the money is transferred, that is all it amounts to. Putting the money in the Post Office Savings Bank merely gives the depositor a guarantee by this government that his money will be safe, that is the only advantage the people have in placing their money in the Post Office Savings Banks instead of in the regular banks, because it goes to the regular banks anyway. Now the Bankers' Association control the Finance Minister in that respect, just as they do apparently in many others. The people receive three per cent from the banks for the money deposited, and when they want to borrow money they have to pay anywhere from six to ten per cent on loans. The Bankers' Association will not agree that the rate of interest in the Post Office Savings Bank should be increased, because they know full well that if the rate was increased they would have to increase the rate they pay to the public; so I say that they are able to control the Finance Minister in that regard, and to keep the rate of interest in the Post Office Savings Bank the same as it is in the regular banks. Now on the 31st of last December, all the banks in Canada showed a paid-up capital of $99,676,093; the deposits of the people in those banks amounted to $280,910,695, those were deposits payable on demand. The deposits payable after notice, or on a fixed date, amounted to $544,220,710. There is a total of $825,131,405 of the people's money deposited in the various banks of this country, the paid-up capital of which is only $99,676,093. In other words, under the system to-day, the money, the credit of the people, is being used by the banking institutions of this country at the rate of three per cent, and these banking institutions show their gratitude to the people by charging them anywhere from six to ten per cent on short loans, if they can get the money at all. That is the condition of affairs, and it is one that is unfair, not only that, but it is being permitted by the government at the present time, and has been permitted for years. The government pay three per cent to the people, while this very government goes to England, or to other money markets of the world, and borrows money on which it pays four per cent or even a higher rate, while there are over $800,000,000 of the people's money only drawing three per cent. Now I contend that these figures show that the people of this country, whose money is running these banks, have a right to come to this parliament and ask for a Royal Commission to investigate the failure of the Farmers' Bank, or of any other bank. They have a perfect right to ask that some of the money of this country should be expended in granting that Royal Commission, and even they might go further, and ask this government to give them some compensation for the losses they have sustained.

Now I wish to refer more particularly to the failure of the Farmers' Bank, and in doing so permit me to refer briefly to some remarks made by the right hon. the Prime Minister last night. The right hon. gentleman spoke to this resolution very briefly, not only did he speak briefly but he did not speak to the point. He attempted to read into the resolution what was not there at all, and he forgot to read what was in the resolution, for instance, he tried to leave the impression that the resolution contained something in the direction of compensating those who had lost by the failure of the bank. Now there was nothing whatever of that kind in the resolution, from first to last. But, Sir, I think although that was not contained in the resolution and although the right hon. gentleman spent a good deal of his time in trying to leave the impression that that was the sum and substance of the resolution before the House, I would say, speaking for myself, that I do think there are very strong and cogent reasons why this government should compensate, in a measure at least, the people who have sustained losses through the failure of the Farmers' Bank. This parliament has voted without dissent substantial sums of money for the relief of sufferers by flood in Paris and by earthquake in San Francisco and in Italy. These people suffered through no fault of their own and through no fault of this government, and parliament gladly gave them a measure of relief. The sufferers through the failure of the Farmers' Bank also suffered from no fault of their own, but from the negligence and the fault of this government, and therefore, the argument in favour of granting relief to them is overwhelming as I think has been amply proven in the discussion that has taken place.

The right hon. gentleman, after failing in his juggling feat with the motion before the Chair, advanced as his sole and only plea why a Royal Commission should not issue in this matter that the Finance Minister had been deceived, and that we should, therefore, not hold the government responsible. He says that Travers was the agent of the shareholders, and that we should not reimburse these shareholders whose agent Travers was, but he failed entirely to answer the point raised by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax), when he referred to the depositors who certainly were not to blame whatever blame may attach to the shareholders.

What are the facts in regard to the Farmers' Bank? The Farmers' Bank was incorporated in the year 1905. The matter came before the Banking and Commerce Committee in the regular way. An attempt was made by the Minister of Finance to have the members of the Banking and Commerce Committee share with him the responsibility for the incorporation of the Farmers' Bank. I do not think that was justified, because while the matter came before the Banking and Commerce Committee it is well known that many of the details, such as the examination of credentials, are not placed before that committee, but are supposed to be looked after by the Finance Department. The minister failed utterly in his attempt to drag the members of the Banking and Commerce Committee into the pool created by his own neglect, and lax administration. The Finance Minister has been deceived by Mr. Travers, the Prime Minister says. It is an old saying that there are none so blind as those who will not see, and in reference to the Farmers' Bank it does appear that the Finance Minister deliberately refused to either hear or see; from the time he took office in 1896 until to-day his pathway is strewn with the wreckage of banks, yet he has never taken warning from one of those banks. I do not know what warnings will be necessary to make him realize his responsibility, he may wait until some bricks fall out of a breaking bank and hit him on the head before he realizes how weak his whole Bank Act is. The statement of a man like Mr. McLeod, former manager of the Bank of Nova Scotia, appears to have made no impression on him whatever. One of the ablest and oldest and most highly respected members of this House, the member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) went to the Finance Minister and gave him repeated warnings in regard to the Farmers' Bank, and yet the Prime Minister says the Finance Minister was deceived. I would like to ask why the Prime Minister objects to the issuing of a Royal Commission? Can those who have suffered by the failure of the Farmers' Bank lose anything by the appointment of a commission, can matters be made any worse for them? Will anybody say there is no possibility that it might bring forth some facts which would lead to the recovery of part of the money? Why then object to the appointment of this Royal Commission? What is the premier afraid of? No doubt if there was a Royal Commission the Finance Minister would be placed in the box and would have to give evidence. Is the Prime Minister afraid of that? Is that the reason why they do not wish a Royal Commission? There is no doubt also that if a Royal Commission was appointed, Mr. Calvert, former chief Liberal whip, would have to go into the box. Is it for the sake of Mr. Calvert that the Prime Minister and his Finance Minister object to the appointment of a Royal Commission?

Mr. BOYCE. Would not other hon. gentlemen opposite have to go into the box?

Mr. EDWARDS. I cannot say, but it seems to me very probable that the hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Stratton) would have to testify before such a commission. Is it because of this that the leader of the government, and the Finance Minister object to a Royal Commission? They have not given any good reason why a Royal Commission should not issue, and it does look very suspicious indeed. If they have nothing to conceal, if they have no party favourites to defend and protect, why should not a Royal Commission be appointed to investigate this matter without loss of time? It looks to me as if the objection to the Royal Commission was not on the grounds of economy—think of this government practising economy along any line—but purely on the ground of party political expediency. The Prime Minister says his Finance Minister was deceived. But, suppose he was—though in the face of facts that were placed before him previous to that certificate being issued I do not see how he could be deceived—but, if he were deceived all the more reason there is why a Royal Commision should be appointed which will get at the methods by which men like Travers can come along and deceive a man like the Minister of Finance, so that we may be able to guard against that sort of thing in the future. On the 8th of October, 1906, Mr. Leighton McCarthy wrote the Minister of Finance giving notice that a number of subscribers would dispute the bona fide character of the subscriptions, and that was followed by another letter from the same gentleman on the 19th of October inclosing a special endorsement of writ from the High Court of Justice and giving the names of plaintiffs and defendants. These letters and documents allege fraud, deception, and misrepresentation in getting subscriptions; they gave numerous examples and all of this information was in the hands of the Minister of Finance before the certificate was granted. The Prime Minister tells us, however, that his Minister of Finance was deceived, but the allegations made in these letters of Mr. McCarthy and in the documents sent were acknowledged by Travers when he paid back the money and gave up the notes to these subscribers, which he did rather than face the court. I repeat that all of these facts were before the Minister of Finance prior to the certificate being granted. It was the duty of the Minister of Finance to guard the people's interest and to see that section 13 of the Bank Act was complied with. Did he do so? No, on the contrary he knew it had been violated and that Travers and the provisional directors had no right to call the meeting of the subscribers which they did call under that section. Was the Minister of Finance deceived in that? I think he knew, and he must have known that the meeting was called illegally, and it looks to me that he was indifferent rather than that he was deceived. The names of men who had been released by the High Court of Justice as subscribers to the Farmers' Bank and whose money and notes had been returned to them by the order of that court were falsely retained on the list as subscribers for shares, and how can the Minister of Finance say he was ignorant of that fact. And yet, the Prime Minister puts forward as his only reason for opposing the appointment of a Royal Commission, that his Minister of Finance was deceived. Will the Minister of Finance say that the $250,000 was properly raised by the taking of notes from the subscribers and the discounting of the same. Why, the Minister of Finance himself says in a letter to Travers dated November 30:

> We have been told that in some cases the subscribers did not actually pay in cash but gave notes to the provisional directors which were used to raise money.

On the very same day Sir Edward Clouston, president of the Canadian Bankers' Association wrote a letter to the Minister of Finance counselling delay in the issuing of the certificate and urging thorough investigation for the protection of the public. And yet, with all these facts before him, the Minister of Finance issued a cirtificate without which the Farmers' Bank could not have gone on and without which these losses would have been impossible. And yet we are told by the Prime Minister that the government is in no way responsible, because the Minister of Finance was deceived. Now, Sir, this brings us up to the granting of the certificate, and I say it is a most remarkable thing that the Finance Minister in the face of these repeated warnings; in the face of this indisputable evidence that Travers was crooked, granted this certificate. But, I would take the matter just a step further; I would like to know if the responsibility of the government ends with the granting of the certificate. Has the government no further duty to perform? has it no further obligation to protect the people? Let them read sections 112 and 113 of the Bank Act. Section 112 says:

> Monthly returns shall be made by the bank to the minister in the forms set forth in the schedule to this Act.

Section 113 reads:

> The minister may also call for special returns from any bank whenever in his judgment they are necessary to afford a full and complete knowledge of its conditions.

So that after the certificate was granted the Minister of Finance had the right not only to a monthly return, but he had the right at any time to ask for a special return that he might be apprised of the condition of the bank in any respect. Did the Minister of Finance find nothing in the correspondence which passed between him and the state superintendent of insurance for New York over a year ago, to warrant him in asking for a special return in order that he might have full and complete knowledge of the condition of the Farmers' Bank. Let me read what is said by an American paper of date, January 17, 1910, commenting on this matter:

> An amazing and almost incredible story, which should make every Canadian blush for shame is on file here in the public records of the Department of Insurance of New York State. It relates how, in the face of repeated warnings and urgent entreaties, based on undisputed facts, the Finance Department of Canada refused summarily to investigate the Farmers' Bank a year ago when it was beginning to totter on the brink of inevitable disaster.

There we have the whole thing in a nutshell so far as the minister's responsibility is concerned after the certificate was granted, I repeat that his responsibility as Minister of Finance did not end with the granting of the certificate, but that it was up to him in the face of the correspondence which passed between him and the New York state superintendent of insurance to hold the most rigid and careful examination into the condition of the Farmers' Bank. Had he done his duty in that respect the people of this province would have been saved the heavy losses they have sustained. Now, Sir, what members do we find on the government side of the House opposing this resolution asking for a Royal Commission? We have in opposition the Minister of Finance, and that is of course very natural I suppose, and we have the opposition of the Prime Minister, who thinks it is necessary to protect and shield his followers, which I suppose is very natural also. In addition to that, up to the present time we have had the opposition of the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Miller) to the granting of this Royal Commission. That hon. gentleman interested himself very energetically and enthusiastically some time last year, in raising that beautiful fund which was presented to the Minister of Finance, the $120,000 present. I believe it is said that the hon. member for South Grey contributed slightly to that fund. At all events I think I am correct in saying that the hon. gentleman told us himself in this House that he was one of those who solicited subscriptions. Well, that was last year; he occupies the position of chairman of the Banking and Commerce Committee this year.

Now, Sir, the Farmers' Bank in all its transactions from beginning to end is a very sorry spectacle. It seems to me that it was conceived in fraud and iniquity, and that there was a deliberate attempt from the very beginning of the organization of this bank to rob the people of the province. From the day that the Finance Minister, regardless of the repeated warnings which he had received, granted the certificate, down to the time that the bank failed a short time ago, every bit of history of the transaction is marked with fraud and deceit. The Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister have failed in their duty to the people and I regret that they are disposed at the present time to add to the burden of their sins, already one would think, greater than ordinary mortals could bear, by refusing this very reasonable request of my hon. friend from Halton that a Royal Commission be issued to inquire into the Farmers' Bank. For my part, I am very strongly in accord with the resolution. I think I would not be doing my duty to the people of my constituency who have suffered serious loss from the failure of this bank did I not urge upon the House the appointment of a Royal Commission. After hearing the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister oppose the resolution we who come from constituencies where people have sustained heavy losses by the failure of this bank have nothing much to expect in the way of the granting of the request of this resolution. Very well, the responsibility will be put on this government and I can assure the hon. Minister of Finance that the people of my county, when they are aware, and they are pretty well aware now, of his inefficiency as a Minister of Finance, of his inability to cope with the financial situation, of his failure to regard repeated warnings given to him and which, if he had regarded them, would have saved them from the loss which they have sustained, will not have very much confidence in his ability to go to Washington and negotiate a treaty for the benefit of this country.

Mr. EDWARDS.

Mr. E. W. NESBITT (North Oxford). Mr. Speaker, there is a great deal in the remarks of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) in introducing this resolution, with which I personally am entirely in accord. It is a great pity in the financial interests of the country and also in the interests of the people who have been so severely punished that a fraud of this kind should have peen perpetrated on the public. I also have a large number of people in the riding that I haye the honour of representing in this House who have been very severely punished, and I know that we have in two townships in North Oxford lost $105,000 in deposits. It would not require a person to have very much sympathy in his nature to sympathize with these people. I heard the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) last evening read a letter from some one at Lakeside in my constituency, the lady who wrote the letter, I suppose, being either the wife of one of my constituents or a widow in that constituency. I have been approached by people who lost money deposited in that bank to ask the government to see that they were reimbursed for their losses. I have also been approached by people to ask the government to appoint a Royal Commission to investigate, although I may say not exactly the kind of Royal Commission that is proposed by the resolution. I heard the resolution read yesterday, but I am slow to gather in what is read in that way, and until to-day I did not know what was in that resolution. If I may be allowed I would like to read it just to hear myself read it:

> This House is of opinion that a Royal Commission should forthwith issue to inquire into and investigate the incorporation and organization of the Farmers' Bank of Canada, and the granting of a certificate by the Treasury Board permitting said bank to issue notes and transact business, and all the circumstances connected therewith——

That is into the issuing of the certificate:

> —and generally to inquire into and investigate the operation and efficiency of the Bank Act in relation to the affairs and transactions of said bank.

There is nothing asking the government to appoint a commission to inquire into the working of the Farmers' Bank after it was instituted or into the present condition of the Farmers' Bank that was. What I would think would be much more necessary would be to inquire into the present condition and find out if there were any means of recovering some of the money that the depositors and shareholders of the Farmers' Bank were beaten out of. As far as the issuing of the certificate is concerned, I cannot agree with the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) when he says that the shareholders were looking to the Finance Minister to protect them in not issuing the certificate. I venture to say that there was not one in twenty of these subscribers who knew that when the charter was issued the bank did not come into existence. I venture to say that until this discussion came on in the newspapers with reference to the certificate there were very few subscribers of the Farmers' Bank who knew that a certificate had to be issued after the charter was obtained. I believe that most of them thought that the instant the charter was obtained it authorized the bank to go on and do business. Therefore, I do not believe that there was deception in so far as the subscribers were concerned. Perhaps a good many people who bought stock in the Farmers' Bank now do not really understand what the discussion is as between the certificate and the charter. The fact is that these stocks are sold by very enterprising gentlemen as a rule, men who have very smooth tongues, and you will see in this Return which has been brought down by the government that the prospectus points to the profits that might be obtained by buying stock in this bank, comparing it with the older banks that have been in existence for a long time. That, I know, is done. I am not selling stock for any corporation. I frequently have propositions brought to my attention and I have many times been asked to sell stock for various institutions, but up to the present I have refused for the very simple reason that I never know whether the corporation will be a success or not. I do occasionally buy some stock, if I can borrow money enough to do it, and I have generally been deceived myself, although I do not know that I know so very much less than the ordinary individual shareholder in my section of the country.

Coming down to the question whether the Finance Minister was guilty of any negligence or not, I am quite sure that none of my hon. friends opposite will say that they charge him with anything else. I do not think that any one of them will say that the Finance Minister had any wrong intention when he allowed that certificate to be given to the Farmers' Bank; but looking at this matter in a proper light, the question is: Was the Finance Minister negligent in his duty? We must all admit that the Finance Minister is not more responsble for the Bank Act than any other hon. member in this House. We are all equally responsible The hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Edwards), has continually referred to it as the Finance Minister's Bank Act, but that Act was in force practically as it is now before Mr. Fielding became Finance Minister, so that he is no more responsible for it than any other hon. member of this House. In executing that Act, he acts in an administrative position. He has to administer the Act as he finds it, and I claim that he did so administer it. Under clause 15, after all other requirements have been complied with, the promoters have to deposit $250,000 with the Receiver General and $5,000 for currency. The hon. minister (Mr. Fielding) did see that that $250,000 was deposited. It is quite true that Mr. Leighton McCarthy notified him not to issue a certificate until some irregularities were removed, but in another letter Mr. McCarthy withdrew that notification. He said most distinctly that he withdrew the charges he had made, and his opposition to the issue of the certificate. He withdrew entirely his opposition, in so far as his clients were concerned. I do say that I can sympathize with my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson), who may have given a hint to the Finance Minister that everything was not right, but did not want to put himself in writing. He did not want to commit himself to writing for the simple reason that none of us want to assume the position we would have to assume by putting ourselves in writing if we were not absolutely sure of the facts. I quite believe that if we were aware that a fraud was about to be committed on the government or anybody else, we would be only too willing to give notice to the parties interested. But my hon. friend from Halton was naturally very careful not to put himself on record in writing. He was very careful not to tell the Finance Minister in writing that he thought a fraud was about to be committed. The Finance Minister was in exactly the same position. He dared not move until he was absolutely sure because he might do a good deal more harm than he possibly could do good. When Mr. McCarthy withdrew his objections, the minister had nothing before him to show that there was anything wrong. He had the affidavit required by clause 15, and after Mr. McCarthy had withdrawn his opposition there was certainly nothing to warrant the minister in concluding that Travers was not telling the truth when he told him that the subscriptions were regular and that everything was regular. If my hon. friend from Halton did not want to put himself in writing, I can quite understand that the Minister of Finance would not dare to prevent the issuing of that certificate. If he had, there would have been a cry to high heaven that he was standing in with the moneyed interests and the banking association and consequently had refused to give the farmers a charter and see how they could run a bank for themselves.

The Finance Minister was not authorized by anything shown here to refuse that certificate. The next day after the certificate had been issued, when Mr. Clouston, President of the Banking Association, told him he did not think everything was right and that the moneys had not been all obtained for that certificate, properly Mr. Clouston was very careful in the letter he wrote not to be very definite in his statements. He did not say that there was something wrong, but that he heard something was wrong, and asked the Minister to delay issuing the certificate. But there was nothing in the Act to authorize the Minister of Finance to stop that certificate. Had he done so, he and the government would have been open to prosecution.

Mr. BOYCE. Would the hon. gentleman say that the certificate having been issued, and the attention of the Minister of Finance or the Treasury Board having been drawn to the fact the following day that that certificate had been obtained by fraud, the government were powerless to prevent a continuance of that fraud on the public?

Mr. NESBITT. There is nothing in the Bank Act to show what the government should do in such a case. There is no power or instructions in it to meet such a case. Mr. Clouston said in his letter that he had heard that there were rumours and asked that they be investigated. There was no charge.

Mr. BOYCE. Mr. Clouston said, as President of the Canadian Bankers' Association, to the Finance Minister that he had reason to believe, and that is very different from having heard.

Mr. NESBITT. What is the difference? The words are not the same but the meaning in each case is identical. It needs a peculiar mind to construe them differently. What I say is this, that if there be anything wrong in this matter it is the Bank Act, and the Minister of Finance did not make that Act any more than any of the rest of us, and if that Act is wrong, then it is high time we should amend it, and I understand there is going to be a new Bank Act. Now, I hope that all these hon. gentlemen who deem themselves so wise during this debate will be at the Banking and Commerce Committee and show an interest there in the amending of the Banking Act, and try to put through a Bank Act that will guard against these evils. I quite agree with the hon. member who said yesterday that there should be corroborative or collateral evidence in addition to the affidavit before the issuance of the certificate authorizing a bank to commence operations. But I do not agree with the suggestion of sending for the minute book of the people who are incorporating. I know that the present Bank Act does not authorize this. I believe it has never been done, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) says that it has never been done in his time.

Now, as to reimbursing these depositors, where would this end? Some hon. gentleman says that we have voted moneys to the sufferers by great calamities in this and in other countries. That is quite true, but I think that that is entirely different from voting moneys to repay these depositors, much as I sympathize with them. These calamities that are referred to are the act of God. But these people who put money into this bank—I am not speaking harshly of them; there are a number of them in my own section—had access to a bank of which they were sure all the time, the Post Office Savings Bank; and they could have got just as good interest in it as they got in the Farmers' Bank. Right in the same place where the Farmers' Bank had an office, there was the Post Office Savings Bank ready to receive the people's money. Therefore, this loss is not in the same class as loss in a calamity which, as I have said, is the act of God.

One thing was said last night that surprised me a good deal, and that was what my hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Crothers) said with regard to a former member of this House. I did not think the hon. gentleman would be so—well, so unfair. It was an insinuation that Mr. Calvert, formerly whip on this side of the House, had introduced this man Travers to the Finance Minister for financial reasons—nothing more and nothing less. Now, Mr. Calvert denies over his own signature in the newspapers that he had any possible interest in giving this introduction. He said that when he was whip, former mayor Urquhart of Toronto wrote him a letter introducing this man Travers to him—he had never seen the man before, and did not know him—and asking him to introduce Travers to the Finance Minister. Mr. Calvert received hundreds of letters of that kind from various people all through the country. He did introduce this man to the Minister of Finance. He afterwards borrowed from the Farmers' Bank $3,000—like any other man who would borrow; and he repaid it, like any other borrower. Should I think my hon. friend from West Elgin himself will see that it is not a fair thing to throw suspicion on a transaction of that kind. There was no need for suspicion; Mr. Calvert did what he had a perfect right to do. Every member of this House is asked to introduce people he knows little about to ministers of the Crown. If these people turn out wrong, to a certainty it is not our fault.

So far as this resolution is concerned, I think the whole fault whatever it may be, lies with the Bank Act. If this idea of reimbursing the depositors were carried out, some of my people would benefit by it, and I should be glad to see it done if the doing of it could be justified. But we could not make an exception of these people; we should have to go back to the people interested in the Banque de St. Jean, the Banque Ville Marie and others. We could not very well do that. And there are many other things for which, on the same ground, we should have to reimburse people—for there are so many companies chartered by the government that afterwards beat the people. It is too bad that it is so, but I presume that it will always be so. Nobody sympathizes with these losers more than I do, but I do not see why we should be asked to take money out of the public treasury to reimburse them. They deposited their money in the Farmers' Bank with their eyes wide open, when they had, as I have said, other places where they could have deposited it with absolute safety, guaranteed by the government itself. The Bank Act, I think, should be amended in many ways; but I am not going to discuss that this afternoon; this is not the time for such a discussion. I shall have much pleasure, if I am living and the Bank Act comes before the Committee on Banking and Commerce, in taking part in the discussion there. I have my own views as to how the Act should be amended—very strong views— and I agree that we should protect the people to the very best of our ability in these charters that we issue. This applies not only to bank charters, but to all others. We should be more careful in all the charters we issue here. For my part, I hope it will not be many years before the Dominion Companies' Act will be amended. Many improvements could be made in that law for the better protection of the public. But, after all, you cannot wholly protect the public. We are not a paternal government, and the public will always, no doubt, be buying stock in something in which it will be beaten. As to this particular bank which is under discussion, I quite agree with the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) that it was intended from the first to beat everybody; I do not believe that it had any other idea. I would like to see these people severely punished. If the courts, which are now investigating this case, do not investigate it thoroughly and punish adequately everybody who should be punished in connection with the matter. I hope the government will appoint a Royal Commission and follow up the case. But I do not think this is the time—while the courts are investigating—to ask the government to appoint a Royal Commission. And I still say, with all due deference to the opinions of others, that nothing has been said during this debate that would lead any person to believe that the Finance Minister did not do his duty fully as laid down by the Bank Act. Especially will this be seen to be the case when you consider that it would have been just as dangerous—perhaps more so—for him to make an error by refusing a certificate to people who should have it as to err in granting a certificate. The Minister of Finance speaking yesterday afternoon, quite fairly called attention to the fact that these people who made this application were then creditable men. We are all gifted with wonderful hindsight as compared with our foresight. We all know now that this was a fraud. We all know that this man Travers was a fraud. For my part, before the bank started I had never heard of him, and I venture to say that the Finance Minister had never heard of him either, until Travers was introduced to him. Some people have commented upon what a nice letter the Finance Minister wrote to this man on the day when he issued this certificate.

Now hon. gentlemen know that there is no point in that sneer against the Finance Minister. That was only an ordinary polite letter such as we get every day, and if hon. gentlemen opposite dont get that class of letters every day from business men, I do, and I hope that is the class of letters they write to business men. Why should they sneer at the Finance Minister, because he wrote an ordinary polite letter to a man that, so far as he knew, was honest, and who wanted to deal with the government in an absolutely honest manner? Now I want to put myself on record as saying that I would like to see this matter investigated thoroughly, and so far as I have been able to observe, it is being thoroughly investigated in Toronto. I see that yesterday two or three other men have been committed, I hope they will have a fair trial, and if they have been guilty of any fraud, that they will be punished. I believe there are men who have borrowed money from the Farmers' Bank who will be uncovered by the liquidators, and if they are able, they will be forced to pay the money back. I look to see the liquidation of the Farmers' Bank turn out better than many now expect, because I believe that some of those to whom the Farmers' Bank had lent money in a reckless manner, will be forced to return it. If that is not done, I hope the government will appoint a commission that will compel them to do so, and that will see that everybody who has been guilty of fraud in connection with the Farmers' Bank will be punished. But I do not see the need of inquiring into the Bank Act as applicable to the failure of the Farmers' Bank at present when we are to take up the revision of the Bank Act itself in a few days, and if there is anything lacking in the Bank Act that will be the time to make it right. When that time comes, I hope that hon. gentlemen opposite will show just as much interest in preparing a thoroughly efficient and proper Bank Act, as they are now in asking for a Royal Commission.

Mr. RICHARD BLAIN (Peel). My excuse for taking up a short time of the House in discussing this question, is that in my own county, at a small place called Chiltenham, the people have lost already, or will lose, $36,600. I was much interested in listening to the remarks of my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt). He stated that those who organized this bank were guilty of fraud, but he is unwilling to vote for a resolution that will bring about a searching examination to find out who is responsible. My hon. friend suggests that possibly a revision of the Bank Act might reach the case. For myself, I cannot understand how any revision of the Bank Act is going to assist to bring those who are guilty to justice, or recover any of the money which has been lost by many persons in the province of Ontario by reason of the failure of the Farmers' Bank. I crave the indulgence of the House to read a petition that was presented from my own county, bearing the signature of 70 men who are sufferers from this failure, men who had invested their money either in stock of the bank, or placed it on deposit. This petition is only one among many others that have been presented to the right hon. the First Minister and the Finance Minister in relation to this difficulty:

To the honourable the House of Commons in parliament assembled:

The petition of shareholders and of creditors of the Farmers' Bank of Canada humbly sheweth:—

1. The bank was incorporated by an Act of the parliament of Canada, chapter 77, of Edward VII.

2. The Act was amended by subsequent Acts.

3. The bank was organized in the year 1906.

4. A large proportion of the shareholders are farmers.

5. The government return for October, 1910, reports the total assets of the bank at $2,670,195, and the total liabilities at $2,051,081, leaving a surplus of $619,114.

6. The bank suspended on the 19th day of December, 1910, and Geoffrey T. Clarkeson, accountant, has been appointed curator, and has taken possession of the head office and branch offices of the bank, and of the books, assets and securities at the offices.

7. The curator has with the assistance of a retired bank manager and some of the officers of the bank, made a partial examination and investigation into the assets and liabilities of the bank, and your petitioners are informed and believe that the curator will report to the shareholders and creditors that a large proportion of the capital and deposits has been lost by the officials of the bank in their own speculative and unlawful transactions, and amongst others:

(1) In the purchase, equipment and development of a mining prospect.

(2) In loans on unlawful and insufficient securities.

(3) In personal loans to borrowers who have no means or ability to repay them.

8. The deposits are stated to be more than $1,500,000 and the paid-up capital stock about $580,000.

9. Your petitioners are informed and believe that the shareholders will be called upon to pay the double liability on their shares, and that all the available and collectable assets, inclusive of the double liability, will not realize a sufficient sum of money to pay more than an approximate rate of twenty-five cents on the dollar to the general creditors after payment of preferential claims.

10. Your petitioners have been trusting to the published government returns of the assets and liabilities of the bank and the difference between the published returns and the actual state of the accounts of the bank, appear to show a loss of the money of the shareholders and depositors within a period of four years of approximately the sum of $1,500,000.

11. The grief, the sorrow, the physical and mental suffering brought on the families of shareholders and creditors cannot be told in a petition.

12. Your petitioners refer to the examination under oath of the inspector of the bank in open court at Lindsay, and to the report which will soon be prepared by the curator.

13. And it is evident that in too many instances the families of shareholders and creditors will be compelled to meet great distress and suffering.

14. And your petitioners respectfully submit——

I want to direct attention particularly to this.

And your petitioners respectfully submit to the parliament of Canada that it is material and necessary in the public interest to have a thorough and exhaustive examination of the government returns which have been made by the officers of the bank and of all the affairs, accounts and transactions involving the use of the money of the bank.

Now in closing, I want to direct this latter paragraph to the attention of my hon. friend from North Oxford, because in his county there are some people who are losing money.

15. And your petitioners respectfully pray that a Royal Commission shall at once be issued with full powers to examine into the affairs of the bank from the time of its incorporation until its suspension, and of all the accounts, dealings and transactions with the money, securities, assets and liabilities of the bank, and your petitioners will ever pray.

This is signed by P. O. Macdonald, T. H. Elliott, F. P. Hames, in all by 70 persons, who have suffered by the wrongdoing of some persons. For myself I cannot agree with my hon. friend from North Oxford when he says that the responsibility for this difficulty does not rest upon the government; in my opinion all the responsibility rests on the government of the day. There is responsibility somewhere. The Prime Minister has stated that it does not rest with the Banking and Commerce Committee or with the House in passing the incorporation Bill, the one important point is the minister's responsibility for granting the certificate that allowed the bank's doors to be opened for the people to deposit their money. Let me suggest that if the Banking and Commerce Committee of this House when this bank was seeking incorporation for the first time, and subsequently when it came for extension of time had been made aware of such a letter as was written by Mr. McCarthy, then a member of this House, not a member on either side of the House would have granted the extension or granted the bank incorporation at all. Therefore, whatever responsibility may attach to the members of the Banking and Commerce Committee, and of this House there is surely a special responsibility resting on my right hon. friend as Prime Minister, upon the Treasury Board and particularly upon my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. Leaving out the question of incorporation and extension what does the Finance Minister say about it in his speech of yesterday:

> The first stage in this matter of the issue of the certificate is to be found in a communication from Mr. Leighton McCarthy, who says he is instructed by some shareholders, his clients, to object to the issue of the certificate, and he states in a subsequent letter that he complains that in come cases where large sums of money have been paid, notes have also been given. Now, at that time the application for a certificate had not yet been received, and, therefore, there was no such application.

Then when this all-important time arrived in the bank's history, the first matter that came to the attention of the Finance Minister was a letter from Mr. McCarthy which was as follows:

> Home Life Building, Victoria St.,
> Toronto, Oct. 8, 1906.
>
> Counsel, Wallace Nesbitt, K.C.
>
> Honourable W. S. Fielding
> Minister of Finance,
> Ottawa.
>
> My Dear Mr. Fielding,—I have been consulted on behalf of a number of subscribers to the shares of the Farmers' Bank, and from the instructions I have received, a number of the subscribers will dispute the bona fide character of the subscriptions. I have not time to-night to give a full statement of the grounds of this request to you, but I beg to assure you that grave conditions have arisen which will require careful consideration before the Treasury Board would grant any certificate for the organization of this bank.
>
> I, therefore, ask you to be good enough to stay any action which might be taken until I have had an opportunity of discussing this with you. If it is not asking you to hold it too long, I would prefer not having to go to Ottawa this week, but will go any day next week which would suit your convenience. Of course, if there is no immediate prospect of your granting such a certificate, my seeing you at an early date will not be necessary.
> LEIGHTON McCARTHY.

The Finance Minister states that everything has been presented to the House and practically everything has been discussed. The House has no knowledge whatever of the personal interview and of what took place between Mr. McCarthy and the Finance Minister.

Mr. FIELDING. I do not think I had any such interview. I do not recollect any at all events. I do not think Mr. McCarthy came to me on the subject.

Mr. BLAIN. That is one of the difficulties. We have a letter from Mr. McCarthy stating that he would come to Ottawa.

Mr. FIELDING. Later on it appears that he did not come. I am pretty sure I am correct in saying that Mr. McCarthy did not see me about it.

Mr. BLAIN. I accept that statement. My hon. friend had notice from Mr. McCarthy that there was something wrong. My hon. friend knew at that time that a large number of people in almost every part of the province of Ontario had subscribed for stock, had paid a portion of their money and given notes for some of the balance. Not only was my hon. friend aware of that, but he said in the House that when this matter was up for an extension in the Banking and Commerce Committee he was a little suspicious of the affair himself. Suspicious of what? Suspicious that these men who were associated in the early history of this bank were not the men to whom to entrust the people's money and public honour of this country?

Mr. FIELDING. No, that was not it.

Mr. BLAIN. My hon. friend denies that, but he goes on in his speech and is very careful to give a character to Mr. Travers. May I say to my hon. friend, with all deference to the high position he occupies, that the public have dealt to some extent with Mr. Travers, and they want to deal with my hon. friend the Finance Minister now, because my hon. friend the Finance Minister had more to do with the granting of this certificate than any other man in Canada. One word from the Finance Minister at a critical stage in the history of this bank, not after the bank had been organized and the people had put their money into it, but when he either took this letter of Mr. McCarthy's before the Treasury Board or did not, would have settled this question and not a man in Canada would have lost a dollar through this bank. May I ask the Finance Minister and the Prime Minister whether or not, when this matter was discussed in the Treasury Board, Mr. McCarthy's letter was read to the board?

Mr. FIELDING. I could not tell my hon. friend. Mr. McCarthy's letter having been withdrawn, was no longer an issue. The Treasury Board record must speak for itself, but as to what actually occurred between the members of the Treasury Board at that time I would not from memory attempt to speak.

Mr. BLAIN. My hon. friend in answering Mr. McCarthy said:

I wired you to-day that no application had been made by the promoters for the Treasury Board certificate, and suggested that you send forward at once any representations which you may wish to make, to which we shall give all due consideration.

Mr. FIELDING. Then they were withdrawn?

Mr. BLAIN. May I say that my hon. friend the Finance Minister was not speaking in that letter particularly as Finance Minister; he was writing over his signature representing the Treasury Board, and he told Mr. McCarthy over his own signature that whatever representations he had to make would be placed before the Treasury Board when they met to deal with this certificate. My hon. friend's memory is a little short now.

Mr. FIELDING. No.

Mr. BLAIN. Well, my hon. friend is not able to state whether or not that letter was read to the board.

Mr. FIELDING. The letter having been withdrawn, Mr. McCarthy having withdrawn his objections, I think it is quite possible the letter was not read, but I cannot speak from memory on a matter of several years ago.

Mr. BLAIN. If it was not read the greater the responsibility on the head of the Finance Minister because he took upon himself to receive communications from a gentleman who was objecting to the granting of the certificate, he corresponded not as Mr. Fielding, but as Finance Minister of this country, and a member of the Treasury Board, took upon himself to accept communications, to answer communications, to receive further communications and telegrams, and then because some of these had been withdrawn, he took upon himself to not submit any of them to the Treasury Board.

My hon. friend's record in connection with the establishment of banks is not so good, as was pointed out by my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) in his speech during this afternoon.

The responsibility, therefore, must rest with the Minister of Finance. Whatever the policy of the government may have been in the past in respect to granting these certificates to banks; whether they did it at the close of a council meeting or not, whether they did it in a formal or informal way, whatever the past history of my hon. friend as a member of the Treasury Board, he had sufficient warning in this case; he had suspicions of his own when the bank was asking extension of time, he had suspicions when Mr. McCarthy, a member of this House and a political supporter of his own party wrote him a warning letter; he had sufficient information in his possession, as a trustee of the public interest, to call the board formally together and go into the whole matter in detail. There is no question about that. The Finance Minister had been warned time and again. My hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) prior to the granting of the certificate had more than one conversation with him as the Minister of Finance admits. What were these conversations about? Would there be any necessity for them if everything was all right. And yet, we had the Minister of Finance saying yesterday to my hon. friend (Mr. Henderson): You need not be alarmed, Mr. Henderson, you have notified the government, your responsibility ceases. And the member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) struggled to point out that the same responsibility rests with the member for Halton in the premises as rests with the Minister of Finance. Surely when he reads his remarks in 'Hansard' to-morrow he will not subscribe to such a doctrine. What is the Finance Minister for, anyway, and why is he selected for the second position in the cabinet if it is not that he should specially protect the interests of the public in such a matter. What nonsense it is to argue that he has no greater responsibility in such a proceeding than has an ordinary member of the House. And, when the Prime Minister spoke he was careful to discuss everything but the request of those who are suffering, that a Royal Commission should be appointed, and that, Sir, is the crux of the whole question that is before the House, before the courts, and before the people of Canada. I am not going to discuss just now the question of recouping out of the public treasury these sufferers, but I will read the resolution of my hon. friend, (Mr. Henderson):

This House is of the opinion that a Royal Commission should forthwith issue to inquire into and investigate the incorporation and organization of the Farmers' Bank of Canada, and the granting of a certificate by the Treasury Board permitting the said bank to issue notes and commence business, and all circumstances connected therewith, and generally to inquire into and investigate the operation and efficiency of the Bank Act in relation to the affairs and transactions of the said bank.

I think I would be safe in saying that my hon. friend (Mr. Henderson? would not have gone too far if he had moved a resolution condemning the government, the Minister of Finance, and the Treasury Board for failing to discharge their whole duty in respect to the granting of the certificate to the Farmers' Bank. But, the resolution is so mild in form, that in view of the statement of the Prime Minister, and of the Minister of Finance that there has been no wrongdoing on the part of the government I should have thought that they would cheerfully accept such a resolution asking for a Royal Commission. If the Minister of Finance is not guilty as he declares, who can suffer. Certainly the government will not suffer from an elucidation of the facts if they have done nothing wrong. Surrounded as this whole question is with suspicion, why is it that the Prime Minister and particularly the Finance Minister do not hail this resolution with sighs of relief and declare that they will reveal everything in connection with the transaction. But, the Minister of Finance stands up and declares to his followers that there shall be no Royal Commission and asks support. In the different sections of the province of Ontario there are homesteads disappearing from the possession of their original owners and there are men who hitherto have lived in comfort forced to take up the pick and shovel to earn a livelihood for the remainder of their years, and all on account of the ruin brought on them by this unfortunate collapse of the Farmers' Bank. And yet the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance tell these unfortunate people that they are to have no recourse, that justice is not to be rendered them, that there is not to be an inquiry into how this bank came into being and as to the fraud it perpetrated; and they call on their majority in this House to vote down a resolution which might give these poor people some relief. Yesterday we had the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster). the responsible representative of a great city in this Dominion, stating in his place in the House that if a commission is granted he would bring forward other evidence that cannot be presented without the appointment of such a commission. The Minister of Finance knows full well that there is evidence to be found that will not come out in the investigation which is taking place in the city of Toronto, and which only can be made public through a Royal Commission. I do not wish to detain the House longer, and in conclusion I will say to the Prime Minister and to his Finance Minister that there is no class of the community, whether they be losers by the Farmer's Bank or not who will feel that the government has done its duty if they refuse to accept this moderate resolution proposed by my hon. friend (Mr. Henderson). It is not a resolution condemning the government before they are tried; it merely asks for a full and complete investigation by an impartial tribunal so that the people will know where the money came from, and where the money has gone.

Mr. M. Y. McLEAN (South Huron). Mr. Speaker, I desire to say only a very few words on this subject, and I do not intend to waste the time of the House discussing the sophistries, insinuations and suspicions indulged in by my hon. friend (Mr. Blain) who has just preceded me. In listening to the remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite, as well as to those of my hon. friend who has just taken his seat, the thought has occurred to me that if the foresight of these gentlemen were only half as good as their hindsight they would be very wise indeed, but unfortunately for us all, that is not our condition. If it were we would be saved from many difficulties, many disasters and many pitfalls. I do very sincerely and truly sympathize with my hon. friend (Mr. Henderson) who has moved this resolution. There are stockholders and depositors in this bank in my own constituency. The bank had, I think, three agencies in the constituency and there are deposits to the amount of about $100,000 or over. But, I am sorry I cannot congratulate my hon. friend on the manner in which he has introduced this resolution or the time that he has chosen to do it. Neither, Mr. Speaker, can I congratulate hon. gentlemen opposite on their attempt to make political capital out of this unfortunate affair. I have very carefully and attentively listened to the discussion of this subject, I have very carefully perused all the evidence that has been submitted to this House, I think that possibly I am, in a measure, as capable of judging the evidence as some of my hon. friends who have spoken on the opposite side, and I am free to say that for the life of me I cannot discover that my hon. friend the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) or the Finance Department have been blamable in any sense whatever. In so far as my judgment enables me to interpret these documents they have only done what they should have done in connection with the matter. It is quite true, Sir, that the department was deceived by Mr. Travers, but they are not the only parties who have been deceived by Mr. Travers. Mr. Travers deceived his shareholders, he deceived his provisional directors, he deceived his permanent board of directors, and he deceived the late president of that board. I am also free to say that, from my examination of the evidence which has been taken before the courts in Toronto, I am firmly of the belief that, bad as Mr. Travers is, he has simply been the tool of another archconspirator and rogue, who, I am sorry to say, has not been captured, and I am led to believe that the authorities possibly have not made as great exertions to capture him as they might have made.

If, under these exceptional circumstances, the government can see fit, or think it advisable, to recommend that the depositors in this bank should in some measure be reimbursed, and if this can be done without setting a dangerous precedent, I would be very glad. I have not so much sympathy with the stockholders of the bank. The stockholders went into it knowing what they were doing, at least they should have known what they were doing. They went into it as a business enterprise, and if it had succeeded as a business enterprise they would have profited. But, as it has not succeeded as a business enterprise, of course, like investors in any other similar business, they have lost. But, it is very different with the depositors. The depositors placed their money in this institution for safe-keeping, believing at the time that they were protected in so doing by the laws of the land, and, under the circumstances, as I said before, if the government should see fit, or if they should consider themselves in a position to grant some measure of aid to these unfortunate people without setting a precedent which might be considered dangerous, then I think that the country will certainly support them in so doing.

Let us come down to the real issue that is before the House and to the substance of the motion moved by the hon. member for Halton. That motion has been read two or three times already this afternoon, but for the sake of my argument, I want to read a portion of it again. The resolution says:

> That this House is of opinion that a Royal Commission should forthwith issue to inquire into and investigate the incorporation and organization of the Farmers' Bank of Canada, and the granting of a certificate by the Treasury Board permitting said bank to issue notes and transact business, and all circumstances connected therewith——

I maintain that there is no necessity for a commission for any such purpose. I maintain that all the evidence which any commission could possibly secure has already been obtained and has already been placed before this House by the Department of Finance. Not only that, but the resolution casts a doubt upon the honesty and fidelity of the Minister of Finance and the Department of Finance, and I certainly cannot vote for such a motion as that, because I have full confidence that the minister, the department and the Treasury Board would not do a dishonest or dishonourable act to favour any person. The second part of the resolution is:

> —and generally to inquire into and investigate the operation and efficiency of the Bank Act in relation to the affairs and transactions of the said bank.

Why should we carry a resolution of that kind at the present time? That question is not before the House. That question will be presented to the House before very long, and when it does come before the House is the proper time to decide as to whether or not such a commission is required. But, Sir, I contend that the affairs of this banking institution are at the present time being investigated by the courts of this province. If that investigation is thorough and complete and if it answers all the purposes, then certainly there is no necessity for a Royal Commission such as is being proposed. It has been said that under a commission the Minister of Finance, and several other gentlemen who were named could be brought up and put into the box; but under the investigation now being prosecuted, the Finance Minister and every other man can be brought forward and made to give his evidence. This again shows the futility of the proposition before the House. I have no hesitation in saying that in the event of its being ascertained that the present investigation is not full, that justice is not being done, that those supposed to be criminals are being shielded and that an additional investigation is necessary, the government would be lacking in their duty to the people and themselves if they did not grant such an investigation. But the time for deciding that has not yet come. When it does, if it should come, the government can take action. For these reasons I have no hesitation in saying that I shall give my vote against the motion of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson).

Mr. C. J. THORNTON (Durham). With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to occupy a short time on this question, and I shall be very brief, because I have some sympathy for yourself, Sir, and the House who have to listen to this long discussion. The matter is, however, of so much importance to those of us especially who represent agricultural constituencies that I would be derelict in my duty if I did not give my views with regard to it. It has been my lot to have been brought very closely in contact with some of those who have suffered through this disastrous bank failure. It makes one's heart ache to see how much suffering has been caused by it. I have in my mind the case of a young woman whose husband was killed on the railway, and she was left with three young children. She gathered up what she could of what was left after his death and deposited $1,000 in this Farmers' Bank. To-day that is all gone and this poor woman with three children is left without any means of subsistence. I know the case of a man between 60 and 70 years of age, whose working days are over, who deposited his all in this bank, and now that it is gone he does not know where his means of living is to come from. I could multiply these instances by the score, and it makes one's heart bleed to realize how much suffering this fraudulent disaster has caused. It is wise, therefore, that we should look carefully and calmly into the facts of the case. How was this bank instituted? An appeal was made to a class of men who have very little experience in business and who are the natural prey of financial sharks. I refer to the farmers. Being a farmer myself, I know how to sympathize with them, and I know how they may be the easy victims of frauds such as this. An appeal was made to them. At the head of that prospectus are the names of responsible, successful business men. Why were these names inserted? They were used to decoy honest men into investing their money in that institution. If you examine that prospectus, you will find it looks as though it had been framed purposely to deceive the public. It says:

The Farmers' Bank of Canada is being formed to give the increased banking facilities required by the natural expanse of business coincident to rapid development in Canada——

Immediately following, it says:

—particularly the agricultural industry to whose interests, whilst conducting a general banking business, it will aim to give special consideration.

There you have a special appeal to the farmers on behalf of a banking institution which took the name of the Farmers' Bank, and which declared that it would give special attention and consideration to the interests of the farmers. Then the prospectus goes on to say:

No other safe business has been as profitable as banking and no other profitable business has been as safe as banking.

In order to further decoy the farmers it gives a table showing what profits have been made in banking in Canada, and it tells us that the Dominion Bank, the par value of which was $100 the share, are selling to-day at the price of $280 per share, and paying a dividend of 10 per cent. All that was declared purposely to lead the farmers to invest their savings in this bank. Then the prospectus goes on to give a list of the American banking institutions and quotes the Chemical National Bank of New York, the par value of whose shares was $100, and whose present price was $4,850 per share. These tables were of course quoted to deceive the farmers, and other innocent people who put their money into this institution. Then it goes on further to say:

That it was a safe investment and an investment increasing in value and an investment easily realizable.

These were all intended to deceive the people and induce them into subscribing to the stock. Further on the prospectus says:

This is an opportunity that seldom occurs and once the stock of the bank got into the hands of a few men, they hold it and it is almost impossible to buy bank stocks.

Further on in the latter part of the prospectus, this is set forth:

That the gentlemen who have consented to act as directors have succeeded in their own business and are admittedly men in whom the public have the highest confidence.

There was everything in that prospectus to lead the farmers to invest their money in that institution and they did so with the utmost confidence in its solvency. There is another thing. It was generally believed throughout the country that the deposit made with the government when a bank is started is an additional security to the shareholders and depositors. It was not generally known that that deposit was immediately given back with the exception of $5,000. In fact everything about this matter seemed to be for the purpose of deceiving the people. You notice that, before the bank began business, before the certificate was issued authorizing it to do business, a strong protest was made against the certificate being granted by the Treasury Board. The very fact that that protest was made in the wrong way in which it was made, together with the facts which that protest recited, were enough to have made any person in authority and connected with the granting of this certificate suspicious. That protest never was withdrawn. While there was a money settlement with the men whose interests were concerned in that protest, that act on the part of the promoters of that bank stood there against them, and should have been, in the eyes of the Finance Minister and the Treasury Board, something to cause them to hesitate before granting the certificate. That protest against the issuing of the certificate was settled, so far as the money part of it was concerned. But there is another matter to which I would direct the attention of the Minister of Finance and the House. The Bank Act provides that a bank shall not do business until the certificate of the Treasury Board is issued. We are told that, after this protest, had been entered by Mr. Leighton McCarthy against the issue of this certificate, an interview took place between the Finance Minister and Mr. Travers and that Mr. Travers gave the minister assurance that everything was straight in connection with the raising of the money for the deposit that was necessary before the certificate could issue. In his reply to the Finance Minister, Mr. Travers said:

In reply to your letter of the 30th of November, I have to say that in the case of the Farmers' Bank of Canada, the provisional directors did not raise the money in the way mentioned by you. You will find the statement put in by me absolutely correct as to the amount of stock subscribed and the amount paid up.

This was in direct contradiction of the allegation made by Mr. Leighton McCarthy. At pages 6 and 7 of this return we find the application which was made for this certificate of the Treasury Board. We have been told that the application was made by the Farmers' Bank of Canada. But I think there was an evasion of the law and something misleading in the application made by Mr. Travers. As a layman, I may not understand these matters, but I think that the very fact that the application for the certificate was put in by Mr. Travers in the way it was should have made the Treasury Board suspicious that things were not right. As I read the Bank Act, it does not say that the manager of a bank can get the certificate and start the bank. It does provide, as I understand it, that the president and directors of the bank can get the certificate and start the bank—assuming, of course, that they have complied with the conditions under the law. In this case, was an application made by the president? No. Nor was it made by the directors. This application reads as follows:

Toronto, Nov. 27, 1906.

Deputy Minister of Finance,
Parliament Buildings,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir,—I have the honour herewith to forward declaration of the general manager of the Farmers' Bank of Canada setting forth facts relating to the incorporation and organization of the said bank, and also giving the names of the directors——

And so on. And he goes on to say, at the end of this letter:

I apply for the certificate of the Treasury Board permitting the said bank to commence the business of banking.

W. R. TRAVERS,
General Manager.

Mr. THORNTON.

Mr. Travers himself applied for the certificate and was given that certificate. Now, I do not read the Bank Act as saying that the certificate is to be granted to the manager himself on his personal application. As I read the law, there should be an application on the part of the bank, signed at least by some of the bank officials who have authority. But in this case the application was made by a person said to be the general manager, but who, even as such, had no authority to ask for nor receive the certificate.

Another point that seems to me of great importance is the correspondence that took place between the Deputy Minister of Finance and the Deputy Minister of Justice with respect to Mr. Travers' application. I read at page 25 of this return the letter of the deputy Minister of Finance in which he says:

Dear Sir,—I beg to inclose herewith a file of papers being an application from the Farmers' Bank of Canada for a certificate to commence business under sections 13-17 of the Bank Act.

Kindly advise me if, on the papers submitted, such a certificate may legally issue.

Now there is something in this reply of the deputy minister that should have caused the Treasury Board suspicion. Now I will the Deputy Minister of Finance in which Deputy Minister of Justice.

In reply, I beg to state that the statements in the statutory declaration of Mr. Walter R. Travers are sufficient, if they are accepted——

Now he does not say they are sufficient, he does not say that they should be accepted, he does not pass any judgment upon their sufficiency, but he says 'if they are accepted,' that is, by the Treasury Board. Surely there is here an implication that they should not be accepted. There is in these few words of that letter, matter which should have caused the Treasury Board to pause, there was something which should have raised a suspicion in their minds that all was not right. Now there is another point I wish to bring out, and that is the fact that no certificate could issue without a meeting of the Treasury Board, and without the consent of the majority of the Treasury Board. Not only that, but there is the promise of the Finance Minister to Mr. Leighton McCarthy that his objection to the granting of a certificate would be laid before the Treasury Board when they considered the application for a certificate. That was of all things the most important to lay before the Treasury Board, that objection of Mr. Leighton McCarthy was the most important thing of all. Now will the Finance Minister say that that objection was laid before the Treasury Board? Did the Treasury Board consider that charge against these men who were trying to get this certificate? Did they ask if those things were true? Were they laid before the Treasury Board? Why, Mr. Speaker, we have the fact that the Treasury Board met on the 30th November, but the papers, all the documents which had been submitted to the board in connection with Mr. McCarthy's protest, were returned to Mr. McCarthy on the 7th of November, and the board did not meet until the 30th of November. Then when the papers had been returned to Mr. McCarthy, how could these matters have been laid before the board? It looks very suspicious to say the least of it.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock, I was directing attention to the conduct of the Treasury Board at the time the certificate was granted. We have Mr. McCarthy's letter and the minister's answer requesting particulars of the charges against these men who were asking a certificate for the Farmers' Bank, and the minister promised that the matter would be considered by the Treasury Board. All particulars were furnished, the charges were made against the promoters of the bank and yet the Treasury Board met on November 30, but the papers and particulars which had been furnished at the request of the minister had been returned to Mr. McCarthy on November 7. Evidently these men got the certificate without the objections having been considered by the Treasury Board. It is peculiar that the Treasury Board met on November 30 and that on that day there was correspondence between the Minister of Finance and Mr. Travers, and that on that day Mr. Travers received his certificate for the bank to start business. It looks as if everything had been hurried on that day. There was no occasion for hurry, an extension had been granted, good until January 18, so there were still about six weeks before the charter would expire. Who was hurrying the Treasury Board and the Finance Minister? The question arises, was Mr. Calvert or the president of the Trust and Guarantee Company hurrying matters on, and if so for what reason? Was there something in it for these men? These questions naturally arise, and the people out in the country are asking them.

There is something very distressing in the failure of the Farmers' Bank. Members from constituencies which were very much affected, receive many letters about it. I receive letters every few days appealing to me and asking if the government and the right hon. First Minister will not do something to relieve those who have been robbed of their all, for there are many whose whole substance has been taken from them by this, and wanting to know if there is not some relief to be granted by the government. If the government had been as careful of the people's interest as they should be, then immediately this failure occurred, they would have done something to relieve the situation and to show the people that they wanted to get after these designing men who robbed the shareholders and depositors. I know the plea is put up that there is no law to touch these men, that the government had no power to interfere. Is that so? Has it come to this? I am perfectly well aware they say there was a law and that the law was being enforced in Toronto, but we know how comparatively helpless that is; we know how the majority of these men have escaped the hands of justice and how the great offender in the case received what everybody says is too light a sentence, only six years for the crime he had perpetrated. The impression is abroad that he should have had 26 years. It looks as if there was something lax in the law when a man guilty of such a crime should receive a sentence of only six years, and is to-day living comparatively a gentleman giving evidence in Toronto. It looks as if the government ought to have done something more to get after those fellows. If there is no law to get after them should there not be? Are designing men to be allowed to rob innocent men, women and children of their hard-earned savings? If so, God help Canada and help her legislators, her lawmakers to make laws that will get after such men quickly.

There were warnings without number in connection with this bank failure. We had first of all numerous personal appeals made not only to the Finance Minister, but to other members of the government. These were more than gossip, they were practically definite charges made against the promoters of this bank, for the way in which they were trying to get the bank started. Then there was the direct charge made by Mr. Leighton McCarthy, coming from shareholders who had been, to say the least, fooled, who were being robbed and misrepresented in connection with the floating of this bank, and on the very day that the Treasury Board issued that certificate we have Mr. Clouston, in the name of the Canadian Bankers' Association, protesting strongly against that certificate being issued. Then within four months of the bank starting business we have this protest from the manager of the Milton branch of the bank, saying there was crookedness in connection with the management at head office, and we had later on another appeal from the Canadian Bankers' Association, through its secretary, saying there was something crooked in connection with the doings of this bank. All these warnings about the misdoings of the management should have shown it was time to do something. Had steps been taken by the department in some way to arrest these men in their work of robbing these innocent people, something could have been done. I do not wish to take time to recite the particulars of that insurance matter in New York state. You will remember that when the Minister of Finance was appealed to, his one answer was that contained in a letter dated January 12, 1910, to Wm. H. Hotchkiss, Superintendent of Insurance, Albany, New York:

> There being no government bank inspection in Canada I do not see how we can at present take the action that you desire. Probably the bank on application from you would explain the whole matter.
> (Signed) W. S. FIELDING.

Now, if there is not government bank inspection in Canada which would prevent these abuses, whose fault is it? Ought there not to be some way by which banks can be controlled, and some way in which bank managers can be prevented from fleecing the people. Let me refer briefly to the question of bank inspection. At different times the subject has been discussed in this House, but no action has up to the present time been taken. It is said, that in the last thirty years the people of Canada have lost no less than $45,000,000 in connection with bank failures, and I am inclined to think that is rather an underestimate. In thirty years there have been 29 bank failures in Canada, and in view of such deplorable figures it seems to be extraordinary that a system of government bank inspection has not been inaugurated before this. Three years ago this question was brought forcibly to the attention of the House by Mr. Pringle, then member for Stormont, and in the course of his remarks he laid great stress on government inspection of banks. Mr. Pringle stated that at the date on which he was speaking there were $600,000,000 deposited in Canadian banks, and to-day the deposits amount to over $800,000,000. I am well aware that there is a difference of opinion as to government bank inspection, and I can readily see how that may be the case. But some of the best bank managers that Canada has ever had are very strongly in favour of government bank inspection. Mr. H. S. McLeod, late manager of the Bank of Nova Scotia is strongly in favour of government inspection or of an independent audit or both, and he urged this matter on the government as far back as the year 1900, and at different times since then. In a letter to the Toronto 'Globe' on the 26th November, 1906, Mr. McLeod wrote:

> In Canada there were in existence in 1880, forty-one banks. Since then seven have been incorporated and have commenced business, making a total of forty-eight banks. Of this total, twelve have failed and some others have saved themselves by amalgamation. The failures are, therefore, 25 per cent in twenty-six years, the last ten of which were years of unexampled prosperity with steadily rising deposits—conditions under which even insolvent banks seldom close their doors.

Now, here is a very important part of Mr. McLeod's statement:

> Most if not all of the above mentioned failures were fraudulent, and it is now plainly evident that a few hours examination by a skilled banker would have disclosed an insolvent condition in any one of the banks years before it collapsed.

There cannot be any doubt as Mr. McLeod says that had there been efficient government bank inspection in Canada during the last 3 or 4 years this disastrous failure of the Farmers' Bank and the dreadful consequences that ensued could not have happened, because, as Mr. McLeod says, a few hours' examination by a skilled banker would have disclosed the insolvent condition of that bank Mr. McLeod says further:

> In each of the two most recent disasters a correct diagnosis could have been made ten or more years ago.

Had there been efficient bank inspection the Farmers' Bank could not have run six months without its insolvency being detected, and over one million dollars would have been saved to the innocent shareholders and depositors. Three years ago when Mr. Pringle brought this matter to the attention of the House, one of the most surprising things in that debate was the answer which the Minister of Finance then gave on the floor of the House. Speaking on the 2nd of March, 1908, he said (volume 3, 'Hansard' 1908, page 1499):

> Perhaps the most important question he (Mr. Pringle) discussed was that of government inspection. I confess without pretending to give a final judgment that my inclination is strongly against the views he has presented on that subject.
> I am disinclined to favour government inspection for several reasons:
> 1. In the first place I think it is unnecessary. There is no condition of affairs in Canada that calls for it.

Now, if there is no condition of affairs in Canada that calls for bank inspection I would be curious to know how rotten the condition of things must be to satisfy the Minister of Finance that government bank inspection is necessary. It is most distressing to contemplate that the state of affairs existing in this country in respect to banking must be worse than it is to-day before they call for efficient government inspection in the eyes of the Minister of Finance. It seems to me that the want of proper government inspection is where the Bank Act is weak, and where the Minister of Finance is at fault in not providing it. I believe there should have been efficient government bank inspection in Canada years ago. In the United States where there is a system of government inspection of national banks, a system which is not nearly as perfect as it should be, and which, indeed, is very imperfect, there has only been in the last 25 years 5 per cent of failures as against 25 per cent in Canada. It would seem to me, the Minister of Finance notwithstanding, that these figures show that government inspection is a good thing. I believe, Sir, that the time has come when something should be done by the government in the line indicated in the motion of my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson), I believe that the only way to get at the facts in connection with this deplorable business is to appoint a Royal Commission to make full and independent inquiry.

It has been acknowledged on all hands, and acknowledged by some hon. gentlemen on the government side of the House, that there is no other way to get at the facts except by a commission. I thought the duty of the government, and indeed most people in this country thought the duty of the government was, just as soon as this failure occurred, to have issued a Royal Commission to investigate the whole matter. They should have done it immediately after the failure. They could and should have done so. Three months or thereabouts have elapsed since the failure and nothing whatever has been done. We have been waiting for the powers that be in Toronto to move in this matter. It is a well known fact that in information they have gained there is of such a limited character that it does not throw a great deal of light on it. A Royal Commission is the only means by which the information can be obtained. The matter is of so much importance and the consequences of this failure are felt so widely throughout Canada that I cannot see why or how the government can refuse to grant this request of my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson). Those who have lost their all do not hesitate to blame the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and the hon. the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding). I know the feeling of the country, and it is that if the government and the members of the government, if the right hon. Prime Minister and the hon. Minister of Finance want to square themselves with the people they will not hesitate for one moment to grant this request of my hon. friend from Halton. There is no doubt that had ordinary care been exercised when this certificate was granted, these so-called bankers would never have been authorized to do business. It is regrettable from every view point that this failure should have taken place and I trust that the proposal of my hon. friend will be acceded to. Not only that, but I hope that there will be in the new Bank Act provision for an efficient and thorough system of government inspection. I think that the government should show its willingness to try to do something at least to save as much as it can to the innocent sufferers from this miserable wreck.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR (Leeds). Mr. Speaker, I represent a constituency in which there were practically two branches of this institution which was licensed by this government and allowed, with the full knowledge and consent of the government, to perpetrate frauds upon the people of the country. Many of my constituents have lost their all. At the village of Phillipsville there was one branch of this bank established. Across the line dividing the constituency of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) and my own constituency there was a branch located, but a great share of the business was done with the farmers in my own constituency. Many of them are stockholders and depositors, I had hoped to see the Minister of Railways and Canals in his place joining with me in advocating that the government should approve of the motion of my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) and I hope that when the division comes he will vote with me in the interest of many of his constituents who have suffered, as mine have, from the fact that this rotten institution was granted a certificate by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). With the full knowledge that a fraud was being perpetrated upon him and upon the government, they granted this certificate, the minister having at the time the proof of this fraud in his hands. If he did not have it in his hands he got the information the next day. The certificate was issued on the 30th November, and next day he received a letter from the Bankers' Association telling him that the thing was not right. Why did he not obtain a warrant for the arrest of Travers for perjury? He had the declaration sworn to by Travers in which Travers had given false information, he had the proof in his own hands that it was false—why did he not act and save the people of this country from the loss of thousands and thousands of dollars? A branch of this bank was opened in Athens, adjoining my constituency. Travers came there, selected one of the most respectable farmer's sons in the constituency as manager because he knew that he had influence in that section of the country with the surrounding farmers. Travers said to him: I want you to go among the farmers and offer them 4 per cent on their deposits. The rule of the Bankers' Association only permits 3 per cent, but you will have to cover the matter up in your books so that it will not show. Early last fall, after this branch had been doing business for some time, the accountant was short in his cash, and he and the manager were both arrested. The manager was sentenced to three years in the penitentiary for falsifying his books. He is in the penitentiary now and Travers, who got him into this trouble, will be down with him, I presume, in a few days. There is a petition being circulated and signed in the constituency of the Minister of Railways and Canals and in the town in which the young man is well known asking the Minister of Justice to liberate him from the penitentiary. I hope the Minister of Railways and Canals will see that his colleague the Minister of Justice does justice to this young man and has him released, because what he did he did at the request of the manager, Mr. Travers, in order that the bank might pay one per cent more than the other banks are paying.

The Minister of Finance issued that certificate contrary to law. The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) said that we have a Bank Act. What is the good of having a Bank Act or of making a Bank Act if the government will not enforce it? We have a Bank Act now and if the Minister of Finance had done his duty and enforced the Bank Act this certificate never would have been granted. What is the use of talking—are not the government morally if not legally responsible for every dollar that has been allowed to be taken from the people of this country by this rotten institution which they brought into existence? Now, they refuse to give a Royal Commission to investigate the facts. Why do they refuse a Royal Commission? Is it not patent on the face of it that some of their friends would be exposed if a Royal Commission were granted? The only excuse they can have for not granting the request of my hon. friend from Halton is that some of their friends will be exposed and they would rather that the whole country should suffer than that some of their friends should be exposed in the matter.

I will support the motion of my hon. friend from Halton, in the first place, for the reason that I think we should have a Royal Commission. That commission should investigate all the circumstances and facts surrounding this bank, and the fact that it was allowed to do business by this government. The Prime Minister, the Finance Minister, the Minister of Customs, have often repeated in my hearing in this House that they belonged to a business government. The Prime Minister brags that his is a business government. The people of Canada have elected this parliament, the members of the government are the trustees of the people, they are in the same position towards the people as is a board of directors towards any incorporated company. If any board of directors had acted for their company as the members of this government have acted for the people, the stockholders would soon turn them out, and I think that the people of this country, if for no other reason than the incapacity and laxity of the government in allowing this fraudulent institution to be foisted on them, will say to these ministers: You have not discharged your duty faithfully, and we are now going to elect a new board of directors at the first opportunity. I, therefore, support the motion of my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) calling for an investigation. If we should have that investigation and find that the government made a mistake, that they were careless in their administration, that they were regardless of the interests they were bound to protect, then they are morally responsible for the losses sustained by the depositors in this bank. It will then be the duty of the people of this country, through their representatives in this parliament, to declare that this country is big enough and able enough to stand the losses which the people's trustees have brought upon so many innocent people. The facts stated by my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) cannot be disputed; and on those facts being proved, as they cannot fail to be, by a Royal Commission, it will be the duty of this parliament to pass legislation liberating the stockholders from their double liability. They will suffer enough by losing what they have paid in already and should not, under the circumstances, be compelled to pay this double liability. These are my views. It is the duty of the Finance Minister to withdraw his opposition to this motion and allow a Royal Commission to be appointed so that we may find out who are the guilty parties. The hon. minister says that he was not to blame, that he had nothing against the promoters of this bank after Mr. Leighton McCarthy had withdrawn his charges. But he had in his hand a letter from the Bankers' Association telling him that there were irregularities, that things were not correct, and he should immediately have had Travers arrested, and that would have put a stop to the bank doing any further business. But when he did not have Travers arrested then, he should, four months later, when he was informed by one of the banks that this thing was not right, that these notes were being discounted, have had Travers arrested then for making false returns. He did not, however, do this because no doubt he was afraid of exposing some of his friends. Should the commission be granted which my hon. friend calls for, we shall have all these transactions, which are now hidden, brought to light, and the parties responsible brought to punishment, but otherwise we shall be helpless.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton). Like many of those who have addressed the House, I have a branch of this unfortunate bank established in the town of Arkona in the county I represent. In that branch there were deposits to the extent of $43,000 besides a large number of stockholders. In common with other members of this House I deeply regret the unfortunate condition of affairs which has come about in connection with this institution, and the whole matter is a live question among the people of my constituency and one worthy surely of the consideration of the government. We have had the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) telling us that the Finance Minister had no evidence against the promoters of this bank, after Mr. Leighton McCarthy had withdrawn his charges. Well, I am satisfied that if my hon. friend had investigated a little further he would have found that the Bankers' Association sent a letter to the Finance Minister calling his attention to the fact that there had been irregularities and urging on him the necessity of an investigation before granting the certificate. My hon. friend said also that the people in the country should have put their money into the savings bank. I am satisfied, however, that those of us who are in touch with the banking system throughout the country realize how absurd it would be to ask the people to send their money to a savings bank instead of depositing it in a bank in their own immediate vicinity, and I sincerely hope that when the time comes to discuss a new Bank Act, provision will be made for government inspection, not only of the branches of banks, but also of the central organization, because that is where the trickery and rascality was carried on in the Farmers' Bank. It was in the central office of that bank that Travers conducted his operations, and had that institution received a thorough government inspection, there is no doubt we would not have had the unfortunate collapse we are now discussing.

The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) said he would approve of the appointment of a commission if the court does not do its duty. But my hon. friend knows, and the Minister of Finance knows full well, that it is practically impossible for the police court of Ontario to carry on any serious investigation. The Minister of Finance knows that when Mr. Laidlaw placed his case before the Prime Minister in his apartments in the House of Commons, he distinctly and emphatically declared that there was not one dollar with which to carry on an investigation after the preferred claims had been paid by the liquidators. He also urged upon the Finance Minister and the Prime Minister on that occasion the necessity of making a thorough investigation into the doings of the different men who had transactions with that bank, and he assured the right hon. gentleman and his colleague that if such an investigation were ordered it would certainly bring to the bank a large amount of money for the benefit of its stockholders and depositors, because many men would be brought to justice who otherwise would go scot free.

The people of this country have always looked upon bank stocks as one of the safest kinds of investments and have always regarded their bank deposits as perfectly secure; and anything we can do in this parliament to strengthen that confidence, which is now so severely shaken, will certainly be a move in the right direction. I trust, therefore, that the Minister of Finance will see that before this session closes, the people who do business with our banks will have sufficient protection in that regard.

My hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. McLean) said that Travers was only a tool of others, and that the depositors believed they were protected by the laws of the land. Depositors in my riding, who had placed $43,000 on deposit in this Farmers' Bank in the town of Arkona, believed up to a short time ago that their money was absolutely protected by government inspection and control, and they are to-day surprised to find that they are likely to lose every dollar, because it is emphatically stated that the only asset the bank has, after the preferred claims have been paid, is the Keeley mine. And it has been shown by the men interested in the Keeley mine that the amount of money that is owing to the Farmers' Bank at the present time is very small, and that the creditors of the Farmers' Bank need expect to get very little out of that mine.

What harm, may I ask the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) and the first minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) would there be in granting a commission to investigate this whole affair? And will it not be a source of satisfaction to those who have deposited such a large sum of money in this bank, and to the stockholders as well, to know, that this matter has been thoroughly investigated, and that the men who are guilty of any rascally conduct in connection with the incorporation or operation of this bank have been brought to justice? There is no reason why they should not be exposed. Do the government deny this investigation because they are afraid that the reputations of some men might be spoiled? I am satisfied that if the government consult the wishes of the people who are interested in this affair, and of the financial institutions of the Dominion they will conduct the investigation that my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) has asked for. If you do not grant that investigation, depend upon it, the people will come to the conclusion that something is radically wrong, and that the government is shielding somebody. The thorough investigation of this question will assist us in framing a law under which, we may hope, the repetition of any such transactions as these will be impossible in this Dominion. The hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Miller) said, in regard to this certificate, that it was granted in good faith, and that in granting it the Minister of Finance believed that he was doing right. On the facts before us, we cannot come to any conclusion but that the Finance Minister was deceived by Mr. Travers and the other men who brought this matter to his attention. And not only he, but the people who bought the stock or deposited their money in this bank also were deceived. But, remember, the only men who are to suffer loss in this matter are the depositors and shareholders of the bank; the government, apparently, are not going to lose any money. Nor are they ready to spend a reasonable amount of money so that the men who were instrumental in wrecking this institution could be brought to justice. The liquidators, as I have said, have no money to carry on an investigation, nor have they power to incur indebtedness to raise money for such a purpose. And why should we saddle such an expense upon the poor people who have been so seriously injured already? I only wish that I felt free to speak of a number of those in my own district; but I will refer only to one case. I have in mind an old couple, each about 80 years of age, who were induced to put down their names for ten shares in this bank. I think they had only half enough to pay for these shares; and to-day we find that, under the double liability, they are compelled to sacrifice their home. And these are not by any means the only ones who are made to suffer by the rascally work that has been carried on by Mr. Travers, and by the action—might I say?—of the Finance Minister in granting this certificate. For, when Mr. McCarthy, time and again, called his attention to the fact that these men were trying to get this certificate under false pretenses, and that they were perjuring themselves to that end, it was his duty and the duty of the Treasury Board to make a thorough investigation into the whole question. This Royal Commission should be granted. Since 1905, 11 banks have quit the field of active business; five have been absorbed by other banks; one is now in process of liquidation; and five have failed. The Farmers' Bank is the only case in which the depositors have had a great amount of funds tied up. In other cases, the depositors have generally received within a small percentage of their money; but in this case it looks as if practically every dollar the depositors have placed in this bank throughout the Dominion will be a direct loss to them. The people have been led to believe that deposits especially were safe in the banking institutions of our country. I do not wish to take up more time, as there are many others to follow? My object is merely to emphasize the statement made by the hon. member for Halton, and to say that I intend to support the resolution. My reasons are these: That Mr. Travers was not entitled to a certificate, because the sum of $500,000 had not been bona fide subscribed, and $250,000 had not been bona fide paid thereon. That the Minister of Finance had notice that the provisions of the Bank Act had not been complied with, and he did not make the thorough investigation he should have made into the facts connected with the issue of the certificate. That the president of the Bankers' Association urged upon the Minister of Finance the necessity of investigating this question; and this and the numerous private interviews that were held with the hon. member for Halton and others in regard to this important matter were surely worthy of consideration. That the minister had conclusive evidence, by the admission of Mr. Travers, that he had committed perjury even before the certificate was issued. For these reasons, I heartily support the resolution of the hon. member for Halton.

Mr. W. M. MARTIN (Regina). I shall speak but a very few minutes. I have not the same excuse for speaking as other members have had, because the Farmers' Bank and its promoters did not operate in the province of Saskatchewan and I am very glad they did not. I agree of course with the member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) that the shareholders of this bank, and also the depositors, are deserving of the greatest amount of sympathy on the part of all the people of Canada. So far as the shareholders are concerned, I must say that I cannot sympathize with them so much as I do with the depositors. The shareholders went into the concern and subscribed their stock, presumably, after making proper inquiries. They went into the matter as a business proposition, as an investment, with the intention of making money legitimately. But so far as the depositors are concerned, they deserve the sympathy of every member of this House. I do not agree, however, with those members who have supported the resolution that the government should recompense either the shareholders or the depositors. It seems to me that it would be a dangerous precedent to follow in respect to any banking or financial institution transacting business in Canada, if, in case of failure of that institution, the government should compensate the shareholders, or, in the case of a bank, the depositors. Now the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), it seems to me, was most unfair in an expression he used this afternoon. He referred to the Bank Act as 'the Fielding Bank Act.' Now the Bank Act is no more the Fielding Bank Act, than it is the Act of any other member of parliament who occupied a seat in this House at the time of the revision of that Act. Then I want to refer to what was said last night by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Crothers). Referring to the issue of the certificate by the Treasury Board, that hon. member said:

The Treasury Board who are made the guardians of the public interest in such a matter as this, is composed of the Minister of Finance and five other members of the cabinet, and as we have been informed that this matter was considered when only three members of the Treasury Board were present, it is perfectly clear that there not being a quorum or a majority of the members of the Treasury Board present, the issuing of this certificate was illegal.

I would like to ask the hon. member for West Elgin where he got his authority for stating that three members of the Treasury Board are not perfectly justified in transacting any business that comes before them, and were not justified in this case in issuing a certificate to the Farmers' Bank on being satisfied that the promoters had complied with the Act. I am informed that it has always been the custom of the Treasury Board to transact business with only three members of the board present.

Now with respect to the incorporation of the bank, which is included in the resolution as a matter for investigation by the proposed Royal Commission, the member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) last night, I think, well expressed the views of the House when he said there was no question that parliament was responsible for the incorporation of that bank. If I had any criticism to offer with respect to the incorporation of the Farmers' Bank it would be this that it was inadvisable to allow any bank to be incorporated under that name. The word 'farmer' no doubt induced a number of people to subscribe stock to the institution who would not otherwise have done so, and to deposit their money in that bank who would not have done so if the bank had not been called the Farmers' Bank. With respect to the issue of the certificate, there is no question that the responsibility attaches to the Finance Department, and therefore to the government. The whole question, however, is as to whether the Finance Department took the proper steps to make inquiry to see that the Bank Act had been fully complied with. To answer that question all we need to do is to refer to section 15 of the Bank Act, which says:

No certificate should be given by the Treasury Board until it has been shown to the satisfaction of the Board, by affidavit or otherwise, that all the requirements of this Act and of the special Act of incorporation of the bank, as to payment required to be made to the minister, the election of directors, deposit for security for note issue, or other preliminaries, have been complied with and that the sum so paid is then held by the minister.

Now the words 'affidavit or otherwise' imply that there may be some other way of obtaining a certificate except by affidavit. In this case the affidavit was supplied which on examination, proved to be in exact compliance with section 15, and also covers the points set forth in section 13 of the Bank Act to which the member for Frontenac referred. Now that affidavit was referred by the Finance Department to the Justice Department, and a good deal of criticism has been made with respect to the answer of the Deputy Minister of Justice to the request for an opinion as to whether the Bank Act had been complied with. On November 28, 1906, a letter was sent by the Deputy Minister of Finance to the Deputy Minister of Justice, inclosing a file of papers and I presume from the wording of the letter that the papers included all the papers on file in the department with respect to this matter. In the reply of Mr. E. L. Newcombe, Deputy Minister of Justice, dated on the 28th of November, he says:

In reply, I beg to state that the statements in the statutory declaration of Mr. Walter R. Travers are sufficient if they are accepted to show compliance with the statutory provisions.

All that the Deputy Minister of Justice intended to say was, the Bank Act has been complied with, and if these statements are true you are justified in issuing the certificate. He put upon the Department of Finance the responsibility of seeing whether these statements were true. Now let us see what precautions the Department of Finance took before issuing this certificate to the Farmers' Bank. Take the letter written by the Deputy Minister of Finance on the 24th of October, 1906, to the general manager of the Farmers' Bank of Canada, in which he says:

I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 23rd instant, inclosing receipt and draft of the Bank of Montreal, Toronto, for the sum of $250,000 deposited by your bank in compliance with section 13 of the Bank Act. I may say in this connection that opposition has been filed in this department to the granting of a certificate to your bank under section 14 of the Bank Act.

Here the Deputy Minister of Finance informs the general manager that opposition has been raised to the issue of the certificate. A little later on, there is another letter from the Deputy Minister of Finance, November 21 in which he writes to the manager of the Farmers' Bank and says:

Referring to your letter of the 23rd October, making a deposit under section 13 of the Bank Act of the sum of $250,000, I have no doubt that you will be applying very shortly for a certificate under section 14 to commence business. In the papers to be submitted to the Board in support of the application there is a list of bona fide subscribers of capital stock of the bank showing subscriptions to the extent of $500,000. Would you be so good as to have added to this list, for submission to the Board, a statement showing the actual amount of cash paid up by each subscriber.

Now there, I contend, was a certain amount of precaution taken by the Finance Department in asking to be supplied with a list of subscribers, the amount of stock subscribed by each, and the amount of cash paid up. There is no question that precaution was taken there. Now the supporters of this resolution have endeavoured to make a great deal out of the protest put in against the issuing of the certificate, by Mr. Leighton McCarthy, on behalf of certain subscribers to the bank.

Mr. LALOR. Was there any effort on the part of the Treasury Board to find out the bona fides of these subscription lists?

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). There was absolutely no evidence before the Department of Finance to show that every one of these shareholders was not absolutely bona fide and that every dollar of that subscription was not satisfactory.

Mr. LALOR. Did not Mr. McCarthy's letter cast doubt on it?

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). My hon. friend knows that Mr. McCarthy's letter was subsequently withdrawn. The supporters of this resolution have endeavoured to make a great deal of the fact that a writ was issued and a copy of the writ or the special endorsement was on the files of the Department of Finance. Every lawyer in the House knows that there is always a great deal of material put on a special endorsement of a writ, put in a statement of claim, to which no one pays any attention until some proof is submitted. What is an endorsement on a writ? Absolutely nothing as far as the case against the Department of Finance is concerned. The argument of hon. gentlemen opposite rests entirely, so far as this return shows on that specially endorsed writ filed with the department which was absolutely and unequivocally withdrawn by the letter sent subsequently by the solicitor. What does the special endorsement show? Nothing in connection with the $250,000 not being bona fide subscriptions. The claim in the special endorsement was on behalf of special shareholders who wanted their subscriptions set aside by reason of certain fraud and misrepresentation alleged against Travers and other agents who had been selling stock, the fraud and misrepresentation consisting of such statements as that agents, Travers amongst them, I presume, had stated to prospective subscribers that So and So had subscribed $10,000 stock to this bank whereas they had subscribed only $3,000, and also allegations to the effect that certain men, among them Major Beattie, member for London, had agreed to act as directors when they had refused to be associated with the bank. What in that claim shows anything wrong with the deposit of $250,000 with the government?

I would have no hesitation in supporting a request or resolution asking a Royal Commission to investigate the affairs of this bank if I could see what could be accomplished by it. But how would you get the money back to the poor depositors by holding a post mortem inquiry into the affairs of the bank?

Mr. LALOR. We will find out who influenced the Treasury Board.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). My hon. friend will have plenty of time to make a statement afterwards. I know my hon. friend is full of suspicion like many members on that side. I would have no hesitation in supporting this resolution if any one could tell me what good it would do to the shareholders or depositors. No good can be done by holding a post mortem examination into the affairs of the bank. I would be perfectly willing to support a resolution for an investigation into the affairs of all banks in Canada in the same way as we had a Royal Commission some years ago to investigate the dealings of the insurance companies in Canada. For instance, I would like to know some things about other banks. I would like information as to how the Bank of Montreal came to lose somewhere between $1,000,000 and $5,000,000 in Mexico some time ago and whether they lost that money by illegitimate speculation with the funds deposited in that bank. I would also like some information with respect to the dealings of the Bank of Commerce with the Canada Furniture Company. It is generally rumoured among men with whom I associate that the Canada Furniture Company is practically supported by the Bank of Commerce. If that is the case the depositors of the Bank of Commerce have practically no assurance that their funds are being properly dealt with. I would also like to know how it is that the Canadian banks gather in the money from the people of this country at a small rate of interest and immediately send it to New York on short call loans and get large rates of interest, and what security they have for the money they lend to the stock speculators on Wall street.

Mr. BLAIN. Does my hon. friend know anything of the truth of the statement he has made with reference to the Bank of Commerce and the Canada Furniture Company.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). I do not state that as a fact, I simply give it as a rumour, citing it as an instance to show that it might be in the interest of the country to have some investigation into the methods of the banks in dealing with the people's money. In 1907, in Western Canada, it was impossible even for a farmer worth from $10,000 to $20,000 or a reputable business man to get the smallest loan in Regina, and the reason given there was that all the money the banks had available was on short call loans in Wall street, in New York, and at that time in Western Canada we could not get sufficient money from the banks to move our crops to the eastern market.

To my mind, and I have followed the evidence of what has taken place with reference to this bank in the Ontario police courts, all the information the public can get towards punishing the criminals at the head of the institution can be and is being acquired at Toronto. Perhaps my hon. friends from Peel (Mr. Blain) from North Ontario (Mr. Sharpe) and from Algoma (Mr. Boyce) who are so suspicious in connection with this matter can tell the House and the people how it was that the Attorney General's department of the Ontario government had all the information about the failure of the Farmers' Bank 24 days before making a solitary move to get hold of Dr. Beattie Nesbitt, the arch-criminal of all the promoters of the bank. I would ask them if some one did not give Dr. Beattie Nesbitt some warning to get out of the country. To show the sincerity of the Ontario government in their desire to capture Dr. Beattie Nesbitt I would point out that they have offered the magnificent reward of $200 for the production of his live body.

If the Farmers' Bank teaches this parliament any lesson it is that in the revision of the Bank Act some measure should be adopted providing for the public inspection of banks. The depositors in all our banks must be protected. This is one of the most important matters we can deal with, to see that our financial institutions are on a sound basis and when the Bank Act comes before the Banking and Commerce Committee of this House, I hope that some measure of public inspection will find its way into the Act and become the law of Canada.

Mr. J. J. DONNELLY (South Bruce). The facts so far made public in connection with the organization and management of the Farmers' Bank have done much to weaken the confidence of the public in the stability of the banking institutions of this country. It appears to me that a thorough investigation by a Royal Commission such as is suggested by this amendment into all the operations in connection with this bank would assist us in locating the weak points in our Banking Act and in so amending that Act as to prevent the recurrence of what has happened to the stockholders and depositors of the Farmers' Bank. The fact that a bank has a Dominion charter is taken by many people to indicate that it not only has a right to transact public business but that it is subject to such supervision by the Dominion government that it may be fairly assumed to be in good financial standing. Now, section 158 of the Bank Act practically wipes out all the private banks of this country. That section reads:

> Every person assuming or using the title of bank, banking company, banking house, banking association or banking institution without being authorized so to do by this Act or some other Act in force in that behalf, is guilty of an offence against this Act.

The object of that legislation was to protect the public by rendering it necessary for them to do practically all their banking with chartered banks. If the fact that a bank has a Dominion charter and is authorized to do business by a certificate issued by the Treasury Board is no guarantee of the financial standing of that bank, why was this legislation passed which practically gave all the chartered banks a monopoly of the banking business of this country? In view of that, it was clearly the duty of the Minister of Finance and the Treasury Board to take every precaution before issuing a certificate to the Farmers' Bank. Now, just a word in reference to the name 'Farmers' Bank.' The persons who promoted this bank were not farmers. I listened yesterday to the Minister of Finance reading over a list of some fifteen names of persons who, according to the prospectus issued by the bank, were willing to act as directors were they elected as such, and among that fifteen there was only one farmer, so that about the only right the promoters of this bank had to be called farmers was that possibly in incorporating it they were placing themselves in a position to farm the public. However, I suppose their object in so calling it was to gain the goodwill of the farming community. The discussion so far has led me to believe that the Minister of Finance and the Treasury Board did not exercise reasonable precaution before issuing the certificate to the Farmers' Bank. We have the statement of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) that he warned the Minister of Finance before the certificate was issued; we have the letter of Mr. McCarthy, warning the Minister of Finance that the promoters of this bank were endeavouring to evade the provision of the Bank Act which said that before a certificate shall be issued, at least $500,000 of stock must be actually subscribed for, and at least $250,000 of that money paid into the hands of the Minister of Finance. We have also a subsequent letter of Mr. McCarthy, in which he gives more detail, and he says:

I have received information that the alleged subscribers for shares paid a large sum of money in cash and have signed notes for other large sums of money, and that the persons professing to act in the name of the bank have transferred notes and received the proceeds, and that a deposit either has been made or will be made of the cash received and the proceeds of these notes, or sufficient amount to make up $250,000.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it appears to me that when the Minister of Finance had this information before him he should have made some effort to verify it, but, the Minister of Finance takes the ground that Mr. McCarthy later on withdrew his objection. As a matter of fact, that is not the case. Mr. McCarthy was acting for some half dozen stockholders in the Farmers' Bank who were his clients, and he made his objection solely for the purpose of protecting them. Apparently the promoters of the bank became aware of that fact and they settled with Mr. McCarthy's clients, and he as their solicitor had no further authority to press the matter. But the fact still remains that the minister had the information that this evasion of the Bank Act was being perpetrated, and, Sir, all the other shareholders of the bank were just as much interested in the charges made against the promoters of the bank as were Mr. McCarthy's clients. Mr. McCarthy succeeded in protecting his clients but the Minister of Finance failed to protect his clients, the public, whose representative he was in that case. I say, Sir, that it was the duty of the Minister of Finance to make a thorough investigation in view of these repeated warnings, but in place of doing so what do you think he did but apply to the manager of the bank who was seeking the certificate, the man of all men who would be most anxious that the truth should not be known. And, the Minister of Finance accepts this man's testimony, sworn testimony if you may call it so, against the statement set forth in Mr. McCarthy's letter, against the warning he had received from Mr. Henderson and others, and he issued this certificate. The First Minister tells us that the Finance Department and the Minister of Finance were deceived. Well, if they were deceived it is their own fault because they had every opportunity to investigate and discover whether the charges made and the warnings given them were founded on fact. But, there appears to have been peculiarly undue haste in the issuing of this certificate. There is a great deal of correspondence about it dated the 30th November, 1906. We first have a letter from Mr. Fielding to Mr. Travers regretting that engagements the previous day arising out of the budget prevented him meeting Mr. Travers, and we have a letter from Mr. Travers to Mr. Fielding, saying:

In reply to your letter of the 30th November, I have to say that in the case of the Farmers' Bank of Canada, the provisional directors did not raise the money in the way mentioned by you. You will find the statement put in by me absolutely correct as to the amount of stock subscribed and the amount paid up.

We have another letter of the same date from the Deputy Minister of Finance to Mr. Travers and we have also a letter of the same date—although not received on the same date addressed to the Deputy Minister of Finance and signed by Sir Edward Clouston, and that letter I shall read:

Montreal, November 30, 1906.

T. C. Boville, Esq.,
Deputy Minister of Finance,
Ottawa.

Farmers' Bank of Canada.

Dear Sir,—In connection with the application of the Farmers' Bank of Canada for the usual certificate from the Treasury Board, I have reason to believe that the money lodged, or to be lodged, at Ottawa as stock subscriptions, cannot be regarded as paid-up capital, and that a large proportion of the amount necessary to the obtaining of a certificate is a loan made upon the promise of its payment when returned by your department.

Permit me to request that, if only for the protection of the public, the Treasury Board will exercise its right to refuse to issue a certificate if it thinks best so to do, until a thorough investigation has been made into the circumstances stated herein.

E. S. CLOUSTON,
President.

It is a peculiar coincidence that there should have been so many letters and such undue haste on that particular date. Would it not be, Mr. Speaker, a fair inference that all this haste, this rush, was caused by the fact that the promoters of the bank became aware that Sir Edward Clouston was sending this or a similar letter to the Department of Finance? It has been argued that even if this certificate was obtained by fraud the bank might have gone on and proved a success. That is possible, but we must not forget that had this certificate not been issued these parties would never have been in a position to go out and make the appeal to the people of the country that this chartered bank had to make in order to secure deposits. The story of the organization and management of the Farmers' Bank is a story of crime and inefficiency, it is a blot upon the financial reputation of this country, and no effort should be spared to place the responsibility where it belongs. Let us have a full and free investigation and base our further action upon the results of that investigation.

Mr. S. SHARPE (North Ontario). Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the facts and circumstances in connection with the unfortunate bank known throughout Canada as the Farmers' Bank. I do not think that any hon. gentleman in this House, particularly those whose constituencies are directly affected by this unfortunate failure, have any reason to offer any apology to this House for occupying time upon this important question. After having carefully examined the return that has been brought down by the government and after listening to the case as presented by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, I am not at all surprised that the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is disinclined to grant the prayer of the resolution. The man who is being charged with serious omissions and derelictions of duty does not display as a rule any enthusiasm for his trial to proceed, and there is no doubt that, if a Royal Commission were appointed in connection with this bank, virtually and in fact the Finance Department would be on trial. Consequently we are not surprised to see that the Minister of Finance is not disposed to grant a Royal Commission as asked for by my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson). The history of the Farmers' Bank is certainly an extraordinary one. The Act incorporating the bank was passed on the 18th July, 1904, and subsequently there were two Acts extending the charter, the first for two years, within which a certificate might be granted, and the second extending the time for six months. The Minister of Finance himself stated that he entertained grave fears concerning the success of this bank on the ground of the difficulty in raising funds with which to commence the operations of the bank. I say this, Mr. Speaker, should have placed him upon his guard and should have caused him to see that henceforth and from that time onward all the formalities as required by the Bank Act were adhered to. The certificate was granted on November 30, 1906, and the bank suspended on December 19, 1910. Within about four years the bank depleted its whole capital, ruined thousands and thousands of depositors and altogether dissipated over a million dollars of money. The curator, Mr. Clarkson, made an interim statement of the affairs of the bank, a synopsis of which I propose to give to the House.

LIABILITIES.

Stocks and bonds, &c.		535,000 00
As against this the curator has the bank's claim against the Keeley mine		$1,303,284 86

This leaves a net deficit to be met by the asset known as the Keeley mine of $1,303,000. The statement has been made just lately that the Keeley mine is indebted to the Farmers' Bank in the sum of $150,000 or $200,000 only. Consequently it will mean a net deficit, after the obligation to the Farmers' Bank is met by the Keeley mine, of over a million dollars. The results and consequences of the operations of the Farmers' Bank have been most serious. I think it is the most disastrous financial failure in the history of the country. It is the worst tragedy in the annals of banking. The shareholders and depositors are not the comparatively rich people to be found in mercantile circles. They do not reside in cities and towns, and, as the notion is, make a comparatively easy living, but they are poor labouring people in many cases distributed throughout the length and breadth of the province. The savings of a lifetime have been swept away, poverty, ruin and desolation, and, in many cases, actual hunger, face those who have lost all their means in the financial disaster known as the failure of the Farmers' Bank.

The question naturally arises, on whom is the responsibility for this failure to be fastened? Of course we all know that the loss has resulted from the operations of the bank, but the bank could not have started operations without the sanction and license of the department, and hence the question naturally follows what facts and circumstances were known to the Finance Department or the minister who is responsible for issuing that certificate, and which should have prevented this bank from going into operation, and which should have prevented the Minister of Finance from issuing the certificate. I submit that no person can read the record without being convinced beyond peradventure that an absolutely complete case has been made out against the Minister of Finance and his department. The facts fix on the Minister of Finance a perfect knowledge that a fraud was being perpetrated on behalf of the promoters of the bank. A series of most interesting interviews took place before the certificate was issued between my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) and the hon. Minister of Finance. Before the certificate was issued my hon. friend told him that a great number of his constituents were interested in the promotion of this bank, that he felt alarmed for its success, and he asked the minister to withhold the certificate.

What was the answer of the minister? He said: I will delay the issue of the certificate as long as possible. But the facts and circumstances show that instead of withholding the certificate as long as possible, he displayed all kinds of anxiety to get it out of the hands of the Treasury Board into the hands of Travers. After the certificate was granted, we had the hon. member from Halton (Mr. Henderson), going to the Finance Minister and again expressing his anxiety in connection with the operations of the Farmers' Bank. What was the action of the hon. minister? He said: Mr. Henderson, you have no occasion to be alarmed, you are not financially interested in the bank, and besides you have discharged your full duty. You warned the department. I submit that there could be nothing verbally stronger than the warning which my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) gave the Finance Minister on that occasion. I was somewhat surprised to hear the minister say that he had no recollection of that interview, and that, so far as he remembered, such a conversation did not take place. He did not say that if it had taken place and the warning had been given, he would have refused to give the certificate, because he would then have been confronted with the argument that the documents on file in his department were stronger by far than any verbal warning the hon. member for Halton had given. What were these documents? They are in the return brought down and printed by the government, but as these letters have been put on 'Hansard' already, it is my intention to do no more than give a very brief recapitulation of the various warnings given the Finance Minister.

We find Mr. Leighton McCarthy, who was then a member of this House, and who, although elected as an independent, voted for the government on every occasion, giving the strongest possible warning to the Finance Minister. We say Mr. McCarthy who was elected to protect, not merely any possible client he might secure in the way of legal practice, but the people at large, who was elected not only to make the laws but to see that the laws of the country were being observed, and who had great influence with the government, we find him writing on October 8, 1906, to the Minister of Finance, before the certificate was granted, and in that letter he made this statement:

I beg to assure you that grave conditions have arisen which will require careful consideration before the Treasury Board grant any certificate for the organization of this bank. I, therefore, ask you to be good enough to stay any action which might be taken until I have had an opportunity of discussing this with you.

Not having heard from the department for three days, Mr. McCarthy, in his anxiety to protect his own clients, wrote the minister on October 11, three days later, as follows:

Please wire me assurance in reference to stay of certificate of Treasury Board mentioned in my letter of Monday night.

He got a reply on October 11, from the Minister of Finance as follows:

No application yet received for the certificate referred to. Please forward your representations immediately and they will be considered when application comes.

As a matter of fact, the report shows that these representations of Mr. McCarthy were never considered by the Treasury Board. On October 11, we have a letter signed by the Finance Minister himself to Mr. Leighton McCarthy:

I wired you to-day that no application had been made by the promoters for the Treasury Board certificate, and suggested that you send forward at once any representations which you may wish to make, to which we shall give all due consideration.

W. S. FIELDING,
Minister of Finance.

There was assurance from the Finance Minister that any representations regarding the organization and the formalities connected with the inception of the bank would receive due consideration. Yet we have it on the words of the Finance Minister that because the complaint of Mr. McCarthy had been withdrawn and because he asked to have his papers returned, these letters of Mr. McCarthy's and the writ of summons setting out misrepresentation, deceit and fraud in connection with the whole transaction, had never been submitted to the Treasury Board. Then on October 19, 1906, Mr. McCarthy wrote the Finance Minister as follows:

My Dear Mr. Fielding,—I beg to inclose the special endorsement upon a writ of summons in the High Court of Justice for Ontario.

And he goes on to refer to the misrepresentations and other grounds which may be disclosed upon examination of the alleged subscriptions to shares and he says:

I have received information that the alleged subscribers for shares paid a large sum of money in cash and have signed notes for other large sums of money, and that the persons professing to act in the name of the bank have transferred notes and received the proceeds——

This was in violation of the Bank Act and should have voided any application for a certificate.

—and that a deposit either has been made or will be made of the cash received and the proceeds of these notes, or a sufficient amount to make up $250,000.

Then we find that Mr. Boville, the Deputy Minister of Finance, four days afterwards, writes Mr. McCarthy as follows:

I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 19th instant, to Mr. Fielding's address, respecting the Farmers' Bank of Canada. When application is made by the Farmers' Bank to the Treasury Board for a certificate to enable them to commence business, the representations contained in your letter with its inclosure will be laid before the Board.

Consequently we have the statement of the Minister of Finance himself and of his deputy that when an application for a certificate shall be received the representations made by Mr. McCarthy would be laid before the board and all these facts and circumstances connected with the fraudulent promotion of the bank would be submitted to the Treasury Board in order that it might deal with them before granting a certificate.

On the same day the letter was written, Travers sent down a deposit of $250,000. On October 24, the Deputy Minister of Finance, Mr. Boville, notified Travers that there was opposition filed in the department to his being granted a certificate. Then on October 31, the deputy minister wrote Mr. McCarthy again:

Dear Sir,—Referring to your letter of the 19th instant, addressed to Mr. Fielding, on the subject of the Farmers' Bank of Canada and the issue of a certificate to that bank to commence business under section 15 of the Bank Act, I notice recently a reference in the newspapers for a judgment given by Judge Anglin in a suit relating to this matter. In view of the decision rendered, I shall be obliged if you will let me know if you still desire the protest contained in your letter to be brought before the Treasury Board upon an application of the Farmers' Bank for a certificate to be considered.

T. C. BOVILLE,
Deputy Minister of Finance.

There had been no word from Mr. McCarthy to show any desire on his part to withdraw his objections to the certificate, yet we find the deputy minister writing to him and all but suggesting that he should withdraw all objections. All the facts and circumstances show that the Finance Department displayed a great deal of anxiety, not to safeguard the interests of the shareholders and depositors or the general public, but to get the certificate into the hands of Travers so that he might commence operations under the name of the Farmers' Bank.

Then we find on November 2, 1906, a letter from Mr. McCarthy stating that his clients had been settled with and withdrawing his objection; and because of that letter the Minister of Finance says he was entitled to proceed as if no objections had been made. But the facts set out in the writ of summons, a copy of which was in the hands of the Minister of Finance and on file in his department, showed most serious accusations. It is not my intention to read them in full, but I desire to set out briefly what they meant.

The charges made in this writ were:

(a.) That the subscriptions were procured through deceit, fraud and misrepresentation;

(b.) The particulars of the fraud are stated. We cite one example, namely, that John Sproat, one of the plaintiffs, intended to subscribe for $1,000, and his application was wrongfully entered at $10,000;

(c.) That the directors mentioned in the prospectus have neither subscribed for shares, nor consented to act as directors;

(d.) That agents who procured subscriptions for shares had taken promissory notes on account of subscriptions, which were payable to the provisional directors, and that they were endeavouring to discount these notes in order to make up the deposit of $250,000.

(e.) That a large sum of money paid on account of capital had been unlawfully deducted for commissions;

(f.) That the money and promissory notes taken from subscribers were impressed with a trust under the Bank Act for all the subscribers;

(g.) An affidavit of verification was filed, and notice of motion served and an injunction claimed to restrain the further publication of a notice calling a meeting, and to restrain the directors from making any application to the Treasury Board for a certificate to open the bank.

Now, can any reasonable man who peruses the records on file say that these charges should have been disregarded when the application for certificate was being considered? I ask, was the department concerned only about Mr. McCarthy's clients? What about the hundreds of other poor shareholders and depositors? When the government delayed the certificate in order to get Mr. McCarthy's clients out of the hole, did they discharge their full duty towards the public and towards the shareholders and depositors throughout the length and breadth of the land? Had they still no duty to protect others from fraud and crime? I submit that a case more complete and unanswerable could not have been made out than that made out by the hon. member for Halton who moved this resolution. Then, we have a letter which is very significant and which has been commented upon. The Department of Finance, in order to shift the responsibility, asks the advice of the Minister of Justice. This is a frequently used device in the various departments of the government when they desire to shirk responsibility. We find the Minister of Justice (Sir Allen Aylesworth) himself, when he was defending the Newmarket canal, shifting responsibility to the engineers,—he said he had the engineer's report that the enterprise was feasible and relied upon that report. And the Minister of Public Works tries to shift responsibility to the Minister of Justice when he wants to put in an elevator in a privately owned building the owner of which agreed in the lease to put in the elevator himself. So, we find the same device resorted to on this occasion—the Department of Justice is asked for an opinion. That rose, so to speak, had a thorn in it. The opinion given by the Department of Justice, said:

In reply, I beg to state that the statements in the statutory declaration of Mr. Walter R. Travers are sufficient, if they are accepted.

This throws back again upon the Finance Department the onus of deciding upon the merits of the case, but says that so far as the form of the application is concerned, that was all right. It was not necessary to refer the question to the Justice Department at all, but evidently the Justice Department had the same suspicion that the Finance Department had that everything was not right in connection with the promotion of this bank, and the Minister of Justice and his department were determined not to be made the scapegoat for the Department of Finance. At the same time, we had all these warnings from the hon. member for Halton and from the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) who, as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) told us last night, went to the Minister of Finance and warned him against issuing the certificate that would allow this bank to commence business, as well as Mr. McCarthy's letter with the serious charges therein contained. Beyond and above that we have the far more important letter that is in the hands of the Finance Department, from the president of the Bankers' Association, Sir Edward Clouston, dated on the identical day on which the certificate is said to have been issued. I submit, as has been stated by other speakers, that this was the time for the Finance Department to act. They must have known, from the warnings they had received, and from this letter of Sir Edward Clouston, that the affidavit of W. R. Travers filed in order to secure the certificate was false and that the man who was to be manager of the bank had been guilty of perjury. The bank at that time had not opened its doors or received a dollar of deposits. That was the time for the Finance Department to act. The Minister of Finance, when defending his course yesterday, asked the question: 'What could I have done? I submit that to ask that question is to have it answered. All he had to do was to wire Mr. Travers that the certificate had to be returned, and, if it was not returned, to issue a warrant for his arrest. Or, he could have issued a warning to the public through the press not to transact business with the bank, and the bank could not have opened its doors. It would have been an infinitely easy matter for the Finance Department to have prevented the Farmers' Bank transacting any business. In addition to all this, the bank had only been in operation three or four months at the outside when there was a most important communication received from the manager of the Milton branch of the bank. Feeling concerned about the irregularity of discounting subscribers' notes, this gentleman wrote to the Finance Minister the letter which is published at page 29, of the Return, as follows:

The Farmers' Bank of Canada,
Milton, April 7, 1907.

T. C. Boville, Esq.,
Deputy Minister of Finance,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—Will you kindly give me your opinion as to the following: Our general manager sends to the different branches lists of notes given in payment of our capital stock. These notes he makes the managers put through as discounts, crediting the amount to H.O. This is figured in the government return as paid-up capital and circulation issued to that amount. If I read the Bank Act correctly, section 76, he is asking us to do what is not right. As I do not wish to do anything contrary to the law, I should be much obliged if you give me the ruling on it. With many apologies for troubling you.

G. VANKOUGHNET,
Manager.

Now, it is extraordinary that, though this letter confirms beyond any doubt the allegations contained in Mr. McCarthy's writ and the statements made in Sir Edward Clouston's letter and proved the falseness of the affidavit made and filed by Mr. Travers with the department to secure this certificate, yet the department did not even condescend to notice it for a matter of two weeks. I submit that, if the Finance Minister had appreciated the position he was in as trustee for the people, he would have taken action upon receipt of that letter. As a matter of fact, as I have said, they ignored that important communication for two weeks and then wrote in this way:

Finance Department,
Ottawa, May 1, 1907.

G. VanKoughnet, Esq.,
68 Howard Avenue,
Toronto.

Dear Sir,—I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 17th ultimo.

I must apologize for the delay in replying. Parliamentary business at this time in the session takes precedence over other duties.

While it is not deemed expedient to enter into correspondence at this stage, the matter referred to by you is of sufficient importance to warrant further inquiry. This will shortly be made. I should like to have a copy of any of the notes.

T. C. BOVILLE,
Deputy Minister of Finance.

Is routine parliamentary work so much more important than the interest of the public?

Now is it conceivable that the Deputy Minister of Finance would answer an important communication in that manner? Why was it not expedient to enter into communication? Was it not their bounden duty to take cognizance of an important communication of that kind, and to take some action? The bank, as a matter of fact, had only been in operation a very few months. If they had taken immediate action on that occasion, and had issued either a warrant against Travers and had him arrested, or had issued a Royal Commission, or even given notice to the press calling public attention to the fact that the bank was conceived in sin and born in iniquity, and that the public should not deal with the bank, that would have been an effective way to protect the interests of the people. But there was no reply to that important communication for upwards of two weeks. Then, on December 7, 1908, we find the secretary of the Bankers' Association reporting that a deposit receipt amounting to $150,000 was being offered for sale in the New York markets, and still the Finance Minister takes no action. The Minister of Finance says he only heard rumours, or some gossip regarding the irregularities. Now it seems to me that the statement of the minister hardly accords with the facts. Surely the conversations he had with the member for Halton (Mr. Henderson), and with the member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler), the allegations contained in the writs, these important letters warning the department against issuing the certificate—surely all these things were not mere gossip. I say that no person could regard these serious allegations, these serious statements of hon. members of this House in regard to the condition of that bank, as mere gossip and rumour. Before the certificate was granted the department had received the strongest warnings; immediately after the certificate was granted they received more warnings. Why then did the department not act? Was it powerless under the Bank Act to recall or cancel the certificate? If it was, then the Bank Act should be amended. But even after the department had issued the certificate enabling this bank to transact business, it was not, to use a legal expression, it was not functus officio, it still had some power. Was it paralysed that it could not act? Was it speechless that it could not warn the public against the operations of the bank? That the certificate had been secured by fraud and perjury. Only a word or a letter at that critical stage would have been sufficient to save the depositors and shareholders from loss and ruin. The only redeeming feature about the failure of the Farmers' Bank, in my opinion, is that if it had to occur, it occurred at a most opportune time, because the Bank Act is about to be revised; and if the failure of the Farmers' Bank and of other banks have done anything, they have emphasized though at an awful cost to the shareholders and depositors the many defects in the Bank Act, and the incapacity of the Finance Department. I submit that the government as represented by the Finance Department is morally responsible for all the losses that have occurred in connection with this institution. They knew that the notes of the subscribers to the stock were being discounted in order to raise the deposit for the government. They thus knew that the deposit was being illegally raised, they knew a writ had been issued charging the officers with fraud and forgery, they knew that a perjured affidavit was on file in the department, and that the writ containing these serious allegations set out in the writ of summons were filed with the department, also they knew that the action was settled, that the plaintiffs who were expressly mentioned in the writ had been settled with and had withdrawn their action. I submit that the Finance Department should not have turned a deaf ear to all the warnings they received in connection with the inception of this bank. The bank's charter was a mere dead letter, was a mere corpse, until galvanized into life by the granting of that certificate, and I submit that the department should not have allowed an unscrupulous promoter to use a government creation to bring to the people serious loss, and ruin, and desolation. A banking institution with a central office in a large city, and with branches throughout the length and breadth of the province, is like a big octopus stretching out its tentacles into every part of the province. In this case it gathered in the savings and earnings of the poor people throughout the province, and brought them into its maw in order to engage in speculation and criminal operations.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I say this in all seriousness, that there are three men who are directly and primarily responsible for the inception of the bank, and the loss that has been inflicted on innocent people. If the hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr Stratton), and his institution, the Trust and Guarantee Company, had not loaned money to the subscribers of the stock upon their notes, and thus been guilty of a fraud upon the Bank Act, the promoters never would have been able to raise the money, they would never have been able to make up the deposit, and consequently the bank would never have opened its doors. I submit that the hon. member for West Peterborough—I am sorry he is not in his seat to-night—as the elected representative of the people, a man who is supposed not only to make laws, but to observe them, it was his duty to warn the government that these notes were being discounted. It is said that that very cheque that went from the Trust and Guarantee Company to the Bank of Montreal contained the signature of the hon. member for West Peterborough as its president, and on the face of that cheque it is mentioned that the cheque is to be used as part of the deposit that is made to the government in order to enable the bank to start operations. Now, Sir, it has been asked what the member for West Peterborough made out of the transaction? I do not know whether he made anything personally out of the transaction; but either he or the Trust and Guarantee Company secured thousands of shares of stock in the Keeley mine. They received a large rate of interest, and a large cash bonus besides. Then the next gentleman who appears on the scene was the Liberal whip of the Reform party, he is the next member who comes into the limelight in connection with the organization of the bank. The Liberal whip introduced Mr. Travers to the Minister of Finance, and used his influence to secure the certificate. Mr. Travers, in his sworn statement in the police court in Toronto, stated that Mr. Calvert received a loan of $5,000. Mr. Calvert says it was $3,000, and it was perfectly legitimate, and in the ordinary course of business. If that money was secured in the ordinary course of business, then I ask why it was charged up to commissions, and was not put through the banks in the ordinary shape of a loan. The Minister of Finance asked what a Royal Commission would find out that is not already disclosed. It would be interesting for the public to know, it would be interesting to this House to know, and I am sure the shareholders and depositors desire to know when Mr. Calvert received his loan, and when he paid it back.

Mr. CARVELL. I will answer the hon. gentleman if he wants to know—on the 9th of July, 1909, three years after the bank received its certificate. I have the original note and all the documents.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). Then perhaps the hon. member will proceed to answer the question why it was charged up to commissions, if it was a loan in the ordinary sense?

Mr. CARVELL. I do not think it was.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). That is the sworn statement of the manager of the bank.

Mr. CARVELL. The original note has the words marked on it 'Loan, W. R. T.'

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). The hon. member (Mr. Carvell) will perhaps agree that many of these doubts and suspicions would be cleared and the atmosphere clarified if we had a Royal Commission. Mr. Calvert could go into the box and explain the circumstances. The hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Stratton) could explain many things. This is a most serious and grave matter. Upwards of a million dollars have been lost in four years. The money has disappeared, the courts cannot find out where it has gone. Is it not the duty of the government to appoint a Royal Commission and ascertain how such a tremendous loss occurred in such a short space of time?

I would ask the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) to explain another matter. Mr. Calvert as chief Liberal whip had peculiar influence on the ministerial side of the House and applications were made to him. It is not usual when doing business with a department of the government to ask for a letter of introduction from the government whip, to do so is in this case, a very suspicious circumstance. Not only did Mr. Calvert exercise his influence with the Finance Department in connection with the passing this certificate through the Treasury Board, but he exercised his influence with the Customs Department on behalf of Mr. Travers. I moved for a return the other day in connection with a pleasure yacht which Travers had transferred from the register at Detroit to Brockville. Mr. Calvert seems to have been under some obligation and Mr. Travers wrote to him, August 18th, 1909, just when everybody was clamouring for an investigation, when the insurance department of New York State was asking for an investigation into the affairs of the bank. Mr. Travers was doing everything he could to stave off that investigation. Instead of writing direct to the Customs Department we find him writing to Mr. Calvert as follows:

W. S. Calvert, Esq., M.P.,
Strathroy, Ont.

Dear Sir,—Referring to my conversation with you regarding the entering with the Customs Department my yacht 'Wanda,' will you kindly make an application in my behalf to accomplish the same. It is a pleasure yacht for the use of my family only, and is now at Maitland, Ontario. It was a present to me from Mr. F. C. Whitney, of Detroit. It is sixteen years old and I doubt very much if it would bring $1,000 if offered by auction. If I cannot have it appraised at a low figure I shall have to return the boat as I cannot afford any such luxury.

It enables my family to buy all their supplies at Brockville, and I am sure the people there would be sorry to see me return the boat.

I am sorry to trouble you in the matter, but will be very much obliged if you will be so kind as to see what can be done for me in the matter.

Yours very truly,
(Sgd.) W. R. TRAVERS.

That is about a month after the loan to Mr. Calvert. Travers writes to him asking him to get his boat passed at a low valuation. Mr. Calvert writes to Mr. McDougald, Commissioner of Customs, on the 19th of August, after having a personal conversation with that gentleman. His letter reads:

Dear Mr. McDougald,—I inclose letter from Mr. W. R. Travers, general manager, the Farmers' Bank, Toronto. As I informed you the other day, unless this old boat can be admitted for a nominal sum, say valuation of $1,000 or so, Mr. Travers will return it as he advises me, it is not worth much to anybody, and was given to him as stated in his letter.

You will, therefore, have your appraiser take a look at it and let me know what can be done. I believe he had it painted this summer and it looks clean, so I am informed. I think if you can pass it at above sum of valuation it will stay in Canadian waters, and if not, then I guess he will return it to the donor.

Yours very truly,
(Sgd.) W. S. CALVERT.

So you see Mr. Calvert the Liberal whip had personally interviewed the Commissioner of Customs with a view to getting the boat through the Customs at a low valuation, and actually suggested the valuation. If the Minister of Customs were here I would ask if that is the way the Customs Department is managed. This transaction came to light by accident, and I would ask how many entries are made through the Customs Department on the advice of the Liberal whip. It is an extraordinary circumstance and the Prime Minister should take cognizance of the matter. Mr. Farrow, assistant Commissioner of Customs, replied as follows:

File 68283. Ottawa, August 24, 1909.

W. S. Calvert, Esq.,
Strathroy, Ont.

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 19th instant, with enclosure from Mr. W. R. Travers, general manager, the Farmers' Bank of Canada, Toronto, respecting the value for duty of the yacht 'Wanda.'

One of the Dominion customs appraisers will visit Brockville in course of a week or ten days and examine and appraise the yacht for duty purposes.

Then we have a letter from Mr. Farrow to the Collector of Customs at Brockville. I understood that it was the duty of the collector to make these appraisements himself, but in this case a special appraiser was sent down. Mr. Farrow's letter reads:

File 68283. Ottawa, August 24, 1909.

The Collector of Customs,
Brockville, Ont.

Sir,—In a week or ten days Mr. Dominion Appraiser Boughner will visit your port to examine and appraise the yacht 'Wanda,' owned by Mr. W. R. Travers, general manager, the Farmers' Bank of Canada, Toronto.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
(Sgd.) R. R. FARROW,
Asst. Commissioner of Customs.

The valuation is interesting. I am informed that the boilers and engine alone for scrap iron would be worth several thousand dollars. It is a most expensive yacht, and it is valued on the suggestion of Mr. Calvert at the low sum of $1,600. Mr. Calvert suggested $1,000 or so, and the Customs Department being in an accommodating mood split the difference and made it $1,600. That matter should be taken cognizance of by the leader of the government. Mr. Calvert had been the instrument in securing the passing of the Farmers' Bank certificate; he was the instrument in having the yacht 'Wanda' passed the customs at one-twentieth of its true value. Why did not Mr. Travers deal direct with the Customs Department instead of using the Liberal whip to secure the valuation of a boat worth thousands and thousands of dollars at $1,600. The Customs Department through the influence of the Liberal whip was defrauded out of hundreds of dollars in duty.

It is worthy of note in passing that Mr. Calvert is now on the Board of the Transcontinental Railway Commission dealing with the expenditure of millions and millions of dollars of the people's money for the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific. I ask the leader of the government if Mr. Calvert should be allowed to retain his position upon that board, or should there not be an investigation into his conduct in connection with these various matters. If he received a loan from Mr. Travers by reason of the influence he used either with the Finance Minister or with the Minister of Customs is it not reasonable to assume that he is open to receive loans, if you designate them as loans, from the contractors engaged in the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific? Is it not a matter of fair comment to say that all this is worthy of the closest investigation, and that is one of the reasons why we earnestly press that a Royal Commission of investigation be appointed. Then there was interested in the granting of the certificate the member for
