

DOMINION OF CANADA
OFFICIAL REPORT OF DEBATES
HOUSE OF COMMONS

---

SIXTH SESSION—NINETEENTH PARLIAMENT
which opened the nineteenth day of March, 1945, and was prorogued the sixteenth day of April, 1945

---

8-9 GEORGE VI, 1945

---

IN ONE VOLUME (with Index)

OTTAWA
EDMOND CLOUTIER
PRINTER TO THE KING'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY
1946

MEMBERS OF THE GOVERNMENT
OF THE
RIGHT HON. WILLIAM LYON MACKENZIE KING

(January 29, 1945)

---

Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council, Secretary of State for External Affairs....	Right Hon. WILLIAM LYON MACKENZIE KING
Minister of Mines and Resources.....	Hon. THOMAS ALEXANDER CRERAR
Member of the Administration and Minister without portfolio.....	Hon. JAMES H. KING
Minister of Veterans Affairs.....	Hon. IAN ALISTAIR MACKENZIE
Minister of Finance.....	Hon. JAMES LORIMER ILSLEY
Minister of Transport.....	Hon. JOSEPH ENOIL MICHAUD
Minister of Munitions and Supply and Minister of Reconstruction.....	Hon. CLARENCE DECATUR HOWE
Minister of Agriculture.....	Hon. JAMES GARFIELD GARDINER
Secretary of State.....	Hon. NORMAN ALEXANDER McLARTY
Minister of Trade and Commerce and Acting Minister of National Revenue.....	Hon. JAMES A. MacKINNON
Postmaster General.....	Hon. WILLIAM PATE MULOCK
Minister of National Defence for Air.....	Hon. COLIN WILLIAM GEORGE GIBSON
Minister of National Defence for Naval Services .....	Hon. ANGUS LEWIS MACDONALD
Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada .....	Hon. LOUIS STEPHEN ST. LAURENT
Minister of Labour.....	Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL
Minister of Public Works.....	Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER
Minister of Fisheries.....	Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND
Minister of National War Services.....	Hon. LEO RICHER LAFLÈCHE
Minister of National Health and Welfare....	Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON
Minister of National Defence.....	Hon. A. G. L. McNAUGHTON

PARLIAMENTARY ASSISTANTS

Hon. CYRUS MACMILLAN, M.P.....	To Minister of National Defence for Air.
D. C. ABBOTT, Esq., M.P. ....	To Minister of National Defence.
LIONEL CHEVRIER, Esq., M.P. ....	To Minister of Munitions and Supply.
PAUL J. MARTIN, Esq., M.P. ....	To Minister of Labour.

MEMBERS OF THE GOVERNMENT
OF THE
HOUSE OF COMMONS

Speaker ..... Hon. JAMES ALLISON GLEN, K.C.

Deputy Speaker..... JOSEPH ARTHUR BRADETTE.

---

Clerk of the House.....ARTHUR BEAUCHESNE, C.M.G., M.A., K.C., LL.D., Litt.D., F.R.S.C.

Clerk Assistant..... CHARLES WALTER BOYCE.

---

Sergeant-at-Arms.....Major MILTON FOWLER GREGG, V.C., M.C. and Bar, M.A.

Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms.....JOHN LAUNDY.

---

Editor of Debates.....EARL COURTNEY YOUNG.

Associate Editor of Debates.....FREDERICK W. S. GALBRAITH.

Editor of French Debates.....J. HENRI MACKAY.

---

Official Reporters of Debates:—

English: H. E. Oliver, T. S. Hubbard, E. L. Featherston, C. L. Empringham, W. W. Buskard, P. H. Shelton, D. R. Butt.

Assistants to the Editors: Miss L. A. Kearns, Miss I. A. Boyce.

---

SELECT COMMITTEE ON OFFICIAL REPORT OF DEBATES

Messieurs: Blanchette, Claxton, Esling, Hlynka, Jutras, Pinard, Ross (Middlesex East), Ross (Moose Jaw), Rowe, Shaw, Sinclair.

Chairman: Mr. Jean-François Pouliot

ALPHABETICAL LIST

OF THE

Members of the House of Commons

Sixth Session—Nineteenth Parliament

Hon. JAMES ALLISON GLEN, Speaker

-
- |  |   |
|--|---|
| ABBOTT, DOUGLAS CHARLES—St. Antoine-Westmount. ADAMSON, AGAR RODNEY—York West. ANDERSON, ALEXANDER JAMES—High Park AUTHIER, HECTOR—Chapleau. AYLESWORTH, WILBERT ROSS—Frontenac-Addington.BENCE, ALFRED HENRY—Saskatoon City. BERTRAND, ELIE OSCAR—Prescott. BERTRAND, HON. ERNEST—Laurier. BLACK, DONALD ELMER—Châteauguay-Huntingdon. BLACK, GEORGE—Yukon. BLACK, PERCY CHAPMAN—Cumberland. BLACKMORE, JOHN HORNE—Lethbridge. BLAIR, JOHN KNOX—Wellington North. BLANCHETTE, JOSEPH ADÉODAT—Compton. BONNIER, JOSEPH ARSÈNE—St. Henry. BOOTH, CHARLES STEPHEN—Winnipeg North. BOUCHER, GEORGE RUSSELL—Carleton. BOURGET, MAURICE—Levis. BRADETTE, JOSEPH ARTHUR—Cochrane. BREITHAUP, LOUIS ORVILLE—Waterloo North. BROOKS, ALFRED JOHNSON—Royal. BRUCE, HON. HERBERT ALEXANDER—Parkdale. BRUNELLE, HÉRVÉ EDGAR—Champlain. BRYCE, WILLIAM—Selkirk. BURTON, JOSEPH WILLIAM—Humboldt.CARDIFF, LEWIS ELSTON—Huron North. CARDIN, HON. P. J. ARTHUR—Richelieu-Verchères. | <sup>1</sup>CASE, W. GARFIELD—Grey North. CASSELMAN, ARZA CLAIR—Grenville-Dundas. CASSELMAN, MRS. CORA T.—Edmonton East. CASTLEDEN, GEORGE HUGH—Yorkton. CHAMBERS, ALAN—Nanaimo. CHEVRIER, LIONEL—Stormont. CHOQUETTE, JOSEPH ARMAND—Stanstead. CHURCH, THOMAS LANGTON—Broadview. CLARK, STUART MURRAY—Essex South. CLAXTON, HON. BROOKE—St. Lawrence-St. George. CLEAVER, HUGHES—Halton. CLOUTIER, ARMAND—Drummond-Arthabaska. COLDWELL, M. J.—Rosetown-Biggart. CORMAN, ELLIS HOPKINS—Wentworth. COTÉ, PAUL EMILE—Verdun. CRERAR, HON. THOMAS ALEXANDER—Churchill. CRÈTE, J. ALPHIDA—St. Maurice-Lafèche. CRUICKSHANK, GEORGE ALEXANDER—Fraser Valley.D'ANJOU, J. E. S. EMMANUEL—Rimouski. DECHENE, JOSEPH MIVILLE—Athabaska. DENNIS, AZELLUS—St. Denis. DESMOND, CLAYTON EARLE—Kent (Ont.). DIEFENBAKER, JOHN GEORGE—Lake Centre. DONNELLY, THOMAS F.—Wood Mountain. DORION, FREDERIC—Charlevoix-Saguenay. DOUGLAS, JAMES LESTER—Queens. DUBOIS, LUCIEN—Nicolet-Yamaska. DUBUC, JULIEN EDOUARD ALFRED—Chicoutimi. DUPUIS, VINCENT—Chambly-Rouville. |
|--|---|
-

<sup>1</sup> Elected in by-election, February 5, 1945.

-
- EDWARDS, MANLEY JUSTIN—Calgary West.
 EMMERSON, HENRY READ—Westmorland.
 ESLING, WILLIAM KEMBLE—Kootenay West.
 EUDES, RAYMOND—Hochelaga.
 EVANS, CHARLES ROBERT—Maple Creek.
- FACTOR, SAMUEL—Spadina.
 FAIR, ROBERT—Battle River.
 FARQUHAR, THOMAS—Algoma East.
 FAUTEUX, GASPARD—St. Mary.
 FERLAND, CHARLES EDOUARD—Joliette—L'Assomption-Montcalm.
 FERRON, J. EMILE—Berthier-Maskinonge.
 FOURNIER, HON. ALPHONSE—Hull.
 FOURNIER, SARTO—Maisonneuve-Rosemont.
 FRASER, GEORGE KNAPMAN—Peterborough West.
 FRASER, WILLIAM ALEXANDER—Northumberland (Ont.).
 FULFORD, GEORGE TAYLOR—Leeds.
 FURNISS, STEPHEN JOSEPH—Muskoka-Ontario.
- GARDINER, HON. JAMES GARFIELD—Melville.
 GERSHAW, FREDERICK WILLIAM—Medicine Hat.
 GIBSON, HON. COLIN WILLIAM GEORGE—Hamilton West.
 GILLIS, CLARENCE—Cape Breton South.
 GLADSTONE, ROBERT WILLIAM—Wellington
 South.
 GLEN, JAMES ALLISON—Marquette.
 GOLDING, WILLIAM HENRY—Huron-Perth.
 GOULET, ALFRED—Russell.
 GRAHAM, ROY THEODORE—Swift Current.
 GRANT, THOMAS VINCENT—Kings.
 GRAY, ROSS WILFRED—Lambton West.
 GRAYDON, GORDON—Peel.
 GREEN, HOWARD CHARLES—Vancouver South.
 GREGORY, JOHN ALBERT—The Battlefords.
- HALLÉ, MAURICE—Brome-Missisquoi.
 HANSELL, ERNEST GEORGE—Macleod.
 HANSON, OLOF—Skeena.
 HANSON, HON. RICHARD BURPEE—York-Sunbury.
- HARRIS, JOSEPH HENRY—Danforth.
 HARRIS, WALTER EDWARD—Grey-Bruce.
 HATFIELD, HEBER HAROLD—Victoria-Carleton.
 HAZEN, DOUGLAS KING—St. John-Albert.
 HEALY, THOMAS PATRICK—St. Ann.
 HENDERSON, CHARLES ALFRED—Kindersley.
 HILL, BURTON MAXWELL—Charlotte.
 HLYNKA, ANTHONY—Vegreville.
 HOBLITZELL, FREDERICK GEORGE—Eglinton.
 HOMUTH, KARL K.—Waterloo South.
 HOWDEN, JOHN POWER—St. Boniface.
 HOWE, HON. CLARENCE DECATUR—Port Arthur.
 HURTUBISE, JOSEPH RAOUL—Nipissing.
- ILSLEY, HON. JAMES LORIMER—Digby-Annapolis-Kings.
 ISNOR, GORDON B.—Halifax.
- JACKMAN, HARRY R.—Rosedale.
 JAKUES, NORMAN—Wetaskiwin.
 JEAN, JOSEPH—Mercier.
 JOHNSTON, CHARLES EDWARD—Bow River.
 JOHNSTON, JOSEPH ALLAN—London.
 JUTRAS, RENÉ—Provencher.
- KING, RIGHT HON. W. L. MACKENZIE—Prince Albert.
 KINLEY, JOHN JAMES—Queens-Lunenburg.
 KIRK, JAMES RALPH—Antigonish-Guysborough.
 KNOWLES, STANLEY HOWARD—Winnipeg North Centre.
 KUHLMAN, WALTER FREDERICK—Jasper-Edson.
- LACOMBE, LIGUORI—Laval-Two Mountains.
 LACROIX, WILFRID—Quebec-Montmorency.
 LAFLAMME, J. LEO K.—Montmagny-L'Islet.
 LAFLECHE, HON. LEO R.—Outremont.
 LAFONTAINE, JOSEPH—Megantic-Frontenac.
 LALONDE, MAURICE—Labelle.
 LAPOINTE, ARTHUR JOSEPH—Matapedia-Matane.
 LAPOINTE, HUGUES—Lotbinière.
 LEADER, HARRY—Portage la Prairie.
-

- LECLERC, JOSEPH HERMAS—Shefford.
 LEDUC, RODOLPHE—Wright.
 LEGER, AUREL D.—Kent (N.B.).
 LITTLE, WALTER—Timiskaming.
 LOCKHART, NORMAN J. M.—Lincoln.
- MACDIARMID, WILLIAM B.—Glengarry.
 MACDONALD, HON. ANGUS LEWIS—Kingston City.
 MACDONALD, WILLIAM CHISHOLM—Halifax.
 MACDONALD, WILLIAM ROSS—Brantford City.
 MACINNIS, ANGUS—Vancouver East.
 MACKENZIE, FREDERICK DONALD—Neepawa.
 MACKENZIE, HUGH ALEXANDER—Lambton-Kent.
 MACKENZIE, HON. IAN ALISTAIR—Vancouver Centre.
 MACKINNON, GEORGE ERNEST LAWSON—Kootenay East.
 MACKINNON, HON. JAMES A.—Edmonton West.
 MACLEAN, MATTHEW—Cape Breton North-Victoria.
 MACMILLAN, HON. CYRUS—Queens.
 MACNICOL, JOHN RITCHIE—Davenport.
 MCCANN, JAMES JOSEPH—Renfrew South.
 MCCUAIG, DUNCAN FLETCHER—Simcoe North.
 McCUBBIN, ROBERT—Middlesex West.
 McCULLOCH, HENRY BYRON—Picou.
 McDONALD, WALLACE REGINALD—Pontiac.
 MCGARRY, MOSES ELIJAH—Inverness-Richmond.
 MCGEER, GERALD GRATTON—Vancouver-Buttard.
 MCGIBBON, JAMES W.—Argenteuil.
 MCGREGOR, ROBERT HENRY—York East.
 MCLRAITH, GEORGE JAMES—Ottawa West.
 McIVOR, DANIEL—Fort William.
 McLARTY, HON. NORMAN ALEXANDER—Essex West.
 McLEAN, GEORGE ALEXANDER—Simcoe East.
 McNEVIN, BRUCE—Victoria (Ont.).
 McNIVEN, DONALD ALEXANDER—Regina City.
 MARIER, ELPHÈGE—Jacques Cartier.
- MARSHALL, JAMES ALEXANDER—Camrose.
 MARTIN, PAUL—Essex East.
 MASSEY, DENTON—Greenwood.
 MATTHEWS, JAMES EWEN—Brandon.
 MAYBANK, RALPH—Winnipeg South Centre.
 MAYHEW, ROBERT WELLINGTON—Victoria (B.C.).
 MICHAUD, HON. JOSEPH ENOIL—Restigouche-Madawaska.
 MILLS, WILSON HENRY—Elgin.
 MITCHELL, HON. HUMPHREY—Welland.
 MOORE, WILLIAM HENRY—Ontario.
 MULLINS, JAMES PARTICK—Richmond-Wolfe.
 MULOCK, HON. WILLIAM PATE—York North.
 MUTCH, LESLIE ALEXANDER—Winnipeg South.
- NEILL, ALAN WEBSTER—Comox-Alberni.
 NICHOLSON, ALEXANDER MALCOLM—Mackenzie.
 NIELSEN, Mrs. DORISE WINIFRED—North Battleford.
 NIXON, GEORGE EWART—Algoma West.
 NOSEWORTHY, JOSEPH WILLIAM—York South.
- O'BRIEN, J. LEONARD—Northumberland (N.B.).
 O'NEILL, THOMAS JAMES—Kamloops.
 PARENT, CHARLES—Quebec West and South.
 PERLEY, ERNEST EDWARD—Qu'Appelle.
 PICARD, L. PHILIPPE—Bellechasse.
 PINARD, JOSEPH ALBERT—Ottawa East.
 POTTIER, VINCENT JOSEPH—Shelburne-Yamouth-Clare.
 POULIOT, JEAN FRANÇOIS—Témiscouata.
 POWER, HON. CHARLES GAVAN—Quebec South.
 PURDY, GORDON TIMLIN—Colchester-Hants.
- QUELCH, VICTOR—Acadia.
- RALSTON, HON. JAMES LAYTON—Prince.
 RAYMOND, MAXIME—Beauharnois-Laprairie.
 REID, THOMAS—New Westminster.
 RENNIE, ALMON SECORD—Oxford.
 RHÉAUME, MARTIAL—St. Johns-Iberville-Napierville.

RICKARD, WILBERT FRANKLIN—Durham.	STOKES, GEORGE HENRY—Hastings South.
ROEBUCK, ARTHUR WENTWORTH—Trinity	SYLVESTRE, ARMAND—Lake St. John-Roberval.
ROSE, FRED—Cartier.
ROSS, DOUGLAS GOODERHAM—St. Paul's.	TAYLOR, WILLIAM HORACE—Norfolk.
ROSS, DUNCAN GRAHAM—Middlesex East.	THAUVETTE, JOSEPH—Vaudreuil-Soulanges.
ROSS, GEORGE HENRY—Calgary East.	TOMLINSON, WILLIAM RAE—Bruce.
ROSS, JAMES ARTHUR—Souris.	TREMBLAY, LEONARD DAVID—Dorchester.
ROSS, JOHN GORDON—Moose Jaw.	TRIPP, JESSE PICKARD—Assiniboia.
ROSS, THOMAS HAMBLY—Hamilton East.	TUCKER, WALTER ADAM—Rosthern.
ROWE, HON. WILLIAM EARL—Duferin-Simcoe.	TURGEON, JAMES GRAY—Cariboo.
ROY, JOSEPH SASSEVILLE—Gaspé.	TUSTIN, GEORGE JAMES—Prince Edward-Lennox.
RYAN, ROBERT—Three Rivers.
	VENIOT, CLARENCE JOSEPH—Gloucester.
ST. LAURENT, HON. LOUIS STEPHEN—Outremont.	WARD, WILLIAM JOHN—Dauphin.
SANDERSON, FREDERICK GEORGE—Perth.	WARREN, RALPH MELVILLE—Renfrew North.
SENN, MARK CECIL—Haldimand.	WEIR, WILLIAM GILBERT—Macdonald.
SHAW, FREDERICK DAVIS—Red Deer.	WHITE, GEORGE STANLEY—Hastings-Peterborough.
SINCLAIR, JAMES—Vancouver North.	WHITMAN, FREDERICK PRIMROSE—Mount Royal.
SISSONS, JOHN HOWARD—Peace River.	WINKLER, HOWARD WALDEMAR—Lisgar.
SLAGHT, ARTHUR GRAEME—Parry Sound.	WOOD, GEORGE ERNEST—Brant.
SOPER, BERT H.—Lanark.	WRIGHT, PERCY ELLIS—Melfort.
STIRLING, HON. GROTE—Yale.

ALPHABETICAL LIST

OF THE

Constituencies of the House of Commons

Sixth Session—Nineteenth Parliament

---

ACADIA—Quelch, Victor.	CHAMBLY-ROUVILLE—Dupuis, Vincent.
ALGOMA EAST—Farquhar, Thomas.	CHAMPLAIN—Brunelle, Hervé Edgar.
ALGOMA WEST—Nixon, George Ewart.	CHAPLEAU—Authier, Hector.
ANTIGONISH-GUYSBOROUGH—Kirk, James Ralph.	CHARLEVOIX-SAGUENAY—Dorion, Frederic.
ARGENTEUIL—McGibbon, James W.	CHARLOTTE—Hill, Burton Maxwell.
ASSINIBOIA—Tripp, Jesse Pickard.	CHATEAUGUAY-HUNTINGDON—Black, Donald Elmer.
ATHABASKA—Dechene, Joseph Miville.	CHICOUTIMI—Dubuc, Julien Edouard Alfred.
	CHURCHILL—Crerar, Hon. Thomas Alexander.
BATTLE RIVER—Fair, Robert.	COCHRANE—Bradette, Joseph Arthur.
BEAUCÉ—	COLCESTER-HANTS—Purdy, Gordon Timlin.
BEAUHARNOIS-LAPRAIRIE—Raymond, Maxime.	COMOX-ALBERNI—Neill, Alan Webster.
BELLECHASSE—Picard, L. Philippe.	COMPTON—Blanchette, Joseph Adéodat.
BERTHIER-MASKINONGÉ—Feron, J. Emile.	CUMBERLAND—Black, Percy Chapman.
BONAVENTURE—
BOW RIVER—Johnston, Charles Edward.	DANFORTH—Harris, Joseph Henry.
BRANDON—Matthews, James Ewen.	DAUPHIN—Ward, William John.
BRANT—Wood, George Ernest.	DAVENPORT—MacNicol, John Ritchie.
BRANTFORD CITY—Macdonald, William Ross.	DIGBY-ANNAPOLIS-KINGS—Ilsley, Hon. James Lorimer.
BROADVIEW—Church, Thomas Langton.	DORCHESTER—Tremblay, Leonard David.
BROME-MISSISQUOI—Hallé, Maurice.	DRUMMOND-ARTHABASKA—Cloutier, Armand.
BRUCE—Tomlinson, William Rae.	DUFFERIN-SIMCOE—Rowe, Hon. William Earl.
	DURHAM—Rickard, Wilbert Franklin.
CALGARY EAST—Ross, George Henry.
CALGARY WEST—Edwards, Manley Justin.	EDMONTON EAST—Casselmann, Mrs. Cora.
CAMROSE—Marshall, James Alexander.	EDMONTON WEST—MacKinnon, Hon. James A.
CAPE BRETON NORTH-VICTORIA—MacLean, Matthew.	EGLINTON—Hoblitzell, Frederick George.
CAPE BRETON SOUTH—Gillis, Clarence.	ELGIN—Mills, Wilson Henry.
CARIBOO—Turgeon, James Gray.	ESSEX EAST—Martin, Paul.
CARLETON—Boucher, George Russell.	ESSEX SOUTH—Clark, Stuart Murray.
CARTIER—Rose, Fred.	ESSEX WEST—McLarty, Hon. Norman Alexander.

---

FORT WILLIAM—McIvor, Daniel.	KINDERSLEY—Henderson, Charles Alfred.
FRASER VALLEY—Cruikshank, George Alexander.	KINGS—Grant, Thomas Vincent.
FRONTENAC-ADDINGTON—Aylesworth, Wilbert Ross.	KINGSTON CITY—Macdonald, Hon. Angus Lewis.
GASPÉ—Roy, Joseph Sasseville.	KOOTENAY EAST—MacKinnon, George Ernest Lawson.
GLENGARRY—MacDiarmid, William B.	KOOTENAY WEST—Esling, William Kemble.
GLOUCESTER—Veniot, Clarence Joseph.	LABELLE—Lalonde, Maurice.
GREENWOOD—Massey, Denton.	LAKE CENTRE—Diefenbaker, John George.
GRENVILLE-DUNDAS—Casselman, Arza Clair.	LAKE ST. JOHN-ROBERVAL—Sylvestre, Armand.
GREY-BRUCE—Harris, Walter Edward.	LAMBTON-KENT—Mackenzie, Hugh Alexander.
GREY NORTH— <sup>1</sup> Case, W. Garfield.	LAMBTON WEST—Gray, Ross Wilfred.
HALDIMAND—Senn, Mark Cecil.	LANARK—Soper, Bert H.
HALIFAX—Isnor, Gordon B. Macdonald, William Chisholm.	LAURIER—Bertrand, Hon. Ernest.
HALTON—Cleaver, Hughes.	LAVAL-TWO MOUNTAINS—Lacombe, Liguori.
HAMILTON EAST—Ross, Thomas Hambly.	LEEDS—Fulford, George Taylor.
HAMILTON WEST—Gibson, Hon. Colin William George.	LETHBRIDGE—Blackmore, John Horne.
HASTINGS-PETERBOROUGH—White, George Stanley.	LÉVIS—Bourget, Maurice.
HASTINGS SOUTH—Stokes, George Henry.	LINCOLN—Lockhart, Norman J. M.
HIGH PARK—Anderson, Alexander James.	LISGAR—Winkler, Howard Waldemar.
HOCHELAGA—Eudes, Raymond.	LONDON—Johnston, Joseph Allan.
HULL—Fournier, Hon. Alphonse.	LOTBINIÈRE—Lapointe, Hugues.
HUMBOLDT—Burton, Joseph William.	MACDONALD—Weir, William Gilbert.
HURON NORTH—Cardiff, Lewis Elston.	MACKENZIE—Nicholson, Alexander Malcolm.
HURON-PERTH—Golding, William Henry.	MACLEOD—Hansell, Ernest George.
INVERNESS-RICHMOND—McGarry, Moses Elijah.	MAISONNEUVE-ROSEMONT—Fournier, Sarto.
JACQUES CARTIER—Marier, Elphège.	MAPLE CREEK—Evans, Charles Robert.
JASPER-EDSON—Kuhl, Walter Frederick.	MARQUETTE—Glen, James Allison.
JOLIETTE-L'ASSOMPTION-MONTCALM—Ferland, Charles Edouard.	MATAPEDIA-MATANE—Lapointe, Arthur Joseph.
KAMLOOPS—O'Neill, Thomas James.	MEDICINE HAT—Gershaw, Frederick William.
KAMOURASKA—	MEGANTIC-FRONTENAC—Lafontaine, Joseph.
KENORA-RAINY RIVER—	MELFORT—Wright, Percy Ellis.
KENT (N.B.)—Leger, Aurel D.	MELLVILLE—Gardiner, Hon. James Garfield.
KENT (ONT.)—Desmond, Clayton Earle.	MERCIER—Jean, Joseph.
	MIDDLESEX EAST—Ross, Duncan Graham.
	MIDDLESEX WEST—McCubbin, Robert.
	MONTMAGNY-L'ISLET—Lafamme, J. Leo K.
	MOOSE JAW—Ross, John Gordon.
	MOUNT ROYAL—Whitman, Frederick Primrose.
	MUSKOKA-ONTARIO—Furniss, Stephen Joseph.

<sup>1</sup> Elected in by-election, February 5, 1945.

NANAIMO—Chambers, Alan.	QUEENS—Douglas James Lester. Macmillan, Hon. Cyrus.
NEEPAWA—MacKenzie, Frederick Donald.	QUEENS-LUNENBURG—Kinley, John James.
NEW WESTMINSTER—Reid, Thomas.	RED DEER—Shaw, Frederick Davis.
NICOLET-YAMASKA—Dubois, Lucien.	REGINA CITY—McNiven, Donald Alexander.
NIPISSING—Hurtubise, Joseph Raoul.	RENFREW NORTH—Warren, Ralph Melville.
NORFOLK—Taylor, William Horace.	RENFREW SOUTH—McCann, James Joseph.
NORTH BATTLEFORD—Nielsen, Mrs. Dorise Winifred.	RESTIGOUCHE-MADAWASKA—Michaud, Hon. Joseph Enoil.
NORTHUMBERLAND (N.B.)—O'Brien, J. Leonard.	RICHELIEU-VERCHÈRES—Cardin, Hon. P. J. Arthur.
NORTHUMBERLAND (Ont.)—Fraser, William Alexander.	RICHMOND-WOLFE—Mullins, James Patrick.
ONTARIO—Moore, William Henry.	RIMOUSKI—d'Anjou, J. E. S. Emmanuel.
OTTAWA EAST—Pinard, Joseph Albert.	ROSEDALE—Jackman, Harry R.
OTTAWA WEST—McIlraith, George James.	ROSETOWN-BIGGAR—Coldwell, M. J.
OUTREMONT—LaFleche, Hon. Leo Richer.	ROSTHERN—Tucker, Walter Adam.
OXFORD—Rennie, Almon Secord.	ROYAL—Brooks, Alfred Johnson.
PARKDALE—Bruce, Hon. Herbert Alexander.	RUSSELL—Goulet, Alfred.
PEACE RIVER—Sissons, John Howard.	ST. ANN—Healy, Thomas Patrick.
PEACE RIVER—Sissons, John Haward.	ST. ANTOINE-WESTMOUNT—Abbott, Douglas Charles.
PEEL—Graydon, Gordon.	ST. BONIFACE—Howden, John Power.
PERTH—Sanderson, Frederick George.	ST. DENIS—Denis, Azellus.
PETERBOROUGH WEST—Fraser, George Knapman.	ST. HENRY—Bonnier, Joseph Arsène.
PICTOU—McCulloch, Henry Byron.	ST. HYACINTHE-BAGOT—
PONTIAC—McDonald, Wallace Reginald.	ST. JAMES—
PORTAGE LA PRAIRIE—Leader, Harry.	ST. JOHN-ALBERT—Hazen, Douglas King.
PORT ARTHUR—Howe, Hon. Clarence Decatur.	ST. JOHNS-IBERVILLE-NAPIERVILLE—Rhéaume, Martial.
PORTNEUF—	ST. LAWRENCE-ST. GEORGE—Claxton, Hon. Brooke.
PRESCOTT—Bertrand, Elie Oscar.	ST. MARY—Fauteux, Gaspard.
PRINCE—Ralston, Hon. James Layton.	ST. MAURICE-LAFLECHE—Crête, J. Alphida.
PRINCE ALBERT—King, Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie.	ST. PAUL'S—Ross, Douglas Gooderham.
PRINCE EDWARD-LENNOX—Tustin, George James.	SASKATOON CITY—Bence, Alfred Henry.
PROVENCHER—Jutras, René.	SELKIRK—Bryce, William.
QU'APPELLE—Perley, Ernest Edward.	SHEFFORD—Leclerc, Joseph Hermas.
QUEBEC EAST—St. Laurent, Hon. Louis Stephen.	SHELBURNE-YARMOUTH-CLARE—Pottier, Vincent Joseph.
QUEBEC-MONTMORENCY—LaCroix, Wilfrid.	SHERBROOKE—
QUEBEC SOUTH—Power, Hon. Charles Gavan.	SIMCOE EAST—McLean, George Alexander.
QUEBEC WEST AND SOUTH—Parent, Charles.	SIMCOE NORTH—McCuaig, Duncan Fletcher.

SKEENA—Hanson, Olof.	WATERLOO NORTH—Breithaupt, Louis Orville.
SOURIS—Ross, James Arthur.	WATERLOO SOUTH—Homuth, Karl K.
SPADINA—Factor, Samuel.	WELLAND—Mitchell, Hon. Humphrey.
SPRINGFIELD—	WELLINGTON NORTH—Blair, John Knox.
STANSTEAD—Choquette, Joseph Armand.	WELLINGTON SOUTH—Gladstone, Robert William.
STORMONT—Chevrier, Lionel.	WENTWORTH—Corman, Ellis Hopkins.
SWIFT CURRENT—Graham, Roy Theodore.	WESTMORLAND—Emmerson, Henry Read.
TÉMISCOUATA—Pouliot, Jean François.	WETASKIWIN—Jaques, Norman.
TERREBONNE—	WEYBURN—
THE BATTLEFORDS—Gregory, John Albert.	WOOD MOUNTAIN—Donnelly, Thomas F.
THREE RIVERS—Ryan, Robert.	WINNIPEG NORTH—Booth, Charles Stephen.
TIMISKAMING—Little, Walter.	WINNIPEG NORTH CENTRE—Knowles, Stanley Howard.
TRINITY—Roebuck, Arthur Wentworth.	WINNIPEG SOUTH—Mutch, Leslie Alexander.
VANCOUVER-BURRARD—McGeer, Gerald Grattan.	WINNIPEG SOUTH CENTRE—Maybank, Ralph.
VANCOUVER CENTRE—Mackenzie, Hon. Ian Alistair.	WRIGHT—Leduc, Rodolphe.
VANCOUVER EAST—MacInnis, Angus.	YALE—Stirling, Hon. Grote.
VANCOUVER NORTH—Sinclair, James.	YORK EAST—McGregor, Robert Henry.
VANCOUVER SOUTH—Green, Howard Charles.	YORK NORTH—Mulock, Hon. William Pate.
VAUDREUIL-SOULANGES—Thauvette, Joseph.	YORK SOUTH—Noseworthy, J. W.
VEGREVILLE—Hlynka, Anthony.	YORK-SUNBURY—Hanson, Hon. Richard Burpee.
VERDUN—Coté, Paul Emile.	YORKTON—Castleden, George Hugh.
VICTORIA (B.C.)—Mayhew, Robert Wellington.	YORK WEST—Adamson, Agar Rodney.
VICTORIA (ONT.)—McNevin, Bruce.	YUKON—Black, George.
VICTORIA-CARLETON—Hatfield, Heber Harold.

The late John Mouat Turner

THE LATE JOHN MOUAT TURNER

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before we enter upon the business of this session I should like to make a reference to the passing of one who to-day is very much missed in this House of Commons. I refer to our friend the late hon. member for Springfield, John Mouat Turner. As hon. members will recall, Mr. Turner was in this house for some ten years, having been first elected in the general election of 1935 and again in 1940. He had just been renominated in the constituency of Springfield as Liberal candidate to contest the riding at the next general election.

The constituency of Springfield because of its great extent, the variety of its industries and the mixed character of its population, is not an easy constituency either to contest or hold. Agriculture is the principal industry, but there is also much in the way of manufacturing and various business concerns. In the constituency there is also a large number of railway workers. The constituency might be regarded as a cross-section of the province of Manitoba. Mr. Turner followed different occupations in his early years. He was one who always kept closely in touch with his fellow men, enjoyed the sharing of their interests, and sought so far as opportunity afforded to do what he could to further their well-being. The fact that he was able to carry the constituency as he did on two occasions, and to merit the recognition accorded him of being asked again to contest it, proves that he possessed in rare measure personal characteristics of the kind that gained for him not only many friends in his constituency but also friends on all sides in this House of Commons. It might be added that in his election contests he had been opposed by formidable opponents.

Mr. Turner did not take much part in the debates of the house. He was however faithful in his attendance and when he spoke never failed to make clear the breadth of his human sympathies. He was always ready to do what he could to further measures for the well-being of his fellow men, showing particular interest in improving the lot of the less privileged members of society.

I shall always personally be deeply grateful to the late member for his personal loyalty, and for his loyalty to the principles and policies of his party. While some of the government's policies may not wholly have met his views, nevertheless he stood firm in his support in the belief that the larger and general interest was more important than that of any one particular interest.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Turner's father, who was of Irish descent, was one of the pioneers of Manitoba. His mother was Scottish. When one recalls the personal characteristics of the late member one realizes that he possessed in full measure the quality of humour and cheerfulness so characteristic of most of the Irish race, and also that of loyalty, which is the very essence of the best Scottish character. This house and particularly the party of which throughout his life he was so staunch a member, is the poorer today for his passing, all the poorer in that he had not yet completed his forty-fifth year.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, it will be the wish of all hon. members that you convey to Mrs. Turner, and also to the late Mr. Turner's mother and to his brothers an expression in the loss its membership has sustained in his passing and an expression of sincere sympathy to them in their bereavement.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make only one addition to what has been said by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and that is that in the passing of John M. Turner, the late member for Springfield, the house loses a member who upon his return to the house in 1936 was numbered among the seven or eight younger members. While I have not checked the record, certainly this is the first time since I came to the house in 1936 that we have lost a member who was born in this century. I mention this only to indicate the uncertainty of life and to emphasize the sorrow felt by members of this party and members generally at the passing of one so young.

The Prime Minister has referred to Mr. Turner's friendliness. I should like to emphasize what he has said in that regard. After all, in political life, and particularly in parliament, there are certain fundamentals which go much deeper than may appear on the superficial political surface. John Turner passed from this earthly life with perhaps as many personal friends as any other member of parliament. I think no better tribute can be paid a man than that upon leaving his fellow men in parliament or elsewhere, he leaves with the friendship of all and the enemy of none. It is with deep sorrow that we mourn his passing. John Turner was not a man who took a very prominent part in the debates of the house, but when he did speak, to use street parlance, he spoke straight from the shoulder, and did not hide his words under piles of oratorical straw. Not only does he leave behind friends from his own political group, but also friends from this group. Although I did not support his party, and was opposed to him in most political divisions, I considered him a close personal friend. I shall miss him because in the halls and corridors of the house, and in the chamber, I learned to regard him with deep affection, and as one who through the years I was honoured to call a friend.

The sympathy of this party goes out to his wife and the other members of his family. We extend our sympathy to the Prime Minister, to the government and the party to which he belonged in the loss they have sustained. I should like to join in what has been expressed so eloquently by the Prime Minister, and in thus paying tribute to the memory of a fellow member I shall have discharged a duty which would have given me pleasure were he here, but which is a sad one because of this occasion.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggarr): Mr. Speaker, we wish to associate ourselves with the expressions of sympathy to the widow, the mother and brothers of the late Mr. Turner, and we would also express sympathy to the Prime Minister in the loss of a faithful follower.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, it seems particularly regrettable that a young man who apparently had such promise should have been called away at such an early age. We deeply sympathize with those who are bereaved, and also with the Prime Minister and the members of his party in the loss of this man.

I had some connection with Mr. Turner, and was led to believe that he represented his constituency sincerely, and worked for what he deemed to be the welfare of Canada as a whole. I am sorry I did not learn to know more about him, but so far as I did learn, I considered him worthy of respect.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, from this corner of the house I should like to pay my humble tribute to an old friend, Johnny Turner. As a baseball player he could throw straight and strike hard—characteristics which he carried with him into his life. He called almost daily in my room, and while he and I did not agree on certain things, there was one thing on which we did agree. I can still see the twinkle in his eye when he told me that his father and mother were Christian Presbyterians. When he told me that his health was not good, I could then say to him, as one man to another, "Just one thing counts. It is not your position in life or the amount of money you can pile up: it is your faith in God that counts." Johnny Turner told me that a man is a big fool if he does not make sure that his faith is fixed in God. That is my tribute to the hon. member who sat in this royal corner of the house.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as a colleague from Manitoba of the late Mr. Turner who sat in the house for over nine years with him, I wish to pay a tribute of respect to his memory and to join with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon), the leaders of the other parties and the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) in extending to his family our very deep sympathy.

The constituency that Mr. Turner represented was a difficult one to represent. I doubt if any riding in the whole dominion was more cosmopolitan in character than the riding of Springfield. But in that constituency Mr. Turner had friends among all classes and all racial origins whatever they were. It is a tribute to the character of the man that in his work as representative of the constituency he drew these people together and made them feel that they were Canadians, made them feel that they had their place in the life of this country.

He made no pretence of having all the human virtues. He had his failings like the rest of us poor human mortals. But Mr. Turner was a man of sincere convictions. He was a man of no pretence of any kind. He believed in right as he saw it and he was prepared to fight for it. The great mass of people are just ordinary folk and to lose Mr. Turner is a loss, not only to this parliament but to the great body of people in the country and especially those in the constituency he represented here for so many years.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, it was my great privilege to consider the late Mr. Turner, the former member for Springfield, a personal friend. His loss will be felt by all of us, and especially by his constituents who were his friends. There were large numbers of French-speaking Canadians in his constituency and they liked Jack Turner very much. They thought highly of him. While he was in the house he was true to them, and he expressed their views with remarkable courage.

Jack Turner was four-square; he was strongly built, and he was not afraid to say what he thought. In his first year here he made practical and useful and progressive suggestions, some of which have been accepted. In later years he protested vigorously against certain policies and he met with success. He spoke frankly to the government and urged them to take into consideration what he said, and Jack Turner won his case.

The subject matter of his protests seemed of no importance to some of the members of parliament, but it was of great interest to the army. Jack Turner deserves the tribute of being considered an outspoken member of parliament who did a good and useful job while he was sitting here as the representative of the constituency of Springfield in Manitoba.

May I express to Mrs. Turner, who often came to Ottawa with Mr. Turner, my deepest sympathy in her great loss.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRECEDENCE OF GOVERNMENT NOTICES OF MOTION AND GOVERNMENT ORDERS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): After Your Honour has reported the speech of His Excellency the Governor General to the houses of parliament it has been customary for whoever was leading the house to make a motion to the effect that the speech delivered by His Excellency should be taken into consideration at a subsequent sitting of the house, mentioning the time.

The intention of the government, in order to enable business to be proceeded with as rapidly as possibly, is to have the debate on the address in reply proceeded with this afternoon, but only to a limited extent. The address will be moved and seconded by two hon. members of the house and the debate will then be adjourned to a subsequent time. Except in that particular there will be no difference in the order of procedure from what has been customary. I might say that what I have just indicated is not a departure, because on several occasions this house as well as the parliament at Westminster has taken time for the consideration of the address immediately following its delivery. What is being done to-day is simply for the purpose of expediting the work of this session. I would move:

That on Tuesday, the 20th March, 1945, to the end of the present session, government notices of motion and government orders shall have precedence at every sitting over all other business except questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before this motion carries I should like to comment for a moment upon the suggestion of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) with respect to the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I take it that the Prime Minister has in mind intervening with some other type of public business and postponing the debate on the address to some subsequent period.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

I think I should not let this matter go by without registering objection with respect to the debate on the address being dealt with in this way. So far as the debate on the address is concerned it has been the established parliamentary practice that before supply is granted a motion of confidence in the government is placed before the house so that the house may decide upon it. I do not desire to debate the matter at any length beyond raising this objection on behalf of the opposition, and asking the Prime Minister if this procedure which he is now bringing forward has been adopted in previous parliaments. Since I came into the house some nine years ago I cannot recall any time when the government asked that the debate on the address should be postponed to some subsequent time. I should like to ask the Prime Minister what is the underlying reason for the government's proposal.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say in reply to my hon. friend that this resolution is being moved to give precedence to the business of the house rather than to a discussion on the address. As my hon. friend well knows, the debate on the address might run on conceivably for weeks. This session cannot continue beyond the sixteenth of next month because the term of parliament expires at that time. I believe it will be the wish of all, certainly of the people of the country, that the house should devote its time to the most important business that will be before it. There are, as my hon. friend is aware, two particular items mentioned in the speech from the throne that are most important; one the resolution with respect to the conference at San Francisco, and the other the financial measures that will have to be considered. It is important that no time should be lost in taking up both these measures.

As to my hon. friend's remark as to precedence, I may say that I anticipated he might raise that question and I asked the Clerk to give me a memorandum. I have the following record of what has taken place—part of it, I might say, during the time my hon. friend has been in the house but which he has possibly forgotten:

After the general elections of 1930, the house met in special session on the 9th of September, 1930. The address in reply to the speech from the throne was moved by Mr. Turnbull and seconded by Mr. Gagnon immediately after the house returned from the senate. No motion was made giving precedence to the debate on the address. The debate continued on the next day when the address was passed.

There was no motion formally to continue the debate.

The motion giving precedence to the debate on the address was passed on the 12th of March, 1931, but on April 1, before the debate on the address was concluded, the house voted interim supply for the past fiscal year and went to the senate for royal assent. An amendment to the address was moved by Mr. Gardiner on April 20. It was negatived on the next day when the address was carried.

That was from March 12 to April 20.

In the session of 1932, Mr. Bennett moved, as shown by the journals under date of the 4th of February, that the speech be taken into consideration on the following Monday. On that Monday, before the debate on the address was resumed, Mr. Guthrie, Minister of Justice, moved that a select committee be appointed to inquire into certain charges made by the Hon. G. N. Gordon against Mr. Bennett. A debate took place and the motion was agreed to on that day. Debate on the address was then resumed and concluded on the next day, February 9, when the address was passed.

In the session of 1932-33, Mr. Bennett moved, on October 6, that the address be taken into consideration on the following Monday. Similar motions were made in the sessions of 1934, January 25, and of 1935, January 17.

It will be seen by these precedents that it is not necessary to move that the address be given precedence, but a day may be fixed for it to be considered later in the session. There is no standing order regulating the procedure to be followed with respect to the days on which the address is to be debated.

I might also quote Anson's Law and Custom of the Constitution, part I, Parliament, which at page 74 says:

The speech from the throne setting forth the causes of summons may be necessary to put in motion the business of both houses, but the addresses in answer are non-essential forms: for parliament is not limited in legislation or discussion by the topics set forth from the throne.

I believe that is sufficient to show that there is no departure being made at the present time but that we are simply giving precedence to the business for which this particular parliament has been called.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has stated that this house has been called to give particular attention to two pieces of business, and with that statement as a general thing we are all in agreement. But I would point out to him that except in one of the cases to which he has referred, namely, a motion for interim supply in the session of 1931, which was made immediately after the ending of the fiscal year, no supply has ever been granted until this house has first voted confidence in the government by way of passing the address. In that I think the Prime Minister will agree with me. On the occasion to which he referred I recall that the fiscal year had expired and unless interim supply was voted immediately there was great danger to the public service. I presume, though I have not looked up the record, that that was done by consent. I do suggest to the Prime Minister that before this house votes any money to be spent by this government there must be an expression of confidence in the government itself, especially having regard to the history of recent events. This government has not won a by-election—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hesitate to interrupt my hon. friend, but may I say to him as an old parliamentarian that he knows that this motion is not debatable. I would ask Your Honour to see that the rules of this house are strictly observed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If we are to be chloroformed, let us understand that, and I will bow to the rules of the house. But I do protest that the Prime Minister should not be allowed to speak twice on his motions and the rest of us not at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I submit that my hon. friend is not in order, and no one knows it better than himself.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): You have done things that were not in order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by Mr. Crerar:

That on Wednesday the 21st of March, 1945, and all subsequent Wednesdays until the end of the present session, the sittings shall in every respect be under the same rules as provided for other days.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is already a motion before the house that government notices of motion and government orders shall have precedence.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister a question, through you, with the indulgence of the house. Does the carrying of that motion preclude the doing of any other business or the asking of questions on the orders of the day? That is a very special resolution. Is it the intention to shut off any discussion and that sort of thing on the orders of the day? If it is, we protest.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend seems more anxious to protest than to get information. He knows very well that the government will not refuse to answer questions on the orders of the day.

Mr. ROY: Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on the Prime Minister's motion that government business shall have priority over all private bills or resolutions. A similar motion has been made at every session since the opening of this parliament in 1940. As this session will be the last one before we go to the people, I would like to know from the Prime Minister if there is going to be an opportunity for the private members to move resolutions and introduce bills and have them adopted before this parliament is ended.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. There is some confusion in the minds of hon. members. We are dealing with a motion which asks:

That on Tuesday, the 20th of March, 1945, to the end of the present session, government notices of motion and government orders shall have precedence at every sitting over all other business except questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

The hon. member for York-Sunbury made a suggestion that this might include questions asked of the ministers on the orders of the day. The motion does not so read. The question before me is whether this is debatable or not. Standing order 38 deals with debatable motions, and it provides in paragraph 1 (m): . . . and such other motion, made upon routine proceedings, as may be required for the observance of the proprieties of the house, the maintenance of its authority, the appointment or conduct of its officers, the management of its business, the arrangements of its proceedings, the correctness of its records, the fixing of its sitting days or the times of its meetings or adjournment.

In view of that, it is debatable, as far as the terms of the motion are concerned.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why, certainly. We are just having an application of the gag; that is all.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not as in the case where another matter had been introduced; and the discussion should be confined simply to the terms of the motion before the house—that is, that government notices of motion and government orders shall have precedence at every sitting. Whatever argument or debate takes place must be on the terms of the motion.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think that the misunderstanding which has occurred arose largely because the Prime Minister, when he was introducing the motion, dealt with another matter which I wanted to speak upon and which I subsequently did speak upon. I believe that Mr. Speaker's ruling is one which was adopted in practically all previous sessions: that is, there was almost always a lengthy debate on this particular matter as it affects private members' resolutions and so on. I have no desire to prolong the discussion, but I think the Prime Minister was quite wrong when he suggested that this particular motion was not debatable. If he will apply his memory to previous sessions he will find that quite lengthy discussions are recorded in Hansard with respect to the abolition, even in wartime, of private members' rights in respect of moving motions and resolutions before government business.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I take it, then, that I am in order?

Mr. SPEAKER: The Prime Minister, I assume, had in mind that there was injected into the motion before the house another motion altogether; but so far as that is concerned, debate can only be based upon the actual terms of the motion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Am I to understand then, Mr. Speaker, that I am in order?

Mr. SPEAKER: To speak to the motion?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Very good; thank you. In other days I have protested against the government usurping the rights of private members. I am bound to say to the house and to the Prime Minister that on this occasion, having regard to the situation and the conditions under which we meet and the very few days left for the transaction of business, I think the government is justified in making this request as early in the session as it is doing to-day. I wish to make it perfectly clear that as far as His Majesty's Loyal Opposition is concerned we desire to vote the necessary moneys to carry on the great conflict in which this country is engaged, and we do not want this war run on governor general's warrants. This may be out of order—I hear the Clerk saying it is out of order; but I want to make our position clear, and as far as I am concerned I want to cooperate with the government to that end. I wish to see money voted to carry on the war; but I suggest that before the government brings in other business, even a lengthy debate on the San Francisco proposals, this house should vote confidence in the government—confidence which is now lacking in this country.

Motion agreed to.

WEDNESDAY SITTINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Wednesday, the 21st day of March, 1945, and all subsequent Wednesdays until the end of the present session, the sittings shall in every respect be under the same rules as provided for other days.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I seek clarification on one point? I take it that this means Friday nights as well as Wednesday nights?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It means exactly what it says—unless the house should decide it prefers not to sit Friday evenings.

Mr. GRAYDON: The reason I asked the question was that during the last session the Prime Minister on two or three occasions seemed to assume that some motion had to be made as regards Friday night in order that we would sit; and I wanted to clarify the position.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) presented the following message from His Excellency the Governor General:

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons a certified copy of an approved minute of council appointing the Honourable T. A. Crerar, Minister of Mines and Resources, the Honourable J. L. Ilesley, Minister of Finance, the Honourable J. E. Michaud, Minister of Transport and the Honourable J. A. MacKinnon, Minister of Trade and Commerce, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons as commissioners for the purpose and under the provisions of chapter 145 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, intitled: An Act Respecting the House of Commons.

SUPPLY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That this house will, at the next sitting, resolve itself into a committee to consider of a supply to be granted to His Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That this house will, at the next sitting, resolve itself into a committee to consider of the ways and means for raising the supply to be granted to His Majesty.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): This gives me an opportunity to inquire of the government at what time during this session the budget will be introduced. Also may I ask whether the passing of the motion for the constitution of these committees in any way deprives hon. members of the right to make the usual amendments as provided by the rules, upon the house going into supply.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has brought up a matter which it is fortunate, perhaps, that he mentioned at this stage. He has referred to the time at which the budget will be brought in at this session. May I say to my hon. friend and hon. members that it is customary for parliament to have five sessions, when it extends over five years. The statute fixes five years at the period over which parliament can sit without a general election. This parliament has already had five full sessions. The present session is not to be construed and should not be construed as the session of parliament for the year 1945-46. That session will come later in the present year. It will come after the general elections, just as was the case, as I recollect, with the first session of this parliament; it came after the general elections, after the people had pronounced upon what particular party they wished to have control the affairs of the country during the coming years.

The purpose of this session is to enable the general election to be held as soon as it can reasonably be held; to make provision for the carrying on of the necessary civil government during the period of the election, and to obtain the appropriations which are necessary for the prosecution of the war. It would be a mistake to assume that the government is seeking to have six sessions in a parliament that has already had five long sessions. It is simply seeking to comply with the spirit of the constitution and obtain from the people's representatives in the house what will be necessary in the way of interim supply for the period which will elapse between the beginning of the present fiscal year and the time at which a new parliament comes into being. When the members of the new parliament shall have been elected by the people, it will be for whatever government may be here to introduce its own budget and its own legislation on other matters.

This particular session would have been concerned solely with the question of necessary supply had it not been that recently there has been sent to our government an invitation by the government of the United States for Canada to be represented at the conference at San Francisco on world security. We have felt that the people of Canada would wish that Canada should be represented at that conference, and it is desirable that if Canada is represented it should have as strong an expression of approval as possible from both houses of parliament of the purposes for which the conference is being called and of the position to be taken by Canada at the conference.

I do not know whether my hon. friend asked another question which I have not answered, but I hope I have made it clear that while it is perfectly true that this is a session, it is not the 1945-46 session of parliament. It is a part of the year during which we have already been sitting; its purpose is to make the provision that should be made to enable a general election to be held at an early date.

Mr. GRAYDON: There was one other question I raised with respect to the motion that is now before the house. So far as the budget is concerned, I think the same set of arguments apply with respect to it as apply to the address, because actually I do not think the government would expect, and certainly the country would not expect, that the government should escape censure at this stage of parliament for having failed to take full advantage of the first three months of this year. It could have called a session early in January and could then have given parliament an opportunity to debate, in connection with the address, those things which were essential to determining confidence in the administration. It could also have brought down a proper budget for the ensuing year.

I do not wish to extend my remarks at all, but I would say that business and the taxpayers can hardly be expected to plan very far ahead, and I think it will cause considerable inconvenience if the budget is to be left over as the government now suggests.

I did want to ask the Prime Minister whether, in passing this motion, the house would be deprived of the opportunity of making any amendment that might conceivably be moved on the motion to go into supply or ways and means.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This motion in no way affects the rights of the house with respect to what it may wish to do on going into supply.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The motion is intended to set up a committee of ways and means, but if there is to be no budget—and the Prime Minister made it abundantly clear that there is to be none—why the committee? I can scarcely understand a government asking the house to go into committee of ways and means unless it has proposals by way of a budget to submit to parliament.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

I concur entirely in the statement made by my leader, that this house should have been summoned early in January, notwithstanding what the Prime Minister has said about six sessions in a parliament. That does not mean a thing. There can be ten sessions in a parliament; or, more properly, parliament ought to be called into session more frequently than it has been. We have been away from Ottawa for seven months, whereas the parliament at Westminster has been in almost continuous session.

Mr. HOWE: You have, but the rest of us were here.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is intended to be facetious, I know. Well, I was away from August until now except for the short session. During the short session I was here. That short session was called, however, by reason of the ineptitude of the Prime Minister and of his policies, and for no other reason. I want to know as a matter of information now, before the motion passes, what necessity there is for setting up a committee of ways and means if, as has been announced, there is to be no budget.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): The procedure which is necessary in granting interim supply, which will be asked for, involves the submission of a resolution to the committee of ways and means. The ordinary form of the resolution is: "Resolved, that towards making good supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1946, the following sums be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada, namely". . . And then follow the sums. It is the committee of ways and means that designates the source of the funds which are voted by the committee of supply. With regard to the other question, while it does not specifically answer the point raised by the hon. gentleman, I would point out that it is not uncommon for periods of fifteen or sixteen months to intervene between budgets.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is very unusual.

Mr. ILSLEY: It has happened in the last two or three years.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is not proper either.

Motion agreed to.

MAIN ESTIMATES 1945-46

A message from His Excellency the Governor General, transmitting estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1946, was presented by Hon. J. L. Ilesley (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

FURTHER SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1944-45

A message from His Excellency the Governor General, transmitting further supplementary estimates for the financial year ended March 31, 1945, was presented by Hon. J. L. Ilesley (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved that it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide, inter alia:

1. That a sum not exceeding $2,000,000,000 be granted to His Majesty towards defraying any expenses or making any advances or loans that may be incurred or granted by or under the authority of the governor in council during the year ending March 31, 1946 for—

(a) the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada;

(b) the conduct of naval, military and air operations in or beyond Canada;

(c) promoting the continuance of trade, industry and business communications, whether by means of insurance or indemnity against war risk or in any other manner whatsoever;

(d) for the purposes of The War Appropriation (United Nations Mutual Aid) Act, 1943, as amended by The War Appropriation (United Nations Mutual Aid) Act, 1944; and

(e) the carrying out of any measure deemed necessary or advisable by the governor in council in consequence of the existence of a state of war.

2. That the governor in council be empowered to raise by way of loan under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, such sum or sums of money, not exceeding in the whole the sum of $2,000,000,000 as may be required for the purpose of defraying such expenses or making such advances or loans, the principal and interest of any such loan to be a charge upon and payable out of the consolidated revenue fund.

3. That the governor in council be empowered to reexpend, advance or loan moneys that may be received by way of refund or repayment of advances, loans or expenditures under the War Appropriation Acts of 1939 (second session), 1940, 1941, 1942, 1943 and 1944.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it not customary to put a resolution of this kind on the order paper? I realize that there is no order paper to-day, but the usual practice is to have some advance notice.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This resolution will be printed in the Votes and Proceedings of to-day.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not wish to debate this resolution, but I should like to ask one question, if Your Honour will permit me. Upon what principle or basis was the $2,000,000,000 arrived at? I take it that it is arrived at on the same basis as the civil estimates which will be tabled later. The $2,000,000,000 is what percentage of the total amount?

Mr. ILSLEY: If the leader of the opposition does not mind, I wish he would let me answer that question when I speak in introducing the resolution. It cannot be answered in a sentence; it will take some time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In the meantime this is merely a notice of motion?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. DORION: I object to this motion because according to standing order 45 a motion of this kind cannot be introduced without notice.

Mr. SPEAKER: This being the first day of this session there is no order paper and no notice could be given before the first day. The notice is now being given.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course that is not quite in accordance with the rules.

Mr. POULIOT: I rise to a question of privilege. I have not understood a word that was uttered by the minister except here and there. Hon. members on this side of the house do not at all understand what is going on. I would ask you to be good enough to tell us in a clear and distinct voice what it is all about. This is a huge amount of money, $2,000,000,000. We are here to see what is going on and to examine all expenditures. If members of parliament are to play their part in this session they must know what is going on. Nobody knows what this is all about. The expenditure of $2,000,000,000 is a serious thing. It took almost two months last session to vote $5,000,000,000. I make these remarks in the best possible spirit, but I want to know what is going on.

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps I may inform the hon. member in a few words. In effect what I did to-day, not sufficiently audibly, apparently, was to give notice that at the next sitting of the house I would move that the house go into committee of the whole to consider a resolution for the voting of $2,000,000,000 for the purposes set out in the resolution; and I made the usual statement that His Excellency the Governor General had been made acquainted with the subject matter of the resolution and recommended it to the consideration of the house. There will be abundant opportunity to debate the resolution itself at the time I actually move that we go into committee of the whole, and there will be the same opportunity to debate in committee of the whole.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think the notice is a little bit premature, but we should not be too technical.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder, please.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is just your bad luck. I think the motion appeared a bit too soon. Notwithstanding that, we should not be too technical, having regard to existing conditions. I for one am quite ready to agree to have the procedure followed that has been indicated to-day in order that we may gain a day's time.

With regard to the hon member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), if he cannot hear he should go back to his former seat.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wish to thank the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) for his kindness in saying that we ought not to be too technical at this time, but take the course that will enable us to proceed most rapidly with the business of the house at this particular session.

Motion agreed to.

SAN FRANCISCO CONFERENCE

PROPOSED GENERAL INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION FOR MAINTENANCE OF PEACE AND SECURITY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I wish now to read to the house a motion which I am handing to the clerk and which will appear in the Votes and Proceedings of to-day. I am giving it to the house at this moment so that hon. members will be informed of the resolution at the earliest possible moment. It is a resolution that I intend proposing in the form of a joint resolution, the same resolution to be proposed in each house of parliament, respecting the proposals for the establishment of a general international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

As the house is aware, some few days ago, on March 5 to be exact, an invitation was extended to Canada by the government of the United States, on its own behalf and on behalf of the governments of the U.S.S.R., the United Kingdom and the Republic of China, to be present at a conference to be held at San Francisco on April 25, 1945, to prepare a charter for a general organization for the maintenance of international peace and security. I have in my hand a copy of the invitation that was extended, and also a copy of the reply made by our government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will they appear in the Votes and Proceedings?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was just going to ask if the house would allow me to table them and have them appear to-morrow in the Votes and Proceedings of to-day.

The motion will be as follows:—

That it is expedient that the Houses of Parliament do approve the following resolution:

Whereas the government of Canada has been invited by the government of the United States of America, on behalf of itself and of the governments of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the Republic of China, to send representatives to a conference of the United Nations to be held on April 25, 1945, at San Francisco in the United States of America to prepare a charter for a general international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security, and

Whereas the invitation suggests that the conference consider as affording a basis for such a charter the proposals for the establishment of a general international organization which have been made public by the four governments which participated in the discussions at Dumbarton Oaks, Washington, and

Whereas the government of Canada has accepted the invitation to send representatives to this conference,

Therefore be it resolved—

1. that this house endorses the acceptance by the government of Canada of the invitation to send representatives to the conference;

2. that this house recognize that the establishment of an effective international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security is of vital importance to Canada, and, indeed, to the future well-being of mankind; and that it is in the interests of Canada that Canada should become a member of such an organization;

3. that this house approves the purposes and principles set forth in the proposals of the four governments, and considers that these proposals constitute a satisfactory general basis for a discussion of the charter of the proposed international organization;

4. that this house agrees that the representatives of Canada at the conference should use their best endeavours to further the preparation of an acceptable charter for an international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security;

5. that the charter establishing the international organization should, before ratification, be submitted to parliament for approval.

The Department of External Affairs has had printed in pamphlet form, for the convenience of hon. members, a copy of the proposals for the establishment of a general international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security, and I have asked that copies of this publication be placed in the boxes of hon. members this afternoon so that they will be available immediately at the conclusion of to-day's sitting.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Does this document include the report of the Bretton Woods conference?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, it does not. As I recall it, the report of the Bretton Woods conference was tabled some time ago. This pamphlet contains the proposals that were considered at Dumbarton Oaks, and to which some further consideration was given during the Crimea conference at Yalta.

I should like, Mr. Speaker, to proceed with this motion to-morrow. I think it important that not only our country but all peace-loving countries should know at as early a day as possible that this house approves the establishment of an international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security, and that Canada intends to be represented at the conference. I think hon. members have had very full notice of the fact that this resolution, or something similar, would come up at this session, because I have referred to it publicly many times, and there have been other references to it. I hope, therefore, that no exception will be taken to the house proceeding with the resolution as the first order of business to-morrow. I would move that this resolution be considered to-morrow.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): It is not the desire of the opposition to do other than facilitate public business at this time. Of course we have our bounden duty to discharge in regard to the critical examination of everything brought in by the government, but subject to that there is no desire on our part, as the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) said a few moments ago, to do anything but cooperate in respect to providing money in order to carry on the war. Now, however, the Prime Minister brings up something else, the resolution dealing with the San Francisco conference, with which he proposes to proceed as the first order of business to-morrow. I should like to point out that this creates a rather difficult situation for members, a situation I should like the government to consider. It is perhaps true that some general mention has been made of a resolution of this kind which might be introduced at some stage of the session, but, if I may say so, to ask the opposition and other groups in this house to go on with this resolution to-morrow is to place quite a load upon those whose duty it is to scrutinize carefully the position of the government with respect to this matter.

I would have no objection to the Prime Minister himself going on to-morrow if that would meet his wishes and those of the government. We do not want to be non-cooperative about it, but following the Prime Minister's presentation I feel quite sure a number of hon. members of the house will desire to seek the fullest possible information with respect to the government's position. For a long time the external affairs of our country have been pretty much in the vest pocket of the Prime Minister, and I do not say that offensively. Having that in mind I am sure the house will expect him in his presentation to elaborate on these matters, to give a historical outline of the position in which Canada finds itself and the various developments leading up to it. Then, no doubt, he will give the proposals of the government, as to what is intended to be done in connection with the San Francisco conference. That being the case no doubt there will be a great deal of meat to digest in what the Prime Minister has to say to-morrow, and I suggest that it will take some time for the opposition and other groups in the house to analyse his statement. I should expect, and I am sure the house would expect, the Prime Minister's presentation to-morrow to be lengthy. We know there is a great deal to be said. Therefore, following his statement I would ask the Prime Minister to consider an adjournment of the debate to give an opportunity to digest what he has said. As I said before, I believe there is no subject to come before parliament to which more careful or more detailed consideration and attention must be given. In past sessions we have not had any lengthy opportunity to debate matters of this kind, nor have we had an opportunity to learn the government's position or the policy it intends to follow in this respect.

What provision is to be made so that questions may be asked the Prime Minister during the resolution stage? My understanding is that there will be no committee, and for that reason hon. members will wish to have the fullest opportunity of examining the Prime Minister and asking him questions at the proper stage.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What my hon. friend has just said seems wholly reasonable. I have no desire to hasten the house into a discussion of this resolution. It is an important one, but one which I believe is of a non-contentious character. I shall be greatly surprised if the entire house does not give to the resolution its hearty support. That however may be an additional reason for having members made fully conversant with the provisions of the resolution, and all that is implied therein. I shall undertake therefore to proceed to-morrow with my statement on the resolution. Then, at the termination of that discussion, another order of business might be taken up—although I should add this, that I think there are several members who would be ready to speak. This is a subject practically all hon. members have been considering for many weeks. However, if there is any objection to allowing others who are prepared to speak to proceed to-morrow, following my address, I should be prepared to have the debate adjourned until another day. As my hon. friend has said, there is a good deal of meat in what will be presented to the house. For the most part however I believe it will be found that the material is familiar to hon. members.

My hon. friend asked me about questions. In speaking on the motion I should like to speak without interruption, and to be allowed to complete what I have to say. Then I would suggest that if there are any points I have not covered, points upon which hon. members might seek enlightenment or further information, and upon which they would wish me to elucidate they might mention them when they speak, giving me an opportunity to deal with such matters in my reply at the close of the debate. If my replies are not satisfactory I shall try to find some means of gaining assistance and making such further detailed replies as may be requested.

The subject is a very large one, and it is most difficult to carry in one's mind all the dates, relevant facts and associated matters about which hon. members may wish to learn; but I would seek to accommodate the house in the fashion I have indicated.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not wish to ask too much of the government, and should like to have the debate proceed as regularly as possible. However, the difficulty I see in the Prime Minister's suggestion to the effect that he will answer questions in his reply is, as he very well knows, that a question of this kind is one upon which many people desiring to take part in the debate will want enlightenment from the Prime Minister in respect of certain points concerning which only he can enlighten them. He is the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I know that I should like to ask a number of questions by way of clarification of the government's position, in anticipation of the possibility that he may not deal with certain matters as I might deal with them, or might not view them as I view them. I would ask him therefore to extend the privilege I have indicated, rather than to leave a conglomeration of questions to be answered at the end of the debate. I would ask that he give hon. members an opportunity of knowing the government's policy before they proceed to speak.

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am anxious to oblige the leader of the opposition and other hon. members so far as possible. But a great responsibility rests upon the government and upon myself in debating this subject. I must keep in mind the fact that any question asked me and to which I reply may be quoted in all parts of the world. That is saying a good deal, but it is nevertheless true. I do not wish to be placed in a position whereby, upon answering some question with such knowledge as I have, I might be giving information which one of the nations in the British commonwealth of nations, or one of the great powers, would not wish to have given at this time. I can always inquire as to whether or not I might be at liberty to answer certain questions. I must say frankly however that it will not be possible to answer all questions that may be asked, although it is obvious that one might answer some of them. There are some questions concerning which I might have to use my judgment before replying.

It is my view that on the whole it may be best to proceed in the regular fashion. Then, if at any stage it is obvious that the fact that some information has not been given which should have been given is causing embarrassment, I shall seek to relieve such embarrassment. I should prefer however that we follow the customary rule in debating a resolution.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is one point which is not yet clear in my mind. If the Prime Minister goes on to-morrow, is it understood that at the conclusion of his speech we shall have an adjournment for the purpose of considering the whole situation as he has outlined it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If there are hon. members who wish to speak and who are ready to speak, would there be any objection to allowing them to proceed? I should not expect my hon. friend to follow immediately. On the other hand there are hon. members who will wish to speak and who may be prepared to do so to-morrow. It might even assist other hon. members were we to have such further points of view presented, and were we to permit those to speak to-morrow who may be ready to proceed. I should think it would be preferable not to compel proceeding with the debate; but if any hon. members wish to speak following what I have to say could we not agree to allow them that opportunity? When we have reached the point where there are no further speakers to-morrow, we could go on to some other business.

Mr. GRAYDON: That means that we are back to where we were before. I am not suggesting that the Prime Minister has intended it to be this way, but in my view the suggested arrangement definitely means that those of us who would normally follow in the usual sequence of debate would have to be prepared to follow the Prime Minister. That is what I was hoping to avoid.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No; I would not ask my hon. friend to follow immediately after me. What I have said is this: it is hoped that this resolution might not be a matter of party controversy. I should think the whole discussion would be viewed as above party considerations; and for that reason, to save time and to expedite business, I have suggested that if there are others ready to speak after I have finished we might allow them to do so at once. Then my hon. friend might come in at whatever stage of the debate he wishes. I would not expect him to speak to-morrow.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think effect should be given to that suggestion. The Prime Minister will probably make to-morrow one of the most carefully considered statements he has ever made in this parliament on this very important question. I concur and I hope hon. members of this house will concur in his request that this will not become a matter of party politics, that it will be treated as a great international question above any party conflicts that may have developed between us in this country.

I would like to point out to the Prime Minister that we do not know yet what position his government is going to take. We do not know what principles he will enunciate from his place to-morrow. There certainly will not be time enough to permit hon. members to study the government's position. Everything will depend upon the position which the Prime Minister and the administration take. For instance, I may believe in a policy of collective security while some other people may object to that. Before we can express an opinion on the basis of a bare, skeleton resolution we have to know what is the actual attitude of the government. It is not fair to ask private members or others to go on and deal immediately with the subject matter of a resolution of this magnitude and international character without time for study. I have not been able to assemble in my library all the material that has been put out since Dumbarton Oaks. These are serious matters which we should study and delve into and analyse in order to reach conclusions. I may have one view about one single circumstance and agree with the minister about all others, but I certainly am not prepared to go on to-morrow after he has made a statement which probably has taken days, if not weeks, to prepare with the whole secretariat which he has behind him studying this matter. It is not fair to a private member to compel him to do this. I think the proper course is for the Prime Minister to make his prepared statement and let us read it over.

May I close by expressing the hope that a matter fraught with such grave importance to the future of mankind will not become a political football.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggart): Mr. Speaker, in listening to this discussion I am wondering just exactly what it is we are going to discuss after the Prime Minister's statement. It seems to me that the purpose of the debate which will be initiated by the Prime Minister is to obtain the feeling of this house regarding Canada's position on the very important matter which will be before us because of the invitation received.

Whether we agree or disagree with the Prime Minister we should be prepared to express our points of view as members of parliament in order that any delegation which goes from this house may understand what is the consensus here. To my mind it will not be a debate on what the Prime Minister may say to-morrow; we shall not necessarily be expressing agreement or disagreement with his remarks; it is rather an opportunity to express the opinion of this House of Commons on a very important matter, that of the basis proposed for the maintenance of peace. Personally I can see no reason why the Prime Minister should not make his statement to-morrow and then such members of the house as have been giving some study to these matters over a period of months or even years should be prepared to express their opinions regarding the acceptance of the invitation and the proposals.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, one matter that we must all bear in mind is this: do we as ordinary members of the house know just what is the meaning or the implications of the proposals which were issued by the conference at Bretton Woods or at the conference at Dumbarton Oaks?

As I understand it, we are going to consider ways and means of avoiding war in the future. Is any effort being made to find out what caused this war and the war that went before?

The next thing is to find out whether or not we can remove those causes. Then we must find out whether or not there are ways of preventing war after we shall have removed the causes so far as that may be possible. In the light of that information we ought to consider (with the greatest care) all the proposals which are being made.

It is a remarkable thing to me that we never hear, either from the government, from the newspapers or over the radio, any discussion of any features in these proposals which might be adverse to our welfare. This leads me to suppose that all is not well, that there is a good deal which requires the most careful searching on the part of members of this house. It is perfectly sound to allow people to speak with the greatest freedom, but one thing I fear is that we shall go too hastily, that members of this house will undertake to judge too confidently what was done during days and days of the most careful work by people, none of whom we may know. We do not have anything like the information they possessed, or the information we need.

I desire above all things to find out what were the reasons for the proposals issued at Bretton Woods and Dumbarton Oaks. I want to find out just what problems were faced there. When we know that, we shall be able to judge the proposals of Bretton Woods and Dumbarton Oaks in the light of more thorough understanding.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY, MOVED BY MR. J. A. JOHNSTON
(LONDON) AND SECONDED BY MR. A. J.
LAPOINTE (MATAPEDIA-MATANE)

The house proceeded to the consideration of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. J. A. JOHNSTON (London): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for giving to me the honour of moving the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I know that the citizens of the constituency of London will greatly appreciate this honour. Londoners are proudly carrying their share of the heavy load which is placed on everyone when a country is engaged in the grim business of war.

This will be an historic session, the sixth session of the nineteenth parliament, and as a member of the Canadian active service force I am proud to move this motion and to have associated with me as seconder the hon. member for Matapedia-Matane (Mr. Lapointe). As a young man the hon. member served in the first great war, and he has served with the Canadian active service force in this war.

Parliament has been called together to expedite Canada's outstanding war effort. With this thought before us we heard in the speech from the throne just delivered that the two main objectives are, first, to provide the necessary financial support for Canada's war effort during the period from March 31, 1945, until the first session of the twentieth parliament, and, second, to ensure the widest possible support from Canada, through this parliament, to the Canadian delegation attending the San Francisco conference of the united nations.

May I now refer to the first objective, namely, that of financing the war effort through the election period. It is of paramount importance that Canada's war effort, which has been carried on so splendidly under the leadership of the Prime Minister and his cabinet, be given the necessary financial support for the period between the close of the present fiscal year and the return of the coming election writs.

To all Canadian personnel on active service, to all Canadian workers, in the production line and lines of communication, comes a thrill of satisfaction with the success of allied armies throughout the world. All look forward to the close of hostilities in Europe, to the erasing from the earth of nazism and its cruel tyrannies, to the defeat of Japan in the far east, so that the charter which will be drawn up at San Francisco may be put at once in force throughout the world. Canada must continue to play her part by supplying men, equipment and material and finance.

The second objective, as we were told in the speech from the throne, is to prepare a charter for a general international organization for the maintenance of world peace and security. All countries will have their eyes focused on this conference; so too the men in the Canadian armed forces, in every branch of the services in the four corners of the world, are directing their attention to this conference and are looking to it to produce a charter which will be their guarantee of security for all time to come. And they are hoping by the application of the charter that the word "war" will be removed from all languages and that the charter will assist in obtaining social security for all.

I am sure that the people of Canada generally will commend this parliament for cutting short the preliminaries and getting down immediately to the important business of the session. With this thought in mind, I have decided to make my remarks in presenting this motion very brief. I therefore move:

That the following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency Major-General the Right Honourable the Earl of Athlone, Knight of the Most Noble Order of the Garter, a member of His Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, Knight Grand Cross of the Most Honourable Order of the Bath, Grand Master of the Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, Knight Grand Cross of the Royal Victorian Order, Companion of the Distinguished Service Order, one of His Majesty's Personal Aides-de-Camp, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of the Dominion of Canada.

May it Please Your Excellency:

We, His Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both houses of parliament.

Mr. J. A. LAPOINTE (Matapedia-Matane): Mr. Speaker, in order to expedite this debate, and in accordance with the government's desire to carry on with the work ahead, I shall not make a speech at the moment. I must, however, express my happiness at having been chosen to second this motion, and I want to thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for the honour which he has extended to me. I also consider it a great privilege and honour to my constituency, which is the finest in Canada, if I can believe what was told me by the acting leader of the opposition in this house in a very nice way.

In selecting the hon. member for London (Mr. Johnston) and myself to move and second the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the government no doubt had in mind the paying of a tribute not only to our armed forces, some of whom now are fighting so gallantly on German soil, but to the veterans of the last war; and therefore, Mr. Speaker it gives me great pleasure to second the motion.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe (Matapedia-Matane) the debate was adjourned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the house will allow me, as an old offender, to congratulate the mover and the seconder on the brevity of their speeches.

THE MINISTRY

APPOINTMENT OF HON. C. W. G. GIBSON AS MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR— PARLIAMENTARY ASSISTANTS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): While I am on my feet perhaps I may refer to one other matter of routine. It is simply to make mention of a change in the ministry which has taken place since we last assembled here, under which the Hon. Colin Gibson, former Minister of National Revenue, has been appointed Minister of National Defence for Air to fill the position vacated by Hon. C. G. Power.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister to complete his explanation with respect to the change in ministers, including parliamentary assistants? I ask him to do so because I should like to know who is looking after the Department of National Revenue, and also whether there has been any permanent change as regards the parliamentary assistant moving from the Department of Finance to the Department of National Defence. Is he assuming the new position on an acting basis?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As regards the Department of National Revenue, the Hon. Mr. MacKinnon is acting minister at the present time. It is the customary procedure, when there is not a minister, to have some other member of the government act until such time as an appointment is made. The appointment will be made before very long.

In regard to the parliamentary assistants, the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Macmillan), who is not in the house to-day, wrote to me a day or two ago to the effect that, being at the present time acting principal of McGill university, he had very heavy responsibilities and felt that perhaps he should not try to continue as parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence for Air. He also thought that he should tender his resignation so as to leave the minister free to make whatever choice he might wish. I replied to the hon. member that I hoped he would not think of tendering his resignation at the moment. I said that if he could be here part of the time it would be of assistance, and I also informed him that, having spoken to my colleague the Minister of National Defence for Air about a parliamentary assistant, he had expressed the wish that the hon. member for Queens would continue in that capacity.

Air Marshal Breadner

As to the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. Abbott), as the house is aware, he has been parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance has expressed his readiness to free the hon. member from that position in order to allow him to act as parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence. The hon. member has cordially agreed to assist the government by making the transfer in the manner described.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 5.45 p.m.

Tuesday, March 20, 1945

The house met at three o'clock.

WAR SERVICE GRATUITIES

PAYMENT TO NEXT OF KIN OR BENEFICIARY UPON DEATH OF SERVICE PERSONNEL

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Before the orders of the day are called, I should like to direct a question, if I may, to the Minister of Veterans' Affairs. It is this. Has the government given consideration to the claim that gratuities which would accrue to service personnel meeting death under conditions recognized as pensionable by the Canadian pension commission be paid to next of kin or the beneficiary under the deceased person's will? If so, will the government consider amending the war service gratuities legislation to give effect to the above suggestion?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans' Affairs): With reference to the first part of the question, I may tell my hon. friend that representations have been received from all over Canada dealing with the point he raises. Secondly, I may say that the matter is now receiving the very active consideration of the government. The third part, of course, I cannot deal with at the moment.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister if it is possible to bring in some legislation this session? The matter is very urgent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): As soon as the matter has been decided by council I shall be glad to apprise my hon. friend.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

RETIREMENT OF AIR MARSHAL L. S. BREADNER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence for Air. The retirement of Air Marshal L. S. Breadner appears to have prompted many rumours as to the underlying reasons for it. I should be glad to have the minister make a statement at this time clarifying the situation.

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Defence for Air): The hon. member was good enough to send me notice of his question. I agree that there have been some rumours in connection with the retirement of Air Marshal Breadner, and I should like to make it clear at this time that there has been no friction whatever between Air Marshal Breadner and myself or any members of the staff. Air Marshal Breadner had reached the highest post in the Royal Canadian Air Force, that of Chief of Air Staff, and on his retirement from that post some time ago was appointed Air Officer Commander in Chief overseas. At that time a somewhat unusual arrangement was made, that he would report, not through the usual channel but to the minister direct. When I took my present portfolio I recommended and the war committee approved that the usual channel should be followed again and that the reporting should go through the Chief of Air Staff here. That was a change in the arrangements under which Air Marshal Breadner had gone overseas. He was consulted in the matter and expressed his willingness to retire, and his retirement is being proceeded with. I may say that on his retirement he is to be given a step in rank to that of Air Chief Marshal; and in case there should be another flock of rumours starting, I would say that that in no way affects his pension rights. It is given to him in recognition and appreciation of the many years of distinguished service he has given the Royal Canadian Air Force.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But the fact remains that he did not concur in the new arrangement.

Mr. GIBSON: I did not say that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am saying it.

Mr. GIBSON: I would not say that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Did he agree or did he not agree? He retired and therefore he could not have concurred in the new arrangement.

Mr. GIBSON: I did not say he did not concur in the new arrangement. I said he did not wish to remain on under the new arrangement.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the same thing.

Mr. GIBSON: Oh, no.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

DEPARTMENTAL SURVEY OF POST-WAR PROSPECTS OF EMPLOYMENT IN INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Will the government make available to the house a copy of the Department of Labour survey dealing with post-war prospects of employment in industries with two hundred or more employees, which has been completed, and, we understand, presented to the cabinet? I think it is important that this house should have a copy of that report in order that we may understand what in the view of the government are the post-war prospects.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I shall be glad to take into consideration the request of my hon. friend.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to get the report, not consideration.

REQUESTS FOR REVISION OF WARTIME WAGES CONTROL ORDERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour. Has the government received representations from labour organizations for an immediate revision of P.C. 9384 and P.C. 1003? Can the minister indicate whether any action is contemplated?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The answer to the first question is, yes. The answer to the second question will be made known to the hon. member in due course when the government decides on its policy.

SELECTIVE SERVICE REGULATIONS—FARM WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), or more properly to the parliamentary assistant, who, I believe, tabled certain orders in council to-day having to do with changes in the national selective service regulations. The newspapers carried recently an announcement that some change has been made in the national selective service regulations designating certain man-power for farm help during the summer months. Have any arrangements been made to regulate wages to be paid by farmers for such help during those months?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The answer is, no.

BACON

QUESTION AS TO DECREASE IN CANADIAN HOG PRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner): The production of Canadian bacon plays a very important part in maintaining an adequate diet for the British people. What action, besides talking about it, does the government propose to take to deal with the serious decrease in hog production which is taking place this year in Canada—between forty and fifty per cent in western Canada and thirty-two per cent in Canada as a whole. What action does the government propose to take to encourage farmers to resume production?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): In case my hon. friend should think I was just talking about it again, I suggest that if he will bring the matter up when my estimates are before the house I shall be pleased to go into it with him.

PROVINCE OF ALBERTA

INQUIRY AS TO REFUNDING OF BONDED INDEBTEDNESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. ROSS (Calgary East): Is the Minister of Finance aware of the plan for refunding Alberta's bonded indebtedness, announced by Premier Manning in his budget speech recently? Did the minister offer the cooperation of the dominion government in refunding on a different basis in order to assure a fair and equitable plan, and if so, what were the terms of the offer?

San Francisco Conference—Procedure

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): The hon. member was good enough to give me notice of this question. The answer to his question is, yes. I had the opportunity of several discussions with Premier Manning before his plan was announced, and because I believed so strongly in the importance of a fair and equitable refunding plan, having in mind particularly the credit of Alberta and the other western provinces and, indeed, of all Canadian governments, I was prepared to recommend dominion cooperation in order to assure a fair and equitable plan. After my conferences with Mr. Manning I wrote him a letter outlining the recommendations I was prepared to make, and I now table this letter.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How did they receive the minister's overtures?

Mr. ILSLEY: They did not accept them.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE IN DEBATE ON RESOLUTION RESPECTING
SAN FRANCISCO CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to make an observation with respect to the arrangements for the debate this afternoon. There is pretty widespread disapproval among the members of our party with respect to the proposals of the government for going ahead with the debate on the resolution this afternoon. There is no objection to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) making his statement, but there is serious objection to the debate proceeding, as was indicated yesterday afternoon, over the protests and objections which I attempted to make at that time. The feeling is, and I think there is plenty of evidence to support it, that while we are anxious to cooperate with the government, we do not think that the cooperation should be entirely a one-way-street cooperation. The government has, as the Prime Minister well knows, adjourned the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne and has brought on the San Francisco conference resolution in the name of the Prime Minister. We feel, and I think the Prime Minister will readily see the justice of the position we are taking, that when he has finished with his speech this afternoon an adjournment of the debate should take place to give us an opportunity to study and see the situation as the Prime Minister outlines the policy of the government. I ask the Prime Minister if he would have any objection to that. I took it from his remarks yesterday that he had not very much objection to it. Would he care to comment on that, with a view to arriving at some workable arrangement?

[Mr. G. H. Ross.]

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggart): May I just say that the leader of the opposition is not speaking for the entire house in this regard.

Mr. GRAYDON: I did not claim to.

Mr. COLDWELL: I thought the hon. member said there was a pretty widespread feeling in all quarters of the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: Nothing of the sort.

Mr. CASSELMAN: We saw the cooperation yesterday.

Mr. COLDWELL: I wish to say that in view of the arrangements which I understood were made yesterday we are prepared to go ahead with the debate this afternoon, because we believe this is not a question of debating what the Prime Minister may say, but debating the very important basis of the proposals of the conference at San Francisco. We have been giving study to it for some weeks, and we are prepared to proceed with the debate. I want that clearly understood.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There was no arrangement entered into, there was a ukase set by the Prime Minister saying that he would go on, and if we were not ready to go on, why, that would be just too bad for us. This is such an important matter that I think hon. members should have time to study the Prime Minister's speech. I sent over to External Affairs to-day to see if I could get some data on the Dumbarton Oaks conference, but I was referred to what was tabled in the house yesterday. I have the memorandum in my pocket. There is a lot more material that private members should have, and it is not available to us. May I protest against the paucity of the material which hon. members are being given by the Department of External Affairs. So far as I am concerned I spent three hours to-day trying to prepare a speech on this matter and I have hardly got started. That is, of course, because of my stupidity and bad luck. This is an important matter. It is not something that should be rushed into by any hon. members of the house. We should have time to study what are the government's proposals. We know what is proposed by the three great powers and probably what they say will go; but make no mistake about it, we want to know what this government proposes to do. I am prepared to support almost in toto most of the things set out in the resolution, but I want to know what is behind them, because there is no more skilful individual on the north American continent in disguising his thoughts than the Prime Minister and we want to know.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): It is a curious example of cooperation to be met with a protest every time one proposes an item on the agenda. That has happened more or less since the house opened.

I am as anxious as any one to cooperate with all parties in the house. I just wish they were as anxious to cooperate with me and with the government. This session has been called for two purposes. That has been made perfectly clear for weeks past. One has to do with this one international question, an all important one. It should be decided at as early a moment as possible. The other is to provide the supply that may be necessary to permit a general election at an early date and to make provision for the carrying on of the prosecution of the war and of civil government between the time of the beginning of the new fiscal year and the time that the new parliament assembles.

We are here to get through the business as rapidly as possible. May I say that if Canada is to be represented at San Francisco to discuss there the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, it will be necessary for some of us who may be expected to be present to spend a little time in advance in giving further study to the questions that are likely to come up in the light of comment that may be made in the interval from many sources. I see no reason why hon. members opposite should not be prepared to speak on this question at once. They have had the Dumbarton Oaks proposals before them for a long time. I tabled in this house on December 5 a copy of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals for establishment of a general international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security. It was tabled in reply in part to some questions asked by my hon. friend the leader of the Social Credit party. I tabled copies as soon as they were printed. This document was distributed immediately to all hon. members, and it has since been distributed widely throughout the country.

Before the house met the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) sent me a question which I understood he wished to ask and to which he might have an immediate reply. I shall answer it now. The question is:

To what extent and through what channels has the wartime information board acquainted the public of Canada since Dumbarton Oaks with respect to the proposals for the establishment of an international organization for the maintenance of peace and security?

The answer is:

The wartime information board has published a pamphlet entitled "Dumbarton Oaks Proposals for the Establishment of a General International Organization", over forty thousand copies of which have been distributed to date. An issue of the booklet series "Canadian Affairs" dealing with the subject is in preparation. Charts illustrating the proposed organization are being prepared for distribution to newspapers and other publications, industrial plants and trade unions and discussion groups.

The information service to independent radio stations is providing a series of notes on the subject for use by these stations. Arrangements are being made to provide material to other radio speakers on this subject.

Assistance has been given to the Canadian Council of Education for Citizenship in making available material regarding Dumbarton Oaks for use by educational bodies and discussion groups.

All that is being done in order that, before the delegation representing Canada proceeds to San Francisco, opinions may be freely expressed by the press by many groups and organizations throughout Canada so that the delegation will be fully informed of the views of the country. But as far as hon. members of the house are concerned, as I have said they have had the proposals before them for months. More than that some of them, at least, I am sure heard the statement I made over the radio on March 2, when I said that parliament would be particularly concerned with this one question and with the voting of necessary supply. I stated specifically that the government would seek the approval of parliament of a resolution which would serve as an expression of its support. They would surely know that this would afford opportunity for debate and discussion of the matter and that the government would wish expression of approval at the earliest possible date. The country is interested in knowing what hon. gentlemen opposite think; not only what I think but what they think. I am prepared to make a full statement this afternoon setting out as best I can the matters that are likely to come up at San Francisco and giving as clearly as possible the point of view of the government. The country would like to know the views of the Leader of the Opposition, the views of my hon. friend the leader of the C.C.F. party on the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, the views of my hon. friend the leader of the social credit group and the views of hon. members generally throughout the house, should they differ in any particular with the views that may be presented by the government. For that reason I think it would be inadvisable to delay the debate. I agree with the leader of the C.C.F. group that it was decided yesterday that we would proceed with this resolution this afternoon, though you, Mr. Speaker, will have to express your opinion on that point; and that any hon. members who wished to speak would be given an opportunity to do so, though if there were others who were not prepared they would not be compelled to go on to-day. I am sure it was understood that if in the debate we ran short of speakers we would take up something else, but that provided we did not run out we would go on with the debate until it was concluded.

This is a resolution which is before the house. It is not a discussion in committee. It is a resolution of which hon. members must express either approval or disapproval. I do submit that the sooner this resolution can be dealt with by this house the more pleased the free nations of the world will be to learn that this parliament is united, as I trust it may be, in accepting the invitation that has been extended to this country to participate in the San Francisco conference.

Mr. GRAYDON: The Prime Minister has dealt with one or two matters which perhaps I should clear up. It is not a question of this party being ready or not ready in regard to making speeches. This party is anxious to know the proposals of the government in order that we may study them. We do not ask for a very long time to do so; we are not anxious for a lengthy adjournment of this debate. But it is all very well for the government to ask us to hurry with something to which we want to give some study, when this government has deliberately squeezed into three weeks that which normally should have been dealt with in three months, in a session starting in January instead of in March. Having that definitely in mind it did not seem to me there was very much wrong with the suggestion that we be given time at least to study the matter. In due course, and very quickly, the Prime Minister will learn where this party stands. There is no disposition on our part to quibble or in any way delay the proceedings; but I think Hansard will show and the public will understand that the position we take is entirely justifiable and is one which will meet the public interest generally.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

SAN FRANCISCO CONFERENCE

PROPOSED GENERAL INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION FOR MAINTENANCE OF PEACE AND SECURITY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on account of the great importance of this subject and the desire of hon. members to have the fullest possible information in regard to the government's point of view I have devoted considerable time to the preparation of what I have to say. I feel that, instead of attempting to speak extemporaneously, it would be helpful if I gave my remarks to the house in the form of a statement. I hope that, in the course of reading this statement, I may not be interrupted, but when the statement is concluded, if there are any questions in the minds of hon. members arising out of what I have said I shall be very glad to attempt to answer them. As, of course, I shall be speaking again at the conclusion of the debate, it is my intention to follow as closely as possible the points raised by hon. members in the course of their remarks with a view to being able to give the house, before the debate concludes, any additional information the house may wish to have. I may add that were it not for the fact that I believe hon. members on all sides of the house are likely to be in very full agreement with the purposes and principles of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals and with the resolution now before the house I would perhaps not be so desirous of proceeding as rapidly as possible with this resolution. I think the matter is one on which hon. members already have more or less made up their minds. In this debate I trust there will be very little in the way of diversity of opinion or occasion for any kind of party controversy.

Hon. members will have felt a special interest in the following paragraph which appears in the speech from the throne, opening the present session of parliament:

The government has accepted the invitation to Canada to send representatives to a conference of the united nations to be held on April 25 at San Francisco to prepare a charter for a general international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security. My ministers are of the opinion that the Canadian delegation at the San Francisco conference should be assured of the widest possible measure of support from parliament. A joint resolution of both houses will, accordingly, be submitted for your approval.

The invitation to the conference at San Francisco reads as follows:

Embassy of the United States of America,
Ottawa, Canada

No. 293

March 5, 1945.

Sir,—The government of the United States of America, on behalf of itself and of the governments of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the Republic of China, invites the government of Canada to send representatives to a conference of the united nations to be held on April 25, 1945, at San Francisco in the United States of America to prepare a charter for a general international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security.

The above named governments suggest that the conference consider as affording a basis for such a charter the proposals for the establishment of a general international organization, which were made public last October as a result of the Dumbarton Oaks conference and which have now been supplemented by the following provisions for section C of chapter 6.

C. Voting

1. Each member of the security council should have one vote.
2. Decisions of the security council on procedural matters should be made by an affirmative vote of seven members.
3. Decisions of the security council on all other matters should be made by an affirmative vote of seven members including the concurring votes of the permanent members; provided that, in decisions under chapter 8, section A and under the second sentence of paragraph one of chapter 8, section C, a party to a dispute should abstain from voting.

Further information as to arrangements will be transmitted subsequently. In the event that the government of Canada desires in advance of the conference to present views or comments concerning the proposals, the government of the United States of America will be pleased to transmit such views and comments to the other participating governments.

Accept, sir, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

Ray Atherton.

The Right Honourable
the Secretary of State for External Affairs,
Ottawa.

The invitation was accepted in the following terms:

Office of the Secretary of State
for External Affairs

Ottawa, March 5, 1945.

Sir,—The government of Canada is pleased to accept the invitation conveyed in your Note No. 293 of March 5, on behalf of the governments of the United States of America, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the Republic of China to send representatives to a conference of the united nations to be held on April 25, 1945, at San Francisco to prepare a charter for a general international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security.

The government of Canada agrees that the conference should accept as a basis for its discussions the proposals for the establishment of a general international organization, which were made public in October, 1944, and have now been supplemented by the addition set forth in your Note of provisions regarding voting procedure in the security council.

Note has been taken of the offer of the government of the United States of America to transmit to other participating governments such views or comments concerning the proposals as the government of Canada may desire to present in advance of the conference. I shall communicate with you again if the government of Canada decides to take advantage of this offer.

Accept, sir, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

W. L. Mackenzie King,
Secretary of State for External Affairs.

His Excellency
The Hon. Ray Atherton,
Ambassador of the United States of America,
United States Embassy,
Ottawa.

I do not think there is any question that this house will be prepared to endorse the acceptance by the government of the invitation to Canada to send representatives to the world security conference at San Francisco.

At yesterday's sitting, I gave notice of the resolution which appears on to-day's order paper. In accordance with the understanding reached at the time, I now move, seconded by Mr. St. Laurent:

That it is expedient that the Houses of Parliament do approve the following resolution:

Whereas the government of Canada has been invited by the government of the United States of America, on behalf of itself and of the governments of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the Republic of China, to send representatives to a conference of the united nations to be held on April 25, 1945, at San Francisco in the United States of America to prepare a charter for a general international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security, and

Whereas the invitation suggests that the conference consider as affording a basis for such a charter the proposals for the establishment of a general international organization which have been made public by the four governments which participated in the discussions at Dumbarton Oaks, Washington, and

Whereas the government of Canada has accepted the invitation to send representatives to this conference,

Therefore be it resolved—

1. That this house endorses the acceptance by the government of Canada of the invitation to send representatives to the conference;

2. that this house recognizes that the establishment of an effective international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security is of vital importance to Canada, and, indeed, to the future well-being of mankind; and that it is in the interests of Canada that Canada should become a member of such an organization;

3. that this house approves the purposes and principles set forth in the proposals of the four governments, and considers that these proposals

San Francisco Conference

constitute a satisfactory general basis for a discussion of the charter of the proposed international organization;

4. that this house agrees that the representatives of Canada at the conference should use their best endeavours to further the preparation of an acceptable charter for an international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security;

5. That the charter establishing the international organization should, before ratification, be submitted to parliament for approval.

Next to the winning of the war, the supreme end to be achieved is the winning of the peace. Peace can only be made lasting through co-operative action on the part of peace-loving nations. The purpose of the forthcoming conference at San Francisco is the creation of a general international organization to maintain peace and security in the post-war world.

In some quarters there appear to be misconceptions as to what it is intended the San Francisco conference should accomplish. It might be well, were I at the outset to remove one prevalent misconception. The purpose of the conference has been set forth clearly in the communication of March 5 on behalf of the inviting governments which I have just read. The conference at San Francisco is not the peace conference. It will have nothing to do with the preparation of the treaties of peace. It will not discuss the terms which the united nations will impose on Germany and on Japan at some future time. It will deal only with the constitutional framework of the future society of nations. The purpose is to provide for the maintenance of peace, once peace has been secured.

It may be helpful to the house if I proceed at once to give an outline of the negotiations that have led to the calling of the San Francisco conference.

The Moscow conference which ended on November 1, 1943, was the first step by the great powers towards the development of plans for a new international security organization forecast in the Atlantic charter, and endorsed by the united nations' declaration of 1942. In the declaration issued at the conclusion of the Moscow conference the four governments which were later represented at Dumbarton Oaks, Washington, declared that they recognized "the necessity of establishing at the earliest practicable date a general international organization based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all peace-loving states and open to membership by all such states, large and small, for the maintenance of international peace and security."

At the prime ministers' meeting in London in May, 1944, there were discussions of proposals framed by the United Kingdom government. Since that meeting there have been frequent interchanges of opinion between commonwealth governments.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Between late August and early October, 1944, meetings were held at Dumbarton Oaks, Washington. At these meetings discussions took place between officials representing the governments of the United States of America, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the United Kingdom looking to the establishment of a general international organization for the maintenance of peace and security. At a subsequent stage, meetings were held of officials of the United Kingdom, United States of America and China. At the end of these meetings, there was issued on October 9, 1944, what are known as the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. Canada was not represented at Dumbarton Oaks, but the Canadian government received day to day reports on the progress of the discussions.

The official delegations at Dumbarton Oaks were unable to reach agreement on some points. The proposals there framed were, consequently, but the first stage in the development of a draft charter for consideration by all the united nations. The proposals were subsequently accepted and supplemented by the initiating governments at the Crimea conference at Yalta held in February of the present year. They were thereafter concurred in by China, and were then submitted to other countries for their consideration.

At Yalta the three greatest world powers achieved unified proposals for a charter of a world security organization. That of itself is a hopeful augury for the future. Without continuing unity among the great powers there would be little hope for enduring peace.

As I have already stated, it was on the 5th of this month, that invitations were extended to Canada and other united nations to attend a conference at San Francisco. The invitations were extended by the United States of America on its behalf and that of the United Kingdom, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and China. The invitation suggests that the conference should consider, as affording a basis for the charter of the new organization, the proposals which have been agreed upon between these four governments.

Since the invitation was received, I have had an opportunity for personal conversations with President Roosevelt, in the course of which we discussed the main features of the proposals, and suggestions which the Canadian government believe would make for improvement in the effectiveness of the proposed organization. Early in April, there is to be a meeting of representatives of Commonwealth governments in London to discuss the proposals. I shall not be able to be present myself at this meeting. Our government will be represented by the Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Hume Wrong, in cooperation with the Right Hon. Vincent Massey, the Canadian High Commissioner in London. I believe that the discussions in London will serve a useful purpose as an exchange of information, and as a clarification of views among the different nations of the commonwealth, all of which alike are deeply interested in the success of the conference. This meeting will be a continuation of the exchanges of information and ideas which have been taking place between Canada and the other countries of the commonwealth and some of the united nations.

I might here mention that there was some discussion of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals at the recent inter-American conference on the problems of war and peace at Mexico City. Canada was not represented at that conference, and received no invitation to attend. The conference adopted a gracious resolution which rendered a tribute of admiration to Canada for our country's great war effort, and expressed a desire for closer Canadian collaboration with the pan-American system. To this resolution I have made an appreciative reply.

I have here a copy of the letter from the foreign secretary of Mexico transmitting this resolution to the government of Canada. I have also a copy of the reply I have since made, and at the conclusion of my observations I would ask permission to table these documents. Perhaps the letters might be included as a part of this statement.

Telegram

Castle of Chapultepec, D.F.

March 9, 1945.

(Translation)

The Right Honourable

William Lyon Mackenzie King,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Canada.

I have the honour to communicate to Your Excellency the following resolution adopted with enthusiasm by the respective delegates:

"The Inter-American Conference on the Problems of War and Peace considering that Canada has contributed and is contributing essentially to the defence of the American Continent, realizing a war effort whose magnitude includes all the resources of the country; that because of its geographic position Canada belongs to the American Hemisphere and within that occupies a prominent position for the high development of its culture, industry and democratic institutions, and that it maintains diplomatic and consular relations with the other American states, as also commercial and financial relations, the Inter-American Conference resolves:

"To render its tribute of admiration and gratitude to Canada for its great war effort in defence of the American Continent.

"To express its desire that Canada's collaboration with the Pan-American system may daily become closer and closer."

I have real pleasure in communicating the foregoing resolution to Your Excellency and avail myself of this opportunity to renew the expression of my most distinguished consideration.

Ezequiel Padilla,
Secretary of Foreign Affairs.

Telegram

To: Ezequiel Padilla, Secretary of Foreign Affairs, Mexico City, Mexico.

From: W. L. Mackenzie King,
Prime Minister of Canada.

En Clair

Ottawa, Canada,
March 16, 1945.

On behalf of the people and government of Canada, I extend our sincere thanks for the generous tribute to Canada's war effort contained in the resolution which you transmitted on behalf of the Chapultepec Conference. We are proud to share in the defence of freedom on this continent, as in Europe and Asia. We are convinced that the increasing solidarity of the peace-loving peoples of this hemisphere, will contribute materially in the post-war period to both regional and world security. We greatly welcome the increased collaboration in all matters of mutual interest and concern with our neighbours of the Americas.

W. L. Mackenzie King.

While the San Francisco conference will concern itself with international cooperation in matters other than the assurance of security, its main purpose will be to erect a firm and enduring structure for the maintenance of world peace. The proposals formulated at Dumbarton Oaks and Yalta are not in final treaty form. They are a general basis for discussion of the charter for the proposed international organization. It is the purpose of the conference to develop from the proposals a complete instrument for signature by the united nations. For the success of any final plan of world security, it is essential that it should command the cordial assent of the great powers, as well as the support of a large number of intermediate and small countries. The great defect of the league of nations was not that it had an imperfect constitution, but that, at no time, did it include more than half the great powers. The great powers will no doubt support the inclusion in the completed charter of the substance of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. For that and other reasons, the resolution now before the house recognizes that the proposals which have been made public constitute a satisfactory general basis for discussion of the proposed international organization.

San Francisco Conference

The resolution asks this house to approve the purposes and principles set forth in the proposals of the four governments.

The purposes of the organization as set forth in the proposals of the four governments are:

1. To maintain international peace and security; and to that end to take effective collective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to the peace and the suppression of acts of aggression or other breaches of the peace, and to bring about by peaceful means adjustment or settlement of international disputes which may lead to a breach of the peace;
2. To develop friendly relations among nations and to take other appropriate measures to strengthen universal peace;
3. To achieve international cooperation in the solution of international economic, social and other humanitarian problems; and
4. To afford a centre for harmonizing the actions of nations in the achievement of these common ends.

These are purposes for a general international organization of which this house will surely cordially approve.

In pursuit of these purposes the proposals recommend that the organization and its members should act in accordance with the following principles:

1. The organization is based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all peace-loving states.
2. All members of the organization undertake, in order to ensure to all of them the rights and benefits resulting from membership in the organization, to fulfil the obligations assumed by them in accordance with the charter.
3. All members of the organization shall settle their disputes by peaceful means in such a manner that international peace and security are not endangered.
4. All members of the organization shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force in any manner inconsistent with the purposes of the organization.
5. All members of the organization shall give every assistance to the organization in any action undertaken by it in accordance with the provisions of the charter.
6. All members of the organization shall refrain from giving assistance to any state against which preventive or enforcement action is being undertaken by the organization. The organization should ensure that states not members of the organization act in accordance with these principles so far as may be necessary for the maintenance of international peace and security.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

These principles upon which the general international organization will be expected to act will also, I am sure, be cordially approved by all hon. members of this house.

According to the proposals, membership of the organization should be open to all peace-loving states. It is proposed that the organization should have as its principal organs: A general assembly; a security council; an international court of justice; and a secretariat. It is also proposed that the organization should have such subsidiary agencies as may be found necessary.

One of the first questions which anyone looking at the proposals for the new world security organization will ask is: How do these proposals differ from the covenant of the league of nations and in what respects do they improve upon it? The failure of the league to secure world peace was a world tragedy. It must not, however, be thought that the idealism and effort which went into the league have been wasted. That would be a shallow judgment. The ideal of the new international organization remains the same—the organization of enduring peace. There are, however, important lessons to be learned from the league's failure to attain that end. The knowledge gained should be applied to building on more solid foundations.

The structure of the proposed organization bears a general resemblance to that of the league of nations. But there are important differences in the authority of the various organs proposed.

The general assembly, like the league assembly, would be composed of representatives of all members, with one vote for each delegation. The assembly would discuss and make recommendations on any matter of international importance with the single exception of international disputes which may be under consideration by the security council. These disputes the assembly might discuss, but in order to avoid conflict of jurisdiction, it could not make recommendations for their settlement. The assembly would also elect the non-permanent members of the security council, the members of the economic and social council, the secretary-general of the organization, and, probably, the judges of the international court. It would control budgets and apportion expenses. It would have wide powers of initiation and supervision in the economic, social and humanitarian fields. Its important decisions would be reached by a two-thirds majority, thus abrogating the league rule of unanimity for important decisions of the assembly.

The Security Council. It is when we come to consider the security council that we encounter an important difference between the proposed organization and the league of nations. Unlike the league, in which both the assembly and the council concurrently had many similar general powers, the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security would, in the proposed organization, be assigned to the security council. A further point of difference is that, whereas the league council dealt with many matters other than those directly related to security, the new council's functions would be confined to the consideration of international disputes, and of situations which might lead to friction and give rise to international disputes. The council would deal with disputes, present or prospective, likely to endanger the peace. The assembly's main concern would be to promote general progress through concerted international action to foster the general welfare.

The security council therefore would be vested with primary authority for guarding the peace of the world. It would consist of five permanent members (the United States, the U.S.S.R., the United Kingdom, France and China), and six other States elected for two years by the assembly and not immediately eligible for reelection. Each member would have one vote and seven votes out of the eleven would be required for decisions.

Under the formula proposed at Yalta, decisions on questions other than procedural matters would be taken by a majority of seven votes, including in the majority, the votes of the five permanent members. To this rule there would be one important exception. If a permanent member were involved in a dispute before the council, that member would abstain from voting when the procedure for the peaceful settlement of the dispute was being followed. If it came to a decision that a given situation was a threat to the peace, or to a decision requiring the imposition of penalties, the right to vote would be restored to the permanent member in question. Thus a permanent member could not block the consideration of a complaint against it by another state, nor an effort to solve the problem by pacific means. If, however, pacific means were to fail, the permanent member could by its vote block a decision to take punitive action against itself.

A new agency is now proposed which had no exact counterpart in the league. This is the economic and social council. It would consist of eighteen members elected for three years by the assembly. There would be no permanent members and no provision preventing reelection. The economic and social council would be charged with the general supervision of international economic, social and humanitarian activities, in the light of the policies laid down by the assembly. Expert commissions and staffs would be attached to the economic and social council.

The proposals recognize that there should be a court of justice as the chief international judicial organ. The question as to whether the present statute of the permanent court of international justice should be revised or a new statute prepared is left open. It is to be hoped that as time goes on, and as a more stable world emerges, international differences will more and more be amicably settled by judicial methods. Only in this way can a body of precedent be developed, and broadened, until all the differences between nations come to be settled as a regular practice in accordance with principles of law and equity, and with respect for contractual obligations. Here I might mention that the Canadian Bar Association is performing a most useful task by making a series of valuable studies on the subject of international jurisprudence.

The machinery for dealing with disputes between nations which is outlined in chapter VIII of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals deserves close study. The procedure falls into two stages. The first is concerned with the peaceful settlement of disputes. The security council on its own motion or at the request of any state would have the power to investigate any dispute or situation likely to give rise to international friction. Members of the organization would be bound to seek peaceful solutions by the normal methods of negotiation, mediation, conciliation, arbitration or judicial settlement. If the parties to the dispute themselves should fail to reach agreement by any of these means, the security council could recommend appropriate procedures, such as reference to the international court; or seeking the court's advice on the legal aspect of the questions at issue. Matters within the domestic jurisdiction of states would be expressly excluded.

If peaceful measures should fail, the second stage of the procedure would come into effect. The security council could then declare that the failure to arrive at a solution to a dispute constituted a threat to the peace, and it could proceed to further measures. These measures might include, in the first instance, diplomatic and economic sanctions such as the severance of diplomatic relations, the interruption of communications, an embargo upon trade, and other forms of pressure short of the use of armed force. The security council could call upon all members of the organization to join in the application of such measures.

If sanctions of this nature were still ineffective, the security council could in the last resort require forcible action against the disturber of the peace. In such action, the council would be aided by a military staff committee which would be in charge of plans for the application of armed force. The military staff committee would also have to do with long-term problems concerning the regulation of armaments. Here is another fundamental difference between the proposed organization and the league of nations. The new security organization would be founded on a clear recognition of the fact that world security is based upon the maintenance of a large superiority of power on the side of peace. It is also recognized that machinery would have to be devised to make it possible to apply such power instantly and effectively, should another aggressor arise to disturb international peace.

It will, I am sure, be agreed that peace-loving nations cannot afford to risk a return to conditions which allowed one nation after another to be struck down by an aggressor before concerted action could be organized and taken. Nations have surely learned that they cannot secure their liberties except on an agreed basis of mutual aid. The proposed arrangements with their emphasis on the exploration of peaceful means of settlement, and with organized force in the background to deal with recalcitrants, ought to prevent international disputes from reaching the point of danger. The main function of the police is not to catch criminals, but to make it obvious that crime does not pay. The police do not interfere in the settling of disputes by discussion or litigation, but the police are available if the disputes threaten to lead to the breaking of heads.

The question arises: How would the security council be able to call out forces when the danger point had been reached? Under the present proposals, members of the organization would not be required to place forces under the control of the security council except in accordance with special agreements separately entered into, setting forth the number and types of the forces, and the facilities and assistance which they are prepared to provide. The agreements would limit the military aid, pledged by members, to what each member was ready to give of its own volition. The agreements might include provisions governing the circumstances in which any forces could be called upon to serve abroad. These agreements would need separate approval in accordance with the constitutional processes of each country. In Canada that would mean approval by parliament before such agreements were ratified.

There is at present a good deal of obscurity about the methods by which this part of the proposals would be developed in practice. One point, however, is clear. As they stand, the acceptance of the proposals would in no way commit Canada to send forces beyond Canadian territory at the call of the security council. If any such commitment were sought, it would be embodied in a later agreement, freely negotiated by the government of Canada, and coming into effect only after it had been approved by parliament.

Provision is also made in the proposals for the use of regional agencies to handle local disputes under the general direction of the security council. The relationship of such regional agencies to the security council is likely to prove one of the important questions which will come up for consideration at San Francisco.

The maintenance of security is only one aspect of the creation of a world society in which peace can take root and flourish. It is not merely the security of nations that is indivisible; prosperity also is indivisible. Few would wish to return to the years before the war when many nations sought economic security in economic isolation. What happened was that the economic security of all nations was destroyed. Now is surely the time for the whole world to realize that just as no nation can ensure its own safety of itself, so no nation or group of nations can ensure its own prosperity in isolation.

In the social, economic and humanitarian activities contemplated under these proposals, which would extend over the whole international field, Canada would be certain to take both a prominent and a useful part. It would be a mistake to think of the world organization as exclusively preoccupied with the prevention of war. Indeed, if the defeat of our enemies brings about a securer world, we may hope that considerations of security will gradually recede into the background, and that progress in the arts of civilization by international cooperation on many fronts will be the first topic and central concern of foreign policy. We should come to think and act, less and less, in terms of force, and, more and more, in terms of forces—the forces that create or destroy international amity and goodwill.

Economic and social collaboration was always a useful and active part of the work of the league of nations. It is now proposed to expand into new fields and establish further special bodies to deal with particular problems. In almost all these aspects of economic and social activity, Canada will have a deep interest. As a great trading nation with a progressive and expanding economy, we are, from the point of view of markets and supplies, concerned with conditions all over the world. The assembly and the economic and social council will be central agencies of initiation and cooperation in this field. It will be clearly in the interests of Canada to participate fully in the work of these special bodies. Moreover, the humanitarian tradition which has played so worthy a part in our national life should give us a special interest in worldwide social betterment which the assembly and the economic and social council will seek to foster.

It is one of the proposed functions of the assembly "to promote respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms". This is an aspect of the world organization which should never be forgotten. If this great war, and the last, have taught us anything, it is the truth that "we are members one of another, and that the freedom both of men and of nations is one and indivisible".

The new organization and its affiliated agencies should be able in time to sponsor long-term arrangements for human welfare.

Just here, I should like to say a word or two on one problem of human welfare with which the united nations are immediately faced. The retreating enemy has left behind him, in western and eastern Europe, starvation, disease, and an alarming shortage of the elementary necessities of life. This situation represents a critical danger to the recovery of liberated Europe. The reports reaching the government portray appalling conditions. Even for those who greeted with joy the expulsion of the Germans from their homelands during these last few months, from the point of view of food, fuel, clothing and shelter, this sixth year of war is the bleakest year of all. The privations of those still under German domination are even more terrible.

The united nations have pooled their efforts to build up their great armed forces. For some time to come, it will be in Canada's interest, no less than in the general interest, for all to continue to pool their efforts to make available food and materials for relief and rehabilitation.

Some activities of the proposed world organization in the field of human welfare are likely to be conducted directly under the supervision of the economic and social council. These may include the collection of statistical and other economic information, international health problems, and the control of traffic in narcotics. Such services would be for the most part a continuation of very useful activities previously directed from Geneva. Expert commissions are contemplated to study these and related matters, from the point of view of general welfare and utility, with the experience and wisdom of the world's best technicians at their service.

Apart from activities under the direct supervision of the world organization a number of large functional inter-governmental bodies have already been established and others are being considered. The proposals to be discussed at San Francisco should be considered in relation to these other very important agencies. These inter-governmental bodies would be related to the world organization by agreements reached between them and the economic and social council. Among those agencies is the international labour organization which has already existed for twenty-five years, and is a solid reality. In the very important fields of agricultural production and of nutrition, a constitution has been drawn up by an interim commission for a united nations organization of food and agriculture. The interim commission, of which Mr. L. B. Pearson is chairman, was appointed at the Hot Springs conference of 1943. Proposals were developed at the Bretton Woods conference for an international monetary fund and an international development bank. The setting up of an international agency to deal with problems of civil aviation is also well under way. Proposals for further specialized agencies are under discussion, all of much interest to Canada. These include the establishment of an international agency to deal with questions of commercial policy, designed to assist in removing, by agreement, impediments to trade, and in promoting uniform customs practices, lower tariffs, the removal of exchange controls and similar matters. Proposals for the international regulation of cartels and for the adoption of measures to regulate the prices of certain raw materials are also under consideration. This is not an exhaustive enumeration.

If all proceeds as it is hoped it will, it may be found that, within a few years, there will be six or eight large international bodies performing functions which are beyond the capacity of any one nation or small group of nations. Such international agencies would not be regimenting or controlling individual nations, but, by agreement, would be framing courses of action designed to serve the general interest. It would be one of the functions of the general assembly and of the economic and social council to coordinate the activities of these bodies, to prevent overlapping of activities, and to fill in gaps where joint action proves to be desirable.

I have now completed a summary outline of the proposals to come before the San Francisco conference. Let me mention some of the difficulties and objections which are certain to present themselves in any consideration of the proposals.

In considering the proposals as a whole it is important to have constantly in mind that the international organization should be so constituted that it will function as effectively as possible. It is no less important for us, that in whatever is agreed to, the interests of Canada should be safeguarded. It is also most desirable that the organization, as finally established, should command the assent of the people of Canada so that, over the years, its underlying principles will secure steady public support. It may be that no fundamental changes will be needed to safeguard our interests. But that is not to say that the proposals could not and should not be improved.

Let me first refer to the position which would be accorded to the great powers. I have already mentioned that the participation of the great powers in the enforcement of peace is imperative, and that the main task of maintaining peace must rest with them. The five permanent members of the security council would be given the special voting rights I have described. If responsibility is to be fairly matched with power, it is essential that the great powers should have permanent membership in the security council. Incidentally, permanent membership was given to the great powers in the council of the league of nations.

Objections are certain to be raised to the special voting rights proposed for the great powers. There can be no question that they are open to theoretical objection. To what degree they are open to practical objection depends upon how far objection can be taken to a recognition of the fact of "power" in this imperfect world. It would not be realistic to expect to establish immediately an international system strong enough to coerce any great military power bent on attaining its aims by force. In the proposed new organization, all its members, great and small, would be bound to "refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force in any manner inconsistent with the purposes of the organization." If this solemn promise were broken by a great power the world would be faced once more with a situation like that presented by German aggression in 1914, and again in 1939. Such a situation could not be met in any international body merely by an arrangement of voting, however theoretically perfect. It is not a question so much of what is perfect as of what is possible. No charter can give the world security if, among the powerful, there be not the will for security.

Furthermore it should not be assumed that the possession by the permanent members of the security council of an individual veto on the application of penalties would make the security organization impotent in the event of a breach of the principles of the charter by one of the great powers. Penalties are the last resort. Before they were applied, there would have to be full discussion of the merits of the dispute. If, by its voting procedure, the council were blocked in proposing a solution, the general assembly could make its own recommendations by a two-thirds majority of its members. The great power concerned would know where, in the eyes of the world, justice lay, and the risks such a power would incur in violating the charter.

To expect perfection in any plan would be utopian. Both Mr. Churchill and Mr. Roosevelt have stated that while the proposals are not perfect, they are in substance the best upon which, up to the present, it has been found possible to secure agreement. President Roosevelt has said he expects that, over the years, the charter will be amended from time to time in the light of experience.

The decision with regard to voting taken at Yalta represents an achievement of substantial unity by the three greatest powers. It would be unrealistic and unwise to reject the decision outright. Here, if anywhere, there is reason to keep an open mind, and to reserve judgment as to our position until all points of view have been explored at the conference.

In general, exception can hardly be taken to the extension, within the organization, of some special prerogatives to the great powers, on whom the major responsibility for keeping the peace must rest. That is a correct application of the functional idea to international organization, which is that the position accorded to a state should correspond with the functions which it is able and ready to discharge. In marshalling force against aggression, the position of those able to contribute the greatest force must be respected.

If this be granted, it would seem that a further application of this principle would be both logical and appropriate.

The contribution of states, other than the great powers, to the success of the organization will vary widely. It would be in the general interest to develop the idea, and to accept as a guiding principle that power and responsibility should, as far as possible, be made to coincide. If this could be done, the result would be to narrow the gap between the great powers and other nations, while maintaining the principle of the sovereign equality of all member states. It would mean that the smallest and least powerful members would not nominally be given the same responsibilities as, let us say, Australia or the Netherlands or Brazil. It is the view of the government that the constitutional position within the organization of important secondary countries should be clarified, and that the delegation from Canada should exert the utmost effort to secure due recognition of their relative standing among the nations of the world.

As the proposals stand, all states, other than the five great powers would have the same constitutional position in the organization. No regard would be paid to their international significance, or to their record in resisting aggression, or to their potential contribution to the maintenance of peace. It is surely desirable that among the states which are to be elected members of the security council there should be several countries which can make a valuable contribution to the maintenance of security. At the same time, there should, of course, be representation in the council of different parts of the world. Without doubt much consideration will be given at San Francisco to the character of the elected representation on the security council. Some method of selection which would have due regard for the power and responsibilities of secondary states would make the council a more powerful and efficient body.

The proposal that all members should bind themselves to carry out diplomatic, economic and military sanctions at the request of the security council raises another difficult question for Canada and other secondary states. As I have already mentioned, military action would be limited to whatever was undertaken by each state in a special military agreement. It would seem to be desirable to develop some procedure whereby states not represented on the security council would not be called upon to undertake serious enforcement action without the opportunity of participating in the council's proceedings, or without agreeing separately to join in executing the decisions of the council.

To be effective, nearly all decisions of the council imposing sanctions would require the assistance of one or more states not represented on the council. The cooperation of states bordering on the offending state, or of states in which operational facilities might be essential, would be particularly needed. In practice, if the enforcement of sanctions required active aid from a country not represented on the council, its consent would probably be sought. The probable practice might well be made the formal rule.

A further question arises in connection with such transitional arrangements as may be necessary for the enforcement of the surrender and peace terms against Japan and Germany in the years following their defeat. Special arrangements will clearly be required so long as those countries are under full military occupation. It will be necessary to have a definition of the relations between the security council and any inter-allied authority which may be set up to supervise any long-term measures of control of the enemy countries.

In view of the difficulty of planning a world security organization, especially while the world itself is still at war, it might be desirable to include in the charter some provision for its general review after a term of years.

The government's views on the composition and powers of the security council and on other aspects of the proposed organization have already been communicated to the greater powers. It is not at present the intention of the government to propose particular provisions or amendments in advance of the discussions at the conference.

In considering this great plan for organizing peace, it is all-important that we think broadly and take a long view. The benefits which Canada may hope to gain from full participation in the organization are immense. They should not be weighed merely in terms of prestige. No country has a greater interest than ours in the prevention of another general war. That is the overriding consideration.

It was on the battlefields of an earlier war that our country reached the full stature of nationhood. On all the seas, in the skies over land and sea and in some of the bitterest land battles of the present world-encircling conflict, our fighting men have held high the name of Canada. Our contributions to the fashioning of victory have been far greater than could have been imagined six years ago. Our part in the shaping of peace may be no less urgent and no less effective.

The organization of world security is a co-operative undertaking. The present effort will be, perhaps, the greatest of its kind in history. To achieve success there will have to be a willingness to give and take. The results should not be regarded piecemeal. They should be assessed as a whole. Concentration on security and on the need to organize force to meet the threat of war will not be enough. Once confidence has been established, international action and organization in many fields will be required to make peace enduring. The strong bonds of comradeship and cooperation which have been developed under the stress of war, should be made ever stronger in the organization of peace.

Were another great war to break out in twenty or thirty years, or at any time in the future, it is certain that Canada would not escape its fury. The development of new weapons, the development in particular of the flying-bomb and the rocket projectile, are making it impossible for any country to claim immunity from sudden aggression. So long as might is made a substitute for right by any nation there can be no security for this, or the next or any succeeding generation of Canadians.

Even should the charter as finally drafted not be all that we could wish, its acceptance might nevertheless be preferable to its rejection. At all events, the interests of Canada are fully protected by the wording of the resolution. Hon. members will have noted that the resolution provides that the charter should, before ratification, be submitted to parliament for approval.

In proposing this course, the government is following the procedure customary with respect to treaties. No treaty obligation could be more solemn than that which the united nations will assume under the charter. The course which the government is proposing would, moreover, ensure to a parliament newly elected by the people, the final word with respect to the adoption of the charter.

It is important to Canada that her representatives at the world security conference should be assured of the widest possible measure of support from parliament and from the people. It is important that our representatives should speak with a clear, strong and united voice. There is every reason to believe that the vast majority of Canadians of all parties desire to have Canada participate in measures to safeguard the peace which we hope to see established at the close of this terrible war. For this, as well as other reasons, it is desirable that Canada's delegation to the San Francisco conference should be broadly representative. As I have already announced, it is the government's intention to select representatives from both houses of parliament, and from both sides of each house. The government itself will, of course, assume its constitutional responsibility both for the selection of the delegation and for any decisions which are agreed to at San Francisco. It is desirable that the house should make its decision upon the resolution now before it, before the membership of the delegation is announced. Once the resolution is adopted, I would hope very shortly thereafter to be able to make an announcement. By associating with the delegation members of political parties other than its own, the government is seeking to lift and to keep the effort to achieve enduring peace above the arena of party strife.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

In the resolution, the house is asked to agree that the representatives of Canada at the conference should use their best endeavours to further the preparation of an acceptable charter. I think I may assure hon. members that Canada's representatives will certainly be guided by the determination to do everything that is humanly possible to make the most effective provision for the maintenance of international peace and security.

At the approaching San Francisco conference, the united nations will be laying the foundation of a new world order. I know that the people of Canada, regardless of party or other affiliations, welcome the opportunity thus afforded our country to make its contribution to this vast undertaking. I am equally sure that this parliament will approach the question of world security and reach its conclusions with a full sense of its responsibility to our own and to future generations of Canadians and, indeed, to all the peoples of the world.

In any charter to establish a general international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security, the spirit in which the approach is made, and in which effect is given to its provisions will be vastly more important than the letter. As long ago as March 24, 1941, I spoke, in Toronto, of a new world order to take the place of the old order when the war was at an end. On that occasion I said:

If that new world order is not already on its way before the war is over, we may look for it in vain. A new world order cannot be worked out at some given moment and reduced to writing at a conference table. It is not a matter of parchments and of seals. That was a part of the mistaken belief at the end of the last war.

A new world order will be born, not made. It will be something that lives and breathes, something much closer to the soul of man than a mere mechanical or legalistic device. A new world order needs to be worked out and have its place in the minds and the hearts of men. It should express itself in brotherhood and goodwill. It will be the application, in all human relations, of the principle of service and of mutual aid.

These words, I believe, express the spirit underlying the Atlantic charter and the united nations declaration of 1942. This spirit has found concrete expression in lend-lease, in mutual aid and in the united nations relief and rehabilitation administration. The same spirit will, I believe, guide the united nations in their deliberations at San Francisco. It is important that the machinery of the new world organization should be realistically devised and wisely planned. But no constitutional machinery, however ingenious, will be effective unless the nations of the world profit by the lessons they have learned in these five and a half years of war. The supreme lesson is that humanity should no longer be made to serve selfish national ends, whether those ends be world domination or merely isolated self-defence. Nations everywhere must unite to save and serve humanity.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, contrary to what some hon. members may think, I do not rise for the purpose of continuing the debate. I confess, as I did once previously this afternoon, my inability to proceed at this time. I think I might be pardoned, however, for saying to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that he has made a very notable speech with which in great measure I find myself in agreement. There are a few outstanding points as to which perhaps we might be permitted to have some difference of opinion, and I shall advert to those on a later occasion if I find myself capable of participating in this debate, as I hope I may.

I rise primarily for the purpose of taking advantage of the kindly offer made by the Prime Minister, to permit of certain questions being asked at the conclusion of his address. I have given a good deal of thought to the setting up of this world organization, a new and enlarged league of nations, but I am puzzled over one factor as perhaps the Prime Minister is also puzzled. It occurs to me, and I suggest to the Prime Minister that he might take time to consider it, that the preservation of peace for to-morrow and for the future—and the Prime Minister was quite right when in his opening remarks he differentiated between peace-making and peace-keeping—depends not upon this new league of nations but upon the attitude of the three great powers, Great Britain, the United States and Russia, toward whatever agreement is reached among them outside the framework of the Dumbarton Oaks agreement. That is the part of the proposal that has been borne in upon me, and I would ask the Prime Minister—not now, because it is a big topic—to give consideration to that aspect of the whole position. We all desire peace; but does not the preservation of peace in the future depend upon the attitude of these three great powers? That is a vital question and a vital problem; and their attitude in that regard is not circumscribed or confined by the Dumbarton Oaks agreement.

That is the main question to which I should like the Prime Minister to give consideration, not now, as I have said, but at a later time. Then I should like to know if the government has forwarded any communications to the inviting powers or to the United States of America as is contemplated by the concluding paragraph of the Prime Minister's letter as Secretary of State for External Affairs to the United States ambassador, in which he states:

Note has been taken of the offer of the government of the United States of America to transmit to other participating governments such views or comments concerning the proposals as the government of Canada may desire to present in advance of the conference. I shall communicate with you again if the government of Canada decides to take advantage of this offer.

From something the Prime Minister stated this afternoon, though I am not quite clear about it, I gathered that representations had been made. I wonder if that is true and, if so, what they are.

Then there are a few subsidiary questions to which I desire to give attention. What instructions will be given to Canada's representatives at the London conference? Have those instructions been framed, and if they have not been framed will they be presented to parliament? I am assuming, of course, that the London conference will meet before parliament is dissolved.

Then, I should like to know why Canada was not represented at Dumbarton Oaks. Is it because we were not invited? Having regard to our contribution I regret exceedingly that Canada was not invited to Dumbarton Oaks. However, the first question is the one which troubles me, if we are going to have peace in the world. Does it not depend upon the attitude of the three great powers, outside the framework of the Dumbarton Oaks agreements? When I ask these questions I wish to impress upon the Prime Minister that I do not ask them in any hostile attitude at all. I am all for peace, and I want to see Canada participate in the San Francisco conference. But I want also to be informed; and the only way I can get information is by cross-examination of the Prime Minister on matters of vital importance.

San Francisco Conference

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to continue the debate if there are other hon. members who first of all wish to ask the Prime Minister questions. I am not rising to ask questions, but rather to discuss the Dumbarton Oaks proposal. I shall be very glad now, if there are any other hon. members who wish to ask questions, to give way to them. But I do suggest, when I am on my feet, that in courtesy to those of us who are prepared to speak we should not now hear a series of short speeches, but rather we should hear questions on points raised in the Prime Minister's statement. Otherwise I am prepared to go ahead.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question. The Prime Minister stated that he desired the unanimous—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Of course the house will understand that we are not in committee. Any questions asked of the Prime Minister may be replied to when the Prime Minister closes the debate on the resolution. Any hon. member, in asking questions, under the rules, is really forgoing his right to make a speech later.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Prime Minister definitely asked that questions might remain until after the conclusion of his speech. Surely we are not to be barred from participation in the debate. I am sure the Prime Minister would be the first to take the opposite view.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) is perfectly correct in saying that there was some understanding. But the rules are that those who participate in a debate, either in the form of questioning or by making a speech, have exercised their right to speak. And it is for this reason that I am suggesting to the hon. member for York-Sunbury, and to any other hon. member, that he may be deprived of that right.

Mr. CASSELMAN: Not if he asks a question, surely.

Mr. SPEAKER: Not in the form followed in the committee of the whole; that is wholly contrary to our rules. While the Prime Minister has stated he will be glad to answer questions, yet I myself have the feeling that if the Prime Minister is now cross-examined on his speech, the hon. member asking the questions would be deprived of his right to speak. I must have that understanding.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I make clear what I had in mind? I wished to have it understood that if in the course of my remarks there was anything that was not clear, and about which hon. members would wish to ask questions, I would answer them, and would seek to answer them immediately at the conclusion of my speech. On the other hand I did make it clear that what I intended to do was to seek to follow closely the remarks of the different speakers, as they addressed the house, and to note from their speeches, questions concerning which they would wish to have further information or enlightenment. I pointed out that I would seek to deal with all those questions when I replied, at the conclusion of the debate. That, Mr. Speaker, is the order that I should like to have followed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is very limited.

Mr. GRAYDON: If I might not be deprived of my right later on to speak, may I say at this time that my understanding with respect to the Prime Minister's suggestion to-day was very clear. He was good enough to suggest that he would answer certain questions that might arise, by way of clarification of what he might say to-day. Unless that is carried out, and unless we are to have latitude in the matter, then it does seem to me that our rights will be seriously curtailed. There are a number of questions with which the Prime Minister did not deal, or which he did not amplify. All this brings us back to the position we were in before. There are certain points which have arisen in the Prime Minister's speech to which study must be given. It is the government's policy, and I suggest we should have some clarification. The Prime Minister ought to make it very clear that by asking questions we are not depriving ourselves of the right to participate in the debate at a later time.

Mr. SPEAKER: The Prime Minister answered that question. Yet, with all due deference to the Prime Minister, he cannot make the rules of debate. My understanding was that the Prime Minister would make his statement, and that those who followed in their speeches might ask him questions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, that is not it at all.

Mr. CASSELMAN: By unanimous consent anything may be done.

Mr. SPEAKER: My understanding was that the Prime Minister was making his statement, and that any hon. member in making his speech at a later time might ask questions of the Prime Minister, to which he would reply in closing the debate on the resolution. From the Prime Minister's remarks to-day I gather that that is in accord with my understanding. I must point out to the house however that the Prime Minister, the leader of the house, cannot make the rules of debate. For that reason I wish to have the matter clarified now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What I said yesterday is clear, as it appears in Hansard. This is what I said:

My hon. friend asked me about questions. In speaking on the motion I should like to speak without interruption, and to be allowed to complete what I have to say. Then I would suggest that if there are any points I have not covered, points upon which hon. members might seek enlightenment or further information, and upon which they would wish me to elucidate they might mention them when they speak, giving me an opportunity to deal with such matters in my reply at the close of the debate. If my replies are not satisfactory I shall try to find some means of gaining assistance and making such further detailed replies as may be requested.

I was making it clear there that, in discussing a great subject such as this, I could hardly be expected to answer instantaneously all questions that might be asked. For any difficult technical questions I might wish to consult or have with me officials of the department, before making reply. But I have not proposed at any time that we should change the rules of debate or change the rules of the house in connection with the presentation of a resolution. My proposal to-day was that, instead of being interrupted, I might be permitted to proceed. Then, if hon. members would be kind enough not to interrupt, if there was something I had not made perfectly clear I would then be prepared later on, when I finished speaking, to endeavour to answer questions. If at that time I did not give immediate answer I would make answer respecting it at the appropriate moment.

Mr. GRAYDON: I take it that we may ask questions, without getting into difficulty so far as the house is concerned, by obtaining unanimous consent.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. GRAYDON: Well, I am going to ask for unanimous consent; and if I am refused unanimous consent to ask the Prime Minister certain questions with respect to this matter, then the house can take the responsibility. I do not think the Prime Minister would be the one who would refuse me.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am suggesting that so far as possible we should follow the rules of the house. If questions are going to be asked, then they should be questions and should not be ten-minute speeches, as we heard a few moments ago. I say that because those of us who wish to participate in the debate, while we are not being deprived of the opportunity to speak, find that we must wait while a number of short speeches are being made. So far as that is concerned, I should like to make a dozen speeches on this matter.

I have no objection to questions. But as a member who is prepared to speak I suggest the rules of the house should be observed as closely as possible, having due regard to the invitation extended by the Prime Minister.

Mr. BOUCHER: There should be no objection to waiting until the question is asked.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not making any objection to questions, I am objecting to privileged speeches being made.

Mr. SPEAKER: The Prime Minister stated that if desired by any hon. member questions might be asked during his speech and he would deal with them when he replied in closing the debate. To reduce this debate to the standing of a committee of the whole when considering a resolution of this importance would be contrary to the rules of the house. I take it that when the member who speaks asks a question, it will be answered later by the Prime Minister.

Mr. GRAYDON: On a point of order, I have tried to be fairly calm this session with respect to the whole situation. I want to be fair, but this is the last straw. I do not want to cast any reflection upon the Speaker, but it does seem to me that if this is going to go any farther our rights will be gradually diminished to the point where we will no longer be a parliament. I cannot make this too strong. The Prime Minister read a statement which he made yesterday, but that statement is not made by the Prime Minister to-day. He gave us the right of asking certain questions by way of clarification.

An hon. MEMBER: Go on and ask them.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think this government, which is now a minority administration, had better be careful how it deals with the majority. Will the Prime Minister not clarify this matter? Will he permit us to ask some questions we want to ask and which he said yesterday we might ask? If that is not done, and I do not think the Prime Minister will take any different step, the result will be nothing less than steamroller methods.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What question does my hon. friend wish to ask?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Let us settle the general principle.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am not asking the question until the Speaker permits me to do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As between the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition there are always certain courtesies accorded. If my hon. friend has a question he wishes to ask me I shall be very glad if he will ask it.

Mr. GRAYDON: Do I understand that if I ask a question I shall not be deprived of my right to take part in the debate?

Mr. SPEAKER: As I interpret the rules of the house I would have to rule that the leader of the opposition would be taking part in the debate by asking a question, and would have exhausted his right to speak.

Mr. GRAYDON: If that is the case, all I can do is to protest and object. I think the country generally will not approve the manner in which we are being treated. I think everybody expected that there would be some kind of cooperation in connection with this resolution. We are objecting to the procedure to-day and we objected to it yesterday. Is the government reducing parliament to something that will be definitely under its thumb?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): It is deliberately sabotaging parliament.

Mr. MacINNIS: I believe we are losing sight of something that might help us to get clear on this matter. During the course of an ordinary debate it is sometimes customary for the hon. member who has the floor to give way to questions. The Prime Minister asked that he be not questioned during the course of his speech so that he would not have to give way. That implied that questions might be asked after he had finished, and I think he agreed with that. But the objection that has been taken is to hon. members making speeches while they are asking questions. I do not believe that an hon. member should lose his right to speak merely because he asks a question, but if he goes beyond asking a question, then he should lose his right to take part in the debate that will follow. I think, Your Honour, that that is a matter that you can very well deal with. Do not let us get out of hand.

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the Prime Minister a question by way of clarification?

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the hon. member proposing to ask a question with respect to what the Prime Minister said in his statement? I have already stated what the position is. Unanimous consent has not been given, but even with unanimous consent I am in grave doubt as to whether the rules of the house should be set aside, even at the request of the Prime Minister.

Mr. GRAYDON: If that is the case, the situation is completely hopeless.

Mr. POULIOT: The leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) is much better when he acts as a ram than is the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) when he plays the lamb.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggart): Mr. Speaker, if this matter is settled, I wish to say something. The business of this house is to be mainly a discussion of the estimates, the provision of money for the government, and the San Francisco conference which it is hoped will lay the foundation, as the Prime Minister said, of an organization which will guarantee something in the way of enduring peace.

May I say that I agree with those who feel that this house should have been called weeks ago so that we might have given adequate consideration to the problems that are going to arise. To try to crowd these into two or three weeks is an almost impossible thing to do. I feel that adequate time will not have been given for a discussion of the problems of war.

It was August that we last had the opportunity of discussing the ordinary business of the country, and to-day we are in March. Within two or three weeks parliament will be dissolved, and until some time late in the summer or in the autumn there will be no parliament in which hon. members may express the views of their constituents.

We are discussing now the San Francisco conference. We understand perfectly well that the united nations conference is in no sense, as the Prime Minister said this afternoon, a peace conference. As the resolution moved by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), which appears on the order paper, clearly implies, it is a conference to consider means of preventing future war.

The resolution before the house endorses the acceptance of the invitation to go to San Francisco. It recognizes the vital importance of an effective organization for peace, and it declares that Canada should become a member of that organization. It declares that the proposals constitute a satisfactory basis for discussion but it recommends, and I think that this is important, that Canada's delegation should try to improve it; and it safeguards the right of parliament to final decision on any agreement or agreements that may be reached. Therefore the resolution should receive the unanimous support of both houses of parliament.

The world should have profited from the experiences gained between the two wars. At the conclusion of the first great war many people believed that a system for the maintenance of peace was in the making. I know that I welcomed the establishment of the league of nations, and for a good many years I pinned my faith to it. In my support of league principles I have never wavered because I believe that they are principles that are eternally sound. But as the years rolled by I realized that it was not the league that failed or the principles that underlay it; it was the leaders of the nations who had promoted its foundation who failed the principles upon which the league had been founded.

We watched with ever-growing alarm the building up of Mussolini and Hitler as barriers against peoples' movements not only in their own countries but throughout the world. The dictators destroyed their countries' effective labour organizations; they destroyed the great cooperative movements which had been so laboriously established, and gave their people work by preparing for war—a war which at almost any time and at any stage between 1931 and 1938 could have been prevented by united action on the part of all the peace-loving nations.

But of course all this is historic; all this is in the past; and the usefulness to-day in recalling it is merely in the lesson it has for us toward the close of a still more devastating war, and of course the opportunity again presented to the world to do what we failed to do in the period of what we might call a prolonged armistice between 1918 and 1939.

I believe there is an almost unanimous desire on the part of the Canadian people that parliament should give the strictest attention this session to this business and the other business before the house, the business for which the session is called. We must be positive that our efforts, for example, to bring the war to a successful conclusion do not lag in any particular. We must provide the funds to carry on our civil government, to improve our social services, to provide for the rehabilitation of the men and women who are returning now and to make sure that those who are coming back will be replaced and that our fighting men will be adequately reinforced by trained and efficient personnel. I do not believe that the country expects us to indulge at this time in recrimination or petty bickering, but rather to act in a manner that will show our allies that this is indeed a united nation to the extent of our determination to win the war and to lay the foundations for the prevention of another great conflict in the future. If we fail as a parliament to act in the manner in which we are expected to act, parliament will lose to a greater degree than ever before the confidence of the masses of the Canadian people.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) this afternoon announced that parliament will be represented on a non-partisan basis. The choice of the delegation is, in the view of the government, a responsibility of the government in power. I therefore do not intend to discuss that part of the proposal made by the Prime Minister this afternoon, but I wish to state my opinion that in the circumstances in which this parliament finds itself, no representation of Canada on a purely partisan basis could be adequate or satisfactory. The British people will be represented by members of all parties who, owing to the threat of invasion and defeat in 1940, joined together in a coalition. The threat of both invasion and disaster which they faced was one which this country, very fortunately, was spared. The United States and Australia, having party governments, will none the less be represented by non-partisan delegations appointed on the responsibility of their respective governments. In following a similar course Canada is doing something, which, I think, will be approved by the Canadian people generally.

The task which lies before this conference will be both great and historic. It will be meeting, at a time when the victorious allies from the east and from the west will be about to meet somewhere on the plains of Germany—at least that is what we hope. But victory alone will not bring the kind of world in which peace and security may reign supreme. Even the basis of collective action to assure the peaceful settlements of disputes or resistance to a threat of aggression will not be sufficient. As long as racial hatreds fomented in many countries for political advantage, are permitted to divide mankind, so long will the threat of death and destruction be ever present in our midst. We must not forget that at San Francisco the nations will be judged not by what they say but by what they do. Assembled there will be men and women of every race, every creed and every colour. In such a conference all distinctions of that type will be sunk; and if we are to maintain the peace of the world in years to come, the sinking of all such distinctions in that conference must be followed by the sinking of racial discrimination in all countries which may be described as the peace-loving nations of the world.

San Francisco Conference

The problem, then, before the conference will be to lay the foundations on which the creative forces of mankind may build human betterment in a world of peace and security. We must not allow the nations to drift apart as they did following the Versailles conference of 1919 when the league of nations was formed. This time we dare not drift, lest we drift again on the rocks of war, a war which will be more terrible than any war the world has ever known. Some who sit in this house and among all parties have seen the devastation of the blitz. We have seen or heard the flying bomb. We have heard the heavy explosions caused by the still more terrible rocket projectile. We know, and we must convey to our people that knowledge, that these new instruments are only in their infancy, and that unless we lay foundations for an enduring peace these terrible engines of war may devastate not only cities but whole nations of the earth, including even our own country. Canada, which seems so remote from the possibility of attack—protected, as we thought she was, by great oceans on three sides and a friendly and powerful neighbour to our south—can no longer be regarded as immune from attack. But the security which we seek cannot be assured only by the setting up of an organization empowered to adjudicate justice and enforce international law. More, much more than that is required. People everywhere are still obsessed by the twin fears of war and unemployment, these fears which have bred the dictators, these fears which promoted the power of Mussolini and of Hitler. The San Francisco conference will deal to some extent, as the Prime Minister indicated this afternoon, with the economic proposals laid down in a part of the Dumbarton Oaks agreement. These—and I am glad he noted it—are distinct from the monetary proposals of Bretton Woods, which must be carefully reviewed later by this parliament before we give our approval to those monetary and financial proposals. At the moment the Bretton Woods proposals do not enter into the consideration of the conference at San Francisco, and therefore

[Mr. Coldwell.]

I am not going to discuss that matter. But no system of security can be successful if it ignores either of the twin fears to which I have referred.

Primarily, of course, San Francisco will turn its attention to the problem of outlawing war. That will be indeed the primary purpose of the conference. But we must not forget the twin fears which are involved in a consideration of the relationships between the nations. We should not forget the Dumbarton Oaks agreement, which will and must form the basis of the discussion at San Francisco, gives some attention, although not as much as I would have liked to see, to the economic problems of the world. The fact that these economic problems will be discussed by the economic council which, under the agreement, is directly under the control of the general assembly of nations, will give that assembly a considerable measure of general control over the economic problems of the world. In other words, there will be opportunities for the discussion of the international planning of trade relationships and commerce.

This is a proposal that Canada should welcome, because we are deeply concerned not only with the prevention of war in the realm of military affairs but with trading relationships in the post-war world. We shall be living in a false paradise if we think that, after a comparatively brief period of reconstruction and rehabilitation, the world can return to tariffs, quotas, and exchange manipulation and remain either prosperous or at peace. Canada, I believe, has in 1944 become the second among the united nations in the volume of her exports. At the moment this does not cause us any concern; but when the war is over and the period of rehabilitation has ended, the maintenance of our exports will depend upon—what? Upon our willingness to import goods in payment for most of the commodities we export.

Indeed, in the kind of world that one foresees, it is only on such a basis that we can maintain and improve our standards of living. Let us not forget that in this conference Great Britain has to adopt a different position, because of her economic standing, from that which perhaps she could afford to adopt before this war began. The old idea that a nation prospers according to the volume it exports, without regard to the volume of imports, is surely fallacious. Our standards of life, as in other countries of the world, will depend upon the amount of goods and services our people can enjoy.

Obviously we cannot use all the foodstuffs and raw materials, among other things, which this country produces in abundance; but if we import the goods we desire, to complement the volume of primary and secondary goods we can produce, through a proper system of distribution our people can enjoy that standard of living to which modern science entitles us. And what is true of Canada is true of every other country in the world. Standards of living in the backward countries, some of which will be represented at this conference, must be raised as rapidly as possible so that ultimately all nations may enjoy the economic, social and cultural amenities which modern machinery and modern science make possible.

To this task, then, much attention will have to be given at San Francisco. For the peaceful settlement of disputes, in my opinion, machinery must be more easily provided and with much greater speed. It is with great satisfaction that we learned of the determination of the three great powers to work together in harmony after the war. The Prime Minister emphasized that this afternoon, and I am very glad he did so. Moreover, recent pronouncements regarding the holding of free elections in the liberated countries, if carried into full effect, will, we hope, provide a basis for the restoration of democratic procedures in the countries where these institutions have been either destroyed or suspended.

What will the San Francisco conference be expected to do? I think first of all it will be expected to make a clear statement on certain great principles. First of these, in my opinion, is this, that any international organization to be successful must be based on the conscious surrender to the jurisdiction of international organization of certain matters which must be clearly set forth and agreed to. That is the proviso: certain matters which must be clearly set forth and agreed to. And agreed to, not only by the delegations meeting in conference but by the elected representatives of the peoples of the nations where their parliaments exist.

That means, of course, that whatever is proposed and accepted by the Canadian delegation at San Francisco must of necessity—and this is involved in the resolution before us—receive the approval of this parliament, or rather of the successor of this parliament, before it binds this country. The Prime Minister's resolution makes that position abundantly clear, as it should be made clear. For that is the democratic procedure which many of us have always demanded in our own country. Democratic procedure must be the basis of any organization that is established at San Francisco.

All nations, great and small, should be expected, if not immediately—as the Prime Minister indicated, the delegates there may be faced with certain practical difficulties—at least ultimately to accept decisions arrived at by democratic vote of the representatives of the peace-loving peoples. Such democracy within the world organization does not necessarily mean that all members, while they are equal in sovereignty, are equal in power; but it does mean that all nations participating in such organization should be equal before the law of nations.

Some means of course will have to be provided, and for that the Prime Minister was arguing this afternoon on behalf of Canada, so that the influence of national delegations within the international organization may vary, as they vary in world-wide influence and power. Such variations would give a solid foundation for the acceptance of decisions reached by the representatives of peace-abiding people.

To my mind it is not impossible to find a formula which will give consideration to the influence of a nation in the councils of a peace organization so as to reflect the power and influence of that nation in the world. Someone has suggested that some system of proportional power through representation might be worked out. But if the nations give their minds to the solution of that problem I think that solution can be found. And, as the Prime Minister said this afternoon, while this nation and others—secondary nations and smaller nations—may have to accept something short for the time being of what we desire, we should work towards a more just solution of the problem of the influence of the various nations within the international organization.

There is another fact that we have to face, and we should face it, that in the fields agreed upon—and again my qualification, only in the fields agreed upon—national sovereignty in the sense that every nation can do in every particular as it pleases according to its own will and its own power will be, indeed must be, limited. After all, that is not a loss of real sovereignty no more than obedience to democratic law is a loss of the individual's own sovereignty in the community. It is, of course, as among individuals, an insurance against international anarchy and chaos. It may indeed be considered in the international field as an extension of sovereignty; for each nation would have a democratic voice in the settlement of conditions and affairs beyond its own borders, which would in turn affect the conditions and affairs within its own borders. The result will be that, as with individuals or with nations, there would be an extension of actual freedom, not a restriction of it, as is so often contended. Without membership in such an organization the nation would have no voice, I repeat, in matters outside its own boundaries. Therefore if by agreement certain matters affecting the whole world of nations are placed under control of an international organization of which the nation itself, of course, is a part, then this nation is indeed in reality not limited to conditions within its own borders but is extended to conditions beyond its own borders which may have a serious effect upon conditions within its own jurisdiction.

In the proposals which are embodied in the Dumbarton Oaks agreement there are proposals, as the Prime Minister indicated in at least one instance this afternoon, some of which already to some extent have been modified or clarified. At Yalta an agreement was reached among the three great powers that there would be no absolute veto by any one of the three great powers on the discussion of matters affecting itself. This was indeed a welcome modification, but I find myself in agreement with what the Prime Minister said this afternoon, that it should be extended beyond this point. Everyone, I believe, agrees it is essential that the security council should have the power to act and to act swiftly; but the assembly representing the nations should have the right at all times to discuss any matter without limitation.

Canada as a member of the assembly but not of the security council should carefully review the present proposal to prevent discussion on matters being dealt with by the council of the great powers. I emphasize the words "present proposal." That indeed needs some clarification. As it now stands, and as I understand it, any matter which the security council may take under consideration cannot be dealt with by the general assembly unless it is specifically referred to it by the council. I think it is important that Canada should insist that the discussion affecting peace and war and all world interests should take place in assembly in public session, so that the people may be properly informed through the medium of the press and radio. This would prevent secret or backstage diplomacy which did so much to make the league of nations ineffective.

It seems to me that in the final analysis the great instrument for the prevention of war is an understanding by the general public of all the matters involved, so that public opinion may be marshalled on the side of peace and against aggression. Hence the need for the fullest publicity of discussion. Of course we know that outside of the assembly discussion, discussion of the military situation and some matters in connection with a suggested action of the security council might not be possible or desirable, but in the main, discussion should be open to the press and to the public.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Under the Dumbarton Oaks agreement all the member nations must accept the decisions of the council and carry them out. It seems to me proper that the armed contribution, for instance, of any particular nation should be discussed and settled to the greatest extent possible, not perhaps altogether as set out in the Dumbarton Oaks agreement but through a discussion in the assembly, and certainly, as the agreement itself sets out, before any emergency arises. What I suggest is not precisely the provisions of the Dumbarton Oaks agreement, although taking several of the clauses together, it might be implied.

We believe that in spite of the criticisms, some of which I have just made, the Dumbarton Oaks agreement provides a good basis for at least the discussion at San Francisco of concerted action amongst the nations to outlaw war. Then, believing this—of course, if we all believe it in this house—we should endeavour to be constructive in our suggestions for improvements in the basis of discussion already provided so that we may strengthen the present solidarity of the united nations. And who is there among us who does not realize to the full that the entire future of mankind depends upon the maintenance of the solidarity of the united nations, and particularly the solidarity of the three great powers? Canada is in a position, for several reasons, some of which I have indicated—geographical reasons, and so on—to assist in the perfecting of this solidarity and unity. She is in an excellent position, I say, to assist in doing just that. Why? Because Canada is recognized as a leader—I almost said the leader—among the secondary nations.

In economic sanctions against an aggressor or in the actual dispatch of armed assistance Canada is a factor of importance. Canada and the peace-loving nations of her stature, as the Prime Minister suggested this afternoon, and we support him whole-heartedly in it, should be given greater authority on the proposed security council. Under the present proposals Canada might be directed to sever trading relations with or supply armed forces to fight some future aggressor without having had the opportunity of participating in the discussions leading up to the decision reached. Lesser states with little trade, unable to give much armed help, have as great an influence as the strong secondary states; that in my opinion is something that the Canadian delegation should endeavour to rectify. For two good reasons these secondary states should be better represented on the security council. In the first place the security council must have immediate and adequate force at its disposal, and it will lack such decisive force unless nations are represented in accordance with the contribution they will be called upon to make for world peace.

Secondly, it is important that the secondary nations which will be called upon for vital assistance against an aggressor should be able to vote somewhere on the decision reached. That is a fundamental of responsible government, and the Canadian government, or that of any other democratic state, incidentally, has an obligation in this regard to its own electorate. It might be difficult to march to fight or to sever economic relations on the direction of a council in which in so many respects we had been denied an adequate voice. I should like to say that our party stands squarely for collective security with—and I use these words advisedly—all that this term implies. We believe it is the duty of Canada to endeavour to secure the acceptance of proposals for the improvement of the Dumbarton Oaks agreement and to look beyond it to the ultimate establishment of a real, effective, world-wide democratic organization for the maintenance of peace.

This afternoon the Prime Minister mentioned some of the great organizations that had been built up side by side with the league of nations, which he called functional organizations. He said that no less important in the immediate future than the consideration of steps to prevent actual military warfare is the provision of food and assistance for the devastated areas, and that the nations associating together who are in a position to do so ought to see in what manner they can lend the greatest possible aid to repair the devastation of war. We know that the league of nations failed in some respects, but in others the work of the league of nations must be carried on within the framework of the new international organization. Its contribution in the control of the nefarious trade in narcotics and of white slavery did a tremendous amount to assist those throughout the world who could not assist themselves. The International Labour Organization, possibly the one great organization that came out of the league of nations and remains with us, ought to be extended in influence and the agreements made within it should be accepted to a much greater extent than Canada and other nations have been prepared to accept them in the past. Then there is the matter of nutrition. We read before the war that two-thirds of the people of the world were undernourished. I say, Mr. Speaker, that in a world where two-thirds of the people are underfed, no matter how firmly we may establish some system of collective security in the military field there is no organization which can permanently secure the peace of the world under those conditions. There is the matter of civil aviation in which Canada is vitally interested, because we stand at the crossroads of the world, with a great neighbour to the south and another great neighbour to the north who will desire to use routes across our country. All these factors come within the range of the economic considerations that are involved side by side with the military considerations. The Prime Minister mentioned the regulation of cartels and the monetary and stabilization proposals which will be discussed under another agreement.

So I think our view can be summed up pretty well in a resolution passed at our national convention in Montreal last December, which said in part:

Future wars cannot be avoided without the establishment of government on the international level, democratically representative of all the peoples, great and small, and endowed with the paramount powers necessary to maintain the peace and to provide economic justice and equality of opportunity among the peoples of the world.

The post-war arrangements probably will fall far short of this; but, while accepting the best that can be obtained at the moment, we shall continue to look forward to the time when in the words of the late Wendell Willkie this will be indeed one world. When I speak of government at the international level, Mr. Speaker, of course I do not mean any body whatsoever which can make decisions binding upon its members except in relation to those matters delegated to it by the member peoples. Nor does it mean, of course, that we anticipate the immediate formation of a world-wide federation. Within the international organization it might be advisable—and the Dumbarton Oaks agreement provides for it—to have regional associations with responsibility for matters which affect a region more particularly. But let me say at once that undoubtedly it is true that anything which affects a region now affects in a greater or less degree the whole world. However, the point is that the ultimate aim of progressive peoples everywhere must be the unity of mankind under a code of law as applicable to behaviour among peoples as it is among individuals.

It is true that we have an international court of justice now. The Dumbarton Oaks agreement indicates that this court either may be continued or a new court of justice set up to take its place. I believe we should look at the record of the present international court of justice and realize as Canadians that under the present court a good many agreements, decisions and even treaties have been made or interpreted. It seems to me the Canadian delegation should endeavour to maintain the present international court of justice, for to wipe it out and establish a new one may involve the setting aside of agreements, treaties and so on which are related to the present court. I am not an international lawyer, and that may be a wrong interpretation, but I think consideration should be given to that aspect of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals which provide for either the continuation of the present court or the establishment of a new one.

As I say, the point is that progressive peoples everywhere ought to endeavour to secure a code of law for mankind that will be as applicable to behaviour among nations as it is to behaviour among individuals in our communities. So believing all this, I can say that we regard the steps that have been taken at Cairo, at Moscow, at Teheran, at Dumbarton Oaks and at Yalta towards mutual understanding as steps in the right direction. Thus Canada should be prepared to play its appropriate part in an international organization or any international organizations that may be set up as a result of the San Francisco conference and similar conferences in future, to the establishment of which this parliament subsequently agrees. In short, then, we believe that a workable arrangement for the maintenance of peace and to lay the foundations of world-wide social and economic justice can be achieved at San Francisco. In our opinion it will be the duty of the Canadian delegation to obtain the best arrangement possible. Let me repeat that. It will be the duty of the Canadian delegation to obtain the best arrangement possible and then for our parliament and our people to support it even if it does not go all the way we should go, or does not do all that we would desire. I venture to say that the San Francisco conference will in no instance meet the desires of every or any of the delegates attending it. Canada ought to be prepared to press for improvements in the Dumbarton Oaks Agreement, and, having done that, to join with the other peace-loving nations of the earth in establishing the most effective peace system obtainable at this time, in the hope that as the years roll by we may be able to secure a better and a more effective plan to provide economic and social security, freedom from fear, from want and from war, for all mankind.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, in rising to discuss a matter which concerns the peace of the world, and the opening of a new chapter in that world, I do so conscious of some of the impressionable experiences I have had within less than a month when it was my privilege to visit the United Kingdom, and also to see our troops in Holland, Belgium and France.

One point I would emphasize to-day is this: Not only the character of Canada as a nation among the nations of the world, but the tremendous debt we owe our young men from all parts of the country, young men who have given their lives, who are giving their lives and who are prepared to give their lives for decency and civilization, demand that we in this and other parliaments, take two steps. The first is that in the prosecution of the war, now nearing the first phase of its end, steps shall be taken to bring to their proper retribution those individuals and groups who have brought upon the world the fantastic experience through which we have gone during the last five and a half years. The second step is that there shall be created in the individual countries social and economic security, and all that that implies. But this is not possible unless the kind of thing we are discussing to-day—the means by which we shall minimize the causes of war and the means by which we shall provide international order—is made effective. Unless these things are done we cannot provide this security. And so, as I think of the young men who within the last month I saw plugging through the mud of Holland and the mud of France, I say that unless we can satisfactorily arrive at some understanding between the great powers, and between the middle and smaller nations, we shall not have repaid that tremendous debt—that unbelievable debt, one which I never would have believed without the experience I have had during the past two months—to the men in our armed forces who have conducted the prosecution of the war.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), as head of the government of Canada in 1943, was among the first of the heads of governments in the united nations to welcome the formation of a General International Organization. This is the first parliament in the free world to discuss, in the solemn form we are doing to-day, the proposals made at Dumbarton Oaks.

It would seem that the approach of the government in this matter is toward a policy which would include the most cooperative of relations between Canada and the nations of the world. It is one which does not disturb existing affiliations in the Commonwealth, or with our great neighbor, but one which seems to extend these relations into yet broader fields. One need spend little time in impressing on the country and on ourselves the need for order among the nations, the need of some organization by which we shall perhaps not stop war but through which we shall certainly guarantee the peace more effectively than we have done in the past two decades. As the Prime Minister said, we made a valiant effort, but we failed in that effort. We failed, as he suggested, not only because the league lacked universality, but because we failed to recognize that you cannot have responsibility without power. There is no point in having a perfect paper organization which, when it comes to securing the peace and enforcing peace, simply will not work unless there are certain necessary conditions present.

It seems to me, then, that five principles should underlie the world security organization contemplated at Dumbarton Oaks, and which will be discussed at San Francisco. These are:

1. The world security organization must be fully equipped with necessary military force to meet its objective.

2. To bring this about there must be the closest political and military cooperation between the British Commonwealth, the United States, the Soviet Union, China and the other free nations of the world.

3. The responsibility in any future world organization should be constructed on and around the four great powers mentioned, and the other peace-loving states should play their part in the structure in a manner proportionate to their ability to contribute.

4. The world security organization should be flexible enough to permit growth by practice and experience. It should not be straitjacketed either by rigid code or rule.

5. All nations—great, middle, and small—included in the world security organization, should aim at economic and political collaboration.

These are the underlying principles which I suggest should be in the minds of the delegation from Canada when it goes to San Francisco. Certainly this is one of the most vital questions this parliament has had to face. The proposal at Dumbarton Oaks was that there would be a world security council, an assembly, and an economic and social council, under which will be organizations to deal with functional matters. We must not overlook the fact that the essential characteristics of the structure of the league of nations are being maintained. What is being done is to place emphasis on the successful operation of the means by which force shall be employed to maintain peace. This is done by incorporating the principle of the concert of nations, the principle of a strong power bloc, if you will, within the framework of the world security council.

At first I found it difficult to reconcile the acceptance of this proposal with the convictions I have expressed in this house for many years. But while one must bear in mind what ought to be done, the fact is that in this very difficult world one must consider what can be done. The league failed because Russia earlier, and the United States throughout the league's existence, were not members. The peace of the world can not be maintained unless the great powers, those which have the greatest armed and economic force, are prepared to use these weapons. The mechanism proposed in the motion is designed to call upon these nations to use force on occasions of serious and unwarranted aggression.

A country like Canada, one of the leading middle nations, a country that has contributed billions of dollars by way of mutual aid, a country that has enlisted less than a million men, a country that has made a contribution which has won the tributes of the world, cannot in its own interests avoid careful scrutiny of the present provisions in the security council. One recognizes the position of the great powers, but if one is prepared to make a distinction between the great powers and the middle powers, should a distinction not be made between some of the middle powers and some of the lesser powers?

I recognize the difficulty of grading the potential contributing power of the middle and smaller nations, but having in mind that if aggression should occur again the middle nations will be called upon to contribute sanctions, it should not be forgotten that this means the employment of their resources, both economic and human. Therefore we cannot dismiss this question as one of mere academic interest.

It may be, and I offer this only as a suggestion, that upon the application of the principle of functional representation, a principle of which the Prime Minister is the author, a principle that has been recognized in all the functional bodies established since the war, some means may be provided by which a country like Canada or a country like Belgium may be afforded the opportunity of having its interests protected.

This method of functional representation can be exemplified by citing the instance of Norway. Norway could hardly expect to hold on the security council the same position, in terms of the employment of military and economic force, as a country like Canada. But Norway would certainly want to have an important place in any body that dealt with shipping. I think this is a good example of the application of functional representation on the security council which might be applied to the middle powers.

There is another suggestion that might be made. Some arrangements might be made for temporary membership in a given instance covering matters which would involve the ultimate use by a country like Canada of its resources, both economic and human.

Then a point that I think we must keep in mind is this: We must recognize the fact that we have to reconcile membership in this international organization with the means by which it is to be made effective. The position of the assembly being merely that of a place to exchange views, being merely a decorative body, would I think be psychologically disturbing, not only to the smaller and the middle nations but to the people of the world.

While one would not suggest weakening the power of the security council as a security agency in terms of punitive and restraining action, in terms of sanctions, it surely should be possible to extend the scope of the assembly, as has just been suggested by the previous speaker.

The proposal is now made that in the case of the council, where it is recognized that there will sometimes be the necessity of quick or almost automatic action, members of the united nations or of the world security organization, who are not members of the council, either in a permanent or in a non-permanent capacity, should be given an opportunity to express by a two-thirds vote approval or disapproval of the action taken by the security council. In the event of a two-thirds vote being recorded the matter would become binding on all members of the assembly.

We must recognize the inevitable. We are living in a disturbed world, a world of unbelievably difficult problems. It is not a world as easy as the world that faced Wilson and Smuts in 1918 and 1919. The fact is, as President Roosevelt said in his message to congress in January of this year:

[Mr. Martin.]

We can deny that power is a factor . . . but in a democratic world, as in a democratic nation, power must be linked with responsibility and obliged to defend and justify itself within the framework of the general good.

I recognize the weakness of the league of nations. I recognize the anaemic character of responsibility without power, but I must say that power without responsibility is just as mischievous. What we have to do is to try to reconcile these two facts in our efforts to set up an organization that not only will work but that will prove acceptable to those powers without whom it cannot work.

The fact is that if we are going to justify the tremendous sacrifices made by our fighting men we have to take steps this time to see that Germany and Japan are never allowed again to raise their heads in aggression. If that is to be done, the only way it can be done is by recognizing where power lies. That power for the moment lies in three great nations, or possibly in another nation, which I include for certain fairly obvious reasons.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MARTIN: Before the adjournment I concluded by saying that one had to recognize that if the world security organization now under discussion was to be operative, we must realize also that power without responsibility, which characterized the failure of the league, would also characterize the failure of this organization; that what we had to have was not only responsibility but the power to enforce decisions arising out of that responsibility. Senator Ball of the United States, who has given this matter a good deal of thought, and has been outspoken in his views, supporting however the general thesis, has given expression to what I think we all really have in our minds. We are faced with the inevitable obligation of making sure that the sixty nations of the world which it is hoped will ultimately come into this world security organization, will not be thwarted, but will have an opportunity of playing their full part in the developing character of the organization. While we recognize that the great powers on the security council must have powers without which the full force of their military and economic strength could not be enlisted, we shall all want to make sure that that does not mean an unwarranted use of power or an arbitrary use of power, because that would be contrary to the fundamental political beliefs which all parties in this house share and one of the things for which the present war is being fought. Canada, as a middle power, must be assured that it can bring its case before the world assembly or world council. We must be assured that settlement by the greater powers will not be made arbitrarily at our expense. If the situation were otherwise we would find that the pattern which we have in mind would differ only in degree from the kind of regime which the axis have sought to impose in Europe.

Mention was made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggarr (Mr. Coldwell) of the several functional organizations. He referred to the health organization, to the economic organization, to the international labour office—about which I will want to have something to say—and to the world court. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggarr has suggested that we should not change the present set-up of the world court. The world court still continues to function even though it is not an active body at the moment. The statute is still operative; the treaties under which it came into being are still in existence. But I would point out to the hon. member that a very strong case can be made out—and I trust the Canadian government will take this view—for proceeding to establish a new court, preserving by way of continuity many of the features of the present court, but under a new statute which would incorporate the best features of the present statute and avoid its obsolete provisions. It must not be forgotten, having in mind that the fact all the countries of the world will not be at the conference in San Francisco, that we would outlaw participation in the world court by many nations if we were to proceed on the basis of the present statute. What I suggest is that a new statute should come into being, and new treaties should be executed to preserve decisions and actions already taken on the basis of the old treaties. We might link the new statute with the old statute, preserving as I say the features in the old statute which commend themselves to our judgment.

It must be remembered that the league of nations will come to an end once the treaty resulting from San Francisco is concluded. That means that judges of the present court will cease to be. It means also that when that happens there will be no financial support for the operations of the old court. Consequently, to proceed on the basis which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggarr suggested, would, I think, in the light of the circumstances I have pointed out, render wholly inoperative the functioning of that court. The existing jurisdiction of the court over a large number of treaties, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggarr mentioned, will cease once the league of nations as a body ceases to exist under the old treaties of peace. Consequently, if we are to have the advantages of several existing treaties, we must make sure that steps are taken to preserve their existence. That can be done only by treating the matter as though it had never arisen, creating a new body, and preserving desirable old features.

Questions will arise as to what kind of disputes are to go before the court. Are they to be merely justiciable disputes? Are they to be disputes which involve political matters as well as legal questions? It will be remembered that under the advisory opinion power of the old court it could deal not only with legal matters but in some cases with matters involving high political policy.

There is one matter which I think I am striking new ground in covering, and that is the relationship of the international labour office to the new general international organization. I am grateful to the government, grateful to my own minister in proposing to the government that I should represent this country and this government at the recent meeting of the governing body of the international labour organization in London. That was an opportunity for me and an experience for which, as I say, I am extremely grateful. The house may recall that I was a member of the government delegation at the plenary conference of the international labour organization in Philadelphia. I was honoured—if I may say so, or perhaps Canada was honoured, in my election as chairman of the continuing committee of the international labour organization to study the relationships between that body and the world security organization. I have on this account special competence in this one particular, if in no other, to say something which I know is in the minds of the workers and of the employers and of the governments of the world who were represented at the conference in London. The international labour office is in one sense a functional organization, functional in the sense that the agricultural and economic organizations are, but I think it is more than that. I believe that the international labour organization, the only organization of its kind on an international level, representing not only governments but workers and employers, should have a special place in relation to the general organization which is to be set up. The international labour organization is not spectacular; it is not one which readily wins acclaim in the headlines of the newspapers.

But I doubt if any international organization in the world has the record of achievement that this body has.

When one remembers that in 1919 there were but ten million workers in the world who in some way or another came under the benefits of social security legislation; when one realizes that to-day over three hundred million people in the world have the advantage of social security legislation in one form or another, on the models laid down and suggested by the international labour office, one recognizes the tremendous achievement of the organization. I say with knowledge, because I did associate with the workers of the world recently in London and I know what their convictions are in this matter, that they will look very suspiciously, they will look very carefully at any attempt to delimit the scope and the status of the international labour organization. They will be greatly concerned over any attempt to curb its power or interfere with its tripartite basis.

Consequently, I am happy to be able to say to-day that, on the instructions of this government, I joined with the Minister of Labour in Britain, the Right Hon. Ernest Bevin, in saying before that body that this government was determined to give the international labour office, in relation to the organization contemplated at Dumbarton Oaks, the highest place possible. I suggest—I do not do so dogmatically but respectfully—that when the delegation comes to consider this matter it should consider carefully the wisdom of having the international labour office's future predicated upon a relationship to a body on which the workers and employers of the world are not represented. The proposal as outlined to-day is that by agreement the future relationship of the international labour office and the world security organization should be determined with the social and economic council. That is a body wholly made up of governments on which the workers of the world will have no representative at all, and I should think that this would be a serious violation of the tripartite principle of the international labour office. The international labour office should be given access, not to the social and economic council, but to the assembly of the world security organization. For ultimately, of course, the international labour office must be subservient to the world security organization; but let it be subservient to a body that represents the ultimate power of governments and not to a body that has merely delegated power and one on which the workers and employers have no representative.

[Mr. Martin.]

My final suggestion about the international labour office is this. At Philadelphia, governments, workers and employers agreed that there should be appointed a negotiating delegation to meet with the governments at Dumbarton Oaks, and as that did not materialize, the governments at San Francisco should determine by agreement with the negotiating delegation the future character of the international labour organization and its relation to the general world organization. I am happier than I can say, in the light of the London discussions, that the government, which I represented, instructed me to take the position that the international labour organization, with its great achievements, its great record, with its representation of workers and employers as well as of governments, should be allowed to continue in the great achievements which throughout its history since the end of the last war it has effected.

As I said at the outset, at first I did, in the light of convictions which I carried for a long time, in common with many other members of this house, including the head of the government, take a doubtful view about the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. Here, at first I was inclined to think, is a makeshift arrangement, a resort to a concert of power arrangement by which throughout history wars have been encouraged if not provoked. But one has to recognize the realities of the moment, and there is no chance of preserving peace if the United States, Great Britain and the Soviet Union cannot act in unison in the days of peace as they have done in the days of war. That is clear, and in answer to Mr. Welles, the former Under-Secretary of State in the United States, I do not think that we are betraying the principles underlying the covenant. I do not think that we are betraying the Wilsonian principles of the rule of law and the settlement of disputes by pacific means through the agency of law and conference. What we have done is to say, "Here is the best we can do at the moment." And, as the President of the United States said, by experiment, given time, we shall improve the organization until ultimately perhaps, if for no other reason than the very nature of our contracting world, the kind of ideal organization many of us want will come about.

I conclude where I began. I cannot say what a tremendous impression it left upon me to come face to face for the first time in an easy way with men from this country and from other countries who, in the mud of Holland, the dirt of France, the debris of Belgium, and in that fortress island that has withstood the onslaught of our enemy for six years—I could not face all that, I say, without feeling that we are dealing to-night, not with an academic question but with the most important subject that faces the world to-day—full employment, social security, and all those things that we hope to bring about but which cannot be achieved if peace cannot be maintained in the world. That, surely, is basic.

I think of the men in our armies whom I met in canteens and in their training camps not far from the battlegrounds, and I say to you, Mr. Speaker, with the utmost sincerity, that they have altered my perspective. I said to myself, "There is Canada. These men have given us something that we should emulate. Our petty squabbles should be put into the categories where they belong and, like these men, we at home should present a common front of unity and a common purpose." All our sectional differences, our differences between race and race, between religion and religion, between economic interests in the country are unreal in the face of what these men are doing. I went to see the last resting place of some of my friends of another day, two miles from Dieppe lying under the green grass of France and for eternity. Though dead, they are living symbols of what a country can do. I could give their names. They were men from my own city, men of Anglo Saxon origin, French Canadians, and new Canadians, Scottish and Irish. That is Canada; and in the discussion of problems in this house, particularly in this matter, I think we have to realize that anyone who raises the cry of intolerance is not true to the impressive sermon that lies in that little cemetery of France.

If we are to be true to these men, we have to give all our energy and our thinking to the task of making sure that if we cannot arrest war forever we can at any rate minimize its horrible occasions and results.

General Smuts, who had much to do with the creation of the covenant of the league of nations, hoped for a brave new world. He gave expression to a sentiment that did not materialize. I should like to think that in the motion before the house, in the constructive support it has received thus far, and which I know it will continue to receive, we shall, along with the other nations of the world, taking account both of realities and of our ideal, build the strongest possible system by which we can maintain peace in the international field. If we thus bend ourselves to that task, then General Smuts could on this occasion say:

There is no doubt that mankind is once more on the move; the tents have been struck, and the great caravan of humanity is once more on the march.

Mrs. CORA T. CASSELMAN (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, these proposals drawn up at Dumbarton Oaks have been before the nations of the world in this form since last October; but the theory and principle behind them have been under discussion for a quarter of a century. Indeed, we might go back into history for three hundred years for very much earlier discussion of attempts to find a means to prevent war and to settle international difficulties by peaceable means. Many of us have made this topic one of our chief concerns in small groups and in large which I have been privileged to attend. The empire parliamentary association meeting in Ottawa two years ago considered this question indirectly. It invited congressmen from the United States, representatives of the senate and the house of representatives to come here and put their views before us. The annual conference of the institute on international affairs, the league of nations society, the great churches across Canada, have dealt extensively with this subject and have gone on record for the need of strengthening the ties of friendship and cooperation among the nations, of organizing a world community on the basis of freedom and lasting peace. Especially during these twenty years of armistice, men and women have studied the cause and cure of war. Practically every nationally organized association of women has had a committee to study international relations. Almost every local group of women has had a study group to read material, to present and discuss their views along this line. It is no new topic for us. We have had material from such sources as the league of nations society, from the commission to study the cause and cure of war, from the Carnegie endowment for international peace, from the Canadian institute of international affairs. There I mention only a few of the sources of material that dealt with the question of organizing a world community, and of dealing with other means of settling international disputes. I have been closely associated with the study groups, and I bear testimony to the earnestness with which women have followed developments. Because of that background of preparation, because of the attempts concerned with the successes and the failures of the league of nations, we are ready to examine these present proposals.

We have waited anxiously for war news for years; and just as anxiously for news of international conferences that will hold out the hope that the fruits of victory would not turn into ashes. We hold to the hope that the years and the lives that our men have spent in fighting this war will have a reward at the end of the war. Reports of the Atlantic charter, of the UNRRA conference, of Moscow, of Teheran, of Crimea were significant—doubly so when related to the profound desire of the millions that out of this victory might come a peace that would last.

I do not speak officially for women; I cannot do that. But I do know that women throughout this land will feel that a world security organization is an answer in some measure to their longing to have done with war. Victory in itself is wonderful. Even if we accomplish no more than preserving for ourselves our right and our freedom to work out our own destiny within our own borders, the war would not have been fought in vain. But with what confidence can we face the future if we have little hope that reform will endure, that progress will continue with the threat of another war hanging constantly over us? No, we want something more than a military victory. We want some guarantee that a real and a new attempt will be made to build and preserve human freedom, social justice, economic progress and political security. So it was with hope and fear that we concentrated our vision on proposals made at Dumbarton Oaks.

The wartime information board is to be congratulated on printing and distributing last fall the pamphlet dealing with their proposals to all who were interested. It is a good sign of the times. The covenant of the league was not available to the public beforehand. The proposed charter was in our hands some months before this conference was called at San Francisco. The Secretary of State of the United States, Mr. Stettinius, wrote an article which appeared in February's issue of the Reader's Digest. It was several pages long and set forth the proposals of Dumbarton Oaks. I hope that not all hon. members of this house have missed reading that article. He is to be congratulated on putting before the public in a popular way some of the proposals that will come before the conference that is to meet in San Francisco.

These proposals are not in their final and completed form. Indeed there have already been modifications of them. At the Crimea conference, for instance, the great powers answered one objection, that they were keeping too much power in their own hands, by a slight change in the method of voting in their proposed security council. After all, the success of our democratic processes is based on a system of checks and balances. If they have altered it in one way there may also be other instances in which after discussion, after negotiation, they may limit their power to some extent. But with responsibility there must be power. If the great powers have the responsibility for underwriting the peace of the world they must see to it also that it is maintained on a just basis, that the cultural integrity of the people is supported, that interference in domestic affairs is limited to the minimum consonant with the rights of the majority.

[Mrs. Casselman.]

Great powers may be bound only with their own consent. We might as well face that. There is nothing that I can see but naked force, or conscience, to bind the great powers of the world—force, war, facing perhaps a combination of powers, or conscience or reason or willingness to be bound. We, the peoples of the world, are fortunate that the most powerful nations, the United Kingdom, the United States, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and China, have expressed their willingness to assume obligations such as those set down in the purposes and the principles of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. They say they want to develop friendly relations among nations, to take broader measures to strengthen universal peace.

After the meeting in the Crimea, this statement was issued by the three leaders, Mr. Roosevelt, Mr. Churchill and Mr. Stalin:

Our meeting here in the Crimea has reaffirmed our common determination to maintain and strengthen in the peace to come that unity of purpose and of action, which has made victory possible and certain for the united nations in this war. We believe that this is a sacred obligation which our governments owe to our peoples, and to all the peoples of the world.

There is our hope that conscience will bind the great powers and the small in the fulfillment of the longing of the world to have done with war. We have said that one of the chief reasons for the inability of the league of nations to prevent war was that the United States was not a member. Here then is the promise of participation by the United States and the other great powers. We feared their isolation more than we fear their participation in world affairs. We hope for much from the methods of consultation and discussion.

These proposals are not the perfect solution for which theorists and idealists look. Neither was the magna charta, the bill of rights or the habeas corpus act. But these were living charters, and so must this be. If we have the spirit of cooperation and the desire to understand each other's viewpoint the organization will grow into a living thing, a vital wall against the agony of war, the misery of frustrated hopes and the anguish of injustice. We must understand that the relinquishment of national power goes hand in hand with the establishment of international power, that they must proceed at one and the same time, and that perhaps the growth may be slow. But do not let us stand in the way of these steps along the road to cooperation, because the instrument is not one hundred per cent perfect.

Speaking in this house in 1943 I quoted these words, which are just as true now as they were then:

To-day the problem of durable peace is being discussed from so many angles that the public is in danger of confusion. If, before we can have peace, the income of every person must be guaranteed, if every vestige of racial or social discrimination must be obliterated, if every man must adhere to rules which mortals have never learned completely to live by, then peace is indeed a complicated business, and not to be achieved short of a perfect world.

Wonders have been accomplished sometimes with instruments that have not been perfect, and this goes a long way toward answering questions which have puzzled the world for years.

Should Canada take part in the formation of a new security league I say we desire to do so, and we must. It is the supreme interest of the nation. Only by widespread co-operation can the nations set up a durable association. It will never be done by sitting back and letting others go ahead. It will never be done by speaking publicly or even officially of the peace we want. It will be done only by getting in there, talking and discussing and doing our part. Canada must play its part in the formation of an organization for the maintenance of peace, just as it is doing its part in the holocaust of war. We must, I say. Mechanical inventions have made this world small. No great city is more than sixty air hours from any other great city. Science has developed fearful weapons, and will continue to improve them. Canada is at the cross-roads among the great nations of the world. Our geographical position has been a factor in saving us from the horrors of invasion, and we have had a good neighbour. We are thankful for that, and thankful for the commonwealth of which we are a part. But even so there have been submarines in our waters. Even so during the last few years there was a threat of invasion. In another few years our geographical position may make us the battleground, the Belgium between great powers, unless those powers, through some organization such as is now suggested, decide that the things upon which they are in agreement are more important than those which divide them.

What other alternatives have we? Maintain neutrality and mind our own business? Norway did that; Holland wanted to live and let live, and what happened? Ireland was saved by her geographical position, by the British navy and by the conscience of the united nations. You may say we should make no military preparations; that we should not arm. As late as 1936 the view was asserted in this very house that we should rely for protection upon our weakness and our position as a good neighbour of the world. Did Denmark's helplessness save that country from occupation? You may say we should make treaties of non-aggression with other countries. Poland did that. Should we build an immense army? Russia did that, at the expense of almost every material comfort for her civilians. No, there seems no other hope for the world, and for Canada as part of the world, but getting together now, while the will to cooperate is strong, to set up international organizations of the free with the free, the equal with the equal, with as much justice as is capable of achievement.

Speaking in this house two years ago I gave my reasons for believing that a new attempt to build an international association would succeed, and those reasons are still valid. The league of nations did not keep peace; it had weaknesses which may be avoided now. Men learn from their mistakes as well as their successes. We are learning a second drastic lesson. Again the world is being hammered into a realization of the need of one country for the other in preserving and maintaining peace. The league of nations accomplished a tremendous amount of good work in many fields, exploratory work that provides a solid foundation for renewed effort. How far did the first airship fly? Did they give up that experiment? Supposing this should fail, for any reasons you may like to mention. Should the experiment be given up? No. If the league did nothing else but stir up thought, it justified its life. For centuries the world has known how to unite to make war. It has never known how to unite to make peace. There must be an alternative way to settle disputes if war is not to continue; so the proposed charter provides for arbitration, for conciliation, for reference to a court of international justice, all methods which depend on the desire of the disputants to avoid war, and on the good will of those who ask for arbitration.

But the charter goes farther than that. It makes it the responsibility of the security council, the representatives of the big five and six other members elected from the other nations, to see that the matter is settled without resort to arms; and back of the obligation to settle disputes by peaceful means is the power which may be wielded by the security council to take combined international enforcement action, which is a terrible and grave responsibility. In May of 1939 the league council authorized a committee to study fundamental questions of economic and social welfare, questions that are part of the causes of war. That committee met under the chairmanship of Right Hon. R. M. Bruce, high commissioner for Australia in London. In December of that year it made a report of far-reaching significance. This suggested international commission for economic and social cooperation may be an outgrowth of the work of that former committee, since it has as its purpose the promotion of respect for human rights and fundamental freedom. It would have much to do with removing the causes of war. This proposed commission is to consist of eighteen members elected by the general assembly. There is no domination by the great powers there, for the decision is to be by a simple majority of those present and voting.

There are many ways in which these suggestions show more promise than did the covenant of the league. Some of them extend former duties. There is the power of investigation, as outlined in chapter 8, section 1, as a means of forestalling war. It will be noticed also that the following clause states that any country would have that right. Any state, whether or not a member of the organization may bring any such dispute or situation to the attention of the general assembly or to the security council. The enforcement action provided under section B of chapter VIII goes a step beyond that of the former league, placing responsibility upon the great powers and the security council. There will be close scrutiny of these proposals, with the middle powers, of which Canada is one, no doubt making suggestions. I am glad to see that paragraph 3 of chapter X gives the secretary-general the right to bring to the attention of the security council any matter which in his opinion may threaten international peace and security.

I have not sufficient time to discuss many of these details. But, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) told us this afternoon, they will require careful study, in order that our position will be sound, and that the delegation may have in its hands the conclusions of experts and of those well versed in international affairs.

To my mind the five paragraphs in the Prime Minister's resolution merit widespread support. Canada should go to the conference after the best preparation that can be made, and after the most expert and careful scrutiny of the proposals; and we should go having in mind what we want not only for ourselves but for the other nations of the world. Canada should go with the purpose of cooperating, and of making this basis for discussion a vital document for the strengthening of world ties.

[Mrs. Casselman.]

I think the house will give unanimous consent and support to the resolution, because this is a matter which touches all of us individually and nationally. The United States has made a united stand, through both its great parties. For instance Senator Austin of the Republican party, speaking on Lincoln's birthday last month, had this to say:

Every opportunity should be employed to strengthen the faith of our chief executive that he has the moral power of this nation to support his position and give effect to his advocacy of the organization for security and peace. We advocate as a party the development of international law, including a bill of rights for men in their international relations and the establishment and use of international tribunals of justice for their administration.

Let us uphold a non-partisan stand, and unite for the establishment of an enduring peace. Let us be confident that from these small beginnings will grow a great undertaking. Hon. members will recall the words of Arthur Clough quoted by Mr. Churchill in a broadcast he made some years ago:

For while the tired waves vainly breaking Seem here no painful inch to gain,
Far back through creeks and inlets making Comes silent flooding in the main.

Very small beginnings—and these are not small beginnings—grow to things that at last may give us security and peace.

Mr. R. T. GRAHAM (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, I desire first of all to record my whole-hearted and unqualified approval of the resolution introduced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). Not only do I approve the principle contained therein, but my approval extends particularly to its wording. On this particular occasion the wording of the resolution is important because, in general terms, it indicates the instructions from the government and parliament of Canada to the delegation which will go to San Francisco to speak for the country.

You, Mr. Speaker, and other hon. members, will have noted that while in general terms the resolution approves the Dumbarton Oaks agreement as a basis for discussion, its terms are sufficiently flexible to permit of improvement, and to permit of the Canadian delegation doing all within its power to improve if possible the agreement reached at Dumbarton Oaks. Then, finally, in recognition of the fact that Canada is a democracy, and that no agreement reached at San Francisco could in the long run be efficacious or useful unless it had behind it public opinion in Canada, the resolution provides that before the charter adopted at San Francisco can be binding upon or accepted by Canada, the Canadian parliament will have an opportunity to discuss the complete proposal, and to pass judgment thereon. So, as I say, I am particularly pleased with the way in which the resolution appears before the house, in respect of both its subject matter and its wording.

There are some issues which in their very nature transcend party lines, or which do not develop that cleavage of opinion which generally divides the different parties and groups in the house. Surely if there ever was an issue before the House of Commons worthy of the united support of all hon. members it is the one now before us. The history of Canada in the present generation must make clear to all of us the fact that there is one issue on which we should stand united, namely that of preventing if possible a recurrence of war and the sacrifice and suffering that follows in its wake. Canada cannot stand aside from seeking a solution to this age-old problem.

As hon. members know, this country is as peace-loving as could be imagined. In my lifetime I have not known of any responsible leader of any political party in Canada, or any other person prominent in our public life, showing any desire to embroil Canada needlessly in a war. So I say the people of Canada are whole-heartedly behind anything that may bring hope of permanent peace and security to a world in which Canada forms a small but very important part.

I join in the hope already expressed in this debate that we will find that degree of unity in the House of Commons, in the editorial pages of our press, over the radio and in the hearts and minds of our people which may in its turn enable the delegation from Canada to promote unity among the nations of the world in the setting up of this organization, which holds out such high hopes to the whole of the human race.

In this connection I think it proper to call to the attention of hon. members an expression used in May of last year by the Prime Minister upon his return from the conference of prime ministers in London. On that occasion the house paid him a well-deserved tribute of friendship, and in replying he said that if the speech he made in London had any value it was because he recognized that the things that unite us are so much greater than the things that divide us. That is what prompted him to make the appeal, not only to the members of the British commonwealth but to the nations of the world, for support of those principles that will lead us to a better world, a world in which there would be some hope of permanent peace.

I am not sure that all of us recognize the immensity of the task we have embarked upon. There are those who, with some justification, do not believe that there is any hope of setting up an organization that will be able to outlaw war. If one were a pessimist he would have to agree that the history of mankind, particularly the history of our own day and age, would justify that attitude. I do not class the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) as being one of these, yet he gave to-day an indication of a line of thought that is understandable when he suggested that the position of the world depends, not upon the contribution that Canada and the smaller countries can make, but upon the good will and the purposes of the three great powers, the United States, Russia and Great Britain. We must however rise above these fears and set ourselves to the task, no matter how great the difficulties.

From our viewpoint, if perhaps not from the viewpoint of others, one of the cornerstones of any such organization must be a sufficient degree of unity, a great degree if you will, between the two great English speaking democracies, our mother country, Great Britain, and our neighbour to the south, the United States. Canada has done and can do much to cement their friendship and cooperation. These countries are joined together by a common language, a common political philosophy, by aims and objectives which are the same because of their history; and yet if one considers the aftermath of earlier wars he finds that even those two great democracies, if they so desired, could find issues upon which to divide or which would create sufficient dissension to make it impossible for them to cooperate in a world security organization. To illustrate, I need only direct your attention to the position in the Pacific and the trade rivalries that of necessity exist between those two great countries. If it is difficult for those countries, and our country, to find a unity of purpose sufficient to bind them together as united nations, when one thinks of other nations not so bound together by ties of language and of common philosophies it is easy to be overwhelmed by the difficulties of the task that lies ahead. Again I say we must look upon these difficulties as but a challenge to overcome them.

The third great power of to-day, Russia, is just as important in the final outcome of the setting up of this organization. Unity between Great Britain, the United States and Russia is of course one of the true keystones of any organization that may be set up. Russia has emerged from a great revolution which occurred some twenty-five or more years ago. She has been engaged in the tremendous task of consolidating her position as a world power and of developing the economic life of a great self-sustaining empire. We know that if the united nations organization is to be fruitful in its results it must be established on an appreciation of the things that unite these three great powers, the United States, Great Britain and Russia and not upon the things that might possibly divide them.

San Francisco Conference

Let me read a statement made by Sir Norman Angell which I think illustrates what I have in mind. Referring to the place of Russia and our relationship to Russia, he says:

The issue this time will not depend so much on guarantees to France as to Russia. For obvious geographical and military reasons, Russia will have the last word concerning future treatment of Germany. Again the same point arises: the outcome will depend, not so much upon whether we can trust Russia, as upon whether Russia can be brought to trust us, to trust that we of the "capitalist west" will not combine against her "in defence of capitalism," and that we will, if she is attacked, come to her aid just as twice within a quarter of a century we went to the aid of France.

We should be realistic in our approach to the task that lies ahead. We must approach this problem so that we shall be able to count on that degree of cooperation between all the powers that will be necessary to make a success of any organization we may hope to set up in San Francisco.

I need not recall the other difficulties, such as the Polish question, and the place that France will understandably seek to gain in this world. One could go over the continents of this earth and in each he will find problems that require the utmost degree of tolerance, the utmost of understanding, the utmost of friendly help if solutions are to be found for the problems that exist, and if the causes of war are to be removed so that this new organization may have some possibility of success.

The history of Canada is to no little degree a lesson in the wisdom of tolerance and understanding. I hope the Canadian representatives at San Francisco will have in mind some of the lessons that we have gained throughout our history. I recall the brief session of this house last November. The issue then before the house was one that excited, not only a great deal of controversy but considerable heat in some portions of the house. After everything that could be said seemed to have been said, the debate still continued. I remember a friend of mine coming to sit beside me. He asked me if I did not think it was an imposition that the members had to listen to the hon. member who was then speaking, and who insisted on making his contribution to that particular debate. While I would have liked the house to get through its business and permit us to go home, I said to him: "Instead of complaining we Canadians should be thankful indeed that we have in this House of Commons an institution that permits us to settle our disputes, and any crisis which may arise in the nation's history, in the manner in which we met that particular crisis, if you care to call it that. How blessed are we that, instead of bullets and armed revolutions and unexpected clashes of armed forces, we have found in our democratic institutions a safety valve of expression which permits our people through their elected representatives to speak their minds, to claim the opportunity to present the viewpoints of their constituents in this House of Commons, and after what is on some occasions a lengthy debate, to accept as a nation the verdict of the majority." So as I say, in Canada's history surely we have learned some lessons which those whose duty it will be to represent Canada not only in the San Francisco conference but in the subsequent organization, may bring to that organization and help to build up and strengthen it in the work it proposes to do.

[Mr. Graham.]

Still more so is this true of the British commonwealth of nations. I recall the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the speech which he made in London last year, when, addressing both houses and referring to Britain and the commonwealth, he used these words:

So long as Britain continues to maintain the spirit of freedom, and to defend the freedom of other nations, she need never doubt her pre-eminence throughout the world. So long as we all share that spirit we need never fear for the strength or unity of the commonwealth. The voluntary decisions by Britain, by Canada, by Australia, by New Zealand, and by South Africa are a supreme evidence of the unifying force of freedom.

The British commonwealth of nations is of course the earliest league of nations, if you care to call it such, of which the world has record, and in its over-all results, I think all of us must agree, its success has made, time and time and time again, a great contribution to the freedom of all nations, not only those that are partners in the commonwealth. When I think of the British commonwealth I always have in mind some of the examples which are afforded by the history of this group. One is the history of Ireland, particularly southern Ireland; the other is the history of the Union of South Africa. I believe that it is a great tribute to the reality of the freedom permitted by the British commonwealth that the Irish Free State has exercised its right as an autonomous state to stay out of this war. I disagree with its decision but I recognize the historical value of its right to make that decision. On the other hand the Union of South Africa is fighting by the side of Canada and other component parts of this great commonwealth in the war in which we are now engaged. In considering these contrasted situations, one must first trace the history of the relationship between Great Britain and Ireland, the long period of disunity, occasionally of repression, of frequent application of the special crimes act, and of attempts to enforce upon Ireland certain decisions of the central power; and note the results of that policy. Think on the other hand of the result of Britain's wisdom, immediately upon the conclusion of the South African war, in giving to the Boers complete freedom to govern themselves within the framework of the British commonwealth. When I see the dividends which that policy of tolerance and generosity has paid in the results which have flowed from it, I say that the commonwealth of nations has set an example to the united nations which they may well respect and follow, and from which they can draw useful lessons.

In reflecting upon Canada's war effort, the magnitude and amazing success of which in its contribution to the common cause is generally recognized, I am struck by the advantages we have reaped by profiting by the mistakes which were made in the last war and in the period which followed that war. In the setting up of an organization to preserve international peace and security, I believe we would be wise, as most of the speakers have indicated, to study the experiences of the past and observe why the efforts which were made after the last war were not as successful as it was hoped they would be. Some of those errors are quite apparent. One was that the task was not undertaken until the completion of the war. Over sixty nations gathered at Versailles without the unifying influence of a common war effort and attempted to find by discussion there a basis of peace and of the establishment of a league of nations. Looking back, one is not in the least surprised that in the atmosphere of selfishness, hatred and bitterness engendered by the war, the human beings who led the conference at that time found it impossible to establish a successful institution. I am delighted that in our day we have shown wisdom in not waiting until the end of the war to sow seeds which in time may grow into a strong and vigorous organization to preserve the peace of the world. I think too that we have gained greatly from the conversations which have taken place between the heads of states and from the various conferences which have led up to the one which is to take place in San Francisco.

Another mistake which was made in 1919 was in tying the league of nations covenant to the peace treaties, which were signed as it were under duress by enemy nations. One of the wisest things that those who took part in the Dumbarton Oaks conference did was to separate completely from the work of the united nations organization the task of dictating or enforcing peace terms between the belligerents in this war. It will give that organization the opportunity to stay apart from the inevitable dissatisfaction which will result from those peace treaties, signed under duress, as necessity dictates, with all the implications of continued occupation and control which they must contain. So I am greatly encouraged, as I say, that in these conferences, seeking to eliminate a good many of the things which might divide the larger conference, we have already taken many steps towards ensuring the success of the San Francisco conference. You will recall that as early as May, 1943, at Hot Springs in Virginia, a conference was called to consider and make recommendations with regard to food and agriculture. Then at Atlantic City a little later there was another conference to deal with relief and rehabilitation; then at Bretton Woods a conference to deal with monetary and financial matters, and finally the conference held at Dumbarton Oaks to consider the setting up of the framework of an organization to preserve international peace and security. It is true that the organizations dealing with these specific matters are functional in their character, as has been said; but it is hoped, as indicated by the suggestions for a charter contained in the Dumbarton Oaks agreement, that finally the assembly of the united nations will undertake the task of correlating the activities of these different economic and socially-minded groups.

I think, too, that the great powers who took part in the Dumbarton Oaks conference, in the long run, did the cause which they seek to serve a great service by not being too specific in the setting up of the proposed organization. I was pleased this afternoon to hear the Prime Minister suggest that it might be wise to provide in the charter for a future meeting, say in five or ten years' time, in which, in the light of the atmosphere of that day, such changes could be made in the organization as were found to be necessary.

Let us be certain of this, that at the conclusion of a war that has so devastated the world as the present one has done, the people of the world, even the statesmen of the world, since they are human, are hardly in a frame of mind conducive to the founding of an organization that hopes to perform the great service to mankind that this united nations organization, it is hoped, will render. So that we must of necessity cast our minds some years ahead; and, thinking in terms of that future, I believe it would be wise to give to the San Francisco conference the right to include in the charter some provision whereby the united nations will recognize the necessity of perhaps periodically reviewing the set-up and making such changes as will render it more workable and better able to fit into the framework of the worlds needs.

One of the arguments raised against the proposed plan, and it is a most natural one, is the fear that the three or four or five great powers may constitute a threat to the freedom and liberty of the smaller nations. However, like other speakers who have preceded me, I do not believe that the success or failure of the new organization will depend on the authority that is given to the members of the security council. I think we must recognize that power rests somewhere in this world, and at the moment, being realistic, we must know that the combination of the power of the United States, Russia, and Great Britain constitutes that military strength either to enforce peace or to cause another war. It is the use and direction of that power that we are concerned with, and when we must impose upon the countries possessing that military strength and power a responsibility, it seems to me to follow that we must of necessity recognize the responsibility they assume; and certainly in the earlier days of this organization we must give them the safeguards that will permit them to work without too much fear of accepting that responsibility.

I am certain that this united nations organization will not fail because we have given the great powers too much authority. It will fail if, in the development of that organization, we do not win, along with the responsibilities that should go with it, the good will and understanding of all those great powers. The alternative of course—you and I know it—is that if we do not succeed in that purpose the great power that might disagree with the attitude of the united nations could walk out; and then of course we would have a repetition of the history of the past, and that power will inevitably attempt to gather about it—Germany perhaps, Japan perhaps, or some other nation—the countries that are discontented with their lot in life. And then we shall find in truth two great groups of powers again facing one another with opposite purposes and different objectives.

[Mr. Graham.]

That is the situation that inevitably leads to the outbreak of war. It seems to me therefore that Canada need not fear the authority that is given to the powers who must accept the chief share of the responsibility of preserving peace, because when we persuade them to join with the smaller powers in forming the united organization, if we succeed in convincing them that it is to the interest of each to continue to be a member of that united nations organization and make the contribution which each can, then I think there will be hope that the new organization will succeed where in that regard at least the league of nations failed.

Personally I believe that there was never in the world's history such an opportunity for gaining that measure of cooperation between the great powers as exists to-day. When we view the attitude of the people of the United States after the last war and view the attitude of the people and of the government of that great nation to-day; when we see Russia, great as it is in military strength, committed to the task of developing its own country's resources, I am convinced that the three powers, Great Britain, the United States, and Russia, have a common objective, namely, in their own interests to preserve peace. Relying upon that, I am not at all concerned at giving them a certain measure of authority in dictating the important decisions of the security council. I would ask the members of the house to consider this. We cannot hope to impose upon another country our political philosophy. We must take those countries as they are and seek to find a common purpose in pursuit of a common objective and somehow make them work to that objective and with that purpose in view.

President Wilson's remark that we fought in the first war to make the world safe for democracy is, I am afraid, not a correct statement of the position that we are in to-day. I think it would be more correctly put if we said that we are fighting to preserve for ourselves and others who believe in democracy, and who are capable of being governed by such a philosophy, the right to be so governed. But, I think every nation must accept within the framework of the united nations organization the principle that every country has the right to govern itself as it thinks best in its own interest.

I noticed that the hon. member for Rose-town-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) spent some time dealing with the very important subject of trade policy. With his statements, of course, I am in full agreement; but I would suggest that it is not likely that even that particular subject will be a matter for discussion at San Francisco; that it, like the other matters coming under the economic and social council of the proposed organization, will have to await the agreements between the nations and the submission of these to this parliament in due course. I think that this House of Commons and our delegates should confine themselves to the primary and paramount objective of setting up an organization that will hold out the hope to this world of the maintenance of international peace and security. I believe that if we keep that one objective in mind, bend all our unity, devote all our efforts to doing what we can to further that objective, we shall be doing what our Canadian people would have us do at San Francisco.

Sometimes it has been said that Great Britain in its hour of need always finds a great leader. Without introducing any party note into this discussion, but speaking more as a Canadian than as a member of the Liberal party, I say that Canada is indeed fortunate in sending a delegation to San Francisco which will be headed by a man of the character, experience and capacity of the present Prime Minister. I do not believe that any leader of any opposition group in this house would care to disagree with me in that. If ever a nation and if ever we as individual members of this House of Commons had an opportunity to contribute something of a worthwhile nature to the cause of world peace then surely that moment is now. In sending a delegation to San Francisco, headed by a man whose friendship with the United States and with the other members of the British commonwealth of nations is such that it will give him a position of great influence, we are doing something that I think will pay large dividends not only to Canada but to the cause of peace. I am extremely grateful that Providence has placed us in that position and given us that leadership.

Mr. GASPARD FAUTEUX (St. Mary) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, as has already been announced, in a few weeks there will be held in San Francisco a conference where representatives of great powers, who have brought about the victory which we hope will soon come, will become the architects whose task it will be to prepare plans and specifications and who will have to give us to-morrow that better world which has been promised for quite a long time. Only a few years ago, when the Germans overran Europe and conquered France, Belgium, Holland, Luxembourg and the Baltic States, the leaders of those great nations succeeded in marshalling the military strength and in organizing the production of their countries in a way that enabled us to withstand the onslaught of a seemingly invulnerable enemy and reconquer the countries we had lost. Those same leaders will soon meet in San Francisco in order to work out, as I said a moment ago, plans and specifications that will ensure us, as we hope, a better world to live in after the war.

It is obvious that the citizens of European countries, which have been overrun twice within a period of twenty years, that those families who have lost fathers or mothers, sons or daughters, not to mention their worldly possessions, their farms, trades and industries, will turn their thoughts and cast their eyes in the direction of San Francisco in the hope that from that conference will emerge a formula of peace and future happiness.

The conference will hear various proposals in connection with the establishment of an international organization having the following aims:

- (1) To maintain international peace and security; and to that end to take effective collective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to the peace and the suppression of acts of aggression or other breaches of the peace, and to bring about by peaceful means adjustment or settlement of international disputes which may lead to a breach of the peace;
- (2) To develop friendly relations among nations and to take other appropriate measures to strengthen universal peace;
- (3) To achieve international cooperation in the solution of international economic, social and other humanitarian problems; and
- (4) To afford a centre for harmonizing the actions of nations in the achievement of these common ends.

I repeat the third paragraph:

To achieve international cooperation in the solution of international economic, social and other humanitarian problems.

Mr. Chairman, at the outbreak of war, one thing has been a surprise to many and has provoked a number of questions. How is it, it was often asked, that our government or so many countries can find so much money for war purposes when, immediately before, there were no funds available to provide jobs. Overnight, war having been declared, countless billions were readily on hand for waging war. The answer was as follows: When a country is at war, people are easily incited to make sacrifices, to assume heavy tax burdens for defence and military activities. Would not our people or the peoples who have suffered this infernal war for five years, be willing to make the same sacrifices to maintain peace? Among the plans and specifications which the united nations conference to be held at San Francisco will consider, many will concern the best ways to ensure world peace, to prevent war among nations. Numerous measures will be investigated to establish an organization entrusted with the task of ensuring security and applying penalties on any nation guilty of aggression. Care will also be taken, unless I delude myself on the nature of the work to be undertaken in San Francisco, to organize the economical life of the various countries so that they will be satisfied without having to covet the property of their neighbours. Such a result, I believe, is feasible. The united nations, it seems to me, could ensure through their organization a sound economy for all the nations.

Everyone will admit, I think, that Canada has done wonders in controlling her economy since the beginning of the war. It is true that numerous restrictions and controls have been imposed, and that the heavy taxes which our people have had to pay have entailed sacrifices on their part.

But, on the other hand, if it has been found possible to develop our production to the point where our soldiers have been supplied with everything they needed to wage war, never before have we been so prosperous and have we seen so much money being spent. If it is possible to so adjust the economy of a country in war time in order to attain full production, to provide employment for all our workers, to allow our farmers to achieve maximum production, then the same thing could be done in peace time if the same men who go to San Francisco, and who have so well succeeded in organizing the economy of their own country, endeavour to organize the economy of the world at large.

Indeed, not only have the countries which have united to wage war been asked to produce to the limit of their capacity, but international pools have been organized in order to provide each of the united nations with the raw materials and other supplies needed to prosecute the war.

As it had been realized that some of the united nations were short of certain products while others had surpluses, offices were set up in Washington, which are called "combined boards" in order to supply each country with the necessary foodstuffs. Those countries which had an over supply could not dispose of them without authority from the Combined Food Board, at Washington, on which there were representatives of the united nations, and from Canada.

There is also an office for the control of machinery and tools and all that is needed in industry to help those countries where shortages or oversupplies exist.

Why could not such controls continue after the war in order to provide work and food and ensure the comfort of the population of the various countries? You will recall that a few years ago—and it is unthinkable that such a situation could be allowed to prevail in a civilized world—wheat growers of Western Canada did not know what to do with their grain while, on the other hand, in other countries, such as China for instance, thousands and millions of people were starving to death. Likewise, a few years ago the United States government paid bonuses to farmers to kill their hogs in order to prevent over-production while in other countries starvation was rampant.

Often enough people are asking themselves, and rightly so, especially in urban centres, in cities like the one in which I live—Montreal—what will become to-morrow of the numerous war plants where thousands and thousands of people are employed. When victory has been achieved, when we no longer need to produce tanks, aircraft, war materials, to what use will the plants be put, what will become of these workers?

The answer that comes to the mind of many is that farm implements, automobiles, radios, electric refrigerators or other appliances now indispensable in households and which at present are scarce, can be manufactured. However, a question one might also ask is: What shall we do with such goods at the end of two or three years when the people's needs have been met, if there is no export market?

A peace organization whose object would be to ensure international cooperation in the solution of international humanitarian problems in economic and social fields, or in other spheres could take action with a view to raising the standard of living of millions of people in China and in India, so that they might become purchasers for all commodities we could produce and which are to be found everywhere, even in our most humble homes, and which would be quite useful to them. To my mind, the San Francisco organization, in raising the living standard of those people, in endeavouring to improve economic and social conditions in all those countries, would accomplish efficient work for preserving world peace.

When people are unemployed, when they can find no work, and cannot earn a living, they are prone to listen to demagogues who expound their theories to them. That is how Hitler took power in Germany, as Mussolini had done in Italy. In order to give their people bread and employment they had to convert their peacetime industries into war plants. After producing everything required for waging an armed conflict, they declared war, they waged war, and they set afire not only Europe but also Asia. If I emphasize that point, it is because my constituents are still wondering, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, how it is that before war was declared there was no money for putting them to work while to-day they are required to work night and day.

My object in making these few remarks is also to plead on behalf of the people whom I represent and to whom I have stated time and again, with the leaders of Canada, of the United States and of Great Britain: If you are requested to make sacrifices for victory, if you are asked to tighten your belt so that more money may be put into the country's treasury to help win the war, if you are asked to give your sons and your daughters so that democracy and christendom may be saved, it is because we believe that we shall destroy the nazi and fascist dictatorships and ensure a better world for you after the war.

A better world, Mr. Speaker, is not simply a world made better through the elimination of the nazis, of the fascists and of the Japanese. A better world does not simply mean victory, it means peace in victory. Peace in victory, peace in the home, peace in the country, Mr. Speaker, is brought about by employment. Such a peace is ensured in the home when heads of families can secure employment, when on their return home at night they can provide for the needs of their family. To our Canadian heads of families, our workers and farmers, it means as much work and production in peacetime as there has been during the war. We shall have peace only in so far as the leaders of Canada and the leaders of the world organize a sound economy in the various countries. I mean that people might not in peacetime destroy one another for the sake of profits, or endeavour to satisfy their ambitions by raising tariff walls to ruin their neighbours. We shall have peace in our Canadian homes and our boys shall return from Europe, in a truly better world, after having served four or five years overseas, if the leaders of the united nations can set up for after the war the world they have promised, and if they can transform a war economy into a peace economy based on the same principles and the same needs.

Mr. Chairman, I am proud to hear that Canada will send representatives to the San Francisco conference. Our country has played a great part in this world war; it has become known throughout the world and it has aroused universal admiration. I am sure that Canada who has shown herself to be a strong and great nation in order to win the war will show herself to be equally strong and great in order to win the peace and to ensure to the Canadian people peace in victory, thus fulfilling the promise of Canadian ideals and of a truly better future for the Canadian people.

Mr. J. G. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I believe this resolution portends one of the greatest events to take place in the civilized world of this time. It is therefore astonishing that the official opposition, which has been going across Canada from one end to the other telling the people that they are prepared to take over the government of the country, even during war or immediately thereafter, and to look after the affairs of the country, has not offered one man to say a word to-day in this debate. Perhaps they have not enough leaders. They have one outside the house and one inside—

An hon. MEMBER: Two inside.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Yes, perhaps two inside the house. Maybe it is a case of too many cooks spoiling the broth. At any rate they do not seem prepared for anything at the present time, and had to turn over to the leader of the C.C.F. party the privilege of answering in the debate.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That is a lot of bunk.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Your party is; yes, I believe you are right.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I had reference to what you are talking about.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): When you are prepared to get up and make a speech, get up and make it. Don't sit there and interrupt.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The Prime Minister made one statement yesterday and a different one to-day.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The San Francisco conference is of great importance to Canada, as it is to all other countries. After the last war many men of good will endeavoured to set up an organization to outlaw war. As we all know, they did not altogether succeed. They partly succeeded. Although the last war was called a great world war, few countries were really harmed to any great extent because the fighting was in a fairly small area. One of the great nations which made an important contribution in that war and whose leader endeavoured to set up that organization let him down when he came back and would not take the place it should have taken in that organization. After the last war the great nations were not as sincere as they are to-day. I remember I had the privilege of going to Europe shortly after the last war and attending the disarmament conference held in Geneva in 1932, although not as an official delegate. Some sixty nations were represented. I spent some ten days listening to the deliberations and I was struck with the similarity of the people who were there. I could see little difference between any of the nationalities on the floor of that great conference hall. There was some little difficulty at the start of the conference when the delegates of Japan pulled out. Trouble started between Japan and China, but when the conference got under way it looked as though some real progress would be made. Things seemed to be going quite well, but finally one gentleman rose and made a fiery speech, and the conference was ended.

San Francisco Conference

That conference was held in Europe in the midst of prejudices and suspicions where wars had been carried on for generation after generation, where every nation seemed to have something against some other nation. This coming conference is to be held in a new world where people are more friendly, where I think they are more advanced in their ideas. The world has had a terrible lesson in this war. Practically every country that has taken part has been devastated except our own and the United States of America.

The great powers to-day are different from the great powers of the last war. They are sincere in what they intend to do from now on. I think the world has learned the lesson it needed in order to set up an organization to outlaw war for all time. Russia is a new nation without the prejudices of the old nations of Europe. The United States is a new nation, and Great Britain has always had advanced opinions if she could only get others to do what she wished to do. Last but not least, the contribution of this new country of Canada to the conference in San Francisco will be great.

Then there are the pan-American countries which are looking to Canada for partial leadership and to hear expounded some of the ideas in which they believe. Canada has made a remarkable contribution in this war, a contribution recognized by everyone, especially outside Canada. She is at present the third trading nation in the world. She has, I believe, the fourth air force in the world, and when the war is over she will have the third navy in the world. She is second in mutual aid and assistance, and she is the only country outside of the United States of America that has paid her whole way in this war and has helped her allies to get along with their own part of the war as well. For her population she has been able to supply more food, munitions, supplies, ships and the wherewithal to fight the war than any other country. Therefore she should have a prominent place in the conference at San Francisco and in the peace conference that will come later.

[Mr. J. G. Ross.]

This afternoon the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) referred to trade as one of the subjects that will have to be discussed in the conference. He was followed by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell), who also spoke of trade as being an important issue. I was glad to hear that, because there have been times when my friends of that party have not taken the same view as I have in regard to trade. We all know that trade can be carried on properly only in a peaceful world. There can be no peace in the world if trade is to be directed by the nations to their own advantage by restrictions imposed at the expense of other countries. It is generally agreed now throughout the world that harmony and progress can be achieved only if trade barriers, quotas and exchange restrictions are eliminated in order that the commerce of the world may flow freely from one part to another. It is a great consolation to me as a humble individual to hear so many people speaking along this line and to know that they have finally come to see the light in regard to world trade. I have seldom made a speech in this House of Commons without advocating free trade for Canada and for the world.

History has taught us that the preparations for war start with a policy of self-sufficiency. Every time a country wants to prepare for war it starts to make itself self-sufficient in order not to have to import while the war is on. If this conference is able to steer the world to a place where nations will not be allowed to put trade barriers against each other, then it will be doing a great deal to keep us out of future wars.

On the way home from attending the disarmament conference I visited Milan. Being a foreigner and having to take a train I thought it would be best to get to the train a little ahead of time. I bought a copy of the London Daily Mail which was printed on the continent and got into a compartment designed to hold eight people. I started to read my newspaper. Shortly before the train pulled out, seven men came into the compartment. The train started, and these men began talking in Italian, so I could not understand anything they said. Finally I noticed particularly one man across from me. He spoke to the man next to me and they exchanged places; and this gentleman said to me in very good English, "You are an American?" I said, "No, I am a Canadian." "What part of Canada do you come from?" I said, "Saskatchewan." He said, "Out where the wheat grows?" I said, "Yes." "Well," he said, "that is a peculiar coincidence. These seven men who are with me here in the car are all wheat merchants from Genoa. We have been in Milan for a conference." Then he said to me, "Don't you think we are all a little crazy?" I said, "I don't know, maybe we are; but why do you say so?" "Well," he said, "you come from a wheat country and I understand you grow wheat?" I said, "Yes." He said, "We are all wheat merchants here. We used to import from your country twenty-five million bushels of wheat through the port of Genoa. To-day we import nothing. We are unable to buy your wheat and you are unable to sell your wheat. We over here feel that you are the same as Americans." And he said, "The United States placed tariffs against our country on many of the things we used to sell them, and therefore our country placed tariffs against the things which you used to sell us. Now you find yourself unable to sell any of your grain and we cannot buy any of it, and you know what our bread is like in Italy now." There is an example of the consequences of one country placing a tariff against another.

I travelled from there to England, a country which for eighty-five years had had free trade and had become under free trade the greatest trading nation in the world. Largely the cause of its prosperity was free trade. Great Britain exported the greatest amount of products per head of population of any country in the world. Yet she produced very few raw materials; she had to import them from all over the world, process them and then export them. She was selling to the protected countries of the world. The wage scale in England was higher than in any of the neighbouring European countries, while she had free trade and they had protection. Her social services were much greater than those of any other country in that part of the world, while she maintained much more of her own market than did any protected country in Europe at that time. She was the great carrier of the trade of other countries, receiving tremendous returns from the carrying trade of her ships, from the insurance she placed upon cargoes, and from the financing of her trade with other countries. At that time an election had been held in England, and the Conservative party had come into power and were bringing in a tariff for the first time in eighty-five years. Their story was that England had more men unemployed than previously, that business was not as good as it had been, and they blamed these conditions on her free trade policy. But that was not the reason; for the protected countries had suffered far more from trade depression than England had, and the fact that they had ceased to trade with one another deprived England of many millions of pounds because she could not carry their imports and exports; she could not finance cargoes or get insurance on their trade.

I had the great privilege while in England of going to the House of Lords and hearing the late Viscount Snowden speak on the tariff bill. The report of his speech is in the parliamentary debates of the House of Lords, September 8, 1931 to March 24, 1932, which will be found in the library, and I would commend to every hon. member a reading of it. It is too bad that hon. members could not have heard him. He was a little man, and crippled; when he rose to speak he had to walk with the aid of two canes to the clerk's desk in the centre of the chamber and put both hands on it. He made one of the finest speeches I have ever heard. It was not interrupted by anyone. I happened to remark to a British member of parliament who was standing alongside of me at the bar of the house that I did not notice anybody interrupting Viscount Snowden. He said to me, "A man does not generally stir up a beehive"; and I guess that was the explanation. He was a great speaker; he had all his facts and figures—and they are in the report—which absolutely prove the case for free trade so far as Great Britain is concerned.

Canada is vitally interested in trade, and it will be more interested after this war than ever before in her history. During the war we have developed our agricultural production over fifty per cent; we have also developed our lumbering, our mining, our fishing and our manufacturing to the point where we must have outside markets or we cannot carry on. As a matter of fact we shall be very much interested in every conference which takes place in order that during the short period after the war, when rehabilitation is taking place in other countries, we can make arrangements, if necessary giving credits, for the promotion of our trade so that this great production may be maintained and the resultant wages amongst our people kept flowing. In this matter we cannot be represented by other parts of the British commonwealth of nations because when this war is over we shall not see eye to eye with them in trade matters. Take for instance Australia, one of the countries which the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) and I had an opportunity of visiting last summer. I am afraid that Australia will be putting up tariffs instead of taking them off when this war is over. There are in every country special interests that always want tariffs and try to find good excuses for having them imposed. While I was over there I heard certain industrialists say: "We were not prepared for war with Japan, and we had to build up certain industries so as to be able to fight this war; therefore, in order to be in a position to fight another war if it ever comes, we are going to have to build, by protection, industry in this country." That is a story that has been heard in many countries for many years. In Canada we have found during this war that in order to produce for war it was better for us to lower our tariffs than to raise them. We have found that it was better for us to allow products of one kind or another to flow freely across the boundary between the United States and Canada, because thereby both countries were able to produce more, and more economically, than they could have done without that free flow of goods.

Canada is to send a delegation to San Francisco. As the member for Swift Current (Mr. Graham) said a few moments ago, we are extremely fortunate in this country in having the Prime Minister we have to head that delegation. For many years, long before the President of the United States assumed that office, the Prime Minister was a personal friend of that man, and that personal friendship has allowed Canada and the United States, the Prime Minister and the President, to sit down together time after time during this war, and indeed before it, and work out things to the great advantage of both countries.

We must send to that conference in San Francisco men from all parties, if you will, but men of good will all of them, men prepared to go there and sit down with the representatives of other nations and discuss matters for the benefit of all nations and not just for our own little needs as we see them ourselves.

We have become a great nation during this war. We have become the leader of the secondary nations and we must be ready and willing to take our place in that conference. When that time comes the Prime Minister will select the men to go with him on that delegation, and the contribution that will be made by him and by the delegation from Canada will have an effect on the world for many years to come.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, this house is not authorized to send representatives to the San Francisco conference, for the following reasons: In that place and time, even the Prime Minister himself (Mr. King) would not be speaking on behalf of Canada. If he does, all he says and accomplishes will be null and void. After April 17, his term as member of this house will have expired. The same thing applies to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) and every one of the hon. members of this house, including myself; our terms of office will have run out. So as to be truly representative, one needs a mandate. Neither the Prime Minister, the leader of the opposition nor any member of the present parliament will be authorized to represent Canada at San Francisco, on April 25. They will represent nobody, absolutely no one. I know of certain drafters of charters who, although authorized to do so, found out after two years of study, that they had accomplished nothing. What could we expect of such a delegation to San Francisco? Neither a charter nor any valid agreements. Such a delegation will have no authority whatever to bind Canada at the conference. Let us not take any undertakings that the next parliament will never ratify. Only a new house comprising representatives of the people could discharge the right to send delegates to the conference from its newly elected members. For my part, I refuse to vote a single cent of the public funds to defray the expenses of this delegation whose powers will be nil and whose decisions will be void, because they will be exercised or taken by persons not responsible to the Canadian people.

To allow the Prime Minister and members of this parliament to represent our country at this conference would constitute the worst form of cynicism. Safeguard of democracy and of the government of the people by the people; protector of freedom, of justice and of right; defender of christianity and minorities; battling side by side with Soviet Russia, will Canada dare delegate to San Francisco a Prime Minister ruling without a mandate over a country with no parliament? If that should happen, nothing is impossible. Once again our constitution is trampled under foot by the very man and the very government who so many times were returned to power by arguments in defence of this constitution. Liberty, justice, right and minorities have been violated and disregarded by an administration that declared war and imposed conscription without authority to do so, by a nation which, without a flag of its own, is struggling against the worst economic chaos, by reason of the fault of those very people who are asking us to allow them to go to San Francisco in order that they may approve the principle of Canadian intervention in any part of the war-torn world. No, we are already so poor that we should remain at home from now on, so that we might prepare for the return of our sons and daughters whom we may soon expect. Everything commands the Prime Minister to ask His Excellency the Governor General to dissolve parliament at once. The people of Canada have lost confidence in him long ago. I need no other proof of this but the repeated defeats of his candidates during the last two years and the recent defeat of the Minister of National Defence, Mr. McNaughton. It was a disaster and the interested parties are not ignorant of the causes of this defeat.

Contempt for the truth, engagements broken and national disunion, those are the results of the unspeakable attitude of a government elected five years ago on a definite programme. Because he has given in step by step, since the mobilization act, to the Imperialists and disowned the true Canadians, the Prime Minister will have lost everything by sacrificing the friends of Canada to those who are not true Canadians. We should profit by the experience of the past. Our membership in the last league of nations has brought on us only travelling and living expenses for a useless personnel in Geneva. The voice of Canada was not heard at the conferences of Casablanca and Crimea, nor at the other conferences. The San Francisco conference will of necessity refer to the previous discussions where we were not represented. Why should Canada be represented at that meeting where the discussions will be on questions dealt with in previous conferences where Canada was ignored? To prepare a charter, as it is said in the speech from the throne? We know what those charters are worth. For two years I listened to the most eulogious speeches in praise of the Atlantic Charter, and then we were told by the President of the United States himself that it had never existed. How all that looks like the fallacious bait of the great principles that precipitated Canada into this war. The noble and lofty aim of the Allies was then to defend Poland against the German hordes and the Russian legions. And, by some cruel reversal of events, Poland is sacrificed, divided and dismembered with the complaisance of the same people who had declared war to safeguard her integrity and her rights. It is all very well to set up an international organization to maintain world peace and security, but only through having regard to the rights of all martyred peoples to life, justice and liberty can such an organization build something lasting.

Social injustice has been one of the ultimate causes of armed conflicts. Ever since the mobilization act was passed, economic dictatorship has been supreme in Canadian developments and politics. We are ruled by commissions which have substituted themselves to genuine government. The financial magnates, many of whom control the whole national economy, are forcing their selfish views and their will upon the Canadian people. Small businesses have a growing tendency to be overwhelmed by the weight of monopolies. Unbridled capitalism is what is to be most dreaded. Under cover of economic liberalism and democracy, the reign of dictatorship has been established in Canada. The unlimited powers bestowed on the government and its commissions by the mobilization act have become a source of untold abuses. As long as social injustice and hatred prevail in the world, international peace and security cannot exist. All those who have some understanding of humanity and of civilization are sincerely seeking peace in the universe.

The concluding paragraph of the preamble of the resolution before the house reads as follows:

Whereas the government of Canada has accepted the invitation to send representatives to this conference.

And the first paragraph of the resolution reads thus:

That this house endorses the acceptance by the government of Canada of the invitation to send representatives to the conference.

That is a strange way to proceed. In their customary manner, the government accept the invitations take the engagements then ask parliament to approve everything.

Parliament was not consulted prior to the acceptance of this invitation by the government. The Prime Minister could have called the members together a few days earlier for the purpose of submitting this invitation to them. But no, the government, following their habitual course, decided to accept the invitation of their own accord. They now ask the house to approve the engagement they have taken without consulting the members. Too long has parliament been ignored. Each member represents in this house thousands of electors. We do not wish merely to be the laughing-stock of the invidious bureaucracy ruling over Canada these last five years. The cup is filled to the brim. I have unceasingly protested against this curtailment of the members' privileges since the declaration of war and the adoption of the mobilization act.

What has become of the supremacy of parliament so dear to the Prime Minister? What has happened these last few years to the privileges of the house? All that has been ignored, dilapidated even. The day is not far away when that dictatorship will be crushed under the weight of public opinion. The Canadian voters are only waiting for the chance to speak freely on general election day.

I call the attention of the house to the fourth paragraph of "the proposals for the establishment of a general international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security." I shall read that paragraph which I find at page 12 of the pamphlet embodying these proposals:

Should the Security Council consider such measures to be inadequate, it should be empowered to take such action by air, naval or land forces as may be necessary to maintain or restore international peace and security. Such action may include demonstrations, blockade and other operations by air, sea or land forces of members of the organization.

We realize at once the importance and the seriousness of the engagements which the delegation to San Francisco might enter into on behalf of Canada. Our air, naval and land forces would be requisitioned at any time by the future league of nations to serve anywhere in the world. And we would empower the delegates to that conference to take such actions heavy with consequences or even to discuss their advisability? I say that this should not be done before a public expression of opinion. Parliament can not and should not appoint a delegation entrusted with such powers. I refuse to believe that Canada, once the war is over, should mobilize her resources for the protection of world security. I object to the sending of a delegation of members no longer in office to that conference; it would be contrary to our constitution, to custom, and to law. With many others, I wonder if it would not be more appropriate and reasonable to restore order in our own country, to stabilize our finances, and to prepare our youth for careers worthy of their sacrifice. In short, let us put an end to our international commitments. Let us undertake the rebuilding of our economic structure which is crumbling. Let us think first of our own, of the sons and daughters of Canada who will be returning to this country. They shall have the right to work and to positions worthy of their sacrifices. Up to now, the government has found twenty billions for war purposes. We shall need as much, and maybe more for works of peace. Peace and national security for Canada should be our greatest worries. To that noble task we should devote all our energy and our resources. Let us use them for our own people and for our country. I know that my call will not be heard. At least I shall have fulfilled my duty to my country and to my people. Those who, without a mandate from the Canadian people, will go to that conference and subscribe to new commitments shall assume before history the dangerous consequences of their acts.

[Mr. Lacombe.]

On motion of Mr. Stirling the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 10.35 p.m.

Wednesday, March 21, 1945

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. HANSON

PROCEDURE IN DEBATE ON RESOLUTION RESPECTING SAN FRANCISCO CONFERENCE

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, when I rose yesterday at the conclusion of the Prime Minister's speech and asked the questions which I did, I based my position on a statement which I understood the Prime Minister had made in the early part of his speech, which I shall now read and which will be found in the second column, page 20 of yesterday's Hansard. This is what the Prime Minister said:

I hope that, in the course of reading this statement, I may not be interrupted—

And may I interject that that hope was fulfilled.

—but when the statement is concluded, if there are any questions in the minds of hon. members arising out of what I have said I shall be very glad to attempt to answer them.

It was on the basis of that statement, which is there without limitation, qualification or equivocation, that I asked the questions which I did. I hope therefore, in view of the discussion that ensued after the Prime Minister had spoken and I had asked those questions, that I shall not be debarred from the privilege of taking part in this debate if I so desire.

Mr. SPEAKER: In answer to the hon. member for York-Sunbury I was fully aware that he was under a misapprehension in regard to the procedure, and I intended—and I think the house would agree with me—that he should be allowed to take part in the debate if he so desired.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I thank Your Honour for that, but I do not concur in the suggestion that I was under a misapprehension. I will let it go at that.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

NATURALIZATION—SAMUEL CARR

Mr. BRUCE:

1. When did Samuel Carr first make application for naturalization as a Canadian citizen?
2. When were his naturalization papers granted him?
3. What were the reasons for giving a decision in his favour and granting naturalization papers?
4. Where was Samuel Carr born?
5. When did he come to Canada?
6. What name did he bear when he first came to Canada?
7. What name or names has he assumed since then?
8. What is his present occupation?

Mr. McLARTY:

1. First application made in name of Samuel Kogan in court of general sessions of the peace, Waterloo county, Ontario, 29th January, 1931. Certificate issued 23rd June, 1931, but not delivered. This certificate revoked by order of governor general in council 17th December, 1932. Second application made in court of general sessions of the peace for county of York, 11th September, 1936.

2. Certificate issued March 2, 1945.

3. Finding by a judge of the county court of York, that the applicant was a fit and proper person to be naturalized and possessed the required qualifications. This finding was made under date 4th February, 1937. Consideration of the case by Secretary of State.

4. According to application, Kharkov, U.S.S.R.

5. According to immigration report, August 29, 1924.

6. According to immigration report, Shmil Kogan.

7. Second application made in name of Sam Carr.

8. According to application, secretary.

ASSISTANCE TO PROVINCES IN BUILDING OF HOSPITALS, ETC.

Mr. LALONDE:

1. Since September 1, 1944, has the government of the province of Quebec requested the cooperation or financial assistance of the dominion government in the building and equipping of hospitals, insane asylums or other similar institutions?

2. If so, (a) on what dates; (b) for what projects; (c) what was the answer of the federal authorities?

Mr. CLAXTON:

1. No.
2. Answered by 1.

VETERANS' LAND SETTLEMENT—LINCOLN COUNTY, ONT.

Mr. LOCKHART:

1. To date, what properties have been purchased in Lincoln county to be used for the establishment of returned men on the land?

2. From whom were such properties purchased?

3. What was the total amount paid in each instance?

4. What acreage was obtained from each purchase made?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre):

1. Pt. S.E.¼ Lot 19, concession 3, Grantham township; Pt. lot 21, concession 8, Grantham township; Pt. S.½ lot 22, concession 8, Grantham township; Pt. lot 17, concession 4, Grantham township; Pt. lot 14, concession 5, Grantham township; Pt. lot 7, concession 2, North Grimsby township.

2. German, William J. and Clara E.; Welstead, Katheryn L.; Welstead, G. A.; Jansen, Peter A.; Battal, Charles P.; Jarvis, T. D. and Edna Mary.

3. $4,300; $8,800; $12,500; $4,000; $3,984; $4,800; including improvements valued at $13,620.

4. 10, 25, 50, 2½, .23, .5.

R.C.A.F.—ASSINIBOIA, SASK., STATION

Mr. SHAW:

1. Was an R.C.A.F. station opened at Assiniboia, Saskatchewan, on or about August 21, 1944? If so, what was the purpose of opening this station?

2. Was the road between the said station and the highway gravelled sometime between August and December of this year? If so, what was the purpose of the graveling?

3. Was a winter supply of coal delivered to the above station after August 21, 1944? If so, what quantity of coal was supplied; when was the last delivery of coal made to the station, and what was the total cost of the coal?

4. On what date was it decided to close this R.C.A.F. station at Assiniboia?

5. Was an investigation undertaken at the R.C.A.F. station at Assiniboia because of certain alleged irregularities in the equipment section?

6. If so, (a) on what date was it commenced; (b) who was in charge of same; (c) was the R.C.M.P. notified of such investigation; (d) was it completed; (e) what were the findings; (f) if such investigation was not completed, what is the reason?

Questions

Mr. GIBSON:

1. On the disbandment of No. 34 EFTS Assiniboia, the premises were allocated to accommodate No. 41 Pre-aircrew training school and No. 403 aircraft holding unit, effective 21 August, 1944. Effective the same day a small RCAF Station was formed at Assiniboia to provide services and maintenance for the PATS and AHU.

2. Yes. The gravelling of this road was considered necessary to enable maintenance of the buildings on the station to be carried out.

3. A three months' supply of coal consisting of 947 tons of lignite stoker and 56 tons of sub-bituminous lump. The last delivery was made on November 30, 1944, and the total cost was $3,782.10.

4. When it became apparent that sufficient aircrew had been trained No. 41 PATS was no longer required and was disbanded effective 15 November, 1944. A new and more efficient method of handling stored reserve equipment allowed of the disbandment of No. 403 AHU, effective 1 December, 1944. As RCAF Station, Assiniboia, had been formed to maintain services for these units, it was no longer required after their closing and was disbanded effective 1 December, 1944.

5. No information is available indicating that any such investigation was ever undertaken.

6. Not applicable.

INDIANS—MILITARY SERVICE

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

1. Were the Indians of Canada residing on the reserves, included in the national registration of 1940?

2. Are Indians residing on Indian reserves in Canada subject to compulsory military call under government regulations?

3. How many Indians, in each military district, have been compelled to take military training in Canada under existing regulations?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. Yes.

2. The resident Indian Agents, located on the Indian reserves throughout Canada, at the end of August 1940, were appointed as deputy registrars under the national registration regulations, 1940, and authorized and instructed to register all Canadian Indians who were on the reserves at that time, whether residents or visitors, and to continue such registrations, including those of young Indians as they attain their sixteenth birthday. Under this arrangement the majority of Canadian Indians who were on or about the reserves in September 1940 were then registered there. Most of the Indians who were then away from the reserves were registered at the reserves upon their return. Others became registered at various outlying post offices or at outlying R.C.M. Police detachment offices. In this way a very complete registration of all Canadian Indians has been effected and is being continued. It is not compulsory that the Indians must register on a reserve.

[Mr. Shaw.]

3. It is regretted that we have no information available to divulge this fact.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

LEGAL SERVICES—BORDEN, ELLIOT, SANKEY AND KELLEY

Mr. POULIOT:

Since the beginning of the war, how much was paid each year by the dominion government and any dominion board, commission and corporation and any other dominion agency to—1. the law firm of Borden, Elliot, Sankey and Kelley, barristers and solicitors, of the city of Toronto;

2. The following partners of the above mentioned firm: (a) H. Borden, K.C.; (b) B. V. Elliot, K.C.; (c) R. H. Sankey, K.C.; (d) W. A. G. Kelley; (e) J. T. Johnson; (f) I. G. Wahn; (g) A. D. McAlpine, and (h) Hon. C. P. McTague, K.C.?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

RETIREMENT OF MAJOR-GENERAL PEARKES

Mr. BRUCE:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other communications exchanged between Major-General G. H. Pearkes, V.C., D.S.O., M.C., and General McNaughton, or any officer in the Department of National Defence, relating to—1. His retirement from the Pacific command.

2. Instructions issued by the Department to General Pearkes and/or his officers in the Pacific command on methods to be employed in inducing the personnel of the home defence army to go overseas.

3. Reports made by General Pearkes to the Department of National Defence giving the nature and result of the efforts of himself and staff in carrying out the instructions stated above?

Mr. ABBOTT: I think that most of the documents asked for here are confidential and probably privileged. That certainly applies to communications between General Pearkes and the Minister of National Defence or officers of the department. Subject to the usual reservation I think the motion might pass, that papers which are not confidential or privileged will be produced.

CONSCRIPTION FOR OVERSEAS SERVICE—
CORRESPONDENCE WITH QUEBEC PROVINCE

Mr. LALONDE:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the dominion government and the government of the province of Quebec, since September 1, 1939, pertaining to the putting into force of conscription for overseas military service.

EMERGENCY SHELTER REGULATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO APPLICATION OF THE CITY OF WINNIPEG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Has the attention of the Minister of Finance been called to the fact that the council of the city of Winnipeg has made a second application asking that Winnipeg be brought under the emergency shelter regulations, and that this application is supported by other public bodies in the Winnipeg area? As evidence I hold in my hand a letter from the Winnipeg council on rehabilitation and post-war reconstruction, and also a telegram from the Winnipeg branch of the Canadian Legion, urging that this request be granted. Can the minister indicate whether consideration has been given to this renewed application?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I received notice of this question just before coming into the house, but I know something about the situation in a general way. I know that when we formed the intention of making an offer to congested areas for the appointment of emergency shelter administrators we felt that it was necessary to stipulate that application must be made within a certain time; otherwise it would be impossible to set up an effective organization. That time has gone past; and I know that it is the strong conviction of the wartime prices and trade board officials who are concerned with these matters that it would be impossible now to accomplish anything worthwhile in Winnipeg in the time within which it could usefully be accomplished, that is, before the period around May 1.

I saw a copy of a letter that the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board has recently written to authorities of the city of Winnipeg in which he offers to give consideration to setting up an organization with a view to the situation which may develop on the next moving date, which is October 1; but we do not think we can go into Winnipeg now with the idea of doing anything effective during the spring season.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

STATEMENT AS TO PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF INCOME WAR TAX ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I should like to make a brief statement in answer to some inquiries that have been made regarding family allowances. The Family Allowances Act provides for the payment, commencing in July, 1945, of monthly cash benefits in respect of children under the age of sixteen.

Mr. GRAYDON: What date in July?

Mr. ILSLEY: The period covered is the period on or after July 1, but the first payments are not to be made until later in the month of July.

At present an allowance is given to income tax payers for their dependent children, and it is not intended that there shall be a duplication of benefits in their case. The Income War Tax Act will be amended at the appropriate time to prevent this duplication. The exact nature of the amendment cannot as yet be announced, but it can now be said that taxpayers may be sure that their net position will not be impaired as a result of the payment of family allowances. I wished to make the last point clear in answer to inquiries that have been made.

SAN FRANCISCO CONFERENCE

PROPOSED GENERAL INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION FOR MAINTENANCE OF PEACE AND SECURITY

The house resumed, from March 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King to approve a resolution to send representatives to a conference of the united nations at San Francisco to prepare a charter for the maintenance of international peace and security.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this very important debate, and having given some study to the Prime Minister's address of yesterday, I should like at the outset to deal with certain points which were raised by him. His reference to the meeting of commonwealth representatives which will take place shortly in London gave no adequate explanation as to why a minister of this government had not been dispatched overseas to take part in such an important gathering. Nor was there anything in his speech to indicate what position Canada was taking with respect to close collaboration with the United Kingdom and other units of the commonwealth when the San Francisco conference is convened. This, and other points I intend to raise this afternoon, I should like to have the Prime Minister answer in due course some time before the debate ends in accordance with the arrangements made.

San Francisco Conference

The Prime Minister mentioned, too, the contribution of the league of nations. In the estimates just tabled there is provision for Canada's share in the costs and expenses of that league. With the setting up of the new world peace organization I think it is a very proper question to ask now: what will then be the status of the old league and its various collateral organizations? Will they be absorbed in the new set-up, or will the old organization and its collaterals be disbanded altogether?

The Prime Minister stated in his address that the government's views on the composition and powers of the security council and on other aspects of the proposed organization have already been communicated to the greater powers. Do we understand, therefore, that the views expressed in his address of yesterday cover all of the government's policy as communicated to the greater powers? We should know whether this government has advanced views to the greater powers which have not been made known in parliament. It is evidently not the Prime Minister's intention to propose particular provisions or amendments in advance of the discussions of the conference, despite some rumours which have been abroad that already a Canadian amendment had been proposed. I should like the Prime Minister to indicate to the house, if he will, before the debate closes, what his government has in mind with respect to proposed amendments which may properly come before the conference and which have not been mentioned by him so far in this debate.

A close scrutiny of the Prime Minister's address would indicate that the government intends to take the Canadian delegation to San Francisco without any clear delineation of policy prior to arrival there. True, his speech contained some suggestions, and it gave obvious approval to the principles and purposes of the proposed charter, but evidently Canada's real position is to be left until the San Francisco conference is held; and that, in my humble opinion, is not good enough in the circumstances.

In his address the Prime Minister dealt briefly with the proposed Canadian representation and expressed the view that it was desirable that Canada's delegation to the conference should be thoroughly representative. With that general statement I think perhaps everyone will agree, but I had hoped the Prime Minister would give a more detailed account, first as to how this broad representation was to be achieved, and second, as to the status of those who will be chosen outside of the normal government ranks. At this point I should like to say that when the Prime Minister, at a press conference prior to his departure for Washington, arbitrarily ruled out as a possible delegate our national leader, John Bracken, that was and is regarded by our party in and out of the house and by myself as an unprovoked slight, particularly in view of the fact that when the delegation goes to San Francisco there will not be any parliament in Canada at all. To rule out the possibility of choosing a prospective prime minister of Canada was going pretty far. Our party now ask that we be given by the Prime Minister the right to choose our own delegates. When this delegation goes to San Francisco, as I have said, there will be no parliament in Canada. A new parliament will have to approve the stand and actions of the delegation at San Francisco. Even the most unprejudiced observer to-day would scarcely hazard the guess that the present government is likely to be in control of the next parliament of Canada. In this respect Canada is in a vastly different position from the United States, where approval and ratification will be dealt with by the government and congress now in office. I suggest, therefore, that the delegation to San Francisco cannot be confined to representatives of parties sitting in a dying parliament. In my opinion it should be enlarged to give proper representation to agriculture, labour, veterans of the last war, service men or veterans of this war, as well as industry and business. More than that, the apparently heavy delegation of government supporters which it is rumoured will go to San Francisco will be out of balance, as far as the membership is concerned, particularly when parliament will have expired, in view of the share of public support which the government commands to-day throughout Canada.

Further in the Prime Minister's speech he states that the government itself will, of course, assume its constitutional responsibility both for the selection of the delegation and for any decisions which are agreed upon at

[Mr. Graydon.]

San Francisco. This raises at once the question as to the status of the delegates the government will choose outside of its own supporters. Will they go as full-fledged delegates? Will they go as advisers, or what will be their capacity? Will they have the same freedom to express their views at San Francisco as is claimed by the representatives of the Republican party in the United States; and will there be any prior consultation among the delegates who will go to the conference? I raise this point because certainly in the past there has been no disposition on the part of the government to take the official opposition into its confidence with respect to external affairs.

I can find no reference in the Prime Minister's address to a very important matter which has been raised from time to time regarding the scope and field of the united nations charter. In his reply in this debate I would ask him, if he will, to make clear his interpretation with respect to the powers of the new security organization, particularly with reference to the question of the revision of any part or all of the peace treaties which may be made prior to the united nations charter going into effect. On this point, as well as others, this house would like to know if any other governments have sent in proposals or amendments relative to the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. If they have done so, has Canada received copies of them? If so, such proposals or amendments should be made public or tabled in this house.

I now come to another rather important part of the Prime Minister's address, in which he spoke of military agreements. To use his own words, at page 26 of Hansard for March 20, the Prime Minister said:

Under the present proposals, members of the organization would not be required to place forces under the control of the security council except in accordance with special agreements separately entered into, setting forth the number and types of the forces, and the facilities and assistance which they are prepared to provide.

The agreements would limit the military aid, pledged by members, to what each member was ready to give of its own volition. The agreements might include provisions governing the circumstances in which any forces could be called upon to serve abroad. These agreements would need separate approval in accordance with the constitutional processes of each country. In Canada that would mean approval by parliament before such agreements were ratified.

There is at present a good deal of obscurity about the methods by which this part of the proposals would be developed in practice. One point, however, is clear. As they stand, the acceptance of the proposals would in no way commit Canada to send forces beyond Canadian territory at the call of the security council. If any such commitment were sought, it would be embodied in a later agreement, freely negotiated by the government of Canada, and coming into effect only after it had been approved by parliament.

With respect to these points I should like the Prime Minister to make clear when the agreements which are mentioned in the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, and referred to in his speech yesterday, are likely to be entered into by the states subscribing to the charter, and this is what I mean by that statement. Will there be any agreements entered into at San Francisco, or will the agreements be entered into after approval and ratification of the charter have been given by the respective governments, or will the agreements be entered into only after the peace treaties have been signed?

It would appear that the extent of our contribution with respect to force will be governed by the agreements rather than by the charter itself. We should be told whether there will be one blanket agreement covering all our contributions in this regard or whether there will have to be a special agreement covering each particular operation in which the organization may require men and equipment and, if so, will each of these special agreements have to come before parliament for approval and ratification in each instance?

To my mind these agreements are going to be of vast import so far as this country is concerned, and I feel that the Prime Minister has not dealt with them and their import as fully as he should have done. There will be ample time, however, for him to do so when he replies in this debate, and I ask him now to clarify this point at that time.

World peace and world trade are inseparable partners. The success of the new international organization will depend to a very large extent upon the degree to which it is possible for world trade to expand. Conversely, we know it is equally true that world trade can flourish only when the international political climate is favourable. Too little was said by the Prime Minister and too little has been said in this debate on the question of opening the channels of trade. This nation must have trade. Without it all the internal palliatives will be ineffective to make or keep our people employed and prosperous. One of the major jobs of the economic and social council of the new united nations organization will have to be centred on methods to be applied in extending international commerce. When the Prime Minister replies I suggest he give his views with respect to the possible functions and powers of the economic and social council in this regard.

Leaving for a moment the points made by the Prime Minister, I desire to tender certain views of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition relative to the resolution before the house. At the outset I would like to make it abundantly clear that the Progressive Conservative party will support the resolution.

Abroad throughout Canada is the grim and unquenchable determination that the same power and resolve which enabled this nation to make an outstanding contribution to the winning of victory on the war fronts of the world shall be with no less vigour and resolution turned to the equally difficult task of winning the peace. That widespread view constitutes an unmistakable guide to those upon whose shoulders will rest the setting up of the machinery to keep inviolate the victory which we hope this war will presently give us.

The debate on the Prime Minister's resolution affords parliament a unique and far too infrequent opportunity of discussing Canada's position in international affairs. I do not recall at the moment a full-dress debate on our relations with other countries having taken place since I entered parliament in 1936. Our government, our parliament and our people have not been kept abreast of the developments in the fast-moving world community as they should. Think well over the fact that less than twenty-six full days of parliamentary sittings in the last ten years have been consumed in discussion of this most important branch of our national business. Ponder a moment, too, the fact that during that ten-year period the appropriate standing committee of this house has not been convened once to discuss the broad matters of either commonwealth or external affairs. It will not do to forget, either, that never yet in Canada have we had a separate minister of external affairs, despite the fact that the importance of that department admittedly calls loudly for something better in the way of constant attention than one can in fairness ask a busy Prime Minister to give. The plain fact is that this government has been derelict in its duty in failing to provide a full-time minister and other essential facilities properly to discuss and handle our relations with other nations. It is pretty late to start, but this house must make the best use of this opportunity to air its view on a subject which has been kept not only in the background but almost underground so far as parliament is concerned.

Having spoken on matters internal I now turn to the conference with respect to which this resolution deals. As the Prime Minister properly pointed out yesterday, San Francisco is not a peace conference. It is a conference to which forty-four nations are invited to create the machinery which it is hoped will perpetuate and preserve the peace that is subsequently made. As a basis of discussion the delegates to this world security conclave will have before them the Dumbarton Oaks proposals and any amendments thereto.

[Mr. Graydon.]

To the united nations there were two main avenues of approach to the problem of finding the means to make the peace stick. One was, as the celebrated columnist Walter Lippmann stated, to dissolve the wartime alliance, reassemble the separated nations and then seek to bind them by the terms of a covenant in accordance with the Wilsonian principle of 1919. The other avenue was to preserve the wartime alliance by transforming it and adapting it to the post-war world. Dumbarton Oaks represents the latter approach. Its proposals contemplate a charter drafted by the authority of an alliance which is presently in existence.

The contemplated charter is evidently to be utilized as the machinery to maintain the peace when won. What is significant is the fact that the peace is to be maintained largely by the powers that win it. Viewing the proposals with a realistic eye one must come to the inescapable conclusion that there is much to commend them, particularly on the broad basis that if the great powers stick together we will have peace. If they do not, we may have war, and in any event they have the combined power to enforce world security and avert catastrophe.

Our representatives at San Francisco must recognize this situation and face it as realistically as they can. We must not allow the desire to retain as much freedom of action as possible to prevent our playing our full part in the security pact, but must harmonize these two natural and desirable objectives.

Some analysis of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals is essential to any discussion as to Canada's possible stand at the conference, although naturally those representing us at the meeting will of necessity have to meet the specific problems with some resiliency if agreements are to be finally reached. Let us examine some of the major propositions laid down for consideration at San Francisco. I am not going to go through them all, but I want to take up four or five which I think are important.

1. With regard to the principles and purposes set out in the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, I fancy that no comment is called for because Canada will be whole-heartedly in agreement with them.

2. With respect to membership in the organization, according to the Dumbarton Oaks proposals this is to be open to all peace-loving states. That definition is pretty broad. Perhaps the underlying reasons are powerful for such a breadth of language, but some clearer definition would appear to be essential if misunderstandings in the future are to be avoided.

3. On the point of the principal organs of the organization there will be little disagreement.

4. But with respect to the composition, functions and powers, voting and procedural provisions of the general assembly there will doubtless be considerable criticism. It appears to be headed for the post of a discussion group. It can talk but it can do little acting other than the election of non-permanent members to the security council. True, there are other functions, but I choose only the more important. Nevertheless its membership will be largely obligated to provide armed and material and financial assistance to the organization without in my opinion there being any corresponding control or direction of those contributions, and, what is more important, they are to a large extent denied the right of deciding when or how they shall be used other than through the members they elect to that security council.

The assembly debates may have a powerful effect on public opinion, but they will fall short of bearing any semblance to the relationship between a democratic legislature and its executive so far as its status beside the security council is concerned. Its members, however, will have protection in disputes, or where acts of aggression are committed against them, and in the final analysis perhaps that factor cannot be lightly overlooked. An assembly that hampered or delayed the actions of the powerful security council in its mission to preserve peace could not be countenanced. We revert once more to the practical equation: peace or war very largely depends upon the great powers. That is no reflection upon the part that other powers will play.

5. The security council contemplated in the proposal constitutes the main part of the peace machinery. It is given wide powers and the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security. The council as proposed has eleven members, six non-permanent elected by the assembly and five permanent members, including the four great powers and in due course the republic of France. Agreement, as you know, was not arrived at at Dumbarton Oaks with relation to the voting procedure on the security council, the issue being whether one great power should have a right of veto against action when it itself is involved in an international dispute, an issue raised primarily by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

At Yalta the big three, so-called, devised a new voting formula which was included in the invitations that last week went to the invited powers. The new voting formula may be summed up as follows: First, every member of the security council will have one vote; second, on procedural matters, that is, getting issues before the council, a vote by any seven members will suffice and, third, at the critical state, when the question of using force comes up, seven votes will be needed but they must include the great powers. This is intended, I presume, to give other nations a measure of reassurance as far as this part is concerned.

The practical effect of the voting compromise arrived at at Yalta is to make a distinction between the quasi-judicial functions of the council in promoting the specific settlement of disputes and the political functions of the council in taking action to maintain peace and security. When questions of the first kind are involved, that is, when the issue is whether any particular situation threatening peace should be investigated or what action short of recourse to force should be taken in order to deal with the situation, no nation which is a party to the dispute, whether that nation is great or small, will participate in the decisions of the council, and these decisions shall be made by a majority of seven of its eleven members, the eleven consisting of the five permanent representatives of the great powers and six representatives of the others. But when the issue goes beyond specific measures, when the question is actually one of using force to prevent or restrain aggression, then a different voting procedure will be followed, or is proposed to be followed, should I say. In this case there must be unanimous agreement among the representatives of the five great powers before action can be taken. Each of these great powers, therefore, in effect has the right to veto action against itself.

Canada stands in a different position from that of the other smaller or so-called middle nations, although I think those terms are pretty loosely used in view of the significance sometimes attached to them. Her close relations with the two great Anglo-Saxon powers give her freedom of fear unique among nations, small or large. No nation is more wedded to peace. We have not a single national objective which cannot be gratified by peaceful means. We have not a single national objective which can be gratified by war. How fortunate we are compared with so many nations which live under the constant dread of war.

Though so averse to war, Canada has played a big part in both world wars. For this reason, and because of her position of influence in the councils of the commonwealth—incidentally we may perhaps claim to be not entirely without influence in the councils of the United States as well because of our close proximity to that republic—Canada stands head and shoulders above all nations other than the great powers in her capacity to make a contribution to the maintenance of peace, and this must be considered when our position is placed before the conference by our delegates.

Canada's future as a free nation can best be assured as a member of the British commonwealth of nations. British and American peoples must work together in close harmony. An international organization must be created to maintain world peace and Canada must give full support to such an organization. Those three sentences are taken from the programme and platform of the Progressive Conservative party.

The principal judicial organ of the organization, the proposed international court of justice, is still in embryonic form. Perhaps I should say it is even less than that, because only proposals have been made with respect to it. The conference at San Francisco will have some guide from the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, but they are largely in alternate form. The scope and field of the court's jurisdiction will be something requiring careful study and consideration by the nations in view of the plenary powers being given to the security council with respect to all matters relating to external affairs.

One point with respect to the international court of justice which may well be mentioned will be an early codification of existing international law which can profitably form a basis at least for the initiation of the new court, providing valuable assistance by way of precedents for its operations.

In the midst of this discussion on the proposals for world security I desire to make an observation with respect to our commonwealth and empire relations as well. Nothing done by this nation at the coming conference or elsewhere must endanger our close ties with the British commonwealth and empire. These ties must be strengthened rather than relaxed in the days that lie ahead. It will be recalled that in this very chamber two years ago the

[Mr. Graydon.]

United Kingdom Foreign Secretary, Right Hon. Anthony Eden, standing at the head of the clerk's table, used these words:

The relationship between the various units of the commonwealth may well form a pattern for a world peace to be followed by the nations of the world.

This is the glory and the common sense of our commonwealth, that there is nothing exclusive about it. Having been for long an international going concern, and having taught the world in past periods how even a partly international going concern could keep the world at peace, it can now fit easily into the larger security plan.

The temple of peace will have to be constructed slowly and laboriously, stone by stone. One of the chief builders will be the British commonwealth, and it can only discharge this task if there is among its partners the fullest desire and intention that this international going concern—the British commonwealth and empire, the only international going concern in existence at the moment—shall be kept strong and vital so that it may discharge its task in peace no less effectively than in war. We of Canada at the conference and elsewhere must never let the commonwealth down.

Of major import to Canada is our relationship with the great and friendly republic to the south of us. It is of great importance that this deep and abiding international companionship and brotherhood be continued, promoted and consolidated. This nation must always see to it that the ties and bonds of friendship between Canada and our American cousins are preserved and maintained. Between the common people of both nations is a depth of understanding which is an anchor of assurance for peaceful relations for generations to come. So that in every one of our international movements our position with relation to the United States of America must be an important consideration and factor in our policy. One of the keystones in the arch of peace for us is a friendly commonwealth, friendly among ourselves and friendly with the United States of America.

We are fortunate in the knowledge that the United Kingdom and other units of the commonwealth are desirous of seeing Canada's friendly relations with the United States of America maintained, preserved and promoted. Likewise the United States of America is anxious, for obvious reasons, that this nation shall be a powerful and influential unit in the British commonwealth of nations.

In the sentiments thus expressed and in the stand this nation takes in her relations to the commonwealth and the United States there is no inconsistency with our contemplated association in the proposals for world security. Dumbarton Oaks recognizes such ties as major contributions to the peace of the world.

The people of this nation, Mr. Speaker, are determined to take every means at their disposal to prevent another war. They have made up their minds that so far as lies within their power this war must be the last. They know, too, that we have to be more realistic and less theoretical in our policy on external affairs. Pious hopes and prosaic chantings on the theories of peace and similar subjects are not only so much waste time but are definitely harmful and dangerous. Canada must be no international Pollyanna. She must face the cold hard facts as they are. A world organization without the power to enforce its decisions is like the domestic law that is never enforced—it is better off the statute book altogether.

Unless we evolve a more practical method than we have been using, I have fear of Canada drifting again into the same negative attitude which characterized her in pre-war days. We must stand for something in commonwealth and international matters. We are a virile, robust people, and we must not yield in the future to the temptation of pursuing any timid, weak-kneed, spineless or negative policy in dealing with others.

In an honest effort to prevent wars and promote peace and trade there are those of us who think that this nation should take its full share of responsibility in shaping with others the conditions which determine peace or war, instead of pursuing an ostrich-like course in time of peace, only to pull our heads out of the sand at the last minute and find that we are in a war. Canada has to do better than that in the post-war years. We must help to prevent wars instead of helping only to win them. But we cannot do that if we pursue our pre-war policy of aimless hesitation, ineffectiveness and isolation.

The Dumbarton Oaks foundation upon which the San Francisco framework will be built envisages more than the political side of peace. The proposal for an economic and social council will be welcomed as a step in the right direction, even if its powers are not very impressive. There is more than the political side to peace. There are many opinions, all of vastly divergent character, as to the root cause of war, but it may safely be said, I think, that a happy, contented people can readily have their aims gratified by peace alone. The peoples of this globe are not all living under happy conditions. Standards of living run from the point which they have reached in some sections of North America to starvation and death levels in many other lands. The humanitarian side projects itself into every consideration leading to permanent peace in the world. Exploitation of the weak by the strong must have no place in the international economic and financial field. The strong must succour the weak rather than dominate them if world peace is to be more than a fanciful objective in the world of to-morrow. Shakespeare put it well when in these memorable lines he wrote:

The quality of mercy is not strain'd . . .
. . . it is twice blessed;

It blesseth him that gives and him that takes. And when one couples with that the biblical quotation: "It is more blessed to give than to receive," it will be apparent in the minds of all who wish a peace of honourable dimensions in the world of to-morrow that the Christian ideals to which so many millions on the face of the earth do homage should not be forgotten in the struggle for permanent and lasting peace.

I yield to no one in my desire to see that the abuses of yesterday shall not be extended and perpetuated into the morrow. It has been said time and again that one of the threats to world peace in the past has been the ramifications of certain international combines, monopolies and cartels. There must be no interests greater than the governments whose sovereignties are being recognized in the coming conference. The people must be supreme, which means that the governments must be higher in authority and control than any powerful group within that government's jurisdiction. The world's highway must be cleared of dangerous international highwaymen of finance, industry or politics. The road must be made safe for the ordinary people of the world.

The eyes of the ordinary citizens of Canada or the world must not be dazzled and blinded and diverted from the realities of the situation by any shining sunlight that may emerge from San Francisco. The machinery for world security will give no irrevocable guarantee that there will never be another war. Unfortunately that statement has to be made. If we hark back to the old days of Woodrow Wilson and the birth of the league of nations, that will be sufficient to banish forever the illusion that there can be a perfect machinery operating perfectly in an imperfect world. San Francisco is another trial—and it deserves a good trial. It is another test as to whether or not the world has returned permanently to its senses once more, but in the meantime let us not reach too many heights of fancy or dream too many utopian dreams. This is a world of reality and it will not be put right by people who only talk peace. If it is put right it will be by people working at the job of keeping peace and fighting, if necessary, to preserve it. There is no other royal road to peace.

I have great hopes for Canada in this post-war world of international opportunity. We have the areas; we have the resources; we are peopled with as hardy, ambitious and industrious men and women as any nation on the globe. Because of that, the challenge to this nation and to every one of us becomes the greater. There has been nothing to excel the Canadian sailor, soldier and airman in the experience of two world wars. Let us demonstrate to the world there is nothing finer than a Canadian citizen in the national, commonwealth or international field of peace.

Mr. L. P. PICARD (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to introduce any political note into the remarks that I shall make this afternoon, but a few words of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) compel me to do so. He referred a moment ago to the spineless policy of the government and stated that there should be a government who would take a full share of the responsibilities in the planning of the world of to-morrow.

Let me say that in the past the Liberal party has needed no lesson of that kind, because it has been the policy of that party in the early days, during the fights for the constitutional liberties of our people, to have its leaders to the fore, from Papineau and Mackenzie to Baldwin and Lafontaine. Later on under Laurier the Liberal party has been leading the fight for the recognition of Canada as a world power, and even more under the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) under whom Canada has made great strides in the field of international relations.

The future of our international relations, I may say, is better in the hands of the Prime Minister than it would be in the hands of the board of strategy of my hon. friend's party, and by keeping the present government in power we shall avoid the necessity of the house leader of my hon. friend's party asking for a delay of the debate in order to consult his absentee leader and permit that leader to consult his experts.

The making of a nation, as that of man himself, is a matter of time and evolution; it is a matter of toil and of struggle. No nation of the old world has reached its present status by spontaneous growth, because they have all gone through the ordeal of wars and social perturbations. They are the results of the merger of small states or the splitting up of vast empires. They have been enlarged by expansionist policies or have become smaller in consequence of weaknesses. Some are the outcome of wars while others are the product of compromise and of a concerted effort to prevent wars.

[Mr. Graydon.]

The nations of the new world had a somewhat simpler development; all of them are the outcome of the adventurous expeditions of the wealth-seeking nations of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries; of the seafaring powers, of the Spanish, the Portuguese, the Dutch and of the French and the British. Nearly all of them have undergone some process of evolution from the condition of trading posts to that of colonies, and from the colonial status to that of sovereign states.

Of these, Canada has probably had the slowest evolution to its present state of nationhood, but its development has been the result of persistent efforts. As it has reached sovereignty and has become a contributing factor in the shaping of the fate of the world by the tremendous contribution it has made to the liberating forces of democracy, it is about to be asked to divest itself of part of its sovereign rights, as other nations will be asked to do, in order to attempt to establish an organization devoted to the protection of world security, which the resolution now before the house asks us to approve.

It is therefore not irrelevant for me to dwell for a few minutes, in these remarks, on the historical development of our national status as well as on our inter-imperial and international relations. When analysing Canada's status in the world of to-day and contemplating the prospect of Canada's role in the world of to-morrow, we cannot overlook the strange pattern of the historical make-up of our country, nor can one prevent one's memory from recalling the different steps that have led us from the colonial era of the French, and early British domination, through the stages of the fight for the acquisition of legislative power on to confederation and the dawn of self-government and autonomy within the framework of empire, and, finally, to full nationhood within the larger family of the league of nations.

It is consoling to see that at all stages of this evolution men of both races, whose sons shared this country, men of all political parties—and that statement is evidence of my intention not to introduce the political note into my remarks this afternoon—who have taken part in the administration of the state, have shown a common ambition to lead the nation step by step to a higher plane in the field of democratic government. In the early days of British occupation we see Viger and Bedard carrying their grievances to London and invoking the principles of British government to obtain a larger measure of legislative authority for the colony. Later we find united two great Canadians to whom the country is greatly indebted for their indomitable courage, William Lyon Mackenzie and Papineau, who struggled to secure for upper and lower Canada the right to manage their own affairs, and who fought against grave abuses and for the redress of serious injustices to the mass of the people of the two provinces.

This question of legislative authority was to the fore during all the period and brought together two other great Canadians who led the liberal forces of the times, Baldwin and Lafontaine, who can equally share honours for their fight for responsible government. Up to these days the only party that believed in responsible government as being essential to the progress and prosperity of Canada, and that the granting of this right of self-government would not only not weaken but strengthen our loyalty to the crown, was the Liberal party in Canada.

Then came Cartier and Macdonald, whom the former conservative party have a right to be so proud of for their part in the building of confederation. Both were great Canadians whose aim was the greatness of the country and its advancement in the path of self-government. History already recognizes the part Laurier has played in the further emancipation of the country. Barely a year after his getting into power, Laurier, when in London for the diamond jubilee of Queen Victoria, was consistently maintaining the position that Canada had reached the status of a nation, and he obtained recognition from the British government that such was the case. Later on his return he was able to state that he had "longed to live to see the day when Canada would no longer be a colony but would be a free nation within the empire, and he was glad to be able to say he had lived to see that day."

Laurier impressed consistently upon British statesmen during the succeeding imperial conferences this thought of Canada's emancipation. The Hon. Newton W. Rowell stated in Montreal in 1912:

This assertion of our national status was necessary for the people of Canada to develop our own national self-consciousness and our own self-respect. It was necessary for the people of Great Britain in order that they might realize that they were dealing not with subjects but with fellow citizens. That this is our position, and that we are now a nation, is not only recognized by the statesmen of Canada but by the statesmen of the mother country.

He concluded by saying:

I venture to suggest that when the history of our constitutional development is written among the great things that Sir Wilfrid Laurier has done none will appear greater than his perception of the fact that the status of Canada must be changed and that this change must be brought about, not by legislative enactment, but by the demand on our part for a new status.

It must be said that at the time all the Conservative press of the country was accusing Laurier of being a separatist. But soon afterwards another great Canadian, Borden, had occasion to demonstrate that the successor of Macdonald could, when faced with the responsibilities of power, broaden his outlook on the same question of Canadian autonomy, and a further step was made during the last war in the negotiating and signing of the peace treaty, when Borden convinced the British statesmen that nobody could speak for Canada but its own Prime Minister.

When one of the treaties ending the last war was brought before this parliament for approval there was given to the country the evidence of true cooperation of great Canadians to the cause of autonomy when the present Prime Minister, then leader of the opposition said, as reported at page 472 of Hansard of March 16, 1920:

I would say frankly that Sir Robert Borden and his colleagues stood firm for the maintenance of Canada's status—they did their duty by Canada in that regard. If they had done less they would have been derelict in their duty and would have been liable to the censure of this parliament. Having done their duty, and done it well, they are entitled to the thanks of this parliament and of this country.

On the same day the Right Hon. C. J. Doherty, Minister of Justice in the Conservative cabinet, answering the leader of the opposition, had this to say of Laurier, as reported at page 474 of Hansard of March 16, 1920:

... that status was the result of a growth, a growth to which succeeding statesmen, one after another, contributed. Let me say at once, that I take off my hat without hesitation in respect to the memory of Sir Wilfrid Laurier for the great contribution that he made to that growth.

This exchange of honours between the Liberal leader and a prominent member of the former Conservative party took place a quarter of a century ago, nearly to the day, that is, on March 16, 1920. Since that day Canada has made great strides towards the attainment of full nationhood under the guidance of the great Liberal statesman who now leads the country. At the moment when he asks us to approve of his participation in the momentous conference of San Francisco I consider it is appropriate to look back on the road followed since 1921 in order to determine Canada's position to-day in the field of international affairs. In 1919, the representatives of Canada signed the peace treaty as members of the British empire delegation, and nowhere is Canada's name to be found in the treaty. The theory at the time was expressed by Mr. Doherty in 1920 in the following words as reported at page 476 of Hansard of March 16, 1920:

The party for whom His Majesty is acting is the British empire, but His Majesty knows what it is that constitutes the empire and he therefore informed those with whom he was contracting that when he contracted for the British empire he did so on behalf of the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, India, et cetera.

And he added:

In order that the treaty shall bind the British empire it is necessary that it shall be executed with the approval of all the self-governing nations of the British empire, and Canada is one of them.

It was a new departure and a step forward for which Sir Robert Borden deserved the praise paid to him by the present Prime Minister. But since those days Canada has moved forward. In 1922 for the first time Canada was, in its own name, party to a treaty, and for the first time the treaty was signed by a Canadian, Mr. Lapointe, in the name of Canada. It was not the subject matter concerned that made the treaty important to us, but the fact that another attribute of sovereignty, that of treaty-making, had been gained by Canada.

Then came the imperial conference of 1926. To do justice to all the enactments of this momentous gathering would necessitate more time than I can devote to it in this part of my remarks. Let it suffice to recall this most important passage of the report of the conference which paved the way for a new unwritten constitution of the British commonwealth. I quote from page 12 of the "Summary of Proceedings" of the imperial conference of 1926:

There is, however, one most important element in it which, from a strictly constitutional point of view, has now, as regards all vital matters, reached its full development—we refer to the group of self-governing communities composed of Great Britain and the dominions. Their position and mutual relation may be readily defined. They are autonomous communities within the British empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs though united by a common allegiance to the crown, and freely associated as members of the British commonwealth of nations.

This statement is a milestone, Mr. Speaker, on the road of our evolution, and consecrates a situation existing de facto for a certain time for the recognition of which there was needed only the demand from the interested parties.

{Mr. Picard.]

If I may add a personal note, I would say I was privileged to attend many sittings at the conference of 1926, and saw at work the leaders of all the nations of the commonwealth. Allow me to state that not only did I find Canada's representatives, who were the present Prime Minister, and the then minister of justice, the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, an equal match for any of the representatives of Great Britain and the other dominions, but I considered that they played a most important role in shaping there the pattern of future relations within the commonwealth. Those who know the inside of the deliberations of the conference, as well as all those, especially in Great Britain, who have commented on the conference, have recognized that the Prime Minister of Canada in acting as a mediator, may I say, between the ultra-imperialist views expressed at that time in the name of Australia and New Zealand and the ultra-nationalist views of Ireland and South Africa, influenced more the outcome of the conference and the drafting of the report and conclusions of its meetings than any other statesmen present.

As to the part played by Mr. Lapointe, the house may be interested in hearing of an incident which occurred during one of the meetings of the conference. On coming back from each meeting the minister would bring to me a portfolio with all the documents he had received that day for consideration and study during the evening. I used to sort them, file them and bring them back for his attention when the time required it. One day I found a small piece of paper, of which I have a photostatic copy, which I realized was not in the handwriting of Mr. Lapointe. The note said:

It seems to me to be working very well in the direction of a general resolution of approval by all instead of ratification by some—unless Austen feels that he can persuade them all to ratification, which I confess I doubt after Lapointe and Hertzog.

Hertzog was then the leader of the South African delegation. The next day I went to No. 10 Downing street and inquired of a secretary as to whose handwriting this was, and discovered it was the handwriting of the Right Honourable A. Balfour, one of the British delegates at the time. Evidently he had passed it to his neighbour to show him it was better to accept simply approval, on account of the strong stand taken at the conference by Mr. Hertzog and Mr. Lapointe.

But some may say there is a margin between the enunciation of a doctrine and the subsequent adoption of practical procedures needed to apply it. Let me give you another incident which occurred in 1927, during the naval disarmament conference. At that time also I accompanied Mr. Lapointe, who was leading the Canadian delegation; and when we arrived in Geneva we discovered that there were three nations represented, the British empire, the United States and Japan. The first morning the leading delegate from Ireland, Mr. O'Higgins, who during that same conference was murdered while on a trip to Ireland, called Mr. Lapointe and asked him whether at the next meeting of the empire delegation, in the afternoon, he would take steps to have this situation rectified. That afternoon we were told all that had happened at the conference before our arrival. This information was given by the first lord of the admiralty, and dealt with complicated technical matters of naval armament and so on. When this was over and Mr. Bridgeman asked whether any dominion delegate had a question to ask, Mr. Lapointe replied, "No, I have no question, because I do not think I have been invited here. I am here with a letter from the king appointing me his representative for Canada, yet I do not see the name of Canada anywhere at this conference, so I must have come to the wrong meeting." He had barely made the statement when Lord Robert Cecil, another British delegate, said, "Mr. Lapointe is perfectly right. These gentlemen of the admiralty and the dominions office are much slower to perceive changes in imperial relations. This state of affairs will be changed by to-morrow." From the next day all the letter-heads and papers concerning the conference were reprinted and redrafted to include seven nations, Australia, Canada and so on. As Lord Robert Cecil said, it takes time to have these changes understood by certain people.

I am taking more time on this portion of my remarks than I had planned. Let us come to the start of the present war. Canada's participation was the outcome of the will of the nation, as expressed by parliament. People may have different opinions as to the advisability of this or that step in the prosecution of the war, but no one can say that any decision arrived at by the government or by parliament was not the decision of a nation acting of its own free will and taking a stand approved by the majority of its people. I for one have been a strong opponent of certain measures; and since I have never been a blind follower I have expressed myself in no uncertain terms. But that does not prevent me from acknowledging the fact that our declaration of war was in no way brought about by the subjection of Canada to any other power. Rather it was brought about by the opinion of the people at large. That the relationship of a majority of our population to parent stock in the British isles was the dominant factor in the determination of our people to declare war at a time more than actual danger to this country was evident; but it is also evident that the solidarity of the democratic nations in which Canada participated at the beginning of the war was one of the factors that made it possible to stem the onrushing tide of German domination. That our people chose the right way and acted in their own eventual interests should be clearly perceived by all except those who are deeply prejudiced. The fact is that Canada acted as a sovereign nation; and as an outcome of the role it has willingly played it is now called upon, together with the other democratic nations of the world, to participate in the San Francisco conference and to study proposals for a world security organization.

Canada's position in international affairs has been greatly enhanced since the days of Laurier and Borden. As I pointed out in connection with the conference of 1926 the present Prime Minister, who has accomplished so much for the advancement of the country in this as in the social field, for many years had the support of a son of the other great race, Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, who ably and faithfully assisted him over a long span of their political life. Their work in the conferences of the commonwealth; Canada's role in the present war; the Prime Minister's present activities among the leaders of the great democracies, and in particular his intimate connection with President Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill, have contributed greatly to the recognition of Canada as one of the forces to be counted upon in the shaping of a postwar organization. Year after year Canada's ministers and ambassadors have been accredited to an ever-increasing number of nations, and have helped make our country better known abroad. Here in Ottawa a number of competent men are following and interpreting world events, helping to shape Canada's role in the international field. Canada's representatives at the forthcoming conference will be greeted as those of a nation that has accomplished much for humanity in the last five years, after coming a long way from its colonial days to its present honoured position in the world.

When he introduced the resolution now before the house the Prime Minister has once more shown his keen devotion to democratic customs, and has followed the practice he advocated in this house twenty-five years ago, during his first session as leader of the Liberal party. At that time he said, at page 465 of Hansard for March 16, 1920:

Mr. Speaker, let me repeat, we on this side of the house are strongly in favour of democratic control of all these matters of foreign policy. I think we would be willing to go so far as to say that we would like to have an expression of opinion of this house to the effect that Canada should not be bound by any treaty or agreement in matters of external relations, of which parliament has not been fully informed in a way of which all of us could take cognizance. That would be helping along the democratic control of foreign relations, and when we have that principle carried out we shall have a sense of security which at present we do not feel in the matter of our external and inter-imperial relations.

After the complete analysis by the Prime Minister yesterday of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, little remains to be said. All of us should have a clear understanding of the matters upon which the four great powers who took part in those discussions were able to agree. The aims of the united nations for the after-war period, as stated recently by the Secretary of State for the United States, Mr. Stettinius, are to obtain for the world "political stability, economic and social advancement, and a wider regard for human rights." All these achievements are subject to the maintenance of lasting peace. No plans for the betterment of humanity can be undertaken unless a system is devised under which it will be possible to prevent the recurrence of world wars whose magnitude would continue to increase, with the advances of science and the improvement of weapons and the means of destruction.

The Dumbarton Oaks proposals may not constitute the perfectly ideal solution that would lead the world to general fraternity and understanding. The will of powerful nations may not yet be such as to lead to the organization on a world scale of an ideal community life. But the proposals appear to me to be the nearest approach yet advocated to a solution of the problem of world security, if carried on in a proper spirit of cooperation between the greater powers, supported by all nations of the world. It must always be remembered, as Sir Robert Borden said in 1919 in this house, as reported at page 17 of volume I of Hansard for that year, when he asked for ratification of the treaty of Versailles, and explained the provisions of the covenant of the league of nations, that—

The enthronement and enforcement of international law must rest upon the faith of the nations just as ordered liberty and justice within each state depend upon the public opinion of its people. Upon each nation is imposed a responsibility commensurate with its power and influence. Unless that responsibility is accepted and fulfilled the peace of the world cannot be maintained.

The same applies to-day, after the end of another war.

[Mr. Picard.]

In the same line of thought, not earlier than November 30, 1944, Mr. Arthur Woodburn speaking in the British House of Commons expressed more or less the same views, in these words:

Peace can never be quite assured if it depends solely on its enforcement by an international police force. The first essential is that people and nations must accept and be willing to observe the law. If that is to be done, we must make laws which are generally acceptable. It is easier to enforce a law which is generally just. In this matter, I would commend the Dumbarton Oaks conversations on world organization, which I think are a step forward based on the experience and failures of the League of Nations and which can take us very far toward organization for peace.

Speaking on the same day, Captain James H. Duncan expressed more or less the same views when he said:

I would just say that no form of international peace, international arrangement or international organization can be successful unless it is based on the goodwill and good faith of the nations concerned. The Dumbarton Oaks proposal suggests a security council of the great powers, but the great powers themselves have to have the will, and to continue to have the will, and, above all, the ability to enforce their will, and nothing set up in the form of an organization can succeed unless the big powers in the world have the will to peace and the will to enforce it.

Some already argue against the fact that all five great powers keep for themselves respectively the right to veto a decision of the security council and also protest against the right of the great powers to sit on the council, even if they are brought before the council. It is true that this is one of the imperfections which I had in mind when I said the proposals were not perfectly ideal; but practicability and not dreams will be the keynote of the new organization, and upon it will rest the success of the venture.

Of course the voting agreement concluded at Yalta may leave great apprehensions in the minds of many as to the dangers resulting from a rupture of friendship between the great powers. The discussion in the British parliament on Dumbarton Oaks, even before the Yalta agreement, shows that a great many British members were apprehending trouble.

To this anxiety I found a very humoristic, but at the same time practical answer in the New York Sun, written by the columnist H. I. Phillips, and which I cannot resist reading. He states:

Of course it would be swell if the rule was that in a showdown no Big Five nation that turned bully could vote when its own case was being acted on, but I guess the whole thing simmers down to the simple fact that if the big powers don't hang together for keeps and get along without having to put their troubles up to the small nations, no voting arrangement is ever going to make much difference.

Any time the Big Five let's things go that far it will be too late for anything but jet planes and rockets and they will be flying through the air before anybody starts balloting on the question, "Is you is or is you ain't a world nuisance?"

Only the Big Five will have the wallop, the dough and the draft lists to fight another war. Ecuador, Iceland, or Guatemala ain't going to start the next global shindig. And if the Big Five can't keep the peace among themselves without no Gallup polls, then it can't be kept.

An appropriate answer to those who fear granting too much authority to the great powers can readily be found in the fact that if they are not given that power the peace of the world would be as much in the danger as after Versailles. This idea was supported in the British House of Commons by Mr. Daniel Chater, in the following terms:

If these proposals are to mature it seems likely that a great deal of criticism will centre on the enormous power that is to be placed in the hands of the security council. But I accept the giving of that power as a logical necessity if we are to have effective means of preventing world aggression.

Let us remember that these four nations will have the power to prevent another world war, inasmuch as they will have to bear the great burden of preventing or punishing aggression. If it should be found impossible to obtain agreement among the members of the united nations . . . then these four powers could constitute the nucleus of an instrument which will be strong enough to prevent or punish aggression. There is no reason why other nations should not congregate around that nucleus.

As to the composition of the security council I think the Dumbarton Oaks proposals have failed to take into account the role played by certain nations in this war, and their importance for the maintenance of peace.

I think the Prime Minister had the right approach to the question when he said in this house on July 9, 1943:

In the view of the government, effective representation on these bodies should neither be restricted to the largest states nor necessarily extended to all states. Representation should be determined on a functional basis which will admit to full membership those countries, large or small, which have the greatest contribution to make to the particular object in question.

And on August 4, 1944, still before the Dumbarton Oaks proposals were made known, the Prime Minister said this:

In determining what states should be represented on the council with the great powers, it is, I believe, necessary to apply the functional idea. Those countries which have most to contribute to the maintenance of the peace of the world should be most frequently selected.

I am sure that in the forthcoming conference efforts will be made by Canada to have a readjustment of chapter VI, section A. A country that has contributed as much as Canada has done during the crisis, not only in men serving in her armed forces, but in supplying to other nations such vast quantities of weapons of war and in feeding our allies by our enormous shipments of food, has the right to expect that in any organization devoted to the maintenance of peace it will have a place proportionate to its efforts in time of war.

No consideration, Mr. Speaker, of a world security system will be complete by establishing a machinery intended to make an aggressive war impossible, because the peace of the world is hinged to the economic security of nations. In a recent interview Mr. Stettinius, United States Secretary of State, declared:

"Unless there is economic security in the world, we are bound to have trouble; but in order for a nation to have economic security it must be able to produce and trade profitably with other nations. Each nation can help the others, and in so doing it will increase its own prosperity. All of them need more production and more trade if each is to maintain employment and increase the living standards of its people. There are many ways in which this can be done.

"Above all, we must try to facilitate the means by which nations can trade and carry on financial operations among themselves for their mutual benefit. Obstacles that stand in the way of this react on the country establishing them."

Among these obstacles Mr. Stettinius listed excessive tariffs, quotas, exchange controls, discriminations and many others, all of which, he believes, can be remedied or removed by international agreements. Through such agreements we can also obtain for our own business men reasonable conditions for the conduct of their affairs in other countries.

"In that connection, we have learned that industry can no longer restrict its objectives to commercial objectives. In managing its affairs it must be kept in mind the whole field of human relations—labour, capital, consumer and public must be considered. This is as true in international affairs as it is in national ones."

With this expression of opinion, and with the recent joint statement of President Roosevelt and the Prime Minister I am fully in agreement as should be the house.

I should like here to make clear that in economic matters Canada's future policies should be based on our economic interests, and not on sentimental impulsion.

Canada should envision its interests in regard to world economic policies and not base them solely on regional or imperial bases. Great Britain has given us examples of the course to be followed by us. I have on a previous occasion given impressive figures on British trade as orientated by British financial interests and the opportunity of maintaining its spheres of influence in foreign countries. I need not repeat them to-day. But it may be advisable to notice that when our grain elevators were overflowing with wheat and we could not market it, Great Britain was buying large quantities from Argentina. When our pulp and paper industry was operating at only twenty-five per cent of its capacity, Great Britain was buying heavily from Norway, Sweden and Russia. These transactions were motivated only by questions of financial return and political expediency and not by sentiments of imperial relations and friendship. Such sentiments should not be invoked only to help Great Britain. Canada's policies should be dictated by Canadian interests, and any curtailment of its rights or any sacrifices she may be called upon to make economically should be on a basis of world relationship on a par with any other nation of the world.

Canada should be ready to participate on an equal footing with the other states in any system of tariff adjustment or, if needed, in the abolition of trade barriers, but I repeat that subject to the same restrictions or readjustments as would be consented to by other nations, Canada should follow its own course in the orientation of its economic life.

Of equal importance to the economic security of a nation is the social security of its inhabitants. This government has already put on the statute books a number of measures that will give a larger degree of welfare and security to the masses than was heretofore contemplated. Its plans for the readjustment of Canadian industry and agriculture to after war conditions and the passing from a war economy to a peace economy are in the process of elaboration.

If we are ready to devote our efforts to the maintenance of peace and the attainment of economic security we must also have in turn the energy to tackle social security and to prevent as much as possible the economic aftermath of the war. A country that has been able to muster the industrial and agricultural strength this country has developed has no reason to return to an economy of poverty when during the war it has found the resources to carry on.

In conclusion I wish to say that this war has been a struggle between two ideologies, between two systems of government for the world. Had nazi Germany and Japan been able to extend their own forms of government to most peoples of the earth, a so-called master race would have kept in slavery those they claimed to be subject races. Any life within that new order would have been the negation of human dignity and human rights. Any life outside the sphere of German domination would have been so influenced economically and otherwise as to bring about a considerable reduction of the standards of living for nations that hitherto had known a better fate.

[Mr. Picard.]

Now that victory for the allied nations appears certain and within sight, it is of prime importance that the last touch be put to the charters that will be the guiding beacons in the world of to-morrow. For the maintenance of peace the Dumbarton Oaks proposals constitute a promising basis for discussion. It is in my mind a plan vastly superior to the league, because it has more effective power than the league. If, as I stated previously, it meets with the effective approval and receives the support of all nations it may prove to be a barrier against the ambitions and drunken nightmares of barbarians.

Although imperfect and although it demands from all nations sacrifices and the submission to a higher super-state in the matter of international relations, it should be considered a worthy attempt at world reorganization.

Before taking my seat I should like to quote an excerpt from a statement by Senator Norris, that famous United States liberal, in which he defined a liberal. 'I would like' this to be applied in connection with the somewhat startling departure from usual international practice that we find in the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. Senator Norris said:

I should say a Liberal is a man with an open mind who sees the changes that are taking place in the world about him and realizes that our system of government must keep pace with those changes. He realizes the value of precedents, but he also realizes that we are inclined too often to follow those precedents which were established under conditions entirely different from those existing at the time the precedents are employed.

Let us all be liberals, then, in so far as the security proposals are concerned. Let us all face the necessity of providing radical measures in the hope of preventing another world catastrophe. No sacrifice of sovereign rights is too high, no expense is too extravagant, if it should have as a reward the maintenance of peace and security in the world.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I think we have every reason to rejoice at the fine spirit of cooperation that exists to-day between the great nations of the world, Great Britain, the Soviet Union and the United States of America. Our recent victories could not have been achieved without that type of cooperation. Had this existed back in the nineteen-thirties very likely this war would never have been fought. If peace is to be maintained after the war this cooperation will have to continue, because no international organization, at least not of the type now visualized, can maintain peace unless the major powers can agree.

I am prepared to support the government's action in respect to the invitation to send representatives to San Francisco. Furthermore I am in general accord with sections 1, 2, 4 and 5 of the resolution. On the other hand, I am not quite certain what the approval of section 3 really implies. For instance, does it imply an endorsement of the final act of the Bretton Woods agreement? I say that for this reason: certain statements have been made recently by President Roosevelt and Mr. Edward Stettinius which would indicate that Bretton Woods is an integral part of the international organization that is to be set up. I should like to quote what these two gentlemen have said. I quote first from the Lethbridge Herald of February 13, in which I find this statement attributed to President Roosevelt:

The Bretton Woods plan is the cornerstone for international economic cooperation.

Then in the February issue of the Reader's Digest I find an article by Mr. Edward Stettinius. Referring to the monetary stabilization fund, the international bank for reconstruction and various other international organizations that have been set up, he says:

All these organizations clearly are but so many spokes to the international wheel. They need a hub. The Dumbarton Oaks plan authorizes the assembly to act as the hub with the economic and social council as its principal operating mechanism.

It must be quite plain that if any of the spokes of the wheel are unsound, that wheel may collapse and the hub with it. Therefore I say that if the final act of Bretton Woods is a declaration of unsound policy it is bound greatly to endanger the success of any international organization that is set up to try to maintain peace in the world in the future.

I believe the Dumbarton Oaks proposals would form a basis for the discussion of an international peace organization, but there is one thing we must keep in mind at all times: you cannot build a temple of peace upon a foundation of economic war. Unfortunately this government, along with certain other governments, has already sponsored or played a leading part in sponsoring economic war, even before the European war has ceased.

When I say that I have in mind the Bretton Woods agreement. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in his speech reminded us that two or three years ago he stated that a new social order would have to be brought in and be well on its way before the end of the war or we might look for it in vain, and he referred to the fact that certain steps had been taken to that end already—UNRRA, mutual aid and lend-lease. I think we all agree that those were fine measures in the interests of peace, but I sometimes wonder why it is proposed that after the end of the war mutual aid and lend-lease shall be supplanted by the final act of the Bretton Woods agreement. Lend-lease and mutual aid undoubtedly help to maintain peace, just as the final act of the Bretton Woods agreement is bound to cause international friction throughout the world.

I think the Prime Minister is to be congratulated upon the speech that he delivered to both houses of parliament at Westminster on May 11, 1944. I took that speech to mean that he stood against international centralized control and in favour of international co-operation on policies discussed and approved by each country. And I agree that while it is desirable to have close cooperation between members of the British commonwealth of nations, it is equally important to extend that cooperation to other nations of the world that desire peace. The declaration of the principles of the Atlantic charter laid the foundations for such cooperation. To my mind the greatest danger in the way of implementing that declaration is first of all the post-war fight for foreign markets, and secondly the attitude of certain people and certain organizations towards the Soviet Union. You often hear people say that it is no use trying to have cooperation with the Soviet Union because they cannot be trusted. I say that we have no more reason to distrust the Soviet Union than the Soviet Union have to distrust us, on the basis of what happened from 1930 to the outbreak of war.

I believe that world peace will be greatly endangered if the decisions reached at Bretton Woods and embodied in the final act are put into operation, because to my mind that final act means four specific things. First it means a declaration of economic war; second, it means the restoration of a gold standard of an even more vicious character than that of 1925; third, it is bound to be a menace to the good will that exists between the members of the British commonwealth of nations, and lastly it means loss of national sovereignty. I agree with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggart (Mr. Coldwell) when he said it would be necessary to surrender a certain degree of sovereignty. You do that every time you sign an agreement or cooperate. But unfortunately the Bretton Woods agreement goes far beyond that. It means loss of sovereignty to the extent that an international authority would control your national budget.

San Francisco Conference

The Prime Minister I know has stated that Canada is not committed to the final act of the Bretton Woods agreement. But let us remember this. Canada sent experts, so-called, to the London conference, to the Washington conference and to Bretton Woods, and these experts took with them a Canadian plan. Three plans were considered: the White plan, the Keynes plan and the Canadian plan, and we were told over the air that the final plan that was adopted resembled more closely the Canadian plan than either of the other two. Is it likely that any government would send experts to a conference with a plan if they fundamentally disagreed with the plan their experts were presenting. So undoubtedly we may say that the government, when it sent its experts with the Canadian plan, must have been in accord with its general principles, and there is no fundamental difference between the Canadian plan and the final act of the Bretton Woods agreement.

I used the term "so-called experts" advisedly, because I judge whether a man is expert by his record and by his actions. I remember that these men who are advising the government to-day on financial affairs are generally speaking, the same men who were advising the government in the nineteen-thirties, in the depression years, during which period our production was down to less than fifty per cent of its capacity. I ask the members of this house, if you hired an expert to run your plant, and over a period of days, weeks, months or years that expert failed to develop the capacity of your plant to more than fifty per cent, would you be willing to call that man an expert? I am satisfied that long before the end of a year, perhaps at the end of a month, you would fire him because you would consider he was thoroughly discredited. Yet these very men whose policies were so thoroughly discredited in the depression years are the ones who are now advising the government on the financial policy of the future, and they have started over the same route that we were taking between the two wars; they are already leading us back to the gold standard.

Agreement and cooperation among the nations of the world on a basis of mutual advantage is essential if we are to have a lasting peace. I think we are all agreed on that. International trade should be a bond of friendship, not a cause of international friction. To hope to maintain peace through some form of international organization while at the same time carrying on a policy of economic war is in my opinion simply to live in a fool's paradise. Let me recall what President Wilson said shortly before his death:

[Mr. Quelch.]

The seeds of war are sown in hot, successful commercial rivalry.

I doubt whether at any time in the history of this world that was going on to a greater extent than it is now in preparation for a fight for the markets of the world.

The failure of the league of nations has already been attributed by some members of this house to the fact that it did not have at its disposal an armed force. To my mind that was not the cause of the failure of the league. Its failure was rather due to the fact that the nations represented on the league lacked either the will or the desire to impose any policy that might interfere with the profitable trade of their own nation, and that was especially evident in regard to Japan, Italy and Germany. Unless we are really sincere in our desire to do everything in our power to maintain peace, if we, on the other hand, seek advantage for ourselves at another nation's expense, we make a mere farce of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals.

I want to deal briefly with my main criticism of the final act of the Bretton Woods proposal. I made four charges against that final act, and I want to deal with each one.

In regard to international trade, it has been customary to regard default as arising from a nation's buying more than it can pay for. Today, however, it is realized that the blame often rests with the creditor nation because the creditor nation takes steps to prevent the debtor nation from balancing its payments. In the past, nations threatened with an unfavourable balance of payments were able to institute exchange restrictions as a protection. But under article 14 of the final act of Bretton Woods that power has been removed under threat of expulsion from the organization, unless permission can be obtained from the international board. Then a debtor nation unable to meet its obligations is severely penalized under article 5, section 8. So it may be charged that whilst the final act gives no protection to nations in default, it at the same time removes one of their main defences and then severely penalizes them for being unable to meet their obligations.

Now I ask, is a policy of that kind, distinctly detrimental to the debtor and to the advantage of the creditor, likely to bring about good feeling throughout the world. It will be argued, of course, that the creditor countries will be willing to make long-term loans to the debtor nations in order that the latter shall not continue to default. But surely it must be evident that while long-term loans may be necessary in the development of new countries they cannot be looked upon as an alternative to the acceptance of payment in goods on current account. The result would merely mean the expansion of debt, thereby increasing the difficulty of the debtor nation in balancing its future payments. And, in so far as the creditor nation is concerned, it would mean a continuation of pre-war imperialistic policies—true, not carried out by force of arms but carried out by monetary penetration, backed up, no doubt, by force of the international organization which it is proposed to set up.

On former occasions I have dealt at some length with this question and I will not take up much time now, but we have heard different officials of the Department of Finance, as well as other prominent individuals, state that the prosperity of Canada in the future will depend on her making large-scale foreign investments. That policy is being preached in all the creditor countries, and therefore we see the stage being set for keen competition in order to try to maintain large-scale foreign investments and large favourable balances of trade.

Surely, however, it is obvious that the prosperity of a nation cannot depend upon maintaining large-scale foreign investments, because when you export more than you import you are actually reducing the standard of living of the people to that extent; and when you remember that from 1935 to 1939 we maintained on an average a favourable balance of payments to the extent of over $218,000,000 annually, while at the same time we had a million people on relief, I think you will be prepared to admit the absurdity of the contention about maintaining foreign investments and a favourable balance of trade as a means of bringing about the prosperity of people.

My next criticism of the final act of Bretton Woods is that it means the return to the gold standard of an even more vicious character than that of 1925. I recall that about three years ago I stated that we were getting ready to bring about reconstruction on a gold basis and were getting ready to go back to the gold standard, and the then Minister of Pensions (Mr. Mackenzie) at that time most emphatically denied that statement and said that we would certainly not go back to the gold standard. I wonder if he would be prepared to-day to say that we are not getting ready to return to the gold standard. I do not think anyone would dare to deny that assertion in view of the part that Canada has already played in bringing about the final act of Bretton Woods. Paul Einzig has this to say regarding Bretton Woods:

On the basis of the above facts, nobody could honestly deny that the proposed system is the most vicious form of the gold standard, far worse than this country was fortunate enough to abandon in 1931.

What he refers to is a series of statements regarding the use of gold as a basis in the new set-up. The reason I say it is more vicious than that of 1925 is this. Under the old gold standard, if any nation had an unfavourable balance of trade and was unable to balance its international payments, it had the power to devalue its currency without appealing to anyone. Under the new set-up that is limited to a ten per cent devaluation, unless the country first obtains permission of the international board, upon which will be sitting its trade rivals, and it is questionable whether it would receive permission to bring about that devaluation.

Before leaving that question I might perhaps briefly review the history of the gold standard in the past. You will recall that we were on the gold standard in 1914 and then war was declared, whereupon it became necessary to expand our resources to the maximum, and we went off gold. Production steadily expanded from 1914 to 1918. Before 1918 was reached, we were making ready to go back to the gold standard after the war and credit restrictions were instituted in order to bring about a certain relationship between our gold reserves and the money in circulation. We went on gold in 1925, but we were forced off in the depression years, in 1931, and at that time Churchill bitterly denounced the gold standard. We went off the gold standard, but in Canada we maintained the gold basis and we maintained it until the declaration of war. Once again it became necessary to expand our resources to the utmost and we were forced off gold. Now, as we once again approach the end of war, we are getting ready to return to the gold standard notwithstanding that history has shown that when it has been necessary to expand our resources to the maximum we have had to go off gold, whereas in peace time we have gone back to gold and reduced production.

Surely, if it is necessary to go off gold to have the greatest possible amount of production in war time, it should be equally necessary to keep off gold in order to do the same in peace time.

After all, the people in all countries are the same. People, generally speaking, are not interested in buying gold. They are interested in one thing only; they are interested in buying goods and services. They do not care how many grains of gold their money buys; what they are interested in is the amount of goods and services which it will obtain. Therefore, undoubtedly, the correct basis of money is goods and not gold.

My next criticism of the final act of the agreement is that it seriously jeopardizes the good will that exists between the members of the British commonwealth of nations. Section 1 of article XI provides that members of the fund shall institute a boycott or blockade against non-member nations.

Fortunately public opinion in Britain is being aroused against the dangers of the Bretton Woods agreement and there is every likelihood that Britain will refuse to become a member and will revive the sterling group; or, if she did join, and later in order to avoid bankruptcy applied for permission to devalue sterling and was refused, yet persisted, she would be forced to withdraw. If that happened, what would happen in Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa. Under the terms of the agreement we should be forced to place a blockade or boycott against Britain.

If the people who drew up the final act of the Bretton Woods agreement had in mind the destruction of the British empire they could not have provided better means of bringing that about, because either this would destroy the British empire, or, on the other hand, the British empire as a whole would have to withdraw—and I hope that is what would be done. I am amazed that the representatives of any government in any of the dominions would agree to article XI, which deals with this matter, because that provision was not in the Keynes plan or the White plan or the Canadian plan. It is a new clause which was introduced at the last minute.

An hon. MEMBER: Who by?

Mr. QUELCH: Somebody asked "Who by?" I do not know who was responsible for it. I doubt very much if he would like to have his name disclosed.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Certain traitors, I guess.

Mr. QUELCH: To my mind the Bretton Woods agreement would certainly destroy all chance of a new social order. It would be bound to create international friction. Some people will argue that it will be changed; but when it is so obvious that it is bound to cause international friction why pass it in the first place?

My final criticism is that this proposed economic policy will mean an end to national sovereignty. And in that regard I should like to quote from a statement made by Mr. P. C. Armstrong in the Labour Gazette. This is what he says:

[Mr. Quelch.]

Something will come out of these studies, but it must be clear that they involve a considerable degree of surrender of each country's control of its own economy to some central body. Obviously, no country can hope to engage in that sort of extravagance, in internal policies, which leads to its currency falling in the markets of the world and expect any system of stabilizing currencies to protect it against this result. Therefore, international currency control means control of national budgets by an international body, and I suggest that we shall see nothing very drastic or successful in the way of a system of international currency control in the immediate post-war period.

We hope he is right. In the reports of the presidents of the chartered banks we note statements to the effect that we must be prepared to give up a certain degree of our sovereignty in order to put this scheme into operation. As I said before I would be prepared to surrender a small degree of sovereignty as it becomes necessary when you cooperate with other nations, but I would not be prepared to surrender sovereignty to the degree necessary to give away control of our internal policy as undoubtedly envisaged in the final act of the Bretton Woods agreement.

May I just quote from a statement by Sir Charles Morgan-Webb showing what the effect of the final act of the Bretton Woods agreement will be on England. I made the charge that it will undoubtedly destroy good will between members of the British commonwealth of nations. I think this statement of Sir Charles Morgan-Webb shows to what extent it will handicap England. It is a pamphlet entitled "Post-War International Purchasing Power". I quote the following:

The linking of the war debts of the first world war to the capricious medium of gold inevitably made them unpayable. The linking of the present overseas cash debts owing by Britain to gold, as proposed at Bretton Woods, will transform them from an obligation to redeem them in exports into an unpayable obligation to redeem them in gold. As they stand, they are payable in British exports. Transformed into gold obligations, they will fulfil the expectations of American high finance, and drive Britain into default.

If that happened she would likely withdraw from the organization, and we would be in a position where we would have to place a blockade against her.

As I mentioned a little while ago the Prime Minister referred to mutual aid and lend-lease as part of the programme of the new social order; and I am of the opinion that those measures should be continued after the war and adjusted to peace-time requirements. A plan has already been drawn up. It is not a question of Bretton Woods or chaos as we are told so often by certain leading bankers. Other alternative plans have already been formulated, and perhaps the best known one is that sponsored by the London chamber of commerce.

I was speaking to one of the highest officials of the Department of Finance on this matter and I asked him whether or not the London chamber of commerce proposals would be satisfactory. After studying them he said he thought they would be good proposals but the difficulty would be to get other nations to agree to them. I asked him what nations. I said: "Would Russia agree?" He said, "Yes, he thought so".

It finally boiled down to the fact that he did not think the United States would agree. Of course the United States hold eighty-five per cent of the gold reserves of the world and are, therefore, anxious to get the gold back into circulation. But should we turn down a scheme just because the United States will not agree to it and support a scheme which we know to be fundamentally unsound and which may very well wreck the peace organization?

In closing, I would again say that the Dumbarton Oaks proposals might form the basis for a discussion, but I certainly think that when the Prime Minister speaks in closing the debate he should tell us clearly and unequivocally whether or not endorsement of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals means an endorsement of the Bretton Woods final act.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes, and prove his case.

Mr. QUELCH: We may not have assurance from other nations but at least we are entitled to that assurance from the Prime Minister. It is quite a while since the final act was formulated and we were promised a debate on the question in this house. We were promised that Canada would not agree to the final act until it had been agreed to by parliament. Up to the present time we have not had an opportunity to debate the question in this house. Now we are being asked to endorse proposals for a certain international organization of which we are told the Bretton Woods final act is the corner-stone.

I believe that under a sound economic policy Dumbarton Oaks could lead us to peace, but under an unsound policy, such as the final act of the Bretton Woods agreement, whilst we might possibly prevent an international war, we would on the other hand make civil war inevitable.

Mr. A. G. SLAGHT (Parry Sound): In addressing the house on this very important subject may I preface my remarks by saying that I believe this resolution and the San Francisco conference should receive the unanimous support of the people of Canada and the hon. members of this house. Before I deal directly with the resolution may I say a word with reference to the attitude of the hon. the house leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) as disclosed in his very able address to-day. I enjoyed that portion of his address which constituted an analysis and somewhat provocative and proper questions as to the interpretation of the proposed charter which we have before us as a basis. But I was somewhat surprised that the hon. member, despite the virtuous assertion of his desk-mate that the debate should be conducted without partisan or political prejudice creeping in—and I think it should—to hear him this afternoon as the house leader of a party bidding for power to whom these proposals have been available since last December, assail the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and our supposed lack of government policy in the language which he used. I am going to give you, sir, three or four sentences to which I take distinct exception. The hon. leader of the opposition said that there was nothing to indicate what position Canada was taking with respect to close collaboration with the United Kingdom and other commonwealth nations as to San Francisco. Surely the sending of an able representative to England to participate in commonwealth discussions prior to the journey to San Francisco makes that criticism purely one made for political purposes.

His second complaint is that the Prime Minister and the government ruled out John Bracken, as he put it, as a delegate and that conduct or ruling was regarded by his party as an unprovoked slight. I want to deal with that in a moment. Then the hon. gentleman went on to say that this government was derelict in its duty in failing to provide a full-time minister and the essential facilities properly to handle and discuss our relations with other nations; and he said that his party made its views known on this subject which he suggested had been kept in the background and in fact almost underground as far as the policies of the government were concerned. That is all very delightful language to be heard in a non-partisan address. Then he charged our government with pursuing an ostrich-like course in time of peace, only to pull its head out of the sand at the last minute and find this country involved in a war.

I am at a loss, Mr. Speaker, to understand why John Bracken should have been afforded an opportunity to go to San Francisco. What has he been doing for the last two and a half years? He was invited by the government to seek a seat in this House of Commons, where the leader of any party belongs unless he has something tugging at his coat sleeves to make him believe he can serve his nation better, in war time, by going from coast to coast hiring halls and making, purely political speeches. Let me say to my hon. friend that during those two and a half years, and for years before that, the Prime Minister of this country devoted himself every day, and every minute of every day, to the business of the country and the business of winning the war. He has not taken time off to play partisan politics, and my hon. friends know that to be the case. I hear some murmurs, some grumbles, from over here in the sticks, but I did not hear the interruption. I had not intended to mention any political matters, but since these statements have been made by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) I want to leave with hon. members the opinion of the Prime Minister of Great Britain, Winston Churchill, the most beloved man in the British empire to-day. This is what he had to say about our leader, our leadership and Canada's part in the war. I quote from a cable addressed to the Prime Minister:

In the darkest days Canada under your leadership remained confident and true. Now the days are brighter, and when victory is won you will be able to look back with just pride upon a record surpassed by none.

I leave to hon. members of this house and the people of Canada the choice between the political viewpoint of the hon. member for Peel and the viewpoint of that great man Winston Churchill, who plays no politics but, like our own leader, gives every minute of every day to the service of the empire.

I think we all know, or believe we know, what the allied nations are fighting for. It can be set forth in one word: freedom. But we must appreciate the need for this international charter, and the consequences of failure to bring it into existence. In this respect I adopt the words of my hon. friend the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell), who said we should not send the Canadian delegation to San Francisco expecting to get every last item or clause we might hope for. We should go there in a spirit of give and take, prepared if necessary to accept something less than we desire. The great thing is that this meeting of nations should be a success, not a failure, and that a charter should be evolved for the future peace of the world. Surely all will agree with that.

[Mr. Slaght.]

I believe that to appreciate the need for this charter we should examine the record for a moment as far as our enemies in this war are concerned. I read somewhere, as a criticism of allied conduct after the last war, this statement: "With the lives and happiness of millions of the human race in jeopardy, we cannot be forever blowing bubbles." Let not our conduct be such that this accusation could possibly be levelled at the allied nations after this war. The leaders of the two enemies with whom we are locked in mortal combat, and I believe, in the main, the followers of those leaders, are ruthless, cruel, bloodthirsty gangsters, nothing less. It is significant that both Germany and Japan are sworn enemies of religion, and by religion I mean the various philosophies of life that constitute the religions of the world, not only our Christian religion. That is a significant fact which we should keep to the fore in dealing with people of that type. They set aside religion and those philosophies which make for better living, better neighbours and those virtues that we in Canada have been taught to worship, no matter under what creed. From the German churches, says the Archbishop of Canterbury, has come no protest against such crimes as the attempt to exterminate the Poles, or the horror and misery of the Jews. For five years we have had to put up with announcements over the BBC such as this: "Fifty more Czechs, including old women and children, have just been shot." The nazis have killed, tortured, maimed, starved, plundered and burned altogether too much for any sane man in this world to adjudge them entitled to any kind of decency in our treatment of them.

Mr. JACQUES: What about Greece?

Mr. SLAGHT: Yes, Greece is another sample of intensive cruelty, beyond all military needs. I could multiply them many times, but I shall pass along in what I have to say. I could speak of the destruction of thirty thousand civilians including old men and women with babies at their breasts, in that old Dutch city of Amsterdam—civilians who were murdered in cold blood by this ruthless gangster in the early stages of the war. And when the civilian population was fleeing from Paris along the roads the nazi aircraft zoomed up and down, spraying machine-gun death upon those helpless hurds of human beings, in order to build stop-logs of their bodies, so as to better the ruthless assault of the German army.

When I speak of Germans I do not include one hundred per cent of the Germans, but I do mean the nazi educated hordes who constitute the great majority of people in the German nation to-day. Let me hasten to say that we have a great number of splendid German citizens in Canada. To that large number of people nothing I have said would have the slightest application. But let us recall that, in the main, they came here to escape conditions in Germany. They came to Canada to escape revolution in Germany many years ago; they came to this great land of ours to be away from those very conditions we are bound to indict.

In the last hundred years Germany has taught her youth one continuous lesson, that of the grandeur of war—the lust to kill. From their very cradles German babies have been nursed on the milk of hatred of all races other than the German race. We can remove a tiger from the jungle, put him in a cage in the zoo, and have the patience to train him. But when the keeper takes a chance some day and does something for the tiger, out comes the claw, the fang, and he becomes a killer, all over again.

Let us recall that in the last century Germany has begun and fought five separate wars of aggression. In July, 1900, the ex-kaiser made a speech at Bremerhaven to his German troops, in which he said, "When you meet the foe you will defeat him; no quarter will be given; no prisoners will be taken."

And so we find to-day that Germany has become a habitual enemy. She has abandoned Christianity, and has substituted for it the worship of one man, der Fuehrer. What a man to worship! When he walks he struts; when he speaks he screams. His watchword is treachery, and his lust is for blood and the will to kill.

That has been extended to the youth of Germany, to the point where we find ourselves faced now with a proposal which we hope and believe can, once and for all, stamp this monster out, beyond any possibility of future war and conflict for our children.

Let me now turn from that ugly picture and say a word or two respecting the proposals. I make the suggestions, as we were invited to do, and after having given some close study to the proposals. I ask this: Is Canada content with the present constitution of the permanent court of international justice, and content to continue it in force; or are there provisions which Canada thinks should be inserted—as the proposals invite us to insert them, if desired? My own view is that amendments are needed to the set-up of the present permanent court of international justice. They are of a somewhat legal and detailed character, however, and I do not purpose taking the time of the house to deal with them now.

If I may be permitted, I am going to give a memorandum to the Prime Minister, so that when Canada's delegation goes to San Francisco it will have my views before it. Is it considered desirable that Canada should endeavour to have one of the six non-permanent memberships on the security council, and that she should endeavour to select her delegate for that purpose in advance—if it is believed that the San Francisco conference will go so far as actually to select the security council? Then, is it desirable that Canada secure at least one member of the eighteen to be elected on the economic and social council, and to select such proposed representative—if it is thought that the conference will reach the stage of electing those eighteen members?

Then what is an expert, as the word is used in chapter IX of the proposals? That portion of the chapter which troubles me for the moment is this:

Section D: Organization and Procedure:

1. The economic and social council should set up an economic commission, a social commission, and such other commissions as may be required. These commissions should consist of experts.

I find no definition of an expert. What occurred to me was this: In Canada there might be suggested to sit on one of those commissions a man with splendid business training, but with no university education, a man who has made a success of a large industrial venture or one who is eminently fitted to sit on a commission of that kind. Would it not be well either to interpret or to define the word "expert" so as to avoid any friction later on. I say that because, as I see it, we must make this as free from any possibility of friction as it is possible to make it, and I suggest a definition so that an expert might not be defined as one having purely academic or professional qualifications necessary to bring him within the strict definition of the word.

Then with respect to the set-up of the position of secretary-general, I suggest, for the consideration of our delegation, that under the present proposals too many jobs are placed on his back. He is declared to be chief administrative officer. That, in itself, is a big task. It is also declared that he shall sit as secretary at the meetings of the general advisory committee. Then, he is to sit as secretary at the meetings of the security council. It is conceivable that those two bodies may sit in different places, and in my view the machinery would be facilitated if it is suggested that he should be appointed—not elected—and that an assistant might be appointed who in his absence or at his request might take on part of his duties. These of course are small details, but I give them to the Prime Minister, in passing, for what they might be worth.

I was greatly impressed by the most able address delivered by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), particularly where he dealt with the question of voting procedure and voting power. He made clear to the house that we proposed urging that a functional basis of recognition should be adopted, so that Canada, as one of the greater among the lesser countries, should not have simply one vote as against one vote of a beloved but smaller and less important neighbour. I might have in mind, for instance, one of the South American countries. In my belief the functional basis could be recognized.

In that connection may I give to the house the observations of two eminent senators, when they discussed the point in March last in the Senate of the United States. At that time Senator Burton said that sovereign equality was rather an equality in status, and the fact that in any association some nations might have more votes than others would not destroy the principle of sovereign equality. As he understood the matter, they could have differences in representation and still have sovereign equality and the resolution which was passed by the senate did not mean that every nation which joined it would have precisely the same votes in the council. Then Senator Wiley, who I believe is of another political faith, in answer to Senator Burton said that he would say that that was a correct statement of the situation, that the question of votes was not so much involved as the field of authority which would be given to the international organization.

So that Canada might expect to find some support for the view put forward by the hon. member for Essex East and, I believe, by the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell) as well, that that matter ought to be carefully considered by our delegation before departure and possibly a status as to voting secured to which this country because of its record in this war and heretofore is justly and properly entitled.

There are many attractive items that one would like to discuss in connection with this all-important matter, but I do not propose to detain the house with them. There is just one last suggestion I want to place before the Prime Minister—I do this with a good deal of diffidence—in order that the delegation which is to go to San Francisco may give it some thought and bring their own judgment to bear upon it. They may then reject it or possibly, if they find it is something they believe the people of Canada desire and would be helpful, they may adopt it.

[Mr. Slaght.]

I should like to submit the proposal that at San Francisco it should be suggested that Canada become the permanent home of the new international organization, of the general assembly, of the security council, of the international court of justice and of the secretariat, or at least some of them. Personally, I would go so far as to extend an invitation that they all be placed upon Canadian soil. Without being, as a Canadian, immodest I would ask what country has a better claim for that consideration. Let me put it perhaps in a sounder way and ask what country would be as acceptable to all nations, great and small.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is a definite possibility.

Mr. SLAGHT: I am glad to hear my hon. friend say that and I am sure he will feel like supporting it. Let me make just one or two brief suggestions in support of that proposal. Canada could offer a site of such beauty and magnitude as the world could not excel. We could well afford to donate such a site. We could offer the alternative of many sites. Right in our own Ottawa valley we could provide for the creation of a great new city: the city of peace, located in Canada. Just get the vision of that. The city of peace, located in this our country.

That city could be located in the Ottawa valley, up in the Gatineau hills, in the Grimsby valley on the Niagara peninsula or in the magnificence of our mountain fortress in the Rocky mountains. There are so many magnificent and beautiful sites to be suggested. Each allied nation could have its own building combining a home for its delegates and appropriate offices. Just as in the heart of the empire No. 10 Downing street is not only the home of the prime minister where he eats and sleeps and rests, it has as a part of it the great cabinet council where the business of the nation and of the empire is transacted.

I recall that at the world's fair held recently in New York a scheme was worked out whereby many of the European nations built their own beautiful buildings. The architects of the world could come to such a site. The main buildings would have to be constructed with joint moneys, but I believe there could be set up in this country of ours a city beautiful that would be a credit to Canada and to the world.

The crystal dome visualized in the Canadian sunshine might have a dove of peace at its crest, but do not let us forget that there are teeth in these proposals. Probably at the portal we would have a replica of the American eagle, the British lion and the Russian bear so that nobody might enter unless with peaceful intent.

I have travelled almost the road, but let me give you in a word the other geographical position that Canada is in for this proposal. Nature has placed us, so to speak, in a pivotal geographical location. Canada has been referred to as the crossroads of the world. I learned to-day from authorities who know that it is only twenty hours from Ottawa to Moscow if you take a direct route over the north pole. It is only from fourteen or fifteen hours from Ottawa to London, and Ottawa is only a reasonable time from anywhere in the United States. I believe the twenty-one South and Central American countries would welcome Canada as a place to come to. It would be more convenient for them than possibly any other location that would have any chance of success of being selected.

If nature has made us the logical choice, then let us do our part to make welcome this great new organization with a dignity that will be commensurate with our own national development and pride. I should like to leave with the house this concept of the duty of our delegation at San Francisco which I believe might well be adopted to-day. I am going to the words of that great president, Abraham Lincoln, uttered seventy-eight years ago when at the close of a war which had torn his nation he said:

With malice toward none; with charity for all; with firmness in the right, as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in; to bind up the nation's wounds; to care for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow and his orphan—to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace among ourselves and with all nations.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has expressed in this very important resolution which he has moved the clear intention of the government of Canada with respect to the invitation to send representatives to the San Francisco conference.

The resolution first asks the house to endorse the acceptance by the government of Canada of the invitation; that the house recognize that the establishment of an effective international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security is of vital importance both to Canada and the future well-being of mankind; that the house approve the purposes and principles set forth in the proposals of the four governments and agree that the representatives of Canada at the conference should use their best endeavours to further the preparation of an acceptable charter for this new international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security; and finally the house is asked to approve that the charter establishing the organization should, before ratification be submitted to parliament for approval.

I believe that in this connection what is wanted at the present time in the House of Commons by the people of Canada is plain speaking and clear thinking—something which we have not had for many years past with regard to the foreign affairs of this country. After all is said and done, the United States, our great ally, to whom we owe a great deal, have not had a foreign policy for fifty years beyond that of Jefferson and Madison and Monroe, which was to have no entangling foreign alliances unless their country was invaded.

The San Francisco conference comes, it seems to me, at a very peculiar time. We have had the Yalta conference in the Crimea, the Teheran conference and other conferences before that, and what was the result of one of these conferences? In my opinion, to divert so much shipping and armies to the far eastern theatre, more than could be afforded until Germany was beaten forever, greatly prolonged the war. Last year it was predicted that the war with Germany would be over by Christmas, and everybody thought at that time that the war was about to come to an end. But we are far from victory even now, and I believe it would have been better if the San Francisco conference had been postponed until after the war with Germany had been won.

Last December Mr. Churchill, who saved Greece and restored order there, was much criticized in hundreds, yes thousands—the latter figure is correct—of newspapers in the United States and by some of the members of this house for his policy with regard to Greece. We know that the British government later had to send an ambassador to Washington to look after the food and shipping situation so that relief might be sent to the liberated countries of Europe which had suffered so much and were on the verge of starvation. Ships had been withdrawn from European waters and transferred to the Pacific sooner than they should have been, and in that way the war with Germany was prolonged.

I believe that the Prime Minister deserves a great deal of credit for some of the work that has been done, and I think at the present time all parties in the house and out of it cannot stress too much the necessity of team work both with respect to this resolution and until the war is won.

As I study the invitation to this conference, I cannot understand how it came about that four neutral countries in Europe were invited while Poland was not. Poland was the country which Britain went to help at the very start of the war to redeem her pledge, and I believe that Mr. Churchill and Mr. Roosevelt did the best they could for that unhappy country at their conference last month, but still I think Poland should have been invited to the San Francisco conference when four neutral countries got invitations.

I have read a booklet that has been got out by the Department of External Affairs. I may say that this world organization is to promote peace and that there has to be political and economic planning, that San Francisco is to take up the work where Dumbarton Oaks and Bretton Woods left off and write a new charter for world security. I may say myself that the San Francisco conference is to be exploratory and is not related to the settlement of the war itself. This session will close within two or three weeks and the issue will then be up to San Francisco and the forty countries. more or less, that will meet in conference there. I hope that the conference will be a success.

We have had two great wars, with a long depression intervening between them, and there have been many of these pacts and agreements and notes and Locarnos and Kelloggs in consequence, but they have all ended in failure. This includes the second league of nations, and I believe that the coming conference will contribute little or nothing to the collective security of the future or to world peace. Mr. Morgenthau, in the United States, made the statement, on February 5 that he hoped the world organization which had been outlined at Dumbarton Oaks would be a success. He said that the San Francisco conference would complete it and the Bretton Woods agreement, but he let the cat out of the bag when he added "that, while the United States would join with the other communities within the united nations in an organization to maintain peace, the United States did not guarantee to join in with them," and he would not help to remove one of the most dangerous causes of war—that, at any rate, is my opinion—namely, "economic dislocation." But, I submit, the study of economic problems should precede any proposed agreement that might be submitted looking to security in the future.

[Mr. Church.]

As regards the questions of currency stabilization fund, the international bank, and so on, which the United States congress referred to the banking and currency committee of that legislative body, I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if adopted they would so affect world trade and world employment that the result would mean the end of the British empire. It is no wonder therefore that these proposals have been rejected both by public men and by the press in the United Kingdom. If these proposals were carried out the empire, in my opinion, would pass into liquidation. But the great President of the United States, on February 12, sent a message to congress intimating his approval of both the monetary and bank proposals that have been submitted.

I say that we should know the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth before this country is committed to anything in connection with the coming conference. I do not think we should be committed irrevocably in this last brief session coming at the end of the five-year term of this parliament. After all the great wars in the past hundred years and more, proposals of the same kind have been brought forward, and the lessons of history as to them ignored. As I say, the United States treasurer, on February 12, approved both parts of the proposals, the fund and the international bank, and we were told that the American Bankers' Association were in favour of one but not of the other.

Let us retrace our steps so far as these proposals are concerned, linked as they are with the great problem of collective security and perpetual pacts during the last hundred years and more among the nations of the world. Let us be sane and honest with one another in our attitude to these questions. In my opinion, the San Francisco conference cannot succeed where similar conferences over the past two hundred years have failed.

After the last war I was a member of this house, and was a member for a considerable period in the time between the two wars, and I can remember votes being brought forward every session for the purposes of the league of nations. But it all collapsed. The trip to the league of nations was regarded as a wonderful thing. I remember one Quebec member calling it a joy ride. I would not go as far as that, but it always struck me nevertheless as a sort of consolation prize for anyone who had voted right in the house. If he had done as he had been expected to do he would be sent to the league. In fact, a lady member from southeast Grey, in the southeast corner of the house, who went herself there, once proposed to send me to the league; she said that if I went after I had scoffed at the sham and humbug of Geneva I would come home to pray. But, Mr. Speaker, I have never been blind to the sham and humbug at Geneva which brought us face to face with a second war.

I have heard a great deal in the past about the first war that was to end all wars by Geneva and to make the world safe for democracy and to make this, among other countries, a place fit for heroes to live in. To-day the slogan "On to San Francisco" has been taken up all over the American continent. Well, I should like to see my learned independent friend from British Columbia, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) sent there. He is almost the dean of the house, and he would put a little common sense into the proceedings and tend to temper the clamour and agitation which will prevail there. We all know what will happen at this conference, because we know what happens when a lot of people get together. We know what happens at caucuses in and out of parliament, where all sorts of matters are discussed, from the foundation of the world upward. We know also what happens in community clubs and other organizations of that sort. Once people get together around the table they seem to get different ideas and the result is that there is a great deal of clamour and agitation and not very much that is really constructive.

For these reasons, the proposals which have been made do not commend themselves to me, and I do not think they will commend themselves to the wisdom and the sound judgment of the country. The first league of 1920 wound up in potter's field and caused a second war, and I am afraid of the consequences of this second attempt. At the end of the last war the allies parted friends, but those who had nominally won the war soon found that they were faced with all the elements that would make for another conflict. We lost Italy and Japan. Canada led in all this peace talk and cried aloud for the league and disarmament, that monument of folly. The result was a mad rush for disarmament, which led to another war.

Before we send off this delegation to San Francisco on the present trip of the good ship collective security, may I ask what the charter Party will be? Who will be admiral in charge? Have the shoals and seas of collective security been charted? Will the compass be laid on the table of the House of Commons? Are the proposals of the government to be brought before the house? Will the government announce, in connection with these proposals, those who are to go, or will they meet separately? Are they to have some say or will they do as certain Republicans, selected to go by the United States, intimated to Mr. Roosevelt, when they said that they would carry out what they believed to be right? I would like to know what the long-term foreign policy of Canada is going to be. I have not heard of it. I would like to know what the long-term economic policies not only of Canada, but of Great Britain and the United States and of the other dominions within the empire, are going to be, before we decide to adopt these new proposals. These are matters that should first be considered before any question of collective security for the future can be broached.

Canada has never had a foreign policy except that laid down by Sir John A. Macdonald years ago. On this San Francisco occasion, this dominion will be going to the front—I think I might say that—without anything in the shape of a foreign policy. The new prospectus issued at Dumbarton Oaks in connection with the proposed new league which will emerge from the San Francisco conference contains two provisions as far as I can see; one is the policy of the old league and the other the policy of the new organization and what it proposes to do about the proposed economic council.

If the compass is not carefully examined it is hard to predict what the result will be. The Prime Minister did say that our delegates would meet, to see if they could harmonize their views. In my opinion it will be impossible to harmonize them because there are such wide differences of opinion. I believe in considering every case fairly and speaking common sense and I am not going to join in any halleluiahs chorus and hosannah shouting about the success of the coming world conference, because I have some knowledge of the history of the world with regard to other security leagues for many hundreds of years past.

In connection with this work the body of the new league of nations was settled at Dumbarton Oaks and its framework, the substance of the charter of the united nations, differs little from the functions of the 1920 league of nations. The fundamental provisions are that the security council should be endowed with authority to investigate any dispute, any situation that would lead to international friction or give rise to a dispute in order to determine whether its continuance is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security.

San Francisco Conference

Subsection 2 of section B of the proposals reads as follows:

In general the security council should determine the existence of any threat to the peace, breach of the peace or act of aggression and should make recommendations or decide upon the measures to be taken to maintain or restore peace and security.

The provisions are almost identical with the operative clauses of the concert of Europe and the now defunct 1920 league of nations. But there is one difference. Whereas under the old league of nations the seat of power was the general assembly of the nations, under the Dumbarton Oaks scheme all effective power is transferred to and vested in the security council.

Under chapter V (B) (1):

The general assembly should not on its own initiative make recommendations on any matter relating to the maintenance of international peace and security which has been dealt with by the security council—

And,

... all members of the organization should obligate (sic) themselves to accept the decisions of the security council, and to carry them out in accordance with the provisions of the charter.

In these circumstances is it not farcical to pretend that "the organization is based on the principles of the sovereign equality of all peace-loving states"?

We had a sample of this, Mr. Speaker, in connection with the empire parliamentary association. That was an association for the good of the British empire. They had a sort of executive council inside, and the association ceased to function, and a select few thought that they were the council. They in time turned it into a pan-American organization and forgot all about the empire. Some of the delegates on that association were in favour of disarmament and collective security and the like, and all the sham and humbug of Geneva. Some of them are the very people who are now clamouring for this particular institution.

In connection with this work, if we are to have internationalism let us start with the British empire. In a speech that I made last August 4 on foreign affairs I said:

How is it that more of the dominions are not willing to make an agreement of that sort? We are not real internationalists if we are not ready to join with other branches of the empire, the other dominions, as one family in a united empire policy of cooperation and collaboration with the mother country. Why should we not have a league of nations of our own? As has been well said to-day, the only league of nations that has ever achieved any success is the British empire. The United States knows that; the world knows it; and out of this war there should emerge a great league of nations, namely, the British empire.

[Mr. Church.]

As Lord Milner said in 1919, speaking at Oxford, it was a most strange anomaly to hear that the self-governing parts of the British empire should be joining a league, binding themselves by a formal tie to a number of foreign nations, when they had theretofore been unwilling to enter similar obligations with one another.

That is a fact. Then we had a similar debate on civil aviation in March, 1944. Delegates of certain states and countries who belong to these so-called leagues of nations established for the purposes of peace and security go to the meetings and take certain stands, but when they come back home they do not carry out any of the principles laid down by the said leagues. What have the different states that belong to these different leagues done in the last hundred years for collective security? They have been willing to belong to the different leagues so long as it does not interfere with their own status sovereignty and autonomy or aggression within their own borders.

Where would we have been in this war if we had had such an international policy which meant the giving up of Gibraltar and the Suez, the Cape, the Far East and the West Indies, Alexandria and these other bases around the world? We would have been in the position that I spoke of when I addressed the house on March 28 last, when I said:

Our position would have been impossible. We should have been under pressure to keep neutral. Internationalization presupposes a perfect world of the future. It is one of those dangerous principles.

The British bases to be under the control of an international security council are the backbone of the British empire in the seven seas. Upon them the peace and security of the British empire has depended for 200 years. Without them in this war we would be adrift, the empire would be an absurdity on the map, it would be a body without arteries. It is one of the most dangerous principles of the prospectus for a new league patterned by Dumbarton Oaks.

History teaches us one or two things in connection with this work. Let us not forget the lessons of history. It is inconceivable that English people in the Elizabethan or Victorian eras under Bureleigh and Palmerston or the French under Louis XIV or the Americans under Monroe or Lincoln would have dreamt of submitting their personal concerns to state control, or of surrendering the sovereign rights and national interests of their country to the control of international organization. It was never heard of until recently. A great historian wrote a textbook on the subject. Professor S. R. Gardiner, commenting on the Treaty of Utrecht of 1713, said,

The truth is that states combine readily through fear and very seldom through a desire for the common good, and when Louis XIV ceased to be formidable each state thought exclusively of its own interests.

It was in the same year, 1713, that the great learned scholar, Abbé de St. Pierre first set out the theory of collective security in France. He went to a very able cardinal of France, Cardinal Fleury and asked him to consider the scheme. The cardinal replied, "Have you sent out missionaries to turn the hearts of men?" I think that is what we should do down in San Francisco. We should send out missionaries among some of these forty nations, including some of the four neutrals.

Nothing more was heard of collective security until in 1815 Emperor Alexander I of Russia proposed what is known as the Holy Alliance or the Concert of Europe. Between whom? Between Russia, Prussia and Austria. They were to meet every few years, the contracting parties look over the face of Europe and see how peace and security was. What did it lead to? It led to the great prime minister of Great Britain, George Canning, urging that Britain should get out of Europe and seek a new alliance for a while; and it led by provocation to the United States adopting the Monroe doctrine in 1823. As Lord Castlereagh, the great foreign minister wrote to Lord Liverpool in 1815 at the Quai D'Orsay, "It was not without difficulty that we went through the interview with becoming gravity." It was the spiritual force behind the Concert of Europe of which Russia, Austria and Prussia were the protagonists. They were the high contracting parties. It lasted eight years, its most notable achievement being that it provoked the United States into establishing the Monroe doctrine in 1823.

Then another century passed and you have the league established which I have referred to before, and now Dumbarton Oaks. Mr. Disraeli, speaking in the British House of Commons on July 4, 1864, said:

I lay this down as a great principle which cannot be controverted in the management of our foreign affairs. If England is resolved upon a particular policy war is not probable. If there is under these circumstances a cordial alliance between England and France war is most difficult. But if there is a thorough understanding between England, France and Russia, war is impossible.

If in connection with this matter we substitute the United States or add it to these countries there is hope for the world by power alliance policies. With the alliance between United States, Britain and Russia, if they continue as they have so admirably done during this war there is hope for the world in collective security but not in the old forms of league political security.

I wish to refer to a great textbook writer on foreign affairs, Mr. Walter Lippmann. He has, according to a great editor of the National Review, written a textbook on the war aims of the United States. I read it three times. He was one of the sponsors in that great country of the league of nations under Mr. Wilson. He has recorded the action he took and he is candid enough to admit he was wrong in 1919, and now knows it. To those who were always convinced of the dangerous folly of the whole Wilsonian theory and who marvelled at the blindness of our English pacifists, Mr. Lippmann's book will bring evidence that the day of that particular lunacy is over in the United States. He saw the errors of Geneva. He knows that collective security is a dangerous myth. He is now in favour of the policy of the balance of power. He urges his own countrymen not to make promises unless they are sure to keep them and not to threaten when they cannot themselves carry out their threats.

I commend this book to those who are going to this conference; the author is in favour of a good understanding between the United States and the British empire, and also Russia. At the time of the Venezuelan controversy a great prime minister of Britain, Mr. Balfour, speaking at Manchester in 1896 said: "That the time must come when some statesman of greater authority even than Monroe will lay down the doctrine between English-speaking peoples that war is impossible". I am not going to be a party of the liquidation of the British empire through any such economic council as is here proposed at Dumbarton Oaks. The British empire has stood for centuries like the rock of ages for the peace and security of the world. Next to the Christian church the British empire has done more for freedom, liberty, humanity and civilization and for the peace and security of the world than any other agency, and no one else has done so much for the weaker nations. Britain has protected them with her fleet for four centuries, and even during this war. The tragedy which has overtaken civilization in the past twenty years was born of the league of nations and all its works.

In my opinion the future of Canada and the future of the United States lie in their own peoples. We need the closest and most absolute cooperation and collaboration and understanding between this country and the rest of the British empire, and between Canada and the United States. Our position is of great importance. Our air policy, for instance, should be planned in close consultation with Britain, and we should have an empire council such as has been advocated by Mr. Curtin and Mr. Fraser. I am very sorry to see this conference being held at the present time. We hear very little talk about the London conference of the British nations in early April for empire collaboration first; all we talk is internationalism about San Francisco and California. If we want internationalism let us start with our own empire, which has been the only successful league of nations in the history of the world. The greatest error we have made in this war has been in surrendering too much political, military, financial and economic initiative to Washington; that has been one of our great mistakes. We hear talk about the United States and Canada making bold trade moves. In my opinion it will be fatal to draw up international agreements based on disarmament before we have dealt with the essential questions of trade, quotas, preferential trade, empire trade, defence and migration within the empire first. We must solve these problems first. It is useless to expect harmony when basic principles are at variance. Look at the divergent economic systems of the United States and Britain, these two allies who have worked together so well during this war. Their cooperation after the war is most essential. We must appreciate the economic problems of these two countries and of Canada, for a clear understanding of these matters is needed if we are to carry on in future as we hope we may. For instance, we have the very high wages being paid in the United States. Britain is depending upon her export trade to supply goods and services in exchange for her imports of food and raw materials, while in the United States they consume all but about five per cent of what they produce. I think you will find that the United States will wish to continue its high protective tariff after the war is over. So I contend the first thing to do is to settle these important empire economic and financial questions first.

I wish these San Francisco proposals every success, but let us not forget that the twenty years between the two wars were the most disastrous in the history of the human race. We lost a generation between 1914 and 1918, and the older generation had to carry on until the commencement of this war. After the last war everyone clamoured for collective security, for a league of nations and all that sort of thing, and we saw what that brought about; it caused another war. So that while I hope something will come out of these proposals I do not believe this is the right time to call such a meeting. Further, I believe that for Canada over the head of our own dominions to join any pan-American union would be a fatal mistake, a retrograde step, which might lead to the dissolution of the British empire. Many of these southern countries are fascist, they have not the British outlook; they are not large countries. For the last four hundred years, since the time of the wars with Philip of Spain and Louis XIV and Napoleon, through the two wars in our generation, the security of the world has depended upon Britain's supremacy on the high seas, which brought peace and prosperity from 1815 until the invasion of Belgium, and that will be the case equally in the future.

[Mr. Church.]

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, is this just another attempt to make the world safe for democracy after peace comes? It is a matter of very great importance, and I congratulate all hon. members who have carefully prepared their speeches on this motion. But this is not the first time within the last few years that statesmen have tried to save the world and to end war. There was the treaty of Versailles, which was a failure; but before it was acknowledged to be a failure there was also the Briand-Kellogg pact signed in Paris in 1928, as an added reinforcement to that treaty. Both collapsed, which was very unfortunate. The result of all those efforts was pitiful.

The question now could not be to decide as to peace. We will have peace only when the enemy capitulates. We are discussing now what will be done after peace has come. We are rather ahead of our time. This discussion is premature. A man who is known the world over, Mr. Edward R. Stettinius, Jr., Secretary of State of the United States, published a very interesting article in the Readers' Digest of last February, in which he says there are four corners of the Dumbarton Oaks agreement. I will mention at once the fourth corner, which has to do with disarmament. But see how cautious he is. He does not mention disarmament but says this is the progressive reduction of armaments "which in the modern world have become a crushing burden on the resources of all nations." He does not say we will disarm immediately after peace is signed. He says we will reduce armaments, which is in accord with the aspirations of most of us. Then he adds:

The general assembly of the new international organization is,

(1) To consider the general principles governing disarmament and the regulation of armaments.

They are considering those principles. That is the first step. What will be the second step, according to Mr. Stettinius?

The security council is to go further in order to achieve the least diversion of the world's human and economic resources for armaments.

It is to formulate plans for the establishment of a system of regulation of armaments, and it is to submit those plans to all members.

In the third place, after those plans have been formulated they will be submitted again to the general assembly.

It is a vicious circle, but a vicious circle it will take a long time to go around. Then he goes on with an observation that may bring a smile to the faces of hon. members. He says:

It is not proposed this time that the United States or any other members of the new international organization shall disarm as an example.

No one wants to give an example. Who will start it?

It is proposed that all members of the Organization—

With a capital "O."

—shall travel the road together, and at the fastest possible joint pace.

All together, or nothing. Then he goes on to say:

No nation however is likely to travel either fast or far on this road until it feels able to place full reliance for its security on the international organization.

Now, what would happen is this: We all hope the enemy will soon be defeated. But after it will take a long time to adjust a peace which will last. And only when that has been done, the matter we are now discussing—the Organization with the capital "O"—will start to work. Therefore I submit in the first place that this debate is premature.

In the second place I follow the custom that has been established and express my views in the matter. However this is not the proper way to discuss a matter of such wide scope and with so many ramifications. Some leading members of all parties should be called together to discuss in committee the very important matter we are now debating. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has made a speech, as have the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) and the leaders of other groups. Some private members have also spoken. This does not mean that they have joined in a united front, because it is inevitable that there shall be some differences of opinion.

If a Canadian delegation is to go to San Francisco to attend the conference, then the Canadian delegates should be in accord; which is impossible unless they discuss the matter before we are finally called upon to vote upon it. Therefore I will ask the government to adjourn the debate for the time being, to form a committee to discuss the whole matter around a round table, so that we may know more about the position that will be taken by the country at the conference, if we are to attend.

This brings me to the question of the extension of parliament. We have been told that all must show unity of purpose. I am showing good will and I am ready to go the limit in that matter; but I do not see how three billions of dollars can be swallowed in three weeks—rather I should say two weeks, because the present debate will continue probably into next week. If we go to a discussion of the estimates it will mean that we have not given enough time to the debate now before the house.

I hope there will be an understanding among all parties so that, in the first place, this matter may be studied by a special committee, second, by a committee of the whole house and, in the third place that it may be brought again before the house, sitting as it is now.

The life of this parliament will expire on April 17. We may be told, "Hurry up; hurry up; parliament will die, and afterwards it will be too late." Is that the way to talk to responsible members of parliament? We may be told, "Let us show unity of purpose; let us save the country; let us vote three billions in two weeks." That is what may be said. There are some jingoes who will wrap themselves in the union jack. If we do not agree with them we will be called traitors and bad citizens. We will be told that we are not faithful members of parliament when we are not ready to vote with closed eyes such huge sums of money. It will be said that we are unworthy to be members of parliament, and that is one more reason why parliament will not be revived by extending its term. This is the kind of speech we may hear, very probably, unless by general consent the life of parliament is prolonged. Why should it not be? Is there anybody who is going to play politics at this time about such an important matter? We should have been called in January and then much of our work would have been completed by now. However, we were not called until later and we have only a short time in which to study what has been submitted to us.

Neither the government nor the opposition should feel any false shame about coming down to brass tacks, about coming down to earth and seeing what can be done about an extension of parliament. There might be some criticism in some quarters, but the fact is that the government has the power to extend the life of parliament. It seems to me to be much more logical to extend the term of parliament so that we may give all or nearly all our time before the conference to a study of what has been said by Mr. Churchill, by Mr. Roosevelt, by the Prime Minister of Canada and by other representatives of the united nations about the maintenance of security in the post-war period.

This subject is so vast that it is impossible for a member of parliament to consider every angle in the time allowed to us. It is necessary that we should ask questions, but how can we do that? The procedure in debate is such that we are prevented from directing questions to the treasury benches. We are not informed and we will not be informed unless the procedure is changed.

What would be the effect? The Prime Minister may not be anxious personally to extend the life of parliament, nor is he anxious to secure money by governor general's warrants. But he should choose the lesser of those two evils. It would be more in conformity with modern parliamentary practice to extend the life of parliament than to secure such large sums of money by governor general's warrants. If the Prime Minister, the leader of the opposition, the leaders of other groups and their supporters do not agree to an extension of parliament the members of parliament will be faced with a dilemma. Either they will have to vote blindly the amounts that will pass before their closed eyes or the government will have to secure money by means of governor general's warrants.

In March, 1920, the Prime Minister said in this house: Why should we go to Westminster to amend our constitution? We should do that right here. It would be easy for this House of Commons to pass a resolution or a petition addressed to the British government if the views expressed by the Prime Minister twenty-five years ago are no longer his policy. Then this parliament could be adjourned during the conference. It would be understood that the session would continue afterward and we could come back then for a regular session. The rights of the people would be safeguarded much better by that course than they would be by following the course suggested by the government.

In his remarks yesterday the Prime Minister said that the country is interested in knowing what hon. gentlemen opposite think. He was referring to the Conservative opposition. The country is not at all interested in knowing what we think, but we are expected to know what the Canadian people are thinking, which is very different, and we shall act accordingly. We must represent the views of the Canadian people and in order to do that we must keep in contact with the people. I pay a tribute to most members of parliament for the contact they maintain with their constituents. They keep in closer touch with the people than do the cabinet ministers who do not live in their constituencies. The right hon. gentleman added:

[Mr. Pouliot.]

I think the matter is one on which hon. members already have more or less made up their minds, and in this debate I trust there will be very little in the way of diversity of opinion or occasion for any kind of party controversy.

In answer to that may I tell the Prime Minister that there might be diversity of opinion on many occasions without there being party controversy and without any exhibition of partisanship.

What about the resolution itself? What is its purpose? It is to prepare a charter for a general international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security. That is a very fine purpose, but there are certain things in the resolution which are hard to accept. Let us point them out. The resolution states that it is in the interests of Canada that Canada should become a member of such an organization. Perhaps, but we must know more about it to be in position to decide that. Then the third clause in the resolution reads:

(3) that this house approves the purposes and principles set forth in the proposals of the four governments, and considers that these proposals constitute a satisfactory general basis for a discussion of the charter of the proposed international organization.

Although it is not a finished product, we are asked to support it. The next paragraph reads

(4) that this house agrees that the representatives of Canada at the conference should use their best endeavours to further the preparation of an acceptable charter for an international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security.

After we express our satisfaction with those purposes and principles set forth in (3) we go on in (4) to try to improve on them.

Then (5):

that the charter establishing the international organization should, before ratification, be submitted to parliament for approval.

Dumbarton Oaks makes a difference between the peace-loving nations and the rest of the world. Which will be the peace-loving nations? They will be precisely those which will be armed to the teeth to prevent, perhaps, the war-loving nations from ruling the world. So that the world will be divided into peace-loving nations on the one side, and on the other side the rest of the world. Will not that be a cause for another war in the near future?

The Prime Minister said:

The conference at San Francisco is not the peace conference. The purpose is to provide for the maintenance of peace, once peace has been secured—

And that is very far away.

What exactly is the Dumbarton Oaks agreement? I will try to make it clear by summarizing Mr. Stettinius' article. He said:

We can only prevent—

He should have said "postpone".

—the next war by planning and developing, in cooperation with the other peace-loving peoples of the world, an organized peace that will really work.

The powers represented at Dumbarton Oaks were the United States, Great Britain, the Soviet Union, China, and afterwards France was added as a permanent member of the security council.

What is the other corner of the Dumbarton Oaks agreement mentioned by Mr. Stettinius:

There are four corners to the plan proposed at Dumbarton Oaks. The first is this: peace can be maintained only if the peace-loving nations of the world band together for that purpose.

Then there is "sovereign equality". I quote again from the article by Mr. Stettinius:

The phrase "sovereign equality" is enshrined in Principle Number One of the Dumbarton Oaks Proposals.

So that the countries represented there will have to be sovereign. "National sovereignty remains unimpaired." I quote again:

Each such state, irrespective of size, is an international individuality. Each, therefore, has both a right to a voice in the affairs of the family of nations and a responsibility to share in the task of creating a peaceful world order.

All member states will be represented on an equal footing in the general assembly, the duty of which will be the creation of the international political, economic and social conditions favourable to peace. The proposals also provide for a smaller body of eleven members—the security council—of which the five most prominent nations will be permanent members.

The primary responsibility of the security council is two-fold: (1) prevention, and (2), suppression of war. It will comprise eleven members, five permanent members, representing the United States, Great Britain, the Soviet Union, China and France, and six non-permanent members elected for two-year terms by a two-thirds vote of the general assembly.

The supreme duty of the security council is "to take any measures necessary for the maintenance of international peace and security in accordance with the purposes and principles" set down in the charter of the new international organization: (1) measures to prevent wars; (2) measures to suppress wars. Local differences can be settled by regional arrangements without reference to the security council. If those means fail, then the nations are obligated to come to the security council, which has the power, on its own initiative (1) to investigate any dispute, and (2) to recommend methods of adjustment.

Then they recommend an international court of justice, which will be very much like the permanent court of international justice, as Mr. Stettinius says, with minor modifications. There will be no change there.

The security council may call upon the general assembly to apply pressure to any offending state by non-military means. If that is not enough, the security council is empowered to take military action.

Here is what Mr. Stettinius has said about it:

The members of the new international organization would agree, in the charter itself, that throughout these efforts the security council would be acting "on their behalf". They would also agree to assume the obligation to make "armed forces" and "facilities" and "assistance" available to the security council "on its call" and in accordance with special agreements previously concluded. To ensure effective employment of these forces the security council is to be provided with a military staff committee composed of the chiefs of staff of the permanent member nations of the council or their representatives.

If we are to have lasting peace, says Mr. Stettinius, in explaining Dumbarton Oaks, we have to build peace. How will we build it? The economic and social council to be created under the Dumbarton Oaks proposals will consist of eighteen states elected by the general assembly, and holding their posts for three-year terms. This is bureaucracy at its worst. It is still worse than the bureaucracy of the defunct league of nations.

There will also be according to Mr. Stettinius (1) commissions in all fields; (2) technical experts; (3) a secretariat; (4) a research staff for all projects. Then there will also be coordination of (1) the international labour organization; (2) the proposed united nations food and agriculture organization; (3) the proposed international monetary fund or the gold standard; (4) the proposed international bank for reconstruction and development; (5) new international "specialized" organizations in (a) aviation; (b) cartel control; (c) health; (d) education; (e) wire and wireless communications; (f) foreign trade; (g) many agricultural and industrial commodities. They call it an "Advisory economic general staff of the world." Then we would have the fourth cornerstone, progressive reduction of armaments. I am very doubtful whether bureaucracy will bring relief to the entire world. We had that sort of thing in the league of nations and it did not prove successful.

The Prime Minister said yesterday, as reported at page 30 of Hansard:

Even should the charter as finally drafted not be all that we could wish, its acceptance might nevertheless be preferable to its rejection.

Well, the question is not one of acceptance; the question is, shall a charter be prepared, which is altogether different. Instead of going to San Francisco to approve the Dumbarton Oaks agreement, without amendment, the proposal before us is to study it and try to improve it. Yalta and Dumbarton Oaks! On March 13 of last year I asked a question about our lack of representation at Cairo and Teheran and the answer of the government was:

Canada is not bound by the decisions of those conferences where she is not represented, but obviously, any conclusion relating to the conduct of the war made by the representatives or heads of governments participating in those conferences will carry very great weight with all members of the united nations.

These big men seem to have power of attorney to make decisions that affect the whole world. It is hard to make comparisons between Messrs. Roosevelt, Stalin and Churchill and Talleyrand, Metternich and Nesselrode, but it is to be hoped that when the time comes to obtain the signature of the enemy to the peace treaty the diplomats of our modern times will be as successful as the old men were, such as those at the Congress of Vienna.

It was to my great surprise that I saw in the press that the government had decided to invite members of the opposition. The thing had been done in other parts of the world, in Australia for instance, where the situation of the government is very precarious, and in England where Mr. Churchill wishes to face the country with a union government. But I did not see why it should be done here, with the big majority that the government has in the house. But if it was done, it was just a matter of courtesy on the part of the government to the opposition. It was not a matter of right for the opposition to say, "We will name our own men."

The government may find among the opposition some yes men who will be willing to put a rope around their necks and go to San Francisco as the burghers of Calais. They will go there and will show how important they are but I heard my hon. friend the leader of the opposition say this:

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Our party now asks that we be given by the Prime Minister the right to choose our own delegation.

If I were the Prime Minister my answer would be obvious: if you are not satisfied with what I offer you, you will get nothing; and no member, at least of the Conservative opposition, would go to San Francisco. But if the Prime Minister desires to make a selection, there are some members of the opposition who might be taken. There is my good friend the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), my good friend the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) and others, faithful members, who could go there; if the leader of the opposition and the past leader of the opposition are not satisfied, the invitation might be extended to others by the government.

But I do not regard it as a plum for them. It should not be a reward bestowed because the members of the opposition have been good boys and have voted for the government. I hope that was not in the Prime Minister's mind when he spoke of a united voice at San Francisco. I hope that Canada will have a united voice, and that Canada will come back from San Francisco not as a small nation, a small country, not as a middle power, but as the great country that she is. Why such distinctions between small countries, middle countries and great powers? Why should any country in the world consider itself a big power because of its population? Then the greatest country in the world would be China, and Japan would be much greater than many civilized countries in the western world.

I say, therefore, that going to the conference must not be the reward for surrender by the opposition to the government. It must be regarded in a different light.

Until now the debate has reminded me of some trips in the air over clouds when it was impossible to see the land below. One could not see the land without coming down to earth. If the Prime Minister goes there to preside at the conference, as has been mentioned in the papers, it will be an honour to Canada, and as president of the conference he should be relieved of some of the responsibility as leader of the Canadian delegation. But if the delegates to the conference wish to be useful to their country they must regard the trip not as a pleasure excursion, a joy ride. They must look upon it differently. They must not forget that they represent this country and they shall share the feelings of the world, because we are sick of war and we hope that it will be postponed for a long period of time. While they are at San Francisco they must think of all those who have so deeply suffered during this war, so that that suffering shall cease in the future and this country be in the position that she deserves to have in the world.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I wish to add my voice to that of those who have already spoken in support of the resolution before us; and I hope I do so with full understanding of all that is involved in it. I do not think that any sane person in Canada to-day is opposed to this country taking part in a collective security system. What has happened in the world during the past fifteen years should be sufficient to convince us that there is an imperative need for some kind of international system that will maintain peace. It is not only necessary to prevent aggression because in a certain sense that is a negative state; it is necessary that peace may be something more than just absence of war, it must be a dynamic condition promoting human welfare and human concord.

I must say that I was very much surprised at the attitude taken by the official opposition yesterday and the day before in refusing to take part in the debate until they had heard or read what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) had to say. To me the resolution itself made it clear, as clear as it could be made at this time, what the position of the Prime Minister would be. For the sake of brevity I should like to paraphrase the resolution that we are discussing. It asks that the house endorse the government's acceptance of the invitation to the conference. That is No. 1. No. 2, that the house recognizes the establishment of an international organization for the maintenance of peace is vitally important to Canada and that Canada should be a member. No. 3, that the house approves the principle and purposes set forth in the proposals of the four governments and considers them a satisfactory general basis for discussion. No. 4, that the house agrees that Canada's representatives should use their best endeavours to prepare an acceptable charter for maintaining international peace and security. No. 5, that the charter be submitted to parliament for approval before ratification. To me this is well worded and I think it is a non-controversial resolution. It is clear and to the point. It proposes five things. It asks first for the acceptance of the invitation. Unless we are opposed to collective security we could not be opposed to that, and it should not give room for criticism. The second one asks membership of Canada in an international organization for maintaining peace. I do not believe there is any room for opposition or criticism there. The fourth asks that Canada's representatives press for the best charter possible, and the fifth that the charter as approved be brought before parliament before becoming effective. Now I believe there is no room for criticism there.

Let me go back to the third one which I left to the last, namely, that the Dumbarton Oaks proposals be the general basis for discussion. I do not think they are a matter for criticism so far as this government is concerned, because the government was not implicated or consulted in the formulation of these proposals. The proposals themselves, of course, are open to criticism. It also suggests that we here make proposals that the delegation may submit at the San Francisco conference. Why should the official opposition then take the position that they could not say anything or commit themselves to anything until they heard what the Prime Minister had to say? To me the attitude of the official opposition is amazing at so critical a time and on so important an issue. It is indeed very hard to understand.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggart (Mr. Coldwell) in putting the views of this party before the house yesterday covered most of the points in the Dumbarton Oaks proposals that we should like to have considered. I do not think he exhausted the points in the draft plan that we believe could be improved, but I am not going to take the time to-night to add to what he said in that regard. The most I wish to say is that I am in favour of an international security system because I see no way of avoiding war or of avoiding world chaos unless we bring our international relations within the rule of law. The inventions in transportation and communications of the last few decades have made of the nations of the world a community; and it is no longer a figure of speech to talk about the community of nations. As we have a community of nations I think those nations must now come under the rule of law as individuals and groups in nations must abide by the law of those nations; otherwise I can see no hope for peace in the future. In order that that may be done, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggart when he spoke, nations may have and will have to give up a certain amount of sovereignty. I believe that, as is the case again with the individual who, in giving up certain freedoms acquires certain other freedoms which do not limit his opportunities but add to them, so with nations.

Commander Harold Stassen who I believe is one of the representatives selected by President Roosevelt to go to the conference for the United States, said that one of the reasons why he subscribed to an international security system was this.

He said:

That we do not subscribe to the extreme view of nationalistic sovereignty; that we realize that neither this nation nor any other nation can be a law unto itself . . . and that we are willing to delegate a limited portion of our national sovereignty to our united nations organization.

I think that is inevitable if we want to have peace. So, then, as the nations should bring themselves under a code of laws, it follows that no nation should be above the law, as no individual is above the law. There is another function of a collective security system, that is, the function of removing the causes that lead to aggression, and improving social systems. We should stress this as much as the function of preventing aggression. Provision for this is made in the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, and I am firmly of the opinion that the more attention the nations give to the study and solution of social and economic problems, the less time and thought they will have to give to coercive action. Some people are cynical—perhaps that is too strong a word—as to the success of any system of international security because of the failure of the league that was created at the end of the last war. Again I agree with the hon member for Rosetown-Biggan when he said, that it was not the league that failed; it was the refusal of the nations of the world to use the machinery created by the league that brought us to the verge of catastrophe in the present struggle.

At this time, however, in my opinion we are discussing international security in a very different atmosphere. After the last war collective security was an idea in the mind of one statesman at the peace conference. Because of his position and the prestige of his country he succeeded in having his proposals become part of the treaty of Versailles, but I do not think it is any secret that other statesmen at that conference accepted those proposals with their tongues in their cheeks. They did not like them. They were afraid of them. They were afraid they would interfere with the old system of grab, and no sincere attempt was ever made to make them work. To-day we are talking about collective security in an altogether different situation. We are talking about collective security at a time when the nations of the world have become convinced by the events of the past five or six years that there is no safety in isolation. War has become so terrible that no country or individual can escape its consequences. As a result everyone must accept his or her responsibility for putting an end to it; and in my opinion there is no other way to put an end to war in general except the way we are going to put an end to this one, and that is by the cooperation of the nations of the world. President Roosevelt told congress recently that the United States would have to take the responsibility for world collaboration or have to bear the responsibility for another world conflict. We in Canada are facing the same situation that is being faced by the people of the republic to the south. We have come through this war, at least so far, without the invasion of our shores or the destruction of our cities, but it is most unlikely that if another war should take place in ten, twenty or twenty-five years, we should again escape.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

I think it was the Prime Minister who said yesterday that we should not expect perfection, and I suppose that is true. But there is no reason, I suggest, why we should not strive for it, and I hope our delegates to the San Francisco conference will put forward every effort, because they have a sacred trust to do everything in their power to make the charter as perfect as possible. In this I am sure they will have the good wishes of all hon. members of this house.

Mr. FRED ROSE (Cartier): On behalf of the Labour-Progressive party I wish to endorse the resolution which has been moved by the Prime Minister concerning Canada's participation in the San Francisco conference. I want to urge upon hon. members that we adopt this resolution unanimously, as an expression of the united desire of the Canadian people for lasting peace. Lasting peace! Here are two words that mean so much to suffering humanity. The men at the front and the people at home look to us to leave no stone unturned in our endeavour this time to make possible a peace that will endure. Many ask if this can be done, if it is only a utopia. The answer is to be found in the mighty combined offensives that are giving nazism its death blow. The answer is to be found in the unprecedented unity of the three great leaders of world democracy who charted a new course for mankind at the Crimea conference. The answer is being given by the people of all lands who fight for freedom and who are utterly determined that never again must the world pass through the horrors and devastation of war.

The decision that we are called upon to make at this session is truly a momentous one. Should we fail to grasp its implications we shall fall short of what Canada expects from us. At San Francisco this country must help shape the pattern of the post-war world. The Dumbarton Oaks proposals for a world security organization, endorsed by this resolution, unquestionably provide a real and workable basis for maintaining peace. These proposals are based, not on fictitious abstractions, but upon realities of the world to-day. And the biggest of these realities is the fact that for the first time in the history of mankind the vast majority of the world's peoples, represented by Churchill, Roosevelt and Stalin, have achieved definite agreements for planned, long-term cooperation on a world scale.

If we had no peace in the past it is because never before was agreement achieved on such a scale and on such a high level of understanding. Capitalist democracies, the socialist Soviet Union, the peoples of Europe and the far east fighting for liberation have overcome all differences in order to wage war. They are no less firmly united in their determination to establish enduring peace and economic collaboration for world prosperity.

That determination is fully shared by Canada's people, French- and English-speaking alike.

Our achievements in this war, of which all Canadians are justly proud, have been possible above all, because we have had before us a supreme national objective, the objective of victory.

So likewise, in the post-war years we must fight unitedly for an objective that will be as easily understood and as widely supported by the overwhelming majority of Canadians—the establishment of an enduring and prosperous peace. Only by maintaining such a unity in pursuit of this new great objective can we make sure that Canada will play her full part as a sovereign power in world affairs.

Just because Canada is so strategically placed as a member of the British commonwealth of nations, a nation of the Americas, and a next-door neighbour both to the United States and the Soviet Union, she can make a most vital contribution to the security and the peace of the world. In making this contribution constructively and independently Canada can best fulfil her destiny as a young, vigorous and growing power.

Canada's new stature as a power should find expression at San Francisco. She could declare herself publicly prepared to accept responsibility as a member of the new world security organization, ready to share responsibility for jointly preventing aggression, and ready to maintain a permanent armed force after the war in order to help in the collective safeguarding of peace. Nothing less than that is required of us.

I welcome the unanimity with which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and leaders of other groups on this side of the house have expressed support for the principles embodied in the resolution. My party, from the very first, has sought to popularize among the people the historic agreement reached at Teheran and more recently at Yalta by the three leaders of the world. We believe that the attitude of parties and individuals toward those momentous agreements will determine whether or not we have lived up to the opportunities and responsibilities of this decisive turning point in the history of the world.

The Prime Minister's speech expressed the desires and aspirations of the Canadian peoples for a peace which will endure. It is therefore regrettable that anything in his speech should have given ground for the kind of interpretation that has crept into some of to-day's newspapers, which suggest too much emphasis on reservations and alterations.

It is disturbing that in the discussion reservations over secondary and even minor features of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals have tended to overshadow what is primary, namely that the big three have reached a definite agreement on the basic principles for a world security organization.

Any attempt to argue legally and on technical ground in this regard in respect of that agreement means that the peoples of the world can only undermine unity and help the foes of peace. Among the close to fifty nations to be represented at San Francisco Canada should stand out as a staunch supporter of the unity achieved in the Crimea. Pressure from the opponents of that unity will operate with most telling effect on small nations which have more limited responsibility. Canada should under no circumstances fall victim to such reactionary pressure.

I could not help feeling that such pressure found some expression in the speech of the leader of the C.C.F. Instead of telling the house that we should go to San Francisco to assure the immediate setting up of a permanent organization for world security the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggan goes no further than saying—

The Dumbarton Oaks agreement provides a good basis for at least the discussion at San Francisco of concerted action among the nations to outlaw war.

"At least a discussion" is not enough. What we are called upon to do is to act, and not merely discuss.

I cannot escape the impression that the reservations regarding points of procedure in relation to discussion, voting procedure and the implementing of decisions flow from a failure to support wholeheartedly the essence of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals as a whole.

It would be nothing short of disastrous should controversy over secondary matters lead Canada to place herself among the obstructionists who seek to imperil agreement at San Francisco. Flanking attacks against Dumbarton Oaks are being made under the dishonest and misleading slogan of "defence of small nations' interests". This should lead us to ponder on the fact that in the last analysis Canada's role will be determined not by our status in a hierarchy of gradations among states, but by the firmness of our support to the principles of the Crimea agreement, which must underlie any enduring organization for peace.

We take second place to none in our advocacy of a strong affirmation of Canada's independent role in world affairs. But that role must be a constructive one; nothing less than that will serve our national needs. This house must decide and state frankly which thing it places first in the struggle for a world security organization; the question of hierarchy and the exact place that Canada is going to occupy, or the question of how Canada can contribute most to the establishment of a world security organization.

It is perfectly reasonable to recognize the fact that if it is possible to organize the voting powers and the seating on the permanent council in such a way that there is a differentiation between those powers on the basis of their ability to contribute, then it is good that it should be done. It will bring the world security organization more into harmony with the actual gradations of power in the world. But that is a very secondary question.

For Canada to come forward and make this a divisive issue, or to come forward as a representative of those states which consider that as middle powers they should have a separate special status, might well place this country at the head of the opposition to the establishment of a world security organization.

It is quite natural for us to accept in the conduct of the war the assumption of military leadership by the great powers in the making of vital decisions. There is no reason in the world why, in the battle for peace, we should have less confidence in the leadership of those powers. On the contrary, without their united leadership there can be no security for the lesser powers or for the world.

[Mr. Rose.]

There is a great fundamental difference between the league of nations and the proposed new world organization. It consists precisely in the fact that whereas the league attempted to operate without the simultaneous participation of all the greatest powers, including the Soviet Union and the United States, and in fact at its outset bore the imprint of the exclusion of the Soviet Union,—it is now possible, in the midst of the war against nazism, to give lasting permanence in organized form to the all-inclusive unity of the freedom-loving peoples, great and small.

I believe that I can best answer the ifs and buts that have crept into the discussion in the following words of President Roosevelt, contained in his recent address on the state of the union. I quote:

Perfectionism no less than isolationism or imperialism or power politics may obstruct the paths to international peace. Let us not forget that the retreat to isolationism a quarter of a century ago was started not by a direct attack against international cooperation, but against the alleged imperfections of the peace.

Another kind of flanking attack on Canada's support for Dumbarton Oaks comes from the camp of those who seek to counterpose empire unity to world security. To these imperial centralizers, the Prime Minister has given Canada's answer in his admirable address to the commonwealth conference last May.

Behind the outburst of Premier Drew of Ontario against the Prime Minister's advocacy of a distinctive national flag and anthem for Canada lies a deep-seated opposition both to Canada's sovereignty and to the primary need of world cooperation. The constant protests and insistence of the Progressive Conservatives that Canada's decisions on world affairs must pass through London before the Canadian government can act, when coupled with their equally constant omission of any expression of desire for full cooperation with the Soviet Union all add up to the policies of empire exclusiveness which can only weaken the chances for strengthened world cooperation. This Tory attitude, detrimental to commonwealth interests as well as to Canada's, is expressed also in opposition to any increase in Canada's participation in inter-American affairs.

As against those who try to keep Canada from full participation in the affairs of the American community of nations, it is our opinion this house should associate itself with the historic decisions reached a few weeks ago at the inter-American conference held in Mexico city. Canada should endorse the act of Chapultepec, with its proposals for strengthening of the political and economic solidarity of the Americans. There are two reasons for this. First of all, Canada should not be the only democracy in the western hemisphere that does not adhere to that pact. Second, such a step would demonstrate Canada's determination to contribute fully as a sovereign state in North America to the achievement of the new relationships of world cooperation, which victory in the war is making possible.

This question is particularly important, in the light of the fact that there can be no prosperity for Canada in the post-war years unless international cooperation is developed to the fullest possible extent in the world. The issues of peace and prosperity are inseparably linked together. The fight for markets, which in the past has been one of the chief causes of war, can now for the first time be resolved on the basis of a new concept—planned world economic cooperation. This will be one of the chief tasks of the economic and social council, envisaged in the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. Canada more than any other country is vitally concerned in the successful attainment of this objective.

The huge task of reconstruction in Europe, the vast opportunities for the industrialization of the countries of Latin America and of the far east, provide a solid basis for full employment and prosperity in the post-war period. The democratic reconstruction and industrialization of these areas will make possible the carrying through of policies aimed at the continuous raising of purchasing power and living standards. An illustration of what is possible is to be seen in the fact that if we were to increase the purchasing power of every individual in India and China by ten cents a day it would mean an increase in world purchasing power of $25,500,000,000 a year.

The key to the carrying through of this world programme is the joint cooperation of the capitalist democracies and the socialist Soviet Union on the one hand, and the resolving of conflict among the capitalist nations on the other. It is in the interest of Canada's peace and security that the agreement reached at Crimea for long-term cooperation between capitalist and socialist states should be firmly upheld and vigorously developed. The touchstone of the enduring unity among the capitalistic states is the relationship between Britain and the United States. Canada is vitally concerned in resolving the conflicts and frictions between these two great powers.

Canada is excellently placed to make a vital contribution to the solution of this very serious problem because she is at one and the same time a leading member of the British commonwealth and the second industrial nation in the Americas. It is my belief that our representatives, both at the London meeting of commonwealth spokesmen and at San Francisco, should make constructive proposals in this regard.

These proposals should express recognition of the fact that the productive capacity of Britain, the United States and Canada is such that any return to the policies of restricted markets that prevailed before the war can bring nothing but disaster to all three of us. In the light of this we should urge that definite agreements be reached first and foremost between Britain and the United States upon a division of export markets, a division which would make it possible for British industries to operate at full capacity, while at the same time guaranteeing an equitable share to the United States, Canada and other powers. Such an agreement is just as much in the interests of the United States as of ourselves and other peoples, because the only alternative to it is a reversion to a cut-throat struggle which would undermine the whole of world security. There is no country in the world so favourably placed as Canada for advocating such an agreement. An accord of this kind is vital to our domestic prosperity. Achievement of such economic collective security will make it possible for us to carry through the policies at home which will provide full employment and raise the purchasing power of Canada's people.

Only in such a perspective of peaceful world development, and not in isolation, can the people of Canada and of my own province, Quebec, be assured that our factories, shipyards, mining and forest industries as well as our farms, can be kept in full production. As I have emphasized, the raising of living standards at home can be achieved and must be pursued within the framework of such world cooperation.

Of particular urgency here is the problem of helping to expand the domestic market in the province of Quebec. It is a startling fact that total retail sales in my province amount to scarcely more than half of what they are in Ontario. According to the Financial Post Business Year Book for 1944, the figures are $1,368,000,000 for Ontario as against $777,000,000 for Quebec.

This means that by raising popular purchasing power to the Ontario level alone would provide Canadian business with an annual market for half a billion dollars worth of goods. This is practically half of our total pre-war exports. That means that we must have post-war policies which will raise substandard wages, increase farm income and provide a national minimum of social security. It means rejection of the suicidal isolationism advocated by the Tory-inspired Nationalists, whose programme is both a denial of the realities of the present day world and a betrayal of the true interests of the great French Canadian community.

These things I have been speaking about are all dependent on world stability and world cooperation, made possible by the crushing of the fascist monster. Anti-Semitism was part of the official programme in all countries of the Hitlerite coalition. Hitler's anti-Semitic poison has had its effects in countries outside the fascist axis. Every member of the united nations is duty bound to ban by law all racial discrimination. We should do so in Canada, and should strive to have it established by the new organization that all member states rid themselves of fascist anti-Semitism.

No single national group has suffered more than have the Jewish people at the hand of Hitlerite barbarism. With approaching victory the solution of the much-discussed problem stands before us in full sharpness. There is little doubt in my mind that world democracy and the complete destruction of fascism, and its tool anti-Semitism, are the true prerequisites for a new world order for all peoples, and a new deal for my people, the Jewish people. With victory in the war, the problem of resettlement of the survivors of the Maidenek murder factories will become more and more acute.

Scattered through the European continent many of the Jewish survivors will seek to leave the lands where so much suffering has been visited upon them. The coalition cemented at Teheran, at Yalta, and as it will be further extended in San Francisco, makes possible a new and constructive way of solving long-standing problems of nationalities and frontiers. It is in the light of these historic facts that we should approach the problem of Palestine.

The problem of the creation in Palestine of a Jewish homeland is one which requires solution and which can now be achieved as a result of the new world order envisaged and planned at Crimea. Following the Crimea conference both Mr. Churchill and Mr. Roosevelt held discussions with the Arab peoples. While no official reports were issued on the results of these discussions, it is to be hoped that the Arab leaders will understand that mass migration of Jewish people into Palestine is essential and is not a menace to a prosperous future of the Arab people. Such mass migration should be encouraged by the united nations, and all financial responsibilities connected with it should be undertaken by the united nations as part of their general resettlement and rehabilitation plans.

[Mr. Rose.]

The Crimea conference and the subsequent discussions with the Arab people as well as the San Francisco conference will make possible a peaceful, industrial, cultural and political advancement of all countries in the near east.

On the background of such a bright future the Arab people can and should consider the establishment of a Jewish national homeland in Palestine as a constructive factor in the development of the near east.

I am sure that I express the sentiments of the house when I voice our sincere hopes that the Crimean charter will herald the establishment of the friendliest, fraternal relations between the Jews and Arab people, so setting this stage for a great future of all people in the near east, and for the fulfilment of the aspirations of the Jewish people through the creation of a Jewish state in Palestine.

May I here repeat what was stated in the house before, that we of Canada should stand prepared to participate in the joint solution of the problem of resettlement of refugees.

The greatness of Canada at San Francisco will be reflected, not in gradation of our country's position in relation to other powers, but in the action of our delegation. That delegation should be unanimous in expressing the desire of the Canadian people for durable peace and for prosperity.

The makeup of our delegation is important in that regard. Canada can demonstrate the new spirit and give a lead to other nations to follow her example by including in her delegation, a unity delegation, representatives from the ranks of organized labour, preferably from the two congresses, the Trades and Labor Congress of Canada and the Canadian Congress of Labour.

Labour has achieved, at the recent world conference of trade unions held in London, representing 60 million organized workers, a new high level of unity, on the basis of the policies arrived at simultaneously in the Crimea meeting. Canadian labour, to its great credit, participated in that conference through a joint delegation.

Labour is one of the biggest and most homogeneous groups of the Canadian population. Labour has played a fine role in this war; labour is concerned about the future of Canada's peace and prosperity, and the organized labour movement should therefore have representation at the San Francisco conference.

Mr. Speaker, we are deciding in this session a matter of vital concern to all Canadians. The issue of banishing the scourge of war for generations to come rises high above partisan politics and rhetoric. The men at the front, their families and friends at home, all Canadians, say that it must never happen again. We must not fail them.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: If the hon. member will permit a question, has he read the entire paragraph on page 38 of Hansard from which he quoted a sentence from the speech by the hon. member of Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and does he not think that he has distorted the meaning of that paragraph by giving just the sentence he quoted?

Mr. ROSE: No, I have not distorted it. I read and studied that whole page very carefully and I based my remarks on the whole essence of the hon. member's speech, not just on those few words.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Did the hon. member read the sentence regarding the solidarity of the three great powers?

Mr. ROSE: Is the hon. member making a speech now?

Mr. WILFRID LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, paragraph 3 of the resolution on which the government requests our approval reads as follows:

That this house approves the purposes and principles set forth in the proposals of the four governments, and considers that these proposals constitute a satisfactory general basis for a discussion of the charter of the proposed international organization.

Now, I think the decisions which have already been taken at Yalta and which undoubtedly will be ratified at San Francisco already include the germs of a new war, and this as a consequence of the stand which Russia, England and the United States have taken at Yalta in agreeing to the spoliation of Polish territory, and also because Russia has been conceded a right of veto on whatever decisions may be taken against her interests by a majority of the four powers having permanent membership.

To my mind it is not to be doubted that the San Francisco conference will ratify the decisions taken at Yalta. Yet, the government asks us, by this resolution, to approve the purposes and principles set forth in the proposals already framed by the governments which will have permanent membership in the security council. At Yalta the reasons put forward to involve Canada into the war have shamefully been side-stepped, and Hitler resorted in 1939 to historical arguments just as Stalin is doing to-day, when he claims eastern Poland. Because England and Canada considered the nazi demands as being at variance with the Versailles treaty and other agreements with Poland, neither London nor Ottawa wanted to let Hitler take Polish territory without Warsaw's consent, and our present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) even went to Berlin, at the request of the British government, to warn Hitler that if Polish territory was in any way violated, it would mean war as far as Canada was concerned. Stalin's present demands, to which Churchill and Roosevelt have yielded, are much harsher for the Poles than were Hitler's in 1939. Moscow claims more than one-third of Poland, and Polish integrity and sovereignty are definitely cast aside. All this has happened in violation of the principles expounded at the beginning of the war in the Atlantic charter which has foundered in the ocean of that name.

After this sacrifice of the right of peoples to self-determination, Yalta will be recorded in history as a conference constituting a repetition of Munich, as well as the most complete surrender of democracy to Stalin's dictatorship. If we were opposed to nazi annexations in 1939 why did we declare war to permit sovietic annexations in 1945? We shall see, after this war, communistic influence permeate the whole of Europe and if Canada approves the purposes and principles set forth in the proposals already framed at Yalta, it means for us a war in which we shall inevitably be involved within ten or fifteen years.

The security council will have only four permanent members and, contrary to the principles of international justice, each one of those four member-governments will have a right of veto on any decision taken by the majority, which will necessarily mean war, should a decision be unacceptable to Russia. As the Russian government is wholly under the control of a dictator, Stalin, just as the German government is under the control of Hitler, one can easily imagine the adventure toward which we are heading by going to San Francisco. Such an adventure will be all the more regrettable as it will mean for this country permanent enforcement of conscription so that we may play our part in the international army which will have to maintain order in the world. That is an absurd and idiotic policy for a young country like ours, whose population is just 12 million, with an area as large as Europe awaiting development. Why should we not imitate Ireland and the Irish who, unlike us, remain first and before all Irishmen and do not accept as binding decisions that may be taken by the London government if they are against their interests.

Further, as the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) so aptly said, what mandate has the present government to thus commit the future of our country? It has no such mandate. And I am convinced that notwithstanding the statements made by the Prime Minister the decisions which will be reached at San Francisco will be submitted to the new parliament as a fait accompli. Can we expect that the three groups present in this house will refuse to ratify them? I do not think so, for the present Prime Minister has become as much of a Tory as the staunchest of the imperialists who sit opposite him, and although he had about 160 supporters in the present house, he readily yielded to all the demands of the 39 Conservative members opposite, in spite of the most formal pledges which had been given to the electors of my province, and in such a flagrant manner that all the Liberals who sit in the Quebec legislature, headed by the former premier, the Hon. Mr. Godbout, could not refrain from passing a motion which was unanimously adopted in which the Quebec legislature vehemently protests against the enforcement in Canada of conscription for overseas service and deeply regrets that the right hon. the Prime Minister of Canada has broken his most sacred pledges. Therefore, the legislative assembly unanimously instructed its clerk to forward copy of this resolution to the Prime Minister of Canada and to the other ministers of the cabinet for the province if any still remain.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, how could we rely on future promises on the part of the Prime Minister, when he has completely broken his past pledges? If he had kept the promises he had already made, we would not have now a whole province which has lost faith in a man who owes it his present standing.

Will it be possible for us, at the time of ratifying the treaty, to have confidence in the Progressive Conservative group? No, for their imperialistic and reactionary doctrines together with their electioneering methods of continuous mud-slinging against the province of Quebec, inspire me, as a Canadian, with the greatest contempt.

Could we rely, in these circumstances, on the C.C.F. group? Again no; for I have noticed, in the eight years I have spent in this house, that they have never failed to support the views of the Russian government in the field of international politics.

[Mr. LaCroix.]

What will be needed in this house, after the next elections, for I doubt that any of the three parties I have just mentioned will have a working majority, is a group of members strong enough to force the other parties to follow a truly Canadian policy.

In a talk delivered recently before the Cercle des Femmes Canadiennes, in Quebec the British High Commissioner to Canada stated that we remained masters of our fate and that each of the dominions was free to decide for participation or neutrality on the declaration of war and that no imperial edict, originating in London should or could influence our decision or force us into the struggle. But, Mr. Speaker, all the speeches made in this house by the government supporters before the declaration of war, were based on the assumption that neutrality was impossible because we were a British dominion. However, the attitude of Ireland proved that this was not true. The simple truth was that an order had been given in London and we had to obey. The same thing will apply when the time comes to ratify the decisions taken at San Francisco for then, unless the Canadian people is sufficiently wide awake to think of their own interests, as at the declaration of war, we shall be confronted with a situation and an accomplished fact arranged in London and not in Ottawa. All the attractive promises that may be offered to us during the next electoral campaign will not be worth much more than the pledges taken in the past and we shall be irrevocably launched in a policy of internationalism and cooperation in the establishment of a programme of world security dependent on the good will of Stalin, the dictator or, which would still be worse, of international high finance.

For these reasons I shall vote against the motion before the house, for I believe it to be my duty to prevent Canada from being drawn into another war and at the same time to protest against the wanton annexation by Russia of one third of Poland, and of the Baltic States, without mentioning the moral occupation of Yugoslavia and part of the Balkan countries.

Mr. W. E. HARRIS (Grey-Bruce): Twice in my lifetime Canada has been plunged in an European war and to add to it, on the second occasion, we have had a Pacific war and in which we are still engaged. It seems to me that, next to the declaration of war, the most important measure that has come before parliament is the present resolution, and we should take steps immediately to do what we can to prevent a recurrence and our being involved in a third world war. I believe we should take these steps at once, because it requires the complete support of the Canadian people for anything that we decide to do at this conference or in any later plans that are made.

Prior to 1914 Canada knew little about war. We had in fact had the South African war, but for all practical purposes I assume that war came to Canada for the first time in 1914. We had become world conscious before that because the west had developed wheat and had exported it in great quantities to Europe and we knew that dislocation of trade in Europe would adversely affect our economy. Nevertheless, it was not with that in mind that we went to war in 1914; it was because we decided that small nations had rights which had to be protected and that Germany in particular had acted in a most uncivilized manner in attacking a smaller nation. So that while we entered the war to aid a small nation we knew we had nothing to gain ourselves and would only have losses as a result. In fact, we had 60,000 killed and many more incapacitated, and when we came out of the war we had nothing to show except our losses.

Prior to the war our position in the British empire had been one which required a certain amount of consideration and which did not altogether agree with the situation as the world knew it. Owing, I believe, to our contribution to the last war, and to other matters as well, it was agreed during the war that our position needed clarification, with the result that in 1921 it was first made known informally and in 1926 formally by statute. What had been the practice became the law; that this country was free and self-governing, and by a common allegiance to the crown, was a member of the British commonwealth, free to do as it wished. Therefore upon the appearance of world war II, there was a very considerable difference in the method by which we joined it. World war I had been entered because Great Britain declared war on Germany and we automatically followed. We followed then, I believe with almost the unanimous support of all hon. members of the House of Commons at that time, and certainly with the practically unanimous support of the country.

On this occasion parliament was assembled, the government recommended a declaration of war, debate ensued and war was declared. It was not suggested on that occasion that we had automatically followed in any event because Great Britain had gone into the war. On the contrary it was tacitly admitted, I believe, that it was within the full power of this parliament to have made a decision not to enter the war. To an outsider there might have been certain evidence that it would have been in our material interest to have decided to stay out, because war is undoubtedly the greatest evil that can overtake a nation, and that it might better serve the people to postpone it as long as it would be possible to do so. However, it is my personal opinion, for what it is worth, that had any government attempted to stay out at that time it would not have lasted much longer after having made known its intention.

The reason for the practically unanimous decision of parliament to enter the war was I think due to a circumstance which I believe was properly explained by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) when he called parliament. He said something like this, that the fate of a single city or the independence of a particular nation was the occasion rather than the real cause of the war; that the real cause was that there had grown up in one nation of the world a belief not in the individual personality of all of us, but that the person belonged to the state and in consequence it was proper that states might use might in its relation toward any neighbour, particularly a smaller neighbour.

By September, 1939, the Canadian people had been firmly convinced that that was the intention of Germany, and that if we were to defend our homes, our religious and our parliamentary institutions it was necessary to go to war and it was desirable to go to war at the time when we had friends with whom we could join. Once again we had no material gain at stake in Europe, but once again we hazarded everything, knowing that we would have losses, and knowing that there was nothing we could gain directly by entering the war. Up to the present time we have in fact lost over thirty thousand people again, and our losses are mounting each day and will continue to the end of the war. Yet on each occasion, Mr. Speaker, we did not entirely lack all profit in the war. There is such a thing as national honour, which is something like the individual conscience. On each occasion I think we have saved that honour, because had we not done so national life in this country would have been empty and we would not be entitled to the future which I think is in store for the Canadian people. We decided that evil as war was there was no price that we would not willingly pay if we could reassert again certain spiritual values which seemed to have gone out of fashion in the world.

To say that world war II was an admission of failure of our efforts to maintain the peace after world war I is of course true, but there is no nation that sought to maintain peace as much as Canada did since 1918. We joined the league of nations; we aided in every plan for disarmament; we suggested to the world that we had experience in negotiating and in arbitrating of our difficulties with our neighbours; that these methods might very well be adopted by other nations, and we did on every occasion what we thought would advance the interest of civilization.

It is true we felt extremely disappointed that the United States did not join the league of nations. We also felt that the United States did not advance the cause of peace when she refused to join with Great Britain in guaranteeing the security of France for fifteen years if France did not insist on occupying all lands west of the Rhine; but we did admit that the United States and all nations would have to make these decisions for themselves. And in so far as we could as a good neighbour we attempted to show the United States that her interests as well as those of the world could best be served if she joined, if not the league, then every other body which attempted to solve any differences which might lead to war. At the same time we appreciated the fact that isolationism as it grew up in the United States was understandable, because a similar opinion developed in this country, particularly in the period from 1929 to 1935; and many public men in this country in all sincerity and after considerable thought made it clear that it was doubtful what Canada might do if another European war occurred. Of course, we know that when the time came there was no doubt about it and that we did go into the war, if not united, at any rate united except for a vote or two in this house. I repeat these things to remind ourselves that isolationism is a condition of mind which grows, I think, through weariness and cynicism; that that opinion may very well rise up again in Canada in the future if it does not already exist in some parts, and that it is an error into which we must never fall again lest we lose the hold we have on ourselves and cease to work for peace so that we may avoid future wars.

I believe we ought to consider realistically the position of Canada with respect to the world. We are members of the British commonwealth of nations and as such we are bound by sentiment and common interests to at least six self-governing nations which are scattered around the globe, and in the commonwealth, or empire, if you like, there are colonies in various stages of self-government and there are dependencies and there are what are known as crown colonies. In this very large group there are many countries which from a strictly military point of view, must, for our security, remain in friendly hands. It is only necessary to remind ourselves of the real fear which arose in this country in June, 1940, of the thought of Great Britain being invaded to realize what I mean. We could not contemplate the possibility of Great Britain being in unfriendly hands, and I suggest—and it is my own opinion—that for some time to come we could not contemplate that happening. In this country there is an honest realization that Great Britain was the first country which taught the world that a man might be free if he so willed; that individual freedom is restricted for the sake of the common good, but restricted as little as possible, and that these principles were not only given to the dependencies and colonies, as they started out to be, but encouraged as the various countries became self-governing. When one contemplates that situation and realizes this is the inheritance which this country received from Great Britain, I for one at any rate feel that we owe so much that time alone will tell when we feel we have paid the debt, if we ever have that feeling. I pass over the other members of the commonwealth, not because they are different but because they are the same. Each is going its own way, yet the roads are not diverging very much. They are trying, as we are, to improve their inheritance in order that they may pass it on to succeeding generations.

[Mr. W. E. Harris.]

With respect to the United States, we have been at peace with that country for 130 years and in each of those years we have seen an improvement in our methods for the negotiation and arbitration of any differences. We have now reached a point in our relations with that country where I believe we have eliminated the suspicion which is so often the bar to countries having confidence in dealings with each other. I think we have reached the position, indeed, that not only in this war but in peace each country counts on the other to resist aggression on the continent of North America. I am sure we feel the United States would do so, and from what happened in 1939 and 1941 I know the United States counted on us if aggression came this way. However, our two countries face the Pacific together, and our interests there may be the same; at any rate I do not believe they are very different. I cannot conceive of an occasion arising in the Pacific in connection with which we will clash with the United States; nor can I conceive an occasion arising in the Pacific in which, if their interests are adversely affected, our interests at the same time will not be adversely affected. Under these conditions, concerned as we are with Great Britain in Europe, with the United States in the Americas, with the commonwealth of nations and the United States in the Pacific, I feel it reasonably certain that should any major war break out in future we will inevitably be drawn into it, whether we like it or not, and I approach this resolution with that in mind.

The resolution calls for the approval by this parliament of the action of the government in accepting an invitation to attend the conference at San Francisco to promote world security, and it is suggested that the proposals made last fall by the big four, Great Britain, the Soviet Union, the United States and China, should be accepted as a basis. I do not intend to go into those proposals; I am sure all hon. members have read them. As I understand them, the proposals do not vary very much from the old set-up of the league of nations. There is a general assembly, a security council, a court of justice and of course the administrative officers. There is one noticeable difference, however, with the league of nations set-up; that is in the voting. It was said that one of the weaknesses of the league was that one small nation might block any decisive action, and the framers of these proposals apparently have tried to avoid that situation in the future. They have succeeded in doing so, but it is possible that they have swung too far in the other direction, so that small nations now will not be in as strong a position as they were under the league of nations. It seems to me that may be a mistake, because at the beginning of this war a number of small nations maintained their neutrality until they were invaded. Those of us who were in the war considered this unreasonable; we could not understand their attitude, since we thought we knew they would inevitably find themselves involved in any event. Yet I wonder if their decision was not made because in the past they found that their advice to the league was not accepted, or that they were not in a position to bring their advice forcibly before the league. However, Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to examine the proposals in detail. I am sure that by the time the conference ends they will have been changed, and I am sure the nations concerned will attempt to draw up a charter in such a way that every country will be given an opportunity to make its views known, and that proper voting strength will be decided having regard to the contributions made in this war and the contributions to be made toward maintaining peace.

To give the reasons commonly advanced, wars begin through racial and national strife, religious differences and economic dislocation. At least I have always seen economic dislocation given as a reason. No doubt it is, yet I am satisfied that it is not the common man, whose economic position is often insecure, who consciously wills a war; and on no occasion that I can remember has the common man insisted on his leaders taking him into war to improve his economic position. It is true that if there is economic stress leaders may seize that opportunity to present their arguments and obtain the support of the people for a war, but usually the argument is based on some ground other than self-interest, such as racial superiority or racial improvement. I hope the plans made for the peace will include an effort to convince the world that all races have some advantages; that no race has all the ability, all the brains, all the right to live, or the right to impose its will and its ideas on others.

It has been pointed out during this debate that this is not to be a peace conference, and that is quite true. When the peace treaty is drawn up, if in fact there is one, it will be on terms decided by the countries which conquer Germany in the first instance and Japan in the second; and I suppose that when the peace treaty is finally concluded it will be the duty of this body to see that the treaty is carried out, with perhaps changes from time to time designed to promote the cause of peace. So that while nothing will be finally decided on this occasion except the actual organization, it seems to me it might very well provide the nations with an opportunity to express their opinions as to the peace of the future. I have no particular views as to the nature of the peace to be dictated to Germany and Japan; I leave that in better hands. Nor have I any particular views as to the nature of the peace which ought to be maintained in future. Yet it is a fact that peace is not something you have as a matter of course. After having been back in Canada for six months now I am afraid that people may easily fall back into the comfortable assumption that if we leave it to somebody else all will be well, and that we need not bother our heads about such a troublesome thing as Europe. I know that European politics are incomprehensible to most of us and therefore suspect; yet we must never allow ourselves to fall back into that position. Canada has made a contribution in this war out of all proportion to its size, and I have no doubt this will be recognized at the conference in San Francisco. And yet Canada must continue to make its contribution in the cause of peace, out of all proportion to its size. That contribution can be made by this delegation when it goes to San Francisco next month. I am sure they will go—at any rate I certainly hope so—with the unanimous vote of parliament. They will go in the knowledge that war is the greatest evil we face; and that while it is in order that we should insist upon our rights, yet if all nations are ready to forgo some of their rights in order to promote peace, then Canada might very well join with them in that respect. The Canadian people are prepared now, after two experiences, to feel that any price is not too great in peace time to continue peace.

That brings me to my final word, and it is this, that if unanimous approval is given to this resolution, as I hope it will be, the fact remains that the people of Canada should be told fully about the reasons we have for doing this. They must be told not only the advantages they will gain by a world peace organization, but also the duties which that organization involves. I hope members of the house will feel obliged in some respects to see that those obligations are fully understood. I believe the people of Canada are prepared to assume them; and yet it is better that they should know about them at once, rather than later on.

Those obligations, I take it from the draft proposals, are not any more onerous than they were in respect of the league. Therefore if we enter into them with full knowledge of them I believe the Canadian people will continue to give their support. In the final analysis it amounts to this, that peace is maintained if people want peace; and if they get away from that we will have war. I hope our delegates to the conference, and delegates we may send to future organizations, will go with a spirit of maintaining peace, and that they will induce others to do likewise.

Mr. A. W. ROEBUCK (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, may I just take a moment to congratulate my gallant and learned friend from Grey-Bruce (Mr. Harris) upon the informed and thoughtful address he has just delivered. It ran through my mind that if all statesmen of the world approached this problem with such judicial calm, good will and kindness of thought we would not have war in the world, irrespective of the institutions we might support. It was a fine address.

On motion of Mr. Roebuck the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

[Mr. W. E. Harris.]

Thursday, March 22, 1945

The house met at three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

RECOMMENDATIONS OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION WITH RESPECT TO CLASSIFICATIONS, ETC.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to lay before the house reports of the civil service commission classifying certain positions on the staff of the House of Commons and approving the appointment of a secretary of the executive in the library of parliament. These reports have to be taken into consideration by the house under section 65 of the Civil Service Act as amended by chapter 40 of the annual statutes of 1932. The commission's recommendations will come into effect as soon as approved by the house; and with respect to the executive secretary of the library, action has to be taken by both houses.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask, Mr. Speaker, whether the report to which you have just referred has to do with the matter which I brought up last session with regard to the protective staff of the House of Commons?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes, I received the report from the civil service commission during the recess. According to the provisions of the House of Commons Act it must be placed before the house. It has to do with the matter to which the hon. member has just referred.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask Your Honour what is the next step with respect to getting the adjustments through?

Mr. SPEAKER: It is now in the hands of the Clerk of the House. The house will deal with it in due course.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRECEDENCE OF GOVERNMENT ORDERS— INTRODUCTION OF BILLS

Mr. SPEAKER: There are two bills on the order paper in the name of Mr. Fair. I will have to refer the hon. member to the resolution that was passed by the house on March 19 as follows:

That on Tuesday, the 20th March, 1945, to the end of the present session, government notices of motion and government orders shall have precedence at every sitting over all other business except questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

That was approved by the house. It does not cover introduction of bills; therefore I cannot place these bills before the house now.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—WALKING OUT UNIFORMS

Mr. LOCKHART:

1. Does the government supply "walking out uniforms" to the armed forces?
2. If so, what has the total cost of these uniforms been to date?

Mr. ABBOTT:

1. The "walking out uniform" was withdrawn from army scale of issue in January, 1945.
2. Approximately $6,340,000.

ENEMY ALIENS—SEIZURE OF PATENTS AND FORMULAS

Mr. ROSS (Hamilton East):

1. Have patents and formulas owned by enemy aliens been seized by the government?
2. If so, are same available to Canadian industries?

Mr. McLARTY:

1. Under the regulations respecting trading with the enemy, the property in Canada of enemies is vested in the custodian and has been so vested since the 2nd September, 1939.
2. Under the patents, designs, copyright and trade marks (emergency) order, 1939, provision is made for application to the commissioner of patents for licensing the use of any patent, design, copyright or trade mark which had previously been held by an enemy.

REFUGEES ADMITTED TO CANADA—RACIAL ORIGIN

Mr. DORION:

What is the number and the racial origin of the refugees who were admitted into Canada from the 1st of March, 1944, to the 1st of March, 1945?

Mr. CRERAR:

Racial origin	Number
Austrian .....	4
Beligan .....	1
Czecho-Slovakian .....	1
German .....	11
Hebrew .....	410
Jugo-Slavian .....	2
Luxemburg .....	1
Polish .....	3
Portuguese .....	1
Roumanian .....	2
Russian .....	2
Serbian .....	1
Spanish .....	8
Total .....	447

32283—8½

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

COLONEL ALLAN ANGUS MAGEE, K.C.

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Was Colonel Allan Angus Magee, K.C., employed by the dominion government since the beginning of this war?
2. If so, in what department, under what cabinet minister, in what particular capacity and for how long?
3. How much was paid to him each year for salary, and for living and travelling expenses?
4. Was he and is he still the president of Barclay's Bank (Canada), Ltd., and of Barclay Trust Co. of Canada?
5. Was there any other president of a Canadian chartered bank who was "a dollar a year man"?
6. If so, who?
7. Was Mr. Henry Borden, K.C., employed by the dominion government since the beginning of this war?
8. If so, in what department, in what particular capacity and for how long each time?
9. What were the duties and responsibilities of each one of the positions referred to in No. 8?
10. Was he a director of Barclay's Bank (Canada) Ltd., and, if so, since when?

CHARLES J. BURCHELL, K.C., AND OTHERS—GOVERNMENT APPOINTMENTS

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Was Mr. Charles J. Burchell, K.C., a partner of the law firms of Maclean, Burchell and Ralston from 1912 to 1922 and of that of Burchell and Ralston from 1922 to 1926?
2. Was he appointed Canadian High Commissioner to Australia, Newfoundland and South Africa, and, if so, when?
3. What was the date of his birth?
4. Was Mr. James Gordon Fogo, K.C., a partner of the law firms of Ralston & Hanway, Amherst, N.S., in 1924, and of that of Burchell & Ralston, Halifax, in 1925 and 1926?
5. Is he still now a partner of the law firm of Burchell & Co.?
6. Was he appointed associate coordinator of controls in the Department of Munitions and Supply, and, if so, when?
7. Was Mr. Joseph Gerald Godsoe associated in the practice of law with the firm of Burchell & Co., in Halifax, from 1928 to 1930?
8. Was he appointed coordinator of controls and chairman of the wartime industries control board in the Department of Munitions and Supply?
9. If so, when and whom did he succeed?
10. Was Mr. John Doherty Kearney, K.C., a partner of the law firm of Ralston, Kearney & Duquet, of Montreal, and if so, until when?
11. Was he appointed Canadian High Commissioner in Eire, and, if so, when?

Questions as Orders for Returns

12. Was Mr. Stuart Bowman Ralston in the law firm of Ralston, Kearney and Duquet, Montreal, and later on in the law firm of Kearney, Duquet & Mackay, Montreal?

13. What is his age and when was he admitted to the practice of law?

14. Was he appointed to do some work at the Patent and Copyright Office?

15. If so, from what date to what date, what work did he do and how much was paid to him or to his law firm for his work and for living and travelling expenses?

16. Did he make a report?

17. If so, to whom and when?

18. Did he make any recommendations?

19. If so, what were they, and were they adopted and enforced by the government?

LEGAL SERVICES—BURCHELL, SMITH,
PARKER AND FOGO

Mr. POULIOT:

Since the beginning of the war, how much was paid each year by the dominion government and any dominion board, commission and corporation and any other dominion agency to—
1. the law firm of Burchell, Smith, Parker & Fogo, barristers and solicitors, of the city of Halifax?

2. The following partners of the above mentioned firm: (a) C. J. Burchell, K.C.; (b) F. D. Smith, K.C.; (c) E. T. Parker, K.C.; (d) J. Gordon Fogo, K.C.; (e) W. H. Jost; (f) C. W. Burchell; (g) A. J. Meagher?

LEGAL SERVICES—KEARNEY & DUQUET, MONTREAL, AND KEARNEY, DUQUET AND MACKAY,
QUEBEC

Mr. POULIOT:

Since the beginning of the war, how much was paid each year by the dominion government and any dominion board, commission and corporation and any other dominion agency to—
1. the law firm of Kearney and Duquet, barristers and solicitors, of the city of Montreal, and Kearney, Duquet and MacKay, barristers and solicitors, of the city of Montreal?

2. The following partners of the above mentioned firms: (a) J. D. Kearney, K.C.; (b) J. E. L. Duquet; (c) R. de W. MacKay; (d) W. Mitchell; (e) S. B. Ralston; (f) D. L. Gales?

GOVERNMENT PURCHASES OF REAL ESTATE IN OTTAWA

Mr. POULIOT:

What are the persons, companies and estates from whom the government has bought real estate in the city of Ottawa since the beginning of the war, and how much was paid to each one of them?

INDIANS—HALDIMAND TREATY

Mrs. NIELSEN:

1. What is the text of the Haldimand treaty under the terms of which the people of the Six Nations Indians were settled on territory on each side of the Grand river in Ontario?

[Mr. Pouliot.]

2. What are the terms of the lease by which part of the territory, granted to the people of the Six Nations Indians under the Haldimand treaty, was rented by Captain Joseph Brant, and what were the rentals?

3. What is the total amount of money—the property of the people of the Six Nations Indians—now in possession of the Department of Indian Affairs, and how is it used and administered?

EXCISE TAX—SUGAR INDUSTRY

Mr. WINKLER:

1. How much did the government remit from the excise tax per 100 pounds of refined sugar to the beet sugar growers in September, 1943?

2. Was any remission made by the government to the cane sugar industry at the same time, namely September, 1943, or at any other time since?

3. To what did the duty plus 10 per cent war tax on imported raw cane sugar per 100-pound bag of refined sugar amount in 1940, 1941 and 1942?

4. Did P.C. 6582 dated July 27, 1942, abolish the import duty on raw cane sugar and the 10 per cent war tax?

5. How much money has been paid into the sugar stabilization fund established by the W.P.T.B., June 6, 1940?

(a) How much was paid by the sugar beet industry by years since its establishment in 1940?

(b) How much was paid by the cane sugar industry by years since its establishment in 1940?

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WARTIME LABOUR RELATIONS BOARD—WRIGHT-HARGREAVES APPEAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): May I direct the following questions to the Minister of Labour? Has the minister received any protest from organized labour regarding the decisions of the national labour relations board on the Wright-Hargreaves appeal? Has organized labour requested the government to reverse the decision of that board and change the personnel of the board? Is the minister at liberty to indicate to the house what action the government proposes to take?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): At the moment I cannot say whether any protests have been received, but I can say to my hon. friend, to begin with, that no decision of the wartime labour relations board is going to be changed by this government. Neither is the complexion of the wartime labour relations board going to be changed. Of course hundreds of these decisions are made, but if I remember correctly the decision in this instance was unanimous on the part of this board, which is composed of equal representatives of labour and the employers. Before my hon. friend asked his question he must have known that governments do not interfere with boards of that description; that is elementary and fundamental. That is all I have to say.

TRACTORS AND TRUCKS

AVAILABILITY FOR FARM PURPOSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply whether more tractors will be made available to farmers this spring than was the case in 1944. Apparently there has been some relaxation in the United States, and I was wondering if the minister would be in a position to advise what will be the situation in this country during the coming spring.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): As my hon. friend knows, tractors are not manufactured in Canada; our supply comes from the United States. We are on a quota basis there and if, as is suggested, the restriction on the manufacture of tractors has been relaxed in that country our quota will be raised accordingly, since a certain proportion of all tractors manufactured there come to Canada. Without going into the question in more detail I cannot say the extent of the relaxation, but I do know that if there has been any relaxation we will receive our proportionate share.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In this connection would the minister be good enough to make a statement with respect to the release of trucks in Canada? It is a burning question in my part of the country. Trucks in use at present are wearing out. There is provision for replacement, but the population is constantly changing, and the demand is changing, and I understand it is impossible for any newcomer to get a truck. As a result the truck transportation system is bogging down. I should like the minister to make a statement on that matter.

Mr. HOWE: The position in regard to trucks is very similar to the position in regard to tractors. We do make trucks in this country, but the release of trucks in Canada and the United States is proportionate. We think there is a fair distribution of such trucks as can be made available as between the two countries. As my hon. friend knows, heavy trucks are made in the United States and light trucks in Canada. There is some interchange between the two countries, but as in the case of tractors the distribution is proportionate.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The point I am making is that a firm rule has been laid down that a truck may not be sold to any person who never had a truck before, such as a man engaging in a new business to take the place of someone else who has dropped out. That man cannot get a truck. I realize that the situation is difficult, but it has been the cause of considerable hardship.

Mr. HOWE: I suggest that it would have been an even greater hardship if we had refused trucks to established trucking businesses and had given them to others setting up competing businesses. I think the plan of giving priority to the replacement of existing trucks is the only sound plan.

SHIPBUILDING

INQUIRY AS TO CLOSING DOWN OF TORONTO PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Has the government decided to close the shipbuilding plant on the Toronto waterfront? Could it not be used after the war for civilian shipbuilding purposes? At the present time we have no drydock at Toronto for large ships and they must be sent to Kingston or to Port Dalhousie or Montreal. This is an urgent matter.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): The shipyard at Toronto was established for one specific purpose; that was to build corvettes and minesweepers. There was no particular construction; the facilities at that point were adopted for that use. Those facilities are still being used for that purpose, and there is a fairly busy season ahead for the yard. After that the matter will have to receive further consideration.

OIL

PROGRESS OF OPERATIONS AT FORT MCMURRAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): I should like to ask the Minister of Mines and Resources if it is his intention to issue a progress report in connection with the production of oil at Fort McMurray.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): That has not been considered, but I shall be glad to take my hon. friend's suggestion under consideration.

Housing

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Since members of parliament are receiving letters daily asking for information on the housing policy of the government, I would ask the minister concerned to be good enough on the orders of the day to-morrow to make a statement of policy and inform hon. members of what is going on, and also to tell the house when the publications regarding housing will be ready for distribution. We have been expecting some of them for months; we are told every day they are coming off the press, but so far we have not received them. I hope it may be possible to have this statement to-morrow.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I can make a statement to-morrow as to when the regulations are likely to be available to the public. They have been in course of preparation for some time, and I understand they will be available soon. The other part of the hon. gentleman's question, as to what is going on, is a little indefinite, but I will make a brief statement to-morrow.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you.

WAR SERVICE GRATUITIES

QUESTION AS TO STATUS OF CANADIAN FIREFIGHTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York West): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Unfortunately I have not had an opportunity of giving him notice, for which I apologize. Has there been any reconsideration of the government's decision to exclude Canadian firefighters who have seen service overseas from the benefits of the service men's gratuities?

Hon. IAN A MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I can assure my hon. friend that this matter is now before the government for consideration.

PRIVILEGE—MR. CHURCH

REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN TORONTO "STAR" OF MARCH 21

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention to a special article in the [Mr. Crerar.]

Toronto Star of last evening referring to the opposition in connection with the debate now in progress in the house, in which it says that no member of the opposition was ready to take part. It goes on to refer to one of us over here as Richard the Unready, whereas the King of England they had in mind was Ethelred the Unready. I was ready to go on Tuesday night, but I understood we were not expected to take part in the debate that day. I may add that in debates I have adopted here the slogan of the Queen's Own Rifles of Toronto "Ready, aye ready."

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

EASTER RECESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): May I suggest to the Prime Minister that to-morrow, if it appears that the present session will go beyond Easter, he might make a statement to the house, for the convenience of hon. members who are here, as to what the adjournment will be over the Easter week-end.

SAN FRANCISCO CONFERENCE

PROPOSED GENERAL INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION
FOR MAINTENANCE OF PEACE AND SECURITY

The house resumed, from March 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King to approve a resolution to send representatives to a conference of the united nations at San Francisco to prepare a charter for the maintenance of international peace and security.

Mr. A. W. ROEBUCK (Trinity): I have been impressed, Mr. Speaker, during the course of this debate with the unanimity of opinion expressed by hon. members with regard to the resolution before the house. The Prime Minister stated that he thought the resolution would be non-contentious, with which view the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) seemed to agree. Since then there has been a sweet reasonableness in the speeches of hon. members that has been delightful and yet somewhat surprising, when one considers that in the debate on this resolution this house is approaching the most momentous question that has confronted this assembly since the declaration of war. And yet that is reasonable enough as well, because who among us at the close of this terrible war would refuse to join at least in the hope for international peace and security? The blood of the fallen millions in two wars on the battlefields of both Europe and Asia call to us who still live to take such action as is within our power to see that there be not reenacted the tragedies of 1914 and 1939.

Were Canada to defeat this resolution, were she to refuse to send a delegation to San Francisco, she would forfeit the high position she has now secured in the councils of the world. That would be the result should she stand aside at this critical time and refuse to join in the struggle which must confront the delegation to San Francisco.

I submit that this resolution should carry unanimously, and I congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) upon his masterly presentation of the subject in opening the debate. I rejoice that the Canadian delegation to San Francisco will be led by a statesman of the knowledge and wisdom of the present Prime Minister of Canada.

I am also pleased that probably included in the delegation will be the amiable gentleman who leads the official opposition—although I must confess that so far he has contributed very little to the debate on the subject. But I would suggest that, if the delegation is to have a Progressive-Conservative wing, we place in the estimates the price of an alarm clock, so that when they are there they will have their speeches written on time. It might be worth while were we to pay the cost of some vitamins, to pep them up a bit, and enable them to recover from that inferiority complex in international affairs which has always afflicted members of that party.

The resolution provides, in the first instance, that we accept the invitation to San Francisco, and secondly that we approve the principles and purpose of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals—in effect the maintenance of international peace and security. Those proposals are put forward as a satisfactory general basis for discussion. The government's policy is expressed in the resolution. It is easy indeed for the house to approve in a general way any effort to maintain peace and security. The young lives and the treasure we have poured out in these last few years in the melting pot of war, and the horrors through which humanity has passed, are sufficient guarantee of our sincerity in that regard. We want no more of war with its loss and its bereavements.

It is easy to determine that Canada's delegates should go to the conference, but it is much more difficult to decide what our delegation should do when it gets there. Lest there be any misunderstanding in this regard, let me point out that the Dumbarton Oaks proposals are not a statement of Canadian government policy. Except as an observer, Canada was not even there, and Canadian representatives took no part in the discussion which preceded the statement of proposals. They are the proposals of the big four who were there and therefore Canada is free to express her welcome or her commendation of the proposals, if she feels that way—or to criticize them. She is free to improve them if possible. The proposals were drawn without the presence of the great body of the allied nations. I think it is fair, therefore, to assume that the proposals will be modified, perhaps materially modified, when the smaller nations are heard. I sincerely hope that they will be changed in the discussions to take place at San Francisco; for in my opinion the Prime Minister and his associates will need all the wisdom they possess if this conference is not to be wrecked on the tangled skeins of these practical proposals. It will take all the wisdom and good will of our delegation and other delegations to assure that the international house of cards which may be erected in San Francisco does not collapse in wrack and ruin as did the house of the league of nations.

There are many reasons advanced as to why the league failed in the crisis. But in my humble opinion, one of the primary reasons for the failure of the league of nations was that the big four assumed to boss the show. The next reason was that the nations, including the big four, failed to carry out in action the high principles they expressed in memoranda. It was because of the lack of effectiveness and will to hold together, and the set-up which in practice gave to the big four undue control in the councils of the nations. It was because the small and medium nations permitted themselves to be treated as inferiors. Had the set-up of the league of nations been more democratic; had it been in very truth a parliament of the world, the United States would probably have joined in the deliberations. Confidence would have developed among the nations, and in the time of testing they might have relied upon collective security instead of each trying to save his own hide, with a total disregard for the welfare of others.

According to the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, the same general scheme is to be followed. The big five in matters of vital importance assume to be the whole thing. Frankly, I wonder how likely of permanent success is such an arrangement.

Let me pause to commend the men who at Dumbarton Oaks framed these proposals. They made a good beginning. One must realize that the Dumbarton Oaks proposals are an offer by the big five to all other allied nations of a scheme of association entirely satisfactory to themselves, something to form a basis of discussion and of bargaining when these delegations meet shortly in San Francisco.

The real purpose of the institutions to be set up in San Francisco is the establishment of an organization to maintain international peace and security, a consummation devoutly to be wished. To this end it is proposed that we constitute a security council of eleven nations and endow that council with the drastic and terrible responsibility of peace and war. If you will turn to page 16 of the pamphlet containing the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, published by the wartime information board, you will notice that the council in question is empowered to settle any dispute which constitutes in its judgment a threat to international security. To that end it may take such action by air, naval or land forces as may be necessary. Then if you will turn to page 17 of the pamphlet, you will note that all the members, not the eleven only who constitute the council for the time being, are expected to make available to the security council the armed forces, facilities and assistance which may be necessary. This is qualified only by the fact that the military assistance shall be in accordance with the agreements concluded among themselves. That is a powerful organization for concentrating in the hands of a few the military forces of the united nations.

But the fly in the ointment is in the constitution of the council, which you will find described on page 11 of the pamphlet. This reads:

The security council should consist of one representative of each of eleven members of the organization. Representatives of the United States of America, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the Republic of China, and, in due course, France, should have permanent seats.

The remaining six seats are to be competed for by the forty or fifty other united nations on a two year basis without the privilege of reelection. I do not wish to go through all the details of this constitution, with its voting privileges and so on. Sufficient it is for my purpose to say that the control of the armed forces which may be placed at the disposal of this council is to be in the hands of the permanent members of the board.

It has been urged in countless debates since these proposals were made that this control by the so-called great powers is made inevitable by the recognition of the facts of military might—as the Prime Minister phrased it, “the fact of might in this imperfect world.” One cannot be a realist and not recognize the logical consequence of the possession of power, but those who assume the right to make decisions should furnish the military might necessary to enforce them. There is an old saying that he who pays the piper calls the tune. I think the reverse statement should be equally true, that he who calls the tune should pay the piper.

[Mr. Roebuck.]

The Canadian people, it will be found, are not prepared to be the tail of any one's kite—international or otherwise. I notice that Anthony Eden, the British foreign secretary, seemed to have recognized that fact in a statement which appeared in yesterday's paper; I read from the Toronto Star:

There can be no freedom in the world unless the smaller states can be joined with the great powers in the protection of their common interests. Their right to their own way of life must be respected.

Note this sentence:

They must have their due share in making great decisions.

Mr. Eden must have realized that unless the smaller nations have had their share in the making of decisions of prime importance, they will not long cooperate in carrying them out. If it is necessary that we have a number of permanent members on the security council, to the exclusion of and superior to the great body of the united nations, then I ask, why is it that Canada is not included? I have been surprised Mr. Speaker, in the course of this debate to observe the readiness with which members on all sides of the house have accepted on the part of our nation the role of a second class power. I submit to you that a nation that is able to enlist something slightly fewer than a million men in its armed forces, that has a hundred ships of war upon the sea and thousands of its airmen in the skies, that is able to pour out something in the order of twenty billion dollars for the war effort before this coming year is concluded—I submit that such a nation holds no inferior place among the nations of the world. When it comes to enforcing decisions of the security council, when military action or economic sanctions are the order of the day, the concurrence of Canada will be essential to success.

I have been told that the reason we are not included among the permanent members of this board is that it is economic and military power that counts. If that is so, Mr. Speaker, how can it be said that France and China have anything comparable to the military and economic power of the Dominion of Canada?

At all events, we are not fighting among ourselves as are the people of China—due, I grant you, to the statesmanship of the Prime Minister that we are not fighting among ourselves!

It may be answered that it is not present power that counts but rather potential power. If that be so, Mr. Speaker, who, I ask you, will look into the future and will limit the potential power of this great Dominion of Canada?

Perhaps the real answer to this question why Canada is not placed in the upper class lies in the fact that Canada is a part of the British empire, and it has been assumed by those who know less of our constitution than do we that Great Britain speaks for the rest of the self-governing dominions, including this country of Canada. If Great Britain is to speak for Canada, let me point out that it involves both advantages and dangers. If the British delegation speaks on behalf of Canada, the question at once arises as to how the British delegation is to be selected. Does Canada have a voice in the selection and instruction of that delegation? If not, is Canada to revert in foreign affairs to the colonial status from which we have so slowly and painfully emerged during the century that has passed? And what, Mr. Speaker, becomes of the imperial conference resolution of 1926 in which it was declared that Great Britain and the self-governing dominions are equal in status, and not inferior one to the other in any aspect of their domestic or foreign affairs?

The old-time view of Canada's position within the empire as expressed by Kipling has long passed—"Daughter am I in my mother's house, but mistress in my own." That was a broadminded statement when Kipling penned those famous words, because it conceded to Canada autonomy in local affairs, but impliedly it asserted, as the facts then were, that Canada did not have control of her foreign affairs. Kipling would not write those words to-day did he know the changes that have taken place. Canada now is daughter in no man's house though still mistress in her own. She is the equal of any member of the British commonwealth and occupies no different relation to any other member from that which that member occupies to her.

It is important, in my view that these fundamentals of Canada's status be borne in mind by the delegates who attend the San Francisco conference. Let it not be forgotten by those delegates that Canada is a north American nation and that she has interests and problems which are essentially different from those of the nations of Europe and Asia. She is a north American nation and all that this implies. With the United States on the south, with the great Soviet republic on our west, and with Great Britain on our east, Canada is strategically placed. In such a midway position no one can speak for Canada but Canada herself, and no one can act for Canada except with Canada's consent. I think this is thoroughly realized, though so far unexpressed, by the Prime Minister who will lead this delegation. I should like to read you a word from his speech:

It is the view of the government that the constitutional position within the organization of important secondary countries should be clarified—

That is, our position should be clarified.

—and that the delegation from Canada should exert the utmost effort to secure due recognition of their relative standing among the nations of the world.

No doubt the Prime Minister had Canada in mind when he spoke these words. I hope that the members of this delegation will go to San Francisco bearing vividly in their minds the fact that they are there to further the cause of peace and security, to protect the interests and the future of the dominion which they represent, and to promote the future of mankind.

The Prime Minister, in the remarkable and capable speech with which he opened this debate, has said that our contribution to the fashioning of victory is far beyond what we could have expected six years ago, and that our contribution to the maintenance of peace and security may be even greater. That is true. The Prime Minister also said, as reported on page 30 of Hansard:

It is important that our representatives should speak with a clear, strong and united voice.

With that statement I heartily agree. I wish that I could imbue every member of this delegation with the militant and aggressive Canadianism which I myself possess. I would add to that excellent statement: speak not only with a strong voice but with a bold and confident voice, fully realizing and maintaining the dignity and importance of the brave country which it is their privilege to represent. The ancient leader Joshua, speaking in Israel, used these words, "Be thou strong and very courageous", and I repeat his words to the members of this momentous delegation, "Be thou strong and very courageous", and let them bear in mind throughout their most important deliberations that any human institution which they may set up for the exercise of military and economic power which they hope will endure must be based upon a foundation of democracy, of equality, and of respect for every member represented. If the security council is to endure, it must be subject to democratic control by all members who participate in the dangers and the costs of its decisions.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, the resolution under debate to-day provides for endorsement by this house of the acceptance of the invitation extended to the government of Canada to attend the conference at San Francisco; it provides that the house shall recognize that the establishment of an effective international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security is of vital importance to Canada and that she should become a member; further that the house approves of the purposes and principles set forth in the proposals of the four governments, known as the Dumbarton Oaks and the Yalta proposals, and considers that such proposals provide a basis for the discussion of the charter of the proposed international organization. The resolution does not provide that by accepting it this house shall be taken as approving all these proposals as distinguished from the purposes and principles; it merely states that the proposals are to be considered as a basis for discussion. Then it provides that the representatives of Canada shall be instructed to further the preparation of an acceptable charter for an international organization, and finally that such charter shall, before ratification, be submitted to the Canadian parliament for approval.

Anyone in this house or elsewhere in Canada who believes in world peace must approve this resolution. Surely it is obvious now that there can be world peace only if there is some effective world organization. So there is in my opinion nothing controversial about the resolution itself.

But the case is different with the proposals that were submitted to this house and to the nation by the Prime Minister (Mr. King) in his speech of two days ago. He outlined some of the changes which this Canadian government will ask in the proposals, and gave us some idea of the policy of the government with regard to an international organization. It is true that he did not give us as many details as some of us would have liked, but he did give a rough outline of the proposals which the present Canadian government will present at San Francisco. To-day I propose to criticize some of these proposals. I shall try to do that, not for the sake of criticism, but having always in mind the aim that Canada may make the greatest possible contribution to world peace.

[Mr. Roebuck.]

International peace and security cannot be attained or kept by passing resolutions or by junketing trips to international conferences, whether they are at Geneva or San Francisco or any other place. It cannot be attained or kept by speeches at such conferences, but only by each nation being prepared, in the first place, to cooperate on friendly terms with all other nations, and, in the second place, to combine at once with other nations to fight any aggressor. That is another lesson we should have learned from this second world war. I have always thought that the basic principle in considering how world peace may be attained and kept is very clearly set out by Sir Norman Angell in his book entitled "Let the People Know". At page 50 he gives that principle as follows:

It is this exceedingly simple and basic social principle: unless the community—whether it be a community of persons or of states—is prepared to use its combined power for the defence of the individual member who is made the victim of lawless violence, there can be neither law, nor peace, nor justice, nor stable civilization.

Therefore for Canada it all adds up to this: she must be prepared to furnish fighting men for service abroad. It is to be hoped that there will never be fighting on Canadian soil. Surely Canadians should hope that any fighting which takes place will be as far away from our shores as possible. This means that we must be prepared to furnish fighting men for service anywhere in the world; it means, putting it on a personal basis, bringing it back to the Canadian father or mother in the home, that Canadians must be prepared to have their sons die abroad to protect some other nation; because we realize that only in that way can peace be maintained. It follows as surely as the night the day that only in that way can our homeland of Canada be secured. The Canadian House of Commons, the Canadian people, had better face that fact, had better realize that there may be a price to be paid in Canadian blood for world peace. I believe that Canadians will face it and will be prepared to pay that price. But it did not help to have the Prime Minister use these words in this speech of March 20, 1945, as reported at page 26 of Hansard of that date:

As they stand, the acceptance of the proposals would in no way commit Canada to send forces beyond Canadian territory at the call of the security council.

I realize that that statement can be interpreted in two ways. It can be said that what was meant was that in the first agreement between Canada and the new world organization which provides for the forces that Canada must furnish, there would also have to be special provision if these troops were to be sent beyond the boundaries of Canada. But it may also be interpreted in another way, and I fear that it will be interpreted the other way by some of the Prime Minister's followers in the election campaign this year. It can be interpreted to mean that when trouble comes Canada will not have to send any men beyond her boundaries unless there is an agreement made at that time that such shall be done. If every nation or only a few nations take that position, there will be no effective world organization. The tragedy of his statement is that it gives the impression that in entering a world organization Canada has not very much to worry about, that there is very little obligation.

May I suggest to the Prime Minister that it would have been far wiser for him to adopt the attitude taken by that great leader the Right Hon. Winston Churchill when in 1940 he told the British people that he could offer them nothing but blood, sweat and tears. He received their whole-hearted support because he took that attitude. It would have been far wiser—and the Prime Minister can still make his position clear—to tell the Canadian people that there will probably be a price to pay, that almost certainly sooner or later Canadians will have to die abroad with the young men of the other peace-loving nations in order to suppress aggression; and it should be pointed out that for such a cause the sacrifice would be worth while.

The Prime Minister showed the same attitude with regard to Canada imposing sanctions. His statement will be found at page 29 of Hansard of March 20, where he used these words:

It would seem to be desirable to develop some procedure whereby states not represented on the security council—

Which, of course, under the present provisions will be Canada's position most of the time.

—would not be called upon to undertake serious enforcement action without the opportunity or participating in the council's proceedings, or without agreeing separately to—

Here is the damaging part of the statement. —or without agreeing separately to join in executing the decisions of the council.

That would probably mean a delay. It might defeat the whole purpose of sanctions being imposed. It is too much like the attitude taken by this same Canadian government back in 1935 concerning the imposing of sanctions on Italy. I hold in my hand a press dispatch of December 2, 1935, which reads as follows:

When Doctor Walter A. Riddell, Canada's permanent advisory officer at Geneva suggested on November 2 to the league of nations committee of eighteen that sanctions against Italy should be extended to include oil, coal by-products, iron and steel, he was expressing "only his own personal opinion, not the views of the Canadian government," according to a lengthy statement issued by acting Prime Minister Ernest Lapointe on Sunday.

The Prime Minister's statement indicates that this government is still tarred with the no-commitment stick. Those of us who were in the House of Commons before war broke out will remember that right up to the outbreak of war the foreign policy of Canada, under the present government, was that she had no commitments to anybody, league of nations, Great Britain or other dominions, United States or anybody else. I am afraid that that attitude is still in the back of the minds of the ministry. The government is still thinking along this line and is trying to leave open an exit from some of the obligations that Canada will be asked to assume at San Francisco. I hesitate to be suspicious, but it looks to me like an attempt to appease the isolationists of Canada. In any event it is a very disturbing attitude. Our delegation must make clear at San Francisco that Canada is prepared to make commitments, to stand by them not only in word but in deed and with no thought of evasion.

I now come to Canada's position under the Dumbarton Oaks security proposals. First of all there is to be a general assembly. I need say nothing about that other than that all of the nations, including Canada, will be members of the assembly and every nation will have the same authority. Then there is to be an economic and social council. That is a council set up for the direct betterment of mankind. I agree with the Prime Minister's remarks of a few days ago when he said that he hoped it would not be very long before the work of that council should become the most important work of this new world organization, although I doubt whether that will be so for many years. I hope also that that council will always keep in mind that portion of the Atlantic charter, that great charter for humanity, which gave us the vision of a peace which would offer the assurance that all the men in all the lands might live out their lives in freedom from fear and want. There are to be eighteen members on this council, chosen by the assembly for a term of three years, and I have no doubt that in her turn Canada will be a member of that council.

Then there is to be a security council, which is given the main task in the world organization, the task of maintaining peace and security. Of course the primary purpose of this world organization is to stop wars and to defeat any aggressor who starts one. The greatest power of the security council is set out in chapter VIII, section B, paragraph 5 of the proposals, in these words:

In order that all members of the organization—

Not just the greater powers, as the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) suggested.—should contribute to the maintenance of international peace and security, they should undertake to make available to the security council, on its call—

That, of course, is the reverse of the statement of the Prime Minister the other day with regard to troops serving beyond Canada on call of the security council.

—and in accordance with a special agreement or agreements concluded among themselves, armed forces, facilities and assistance necessary for the purpose of maintaining international peace and security.

There are to be eleven members, six of them non-permanent, elected for two-year terms and ineligible to serve a second term immediately. Five members are to be permanent; and they are named, in chapter VI of the proposals, as the United States of America, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the Republic of China and, in due course, France. Those permanent seats on the council have been allotted on the basis of power; certainly that is so in respect of the first three named; the Prime Minister put it the other day, that those are the three greatest world powers. The nations holding permanent seats are given very wide powers. In the first place, on all vital matters such as the application of force or the imposition of sanctions, they must agree, which of course means that any one of the five may veto action. That is set out in chapter VI, section C, paragraph 3 of the proposals, in these words:

Decisions of the security council on all other matters—

That is, other than procedural matters.

—should be made by an affirmative vote of seven members including the concurring votes of the permanent members; provided that, in decisions under chapter VIII, section A—

That has to do with the pacific settlement of disputes, as distinguished from threats to the peace or acts of aggression.

—and under the second sentence of paragraph one of chapter VIII, section C—

This refers to regional arrangements.

—a party to a dispute should abstain from voting.

That is the first very important power that is to be given to these nations holding permanent seats. In addition there is to be a military staff committee, which is provided for in chapter VIII, section B, paragraph 9. It is really a general staff for this world organization, but in addition to being given the power to make recommendations about the use of troops and to conduct a war it also has control over the regulations of armaments and the possible disarmament of all the nations of the world. That committee is to be composed of the chiefs of staff of the permanent members; it does not include the chiefs of staff of those who happen to be non-permanent members at the time but only the chiefs of staff of the permanent members.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. KINLEY: It is more than that.

Mr. GREEN: You can make your own speech.

Mr. KINLEY: Well, you are wrong; that is all.

Mr. GREEN: The third power is in regard to amendments and is contained in chapter XI. This provides that amendments to the charter must be ratified by the five nations holding permanent seats on the security council, which again means that any one may veto an amendment. Finally they have great power because they are there all the time. They are to be permanent, with each of the five nations having a permanent organization actually at the headquarters of the world organization.

There is great importance attached to a permanent seat on the security council. Under the Dumbarton Oaks and Yalta proposals Canada will never have a permanent seat on that council, though occasionally she may have a non-permanent seat. In other words she will seldom be a member of that council. That is a humiliating position for a nation that has raised nearly a million men during the present conflict and has given so freely of her blood and treasure. In effect, Canada is in the same position as the Irish Free State.

The Prime Minister now bewails our position, yet it is a direct result of the policies of his government. Had the Canadian government so willed, the great world power at Dumbarton Oaks could have been the British commonwealth of nations rather than the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. The British commonwealth of nations could have been the power named in the Dumbarton Oaks proposals as the power to hold a permanent seat on the security council. There can be no doubt of the attitude of Great Britain; Churchill and Eden have shown it on different occasions as clearly as they dared. I have here the press dispatch of a speech made by Mr. Eden in the British House of Commons over a year ago, in which he said that "if a close and intimate understanding could be achieved between the British commonwealth of nations, the United States and Russia, all our problems, however difficult, can be resolved." He did not say Great Britain, the United States and Russia; he mentioned the British commonwealth of nations. In October of last year, while in Russia, Mr. Churchill said:

I hope most earnestly and I believe with deep conviction that the warrior statesman at the head of Russia, through these years of storm and tempest will bring his country into the sunlight of a broader and happier age for all, and with him in this task will march the British commonwealth of nations and the mighty United States of America.

Here again Mr. Churchill did not use the term Great Britain; he was very careful to say the British commonwealth of nations. But our Prime Minister has maintained throughout that this great power must be the United Kingdom alone. On July 20 of last year he was asked in this house about the meeting at Dumbarton Oaks. He was asked who were to be the four great powers represented there. This was his answer, as it appears in Hansard:

The purpose of the meeting is that these four powers may consider the development of a general plan of world security. There will be only the four powers at the meeting.

Then the leader of the opposition asked whether it was to be understood that the British commonwealth was included in those powers, or just the United Kingdom, to which the Prime Minister replied:

The four powers are the United Kingdom, the United States, the U.S.S.R. and China.

The actual fact is that the third great power in the world to-day is not the United Kingdom but the British commonwealth. There have been almost a million young Canadians in the forces, hundreds of thousands of Australians and thousands of New Zealanders and South Africans, as well as something like two million from India. So that between three and four million men who have been fighting in this war under the British commonwealth did not come from the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

The government's policy has been and is to-day based upon a false premise, with the result that now Canada finds herself in a humiliating position. But she can still get out of it. The way to get out of this humiliating position is not to shout for a seat for herself on the security council and to give more trouble in that way. The way for her to get out is to ask that in the charter provision be made for a permanent seat on the security council for the British commonwealth rather than for the United Kingdom and Northern Ireland.

I am sure there will be no objection to that request in Great Britain. I have here a dispatch from Great Britain dated March 2, and reading as follows:

Third leg of the massive tripod that is to sustain this structure of world order has to be provided by British power. Resources of this small island are inadequate for this, and only world-wide cooperation by the British commonwealth can be regarded as sufficient. Sovereign freedom of each dominion is no bar to action in peace, with similar concert as in war.

Thus if Canada makes this request, and if it is granted, Canada, still with a seat on the assembly, will be sitting in permanently on the security council, where the important decisions are being made. She will be sitting in as a very important part of one of the three greatest world powers, playing a vital role, making her greatest possible contribution to world peace, taking the place won for her by her sons on the field of battle, on the seas and in the air, in all parts of the world, and working with the other nations of the commonwealth as a team, in peace, as we have done in two wars. We would be taking our natural position.

The former prime minister of Australia put it very clearly the other day. A press report makes this statement:

Former Premier Menzies in the house of representatives in Canberra described as unwise and dangerous the tendency of the British commonwealth to meet as units and not as a team in the international conferences, like that of San Francisco. It was more important for the British dominions to aim at a common front than insist upon their independence, which nobody challenged.

But no, none of that for this government! The Dumbarton Oaks plan ignores the fact that there is a British commonwealth of nations, despite the fact that that commonwealth of British people stood alone against the aggressor for nearly a year, with only the help of little Greece. It stood alone and saved civilization. I believe the Dumbarton Oaks proposals ignore the existence of the British commonwealth of nations at the suggestion of this Canadian government.

The Prime Minister's plan to get Canada out of the humiliating position into which she has been put by his own policy is to set up a new group of nations. He wishes to have great powers, the middle or secondary powers, and the small powers. I am reminded of the fairy story about Goldilocks and the three bears—the big bear, the middle-sized bear and the little bear. The government wants Canada to be a middle-sized nation. Then, it wants those middle-sized nations to get more rights and a preferred position over the small nations.

In his speech the other day, in effect the Prime Minister warned the little nations away from attempting to get a non-permanent seat on the security council, because they were not able to put up as much force as he could. A few months ago the policy of this government was that Canada should be a leader of the small nations. This is what I find in a press dispatch:

Canada to Lead Small Nations

Senator Wishart Robertson, president of the National Liberal Federation, last night asserted that Canada will go to the peace conference "virtually the leader of the smaller countries among the united nations."

This press dispatch is dated at Saskatoon January 19, 1944. Now we find that the government has shifted its stand and wishes to become one of the middle-sized nations. It is now trying to shove the small nations one rung further down the ladder. A few months ago the government was bewailing any attempt to play power politics. Now, in effect, the Prime Minister is advocating bare-faced power politics; and the C.C.F., dutiful as usual, is following along behind and advocating the same thing.

No other nation says there should be a new group of middle-sized nations with more rights. There is nothing about it in the Dumbarton Oaks proposals or in the Yalta proposals. The sad feature for humanity is that it is complicating an already complex plan. The suggestion for middle-sized powers may well be the source of much trouble. It asks for a dangerous distinction. What is a middle-sized nation? The Prime Minister mentioned Brazil, the Netherlands and Australia. The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Martin) mentioned Belgium and Canada. Well, what about Turkey, Sweden, Spain, Mexico, Argentina, Italy, Rumania, Czechoslovakia? They will all want to be classed as middle-sized nations too. The other day the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour admitted, rather dubiously, that it would be difficult to define just what a middle-sized nation is, and he was dead right. It will be even more difficult to determine the preferred position that these middle-sized nations are to get. And all this is caused because the government is dodging, twisting and turning to get away from a permanent commonwealth seat, with the result that Canada is not to get her rightful place in this world organization.

I had meant to say something about regional arrangements and regional agencies, particularly as they apply to the Pacific coast. As my time is almost up, however, I shall not deal with those matters in detail. But I think the government should tell the house what plans it is going to advocate by way of regional organization. For instance, there is now a Pacific council, and we should like to know what that council has been doing. We should like to know what the government thinks about having a regional organization in the Pacific, where there are questions of defence, and communications; airways, through Alaska and into Russia, and thence to other parts of Asia, airways to points across the Pacific ocean such as Australia and New Zealand. There is the question of a highway to Alaska, and the connecting link by ferry with Russia, so as to join the two great continents of North America and Asia. There is the question of trade. Canadians who live on the Pacific coast are vitally interested in all those questions. We should like to know what the government will be proposing at San Francisco concerning regional organization for the Pacific. Canadians, with our blood brothers the Australians and New Zealanders, have the responsibility of deciding, in conjunction with the Americans, the Chinese, the Russians and the Dutch, and of course the folks of the motherland, just what sort of future there shall be around the shores of that great ocean.

[Mr. Green.]

In conclusion may I say that there will be more world conferences. This is only the first. At every one of those conferences the lives of our sons and their sons, the survival of the nation and the continuance of civilization will be at stake. The Canadian people are in no mood and they will be in no mood to have their representatives make commitments that are only half commitments, that leave open a line of retreat. Canada's commitments must be clear-cut, they must be fully binding. Canada must fulfil not only the letter of the law but also the spirit. Then as a nation she will be acting as every true Canadian would act. Further, the Canadian people are in no mood to have their representatives start an argument or perhaps a dispute by insisting on a regrouping of powers other than those occupying the permanent seats in the security council under the Dumbarton Oaks plan, a regrouping into middle-sized or secondary states, or whatever you wish to call them, and small nations. There should be no demanding of recognition and extra rights for the middle-sized nations because Canada happens to be one of them. The Canadian people are not interested in having Canada declared a middle-sized nation or a secondary state, but they are interested in Canada's developing into a great world power, standing beside Great Britain and the other dominions in the British empire. That is the destiny of this nation.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I am thankful for the opportunity of saying a word in this debate. I want to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. MacKenzie King) upon the fine opening address he made. I do this because I respect his judgment and because what he said is in keeping with what he said in London, what he said before the labour congress in Toronto and what he has said on several occasions, that this is the beginning of a better day.

I also congratulate the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) upon the endeavour he made yesterday. I think he did pretty well with a most difficult job. He interjected a little politics into the debate, but I do not blame him for doing that because I am going to do the same thing. I do not agree with what the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) said about the places that would be suitable for the proposed house of peace. I think the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) will agree with me when I say that if the hon. member for Parry Sound would stand on the hill at Mirady park and look out over Thunder bay; if he could see Fort William sleeping quietly there; if he would see the sleeping giant away over yonder or the squaw looking for her husband coming home with his fishing boat; if he could stand on Mount McKay with all its majesty at the head of the lakes; if he could see Loch Lomond, from which that city gets its water eight hundred feet above Fort William; if he could see the background of Kakabeka falls with their one hundred and ninety foot head, he would then agree that the finest place in Canada for the peace house would be in the Thunder Bay district.

I was sorry the Prime Minister did not go further afield in his selection of the delegation. If he knew, and I hope he does, of the intelligent judgment, the practical common sense and the sweet influence of the fairer sex, both inside and outside the home, he would have then chosen representatives from both houses of parliament, from both sides of the house and from both sexes in the house. I say that the delegation will not be complete unless it contains one of the fairer sex to keep the men where they ought to be kept.

Knowing hon. members of this house as I do, I do not think that any member of this delegation will stoop to play politics, either on the way to the conference, while he is there or on the way home. I know they will all be big enough to get behind the scene and study the needs of the countries that are represented, especially Canada.

I was terribly disappointed at results after the last war. Nobody wanted war immediately after the last war. I sat on a school board at that time and I was criticized for advocating cadet training. It was said it was just the thin end of the wedge to bring back war. Women all over Canada, universities and high schools, labour and farmer organizations all passed resolutions condemning war, saying that it was all being done to satisfy the whims of the war lords of Europe and to supply cannon fodder.

What are we fighting for? The hon. member for Parry Sound said it was freedom, but I would go farther than that. You cannot have freedom without permanent peace. Before I am through I shall show you upon what permanent peace is based.

I expect that this will be the greatest conference that the world has ever known. There will be a sacred trust upon every one who represents us, every man or woman, and I am sure they will all measure up to that trust. This conference is to outlaw war. As someone said the other day, it will also put out of business the league of nations. I was disappointed with the league of nations. They did many fine things, but when they allowed Italy to sweep into Ethiopia and take over that country, when they allowed Japan to go into China, a large nation but one militarily helpless, I was disappointed.

I read that splendid book "One world" by Wendell Willkie. The hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) is right when he says the small nations should be respected. When I think of the way the Prime Minister looks out for the little men, the people with low incomes, then I know he is not going to pass up the small nations. He will see that they get fair play. I know it is important for every man to have a job, but if every man in the country had a job there would not be heaven on earth just the same. I know that every nation should be free and enjoy security. I do know, too, that I was of the opinion that no nation taking part in this great war was going to seek territorial advantage. I remember that I stood up in this house, whether I was the first or not I do not know but I was first on the government side, to advocate that there be ambassadorial relations between Canada and Russia. Dear knows where we would be to-day were it not for Russia. She has kept us living. But I am not so optimistic when I find a big slice of Poland going to Russia. That is just a sign of the times, and I hope that Russia will be big enough to give that territory back to Poland.

I would also say that no man and no group of men and no nation can live in luxury while others are living in abject poverty, for there are the seeds of war.

Our delegation to the San Francisco conference, of course, should prepare thoroughly, thinking not of Canada only but in terms of the whole world. They should emphasize things that the nations have in common and forget the petty differences. We have plenty of things in common that stand out—our belief in the Divine Creator; the need for every man to eat and live and have his children educated and have a fair degree of comfort; the need for freedom to worship as we desire.

When the peace conference is called I hope the women will be represented there, indeed that every interest will be represented. I know I have my bias but I would say that labour has qualified for a position at the peace table.

It has been my sad privilege, Mr. Speaker, to visit many homes in the Thunder Bay district afflicted by casualties. I remember three days, one after the other, when I visited ten homes a day. I saw a husband standing beside his wife whose boy of great promise had been taken, and I listened to the wife saying to us, "Dan, do you think the peace will be worth it?" I wonder how you would answer that woman! I had my answer. There are two answers to that. First, I said, "If our boys and Canada and the United States had not gone into this war we would not be here to-day as we are now, because Germany would be in Canada." The other answer is, "The peace will be worth while provided that we build it upon a foundation that does not give way." I dare quote, Mr. Speaker, from the greatest book in all history, a book that took over a thousand years to write, whose contributors have been the greatest men in every age, and whose truth is infallible. I do not say that the book itself is infallible because we could burn it, but I do say that the truth that this old book contains is infallible and I dare to quote from it to-day.

We hear at Christmas time a great deal about the coming of the Prince of Peace. We have all heard in all our churches throughout the length and breadth of Canada of the only foundation upon which a peace that will endure can be built. I am convinced that that foundation is the teachings and character of the Peacemaker himself. You will find the principles laid down in his first sermon, what you might call the speech from the throne. There you will find laid down the principles upon which the peace conference should be founded, and I am sure that if the delegates take into account the principles of the Prince of Peace, a peace will be built that will last. The Peacemaker sums up by saying that the man who builds upon the sands—it may be the sands of education only, it may be the sands of fame or ambition, it may be the sands of money, love of power, property—when the storm comes the superstructure will be swept away, but a house built upon the Rock of Ages will stand the test of time, and I hope that a peace will be built upon that rock because it is the only kind of peace that will last.

[Mr. Green.]

The Peacemaker outlines the principles, the foundation of the new kingdom, the new social order, if you like to call it that, which we are to have after the war. He says that they that live by the sword shall perish by the sword.

Take Hannibal, Nero, Napoleon, Hitler or any other would-be world conqueror—every one of them has had to learn that the man or nation that lives by the sword shall perish by the sword. I can hear the historian telling of how Napoleon said, "Talk not to me of Providence, for Providence is on the side of the heaviest battalions." But Napoleon lived to rue the day because he found that Providence was not on the side of his great battalions but on the side of the soft white snowflakes of Russia that froze half a million of his men in their saddles or where they lay upon the ground. Hitler had the largest and best equipped army in the world. Why did he not sweep into England when there was not enough ammunition there to keep the soldiers of Britain fighting one hour? I would say that it was in answer to the prayers of a Christian people in a Christian world. It was due to Divine intervention, just as it was in a time of crisis in the last great war.

Then He tells us how to deal with your enemy. Bless them and curse not, He says. Hon. members will agree that that is not so easy. You have to be completely unselfish to love even your political enemies in this house and to ask for a blessing upon them.

Then we have His statement about those who will not cooperate in the building up of the kingdom of peace. We remember His saying, "Neither cast ye your pearls before swine, lest they trample them under their feet, and turn again and rend you." Did we not have a perfect example of that when Chamberlain as Prime Minister of Britain journeyed twice to see Hitler as leader of Germany in an effort to avoid war? But what did Hitler do? He trampled the arguments of Chamberlain under foot and prepared to rend England into smithereens. And it did not do him any good.

I quote the saying of another great statesman who at first had a Jewish name, Saul, but afterwards changed it to Paul. He laid down the foundation which our delegation should bear in mind in following the principles of the Prince of Peace in building a new world, "other foundations can no man lay than that which is laid in Him." You may have geographical descriptions of economic needs and natural resources, but if you leave out the foundation laid by the Prince of Peace, the peace conference will be wrecked. I heard the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) quoting the words of Joshua, the successor to Moses—"Be strong and very courageous." I would quote a bigger man than Joshua, the apostle Paul, who said, "Fight the good fight", the fight against selfishness and cruelty and wrong. I have confidence in our Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), because I know something of his practical Christianity, that he will use his influence for the sake of peace, and he and his delegation, I am confident, will lay the foundation for the peace of the world upon the Rock of Ages.

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): It is a very healthy sign that there is almost unanimous consent of the house to the proposal for a world organization after this war is over to prevent in so far as possible the recurrence of such a catastrophe. I believe it is also a healthy sign that there is almost unanimous agreement that Canada should accept her place as a member of this world assembly. Possibly we do not agree in all details as to how that membership should be expressed. We heard this afternoon from the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) his opinion or that of his party of how our representation at that conference should act. I do not agree with him in his analysis in that respect, and probably some of our group will later make our position clear in this matter. It is also reassuring that the house is almost unanimously in agreement that when Canada accepts membership in the league she should accept all the responsibilities which go with it. I agree in that respect with the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver South; if we are to take our place in the world community we must accept the responsibilities which that membership entails.

This afternoon, however, I propose to deal with the economic angle of the Dumbarton Oaks agreement, that part of the agreement which suggests the setting up of an economic and social council. We all agree that it is necessary to have machinery to settle disputes and maintain peace. I say it is just as necessary to remove the causes of these disputes. One of the greatest of these in the international as in the national field is economic and social injustice. The Dumbarton Oaks agreement recognizes this principle, and I believe our delegation should ask for the strengthening of this part of the agreement. Wars can be promoted only when there is fear, want and inequality in the world; remove these and you remove the basic causes of war. Neither individuals nor nations as a rule start a fight on a full stomach. Therefore, I say, the increased production and proper distribution of food can be one of the major factors in maintaining world peace. I hope our Canadian delegation to the San Francisco conference will see to it that this matter receives adequate attention and discussion. Canada is vitally interested. She is in proportion to her population by far the greatest producer of food in the world. Last year we exported from thirty to forty per cent of our total production of food and produced over $1,750 millions of agricultural products. The raising of the nutritional standards of not only our own people but the peoples of other countries is consequently of paramount importance to us. Canada's delegation to the conference should therefore endeavour to strengthen the authority and importance of the social and economic council.

Under this council, I believe, will act the permanent committee set up by the united nations conference on food and agriculture at Hot Springs, Virginia, in May and June, 1943. That conference appointed an interim committee to draw up a permanent constitution, that constitution to be ratified by the thirty-six nations represented at the conference. To date only nineteen nations have ratified that constitution, and Canada is not one of them. I believe that before our delegation goes to San Francisco this house should see that the permanent constitution of the united nations conference on food and agriculture held at Hot Springs is ratified, and that the permanent commission for carrying out the recommendations of the conference should be immediately set up. President Roosevelt about a month ago asked the congress of the United States to ratify that constitution. It is essential that Canada also should do so, and, as I said, before our delegation goes to the San Francisco conference.

At Hot Springs, Virginia, for the first time, an international conference recognized the principle that human needs should be the first consideration in setting up any new world order. They made definite recommendations as to methods that might be used in the carrying out of a world plan for the most economic production and distribution of food and other agricultural products. In this connection I would like to quote from the declaration of that conference, because I believe it is very important to us here in Canada:

(1) The first task is to complete the winning of the war and to deliver millions of people from tyranny and from hunger. During the period of critical shortage in the aftermath of war, freedom from hunger can be achieved only by urgent and concerted efforts to economize consumption, to increase supplies and distribute them to the best advantage.

(2) Thereafter we must equally concert our efforts to win and maintain freedom from fear and freedom from want. The one cannot be achieved without the other.

(3) There has never been enough food for the health of all people. This is justified neither by ignorance nor by the harshness of nature. Production of food must be greatly expanded; we now have knowledge of the means by which this can be done. It requires imagination and firm will on the part of each government and people to make use of that knowledge.

(4) The first cause of hunger and malnutrition is poverty. It is useless to produce more food unless men and nations provide the markets to absorb it. There must be an expansion of the whole world economy to provide the purchasing power sufficient to maintain an adequate diet for all. With full employment in all countries, enlarged industrial production, the absence of exploitation, an increasing flow of trade within and between countries, an orderly management of domestic and international investment and currencies, and sustained internal and international economic equilibrium, the food which is produced can be made available to all people.

(5) The primary responsibility lies with each nation for seeing that its own people have the food needed for life and health; steps to this end are for national determination. But each nation can fully achieve its goal only if all work together.

(6) We recommend to our respective governments and authorities the study and adoption of the findings and recommendations of this conference and urge the early concerted discussion of the related problems falling outside the scope of this conference.

(7) The first steps toward freedom from want of food must not await the final solution of all other problems. Each advance made in one field will strengthen and quicken advance in all others. Work already begun must be continued. Once the war has been won decisive steps can be taken. We must make ready now.

Later on in this document they go on to show how these objects may be obtained—by a long-term food production policy, by adequate agricultural credit, by the encouragement of the cooperative movements throughout the world, by changes in our land tenure and farm labour conditions, by education and research, by conserving land and water resources and by the development and settlement of land for food production. To carry out this programme it would be necessary to facilitate the exchange of agricultural products between nations. We believe that one of the chief ways in which this can be done is to take the exporting and importing of food products out of the hands of the speculator, as has been done to a very large extent during the war, and make it a government responsibility. We believe that it is in the interests of both importing and exporting nations to have long term agreements as to prices, quality and quantity of food to be exchanged. No country can get the maximum production of food without stability in the price structure. This has been amply demonstrated in Canada by the increased production during the war when we had stabilized prices.

[Mr. Wright.]

It is equally to the advantage of exporting and importing nations to know that they are guaranteed a continuous supply of quality goods at a known price. Any return, therefore, after the war to the speculative handling of food should be vigorously opposed by our government. Long-term agreements should be negotiated between exporting and importing countries for periods of not less than five years and should be renegotiated at least one year before termination of the contract. This we believe would greatly assist in obtaining maximum production and continuity of supply. We believe that in the collection, processing and distribution of food within the various nations the cooperative movement should be encouraged. In this connection I do not think I can do better than quote again from the recommendations of the united conference on food and agriculture held at Hot Springs. The following paragraphs appear in the document:

1. Whereas the cooperative movement has been of very great importance in many countries, both to urban and rural populations, especially in agricultural districts where farming is based on small units and in urban areas of low-income families;

2. The proper functioning of cooperative societies may facilitate adjustments of agricultural production and distribution, as members have confidence in the recommendations and guidance of their own cooperative organizations which they know operate in the interests of their members and of society in general;

3. The democratic control and educational programmes, which are features of the cooperative movement, can play a vital part in the training of good democratic citizens, and assist in inducing a sound conception of economic matters;

The united nations conference on food and agriculture recommends:

1. That, in order to make it possible for people to help themselves in lowering costs of production and costs of distribution and marketing:—

(a) all countries study the possibilities of the further establishment of producer and consumer cooperative societies in order to render necessary production, marketing, purchasing, finance, and other services.

In that connection the C.C.F. government of Saskatchewan has been, I believe, the first government in the world to implement this recommendation made at that conference. One of the first acts of that government was to appoint a minister of cooperatives to encourage the cooperative movement in that province.

(b) each nation examine its laws, regulations and institutions to determine if legal or institutional obstacles to cooperative development exist, in order to make desirable adjustments.

Yet we find that in Canada the cooperative movement has been asking for years for a dominion cooperative act to clarify its position with regard to taxation and several other matters. It has not yet received that consideration from our government. Instead we have shirked our responsibility and thrown the whole matter into the hands of a commission, thereby keeping the cooperative movement in Canada, at a time when it should be expanding, in a static state and endeavouring, one would almost think, to stop its growth.

(c) full information as to the present development of cooperatives in different countries be made available through the permanent organization recommended in resolution II.

In Canada we have very little conception of the tremendous growth of the cooperative movement throughout the world. I must admit that I myself had very little conception of the growth of the cooperative movement in Great Britain until last fall when we were privileged to visit there. We were entertained by the cooperative wholesale society of England and by the Scottish cooperative wholesale society. They took us down to the Thames in London and showed us a flour mill owned by the cooperative there, the largest flour mill in the world, a flour mill which produces every day enough flour to feed a million people. They told us that they were producing fifty per cent of all the flour produced in Great Britain. We were taken up to Scotland and shown the tremendous cooperative development in that country.

When the British government asked the people of Great Britain in 1940 to register the stores with which they wanted to do business during the war so that there would be a fair distribution of supplies forty-two per cent of the people of Scotland registered with the cooperatives as the stores through which they wanted to do their buying. We were shown the banks which the cooperatives had started in Great Britain. Last year these cooperative banks did over five billion dollars' worth of business in Great Britain. The cooperatives are the greatest merchandising organization in the British empire. They have their own tea plantations in Ceylon, their own shipping facilities, their own factories and their own distributing centres. I believe that in the aftermath of the war they will be one of the stabilizing factors in Great Britain.

World trade and the freest possible exchange of goods are necessary if living standards are to be raised in the world. Manipulations of exchanges and tariffs to secure profit and provide gain must be eliminated. We believe that only in this way can a world of plenty be built when war is outlawed. If Canada is to export, as she must if our agricultural industry is to be prosperous, she must be prepared to import. This was emphasized by everybody we met in Great Britain last fall. It did not matter whether you talked to members of the labour party, the cooperative associations, their boards of directors, or the Conservatives, they were all agreed that so far as Great Britain was concerned she had to find markets for her products if she was to import the necessities of her people.

Great Britain's ability to raise the standards of living of her people, or even to maintain them are dependent on this. She has been and will probably remain the greatest market for Canada's agricultural products. If we are to retain that market it will be necessary for us to readjust our economy so as to use more British-made goods. Great Britain has one great asset, her ability to produce quality goods and materials. Nowhere else in the world can you buy better quality leather goods, woollen goods, china or cutlery than in that country. Unfortunately, before the war the financial position of the average Canadian citizen was such that he had to be satisfied with secondary grade articles because they were cheap. We found our shelves in this country flooded with trash and cheap goods. When you looked at them you almost invariably found stamped on them "Made in Germany" or "Made in Japan". We bought them not because we preferred them, not because we would not rather have bought better quality goods that could have been supplied by Great Britain, but because we could not afford the better goods. If we again allow the purchasing power of the people of the Dominion of Canada to be decreased by the lowering of the prices of agricultural products, or the lowering of our wage scales, or by unemployment, we shall find ourselves in the same position once more.

One of the chief aims of our delegation to San Francisco should be to secure the freest possible flow of goods between nations, and we believe that this can be done only by one of two methods. A great many people, a great many newspapers and many members of this house say we must export, but they say very little about importing. They say we can solve all our problems by exporting more goods. We in this group believe that if we are to obtain export markets we shall have to be prepared to accept imports and raise the standard of living of the people of Canada so that they may use those goods that we bring into this country. The first thing we must do is raise the purchasing power of our people who need goods and services, and the second thing is to remove some of the artificial barriers that at present hinder the flow of trade. Permanent peace cannot be brought about by the more industrialized nations building up investments in other countries; yet this is what must take place if we export more than we are prepared to import. This has resulted in the past and will result in the future, I believe, in friction and dissatisfaction. These investments have often resulted in interference in the internal policies and governments, of the countries in which they have been made. This interference has resulted in ill-will between nations, and has been one of the contributing factors to wars. It also has been one of the methods adopted to build international cartels and monopolies, which in turn have been deliberately used to prevent the free exchange of goods. These cartels are not particularly interested in the nutritional or living standards of the peoples in the countries in which they operate. They are interested principally in maintaining their special privileges and profits obtained by monopoly control. We believe, therefore, that our delegation should be especially interested in seeing that through the economic and social council these cartels and monopolies which restrain trade are abolished.

In that connection I should like to refer to the recent judgment handed down by a special panel having the authority of the supreme court of the United States with respect to the Aluminum Company of America and Aluminium Limited of Canada. This judgment, which was handed down on March 12 and appears in the March 13 issue of the New York Times, states that the Aluminum Company of America and Aluminium Limited, the Canadian company, are part of a monopolistic conspiracy in restraint of trade. This finding amply bears out the evidence presented to this house in 1942 and 1943 by the leader of this group, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggart (Mr. Coldwell). In passing I should like to remark that both the government and the official opposition were loath to accept the evidence presented at that time.

Mr. GRAHAM: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, may I correct the hon. member. The committee which reported to this house on the aluminum contracts did not base one finding of fact upon any decision of any United States court examining into an alleged infraction of the Sherman act of that country. Every single finding by that committee was based upon the evidence of witnesses who appeared before it, or upon documents properly authenticated by witnesses appearing before it; and the reversal of a decision of an inferior court in the United States cannot affect in any way the report presented to this house by the committee.

[Mr. Wright.]

Mr. COLDWELL: May I speak to the question of privilege, as the hon. member has done. The committee relied very largely upon the judgment of the lower court, which now has been reversed by the judgment of the supreme court of the United States.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am amazed at that statement by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggart, because he was a member of the committee and knows that it is completely incorrect and untrue.

Mr. COLDWELL: I ask that the hon. member's statement be withdrawn. I know what I said was completely correct and true, and if hon. members will examine the report of the committee they will find lengthy references to the judgment of the lower court of New York, the findings of which now have been reversed. The hon. gentleman should withdraw his remark that my statement was completely unfounded and untrue.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman should withdraw.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am quite content to leave the accuracy of my statement, as compared with the accuracy of the statement made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggart, to the report itself. The report will speak for itself.

Mr. COLDWELL: I ask for the withdrawal of the statement that something I said was wholly untrue. I believe that is unparliamentary language.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is. The hon. member who made the statement must withdraw.

Mr. GRAHAM: If the rules of the house compel me to withdraw the statement, Mr. Speaker, I bow to your ruling and withdraw it.

Mr. WRIGHT: As a matter of fact I did not mention the committee at all. I said both the government and the opposition in this house were loath to accept the evidence presented by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggart with respect to the aluminum industry being a cartel and a monopoly; and I said that his allegations have been amply borne out by the panel of the supreme court of the United States. That is not the only monopoly or cartel we have in Canada; and I say further that these monopolies have grown under Conservative and Liberal administrations alike. So that when we hear hon. members opposite saying in this house that they are going to abolish monopolies we wonder why they ever allowed them to grow in the first place. Their promises certainly do not sound genuine to many of the farmers and working people in this country. We therefore believe our delegation should be especially interested in seeing that through the economic and social council these monopolies and cartels which restrict trade are abolished.

To sum up, I should like to say that we in this group believe our Canadian delegation should be interested not only in the setting up of machinery to outlaw war, but should be definitely interested in the removal of some of the basic causes of war. If we can build a world in which there is genuine freedom from fear and freedom from want we shall have gone a long way toward the establishment of permanent peace in the world; and one of the ways in which this can be done, we believe, is by providing an abundant food supply and seeing that it is properly distributed throughout the world.

Mr. FREDERIC DORION (Charlevoix-Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, the first thing that strikes us in reading the motion now before the house is the fact that the government has already come to a decision involving the participation of Canada, and is now asking us to ratify that decision. I wonder if we can call this procedure a democratic one. Since the beginning of the war our government has ruled the country almost by order in council, and by all kinds of decisions taken by controllers, boards and the like. We have always been told that this kind of government would last only for the duration, and that we would revert to real democratic government as soon as the war is over. But if we consider the fact that a great number of decisions regarding the organization for peace, of which this resolution is a striking example, have already been taken, and are still being taken by the government, the public is being led to the belief that if we want to revert to real democratic government we must have some real changes in the government itself.

I wonder what would happen if, after acceptance by the government to participate in this conference, the House of Commons were to refuse to adopt this resolution, as it has a fundamental right to do. I know that to-day the government can rely upon its majority in the house; but as my colleague the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) has said, we must not forget that those who will represent Canada at this conference will have no mandate from the Canadian people, because after April 16 there will be no more parliament in Canada.

[Mr. Wright.]

Therefore it may well happen that after the next general election the new members of the House of Commons will not feel themselves bound by the decisions or engagements taken by the Canadian delegates at this conference. So far as the group of independents is concerned, we must advise the government that we will not accept in advance the decisions taken at this conference; and as in the next government of this country we will surely have a word to say we wish to state right now that we will not feel ourselves bound by these decisions.

We are asked to endorse the acceptance by the government of Canada of the invitation to send representatives to the conference. There is no doubt that this measure is one of the most important that has been introduced in the house since September, 1939. In fact at the beginning of September, 1939, parliament was asked to recognize a state of war with Germany and to accept participation in the present war. To-day through this resolution we are asked to declare, right off, that we will participate in any future war in the world. That is the real point. That is the only meaning of our accepting this resolution and our participation in the San Francisco conference. The question is: Shall we consent to engage ourselves and our country in participation in any war that may arise in the years to come in any part of the world? The resolution speaks about the safeguarding of mankind, and the magnificent part Canada is called upon to play in the organization of a new world. This is all very well and good. But I believe, as do other people, that we must first think of ourselves, rather than the world at large. I would like to see Canada's own interests just as vigilantly protected as Mr. Roosevelt intends to protect the self-interest of the United States, as vigilantly as Mr. Churchill intends to protect Britain's self-interest, and as vigilantly as Mr. Stalin intends to protect the Soviet republic's self-interest.

In view of the stand we are taking just now, hon. members in this section of the house may be called, as we often have been in the past few years, a group of isolationists. But I should like to ask whether it is a crime to stand for Canada first. Nobody will deny that Mr. Roosevelt himself stands for America first, Mr. Churchill for Britain first and Mr. Stalin for Russia first.

In the last few years we have witnessed the most extraordinary manner in which Canadian affairs have been conducted by the present government. If we examine carefully all the legislation that has been passed by the government we might ask ourselves what part of it, with the exception of a few social laws, has been really and truly enacted for the benefit of our Canadian people. Everything has been done to favour other nations, under the fallacious pretext that we have to save humanity and civilization.

I should like the Canadian government, before attending this conference, to give Canadian people a thought—instead of always endeavouring to save the world. I should like to see the Canadian government working in favour of the Canadian people's welfare, before going elsewhere to try to save humanity. Everybody admits that Canada is at present going through an internal crisis, and that we are suffering from disunity. All this is due to the present government. Would it not be the first and the most important task of this government to see to it that a true and lasting peace be established in our own country, before trying to organize the peace of the whole world? All right-thinking people are wondering to an even greater extent about what good may come from this conference.

We have witnessed many conferences in the last twenty-five years. We participated in the league of nations, which was supposed to prevent any further wars. We have spent large sums of money as our share for the upkeep of the league, and to cover the travelling expenses of our Canadian representatives in that organization.

Other nations have organized all kinds of peace conferences and all kinds of disarmament conferences. But in spite of these we have been drawn into this terrible war, one which is upsetting the whole world. Now this question arises: What reason have we to believe that the proposed conference at San Francisco will offer any better guarantee or results than did previous ones?

I believe that, not only does this conference fail to offer better expectations but, because of its very organization, it cannot avoid driving the world to anything but another war.

All hon. members know that the conference will be controlled by only the three powers. These are the three powers which at present are fighting alongside each other—but for how long? What would become of the conference if to-morrow one of those three great powers happened to disagree with either of the other two?

If the powers controlling the conference could all be described as democratic powers, we might possibly entertain some hopes; but when we know that the one which, up to now, has imposed its will upon all the others is a dictatorial power, exactly like those against which we are now fighting, we are not very hopeful nor can we rely very much on the results which may flow from the conference.

[Mr. Dorion.]

Then, when we see that Poland is the country which should have been the first to be asked to participate in the conference, and for whose safety our country was drawn into the war, is not only cast aside but has been broken to pieces in order to please that dictator, who is about not only to control the conference but also to govern all Europe after the war, we have serious cause for concern.

The situation is, I know, a difficult one. In many countries there are people of good will who will endeavour to correct the situation; but in Canada let us not lose all sense of proportion. Let us not try to convince ourselves that we can settle everything—and especially when we know that our international status does not permit us to do so.

(Translation) Mr. Speaker, the question that comes up is whether, with feelings as they are now, it is humanly possible that the San Francisco conference may give the results expected from it, and bring a solution to the problems at hand.

If the establishment of peace in the world is eagerly desired, should not a beginning be made by redressing the wrongs suffered by the people within participating nations?

If a satisfactory result is expected, should it not, in the first place, be shown beyond any doubt to the citizens of interested countries that this new organization which it is desired to set up will not be solely in the interests of a group or of certain international influences which have always, so far, caused the wars that have plagued us.

In short, if practical measures were really desired, if there was a wish to bring the people to take a serious view of the discussions of that conference and of the commitments which it is proposed to take, proof should first be given that the governments concerned have as their primary purpose, the elimination of the factors that cause world wars.

No one will deny that the world is seriously ill at the present time. Everyone will recognize that if a permanent cure is to be achieved, it is not sufficient to apply temporary remedies, but it is necessary, first, to eradicate once for all the causes of the illness.

Should we succeed in putting back on its feet a wounded and bruised world, if we allow it to continue living among unhealthy surroundings, amidst the same dangers as those which prevailed before the war, it will only continue to suffer without ever regaining the full freedom which would enable it to live a normal life.

If we look for the cause of the ills which beset humanity, if we wish to seek these causes in good faith and in all honesty, it is easy to find that peoples themselves are not to blame. Indeed as Ernest Renan said: "The immense majority of mankind dread war." Therefore, if all nations loathe the war why at ever more frequent intervals, must they be dragged into conflicts in which they are suddenly pitted against one another? If we go through the whole world and analyse the thoughts of the inhabitants of the various countries, we shall realize that all peoples have a common wish: to live in peace one with the other. Therefore, all wars have been caused by the leaders of the different governments who, in turn, have often been drawn into them by international financial powers who have always found their interests in confusion and have immensely profited by these world conflicts.

As long as we refuse to recognize these facts, as long as we voluntarily turn away from the light, as long as we refrain from taking appropriate steps to check these evil powers who work havoc with the whole world, so long will conferences such as the projected San Francisco meeting remain a delusion and a deception and so long will they be of no use whatever.

At a time when we are thinking of seeking the means to restore universal peace so avidly sought by all, we are not sufficiently concerned with guaranteeing social security as an indispensable foundation for international peace.

All individuals have a right to the full development of their personality; however, it is their duty to curtail their own activities so as to leave room for the expansion of their neighbours'. We should abstain from restricting the development of other people's personality; and it is not only our moral duty to do so, but it is equally a condition to the attainment of social peace.

When economic conditions are such that two opposite groups are created: one extremely prosperous, the other lacking the very necessities of life, society becomes unbalanced to a point where living is impaired. We see individuals interested solely in the building of their own fortune, grasping, selfish, unscrupulous people, who, in order to attain their ends, are willing to provoke the most cruel wars. On the other side of the abyss, we see the destitute, those who have no other alternative than to work for the wealthy, those who have neither the time nor the means to draw from life their share of happiness.

Such a society cannot long endure. It lacks balance. It is undermined by too much suffering, too much bitterness, by the injustice and humiliation of human life. And when, within societies, disorder rather than peace exists, international conflicts are not far off.

In order that economic life may be suitable within nations, international economic life must necessarily be cleansed; hence the need to fight egotism and greed. The reign of international justice and world peace will be possible only on a basis of social justice and altruism. So long as we have organizations like the International Settlements Bank which I have already had occasion to denounce in this house, peace will just be a mere ideal.

If, as I said a moment ago, wars have mostly been the handiwork of international finance, it is nevertheless true that in the last few years there has come to the fore another international power which must be watched closely and which, if it is not checkmated at once, will also lead us to new international conflicts. I am referring to communism. The Third International, which still exists, and is increasingly active in this country, as in almost all other countries in the world, means the destruction of a class to the advantage of another which is neither better, nor more intelligent, but which is less educated. Consequently, other countries cannot but lose by having anything to do with it. Communism, which was to save us from all ills through the formula "What is mine is also yours" and inversely, has been without any effect.

Every time an attempt was made to disregard the principles which are natural to men, society has gone to ruin and in spite of these warnings, in spite of these results, there are still a large number of promoters of communism who dream of the day when this nefarious form of government will rule the whole universe.

If, Mr. Speaker, every country were to clean its own house and do away with all its subversive elements, the need would probably disappear for conferences such as the proposed San Francisco meeting to seek a remedy to the ills which afflict humanity.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, the principal reason which convinces me that this conference cannot produce anything worth while is that, I repeat it, the greatest international power in the world, the Vatican, is systematically ignored.

In the course of the debate on the address, on January 31, 1944, I said in this house:

Since the beginning of the war we have been told we were fighting for democracy and Christian civilization. For us Canadians, we cannot aspire to anything other than the reestablishment of an enduring peace in the world. We cannot expect territorial possessions. We cannot expect much compensation. Therefore, if we wish to reach our end, if we wish to be true to ourselves and to others, we have nothing to do other than to see to it that all the necessary precautions be taken to have this time not twenty years' truce, but a real, everlasting peace. One of the most necessary precautions would most certainly be the attendance at the next peace conference of the most powerful moral authority, the greatest friend of peace, the greatest advocate of the moral brotherhood of mankind.

San Francisco Conference

As long as this great international power, the Vatican, is deliberately left aside and excluded from international discussions, the suffering and unhappy peoples of the world will be offered only incomplete and insufficient remedies.

I recalled then that in 1919 the Pope had been excluded from the peace conference on account of the secret treaty between Italy, Great Britain, France and Russia, and I added:

What wonderful success resulted from this policy of excluding the sovereign pontiff and of ignoring the rights of Providence!

The treaty of Versailles has probably lasted for a shorter period of time than any other treaty in history. Is it not very evident that after the present war, when we must start from scratch, it will be absolutely necessary to rectify the mistakes made from 1899 to 1919 and ask the Pope to enlighten by his moral authority the nations which will have the task of drawing up the next peace treaty?

Is there not, at the present time, another secret treaty, another convention designed to keep the Vatican out of international discussions? I hope not, for such a state of things would simply be a repetition of a crime for which we might have to pay very dearly.

Indeed, the fair-mindedness and the influence of the Pope have been proved beyond the shadow of a doubt.

I wish to quote the following from a book on the league of nations by Father Yves de la Brière:

More than anyone else in the world, the Pope deserves to be the messenger, the umpire, the legislator of peace and right among nations. His religious mission is to be the universal pastor of the souls. He has been entrusted with the evangelic doctrine of peace, justice and charity. The theological schools of which he is the supreme head, have been giving for centuries enlightening and coherent lessons on the code of peace and war. The institutions of catholicism enable him to exert a deep influence on the moral, intellectual, social and spiritual formation of over two hundred million of human beings. Throughout the centuries, the name of the Pope of Rome has remained identified, in the settlement by arbitration of international conflicts with the best and most efficient effort in history.

In addition to his spiritual jurisdiction, the Pope of Rome possesses a temporal sovereignty which is no longer territorial but personal . . .

[Mr. Dorion.]

This book was written before the Pope became once more the head of a Sovereign state.

. . . which to-day is diplomatically and authentically recognized by international law. On this score, it is in order that the diplomatic representatives of the Pope should take part in conferences attended by the diplomatic representatives of all sovereigns and chiefs of state, especially so when the aim of the conferences is to conclude or guarantee peace between nations, an object which is quite in keeping with the distinctive mission of the Holy Father.

To confer to international agreements the august and sacred prestige which are necessary in the eyes of nations, to give to the rules of mediation and arbitration, to international laws and sanctions, the moral authority which, frequently at least, will insure respect, what sovereign, what chief of state will be in a position to exert, by his recommendation, by his public endorsement, a more beneficial influence than the Pope of Rome?

As we have said, he rules spiritually over several million subjects in each state or group of states in Europe and throughout the world. He is not affiliated to any system of alliances, to any political, diplomatic or economic scheme; yet he is nowhere a stranger. In every country, Catholics regard him as their Pastor, their Doctor and their Father, and the right-minded non-Catholics see in him a moral force whose authority commands their esteem, their respect, nay their veneration.

Who could, in all fairness, deny the Pope the right to partake in the diplomatic and legal conferences involving international law?

For this reason, Mr. Speaker, considering all those reasons I have mentioned, I cannot place any confidence in this organization and I am satisfied I am loyally discharging my duties as a member and as a citizen of Canada in voting against this resolution.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York West): Mr. Speaker, the debate on this resolution is in danger of becoming an orgy of wishful thinking. Every hon. member wants peace; but by blind adulation of the present proposals we are not assisting the Canadian delegation to the San Francisco conference, nor are we fulfilling our duty to our constituents. The failure of the league of nations was started by the hysterical praise of the idealism of President Wilson. The world forgot man's essentially human nature and for a period believed that all men were angels. We forgot that each of us contains a great deal of the old Adam. This led the way for the destruction of the power of the league and eventually of the whole league itself by selfish and sinister influences. Their methods were, first, to advance objections because the charter of the league was not perfect. They were devastatingly effective, and nowhere more so than in the United States Senate. The battalion of death headed by Borah and Lodge placed the demolition charges under the bridge of collective security, and Hitler, Mussolini and Tojo saw to it that electric wires and fuses were well placed and did not fail when the firing trigger was pressed. Now that the world believes nothing without reservations and that we call ourselves realists, when perhaps we confuse realism with cynicism, we can approach the international issue without the sugar icing of Wilsonian idealism. We now get to the meat directly, and the meat we get to is power, and is called by that name. This is a tremendous gain over 1919.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the first hypothesis is that the world wants peace. True, every member in this house wants peace and every Canadian wants peace all the time. But because we want peace, or because the huge majority of the rest of the world, war-worn and weary of devastation and bloodshed, wants peace, it does not automatically follow that all the world wants it too, and will continue to want it in the future.

The last effective long-time organization for peace was the pax Britannica; and the pax Britannica, which was in force for the years between the Napoleonic and the great wars—virtually a century—did not prevent war but it did localize war. During that time there were a number of wars in which the major countries of the world took part. First, there was the Crimean war in which Turkey, Great Britain and France were pitted against Russia. Because of Britain's command of the sea Russia was unable to attack the British isles; therefore the war was localized. Then there was the Franco-Prussian war, in which two major European countries, France and Prussia, fought bitterly. Alsace-Lorraine was overrun and Paris besieged and taken. But that war did not proceed any further. With the transfer of Alsace-Lorraine to Prussia, which became Germany, the war came to an end. Then there was the Russo-Japanese war. Here again two major powers fought, but the war was localized. One major mutiny, the Indian mutiny, occurred, and there was one important civil war, the civil war in the United States. There was the religious war of the Mahdi against the British in the Soudan and Egypt; and there was what is now considered by enlightened people everywhere a predatory war, known as the South African war. All these wars were localized, and they were localized because the power possessed by the British fleet, which had a ratio of two to one over all the other fleets of the world during a great part of that time, prevented the spread of war. It was not because of modern inventions that war was prevented from spreading, because the Napoleonic wars were virtually world wars. They effected war in Canada, in the islands of Oceania, in Java and Sumatra, in southern India, and in Egypt, where, near Cairo, the battle of the Nile was fought; and almost the entire continent of Europe was also involved. At that time there was no guiding, overwhelming force to control and localize wars; and since the beginning of the German movement for equality of strength in naval armaments, Great Britain could not maintain a strong enough navy to guarantee world peace. So, in 1914, we had the first of the modern world wars.

Because we failed to heed the lesson of power we have had another world war within a period of a quarter of a century, the most devastating war in the world's history. We have now had a conference at Dumbarton Oaks, and for the first time since the ending of pax Britannica the world has admitted the necessity for power. I do not believe that this house is sufficiently aware of the tremendous import of the power clauses in the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. I propose to quote briefly the major power proposals of this conference. The first is in chapter V, section B, 1. It compares the proposals with the league of nations. In the league of nations both the assembly and the council could take action with regard to the settling of disputes and the maintenance of international peace and security. Under the charter of Dumbarton Oaks such action would rest solely with the security council. In other words the assembly is now relegated to an advisory position only. Under the Dumbarton Oaks proposals the general assembly will have the right to discuss any question relating to world peace, but if action were necessary it would be for the security council to decide and act. That is the first fundamental difference between the new proposals and the old league.

The next power clause is chapter VI, paragraph 4, which reads as follows:

The security council would have the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security; such responsibility to be freely conferred upon it by the charter by the members of the organization. The powers to be conferred on the security council are greater than have ever before been given to an international body.

I should like to repeat those words, "greater than have ever before been given to an international body."

Then the first instrument of power is that the security council be assisted by military staff committees whose compositions and functions are detailed in the proposals. We then go along a little farther and we come to chapter VIII, which reads as follows:

Members of the organization would be bound to give assistance in the form of quotas of national forces, or the provision of facilities, in a manner and to the extent previously promised by special agreement or agreements . . .

I shall not quote the whole paragraph because it is rather lengthy, but there is your clause binding all the members of the organization. We now come to the powers of the military staff committees, which read as follows:

It is the military staff committee that is to advise the security council on all military questions. This body, composed of the chiefs of staff of the members with permanent seats. . . .

That is very very important. The military staff committees are composed of the members with permanent seats.

Mr. KINLEY: Read farther on.

Mr. ADAMSON: Or their representatives.

Mr. KINLEY: Go on.

Mr. ADAMSON: Who work out the quotas to be supplied by the members of the organization and prepare schemes for the disposal of such forces for the purpose of preventing a breach of the peace.

Mr. KINLEY: Is the hon. member talking about military staffs?

Mr. ADAMSON: Yes, it is chapter VIII, B. 9. The hon. member can read it for himself.

Mr. KINLEY: Paragraph 9 is the paragraph.

Mr. ADAMSON: I am reading chapter VIII, paragraph 39.

We now come to the right of members to amend the council.

The right of the members with permanent seats to veto any amendment was thought to be necessary, since they have the major responsibility in the question of maintaining international peace and security and could hardly be expected to undertake to carry out this duty under conditions not agreed to by themselves.

Your permanent council have the power to complete and absolute power of veto.

The next clause is very significant:

Amendments so adopted would be binding on all members, even on those voting against them. They are not allowed to withdraw from the organization on this ground as was provided by the covenant of the league of nations. This is undoubtedly a great innovation in international procedure, but it was thought to be necessary if the organization was to be able to adapt itself to the rapidly changing world of to-day.

[Mr. Adamson.]

I believe you will agree with me, Mr. Speaker, that this is a charter of power if ever there was one. I am not objecting to that. We have seen that these nebulous, indecisive charters, such as the first Hague court and the league of nations, failed because it did not have the power at its disposal. Because the Dumbarton Oaks proposals do have power it is necessary that we should consider where we stand in Canada as one of the nations going into this agreement under the present proposals without a permanent seat on the council and exactly how far this will affect us.

The three permanent members with power at the present time are Russia, the United States and Great Britain. You will find in Russia a bi-continental country of some 270 millions of people, stretching from the Atlantic in Europe to the Pacific in Asia, probably the greatest military power in the world to-day. The second of the great powers is the United States, a country of 130 millions of people, certainly the greatest industrial power in the world to-day. Under our proposals at the present time and at Dumbarton Oaks the third permanent power outside of China and possibly France is the government of the United Kingdom and Northern Ireland. The United Kingdom is a country devastated by war and crippled financially, whose industries have been wrecked by bombings, whose cities have been largely destroyed by fire, and whose population numbers scarcely forty-three million people. So under these proposals we have two great world powers with upward of four hundred million people, the greatest industrial and military powers in the world to-day, and we have a country with but one-tenth the combined population of the other two.

It is for this reason that I disagree with this proposal. The two major powers are fundamentally land or continental powers. If we can judge by history we see that if we are to limit war—and I only say "limit"—we must have the freedom of the seas and the power of the seas. The government of England has said in unmistakable terms, through Mr. Churchill and Mr. Eden, that Great Britain can no longer undertake the job of securing the freedom of the seas. Now we are putting ourselves in the hands of one great land country, Russia, which has no need for international trade, and another great land country, the United States, as nearly sufficient unto itself as any country could be in this day and age, a country which is now a great naval power, I admit, but only of comparatively recent days, and which in the past considering its trade has not been a great maritime power. I submit that if we leave the thing as it now is and do not take into consideration the importance of the freedom of the seas we will destroy our best chance for world peace by merely including in these proposals as the third member of the power group the United Kingdom rather than the British commonwealth.

That is my first reason for disagreeing with these proposals. You may say that if the British commonwealth acts as a unit there will be the danger of imperial commitments. I think I have shown that if we are going into this thing at all we will be undertaking very great and serious international commitments, greater than were ever asked of any nation before. Surely any British or imperial commitments we might be asked to undertake would be light as compared with the commitments we are hoping and willing to undertake under these proposals.

We have to look at the British commonwealth from the point of view of population and production. Great Britain is a country of some forty-three million people, with perhaps two-thirds that number of white people in the remainder of the empire. If we include India the empire population other than that of the United Kingdom is many times greater than the population of the United Kingdom; but if we base our strength on population and industrial production we find that even now the commonwealth, with India and the colonial empire, has a greater industrial potential than the United Kingdom. With the commonwealth acting as a unit in this power group we would have an equal voice with the great military and industrial powers of the world.

To me, Mr. Speaker, that is imperative. But there is another danger if we do not come into this thing as a commonwealth unit. To-day we find England virtually bankrupt, with her foreign investments gone. We have taken some of them, I think unwisely. She has been forced to endeavour to form what is known as a sterling bloc, a group of empire countries outside Great Britain, including also probably the trading countries of Scandinavia and the lowlands, two of the Mediterranean countries and the greater part of Africa. On the other hand Russia and the United States have definitely intimated that they believe in trading on some form of gold standard. In the past our prosperity resulted in large measure from being the sterling broker for Great Britain and bought from the United States, to a very large extent. If we find ourselves, depending on sterling for our exports, situated between two great gold countries, we will find ourselves in perhaps the worst economic dilemma we could imagine. I believe we must point this out with brutal frankness to both the United States and Great Britain, and I see no better way of doing so than by demanding that we take our place as a member of the commonwealth in the permanent seat on the security council. If we do not do that we may find ourselves ground between the upper and nether millstones of gold and silver.

There is another clause which is of some interest; that is the provision with regard to the world court. The world court was a judicial device brought about in the first place at the Hague as long ago as 1904. We know there have been many other attempts at a world court, but the great attempt was made in conjunction with the league of nations. It was upon this world court that we very nearly got joint action and cooperation from the United States. But the stumbling block on which the United States refused to enter the world court was that clause dealing with advisory opinion; that is, opinion of the court in an advisory capacity with regard to a dispute between two nations.

In the Dumbarton Oaks proposals it is definitely stated that the court could also be asked to give advisory opinion to the security council on questions where a legal issue arises. That fact is stated, and stated clearly. It has been decided, and I think rightly so, that the world court shall be empowered to give advisory opinion. I think that is one of the functions of any international judicial body, and one of its most important functions. But it is on that stumbling block that the United States senate foreign relations committee refused to enter the world court before. We must be prepared for that contingency this time.

One thing further I should like to suggest to the delegates who will leave for San Francisco, is in connection with the manufacture of armaments. We have seen an attempt—an abortive attempt it is true—to restrict the manufacture of armaments. All during the unquiet years of peace, from month to month one would see stories in the newspapers telling about some country that had a new gun, or some other country that had a new tank, or some other one that had a new type of lethal gas, or one that had an extremely powerful bomb, or a new type of aircraft. All of these things were developed and kept in secret in the war departments of the various countries concerned.

San Francisco Conference

We are not going to stop the invention of lethal weapons. We are not going to stop the designing of new bombs. We are not going to stop the invention of better and more devastating explosives. We are not going to stop the invention of faster aircraft, or new weapons such as the flying bomb. But I do feel that one of the things the security council should do is pool all information with regard to the manufacture and invention of ordnance. If we do that we will know each other's weapons; we will stop trafficking in arms; we will prevent the publicity of arms competition, which has done so much to keep the world in a state of unrest.

Because I have been critical of some of the measures and proposals resulting from the Dumbarton Oaks meeting, it is not to be construed that I am opposing in any way the San Francisco conference. We cannot be perfectionists; perfectionism is the path to war. All government is compromise. Certainly all democratic government is compromise, the very fact of having a government and an opposition indicates that compromise. Because we compromise internally we must compromise externally. To go to San Francisco with rigid minds or fixed ideas is fatal. Let us take this last chance, for if we fail this time we perish—and Canada is likely to be the battlefield of the future.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, to paraphrase Kipling, let us say to the delegation that goes to San Francisco: Do not look too good or talk too wise.

Mr. J. J. McCANN (Renfrew South): Mr. Speaker, in the discussion of the resolution before the house the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has asked for free expression of the different points of view of hon. members. There appears to be unanimity of opinion as to the desirability of holding a conference, and of preparing a charter for a general international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security, and to that end taking collective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to peace, the suppression of acts of aggression or other breaches of the peace, and bringing about by peaceful means adjustments or settlements of international disputes which may lead to breaches of that peace. This is one of the purposes of the conference.

I agree with the government's action in accepting the invitation to the conference, and believe that now is the time to make preparation for world security, rather than leave it, as after the last war, to be added as an appendage to the peace treaty. To be forewarned is to be forearmed. There must be collective security, and the responsibility that any nation undertakes must be backed by power; because it has been amply demonstrated that no single nation of itself can ensure its own safety.

[Mr. Adamson.]

Personally I hope and believe that a workable arrangement for the maintenance of peace and the laying of foundations for world-wide social and economic justice can be achieved, if the free nations of the world show the same measure of good will and cooperation they have evidenced throughout the war. I hope, too, that the social agencies which were a part of the league of nation's set-up may be incorporated in the new set-up. I refer particularly to those agencies that had to do with the control of narcotics, the control of vice, and the standardization of drugs. Those agencies did remarkable work and accomplished much, and they should be continued and enlarged. Let me here pay a tribute to Doctor Nansen, a Nobel prize winner and great Norwegian physician who had charge of that particular part under the league of nations set-up.

Canada, a peace-time nation, has become a fighting world power. Let us maintain her position as a peace-time world power for the peace and security of the world. No doubt there are those who will advocate that Canada should line up with Britain and the commonwealth as one of the big three rather than take the position of having a voting power of her own. Should we follow such a course, much of what we have striven for and obtained under the Statute of Westminster would be thrown into the discard. We would once again revert to colonial status. I think we can continue to maintain our place in the British commonwealth of nations and yet at the San Francisco conference, and indeed at the peace conference, claim and take our place as one of the most important nations of the world and assert our position in that regard.

I have every confidence that our Prime Minister who will lead Canada's delegation will see to it that Canada's interests are protected. Our voting strength should be based on our contribution in men, arms, production and achievement in the present war. Our delegation should strive to that end and not be relegated to a position comparable with that of San Salvador or some other small nation whose only claim to a seat at the conference is that they have shown evidence of friendliness to the allied cause. Just as there has been a difference in the capacity of the different nations to contribute to the war effort, so too will there be a difference in their ability to contribute to peace.

But there are doubts in the minds of some citizens of this country as to the success of the conference. These doubts have some basis in fact and will continue and become of graver importance unless all countries and the free nations of the world are invited and represented and unless injustices which have already been committed are set aright.

Take the case of Poland. This is of interest to all of Canada and of particular interest to the Polish citizens of Canada. These are not an inconsiderable number. Do you know that there are in Canada 167,485 persons of Polish extraction, and over a million persons of Polish extraction in the United States of America? Renfrew county, which I have the honour to represent, has between five and six thousand citizens of Polish birth and ancestry. In this war Polish citizens from Renfrew county have joined the armed forces voluntarily in large numbers. Many have been decorated for gallantry, and many have laid down their lives for a cause which they deemed to be just and to give evidence to their fatherland and to their relatives in Poland that the ancestral ties were still strong and that they were willing and ready to make the supreme sacrifice if needs be.

Let me say that no county has a finer class of citizens than the Polish people of Renfrew county. They are honest, industrious, hard-working, good living and God-fearing people. They are men of the land and of the forest. They have been there for many years; they have raised large families, have become prosperous and are splendid law-abiding citizens. They have their own parishes and churches. As a matter of fact the parish of Wilno in Renfrew county is called after Vilna in Poland and is the oldest Polish parish in Canada.

These people have made an appeal to me to present the case of their country to the Canadian parliament on their behalf, on behalf of their fatherland and in the name of justice and British and Canadian fair play. They ask this to be done in order that Poland may obtain the justice which she so much deserves for her loyalty to her British allies. I accepted that task gladly and I make no apology for making this protest or bringing up the matter here because it has been brought up already in the British parliament and in the congress of the United States.

I am mindful of the position which the great Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Blake took in the defence of the country of my ancestors when her position was somewhat similar to that of Poland. No country under the banners of the united nations has fought more valourously, gained more of glory on land and sea or in the skies than has Poland. There were Polish paratroopers in that heroic band which endured to the last at Arnhem. There is an armoured Polish brigade under General Maezek fighting in Holland. There is a Polish legion with the first Canadian army. There is a Polish division under General Anders with the eighth army in Italy. There are Polish airmen daily and nightly in the skies over Germany and forty-five per cent of all allied naval decorations granted by the British government have gone to Polish sailors—to that Polish navy which is but nine per cent of the allied naval effort. All of us, therefore, should be proud to salute Poland and proud also to hope that the Polish people fighting Hitler and tyranny with the finest heroism, will win for their own country the freedom it deserves.

Poland is a constitutional state, constituted under international law with boundaries defined. It was a free sovereign and independent nation, a very ancient state over 1,500 years old with a distinct language and strong powerful racial sense. Belonging to the western civilization, possessing a great degree of culture, having produced many learned scientists, musicians, poets, writers, painters and sculptors—to mention only a few, Copernicus, Chopin, Paderewski, Conrad and Madam Curie—Poland has always had a democratic form of government. It has some of the oldest universities in Europe.

On account of war-time conditions Poland, like Belgium, Holland and other countries, has had her legal government in London, which government is based on the principal of legal continuity and was the successor to the government of General Sikorski whom Mr. Churchill clasped so warmly by the hand, vowing friendship in life and death, saying, "We shall conquer together or we shall die together". Thus spoke Mr. Churchill in 1940. The Polish government in London is recognized by the Polish nation. An army of nearly 200,000 men is sworn to this government and the Polish underground is likewise sworn to this government. This government was recognized by all the countries of the world as the legal government of Poland. Even Russia recognized this as the legal government of Poland until the Moscow-made Lublin committee of liberation took its place.

The legal Polish government in London has not been invited to the San Francisco conference where it might be given an opportunity to present its case, and where a decision as to the matter of its present and future status might be honourably sought. We find that at the Yalta conference that government has been repudiated and one of Russia's choosing at Lublin recognized.

We all recall that Hitler pounced on Poland in 1939. Great Britain at once declared war on Germany. Only a few hours afterwards the parliament of this country declared war on Germany to protect Poland and western civilization. I need not recall the course of events since that time as it is well known the part Poland played in keeping her part of the Anglo-Polish pact. Poland honoured and sealed this pact with her blood, shed at home and on allied battle fronts for her own defence and that of her ally.

Hon. members are familiar with the decisions of the Crimean conference with reference to Poland. Her eastern territorial boundary is now to be the so-called Curzon line, and by it Poland will have lost forty-two per cent of her pre-war territories. It is true, of course, that she is being given compensation in being allotted German territory. The question of the frontiers between Poland and Soviet Russia is of secondary importance. The supremely important aspect of the whole Polish problem is the future independence of the Polish state and the freedom of the Polish people to elect the kind of government they desire. The government, both national and municipal, is to be of the kind prescribed by Russia and forced on the Polish people. Elections are to be held on conditions agreeable to Russia.

Poland has comparatively suffered the greatest losses during this war. More than five million Poles have been killed, murdered or starved to death. There are millions of innocent Poles who are alleged to be prisoners of the Soviets. It is surprising that the champions of liberty the world over have not demanded the release of these people. Poland has been done a grievous wrong; she has been sacrificed to appease Soviet diplomacy. The eyes of the world are on Poland. Hilaire Belloc said:

The test is Poland—watch Poland; see what they do with Poland.

Captain Allan Graham, a member of the British parliament, said:

Poland is the test case for European civilization. If Great Britain deserts Poland Europe will desert Britain and that will be Great Britain's ruin.

A few days ago Mr. Churchill asked the British House of Commons for a vote of confidence in the Yalta decisions, which involve Russia's annexation of nearly half of Poland. Let me quote from an editorial of the Canadian Register of recent date, entitled "Mr. Churchill's Speech on Poland":

He repudiated any suggestion that he was making a questionable compromise or yielding to force and fear! He thus showed his anticipation of the accusation of betrayal. It is very

[Mr. McCann.]

Churchillian and it serves its purpose at a time when there are few willing to take the responsibility of depriving Britain of an effective government and causing a split between the three chief allies. But Mr. Churchill would not expect any informed persons to be converted by his rhetoric. He showed doubts himself that even the Polish troops who have covered themselves with glory fighting on the side of the allies will want to go back to their country. It was a strange suggestion to make, that victorious troops should not want to go back to the land they had fought to save. Of course it would not be strange if Mr. Churchill has a secret consciousness that they have fought in vain, that Poland has been robbed by its allies of far more than the corridor for which she defined the might of Germany. Moreover, Mr. Churchill will know, though he will not say, that the Russians have established, and may be able to maintain, a system of purging in Poland whereby all men who could put up a fight against them are being eliminated. As soon as the Russians were able to advance into Poland and drive the Germans out they began to imprison or deport members of the underground. Mr. Churchill calls this the "liberation" of Poland. He thinks Poland should be so grateful to Russia for this "liberation" that it should surrender half the country to the liberators. At the same time he suggests that as this kind of liberation may not appeal to the Polish soldiers and airmen who have contributed so largely to British victories in Africa, Italy and on the western front, the British empire might be able to find new homes for them.

Although he paints the partition of Poland as just and fair, Mr. Churchill hastens to assure Poland she will be "compensated" for giving up what has justly been taken from her. Poland is to get large slices of Germany, not only parts of Pomerania and Upper Silesia to which Poland has some claims on ethnic and historic grounds, but cities like Breslau, which are thoroughly German. He offers Poland the assurance that she will have no difficulty in keeping these annexed Germans in subjection because Germany is to be so treated that she will never be able to arm herself again. "Never" is a long time and Mr. Churchill, who is a very good historian, hardly does himself justice in pretending to believe that any confidence can be placed in the durability of these arrangements of power politics.

Churchillian hardihood in squaring the circle is nowhere better exemplified than in his claim that the Great Powers must be allowed to have their own way by the rest of the world but are not to be called a dictatorship because their whole aim is not to rule but to serve. No, Mr. Churchill did not go so far as to say that this is the great powers' aim; he merely said it is their duty, and of course great powers never think of doing anything except their duty.

The world outlook has been made sombre, to use one of Mr. Churchill's favourite words, by the Yalta decisions, which make for a dictatorship by three great powers whose "overwhelming force" is flourished before the rest of the world. The rest of the world knows well, however, that the force is overwhelming as long as the Big Three are in agreement, and not a moment longer. As regards Poland the chief present desire of her friends for the immediate future will be that her new government, when it is formed, will be genuinely representative of the Polish people and that it will not consist of stooges like those at present installed in Warsaw by the Soviet and which the British government has not yet brought itself to recognize.

Mr. Churchill was quite right in saying that the question of the frontiers of Poland is much less important than that of the freedom of Poland, though he does not show much respect for the freedom of Poland when, against the protests of the legal government of Poland and without even the pretence of consulting the people of Poland, he helps a foreign country to take away nearly half her territory. Still, if a truly Polish government is installed Poland will be able to make the best of the territorial situation and work towards improvement. A genuinely Polish government will not be anxious to be saddled with German territories and to make its country a buffer to Russia against Germany. Britain had need of Poland in 1939, and it is easy to imagine circumstances in which she will be seeking Poland's cooperation again. The task of British statesmen, when that day comes, will not be facilitated by the remembrance of Mr. Churchill's speeches and actions in 1945.

The ordinary man on the street cannot understand why the empire went to war to save Poland, and now, when a conference is about to be held to discuss security measures, why Poland is not invited to sit in.

Mr. Speaker, I resent the treatment handed out to Poland and my resentment is based on the sound concept of justice and common decency and respect for freedom. I respectfully request this government through its Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to use its good offices with Great Britain and the United States that Poland may be represented at San Francisco, where she may have an opportunity of presenting her case. I further request that, when the proper time comes, Canada may make representations that the Crimean findings be reviewed and justice done to Poland.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Will the hon. gentleman allow me a question? Will he permit me to be associated with these sentiments in defence of Poland?

Mr. McCANN: Very gladly.

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): I rise to support the resolution before the house. As for the resolution itself, I feel it should have the unanimous support of the house. Concerning the proposals which have been placed before us and which constitute the basis of discussion at San Francisco, I feel that there is no impropriety in any hon. member's discussion of these proposals.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I should like to have your ruling. On March 20 you stated, as reported in Hansard, at page 34:

As I interpret the rules of the house I would have to rule that the leader of the opposition would be taking part in the debate by asking a question, and would have exhausted his right to speak.

I do not want to stop the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) from speaking, but I want a ruling. As reported in Hansard, at page 101, the hon. member asked a question. What I want to find out, Mr. Speaker, is, is it all right to ask a question of an individual member and is it not right to ask a question of the Prime Minister?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There is no difference at all.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Well, then, I want a ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: The position is very different. We had to-day a question asked by an hon. member of another hon. member on the other side of the house to which that hon. member may or may not reply, as he wishes; he has the floor and he need not reply unless he likes. The question addressed to the Prime Minister was of a totally different nature, and was based on the assumption that the Prime Minister would answer questions from any part of the house, not in the course of his speech. If an hon. member should interrupt the speech of another and inquire if he may ask a question, that is altogether different.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The question of the hon. member for York South was asked after the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Rose) had concluded his speech.

Mr. SPEAKER: If an hon. member who is asked to permit a question desires to answer it he can do so, but an hon. member asking a question cannot compel a reply, and the request for permission to ask a question does not debar the hon. member so asking from speaking later in the debate.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Mr. Speaker, may I have "time out" for this interruption?

As I said before, I rise to support the resolution before the house. As far as the resolution itself is concerned I feel it should have the support of every member of the house.

Concerning the proposals which were placed before us, I feel that there is no impropriety in any member's discussion of these proposals, that there is no sacrilege implied in suggesting changes in detail of these proposals. The agreements were modified at Yalta, and I have no doubt they will be modified again at San Francisco, and modified in a manner to which the five great powers of the united nations will agree. In fact I see no point in calling the representatives of forty or fifty nations together at San Francisco to discuss this agreement if it is impossible that any further modifications should be made.

San Francisco Conference

The position of this party in regard to these proposals was set forth very clearly by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggart (Mr. Coldwell). Our position in regard to the final outcome of that conference was also, I think, set forth in that speech. I wish to quote from the hon. member's speech at page 38 of Hansard. In the paragraph from which the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Rose) quoted a sentence I find later the following statement:

And who is there among us who does not realize to the full that the entire future of mankind depends upon the maintenance of the solidarity of the united nations, and particularly the solidarity of the three great powers? Canada is in a position, for several reasons, some of which I have indicated—geographical reasons, and so on—to assist in the perfecting of this solidarity and unity.

Then on page 40:

It will be the duty of the Canadian delegation to obtain the best arrangement possible and then for our parliament and our people to support it even if it does not go all the way we should go, or does not do all that we would desire.

Then from the same page:

Canada ought to be prepared to press for improvements in the Dumbarton Oaks agreement, and, having done that, to join with the other peace-loving nations of the earth in establishing the most effective peace system obtainable at this time.

On page 39:

I should like to say that our party stands squarely for collective security with—and I use these words advisedly—all that this term implies.

Notwithstanding these statements by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggart, the hon. member for Cartier, as reported in Hansard, at page 97, said this of our leader's speech:

Instead of telling the house that we should go to San Francisco to assure the immediate setting up of a permanent organization for world security the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggart goes no further than saying—

"The Dumbarton Oaks agreement provides a good basis for at least a discussion at San Francisco of concerted action among the nations to outlaw war."

I think it is quite clear from the statements I have quoted that we believe Canada must be ready to assume whatever responsibility membership in a world organization may involve. In my opinion only those blinded with partisan prejudice can possibly interpret that speech to mean anything but cooperation with the peace-loving nations to establish a world organization that will maintain peace in the future. I might say, however, that we can maintain that cooperation without clinging like barnacles to the government's bottom.

[Mr. Noseworthy.]

I am sure we all realize that for some years to come world peace must depend upon the extent to which Great Britain, the United States and the Soviet Union can agree upon a common course of action. Together they can prevent war. It is also true that either of the three has it in her power to start another war whenever she may choose to do so. Our only hope for the future lies in their use of that power to maintain peace.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) asks for suggestions. I am going to make one suggestion. It is that the Canadian delegates to San Francisco will support the setting up of an international education agency or commission as an integral part of any international organization set up to maintain peace. I can find no mention whatever of education in the Dumbarton Oaks agreement or in the proposals placed before us by the Department of External Affairs. At the end of the last war educational authorities sought to have an international education commission established as a part of the league of nations' machinery. At that time the statesmen of the allied nations concerned themselves with national and international governments, with questions of national boundaries, with minority rights, international courts and other legal machinery. There is plenty of evidence to-day that the emphasis will be placed, and quite rightly so, I think, upon the economic causes of war, upon international trade agreements, upon equal access to raw materials and other economic problems. That is all to the good. It still falls short of what is essential to maintain peace. The men and women who will fight in world war III, if we should have a third world war, are the boys and girls of to-day. Whether they in twenty-five years' time will have developed attitudes that are conducive to peace or attitudes that are conducive to war will depend upon what and how they are taught in the schools of the world.

The future peace of the world will depend not only on the efficiency of the international organizations set up at San Francisco to prevent war by taking economic or military action, but also to a large degree upon whether the schools of the world foster in the potential soldiers of to-morrow, an intelligent desire for peace with an understanding of the conditions necessary to maintain peace, or whether they sow the seeds of war. The important contribution that education could make to world peace was completely ignored in the setting up of the league of nations' machinery at the end of the last war. Not until some years later was any recognition given to education. Then the recognition was too little and was given very reluctantly. No statesmen took up the cause for which educators pleaded at the end of the last war. While these statesmen were attempting to bolster up the league of nations, the children in many countries were getting the kind of education that was to fit them for world war II.

Only the dictators saw clearly that the effectiveness of all social planning is based upon education. They alone lavished upon education almost unlimited attention, prestige and resources. Before they dared to place in the hands of youth the weapons which they had built, they regimented their minds and militarized their spirits in the schools in which they were taught.

It must be obvious to us that unless we can effectively train the children of to-day in those habits and arts that make for international sympathy and understanding all our plans for the safety of civilization may very well come to naught. It is also obvious that such sympathetic understanding must be fostered among all the people of the world. No one nation alone can wisely or safely conduct such education unless all nations do so. It is for that reason that educators believe that some provision for the international planning and organization of education must be included in any post-war planning that seeks to establish a lasting peace.

Educators in the united nations have already given much study to this subject. They have studied the need and the functions of such an organization. A conference of allied ministers of education has been meeting bi-monthly in London, England, since September, 1942. There have been other education bodies representing educational associations in Great Britain, the United States, Russia, China and other allied countries studying these problems. Conferences representing as many as twenty-six nations have been held and a number of reports submitted. I hold in my hand a report submitted by the wartime information board, entitled "Reference Papers" and dated July 27, 1944. Speaking on this subject this paper says:

Of all the efforts in this respect, two conferences, one in London, England, the other at Harper's Ferry, West Virginia, are most significant. In November, 1942, in London was convened the conference of allied ministers of education under the chairmanship of Right Honourable R. A. Butler, president of the board of education. This conference has been sitting once every two months since then. The ministers of education of all the governments in exile are members of the conference. . . . In May, 1943, Right Honourable Vincent Massey, high commissioner for Canada in the United Kingdom, appointed a Canadian observer to the conference, D. V. Le Pan. The United States, the Soviet Union, China and other dominions are also represented by observers.

An official press release coming from that conference on April 19, 1944, informs us that:

A tentative draft constitution for the united nations organization for educational and cultural reconstruction was accepted by the conference of allied ministers of education yesterday, 19th April. It will be forwarded to the allied and associated governments, and if adopted by them it will permit joint efforts in this field in line with parallel work already being developed by the food conference and UNRRA. General acceptance of the creation of an international organization to undertake cooperatively the vitally important work of restoring the educational and cultural heritages of war-torn countries, would carry the united nations past another important station on the road towards lasting peace.

The Hon. Vincent Massey in reporting on this conference, has this to say:

Canadian participation in the work of the conference is warmly sought. It is hoped that Canada will be able to provide some of the educational supplies which will be urgently needed. Specifically, I have been asked to inquire whether Canada would be prepared to restock the national and university libraries in Europe which have either been censored and pillaged by the nazis or have been gutted by military action. The books and periodicals required would fall into four classes.

He mentions the four classes of books required and goes on to say:

It has also been suggested that, because of the shortage of paper, both here and in the occupied countries, and because of the dislocation of the publishing trade, arrangements might be made in Canada to publish the textbooks which will be necessary.

Another conference suggested that since hundreds of thousands of teachers will be required in the liberated countries of Europe, and since the facilities of these countries for training teachers and equipping schools are almost non-existent, Canada might devote some of the buildings formerly used in the commonwealth air training scheme to the training of large numbers of teachers for these countries. Other suggestions also have been made. According to the educational supplement to the London Times I find that this constitution drawn up by the conference of ministers in London was sent to twenty countries, of which I presume Canada was one. It is further reported that only ten or twelve of those countries had as yet indicated their willingness to take part in the establishment of this organization. I should like to ask the Prime Minister to tell us, when he makes his statement, whether or not Canada has been asked to take part in this international educational organization and, if so, what position has been taken by the Canadian government.

An enormous task will lie ahead of the united nations in providing educational facilities for the liberated countries. A still greater task will be the reorganization of education in Germany itself. As to the need of education in the liberated countries I want to quote from a pamphlet entitled "International Planning for Education," by Doctor Robbins, of the dominion bureau of statistics. The quotation is taken in turn from a book entitled "Education and the United Nations," published in 1943 by the Council for Education in World Citizenship:

In the territories incorporated in the Reich, Polish schools of every kind were closed, only German schools were allowed. . . . Polish education was for a time carried on secretly, but this was gradually stamped out by increasing terrorism. Teachers were deported, shot or sent to concentration camps. . . . In the so-called general government a certain number of Polish elementary schools still exist. Their difficulties are immense. Reading books . . . have been confiscated. So, too, have all works in Polish or about Poland in the school libraries.

And later:

Sixty per cent of the elementary schools have been closed in Bohemia and Moravia. . . . In twenty-three districts of the Moscow area occupied by the Germans they completely destroyed 947 out of 1,220 existing schools. . . . In the territories occupied by the Bulgarians, they are trying deliberately to exterminate all Greek culture and Greek schools have been destroyed or are rapidly being ruined by use as barracks or stores. . . . Fourteen of China's institutions of higher learning were completely razed; fifteen seriously damaged through aerial bombardment. . . .

It will be useless to provide international machinery for maintaining peace if the schools of any nation are left to sow the seeds of war. Military provisions will be of little avail if schools in Germany, Japan or any other country are left to teach the glorification of war, the myth of racial superiority or the subordination of the individual to the interests of the state. To-day those elements of the axis population and of the conquered peoples who are regarded only as workers are denied access to any form of education other than elementary, except vocational. Those elements of the population regarded as the ruling classes have access to all forms of education. You cannot build a free world on any educational system that denies any section of the population, on the basis of race, creed or colour, access to the entire body of knowledge

There are numerous functions which an international educational agency could perform. I will summarize the three most important as, first, the reconstruction of education in the liberated countries; second, the taking of the necessary steps to prevent any country from teaching in its schools the knowledge and attitudes that engender war; third, to see that greater educational opportunities are made available to the children of all countries. It is because of the vital importance of education as a factor in world peace that I urge the Prime Minister and those who go with him to San Francisco to do everything in their power to ensure for education its appropriate place in the plan for peace. Failing that, and I quote from a publication entitled "Education and the People's Peace," published by the educational policies commission of the national education association of the United States:

[Mr. Noseworthy.]

For as surely as the earth turns, force and violence shall be the law; and wars of cataclysmic destruction shall be the penalty; and blood and tears shall be the inheritance of that people who neglect to learn and to teach that the earth has grown smaller, that all men on it are fundamentally alike, that no human being need now lack food or shelter, and that science has made it necessary for men to live at peace if they want to live at all.

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): In rising this evening to take part in this debate in support of the Prime Minister's motion, I am very conscious of the many people I represent back in the constituency of North Battleford. We are in effect really a small league of nations of our own. We are French and English speaking. We come from the Ukraine, Poland, Hungary, Germany and many other European countries. There have been plenty of differences between us in the past—even during this war. But I have no hesitation whatever in speaking on behalf of them tonight and stating that our unanimous desire is, of course, for peace.

Although Canada has been very fortunate in escaping to such a large degree the destruction which has overtaken other nations, we must not forget that many, and sometimes quite terrible sacrifices have had to be made by our farming people for the winning of this war. Our people long for peace. They long for the return of their sons and daughters, and for the reunion of their families. It is true that for the last few years we have had markets for what we could produce, which has contributed to some extent to our incomes. But the price of war for such markets is one which the farming people do not want ever again to pay.

I have no hesitation in supporting wholeheartedly on behalf of my people the sending of this delegation to San Francisco.

I am reminded also, as I stand here tonight, of a section of Canada's people who would like, I believe, that their voices should also be heard. I refer to the Canadian women. I noticed that the other woman member in the house said that she had no authority to speak for women. I felt rather sorry about it, because I feel that both she and I should speak for Canadian women. After all, between the Colonel's lady and Judy O'Grady there is no difference under the skin, any more than there is between any other women of Canada to-day in our fears and our hatred of war.

Canada's women in all strata of society have made a tremendous sacrifice. And not only that, but the role of women in this war has been far from passive. They have broken all precedents in their great endeavour to play a full and important part in the winning of the war. They have, I think, earned the right to make their voices heard. I cannot believe there is a single woman in the land who does not say with all the rest of us, "let there be no more war". We look forward to an era of lasting peace in which we can throw our full weight to more constructive efforts, to the building of a richer life and the making of motherhood and citizenship a task worthy of our abilities.

There have been, I believe, in the past some of my people at home who have favoured the policy of no commitments. But to-day there is one commitment which we all have to agree is necessary, above everything else, and that is that Canada as a sovereign nation in her own right be committed to uphold world peace. And not just that, but that we unreservedly support the decisions which are needed to establish a really effective instrument of peace which will work. That is the important thing.

There is every reason why we, together with other nations, can go forward to the actual establishment of a world security organization, with confidence and with high hopes. It is because of a completely new world which has arisen from the ashes of this war's frightful conflagration. The old league of nations was attempted in a world where economic isolation and hatred of the Soviet Union kept divided the nations that desired peace, thereby helping fascism to power and ascendancy.

To-day the world picture is so different. All peace-loving nations, including the Soviet Union, have been welded by the fires of war. They are united to-day in their aims and purposes. Together they are destroying the fungoid and parasitical growth of fascism, tearing it out by the roots—roots which have sucked at the very life blood of the people and fed upon the very vitals of humanity. And together they are freeing the great host of democracy for its growth, to maturity, for its flowering and for its fruition. Because of this new understanding which has been gained by nations during the war three men sat down together at Yalta—strong men, men strong with the strength of determined peoples behind them. And because their united efforts have now made certain of victory, they were able to talk on the business of peace. It was not just their business; it was the world's business. And what they agreed upon is our business, for they committed the world's peoples, including us, to a new form of teamwork for tackling our problems and for securing all human endeavours. By deciding that the two great capitalist democracies of Great Britain and America, together with the Socialist Soviet Union, would work together in friendship and in mutual confidence, these three men created the one supreme condition for world security and prosperity without which there can never be any basis for a world security organization.

To my people at home this question of prosperity through markets both at home and abroad is all part of security, as it is indeed for all Canadians, and part of the question of peace. And the two cannot be separated. They are integral parts one of the other. Western farmers need markets; they cannot live without them. There is only one way of getting assured markets, and that is by having a world able, because it is at peace, to turn its full attention and energy to the question of international trade. It must be a world able to buy our products. Before this war we lived in a world of restricted markets, where the accepted policy was one of scarcity and limited trade. Any return to that would result in depression and misery and unhappiness, which western farmers suffered to the full once before.

It was at this conference in the Crimea, at Yalta, that a completely opposite policy, a policy for world expansion of trade and international cooperation, was accepted as being the only way for the world to proceed into the peace. Canada's future depends upon that policy's being realized. The success of any world security organization depends upon that policy's being realized. That is why I say without reservation this evening that the proposals of Yalta together with the setting up of the world security organization must go hand in hand. They are of importance to every Canadian, man, woman and child. The facts are that not only lasting and increasing prosperity, but peace itself depend upon Canada's realizing that her interests lie in trying to help rebuild the economies of other countries.

Herbert Lehmann, as president of UNRRA, recently said that the minute fighting stops there will be an instant demand for about 200,000,000 suits of clothes. That, of course, is only one thing. Not only that, but in the necessities of the home, footwear and shoes, to say nothing of the greatest of all human needs, food, countries devastated by war will be almost insatiable in their demands. Let us not forget also how last spring millions of India's people died from sheer starvation—not through causes of war alone.

Our aim and our object must not be to keep these people on a diet just above starvation level, as they have been in the past. Our objective, if we are to realize the proposals of Yalta, which are bound up with the success of a world security organization, must be to build these peoples up to full health and strength by letting them have as much as they are able to consume.

Take China, that land of long suffering sorrows where the people's grief for centuries has been bound up with famine, that land where 400,000,000 souls cry out for food which we can so amply produce to give them the dignity of human beings. These forgotten peoples of the world must be helped to lift themselves out of the mire and misery of destitution through mutual aid, through the establishment of a central bank and through all and every kind of channel that is available to us. We must help to start these people with the equipment and means whereby they can become great new purchasing nations, providing in turn a vista of expansion in Canada which until now has been undreamed of.

It can only be when these things are done that we ourselves will know the blessings of peace and enjoy the right to a full and satisfied existence; it is only upon such a basis that we western people can build our own lives and communities into the fabric of a prosperous and peaceful world. These things will not come automatically; they must be worked for the same as the setting up of the actual world security organization. The position taken by our delegation at San Francisco will decide our foreign policy for some time to come. That is why it is so tremendously important that the whole nation understand our position.

Personally I think we should not seek to hide or to cover up, but rather should stress the unique position which our delegation will be in. After all, our delegation will represent the aspirations of a nation bound, first of all, by tradition and also by strong ties of economic interest to the British commonwealth of nations, while at the same time it is bound by geography and other ties of economic interest to the western hemisphere and the Americas. In my opinion it is precisely if we recognize the advantage of this position and base our proposals and policy upon it in the realm of international affairs that we shall be able to make our greatest contribution to this conference. Do not let us try to cover up this position; let us utilize it.

[Mrs. Nielsen.]

Conversely, it will only be if we fail to realize the significance of this strategic position that we shall fail to put into practice the concrete proposals which alone can ensure our future greatness and economic security as well as peace. There is every reason why we should actively participate in British commonwealth associations. Indeed our economic interests demand that we do. There is, however, a new and important feature to be recognized in our relationship with the British commonwealth of nations.

Let there be no doubt about it, there will be some voices within the British commonwealth of nations which will again attempt to build the British empire into a unit of supremacy in the economic field through policies of self-sufficiency, attempting to repeat again the era of scarcity and trade rivalries. Canada's new role within the British commonwealth must be that of fighting against such a development and seeking to draw the British commonwealth into the orbit of world cooperation on the new conception laid down at Yalta. This has been begun by the speech made by the Prime Minister last year at the London conference, and I hope sincerely that it will be continued.

So in our relationship to the Americas I think it would be a good thing for us to become a part of a group of western hemisphere nations and to declare ourselves willing to be part of the declarations of the Mexico City conference; however, always with the understanding that Canada's vital role in such an association would be to fight against any new imperialism in America which would threaten the world with dominance in the economic field. There would be no contradiction in our occupying such a position. In fact it is there that we can make our greatest contribution. Mind you, this could not have been done before this war. It is only the changed perspective envisaged at the Crimea conference which opens up the way for such a constructive role in foreign policy being played by Canada.

Let us think for a moment what the alternative might be if we were unfortunate enough to have a Tory government in power in Canada after the next election, which I sincerely hope God and the Canadian voters will forbid! Supposing they were in power and directing the foreign policy of Canada. By working and helping to make the British empire a centralized bloc, antagonistic to full cooperation with the United States of America and with the Soviet Union, they would undermine world unity and endanger peace again.

Such an empire bloc working for economic supremacy would start trade wars, destroying our hopes for both prosperity and peace. Let us recognize where Canada would be in this situation. Where could we hope for markets? Would we dare to go to Latin America if Britain and America were struggling for trade supremacy there? Would we dare to go to India? Would we dare to go to China? There would be no place for Canada to establish markets in the face of such rivalry and our economic existence would be in danger.

We must not fail the great aspirations of the people of this country who have with faith and courage given so much to win this war. The Canadian delegation must go to the San Francisco conference with confidence, ready to accept all responsibilities of building a world security organization. No war memorial, nothing could be raised as a memorial to the youth of Canada who have given everything to win this war that would be better than an edifice of world cooperation and peace.

It will be good, of course, if Canada's position as perhaps the most influential of the so-called middle nations is established in the peace organization, but I would like to emphasize this one thing: the Canadian delegation must never for one moment forget that the main consideration is that the three big powers, or the five big powers, who alone can enforce peace, are not impeded in the setting up of this machinery because of small differences which may exist between the relative voting powers which lesser nations think they should have. That is extremely important.

I must also bring to the attention of the house the fact that I regard the very mild criticism last night by the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Rose) of the address made by the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell) to have been quite justified, and nothing which the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) has said this evening has changed my opinion. The times are too serious for anyone to indulge in carping criticism. The stake of peace is far too high a stake for that.

For my own part and on behalf of the Canadian people, particularly those who are followers of the C.C.F., I wish that we could be clearer as to the real feelings of the C.C.F. leadership with regard to this question of the setting up of a world security organization. There were some quite excellent statements in the speech made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggan on March 20 to be found at page 38 of Hansard, where he is reported as saying:

And who is there among us who does not realize to the full that the entire future of mankind depends upon the maintenance of the solidarity of the united nations, and particularly the solidarity of the three great powers?

That is an excellent statement, but how are we going to understand the position of the C.C.F. when statements such as that made in this house are so utterly contrary to statements made by leaders of that party, both in their press and at public meetings throughout the country. I have a number of quotations from speeches which have been made during the last two or three years, but I do not happen to have them in Ottawa with me. However, when I was in the reading room I picked up a couple which I believe will illustrate what I mean.

One of the leaders of the C.C.F., a member of the British Columbia legislature, Mr. Colin Cameron, writing in the C.C.F. News of British Columbia in its issue of December 21, 1944, said:

The hard, indisputable fact of the matter is that the real hope and aspiration of men and women everywhere—the complete and total outlawing of the idiocy of war—is not compatible with the foreign policies of Messrs. Churchill, Roosevelt and Stalin.

That appears to me to be a complete contradiction of the statement of the leader of the C.C.F. party here. In the same article, speaking about the conferences which led up to Yalta, particularly the Teheran conference, Mr. Cameron goes on to say:

Any such meeting would fail to bring about the hoped for harmony so long as the Big Three are Churchill, Stalin and Roosevelt.

In that same paper of December 21, 1944, the C.C.F. News of British Columbia, there was an editorial which says:

The truth which is revealed through this sordid Polish deal is the fact that the Atlantic charter and similar pronouncements were nothing but a cold-blooded hoax, practised upon the common people of the world.

These are terrible statements in my opinion, Mr. Speaker, and I cannot reconcile the present position of the leader of the C.C.F. with what has been his party's attitude right up until the summoning of this parliament.

Mr. COLDWELL: At least I never said in this house that Canada would be as well off under Hitler.

Mrs. NIELSEN: That was said under entirely different circumstances.

Mr. MacINNIS: It was during this war.

Mrs. NIELSEN: The C.C.F. gets itself muddled up over these things, and it greatly adds to the confusion of the Canadian people at a time like this when they should be so united in support of the efforts of these three great men. Taking the whole speech of the leader of the C.C.F. I feel that to the rank and file of his party it must prove as disappointing as it was to any of the rest of us in this house. All the way through it, while he seems anxious to, well, praise, shall we say, really he damns the conference with faint praise.

Mr. COLDWELL: You know better than that. Just be moral once.

Mrs. NIELSEN: I am taking the whole speech.

Mr. COLDWELL: Quote it.

Mr. MacINNIS: Read it.

Mrs. NIELSEN: I feel that in his speech he dwelt on and emphasized the arguments which show up the various differences which may arise at the San Francisco conference, and certainly, specifically, when he dealt with the question of the right of discussion of the assembly

Mr. COLDWELL: On what page?

Mrs. NIELSEN: My inference anyway—I cannot help it if my inference was not correct—was that the leader of the C.C.F. party was trying to make out that certain of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals were comparatively undemocratic at least, in that they did not give the very fullest right of discussion.

Mr. MacINNIS: Terrible.

Mrs. NIELSEN: I am glad that we agree on something. He said on page 38 of Hansard:

Everyone, I believe, agrees it is essential that the security council should have the power to act and to act swiftly;—

That is very good, but then comes a "but."—but the assembly representing the nations should have the right at all times to discuss any matter without limitation.

Mr. COLDWELL: What is wrong with that?

[Mrs. Nielsen.]

Mrs. NIELSEN: Let us go a little carefully on this matter.

Mr. COLDWELL: Exactly!

Mrs. NIELSEN: He goes on to say:

Canada as a member of the assembly but not of the security council should carefully review the present proposal to prevent discussion on matters being dealt with by the council of the great powers.

When I look over section B of chapter V of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals with reference to the general assembly I find this:

The general assembly should have the right . . . to discuss any questions relating to the maintenance of international peace and security brought before it by any member or members of the organization or by the security council; and to make recommendations with regard to any such principles or questions. Any such questions on which action is necessary should be referred to the security council by the general assembly either before or after discussion. The general assembly should not on its own initiative make recommendations on any matter relating to the maintenance of international peace and security which is being dealt with by the security council.

I fail to see where there is any limitation on democratic discussion relative to the work of that organization, but I am glad to see that there is a safeguard provided against the whole proceedings being bogged down by irrelevant discussion to the exclusion of the necessary action for which the assembly is being set up. I think that is an excellent safeguard.

The leader of the C.C.F. party says that the assembly should have the right at all times to discuss matters without limitations. I would say that such a procedure, instead of protecting democracy, would expose it to body blows and to futile discussions which would be very likely to kill it. I can think of no better opportunity for those interests that still exist and would destroy world security than to have, if they could, unlimited discussion in such an assembly. Unlimited discussion could kill it. It pretty nearly kills us sometimes!

The world and its peoples want action, not words. They want to see the security organization take on life, not to be strangled at birth by unlimited discussion of irrelevant matters. I would say that defeatism in time of war is a betrayal of the cause for which we fight and of those who gave their lives to fight. I wish to say openly in front of the whole house that any person to-day who is spreading even doubts and little fears about the possibility of our achieving democratic rights and so forth in this new peace and security organization which is being set up comes into the same category as those who spread defeatism in time of war. Mr. Speaker, let Canada have none of that type of person. Instead, let all of us wholeheartedly wish our Canadian delegation godspeed and send them forward with the greatest enthusiasm to carry out their part in the work that has to be done.

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, a moment's reflection on the war-time achievements of the allied nations serves to convince us that these same nations can be a powerful influence for peace and security in the post-war era if the same determination which characterizes their present activities is also made to characterize their activities during their later associations. It is not at all strange that people throughout the free world to-day are turning with anxious eyes to the future. It is not at all peculiar that they should gaze even now before the cessation of hostilities into the distance for something which they hope will happen to prevent a repetition of the history of the past twenty-five years; for they know that shortly after the guns were silenced in the war of 1914-18, only shortly after the armies had been demobilized and the war-weary nations turned enthusiastically to the task of creating a new world, certain evil forces were let loose upon the world to develop conditions which later plunged us into the most devastating conflict we have ever known. I feel, therefore, that we are quite justified, even at what might be a very critical stage of the war, in giving the utmost consideration possible to shaping so far as we can the conditions that will prevail after the cessation of hostilities.

The resolution which we have before the house at the present time I feel should not be dealt with in the manner in which we have been dealing with it in this debate. Like others I have a desire to express my views on this very important subject, but I would much prefer the type of discussion where through questions and answers we could secure the information which many of us feel we should have before we cast a vote on the resolution.

I notice in the first section of the resolution the house is called upon to endorse the acceptance by the government of Canada of the invitation to send representatives to San Francisco. I have no objection to that section. It is imperative in my estimation that Canada take her place among the nations of the world to discuss post-war international relationships. Canada can no more afford to be neutral on a matter of this kind than she could have afforded to be neutral during the savage struggle of the past five and one-half years. Moreover I concur in the oft-repeated assertion that this nation has acquired a position among nations which renders our participation in international post-war discussions essential, not only for our own future welfare but also for the welfare of those associated with us. Canada is in an admirable position to constitute a tremendous factor in the establishment of general world stability. Her influence and contribution will be governed, I feel, by the representatives whom we send, if these representatives show vision and courage, and if they are imbued with the realization that a re-ordered world depends upon the re-ordering of each nation within the world.

As far as section 2 of the resolution is concerned, the house is being asked to recognize that the establishment of an effective international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security is of vital importance to Canada and the future well-being of mankind. Further we are asked to endorse the fact that Canada's interests dictate that we become a member of such organization. An examination of that section does not in my estimation commit us to any particular organization. We are given to understand that there shall be set up—at least it is hoped that there shall be set up—an organization which shall have as its purpose the peace, security and welfare of the nations, but as yet the exact nature of such an organization is not determined. Therefore it is not hard to agree that Canada should become part of some type of organization having as its objective the maintenance of peace and some sort of guarantee of security.

I come to section 3, which presents a slightly different problem. The house is asked to endorse the purposes and principles set forth in the proposals of the four governments; and I feel very much as the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) did yesterday when he inquired whether the proposals set down in the Dumbarton Oaks conference and the Bretton Woods conference are to become the basis for the establishment of the organization which it is proposed to set up. I feel that there is a good deal we must yet learn about the extent to which the decisions arrived at, particularly at Bretton Woods, shall enter into the determination of the nature and character of the organization which it is hoped to set up at San Francisco. We are asked in section 3 to consider that the proposals constitute a satisfactory general basis for a discussion of the charter of the proposed international organization. I would not take very strong exception to that particular section of clause 3, but I do feel that it would have been very much better if those first few words, referring to the house approving the purposes and principles set forth in the proposals of the four governments were deleted. One is placed in a position of this kind. One may support the sending of a delegation; one may support the belief that an organization of some kind should be set up; one may well agree that Canada's representatives should use the very best judgment possible in working toward conditions which will guarantee peace and security; moreover one may feel strongly in favour of the final clause of the resolution which states that the charter must be referred to parliament for ratification. But in order to vote for those, one is also placed in a position where, at least as near as I can determine, he must approve the final act of Bretton Woods, something which on the basis of the facts as we know them to-day may be extremely difficult to do.

I go on to clause 4 of the resolution, which asks the house to agree that the representatives of Canada at the conference should use their best endeavours to further the preparation of an acceptable charter for an international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security. I would not disagree with clause 4. We would expect Canada's representatives, regardless of who they are, to lend their very best efforts in endeavouring to achieve the purpose for which the delegations have gathered.

Section 5 asserts, as I have said, that the charter establishing the international organization should, before ratification, be submitted to parliament for approval. That is exactly what we would expect if we are to continue our form of government in Canada as a democratic form. However, I should like to point this out. In this connection I think we are in a peculiar position. A delegation is to be chosen from the Canadian parliament; yet while they are in the midst of their deliberations it is quite possible that they may cease to be members of parliament. Having committed us, at least to a degree, I feel that the next parliament of Canada may be put in the peculiar position that, let us say, one would be placed in who, being engaged to a young lady, suddenly decided that he wished to terminate the engagement. We know that in his mind would probably be a feeling that breach of promise action might be taken against him. And I feel that a delegation of this kind from a parliament which is in its dying stages may well place the incoming parliament in a peculiar position. However, I do not use that as an argument against sending a delegation. I think I have made that abundantly clear.

[Mr. Shaw.]

I merely point out the unusual position in which we may find ourselves. I say to this delegation that the future peace and security of this world depend upon, first, the determination of those things which lead to war and the removal of those conditions. I have always felt—and I here give expression to my personal views—that the most potent provocation for all world wars has been economic insecurity and the struggle for foreign markets. It has caused perpetual strife within nations and it has caused perpetual strife between nations.

I would say also that the delegation should be mindful of the fact that history is rich with the aggressive tendencies of any centralized authority with powerful armed forces to impose its dictates upon its own people or upon other nations. These conditions have in the past at least led inevitably to war or to revolution. I think we might give some consideration to the history of our own British commonwealth. The history of the British commonwealth of nations has offered to us a practical demonstration of the strong bonds of unity and cooperation which can be forged in a policy of decentralization of sovereign authority, as well as the disastrous consequences which have inevitably developed when such a policy has been abandoned.

Let us go back for a moment and reflect upon the conditions which prevailed immediately after the last war. I say that never in the history of mankind did the people of all the countries desire peace more passionately than they did after the war of 1914-18, a war which we had been told was fought to end all wars. I said earlier that no sooner were the guns silenced, no sooner were our armies of that period demobilized, no sooner had the war-weary nations of the world turned to their new task of creating a new world than certain forces were loosed in the world which laid the foundation for world war II. I think all hon. members will appreciate that almost immediately after the last war primary producers, manufacturers, merchants and wage-earners were caught in the grip of a savage struggle for existence; against what? Against shrinking markets, against falling wages, against increasing unemployment and growing poverty. I ask, what a reward for the sacrifices which they made during the period of the first war. In the international field, almost immediately after the last war, fierce economic wars for markets developed. Rather than concentrate upon the task of making certain internal adjustments, almost in every case each nation turned elsewhere to find the solution of its problems. These other nations faced with similar internal conditions immediately established tariffs and embargoes, and did their utmost to increase their exports. I think it is a matter of history that this intense economic strife and the growing struggle for markets did lay the foundation for revolution and war.

We are often inclined to-day to speak in terms of Hitlers and Mussolinis as the causes of war. I say, let us never forget that conditions breed men of that character. I say that we should never forget that from the military war of 1914-18 we staggered into a war of economic strife, and out of the economic strife emerged men like Hitler and Mussolini to carry their nations and the rest of the world into military war. I feel that never in the history of the world have we, the nations of this earth, been better equipped to provide that national and international economic security which prevents the rise of dictators. In my estimation the people generally do not desire to embrace dictators and dictatorships. I say that dictators and dictatorships emerge as a consequence of a desperate hope of the people, usually the distressed people, that somehow such dictators can improve their economic lot. History also proves that, once accepted, dictators inevitably exert sinister influences in directions which were certainly not anticipated by the people who welcomed them, in certain countries at least, with open arms.

I should like to think that Canada and Canada's delegation to this conference might well bear in mind eight very important things. I think our delegation should recognize first that Canada is in a wonderful position to exert a powerful influence for good; and, second, that Canada can by example be also a powerful influence in the shaping of the world to come. I say that first by reorganizing our own national economy for economic security and democratic freedom so that we can at least in our own country guarantee a measure of contentment and toleration which will result in a decrease of human covetousness, when any other country witnesses in Canada conditions of the kind which I suggest, then it would be a powerful influence upon the other nations. Second, I say that Canada should give consideration to increasing trade on a reciprocal and mutually agreeable basis. We cannot hope, as so many have said, to engage in a cut-throat type of competition for foreign markets and escape the inevitable, which is economic war and military war. I say that Canada should also—and I think our delegates should remember this fact—exercise and maintain unimpaired her position as a member of the British commonwealth, and that she should maintain her sovereign authority in the field of ordering her own affairs in accordance with the will of her people.

I agree with the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) who said that we recognize fully that to a degree at least it may be necessary for Canada to give up a limited amount of that sovereignty, but nevertheless I feel that Canada should guard jealously her sovereign position and her sovereignty. I feel, too, that any delegation must be very careful as to the distance it intends to go in turning over or in surrendering control over her armed forces to any external authority. I think Canada should also declare that we are fully prepared to recognize the sovereign integrity of other nations without interference in their affairs; but I recognize fully that following the cessation of hostilities it will be necessary for us to deal properly and effectively with those countries which have brought this catastrophe upon us, this second world war.

I feel that Canada should declare without equivocation that she is prepared to abolish all unnecessary barriers to trade and to travel. I believe Canada also should adopt in future a policy of making available to other nations whose domestic needs require them, on reasonable and certainly on mutually agreeable terms, the raw materials of which we have an abundance and which other countries certainly are going to require when the war is over. Finally, in the eighth place, I think Canada should make it a point to strive consistently with other nations for the establishment of good will among the countries of the world.

May I emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that I have never believed in nor tolerated any idea of isolationism. We recognize that we should be one of a great family of nations; but we also realize that our association as a family of nations must be the sort of association which one would hope to find in any family where unity prevails. It is my firm conviction that if our delegation at San Francisco gives consideration to the broad general ideas I have endeavoured to lay down in these eight points, they will be in a more advantageous position to set up Canada as an example which other nations will be proud to follow and also will have a greater influence upon those nations and their representatives with whom they may come in contact during the course of this conference.

San Francisco Conference

Mr. J. A. BONNIER (St. Henry) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I have just a few comments to make. I would urge the delegates attending the San Francisco conference to show much sympathy toward Poland. That nation was the first to withstand the onslaught of the invader. She fought back as well as she could, without waiting for the help of other nations. Her whole population rose against the aggressor. Poland is in a very difficult situation on account of Russia's demands and owing to the fact that she is at war with Germany. Poland was the first country to be invaded and to undergo the devastations of war. It was said, some time ago, that Poles had been buried alive, either by the Russians or by the Germans. The two nations charge each other with that heinous crime. No one knows which one of the two is responsible for such an atrocity. But, at all events, it is obviously one of the two.

I urge the delegates to the San Francisco conference to look after Poland's interests. Quite recently, Poland, not relying on the strength of the Allies, fought as well as she could. When the Russians launched their attack against Warsaw the Poles, believing that the Russians would soon enter the city, revolted. Unfortunately, the Russian armies halted at the gates of Warsaw and 100,000 Poles were slaughtered by the Germans inside that city.

I have read in a newspaper that the Red Cross is not being permitted to bring relief to Poland. I hope that such a report is unfounded because if it were accurate it would be too tragical, after what that nation has had to suffer. It should not be forgotten that Poland has been despoiled of all her wealth and that only tottering walls have been left to her. Will any one abandon those of her citizens who have survived to suffering and death? I hope the delegates to the San Francisco conference will take care that Poland is not subjected to further ill treatment. If it can be ascertained that the Polish nation is really suffering and starving, let us extend our help to her.

It is a satisfaction to me that Canada should be represented at that conference. Let us not lag behind after having made so many sacrifices both in manpower and in money. Let us not be indifferent to the pact of friendship which the great powers wish to make. No man is more qualified to lead that delegation than the right honourable the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). His experience and his relations with the other great statesmen who lead the united nations are unmatched and no other man in this country could be substituted for him.

[Mr. Shaw.]

Mr. J. EMMANUEL d'ANJOU (Rimouski) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the die has been cast. Another conference of the united nations will be held in San Francisco next April.

To my mind, we have had already too many such conferences judging from the poor results achieved. The Crimea conference, for instance, has given deplorable results from more than one standpoint. Poland was in a cowardly and cynical manner sacrificed for the benefit of communist Russia.

And yet it has been drummed into our ears since September, 1939, that it is for the sake of poor Poland that we have declared war against hitlerite Germany.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, it seems that we are at war because chancellor Hitler violated Polish territory. Although the war has not yet ended, the delegates of the united nations meeting at the Crimea conference have authorized a communist, Joseph Stalin, to dismember Poland for the benefit of Soviet Russia. This constitutes a most serious motive to look with suspicion upon the convening of the San Francisco conference. I am very much afraid that the Canadian delegates will be coerced into agreeing that Canada should be once more involved in a conflict. Obviously the advisability of setting up a new league of nations will be discussed. It will certainly be a loss of time because the defunct league of nations was a colossal fiasco. Has the former league of nations ever prevented a war? I challenge anyone in this house to mention a single instance.

When the emperor of Ethiopia, Haile Selassie, whose country was a member of the league of nations, was appealing to the league to intervene at the time that Italy was brutally attacking his country, did that league raise a finger in response to his appeals? No, Mr. Speaker. That shows the deceiving part played by this notorious league of nations.

Therefore, the future league of nations which will surely be set up at the San Francisco conference does not appeal to me for, as was the case with the defunct league, it will be a colossal failure.

In support of my contentions, I shall quote a resolution submitted by the hon. member for Quebec South, my dear friend the former minister of defence for air (Mr. C. G. Power) during the session of 1923, which appears in Hansard of March, 1923, page 1529, volume 2:

Mr. Power moved the following resolution: That, in the opinion of this house, the Dominion of Canada should give notice of its intention to withdraw from the League of Nations and forthwith take steps to comply with article I of the covenant of the League of Nations by promptly freeing itself from all obligations which it may have contracted under such covenant.

I recall that as Mr. Power could find no one else to second his motion, I accepted to second it. I wonder what occult influence was brought to bear to cause him later to withdraw his motion. Mr. Power, seconded by myself, then moved another resolution which read as follows:

That, in the opinion of this house, it is expedient to declare that, save in the case of actual invasion, the Dominion of Canada shall not be committed to participation in any war without the consent of the parliament of Canada.

And now, Mr. Speaker, here is what I said in speaking on that motion:

Mr. Speaker, as it is quite late and considering that my hon. friend the member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) has so ably set forth his resolution, I shall but add a few words in support of this very important motion; I shall, however, dwell long enough on the subject in order to express clearly my views on this question of participating in imperial wars. It affords me much pleasure to second the resolution of the member for Quebec South, and, I sincerely congratulate him for having brought up this debate, thus affording the members the opportunity of stating their views on a question so vital to the interests of Canada. On that score he certainly deserves the thanks of every patriotic person in this country.

Members sitting in this house and having a leaning towards militarism or imperialism can no more parade as drawing room generals, or seriously cast a shadow of doubt on the motives which have prompted my hon. friend to take this step. This right is denied to them by the reason of his being one of the glorious wounded of the great war. It is because he was an eye-witness to so many horrors that he wants no more war, it is because he has a true knowledge of its frightfulness that he does not wish his country to be dragged into new conflicts without the people's consent, represented by their members in the nation's parliament.

In 1914, the Borden government decided to throw Canada into the most terrible war which history has ever recorded. They were willing to lay waste the country by sacrificing the last man and dollar to save the empire, and this without having first consulted the Canadian parliament. Such an act was unworthy of responsible government nor was such a procedure truly democratic. It is this arbitrary and despotic way of settling the destinies of Canada by making light of the rights of the Canadian people that we wish to prevent by asking the house to adopt the resolution which my hon. friend has so courageously and eloquently put forth.

In the month of August, 1914, the people of this country awoke one morning to learn with stupefaction, that the Canadian government had cabled to the imperial authorities that they were ready to lead the country into the most disastrous bankruptcy to save the empire. What right had the government of that day to plunge Canada to an unlimited participation in the war? What authority did it possess to cause the blood of thousands of Canadians to flow on the Flanders fields and drain the treasury to save the empire from floundering. It is under a false notion of liberty that the government directing the destinies of Canada, in 1914, offered, without thought, to place all the nation's manhood on the battlefields of old Europe, for England's benefit. It is only after everything had been settled that the government called the parliament together to ask it not to decide if yes or no, we should participate in the war, but simply to approve of its line of conduct after having taken upon itself to decide what belonged to parliament alone to decide.

Since it is the people who shed their blood and give up their gold to the god of war, it is but just that it should be the same people that decide if they should or not take part in the wars of the empire or in any other war outside Canadian territory, except as the present resolution under consideration demands it in case of an actual invasion of Canada.

The Canadian people were highly pleased to hear on different occasions the leader of the present government state that parliament alone would decide in the future if, yes or no, we should participate in foreign wars or the empire's wars if you wish to put it that way. The whole of Canada sincerely applauded the noble and patriotic action of our prime minister when, during the Turkish entanglement, he answered, in a dignified manner, the British government who asked for contingents to be sent to Turkey: "The parliament of Canada is the sole judge in the matter and alone will decide on our participation or non participation in foreign wars, either in Turkey or elsewhere." Europe is actually resting on a volcano. France which suffered the most in the last war, was obliged, so as to obtain the payment of reparations, to invade German territory. The League of Nations is a huge joke and the sooner we get out of it, the better it will be for Canada. Therefore, it is of the utmost importance that the Canadian people should control their own destinies and have the last word to say, through its representatives in parliament, when the question again presents itself of pledging Canada to participate in the imperial wars. The people's duty is therefore to choose representatives whose views are well known in regard to the question of participation, and, who are in favour of previously consulting parliament before pledging Canada to new wars to the exclusive benefit of the British Crown.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I claim, with the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion), that the delegates who will attend the San Francisco conference will not be authorized to speak on behalf of the Canadian people. After April 17 next, the Canadian parliament mandate will have expired and, therefore, they will have ceased to be members of parliament.

This conference will inevitably draw us into another armed conflict and our soldiers, airmen and sailors will once more be called upon to wage war all over the world. In 1923, I opposed our participation in empire wars and I still hold the same opinion.

On motion of Mr. Blackmore, the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 10.40 p.m.

Friday, March 23, 1945

The house met at three o'clock.

WAR SERVICE ELECTORS

EXPLANATION OF ORDER IN COUNCIL AMENDING REGULATIONS OF 1944

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): On Friday, March 16, an order in council was passed relating to an amendment to the Canadian war service voting regulations of 1944. I should like to ask the Secretary of State whether it is his intention to table that order in council and, at the same time, if he would elucidate what this change really involves so far as our troops overseas are concerned in the coming election.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): The hon. leader of the opposition was kind enough to inform me that he was going to ask this question this afternoon, and I table herewith a copy of the order in council. In explanation I may say that the ballots prepared for war service electors are of course blank, but each war service elector is furnished with the names of the candidates in his particular riding, together with the designation of the political party or group to which each candidate belongs.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How is that given to him?

Mr. McLARTY: The chief electoral officer has them printed following the returns from the constituencies, and in turn these are sent to the special returning officers who distribute them in accordance with the terms of the regulations, so every voter is made acquainted with the names of those running in the particular riding in which he lives. In addition, as I think hon. members will remember, special maps are being prepared indicating to the war service elector the particular riding in which he lives.

Mr. GRAYDON: Showing the boundaries of the constituencies.

Mr. McLARTY: That is correct. It was thought that while section 50 of the regulations provides that a ballot shall not be declared void if it clearly indicates the name of the candidate, something more might be necessary in the event of a recount, if that should be made. Remembering that the elector has before him the name "John Jones, PC," or whatever the initials may be—

Mr. GRAYDON: I am glad you put those initials first.

[Mr. d'Anjou.]

Mr. McLARTY: Well, the question was directed to me by the leader of the opposition; that was the reason. Inadvertently, in copying the name, the war service elector might in addition to the name of the candidate put the appropriate initials of the political party with which the candidate was affiliated, and it was thought it would be unfair to declare a ballot invalid merely by reason of that fact. It was merely to make the position clear in that event that the order in council was passed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What instructions if any are being given to prevent identification of the ballot?

Mr. McLARTY: I suppose where the name of the candidate is written in that may be difficult, because handwriting varies as between one man and another. However, that is the only variation I know of from the ordinary ballot, and it was only to prevent this being used as a mark of identification that the order in council was passed.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

INQUIRY AS TO PROCEDURE IN SUPPLYING DETAILS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): May I suggest to the Minister of Finance that when he brings down the resolution preceding the war appropriation bill, presumably some time next week, he might give the house details of the estimated expenditures of each department in some form similar to that in which this information has been given on previous occasions. The minister will recall that in other years the details have been laid before the house, in order that we might know what the estimated appropriations actually were for each department.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I think that would be next to impossible this year, and I have a different plan for dealing with it. We are concerned only with the expenditures for a fraction of the year, roughly about five months, and it would be just about impossible to give those details. I had proposed to deal with it on a different basis. When I make my speech I shall explain the reasons, and if at that time the hon. gentleman cares to renew his request we can consider it then. I thought the details would be given by the ministers of the various departments.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like the minister to consider the matter in the meantime. I have not heard what his proposed plan is, and perhaps I am somewhat premature. We do not, however, wish to leave the matter without some attention.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

EASTER RECESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister if he is in a position to answer my question of yesterday as to the Easter recess?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Not only am I in a position to answer it, but also I am in a position to ask the house if it will agree to the suggested period of adjournment. I move:

That when the house adjourn on Thursday, March 29, it stand adjourned until Tuesday, April 3, 1945.

Motion agreed to.

PRISONERS OF WAR

STATEMENT RESPECTING CONDITIONS AMONG CANADIANS IN GERMANY

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government has consistently endeavoured to keep the public fully informed about the treatment by the enemy of Canadian prisoners of war. I have made a number of statements on the subject in this house, and further information has been released to the press from time to time as received from the protecting power and from the international committee of the Red Cross at Geneva. I should like to make this further statement to-day.

In view of developments of the war in Europe, there is additional concern in the public mind as to the welfare and safety of our prisoners of war in Germany. With the successful invasion of Germany from east and west by allied armies and the bombing of German cities and communications by the allied air forces, conditions of life in Germany will continue to deteriorate. As Germany approaches closer and closer to defeat, it is inevitable that prisoners of war in Germany will feel some of the effects of the deterioration of general conditions. The provision of food supplies is bound to be uncertain, and may from time to time be inadequate.

Thanks to the supply of Red Cross food parcels, prisoners generally are reported to be in good physical condition. All reports indicate that morale is high and that the men feel more than compensated for the hardships they are undergoing by the realization that these hardships are proof that victory is in sight for allied armies.

[Mr. Graydon.]

The governments of the commonwealth are kept fully informed by the Swiss government and the International Red Cross of the welfare of prisoners of war. Measures have been taken to provide for prisoners moved from the eastern front and congregated in large numbers in central Germany. Recently a special train carried food supplies from Switzerland to the area just north of Munich where some 80,000 prisoners of war from the eastern front had been congregated. Further supplies will be carried to this area by convoys of motor trucks. Negotiations are now under way for the operation of similar convoys from a port on the Baltic to distribute supplies sent via Sweden. At least one supply depot has already been set up for prisoners of war on the march.

All possible means of ensuring that supplies will continue to reach prisoners of war will be used as occasion demands.

Reliable information about the welfare of prisoners of war in Germany will be released to the public as it is received.

Mr. BENICE: Is it the belief of the government that next of kin in this country should continue to send parcels to the addresses to which they were formerly sending them?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would say, yes.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

DEPARTMENTAL SURVEY OF POST-WAR PROSPECTS OF EMPLOYMENT IN INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggarr): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour. On Tuesday last I asked him if he would table a report with respect to employment prospects in the post-war period, as a result of a survey made by his department. Has he considered the matter?

Mr. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The matter has been considered. There is no final report. As my hon. friend knows, it is a partial report. Nothing dies as quickly as figures.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister should be an authority on that, after the last session.

Mr. MITCHELL: Oh, that is all right. I have a vivid recollection of a statement made not long ago by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggarr.

Mr. COLDWELL: Don't remind me of that.

Housing Act—Statement

Mr. MITCHELL: He predicted last spring that there would be a hundred thousand people out of employment. As a matter of fact we had one of the tightest labour situations we have ever had in the country's history. This is a partial report; it is not complete. And may I say, from my knowledge of the matter, that it is dead before it is born, because things have changed so much.

The report dealt with firms of over 200 employees. My hon. friend must know that the largest number of people in this country are employed by firms having less than 200 employees. What I have said will give some indication of the meagreness of a partial report. It is still under way, however, and when it is completed I shall give further consideration to the request of my hon. friend.

HOUSING

STATEMENT AS TO OPERATIONS UNDER THE NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on the orders of the day yesterday the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) asked when the publications regarding housing will be ready for distribution, and also asked what was going on in regard to the government's housing policy.

All parts of the National Housing Act, except part IV which relates to home improvement and home extension loans, were proclaimed on January 18, of this year. While conditions are not altogether propitious for home building because of wartime scarcities of labour and materials, it was considered desirable that the lower interest rates and the higher percentage loans provided under the act should be made available as soon as possible for those who are able to build. Temporary limits have been placed on the value of single dwellings and apartment blocks that may be financed under the act in order to use scarce labour and materials to best advantage in supplying additional housing. In the case of single dwellings these limits are: $6,000 for a single house with one or two bedrooms, $7,000 for a house with three bedrooms, and $8,000 for a house with four or more bedrooms.

As hon. members are aware, loans under parts I and II of the housing act are joint loans, twenty-five per cent being furnished by the government and seventy-five per cent by approved lending institutions. To date twenty-eight lending institutions—including insurance, trust and loan companies and mortgage institutions—have signed agreements with the government and 817 applications for housing loans submitted through them have been approved by the national housing administration. An additional 256 applications have been received and are in process of being investigated. On the average about seventeen applications are being received daily.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Part IV of the National Housing Act, relating to home improvement and home extension loans, is not being proclaimed for the time being because it is considered that the limited supplies of labour and materials which are available can be used to better advantage in the provision of additional housing than in the repair and modernization of existing houses.

I regret that the hon. member for Témiscouata has had difficulty in procuring literature about the housing act. The regulations and the act have, of course, been available for some time in both English and French and can be obtained on application, but it is recognized that explanatory material is also necessary and several booklets are now in course of preparation. I understand that the English version of the first of these booklets, which deals with loans to home owners, will be available within the next day or two, and that the French version is in type and should be printed within two weeks.

CANADIAN ARMY

DISTURBANCES AT DRUMMONDVILLE AND GATINEAU MILLS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent). In view of the responsibility of the Department of Justice for the maintenance of law and order, will the minister say what action he took in regard to the breaking of the law by a mob at Drummondville, Quebec, some weeks ago? Did he consider such action adequate to prevent a recurrence of such unlawful acts? What action has been taken in regard to the alleged beating up of three provost corps men at Gatineau Mills, Quebec, by a gang of forty or fifty men? What action has been taken against the constable at Gatineau Mills, who is alleged to have sat idly by and watched the law being broken?

Mr. SPEAKER: May I see that question, please?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Ask the Globe and Mail.

Mr. GRAYDON: That would be a lot more sensible than asking you, anyway.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): You don't know anything about it.

Mr. SPEAKER: While I do not intend to apply too strictly the rules respecting questions asked on the orders of the day, in view of the fact that we may be here for only some days, yet where questions are not of extreme urgency—as I think this one is not—they should be placed upon the order paper. This question should certainly be placed on the order paper.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I suggest that Your Honour examine the question very carefully to see whether it does not contain statements of fact.

Mr. SPEAKER: I notice that in paragraph 1 of the question there is a statement of fact which should not appear in a question. It reads:

In view of the responsibility of the Department of Justice for the maintenance of law and order . . .

This is a statement of fact which under our rules is not allowed to appear in a question. The question should be framed to meet the rules.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suggest that it be changed.

Mr. BRUCE: I should be quite willing to change it now.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member should change the form of his question and place it on the order paper.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I suggest that what Your Honour said with respect to granting some latitude is well taken. We will not have very long before the end of the session and there seems to be a disposition sometimes on the part of government to place this whole session in a strait-jacket. This is just an ordinary question that is being asked.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is not an ordinary question; it is wrong.

Mr. GRAYDON: I cannot see any reason why it should not be answered by the Minister of Justice. More than that, I wish when a member is speaking that the rules of the house would be observed by the members of the government. Surely we ought to be able to be heard at least. It has got to the point where when anyone on the opposition side rises on any question of dispute it is difficult for him to be heard. That sort of thing should not be tolerated in a democratic assembly.

Mr. SPEAKER: The leader of the opposition has referred to a remark I made about asking questions on the orders of the day. I think it is in the mind of every hon. member of the house that we are likely to continue for some days. Where a question is not one of urgency then it should conform to the rules of the house and be placed on the order paper. If questions are to be permitted to be asked on the orders of the day they must be reasonable in their claims as to urgency.

Mr. BRUCE: Knowing that members of the administration desire to see in advance what questions are to be asked I sent a copy of this question to the minister about mid-day. If we are to be denied the privilege of asking questions on the orders of the day, there will be no need to send them copies in advance.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You do not have to do it anyway.

Mr. SPEAKER: The mere fact of sending advance notice of a question to a minister does not mean that the question may not be as much out of order as the minister replying to it. In this instance I have no doubt that the question ought to be placed on the order paper.

SAN FRANCISCO CONFERENCE

PROPOSED GENERAL INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION FOR MAINTENANCE OF PEACE AND SECURITY

The house resumed, from March 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King to approve a resolution to send representatives to a conference of the united nations at San Francisco to prepare a charter for the maintenance of international peace and security.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, this house and the country have a right, I believe, to hear a definite statement of the position and the attitude which is taken by the Social Credit movement with regard to the San Francisco conference and the Dumbarton Oaks proposals which are declared to be the basis of the discussions at San Francisco. May I deal first with the situation generally and then state specifically the Social Credit attitude to the Dumbarton Oaks proposals and to the proposals of Bretton Woods which Dumbarton Oaks necessarily involves. Then may I set forth the Social Credit attitude to the general idea of establishing a world organization to ensure peace.

In September, 1939, parliament met in special session, the last session in the life of that parliament, to meet the peril that faced the nation because of nazi Germany's acts of aggression which brought Great Britain into the war. On that occasion the Social Credit group in the house took an uncompromising stand against the rest of the members in the house when they urged total mobilization of Canada's resources in finance, industry and man-power as being essential for the total war effort that would be required to meet the grave peril we faced. At that time Canada could have given leadership in the world and it might have had a profound effect upon the subsequent trend of the war. However, the government chose to be guided by its advisers and adopted policies dictated by considerations of compromise and political expediency. Subsequent events have proved the rightness of the stand the Social Credit members took in 1939.

On this occasion parliament once again is meeting in special session, the last in the life of the present parliament, to deal with a new world situation. Once again the Social Credit members find themselves in honour and duty bound to take a stand which is likely to conflict with the government and hon. members of the other parties. Once again we find ourselves compelled to challenge the policy which this house is being asked to endorse and to warn hon. members of a new peril which faces our country, a peril far greater in some respects than we faced in 1939.

On this occasion the government is asking us to approve a policy which if made effective would, with military victory in sight, result in the loss of the fruits of that victory and of everything in defence of which Canada entered the war. The Canadian people were told that we went to war for the defence of democracy, that we were fighting for the preservation of human freedom against the threat of slavery in a totalitarian world. Since then, under the stress of war conditions, we have moved with growing rapidity toward a totalitarian state and now we are faced with the very real danger of becoming vassals of a world dictatorship to which we are required to surrender our sovereignty and with it every vestige of our constitutional democratic rights and liberties. That is the issue which is before the house, and every other issue pales into insignificance beside it.

I know some hon. members will be inclined to treat our warning with impatience, as being too fantastic to consider seriously. Hon. members will remember that they treated our proposals about conscription in the same manner. Who was right? I make a special appeal to hon. members not to be too hasty in their judgment until they have considered the facts. And the facts are very simple.

The basis of this thing we call democracy is the sovereignty of the people. Democracy, government in accordance with the will of the people, can exist only if the people have complete sovereignty to order their affairs in accordance with their will, through their parliament, provincial legislatures and local governments.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

The essential spheres of sovereignty are three: First, the country's economic institutions; second, the country's political institutions; and third, the country's armed forces which exist to protect the nation against any threat to its sovereignty. The sovereign authority of the people is effective to the extent that they exercise control over these institutions. That is to say, the more decentralized is the power of control and the nearer the people are to the institutions of government, the greater is the measure of democracy. Centralization of control is destructive of democracy; remote control is destructive of democracy; the weakening of sovereignty is destructive of democracy.

Strange to remark, Mr. Speaker, during the whole of the past thirty years we have witnessed in the world a wide-spread attack being made against democracy and decentralized or democratic institutions. A type of society has been spreading throughout the world which is the opposite of the democratic concept. Its basis is the centralization of power and the control of the people by a ruling group—a set of planners. We call this type of state, totalitarian, because all the power of control is centred in those operating the institutions of the state—political, economic and military. It was against the threat of having this kind of dictatorship imposed upon us that we went to war.

Now the government is asking this house to approve a policy which involves the establishment of a world organization under an executive body which would have effective control of the armed forces of all nations and could mobilize economic sanctions against any nation for the purpose of imposing its dictates. That is what the Dumbarton Oaks proposals involve which are to form the basis of the San Francisco conference. However, those proposals cannot be considered without reference to the Bretton Woods proposals, which involve a centralization of economic power on a world scale by setting up a world authority with control of the monetary policy of all nations.

It will be argued that the Dumbarton Oaks proposals specifically provide that each nation is to have its sovereignty. But what is the use of talking nonsense like that when you at once proceed to set up an organization where it is impossible for any nation to have its sovereignty?

It will be argued that the Dumbarton Oaks proposals envisage the control by each individual state of its military forces until it surrenders it. But there will be such mechanism set up in this whole arrangement, including Dumbarton Oaks, UNRRA, the monetary fund, the international bank and all the rest, that such pressure will be brought to bear on any nation which hesitates to surrender the control of its forces that it will be obliged to surrender those forces in order to subsist.

Thus we find that the policy that the government is asking this house to approve involves the surrender of Canada to an international authority of all effective sovereignty and the concentration of power in an alien-dominated international group over, first, our economic policy, second, through this, our political policy, and third, of the armed forces. In short the power of the proposed international authority will be absolute. Every vestige of effective democracy will be destroyed and Canada will become a vassal state under an overriding international dictatorship. The British commonwealth will be swallowed up in a federated agglomeration of servile states. The relationship of this parliament to the world authority would be that of a Canadian village council to-day to this parliament. Human freedom would be a mockery, and we would have a world totalitarian dictatorship fastened upon us until conditions became so intolerable that a universal revolt would destroy it. And, Mr. Speaker, the design of the planners of this whole set-up is that when this universal revolt occurs there will be fastened upon the people in their helplessness and uncertainty and chaotic condition another dictatorship which will be one of military power.

These words may sound extreme, but the more they are contemplated the less fantastic I think they will sound.

I cannot understand this government, which under the present Prime Minister has always professed such jealous concern for the preservation of Canadian sovereignty against any measure of control from Westminster, being so anxious to surrender every vestige of effective national sovereignty to some, as yet unspecified group, whose interests cannot by the very nature of things be identified with those of the Canadian or any other British people.

I find myself in the contemplation of this thing completely astounded, Mr. Speaker. It was hailed by the Liberals and by many other people as a great achievement when in 1926 the Balfour declaration was issued defining the British commonwealth as being composed of autonomous states, equal in status and in no way subservient or subordinate to one another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs. What has passed over the world in the brief space of twenty years that makes it desirable now to destroy not only the newly acquired national status of those states but also whatsoever democratic control we enjoyed prior to the imperial conference of 1926? Anyone who finds himself at a loss for a problem to solve may dig his teeth into that one for a while.

The Social Credit movement believes that Canadians and other British peoples of the commonwealth are fighting the forces of totalitarian aggression for the preservation of their constitutional democratic rights and privileges, and for the application of those in a properly functioning post-war democratic order, free from the evils of the pre-war social system. The Social Credit movement further believes that the basis of a properly functioning democracy must be the complete national sovereignty of the people in ordering their affairs, and the greatest possible decentralization of the power of control.

One thing which has astounded me, Mr. Speaker, during the last four years is that we have never been able to find in our Reader's Digest or any other of the periodicals which are supposed to be progressive—products of the intelligentsia!—any evidence of a concentrated attempt to find out how to make democracy work. All we have been able to read is articles undertaking to show that democracy cannot work and that we should not try to make it work in future.

Social Crediters contend that the discovery of the machine and the highly improved technological skills of the past century have rendered it more and more possible for people to be free, and that consequently the democratic freedom of the people should be increasing rather than decreasing.

Finally, the Social Credit movement believes that the proposals for the centralization of economic control on a world scale through a world monetary authority backed by armed force of overwhelming strength and involving the centralization of political power on a world scale, which was formulated at the Bretton Woods and Dumbarton Oaks conferences, and which is to form the basis of the forthcoming San Francisco conference, would, first, involve the surrender of every vestige of effective national sovereignty; second, destroy Canada's democratic constitution; third, place this nation at the mercy of an alien-dominated international power; fourth, render Canadians helpless to effect a democratic reconstruction of the national economy in accordance with their wishes; and, fifth, establish an armed world dictatorship wielding absolute power.

We are therefore utterly opposed to the establishment of any international organization which involves the surrender of an effective national sovereignty to a central authority vested with power over parliament and the legislatures of Canada and able to enforce its dictates by economic sanctions and the use of force.

But some people, I fancy, are wondering and are asking, how do you propose to have effective cooperation among the nations for the preservation of peace? Mr. Speaker, all I point to is the record of the British commonwealth and the British empire. There were those who argued in 1914 that the reason Canada participated in war by Britain's side was that she had to, and that the same was the explanation of the reason the other members of the commonwealth participated. But what shall be said of the participation of those members of the commonwealth in the present conflict since, in 1926, they had been declared equal in status to the British motherland? They cooperated freely. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has rejoiced over that and we have rejoiced with him. We cooperated freely. Why? Because we realized that there were at stake principles which to us are sacred. Are we to be told that it is impossible to get France, and Denmark, and Norway, and the South American republics, to take a similar point of view and to understand their own interests in a way similar to that in which we understood our interests, and that it is therefore impossible to get them to cooperate in time of grave peril in their own interest? To suppose such a thing, is, I submit, a reflection on the intelligence of mankind generally. So that it is not necessary to presuppose a central power with the ability to force people to do the right thing.

Mr. HANSELL: The wrong thing, sometimes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Quite so. This is the Social Credit position. There are those who argue that we do not favour an international organization or understanding to preserve the peace. That is utterly false. The thing we are opposing at this time is the method to be adopted of attaining that organization, the machinery to be set up and the technique to be followed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, do you know of a better 'ole?

Mr. BLACKMORE: We do.

Mr. JACQUES: We don't know of a worse one.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. BLACKMORE: The Social Credit movement will give its full support to the establishment of a world peace organization—the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) can see what he thinks of this—under which, first, each nation retains its complete sovereignty to order its affairs in accordance with the will of the people; second, undertakes to maintain adequate armed forces—if the hon. member will just listen he will hear a lot which will be good for him. No wonder the hon. member is so hard to teach, when he is talking when he ought to be listening. May I interrupt there for a moment or two to make a comment? It is said quite freely that the reason why the league of nations broke down was that the United States was not in it and Russia was not in it and this nation and that nation were not in it. The reason the league of nations failed to stop Japan from going into Manchuria and Manchukuo was that the whole body of people who were in the league of nations collectively did not have the military force to stop Japan. Why did not they have that military force? Will somebody explain that? And what guarantee have we that under the Dumbarton Oaks arrangement the individual members would maintain a sufficiently powerful military force?

I have given two conditions under which Social Crediters will support an international organization. I proceed.

Third, each power undertakes—here is where our programme will begin to hurt somebody—to go to the aid of any other member of the association of nations who is the victim of armed aggression. Now we undertook something similar to that, if I recall aright, under the league of nations. But when Ethiopia was in danger, and it was proposed that Canada should come to its aid by oil sanctions—what was the result?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We retreated.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes. Why? To keep out of war! It sounds ludicrous to-day, does it not? What was the main reason we withdrew? Because we did not have the military strength, and all the members of the empire did not have it, and the United States along with us did not have it, and France did not have it, and we knew we could not enforce our demands.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We did not have the will to do it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The reason we did not have the will was that we did not have the strength. That was all.

I have mentioned three conditions under which Social Crediters favour an international organization. Fourth, each member undertakes to prohibit its nationals from owning or controlling any property or economic undertaking in another sovereign country. The significance of that measure for avoiding war will not be appreciated without a considerable amount of study and thought; but that is one of the most important measures, and if that stipulation is not embodied in the arrangements we make, all our attempts at attaining international peace will be futile.

Fifth: Each nation undertakes not to export goods to any other nation, except in payment for imports from that nation, without the consent of that nation's government. That sounds as though it were going to touch somebody's pocket; consequently that stipulation will not be very acceptable. But the embodiment of the last two undertakings will go further towards producing a peaceful condition in this world than all the achievements of several San Francisco conferences.

Finally: Each state undertakes to receive payment in goods and services for any debt owing to its nationals. Do you need a Dumbarton Oaks, with an international police force, to enforce these regulations? All you need is good neighbourly sincere faith and honesty in approaching facts as they are in the world.

By requiring that each nation should, first: prohibit its nationals from owning property in another state; second, refrain from exporting goods into another country against its government's will, and, third, agree to accept goods and services in payment of any debt, Social Crediters provide for the removal, or at least the partial removal, of the main cause of war.

Is there any provision for any one of these stipulations in Dumbarton Oaks, or in Bretton Woods, or in any of the other conferences which have been held? Not a sign of it! The main cause of war is economic. That has been mentioned by half a dozen venturesome souls in this debate already. Fact-facing individuals who are honest and sincere acknowledge that the main cause of war is economic. Economic in what way? In the ways I have indicated.

Here is the general situation. Each nation in the world is in danger constantly of having an adverse trade balance. That is number one. Each nation in the world is in danger of falling into unpayable debt. All members of the house recognize that truth with respect to Canada. Each nation in the world faces the danger of being unable to obtain the goods it needs on which to live; this, either because it cannot produce enough goods to pay for the goods it needs, or because it cannot get other nations to accept the goods which it can produce to trade for its needs.

There is the situation, and I submit that the very first thing that statesmen of the world must do, the first thing that members of this house must do, if they really, sincerely and honestly intend to remove the cause of war and produce in this world a state of freedom from war, is to grapple these problems head on, to put their teeth into them and to stay with them until they find the solution. And the solution is not to be found in any of the vapourings we have heard in this house up to the present time, with the exception of a little hint here and there in the speeches of this person or that person. There has not been a hint of it in the Prime Minister's speech, not a hint in the speeches of most members who have risen and with enthusiasm supported him. There was not even an indication that they understood that the problem was there.

I wish to point out to the members of the house that neither Bretton Woods nor Dumbarton Oaks recognized this fundamental difficulty nor prescribed any means of overcoming it. This fact casts suspicion upon the whole method of procedure being followed by the united nations and makes any fact-facing individual of sincerity and honesty ask himself this question: Do the experts not understand the real cause of war? Do the men who were at Dumbarton Oaks not understand the real cause of war? Why, it seems hardly possible. If they know anything at all about economics they must know that. Well then, if they understand the real cause of war and are not regarding it, then are they merely deluding the people, or, worse still, are they craftily striving to attain some selfish ulterior objectives?

Social Crediters doubt these men and suspect foul play. Social Crediters have what they believe to be overwhelming evidence to show that there is operating in the world to-day a gang of men who can be classified as international financiers. These men engineered the first great war with its cost of millions of human lives. They engineered the peace at the close of the last war and they engineered this war with a definite objective to be attained. They are responsible for the colossal loss of life and property that has been endured by the world in this conflict, and they are seeking through the peace treaty conferences to attain the objective for which they engineered the war.

What are their aims? It has been possible to trace their aims through confidential documents, confidential statements hidden away here and there from the beginning, from some months before the last war right up to the present time. The objective they intend to achieve is an international dictatorship of finance so that they will be able to have themselves or their particular pets appointed to the governing positions, and will be able to wave the wands that will force nations to bow. And the methods they propose to use are debt, taxation and centralization of power. Any member who sat in this house and who has worried about the rapidly mounting debt in Canada, as everyone has, will have plenty of evidence that these men have been attaining their objective quite effectively in this country.

To Social Crediters both Dumbarton Oaks and Bretton Woods are steps along the way to the attainment of the objective these international financiers have set themselves; and virtually every piece of mechanism included in those proposals indicates that it was designed to be part of a scaffolding for the erection of the structure which is ultimately desired. Dumbarton Oaks, through the indirect use of Bretton Woods, is definitely designed to gain control of the credit and finance of every nation. Of course it is still in its infancy; you do not see the huge claws which the tiger will later grow; you do not see the powerful teeth that by and by will become evident. But just imagine what it will grow into! Dumbarton Oaks is designed to cause every nation to surrender its power.

Just to test this for a moment or two let me talk to my C.C.F. friends, for whom I have much respect because I believe they are honestly trying to find a way out of the difficulty, and let me address these words also to the Prime Minister. If suddenly the world should become a British empire, a British commonwealth, would they favour the establishment of a Dumbarton Oaks for the British commonwealth? No, they would not. They would fear a threat to Canadian freedom. Then why not work for the British commonwealth, instead of for the destruction of the British commonwealth? I doubt that ten per cent of the members of this house would support a Dumbarton Oaks for the British empire; and the mere fact that they would not support that should warn them against the dangers of supporting a Dumbarton Oaks in which power might be placed in the hands of peoples ill informed and numerous, strange and utterly incomprehensible to us. I wonder if the members of the C.C.F. or the Prime Minister or the Liberal party would favour the establishment of a Bretton Woods scheme in the British commonwealth. They would not, for one moment. They would sense a threat to Canadian liberty. Then why build up one in which China's millions, India's millions, Java's millions, the Japs and the Russians will be able to out-vote us by ten to one?

[Mr. Blackmore.]

The organization envisaged by Dumbarton Oaks is somewhat similar to that which obtains in the United States; I believe that is what the Dumbarton schemers are planning. Has that organization removed poverty or insecurity in the United States? Has it enabled that country to distribute its goods among its own people and give them the good things industry in that country should enable them to enjoy? Not at all. Then what guarantee have we that Dumbarton Oaks will do for the world what a similar organization could not do for the United States? That is an important matter.

During the course of a speech which I took the liberty of delivering in this house on November 27 last, as appears at page 6630 of Hansard, I quoted from an article by Paul Einzig in the London Daily Express of August 10, 1944, in which he characterized the Bretton Woods proposals as a "menace." He concluded his article with these portentous words:

The return of the gold standard under a cloud of obscurity must be prevented if this generation and the next are to enjoy the hard-earned fruits of victory.

What does that mean? It means that everything the men are fighting for will be lost if this Bretton Woods project succeeds.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it will be a good thing if every member of this house does a great deal of very serious thinking about these two proposals before making up his mind as to the attitude to be taken by our delegation to San Francisco.

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the establishment of a general international organization at the present time, before the war ends and the peace is signed, is a very wise move. The new world organization to prevent future wars should not be confused in any way with the peace conference. At the peace conference there may be conflicts of interest which would have far-reaching effects on the creation of the proposed international organization, and which would render its acceptance by some of the united nations difficult if not impossible. To-day there can be no doubt as to the acceptance of the principle of collective security by the united nations. The world sees more clearly than ever the formidable disaster that another great war would bring upon humanity. Because of aviation the world has shrunk to the point that no two places in the world are further apart than thirty-six hours' flying time. During the days of President Monroe it was said that the Atlantic ocean could not be argued away. This was still true at the beginning of this war, but it is no longer true to-day. Even the Pacific ocean has been argued away; and if the American marines had not overwhelmed the Japanese forces, although terribly handicapped at the start; if success had been the lot of the Japs instead of the Americans, in whose hands would the western coast of Canada be to-day? During the last war planes were used mainly for purposes of reconnaissance, and I do not think they were ever seen in the sky—a hundred at a time. To-day they are counted by the tens of thousands. They can wipe out a city with a population of one hundred thousand in less than an hour. What will the situation be twenty-five years from now if armaments are allowed to be built ad libitum by individual nations? Even the imagination of Jules Verne would be short of the truth.

Before the days of aviation Canada was considered to be in a remote corner of the world. To-day we are at the crossroads of the world. Landing bases in our territory would be absolutely necessary to any aggressor nation which, as everyone knows, would not hesitate to invade our land. We have one of the richest countries in the world, especially in minerals. These riches happen to be located principally in sections of Canada which are hardly occupied to-day. We must not forget that the underlying cause of war is possession of the so-called vital spaces. The Germans, the Italians and the Japanese not only said this, but wrote it without any prudence. It can be found on fifty different pages of Mein Kampf. Fascism has disciples even among the united nations. Claude Farrere, a well known academician, who wrote over fifty books which were published by the ten thousand copies, has written something on the subject which I cannot refrain from quoting, for it proves my point:

. . . Japan is a country choking in its archipelago; she cannot live on agriculture and fisheries as she did 200 years ago. In virtue of which racial exception, could it be said that she cannot seek, out of its borders, iron, coal, fuel, zinc, lead and gold, that she has not got at home and which are essential to her population which is increasing by fifteen millions every ten years. There is no doubt that a hundred million Japanese have the right to live. So much so because they represent an intellectual and moral elite in humanity.

It can be seen, Mr. Speaker, that all men have not the same idea of what constitutes an intellectual and moral elite. But let us not make a mistake about fascism; this doctrine is going around the world and if it is not trampled down through an international organization we Canadians, on account of our richness and location, are going to be one of the main targets of aggression. Our great mineral resources of the northwest are not far from Japan.

Have we thought enough of the fact that two of the great nations, who were our allies against the central powers in the last war, and who joined in the organization of the league of nations, are or were with our enemies in this war—Italy and Japan? Rumania, another of our allies which was a friendly country at the start of this war, was dragged to the axis after the fall of France. What happened before may happen again.

True it is that the league of nations, as it was, did not and could not stop the war; but true it is that this war is being won to-day by the union of nations, who, had they been all members of the league, could have stopped all acts of aggression of Japan against China, of Italy against Ethiopia and Montenegro, Germany's invasion of the Ruhr, the Anschluss and the invasion of Czechoslovakia. True it is that one-thousandth part of the money spent by the allies in the conduct of this war would have been sufficient to pay for an international army capable of enforcing any reasonable decisions arrived at by the council of the league.

I have read somewhere that Woodrow Wilson, when touring his country to get his compatriots to accept the treaty and the league, said something like this:

If the United States do not join the league and do not ratify the treaty, as sure as I am here, we shall have another world war within twenty-five years.

The substance of this quotation is correct even if the words are not exact; but let me quote verbatim what this great man said immediately before he toured the country:

I know that I am at the end of my tether, but the trip is necessary to save the treaty. I am willing to make whatever personal sacrifice is required. If the treaty should be defeated, God only knows what would happen to the world. In the presence of the great tragedy now facing the world, no decent man can count his own personal fortunes in the reckoning. I would gladly give up my life to save the treaty.

San Francisco Conference

At Pueblo, Colorado, he said:

What of our pledges to the men that lie dead in France? We said that they went over there not to prove the prowess of America or her readiness for another war, but to see to it that there never was such a war again. It always seems to make it difficult for me to say anything, (my fellow citizens) when I think of my clients in this case. My clients are the children. My clients are the next generation. They do not know what promises and bonds I undertook when I ordered the armies of the United States to the soil of France; but I know, and I intend to redeem my pledges to the children. They shall not be sent upon a similar errand.

If the league had been accepted by the United States senate, covenants could have been acted upon when circumstances required; the league's prestige to-day would make her the unquestioned arbiter of world conflicts. What a tragedy that France, who accepted the guarantee of the league, would have been so terribly humiliated and that the United States, whose great president engineered the league, would have it rejected. Thirty years later the United States have to fight another global war, not only to save liberty in the world but to protect their own territory.

In 1923, at the convention of the Canadian Bar Association in Montreal, it was my privilege to hear two great statesmen: Hon. Charles E. Hughes, then secretary of state for the United States, who spoke on "The pathway of peace" and the Right Hon. the Earl of Birkenhead, who spoke on "international law as the great war has left it". Both speeches are reported verbatim in volume 8, 1923, proceedings of the Canadian Bar Association. Let me quote three short passages of Hon. Charles E. Hughes which express his doubt as to the possibility of outlawing of war:

Nineteen centuries of Christian faith, with its evangel of peace on earth and good will to men, with its sweet reasonableness and constant appeals through myriad activities to man's highest hopes, have erected no effective barrier to war.

And again:

We may gain something in our quest for peace if we recognize at once that war is not an abnormality.

And again:

Great powers agreeing among themselves may indeed hold small powers in check. But who will hold great powers in check when great powers disagree?

Hon. Charles Hughes may well be taken as the prototype of unbelievers in international organization, security councils and even international courts of justice. One of his main reasons seems to be that national sense of injury in democracies whipped by demagogues, would nullify the sense of justice. As an example he quotes the Webster-Ashburton treaty which, inter alia, fixed our frontiers between the state of Maine, Quebec and New Brunswick. Daniel Webster, says Mr. Hughes, was accused of sacrificing twelve important points to the British, while Lord Palmerston asserted that Lord Ashburton had capitulated through incompetence and weakness. Mr. Hughes thinks the treaty was fair. I have no doubt he does; if the case had been decided by an international court of justice I believe the result might have been different, but I am sure one of the two parties at least would have been satisfied. Further on Mr. Hughes says:

[Mr. E. Bertrand.]

The discussion of international agreements naturally and properly engage the attention of the public press, but that also not only gives opportunity for reasonable criticisms, but for the pseudopatriots to seize a point of vantage against the government they desire to attack.

Mr. Hughes however did not believe in what we call to-day power politics, which is nothing else but force. He states further:

The principle, each nation for itself to the full extent of its power, is the principle of war, not of peace. Let it be recognized that force is the inevitable resort of unrestrained selfishness; that peace is to be reconciled with national aims, only as an enlightened self-interest permits the reasonable restraint that is consistent with the fair opportunity of others.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, one would not have to enlarge upon those principles to find room for an international organization. It is evident that the school of thought that opposed the league of nations in the early twenties has been enlightened by events which accumulated between 1923 and this war. It is evident that to-day the "pros" have an enormous majority in the United States and that the isolationists, should they show their heads, will have to do so in a flanking way only.

The day after Mr. Hughes expressed his views, Lord Birkenhead spoke on "International law as the great war has left it." This noble lord, as you know, was a very eloquent orator. He has a great sense of humour. Taking Grotius, who died in 1645, as the father of international law, he had him defining it as follows:

International law can never become a real law, unless and until there is formed a concourse of nations able to agree upon that which shall be law; resolved to enforce it upon recalcitrant members; and armed by mutual agreement with material force necessary to restrain and coerce those members of the international family who disobey its decrees. Such a league of nations (I think Grotius may have said to himself) is little likely to arise in this imperfect world. But some progress is possible. The moral precepts which ought as surely to guide the actions of nations as those of individuals may be so camouflaged as law (though I hardly think he used the word), that in time, the majority of civilized nations will tend more and more to accord to these moral precepts the actual authority of law. They will do so, I hope, because the majority in most countries will prefer to act morally rather than immorally. They will do so at any rate, I believe, because most sensible statesmen will realize that on the whole it pays to behave decently and in the manner which most moral and educated men admit to be decent.

Yes, first we have a concourse of nations able to agree upon that which shall be the law. Second, we have enforcement upon recalcitrant members whoever they may be. Third, we have a concourse of nations armed with material force necessary to coerce those who disobey its decrees. Such is the international organization going to be. It is not just likely to arise, as Grotius must have thought; it will be strong and willing to clear the world of one of the worst scourges of humanity, a war of conquest or aggression or any war where a belligerent makes himself judex in re sua.

To those who are afraid that the united nations might abuse their power let me remind them that at present there are two kinds of nations, aggressors and aggresses. I have no fear of decrees issued by the latter nations who have all suffered so much in order that they may live and let live. We all admit that there are difficulties ahead. We know that the large nations will have to pool certain of their privileges and power. We know that we shall have to act nationally with decency and with respect toward other nations. We know that we will have to help poor nations to raise their standards of living. But all of this is of the essence of charity and Christianity. We have been practising it to some extent and I think we are ready to do it again.

I would not want to take my seat without coming back to one thing said by the leader of the official opposition, the house leader of the Progressive Conservative party, with emphasis on the word "conservative".

Mr. BENCE: Will you read this too?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes, I will.

Mr. BENCE: Will you read it a little louder.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes. I quote:

In the midst of this discussion on the proposals for world security I desire to make an observation with respect to our commonwealth and empire relations as well. Nothing done by this nation at the coming conference or elsewhere must endanger our close ties with the British commonwealth and empire. These ties must be strengthened rather than relaxed in the days that lie ahead.

My hon. friend then continued with some words describing the glory and common sense of the commonwealth, with which I generally agree. I do not want to be quoted as being against the British empire, which occupies an important place in the world, but I must say that we have to think in Canadian terms when we discuss problems of such wide implications as those that are to be discussed in San Francisco. The idea that struck me when I heard the hon. member was that the reverse to his proposition should also be true, that is, that nothing done by the British empire at the coming conference or elsewhere must endanger our relations with the nations of the world with which we are at peace, and we must not be drawn into any conflict where we would not have an immediate interest.

Let us hope that nothing of the kind will happen, because our delegates, as well as those of the imperial government, are going to San Francisco in a spirit of justice for all and privilege for none.

In so far as the Liberals are concerned we are satisfied that our worthy Prime Minister, who has directed the affairs of this realm during this terrible war, is well able to take care of any situation which might arise.

Four of our Quebec colleagues who have decided to call themselves independents and whose ideas in this house are well known so far as the war effort is concerned are taking an adverse position with regard to this resolution. If there is one group of members who should be in favour of creating an organization to settle disputes and prevent wars, it is that group. If they are against war they should be in favour of an organization to prevent it. The class of people to whom these gentlemen are appealing have only one definite article in their programme—the separation of the province of Quebec from the rest of Canada. That is a programme which would bring immediate civil war if Quebec tried to enforce it. The disastrous war that secession brought to the United States would undoubtedly be our lot. So we have a group against all participation in this war although they would sell, and at very profitable prices, our agricultural and industrial products to England. This group is against an organization to prevent war and at the same time it is trying to lead its own province toward a war of secession.

Every possible argument is employed by these gentlemen to arrive at their ends. Religion and all possible racial issues are invoked. Recently in the legislature of Quebec we heard a member of this group go so far as to slander his own race with false and odious assertions. They are talking about Poland and they say,

"Why, having gone into a war to defend Poland against Hitler, do we now let Stalin take one-third of her territory?"

I am not a communist but I like to see the facts set right. We went to war not only to defend Poland but to save our own skins and the skins of twenty-four other nations. As to Poland, let us put the facts properly. Poland was revived as an independent nation in 1919. She had been partitioned almost two centuries before. Between Russia and Poland are vast plains occupied by Russians and Poles, and one hardly knows whether he is in Russia or in Poland. The Curzon line was drawn where it seemed that the Poles were in larger numbers on the west side, and the Russians or Ukrainians in larger numbers on the east side. When Russia was hopelessly weak, in the days after the revolution, the Poles pushed their frontier far to the east. This is what Stalin wants to correct to-day. If it had not been for the Russian army, Poland would have fallen back into slavery as it was before 1919. The united nations want to extend the Polish frontiers to the Baltic sea, so that Poland will be nationally in a better situation than before.

A great argument is made out of the fact that the right of veto to apply penalties is given to any of the five permanent members against whom penalties would be applied. This request is assigned as coming from Marshal Stalin. I am not surprised at this request, Mr. Speaker. Stalin is surely informed of all that is written against the Soviets in a certain portion of the newspapers of his own allies. He would not be true to his own country if he did not guard against any possible aggression should these anti-soviet elements take control of governments. I recognize that this right of veto is not theoretically correct, but it is not a reason to discard the whole organization on this sole point.

I am confident, Mr. Speaker, that the immense majority of the people in Quebec are in favour of establishing an international organization which, while it might not at the start be perfect, could become nearly perfect as the years go by. I am one of those who do not doubt humanity.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, with the concluding words uttered by the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bertrand) all of us are in accord. But he made certain statements in regard to Canada's attitude with respect to the commonwealth, and, if I understood him correctly, pleaded in part for a continuation on the part of Canada of adherence to a policy of no commitments in the future, with which I do not agree, and which I shall discuss later in the course of my remarks. As I listened to his summary of the philosophy of international law from the time of Grotius, I felt that he too in his remarks displayed a defeatist attitude towards this proposed international organization, but for a different reason from that advanced by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) who preceded him.

[Mr. E. Bertrand.]

If I understood the hon. member for Lethbridge aright, what he objects to is that any nation should in any way subordinate its national sovereignty. Personally I see no subordination, no surrender of sovereignty, when a nation undertakes through constitutional processes to do that which will assure its political or economic security. No man ever lost his personal sovereignty by submission to the courts of the land. One of the important attributes of this new international organization will be a court of justice with power to carry into effect the dictates and the decrees that it makes. While I do not regard what we are being asked to do as an abdication or surrender of our sovereignty, I say that even if it should be that, it ought to be done for the assertion of the doctrine of national sovereignty throughout the ages has spelt recurrent wars. I hope that the present world court will be continued and that the constitution of the Permanent Court of International Justice will be continued in force with such modifications as may be desirable. As a witness in support of that stand I call the gentleman who was referred to by the Minister of Fisheries as one of the great constitutional experts of our time, the Hon. Charles Evans Hughes, who along with forty or more outstanding lawyers has advocated its continuance. Now, as to the resolution itself, I cannot conceive of anything less than unanimous support of the resolution on the part of all Canadians who believe that war ought to be outlawed and that aggression by any nation or nations anywhere in the world is aggression against this and every other nation. I cannot conceive of anyone opposing this resolution who believes that the pacific settlement of disputes, regardless of the power and of the greatness of the nations involved should be made under rule of law. I believe as a concomitant that Canada and all peace-loving nations must here and now dedicate themselves to contributing their shares to prevent aggression regardless of where that aggression may take place provided that the security council so determines and after full national conformity to the provisions of the proposal.

If I understood the Minister of Fisheries to-day he was starting to whittle and pare down Canada's rights and her responsibilities, to go anywhere in the world to punish aggression if the security council so directs.

I am glad to see the type of delegation that is going to San Francisco. This is no time for partisanship, though there has been some little of it displayed in this debate—but far less, I would point out, than in 1919 when in this House of Commons Sir Robert Borden endeavoured to abolish war by securing Canada's support of the peace treaty. During the last few days the press of this nation and of the United States has indicated that a distinguished Canadian may be chairman of the San Francisco conference, the greatest world constitutional convention that will ever have been assembled. That course, if followed, will be commended by all Canadians, irrespective of party, as a tribute to Canada and her contribution in this as in the last war.

The delegation is not as non-partisan as I believe it should be. The President of the United States chose a non-partisan delegation to Bretton Woods. He is going to do the same for the San Francisco conference. He has chosen a great Republican, Senator Vandenberg, who is a member of a constitutional body, and he has also chosen Commander Stassen, who has no official position to-day other than that there is a possibility of his being a presidential candidate in the next election. He has no other claim but service to his country.

I say to the Prime Minister without partisanship that Canada has a right to demand that not only the Prime Minister but the two national party leaders in this country shall be chosen as delegates to the San Francisco conference, so that the potential leader of this country after the war, whoever he may be, will be represented; because the conference will not only lay the foundation to control war but through its economic council will deal with social, economic and humanitarian problems, such as the levelling of artificial trade restrictions, the maintenance of decent minimum standards of wages, hours and working conditions, and in the larger economic sense, the allocation of the natural resources of the world, of markets, and the controlling and curbing of irresponsible competition anywhere in the world. Surely the importance of these matters demand that the choice be dictated by a desire to serve Canada after this war and to give each of these national leaders an opportunity to contribute his part to the welfare of Canada and the empire and the world after the war.

I find that in the personnel of the British delegation there are four Conservatives, three Labour party men, and two Liberals, but at least four of these men, led by Mr. Eden and Mr. Atlee, are veterans of the last war. I ask the Prime Minister to do one thing: to make his choice from his own cabinet—he has there several distinguished men who served in the last war—or from some of the private members, distinguished and able, and include one or more of them as members of this delegation, so that Canada will be represented by men who served when service meant so much to this land. It is an open secret of whom the delegation may consist, and that open secret reveals that among those to be chosen there will not be a member of the generation of 1914-18 or one of the veterans of the present war whose contribution means so much to this country. We must forget partisanship in this regard. When the peace conference comes let us not make the mistake we did after the last war, of choosing the delegates on the basis of their being government supporters. I hope and trust that Canadians regardless of party will demand that representation of the common men and women in this land, and of those who served in the armed forces, shall come from all parts of the house, to the end that there may be unity in these affairs regardless of party.

I wish to refer to two or three matters in connection with the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. I am not going to deal with the powers of the security council, but I wish to refer in particular to some statements which were made by the Prime Minister, because I believe that Canada as well as the commonwealth as a whole has the right to know what these vague expressions actually mean.

The Dumbarton Oaks proposals represent the aim and the purpose and the idealism of mankind to achieve international good will and peace. They require a world opinion; they require a Canadian opinion, mobilized to assure peace. I am not a defeatist. I believe we have learned that the old days of insistence on sovereignties are past and that men are on their way to a new goal. These proposals may not take us there but they take us part of the way. The world to-day is in the position of a man who has fallen into a deep well where the water is over his head and his only hope of escape is a ladder four or five feet in length. It will not take him out of the well, but he will use it in the effort to avoid disaster. He can see hope for the future; he can see the light; he may never achieve it, but he has hope of survival and he has used the facilities at hand. This charter and these proposals represent the result of consultation and compromise. They demand the setting up of a juridical international order. But I repeat what I said a while ago, that that international order, though set up, can never be secured by those who believe in partial measures, in Canada going part of the way; it can only be secured when we, in common with other nations assuming responsibilities, are prepared to go as far as the security council determines we shall go.

Dumbarton Oaks, as the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bertrand) has said, really sets up a new league of nations. It has borrowed bricks from the structure of the old league and used them in the structure of the new. It has discarded many of the faulty ones; it has preserved the good. It adopts the council and gives it power; and it obligates nations that are members of that assembly to prevent and punish aggression anywhere in the world. It accepts the assembly and the world court. The Minister of Fisheries appeared to be under the impression that a nation like Canada should, by its own course and determination, set the limits of its responsibility. A similar attitude destroyed the league of nations. Nation after nation, little and big, accepted position and power, but they did not want responsibility for themselves; if force had to be exercised that was for the other nation.

I come now to this matter of Canada's responsibility. I had some doubt as I listened to the Prime Minister and as I read his speech, and I am more doubtful now, after listening to the Minister of Fisheries, just what Canada's position is with regard to this vital matter. On December 12 the New York Times advised that Canada had submitted to Great Britain and the United States an amendment to the Dumbarton Oaks plan to increase the authority of the "middle powers" like Canada and the Netherlands, without reducing the effectiveness of the league or flouting the authority of the big powers. The Canadian amendment proposed that the non-permanent seats on the security council be allocated to those nations that had the will and the power to place a high minimum of force at the disposal of the security council. Now, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister said the other day that he had discussed proposals requiring amendment with the President of the United States. Is there any move on the part of Canada to ask for a permanent seat on the security board as a "middle power" based on a high minimum of force to be contributed by Canada? The view in the United States, in part, is that Canada asks for a position on that security council as an autonomous nation prepared to go a long way in supplying force as against aggression. It looks like trouble ahead if nations are to be reshuffled into categories of greater, middle or lesser powers.

Our attitude during the war has been that we have developed into one of the larger of the smaller nations and will become the leader among the smaller nations. That has been the declaration over and over again. Will Canada become a leader among any nations if the policy she adopts is not to allow any of her man-power to be sent beyond the confines of the dominion without parliamentary sanction after the first agreement has been adopted by parliament? In other words, unless provision is made for each nation to enter into agreements as to the extent of the contribution that it will make to the central organization? Are we in Canada not only going to be asked to approve what is decided in San Francisco and what agreements we may enter into with the security council, but also from time to time, as difficulties arise in other parts of the world, to be required in parliament to affirm the right of armed forces to go beyond the confines of Canada? If so, we are building on a foundation that will destroy this security council in advance. Will not Canada's position, if I have outlined it correctly, translate all the difficulties we have had in this country during this war into the period of peace? For one cause of great friction between Canada and the United States has been the undoubted reaction in that country unfavourable to Canada's policy that until recently denied the compulsory use of her man-power beyond the territorial limits of the dominion. Are we going to carry that on? Let us consider the position. Should the United States, as she no doubt will, undertake as a member of the council to send her men anywhere under the direction of the security council, after approval by the senate, dare Canada, desiring to hold up her end as a middle power, or as any power, do less than the United States in that regard?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

I am afraid that certain words spoken by the Prime Minister the other day—they were only a few paragraphs—introduced political considerations into what should have been a unanimous stand by Canada designed to assure the other nations of her willingness to contribute her man-power towards the ensuring of peace without qualification, and, of course, following acceptance on the part of parliament of whatever has been determined upon. Canada can take a position of leadership among the smaller nations; but Canada can never take a position of leadership among the smaller nations or any of the nations if she follows the formula that her contribution as a member of this league of united nations shall be cribbed or confined by territorial considerations or by other considerations within the dominion itself.

The Prime Minister said, as reported at page 26 of Hansard of the present session:

There is at present a good deal of obscurity about the methods by which this part of the proposals would be developed in practice.

And also:

Under the present proposals, members of the organization would not be required to place forces under the control of the security council except in accordance with special agreements separately entered into, setting forth the number and types of the forces, and the facilities and assistance which they are prepared to provide. The agreements would limit the military aid, pledged by members, to what each member was ready to give of its own volition.

That was a general statement. That is applicable to all the nations. Each nation by its constitutional processes will be asked to determine the limit of its contribution. He went a little further, and that is where his words become obscure. He said:

The agreements might include provisions governing the circumstances in which any forces could be called upon to serve abroad.

Does that mean it is intended that they shall include any provision whereby we as a signatory and as a member of the united nations shall go before the united nations and say, "As far as Canada is concerned we shall delimit the extent to which our forces can be used"? The Prime Minister also said:

There is nothing anywhere in the proposals at Dumbarton Oaks that indicates that any member should designate the degree to which its forces would be used by the security council. It gives them the right to determine the number and the nature of each country's contribution but not the degree.

Are we going to incorporate a further provision whereby we in Canada shall determine not only the number of men we will supply and the nature of other support we may give, but in addition stipulate that the men we mobilize for an international force shall not be used beyond the confines of Canada? The Prime Minister finally used these words:

As they stand, the acceptance of the proposals would in no way commit Canada to send forces beyond Canadian territory at the call of the security council. If any such commitment were sought, it would be embodied in a later agreement, freely negotiated by the government of Canada, and coming into effect only after it had been approved by parliament.

With that statement I am not in disagreement in so far as it requires that this agreement, like any other of the kind, under the proposals, must be presented to parliament. But what is serious about that statement is that, either unintentionally or designedly, page 26 of Hansard, on which the Prime Minister's remarks are reported, makes for controversy in this country at a time when there should be a united front. Surely one of the outstanding lessons we learned in the failure of the league of nations was that when the member nations of the league had the right to determine the degree of their obligation the league ended as an instrument to prevent war. With the end of war and the gradual return to peace-time conditions nations tend to lose interest in affairs beyond their own confines. I ask the Prime Minister this. While I naturally agree in every particular with the resolution before the house, did he, by those words, intend in any way to offer a sop to isolationism or the little Canadianism of a minority in this country, in order to ensure support for the resolution? If he is not clear and unequivocal in the answer he makes in this regard, that statement has opened the way to the rebirth of isolationism in Canada after this war, another step along the road that we followed too often and too long between 1919 and 1939. It is an actual repetition of what took place in Canada in 1919. On September 2 of that year Sir Robert Borden introduced a resolution which read as follows:

Resolved, that it is expedient that parliament do approve of the treaty of peace between the allied and associated powers and Germany (and the protocol annexed thereto), which was signed at Versailles on the twenty-eighth day of June, nineteen hundred and nineteen, a copy of which has been laid before parliament, and which was signed on behalf of His Majesty, acting for Canada, by the plenipotentiaries therein named, and that this house do approve of the same.

The ideas contained in those debates of 1919 have been repeated over and over again by the various speakers who have contributed to this debate. Sir Robert Borden voiced the same thoughts and same hopes; he pointed out the same difficulties that beset the way toward peace that we hear to-day. He spoke of the "extraordinary extent to which applied science and the control of mankind over the mighty forces of nature were brought into play for the purposes of destruction." He spoke of it as a war not of armies but of nations, and then he used these words:

. . . if, out of its limitless sacrifice, mankind may not gain redemption from such unendurable horrors in the future, where can we see one ray of hope to lighten the pathway that lies before the nations?

He had the same hopes, the same aspirations and the same dreams that we have to-day; and what happened? An amendment was introduced to that resolution, predicated upon the fact that in the House of Commons there were some who believed that section 10 of the peace treaty went too far for Canada; that if section 10 were carried into effect it would mean that we would be engaged in wars in various parts of the world in order to prevent aggression. Section 10 reads as follows:

The members of the league undertake to respect and observe as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all the members of the league. In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression, the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

San Francisco Conference

Then the same old isolationism of a minority stepped in. An amendment was moved by Mr. Fielding, as follows:

That in giving such approval this house in no way assents to any impairment of the existing autonomous authority of the dominion, but declares that the question of what part, if any, the forces of Canada shall take in any war, actual or threatened, is one to be determined at all times as occasion may require by the people of Canada through their representatives in parliament.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the statement of the Prime Minister the other day is but a continuation of that amendment of 1919; and if we take such a course it will be a retrograde step for Canada and the rest of the united nations. I may add that the amendment was defeated, 102 to 70.

If those words do not carry the interpretation I have placed upon them it is because of the vague way in which they were used; for if they are capable, as I submit they are, of the interpretation I give, instead of doing her part to underwrite world security absolutely and unequivocally, Canada will underwrite it conditionally and partially. It will place Canada in the position of being not a great power but one having little greater responsibility for the preservation of world peace than the smallest member of the family of united nations. The warning of 1919 comes back in 1945. The league of nations failed because it never had the power or strength of a real league. It failed because it lacked the united responsibility of all member nations to keep the peace; because it reserved to any and all of them the right to decide if and when and where they would cooperate to assure peace. I hope the words of the Prime Minister do not mean that Canada now intends to whittle down her responsibilities toward the nations of the world and toward the preservation of world peace, in advance of the conference. If we take away from our responsibility to contribute our part everywhere in the world we add to the probability that eventual impotence will come to the security council, for other nations may well follow our lead in this regard.

Some reference was made by the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bertrand) to Canada's relationship to the British commonwealth, and he referred to the words of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon). I personally give the strongest possible support to this new organization which is to be set up, in so far as it is covered by the proposals that were enunciated at Dumbarton Oaks; but not in so far as any interpretation that may be placed thereon. I emphasize the necessity of a full realization of the collective security which has been ours by reason of our membership in the commonwealth and empire. Nor can we ever forget that between 1931 and 1939 we relied upon collective security outside of the league of nations and within the empire. In spite of the setting up of an international organization, such as will be set up, I believe that we must maintain collective security within the commonwealth as well. It has been worth while in the past; it is worth while perpetuating. And until we, in the commonwealth, under a common allegiance, obtain a solidarity that was not ours in the matter of collective security in the days before the war, we cannot expect a broader cooperation from without.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Only to-day I see a press report of a speech delivered yesterday by Field Marshal Smuts in the union assembly of South Africa, in which he uttered identical views. He said, without in any way detracting from this great international organization:

Whatever emerges from the San Francisco conference, whatever world order may be established or whatever method of achieving security is reached, we shall not make the mistake of not looking after our own defence.

That is one thing I believe we must do, within this commonwealth. We must also lay the foundation for greater security within our commonwealth for, as I see the situation, without a strong commonwealth Canada will not be strong politically or economically.

Some say that sentiment is not held generally by the people of Canada. In spite of those who say that those of us who believe in that principle represent the by-gone days, the fact is that when in November, 1943, a Gallup poll asked a question as to whether or not the people of Canada would support an empire council such as then advocated by Mr. Curtin, in all Canada fifty-four per cent of those interviewed were in favour and only twenty-six per cent opposed. In every province there was a majority of at least nine per cent in favour of closer cooperation with the commonwealth.

Then again on March 25, 1944, another poll was taken, in which this question was asked: Should Canada decide her own foreign policy, or should there be a united empire policy? I shall not enter into an argument in that regard to-day, but I might point out that fifty-five per cent of the people interviewed were in favour of that policy, and only thirty-nine per cent opposed it. This would indicate that in Canada to-day, without in any way subordinating our interests as a nation, our people realize that close relationships are necessary within the commonwealth, and that only by those close relationships can we retain our civilization.

With much of that which has been said in the debate, all are in agreement. These proposals may need amendment; they will require changes, based upon experience, trial and error. We are leading the way toward a day when I believe war will have been abolished—an ideal which, as the Minister of Fisheries said a short time ago, has been the aim of mankind from Grotius to our time.

In building this new world the war has done much by way of acting as a solvent of suspicions among nations. Russia, without which we can never have world peace, has emerged from her isolationism following the last war—sometimes voluntarily assumed by her and at other times under conditions imposed by the other united nations. Vague slogans will not bring peace unless they are enforced. This debate has revealed what all of us would have expected, namely unity among our people in a common sacrifice, unity based upon a realization that our destiny can be achieved only in a world of peace.

Canada has a large place to fill in the post-war period. She has the facilities and the strategic position. Without Canada's strategic position there can be no world peace, nor can there be without her facilities. Geography has called Canada to her destiny. We enjoy the shortest route around the world, both to the east and to the west. One great contribution we can make to the nations of the world in the building of this new world, one free from war, is to make available to the united nations the strategic airports given to us by nature. In that way we can do our part toward rendering available posts from which great international forces will be able to move in order to prevent aggression, not only within the confines of Canada but everywhere in the world where duty calls and parliament allows.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, my first words this afternoon I should like to be those of thankfulness that we have our present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) with us, alive and well, able to introduce this resolution asking that we send a delegation to the conference at San Francisco, and able to go there in health and strength to head the delegation from this dominion.

The suggestion made from time to time, and referred to by the last speaker, that the Prime Minister might be made chairman of that conference, is an indication of the high position he holds in the esteem of all the outstanding statesmen of the world. As the last speaker was on his feet, and throwing doubts around the Prime Minister's willingness and ability to make the greatest possible contribution as Canada's leader and the leader of the Canadian delegation, in connection with the setting up of an organization to establish enduring peace, I was thinking that when the nations of the world quite obviously regard him as one of the most outstanding world statesmen, and when they are ready to trust him in the highest position the conference would have to offer, it is strange to find that in this parliament there should be those who would throw doubt upon him.

May I, at the outset before going further, say in all sincerity that in what I am going to say to-day I speak entirely for myself. It may be that what I say in respect of some matters will not meet the views of other members of my party.

When introducing the resolution I felt the Prime Minister was honest with the country and the world. That was one of the things I appreciated most in his speech. There was no suggestion that something was being done when in fact it was not being done. There was no suggestion that things were going to be accomplished that obviously are not going to be accomplished. It was a straightforward statement of the position in which we find ourselves in the world to-day. It was a clear-cut statement which it seems to me should be appreciated by the people of Canada. Certainly a perusal of the responsible press of this country would indicate that that straightforward statement, that clear-cut statement without pretence, is appreciated by the people of Canada.

I do not intend to follow the last speaker altogether, but one of the things in his speech that struck me was that he suggested that the attitude in the United States was unfavourable to Canada, that in his belief a poor opinion was held in the United States of Canada's contribution to the winning of this war.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I never made any such statement.

Mr. TUCKER: There was the suggestion that there was an unfavourable attitude toward Canada. I took down his exact words. If there is not an attitude in favour of Canada to-day it is due to one thing more than any other; that is, the unfortunate statements of his own leader which have been reproduced all over the United States.

I cannot speak for the present state of public opinion in the United States, but I had the privilege of attending the Bretton Woods conference. At that time I took advantage of the opportunity to talk to practically all the members of the United States delegation and other people from the United States with whom I came in contact. I can say that at that time there was no country held in higher regard by the people of the United States and the delegates there, no country whose war effort and contribution was held in higher respect than that of their Canadian neighbours. As I say, if there has been any damage done, as now confirmed by the leader of the opposition, it has been due to the unfortunate statements of his own leader.

Mr. GRAYDON: The reinforcement crisis.

Mr. TUCKER: I suggest that there has been no reason for that attitude. As a member of the Canadian army during the last war and as a member of the Canadian army during this war I resent the implications that have been thrown upon the good name of the soldiers of Canada when it was said that there was wholesale mutiny and insubordination. I think the time will come when the leader of that party will bitterly regret those statements as I am sure many of his followers throughout the country bitterly regret them to-day.

The suggestion has been thrown out by the last speaker that Canada has no right to aspire to a permanent seat on the security council, and then in the next breath we hear the suggestion that perhaps we should not act as "Little Canadians". If the nations of the world think that Canada by her great contribution to the saving of liberty of mankind, by the great contribution made by her gallant sons in this war, has earned a permanent seat on the security council, it does not lie in the mouth of any hon. member here to suggest that she is not entitled to it.

Mr. DIFENBAKER: I rise on a question of privilege. That statement was never made or implied by me.

Mr. TUCKER: I can only give my understanding of the hon. member's words. Apparently he did not mean what I understood him to say, and I am glad to hear that he did not.

I find it strange that there should be any opposition whatever to this resolution in regard to the sending of a delegation to attend this conference which is to try to set up an organization to guarantee enduring peace. The Canadian delegation are to endeavour to do all they can to help to set up the best possible organization and then, having done the best they can, they are to come to parliament and ask for the ratification of what has been done.

[Mr. Tucker.]

As I say, it is hard for me to understand why there should be any opposition to that resolution.

I read the speech of Prime Minister Churchill to the British House of Commons and I listened to what President Roosevelt said to congress, both reporting on the Yalta conference. The thought which was left in my mind was not that they had evolved a perfect system to guarantee world peace, not that they evolved a system that would be fair to all nations of the world, but that they had done the best possible under the circumstances which are well known to all members here. There is nothing to be gained by finding fault with people who have done the best they can; there is nothing to be gained by pretending that more was done than actually was done, and this afternoon I should like to indicate in my own humble way what I think was accomplished there and what I think the attitude of our delegation should be.

It is quite clear that the proposed peace organization will have the strength and machinery to see to it that Germany and Japan do not again menace the peace of the world. That is something worth a great deal. The second thing that the world peace organization will undoubtedly be able to do is to make sure that none of the smaller nations will be able to start a war which might endanger the peace of the world. That also is something worth while. The third thing they will accomplish is to set up a means for international cooperation among the different nations of the world whereby they will promote their economic well-being. That is a wonderful thing too. I shall deal with it shortly later on.

But it is not so designed as to be able entirely to prevent the outbreak of another world war. Its machinery is not so designed as to operate to prevent one of the five great nations having permanent seats on the security council from engaging in acts of aggression if it should see fit to do so. By its veto power any such nation with a permanent seat in the security council can prevent any effective action from being taken against itself by the other nations of the world in the way of preventing aggression by that particular nation.

That, of course, is unfortunate. There have been attempts in the past at victorious alliances, the joining together of victorious nations to guarantee world peace. One of the first in comparatively recent times was the Holy Alliance, following the Napoleonic wars. However, the time came when the powers that had won the war fell apart and there were further wars. So it seems to me that in regard to this particular organization we should always bear in mind that it does not cover that possibility of the victors falling apart. In all our plans for the future we should bear in mind that it was the confidence of the people of the peace-loving nations of the world following the last war that we had definitely outlawed war for all time that led them so to weaken themselves that the aggressor nations felt they could start a war with success. That lesson of the last war should not be forgotten by the peace-loving nations in regard to this organization.

As I mentioned, I should like to enumerate a few of the things that this organization, particularly under the direction of the economic and social council, can do to promote the economic well-being of the peoples of the world. I shall enumerate these item by item. First is the promotion of international trade, the getting together of nations to eliminate barriers to international trade. Canada has a greater interest in this than probably any other nation. Thirty per cent of our income is derived from exports to other nations. If we are to have full employment and the high standard of living which we hope to have for our people after this war we must see to it that we develop international trade in every possible way. One way in which it can be developed is by international cooperation.

Another way in which the peoples of the world have at times been exploited has been by the setting up and developing of international cartels which are beyond the reach of any individual nation. Surely that is a field where international cooperation can be used for the good of the ordinary people of the world.

Then there is the question of the devastated countries of the world and the backward countries of the world. Bretton Woods, in setting up the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, sought to put the credit of the world behind the rebuilding of devastated areas and to raise the standard of living in the backward countries of the world. This was not only a humanitarian step but one which will benefit the world generally, including Canada, in raising their standard of living and opening up and developing other countries as effective markets for our goods.

Then there is the question of the establishment of some sort of system to settle temporary balances in international trade to take the place of the old gold standard, which more or less went out of existence at the end of the last war. I heard the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) speak about that. I do not have time to-day to answer his arguments, but I would say to him that Lord Keynes, in speaking in the House of Lords before going to the Bretton Woods conference, definitely undertook that so far as Britain was concerned anything they agreed to would not mean that Great Britain would be tied down to the gold standard again. If there was one thing on which assurance was sought and assurance was given it was that very thing, and that was the thing about which the British delegation at that conference, it seemed to me, were more concerned than any other. I am satisfied that if Lord Keynes, one of the most outstanding economists in the world to-day, is satisfied, as he has so stated, that Bretton Woods does not mean the tying down of the nations of the world to-day to the gold standard, that should be satisfactory and sufficient to the average person. So far as I am concerned, with my own limited knowledge and ability, what study I have given it indicates to me definitely that we are not tied down to the gold standard. Incidentally delegates from Australia and New Zealand were equally concerned that the gold standard should not be reimposed on the nations of the world, and they also were satisfied with the decisions of Bretton Woods in that regard.

Another way in which this organization can contribute to the well-being of mankind is in the regulation of prices of basic commodities. One of the things that have thrown the nations out of balance in times past has been that the primary producing nations from time to time have overproduced and have found that the values of their primary products have dropped as a consequence, and the result has been that unemployment has been created particularly in the more highly industrialized nations. If the nations of the world can and will get together and agree on basic price levels for basic commodities such as wheat, beef, pulp, nickel and other such primary products, the well-being of not only the primary producing nations but of the nations of the whole world will be greatly promoted. That can be done only by international action.

In regard to raising labour standards it is well known to any person who studies the question that no one nation alone can go far beyond other nations with which it is in competition in raising labour standards for fear that it would be at a disadvantage in competing for the markets of the world. Obviously this is a case for cooperation between all nations to raise labour standards generally throughout the world by cooperative action so that everybody would benefit and nobody suffer.

Much can also be done in regard to the control of disease, the control of the white slave traffic, the control of the traffic in nar-coties. The more closely the nations of the world can be brought together to work for their mutual advantage, the better hope there is for the future well-being of mankind. The Prime Minister I think rightly emphasized the importance of this economic aspect of the new world organization when he said:

San Francisco Conference

The maintenance of security is only one aspect of the creation of a world society in which peace can take root and flourish. It is not merely the security of nations that is indivisible; prosperity also is indivisible. Few would wish to return to the years before the war when many nations sought economic security in economic isolation. What happened was that the economic security of all nations was destroyed. Now is surely the time for the whole world to realize that just as no nation can ensure its own safety of itself, so no nation or group of nations can ensure its own prosperity in isolation.

There is another matter with which I wish to deal shortly this afternoon, and again this is a matter on which I speak only for myself and do not presume to speak for anybody else. It has been made quite plain that the great powers intend to keep control of the world security council in their own hands, with each one reserving the right of veto over any decision of that council which means the application of effective sanctions against an aggressor. It might very well be that in the future in a case where it is desired to oppose the designs of an aggressor, Canada, for example, would have no representation on that security council; and to suggest that the Canadian people or any other people can be persuaded to place their young men at the disposal of an organization on which they have no representation whatever to be sent any place in the world where the security council wants them to fight is taking an unrealistic attitude. It is all very well to speak in generalities, as the last speaker did, but you have to take into account how people react to these things. The Canadian people are not willing to have the parliament at Westminster make a decision that Canada shall enter into a war to defend the interests of the British Commonwealth anywhere in the world. We strictly reserve to ourselves the right to say that we ourselves shall decide whether we shall engage in any war. Then surely if we have no say in the decision of the security council we are not going to have our armed forces sent abroad to fight at the behest of people whom we have no control and who do not represent us in any way whatsoever. That is only common sense, and it seems to me that it is time it should be said in this house.

Mr. BROOKS: It has been said a dozen times.

[Mr. Tucker.]

Mr. TUCKER: It cannot be said too often. It is only by facing that fact, and not by blinding ourselves and refusing to look at it, that we can say what the solution must be.

There is a solution which has occurred to me. Perhaps it is not new but I have not seen the suggestion made elsewhere. If it is necessary to leave these powers in the hands of the security council for quick action against an aggressor, then it should be provided that before any nation not represented on the security council is to be expected to send its armed forces to fight in a cause which the security council has espoused, there should be a two-thirds vote of the general assembly in which every nation of the world is represented. That would not prevent the security council from acting quickly in putting great forces in opposition to an aggressor, but it would mean that other nations not represented on the council would feel that they would not be expected to be bound by the council's decision unless they so wished, until they had the chance of debating the question in the general assembly and the general assembly decided that was a proper matter for the forces of the whole world to be mobilized behind the security council. I submit that if some such step as that is made there will be some hope of getting not only the secondary powers but all the powers of the world mobilized against any possible aggressor. That mobilization will not be possible if you put the entire power in the hands of a small group of great powers and expect others to trust blindly to their decision, without giving them any chance to be consulted or to have any say in the matter. If we try to put that sort of solution into effect, it will fail again, as it failed before. No peoples are going to put their young men at the disposal of an organization outside their own country over whom they have no control and on which they are not even represented, and I submit that that fact must be faced before we can hope to mobilize all world forces against aggression instead of depending on the great powers and others who happen to be represented on the security council.

It has been suggested by a member of the official opposition that, in calling attention to this defect and suggesting some solution, I am not so wholehearted as he is in the cause of world peace. I cannot understand that attitude. I take it for granted that all hon. members, after what we have seen of the loss of relatives, loved ones and friends in the last war and the present one who have given their lives because it has not yet been possible to outlaw war, are honestly and conscientiously trying to find a solution which will banish for all time that great enemy of mankind. That is why I so heartily approve the Prime Minister's statement, as reported in Hansard, at page 29:

It is the view of the government that the constitutional position within the organization of important secondary countries should be clarified, and that the delegation from Canada should exert the utmost effort to secure due recognition of their relative standing among the nations of the world.

And also this:

It would seem to be desirable to develop some procedure whereby states not represented on the security council would not be called upon to undertake serious enforcement action without the opportunity of participating in the council's proceedings, or without agreeing separately to join in executing the decisions of the council.

My suggestion is that no nation not a member of the security council who signed this agreement putting its armed forces at the disposal of the world security organization should be bound to put this undertaking into effect unless a majority vote of two-thirds of the nations of the world represented in the general assembly should have been passed. Surely that is the place where all the nations, secondary and those which are smaller than secondary, should have a right to go and say whether they think an aggression is actually being perpetrated and whether they feel it should be opposed; and if it is clearly an aggression, and if the security council has already decided it is an aggression and the forces of the great powers are to be put against that aggression, no doubt there will be two-thirds of the nations of the world to support their action. In that way all the nations will feel that, before their efforts are set in motion, they will have the right to go into the parliament of man to decide whether they should go into action or whether they should not.

As I have said, a great deal can be done by this world organization if proposed changes are not approved at all. The alternative, no organization at all, is so terrible that I cannot understand anyone, even if the chances were much less than they are that the organization will be able to eliminate war, not being willing to take that chance. What is the alternative suggested by those who oppose this proceeding? That is the question they should ask themselves. No matter how much we desire our views to be approved, no matter whether the Canadian delegation succeeds or not in securing some of the improvements which, in the mind of the Prime Minister, are desirable for this organization, we should adhere to it and give it all the support the Canadian people feel they should give it in the light of the final form of the organization.

The delegation from Canada will be in a very important position. It was openly recognized at Bretton Woods that Canada seeks nothing from any other nation but friendship and co-operation, that she has no designs on anybody. By her special position in the British Commonwealth she is a comrade of that great galaxy of nations: by her special friendship and position in regard to the United States she is regarded almost as a sister nation of the United States; and by virtue of our close proximity to the Soviets there was an apparent feeling of friendship on their part toward Canada. It seemed to me that whenever the Canadian delegation spoke or took any attitude it was listened to with friendship and good will beyond that accorded to almost any other nation. I am satisfied that on account of the great and decisive part the Canadian people have taken in this war, because Canada was the first country on the American continent to see the danger to the freedom of mankind, and perhaps because we stood by Britain's side in the dark days of 1940 made all the difference between victory and defeat, Canada is esteemed and admired as she has never been before. We shall have at the conference as the leader of our delegation in the person of our Prime Minister a man who is recognized as one of the world's outstanding statesmen, a man who is known for his humanitarian instincts, a man who is known to have been a lifetime worker for the common man not only in his own country but throughout the world; so that much will be expected, and I am sure much will be realized, from the work of our delegation at this great conference in San Francisco.

In conclusion, it is my humble judgment that no matter what tributes we pay to those who suffer in our defence, no matter how much we think of the sufferings of mankind in the last war and the present one—and I do not suppose we can begin to realize the sorrow and suffering which has been inflicted in particular upon civilians subject to the horrors of war—the greatest monument we can erect to the gallantry of the men who fought and died for freedom in the last war and the present one, will be the creation of an organization which will go as far as we can possibly go to-day in guaranteeing enduring peace.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, it is with some diffidence that I rise to take part in this debate. I consider it perhaps the most important debate that has taken place in this house since the inauguration of this parliament. For the past five years we have been engaged in fighting a world conflict. Thousands of the men and women of Canada are taking part in that conflict. We are supposed to be fighting for the preservation of liberty and the maintenance of law and order throughout the world and we find ourselves at the present time in a position where, at least on one front, the war is reaching its end.

The debate we are carrying on now, in which we have been engaged since the opening of this session, is intended to lay the groundwork for the machinery that will guide the destinies of the world in the future and achieve the objectives for which we are fighting. It is a problem that is complex. It requires a good deal of study on the part of people who are honestly interested in establishing the objectives for which we are fighting.

The matter as presented to the house is, however, very simple. A resolution is being debated in this house authorizing parliament to send a delegation to San Francisco. The job of that delegation is to bring out of the conference there a charter that will set the basic principles of the machinery that we are endeavouring to put in motion. There is nothing very complicated about that, and I do not think anyone disagrees with the resolution as presented to the house. The conference at San Francisco, however, is merely one of the decisions arising out of conferences that have previously been held—Teheran, Yalta and others which we have heard talked about but of which we know very little. The forthcoming conference is the culmination of those that have already been held.

While this debate may seem, particularly to some people outside the house, unnecessary and long drawn out, personally I think it is one of the most important discussions that we have had since I have been in the house, particularly on the questions that we have been considering in the last few days. Going through the country as members of the house do in the recess, you will find that a large percentage of the people of Canada know very little about the subject matter we have been discussing for the past week. They know very little about the mechanics of the organization that we are trying to set up, notwithstanding the fact that that organization is designed to map the destinies of the world for many years to come and to decide whether we shall have conflict in the future or whether we shall live in a peaceful world and establish the social objectives for which hundreds of thousands have been dying on the battlefields of Europe and elsewhere in the past five years.

[Mr. Gillis.]

The discussion itself has been fruitful to members of the house. I know that members of this group for many months now, in our conventions, provincial and national, in our council meetings, have been discussing the implications of the subject which we are dealing with at the present time, and since coming to the house and listening to the discussion I find that there have been many things that have been clarified in my mind, so that I am able to speak with perhaps a little more conviction on the matter now than I would have been able to do two weeks ago.

The delegation that we are sending to San Francisco will in my opinion benefit by this discussion because the members of that delegation are not going to express their own opinions. They are going to express the opinions of the Dominion of Canada on the questions that will be discussed, and with respect to the machinery that will be set up, at the San Francisco conference.

At this point I would join with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggarr (Mr. Coldwell) and the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) in the view they expressed that they would like to have seen direct representatives of labour attend the conference. I think that the heads or appointees of the Canadian Congress of Labour and the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada should have representation at San Francisco. It would be good for them, and I believe that the parliamentary representatives going there would benefit considerably from the help which they might get from those who have guided the affairs of the labour movement in the last five years—and it was no small job. In my opinion the heads of the two congresses I have mentioned were the generals on the home front during the period of the war. They had a very difficult job at times in selling the orders in council and the like to their members in order to keep the wheels of production moving. I believe that every effort should be made, as was suggested by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggarr (Mr. Coldwell) and the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), to include the international labour office, its personnel and experience, somewhere in the machinery being set up, because they have been accustomed to handling these problems. I know it will be discussed there, or taken up, and I am just adding my voice to those of the two hon. members who have already made the suggestion.

I have listened with a great deal of respect to the hon. members who have already discussed this matter. This afternoon the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) gave utterance to a lot of fears with respect to the machinery now being set up. I think there is some justification for his fears. He asked a question of the hon. members of this group, namely, whether we would be in favour of setting up a Dumbarton Oaks within the British commonwealth of nations. I think that question is irrelevant, for the simple reason that there is no prospect of war between the member nations of the British commonwealth of nations. The organization that we are now endeavouring to set up is designed to function among the nations of the world. Its function is to preserve peace. There is a lot of danger of war in the future unless some international machinery is set up to prevent it. The question as to whether we would favour that kind of set-up in the British commonwealth is not germane to the discussion, because there is no possibility of war within the commonwealth with interests on the outside.

In my opinion the proposed set-up is a very simple one. We propose to lay down a world court. We are endeavouring to bring into the international field the rule of law. I cannot see how anyone can disagree with it. My very simple analysis would do this: to those who fear the loss of some of our rights and privileges as a nation I say that when we establish a community the individual in that community is subservient to the law. He must obey the legal laws of society within the country and he surrenders a lot of the things that he considers rights in that community. The same thing applies to the machinery now being set up. We are endeavouring to bring the rule of law within the international sphere. Any nation that becomes a member of the world court, the security council and the like, has to surrender its rights to handle its own affairs regardless of how they affect other nations of the world. In my opinion we are trying to do a simple thing, and the more you read this little guide that was given to us, "Proposals for the establishment of a general international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security," the more simple it becomes. There is nothing very complicated about it. However, I should like to emphasize one point, namely, if we set up this international machinery—and I think we all agree that it should be set up—I know that so far as the members of this group are concerned we are a hundred per cent behind the proposals. There is no equivocation or qualification or quibbling; the delegation should go to that conference prepared to see that some enforcement machinery is placed behind it.

When I listened to the Prime Minister's speech I interpreted it exactly as did the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). The Prime Minister said that before this nation would be obliged to send troops overseas or abroad or make troops available to the security council and their military staffs for the purpose of enforcing this international machinery should aggression or disputes arise, it would be the prerogative of Canada, in the event of the security council calling on us to accept our proportionate share of responsibility in the military field to enforce whatever action was necessary to maintain world peace we could discuss the matter all over again in the house and decide whether we were going to make that contribution or not. I shall not read the Prime Minister's speech because the hon. member for Lake Centre has already done that. Personally I believe such a course is absolutely wrong. If we are going into this security council we should be prepared to make our full contribution in the military field as well as in the other fields. However, since reading and checking over this evening the proposals as contained in the document tabled by the Prime Minister, which I quoted a moment ago, I find that if one reads the Prime Minister's speech along with this document one will find that the basic proposals to be discussed at San Francisco contain very much the wording that the Prime Minister used in his speech. I am referring to section B, "Determination of threats to the peace or acts of aggression and action with respect thereto." Section 5 of that particular paragraph reads as follows:

In order that all members of the organization should contribute to the maintenance of international peace and security, they should undertake to make available to the security council, on its call and in accordance with a special agreement or agreements concluded among themselves, armed forces, facilities and assistance necessary for the purpose of maintaining international peace and security. Such agreement or agreements should govern the number and types of forces and the nature of the facilities and assistance to be provided. The special agreement or agreements should be negotiated as soon as possible and should be in each case subject to approval by the security council and to ratification by the signatory states in accordance with their constitutional processes.

There are several sections of these proposals which are on exactly the same theme. If we are sincere and honest in trying to make this machinery work that is one of the things that will have to be discussed thoroughly. If we go into this organization and if we intend to enforce international rules of law with respect to the maintenance of peace in the future, then every country will have to make its commitments as to a standing army, navy and air force, have them trained and ready to move, and there should be no quibbling if and when they must move after a decision by the security council, because they have authority under the machinery to see that aggression is stamped out. I do not think there should be any quibbling on that point. If after enacting laws in this country we left the police force out of the picture entirely and waited until some act of lawlessness was committed before a police force was organized it would take a long time to catch the criminal. I agree with the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) on the point that that has to be strengthened. I think it is the main reason why the league of nations failed after the last war, namely, that they had the right to discuss and the right to condemn and the right to do a lot of other things, but they had no enforcement machinery. To my mind this is one thing of which we should make absolutely certain at this time.

Then, in addition to strengthening the machinery in that way, I think other factors which go toward making war should be given special attention. Last night the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) made an excellent speech, and emphasized the necessity of organizing and distributing the food production of the world. I have no need to elaborate upon what he said, because he did it much better than I could have done. Then the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) stressed the question of education. To my mind that is one of the basic principles that must be handled in the future, if we are ever going to get away from war. As the hon. member for York South pointed out, while we were talking peace and while the league of nations was struggling to function, the schools of the totalitarian nations were drilling war into the minds of the younger generation, with the result that we embarked upon the debacle we have at the present time.

Unless some international machinery is set up, and unless decent principles are inculcated into the minds of the younger generation, we will never get away from wars. That is one of the basic things that should be handled, and when the discussions are held at San Francisco some machinery should be provided to meet that necessity.

The group to which I belong approaches this problem perhaps somewhat differently from some other hon. members belonging to other groups. As we see it, a definite principle is involved. We agree with that principle, namely, the one of establishing a rule of law in international affairs. What we will have to avoid, however, is analysing this matter on the basis of leadership. On two or three occasions in the house I have heard it stated that unless the three big powers hang together there is no possibility of peace in the future, and that unless the present leaders—Roosevelt, Stalin and Churchill—have unanimous agreement on all matters the world will have conflict in the future. I believe that the people of this world must be convinced of the wisdom of the organization being set up, and that they must not depend on leadership.

[Mr. Gillis.]

The span of man's life is very short. While we may be getting excellent leadership at the present time from the men I have mentioned, ten or fifteen years from now those men may not be there. Some new individuals will take over the organization, men with entirely different ideas and they may make other uses of it. And unless we can school the peoples of the world concerning the principles for which the organization is supposed to stand, then my fear is that it may become the plaything of individuals, it will not do the job it was intended to do.

Every opportunity must be taken in every country of the world fully to publicize and have understood the principles for which this organization is being set up. And then, regardless of who may take the reins of power in any of the nations, large or small, with an informed populace the leaders cannot use the machinery for their own purposes. That is something we should have clearly in our minds.

This group is supporting the organization because of the principles for which it stands. We are not now accepting, nor have we accepted, nor will we at any other time accept the principle of fuhrership within this country. I do not think the people of Canada as a whole are supporting Dumbarton Oaks, Bretton Woods or any other machinery that may be set up because of the leadership which may be advocating those principles. The people of Canada are giving their support to the principles upon which the organization is being built. I suggest we should publicize at every opportunity exactly what the machinery of the organization stands for.

The closed mind, prejudices of any kind or hatred for other sections are things which can wreck any machinery which in future may be set up. If that kind of attitude is allowed to creep into any international machinery erected for the purpose of safeguarding the peace of the world, then that machinery is headed in a short time for shoal waters.

I am sorry the hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen) and the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Rose) are not in their places at the moment. I was amazed last night to hear the hon. member for North Battleford, without any provocation whatsoever, launch an attack against the leader of this group, and against the C.C.F. in general. She did so on the assumption that during the debate he had said something that would lead her to believe that he was not wholeheartedly behind the proposals of Dumbarton Oaks. She made a rather pathetic spectacle of herself in what she attempted to do. She waved a copy of Hansard in her hand for a long time, saying, "He said something; it is not here; I cannot find it; I cannot put my finger upon it, but it is something I feel; it is an inference." That kind of stuff in my opinion does not make for unity.

This debate to a great extent has been carried on along non-partisan lines. In her approach to this problem of sending a delegation, the launching of an attack of that kind, by that particular person, was anything but called for. When I think back only a few short years ago, to the time of the outbreak of this war, I recall that the very same people were calling the C.C.F. a group of war-mongers, and were stating that we were backing an imperialist war. In fact, it was not until June, 1941, that they came to the conclusion that the war might be all right. They went to bed on the night of June 21 fully convinced that this was a phoney war, an imperialist war. They were not for it. When they awoke on the morning of June 22 they were for it—but they did not know it until they read the newspaper. The war was all right then; it was a good war.

While the hon. member for North Battleford could not read into the record anything that the leader of the C.C.F. group had said, I am going to read into the record something that she said in relation to one of the statements she made last night. This is what the hon. member for North Battleford had to say last night, as it is reported at page 142 of Hansard:

I wish to say openly in front of the whole house that any person to-day who is spreading even doubts and little fears about the possibility of our achieving democratic rights and so forth in this new peace and security organization which is being set up comes into the same category as those who spread defeatism in time of war.

Well, let us see what the hon. member for North Battleford had to say in the debate on the war appropriation bill on March 24, 1941. I quote from page 1812 of Hansard where she quotes Abraham Lincoln as follows:

I have two great enemies, the southern army to the south of me and the financial institutions in the rear, and of the two the one in the rear is my greatest foe.

A little further down the hon. member said:

I think we can bring the words of Lincoln up to date by saying, "We have two great enemies, Hitler to the front of us and the financial institutions in the rear, and of the two the one in the rear is our greatest foe". That is, from the point of view of the common people, the financial institutions are at the present time our greatest foe.

That was said during the process of fighting this war. Was that spreading defeatism during the process of fighting the war? If the hon. member was speaking at that time for the common people she certainly is not speaking for the common people at this time because the institutions which she condemned as being the greatest enemy, greater than Hitler, the financial institutions of this country, are the same institutions. They have not changed any of their philosophy or any of their functions; they have a greater concentration of power to-day and offer a greater menace in the future than they had or did at that time.

The opinions of people of that calibre are not worth very much. Those who can handspring from one thing to another quickly over night without any regard for the principles involved in my opinion will have to be watched in the future.

As I said before, the members of this group have a Canadian policy. When the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggan (Mr. Coldwell) spoke he expressed the sentiments of the entire movement in Canada. We have debated this matter in our conventions, provincial and national, and in our council meetings. What he put on the record expressed the opinion of the entire movement across Canada. I want to make it quite clear that the hon. member for North Battleford and the hon. member for Cartier are not expressing the sentiments of the Canadian people and they are not advocating a programme that is drafted on the basis of the needs of the Canadian people. The C.C.F. programme, be it right or wrong, represents the sentiment of the people of this country and is based on the needs of the country. The same member took part in the debate that occurred on May 12, 1941, at which time she was asked a question by the hon.

member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). I quote from page 2731 of Hansard of that year as follows:

Mr. Martin: Does the hon. member think they would get a better break under Hitler?

Mrs. Nielsen: I do not know whether they would or not.

Never since the outbreak of this war have the membership of this group been in doubt as to where their interests lie. Had the attitude of the Canadian people at that time been that this was a phoney war, that this was not a war for the preservation of liberties and freedom; had we sat back and waited until 1941; had the United States done that and had Britain been left alone, we possibly would not have been discussing at this moment the sending of a delegation to San Francisco for the purpose of setting up an organization aimed at peace and security in the future. We might have had no parliament; we might have been under the domination of a nazi controlled world. I want to make that quite clear.

I want to make it clear also that as far as we are concerned there is no quibbling or qualification in our support of this resolution to send this delegation to San Francisco. Any criticism we may make is made in an effort to strengthen the organization and make sure that the goals for which we are sending this delegation to San Francisco are achieved. We hope that when the charter is written and brought back to this country Canada will be prepared to accept her full responsibility in the economic field, in the cultural field and in the field of international relations. We are going to guarantee peace in the future. If an international police force is set up—and it must be set up—Canada must be ready to mobilize at any time in order to send to any part of the world her proportionate share of that police force for the purpose of maintaining law and order and to protect other nations, whether large or small. I am going to close on that note and repeat that as far as this group is concerned, we support this resolution without any qualification.

Mr. G. E. WOOD (Brant): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to follow the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) but I am compelled to make one allusion to what he said. I appreciate to some extent his changed philosophy in regard to the war effort as compared with what it was at the outbreak of the war. I was rather shocked to hear him say to-night that he would be prepared to have Canada send a force from this country to any part of the world regardless of the voice of parliament. I think that is contradictory to the philosophy held by that particular group several years ago. That is possibly the result of growing pains and we may have to be generous toward their philosophies. They are not alone in this change. I intend to take this opportunity to direct attention to the changes that have occurred in the philosophies of other groups.

[Mr. Gillis.]

In the meantime I should like to draw the attention of the house to the spirit of reasonable compromise and the broadminded policies that were achieved by the three great leaders at the Yalta conference. These were significant of the unity of purpose and action that must guide us at San Francisco. This is to be a peace-keeping conference, not a peace-making conference.

I think we would be within our rights to clothe the representatives of this country with authority to correct any injustices, errors and mistakes they may see in the peace-making conference. They should be able to do that for the benefit of society. It would be too much to expect that a conference of human beings would be able to organize a security organization that was perfect. We must make progress by trial and error and we must be reasonably generous toward those who have this grave responsibility. We must give them our support and, if there are some things we do not like about what has been done, we must be tolerant and show our delegation when they come back that we believe they did the best they could.

As I listened to this debate I could not help but think of the many different viewpoints and ideas that have been expressed in this House of Commons. We have seen how it is almost impossible to bring together the ideas of men who represent different races and religions, who read different literature and who have different opinions and ideals, and I do not think we should expect this conference to be able to do better than we have been able to do in this House of Commons.

There is one thing we must keep in mind, they will have to face realities. They cannot deal too much with theories. Their ideas will have to be forged on the anvil of practical experience.

I feel that we in Canada are very fortunate in having as our Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) a man who has led a great national party in this country for a period of twenty-five years and one who has been Prime Minister of this dominion for almost the same length of time. It is doubtful whether any other man at the San Francisco conference can equal his experience, and there is no doubt that because of that long experience and his great ability he will be able to make a splendid contribution to the work of the conference. Furthermore the Prime Minister will go there as the head of a country comprising two great races, and the fact that he has been able to keep the country united while it has been making such a magnificent contribution to this war will put the Prime Minister in a very strong position at the conference.

We on this north American continent, where two nations live side by side, separated by no Siegfried line or Maginot line, with no forts or guns constantly pointed at each other, are able to give a most gracious example to the conference of how peace-loving peoples can get along well together when they try to do so and contribute to human welfare and well-being.

Just before the war we had a declaration from the President of the United States that he would not see the United States stand idly by should Canada be attacked, and later we had the Ogdensburg agreement, the agreement for the mutual exchange of goods, and the good neighbour policy. All these things are bound to have an influence, so that I think we can safely say that, despite the training in diplomacy of the statesmen of the older countries of the world who will be represented at the conference, this new American continent has set an example to the world that might well be followed by the other nations.

I was very much pleased with the remarks that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) made in this debate when he said that world peace and world trade are inseparable. He belongs to a group that probably is suffering from growing pains and has experienced a change of philosophy because I have seen him stand in this house from time to time and defend the policy of protection. It is very encouraging to see that he has now seen the error of his ways and has made such a splendid statement.

But as some member has said in this debate—I am not prepared to say who it was—our problems are not going to be solved by the volume of words uttered but by the quality of our thinking—by actions and not by words. I well remember that in my youth I had the responsibility of running a farm. It was about that time that Sir Wilfrid Laurier sent my predecessor from Brant, the Hon. William Paterson, and the Hon. Mr. Fielding to Washington to negotiate a reciprocity pact between Canada and the United States. That was in 1911, and from the Conservative party of that day we had abuse of any man who would advocate trading with the United States. A man's loyalty was questioned by that party if he wanted to sell a bushel of wheat or a cow or a pig across the border. The slogan of the Conservative party at that time was, "No truck or trade with the Yankees." But to-day we see a change of heart in that group. What was their attitude in 1931 when our great ally, Russia, was at that time struggling for a place in the sun? Russia had gone through a revolution and was endeavouring to build up trade; yet in the speech from the throne in 1931, when the Bennett administration was in power, I find this sentence:

Pursuant to the fixed policy of my government to combat all influences which are inimical to the social and economic welfare of this dominion, an order in council has been passed prohibiting the importation of certain commodities into Canada from the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

I believe that if our friends over there in that group had some of these things to do over again they would not repeat some of their mistakes, and certainly they would be reluctant to have such a statement as that upon our records. Let me show you the path they have travelled in the past so that we may judge if they are fitted to blaze a trail for the future.

In 1932 an empire economic conference was held in this city, where the Ottawa agreements were negotiated. Our party was condemned by many of the newspapers because they did not give the conference their whole-hearted support. While our party supported the Ottawa agreements they wanted to trade not only with the mother country and the British commonwealth of nations but with other countries of the world, with other races and other nations. I am sure it is very gratifying to us who have been constant supporters of Liberal principles and policies to realize that we have always been led along channels where we have not had to stop periodically and turn around and apologize for our mistakes. I know of nothing that has contributed more to unrest in the world or was more responsible for bringing about war than those restrictive trade policies which have deprived society of the good things of this world. The Lord has blessed this and preceding generations by revealing many things in the way of science by means of which we have been able to add to our blessings. We have, for instance, the means of transportation to-day so that if there is an abundance of food produced in one part of the world and a famine existing in some other part, that country does not need to go hungry because the food distribution problem has been solved. But trade restrictive policies tend to deprive people of the good things that this earth will produce.

I do not think Canada is asking any more than she should when she demands recognition by way of a permanent place on the council. At the same time I frankly admit that if this is not expedient, I would agree that some other arrangement be made whereby Canada could express her views at the council. But when one realizes that this country of ours, under the leadership of the man whom we shall send to represent Canada at the conference, is the second largest trading nation in the world, that in a few years we have built a navy third in size among the united nations, that in industrial production we stand fourth, that our contribution to the war effort, as Madame Chiang Kai-shek said in this house, is the largest per capita of any of the united nations, surely we are not asking too much when we claim a permanent seat on the council, and I believe the Prime Minister is quite within his rights to ask for a position commensurate with the contribution we are prepared to make.

If there is one thing I enjoy more than any other it is to boast about the accomplishments of our people. I do not want to take up too much of the time of the house, but I happened to get in the mail to-day bulletin 43 of "Canada at War", and I recommend it to hon. members and anyone else for perusal. It seems to me that anyone who can read this book and not be proud of being a Canadian is absolutely hopeless. From our 733,000 occupied farms we have produced grain crops to the value of $730 millions. Our live stock production, in spite of the reduction of man-power on the farms, has amounted to $500 millions. The gross value of our agricultural production is $2,250 millions. We exported to the United Kingdom 665 million pounds of bacon and 80 million dozen eggs. Canada also leads in world production of nickel, asbestos, flax and radium; is second in the production of gold, aluminum and mercury; third in the production of copper, zinc, lead, silver and arsenic; fourth in the production of magnesium. Surely the power we possess is enough to warrant recognition as leader among the smaller nations of the world. We have to-day available in Canada the equivalent of over 10 million horse-power developed for electrical purposes which, when it is distributed, will probably give Canada the highest living standards of any nation on earth. Since the outbreak of the war our aircraft industry has produced 15,000 planes; our output of ammunition has run into millions of rounds; and in spite of the fact that Canada has enlisted a million men to fight the cause of liberty, only thirty per cent of Canada's production is necessary to equip our army, which is considered to be the best equipped in the field. We have been able to spare seventy per cent of our industrial production to help our friends and allies. I would also draw attention to the fact that Canada has 56,000 miles of railroads, and 560,000 miles of highways—indications of the virility and ambition of the Canadian people. Yet there are people who, when you speak of the exploits of our people, seem to be infuriated; all they can do is to bring up some sordid political argument. At a time like this there is the greatest opportunity of making mistakes, but the fact that we have accomplished so much with so few mistakes is, I think, a tribute to the administration which has had the responsibility of organizing the industrial production of the man-power of this country. It may be said that you never see clubs under a sour apple tree.

While I am not in a position to dissect the intricacies of the voting power of the security council and Canada's relation thereto, I still believe that we have merited a place of importance, and how it is to be attained I am willing to leave to my leader who will head our delegation.

One matter to which I wish to direct attention is a remark made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) that the various parties should have the right to select their own delegates. It does not seem to me that that would be good business. Some might do it with wisdom; others probably would not make so good a choice. The Prime Minister must take the responsibility of the selection; and if I were in his place, after listening to some of the speeches, if I had been undecided as to who should accompany me to that conference, at least I would be able to draw a blue pencil through the names of some whom, from the attitudes they have taken, it would not be desirable to take. If there is one thing in which our Prime Minister has been successful, and by which he has been able to do so much for the people of Canada, it is his ability to select men for their virtues, for their merit and ability. I have no reason to believe other than that he will do the same again. But the leader of the opposition demanded the right of selection, and I should like to draw attention to what might happen if all parties had demanded the same thing. We have a communist party in this country, and if it had been left to them to make their selection it is likely that they would choose Tim Buck, as leader of their party. Well, in many respects Mr. Buck is more entitled to represent Canada than others who have been suggested, for at least he has tried to get into the House of Commons.

Mr. GRAYDON: And he is one of your allies in Ontario.

Mr. WOOD: At least he is a courageous one.

Mr. GRAYDON: You can't go back on Harry Nixon, you know.

Mr. WOOD: I say at least he has had the courage to attempt to get into parliament.

An hon. MEMBER: And you have had the courage to take in the communists.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): You must be afraid of our leader, or you would not talk against him.

Mr. GRAYDON: You are in a tight corner.

Mr. WOOD: I could not hear exactly what the hon. member back there said, but let us analyse the position of this one-time great national party.

Mr. BOUCHER: Analyse Tim Buck, your ally.

Mr. WOOD: I have been in this house for nine years and in that time I have had an excellent leader of whom I am quite proud, and I have looked across at the opposition and in nine years have seen them with six different leaders in the Conservative party.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): They have three now.

Mr. WOOD: They have had six leaders in nine years.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is a usurper in the Prime Minister's seat now.

Mr. WOOD: That would average a year and a half to each of those leaders, and if one of the leaders of that party had a seat on this non-permanent council, having a term of two years, then the average leader of the opposition of the Conservative Progressive party would not last long enough to fill out his two-year term on the security council.

Mr. GRAYDON: We did not change as quickly as you did in Ontario.

Mr. WOOD: They have changed their name three times.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Did they ever have one?

Mr. WOOD: And they have also changed their policy.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Did they ever have one?

Mr. WOOD: And now the only argument they have to offer to the people is that Canada's magnificent effort does not mean a thing, that we must have compulsion, that we must send the bloom of our youth to die for their country though they are not a bit concerned about those who live for their country. I say that because I happen to have in my hand a banner that was placed over the picture of my opponent in the 1940 election indicating that their policy then was very much different from what it is to-day. They said: "There will be no conscription. Vote National Government. R. J. Manion."

Mr. GRAYDON: You had the same then and you have changed.

Mr. WOOD: I have not changed, if you want to know, because as far as I was concerned it was not mentioned in my campaign. I have had sufficient experience in public life, having been in some form of public life since the age of twenty-three, to have come to the conclusion that it is better to be cautious and not to prophesy too far into the future. It is wise to take a step at a time and do those things which circumstances and necessity justify at the moment and not to stick your neck out making too many rash promises. If I ever have the good fortune to be reelected to this house it will not be because I outpromise the Progressive Conservatives and the C.C.F. I am prepared to reason things out with reasonable people and trust to their reason, and I hope, if I come back, that I shall be able to offer something better than rash promises, so that it will not be said that I betrayed the people's confidence at any time.

That is my philosophy in public life and it has always been my philosophy. I believe that the principle of good business is the best politics and I intend to follow that in the future as I have done in the past. I commend that motto to this new so-called Progressive Conservative party, and I suggest that instead of changing their name and leader it would be wise for them to change their policy somewhat not only in regard to conscription and protection but in regard to the many other approaches to a proper philosophy. I believe that would be better for them and it would be for the benefit of the country as a whole.

So far as compulsory service is concerned, the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) to-day said that if Canada is to be a force behind the security council it is necessary that she should have compulsion for the purpose. Well, if you are going to wreck the security council the finest way of doing so is for the council to endeavour to meddle with the domestic affairs of its members. Would the hon. member for Lake Centre say that Australia should have conscription before she should be on the security council? Would he say that General Smuts of South Africa should institute compulsory service before being able to make a contribution to society? Would he say to Mr. Churchill, "You have a little place in Northern Ireland, Ulster, where you should have conscription." Would he debar the United Kingdom because there is no conscription there? It is ridiculous.

If the security council tries to interfere with the domestic relations of its members the result will be most unfortunate, and I think that is where the argument of the member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) also breaks down. If they interfere with the domestic policies of the nations we are heading for disaster and the responsibility would have to be borne by those who advocate such interference. If I can make any contribution to the welfare of the security council I shall be delighted.

I appreciated very much the remarks of our spiritual adviser, the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) the other day. It is true it was not a gilded speech, but it contained something that was worth while, because there are the finer and better things of life and they should be recognized. Society stands on a tripod, a strong triangle. It is built upon body, soul and mind. Material things contribute to the satisfaction of the body, the spiritual to the soul, and education to the mind. If this council does not give recognition to all these things, then in my opinion it will fail.

Two thousand years ago there was a Man who had a philosophy of life that probably made the greatest contribution to the happiness of humanity, greater than has ever been made by any one else. I speak of the philosophy of the Christian faith, the religion of Jesus Christ. We have had other philosophies, the Marxian philosophy for instance, and if you analyse it you will find that it is purely materialistic, for it contributes only to material things. Similarly if you analyse socialism you will find that it is nothing but the material. Marx found that religion was an obstacle to the working out of his ideals. He preached the necessity of supplying the physical needs of humanity but he had no recognition for the spiritual. I feel, therefore, that if we are to have a better world in which to live in the future we must have regard to spiritual values, for that is the power that will keep the machinery of life going.

The hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) made a good suggestion in regard to education, but again I cannot see how the security council can interfere with the domestic relations of its members. I suggest that it would be wise for the council to keep records in the form of a Hansard which might be available to those who might wish to increase their knowledge of international affairs and familiarize themselves with the problems of others as well as their own, for I have come to the conclusion that if greater demands continue to be made on governments it will be necessary to establish in different educational centres a system of statecraft for the education of men and women in the duties of the state. Because of the complexities of government, availability of records of an international institution such as I have described would be a great source of knowledge.

[Mr. Wood.]

In closing may I be personal. The reason why I advance this particular theme is that when I was born it was supposed to be the horse and buggy days. Yes, the rag carpet adorned the living room floor and we had three square meals a day, but thanks were given to the Almighty for that. The day's work was always preceded by the reading of a passage of scripture from the Divine Word, and it was followed by a supplication to the Almighty for direction throughout the day. One thing has always impressed me, namely, that that supplication was always prefaced—and I commend this philosophy to our friends of the C.C.F.—by giving thanks for what we already had. We were not always asking for more. Because of that background, Mr. Speaker, I was prompted to suggest the contribution that might be made to humanity in this world conference. I do not believe there is any other place where it can be expressed quite as well. I only hope and trust that we shall have something that will give us greater results than did the league of nations. I am one of those who have always tried to defend the league of nations. While the league of nations failed, the league of nations was not a failure because it did contribute. It showed there was an honest effort by a certain element of society to find some solution and to see that young men and women would not be plunged into a blood bath periodically. We have to make it a success this time.

I have always had a great respect for the man who sponsored the league of nations, President Wilson. He was one of those men who died before he had an opportunity to see the results of his work. He happened to be one of those because there are too many people in the United States who live in Missouri. They had to be shown. Circumstances and events have shown that they made an error when they rejected the president. I can remember reading a newspaper report of a great mob going to his house. At that time his health was impaired. He stood on the verandah and said: "Some day you will realize that I was right." I believe that to-day President Wilson is living in the minds and hearts of many people throughout this world. The fact that he had the courage of his convictions has impressed them immensely. He was the man who sponsored the league of nations only to come back home and see, unfortunately because of political treachery, his plans defeated in the senate. The result was that the nation which was responsible for the idea of the league, probably more so than anyone else in the world, was responsible for it not being a success. Let that be as it may. They are a democratic country; they are a peace-loving country; they like liberty. They did not want to become embroiled in Europe. But we cannot allow that to happen again. The errors and mistakes made at that time brought us to disaster and we do not want to see it happen again.

Mr. G. RUSSELL BOUCHER (Carleton): The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Wood) who has just taken his seat, in explaining the failure of the late President Wilson in the peace conference of the last great war, omitted to mention the greatest cause of that failure, which was that he had not taken to the peace conference a sufficiently representative number of the other lines of political thought or the opposition in the United States. Not having done so, he did not properly portray in a unified way the spirit of his country, and because of that he did not get the cooperation from his countrymen when he returned. I hope the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) will keep that in mind when he picks the delegation to accompany him to San Francisco on this occasion.

So far as the part the hon. members of this house and the people of Canada are going to play in this conference at San Francisco is concerned, I think it has been apparent that every hon. member and every true Canadian is heartily in accord with the aims and objects of the conference. I also believe that to a very great extent they are in accord with the major portion of the proposals set out. We have been honoured with an invitation to this conference. We have not had the background of having had representation at the Dumbarton Oaks or Bretton Woods conferences, but we should be very sincere in any comments we make in this house. We should first consider the fundamental questions that arise in setting up any organization that will maintain the peace and prosperity of the world in post-war days.

In my humble opinion there are three outstanding problems that we in this parliament should solve before our representatives go to this conference. I believe that the first thing we should decide is whether or not we are prepared to make commitments to obtain international peace in advance of any international discord by acquiring and coordinating in advance the necessary policing and striking forces to beat down and overcome aggression. I think we should consider very carefully the necessity of our cooperating by friendly and good neighbourly policies in economic, social and humanitarian problems, which are the fundamental causes of war or peace and prosperity. I think we should decide what particular place our own country shall play in this post-war organization.

Whatever international organization is set up must have a definite policy to keep the economic, social and humanitarian problems of all the nations of the world in such a state of liberty, equality and balance as will not cause discord. To do that I think the second main proposition is the inevitable result. The organization must be able not only to police the nations that may show inclinations to stray, but they must have power behind them in the form of armed strength, an army, navy and air force at all times so that they can enforce their will and beat down the aggressor should he raise his foul head. I do not believe it is sufficient to stand by and feel that any number of nations or accumulation of nations, because a high ideal is set for them, will live up to that ideal. So long as human beings live in this world errors will be made; different viewpoints will arise. It is only by curbing and controlling these factors that a recurrence of war can be avoided.

I believe we in Canada, like the peoples in many other nations of the world, felt before the war that we could sit back in our own country, mind our own business in our own way, and wait until trouble came right to our door. Bad mistakes were made along those lines prior to the war. The result is that, much as we of the democratic nations resent the necessity for having international armies or, if you like, power blocs, we must face the fact that an order is good only if it can be enforced. A law that cannot be enforced is seldom obeyed, and if it is not enforceable to a high per cent of its possible efficiency it should never be a law at all.

Any international organization composed of any group of nations must have within it the power to enforce equitable and just decisions that it may make. In my view it should not have only that power to requisition from the world at large, by individual or collateral agreement, after an occasion has developed, such strength as it might feel required to use.

In this respect the Canadian parliament has to-day a fundamental question, one of pure principle, to decide. According to the suggestions from Dumbarton Oaks we are not supposed to have a permanent seat on the security council, such seats being left to Russia, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, China, the United States and, later, France. I draw the attention of the house first to the fact that one of the seats is to be held by the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. It is not representative of the British commonwealth of nations or the British empire.

The result is that on this security council, consisting of five great nations, a great deal of power is concentrated. The other nations of the world must place implicit confidence in the wisdom, fairness and equity of those five powers. Canada, which contributed so much in the last war, when she won her nationhood, and has done such a splendid job in this war, where she has established her nationhood, and which for the past twenty-five years has taken pride in the justification she has for calling herself a nation, must remain with the other nations.

According to that set-up our position in the international organization is to be exactly like that of any other small nation. Our opportunity of holding even a non-permanent seat shall be equal to that of the smallest of the other small nations, with the result that according to those proposals we must take a place similar and equal to that of about 150 or 200 other nations.

In his speech when opening the debate the Prime Minister suggested an intermediate class in which Canada would be placed. In his speech he suggested—and in this I believe he was right—that Canada merited a better position than other small nations. At one time he said we should be a leader of the small nations, but for some reason or another at a later time he developed that thought to where we are to be one among an intermediate set of nations.

The point I would establish to-night is that as a nation within the British commonwealth, Canada has risen to the top, and that she will emerge from this war as the greatest of the nations within the commonwealth, with the exception of course of the United Kingdom itself. In the last twenty or twenty-five years we have not heard any objection within Canada respecting one nation within the commonwealth infringing upon our liberties. When it came to Dunkirk the British commonwealth of nations, the empire faced the task with a solid moral front. Within the whole of the commonwealth was the unanimous desire that the British isles, standing as they do as the spearhead of the British commonwealth and empire, should survive the present war. The will was there. But how close we came to losing the solidarity of the empire and the commonwealth of nations by virtue of not having the material to accompany the spirit.

Had Dunkirk not been the God-given blessing, and the miracle it turned out to be, I think the whole organization of the British commonwealth of nations would have fallen apart, or very nearly so. I hate to think what other nations would have then felt in respect of their chance of surviving a German invasion. What chance would civilization, as we in Canada understand it, have had to survive the onrush of the Germans, the Italians and the Japanese hordes?

I give this to the house as an illustration to show that in any organization that may be set up to handle any matter for the public weal or welfare there must be both a spirit to cooperate and the material with which to cooperate—not just the right at a future date to secure that material.

I do not know just where we in Canada, or where in fact the British commonwealth fits into the picture in the minds of those who drafted the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. I am very anxious to know where it is going to fit into this world organization to maintain and establish peace. I see no part for that organization which through the years has been built up, which has withstood the trials and tempests of time. I see no place where it will fit into this world conference. Nor do I see where the pan-American union fits in.

I think it is only human nature to associate in small groups before cooperating in large groups. To my mind that which works to the advantage of the individual works also to that of the nation. We should look with great care upon the future. Further, we should judge with care those things in the past which have survived and withstood the test of time. I believe there are none within this dominion to-day who, with any justification, can complain about the liberties they have lost or the liberties they have not obtained by virtue of their adherence to that cooperative enterprise of freedom-loving nations known as the British commonwealth.

When we set up a world organization to maintain peace we must have intermediate organizations to deal with economic, social, humanitarian and militaristic problems of the world. When we realize Canada's proposed position as one of the small nations, in the light of our pride in the resources, munitions, supplies and men we have contributed to this war, we feel that she is entitled, not only to more benefits but to many more obligations in connection with this new organization to establish and maintain peace.

In order to partake in any cooperative undertaking one must look forward to the benefits being commensurate with the obligations. I think the folly of pre-war thinking over the democratic world was a desire for benefits and an abhorrence or abstinence from any commitments as to obligations. I do not think we can expect any recompense by way of benefits that does not carry with it obligations.

Let us think of our position in this world organization. Any one nation, hundreds of them as it may be, may be elected to the non-permanent seats on the security council for two years, and then not be reelected immediately thereafter. This dominion of ours, of which we are so proud, may not be able to get a seat on the security council, which is made up of eleven members, for many years, or once having got a seat and occupying it for one term, will be left out of it for many years to come. These non-permanent seats must be passed around.

I think Canada is capable of a greater contribution to world peace and in international affairs than has been set out. As the hon. member for Brant has just said, we have relied, we can rely and we will rely on our very good neighbour to the south. With all of that I agree, but I say we can rely, we have relied and we should still rely upon our good neighbours within the commonwealth. We want to make sure that the collateral organizations in which Canada may take part do not break down the things that have been good in the past. We need more, not less, participation in British commonwealth affairs.

According to the Dumbarton Oaks proposals Canada shall be apart altogether from the representation of the United Kingdom and Northern Ireland on the security council, Canada shall be apart from the representation of France, of China, of the United States and of Russia. She is to be totally out of the picture. I should like to know, and I think the Prime Minister might very well explain this to us, what moves have been made to bring the British commonwealth of nations into the security council and what objections have been raised to that move and by whom. I believe that a world organization should keep the commonwealth of nations in line with the greatest nations of the world through the cooperative policy that does prevail within the British commonwealth and within the empire. This would be to the betterment of the world organization and very much to the betterment of Canada herself.

We have emerged from this war with a reputation as a fighting and producing force, and our obligation is to carry forward as a moralizing and stabilizing force on the comity of nations, the council of man, if you like to call it that. For twenty-five years we have sat down, having cut our national teeth in the last war, and have not partaken of the national obligations or the international spirit that befits the progress we have made. If there has been one thing more than any other that has caused difficulty within Canada during the present war it has been the lack of an international outlook. That lack of an international outlook is entirely and directly the result of a lack of international outlook on the part of our government. We are not going to expand that international outlook by sitting quietly to one side.

The second question is an economic one. Many collateral organizations will be found to deal with these matters. These may not be as important as the military questions, but there is one thing that puzzles me more than anything else. I refer to the Prime Minister's statement which was discussed by each of the two speakers who preceded me to-night. I am sure that this is worrying every member in this house. What contribution by way of commitment is Canada going to make at the San Francisco conference as an offer or gesture of her willingness to accept obligations in the way of providing armed strength, if you like, to stop future wars?

As the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) has said, no policing can be done if you must first raise your police force, train them and get them to the place where the crime has been committed. The criminal will have escaped long before. An international army will have to be maintained. An international air force will have to be kept immediately available to the international organization. Munitions will be needed for many years to come. I do not think we are going to emerge from this war with such complete disillusionment that we will believe that war will never happen again, or that every one will be so fed up with war that they will never fight again.

Even in peace time we shall have to have a police force to police the nations of the world, to control economic, social and humanitarian conditions. Then there must be a force to back up the policeman on his beat. That being the case, Canada with her national status must look carefully at how that international police force is going to be organized and set up. I think it is just as important for us to see that we have representation on that force as it is for us to see that other nations have not too strong a representation.

I do not think that world confidence can be established if the Prime Minister of Canada goes to the San Francisco conference and says: We are willing to bind ourselves to contribute to an international police force only on these conditions: (1) If we can say whom we shall send; (2) if we can say when we shall send them; and (3) when we have decided to send them and whom to send, if we can say where we shall send them—long after they have been requisitioned. I agree with the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) that such a policy would be not only a failure but such evidence of lack of good faith on the part of Canada that we should never suggest it. I do not think it would do credit to us as a nation if we went to the conference and said: We trust you people but we will not trust you when the occasion arises for our assistance. That we shall decide for ourselves on an "if, as and when" basis; for that is really what it amounts to, and I think we should dwell upon that aspect much more than has been done so far. Surely we have been taught the folly of isolationism by this time.

I well remember sitting in the gallery of this house one evening in March, 1939, before I was elected to this chamber, and I heard the Prime Minister of the day, as well as the leader of the opposition and the leader of the C.C.F. party at that time and many other members voicing this sentiment—not exactly in these words but to this effect: Any nation, Great Britain, or the British commonwealth of nations can go to war and yet Canada can remain neutral. When the election of 1940 was fought, the general cry of all parties was that conscription would not be resorted to. That was a concrete illustration of our lack of appreciation of international involvements that existed that day. Surely now we have learned our lesson, and I hope that when our delegates go to San Francisco they will act in a way that will show that Canada realizes that it must accept international obligations and accept them now, and that Canada has reached a stage in her development where she can take her just and rightful place of responsibility with the other nations. But she is not taking her rightful place in my opinion if she says to the conference: We will let the rest of you contribute to this international army. All you other countries can commit yourselves in advance, but we wish to make a separate and distinct agreement with the security council irrespective of what the other nations may commit themselves to. We must realize that if we enter into a peace organization we must do so in a spirit of confidence and good faith and be prepared even to give a lead and tell the other countries what we are prepared to do to make peace secure and urge other countries to do likewise.

[Mr. Boucher.]

Mr. MAURICE LALONDE (Labelle) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, after exerting a gigantic effort to attain victory, the united nations are bringing up the subject of peace. There are unmistakable signs of peace in the near future. It is very gratifying and we should thank the Divine Providence for having spared Canada the horrors of wars, and the unspeakable havoc wrought by battles and bombings. Our people have gone through hours of anguish which cannot be compared to the tortures endured by our brave soldiers who have made the supreme sacrifice or by the civilian populations decimated by bullets, shells and starvation. Praise be to God!

The united nations are bringing up the subject of peace and they are preparing to meet in San Francisco in order to discuss the plans for the erection of this house of peace which it is desired to build on more solid and less vulnerable foundations than the league of nations which in Woodrow Wilson's fondest dreams was to guarantee world security after the slaughter of 1917. Alas, the league of nations did not come up to the expectations of its sponsors; it collapsed because it had been built on the moving sands of unconcealed human ambition and on the lack of sanctions which were so necessary.

Twenty-seven years later, mankind starts all over again to build another league of nations on the experience gained during two wars, firmly resolved to benefit from the tragic lessons of the past.

The leader of the present government, the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has asked the Canadian parliament for authority to head the delegation which will attend this united nations conference in order to make the voice of Canada heard and to present our just and legitimate claims. Canada's war effort has been magnificent; she has contributed the lives of her sons and her money, and she has placed at the disposal of the allied nations her industrial productive capacity.

Canada's war effort may be compared with that of any of the other allied nations and it entitles us to the fruit of victory. It equally gives us the right to take part in the peace conferences and this is the prerogative that the right hon. the Prime Minister of Canada wishes to exercise with the consent of the Canadian parliament. We had good reasons to expect that the resolution before the house would meet with the unanimous approval of the hon. members. Could any one of us rightly oppose any serious attempt to form a peace organization? Could any hon. member not wish from the bottom of his soul the cessation of this mass slaughter and not welcome on the blood-soaked battlefields of the universe the appearance of the dove of peace? Could any one reject any honest suggestion of seeking in the recesses of the human brain the ray of light that might guide our suffering humanity to a better future? And finally, could any one, knowing where his duties and obligations lay, refuse his support to the present attempt of the united nations toward the restoration of the world.

Alas, a few independent members of this house have rendered such a unanimity impossible. Those very people who so vehemently denounce war, are now opposed to the establishment of a peace organization. After their diatribes against our participation in the conflict, they now stand strong on grounds of political interest in the path of the plenipotentiaries and wish to deprive their country of the right to attend discussions on the means to put an end to war. Mr. Speaker, could you think of a more illogical stand, or a more surprising attitude? It had never yet occurred to me that some people could place politics on a higher plane than the paramount interests of the human race and the Canadian nation. We have an example of this kind in this house. Our hon. colleagues will bear the tremendous responsibility of their acts before their fellow-citizens and their own children.

Four reasons have been given for opposing the resolution submitted to the house:

First the ending of the life of parliament on April 17 next; second, the failure of the past endeavours of the league of nations; third, the growing prestige of communist Russia; and, fourth, Canada's neutrality.

None of these reasons seem to justify the surprising attitude of the independent nationalist members.

These gentlemen, Mr. Speaker, are surely not experts in constitutional or parliamentary procedure. They have not taken into account the fundamental difference between the government and parliament.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that the life of the House of Commons will expire on April 17, but it is equally true that, in accordance with the constitutional law and precedents set through many years, the government will live on. I refer, Mr. Speaker, to the Canadian constitution, sections 50 and 12, where we find the essential and fundamental definitions of what constitutes a parliament and a government as well as a guidance to judge the present situation.

The hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. d'Anjou), the hon. member for Laval-Two-Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) and the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix) have said that our delegates at San Francisco will have no authority to act, as parliament will be extinct, having come to its natural end on April 17. Incidentally the hon. members forget that the delegates to the peace conference will not necessarily be members of the House of Commons for, if I am well-informed, it is possible that some American delegates will be chosen outside of Congress and the House of Representatives.

The present government, as I was saying, will live on after April 17, 1945, and it will have all the necessary authority to act on behalf of the Canadian people. I shall cite as an authority a jurist whose ability no one can question, Mr. Todd.

(Text): I take this quotation from Todd's "Parliamentary Government in England", volume II, page 513:

For, notwithstanding their resignations, the outgoing ministers are bound to conduct the ordinary business of parliament and of the country so long as they retain the seals of office. They continue, moreover, in full possession of their official authority and functions, and must meet and incur the full responsibility of all public transactions until their successors have kissed bonds upon their acceptance of office.

(Translation) This opinion was quoted by the Hon. Charles Tupper who, in 1896, entered into a controversy with Lord Aberdeen, the then governor general, who had refused to approve certain appointments.

Our nationalists need not take offence, Mr. Speaker, and invoke the lack of authority of our delegation to the next peace conference, in the face of these examples taken from history. Referring once again to our parliamentary history and going back to the year 1873, I can find many examples that will prove to these constitutional law experts of the independent nationalists party, that the government, the cabinet, have the right to make appointments even in these particular circumstances. Thus, on October 17, 1878, before Sir John Macdonald came into power, the government made 183 appointments, among which were a judge of the supreme court, a judge of the superior court of the province of Quebec and a county judge for Kent county, Ontario, the Hon. Mr. Bell. Then, in 1896, before the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier took office, the government of the day did not hesitate to make 88 appointments.

Mr. Speaker, those facts indicate without the shadow of a doubt that after April 17, 1945, our government will still be in full possession of its juridical powers and will be invested with the necessary authority to represent the Canadian people at the San Francisco conference, and I believe they will be happy to be represented at that conference by the delegates of the present government rather than by the phantom leader of the Tory party or by the leader of the socialist party. It is also claimed that our delegates will have no authority to commit Canada for the future. Such an argument has no weight, as evidenced by the wording of the resolution. Paragraph 5 of the resolution is self-explanatory:

That the charter establishing the international organization should, before ratification, be submitted to parliament for approval.

The wisdom of that paragraph of the resolution should dispel the fears of our honourable opponents.

Therefore, our delegates will not have the power to bind Canada in any way, because the House of Commons and the representatives of the Canadian people will be called upon to approve or reject the new charter. Could any one ask for a greater or safer guarantee that the democratic interests of the Canadian people will be upheld?

The second reason mentioned by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay for opposing the sending of delegates is the failure of former conferences of that kind. I do not know whether the hon. member has had oracular revelations or has resorted to astrology. I really wonder how he can claim and predict that the San Francisco conference will be a failure. Such an inference is not logical. The fact that the Versailles treaty did not give to the world the peace it desired, or that former treaties have been violated is no reason why we should now refuse to participate in another peace effort. Do those hon. members wish to see a continuation of the dreadful war and its frightful slaughter?

If we were to adopt the views of those arm-chair logicians we might as well say that, since the Versailles treaty was not respected, it would be useless to sign a peace treaty with Germany after the cessation of hostilities. We might as well say that, inasmuch as war was declared, every thought of reconciliation should be banished.

Such conclusions are distasteful to me, Mr. Speaker. I claim that failure is the best test for reconciliation and forgiveness. Past experience must be the most abundant source of endless hopes of redress. A fallen man is never done for, provided he keeps the irresistible will to win. What a poor and disheartening example our pessimistic politico-independents are giving to their country and their fellow-citizens and also to the united nations!

[Mr. Lalonde.]

The fact that the Versailles treaty was a failure, that the League of Nations was a complete disappointment, does not mean that we should give up every hope of putting fruitful energies once again to work for the preparation of a better and triumphant world. If the men of 1919, through their greed, failed to prepare the peace at Versailles, let us not deny to the builders of 1945 our loyal cooperation in the organization of a new peace based on the tragical lessons of the last five years. To refuse such cooperation would, in my opinion, mean a betrayal of mankind's interests.

Let those who advocate such a policy assume the responsibility for their action before the young Canadians who made the supreme sacrifice, before those who have suffered and who hope that their martyrdom will inspire to those who have not yet wept other humanitarian motives than paltry political advantages.

The growing prestige of communist Russia is the third reason put forward by those objectors. I agree that communism is to be feared, that it must be checked. But I cannot agree that Canada should be refused permission to send delegates to the San Francisco conference where the means to prevent the spread of subversive doctrines and to eradicate the germs of war will be discussed.

The San Francisco conference which will be attended by all the united nations, including Russia, will afford an opportunity to make plans to prevent the spread of totalitarian communist or fascist doctrines. In a speech in the British House of Commons, Mr. Churchill stated that Russia was undergoing a spiritual transition and evolution. Communism is not dead—and I do not wish to defend it—but let us remember that Russia, regardless of the nature and form of her political tenets, has paid an enormous price for having turned to the totalitarian doctrines advocated by Karl Marx. And the democracies find themselves in the paradoxical situation of having had as an ally in their struggle against nazism the forces of communist Russia. Evidently, the San Francisco conference will not do away with war or the perverse instincts of man. If it only were successful in ensuring peace for a century, I would consider it to have rendered a great service to humanity.

The hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion)—I am sorry that he is not in the house to-night—expressed the hope that the Pope might be present at the conference. I am of a mind with him, although I know that our hope will remain a delusion. But I fail to follow my hon. friend in his argument: he opposes the holding of the conference, but he proposes that the Pope be invited to attend it. Does he wish the Holy Father to attend a meeting which, in the opinion of the hon. member for Rimouski is bound to be a failure? Indeed, our independent friends are very ill-advised in opposing the San Francisco conference. In their devotion to the Holy See, they seem to forget that His Holiness the Pope himself has expressed the hope that such a conference might be held.

Here is what His Holiness Pope Pius XII said on the Vatican radio on the occasion of the Christmas festivities:

It is indispensable that, in the world organization, some machinery for maintaining peace be established, invested with supreme authority granted by general consent and having among its principal duties that of stopping at its source all menace of aggression. Certain nations and governments who are charged with being responsible for the war will have to bear the hardships of the security measures, but they should have the assurance that by loyally and efficiently cooperating in reconstruction they will again be admitted to the councils of the great commonwealth of all nations. Nations should realize that the only path leading them away from chaos is solidarity.

Well, Mr. Speaker, we must choose between the theologians of the group of independent members, led by the pontiff for Charlevoix-Saguenay and the supreme authority of the Vatican! Indeed, the choice would be a difficult one to make, were I not well informed on the high science and intuitive knowledge of my hon. friend for Rimouski in the field of sociology and social doctrines of the church. However, I feel more secure in the company of Pius XII than at the side of the hon. member for Rimouski who, thanks to his gracious and catty liteness has, in the course of a few months, succeeded in changing his allegiance many times, without breaking his neck.

Now for the last argument: Canada should never have been drawn into the war. This is harping on an old complaint. Bothered by their conscience, they base their present views on questions which have been settled by parliament and the whole country as well. To take part in the peace conference would be, in a way, a tacit acceptance of the principle of Canada's participation in foreign wars.

Our independent members are very wise, extremely wise, in fact. They claim to be the political heirs of Mr. Henri Bourassa. I will have the pleasure of proving that they are independent in name only. To-night I shall be content with proving to them that their political leader whom they threaten to repudiate, while following him at a distance, has never advocated the isolationist doctrine which they themselves propound. Indeed, we find the following on page 253 of a book published in 1915 by Mr. Bourassa himself, a study which is entitled: "What do we owe to England?"

Was Canada obliged to take part in the European war? As a British dominion, she had no such obligation. To fulfil a duty, a moral or legal obligation resulting from her colonial status, no. If Canada had considered the situation from this sole angle—

Of course, Mr. Speaker, this has to do with the world war of 1914-1918.

—she would have had the right even the duty to refrain from taking any active part in the war.

But, as a nation, as a human community, could Canada remain aloof from the European conflict? I do not think so. Bound to England and to France by numerous ethnical, social, intellectual and economic ties, Canada is vitally interested in the preservation of England and France, in the maintenance of their prestige, of their power, of their world influence.

A year earlier, Mr. Bourassa wrote the following in his newspaper Le Devoir, of September 2, 1914:

This is no time for polemic discussions, for bitter recriminations, for bone-picking and even less for party intrigues.

And on September 8 of the same year he added:

Canada, as an Anglo-French nation that a thousand social, intellectual, economic and ethnical ties bind to England and to France, has a vital interest in the survival of France and England, of their prestige, their power and their world influence. It is therefore a national duty for Canada to contribute, to the best of her ability and through means that are hers alone, to the triumph and particularly to the endurance of the concerted efforts of France and England.

And on September 18, 1914, Mr. Bourassa wrote again in his newspaper:

I have not written and I shall not write a single line, a single word to condemn the sending of troops to Europe.

There are circumstances, and this seems to be one of them, when logic and even the most legitimate fears must give way to the exigencies of the hour.

We see then that, according to the nationalist doctrine of Mr. Bourassa, the intervention of Canada in a world war should not proceed from colonial ties, from a moral obligation arising from a state of subjection, but from a free will, from a complete liberty to act and to decide as do all countries that are the real masters of their destiny. I shall never favour colonial intervention but shall favour any intervention resulting from the obligations and duties inherent to sovereignty.

Have my hon. friends opposite forgotten that the Catholic bishops of Canada have stated that the present conflict is a just war?

Mr. Speaker, in the face of this irrefutable testimony, I wonder why they deny their country the right to partake in the peace conference, as an autonomous nation in order to expose our just claims. I ask them once again: Would they want the leader of the Progressive Conservative party, the leader of the Socialist party or the leader of the Bloc Populaire to represent Canada at the peace conference?

(Text) In conclusion, I may say it is unfortunate that the dissenting voices heard in this house should come partly from the province of Quebec. I would rather believe that these expressions of opinion are the result of a mediate political interest, rather than of a sincere desire that Canada should not participate in movements of world reestablishment. This negative attitude of certain members must not be taken by our compatriots of the other provinces as expressing the opinion of the greater number of the old French province of the dominion. I am convinced that the sound and wholesome opinion of my province will repudiate the efforts of these isolationists who wish that Quebec should become a sort of reserve, shut out from all the great constitutional and economic evolutions of our time.

Under the fallacious pretext that they wish to save the race, these gentlemen of the Quebec nationalistic school are leading our ethnic group toward the worst national decadence. After all, we are at least just as patriotic as they are. We contest their right of pretending that they have the monopoly on the generous initiatives of national salvation. But we realize that the future of our people within the Canadian confederation is on a par with the same comprehension of our duties and obligations as a constituent part of a great nation. Our shortsighted nationalists are a component part of the same noisy group that, all over Canada, in cooperation with the minority clique of imperialistic jingoes are threatening the future of Canada itself, and collective progress. Both these groups of extremists who feed at the same sources of integral Toryism are, in my opinion, the obstacles to a broad mutual understanding.

It is high time that our nationalistic independents should realize the true situation of our race in Canada. It is high time that they should turn their faces toward the people to tell them something else besides calling them the "eternally persecuted." It is high time for our compatriots to admit the providential fact of our situation on this land of America. We are surrounded by more than 150 million Anglo-Saxons with whom Providence has decreed that we should live, willy-nilly. It will be of no use to moderate independents, such as the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) or to extremists of the Chaloult type, to preach a provoking resistance. It will be of no use to revolutionists of the Shields clan to threaten us with their thunderbolts. Harmony will be the offspring of an acceptable compromise, both to the honour of the parties in the case and for their future within confederation. I am not pretending to be the protagonist of a unilateral theory of bonne entente; I deplore the attitude of a certain group of my compatriots who are bent on giving us the reputation, in the eyes of the world, of being retrogressive people, incapable of accepting its obligations toward humanity and toward Canada.

[Mr. Lalonde.]

We are part of confederation so that we may deserve and enjoy the respect of others; we shall remain therein if our just and legitimate demands are recognized. We are not the sort of people who give up easily. We are neither cowards nor traitors. Canadian history is too eloquent on this point for me to have to demonstrate more at length. But that some should wish—either through political opportunism, or with the intention of exercising political revenge—that Canada should remain out of the great peace conferences, I object with all my strength.

Having grown and been purified through sacrifice, our dear country is entitled to be represented at the peace table, and she will be so represented by delegates who will be conscious of her duties and obligations. Headed by the great builder of Canadian autonomy, the right hon. the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) I am convinced that the voice of Canada will be heard and will ring with authority. I will therefore vote in favour of the resolution proposed in this house.

Mr. RENE JUTRAS (Provencher): I do not propose to review or suggest any of the technicalities or make any suggestions as to the machinery to be set up to achieve the great task that the united nations will be called upon to achieve once the bell of victory has rung throughout the world. I respectfully leave that task to those who have made a closer study of it and who have enriched their studies by experience. I shall therefore limit myself to the general principles underlying the whole. To the resolution before the house I give my full support; but when one goes back to the league of nations, which was then the new world organization to prevent war, much of the optimism of the San Francisco conference loses its gloss. Not that I am one of those people who believe that a new world organization to prevent wars is an impractical idealism above the virtues of mankind, but on the contrary I sincerely believe that it is well within the possibility of even this world of ours. But it will not be achieved in a few weeks at San Francisco, and many a lesson has yet to be learned.

The failure of the last world organization, known as the league of nations, to prevent war was in no small measure due to the attitude, or shall I say the frame of mind, of the delegation, and for this reason I hope to be permitted to say to the San Francisco conference that they will have to measure up to a very high standard. It is a great task for great men only. Nothing short of that will suffice. I feel therefore that it is the prayer of the nation that those who are designated will rise to the occasion and that their country will be proud to welcome them on their return.

Of course the attitude of the delegates is inevitably influenced and, more often than not, completely conditioned by the attitude of the people at home, the people they are delegated to represent. With that in mind I wish to impart a few observations I have made during my association with men and women in uniform in this country and abroad. It is with complete sincerity that I say that I enjoyed the life in the service, even sharing the bull-pen in Toronto with 1,200 others was not without its brighter side. As an airman then I was not without learning a lot, which I shall never forget—

Mr. MacNICOL: To what does the hon. member refer when he says that he shared the bull-pen in Toronto?

Mr. JUTRAS: The bull-pen is one of the larger rooms at the exhibition grounds in Toronto, used at the time as a manning depot. I did not mean any reflection upon the city of Toronto, at all.

Mr. MacNICOL: I understand the government had fitted up the exhibition buildings.

Mr. JUTRAS: I am sorry if I left the wrong impression with my hon. friend. The bull-pen as we called it, or the "blue room" or "the sheep pen" or "the hog pen," as they were known in the services, was adequately equipped for the men. But still they were very large rooms and, consequently—well, I will just leave it to your imagination.

Mr. MacNICOL: No reflection on Toronto?

Mr. JUTRAS: No, no reflection on Toronto at all. Later, as an instructor, I was to learn of their problems, the multiplicity and diversity of problems that can arise when a large body of men are thrown into a new world and are asked, without further ado, to make it their world.

I cannot but think of them when I think of this new world that we are about to enter. Then, still later, sharing with them the burdens of battle, I learned of the great difficulties they were up against, the high degree of heroism that was unquestionably asked of them; and I witnessed the unconditional surrender of their self to the cause of humanity and their country—and, mind you, they do not begrudge that surrender. I have not the temerity to speak for them. Their deeds speak highly for them, and they shall soon be heard for themselves.

My impressions are entirely my own, and I offer them as such. Men whose regiment has just been ordered to rush a hill to relieve the previous regiment, which has been wiped out, and who sit on their muddy heels gazing at their watches, have very little to say. The men who sit before the map of Germany, with the big red pins showing the "target for tonight", who listen to the cold and blunt facts respecting the dangers of the mission, and who know the demand that is placed upon their skill, their learning and their endurance; and the men out on the ocean who have just received warning of a lurking U-boat, and who stare into the chilly darkness of the night, straining every sense to be the first to strike—those men say very little.

But these tense moments duly come to pass; and then many a thought enters those minds. And they are not thoughts about political parties jockeying for favourable position, or of diplomatic intrigue or of international organizations, but rather why this is all so necessary, and where it is all leading.

Let no one forget that they will request a severe accounting, should these sacrifices be made in vain. It would be well for all delegates not to leave without a realistic picture of this evolution. Canadian youth, as I see it, is largely non-conformist. Canadians like to live as they please. They do not like regimentation, and they dislike bureaucracy. Personal freedom is what they appreciate most. The army, as a peace-time career, does not interest the majority of them. The stigma of depression has left an impression on the character and outlook of a large number and finds expression in a cynical and often pessimistic outlook.

How can one not compare the world of plenty in the services with that of a penurious past? They are not, you can rest assured, without appreciating the concern of their country for their welfare on the battlefield, and the provision for their welfare upon their return. There is no doubt that the men who have seen their own country from coast to coast for the first time and have travelled through many countries and lived with people of different customs and modes of living, and who have been at close range and often in the midst of the problems of other nations—there is no doubt that those men have gone through a readjustment of their concept of international responsibility.

Many who talked of the cities and relatives they had visited before now talk about the countries and nations they have visited. They have come to know several nations and to appreciate their existence. They are conscious of the fact that not Canada alone, but other nations as well, have internal as well as international problems of their own. Also, one cannot spend a few years of this life in the services without gaining a much keener appreciation of the merits of order and organization. The world of plenty has not made them greedy. On every occasion offered them to help the less materially fortunate they have given with a generous heart, and were genuinely happy to do so.

They have also learned the value of common action and, as well, to place their unqualified confidence in the hands of a competent leader. My stay overseas afforded me an opportunity of watching and studying my own country away from the controversies of a partisan press of conflicting and dashing headlines, away from the emotional strain of the home folks ready to snap at the least provocation or disagreement, away from the regional disputes and parochialism.

I must confess that the strain of the war does tell on the Canadian people. There is in this country an atmosphere of preoccupation and worry. People tend to jump at any controversy and to convert it into a live issue, to get their minds of the now long-drawn-out and tiring issue at hand. It is not the same strain we meet in Europe or in the battle-scarred countries. The people here have not had their conversation interrupted by the tired drone of the doodlebug. They have not experienced the excitement of running to the bomb shelter or have not stood in the night watching for enemy aircraft. The people of this country can only sit and wait and day in and day out tax their imagination to the limit in an effort to appraise the condition of the front-line citizens. There is a strain of endless watching, endless waiting. I have watched it since my return. When the telephone rings a startled household turns with one thought to the member who is so far away, and it is not curiosity but anxiety that brings the mothers to the window to watch on whose door the telegraph messenger will knock and will go on worrying over his tidings. It is a strain peculiar to our country, few will detect it. It is locked up in the hearts of the Canadian people. Those in a position to help would do well to respect it. I feel sorry for those who choose to exploit it, to further their own ends, and I pray that they may see the nobler attitude.

[Mr. Jutras.]

If we are to assume our proper place in the councils of the world—and I feel that we have learned the futility of isolation—we must all come to realize that Canada is more than a conglomeration of constituencies or localities and we must be imbued to a much higher degree with a national will and a national perspective. Our provincial-federal relations and responsibilities are in dire need of readjustment. It is imperative for a better mutual understanding and for the economic welfare of the country. The future standing of the country in an international peace organization is in no small measure conditioned by the successful settlement of those relations.

I have no illusions that Canada is now a world power but, at the same time, a country which has contributed as much as we have to the world conflict is not without throwing a deciding weight in the balance. This fact has been duly recognized by our enemy. It is, however, high time that we should get rid of our chronic inferiority complex. Our hope of a true nationhood stands before us within grasping distance. It is our duty and responsibility to put aside our locality concept, to keep our differences in their proper perspective and make Canada a true and proud nation. Everybody but ourselves regards our war effort as a magnificent one. I was never so proud of the Canadian men and women as when I was overseas, and I am also proud to say that the men and women in the factories, on the farms and in the homes have kept as good a pace as those on the front. It is with all the sincerity of my soul, and the complete satisfaction that they are well deserved, that I utter those words.

The job of winning the war is not yet done. Many a hill has yet to be stormed and many a cross will rise from the ground; many a sortie into the jaws of the enemy will have to be effected and many will be crushed in its snapping. The path ahead is dark and dreary; what it will be when we turn the corner no one can tell, but let us keep our eyes well glued to that dreaded road, prepared for the worst yet confident that it is the right road and that it will eventually lead to this new world so dearly and anxiously sought.

I for one acclaimed the Atlantic charter in 1941, then again in 1942, as the first concrete evidence that a really new world was being born. I procured a handmade copy of the Atlantic charter, and had it framed for my office. Well I remember how the might over right principle was denounced by all, how the principle of the sovereign equality of all peace-loving states was proclaimed, later to be embodied in the principles of Dumbarton Oaks. I need hardly say how I felt after the Crimea conference and the treatment that was meted out to the most tried and most loyal nation, the Polish nation. I believe that Canada as a country not yet engulfed by the intricacies of large power politics should stand up for the rights of smaller nations in the name of peace to come and should appoint itself the guardian of the liberty of worship and speech in the drafting of this new world. I wish to associate myself with all those who have spoken for the defence of Poland. I pray that the association of nations will see to it that justice be done. I am confident that as long as men are inspired by the divine spark we call soul, justice will win out.

(Translation): Mr. Speaker, were I so fortunate as to be able to speak the Polish language, I should make bold to direct a few words to the Poles in their mother tongue, in order to comfort their hearts.

As the Prime Minister once said there are certain fundamental principles in the field both of international and personal relations which are eternal in every respect. We can sum up those principles as old as Christianity itself, by saying that we cannot remain indifferent when a neighbouring nation is overrun by an aggressor, neither can we stand aloof when a neighbouring nation falls a prey to fascism, under any form, or when she is subjected to economic exploitation. In the interdependence of the modern world as we know it to-day, those principles constitute not only an ordinary rule of conduct but also an excellent practical policy.

If I have used my mother tongue in imparting these feelings of hope to the Polish nation and to all people of Polish nationality, it was because I believed that I would thus better express my heartfelt feelings.

(Text): In conclusion, I wish to go back to the empire conference which was drowned out by the thunderous prelude to invasion roaring on the channel coast. What the Prime Minister said then can well be recalled now:

Let us by all means improve where we can but in considering new methods of organization we cannot be too careful to see that to our own peoples the new methods will not appear as an attempt to limit their freedom of decision, or, to peoples outside the commonwealth, as an attempt to establish a separate bloc.

I need not contemplate the danger of a world divided into competitive power blocs.

We in Canada have learned to live as neighbour with our neighbours to the south. We are neighbours without fear of one another, and we share a certain responsibility as well as a vital interest in enlarging the pattern of security and confidence we have worked out together. The benefit of that experience we now owe to the world.

On motion of Mr. Weir the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre) the house adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

Monday, March 26, 1945

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

PERMISSION TO VISIT OVERSEAS FIGHTING FRONT—SEAMEN'S UNION—C. H. MILLARD

Mr. BRUCE:

1. Did the government give permission for a representative of the Seamen's Union to proceed overseas and to visit the fighting front?

2. If so, what was his name?

3. Did the government give permission to C. H. Millard to proceed overseas and to visit the fighting front?

4. In granting these privileges, did the government impose any restrictions as to what these men would be permitted to say upon their return to Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1, 2 and 3. In January, 1945, the Department of External Affairs endorsed passports for the following persons proceeding to the United Kingdom to attend the world trade union conference which opened in London on February 6:

Representing the Canadian Congress of Labour; Mr. C. H. Millard, M.P.P., national director in Canada, United Steelworkers of America; Mr. James E. McGuire, national secretary-treasurer, Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Employees and other Transport Workers; Mr. Pat Conroy, secretary-treasurer, Canadian Congress of Labour; Mr. Nigel Morgan, international board member, District No. 1, International Woodworkers of America; Mr.

Questions

C. S. Jackson, president, District Council No. 5, United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America

Representing the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada: Mr. J. A. Sullivan, secretary, Trades and Labour Congress of Canada; Mr. J. A. Whitebone, vice president, Trades and Labour Congress of Canada.

It is understood that Mr. J. A. Sullivan is a member of the Seamen's Union.

In recognition of the great part played by Canadian labour in the prosecution of the war through the production of arms and munitions, not only for the Canadian forces but for the forces of our allies, arrangements were made for the trade union representatives to visit the Canadian forces in Holland and Belgium at the conclusion of the conference in London.

4. No.

PROVINCE OF QUEBEC—AGREEMENT FOR SURRENDER OF PROVINCIAL TAXATION RIGHTS

Mr. LALONDE:

1. Since September, 1939, have arrangements or agreements been concluded between the government of the province of Quebec and the dominion government, by which the government of the province of Quebec surrendered to the federal government the rights to the taxation of gasoline, incomes and other taxes?

2. If so, may such arrangements or agreements be terminated at the option of either of the contracting parties?

3. Within what time may either of the contracting parties terminate any such agreements?

4. Since September 1, 1944, has the government of the province of Quebec notified the federal government of its intention to terminate any such agreements?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Under the terms of an agreement entered into May 27, 1942, and pursuant to an act respecting an agreement between the dominion and the province for the suspension of certain taxes in wartime, chapter 27, statutes of Quebec, 1942, the province of Quebec agreed to suspend temporarily the levying and collection of taxes upon incomes and upon corporations as defined and enumerated in the said agreement. In consideration of this temporary suspension, the dominion agreed to make an annual payment as set out in the agreement in respect of each fiscal year of the province during the term of the agreement.

The preamble to the agreement states that "the province shall not, by agreeing as hereafter provided to desist from imposing certain taxes during the term of this agreement, be deemed to have surrendered, abandoned or given over to the dominion any of the powers, rights, privileges or authority vested in the province under the provisions of The British North America Act, 1867, or any subsequent act of the parliament of the United Kingdom, or to have otherwise impaired any of such powers, rights, privileges or authority."

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

The province did not suspend nor surrender to the dominion government the right to the taxation of gasoline. However, the dominion government agreed to pay, to the province during the term of the agreement the amount by which the net receipts from the gasoline tax in each fiscal year is less than the receipts from gasoline taxes collected in the twelve months ended June 30, 1941.

2 and 3. Yes, the province has the right to terminate the agreement under section 23(5) which reads as follows: "The province may terminate the agreement on the thirty-first day of March of any year, if notice of intention to do so is given in writing to the Minister of Finance thirty days before such notice."

4. No.

Note:—Copy of agreement tabled in the House of Commons on May 28, 1942, (Sessional Paper No. 114(f)).

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION—
REGINA OFFICE SPACE

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Does the unemployment insurance commission occupy any office space in the city of Regina? If so, what space, and from whom is it rented?

2. What rents are being paid for various quarters occupied as above?

3. Has there been any increase in such rents in the last three years? If so, by what amount or amounts, and at what date or dates?

4. Were any such increases approved by the rentals administration of the wartime prices and trade board? If so, when?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull):

1. (a) Yes.

(b) Premises, whole of ground floor of Merchants Bank Building, Lessor, Bank of Montreal, annual rental, $5,400; Premises, space on second floor of Merchants Bank Building, Lessor, Bank of Montreal, annual rental, $1,800.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Rental for the whole of ground floor was increased from November 1, 1944, from $3,600 to $5,400 per annum.

4. Yes, this increased rental was approved by the rentals administration of the wartime prices and trade board under maximum rental decision No. S1-20-6915 dated September 8, 1944.

VETERANS' INSURANCE—INCOME TAX

Mr. WHITE:

1. With reference to section 3 of the Veterans' Insurance Act, 1944, are the proceeds of a policy subject to succession duty?

2. Are the proceeds of a policy payable as a life annuity, or as an annuity for a certain number of years subject to income tax?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1. Yes, if the estate as a whole is above the succession duty exemptions.

2. Proceeds of a policy payable as a life annuity are taxable. Proceeds of a policy payable as an annuity cannot be answered specifically as the terms of the contract and in particular the number of years certain have a bearing on the question.

GENERAL MCNAUGHTON

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

1. Was General Andrew McNaughton granted pension after retirement from the Canadian army during the present war?

2. If so, what amount annually?

3. What was the basis for granting of this pension?

Mr. ABBOTT:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Answered by No. 1.

WHEAT—PARTICIPATION CERTIFICATES

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

1. What amount per bushel on various grades of wheat delivered by producers of 1943 crop will be paid on participation certificates?

2. When will these payments be made by the Canadian wheat board?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1. Amount cannot be given accurately until all 1943 crop wheat sold.

2. As soon as possible after crop disposed of.

SASKATCHEWAN TREASURY BILLS HELD BY FINANCE DEPARTMENT

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

1. What is the total amount of treasury bills now held by the Department of Finance from the governments of Saskatchewan?

2. In what years, and to what amounts in each year were these bills accepted from the governments of Saskatchewan?

3. What demands for payments of these treasury bills have been made to the Saskatchewan governments since 1930?

4. What payments of these treasury bills have been made by Saskatchewan governments since 1930?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. $96,863,996.40.

2. (a) Treasury bills representing Loans under Relief Acts:—

Fiscal Year	Repayments and Credits
	Total	and Credits	Net Loans
1931-32	$12,034,934 12	$1,100,592 66	$10,934,341 46
1932-33	9,734,337 38	2,155,781 82	7,578,555 56
1933-34	6,960,065 88	1,490,825 76	5,469,240 12
1934-35	11,434,811 47	1,293,797 45	10,141,014 02
1935-36	14,291,043 82	45,565 39	14,245,478 43
1936-37	6,059,461 48	582 48	6,058,879 00
1937-38	11,604,786 48	—	11,604,786 48
1938-39	13,767,910 75	59,063 56	13,708,847 19
1939-40	10,247,749 82	1,057,068 20	9,190,681 62
1940-41	1,700,000 00	62,993 77	1,637,006 23
1941-42	—	171,272 74	171,272 74
1942-43	—	50,986 87	50,986 87
1943-44	—	42,648 83	42,648 83
1944-45	—	85,998 47	85,998 47
	$97,835,101 20 <sup>1</sup>	$7,617,178 00 <sup>2</sup>	$90,217,923 20
Less write-offs in 1937-38 and 1939-40			19,056,137 42
			$71,161,785 78

<sup>1</sup> Includes treasury bills to the amount of $8,547,081.77 in respect of interest accruals on certain loans up to 1939-40 of which $68,948.63 was repaid in cash and $2,537,020.96 included in the write-off. Since 1939-40 interest has been paid on only a few classes of treasury bills which are now outstanding to the total of $6,966,360.30.

<sup>2</sup> Of this total $5,910,249.58 represents credits applied against accountable advances made in respect of the dominions share of relief which in certain years was paid in advance of the submission of vouchers.

Questions

2. (b) Treasury bills in respect of seed grain loan guarantees where payment was made by Dominion:—

Fiscal Year	Total	Repayments and Credits	Net Loans
1939-40 .....	$ 2,637,398 15	—	$ 2,637,398 15
1940-41 .....	7,136,051 09	—	7,136,051 09
1944-45 .....	16,468,852 49	$ 582,331 11	15,886,521 38
	$26,242,301 73	$ 582,331 11	$25,659,970 62

(c) Treasury bill representing loan for extension Saskatchewan Power Commission lines to Dafoe, Sask.:—

Fiscal Year	Total	Repayments and Credits	Net Loans
1940-41 ..	$57,600	—	$57,600
1941-42 ..	—	$ 3,840	3,840
1942-43 ..	—	3,840	3,840
1943-44 ..	—	3,840	3,840
1944-45 ..	—	3,840	3,840
	$57,600	$15,360	$42,240

3. Formal demand was made on February 6, 1945, for payment of treasury bill for $16,468,852.49, given by the government of Saskatchewan in respect of 1938 seed grain loan guarantees.

4. Answered by No. 2.

UNRRA—ADMINISTRATIVE EXPENSES

Mr. RAYMOND:

What nations have not sent in their contributions to the payment of administrative expenses of the UNRRA?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: According to reports received from UNRRA, at the end of 1944, payment of contribution for the administrative expenses of the year by the following countries was still incomplete: Chile, Ecuador, Iran, Iraq, Bolivia, Costa Rica, Paraguay, Uruguay, Australia, U.S.S.R., and Yugoslavia.

It is understood that several of the above countries have legislation now pending to enable payment, and that payment in respect of others has been partially completed.

WAR SERVICE ELECTORS—ENTITLEMENT OF WIVES TO THE FRANCHISE

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. Are non-resident wives who married members of the armed forces overseas and who are now in Canada or will be in Canada before the election entitled to vote?

2. If not, is any provision being made in the election act to entitle them to the franchise?

[Mr. Hlsley.]

Mr. McLARTY:

1. Yes, provided that they have been ordinarily resident in Canada for one year immediately preceding polling day and are otherwise qualified as electors.

2. Answered by No. 1.

KINGSTON COLD STORAGE

Mr. AYLESWORTH:

1. Has the government paid any subsidy to the Kingston Cold Storage during the years 1943, 1944?

2. If so, how much was the subsidy?

3. Has the government paid any money to the Kingston Cold Storage during the years 1943, 1944?

4. If so, what was the amount of the payment, and for what was the payment made?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. No.

2. Nil.

3. Yes.

4. 1943, $280.11; 1944, $280.11. Grant for the construction of a public cold storage warehouse.

N.R.M.A. MEN ON TORONTO CONSTRUCTION PROJECTS

Mr. HOMUTH:

1. Were N.R.M.A. troops used on construction projects in the city of Toronto? If so, on what projects?

2. What firms had these contracts?

3. Who gave permission to use these troops?

4. What wages per hour were paid these troops on the various projects?

5. Were wages paid directly to the troops?

6. From what regiments were these troops drawn?

Mr. ABBOTT:

1. (a) yes; (b) Hospitals of Department of Veterans Affairs (previously Department of Pensions and National Health); Soya bean elevator.

2. Redfern Construction Company; L. C. Scott Construction Company and Pigott Construction Company.

3. The Minister of National Defence under authority of P.C. 7429 of 1944.

4. Sixty-two cents per hour, exclusive of board and lodging in the case of Department of Veterans Affairs Hospitals. Sixty-three cents per hour exclusive of board and lodging in the case of the soya bean elevator project.

5. Until 1 December, 1944, wages were received by the Department of Labour and paid to the Department of National Defence. The amount in excess of the soldier's normal pay and allowances was credited to him by his paymaster. After that date the moneys earned were payable to the crown, pursuant to P.C. 9148 of 1944, and the soldier received only his military pay and allowances including dependents' allowance to which he was entitled.

6. District Depot Military District No. 2. These men were subsequently posted to No. 2 General Employment Company.

INDIANS—SASKATCHEWAN—MILITARY SERVICE

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

Were any Indians from the Indian reserves in Saskatchewan compelled to take military service under the national selective service mobilization regulations?

Mr. MITCHELL: Under a ruling by the Department of Justice Indians are subject to military service. In consequence, Indians from the Indian Reserves in Saskatchewan have undoubtedly been called and enrolled in the Army. However, no records are kept in the mobilization offices showing racial origin. It is a fact that many of the Indians in this province have been found unfit and others have been postponed as farmers and trappers.

HECLA, MAN., DOCK

Mr. BRYCE:

1. What appropriation has been made for the repair of the dock at Hecla, Manitoba?

2. What person or firms received the contract for this work?

3. Was the contract let by tender?

4. If not, why were tenders not called?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull):

1. $2,025 authorized from vote 297, "Harbours and rivers, generally, Manitoba".

2. Work done by day labour.

3 and 4. Answered by No. 2.

NORTH WEST FIELD FORCE, 1885—PENSIONS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. How many soldiers of the North West field force, 1885, have been given pensions or other forms of assistance under the order in council, 1944?

2. Have applicants to conform to a "means test" before securing any such assistance, and are small allowances paid them under the Old Age Pension Act deducted from the amounts of those who receive assistance under the order in council aforesaid?

32283—13

3. How many applications have been made and how many granted?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre):

1. At March 23, 1945, war veterans' allowance has been granted to 100 veterans of the North West Field Force, 1885.

2. The War Veterans' Allowance Act provides certain permissive income and exemptions, which are not deductible from an award; consequently, the applicant's circumstances are investigated. Section 4 (3) of the act provides that an allowance shall not be paid while old age pension is in payment.

3. Of 172 applications, 100 have been granted.

MEAT—ASSISTANCE TO BRITAIN

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What action, if any, will be taken by the government to give immediate assistance to Great Britain in the meat shortage, and will any report on this be made to parliament during the present session?

2. Has the attention of the government been called to a statement in the House of Commons, London, March 20, on the subject, by the Right Honourable Winston Churchill, and the one made on Wednesday, March 21, by the Prime Minister of Australia, to the British house, providing for a large consignment of meat to aid the situation?

3. If so, what action will be taken in the matter?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government is giving most careful consideration in all its aspects to the serious situation which has arisen as a result of the world-wide shortage of meat. The government's decision in the matter will be announced in due course.

RADIO BROADCASTING—CBC—GOOD FRIDAY PROGRAMMES

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What action has or will be taken by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to have appropriate broadcasting programmes for Good Friday, March 30, of a religious and christian character?

2. Were any arrangements made on this day in other years since the war started, and what were they, if any?

3. Does the corporation regulate all programmes on that day?

4. Does the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation regulate all private station programmes and require them to conform to regulations as to programmes on that day?

Mr. LaFLECHE:

1. The CBC is arranging special programmes on its networks for Good Friday. Advertising agencies have been advised, as in the past, to refrain from inappropriate religious references either by spoken word or music.

2. There have always been special arrangements made for music, religious, and dramatic programmes on Good Friday, such as: Holy

Questions

Week Meditations, John Masefield's Good Friday, Brahms's Requiem, Bach Cantata—"King of Heaven be Thou Welcome", Haydn's "La Passion", orchestra and choir, and Dorothy Sayer's "Man Born to be King", etc.

3. No.

4. CBC regulations must be observed by private stations on any day. There are no special regulations governing broadcasting on this day.

VETERANS' LAND ACT—TRACTORS AND FARM MACHINERY

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

1. Have any arrangements under the Veterans' Land Act been made to date with machine companies in Canada for the purchase of tractors and farm machinery?

2. If so, with what company and for what number of machines?

3. When are these tractors or other machinery to be delivered?

4. Are any of these machines now on hand at company warehouses frozen or held for future delivery?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre):

1. Yes.

2. Allis-Chalmers Rumely Ltd., Toronto, Ont., Beatty Brothers Limited, Fergus, Ont., A. Belanger Limited, Montmagny, P.Q., J. I. Case Company, Toronto, Ont., Cockshutt Plow Co. Ltd., Brantford, Ont., John Deere Plow Company, Welland, Ont., De Laval Company Limited, Peterborough, Ont., Desjardins Limited, St. Andre de Kamouraska, P.Q., Fleury-Bissell, Ltd., Elora, Ont., Ford Motor Co. of Canada Ltd., Windsor, Ont., Canadian Co-Operative Implements Ltd., Winnipeg, Man., International Harvester Co. of Canada Ltd., Hamilton, Ont., Jutras Company Ltd., Victoriaville, P.Q., Massey-Harris Co. Ltd., Toronto, Ont., Minneapolis-Moline Farm Implements Co., Regina, Sask., Matthew Moody & Sons Company, Terrebonne, P.Q., Oliver Farm Equipment Company, Regina, Sask., Otaco Limited, Orilla, Ont., Renfrew Machinery Co. Ltd., Renfrew, Ont., Riverside Sales Company, Calgary, Alta., George White & Sons Co. Ltd., London, Ont.

(b) Minimum requirements for approximately 3,000 full time farming units.

3. During 1945.

4. Yes.

INTERNATIONAL BUREAU FOR RESEARCH INTO CAUSES OF WAR

Mr. WINKLER:

Has the government proposed or been invited to participate in an international bureau for research into the causes of war?

[Mr. LaFleche.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No such invitation has been received. It may be noted, however, that the following paragraphs of the proposals for a general international organization deal with studies to be undertaken and efforts to be made to determine and remove threats to peace: chapter I, paragraph 1; chapter V B, paragraph 1; chapter VI B, paragraph 5; chapter VIII A, paragraph 1; and chapter IX A, paragraph 1.

ASSISTANCE TO APPLE GROWERS

Mr. HATFIELD:

What assistance was given to the apple growers of Nova Scotia, British Columbia, Quebec, Ontario and New Brunswick, during the years 1941, 1942, 1943 and 1944, in the way of subsidies or bonus?

Mr. GARDINER:

Crop	British Columbia Ontario
	Nova Scotia	Columbia	Ontario
1941	..$ 1,538,864 88	$311,434 37	$3,819 10
1942	.. 2,003,526 61	261,414 06	none
1943	.. 1,785,445 00	56,002 50	none
1944 to date	. 1,258,185 00	28,042 80	none

To Quebec and New Brunswick—nil.

BEEF, PORK AND MUTTON

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

1. How many pounds of slaughtered beef is there now in Canada?

2. How many pounds of slaughtered pork is there now in Canada?

3. How many pounds of slaughtered mutton or lamb is there now in Canada?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1. On 1st March, 1945 there were 30,079,373 pounds.

2. On 1st March, 1945 there were 48,484,024 pounds.

3. On 1st March, 1945 there were 4,333,515 pounds.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

WARTIME HOUSING—PIGOTT CONSTRUCTION COMPANY

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. What is the total value of contracts awarded to the Pigott Construction Company during the war?

2. What is the value of contracts awarded (if any) while Mr. Pigott was president of Wartime Housing Ltd.?

RETIREMENT OF GENERAL PEARKES

Mr. BRUCE:

1. Has the Minister of National Defence any information to cause him to believe that General Pearkes and his officers in the Pacific command did not carry out the minister's instructions to put forth their best efforts to induce draftees to go active?
2. If so, what is such information and the grounds for such belief?
3. Is there any information on the files of the Department of National Defence which establishes that General Pearkes did not, with fidelity, discharge his duties in securing the enlistment for general service of home defence personnel under his command?
4. If so, what particulars are therein given?
5. Was any information to such effect supplied by the Minister of National Defence to the Minister of Agriculture?
6. If so, what was the information?

GENELCO LIMITED

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. How much capital investment by the government does the building, machinery and equipment of Genelco Ltd., represent?
2. Is Genelco Ltd. working on government contracts?
3. If so, what length of time will it take to complete these contracts?
4. Will the present working staff be required until the completion of these contracts?
5. Has Genelco Ltd. laid off any staff this year?
6. If so, how many have been laid off?
7. Has any machinery or equipment been removed from Genelco Ltd.? If so, what machinery or equipment?
8. Will the government dispose of the building, equipment and machinery of Genelco Ltd.?
9. If so, what purchase price is the government asking?

WAR ASSETS CORPORATION—HEAVY TRUCKS

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Has the War Assets Corporation sold any heavy trucks?
2. If so, to whom were they sold?
3. How many trucks were sold?
4. Have any four wheel drive trucks been sold?
5. If so, to whom and how many were sold?

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT—COLLECTIONS OF PRINCIPAL AND INTEREST

Mr. FAIR:

During each of the fiscal years 1930-31 to 1943-44 inclusive, what amount of (a) principal; (b) interest, was collected from soldier settlers under the soldier settlement board (civilian settlers excluded)?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I should like this to stand as an order for return. It can be sufficiently answered in its present form.

HOUSING—TORONTO

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What steps are or will be taken by the government to remedy the housing situation in the city of Toronto?
2. What has been done since the last session of parliament, August last?
3. How many houses have been built there under the National Housing Act programme, 1944, and how many applications were received and dealt with so far?

LEGAL SERVICES—J. H. POWER, K.C.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

What legal services have been performed for the government by J. H. Power, K.C., New Glasgow, Nova Scotia, in each year since January 1, 1940, to date; what payments have been made and what accounts have been rendered and remain unpaid for services and expenses for the Department of Justice, wartime prices and trade board, the Departments of National Defence and the Department of Munitions and Supply?

CANADIAN ARMY—DISTURBANCES AT DRUMMOND-VILLE AND GATINEAU MILLS, QUE.

Mr. BRUCE:

1. What action, if any, has the government taken with respect to the riots at Drummondville, Quebec, some weeks ago, when members of the provost corps and the R.C.M.P. were assaulted?
2. If such action has been taken, does the Minister of Justice think it will be adequate to prevent a recurrence of such unlawful acts?
3. What action has been taken in regard to the alleged "beating up" of 3 provost corps men at Gatineau Mills, Quebec, by a gang of 40 or 50 men?
4. What action has been taken against the constable at Gatineau Mills, who is alleged to have sat idly by and watched the law being broken?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

ST. PAUL DU NORD, QUE., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. DORION:

For a copy of all correspondence and other documents addressed to the government during the six months' period to August, 1944, regarding the appointment of Mr. Boulianne as postmaster at St. Paul du Nord, Saguenay county.

RIVIERE COLOMBIER, QUE., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. DORION:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents addressed to the government during the twelve months' period to September 15, 1944, regarding the post office at Riviere Colombier, county of Saguenay.

STUART BOWMAN RALSTON

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of all correspondence concerning the appointment of Mr. Stuart Bowman Ralston to do some work at the Patent and Copyright Office and of his reports to the head of the department concerned.

*Beet SugarSOLDIER SETTLEMENT AND VETERANS' LAND ACT—GRANTING OF CLEAR TITLES*Mr. FAIR:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, petitions, briefs or other communications received by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Veterans Affairs, the Minister of Mines and Resources, the director of soldier settlement and the Veterans' Land Act or any other department of government in connection with the request of the Soldier Settlers Association of Canada that veterans of great war I, holding contracts with the soldier settlement board at March 31, 1944, be granted clear titles without making further payments after that date.

SEED GRAIN LOANS TO SASKATCHEWAN, 1938*Mr. WRIGHT:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other communications, from 1938 to date, exchanged between the dominion government and the government of the province of Saskatchewan relating to the 1938 seed grain loans.

SEED GRAIN FURNISHED TO SASKATCHEWAN
FARMERS, 1938*Mr. PERLEY:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged, from and after September, 1937, to the present date, between the federal government or any minister or department thereof and the provincial government of Saskatchewan or any minister or department thereof, with respect to seed grain furnished to the farmers of Saskatchewan in the spring of 1938.

BEET SUGAR*REQUEST OF PRODUCERS FOR ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Will he at an early day, tomorrow if possible, give the house a statement on the beet sugar production situation in Canada, answering each of the following questions: (1) Did a delegation from the National Sugar Beet Producers Association of Canada tender a submission to S. R. Noble, J. L. Ilesley and J. G. Gardiner on or about February 7th, 1945, in Montreal, in an effort to obtain assistance for beet producers of Canada? (2) What kind and degree of assistance did they ask for? (3) Was their request granted?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): On a point of order, these questions are clearly not such as should be asked on the orders of the day. I submit that the hon. member is not in order in reading a long list of questions in this way.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am merely giving notice of motion. The minister can have a day to answer, but I submit my questions are in order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Perhaps the hon. member will place them on the order paper.

MEAT*RATIONING—SUPPLIES TO GREAT BRITAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): In view of the drastic restrictions in meat exports from the United States to Great Britain which are proposed for 1945, why has the government not applied meat rationing in Canada in order to make greater supplies available for export to Great Britain?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member will place that question on the order paper.

PRISONERS OF WAR*STATEMENT WITH RESPECT TO SENDING OF PARCELS BY NEXT OF KIN

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief statement to make concerning the sending of parcels by next of kin to prisoners of war in Germany.

Following my statement on Friday respecting conditions among Canadian prisoners of war in Germany, the hon. member for Saskatoon City (Mr. Bence) asked whether next of kin in this country should continue to send parcels to prisoners in Germany, and I replied in the affirmative. Further information received by the Department of External Affairs makes it appear that, because of conditions in Germany resulting from the allied offensive, it may be impossible to deliver parcels individually addressed to prisoners of war. It will be remembered that the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Lafèche) advised next of kin on February 15 that until further notice parcels should not be sent to prisoners of war in certain camps which were being moved by the German authorities. It is expected that the minister will make a further statement in the next few days regarding the sending of next-of-kin parcels to all prisoners of war in German hands.

The important thing for the present is to see that Red Cross food parcels continue to get through to our men.

I am making this addition to my reply of last Friday in order to ensure that next of kin in Canada will not, until further advised, send in parcels which it will be impossible to have delivered.

THE WAR

MILITARY SITUATION IN EUROPE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a brief statement in regard to the military situation in Europe. The crossing of the Rhine has long been looked upon as indicating the final state of the assault on Germany. Since the United States first army established a bridgehead at Remagen nearly three weeks ago, the stage has been set for a major assault as a result of which five allied armies are now fighting east of the Rhine.

I am indeed glad to be able to tell the house that the united assault against the Rhine barrier has been successful, and that satisfactory progress is being achieved at all points.

The people of Canada will have learned with pride that the Canadian third division, as part of the British second army under General Dempsey's command, has taken an important part in this great offensive.

According to latest reports, a crossing over the Ijssel river has already been secured. The Ijssel river is east and north of the Rhine. Immediately to the south of the British second army, the United States ninth army is fighting its way into the heavily industrialized area of the Ruhr.

In all parts of Germany the demoralization of the industrial front is becoming more and more apparent. The Remagen bridgehead is steadily being expanded. Still farther to the south, General Patton's brilliant thrust opposite Oppenheim has captured Darmstadt and has pushed on to the river Main. Enemy resistance west of the Rhine has practically collapsed. The striking successes of the armies of the united nations east of the Rhine give strong reason to hope that the disintegration of the German army may not long be delayed.

CANADIAN FORCES IN ITALY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence since there is no minister in the house. When may we expect some announcement from the department with respect to the Canadian forces in Italy? I have had numerous inquiries about this matter. There is considerable anxiety in my province with respect to the personnel of the Carleton-York regiment which has had such a great record in Italy. The next of kin are anxiously waiting news of their position.

Mr. D. C. ABBOTT (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): An announcement will be made as soon as it is possible to do so. I am not quite sure just what my hon. friend refers to.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it not ready yet?

VETERANS' AFFAIRS

PRESS RELEASES—INCLUSION OF LEAFLET ADVERTISING A CHARTERED BANK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans' Affairs. I received in the mail this morning a sealed envelope addressed to me at Winnipeg from the Department of Veterans' Affairs and bearing the frank of the deputy minister. It contained certain press releases from the department which are of significance and value, but also enclosed was a printed leaflet which is a piece of commercial advertising for one of the chartered banks of this country. I should like to ask the minister whether the facilities of the department and its franking privileges are thus being made available to the chartered banks for advertising purposes.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans' Affairs): In the first place, my hon. friend did not do me the courtesy of bringing this to my personal attention before asking the question in the house. In the second place, what he has revealed is absolute news to me. I did not know any such publications were being distributed.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the minister look into it?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I certainly will.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

STATUS OF SERVICE PERSONNEL WITH SERVICE OF FIVE YEARS OR MORE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. NORMAN J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief inquiry to make of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence. Over the week-end a great number of persons, particularly returned soldiers with service of five years or more, told me that they were anxiously awaiting a statement as to when these men might be able to return to civilian occupations. There is a great demand for the skilled services of some of these men, and I feel that a statement should be made in a day or two in order to let them know what is ahead of them after they have been kicking around for five months or so. They have been told that they do not have to go back overseas.

The Late Earl Lloyd George

Mr. D. C. ABBOTT (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): I presume my hon. friend is referring to service personnel which has been returned for rotational duty in Canada. I shall deal with that when I make my statement on the estimates. Broadly speaking, the position is that a good many of these service personnel will not be returned overseas but are to be kept on for instructional purposes and for operational duties in Canada. My hon. friend will realize that even though from the looks of things the war in Europe may be over before very long, we cannot afford to relax our efforts so far as the training of reinforcements is concerned. I take it that he would be the last who would want to suggest that. These men are being employed in that particular type of operational duty. I doubt that I could make a statement in the course of the next few days, as my hon. friend suggests.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

OFFICERS WITH DUTY IN CANADA ONLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata). Mr. Speaker, would the genial parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence be kind enough to inform the house when the return will be brought down concerning brass hats who have never been in a theatre of war? The order was passed last session.

Mr. D. C. ABBOTT (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): My hon. friend's memory is at fault, which is unusual. I have made inquiries and the matter to which he refers was a question put in the course of debate during the special session last fall, and the minister stated that he would endeavour to obtain the information. It was not a question which was put on the order paper.

Mr. POULIOT: Oh, yes.

Mr. ABBOTT: I had intended to speak to my hon. friend about it. Of course if it was not passed as an order for a return, it died with prorogation.

Mr. POULIOT: It was passed as an order for a return. I want my hon. friend to shake up the brass hats.

[Mr. Lockhart.]

Mr. ABBOTT: My information is that there was no order passed, but I will check again.

THE LATE EARL LLOYD GEORGE

EXPRESSION OF TRIBUTE ON BEHALF OF PARLIAMENT AND THE PEOPLE OF CANADA

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may be permitted to make an announcement which I know the house will be sorry to receive but which is not altogether unexpected. Through the courtesy of the Canadian Press I have just received word that Earl Lloyd George has passed away. I should like immediately on behalf of this House of Commons and on behalf of the parliament of Canada to express the feelings of deep regret which we all share at the passing of one of the foremost leaders of free men in any part of the world. Perhaps the word "regret" is not a wholly suitable one. Rather we should rejoice that one who was so active in public affairs over so many years was spared to the great age to which the late Earl Lloyd George attained and that he had lived to see the regard and respect which comes to one who plays a great part in the affairs of the world.

This parliament will wish to have it known that in expressing its sense of loss in the passing of one who had so much to do with the shaping and moulding of the empire and of the commonwealth, it is sharing a feeling that will be entertained by all the nations of the commonwealth. The late Earl Lloyd George's passing will be deeply felt in the United Kingdom, but the sense of loss will also be shared by all the free nations of the world.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as I listened to the Prime Minister telling of the greatness of the deceased Earl Lloyd George I could not help but think of the time when I witnessed the most spontaneous reception, outside of the visit of Their Majesties, that was ever given in this country to a public man from beyond our borders. It was the occasion of the visit to the part of Canada in which I was then living of Great Britain's war-time prime minister of the first war. I do not think I ever saw such a sense of oneness as I did in the tremendous gathering which then welcomed that distinguished statesman.

I wish to associate this party with what has just been said so eloquently by the Prime Minister with respect to the passing of Earl Lloyd George. He has left a fine reputation in both war and peace. He is a magnificent example of what democracy can do in raising to the top those who are capable of assuming positions of responsibility in times of crises.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggarr): We should like to associate ourselves with the other two speakers. For myself I have a long recollection of Lloyd George. I remember hearing of him first as a rather fiery young Welshman whose ideas were not acceptable to a large percentage of those who wanted to maintain the status quo in Great Britain. I remember also seeing him hanged in effigy during the Boer war. But through the years his ideas have gained ground and his policies have been accepted more and more.

I think we all can join in expressing our appreciation of the life of a truly great man, one moreover who demonstrated to the world anew that Great Britain, with all her ancient symbols and all her ancient ways, nevertheless offers unique opportunities for young men of humble birth to rise to the highest position in the nation.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (MacLeod): Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I can add very much to what has already been said, except that we in this group wish to associate ourselves with the feeling that has been expressed that the British peoples have indeed suffered the loss of a great little man. I have taken some interest in David Lloyd George, to whom my father, an Englishman and a Liberal, often used to refer in glowing terms. It is perhaps particularly for that reason that I have watched him rise to become an outstanding figure in the political and diplomatic life of Great Britain. He stood for those great ideals for which the British commonwealth of nations now stands, and when the Prime Minister made the announcement to-day, coming as it did, I wondered if it might not be significant. We associate ourselves with others who have spoken in expressing our sympathy in the loss of this man.

SAN FRANCISCO CONFERENCE

PROPOSED GENERAL INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION FOR MAINTENANCE OF PEACE AND SECURITY

The house resumed, from March 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King to approve a resolution to send representatives to a conference of the united nations at San Francisco to prepare a charter for the maintenance of international peace and security.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I am conscious of the fact, as I am sure were all members who have preceded me, that this is one of the historic debates of parliament. Ordinarily we deal with matters of local concern, but here we are dealing with a matter that goes far beyond the confines of our country, a matter that is of vital importance to the whole future of this dominion. It is important therefore that we should understand clearly what the business is that will be the main concern of the San Francisco conference.

It is not a conference called to consider how measures of social security may be furthered in the various countries of the world. It is not a conference called to discuss economic questions, what the scale of tariffs should be or where trade should be developed. It is not a conference called to help backward countries. Nor has it anything to do with the terms of peace. The San Francisco conference is a conference in which the united nations will sit down together to try to work out the means whereby peace and security may be the lot of the world in the future, and how war, with all its barbarities, with its unbridled horrors, with all the loss and destruction it brings in the physical and moral and spiritual spheres, may be outlawed forever in this world. That is a lofty ideal, and if we are to comprehend it fully I think we must look at it against the background of the present war.

The progress made by science and invention has illustrated during this war of the last five years, better than anything else could have done, the terrible power of destruction that can come from the inventive genius of man. We see cities destroyed almost overnight; we see tens of millions of people made homeless; we see the pitiless desolation that has overwhelmed a great part of the earth. Not only have we this evidence before our eyes but we realize also the terrible impact which the war and its horrors have made upon the spiritual and moral values of mankind.

I recall hearing, Mr. Speaker, when I was only eight or ten years old, of the Armenian atrocities perpetrated some sixty years ago by the dictator who then ruled Turkey. I recall the thunderings of Mr. Gladstone, then England's grand old man, who roused the moral conscience of the world against the "unspeakable Turk", so that there was not a hamlet or village in Canada that was not conscious of the terrible things that were being done to those poor human souls in far away Armenia. We have travelled a long way since then. To-day the Armenian atrocities pale into insignificance alongside the horrors of the present war—horrors the most bestial the human mind can conceive. I may be wrong—I hope I am—but somehow it seems to me that our moral sense has become a bit blunted. We grow so much accustomed to these barbarities that we hear or read about every day that they seem to have a soporific effect upon the conscience of mankind. It has always seemed to me that the most dreadful thing that comes from war is not the destruction of physical property, not even the loss of life, terrible as that often is, but the destruction of the moral and spiritual qualities in man; for when those moral and spiritual qualities are weakened or destroyed, the foundations collapse upon which all progress has been made in the centuries that have gone.

It is against such a background, war and its horrors and barbarities, the preservation of our liberty, the right to worship as we please, freedom to live our own lives, that the conference at San Francisco takes place.

Reference has been made in the debate to the failure of the league of nations. The league of nations was a great deal, but it is now well known that inadequate preparation had been made for the drafting of a charter for so important a body as the league of nations was. In the end the league failed, it seems to me, for two or three reasons. The first was the absence of the United States from the council table. That was an irreparable blow to the league idea. The second was that the league lacked teeth; that is, it became in practice pretty much a debating society. In the third place, and this to my mind is probably the chief reason, there was not the willingness throughout the nations to surrender a little of their sovereignty, or a willingness on the part of the peoples generally to recognize that if this new instrument was to be made to work, it had to be clothed with the necessary authority and power to enforce law against the law breaker.

The league failed, it had some successes to its credit in the early years, but as time passed the gangster rulers rose in power, and the league declined in influence and in its ability to do anything to ward off danger. So we had the invasion of Manchuria by Japan in the autumn of 1932. By that act Japan openly violated the covenant which it had signed in the league of nations of which it was a member, flouted it and threw it to the winds of heaven. The effort was made by the league—and I have talked to some of those who were present on that occasion—to try to bring Japan to reason, but one could as well have reasoned with a mad dog. The gangsters in Japan were on the march and their hand would not be stayed. In 1934, as everyone knows, the treaty of Versailles was violated by Germany—another direct blow to the league—and then in 1935 came the invasion of Ethiopia by Italy. Ethiopia's entrance to the league of nations had been sponsored by Italy; but this defenceless country was overrun and conquered by its powerful neighbour. Why proceed with the sorry tale? The overrunning of Austria by Hitler, then Czechoslovakia, then Poland, and the outbreak of this war which has covered almost the whole world. It is a melancholy story, and if this new league is to succeed, that story must not be repeated. I recall a speech by Mr. Churchill some eight or nine years ago in which he showed with great clarity and vision the course on which the world was descending step by step into the abyss of chaos and destruction. How true a prophet he was is clear to-day for everyone to see. So, if we are to consider the proceedings at San Francisco in the right light we must see them against the background of the unutterable misery that war has brought to the world, and to humanity everywhere.

[Mr. Crerar.]

Before I discuss the Dumbarton Oaks proposals—and I have a few comments to make on those—I want to refer to two matters which were brought up in debate. The first was by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). Let me say at once that I thought my hon. friend made an excellent speech the other afternoon—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A wonderful speech.

Mr. CRERAR: With the greater part of it I wholly agree. I want no misunderstanding on that point. But the hon. member referred to the debate which took place in this chamber in the autumn of 1919 for the ratification of the peace treaty of Versailles, and I thought he endeavoured a bit unfairly, perhaps quite unintentionally, to score a point against the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). He quoted the amendment moved by the late Mr. Fielding to the resolution to ratify the treaty. The main discussion which took place at that time here, as in the United States, was on article X of the covenant, and the point on which it centred was the degree to which that article committed this country. The hon. member for Lake Centre quoted Mr. Fielding's amendment, and then, in support of his contention that Mr. Fielding was isolationist and that that isolationism had been carried on down to the present Prime Minister, the hon. member used these words, as reported on page 164 of Hansard:

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the statement of the Prime Minister the other day is but a continuation of that amendment of 1919; and if we take such a course it will be a retrograde step for Canada and the rest of the united nations. I may add that the amendment was defeated, 102 to 70.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How did you vote on that amendment? You were here.

Mr. CRERAR: As I recall I was not present in the house. I was present at the debate but I was absent when the vote was taken; but I have no hesitation in saying that I would have voted for the motion. But I wish to say to the hon. member for Lake Centre as well as to the house that his assumption here is wholly incorrect. When Mr. Fielding proposed the amendment he was answered by the late Hon. C. J. Doherty, who was minister of justice in Sir Robert Borden's government and had been a member of the Canadian delegation at the peace conference. Mr. Doherty opposed the amendment, not on the ground stated by the hon. member for Lake Centre, but on the ground that it would be misunderstood abroad. He urged this consideration and stated, as reported in Hansard, (second session), 1919, volume I, page 198:

Between the people of Canada and the operations of the council, under article X, there will always be standing the undisturbed power of the parliament of Canada.

That I think, sets the incident in its right perspective. The same difficulty arose in the United States. If anybody here is interested in reading that debate in the autumn of 1919 he will find that the late Mr. Lapointe, who took a rather different view from that taken by Mr. Fielding, quoted a statement of President Wilson to the United States Congress, that article X did not give the league of nations council power over the congress, that the league's powers were only advisory, and that consequently congress would always be free, if assistance were asked of it, to maintain order in the world, to approve or reject the request.

I come now to another point which is a much more serious one, and that was a point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green). He propounded an idea which I think deserves the most earnest consideration of this house. To sum it up briefly, it was no less than this, that in commonwealth relations with other nations the commonwealth should speak with one voice. That was clearly the meaning of what my hon. friend advocated, and, perhaps at some length, I wish to deal with it because it is not a new suggestion. It is one that has been discussed many times before in this country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was it not only in relation to this new league of nations?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, but the implication was clearly there. I can read what the hon. member said, and I wish he were in his seat at the moment. I think I can state his position, and I certainly do not wish to state it unfairly. He was endeavouring to argue that Mr. Eden and Mr. Churchill were quite willing to have the commonwealth speak with one voice but that the malign influence that prevented this came from the present Prime Minister of Canada. I wish to show, and I think I can show, that my hon. friend is absolutely and wholly on wrong ground. Let me quote from page 116 of Hansard just what he said:

There can be no doubt of the attitude of Great Britain;—

That is, on this matter.

Churchill and Eden have shown it on different occasions as clearly as they dared. I have here the press dispatch of a speech made by Mr. Eden in the British House of Commons over a year ago, in which he said that "if a close and intimate understanding could be achieved between the British commonwealth of nations, the United States and Russia, all our problems, however difficult, can be resolved."

Then he went on to quote Mr. Churchill as using these words:

I hope most earnestly and I believe with deep conviction that the warrior statesman at the head of Russia, through these years of storm and tempest will bring his country into the sunlight of a broader and happier age for all, and with him in this task will march the British commonwealth of nations and the mighty United States of America.

That was very fine and I have no quarrel with that sentiment. But my hon. friend went on to argue that we should have been represented at Dumbarton Oaks through the British commonwealth of nations.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, I do not think so.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, precisely. I will quote what he said:

I believe the Dumbarton Oaks proposals ignore the existence of the British commonwealth of nations at the suggestion of this Canadian government.

I was going to say that is complete nonsense, but at any rate there is no foundation whatever for that statement. Not only that, my hon. friend makes an assumption, on the remarks of Mr. Eden and Mr. Churchill, which I do not think is warranted. When Mr. Eden spoke of Russia and the United States and the British commonwealth of nations, and when Mr. Churchill spoke in the same sense, they were not speaking of the British commonwealth as a political entity at all. They were speaking of it as a group of nations; otherwise they would not have used the language they did. They would have said the British commonwealth; but they used the term the British commonwealth of nations. Indeed, what Mr. Eden and Mr. Churchill had in mind in the statements they made was that there would be Russia, the United States, Great Britain, Canada, Australia, South Africa, all the members of the commonwealth. That is clearly what was meant.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think myself you are hair-splitting.

Mr. CRERAR: No, I am not, but my hon. friend is entitled to his view. The hon. member for Vancouver South proceeded in his argument with regard to the advantages that would come to Canada if we spoke with one voice through the commonwealth of nations.

Mr. GREEN: I did not put it that way.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend did not state it in these words but no other inference I think can be properly drawn from his remarks.

Mr. GREEN: As a matter of privilege, may I say that the minister must not put words into my mouth. He probably did not understand my speech at all. I said, on the security council.

Mr. CRERAR: On the security council, and also I presume at San Francisco.

Mr. GREEN: Just read my speech again.

Mr. CRERAR: I have read my hon. friend's speech and it is not the first time that he has ventilated this doctrine in the house. I wish at present to bring back to him a little bit of history so that he may be able to keep on the track in future. My hon. friend was speaking not only of Dumbarton Oaks but of the security council that will be set up, or which it is hoped will be set up as a result of the San Francisco conference, because he used these words in his argument:

Thus if Canada makes this request—

That is, that the commonwealth speak with one voice.

Mr. GREEN: I must rise again. If the minister is going to quote my speech he must quote it correctly. I was not talking about speaking generally; I was referring to the security council on which I said there should be a commonwealth seat rather than a seat held only by the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. I was very careful to point out that Canada would still have her own seat on the assembly.

Mr. CRERAR: That is the point I wish to come to now. If the commonwealth is to have one seat, that is, if it is to speak as a political entity at San Francisco, or Dumbarton Oaks, or in the league council, as my hon. friend suggests—

[Mr. Crerar.]

Mr. GREEN: You stick to that.

Mr. CRERAR: Let me read what my hon. friend said:

Thus if Canada makes this request, and if it is granted, Canada still with a seat on the assembly, will be sitting in permanently on the security council, where the important decisions are being made.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Surely. That is the point he made.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, let me ask this question of the member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), who probably has had a little more experience in this—I say it without offence—than my hon. friend who represents Vancouver South. Does he think for a moment that if the whole group of the British commonwealth of nations were tied in together in one representation in the league council or anywhere else they could have at the same time their independent representatives in the assembly or in any other organization?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why certainly. I have no hesitation in answering the minister at all. What I do suggest, though—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister put the question to me. If he does not want me to answer it I will not answer it now, but I may try to do so later. What I suggest is that the basis of the thesis of the hon. member for Vancouver South was that the British commonwealth of nations should speak as with one voice on the security council, which would give it power that it will not have under the present set-up.

Mr. CRERAR: That is precisely what I said.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think so. The minister added the words "anywhere else".

Mr. CRERAR: If my hon. friend or anyone else thinks that the members of the British commonwealth of nations can merge their separate entities into one political entity to be represented on the security council or any other international organization and at the same time retain their individual representatives in the assembly of the council, I believe he is wholly and greatly wrong.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister's opinion is that it is not possible.

Mr. CRERAR: This one-voice idea—because it is the one-voice idea—will not survive.

Mr. GRAYDON: That one-voice idea is the straw man that the minister and his party build up once in a while.

Mr. CRERAR: I will show my hon. friend that it is not a straw man before I get through.

Mr. HOMUTH: The minister had a straw man for five years.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CRERAR: It is interesting to note that when the last war ended a Canadian delegation went to Versailles. At that time I was, as my hon. friend knows, a member of Sir Robert Borden's government: I am not betraying any secrets of council when I say that this question of how Canada should be represented at Versailles was discussed for one whole evening at a council meeting in the east block. The government was almost unanimously of the opinion that Canada should have its own representative sitting at the peace table—

Mr. HOMUTH: The minister was a member of the government at that time.

Mr. CRERAR: —when the treaty of peace was made.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The first proposal was that Canada was not to have any say at all; and Sir Robert Borden thought that Canada had earned the right to sit in at the peace conference because of the valour of our men, not because of a political situation.

Mr. TUCKER: We think that to-day.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Pardon me; I should not interrupt.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not interrupt hon. members when they are speaking, and I would ask that I be permitted to continue.

Mr. HOMUTH: The minister—

Mr. SPEAKER: There have been too many interruptions of the minister's speech.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I must say I am astounded at the minister making a disclosure of what took place in cabinet council.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is impossible for the minister to complete his speech in the time allotted to him if he is continually interrupted.

Mr. HOMUTH: The minister makes factual statements which are not in accord with the record.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What does the hon. member know about it?

Mr. HOMUTH: I have some knowledge of it.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member will have an opportunity to reply.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What party did the hon. member belong to at that time?

Mr. CRERAR: I have no desire, certainly in a debate of this kind, to offend my hon. friends opposite; and the events of twenty-five years ago are now history. The position that Sir Robert Borden took was that Canada had earned the right to sit at the peace conference table. Every one recognizes that that was a tremendous step forward in the constitutional relations with Great Britain. I believe it is a matter of common knowledge that that request was not very warmly received in certain quarters in Great Britain when it was made.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the minister's authority for that?

Mr. CRERAR: And it was only because of the appeal made to the British Prime Minister—I think I am speaking within the bounds of truth—that we went to Versailles as a separate entity with our own delegates and signed the treaty of Versailles for Canada. Sir Robert tells that in his memoirs. I really do not need to labour the matter, but a reference to it will be found on pages 893-4 of Sir Robert's memoirs, and reads as follows:

Elsewhere I have said, and here I emphatically repeat, that Canada and the other dominions would have regarded the situation as intolerable if they, who numbered their dead by the hundred thousand in the fiercest struggle the world had ever known, should stand outside the council chamber of the conference, while nations that had taken no direct or active part in the struggle stood within and determined the conditions of peace.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We all agree with that.

Mr. CRERAR: We all agree with that, and I trust we shall continue to agree. Sir Robert Borden continued:

The path upon which the dominions advanced to complete representation at the peace conference was at times rough and thorny.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have no doubt that is true.

Mr. CRERAR: I continue:

Progress could only be achieved by unfaltering persistence and unceasing effort. It affords me the highest satisfaction to declare that in our advance along that path the dominion ministers received from the British Prime Minister and his colleagues complete sympathy and unwavering support from first to last.

San Francisco Conference

That, I repeat, was a tremendous step forward. My hon. friend will also know that in successive meetings of the league of nations Canada and Britain did not always see eye to eye. That has been true under every government of this country, and Sir Robert Borden adds a footnote to what I have just quoted from his memoirs to this effect:

There was intense surprise at Geneva, with many echoes abroad, when Canadian delegates put forward views quite opposed to those of the British delegates in the first assembly of the league of nations.

That is not my statement; it is the statement of Sir Robert Borden, who was a great leader of the Conservative party. I am glad to pay that tribute to him.

I wish to make just one other reference to this matter further to show that the assumptions of my hon. friend are not sound. I do not wish to do him an injustice in the slightest degree, but while we are on this question it is interesting to note a discussion that took place in the British House of Lords on July 21, 1942, as reported in the Hansard of the House of Lords. The question came up on a motion that had to do with "the vital matter of maintaining now and in the future the unity and solidarity of the British empire." That is a sentiment with which we can all agree. Our old colleague in this house, now Lord Bennett, spoke in that debate; and he spoke with the vigour which we were accustomed to seeing when he was with us in this chamber. He sketched the growth that had taken place in the status of the dominions, the change in their relationships with Britain, and I fancied that there was in his speech a note of concern that the dominions were drifting away from the mother country. In the course of his speech he made this statement:

It is obvious that if we are to have a commonwealth of nations we must have a common policy.

That is, if I mistake not, what the hon. member for Vancouver South has in mind. I continue:

That is obvious. It must be a common foreign policy. How that is to be brought about is, I conceive, a problem of the first magnitude.

I say quite frankly it certainly is a problem of the first magnitude, if it is ever to be brought about.

In that debate he was answered by Viscount Cranborne, who was Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs. I should like to quote again, because this is a matter of some importance. If the house will bear with me I shall read at some length from what Viscount Cranborne had to say in reply to the speech of Viscount Bennett and others who spoke in the debate. Speaking of the British empire he said:

[Mr. Crerar.]

It is not a static institution. It is dynamic in character. It is a living organism. The relationship of the component parts has changed fundamentally during the last decades, as Lord Bennett has shown, and is likely to continue to change and develop in the years that are before us.

Wise words. He continued:

In this respect I think the British empire is different from most of the great empires in the past.

Then he goes on to speak of them as being predatory—empires with secret police, and that sort of thing, culminating in the dictatorship of the Third Reich. Then he continues:

Our British conception has, I think, always been entirely different. The empire has been compared to a family. My right hon. friend Mr. Mcmillan, referring to the structure of the empire in another place the other day when the colonial estimates were being considered, rightly pointed out that to try to draw such an analogy exactly would be fallacious, for, as he truly emphasized, in a family parents die, and are succeeded by their children. That is not true of nations. I very much hope that it is not going to be true of Great Britain. But with this essential exception I think a certain comparison can be drawn between the family and the relationship of Great Britain and the dominions and colonies. There is, for instance, the same alteration in the relationship as the children grow up. In the early days of the family, children are young and inexperienced, and not able to face problems of life for themselves. Therefore they have to be protected and educated. But gradually they grow up and begin to take their own line—to think for themselves. Eventually they become independent entities, independent personalities and, finally, if they are worth anything at all, they become self-supporting. They are no longer dependent upon their parents, but they remain members of the family still bound to each other by ties of affection, and still have a responsibility to help and protect each other. They all benefit, and they know that they benefit, from that mutual relationship.

I would ask hon. members to note these words:

That I think is the experience in all well-conducted families, and I think it is equally true of the British commonwealth of nations. The successful operation of this conception, of course, puts a great responsibility on the Mother country herself. She has got to recognize that her family are growing up, and that is always a very difficult thing for any parents to do with regard to any children. They always tend to try and keep their children on leading strings too long. Such a course leads finally to friction and alienation of the child. Indeed, the child may—and in a number of cases does—break away entirely from the family, though the passage of time nearly always softens and even wipes away bitterness in later life.

I think that analogy is perfectly sound. But if we ever come to the position—and I do not believe it will ever happen—where the commonwealth speaks with one voice, whether it be in the council of the league of nations, at Dumbarton Oaks, at San Francisco, or at any other conference which may be held in the future, then I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that it is as certain as night follows day that the friction, the difficulties and differences which would be bound to arise under those conditions would irretrievably break those commonwealth nations to pieces. And so the path of wisdom is to continue on the basis of close and continuous consultation developed through the years. By the aid of the progress made in modern means of communication this is easy, and the prime ministers of Great Britain, Canada, Australia and South Africa can be in daily touch with each other.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Proceed.

Mr. CRERAR: They are in daily touch with each other. And that is the line along which this wise, safe and sound development must take place. The moment we try to draw closer, to get these different entities together, we are going to have trouble.

Mr. GREEN: Are we not fighting a war together?

Mr. CRERAR: I now pass on to only one or two comments on Dumbarton Oaks itself. As I see it, there are two important features in the Dumbarton Oaks proposals which are worthy of note. The proposals themselves as a whole afford an excellent basis for discussions which will take place at San Francisco. First is the voting procedure in the security council. It will be noted that that was left blank, and that no decision was reached at Dumbarton Oaks concerning it. Now, as a result of the Yalta conference it is cleared up to the extent that any one of the permanent members of the league who may be charged with aggression cannot refuse to have the case ventilated; but they can refuse to permit punitive action, should a decision go against them. In other words, as someone has said, the league council may draw up an indictment, but it cannot enforce that indictment against a recalcitrant member. That, it seems to me, is a definite weakness in the proposed league structure; but so important is this conference that, if that cannot be bridged, then I would be for supporting it as it stands.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): So would I.

Mr. CRERAR: I can understand the reason for this difficulty. Everyone knows that until a few years ago there was a great deal of suspicion and distrust in Russia of other countries; and I am bound to say there was some basis for that suspicion and distrust. But I do not like that provision in the Dumbarton Oaks proposal, and I hope it may be possible to have it changed.

There is one other point I should like to mention. One of the questions which undoubtedly will come up at the California conference is the manner in which force may be used against a law-breaker—an international gangster—once judgment has been rendered against that law-breaker. This is a matter of great importance. The old league had no teeth in it. As I see it, there is no use in trying to build a peace structure if the machinery is not there for quick and certain punishment for any nation, whether it be big or small, that violates the code. Punishment must be quick and it must be certain. In this respect I should like to quote a statement made by former Governor Stassen of Minnesota in a recent address to Minnesota university. He is one of those who does not belong to the isolationist school in the United States now, if he ever did. He said:

That as a nation we will join with our present allies . . . to build a definite continuing organization of the united nations of the world based on justice and law and insured by force.

He went on to say that it might be necessary to give up a little sovereignty, and he then made what I think was a pertinent statement when he said:

There may be diplomats who do not know it; there may be many political leaders who are afraid to admit it; there may be many people who do not understand it, but the extreme principle of absolute nationalistic sovereignty is of the middle ages and it is dead. It died with the aeroplane, the radio, the rocket and the robomb.

I think that is a profoundly true statement. If at San Francisco, and what follows, the nations of the world cannot work out some means of maintaining and ensuring peace in the world, even at the expense of a bit of their sovereignty, then black indeed are the years that lie ahead.

Mr. HOMUTH: It must be action on the minute, not waiting for parliament.

Mr. CRERAR: I agree with the hon. member for Waterloo South. The aggressor will have to be dealt with quickly and effectively. It is much the same as a fire brigade in a municipality. If a fire were to break out on one of the streets of Ottawa, it would be poor business if the city council had to be called together to decide whether or not the fire fighting apparatus should be sent out.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not the Prime Minister's position or Mr. Fielding's position.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend is not right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think I am.

Mr. CRERAR: I must close because hon. members have been very patient with me. This business of peace is urgent because if it is not achieved, then the outlook for the future is black indeed. Yesterday I went to the civic hospital to call on a friend who is there for a few days. As I was waiting on the floor the elevator came down and a young man in uniform stepped out. He was with an elderly couple—I imagine his parents—one on his right hand and the other on his left. It required only a moment's glance to realize that the young man had been blinded, probably for life. He was very uncertain in his step. He wore the uniform of the Canadian army.

I think again of a young man from Saskatchewan who was in our naval services and who lost his life less than two years ago in the wintry, icy waters of the north Atlantic. I think of another young man from Ontario who crashed to eternity over Germany with his companions in a burning plane.

When I think of these young men who sacrificed and died that we might continue to enjoy liberty and freedom, and as well of all the terrible miseries that have been inflicted on the world through this war, I say that there is no reasonable length to which the Canadian people should not go to try to prevent for ever any recurrence of this catastrophe.

That is the great business that is to be dealt with at San Francisco. I know the way is going to be difficult. It will be something like the pilgrim on the way to the celestial city. The road is not going to be easy, but we must persevere. We must go ahead doing the right as God gives us to see the right. If we do we may with some hope in our hearts look forward to the state of society pictured by the Hebrew prophet of old, under conditions not greatly dissimilar to those of to-day, where every man can sit under his own vine and fig tree enjoying the fruits of his own labour and where none dare molest him or make him afraid.

Mr. A. H. BENICE (Saskatoon City): Mr. Speaker, I read with a great deal of pleasure the proposals and purposes agreed upon at Dumbarton Oaks last October. The plan quite frankly is an experiment, just as the old league of nations was an experiment, but in view of the fact that, as the Right Hon. Anthony Eden put it the other day, the San Francisco conference which is being called for the purpose of considering the Dumbarton Oaks proposals may well be the world's last chance, it is imperative that everything be done to ensure that the possibilities of future wars be reduced to the very minimum which men and nations of good will can achieve.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

I say that I read the Dumbarton Oaks proposals with pleasure, but I cannot say that I listened with as much satisfaction to the statement of government policy which was given to the House of Commons and the Canadian people last Tuesday by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). Before dealing with his statement, let me say that I was astounded at the political play that was made by some hon. members on the government side and some hon. members of the C.C.F. party over the desire of His Majesty's opposition to scrutinize carefully that statement of government policy. We were accused by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) of handing the answering over to the C.C.F. The members of this party, Mr. Speaker, have been giving to the Dumbarton Oaks proposals very earnest consideration for many months, but as the official opposition in this house we have the duty to scrutinize and, where necessary, to criticize important statements of government policy. Invariably in the past so far as my recollection goes, though I must admit I have not been in this house so very long, when the government has made any important statement of policy never have we been denied the right to examine it for at least twenty-four hours, and I fail to understand why there was such great surprise, or simulated surprise, on the part of some hon. members with respect to the desire of our party to examine this most important statement of government policy. I can understand that some hon. members opposite would probably be prepared to go on with their speeches, following as they do in so many cases the leadership of the Prime Minister. I can quite understand the C.C.F. being prepared to go on, following its practice and coming to this house with a rigid formula which they were prepared to express without any consideration of what the Prime Minister was going to say. I presume they did not know what was going to be in the Prime Minister's statement. Certainly the opposition did not know. As the leader of the C.C.F. made an uncalled-for attack over the radio on our party saying that we were not prepared to go on, I should like to inform his listeners if I could that he came into this house with a prepared typewritten statement in answer to the important statement of government policy made by the Prime Minister, not knowing what that statement was going to be.

Our role in this house, Mr. Speaker, is far different from that of pronouncing rigid formulae or indulging in unnecessary platitudes. I feel sure that all reasonable persons, examining that statement of the Prime Minister, will conclude that the stand we took was the only proper one, because it is my opinion, as I believe it is the opinion of many people in this country, that if the intention indicated in that statement is carried out, it will gravely affect the possibility of an effective agreement being arrived at in San Francisco.

I want to refer to one other significant point which many members have lost sight of, and that is that the Prime Minister stated that it will be the government policy which will prevail so far as Canada's attitude is concerned at San Francisco. His words were:

The government itself will, of course, assume its constitutional responsibility both for the selection of the delegation and for any decisions which are agreed to at San Francisco.

In view of this statement, we as members of the official opposition would be derelict in our duty to the Canadian people if we did not examine most carefully the statement of government policy which is going to prevail so far as our attitude at San Francisco is concerned.

The Prime Minister in his speech removed what seemed to me to be the very kernel of the means by which we hope that the plan now proposed for world security will be more successful than the league of nations. The principal difference between this plan and the league of nations was referred to by the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), a short time ago when he said that this plan would have teeth in it. Only a day or so ago I read an article by Henry Morgenthau, Jr., in which he very aptly said with respect to this new world organization:

It is an organization for maintaining peace and political security which for the first time has teeth in it.

I repeat: "which for the first time has teeth in it." To my mind, Mr. Speaker, the important distinction between the league of nations and the plan now proposed is the fact that this plan has teeth in it. Under the old league we practically told Italy and Germany that we would not resort to arms and the consequence was these two nations were able to go on with perfect confidence in their plans for world conquest and world domination. Under the present plan, if it is carried out in the manner in which I understand it will be carried out, the security council will have the power to act, and to act without delay, and to my mind it is that power which will do more than any other single factor to stop aggression in the future.

To my mind the Prime Minister in his speech has indicated an attitude which will emasculate completely the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. Paragraph 5 of section B of chapter

VIII, which I am not going to read into the record because it has been referred to by many other hon. members, provides that agreements will be entered into by the respective members of the assembly as soon as possible after the agreement is arrived at at San Francisco. Paragraph 6 of the same section indicates that it is the intention that the security council shall be able to act expeditiously. The Prime Minister, as I understand him, anticipates that Canada would enter such an agreement, but he suggested that the undertaking would provide that the use of military force might be confined to the territorial boundaries of the country. He indicated, as I understand him, that if action subsequently was required a second agreement would be entered into which would receive the approval of parliament.

But, Mr. Speaker, the whole value of the security council is that we would be able to act quickly; what in the world is the use of having to go and obtain an agreement from parliament after a crisis has arisen? You will destroy the whole effect of the power of this security council to prevent future aggression. If the Prime Minister believes that his attitude is proper with respect to this country, he must concede the same attitude with respect to the other countries. We shall then have this ridiculous situation: that a crisis arises, that everything possible is done to settle that crisis without success, and finally the security council decides to resort to force; then each nation must go back to its governing body for ratification of the decision which has been made. If the Prime Minister's view carries the day, in my judgment we might just as well wash the whole thing down the river, because we cannot expect to be a beneficiary of these proposals unless we are prepared to do our part. As the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Martin) put it the other day, speaking only a short while after the Prime Minister had made his statement—Hansard, page 42:

Before the adjournment I concluded by saying that one had to recognize that if the world security organization now under discussion was to be operative, we had to realize also that power without responsibility, which characterized the failure of the league, would also characterize the failure of this organization.

As the Prime Minister himself said, speaking in this chamber last session, when he indicated his belief that power must be retained on the side of the peace-loving nations—Hansard, page 5908:

I said in the House of Commons last January that it was indeed true beyond question "that the peace of the world depends on preserving on the side of peace a large superiority of power, so that those who wish to disturb the peace can have no chance of success."

San Francisco Conference

Surely, Mr. Speaker, my colleagues in this house were right when they have said during the course of this debate that the day of "no foreign commitments" is done; and why we cannot come to the position of realizing it and being frank enough to admit it, is incomprehensible to me. It is obvious that if the security council is to have power, real power, it must have the threat of force to be used quickly. I ask the Prime Minister, as other hon. members have done, if he will clear up this point beyond any misunderstanding either on the part of hon. members or on the part of the Canadian people. I do not understand why there should be any hesitancy about committing ourselves fully to the application of force in answer to aggression, because under the proposals which have been made the security council cannot act unless all those holding seats in the council decide to do so. That means, if force is to be used, Russia, Great Britain, the United States, China, and possibly France—if she comes into it—must all decide and be unanimous on it, together with the power holding the one other seat on the council. Does anyone think for one minute that if these nations decide to engage in another world war, Canada can stay out of it? The Prime Minister does not think so, because when he made his speech the other day he said this—Hansard, page 30:

Were another great war to break out in twenty or thirty years, or at any time in the future, it is certain that Canada would not escape its fury. The development of new weapons, the development in particular of the flying-bomb and the rocket projectile, are making it impossible for any country to claim immunity from sudden aggression. So long as might is made a substitute for right by any nation there can be no security for this, or the next or any succeeding generation of Canadians.

These are grave words, Mr. Speaker, and I believe that they are accurate ones. The San Francisco conference is called for the purpose of planning a permanent peace. I want to make perfectly clear my belief that, with the type of evil which has been established in the world and which has kept this whole globe engulfed in war for over five and one-half years, in order to preserve the peace we must keep strong, at least until that evil has been removed; and the fact that we are strong and that our enemies will know we are strong will do a great deal to prevent future wars.

I personally am not in favour of early disarmament except of the aggressor nations. What have we in this country to fear by being armed? What have the peace-loving nations to fear from being armed? I say that we have nothing to fear, unless it be a repetition of what happened last time, when we were allowed to become weak and the forces of evil were allowed to become strong. We shall need to keep our armies and armaments in good shape for many years to come. I hope most fervently that never again shall we hear bleatings in this house or outside of it to the effect that our expenditures should be reduced to one dollar; that never again shall we hear in this house or outside of it statements to the effect that the British connection is our gravest danger. I hope that never again shall we listen to absurdities such as the question which was asked as to whom we are arming against. Surely after two wars we know whom we must stand armed against. That should be abundantly clear. The evil forces which are opposed to our way of life will continue on in the nations of Japan and Germany and Italy for many years after this war is over. These evils cannot be eradicated overnight, nor were the forces of these evils started in Germany with the advent of Hitler. He merely exploited what had begun years before; because after all, the spirit of nazism is not so different from the spirit of junkerism; in fact nazism is a product of junkerism, and if nazism fails, as it will, the spirit of junkerism will continue on, planning and scheming with some new device to bring about its final objective, world conquest. It was so in the Weimar republic when the democracies were foolish enough to believe that Germany had developed a new spirit and a new outlook. During those days, as we know now, the military caste in Germany were planning for "Der Tag" and they will be planning after this war.

[Mr. Bence.]

It is my personal judgment that we must render Germany militarily impotent for at least a hundred years to come, and we can do that only if we remain strong and united in that resolve. The German nation has been smarting under its defeat since the last war, a defeat which it never admitted in its own heart. It was that spirit that made Hitler perform the ridiculous function of calling back the old railway carriage when France capitulated so that he and his people could gloat over the humiliation of the French. It is that natural spirit of race superiority, that belief in the Herrenvolk, that is our greatest menace to permanent peace, and I say it must be crushed in some manner or other.

The Prime Minister has said that the peace treaties and the manner in which the aggressor nations shall be punished have nothing to do with the San Francisco conference. Nevertheless they are inextricably bound up with the San Francisco conference because the machinery which is established there will have to enforce the peace treaties that are made.

In conclusion, may I say 'this, I am very sorry indeed that this matter has to be considered by this parliament. I realize of course that another parliament will have to ratify the agreement arrived at in San Francisco, but to all intents and purposes it will be cut and dried. We shall have to accept what is arrived at there, or nothing at all. I am sorry that this parliament has to consider this matter and make suggestions to the government, because it is not representative of the people. It is particularly not representative of the men who have been fighting this war. We should have with us here the men who have gone through the bitterness and hardships of the battles of Italy, France and Germany, the men who are manning our ships and flying our aeroplanes. We should have them because—and I say this with all respect—their perspective is a better one than ours.

We in this country have lived in comparative luxury. To many of us the rigours of war have meant very little. The men who should be here to guide us with their suggestions are those who have seen the brutality of the Hun in all its viciousness, the men who know from bitter experience that everything, and I mean everything, must be done to see that that type of bestiality never again obtains the ascendancy on this earth. Those are the fathers of the sons who may be called upon to fight another war twenty or twenty-five years from now if we do not do what is proper at this time. With all respect I suggest again that the members of this house, most of whom will not be here twenty years from now, have not the same views in regard to the preservation of peace for the future that the men and women serving in our armed forces have, and whose voices should be heard at this time.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to join with those who have indicated their support of the resolution now before the house, the main purpose of which is to approve the sending of a Canadian delegation to the forthcoming conference at San Francisco. I should like to associate myself as well with those who have expressed the view that this is perhaps the most important resolution that has yet come before the parliament of Canada. I believe it to be literally true that the future of this nation and the future of mankind depend upon the ability of the nations that meet at San Francisco to bring into being a world organization capable of securing the peace of the world.

I have concurred in the suggestion that this is a most important debate, but I would point out that there will be another of even greater importance on the same subject, perhaps in September or October of this year, when the new parliament will be called upon to consider and ratify the charter adopted at San Francisco. I mention this for a purpose. I do so in order to point out how terribly tragic it would be if that next debate were not to take place; how tragic it would be if the conference at San Francisco were not to succeed. Mr. Speaker, San Francisco must not fail. The conference there may not be able to achieve everything. It may not be able to reduce to writing a perfect pattern for international relations. It may not be able to guarantee for all time that peace on earth among men of good will of which many of us still dream. But the alternative to setting up a world security organization at San Francisco is a prospect so terrible that it cannot be considered for a moment by any people with any gray matter at all.

When one thinks of the toll of the two wars which have occupied ten years in the life of this nation since 1914, ten years out of the last thirty-one, one cannot but accept it as a challenge, this time, to take whatever definite steps are clearly necessary in order to preserve the peace of the world. I take my stand therefore with the leader of this group, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggan (Mr. Coldwell), in his contention that the Canadian delegation should go to San Francisco determined to get the best charter that can be drafted, determined to seek improvements at every point in the Dumbarton Oaks proposals where improvements are obviously necessary, but at the same time conscious of the fact that its first duty is to pull its weight for the definite establishment of a world security organization. Our delegation must bring back the best charter they can, but the first consideration is that the delegation bring back to Canada a charter, even if it is not absolutely perfect, for the next parliament of this country to consider, and I trust to ratify.

Having made that clear as my position, and it is the position of the entire C.C.F. organization, I should like to offer constructive criticism of some portions of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. I believe there is far more support in constructive criticism than there is in blind acceptance of what may be handed to us by world leaders, however great they may be.

Let me put it in this way. I feel that there are three fundamental conditions which are basic to the success of a world organization, and I trust that the San Francisco conference will see to it that these three basic conditions are met. First of all, if a world organization is to succeed, it must have authority to enact international law. In the second place, such an organization must have authority to enforce that law. In the third place, it must have the capacity to retain the authority vested in it by the consent of the governed.

May I come back to my first point, that a successful world organization must have authority to enact international law. I feel that that is basic to the whole matter now before this house and the world. If at the end of this war we simply draw up another series of multilateral treaties which those who are not party thereto may ignore; if we set up an organization whose only purpose is to deal with an emergency when it arises, or if we are to revert to the old idea of balance-of-power arrangements and mutual assistance pacts, I am afraid that we shall not have made very much progress.

What the world must try to do is to set up an organization at the international level, to which the nations of the world will give some of the powers of government, specific legislative authority to enact international law, law which in certain well-defined spheres will bind the entire world. That point has already been made by the leader of this group, by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), and by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), all of whom have said that our task now is to bring international relations within the rule of law. My fear is that not everyone discussing this matter, even in this house, has yet realized that this is the basic consideration. There is still altogether too much talk that savours of the old order of multilateral treaties and mutual assistance pacts and balance-of-power arrangements. The previous speaker spoke about getting ourselves as peace-loving nations into positions of particular power. I appreciate the spirit in which he made this reference; but I contend, Mr. Speaker, that we shall not make any real headway until we get out of that realm and begin to think in terms of definite international law which all the nations of the world will be obligated to obey. The pleas that are being made for a modification of the tremendous powers vested in the great states, the proposals that are being offered for a more effective voice for small nations, the arguments that are being advanced against the veto power of the great states, and other considerations such as these, are indicative of the desire of people who are wrestling with this matter to get out of the realm of multilateral treaties and mutual assistance pacts into the realm of world government on a democratic basis. Therefore I suggest that Dumbarton Oaks, while its proposals are encouraging—I insist that we must have nothing less—falls short on this critical point.

[Mr. Knowles.]

I was interested in reading a comment on this point a few days ago in the March, 1945, issue of the League of Nations News. This publication reminded its readers that some months ago the league of nations society of Canada addressed a letter to the leaders of the political parties in this country, to which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the leader of this group (Mr. Coldwell) replied, stating the views of the league of nations society with respect to a new world organization. One of the important points which the society laid down was this:

The assembly should have specific legislative power to declare and enact international law.

The League of Nations News goes on to comment on the Dumbarton Oaks proposals with respect to the point which I have just quoted. It expresses my view precisely. This is what it has to say on the matter:

There is silence on the question of legislative power. The assembly is to be entitled to consider the general principles of cooperation to maintain peace and security, including the principles of disarmament and the regulation of armament, and to make recommendations regarding any such principles. To whom such recommendations are to be made is not stated, but it may be assumed that recommendations would go to member nations for adoption in the form of multilateral treaties, much as has been done with the many excellent conventions emanating from the international labour office. This is by no means a satisfactory method of creating a body of international law. Much of our present international law exists in treaty form which binds only the parties to the treaty. It is always open to non-parties to plead that they are not bound. There should be universality of international law and the assembly should be clothed with powers to enact such laws. This is of exceedingly great importance.

In connection with this whole matter of the rule of law in international relations, which is what we are aiming at, I should like to make a comment on the power of expulsion which is referred to in chapter V, section B, subsection 3 of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. The power to expel would imply that the nations might also have the power to withdraw from the organization. I believe that is a definite weakness; it suggests again the old idea of treaties and arrangements among nations rather than the new idea which we are trying to get started, namely, that of establishing a body of international law to which all the nations of the world are obligated.

The implication in the power to expel or the right to withdraw is that a recalcitrant nation can be put or can put itself beyond the pale of the law. The day must come, and the sooner the better, when that is not the case. In other words, just as quickly as we can attain it, we must have universal and permanent membership in a world organization, and we must get away from the old idea of treaties and pacts and balance of power, and get down to the job in hand, namely that of establishing a body of international law.

I have already indicated, and I wish to repeat it, that in my view the Canadian delegation must bring back from San Francisco nothing less than is in the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. But I suggest there is room for improvement, room for bringing back something more. At this point in my remarks, one thing which I say our delegation should bring back is a charter which gives to the new united nations organization the power to enact law. And I hope that, once that power has been granted, we will start in to build up a code of international law, binding on the entire world.

The second point which I gave as basic to the success of a world organization is the authority to enforce international law. This is a matter which has been given a good deal of consideration and discussion during the debate. Those of us who are supporting the resolution are agreed on the necessity for such authority, and indications are that there is considerable agreement on this point in other nations as well. Accordingly I hope that at San Francisco the obscurity about the methods of enforcement, which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) pointed out, will be cleared up.

I should like to say a word about that obscurity, that lack of clarity. Chapter VIII, section B, subsections 1 and 4 of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals seem to make it clear that the security council is to have power to enforce the judgment of the new organization. On the other hand subsection 5 of that same section indicates that whether or not the security council will have any force with which to give effect to its decisions hinges on the agreements to be made between the various member states and the security council.

The Prime Minister has been subjected to a good deal of criticism because of his statement on this point, which he made at page 26 of Hansard; in the second column:

One point, however, is clear. As they stand, the acceptance of the proposals would in no way commit Canada to send forces beyond Canadian territory at the call of the security council. If any such commitment were sought, it would be embodied in a later agreement, freely negotiated by the government of Canada, and coming into effect only after it had been approved by parliament.

I join in the view that it is regrettable that that statement was made. But I imagine when the Prime Minister replies to this criticism he will remind the house of a statement on the other side of the fence, which he made on the same page. In the first column on page 27 he said something which, I notice, hon. members to my right, who desire, it would seem, only to be critical, and not to be fair, have not bothered to quote. These are the Prime Minister's words in the first column of page 26:

The new security organization would be founded on a clear recognition of the fact that world security is based upon the maintenance of a large superiority of power on the side of peace. It is also recognized that machinery would have to be devised to make it possible to apply such power instantly and effectively, should another aggressor arise to disturb international peace.

Critics of the Prime Minister will point out that he has put it both ways, and that one can have his choice. I do not like that way of putting things; the Prime Minister does it too often. But I will say this, in his defence, that that is the way the Dumbarton Oaks proposals read. One cannot but take both of those ideas from Dumbarton Oaks itself. If one reads chapter VIII, section B, subsections 1 and 4 he gets the impression of power to enforce decisions. Then if one reads subsection 5 he will see that it all depends on the agreements made between the security council and the various member nations. Then there is further confusion when one reads subsection 6 which seems to call for the setting up of some minimum police force, ready for use in any emergency until such time as a meeting of the council can be held. That is good, but the whole picture in the Dumbarton Oaks proposals is just as confused, I submit, as it is in the Prime Minister's analysis of those proposals.

I am trying to be fair in discussing this matter. I want to deal with it not on a partisan basis but as a Canadian interested in the peace of the world. In that connection it seems to me that in this debate we should not be trying to make political capital back and forth out of the different viewpoints which are suggested, but rather we should be pointing out to the Canadian delegation any weaknesses in Dumbarton Oaks itself. The basic fault is not in the Prime Minister's statement; what is wrong is the arrangement set out in the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. Our delegation should go to San Francisco and endeavour to have that arrangement corrected.

What is wrong with the arrangement in the matter of each nation's obligation to the security council? It is this, that the commitments each nation will be asked to make to the security council are to be subject to separate agreements between the nations and the council. Apparently they are to be arrived at secretly. I submit that that leaves all the room in the world for hard bargaining and unequal arrangements, which means trouble ahead. One nation sitting down with the security council is interested in sending as little force as possible, in the event of police action against an aggressor. They drive a hard bargain. Another nation comes along, with the kind of government in power that is prepared to overreach itself; they make commitments which might be too much for that nation to carry out. And so you have inequalities, so far as obligations and commitments are concerned. Then when trouble breaks out, and nations are called upon to measure up to their unequal commitments, there is going to be a great deal of dissatisfaction, and the whole effort at collective security might easily be wrecked.

My view is this, that the obligation which a nation will have to the security council should be based on a formula openly arrived at in the assembly of the new organization. For purposes of illustration I will put it in this way: With the government of the Prime Minister in power when an agreement is made, the bargain driven might be considerably different from the bargain which would be offered if some other group were in power—for instance, a government of hon. members to my right. I do not want either. I do not want the extent of Canada's obligation to be decided on the basis of any party's viewpoint. I want the extent of every nation's obligation to be decided at the assembly of the united nations on the basis of a formula openly arrived at, a formula which applies equally to every nation of the world. We could never carry on in Canada under confederation if the tax obligation, let us say, of the citizens of the various provinces was arrived at as a result of bargaining between the provincial and federal governments. The only way we can carry on satisfactorily in a confederation is by having authority over national matters centred with the federal parliament. I submit if we are going to have satisfactory arrangements in respect of the commitments nations will make to a world security force, then the place for the formula to be decided upon is in the assembly of the new united nations.

I repeat that the issue before us is not the bargain that the present government might drive and about which my hon. friends to our right are having so much to say. The issue before the house to-day is the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. Let us study them and decide whether or not they are right. On this particular point I feel that they fall short and I hope that the delegation which represents Canada at San Francisco will press for the establishing of a formula on the basis of which each nation's obligation will be indicated, this to be done in open session of the assembly of the united nations.

[Mr. Knowles.]

I move on to my third point which is that the success of the new world organization will depend on its capacity to retain the authority vested in it by the member nations. It is an axiom that authority in any governmental body derives from the consent of the governed. That will apply to a world organization perhaps with even greater force than it does to a national government or to governments on still lower levels. Therefore I think it is exceedingly important that every possible step be taken to win for this new united nations organization the full consent, not only of the governments and parliaments of the various member nations but of all the peoples of the world. If that consent is going to be won, and if it is going to be maintained throughout the life of this organization, it is extremely important that it be set up on a democratic basis.

I recognize all of the practical problems that have been advanced in connection with such matters as the voting powers of the security council, the right of veto and all the rest of it, but I submit that if this organization is going to carry on and do its job over a period of time it must become more democratic in its functioning than it will be if improvements are not made in the Dumbarton Oaks proposals.

The suggestion has been made a number of times that if the three big powers fall out, the world itself will fall apart and break into another war. That may or may not be true, but I would remind the house of the rest of the picture. Even if the three big powers stick together that is no guarantee of world-wide peace and human accord if the rest of the member nations in the organization feel that the show is being run not in a democratic way but by the big powers at the top. I cannot stress too strongly the importance in the long run of increasing the democratic nature of the functioning of this organization.

A number of members have already asked what will happen when the security council finds it necessary to call for action against an aggressor and calls upon a nation not having a seat on the council to come through with its commitment and supply forces for use in some distant part of the world. I submit that if the control of the organization is in the hands of a small group there may be trouble when such a crisis comes; but if through the years, through the day to day functioning of this organization, it is carried on on a democratic basis so that the peoples of the nations feel that the decisions of the world organization are their decisions, then when important judgments are given there will be a much better chance of those decisions being accepted by the peoples of the nations concerned, no matter how drastic they may be.

In the matter of the new organization retaining its authority one of its most important branches will be the economic and social council. I want to join with those who have urged that the importance of this economic and social council should be stressed most strongly at San Francisco. The Prime Minister said during the course of his remarks that the main function of the police is not to catch criminals but to make it obvious that crime does not pay. He was referring to international crime. I go further. I feel that the job of this organization is not just to make it obvious that war does not pay; its job is to make it obvious that peace does pay.

I want to propose that the economic and social council should interest itself in such things as housing. That could be done without interfering with the sovereignty of the various nations. The council could establish a clearing house for research and information on the subject and give itself, with all the ingenuity at its command, to the endeavour to have the homes in which people live throughout the world improved, as definite proof of the fact that peace really pays.

Then the council should interest itself in health and education, in social security standards, and in matters now under the direction of the international labour organization. Many other matters have been mentioned during the course of this debate, such as cartels, world trade and so on. Then the council should interest itself in the possibility of increasing travel throughout the world by the peoples of all nations. The common people in all the nations should be given the chance to see the world and to get to know each other better. In other words, our task is to build a peace which is more than just an absence of war. We must have a peace which makes possible human accord and a higher standard of living for the common people everywhere.

Let us give all the support we can to the endeavour to set up the kind of world organization that will prevent another war. Let us make all the commitments that are necessary to guarantee the effectiveness of that machinery. Once we have done that, once we have taken steps that will make sure that there will not be another war, let us get on with our world business in the same way as in our local communities, once we have set up our police and fire departments, we go right ahead with the ordinary business of living. Let us cease talking about world war III; I urge that we get out of our minds the idea that another conflict is inevitable. Having established the machinery to prevent war we should get on with the job of building a positive peace in terms of human accord and better standards of living for the common people of the entire world.

I turn now to a few comments I should like to make on behalf of this group on some of the viewpoints that have been expressed during this debate. One viewpoint was expressed by two hon. members not now in their places to the effect that we should give blind support to the ideas handed out by the leaders of the big three nations, that we should not be guilty of making any criticism of their proposals. As I have indicated already we take the position that there is far more support in constructive criticism than there is in giving blind approval. That is all I need to say on that.

Another position has been enunciated by the leader of the Social Credit group (Mr. Blackmore). I shall try to be as fair as I can in stating briefly his position. As I understood it, he took the view that Canada must not surrender any of its national sovereignty. He expressed himself as being opposed to the organization envisaged in the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. He wanted to make it clear to the house that the Social Credit group was not to be regarded as being opposed to any and every kind of world organization. He said that they would want Canada to join a world organization under certain conditions. I listened closely to those conditions and studied them closely in Hansard afterwards, and it seems to me that basically they amount to this, that the social credit group is prepared to have Canada join a world organization, provided that in that organization Canada retains all her national sovereignty and is not called upon to submit herself to any international law even if she participates in its enactment.

So far as we are concerned, Mr. Speaker, that is the negation of law in international relations. It is, to put it in the simplest language I know, international anarchy. It is to us utterly unthinkable that we should resort to that sort of set-up after the sacrifices that our people have made during the past six years. We must move forward, not backward.

Another viewpoint that has been expressed in the course of this debate has already been under discussion this afternoon. I refer to the idea proposed by our hon. friends of the Progressive Conservative party that Canada should seek to be represented on the security council through a single voice speaking on behalf of the British empire or the British commonwealth of nations. On behalf of our group I want to say that we feel that we cannot have the British commonwealth of nations speaking at one time with one voice and at other times with several voices, that you cannot be one bloc on the security council and five or more different nations in the assembly. The proposal, although it may seem to be heart-warming in certain quarters, really lacks logic, and is impossible to achieve. For example, if the proposal were to be carried out, what nation would sit in the security council on behalf of the empire? Would it be the United Kingdom? If so, the dominions are shoved out into the cold. Would it be Canada? If that alternative is proposed it means that our friends of the Progressive Conservative party are shoving the United Kingdom out in the cold, which is amazing, coming from them. Would it be an alternating proposition, first one dominion and then another, with the United Kingdom taking its turn? If so, I submit that it would be placing the United Kingdom and the British commonwealth as a whole in a weaker position than that of the other four great powers on the security council.

But entirely apart from the illogicality of the proposal we of this group feel that such a step would have the effect of replacing the free association of independent nations which we now enjoy within the commonwealth by a rigid bloc, and if that were brought about, it would destroy the strength of the commonwealth as well as the strength of the individual nations within it. We hear a lot of talk about breaking up the empire. That would be the surest way to break up the association that we now know as the British commonwealth of nations. Its strength, its integrity and its genius would soon be gone.

Furthermore, a move such as that would put Canada back in the status of a colony and would betray the aspirations of Canadian nationhood which mean so much to our Canadian people and particularly to our young men who have fought in this war. They would not agree to that idea at all.

And so, Mr. Speaker, we feel definitely that there should be no going back. These are days for moving forward everywhere. We are proud of Canada's connection with the British commonwealth of nations. We are proud that our connection is that of an independent nation within the group enjoying the free associations that have meant so much to us and will mean more as time marches on. But in world affairs we feel definitely that Canada's job is to pull her weight as the independent nation she fully deserves to be.

Just before I finish I want to suggest two matters which I feel the Canadian delegation might well raise at the San Francisco conference. I suggest them briefly. First there is the question of dependent peoples. This must be dealt with. I feel, to put it briefly, that the states ruling over dependent peoples should be called upon by the new world organization to recognize their responsibility to an international commission for contributing to the social and economic advancement of dependent peoples and their responsibility for the advancement of self-government among them.

The other matter that I feel should be raised at the conference is the Jewish question, with particular reference to matters arising out of the Balfour declaration that followed the last war. All of us know that these people have suffered tremendously, perhaps more than any other people, during the course of this conflict. All of us know that one of the vilest and most poisonous results of this war has been the growth of anti-Semitism, deliberately fostered by Hitler himself, and I feel that any steps that can be taken to set up an antidote to this poisonous thing is good not only for the Jewish people but for all the rest of us as well. I am not going into detail at this time. I merely ask that the Canadian delegation see that matters relating to the special sufferings of the Jewish people are raised during the course of the discussions at San Francisco.

The Canadian people, Mr. Speaker, have made a great contribution through our fighting men and women and our workers on the industrial front and on the farms to the winning of this war. What we have done, we have not done alone. That way we would have been helpless. But recognizing as we have the indivisibility of the common cause, having pulled our weight in whatever way we could, the Canadian people have brought honour and glory to the name of this country.

We can do the same in the battle for peace. We shall not do it, however, if we go to international conferences sparring for prestige and power, seeking to align ourselves with this group or that, so as to get into the most favourable position on a balance of power basis. But we shall bring new glory and new honour to the name of Canada if at San Francisco and at other international conferences in the future we pull our weight for the establishment of a world organization based upon the principles which alone can guarantee permanent peace. I want to underline what my colleague the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) said the other night on this point. The important factor is not the leaders who come on to the stage and pass off again; what is important is the establishing of principles which will guarantee peace on a permanent basis. And so in conclusion I would say that if Canada at San Francisco and in the years that lie ahead will work for the establishing of principles, will pull its weight for world peace and all that peace can mean in terms of human accord and a better life for the common man, this nation, this Canada, will achieve a destiny than which there is none greater.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. J. A. BLANCHETTE (Compton): Mr. Speaker, the period following a victorious war, and I believe that we are about to attain that period very soon, is of special importance in the life of a nation and its citizenry. It is a time of readjustments, of new departures for the nations and for their peoples. Men and women first of all wish to pay due honour to their soldiers and fallen heroes who have made the peace possible, to pay the honour that is due their valiant men and women who have served on the land, in the air, or on the sea. The accomplishments of our military forces, of our men and women in our industries and on our farms, speak for themselves throughout the world, and for long in the after-years of peace shall we continue to glory in and be glorified for our effort toward the allied victory about to be attained.

The resolution now being debated in this house is therefore, as I see it, Mr. Speaker, predicated upon a world readjustment of nations, in which Canada wishes, and rightly so, to take part, first of all in the international field and also with its attendant consequences in our internal economy. The international affairs of mankind cannot be conducted in peace or toward peace by separate political units. If peace is to be maintained it can be effected more safely, I believe, only through unity of political action at the international level.

The first step toward that objective is the calling of a convention representative of the allied nations, or of as many as wish to attend, to provide for the institution of the mechanics—if you will—of looking after the international affairs of their peoples. I am not to be understood as restricting the term "international affairs" to things military; I include also the economic and social divisions of the interpretation of the term. The whole citizenry of the world desire peace, and this peace is now within our grasp, provided that the leaders of the nations have international vision and refuse to be subservient to those interests which profit from the continual fragmentation into national units. It was undoubtedly with this conviction in mind that our Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) stated on October 9 last, regarding the Dumbarton Oaks proposals:

Canada is vitally concerned that an effective international organization should be established for the maintenance of peace and security. It is generally recognized that agreement between the countries which have taken part in the discussions at Washington is an essential condition of success. Without the full participation of the greatest countries it would be impossible to establish an international system which could effectively maintain the peace of the world and achieve the necessary cooperation, not only in adjusting disputes and preventing war, but also in solving the great international problems of human welfare.

This press release of the Prime Minister was undoubtedly the preamble of the house resolution now before us.

As has already been stated here since the beginning of the debate, the San Francisco conference, which from now on is to be called officially "the united nations conference on international organization", is not a peace conference or a conference to enumerate or settle the post-war economic, social or political problems of the world. Neither is it to be a boundaries commission or a court of last resort on the cases of India or of any colonies or mandates, including the colonies and mandates of the enemy powers. Neither is this conference to be the drafting committee of a new code of international law, nor a reparations commission, nor a commission for the immediate supervision of Germany and of Japan later on. Finally, it is not a war criminals commission or court.

What the conference is to be is an international meeting to agree on the details of a world security league for the post-war era, including (a) an economic council, as machinery to adjust later developments in this field in the interests of peace and fair dealing among the participating nations; (b) a statute for a world court; and (c) a trusteeship plan for the colonies and mandates of the enemy nations. Beyond these duties and responsibilities, with the possible addition of some minor points, the San Francisco conference has none. Its objective therefore is to set up an organization which, when the necessary treaties are ratified by enough nations, will be authorized to employ its enumerated powers to maintain peace in the world as it then shall exist. This situation will issue from the ultimate peace settlement, which may or may not have been completed when the organization begins its work, but which the league will have the right to review, and the duty to press for such adjustments as may later be deemed necessary and constructive.

San Francisco Conference

It is recognized generally that it has a large and delicate and difficult task, and that a heavy enough burden rests on a group of nations meeting for the first time during the progress of a great and exhausting war, with the problems of liberation and peace already intruding.

The conference will have to work out a voting system for the proposed security council which will appeal to the intermediate and small nations as fair, just and wise. This system will have to be consonant with the responsibility and ability of the large nations to keep order in the interval between the end of hostilities and ultimate peace, and yet be eventually protective of all national sovereignties and dignities.

The San Francisco conference, therefore, as I see it, Mr. Speaker, is unlike the Paris-Versailles meeting, in that, although eventually it has to deal with peace, there is this distinction. The Paris-Versailles reunion took place after the end of hostilities, the surrender of the enemy, and the signing of an armistice. Paris-Versailles was concerned with the formation of a league to keep the peace, but it was simultaneously at work on the terms of that peace; and the tasks were completed at the same time and bound up in one treaty. The San Francisco meeting, however, is confined to forming a world league—only a part of the work done by the Paris-Versailles reunion—and the other part of the task, that of peace, is to be kept carefully separated. The Dumbarton Oaks proposals recognize the fact that the interests of individual nations lie in the international as well as in the national field, and the present war has by now convinced Germany that unfettered nationalism is a destructive philosophy; if we do not have international order we shall have international anarchy. A community of nations, like any other national association of mankind, possesses certain rights in its own name, and in so far as it speaks in its own name in the common interest of all humanity, the rights of these associations are paramount over those of any individual nation, however rich, however mighty, which may seek to violate the common good. In certain instances this may mean that compulsion will have to be effected; but if all compulsion were removed from human associations we would have not freedom but anarchy and insecurity. Freedom and compulsion, both long recognized in the organization of our social life, are at times fatally ignored in the field of our international relations.

I feel that it is to the interest of Canada that the Canadian delegation headed by our Prime Minister should take part in the deliberations of the united nations conference on international organization. I also feel that no one in this country is better qualified to lead that delegation than our own Prime Minister. I had the honour to be one of the delegates who attended the Bretton Woods conference held in July last year, and I wish here and now to pay public appreciation and congratulations to the able, competent and expert departmental delegates who represented Canada at that conference. They brought honour and prestige to Canada and were recognized by the delegates of the other forty-four nations present at the conference as leaders of thought and direction in the shaping of the policies discussed at Bretton Woods. The departmental delegates held responsible positions on committees of the conference, and I think the civil service is to be highly complimented upon the efficient and expert technical services which these faithful incumbents gave to Canada at Bretton Woods.

[Mr. Blanchette.]

Some of the reasons for my favouring the participation of Canada in this conference are, first of all, that Canada has nothing to gain by remaining out of it but a great deal to expect in contributing as it will to the general welfare of the dominion and to the cause of humanity. The organization is not perfect by any means. This is an exceedingly imperfect world in which progress is almost invariably obtained by evolution and not revolution. Second, practically all the peoples of the world have been wanting peace. They want peace to-day and they want peace for the future. Still we have had wars and are in a colossal war to-day which may be but a miniature edition of wars to come if some new mechanics are not evolved for peace. One of the pronounced evils of the world to-day is international hot-house finance combinations which must be brought to reason and to justice, and the new league provides the best and indeed the only present hope of curbing their excessive abuses. Third, the proposals of Dumbarton Oaks provide for the establishment of an economic and social council of eighteen members elected by the assembly to handle social, economic, labour and humanitarian agencies. This council should go far toward remedying the worst mistakes of the former league of nations, which was to centre its attention on political matters and almost ignore the economic and social aspects of the world.

Last but not least of this enumeration is the fact that our Canadian parliament remains supreme as to acceptance or rejection. The Dumbarton Oaks proposals only give authority to discuss and advise. For Canada to take part in this conference is for her to exercise rights of nationhood, the consciousness of which her people are gradually grasping since the statute of Westminster. We find this same change of opinion in the United States, where in 1920 very few were in favour of the Wilson league of nations thereby entailing international commitments. But to-day seven persons out of every ten in the United States are in favour of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals.

For the first time in her history, there is a definite Canadian army in the battlefield, a separate Canadian air force, a separate Canadian navy fighting because of the declaration of war by Canada, this also for the first time in her history. Since the present war began, Canadian legations and missions in a number of countries—the United States, Russia, China, Belgium, Chile and Brazil—have been raised to the status of full-fledged embassies on a reciprocal basis. The attainment of Canada's nationhood in the family of nations may have brought obligations on her which, as a corollary, to-day bestow upon her the rights of a nation in her international relations.

I fully accept the words, the very true words, of the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) during the course of this debate. He said that the old-time view of Canada's position within the empire as expressed by Kipling has changed. He voices the sentiments of many when he says that it should not be forgotten by the Canadian delegates to the conference that Canada is a north American nation and that she has interests and problems which are essentially different from those of the nations of Europe and Asia.

I also feel that if no one can speak for Canada no one should act for Canada. As to the spirit in which the conference is being approached by the member powers. I might say that the first declaration of Foreign Secretary Eden on March 21 last at Glasgow was:

We are determined that Europe shall only be united by the free will of its separate states. When that happy day comes, we shall hope to be in partnership with it. But we have never sought to create coalitions against European powers, unless they have pursued a policy of aggression. . . . It is against all traditions of our policy to allow unity among our great powers, to become a means to bully the smaller. There can be no freedom in the world, unless the smaller states can be joined with the great powers in their common interest.

Further on in his speech he said:

We hope to lay the foundations of this at San Francisco. This endeavour may well prove to be the world's last chance.

On the very same day, March 21, the Moscow radio declared:

Future international organization of security can in reality insure the interests of the small countries, only, if it becomes an effective organization; that is, if it will be built on the same foundation on which is being built the great structure of our common victory; that is, on agreement and unanimity, and the close collaboration of the main great powers of the anti-German coalition.

A press report of March 2 issuing from General Charles de Gaulle says:

France favours collective security and will make sacrifices of sovereignty to insure it, on condition that it be real and not deceptive, as in the league of nations, is the outstanding point made by the declaration of the government of France to-day. This declaration states that an immediate post-war peace will depend mainly on the harmony of the great powers.

A press release of March 24 from the secretary of state of the United States, reads as follows:

Joseph McCrew, acting secretary of state, affirmed to-day in a statement aimed at clarifying the question of voting procedure in the proposed international security council, that no one nation, could prevent discussion of any dispute or situation that might arise.

This same article quotes Secretary Hull's view as follows:

Without an enduring understanding between these four nations (United States, the British commonwealth, the Soviet Union and China) upon their fundamental purposes, interests and obligations to one another, all organizations to preserve peace are creations on paper, and the path is wide open again for the rise of a new aggressor.

This essential understanding and unity of action among the four nations is not in substitution, or derogation of, unity among the united nations, but it is basic to all organized action, because upon its reality depends the possibility of enduring peace, and free institutions, rather than new coalitions and a new pre-war period.

If these approaches of the various powers are sincere, Mr. Speaker, and I trust they are, then it will be seen that surely we should collaborate to the utmost in order to become a party to our security and also to world security. I also feel that whatever attitude is taken by the Canadian delegation at San Francisco it will be for the best interests of Canada. True it is that force remains as a medium of peace, but I believe it was Blaise Pascal who said:

Right without might is weakness, but might without right is tyranny. We must therefore combine right and might, making what is right mighty and what is mighty right.

In my humble opinion, to obtain such a combination is by common consent the major problem of world politics in our time.

That the right of small nations should be protected is to be gainsaid by no one, but at the same time let us not forget that small nations may have security at times, only if the big powers act together, and small nations will be trampled underfoot if the big powers fall apart.

The best protection which could be offered not only to small nations but to large nations and to the whole world would undoubtedly be the divine precept of love, charity and justice, and it would be salutary for all nations to have recourse to the inspirations of these three virtues, for then we could not be false to ourselves, to our country or to our fellow men, and if these three virtues would form the preamble of Dumbarton Oaks and all further world conferences, then I would prophesy the end of all wars and continued peace to the end of time.

If the power at the disposal of all the united nations is dissipated in disunity, or divided against itself, the result will be global anarchy and violence. If that power is kept united no other state or combination of states will rival it or stand against it.

In my humble opinion here lies the only surviving hope for world order. And as Secretary Eden has so truly said, it may well be the last hope. To lose that hope out of fear that power may be abused is to despair of man's capacity to master the instruments of his own devising. To reject that hope because it falls far short of past expectations is to forget that anarchy is the worst of evils. To grasp the opportunity now presented without illusion, with sincerity, with frankness and with clear perception of all difficulties and danger and to build with firm resolve a better mansion of order and freedom, on this foundation will be the highest service to mankind.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house met at eight o'clock.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might speak to a question of privilege before we proceed further. I should like to draw attention to a statement made by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Wood) as it appears at page 174 of Hansard, where he refers to what I said in this debate. He makes this statement at the page I have mentioned:

I was rather shocked to hear him say to-night—

Referring to me.

—that he would be prepared to have Canada send a force from this country to any part of the world regardless of the voice of parliament.

I want to state that I was present when the hon. member spoke. I did not hear him make those remarks. Had I done so I would have called attention to it at that time. In my remarks in this debate no such statement has been made by me. There is nothing to suggest any reason for the remarks of the hon. member for Brant, and I take this opportunity of making the correction. I do not want the country to believe, if this is quoted in the future, that I was prepared to have parliament abdicate. In view of the fact that the statement is completely incorrect I believe it should be expunged from the record.

[Mr. Blanchette.]

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, at the close of his remarks, the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Blanchette) uttered what I thought were some beautiful expressions in reference to the hopes being expressed in connection with the outcome of the conference to be held at San Francisco. I believe it was the poet Pope who, in his "Essay on Man," devoted several verses to the emotion "hope," that emotion which moves the human heart to go on and on, despite reversals and bitter trials. These were the poet's lines:

Hope springs eternal in the human breast;
Man never is, but always to be, blest.

And so it is very gratifying to see everywhere throughout the world the hope being expressed by statesmen as to what they expect will be achieved at San Francisco, namely, permanent peace.

Every hon. member who has spoken in the debate, beginning with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) who introduced the resolution, has urgently advocated that San Francisco result in permanent peace. Therefore it is interesting to see all hearts so full of hope as to the outcome of that conference.

In spite of my best hopes—and like others who have spoken, I am hopeful, and see a vision of permanent peace—I feel we should be on our guard, particularly those who are to be chosen to go to San Francisco. Something was said earlier in the debate to the effect that we on this side of the house were not ready. Well, I am one who has made a long and ardent study of such matters as this. And in the course of study I have looked into all the conferences held between 1918 and 1938, upon the reports of which I could lay my hands.

Those reports show twenty years of failure. Yes, I say failure; because no matter what was done at each individual conference, in the end they all failed, because they did not achieve their objective of making Versailles work, and agreeing about permanent peace.

The ink was scarcely dry on Versailles, in 1919, when, in 1920 came the first conference at San Remo. It was a failure, because it achieved nothing.

In 1921, the following year, came the Washington disarmament conference. What did it achieve? In the aggregate it achieved nothing.

Came 1922, and the conference at Geneva, called together for putting teeth and claws into clause 16 of the Versailles treaty. But it did not succeed.

On went the show, until we come to 1924, and the conference called to compel arbitration. And that arbitration was on whose behalf? On behalf of Japan. And against whom? Against Canada, Australia and New Zealand. Thanks to the dear old motherland, Japan did not achieve her objective of forcing compulsory arbitration on Canada, Australia and New Zealand. Apart from that, the conference failed.

Then in 1925 came Locarno. Was ever a conference called with such high hopes. All the great statesmen assembled, and looked forward, with hope, to what they could achieve. What did they achieve? Locarno went the same as all the rest; nothing came of it.

Then came 1928, and the Kellogg pact. A meeting was held in Paris, I believe, at which sixty nations sat around the board, all signing for the abolition of war. But the pact was hardly signed in that old hall, the Salle d'Horloge on the Quai D'Orsay when back they went to their homes, to continue in the same old way. Nothing came out of it. They could not make Versailles work.

Then came 1929, and the Hoover moratorium. What did it do? Well, it looked all right, but nothing was achieved.

Then came 1930, and the London naval conference. It might as well not have been held, because within the next few months Germany commenced work on her pocket battleships.

Then came 1932, and the disarmament conference to deal with Japan. Why was that necessary? Because she was making attacks on Shanghai. It, too, was a failure.

In 1933 the world economic conference was held in London. Well, it did achieve something—but achieved nothing so far as eliminating war is concerned.

In 1934 was held the first of what might be called the bad conferences, when Mussolini and Hitler met in Venice. No one knows what they planned, but what has resulted was likely indicated or planned at Venice.

Came 1935, in Rome, with Mussolini and Laval. We are told in the report that Laval agreed there to give Italy a free hand in her attack on Ethiopia.

Another conference was held in 1935 at Geneva, where an attempt was made to prevent the murder of Ethiopia. But it failed, too.

There were no claws in any of the clauses sufficient to compel peace.

Came 1937, and the Brussels conference, called to stop Japan from her attack on China. It, too, was a failure.

Then, in between was the conference at Lausanne, and another at Cannes, and others at Geneva.

I commend a study of the minutes of those conferences to those who are to be chosen as our delegates. Why? A reading of them will bring the minds of the delegates closer to what they are going to be up against. It would perhaps forearm them to withstand those things that could cause a failure at San Francisco.

This is perhaps our last chance to secure peace and every effort should be made by the peace-loving nations to make this conference a success. The more those going to the conference know, the better able they will be to combat the arguments that will be set up against them. I recommend that those who are to go study carefully the debates in the United States congress in 1919 when there was opposition to the signing of the Versailles treaty. That opposition was led by Massachusetts' Senator Lodge, and such a strong argument was put up that they were able to defeat the advocacy of the then President of the United States, the man who was perhaps a main factor in the drawing up of the Versailles treaty. That pact was not signed in Washington and later on Washington signed a separate treaty with Germany.

Those who go to the conference are going to be up against some very capable men, men who know, men who have been there. I recommend that our delegates make a study of the causes of the failure of the eighteen or twenty conferences to which I have referred. The ardent ambition of all of us is to create something permanent at San Francisco. Perhaps when the delegates arrive on the shores of the great Pacific in the vicinity of the Golden Gate, one of nature's miracles; perhaps when they arrive at this gap in the rockbound coast through which pass to safe anchorage great ocean ships from all countries into California's majestic inland sea; perhaps under the inspiration of that setting wisdom will enter into the hearts of these men. We all hope that the result will be permanent peace.

I should like to say a word about our own position. I read that the statesmen from the empire are going to London shortly to attend an empire conference in order that the delegates to San Francisco may have some common platform and be able to fit themselves best to present the views of this peace-loving empire. No country in the world is more peace loving than the British empire. The Prime Minister gave us the names of two eminent men, men of great ability, who are going to attend. Some of the other countries of the empire are sending their prime ministers; others are sending their deputy prime ministers, while others are sending their great statesmen. We should have a representative of the cabinet there. I am not criticizing the government, but I hope that what I say will influence them to send a member of the cabinet. Who should be there but a member of the cabinet to attend this conference of prime ministers? There is one member of the cabinet who within the last year or two has gained some experience in foreign affairs and I suppose he could be spared. It is not for me to say who should go, but I do think a cabinet minister should go to London for that empire conference. This should be done out of respect for Canada's position in the empire. We should consider what the world would think if we do not have some one of cabinet calibre at that conference.

I suggest that those who are chosen to go to San Francisco should study thoroughly the opinions of other outstanding men. I am not going to deal with the voting clauses of the proposed agreement since that matter has been covered thoroughly by several others, including the Prime Minister. Our delegates should study what United States Senator Vandenberg has said. Our delegates cannot know too much. The objective should be permanent peace.

According to a Washington despatch which appeared in the Christian Science Monitor of March 19 Senator Vandenberg recommended that agreements made during the war should be reviewed. I am not going to pass comment on that, other than to say that our delegates should be posted on the boundaries of all countries so that they will be qualified to discuss these matters with men of that capacity. I have in mind what the French government has recommended in the long memorandum it has presented.

One recommendation by the French government is something that has been in the mind of almost everyone who has spoken, namely, the power of the council on which any one of the five principal members of the council can block consideration of anything sent up to it. There is no power to enforce action unless the five main participants agree to provide the forces. The considered recommendation of the French government was that a two-thirds majority of the eleven members should be sufficient to call for the enforcement of peace. Our delegates should make a thorough study of that programme. I am not going to pass any further comment on it because I am not competent to do so.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Our delegates cannot know too much. They should study everything possible in order to be able to discuss all angles necessary to achieve the distant objective, permanent peace. We cannot afford to have another failure because we have had too many in the past. Moscow has issued a statement and this should be studied. In effect Moscow suggests that the matter of enforcement should be left as the big powers decided at Yalta and that the small nations will be protected. The Moscow pronouncement should be thoroughly analysed, not only as it appears in the press despatches but in the form of the full statement which should be obtained by our foreign service.

I come now to Canada's position. I am not satisfied with Canada's position. I am not going to criticize it but I believe it should be looked into carefully. Before our delegates take up time advocating position, I am going to suggest other important things for them to discuss. At page 29 of Hansard of March 20, 1945, the Prime Minister in discussing the San Francisco conference said:

It is the view of the government that the constitutional position within the organization of important secondary countries should be clarified, and that the delegation from Canada should exert the utmost effort to secure due recognition of their relative standing among the nations of the world.

I defer to no man in my respect for my native land, but my own personal opinion is that our delegates should not waste too much time in discussing that proposition. What would be the outcome if that proposal were accepted? A short time ago—I have not the quotation with me—I read that the Soviets are going to ask for representation for their various autonomous socialist republics. The federal Soviet republic, the great central republic of the Soviet union, has a population of over one hundred millions within its boundaries. The Ukraine has over thirty million people within its boundaries and there are half a dozen other autonomous socialist republics with from six to ten millions each of a population. What position would Canada be in if all the 17 autonomous socialist republics got representation in the assembly? She would not be leader if even the first two of these great republics got representation. Then suppose France, rehabilitated, comes and asks for representation on the assembly for her Cochin-China with a population of over thirty millions. What position would Canada be in when Germany by and by is admitted into the council of the nations? It took eight years after the last great war, in 1926 I believe, before Germany was admitted to the family of nations. The world cannot get along without these great countries cooperating in harmony in peace time. Germany has a population of eighty millions within her boundaries, and after she has received in this war the thorough beating which she so richly deserves, she may apply for a position in the council of nations. What position would Canada be in then? There are many principalities in Germany with a much larger population than Canada has, and they may want representation too. The same thing applies to almost every great nation of the world. Fancy the great state of New York, with fourteen millions of population, the richest state in all of America, sitting on the sidelines watching Canada go by to the conference table! We have to study this thing carefully, Your Honour, before Canada takes up its time with a proposal of that kind at the conference. I do not think that question should come up at the conference. Canada should devote her time to much more important matters. After all, we are a part of the empire. I take the stand that Canada's position as outlined in the passage as quoted from the Prime Minister's speech is simply not good enough; it will not do.

What can the Canadian delegates put their time in at? We have problems here in America to solve. Our closest neighbours are the United States and Russia. I am not going to discuss in detail to-day, as I shall do so on a later occasion, the development of the Alaska highway and of what will be the greatest airway in the world, that great route north from Edmonton. I can envision a population of half a million people in Edmonton. Even to-day Edmonton has, I believe, the greatest airport in America, if not in the whole world, with a whole string of airports to Whitehorse in the Yukon on up through the north, a string of airfields such as I have never seen anywhere else. That is only a start. We can spend some of our time to good purpose in discussing with our great neighbours to the south, with whom we have to live in the utmost harmony, the maintenance of the Alaska highway. For our own economic salvation our delegates should spend some of their time at the conference in discussing these matters instead of talking about our status. Let them discuss the economy of this country and the providing of work for the men and women in Canada. I am sure that we can enter into some agreement with the United States in relation to the Alaska highway.

I would go farther and suggest that our delegates discuss with our great neighbour to the south the construction of a through highway straight east from Sherbrooke to Saint John and the maritime provinces. The maritime provinces are like a forgotten part of Canada. They are cut off by that great northern bend in our international boundary around the state of Maine. If we allow our American cousins, as we should, to use the Alaska highway, they might help us to build a through highway from Sherbrooke straight east to Saint John, New Brunswick, a super-highway that would bring the maritime provinces much closer to our great central provinces and provide quicker transportation. We must have quicker and better transportation to keep this country going. That is a compromise we might make with our American cousins. We must work harmoniously together, and it would involve no surrender of sovereignty but would be for the good of both countries.

Next is the problem of oil. I have read a lot about the possible abandonment of the Norman Wells pipeline. I am going to suggest to our delegates that they take that matter up with our American cousins. Can we afford to let these wells or line be abandoned? I spent five days up at Norman Wells last August, and there were a lot of people there, and a lot of oil there too. The Yukon must have oil and they can get their oil at Norman Wells cheap. Those wells should be maintained for the sake of the Yukon and also for the sake of the Mackenzie valley and the Coppermine valley and to serve all that great area around Great Slave lake and Great Bear lake. Those wells must be kept going. I believe that question should be discussed by our delegates at the conference.

We may have to send economic experts there; I believe we should. Our delegates should comprise not only the class which the Prime Minister mentioned but economists as advisers and experts. The British delegation is going to comprise some of their ablest economic advisers. We have to provide a lot of work in this country. I am not one of those who believe that our factory wheels will turn just for the sake of turning. They have to have orders to keep them busy and men and women have to have jobs and an opportunity to live. How can they have that unless San Francisco can help to secure a better economy not only in the United States but our own great country?

Other members have spoken of the Jewish question. A short time ago I attended a demonstration in Toronto in the Royal York hotel which was put on by an Anglo-Jewish association. I heard there, and later read about it, that a shipload of Jews who had suffered everything but death, appalling crucifixions in central Europe, had been loaded on board ship in some Black Sea port on their way, they were told, to Palestine, their homeland for which they have pleaded, they and their ancestors, for two thousand years. While the boat was in sight of their homeland it was torpedoed so that they never reached Palestine. It was not torpedoed by any of our allies or by any belligerent so far as I know, but in any event the boat was torpedoed and those Jews did not reach Palestine.

I cannot see why the conference cannot come to some arrangement or understanding with the Arabs. They occupy a great deal of land and they have been in possession for a long time, but I believe that arrangements might be made with them by the great allied organizations which would assure the Arabs fair play and territory while granting a home land in Palestine to the Jews. I have seen much of what the Jews have done; I know something of their accomplishments in medicine and the other professions. I have seen their great charities and recognize the vast contribution their business capacity has made in building up this country. So I join with others in expressing the hope that our delegates along with those from all over the world will make an effort to see to it that at long last fair play is given to the Jewish race.

I have also in mind a matter which was raised by Senator Vandenberg when, in his remarks on March 19, he touched on the boundary question as it affects Yugoslavia and other countries. This is a very serious problem. I stood for an hour in a great German museum on Unter den Linden, Berlin, which contains a map that would cover all one side of this great chamber. It was a map of Germany. I do not know whether the attendant was a nazi, or if he was trying to rouse up his people, but he certainly inflamed them when he pointed to the corridor which cut eastern Germany in two; he had them crying, he had them gnashing their teeth, he had them clenching their fists. The little knowledge I have of German did not enable me to understand what he said, but I know that he and his hearers were damning all and sundry who were responsible for cutting the country in two. I carefully examined the map after the crowd had moved away, and I discussed with officials whether there would have been much objection if the corridor had been run from Poland to Memel. I did not find much opposition to the idea. Poland is entitled to a corridor; Memel did not at that time belong to either Germany or Poland, and the corridor might have been drawn between Lithuania and East Prussia. I hope that those whose duty it will be to plan for permanent peace will not break up great areas and separate millions of people who wish to remain united. If they do, what must we look for?

[Mr. MacNicol.]

It has been said with truth that every treaty which has been written in the last hundred years had within it the germs of another war. We now have an opportunity to banish war for ever if we can only rise to the occasion and prove ourselves big enough and charitable enough, recognizing that all others have a right to live too. I myself am offering no specific suggestion; that is for statesmen to do.

Something has been said about Poland. That great prime minister, Mr. Churchill, said the other day that he prayed—or words to that effect—that the two Polish governments would get together and get together quickly, so that their nation shall have what it is entitled to, representation at San Francisco. That desire is shared by us all. The Poles are a great people and have made a notable contribution to the world. It would be too bad if internal troubles kept them from being represented at the coming conference. Perhaps before the date of the conference they will compose their differences and so obtain representation.

Near the end of his recent speech the Prime Minister, as reported in Hansard, at page 31, used some very high and exalted language. I heard him, and I was proud of his utterance on this subject; he said:

A new world order will be born, not made. It will be something that lives and breathes, something much closer to the soul of man than a mere mechanical or legalistic device. A new world order needs to be worked out and have its place in the minds and the hearts of men. It should express itself in brotherhood and good will. It will be the application, in all human relations, of the principle of service and of mutual aid.

I hope the Prime Minister will stay on that high plane, but if he is to do so he will have to reverse some of the statements he has made about those who should go to the conference. We have four national parties. The one farthest to our left had a national convention and chose as their leader a cabinet minister of their own province, Hon. Solomon Low. I cannot see why, if the intention is to select a Social Credit leader, the recognized national leader of the party should not be chosen, the more so because after April 17 many of the proposed delegates will no longer have the status of members of parliament. Mr. Low, on the other hand, will remain a member of a legislature. The leader of the C.C.F. is, of course, a member of this house and was chosen at a national convention. I agree with what my own leader in the house has said; I cannot see on what principle the Prime Minister can bar from the delegation the leader of the Progressive Conservative party, a man of great ability, and for twenty-two years, Your Honour, premier of your own province. I should like to see the Prime Minister adopt the high principles he enunciated toward the close of his speech and renounce any animosity against individuals. Our party has several persons well qualified to be representatives. I believe that our house leader is quite entitled to go. I believe also, as was so well remarked by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), a place should be found for representatives of the soldiers, the Canadian Corps and the Legion, the great professions, not forgetting business and labour.

With all others who have spoken, I look forward with the greatest hope to the coming conference. What I have said this evening is in support of the resolution. I cannot see how anyone can oppose it. I cannot understand how anybody can disagree with its objective, which is permanent peace. What I have said has been said in a humble attempt to stimulate delegates to procure information which will enable them to play a greater part at San Francisco. If we keep our activities on a high plane, remembering always the monumental and terrible sacrifices which have been made by our own people and those of our allies in this most catastrophic war, it may be given to us to do something for the realization of that great message left with us by our Blessed Redeemer, "Peace on earth, good will toward men."

Mr. J. J. KINLEY (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, down on the Atlantic coast there is a broadcasting station which, when they announce their identification, usually give this message, "This is the friendly voice of the maritimes." That station sends its message to our neighbours and it also goes out upon the sea. It is heard by the fishermen, by the men of the navy, and by the travellers who come to our shores. It carries, I think, an appropriate touch of good will. For generations the men of the maritimes, moved by a spirit of adventure and a desire to trade with other countries, have sailed the seas, visiting many places in distant lands. There they met many people, sometimes strange people with different customs and a different way of life, but they made friends, and by experience they learned the practical value of friendship; so much so that down there among our people there is something, bred in the bone, that makes us value friendships with other people and leads us to have a tolerance for their views and a high regard for the rights of others.

Then again there is the comradeship of the sea. That is always liberal and generous and international in its aspect, so that it is not hard to understand why the people in my section of the country should give full and enthusiastic support to the resolution before the house. It is my purpose to try to bring to bear on the resolution that friendly spirit which we think is so necessary for its success. Our people, I believe, will support the resolution because it means cordial relations with other countries, because it will bring orderly progress in the future, and also the extension of international trade.

Canada is very fortunate in her friendships and associations. We are part of the British empire, and although we are separated from Britain by an ocean, on the coast we always have a visible evidence of Britain's greatness. Some years ago when I visited the docks of an eastern Canadian port with a friend we saw there one of Britain's greatest battleships which had just come in from the sea. After contemplating the scene my friend said to me, "There is the fortress that will give security to Canada."

On the other hand, we are surrounded on all sides by the sea except on the southern border and beyond that border lies our great neighbour country, the United States. Between our countries there are no fortifications or battlements. The dividing line is almost imaginary so far as movement is concerned, but from the geographical point of view it is definite and it is also definite in the minds of the Canadian people. Because of our relations and our geographic position Canada has a splendid opportunity to do a great service to promote good will between the United States and Great Britain, two great English-speaking countries. Our Prime Minister has always regarded this as a noble duty; in his long and meritorious service he has worked along this line, and that work has been outstanding, so that we can say that he has a fine record of service and achievement, especially for the promotion of good will.

Mr. Churchill, in introducing the Prime Minister of Canada in May, 1944, to the British parliament had this to say:

Canada is the link which joins together the old world and the new; which links the vast American people, with whom I trust we shall ourselves develop a fraternal association. Canada, bound by sacred ties to the mother country, and also by terms of the deepest intimacy and friendship to the United States, clamps the whole structure of this benignant, unfeared glorious British empire together into one homogeneous mass which, when crisis comes to the world as a whole, will never fail in its duty.

San Francisco Conference

I also have in mind that the President of the United States some years ago, while visiting Canada, said that his country would not stand idly by if Canada were threatened by an invading foe. I think that the results of the war, the strength and power which Canada has demonstrated both as an industrial country and as a fighting nation, must convince the American people that it is also to their advantage to have Canada as a good neighbour, because Canada is a strong right arm in the northern part of this American continent.

I think that the first essential for world peace is close association between the English-speaking countries. They will be expected to give the lead and it will have a salutary effect upon the rest of the world. Some suggest that Canada should be more closely allied with Britain; others fear that we might fall unduly under the influence of the United States of America. I rather believe that for this purpose Canada is strong enough to stand on her own merit, to be a member nation in her own right at the San Francisco conference and take a self-respecting place in that forum of good will for the benefit of peace.

May I quote from the Prime Minister's speech made before the British parliament when he was there last year on the occasion when Mr. Churchill introduced him, as I indicated a moment ago. At that meeting the Prime Minister of Canada, addressing the British houses of parliament, said in part:

It will ever be a prime object of Canadian policy to work for the maintenance of the fraternal association of the British and American peoples. When peace comes it is our highest hope that the peoples of the British commonwealth and the United States will continue to march at each other's side united more closely than ever. But we equally hope that they will march in a larger company in which all the nations united to-day in defence of freedom will remain united in the service of mankind.

That speech caught the imagination of the Canadian people and shows that the Prime Minister, even at that time, had in mind what is about to become a reality at the San Francisco conference. I think it is significant that this conference is being held in the new world. The delegates are coming to the land of hope and glory where life is lived most abundantly. It has also been suggested that Canada might be the permanent home of the city of peace. That might well be. It would be a great compliment to Canada; it would be a high tribute to her association with both the United States and Great Britain and the other parts of the commonwealth.

[Mr. Kinley.]

Canada has no territorial ambitions, is not big enough to invite the selfish envy of other nations, and we are a country where the four freedoms are being intelligently brought into play. I think we could welcome with legitimate pride the world to come to this country to establish the city of peace.

The proposals for the conference come from the conference at Dumbarton Oaks and the meeting at Yalta. The basis of the new organization is similar to that of the league of nations, which fell by the wayside through the greed and ambition of other days. At that time the seed fell on stony ground. Let us hope that this time better preparations are made so that the seed will fall on good ground. At that time President Wilson had a high purpose, which was damaged at the peace conference, where he was outmanoeuvred; then difficulties at home kept the United States from joining the league, which seriously impaired its powers and abilities. Mr. Wilson was criticized at home by leading Republicans, who were able to keep the United States from participating in the work of the league of nations. But the world has changed a great deal since then. Now we see national leaders inviting those of opposing political faiths to join with them in this international work. Thus we hope to have harmony and unity of purpose, so that when these men return to their own parliaments for ratification of what has been done their work will not be judged in a political sense; there will be no question of political advantage, but only the rights and benefits of the nations they represent.

With regard to the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, I believe all hon. members must subscribe to the principles underlying them. This is a pledge, and we have great regard for pledges. When we join an organization or institution we pledge ourselves to support it; and we regard that as a matter of honour. Every man who belongs to a labour union in this country pledges his support to that union. When countries sign I regard it as the cement which will go a long way in keeping them together. Many times the statesmen of the world have tried to get nations to sign pledges of this kind. We recall that some years ago the late William Jennings Bryan, who was a great advocate of peace, tried in every way to get arbitration treaties signed by nations so that war would be prevented. I wish to read just a few paragraphs from the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, which I regard as a pledge of great importance:

All members of the organization undertake, in order to ensure to all of them the rights and benefits resulting from membership in the organization, to fulfil the obligations assumed by them in accordance with the charter.

All members of the organization shall settle their disputes by peaceful means in such a manner that international peace and security are not endangered.

All members of the organization shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force in any manner inconsistent with the purposes of the organization.

This in itself, Mr. Speaker, is a forward movement. We are told that there may be a dictatorship of the big three and eventually the big five in the conduct of the affairs of the association because of the way it is organized. Well, a glance at the proposals will show that the general assembly is composed of all nations of good will, great and small. Each retains its own sovereignty; and each member, which means each country, has one vote. It is true that the bigger nations have some veto privileges which would enable them to halt forward movements, but the general assembly elects the majority of the security council, and in my public experience I have always found that the elected members of any parliament or any assembly usually have a great deal to say about what is going to be done. It is my opinion that in the hands of resourceful men the majority of the security council consisting of the smaller nations will be very useful. While it may be true that they cannot go forward without the consent of the larger nations, they can stop anything being done that is not to their liking. In time the peace-time activities of the organization will overshadow its war-time activities. The general assembly will be able to do a great deal for the benefit of mankind, in coordinating the peoples of the world in order to bring mankind to higher levels. We must realize that as far as security is concerned, it depends upon harmony among the bigger nations, who must combine power with responsibility. While we might like to see more control left with the assembly, we must realize that we have to be practical and that to-day it is only through power that we can secure peace.

I think it is a great thing to have Asia, Europe and America brought together in an association of this kind; and we must not forget the potential power of China. We do not know what will happen in the future, and China is a country which it will be well to have in the association. They are a different race, out there in the east apart from the other countries of the world. It seems to me that to get China into an organization of this kind is far-sighted. Then there is the Soviet republic, which controls a great part of the world.

Those people have come a long way and have shown themselves to be powerful, resourceful and intelligent. Would it not be quite inadvisable to attempt to keep nations like these out of this league simply because they do not want to be too closely controlled at the outset? It must be remembered that this is only the start. As they go along and the people become more confident they will not fear each other, and the organization can be improved from time to time.

There is to be an international court. We are told by the proposals that, ipso facto, each member nation comes under the statute of the international court. Let us hope that that will include the larger nations, as well as the smaller nations. We are not quite clear on that point.

There has been some criticism about Canada's position. Some think that because Canada has great military power, and now that she has developed great industrial power, she should be placed with the big nations on the security council. Well, that might cause difficulty at the outset. We must remember that Brazil, with an area of 3,275,000 square miles, has a population of 41,356,605; Mexico, with an area of 763,994 square miles has a population of 19,473,471; Argentina, with an area of 1,078,278 square miles, has a population of 13,518,239, and Canada, with an area of 3,695,189 square miles, has a population of 11,506,665.

It seems to me that Canada is in the forefront in all her activities and in her importance much more than she is in the number of her people. Therein might be found a lesson for the future government of this country.

However, Mr. Speaker, we are by speech and by our relations close to two powers on the security council, namely Great Britain and the United States. Surely when we are in such good company as that we do not need to be afraid that our interests will be hurt because Canada has not assumed a place on the security council with the big nations.

Some people say that the British commonwealth of nations should be the member to sit on the security council, and that we should thus be represented. Well, let us look at this in a practical way. There is one vote for each member. Does anyone think that Great Britain will appoint a representative from Canada? Would not Westminster want to appoint its representative from Great Britain? And if we were with the British commonwealth as a unit, what would become of Canada's position on the security council by election? I say that because each nation has a membership on the general assembly, and if we made a unit of the commonwealth of nations, Canada's position on the general assembly would be imperilled.

There has been some discussion, too, about the military staff. Chapter VIII, section B, paragraph 9 of the proposals does not confine the military staff to the big nations. It associates on the military staff the member of any nation directly interested. Then subsequently they appoint the commanding officer after that nation is included.

Then, some persons worry about Canada's commitments. Canada has no commitments yet. I believe there will be commitments; they will be decided by parliament. And while some hon. members may wish to bring ghosts into the picture to obscure the situation, and perhaps cause fear among sections of our people, it seems to me that their motives are not purely for the purpose of helping out this organization.

After this war Canada will certainly have an air force. She will have a navy, and a permanent militia. It seems to me that instead of being a burden that will be an opportunity, because our forces will have a peace-time objective. Instead of being trained and equipped for war they will be for purposes of peace. They will be associated with other nations in such a way that they will be part of the economic set-up. They will not seem to be a military burden. They will be cooperating with other countries for the service of the world. That is a fine vision and a fine ambition for the future services in this country. I do not see why anybody would consider it a burden; because if they stick together they may not be used very much. It will be something of which people who want to disturb the peace will be very much afraid.

Our friends are very much concerned about the sending of men outside Canada. I was talking with a friend the other day who lives in my county and he said to me, "It is a peculiar thing, that when you want a dollar in parliament you are asked to bring it before the House of Commons, and discuss estimates, and justify it down to the last dollar; but when they want men they want an all-inclusive order in council."

It seems to me that this organization will deal primarily with security in its early stages. After that it will deal with trade and social improvements. No doubt it will be of great benefit to all mankind. Through it all there comes to us the thought as to just how dependent and interdependent men and nations are. In the last analysis you can do in this world only what other people will let you do. Logic, perseverance and ability will carry one a long way. The public will salute all those virtues. But to carry one right through they must be for the benefit of mankind.

[Mr. Kinley.]

Even foreign trade is subject to good will. I recall that some years ago my hon. friends to my right were going to blast their way into the markets of the world. However, they have changed their opinion to-day, and I am glad they have. Yet I believe that was done for their new leader—and it was all to the good, unless they change again. Future tariffs and world trade will be economic and scientific questions.

I am not going to prolong the debate, but I do give a message of godspeed to our delegates who will go to this important meeting. May you there meet noble and sincere friends, so that you will be able to say with Bobby Burns:

And there's a hand, my trusty fere!
And gie's a hand o' thine!
And we'll tak a cup of kindness yet,
For auld lang syne.

And when their work is over—and we trust it will be abundantly successful—may we go forward in this country and in the world, having justice with majesty and peace with beneficence.

Mr. ANTHONY HLYNKA (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, all Canadians are anxious and desirous to see Canada assume her rightful share of the responsibility in the gigantic task of organizing the world for a just and lasting peace. There can be but one view in this matter. I am sure that the members of this honourable assembly are unanimous in regard to this view and are ready to support any motion which would serve as a basis for the discussion of ways and means and for the setting up of the necessary machinery to make a lasting peace a reality.

For this reason I favour the sending of a Canadian delegation to the San Francisco conference. However, to agree to the decisions which may be reached at the conference, based on the proposals set forth at the Bretton Woods and Dumbarton Oaks conferences, is an entirely different matter. It does appear to me that those two decisions are being tied together and should one support the sending of a delegation to the San Francisco conference his support would be interpreted as favouring, at least in the broad outline, the principles of the Bretton Woods and Dumbarton Oaks conferences and also any decisions which may be reached at the San Francisco conference. I repeat that I am in complete agreement in regard to the sending of a Canadian delegation to the conference, but I consider the principles forecast, upon which the future world structure is to be organized, as unsound and contrary to the democratic concept of life and prejudicial to the sovereignty of many small nations and peoples.

It is in the light of past history that I view with reluctance the giving of a ready approval to any scheme of world organization which fails to convince me that the real causes of war will be eliminated. The leaders of the present era are not the only ones who have studied the desirability of organizing the world for a lasting peace. Throughout history the people of the world have pondered over this problem but thus far failed to find an effective solution.

Let us recall for a moment what has happened in that regard during the course of our own lifetime. At the termination of the last war the statesmen of that day exhausted all the means at their disposal in an endeavour to purge the world of all wickedness and to render the resurrection of evil impossible. President Wilson of the United States of America made a valiant attempt to incorporate into his fourteen points the vision of effective sovereignty for nations and peoples. Subsequent to that the principles of sovereignty and the self-determination of peoples were incorporated into the covenant of the league of nations. In my opinion the concept of sovereignty is still the only right doctrine of effective freedom so long as the more powerful nations retain sovereignty for themselves.

All attempts to organize the world for a lasting peace failed, as we discovered to our misfortune, in 1939. This happened because the formula of freedom for all peoples was never applied. While the principles of sovereignty were applied to all political entities called nations, which were arbitrarily set up by force, the broader concept of the sovereignty of the people as applied to historic, ethnic and ethnographical groups was conveniently ignored. This broader concept of the sovereignty of peoples which I regard as the more fundamental was relegated to the position of internal problems of the various political entities. The tragic result was that might and force continued to rule the world.

Twenty years after the conclusion of the first world war the world was again plunged into a still greater demoniacal conflict. The flower of the world's manhood is once again being sacrificed and with more disastrous losses. Following these two tragedies, surely it must be evident to all by now that unless all democratic minded citizens of the world make certain that justice and not might shall guide the affairs of the world, we may again find ourselves hopeless in averting a third world war within our lifetime, and one of perhaps still greater proportions. That problem presents to us the supreme challenge of the present day.

As we approach victory in this war, strangely enough our slogans for peace have changed diametrically opposite to those we used in the last war. As I mentioned already, we then advocated sovereignty and self-determination for both the victors and the vanquished peoples and nations. At the present time all political parties in Canada, with the exception of Social Crediters, advocate the forfeiture of the principles of sovereignty to the dictates of international authority and perhaps to the Big Three. As a matter of fact there is a powerful and relentless movement on foot which aims openly at the destruction of the very idea of sovereignty and holds up to ridicule and even contempt anyone who dares rise in defence of sovereign ideals. An individual who to-day attempts to defend the concept of sovereignty is called "an obstructionist of the new order", "an extreme nationalist" or even a "a fascist." These are the tactics which are being employed to discredit the last vestige of real democracy and justice which can be found only where individuals and peoples are sovereign in their own rights. It may, therefore, be instructive to ask ourselves the question: Why has there been a reversal in our position in regard to the basic principles which underlay the last world organization for peace and which underlie the proposed future world organization? Is it because we have no other choice in the matter, or is it because the power is slipping out of the hands of the people?

The desire to be free is inherent in all human beings. The desire of nations to be free from foreign domination and the yearning of peoples to govern themselves remains one of the strongest impulses in human beings. Every nation, no matter how small, aspires to freedom so that her people can fulfil, in their own way, their mission in this world by way of contribution to the culture, civilization and the general advancement of the world. Or was it the purpose of the Great Creator that they live out their lives in submission?

Unfortunately, it has not been the policy of any nation to concern itself with the basic rights of subjugated peoples unless it were directly or indirectly in its own interest to do so. That being so explains another reason why the world has not had a lasting peace. But what of the future? Will the right be recognized as right and the wrong be recognized as wrong irrespective of where it is found? Does there not seem by this time to be a need for a human code in regard to the basic rights of all peoples, for so long as there is no such a code then might, aggression and covetousness will continue to rule the world.

Let me repeat here that I believe that all Canadians are vitally interested in assisting in the organization of the world in order that a lasting peace may be possible. In my humble opinion, therefore, it is imperative that each component part which goes to make up the world structure be most carefully examined. The success of the future world organization will depend on the stability of each of these constituent parts. Should any part of the new organization be built on an unsound and unstable basis the whole structure would naturally be exposed to weaknesses and be subject to dangerous consequences. I propose therefore to point out a few of the most obvious weaknesses which are apt to become the seeds of future trouble if not given due consideration at this time. I wish to discuss briefly the three major world powers which in the military, political and economic sense hold dominant positions in the world to-day. I refer, of course, to the British commonwealth of nations, the United States of America, and Russia. I believe that a frank appraisal of these powers should be made if past errors are to be avoided.

Let us examine first of all the British commonwealth of nations which constitutes one of the major bodies in the sphere of world affairs. On past occasions I have expressed my views on the British commonwealth of nations, and I do not hesitate to express those views again. In my opinion the British commonwealth of nations is still the most outstanding example of political organization that the world has ever seen. It is the largest and the nearest to the ideal world organization ever built. Let us not forget that this concept of organization has been evolved on the basis of practical experience, in contrast with the theorizing of present world dreamers. True there are many imperfections and even blunders in the history of the British people. But where can you find its parallel, where sovereignty and freedom of the individual is enjoyed to such a high degree as in the British commonwealth of nations?

Some may say, of course, that India constitutes a vexing problem. So it does, but there is not the slightest doubt in my mind that India will eventually gain complete sovereignty and become an equal partner in the British commonwealth of nations. That is more than can be hoped for by any subjugated peoples anywhere else in the world.

Nor is India an isolated case of imperfection of British organization. There are others, but all of them are being adjusted and we may look with hope and confidence to proper adjustments being made in solving all these problems in the British sphere.

[Mr. Hlynka.]

The second most important world power is the United States of America, that colossal giant in the industrial world. Her problems, it will be agreed, are mainly internal and economic. She too is a major world power and has certain problems of world importance, but no one, to say the least, hears cries to high heaven in condemnation of the United States of America for her treatment of her subjugated peoples. So in regard to our good neighbour to the south I trust the enlightened opinion of that nation to look after herself and do what she can do to help the rest of the world.

May I pause here to say that the British commonwealth of nations and the United States of America are privileged to be two of the greatest democratic leaders of mankind. This age demands of them not only that they preserve their own existence, but also that they give leadership in ensuring the preservation of the life of many other peoples and nations who fought this war by their side.

Let us now turn to the third great world power—the Russian empire. It is in the sphere of influence and control which fell to Russia, as the result of territorial expansion, that we find that which spells ill omen to world security and peace.

I know there will be those who will say that eastern European and central European problems should be regarded as Russian internal problems. There will be those who will say that any discussion of these matters may strain our relationship with our powerful ally or that any such discussion would embarrass our own government.

In answer to these arguments let me say that eastern European and central European problems did not become Russia's problems by the will of the people occupying those historic territories. May I say also that I am not the first in this house to be touching on these problems in this debate. Already two hon. members on the government side of the house have expressed their views on these matters. Both the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann) and the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bertrand) dealt with this subject, so that I need not apologize for making reference to another phase of the same problem.

The Canadian people, without exception I believe, profoundly appreciate the role played in this war by our Russian ally. The sacrifices of the Russian people have been immense and we recognize them as such. When, however, it is said that it was Russia alone that saved us the victory in this war, then I say that that is not entirely true. We should also remember that we owe a great debt to many other submerged nations that have not as yet seen the light of freedom and to which sovereignty and self-government is as much an ideal as it is to the Canadian people.

May I read a few excerpts from an article which appeared in the Saturday Evening Post, of January 27, last, written by Edgar Snow, who apparently sent in the article from Kiev, the historic capital of the Ukraine. The article is entitled: "The Ukraine Pays the Bill". Incidentally, the author of the article obtained his information from the official sources of the Soviet government; it was therefore written to suit the government, and yet we glean this striking and most revealing information:

. . . it was not till I came here on this sobering journey into the twilight of war that I quite realized the price which 40,000,000 Ukrainians have paid for Soviet victory. This whole titanic struggle, which some are so apt to dismiss as "the Russian glory," has, in all truth and in many costly ways, been first of all a Ukrainian war. And greatest of this republic's sacrifices, one which can be assessed in no ordinary ledger, is the toll taken of human life. No fewer than 10,000,000 people, I was told by a high Ukrainian official here, have been "lost" to the Ukraine since the beginning of the war. That figure excludes men and women mobilized for the armed forces.

A relatively small part of the Russian Soviet republic itself was actually invaded, but the whole Ukraine . . . was devastated from the Carpathian frontier to the Donets and Don rivers, where Russia proper begins. No single European country has suffered deeper wounds to its cities, its industry, its farmlands and its humanity.

The post-war Soviet market for American goods is to a major extent a Ukrainian market. In the same degree, the heaviest Soviet war claims against Germany are Ukrainian claims.

Because of that, if for no other reason, we should become more familiar with the Ukrainian people, which has its own language and culture and history, older than and quite distinct from that of great Russia.

The rest of the U.S.S.R. is fifty times the size of the Ukraine, but formerly the latter accounted for about half of the giant nation's key industry. One district alone produced more pig iron and steel than Japan, Belgium, Italy and Poland taken together. Ukrainian mines supplied half the hard coal and three-fourths of the cooking coal for the entire Soviet Union. The Ukraine produced 62 per cent of Soviet iron ore, and its bauxite mines furnished 70 per cent of pre-war Soviet aluminum.

The quotations which I read, give us some indication of the sacrifices which the Ukrainian people have made to the allied cause. I presume that a great majority of the people in the English-speaking world do not know that the Ukrainians have been their silent partner to such a great extent. The staggering losses in human and material resources which the Ukrainian people sustained "are unequalled by any European country", according to Mr. Edgar Snow's article which I quoted. I am certain also that other subjugated peoples have made great sacrifices as well to our common cause.

In view of what I have said in my remarks thus far, and in view of the colossal sacrifices which many peoples in Europe have made, I submit that there should be provided a recourse to the submerged nations to make it possible for them to make presentations of their own cases at any and all world conferences to which all free nations are invited. I am making this plea on behalf of the millions who cannot now speak for themselves. I believe that a similar request was made after the last war, but as we know no such privilege was extended to any submerged nation, which fact also contributed to the failure of the league of nations.

In regard to the representation of the Ukrainian people I suggest that the Ukrainian Canadian committee and the Ukrainian congress committee of America be asked to send their delegations to any and all world conferences for the purpose of presenting the Ukrainian case. These organizations include the vast majority of Canadians of Ukrainian origin and Americans of Ukrainian origin and embrace all the Ukrainian church bodies. These organizations have also well proven their loyalty to Canada and the United States of America, their respective countries from the very first day of the war.

Should there be any less informed critics who would advance the view that the Soviet delegation will take it upon itself to speak for all the submerged nations in her sphere of control, then I would quote for their benefit what William Henry Chamberlin, one of the foremost American authorities on the Soviet Union, has to say in his book. "The Ukraine: A Submerged Nation". at page 82:

When Soviet newspapers criticize Stalin's policies as freely as American newspapers criticize President Roosevelt's then, and only then, we may conclude that freedom of speech and press has been established in the Soviet Union. When foreign correspondents in Moscow report a lively contest, with two or more lists of candidates competing for election to the Soviet congress and discussing without inhibition the foreign and domestic policies of the Soviet government, then, and only then, can we assume that the peoples of the Soviet Union enjoy some genuine right of selecting their rulers.

Suggestions that the recent constitutional change in the Soviet Union has transformed the character of the Soviet federation into a loose association of independent peoples, comparable with the self-governing states of the British empire (Great Britain, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, Eire) are naive and premature, to say the least. Only recently Prime Minister Mackenzie King of Canada pub-lily took issue with the contents of a speech delivered by Lord Halifax, British Ambassador to the United States. When the Prime Minister of the Ukraine, or of some other Soviet republic, expresses public disapproval of a statement by the Soviet Ambassador in Washington we may fairly assume that there has been some genuine measure of decentralization in the Soviet Union. Until there is some such development it will be wiser to proceed on the assumption that the essential political and economic controls are still lodged in Moscow.

I believe that any further comment on that point from me is unnecessary.

In closing, I should like to say that people desire peace only to the extent that it is consistent with the principles of freedom, for as we well know, Canada, Great Britain, France, Belgium and other allied nations did not think of peace in 1940 or 1941. Neither can there be a lasting peace in the world with a score of submerged nations fighting for their self preservation.

I pray and hope that the San Francisco conference will give serious consideration to the points which I have raised in the course of my remarks.

Mr. M. E. McGARRY (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a very few remarks on the resolution now before the house, a resolution than which no other of greater importance has ever been brought before this parliament for the careful consideration of its members.

This debate has gone sufficiently far to make it obvious that on the principles contained in this resolution the great majority of hon. members are in agreement, and I believe that parliament could do itself no greater honour or no greater credit than to show its unanimity in a matter which is of such vital importance not only to Canada but to the whole civilized world.

This proposal to send a delegation to the San Francisco conference is, I think, the prelude to the setting up of the security council. It is not only fitting but timely because the peace-loving peoples of the world to-day are not disposed to wait until the end of the war to know what kind of new world they have to live in. They want to know what utopian change will obtain after this red reign of death and destruction will have terminated. A military victory is essential and a military victory will and must be achieved. But a military victory is only a milestone on that road that leads to the new world; and while victory can make peace possible it cannot attain peace nor can it make peace secure.

All round us at this very moment we see evidence of this new world shaping, and indeed it may be fixed before the end of the war.

[Mr. Hlvaka.]

After all, a military victory is an evanescent thing, because quite often we see that before the victor has assessed his gains some new force may arise to dispossess him of those gains. Moreover, we do not know whether differences and disagreements will occur among the victors themselves.

It is well, I think, to realize that we profited from what happened after the last war when the allies failed to discover any aims of peace or attempted to have an agreement thereto. Aims of peace are not soulfully realized after the war; on the other hand, if we have authoritative pronouncements on the aims of peace the effect will be to shorten the victorious conclusion of the struggle itself. We must remember, therefore, that the San Francisco conference is not set up to fix terms of peace but rather to discuss peace aims.

It is not the way of democracy that the fundamental problems of peace should be left to a few political leaders, to have them deal with those problems in private conference and announce the results to the world, because the members who comprise the security council are but human beings and as such, like ourselves, susceptible to error. Therefore we must try to disabuse the minds of some people of the idea that the San Francisco conference is a conference to decide terms of peace. We are also taught not to be carried away by some of, shall I say, the reckless announcements or declarations that are being made that the San Francisco conference is a guarantee of peace.

It is the democratic way that we have taken, so that the nations of the world shall meet in conference, and it provides an opportunity for discussion and for conclusions to be arrived at in the different stages.

I may pause for a moment to make some reference to what I hear urged by some in the house and others outside, who say that every nation should have an army; in other words, that there should be an international police force set up in order to carry into effect the provisions of the council in case of aggression. I am not going to criticize that, but I am very doubtful of such a plan, which proposes that all countries, Canada included, shall maintain an army, a navy, and an air force to be at the beck and call of the security council to fight anywhere at any time, regardless of the possible disagreement which may arise as regards the rights and wrongs of the issue.

As I have already intimated, I believe it would be very difficult to get any agreement in this regard because it would be difficult to imbue the members representing the different nations with the idea that a few human beings should be given uncontrolled power over the armies and resources of the nations, and that their whims are to become law. This seems to me to present a rather difficult task, and I think we may anticipate that it will be hard to persuade the nations of the world, including Canada, of the wisdom of such an idea. The difficulty in bringing about agreement on this matter is one reason why we may have the assurance that Dumbarton Oaks will not immediately at least be a perfect instrument.

I do not want to take the time of the house in going into details, but will merely say that I have been pleased to see such unanimity of opinion on the part of the great majority of the members of this house in regard to this very important question. I join with others who have wished our delegation to San Francisco godspeed and good luck. Before resuming my seat, however, I should like briefly to refer to one matter. I was somewhat impressed with the eloquent and forceful speech delivered in this house last Thursday evening by the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann), in behalf of Poland. There is no doubt that, comparatively speaking, Poland has suffered greater loss than perhaps any other of the allied nations. I know many people in this country feel that a grievous wrong has been done Poland in the partitioning arrangement that has been announced, and in the way the establishment of a democratic government has been interfered with. I say that is the opinion held by many people in this country, although I am not going to say whether or not they have given the matter sufficient consideration to be sure this is the right conclusion. I feel, however, that at the San Francisco conference the delegation representing Canada should ask to have the findings of the Yalta conference with respect to Poland reviewed. Otherwise many people in our country will feel that the Atlantic charter and the Dumbarton Oaks proposals were meaningless, to say the least. The Prime Minister, who will lead the Canadian delegation, has been a champion of justice throughout his political career, and I am confident that one of the matters he will bring before that conference will be the Polish question. I have every reason to think that he will insist on having this matter reviewed, so that the world may be shown that the Canadian delegation are not disposed to leave the impression that the hopeful pronouncements which emanated from Dumbarton Oaks are merely counterfeit or transitory, but are real and lasting. Conditions exist which will make it possible for Canada to advance in harmony with the other nations to a new level of social well-being, and I have every faith that the Canadian delegates to the San Francisco conference will exert their very best efforts to obtain for Canada her proper place in the new world. This will be achieved by seeing to it that labour and management and the other progressive elements of this great country of ours are given an opportunity for maximum production, a higher standard of living and full employment at home, with the freest possible trade abroad. These are world conditions essential for the attainment and preservation of peace.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, during the first month of the life of the present parliament the nazi forces overran France, Belgium and the low countries, and in July of that year Hitler boasted that before Christmas he would be occupying Buckingham palace. A year later, in 1941, after his attack on Russia, he boasted that he would have his Christmas dinner in Moscow. During the greater part of the life of this parliament there have been dark clouds overhead, but now, fortunately, during the closing days of the nineteenth parliament of Canada, we can look forward to the complete collapse of the nazi forces and the victory of the allied nations.

I am sure we are all pleased that before the business of this parliament should be concluded hon. members were given an opportunity to express their views with regard to the important conference which will be held in San Francisco. The people of Canada have reason to be proud of their contribution during the present conflict; and similarly we look forward with confidence to the part we will play in laying the foundations for permanent peace. The young men and women of this country have distinguished themselves and brought glory to the name of Canada while serving in the army, the navy and the air force. In 1939 we had in the navy a mere handful of 1,700, as compared with the present strength of over 30,000. We had 4,500 in the army as compared with 465,000 at the present time, and 4,000 in the air force as compared with a present strength of over 200,000. That is a total strength of more than 750,000. I mention these figures not to give credit to any government or to place our contribution in contrast with that of other members of the united nations, but merely to emphasize that we have no reason to be ashamed of the role Canadians have played.

In the factory and mine, on land and in the home, civilians who were not permitted to take part in military activities also have performed remarkable feats. The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) has awarded contracts totalling more than $9,500,000,000 on account of Canadian, United Kingdom and other allied war production. The farmers of Canada also have established all-time records. In 1943, three male farmers, as compared with four in 1939, produced 160 per cent of the 1939 agricultural production. In other words in 1943 one farmer produced as much as two produced five years earlier. Canada has been able greatly to increase her exports to the United Kingdom, and to other united nations.

One of the interesting observations in connection with food statistics in the present war is that in the United States and Canada particularly, after we have depleted our labour forces on the farms, and after we have exported such a large volume of food, we have consumed more and better food on our own tables.

We find that the consumption of food in the United Kingdom during the war years compares very favourably with the pre-war years. A pamphlet on the food consumption in the United States, Canada and the United Kingdom, issued by the United States Department of Agriculture, shows the following consumption in 1944, as compared with the four pre-war years from 1934 to 1938:

	United States Per cent	Canada Per cent	United Kingdom Per cent
Dairy products.....	118	120	126
Meats.....	116	132	81
Poultry, game and fish.....	104	106	74
Eggs.....	113	121	102
Total fats and oils.....	94	104	84
Sugar.....	89	87	69
Potatoes.....	100	97	161
Nuts and pulses.....	125	126	83
Tomatoes and citrus fruit.....	129	153	69
Fruits, other than citrus.....	89	110	70
Leafy green and yellow vegetables.....	120	116	147
Other vegetables.....	110	100	140
Grain products.....	104	121	117
Beverages, tea, coffee, cocoa.....	103	98	83

So that in the United States and Canada particularly we really cannot complain about the rationing and shortages of food products, when there has been an improvement in the per capita consumption of these important items.

In addition to the supplies we have sent to our own troops, Canada in 1943 passed mutual aid legislation which provided the supplying of commodities to the united nations up to the value of a billion dollars. Again last year another appropriation was made to the extent of $800,000,000. The total cost of the war to the end of the present fiscal year will be over fifteen billions of dollars, as compared with a total cost of the great war, including rehabilitation, of $1,629,958,869.

After having made such an important contribution to the defeat of the nazi forces it is only natural that the people of Canada should be equally interested in considering the changes that must be made in national and international affairs in order that there never again will be a world war. Canadians have followed with keen interest the important conferences which have been held during the course of the war. I think it is significant that quite early in the conflict, as early as 1941, we had important statements coming from Roosevelt and Churchill, outlining the shape of things to come, as they visualized it.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

During the years 1914 to 1918 most people felt that all that was necessary was that we achieve a military victory over our enemies. And then when victory came the victorious nations were not prepared to lay down any formula that would guarantee peace and security to the world. In the Atlantic charter Roosevelt and Churchill reached agreement on eight important clauses. Following that, a conference was held in Washington in December, 1941. Then Roosevelt and Churchill met again at Casablanca. Two conferences have been held at Quebec, one at Moscow, one at Cairo, one at Teheran, and more recently at Dumbarton Oaks and Yalta.

Representatives of the united nations have met, pooled their ideas, and considered working arrangements, in order that we might be able to proceed immediately when victory has been achieved with plans for a permanent peace. Just as it was necessary for the united nations to put everything they had into defeating our enemies, so is it likewise essential to make our maximum contribution with a view to having enduring peace.

Canada should be able, as I have indicated, to make an important contribution in this field. As a result of our geographical position we must interest ourselves in international affairs. For a century and a quarter we have been able to maintain happy relations with our good and powerful neighbour to the south. Our connection as a member of the British commonwealth of nations enables us to interpret to the world the problems and achievements we have experienced as a member of this large family.

Since Russia is our near neighbour to the north we must be interested in interpreting the aims and aspirations of this northern neighbour to the United States and the United Kingdom. In our own country we have had people from all parts of the world come to establish permanent residence here. For many years we have been able to work out our differences of opinion without resorting to war. While we have had problems in different parts of the country from time to time, we have always found, from experience, that it has been in the best interests of all to have resolved those problems peacefully.

On this continent, both in the United States and in Canada, we have found from experience that working together for the greatest good for the greatest number has been far, far better than each province or each state trying to maintain a powerful army with a view to protecting its rights and enabling it to force its demands upon its neighbours.

In my own constituency, for example, for nearly fifty years people from many countries have been working together to build up a strong and united Canada. The 1941 census gives the largest racial group as being of Ukrainian origin, and places the number at 18,334. The Scandinavians come next with 8,000, the English 6,000, Scottish 4,000, Irish 3,000, Polish 5,000 and Russians 4,664.

My children attend a school where more than fifty per cent of the children are non-Anglo-Saxon. Recently I attended an entertainment given by the third grade and I found a miniature league of nations. The teacher is Anglo-Saxon, while her husband of a Ukrainian origin, is a major in the Canadian army serving in Italy. The father of one of the children is a prisoner of war in Hong Kong. These children derive inspiration from the achievement of their forbears in the Scandinavian countries, central Europe, eastern Canada and the United States. The children in that particular room of necessity are keenly interested in the welfare of Canadian prisoners of war in Hong Kong, in the progress of Canadians in Italy and in the achievements of Canora boys on the high seas, in the air force and in the armed forces everywhere. It is only natural that children growing up in that sort of environment will not be handicapped by prejudices that frequently are deep rooted in countries where it is assumed that all virtue is to be found in those who are of the race or colour or creed of one particular group.

In order to win the war we have made tremendous expenditures in blood, sweat and tears. Is it too much to expect that during the next five years the people of Canada, if given leadership by the government of this country, will be prepared to make similar sacrifices and similar contributions with a view to seeing that never again will the peoples of the world resort to war? I mentioned that the expenditures incurred by Canada in conducting the war have totalled over $15 billion. I need not mention that this is a very large sum.

I should like to indicate what could be accomplished during the five years after the war with similar appropriations. We could vote $3,000 to each family in the country to build a new home. There are approximately 2½ million families in Canada and this would total $5 billion. We could give $3,000 to each man and woman in the armed services. A $1,000 car could be supplied to every family in the country. We could make a grant of $200 million a year for each of the next five years for mutual aid to countries that have been overrun; $250 million a year for family allowances for five years and another $250 million for a comprehensive medical, dental, hospital and nursing service for five years could be provided. We could pay $1,000 a year to the 97,000 pensioners of the last war and $1,000 a year to the 200,000 old age and blind pensioners for 5 years. We could make a grant of $500 a year for four years to approximately all university students in Canada. The total of the items I have given is $14,835,000,000. There would be sufficient left over to settle the dispute between the Department of Finance and the Saskatchewan government in connection with certain seed grain advances a few years ago, leaving still a considerable balance.

During the progress of the war the policy of Canada and of every country of the united nations was that whatever was physically possible must be made financially possible. That must still be our goal. I think Canada should stress the importance of chapter IX of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals dealing with international, economic and social cooperation. If permanent peace is to be realized we cannot have one-third of the peoples in several countries ill-housed, ill-clothed and ill-fed. Canada should take a lead in seeing that our own industries operate at capacity, that our natural resources are developed to the limit of our ability and that our man-power is gainfully employed in doing useful work for ourselves and the people in the other parts of the world.

Just as in the war we found it desirable to give of the materials that were needed to achieve victory, so in the years which are to follow Canada must be prepared to give of the surpluses which we have in order that the countries which have been devastated by the years of war shall not be required to wait years and years before they can have their homes rebuilt and decent standards of living.

There is a suggestion I should like to make, one which I do not believe has been offered to the Canadian delegation. Provision should be made for international scholarships for professors and students in order that they may travel freely from one country to another and be able to bring back to their own people stories of the problems and achievements in other countries. During my university days it was my good fortune to attend several international conferences. I will be forever grateful for the privileges that were made available to me.

I remember attending one conference in Yugoslavia. At first there were strained relationships between the students of the different countries, but after we had been there for a few days we found that we had a great deal in common if we were willing to give and take, sufficient agreement could be reached to make real progress in our discussions.

The students in Europe had been able to convince their governments of the importance of making concessions to students to encourage them to travel. We travelled from London to Yugoslavia on a tour that had been arranged by an international organization. Railways in several of the countries gave reductions of fares up to fifty per cent to parties of students that were travelling. In all the university cities we were met by groups of students who took us to their hostels where it was possible to have room and lodging at prices that students could afford to pay instead of having to stay at the expensive hotels. We were able to visit centres of learning in those cities during the limited time at our disposal, and we came away with a better understanding and appreciation of these important centres of learning.

In laying plans for cooperation and understanding in the future I think that generous provision should be made in order to encourage people to visit their neighbours and to become familiar with the work being done. We might start here in Canada. Recently I saw a picture presented by the national film board giving the story of the T.V.A. I feel sure that if that picture could be shown in China, India and Africa a useful purpose would be served. If Canadian, United States and British technical experts were willing to place their services at the disposal of people in Asia and Africa who had not had the advantage of an achievement such as the Tennessee valley authority, we could go a long way toward cementing the peoples of the different nations together in better understanding.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

I want to join with all those who have preceded me in expressing the hope that at San Francisco the Canadian delegation will make a worth-while contribution toward reaching a working basis in connection with these important and complicated international problems; and just as we have given of our best into the pool for the prosecution of the war I feel sure that the people of Canada will give this government and any other government the most loyal cooperation in carrying out the programme which will be necessary if this is to be a war to end wars.

Mr. F. D. MacKENZIE (Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, the resolution before the house and the debate now proceeding is in my opinion one of the most important ever to come before any parliament in Canada. The effects of the San Francisco conference can be tremendous. The implications may well be decisive for our world. If the results of this conference are successful we can go on to a happy future; if unsuccessful, then it may be ruined for all.

Here in Canada this government has put into legislation during the last year a programme of far-reaching importance—a social legislation as advanced as any in the world, agricultural, economic and trade measures that will guarantee the farmer, the fisherman, the lumberman and the labourer a fair return and equitable treatment. Our measures for the rehabilitation of returned service men and women are more liberal than those of any other country in the world. We have completed a full programme of domestic legislation; we have joined in trade and monetary discussions with the united nations, looking to supplement our domestic legislation; and if world peace is assured, not for another twenty-five years but for a long period of time, we can look to the future with hope. But if peace is not assured, then all our national and domestic legislation is in vain and will avail us nothing. Because of that this conference at San Francisco is one of the most important to be held anywhere and this debate transcends in importance any other subject with which parliament has ever had to deal. That is why I wish to go on record.

Because thinking men everywhere sense the implications involved and matters to be discussed in San Francisco there is apparently readiness long before the event to try to see the other man's viewpoint, to be prepared to give as well as take, to work together in the cause of peace. This is seen on every hand in the united nations. It was seen at Dumbarton Oaks; it was seen at Yalta; it is seen in the United States congress and in statements by the press and public men over there. It is seen in this very debate, where the great majority of the members of the house seem to realize that unless we have peace nothing else matters. They seem to realize also that peace is something that cannot be had for the mere wishing but that we must one and all assume obligations, responsibilities and commitments and maybe even fight for peace if we must.

Again, more significant than what public men have been saying and what governments are saying and the support given by the press, is the support of the people themselves. This time I believe the American people have their heart set on this and are willing to go through with it; and this is important, when we remember that the American people and the Canadian people have not been converted by bombs and shells as some of the European people have.

The arrangements for the conference at San Francisco to establish the general international organization go far toward assuring the future peace of the world.

That great contemporary American, the late Wendell Willkie, in his book "One World" used these words:

I was a soldier in the last war and after that war was over, I saw our bright dreams disappear, our stirring slogans become the jests of the cynical, and all because the fighting peoples did not arrive at any common post-war purposes while they fought. It must be our resolve to see that that does not happen again.

I shall never forget some of the disappointment in my own case, following the last war. Some of us did hope for something from the league of nations at the beginning.

I shall never forget an experience in the early 1920's. I attended a meeting of the local league of nations society in Winnipeg. At that meeting the speaker was the late John W. Dafeo, whose trenchant pen became known throughout the world, who saw clearly from the first that there must be collective security and that this entailed responsibilities and obligations, and who continued to press his views to the very end. Mr. Woodsworth and other public men were present.

After the address in which Mr. Dafeo presented his well known views, discussion followed. I was surprised at the heat engendered in that discussion and the wide division of opinion held. And I was greatly disappointed. Another young returned man was with me and when we got outside I said to him: "Isn't it all a hopeless mess. Here we have the world in its present awful state, just out of a destructive war; most of us believe that it requires a world organization with teeth, to control national bandits, and yet, when a possible set-up is suggested, what do we get? Here, to-night, were some 90 or 100 men, all sincerely hoping for a peaceful future, all speaking the same language, educated in the same schools, living in the same community for years as neighbours and yet, when it came to a fundamental matter, in hopeless and heated disagreement. If we who are so similar cannot agree, how in all conscience can we hope for agreement among people who do not speak the same language and are strangers in many ways. Can you see any hope?" I asked him, "because I can't."

Can men agree on common world action to-day? Well, they did not in the 1920's.

To speak more technically, the experience of the league of nations proved that the abstract concept of law removed from an apparatus capable of enforcing it could not be made to apply in the mutual relations of states, and that wherever the authority of law applies, it does so only by the intercession of some recognized political machinery which in essence possesses the superior sovereignty. Can we evolve that machinery and clothe it with the necessary superior sovereignty?

Well, to-day it seems to be different. A second war has struck us, and I am hopeful that the lesson has been driven home. This time already a large measure of agreement has been reached. In our own country the people generally, the press also and right here in this house are looking forward with hope to San Francisco. Listening to this discussion, I cannot remember a debate in which so much agreement has been expressed with the fundamental issue and so little of doubt, selfishness and suspicion.

In the United States the people are prepared to support an organization which, although it means obligations and responsibilities, yet has some assurance of keeping the peace.

As I said before, the European countries were taught by bomb and shell that wars must cease; even Germany must know that now; but conversion has come to the Americas without the aid of that violence. Already there is much agreement among the united nations; we have had Dumbarton Oaks and Yalta, and now comes San Francisco. All this gives us hope that this time men will exhaust every effort to agree on plans for an effective organization.

Who will be so sadistic as to sabotage humanity's attempt to save itself? Who will even speak ill of this attempt and refuse to join in helping it along? Surely no one in this Canadian parliament.

Wars on this earth must cease if the human race is to survive. Peace must prevail, even if we must fight for it.

Perhaps the old quotation, "Peace on earth among men of good will" might be altered for the present to read, "Peace on earth maintained by men of good will". The last time, men of good will wished for peace. This time men of good will must be prepared even to fight and sacrifice for it.

Mr. RAYMOND EUDES (Hochelaga) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the conference to be held by more than forty nations at San Francisco heralds that new order for the establishment of which those nations have been fighting for more than five years and a half.

This war marks the final stage in the evolution of an era. Featured by the countless and marvellous discoveries of science, by the conspicuous progress of civilization, this era has witnessed the formation of two social classes: capital and labour. The former, becoming more exacting and selfish as it acquired wealth, stirred up the opposition of the latter.

Successively, these various factors stimulated the particular interests of nations, and in this way they strengthened the character of each one. At the same time, the multiplicity of international relations made more numerous the occasions of friction. Class strife and wars thus became inevitable.

In the belief that they had a solution for such evils, some nations adopted a policy of uncompromising nationalism, which destroyed the self-reliance and freedom of the individual for the benefit of dictatorship. Yielding to a stupid impulse, they wanted to dominate the world, and compel it to accept their ideology.

We have fought against this threat to enslave the world, in the magnificent hope that the world would emerge purified from this chaos. On several occasions, during the war, nations have expressed their unshakeable will to set up a better order where they will live harmoniously and peacefully and where people will lead a happy existence under the banner of justice, freedom and mutual respect.

Solidly united, the freedom-loving nations have foiled the tremendous forces threatening to enslave them. To-day victory is certain.

[Mr. F. D. MacKenzie.]

This same spirit of cooperation must unite all nations in order to save humanity from the recurrence of such a catastrophe.

The object of the San Francisco conference is to bring the different nations together so that they may prepare the charter of the organization which will be entrusted with the maintenance of world peace and security.

If mankind is to live in a better world, it will not be sufficient to put an end to war; peace requires more than freedom from war; it requires calm and order in all classes of society. Human beings, endowed with the same nature, have equal rights to life and to the possession of worldly goods. If this order is flouted, peace does not exist. Nor is it a reality if anyone is deprived of the free exercise of his rights, if the worker has no job, if the capitalist builds up his wealth at the expense of the common people, if the aged and the indigent are abandoned to their sorry lot, if, in short, material comfort is not equally attainable by all.

Peace does not exist if, in a country, a group of persons attempts to dominate the rest. In Canada, it will not be a fact until the two ethnical groups have realized mutual understanding and cooperation or as long as the extremists nurse a grudge.

Peace must spring from the heart and be a living sentiment before being incorporated into treaties. Signs of its existence are the mutual respect of rights, the practice of justice, charity, true and sincere cooperation of all for the common good.

To be real, peace must be international. Commercial needs and cultural relations, stimulated by scientific discoveries have done away with distance. The ceaseless evolution of human society has so closely bound the various nations together that an isolated state can neither be self-sufficient nor even subsist. The nations truly constitute a vast commonwealth whose members are interdependent, so that the wrong suffered by the one, the injustice perpetrated on the other, have repercussions on the whole community.

The necessary relations between states have a counterpart in reciprocal rights and obligations. When these obligations are ignored, when these rights are trespassed upon, international peace is broken. Flowing from the respect of the international order, peace is the ultimate result of the prevalence of order at all levels of human activities.

This order is dependent on the recognition based on justice, of the rights of each state and on the efficient cooperation of all nations for the common good. It requires the positive attunement of the will and the coordination of efforts. Such attunement can only be apparent and such coordination can only be undertaken if there exists a supreme institution above all national enterprises, grouping the states in an effort to promote between nations relations based on justice, and if an efficient solution is applied to economic and social problems.

The modern state cannot now insure all conditions necessary to a happy life without actively participating in the life of international society. Such an international social life is therefore a normal condition of our times and entails an obligation of universal cooperation. From all these considerations, it is apparent that the nations have the duty of taking part in the organization of an international society and of cooperating to the maintenance of international peace and security.

I am pleased to support the government's resolution requesting the house to approve our participation in the San Francisco conference. In thus contributing to the preparation of a charter for an international organization, our country proves its autonomy. The membership of Canada in the British commonwealth, its geographical position, its racial duality, its immense possibilities, its contribution to the present conflict, the nature of its economy based on the relation of imports and exports, its airways and maritime routes, all these imperiously demand that our country adhere to and cooperate with this international organization. Canada is in a position to contribute to its work in a way that will be beneficial to both its citizens and the rest of the world.

Indeed, by remaining away from that conference, Canada would become isolated from the rest of the world. The standard of living of Canadians would certainly not benefit therefrom.

It has been claimed that the acceptance of this international organization would pave the way for war, entail useless expenditures and make us subject to perpetual conscription. It has been said that it would be more advisable to restore order in our country and to devote our energies to the establishment of national peace and security.

Can it be said that we are paving the way for war when we endeavour to get all the countries of good will to exert a continuous and concerted effort in order to eradicate at the source the causes of war? It is possible that eventually this international organization will prove powerless to prevent war. Is this a sufficient reason not to exert every effort to prevent war?

Of course it is advisable to restore order and peace at home. It is absolutely necessary that all Canadians, regardless of their racial origin, should consider that they have equal rights. But this is not inconsistent with the aim of the international organization. It facilitates its attainment. In view of the absolute interdependence of countries, is not national peace a delusion if international peace no longer exists?

Technical arguments have been resorted to. It was alleged that democracy, that our constitution have been disregarded because the government has accepted an invitation to the conference without first having called parliament together. It was claimed that because on the date of the conference the term of office of this parliament will have expired, the house has no power to appoint representatives. By the same token, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the delegates will have no mandate and will not represent anything.

In rebuttal, it is sufficient, as it has been pointed out, to distinguish between the government and the House of Commons. The former is endowed with the executive power; the latter, together with the Senate, holds the legislative power. The government, which is composed of the cabinet ministers, remains in office until the succeeding government has taken the oath of office. Therefore, on the date of the conference the government will still be in office.

The invitation to the conference was forwarded to the government and not to parliament. Further, the acceptance of this invitation, as well as the appointment of the delegates, come under the executive power. The delegates will be the representatives of the government and not of parliament.

Responsible as they are to the people, the government, out of respect for the constitution and democracy, should submit for approval to parliament their attitude at the conference as well as the ratification of the charter of the international organization. That is indeed the purport of paragraph 5 of the resolution now before us.

On the whole, no sound reason can be adduced for refusing to approve the resolution introduced by the government.

In the preparation of the charter of the new international organization, I hope that our government will emphasize the necessity for all nations to join this organization; otherwise, the object in view will be difficult to achieve. I hope that the government will proclaim that all nations, small or great, have equal rights and that they will see to it that weak nations are not dominated by strong ones, that they will endeavour to confer upon that organization a true authority and adequate powers; to develop, in improving it, the machinery for the peaceful settlement of international differences and to extend the field of cooperation that will ensure a satisfactory solution for economic and social problems.

I hope that this international organization will do justice to Poland. I have neither the authority nor the information required for passing judgment on that vexed Polish question but I do claim that on the coming into existence of an organization dedicated to the preservation of peace, and proclaiming as its primary principle the sovereign equality of all nations, the world is justified in demanding a serious and impartial study of that problem and in insisting that right be recognized and justice respected.

It would be a utopian idea to believe that the creation of this international organization will mean the elimination of all ills and the beginning of an endless golden age. This organization is but an institution, a framework designed for the grouping of nations but within which men, with their qualities and their weaknesses, will be active.

Whatever be in store for this organization, whatever part it may be called upon to play in the future, the fact remains that it constitutes on the part of men a noble effort to make mankind better and to ensure a more pleasant life on earth.

Mr. W. F. RICKARD (Durham): For some days now this house has been discussing one of the most important pieces of legislation ever to have come before parliament, a subject which is of vital importance not only to every Canadian but to every peace-loving nation throughout the world. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), speaking on the resolution, in his splendid speech outlined the proposals at Dumbarton Oaks and other international meetings and told us something of what he thought would be discussed at San Francisco. Members on all sides of the house have expressed their ideas as to what should or should not be done at this conference.

I am indeed glad, and I believe the people of Canada are proud, that the Prime Minister is to head the delegation from Canada. I am sure I am safe in saying that no one in Canada has had a greater knowledge of international affairs than the Prime Minister, nor is anyone held in higher esteem by the statesmen of the world than he. His close associations with the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Great Britain for so many years, and the wonderful contribution of Canada to the war, place him in high standing in the nations of the world.

There has been some suggestion in the press that he might be chairman of the conference. This would be a tribute not only to himself but also to Canada, and I know that, regardless of party affiliations, he would be the unanimous choice of the Canadian people. I am glad also that this delegation from Canada is to be representative of different political parties and I hope that the opposition members who attend will put Canada and the world first. In fact, I know they will.

While some political notes have been sounded in this debate I am sure they will all be forgotten at the conference and no one will take advantage of San Francisco to make political capital. There is too much at stake in these days for that.

We have heard a great deal about the basic things that must form a free world—security, which means freedom from fear and freedom from want. This is a kind of economic structure based on world outlook. Unless it is, I doubt very much if we can have this freedom. Then there is freedom of worship and freedom of the peoples, by which I mean an attitude of respect and cooperation toward each other, not looking down upon any race but realizing that all human beings throughout the world are entitled to the same consideration. Those are the basic things we will need for a free world, because there never was a time when we should be more careful not to make hasty decisions, without first considering the point of view of the other fellow.

I should like to emphasize this one point. We are not the people who will have to be convinced of what must be done in the future. No doubt this delegation will do whatever must be done, will accommodate itself, will work and compromise, if necessary, as long as we are moving forward toward the goal of lasting peace; but this cannot be done at one conference. You know it is very easy to go on talking about things with those who to a large extent agree with what you say, but we must go out into the world and talk to those who do not agree, and try to discover the basis of their disagreement. I hope we can unite on the basic things which all people must accept for a better world. Some speakers have suggested that the smaller nations may not be given much consideration in formulating policies for peace but that the big four, as they are known, will have all the say. In an address made some time ago, Mr. Churchill said:

For the purpose of preventing wars there must be a world-controlling council, comprising the greatest states which emerge victorious after this war, who will be obliged to keep within certain minimum standards of armaments for the purpose of preserving peace.

However, he would not exclude all participation by smaller nations. In addition to the controlling or executive council of great powers, he added:

. . . there must be a world assembly of powers whose relations to the world executive or controlling power for the purpose of maintaining peace, I am in no position to define.

President Roosevelt seems to agree that the great powers must bear chief responsibility for the maintenance of peace. While we know Canada is not one of the larger nations she has contributed to the war effort, according to her size, more than any other nation in the world, in men, material and food, and to my mind is entitled to a high place among those making the decisions for peace. When history is written Canada will be among the first nations and the Prime Minister of Canada will be among the great statesmen of the world. On the basis of population this country stands only about thirty-fifth among world nations. We have less than one per cent of the peoples of the earth. But the catastrophe of two world wars, plus historic accidents of geography and racial association, have hastened our economic maturity. Before the war we took pride in being the fifth trading nation of the world. To-day we are third, or second as far as mutual aid is concerned. Canada has become one of the few surplus-producing nations of the world. In a way this is no new thing. Canada has always produced far more food, materials and goods than her people could consume; but this war has vastly increased our surplus position. To put it in another way, although thirty per cent of our eligible man-power is in the armed forces our productive war capacity, expanded yet not devastated by war, is being made available to the extent of almost eighty per cent for the use and support of other than our own troops. Of a total of over nine billion dollars of war production, between six and seven billion have been made available for use by the other united nations. Our productive capacity, large though it may seem to us, is still small compared with the combined total of Great Britain and the United States.

Canada's early collaboration with the United States provided a pattern for future allied combined economic operations. Even when Canadian munitions production reached its peak of a quarter billion dollars a month in 1944, it represented not more than five per cent of the combined output of Great Britain, the United States and Canada. Nevertheless Canadian aluminum helped to make it possible for England to win the battle of Britain. Unprepared as we were, it was the thin but widening line of communication and supply between Canada and Great Britain which for a time weighed materially in the balance between victory and defeat. Of importance, too, is the fact that in a very real sense Canada and the United States pointed the way toward the pooling of resources of skill and brain power which has been one of the most important single factors in the success of the united nations. As far back as August, 1940, at Ogdensburg, the Prime Minister and Mr. Roosevelt reached agreement on the creation of a joint board of defence for the two countries. In April, 1941, these two leaders met again at Hyde Park to pool the resources of the two nations. Subsequently, in 1942, this Canada-United States partnership was further extended through the fact that Canada obtained top-bracket membership on two of four combined United States-United Kingdom boards created to coordinate and allocate available supplies, raw materials, shipping and food. In July, 1944, a meeting was held at Bretton Woods at which many of the suggestions put forward by Canada were accepted.

One of the most significant trade developments of 1944 was the overwhelming support given President Roosevelt in the November elections and the increased majority he obtained both in the house of representatives and the senate. It is generally expected that some time in 1945 the United States will call an economic world conference and indicate to some extent her willingness to fulfil the reciprocal trade arrangements enacted by all nations under lend-lease.

There are ways of keeping out the goods of other people in addition to building a tariff wall around a country. One of these methods is by quotas. The United States keeps out a great many Canadian cattle which we would like to sell in that country, simply by saying that our sales of cattle in any one quarter may not exceed so many thousand head. In other words, by giving us a very limited trade quota a barrier to trade is maintained and United States cattlemen are protected to that extent.

In my remarks I have tried to show that at least as far as Canada is concerned trade is an important matter in which, as a farmer, I am very much interested. We have heard it said that Great Britain will buy from us after the war because we have shipped her so much during the war, but I fail to see it in that way. I think she will buy from the country that can supply what she wants at a price comparable with that of other countries, a price she can afford to pay; and the same will be true of other nations. We must also remember that if we are going to sell we must buy. So it behooves us as Canadians to go out and find markets for our goods, if possible, because that will mean either prosperity or poverty after the war. Canada has laid the foundation for international trade by the quantity and quality of goods she has sent to all parts of the world. Let us see to it that we continue along this way. But governments cannot do this alone. We must have the cooperation of every manufacturer and every producer of goods to supply the highest quality products and at the lowest possible cost.

Meat Shipments

On motion of Mr. Tustin the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre) the house adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

Tuesday, March 27, 1945

The house met at three o'clock.

MEAT

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION IN RESPECT OF SHIPMENTS FROM CANADA TO THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture, based on a report in the morning papers respecting proceedings in a senate subcommittee conducting an investigation into food shortages in the United States. It is reported that the director of supply for the United States Commodity Credit Corporation told the committee that efforts had been made to get large quantities of meat from Canada, but that the Canadian government would not permit exports. In view of the statement made on December 5, 1944, by the Minister of Agriculture in reply to a question asked by the house leader of the Progressive Conservative party (Mr. Graydon) that Washington had suggested that Canada should not send beef cattle to the United States and that the government of Canada was respecting that attitude, will the minister make a statement explaining what appears to be a contradiction of his previous comments in this connection?

[Mr. Rickard.]

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I did not notice the question of the hon. member until he had begun reading it and I saw the copy of it on my desk; therefore I have not had time to consider the matter. I should like to say, however, that I noticed in the newspapers this morning the statement reported to have been made by the director of supply for the United States Commodity Credit Corporation, and I find it most difficult to believe that such a statement was made without any statement being made at the same time as to what it may be related to. There may have been some request from the United States Commodity Credit Corporation for beef from Canada at some period or another during the war. However, the reference I made on December 5, 1944, was based upon an inquiry made personally by our own deputy minister in Washington a short time prior to the making of it. Any statement made in the house was in exact accordance with information we had from Washington.

Another question, to which reference was made in the house at the same time, had to do with two different matters, and I believe was referred to by one of the senators in replying to this particular statement. I believe I made the statement to the house in December last—and if I did not, I make it to-day—that at that time, when the peak in delivery was reached last fall, not only did we approach Washington, but we also took the matter up with certain packing plants in St. Paul, Minnesota. We asked them whether or not they would take delivery of a stated number of cattle per week over a short period of time, in order to relieve the Winnipeg stock market.

Mr. SENN: Would that number amount to the quota?

Mr. GARDINER: No; we simply asked them if they would agree that so many hundred or so many thousand cattle should be taken off the Winnipeg market during a certain period, and sent down to St. Paul, to be processed in St. Paul plants, instead of at home. The plants were overcrowded in Winnipeg. We received in reply from the cooperative in St. Paul, a telegram, which I could place on the table of the house saying that it would be impossible for them to handle these cattle, and advising us to keep them on this side of the line.

Not only did we consult with officials of the department in Washington but we took the matter up with packing plants as well, and had the same kind of information from both. Of course it is understood by all, I think, in the United States and Canada as well as in Great Britain, that it has been the united wish of all three that as much as possible of surplus meat, not only from Canada but from this continent, should be sent to Great Britain or to other countries requiring it, particularly in these days when other countries are being occupied by the allied forces. We have been cooperating to the greatest extent possible in making the largest amounts available from this country for shipment directly to Britain. That has been understood by the representatives of all three governments. The matter is still under consideration and discussion, even more so now than it was last fall.

Mr. SENN: Is the situation the same to-day as it was in December when the minister made his statement to the house?

Mr. GARDINER: The situation is somewhat different to-day. I am sure the hon. member for Haldimand realizes, as we all do who are interested in the marketing of live stock, that the rush period of deliveries comes in the fall of the year so far as western Canada is concerned, and there is probably also a rush delivery in the spring of the year in the eastern part of Canada where cattle are grain fed. But the period of which I was speaking was the rush period of last fall, when it was natural that we should be considering the plants at St. Paul rather than in the eastern part of the United States. I presume that a similar situation might develop in the spring of this year, although it has not up to the present moment. Last fall we were not able to get all the hogs and cattle we had coming to market through our plants at the time they should go through. At the present time our plants are not running to capacity with live stock coming in, and for that reason I would say there would be less likelihood than there was last fall of anyone asking that we should ship our live stock to the United States for processing of meats on their way to Britain. We can probably put all that will come forward in a short period of time through our own plants, and for that reason more meat can be got to Britain by keeping our own plants fully occupied than could be if we shipped more to the United States and kept our own plants only partly busy.

Mr. SENN: I hesitate, Mr. Speaker, to ask another question, but evidently the director of supply over there told the committee that efforts have been made to get larger quantities. Is that correct?

Mr. GARDINER: I have checked all the records that have come from the other side and all the records we have here, and now that the question has been raised, I think I should say all the records show that there has been more meat consumed in the United States per head of population than there has in Canada. I think that fact should be made known not only in this country but in the United States. There has been so much discussion of this question by people who have not the facts before them that I am afraid some people may have got a wrong impression. The people of the United States appear to have the idea that we consume a much greater quantity of meat in this country in relation to our population than they do. That is not the fact. Their own statistics coming here indicate that while the figures for the two countries are approximately the same, the consumption per head of population has been slightly higher on the other side of the line than in Canada.

The fact remains that on the other side of the line they have a greater difficulty in equalizing the distribution than we have on this side. We have only five or six large cities, while they have a very considerable number of large cities, some of them much larger than ours. On this side of the line we have followed the practice, when there has been a threatened shortage in Toronto, let us say, of shipping meat in and paying the freight on it from some other part of Canada, to make meat available in the shortage area. To apply that same idea to the United States would perhaps be a little more difficult. Nevertheless that practice has resulted in a more equitable distribution of meat in this country, with a lesser per capita consumption than there is in the United States.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

DECORATIONS FOR GALLANTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a suggestion rather than a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence, also to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services and to the Minister of National Defence for Air? At the last session of parliament, approximately a year ago, not during the fall sittings, the three ministers at my suggestion placed upon

Privilege—Mr. Wood

Hansard lists of Canadian service personnel who have been awarded decorations for gallantry. I think it would be appropriate if before the session closes the lists were brought up to date by the three ministers. It would be an admirable idea to have these further names on Hansard.

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Defence for Air): Mr. Speaker, the list for the Department of National Defence for Air has been prepared and is ready to be placed on Hansard.

Mr. GRAYDON: Thank you.

INQUIRY WITH RESPECT TO FARM LEAVE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I would like to direct a question to the appropriate minister, either the acting Minister of National Defence or the Minister of Labour. As spring is now here and agricultural work is getting under way, especially in the west, what provision, if any, has been made for the release of men from the armed forces, either general service or home defence, to work on the farms?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): This of course is a hardy annual. My hon. friend can rest assured that we will get the crop in and get it off, as we have done every year in cooperation with the provincial authorities.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Don't say "we". It is the farmers.

Mr. MITCHELL: All right, you and I.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I should just like to know what provision is being made.

Mr. HANSELL: We are beginning to get letters asking about farm leave for spring work.

Mr. MITCHELL: The provision will be under somewhat similar conditions as those of last year.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I notice the minister said, provision "will be". Does that mean that there is no provision made now, that no proposals are formulated?

Mr. HANSELL: Will the minister make an announcement to-morrow or the next day? Many letters are beginning to come in about farm leave for those in the armed forces. It is an annual question, but the time has come when it should be answered.

[Mr. Graydon.]

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

GOOD FRIDAY PROGRAMMES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): May I ask the government if instructions are to be given that there shall be no crooning or jazz playing over the C.B.C. network on Good Friday? I would like to have an answer.

Hon. L. R. LaFLECHE (Minister of National War Services): The hon. gentleman's words will be noted and brought to the attention of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

PRIVILEGE—MR. WOOD

REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE ON MARCH 23, 1945

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. E. WOOD (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) referred yesterday at page 218 of Hansard to a statement that I had made, the correctness of which he challenged. I based the observations to which he referred on words he used at page 171 of Hansard, when he said, as I heard it from this section of the house: "Any nation that becomes a member of the world court, the security council and the like, has to surrender its rights to handle its own affairs regardless of how they affect other nations of the world." Also on page 171, where he associates himself with the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), there is a quotation from section 5 of section B which I do not need to repeat, but which ends with these words:

The special agreement . . . should be in each case subject to approval by the security council and to ratification by the signatory states in accordance with their constitutional processes.

The remark that prefaced that was on page 171 of Hansard:

Personally I believe such a course is absolutely wrong.

That is what prompted me to make the remark I did.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

OFFICERS WITH DUTY IN CANADA ONLY—
STATEMENT OF MR. POULIOT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, when I make an error I am the first to confess it. Yesterday I referred to an order for return which had been passed in the house regarding the brass hats who had never been in any theatre of war. There was no order for return, but I wrote a question and I sent it to Hansard. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. McNaughton) told me, "We will do our best to get the figures and give the member for Temiscouata the answer to his question." My belief is that the word of a minister should be as good as a vote of the house.

VETERANS' AFFAIRS

AVAILABILITY OF TRACTORS FOR RETURNED SOLDIERS ENGAGED IN FARMING

On the orders of the day.:

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans' Affairs, and I am sorry that I have not been able to send him notice of it. It has to do with a return received yesterday which indicates that the veterans' land act board have frozen tractors and a lot of farm machinery for future delivery. A number of our young men who own their own land have not the equipment to work it with, and it is late in the season. I ask that equipment be released to men who, having been overseas and discharged, are in a position to pay cash for tractors, in order to put their crops in.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I shall be very glad to look at once into the situation as analysed by my hon. friend.

SAN FRANCISCO CONFERENCE

PROPOSED GENERAL INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION
FOR MAINTENANCE OF PEACE AND SECURITY

The house resumed, from March 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King to approve a resolution to send representatives to a conference of the united nations at San Francisco to prepare a charter for the maintenance of international peace and security.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I am not at all sure that after all that has been said in this debate I can make any worth-while contribution to the discussion. However I desire at the outset to say that, notwithstanding all the weaknesses of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals and notwithstanding all the difficulties which I know will be encountered at San Francisco, I am heartily in favour of the underlying principles of these proposals, and I think that every peace-loving, right-thinking citizen in Canada should be also. I am astonished that there has been injected into this debate even a note of dissent with respect to the principle.

Admittedly the subject matter is of very great importance. But I suggest to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that it is not of such immediate supreme importance that at this time we should spend half of the short lease of life of this House of Commons in discussing it, having regard to the fact that another matter, which in my opinion is of vastly greater importance, must be dealt with, at least in a measure, before this parliament dies a natural death. I have always taken the ground that the winning of the war is the supremely vital thing before this House of Commons, and the war is still to be won, although we can congratulate ourselves upon the fact that the position of the united nations to-day enables us to see the victory, perhaps to-morrow. The winning of the peace stands in the second place, and the keeping of the peace is, in my judgment, of third importance only.

This house had a distinct mandate some five years ago this month from the Canadian people to win this war. The Canadian people have done their part manfully. Having said that, I now make the assertion that this House of Commons has no mandate from the people of Canada with respect to either the peace proposals or the post-war period. We have no mandate from the Canadian electorate to deal with the peace-making proposals or the peace-keeping proposals; and the sooner this country has a general election the sooner will the atmosphere be cleared and someone will have a mandate from the Canadian people to participate in the peace-making and in the peace-keeping.

We listened yesterday afternoon to what may possibly be the valedictory of the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar); and I want as an old friend to congratulate him on the general character of his speech. With much that he said I am in general agreement. There is only one point, I think, upon which we may be said to differ, and that is the point he raised with respect to the proposals of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), with which he made it quite clear that he was in total disagreement. But he sought to give to the proposals of the hon. member for Vancouver South a much wider scope than is inherent in the words themselves or in the proposals which the hon. member made. As I understood them, the hon. member for Vancouver South took the attitude that since Canada itself is not to have a seat in the security council our best plan is to work together with Britain qua the security council, and that alone. I quite agree that the time has not yet arrived—it may never arrive—when the empire can speak with one voice on every conceivable subject; but surely if we had collaboration, consultation, cooperation, and all the other attributes which the Prime Minister has stated we have from time to time with Britain during the conduct of the war, we can have collaboration and all the rest of it with Britain in dealing with the making of the peace and with peace keeping. I shall return to this a little later.

Now, Mr. Speaker, on a personal matter. We on this side and I myself in particular have been twitted and giped at because we indicated that we were not ready to proceed with this debate on Tuesday last. I have a perfectly good personal explanation which I am not going to deal with: I was unable to assemble the material which I thought I had in hand, and I certainly wanted to hear what the Prime Minister had to say before I committed myself to his proposals or anybody else's. We listened to ten thousand words last Tuesday—ten thousand words to clothe, sometimes fully and sometimes very obscurely, the position of the ministry; and I venture to say there was not a man in this house who, at the conclusion of the Prime Minister's speech, knew where he or his administration stood as regards certain aspects of these proposals. How could any member of this house, without knowing what the Prime Minister's position was, without having any advance notice of what stand the administration was to take, apart from the broad outline contained in the resolution itself—how, I say, could any member of this house, how could any party in this house, shape his or its course before hearing what the government's proposals were?

I say to the membership of the house, and to the newspaper press which cast these reflections upon my ability and spoke of my ineptitude, that it was a reasonable request to make, and the answer is that we were able to go on the next day. It was a request which has never yet been denied in this house, so far as I can recall after long experience. The member for Rosetown-Biggarr (Mr. Coldwell) did not think it was any impediment, because while it did not appear for one moment that he knew in advance what the government proposals were to be, yet he had his speech, a piece of propaganda, prepared—I assume by the secretariat paid from the sweatings of certain of the labour unions in this country. I suggest, too, that his whole exhibition was that indicated by the old adage that fools rush in where angels fear to tread.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

I wish to be serious for a moment and come to a consideration of the proposals. It is a platitude to say that these proposals are fraught with mighty consequences to every peace-loving country and to Canada and every Canadian. They just cannot be ignored; they ought not to be ignored, and they are not going to be ignored.

I would point out, as I think the Prime Minister very properly did, that we must not confuse two conceptions. There has been in the minds of certain people, I think there was in the mind of Senator Vandenberg of the United States, one of the delegates to San Francisco, and there is in the minds of certain members of this house who have already spoken, confusion of thought between peace making and peace keeping. I suggest that the engagement ahead is concerned solely with peace keeping and nothing else. My good friend the member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann), in the course of an excellent address to this house, brought up the question of the partition of Poland, and I must confess that I have a very large measure of sympathy with the people of Poland. I do not think that any of us who have read about the atrocities that were committed against Poland, first by Russia and then many times over, and much worse, by the Germans during this war, and have then witnessed what has now taken place, the fifth partition of Poland, can fail to sympathize with the people of that country. It is enough to rend the heart of any right thinking man. Yet I do not think that in this debate or in any discussion with respect to keeping the peace in the future we can interject the controversy with reference to Poland. That is something that should be fought out at the peace conference, and justice must be done Poland. That is the forum, I suggest, in which this important matter is to be dealt with.

I ask what I consider to be a very pertinent question: If the world organization contemplated by the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, to be crystallized at San Francisco, fails, what then? What is to be the future of the nations of this old world in relation to international peace unless we have something concrete, binding and enforceable to guide the destinies of the nations in the years that are to come? If we are to have peace at all in our time, or for all time, it is imperative that some international organization such as, or similar to, that contemplated by Dumbarton Oaks should be set up at once and should begin to function immediately after the peace treaties go into effect. If that is not done, I can see nothing but world chaos in the days to come.

What will happen? The rule of law will have failed to function and perform; power politics will prevail instead; spheres of influence will be set up; territorial domination under the rule of force will prevail with all its horrors of war and cruelty and oppression for the weaker nations, and we shall be back just where we were in 1914 and 1939. The whole picture cries aloud to high heaven for some organization to prevent disaster for the future.

The Dumbarton Oaks proposals, I believe and I gather from the reading I have done on the subject, are something more than merely proposals as a basis of discussion. As I read them, I think they are much more than that. If I understand the position of the three great powers, I think these proposals are a sine qua non in themselves, and very little can be done to alter them, even though I would like to see some of the conditions altered. They may be modified in detail, but I suggest they will not be modified in principle at San Francisco.

We shall have a babel of voices at San Francisco, perhaps much confusion; but I suggest that the principles underlying the proposals in the framework of the Dumbarton Oaks agreement will in the end prevail. Mark you well, this conference has been called not by a group of united nations, a large group, but by the three big powers through the medium of the United States. The plans outlined in Dumbarton Oaks and settled by the negotiators at that time and place, are plans for the establishment and operation of an international organization under the title of "The United Nations".

It is trite to say that the objectives cannot fail to find universal support in Canada and among all peace-loving countries. The methods to be adopted, the procedure to be followed, may be open to debate and amendment, but the objective has already been determined. But mark you well—and I desire to call the attention of the hon. members of this house and the people of Canada to this fact—the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, altered or varied as they may be at San Francisco are not in themselves an insurance of peace. That assertion does not per se condemn them, not by any means, but they, a paper plan, are not in any sense in themselves an insurance of peace. If hon. members carefully analyse the plan I think they will agree with me that no paper plan of itself can be an insurance policy for peace.

I desire to make the following observations, which I think cover the position. The preservation of world peace for to-morrow and for the years that lie ahead depends entirely not upon this new league of nations which will be set up under the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, or even upon the finished product that will emerge from San Francisco, but upon what the three great powers, Russia, the United States and the United Kingdom shall determine. And Canada, unfortunately apparently is not to be one of that great company. I assert with every degree of assurance that to-morrow's peace depends upon the measure of agreement which has been or may be reached among these three great powers outside the framework of Dumbarton Oaks. If they do not agree, there will be no peace; if they agree, there will be peace, but altogether outside the framework of the proposals themselves. That may startle some people, but if hon. members examine the set-up of Dumbarton Oaks they will agree with me that unless there is a concert of nations with the three great powers nothing will be done. They and they alone will control and govern. They and they alone, acting together, mark you, will say what is to be the peace of to-morrow—not that the smaller nations may not by moral suasion, by political considerations and argument alter their opinions, but in the final analysis these three great major powers, in my view, are to control the peace of the world. This may not be very acceptable to the small nations. I am bound to say that I am disturbed about it. I do not think it is very acceptable to Canada, but I do think that it is inevitable.

It may not be inappropriate at this time to advert to the suggestion of the part that force is to play in connection with the operations of the security council. I believe we are pretty well in agreement that because of the lack of force, because of the lack of power to enforce its decrees the old league of nations in a given instance was helpless. There never was agreement to use force. Moral suasion there was, and it worked at times. Unfortunately there was a weakness in connection with the power of nations to withdraw from time to time as suited their own purpose. And of course the fatal weakness of the league of nations was the absence of the United States of America.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that after what the United States has gone through in these later years there is over there great revulsion of public opinion against the men who were responsible for the sabotaging of the league of nations in the United States, and if they were to do the job over again to-day there would be a different decision arrived at. However, I do not wish to pursue that line of thought any farther. So far as I can discover, there seems to be a misapprehension with respect to the forces that will be at the disposal of the council of this new league of nations, the force that is essential if the decrees of the council are to be enforced against an aggressor. If I understand the position correctly—and the Prime Minister when he replies will correct me if I am wrong—the forces contemplated after the subsidiary agreements are entered into are not to be armies. This council is not to maintain a strong standing army. The forces are to be police forces only. I suggest that the forces provided for by Dumbarton Oaks are national and not international. I believe that some people fall into error there. I suggest that they will be essentially ad hoc forces, that is to say, mixed forces composed of contingents from various member nations of the new league mobilized for specific and temporary police purposes, not permanently organized as an international army. That is very different, and if the Canadian people understand that the position is as I believe it to be, those timid souls who view with alarm the sending of armed forces out of Canada may be reassured.

What I understand so far as Canada is concerned is that a contingent to take care of our quota, whatever it may be in this international police force, will be organized and nothing more; but if an army is required to put down aggression on the part of any wrongdoer, that will be a matter for further consideration. That is the time when we can very well meet the problem that the Prime Minister raised in the course of his address. I am not giving that view as my own alone. I think it is sound; but I cite in support of that theory the statement made by what I consider to be the greatest military observer of the press in the United States, Mr. Baldwin of the New York Times. Anybody who cares to pursue that line of thought farther will, I think, find useful employment if he reads an article of Mr. Baldwin's in the March number of Harper's magazine.

Following along that line I do suggest that this police force will be large enough perhaps to prevent or suppress small wars, but it will have neither the size nor the power to prevent or engage in large wars. Indeed I do not think that either the agreement itself or the proposed supplementary agreements contemplate that they should be able to do so. That brings me to a further conclusion, namely, if there is basic disagreement without an army, without sufficient force, and the three great powers do not agree, the new league will be simply a facade, a front, and nothing more. Let us pray that that will not be the case. If one of those three great powers commits an act of aggression, nothing the league of nations' police force may do can prevent it or alter it, and, of course, that is a vital weakness.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

May I now be permitted to give some little consideration to Canada's position. Some of the nations will not be happy about the set-up of Dumbarton Oaks. Some of us will not be happy. I gather that the Prime Minister is not too happy about Canada's position in this new set-up, because all we get is a seat in the assembly and our turn in the council of the league. But I suggest to the Prime Minister, and I do so without offence, that there is a reason why Canada has not been given such a seat, which I think she has abundantly earned by her efforts during this great war. The reason is that heretofore in world affairs, for a quarter of a century, I was going to say under prime ministers of all political stripes, Canada's position has been to follow a course of no commitments. Is it any wonder, then, that if hitherto, except in the realm of waging war, Canada has refused to make any commitments in respect of foreign affairs, our position should be as it is to-day?

I regret Canada's position. We have never taken in international affairs the part which our standards of living, our production and all the other attributes possessed by this country would entitle us to take. All down through the years since 1919 the people of Canada, through their parliamentary representatives, have been asserting their position as a nation. We have been willing to ask for and to accept all the jurisdiction and all the kudos that go with nationhood, but we have never been willing, nor are we to-day except to the extent of our participation in the war, to accept the responsibilities that are the concomitant of jurisdiction and position. That, in a nutshell, is our weakness to-day.

As I have intimated we have had consultation, cooperation and collaboration during this great war; yet, having had all that, if we are to follow the lead of the Prime Minister as I interpret his speech, in time of peace we are not willing to accept our responsibilities in an affirmative manner by placing at the disposal of the new organization our armed forces, the only effective means we have aside from financial contributions with which to fulfil our obligations as a partner in this great undertaking. We are back now to where we were in 1919, when Sir Robert Borden moved his resolution in this house approving the treaty of Versailles. At that time Mr. Fielding, as the spokesman of the Liberal party in the House of Commons, moved an amendment designed to leave our armed contribution to be determined by the occasion. My right hon. friend was not a member of the house at that time but he was the leader of the Liberal party outside of this house; and I suggest that while the voice was the voice of Esau, the hands were the hands of Jacob. The spirit of isolation was the controlling factor behind Mr. Fielding's amendment. I have no hesitation in saying that his amendment was a purely political move designed to win the election of 1921, and it succeeded. Not world peace; not collaboration to carry out the provisions of the treaty of Versailles, but politics was the motivating factor of the Liberal party in Canada for the next twenty-five years, and they served their purpose. But, Mr. Speaker, chickens have an instinctive habit of coming home to roost, and the chickens of the Liberal party have done so. If you do not believe me, go down to the province of Quebec. Never for a moment during those twenty-five years did the Prime Minister and those associated with him in promoting that policy of isolation dream there would be a second world war. But it came. Canada has freely participated in this great conflict, and the contribution of the people of Canada, sometimes under very doubtful leadership, in human lives, industrial effort and material support, has been truly magnificent.

Does anyone doubt the assertion I make in regard to doubtful leadership? Just look at the man-power problem in Canada to-day. I am not going to discuss that question at the moment; perhaps there will be a little time to debate it when this resolution is disposed of. But now that victory is certain; now that we have collaborated so well in the winning of the war, we are to right-about-face and abandon that spirit of total cooperation in this effort to preserve peace. We are to revert to the system of isolation which dominated the political thinking of Canada between 1919 and 1939. The lessons of history and of experience are to be brushed aside. We are to revert to a position which the tragic events of the past five years have proved to be wholly untenable and wholly illusive, and which would make no contribution at all to the grand objective of Dumbarton Oaks. And why? Well, to me the answer is quite plain; because in some quarters of this country it will be politically profitable. What a pity! But I do not despair. The people of Canada want peace, and they want Canada to play a man's part in attaining that objective. They reject in toto the whole idea of isolationism.

If Canada is to play a man's part in keeping the peace in the days that are to come—and I am confining my remarks to that point—that great objective cannot be reached by reverting to a policy of isolation and no commitments, but only by active and earnest collaboration with those nations which have the power and the will to do.

Our sovereignty is not at stake. That is a boggy, a straw man that is being raised in some quarters. But our reputation as a nation, among the nations of the world, is at stake. I ask this house and the people of Canada, what will be the reaction of the people of the United States to the latest position taken by the Prime Minister?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not expecting an answer from the hon. member for Kings (Mr. Grant), because he does not know what I am talking about. Our reputation over there is none too good to-day. They marvel at the situation that has existed in Canada during the last two years in the matter of reinforcements for our army.

I regret that we were not represented at Dumbarton Oaks. There is some mystery about that, at least so far as I am concerned. It is a mysterious thing that we were not represented, and it has never been made clear to me why we were not represented. Through the sacrifices of our fighting men in this great war we have earned the right to be represented at any world conference the deliberations of which so vitally affect our own well-being. Were we invited? If not, why not? If so, why were we not represented? If we were invited, did we make representations to the three great powers to be allowed to participate, or did we refuse to be represented. If so, why?

These are questions which should be answered; the answers might clarify the position. They should be answered truthfully. This is a query I put to the house: was it because it was known in advance that we should have to make more commitments, and we were unwilling to do so? And had this government already determined to revert to its historic political position of isolation? I ask that question.

These are not idle questions. The people of Canada are entitled to know. They are pertinent questions. The whole thing cries aloud for clarification. I think our position, as outlined by the Prime Minister, wherein he proposes that we become the leader of intermediate powers, so called, is untenable in the light of the framework of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, and the set-up there contemplated. The Prime Minister is just asking for trouble at San Francisco if he proceeds with that kind of action. He will find other nations with greater populations and as large national resources as we have, but none of which have made contributions in this world war as great as ours. And there is the greatest danger of upsetting the whole apple cart.

Personally—and I speak for myself—I think Canada has earned the right to a permanent seat on the security council. But that has been decided against us. If we are anxious to exercise our maximum influence, I do not think it will be as the leader of the middle nations, a jurisdiction which to-day is not recognized within the framework of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, and which I question very much will be interpolated at San Francisco. I think our only place in exercising influence comes from the fact that we are a member of the British commonwealth of nations.

I limit my remarks entirely to this question of observance of the peace. I think that there lies our destiny in this world peace organization. That is where I believe we can exercise the greatest influence for the attainment of the great objective we all desire—and not in playing a lone hand, perhaps in opposition to the three great powers. We may find ourselves as leader of the intermediate nations, and in opposition to those three great powers.

I have a great deal of sympathy for the proposal of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green). I know it may be difficult of attainment, particularly in view of the Prime Minister's attitude in London with respect to the Curtin proposals. I do not think it can be done so long as the present Prime Minister is in office, but it ought to be possible some day.

I pause here to ask why at the coming London conference of commonwealth leaders Canada is not to be represented by a minister of the crown, but only by our delegated authority, the high commissioner, and an Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs. They will go there in a capacity not much greater than that of observers. At best they will go there with cast-iron instructions which may thwart all idea of empire or commonwealth cooperation.

If Great Britain, Mr. Speaker, at and after Dunkirk attained the moral leadership of the world, and with the support of the dominions and the colonies waged battle for so many years against great odds, against the beasts at Ephesus, and still maintains her position in respect of moral leadership in the world; and if, as I believe is acknowledged the world over, the British commonwealth is the greatest single factor making for world security not only during the trying period of the war before the advent of Russia and the United States; but long afterward; and if, as some of us still believe, the British commonwealth is still the world's best hope for future world peace and security, then why in the name of common sense are we not making common cause with her and the other dominions to maintain peace at this supreme moment of the world's history? Any other course is a reversion to type for Canada, and the reclaiming of a position which history has shown is impossible for any nation.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

I know there will be many times when it will not be possible to have complete support—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken forty minutes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have not much more; and if I could have the indulgence of the house I would be only a few more minutes. I may not be addressing the house many more times.

I know there will be times and occasions when, in other spheres of international activity such as trade, and possibly defence, we cannot go the whole way with the mother country, Great Britain. There may be times when we cannot go the whole way with the other dominions or the colonies. I am referring now perhaps to India, which may soon be a dominion. But in maintaining the sphere of peace I do suggest we can go the whole way with Great Britain, and strengthen her hand in the security council. The hon. member for Vancouver South argued the position. Here is Russia, probably the greatest military power in the world to-day, and with more people—with the exception of the British empire—than are found under any one flag. Here is the United States of America, the greatest industrial power in the world, one of the greatest military powers in the world, and to-day the greatest naval power. Here is the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, shorn by six years of war of all her wealth, of many of her best men, with her navy impaired and with the loss of the flower of her young manhood. With a bare forty millions, how can she, without the support of the members of the British commonwealth, hold up her hand against those two great giants in the days which are to come, if she is to exercise her proper sphere in the matter of keeping the peace? But apparently Canada will not help.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Why does my hon. friend say that Canada will not do her full part in the British commonwealth, after what she has done during this war?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am glad the Prime Minister has asked that question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Why does he continue to say that?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I will answer it if you will sit down.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: All right, I will.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Sit down, then. You did not want interruptions when you were speaking. I will answer it; and the answer is the Prime Minister's attitude to the Lord Halifax proposals, the London conference, and the speech he made the other day. Read them for yourself. That is the answer.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Actions speak louder than words.

Mr. CRERAR: May I ask the hon. member a question—if he will pardon me?

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, the hon. member for York-Sunbury interrupted me several times yesterday.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You invited it.

Mr. CRERAR: Am I right in understanding that the hon. member for York-Sunbury supports the proposals put forth by Lord Halifax, concerning which there has been a good deal of discussion?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I made a speech before the St. George's society in Halifax last year, and I will send the hon. member a copy. But what I do say is that we ought not brusquely to brush aside the Lord Halifax proposals, but that we ought to explore them. My answer is that we never had a chance to explore them. They were denied by the Prime Minister the minute they were uttered, and there was no use opening up a discussion about them.

However, I do not wish to get heated up about this matter; I am warm enough as it is. In my view the Canadian delegates should go to San Francisco with reasonable freedom of thought and action, save in one respect. They are bound, if this resolution carries, and I hope it will, to support the principles of world security underlying the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. In all other respects, there should be freedom of thought, action and expression. That is what they demand, and that is the least that should be given to the Canadian delegates.

Again I express the regret which I feel that Canada as a nation is not to have a permanent seat on the security council. But that should not prevent Canada from doing everything within her power to help the great nations to preserve peace.

Again I express the warning, and I suggest that this is the main theme of my address, that considering the organization visualized by Dumbarton Oaks, and to be clarified, crystallized and ratified at San Francisco in the final analysis the Dumbarton Oaks plan is no insurance of peace, but that the preservation of world peace for tomorrow and the years that are to come depends, not upon the new league of nations to be set up at San Francisco, but upon the will to peace, with all that that implies, among the united nations, and especially the three great nations dehors the framework of the Dumbarton Oaks agreement.

I do hope and pray that Canada at San Francisco will make wise decisions. She has a powerful role to play if she will think internationally and not nationally. If she is to develop into a great world power, standing as she has done with Great Britain and her sister dominions during the war, she will play a great role. Isolated, she will exercise little power and little authority and influence.

There is yet time to reverse the position indicated in the Prime Minister's speech. He asserts a position of nationalism which can only result in our going nowhere.

Some time ago the Prime Minister had printed at the public expense, I assume, a book of his war speeches, entitled very appropriately, and I think he must have selected the title himself, "Canada at Britain's Side".

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. My hon. friend has said without the slightest justification in the world that the book he has just mentioned which was published under my name was published at the public expense.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I withdraw if I am wrong—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He cannot withdraw that remark too soon. But his remark is characteristic of him.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am glad to withdraw it if I am wrong. I have not the book by my side and if it was published at the Prime Minister's expense I am glad to withdraw my remark. But there is no red herring going to be drawn across my trail, I am going to tell you that. The book was entitled, and this is the point I was going to make, "Canada at Britain's Side".

An hon. MEMBER: Where else was she?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It was a very appropriate title. The people of Canada willed it so, no matter what this government willed. The people of Canada, at least in that event, controlled. I put this to the Prime Minister and to this house and the country: Now that this country is faced with the critical task of winning the peace, does the Prime Minister believe that our position at Britain's side has become somehow less desirable and less necessary?

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege arising out of the remarks of the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson). During the course of his remarks at page 244 of Hansard he used these words:

The member for Rosetown-Biggarr (Mr. Coldwell) did not think it was any impediment, because while it did not appear for one moment that he knew in advance what the government proposals were to be, yet he had his speech, a piece of propaganda, prepared—I assume by the secretariat paid from the sweatings of the labour unions in this country. I suggest, too, that his whole exhibition was that indicated by the old adage that fools rush in where angels fear to tread.

I leave it to the house to decide who is the fool. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that my speech was delivered from full notes, and I noticed that the hon. member for York-Sunbury was reading from manuscript to-day. Every line of my notes was prepared by myself in my office and dictated to my secretary. On the morning of Monday, the day that this house was to meet, I prepared my speech because everyone knew that we were about to discuss not the Prime Minister's speech but the proposals for an international conference. I just wanted to set the record straight in that regard because of the aspersions that the hon. gentleman throws from time to time at members of this house.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. Now that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggarr (Mr. Coldwell) has risen to a question of privilege, I should like to make my position clear with reference to the so-called delay with respect to the debate of last week. My hon. friend now states that he had his speech prepared with respect to the Dumbarton Oaks agreement on Monday. Let me say, despite what was said by my hon. friend on the radio—and I hope he will not be quite as bitter or intemperate or intolerant towards me again as he was then—that I had my speech prepared for delivery prior to the debate on Monday, and I want it distinctly understood that I was prepared to go on at the very commencement of that debate. But I did want to hear what the Prime Minister would have to say. Then afterwards, one-third of my speech consisted of an addition dealing with what the Prime Minister had said. I simply asked the Prime Minister for what I thought was a proper time, just a few hours, to digest his speech, before I proceeded. I want to make the record clear on that, in case some people might think that my speech had not been prepared as early as that of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggarr.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to refer to the speech just delivered by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), and I would not have done so but for the remarks he made in the concluding ten minutes of his speech. I think it behooves me as the first speaker to follow him to express on behalf of this side of the house, of the Liberal party, and of the government, if I may, and of a large part of the people of Canada, the resentment we feel at the implication he made against the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), for which there was not the slightest justification of any kind whatsoever, in which there is not the slightest amount of substance, and which the hon. member himself must have known from his knowledge of the Prime Minister and his life and record of service to the people of Canada was unfounded. These are strenuous days, sir, in which political heat is being generated, but it is time, I think, that the people of Canada began to recognize exactly what kind of opposition hon. gentlemen of the party opposite are putting up against the government of Canada.

The hon. member for York-Sunbury, in almost the closing words of his speech referred to Canada's reputation being low in the United States. If that is so, and I do not believe it is, there is only one reason for it, and that is the imputation put on the soldiers and the army and the people of Canada by the discredited statement of the leader of the Progressive Conservative party. It has been my good fortune to travel in the United States representing Canada at various conferences and on government work of various kinds, and I can assure this house and the people of Canada that never has Canada's reputation stood higher in the United States than it stands to-day, and never has it stood higher in any other country than it stands to-day. I have been connected, having had the honour of being parliamentary assistant to the Prime Minister, with the work of the wartime information board. I have seen thousands of clippings, newspaper notices, giving the most favourable attention to the work of the armed forces of Canada in every theatre of war, the work of the navy, the army, and the air force. I have read editorials in the New York Times, the Saturday Evening Post and numerous other United States papers expressing the utmost admiration for Canada's work, in one field or another, of the war; so much so that the New York Times referred to our economic conduct of the war as a "fiscal miracle"; and many countries have copied the economic policies of Canada. This practice of smearing our country is one which will earn the honest resentment of every decent Canadian at home and abroad. It is a practice which has gone on too long. It is a practice in which some hon. members opposite have indulged for political purposes, but it is not going to get them political results.

This is an important debate, and it is one to which the house has given attention for some time. I had intended to speak rather coolly about certain aspects of it, but I felt that I could not go on without making the references which I have.

The eyes of the world to-day are turned in two directions. On the other side of the Atlantic we see unfolding momentous military events which hold us tense with the expectation of the collapse of the organized resistance of the enemy. While the battle rages and reaches its final pitch of intensity, nations are preparing for the conference at San Francisco, and people everywhere are hoping that there we may lay the foundation of lasting peace. Only second in importance to the winning of the war is this new effort to win the peace; and our hope is that two world wars and a world depression, plus the obvious benefits and dangers inherent in the development of high-speed long-range aeroplanes, have brought it home to governments and peoples alike that there is little hope for lasting security except through the development of strong international organization with force to prevent aggression and machinery to promote prosperity.

Canada's interest will be furthered by international cooperation. We have as much interest in peace as any nation, and we can see now that lasting peace can be secured only through collective action in which the major and lesser powers alike are willing to play their part, to have their share of responsibility and power, and to carry their share of the load. The main reason why the league of nations did not succeed in its work before the war was not any defect in the text of the covenant of the league; it was the failure of the governments and the peoples of the world everywhere to recognize that it was in their interest to see that peace was kept and that the only way to keep it was through collective action. We failed because we did not recognize and act on the recognition that peace was indivisible and prosperity was indivisible and security was indivisible. To that failure Canada contributed no more than any other nation; and this effort made by opposition speakers—the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), and the hon. member for Saskatoon City (Mr. Bence)—to show that Canada was more isolationist than other countries, that through her isolation she contributed, in some way definitely Canadian and distinct from other nations, to the failure to keep the peace, is completely unsound. I think if they read the record—

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I do not mind the hon. member disagreeing with my statements, but he must not put into my mouth statements I did not make. I did not say anything to the effect that Canada was more isolationist than any other country.

Mr. CLAXTON: Well, I will come to my hon. friend's statement in a minute, and I will make it clear that he did say we were very decidedly isolationist. But the point I would like to make at the moment is this. During the period between the two wars, did we see the Conservative party supporting collective security, either in the debates in the house, or in the working of organizations like the league of nations society, or in the Canadian institute of international affairs, or at Canadian conferences? Were they there?

Mr. GREEN: I was at one with you.

Mr. CLAXTON: Since the war.

Mr. GREEN: Yes; in New York.

Mr. CLAXTON: Since the war, in 1942. The Conservative party and the Conservative press did nothing whatever to support the idea of collective security, to make it realized and felt throughout Canada that the one way to maintain peace was through collective action; and now they blame—

Mr. GREEN: That is a lot of rot.

Mr. CLAXTON: —the government for their failure. That is not a lot of anything.

Mr. GREEN: You are quite right.

Mr. CLAXTON: The main reason we failed was because of this failure to recognize the interest of everyone in maintaining peace. The reasons why Canada should favour international cooperation for defence and trade are too well known to require more than a summary here. In addition to the reasons which every nation has for wanting peace and avoiding war, we in Canada have additional reasons. First, Canada is more dependent on international trade than any other nation. Foreign trade accounted for thirty per cent of our income before the war, and our high levels of income, wages, and standards of living are due largely to exports. As the second or third trading nation in the world, Canada wants conditions abroad which facilitate trade abroad. Second, take such things as our tourist trade and our sale of gold, which depend on stable world conditions in which we can reap the benefits from these activities. Third, only through international collaboration can a satisfactory solution be found for our position on the cross-roads of the airways. Fourth, in the absence of international agreement, economic or political differences between Canada and the United States can force Canada into closer relations with one country at the expense of our relations with the other. Fifth, only through collective action can we avoid participation in war and the strain it places on the unity of Canada due to the different weights attached by different sections of the population to the competing pulls of history and geography represented in our British, European and north American associations. In view of this, it is not surprising that the Canadian government has throughout the war adopted every means to encourage collective action, and that in the speech from the throne read on the 27th January, 1944, the governor general said for the government:

My ministers believe that the time has come when all the nations now united in the common purpose of winning the war should seek unitedly to ensure an enduring peace. The dangers of future aggressions can be removed, and world security attained, only by a general international organization of peace-loving nations. You will accordingly be invited to approve of Canadian participation in the establishment of an international organization to further national security through international cooperation.

That was the attitude taken by the government in January, 1944, and it is fair to say that up to that time no government had gone any farther. The attitude taken has received the widespread support of the Canadian people. The conservative party, speaking through Mr. John Bracken, in a statement in Maclean's magazine for May 1, 1944, took an attitude which closely followed that of the Prime Minister. The C.C.F. has taken the same attitude. The Bloc Populaire, speaking through its leader the member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond), took the same view in Maclean's for January 1, 1944. A Gallup poll, taken as recently as January 6, 1945, showed that ninety per cent of the Canadian people were in favour of joining an international organization. It is interesting, I hope, to my hon. friends in the far corner, who take a contrary view—such hon. gentlemen as the member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion), the member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe), the member for Rimouski (Mr. d'Anjou) and the member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix)—that seventy-nine per cent of the people of Quebec are in favour of joining such an organization, as shown by this poll.

[Mr. Claxton.]

The Conservative party has said that it will support the resolution, but various Conservative speakers have made two comments. In the first place, they have said that the government was in some way taking an isolationist position, and in second place they have said that it was failing in some way to collaborate with the British commonwealth of nations.

I wish to say a word on each point. The kind of attitude taken is perhaps best found in the words of the hon. member for Vancouver South, who quoted this passage from the Prime Minister's speech of March 20. I quote from page 114 of Hansard of March 22:

But it did not help to have the Prime Minister use these words in this speech of March 20, 1945, as reported at page 26 of Hansard of that date.

And then he quoted the Prime Minister:

As they stand, the acceptance of the proposals would in no way commit Canada to send forces beyond Canadian territory at the call of the security council.

Then the hon. member, for two or three columns, built up the notion that in these words the Prime Minister was taking an isolationist position for Canada. At the end he said:

I hesitate to be suspicious, but it looks to me like an attempt to appease the isolationists of Canada.

Rather similar words were used, and the same quotation made, by the hon. member for Lake Centre in a passage which appears at page 163 of Hansard. The passage from the Prime Minister's speech, on which they base this whole case, is a passage in which he paraphrased the text of the proposals themselves from chapter 8, section (b) paragraph 5 of the proposals. What is more, you will find that the leader of the opposition himself (Mr. Graydon) uses language practically identical with the language used by the Prime Minister in explaining the proposals. Let me quote from the speech delivered by the leader of the opposition on March 21 as reported at page 65 of Hansard:

It would appear that the extent of our contribution with respect to force will be governed by the agreements rather than by the charter itself.

Almost exactly the same language as that used by the Prime Minister; and yet, on the basis of this language, these hon. members opposite build their case that the attitude shown by the government is one of isolation.

Mr. GREEN: Of course, there was no reference to not sending troops beyond Canadian territory in that statement made by the leader of the opposition. It is what I was objecting to.

Mr. CLAXTON: There is no reference in the Prime Minister's speech to not sending troops beyond Canadian territory.

Mr. GREEN: You read it just a moment ago.

Mr. CLAXTON: Now, Mr. Speaker this attitude as shown by the opposition is one that must be surprising at a time like this when, above everything else, one would think that it was in their own interests, if they hold the views they profess to hold, to see that we should all stand together at this time so as to show to the nations of the world that we are united and that Canadians of every race and of every party support the government.

Mr. GREEN: You mean, you want us to agree with your views.

Mr. CLAXTON: I want the hon. member for Vancouver South to agree with the views which the Prime Minister has expressed, when he agrees with them, and not to misinterpret them, as he and other members of his party have been doing all through this debate.

Mr. GREEN: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, that statement is not parliamentary and is not fair. The minister read from my speech, at page 114 and then read the extract. After quoting that extract, I went on to say that the Prime Minister's statement could be interpreted in two ways, and I explained what the two ways were, but the minister has carefully overlooked that fact and is now misinterpreting what I said.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no point of order.

Mr. CLAXTON: It was very noticeable that my hon. friend said that the speech might be interpreted in one of two ways and then he proceeded to interpret it in a way different from that in which he interprets his own leader's speech in which there appears the same language.

This attitude which my hon. friends take is extraordinary when you find the hon. member for York-Sunbury saying to-day that he thought that when it came to the use of force it would be arrived at as an ad hoc measure, which I should think would be very difficult indeed for my hon. friends to reconcile with their criticisms of the Prime Minister's speech.

Then the hon. members for Vancouver South, for Lake Centre, Saskatoon City and York-Sunbury, criticized the government for not taking a more collaborationist position with regard to the British commonwealth. Here I must say you cannot find, either in the Prime Minister's speech or in the text of the proposals or in anything that has gone on in this debate, except their own statements, any relevancy whatever in the position they take. The Dumbarton Oaks proposals were not drafted by the Canadian government, and if they mention the United Kingdom instead of the British commonwealth that is no fault of Canada. If they had mentioned the British commonwealth, I would have been interested to ask my hon. friends who advocated that course how it would have worked out to have the United Kingdom sit in the security council representing four, five, six or seven nations in the commonwealth and yet undoubtedly and inevitably required on every important occasion to express views which were in her own fundamental interests. For how else could she act?

The course suggested by these hon. members is brought up time after time; it is an effort, without any doubt, to go back twenty-five years to the position which Canada had before the last peace, to go back to the time when Canada had no effective representation in any international assembly, when everything that was done was done by Britain alone. It is also a complete reversal of the position which Sir Robert Borden, who led my hon. friends' party, took at the peace conference itself. The first arrangement was to have no Canadian representation at all. Sir Robert Borden had to fight for the representation at the peace conference. Then having secured it this passage occurs at page 52 in a book entitled, "Canada at the Peace Conference" by G. P. deT. Glazebrook, an excellent publication of the Canadian institute of international affairs.

Borden had, in fact, discovered that neither of the two methods of Canadian representation was working as expected. The panel system was stultified by having only two United Kingdom members at the conversations of the great powers, and the separate Canadian representatives could be used only at plenary sessions.

And of course, as everyone knows, there were no plenary sessions that amounted to anything. At the peace conference Sir Robert Borden fought to have Canada's place recognized, and at last succeeded in obtaining from the big three an acknowledgment that Canada had the right to be a member of the council of the league. That appears at page 66 of the book I have already mentioned. It was a memorandum that Clemenceau, Wilson and Lloyd George signed on May 6, and it reads as follows:

The question having been raised as to the meaning of article IV of the league of nations covenant, we have been requested by Sir Robert Borden to state whether we concur in his view, that upon the true construction of the first and second paragraphs of that article, representatives of the self-governing dominions of the British empire may be selected or named as members of the council, we have no hesitation in expressing our entire concurrence in this view.

That was the position which he fought for and which he obtained and which Canada exercised, and which the hon. member now wants to reverse. Well, the Canadian people do not want that position reversed.

The hon. member for Lake Centre quoted some Gallup polls. I should like to quote one which indicates that some eighty-four per cent of the people who were polled in Canada on September 13, 1944, indicated that they would like to have a separate vote for Canada at the conference.

Mr. GREEN: Nobody indicated that Canada should not have a vote in the assembly.

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member makes that change now, but it is not evident in his speech, and in any event it is not clear from the speeches of the other hon. members. Even if it were clear, you would then have this hopeless position: a country which was represented through the British commonwealth of nations in one body, the council, claiming for itself the right to sit as an independent nation in another body.

Mr. GREEN: Certainly.

Mr. CLAXTON: It would not be recognized by any nation on earth.

Mr. GREEN: That is what the minister says.

Mr. CLAXTON: I think the last word was actually said on this subject at the imperial conference in 1911 by Mr. Asquith in this passage. I shall read from the proceedings of the conference at page 71:

Sir Joseph Ward, in a speech the ability and interest of which we all acknowledge, which must and undoubtedly did represent the expenditure of a great deal of time and thought, has presented us with a concrete proposition, but it is a proposition which not a single representative of any of the other dominions, nor I as representing for the time being the imperial government, could possibly assent to. For what does Sir Joseph Ward's proposal come to? I might describe the effect of it without going into details in a couple of sentences. It would impair if not altogether destroy the authority of the government of the United Kingdom in such grave matters as the conduct of foreign policy, the conclusion of treaties, the declaration and maintenance of peace, or the declaration of war and, indeed, all those relations with foreign powers, necessarily of the most delicate character, which are now in the hands of the imperial government, subject to its responsibility to the imperial parliament. That authority cannot be shared, and the coexistence side by side with the cabinet of the United Kingdom of this proposed body—it does not matter by what name you call it for the moment—clothed with the functions and the jurisdiction which Sir Joseph Ward proposed to invest it with, would, in our judgment, be absolutely fatal to our present system of responsible government.

[Mr. Claxton.]

That is from the imperial point of view. Now from the point of view of the dominions, I cannot do better than repeat in my own words what was said by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. So far as the dominions are concerned, this new machine could impose upon the dominions by the voice of a body in which they would be in a standing minority (that is part of the case) in a small minority indeed, a policy of which they might all disapprove, of which some of them at any rate possibly and probably would disapprove, a policy which would in most cases involve expenditure and an expenditure which would have to be met by the imposition on a dissentient community of taxation by its own government.

I venture to say that since that was said no truer words have been uttered on this subject. Since that was said it has not been a live issue in any community of the British commonwealth that we reverse the trend and go back to what existed then.

The case of the hon. member for York-Sunbury, and in part of other hon. members on the opposition side, seems to be built on the notion that Canada has failed in some way during the war, either in respect of her cooperation with the British commonwealth or in her negotiations and relations with other countries. They have never indicated a single instance in which there has been a failure, but they continue to create those fears of their own and then blame the government for it. May I be allowed to go over the record in that regard?

In 1938 we had the consecutive declaration of President Roosevelt and the Prime Minister at Woodbridge and Kingston. In 1940 we had Ogdensburg. In 1941 we had Hyde Park which started the whole basis of cooperation among the united nations and led to the formation of the joint boards and after the participation of the United States in the war formed the pattern, I think, of the organization of the whole system of combined boards on which collaboration was carried out among the united nations. Then we had the conference at Hot Springs, the international food conference, a conference at which Canada took a very active part. A Canadian was named as chairman of the interim commission to carry on the work of the conference. We had the UNRRA conference at Atlantic City, where that body was set up and given its corporate structure. At that conference Canadians took an active part, in consequence of which a Canadian, L. B. Pearson, was made the chairman of the committee on supplies, one of the most important committees of the organization. A second meeting of the council of UNRRA followed, at Montreal, and again a Canadian, L. B. Pearson, was appointed chairman and took an active part in conducting the negotiations and business of the council.

Then we had the conference at Bretton Woods, and the New York Times said that the plan ultimately adopted bore the closest resemblance to the Canadian plan. We had the meeting of the international labour organization at Philadelphia. There I had the honour of proposing a resolution which looked toward the future constitution of the international labour organization. A fellow member of the house, the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) became chairman of a very important committee on employment, represented Canada at the meeting of the governing body of the international labour office, and there became chairman of the committee charged with the task of examining and revising the whole constitution of the labour organization, the most important committee to be set up in recent years.

This is the work of this small country. This is the part played by Canada in international affairs. Add to this the fact that we have a Department of External Affairs that in standing is second to none throughout the world, and that we have diplomatic relations with twenty-three nations—and I do not think any country on earth, and certainly no member of this house, could criticize our representation in any foreign office abroad, we have a group of men whose standing is second to none—when you consider all this, and that the great organization of Canada which has built up this name abroad is under the direction of the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, we can see how much weight should be attached to these statements that Canada has failed to take her part in the affairs of the nations.

In this war we have accepted our full responsibility as a free nation. We took our full part in the struggle to preserve the freedom of mankind. Canada's geographical situation, her natural resources and her interests are likely to involve us in any world war; and we are filled with the growing resolve so to shape the peace that wars will not take place in the future. In shaping the peace, as in waging war, Canada should have a full share. It is a right we are earning by the service of our fighting men, the magnitude of our material contribution, and our spirit of mutual aid. Moreover it is a duty we owe to our fighting men and to all our people. The Canadian people should have a share in world responsibility in proportion to their share in fighting the war. Canada's part in the last war raised her to the status of a nation. Canada's part in this war has given her the opportunities and responsibilities of world wide interests. Canada stands to-day in the shadow of no other land. Our unique position gives us a unique opportunity to serve other peoples as well as our own. To serve humanity we need not sacrifice our own national interests. By furthering international cooperation we shall be furthering the highest interests of Canada as a free nation.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I have carefully listened to or read the remarks of previous speakers in this debate. All hon. members, of course, desire peace, but it is evident that we are not agreed as to the best way to obtain it. Previous speakers have made their earnest appeals, and I can only hope that they will credit me with like sincerity. It seems to me that this is not a party question, or even a question of right and left. It is a question of right or wrong. Freedom and justice are the only bases of peace. Peace may be imposed by force but it cannot be maintained by force.

About a year ago it was my privilege to occupy a seat in the gallery reserved for members of dominion parliaments in the House of Commons at Westminster. In these days that gallery is occupied by members of the armed forces of the allied countries. I have heard some remarks as to what the members of the armed forces are thinking in connection with these matters. On this occasion I was sitting in this gallery in the middle of a group of men in uniform, while in the House of Commons the post-war treatment of Poland and other liberated countries was being discussed. I noticed that the man sitting next to me was a flight lieutenant in the Royal Australian Air Force, and when he turned to me I saw that he was a padre. He did not know me from Adam, of course, but he turned and said, "Is there no one in this house with the courage to get up and tell the truth?" That remark made a very great impression upon me. I may be asked, what is the truth? To me the truth is a matter between a man and his conscience. Since I have to live with my conscience my greatest desire is to remain at peace with it.

The British empire has come in for some discussion during this debate. Since in my opinion it is the only effective league of nations I cannot see the point of attempting to weaken the ties that bind the sovereign dominions of the British empire. I came back from England fully convinced that Canada is the most fortunate country in the world to-day, not only because of its natural resources, but in terms of justice and liberty, both of which have been gained while it has been a member of the British empire.

If Germany is disarmed, where will be the threat to world peace? Last fall I made this statement:

The defeat of German arms is certain, but the plots of international finance and communism, their plans for world control by the surrender of national sovereignty to world government and police force, have become a greater threat to our liberties as Christians and democrats than the disaster at Dunkirk.

That statement has met with a great deal of criticism, but I can only say that nothing has happened since to cause me to change my mind. Let me quote from page 7 of "The Road to Serfdom" by Professor Hayek in regard to Germany:

More hatred of everything German instead of the particular ideas which now dominate the Germans is, moreover, very dangerous, because it blinds those who indulge in it against a very real threat. It is to be feared that this attitude is frequently merely a kind of escapism caused by an unwillingness to recognize tendencies which are not confined to Germany and by a reluctance to reexamine and if necessary to discard beliefs which we have taken over from the Germans and by which we are still as much deluded as the Germans were. It is doubly dangerous because the contention that only the peculiar wickedness of the Germans has produced the Nazi system is likely to become the excuse for forcing on us the very institutions which have produced that wickedness.

Again at page 194 he says:

Apart from the intellectual influences which we have illustrated by two instances, the impetus of the movement toward totalitarianism comes mainly from the two great vested interests: organized capital and organized labour. Probably the greatest menace of all is the fact that the policies of these two most powerful groups point in the same direction.

Many people seem to think that they could become more ethical by delegating their vices to larger groups. Then, again, how will we determine who is the aggressor nation? Would that not depend upon who controlled the means of propaganda? Let me refer to the recent troubles in Greece, and quote some opinions in the matter. I hold in my hand a magazine supposed to stand for Christian democracy, and it has this to say on the Greek policy:

The Greek warfare stands out as part of a connected policy to maintain reaction and monarchy and the "right kind" of fascism everywhere in Europe. It becomes luminously clear now that the guns are actually turned against the heroic Greeks who for years have resisted singlehanded the weight of the German war machine.

No blow aimed by our enemies can match the damage inflicted by this present policy of Mr. Churchill.

Then, a press release in an Ottawa paper given by the C.C.F., and headed "C.C.F. Asks Shift in British Policy," goes on to say:

The situation in Greece and Italy shows a lack of support for the democratic people's movements and a readiness to impose, even by force, unpopular or discredited elements for reasons of power politics. Our masses are not working and dying to restore discredited monarchs to their thrones, and reactionary rulers to their pre-war power.

On December 10 I wrote a letter published in the Ottawa Citizen in protest of the criticism of British policy in Greece. A few days later Mr. Low, national leader of the Social Credit party, issued a statement to the press in which he described as utterly false and mischievous the propaganda directed against Prime Minister Winston Churchill and the British government with respect to the Greek situation. He pointed out that it indicated powerful world forces mobilized on the side of communism.

There you have divided opinion. So far as I know the people of Canada have never been told the truth as to what did happen in Greece. I have procured copies of the debates in the British House of Commons and have made copies of speeches by the Prime Minister and other members of that house. I have sent those speeches to various newspapers in Canada, but without success. Not a paper to which I sent the speech of the Prime Minister of Great Britain on the subject of Greece would publish that speech. Why?

I hold in my hand a white paper respecting the Greek crisis issued by the British government. While I do not wish to go into detail I shall quote from this white paper a telegram from the British ambassador to Greece to Mr. Eden. This is dated at Athens, January 15, 1945, and is the text of a resolution passed at a mass meeting held in Constitution square, Athens, on January 14, 1945. It is as follows:

The people of Athens, the Piraeus and the surrounding country is now breathing in the air of liberty after four years of slavery under three barbarous invaders and after the recent unjustifiable revolution which has thrown the country into chaos, anarchy, destruction and slaughter. Coming together in a mass meeting, called on the initiative of the working classes of the country, with the collaboration both of its professional societies and of its intellectual foundations the people of Greece declare:

Their eternal gratitude to Great Britain, the friend and defender of Greece throughout two centuries, for the unstinting and noble assistance given by her to our country, for the restoration of her liberties, which were torn to shreds by the recent anti-national revolt.

They pay homage to the heroic British army, whose precious sons have sacrificed themselves in this sacred struggle for our liberties.

They denounce the criminals of this revolutionary movement to the public opinion of the whole world for the unprecedented and hair-raising crimes, the looting and the destruction, which they have wrought at the expense of the unarmed population of town and country and which they stigmatize as entirely foreign to the noble soul and gentle customs of Greece; and they entirely endorse the measures taken by our allies to put down the revolt.

They demand that every means be used to secure the immediate release of the thousands of hostages who have been inhumanly arrested and are still suffering torments. They resolve to lay a wreath on the tomb of the unknown soldier in memory of the British and Greek heroes who have laid down their lives for the liberties of the Greek people and the resurrection of our nation.

While I cannot pronounce the names of those who signed, it is indicated that this document was signed by the general secretary of the general confederation of workers of Greece, the vice-rector of the university, and the president of the Athens federation of professional men and industrial craftsmen.

That, I think, should answer the Greek question. Since we have had several opinions from enlightened "liberals" in the house and elsewhere I should like to quote an American labour leader, who is now vice-president of the American federation of labour and chairman of the international labour relations section of the American federation of labour. This is a quotation from his speech as delivered to the American labour conference on international affairs on December 16, 1944. It states:

The prophets of neo-imperialism accept without murmur and even with lively approval the open annexation of the Baltic states by Soviet Russia, the transformation of Poland, Roumania, Bulgaria, Yugoslavia and perhaps also of Hungary and Austria into satellites of Russia as a progressive process.

The very same people are violently opposed to any intervention by Great Britain in the affairs of western or southern Europe, as in Greece, Belgium, Holland, Italy.

It is contrary to the principles of international democracy, these liberal "realists" claim, to intervene in the internal policies of liberated countries.

However, these same "liberals" have never uttered a word in opposition to the intervention of Russia in the internal affairs of Poland, Roumania, Bulgaria. More than that, every word of criticism on Russia issued by anyone is regarded as a major crime and the culprit is systematically smeared and labelled as a pro-fascist and pro-nazi. Why this difference?

I hold no brief for the British empire or for British policies. Yet it cannot be denied that communist policy in the liberated countries has been divisive, provocative and dangerous to the cause of the united nations.

Those American "liberals" who do not see this connection of events and personalities are hopeless. Those who praise the fighting communists in Greece as a "democratic movement" are blind—or worse.

Mr. ROSE: Who said that? Give us his name.

Mr. JAUQUES: Matthew Woll.

Mr. ROSE: I knew it.

Mr. JAUQUES: He is vice-president of the American federation of labour. There is an American. Now I am going to quote an Australian labour leader. I am quoting labour leaders only so that I cannot be accused of quoting reactionaries or Tories. I am going to quote now J. T. Lang, one of the foremost labour leaders in Australia, and formerly the prime minister of a Labour government of the state of New South Wales.

Mr. Lang has just published a book on "Communism in Australia", and I have taken some notes of what he says in that book.

Mr. Lang says that the communist party is organized. The party is shown to be a highly organized concern with unlimited funds, directed by a permanent general staff, almost every member of which has done a two years' study course in Moscow in the art of moulding and controlling the thoughts and actions of the workers. The book shows that in every issue, whether it is industrial, agricultural, national or international, the communist party slavishly follows the policy laid down in Moscow.

Mr. Lang shows how the communist party, in addition to holding the key positions in most of the labour unions, has infiltrated all channels of publicity, such as newspapers and radio. They have penetrated the teachers' federation, the theatre, all avenues of education, instruction and entertainment. And that is just as true in Canada and the United States.

Communists have all this control and they are pledged to use it in the interests of a foreign power whenever that foreign power so orders them. And, as Mr. Lang shows, it makes no difference that that foreign power is an allied power. The local communist party calls on the Australian government to support communist actions in Greece, Italy, Poland, Jugo-Slavia, and other countries. Now, you may say those disputes are only disputes between British and Russian foreign policy, and these countries are a long way off. Very well, then, take the Pacific. That is nearer home. For years to come there will be three great powers in the Pacific—Britain, America and Russia. Our fate depends on everything those three powers do. Should they disagree it means that all the power the communists can exercise in Australia will be exercised to get the Australian government to support the Russian policy, irrespective of whether it is to the advantage of Australia or to our detriment.

You may think we are too small to count. Well, what about your weekly wages, your home, your whole standard of living? How are they affected by the power of the communist party? Let me put this to you. The financial agents of all the leading countries are continually meeting to agree upon the financial system after the war. While there is yet no complete agreement there is general agreement that the scheme will be based on some modification of the gold standard. Russia supports America's claim of almost a full gold standard. After the war, Russia will want our goods to make good her war losses. How will she pay for them? There are only two ways.

One way is further to reduce the standard of living of her own people; the other way is to reduce the standard and cost of living in the countries from which she wants to buy her supplies. It is only common sense that she will prefer that the standards of the other countries be lowered rather than the standards of her own people. Under that arrangement the standards of living in Australia would have to be lowered.

When that comes about who is going to fight for the Australian workers and through them for the whole standard of living of the Australian people?

The Australian communist party will have to carry out the new policy of reducing the cost and standard of living in Australia. The unions will not fight for Australian workers because so many of the important unions are under communist control. If the present Curtin government is still there the communist policies of the post-war reconstruction department will not defend the standards; and if Menzies is there he will not fight either.

The communist party is just as much the agent of a foreign power as if the members themselves belonged to that nation. If you would not put foreigners in charge of your government, and important positions in the community, you cannot afford to have members of the communist party in those positions.

That is the political picture of Australia as recorded by Mr. J. T. Lang, a former premier of New South Wales, a fearless and most able leader of Australian Labour.

And how do Mr. Lang's words apply to us? How does the Australian political situation compare with our own in Canada? The communist party has infiltrated all channels of publicity, such as newspapers and radio, the teachers' federation, the theatre and all avenues of education, instruction and entertainment, and the church. All these openly advocate communism and defend its policies.

What about the Liberals? Why does the communist party, now known as the Labour-Progressive party, support the Liberal party? One very good reason is the post-war reconstruction committee, appointed by the Liberal government. Listen to Dr. James, chairman of this Liberal committee for post-war reconstruction. He says:

I warn my listeners against the very dangerous propaganda which would have you believe that mankind is about to enter an age of plenty. The end of the war does not promise plenty for us. Canada must depend, not on the demands of the Canadian people, but to a greater extent than ever before on the world market.

Just as Mr. Lang says of Australia, Ottawa supported by the communist party, is planning to bring about an age of scarcity in Canada, for the benefit of foreigners, by means of the gold standard. Who is Doctor James, or rather what is his background? Doctor James was trained at the London School of Economics, which was founded fifty years ago by British socialists with money supplied by German international finance for the purpose of training the bureaucracy of the future world socialist state, to maintain the gold standard which, as Mr. Lang says, is supported by the Soviet government. Of course it is, because the gold standard means world control by compelling nations to lower their standards of living.

Not only Doctor James, but Doctor Marsh, Mr. Deutch and I believe Mr. Rasminsky, in fact most of Mr. Ilesley's key men, were trained at this same socialist school of economics, founded in the interests of "gold" and socialism. But, you say, Mr. Ilesley is the great Liberal-defender of orthodox finance and of the gold standard and, therefore, he must be opposed to socialism. Then why does he appoint socialist trained experts to plan Canada's future?

These Liberal-Communist planners were trained at the London School of Economics. One of its professors is H. J. Laski, who is one of the most influential socialists in the world to-day. Laski is the idol of the C.C.F. "brain-trust", and a confidential adviser to the New Dealers of the gold standard. Prof. Laski has written a book, for private circulation, from which I quote:

Christianity has failed, and the Russian ideal is taking its place as the inspiration of mankind, and as the standard of public morality. The Old Testament is the gospel of hard work, while in the New Testament the central figure of Jesus shows no concern for the workaday world. The trouble with Christianity is that it is subdued to nationalism.

So that our future is not to be based on Christian ideals; yet hundreds of religious leaders who call themselves Christians are subject to and working for Moscow because their faith in Christianity is dead; and it is these very men who believe that Christianity has failed—men trained by communists—who are planning the future of Canada. At the same time a rabid propaganda is being directed by certain religious leaders against the Christian religion, particularly Roman Catholicism, presumably because it is opposed to communism. Certain religious leaders are quoted by socialists and communists because they offer totalitarian philosophy as Christian democracy. Certainly these religious leaders have not uttered a single protest against the wholesale persecutions of people in recently liberated countries in eastern Europe. Will these religious leaders confirm or will they deny the persecution of political opponents by communists in Greece and elsewhere? Will they justify or will they condemn these political crimes? Dare they compare the freedom of religion, the press and politics in Russia with our own British freedoms? Do these religious leaders support or do they oppose the monarchy and the British empire? Do they agree with Professor Laski? Should we look to Russia for our ideals and moral standards? Have they lost their own faith and vision? Do they stand by the Atlantic charter? Are we fighting to preserve democracy or to create a totalitarian world? Are the gospels unreliable and unauthentic? Are we to follow Christian ideals according to the gospels, or communist doctrines according to Karl Marx?

Now what about Bretton Woods? My friends the hon. members for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) and Acadia (Mr. Quelch) have stated their objections to the Bretton Woods proposals. I should like to add just one or two statements of my own. I might say that I brought the matter up in a speech on this subject which I made in this house on July 12, 1943. On that occasion I quoted Mr. White, who was a member of the United States congress. He said, speaking of the plans:

Both contemplate the surrender by the individual countries to the international monetary power of a large part, if not all, of the very heart of national sovereignty, that is mastership over monetary and credit resources.

Section 8 of the constitution provides that congress shall coin money and regulate the value thereof. . . . If Mr. Morgenthau and the forces back of him should be able to get around this provision of the constitution, then the last vestige of our great charter of liberty will have disappeared. All hope of restoring it would be gone, and the totalitarian state would be complete.

No, I cannot believe that the American people have as yet been beaten into such abject submission that they will allow this to happen.

Then recently a statement was made, I believe in the British House of Commons, and given to the English press, by Mr. Robert Boothby, M.P. I quote from the report in the London Evening Standard:

It was American big business, not the united nations, which won the great victory at Bretton Woods. For that agreement was a victory for gold over goods. And practically all the gold of the world is at present buried in the vaults of American banks.

If the House of Commons accepted Mr. Morgenthau's advice and ratified the Bretton Woods agreement, it would deliver this country, bound hand and foot, to the money power represented by the vested interests of international finance.

It would prevent us from ever making any attempt at carrying out an internal expansionist policy designed to achieve full employment.

It would deprive us of all the weapons with which we could protect ourselves from the consequences of an American depression.

It would prevent us from developing the sterling area into a regional group of nations with similar economic interests and objectives, and a complementary trade—which is our greatest hope for the future.

Last, but not least, it would subject us permanently to the economic domination of the United States; for the whole basis of the agreement is in favour of the creditor, against the debtor nation.

Mr. Morgenthau gives the game away when he says he wants to increase his exports "provided his customers are in a position to find dollars to pay for them." We don't want to have to find dollars—which, under the Bretton Woods agreement, means finding gold. Still less do we want to borrow them. We want to pay for our imports with goods of our own.

Bretton Woods does nothing to help us to do this.

Always it is the same old story—this insane American passion for "exports". . . . The main purpose of trade is not to get goods out of your country at all at any cost. It is the mutually advantageous exchange of goods. If you cannot do this, it is far better to make, and consume, the stuff at home.

"Here is an organization," says Mr. Morgenthau, with enthusiasm, "which has teeth in it." It has indeed. Nasty sharp teeth, which can bite. Under the Final Act of Bretton Woods, if we don't do what we are told by an international authority situated in the United States, we can have penal charges imposed on us, for the payment of which we shall have—somehow—to "find the dollars." We may even be blockaded by our own dominions!

I am all for cooperation between Great Britain and the U.S.A. But not at this price.

One final point. The present British government has no mandate from the electors to jeopardize the economic future of this country by putting us back on a gold standard, and attempting to resurrect the economic system which was one of the prime causes of the war.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote from an article by Mr. Paul Einzig, one of the world's best-known economists. The hon. member for Lethbridge has already put part of the statement on record, and I shall not repeat it. But this particular statement by Mr. Einzig was published by the Daily Express, which is owned by Lord Beaverbrook, and more than three million copies were printed and distributed in Great Britain. At the end of the article is this warning:

On this page to-day is an article that should be studied closely by the vast "Daily Express" public, even while the news of victory in battle fills the imagination, even while the pleasures of the August holiday month tempt the multitude into more light-hearted distractions.

The article deals with the decisions reached at the Bretton Woods monetary conference. It establishes clearly that those decisions enslave Britons to gold, and are even liable to imperil British good will with the other nations in the empire.

The future of every man, woman, and child in this country is involved. Surely there will be a mighty national protest. Surely there will be a firm rejection of these proposals when they are submitted to parliament.

May I remind hon. members that, apart from all sentiment, Great Britain is by a long way the best market we have. I would like the hon. member who has just taken his seat to tell us where he proposes to market the produce of Canadian farms if the standard of living in Great Britain is lowered. Will he dispose of it in the United States? Or perhaps he will market it in Soviet Russia? I do not know, but I know that Bretton Woods is going to reflect on the prosperity of the farmers of Canada just as it did before. I remember hauling grain for seven cents a bushel when it cost me six cents to thresh it, and I remember selling hogs for two cents and shipping a carload of cattle and getting a bill back for part of the freight. That was due to the imposition of the gold standard, and the same men who imposed it then are in power to-day. They have never been discredited, and the power behind it is international finance and totalitarianism. You cannot separate them. That is the situation we face.

[Mr. Jaques.]

With regard to this San Francisco conference, legally I am not trained sufficiently to get the full appreciation of what the motion really means, what it really implies. Perhaps before the vote comes we shall be enlightened, but at the moment I will say this. I cannot support any proposal that might weaken the ties between the various sovereign dominions of the British empire, and I can have nothing to do with any proposal to reestablish the gold standard, not even in the interests of peace, because I know very well that it would destroy the possibility of any permanent peace as it did before.

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): There can be no difference of opinion on the broad question of the necessity, when this war is brought to a victorious conclusion, of setting up some organization to ensure that all nations of the world will in future enjoy the blessings of peace. There will be general unanimity in favour of the resolution proposed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to send representatives to the conference of united nations to prepare a charter for the general international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security on the basis of the discussions at Dumbarton Oaks, Washington.

Undoubtedly the most vital question to be discussed at that conference will be the provision of sufficient power to ensure that the decisions of the new organization to maintain peace will be carried out. The position of this party has been ably presented by our leader (Mr. Graydon), the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), and others, with all of whom I am in complete agreement. I shall endeavour not to traverse the same ground unless for purposes of emphasis.

In order to understand the government's attitude on this resolution it is necessary to try to interpret the Prime Minister's speech given on March 20 last. I must confess to a deep feeling of disappointment on hearing the Prime Minister's expressions of idealism apparently unaffected by any sense of realism such as should have resulted from the lessons learned from developments since the last war and the tragic events of this.

Some of the Prime Minister's expressions and suggestions reminded me of the impractical dreams of President Wilson, whose influence at the last peace conference resulted in a treaty devoid of the necessary power to prevent war. The following will illustrate what I mean. I quote the Prime Minister's words:

A new world order will be born, not made. It will be something that lives and breathes, something much closer to the soul of man than a mere mechanical or legalistic device. A new world order needs to be worked out and have its place in the minds and the hearts of men. It should express itself in brotherhood and good will. It will be the application, in all human relations, of the principle of service and of mutual aid.

This is the Prime Minister of Canada speaking in 1945, as reported at page 31 of Hansard, and not, as one might assume, President Wilson in 1919. President Wilson's theory was that morality could be an effective power, that the morality of the rulers of nations and of civilized mankind must be the force to do good. Mr. Lytton Strachey, then editor of the London Spectator, warned him that a league based on nothing but promises could not stand the test of reality. After such a war as that of 1914-1918 every nation would exploit every loophole to avoid taking up arms in another's interest. To this Wilson replied:

I feel the weight of your fear, but it seems to me that the effects of this war may just as reasonably be expected to operate in the other direction.

The theory of a league for perpetual peace was not original with Wilson or with to-day's planners. Humanity has always dreamed of peace. The trouble is that so often these plans are worked out in the minds of idealists with little appreciation of the nature of men and of peoples. If they could at the same time create a new kind of humanity there might be some hope for their theories.

Speaking in the British House of Commons on February 27 last, following the Yalta conference on security organization, Mr. Churchill, who is a realist, said in part:

The new body will differ from the league of nations in the essential point that it will not shrink from establishing its rule against the evildoer or evilplanner in good time and by force of arms.

There seem to be some lucid moments in the Prime Minister's mind when he has a sense of reality, for in the speech of March 20, as reported at page 30, he said:

Were another great war to break out in twenty or thirty years, or at any time in the future, it is certain that Canada would not escape its fury. The development of new weapons, the development in particular of the flying bomb and the rocket projectile, are making it impossible for any country to claim immunity from sudden aggression.

The Prime Minister, however, soon lapsed again into another state of unreality when he declared his intention to refer all matters of aggression to parliament and to await its decision before taking action. The delay and uncertainty, if such a procedure were carried out, would be the most certain way of bringing about a third world war.

I was glad to hear the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) say yesterday that commitments for quick and certain punitive action against an aggressor must be written into the charter of the world peace organization if it is to be effective. May I hope that this statement coming from a senior member of the cabinet will make a deep impression upon the mind of the Prime Minister.

I believe I am voicing the opinion of the majority of the people of Canada when I say that we much prefer the advantages which accrue from being a part of one of the three big powers, where we can exert our influence upon the vital decisions which will be made, than if we occupied a place of our own in the security council as a secondary power. Within the empire Canada's voice can be powerful. Once out of the empire she will be just as one of a score or more of secondary nations and be as helpless as Belgium or Holland or become a state in the American republic.

It will be obvious that Canada cannot sit on the security council as a separate nation; for if she attempted to do so Russia and perhaps the United States would be certain to claim more seats. Britain cannot retain her position as an equal in strength with the other two great powers without the support of her dominions, owing to the sacrifices she has made in this war in material wealth and in man-power. Her navy is no longer mistress of the seas. We all know of our own magnificent war effort, and Mr. Churchill has been most generous in his praise of what Canada has done. But I do not think that all of us realize what a tremendous contribution Great Britain has made to the winning of the war. She has called up twenty-two million men and women between the ages of fourteen and sixty-four, who have been mobilized for direct war service and industry. This represents sixty-nine per cent of her people between those ages. Her army numbered 384,000 when the war broke out. In July of last year it had increased to four and a half millions. Her casualties in the armed forces have mounted to nearly six hundred thousand men. One in three of her houses has been damaged by enemy action and 57,298 of her civilians have been killed. But in spite of this Britain herself produced seven-tenths of all munitions and merchant vessels used by the British commonwealth and empire since the outbreak of war. Only one-tenth of those munitions were supplied by other empire countries. Her scientists and inventors have led the war in the development of Radar, in the fight against the U-boat and magnetic mine, and in the development of jet-propulsion planes. In five years the war has cost Great Britain $98,000,000,000.

San Francisco Conference

From purely selfish motives it is in our best interests to continue to exert our influence as a part of the British commonwealth of nations. If we indicate our intention of doing so at the San Francisco conference our example will probably be followed by Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, and the British commonwealth will continue to remain one of the three great powers.

Not long ago the Prime Minister was desirous of being the head of one of the small nations. Now he has become more ambitious and wants Canada to be regarded as a secondary state. I would remind him that a higher place of influence on the security council will carry with it increased responsibilities. It will be totally inconsistent with his pre-war policy of no commitments and isolationism, to which he still seems to cling. Modern instruments of war have brought all nations so close together that it is no longer possible for anyone to live in isolation. May I express the hope that when the Prime Minister attends the San Francisco conference he will promise on behalf of Canada to place at the disposal of the world security organization a reasonable quota of our resources, including armed forces, to ensure future peace.

Since there will be no Canadian parliament in existence at that time it will be necessary to get the approval of the new parliament on the decisions arrived at. If this is all the Prime Minister contemplates there will be general agreement, but when peace is threatened, to make a proviso that the consent of parliament must be obtained before our armed forces can be used, as proposed by the Prime Minister, is to invite another world conflict.

I should like to say a word in support of the suggestion made by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Bence) that representatives should be chosen from men who have served in this or the last war. These men have shown their willingness to fight and, if necessary, to die for Canada. They have earned the right to have a voice in determining the measures necessary to ensure that never again will the world suffer the terrors of another war.

It is significant that the meeting at San Francisco is described not as a peace conference but as a security conference. Already comments upon this conference in many countries leave no doubt that it is generally agreed that the main purpose of the conference will be to establish some basis of collective action for the preservation of peace in the future which has behind it the sanction of armed might. If that is a correct interpretation of the general attitude, and if it is the intention of the government of Canada to commit this country to participation in such a plan for collective military security, it is the first duty of those who are called upon to vote in support of Canada's participation in that conference to examine carefully, and with the utmost frankness, the full implications of our undertaking, to be one of those nations which will, if necessary, use military force to preserve peace in the event of any law-breaker in the future once again threatening the outbreak of another general war.

Any nation which becomes a party to a collective security agreement under which force, if necessary, will be employed to restrain an aggressor must be prepared to contemplate the possibility of war itself. Anything less would only be a repetition of what led to the collapse of the authority of the league of nations and the progressive steps of appeasement which culminated in the war in which we are still engaged. If there is one lesson which emerges more clearly than any other out of those years of crushed hopes and disillusionment, it is that pious expressions of peaceful intentions are little more than an invitation to aggression, unless those who believe in peace are prepared to keep peace by force, if necessary. Recent history teaches us that the surest way to prevent a recurrence of the world-wide catastrophe of these past six years is to be willing to pledge our whole strength in a joint effort to prevent such a thing from happening.

If we are to take the first step, we must be prepared to take the last step. Not to do so would be repeating the weaknesses of the league of nations. If we are to give our undertaking to other nations to stand by them in preserving peace, we must have a clear understanding here at home as to how we will raise those military forces which might become necessary through such an undertaking. The fact that we would hope that such collective action would itself prevent the possibility of another war can be no excuse for ignoring the possible consequences of our undertaking and leaving ourselves in the position where, if we were challenged, there might be any doubt about our fulfilment as a nation of the obligation we had assumed. We must, therefore, support the principle of collective action for the preservation of peace, and Canada should be a party to such collective agreement. But before Canada commits her national honour to any such undertaking it must be made perfectly clear to the people of Canada exactly how that undertaking will be carried out, in the event that in spite of all efforts toward peace this nation once more should be committed to the ultimate test of war.

Twice in a generation the emotions of this country have been torn by the fact that the burden of war was not borne in equal measure throughout the whole of Canada. This has done more to create division within this country than anything else in our national life. It has created bitterness in those parts of Canada where the heaviest burden has been borne, and it has created bitterness in that part of Canada where the load has been less because they feel that they were promised immunity from such an obligation. It would be blind folly to deny the depth of the division which has been created in Canada by that one fact. There is one way above all others by which this sense of injustice and misunderstanding will be removed; that is to leave no doubt that never again will there be any possibility of divided responsibility for the preservation of the security of the state, either in war or in peace.

Universal military service equally applied throughout the whole country is the peace-time law of Britain. The President of the United States has already expressed his desire that a similar law be enacted in the United States. It is the only course consistent with any joint understanding that carries with it even the most remote possibility of military responsibility in the years to come. That being so, the new parliament will have to decide that universal military service to such extent as may be required in peace, and to any extent that may be required in war, will be the law of the land from the Atlantic to the Pacific, to be applied without distinction in every part of Canada.

It would be illuminating at this time to give the house the important parts of the statement issued by the prime ministers of the British commonwealth after their meeting in London on May 17, 1944, quoting from the Associated Press dispatch appearing in the New York Times of May 18 of that year. The dispatch reads:

We, the king's prime ministers of the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, have now, for the first time since the outbreak of the war, been able to meet together to discuss common problems and future plans. The representative of India at the war cabinet and the Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia, have joined in our deliberations and are united with us.

I will leave out some passages that refer to the war and simply pay tributes of praise to those who participated, and continue:

We have also examined together the principles which determine our foreign policies, and their application to current problems. Here, too, we are in complete agreement. We are unitedly resolved to continue, shoulder to shoulder with our allies, all needful exertion which will aid our fleets, armies and air forces during the war, and therefore to make sure of an enduring peace. We trust and pray that victory, which will certainly be won, will carry with it a sense of hope and freedom for all the world.

It is our aim that, when the storm and passion of war have passed away, all countries now overrun by the enemy shall be free to decide for themselves their future form of democratic government.

Mutual respect and honest conduct between nations is our chief desire. We are determined to work with all peace-loving peoples in order that tyranny and aggression shall be removed or, if need be, struck down wherever it raises its head. The people of the British empire and commonwealth of nations willingly make their sacrifices to the common cause. We seek no advantage for ourselves at the cost of others. We desire the welfare and social advancement of all nations and that they may help each other to better and broader days.

We affirm that after the war a world organization to maintain peace and security should be set up and endowed with the necessary power and authority to prevent aggression and violence.

In a world torn by strife we have met here in unity. That unity finds its strength not in any formal bond but in the hidden spring from which human action flows. We rejoice in our inheritance, loyalties and ideals, and proclaim our sense of kinship to one another. Our system of free association has enabled us, each and all, to claim a full share of the common burden.

Although spread across the globe, we have stood together through the stress of two world wars, and have been welded the stronger thereby. We believe that when the war is won and peace returns, this same free association, this inherent unity of purpose, will make us able to do further service to mankind.

Winston S. Churchill, Prime Minister of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

W. L. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister of Canada.

John Curtin, Prime Minister of the Commonwealth of Australia.

Peter Fraser, Prime Minister of New Zealand.

J. C. Smuts, Prime Minister of the Union of South Africa.

It is to be hoped that the close cooperation which this declaration indicates has existed among the nations of the British commonwealth during the war, will continue at the security conference in San Francisco and in the difficult days that will follow after victory.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. V. J. POTTIER (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Mr. Speaker, I have been following with interest the speeches of hon. members during the present debate, and I think it can be said, speaking generally, that except for hon. members in the Social Credit group, and a few independents, members of the house are in agreement in their support of the proposals for the establishment of a general international organization, which subject is to be considered at the coming San Francisco conference. The Social Credit group and the few independents referred to, although perhaps for different reasons, fear that by joining the world organization we will lose our independence or sovereignty. Hon. members who have indicated that they will support the resolution on the order paper favouring our taking part in the San Francisco conference appear to me, quite frankly, to be holding too idealistic a view. I am afraid that a practical observer looking on would come to the conclusion that there are too many who, as in the case of the league of nations, fail to realize that high ideals are only of immediate value, in a matter of this kind, up to the point where they are possible and practicable in their application.

I wish to make one passing observation, however, with reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green). At page 117 of Hansard he is reported to have said this.

The government's policy has been and is to-day based upon a false premise, with the result that now Canada finds herself in a humiliating position. But she can still get out of it. The way to get out of this humiliating position is not to shout for a seat for herself on the security council and to give more trouble in that way. The way for her to get out is to ask that in the charter provision be made for a permanent seat on the security council for the British commonwealth rather than for the United Kingdom and Northern Ireland.

There is nothing new in this thought. It is one of the things already discussed in the house and, as indicated, one of the things which was considered when the league of nations was formed. It was considered and discussed when the post-war policy of the league of nations was under consideration. The question was then, as perhaps it may be said it is to-day—and I quote from G. M. Carter's pamphlet, "Consider the Record":

Should the commonwealth act as one unit or should nations of the commonwealth become particularists in policies, each determining its attitude toward commonwealth issues out of its own immediate interest.

[Mr. Bruce.]

I oppose the idea of one vote for the commonwealth. We have gone too far along the road of nationhood to retrace our steps. There would be danger of quarrels within the commonwealth, with the consequent possibility of the parts breaking away from the whole. It is, moreover, not difficult to visualize occasions arising when one member, with power to vote for the entire commonwealth, would be faced with one of the following possibilities: on the one hand he might find that one or more of the dominions would oppose any proposed stand, and threaten to leave the commonwealth; on the other hand he might find that the threat might be of such a nature that it would prevent the views of the other parts of the commonwealth from being put into effect in the proceedings of the security council.

I believe the Dumbarton Oaks plan shows some indication that it was going to follow what happened in the league of nations. When we examine how the security council of the league was formed we find that from September 15, 1927, as long as the league council remained operative, one of the dominions sat as a member. From the record there would seem to have been an understanding in that regard. We might describe it as a rotating member from one of the dominions, the rotation placing Canada first, Ireland second, Australia third, New Zealand fourth, and, I take it, if it had carried through, South Africa would have come next.

For a three-year period each dominion in its turn had the right to be and as a matter of fact was a member of the security council of the league. This meant that from 1927, as long as the league existed, the commonwealth had two members on the security council, one of whom was from the United Kingdom, sitting as a permanent member, and another from one of the dominions, each dominion taking its turn. As I indicated, the result was that, from 1927, on the security council of the league there were two members who had at heart the interests of the commonwealth, if we wish to put it in that way.

If we follow the suggestion of the hon. member for Vancouver South, and ask for one member for the British commonwealth as a whole, striking out the membership of the United Kingdom, we would stand a great chance of losing one member on the security council. I cannot see any other conclusion from what took place and, having in mind that in large measure the Dumbarton Oaks plan will follow what took place in the league of nations, it seems to me that the same can be anticipated this time.

So much for that phase of the matter. May I now proceed to indicate that the greatest danger in international policy, when plans for international peace are being worked out, is idealism. There are too many well-meaning people desiring to see world peace who work themselves into the belief that human nature can be suddenly altered, and forget what history has shown over and over again.

The idea or the attempt to stop world wars is an old story, and one which can be traced back for centuries. Not going too far back, we see the league of the great powers after the Napoleonic wars, and the need for a wider plan was felt after the first great war, a plan which would join all self-governing countries not only with a view to bringing about international peace, but also with the thought of bringing material gains to the agreeing nations.

Not only have we now a new plan under consideration for a still broader attempt to maintain international peace, but still greater stress is laid upon international cooperation for the purpose of greater social and material gains in the different countries of the world.

The organization proposed by the Dumbarton Oaks plan is practically the same as the organization in the league of nations plan. We find the organization of the league of nations consisted of an assembly, a council, a secretariat, a permanent court of international justice, and technical organizations and advisory committees, dealing with financing, economics and the like.

The organization of the Dumbarton Oaks plan, instead of calling the large body an assembly calls it a general assembly; the council is called a security council and the secretariat goes under the same name. Then, there is provision for a permanent court of international justice. And in considering the material and social matters in the various countries we have under this plan a proposal to establish an economic and social council.

In the Dumbarton Oaks plan provision was made for eleven members, of which five, namely the United Kingdom, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United States, France and the republic of China are permanent, and the remaining six are elected by the general assembly.

Under the league of nations plan the council of the league, in 1935, was composed of fourteen members. Of these, four, namely France, Great Britain, Italy and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics were permanent. The remaining ten were elected by the assembly.

I could go on and show the similarity between the two plans in regard to the proposal for a permanent court of international justice, for technical committees of the league for the social and economic councils proposed under the new plan.

I am not overlooking, of course, the fact that in some important particulars the jurisdiction of the general assembly and security council has changed, as well as the voting power, particularly of the permanent members of the security council. These are made to correct what were thought weaknesses in the league of nations plan and meet what the great powers demanded before they would join in an international organization.

I have gone to some detail in comparing the plan of the league with that of Dumbarton Oaks because I wanted to impress upon this house that the league of nations failed, and I am not sure that this plan is going to succeed. I am sure it will not succeed if the men who have the responsibility of this international organization lack the power of practical consideration and the capacity of practical application in the working of the plan.

I am not one of those who believe that you can by this plan or any other plan, in one year, ten years or a hundred years, make various peoples differing in races, environment and resources, propelled by impulses and power, and the frailties of human nature, become one great happy family.

Let us not be deceived into thinking that human nature has so completely altered that all that is now required is a new plan.

Lord Birkenhead, in an address to the students of Glasgow university, put it in this way:

Summing up this branch of the matter we are bound to conclude that from the very dawn of the world man has been a combative animal. To begin with, he fought violently for his own elemental needs; later, perhaps in tribal or communal quarrel; later still, with the growth of greater communities, upon a larger and more sophisticated scale. And it is to be specially noted that there have nevertheless almost always existed men who sincerely but very foolishly believed, firstly, that no war would arise in their own day; and, secondly (when that war did arise) that for some reason or other it would be the last. At this point the idealist degenerates into the pacifist; and it is at this point consequently that he becomes a danger to the community of which he is a citizen.

I heard a few days ago a very wise clergyman make the statement that this old world was a hard place to live in. There is no doubt that that is true. We are intended to survive by work and struggle. We cannot change overnight the forces that have been working for centuries in opposite and conflicting directions for survival. The league of nations failed because its too high ideals could not be worked out. Every nation was willing and ready to applaud slogans, dogmas, cure-alls and liberty plans, but we saw a dismal failure when the testing time came. It came, for example, when an investigation was requested through the league for the international control of raw materials. Very little progress was made, and a sense of frustration was felt on the part of the countries suffering from that problem. I have in mind Italy in that particular field. The same was true when the testing time for collective security came when the Japanese took Manchuria in 1931, and also when Italy went into Ethiopia. In the raw materials case, the countries which thought they would suffer from international control objected.

In the case of the Sino-Japanese conflict several things were demonstrated. We saw first that great powers would not risk fighting each other for the sake of preventing aggression were they not directly involved. Second, powerful countries preferred looking after their own interests and would not compromise for the sake of the league. Third, secondary powers had little influence to bring about force. Fourth, great powers must be in agreement before pressure can be exerted.

In the case of Ethiopia the same things were demonstrated, with emphasis on the point that you cannot enforce a decision unless you are ready to use force. It was found that there had been a lack of previous planning and understanding of what the realities of the situation might be. The league had not developed a system to use force when it was necessary. To secure peace on a world scale may mean war, and if Canada joins the plan under discussion, we must be ready and willing to face this possibility.

I am afraid there may be too many people, as in the case of the league of nations, who believe that we are seeing the last world war, if we can arouse public opinion; in other words, that public opinion is sufficient to stop aggression without the necessity of force. If that takes place, they may succeed in arousing public opinion to an extent, but these ideals will build a house upon sand, and in the future it will be said—and I quote from the Good Book:

And the rains descended and the floods came; and the wind blew and beat upon that house, and it fell, and great was the fall thereof.

Let no one in this house assume that the millennium is promised by this measure.

The day is far distant when one note of concord or love will stir all mankind to a harmonious response. Nations will go on quarrelling and may come to fighting. There will be great resentment against the police power among peoples it restrains. There will be big problems to be solved and the solutions may involve violence in order for any part of this plan to succeed.

Canada, to take advantage of any benefits that may arise from time to time, must be prepared to give at times in material things more than she will get. She must also be prepared to insist upon plans that are practical; she must not allow the idealist to degenerate into the pacifist, leading nations into a slumber away from the possibility of armed force, where the world will grow soft and our nation will let go from its own hand adequate means for our own protection.

I do not want to be misled by peace organizers who are premature. The world is ready for some things, but let us realize what they are. Expecting it to go beyond its strength will only bring wreck and ruination. A world meeting place should be encouraged, and it will:

1. Make a world affair of any proposed conflict.
2. Bring world judgment on any trouble-maker.
3. Bring about the only possibility of all countries joining against an aggressor.

I was not surprised to find that the question of voting power in the Dumbarton Oaks plan was one of the last things made public, nor was I surprised that the great powers were realistic enough to protect themselves by making provision for the power to veto, if I may call it such, an attack upon themselves. I doubt if the conference is able to change this provision and, if it did, I think it would be a mistake at the present time, in that when the testing time would come, a great power would either disregard the organization or leave the organization. In other words, better give them power, if they cannot be coerced, than take that power away from them and have them break away from your organization, for you will then have no organization at all. Let no one deceive himself; unless we can by some plan keep these great powers together there will be another war, and sooner, perhaps, than anyone in this house imagines. This plan must be realistic enough to keep the great powers together. That is why I am in favour of the provision giving any great power the right to veto—if I may use that term—any steps which are taken against it.

In conclusion, I hope my remarks will not be interpreted, first, as from one who is opposing the proposal for the establishment of a general international organization, or as from one who is a pessimist in thinking that the organization itself will not succeed. I believe there is a duty cast upon us, as one of the great freedom-loving countries, to join a world organization such as is proposed, and that by our ways of life and influence we can, in a measure at least, bring to the other countries of the world something which will be helpful and beneficial.

Our common experience with the United States in developing a great civilization on the north American continent, through the processes of idealism and realism marching side by side, will be of value in trying to set up a better world civilization.

We shall in turn profit from our association with other countries, and in the final analysis, by joining minds and hands in an open world, we shall in an increasing measure, as the years roll on, be striving to lessen man's combative instinct, replacing it with a growing conviction of universal good will.

Mr. MAXIME RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the resolution about which the Prime Minister requests the concurrence of the house implies: acquiescence in the sending of representatives to San Francisco on April 25 next, with a view to helping in the preparation of a charter establishing an international organization for the maintenance of world peace and international security; recognition that such an organization is important for Canada and the future welfare of all mankind, and that in her own interests Canada should join that organization.

Further, it approves the purposes and principles set forth in the proposals drawn up as a result of the Dumbarton Oaks conference and it considers that these proposals constitute a basis for a discussion of the charter of the proposed international organization.

Lastly, it states that the charter, establishing the said international organization, will be submitted to parliament for approval before ratification.

Let us note at once that the resolution involves no commitments for the time being, that the mandate entrusted to our representatives at the San Francisco conference is not to commit Canada to the charter that will be worked out, but only to help in the preparation of that charter, and that parliament alone can accept or reject it.

When that charter is submitted to us we shall judge whether it fulfills our hopes. And we shall accept or reject it, as the case may be.

The hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) has put on this resolution a construction which is in no way justified and he did not bring up a single piece of evidence in support of his absolutely groundless assertion. He said:

To-day through this resolution we are asked to declare, right off, that we will participate in any future war in the world.

Now, nothing like that is to be found in the resolution. Not only is there no question of participating in a war, but the only thing contemplated is the sending of delegates to a conference for considering the means of preventing war and ensuring world peace, without any commitment on our part. Besides, in his speech the hon. member himself recognized the true purport of the resolution when he said:

At a time when we are thinking of seeking the means to restore universal peace. . . .

Take part in a conference to "seek the means to restore universal peace" is entirely different from "participating in a war."

The interpretation which the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay attempts, without reason, to read into a motion, reminds me of the stand he took in November last on a positively anti-conscriptionist amendment introduced by the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Jean).

On that occasion, the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay, after inverting the wording of the amendment, claimed that it was favouring conscription, which was something entirely remote from the actual truth.

However, all the hon. members who favoured the conscriptionist policy of the government, whether Liberals, Conservatives, C.C.F. or Social Credit, voted with the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay against the amendment of the hon. member for Mercier, because it was against conscription.

If the hon. member intended to convey the impression that those who will support this resolution will thereby go on record as being in favour of world war in general, he is formally contradicted by the official text of the resolution, as last November he was contradicted by the wording of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Mercier who took the government to task for having imposed conscription.

In an editorial which appeared in Le Droit of last Saturday, under the title "Should we participate in the San Francisco conference?", Mr. Camille L'Heureux, who is well known for his independent attitude, outlines the true meaning of the resolution. Here are some excerpts:

We do not understand the attitude of those who are opposed to Canada's participation in the forthcoming conference at San Francisco, the object of which is to prepare a charter for an organization entrusted with the maintenance of world peace.

Indeed, the House of Commons is not being asked whether it approves the plan submitted by the great powers, although it is the duty of every member to point out any defects therein and to insist that the government endeavour to correct them at the conference. The object of the resolution is to decide whether Canada will send a delegation to San Francisco.

It will be up to the next parliament and not to the present one to ratify the agreements which may have been entered into at San Francisco.

What is the object of the resolution introduced by the Prime Minister? This resolution asks parliament, in the first place, to approve "the purposes and principles set forth in the proposals of the four governments," in the second place, to agree "that these proposals constitute a satisfactory general basis for a discussion of the charter of the proposed international organization."

The editor then states the aims and principles set forth in the proposals which the Prime Minister has already brought to the attention of the house and he concludes as follows:

No member of the House of Commons may oppose the approval of those aims and principles. On the contrary, each member must strive in order that they might prevail.

Mr. Speaker, I respect the views of those who oppose our participation to the San Francisco conference, but I think the stand taken by some members who have expressed their opposition to this participation is most extraordinary.

Who are the opponents of Canada's participation to this conference? The hon. members for Charlevoix-Saguenay, (Mr. Dorion) for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix), for Rimouski (Mr. d'Anjou) and I believe that I am not mistaken in adding the name of the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy) unless he disapproves of the attitude taken by his leader, the member for Charlevoix-Saguenay.

This attitude, Mr. Speaker, is in formal contradiction with that taken by the same members only a year ago.

A glance through Hansard will show the zeal with which the hon. member for Gaspé denounced the fact that Canada was not participating in inter-allied conferences. Here is what he said on February 8, 1944, as reported in Hansard:

Since the beginning of the war we have had quite a few inter-allied conferences.

There was a conference which took place on the Atlantic ocean. At that conference there was drawn up what was called the Atlantic charter which is supposed to be the basis of governing all the democratic countries when the war is over. Was Canada asked to take part in that conference as an independent country? Was the Canadian Prime Minister invited to that conference? No. As I say, we were told that it was a charter for all the allied countries after the war is over.

[Mr. Raymond.]

We had another conference at Washington and yet Canada was not there.

We had a conference at Casablanca and we find that it was just like the others. There was no place there for Canada. We were just a negligible quantity.

Since then we have had another conference at Teheran. At this conference China, Russia, the United States and Great Britain was represented. Canada, being the fourth largest power in the war, was not represented by its Prime Minister. There was no place for Canada at all, although she is in the war with all her resources. What had then become of our independence?

The hon. member for Gaspé closed his remarks by introducing a subamendment to the speech from the throne, which is to be found on Hansard as well as in the Votes and Proceedings of February 8, 1944.

He therefore proposed, seconded by the hon. member of Charlevoix-Saguenay, that the following words be added:

We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that in the opinion of this house Your Excellency's advisers have failed . . . to demand Canada's partnership in allied conferences on account of her independent status and of her important share in the war.

Such is the motion of non-confidence submitted to the house by the hon. member for Gaspé, seconded by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay. On the question being put, this motion was negatived and the Votes and Proceedings of February 10, 1944 show that, besides the proposer and seconder the hon. members for Quebec-Montmorency and Rimouski voted for the subamendment, together with the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Choquette) and myself.

The hon. members for Charlevoix-Saguenay, Gaspé, Quebec-Montmorency and Rimouski are free to contradict themselves to-day, my hon. friend for Stanstead and myself will remain true to our stand of nearly a year ago, by supporting Canada's participation in the San Francisco conference.

This will be the acknowledgment of our independent status. The hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay seems to base his opposition on the fact that the Vatican will have no representatives at the conference. I am of a mind with him on that point. An invitation should have been extended to them, I shall return to this later on. However, is it reasonable to remain aloof because a party that should have been invited has been left aside? On the contrary, this is an additional reason to attend in order to represent the views of the absent party.

The hon. member is fearful lest the three great powers control the conference. This is a further motive for taking part so as to boost the number of secondary and small powers in attendance and thus be in a position to oppose the selfish designs of the others. If our representatives fail to discharge their trust, we shall judge and condemn them.

A number of conferences have been held lately, where decisions contrary to moral principles have been taken. Only three or four great powers were in attendance. This time the membership will come from forty-four nations. It will be the duty of all these nations, secondary and small,—who are being consulted at last—Canada among them, to see that the principles of good order and justice are upheld; this will offer them an opportunity to oppose certain subversive doctrines which tend to invade the world, such as communism. This will be the time to denounce the unfair treatment meted out to Poland and to take appropriate measures; however, the way to eliminate the causes of evil is not to abstain either from taking part in the discussions, or from joining the other countries who do not wish to witness the maintenance of social wrongs.

The hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguéway is right when he grieves over the evils assailing society, but he attributes them to the economic conditions prevailing in most countries and he adds:

In order that economic life may be suitable within nations, international economic life must necessarily be cleansed.

Is it not well known that one of the proposals that will be under discussion at the conference relates to economic and social co-operation in the international field? Among the basic proposals that will be discussed is the following:

The organization should facilitate the solution of international economic, social and other humanitarian problems, and promote the respect of human rights and primary liberties.

Reform on an international basis is demanded; we are asked to participate in the discussion of such reform and we would decline to do so. That is an odd way of reasoning.

As regards the need of an international organization for the maintenance of peace, let me refer to the advice contained in the message which Pius XII directed to the whole world on December 25 last, and in which I find the following:

It is indispensable that in the world organization there should be some body able to maintain a body invested by general consent with supreme authority and whose duty it would be, among other things, to quell at the very beginning every attempt at aggression.

The decisions already announced by international commissions justify us in the belief that one of the main points of any future international agreement will be the establishment of an organization for the maintenance of peace, of a body invested by general consent with supreme power, whose duty it will be to strike at its very source every individual or collective threat of aggression.

No one will hail such an event more joyfully than he who, for a long time, has expounded the principle that war, as a suitable means of settling international differences, is now obsolete.

Is the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguéway, who has spoken at length about the Vatican, unaware of those directions?

However, the hon. member for Gaspé, who seems to oppose to-day the establishment of such an international organization, recognized last year that it might be in the interests of world peace and to the advantage of Canada's international trade, and he approved its creation.

Here is what he said on February 8, 1944, as recorded in Hansard:

We are told that after the war there will be a sort of international body composed of the allied nations, and in which the small nations will be on an equal footing with the larger ones. That would be a very fine thing for Canada as a peace policy and in so far as her international trade and commerce are concerned. That is all very well.

Does he know that the main principle set forth in the proposals which we are requested to approve in the resolution is precisely "the sovereign equality of all peace-loving states"?

Opposed to war, desirous to see the reign of peace, I do not hesitate to say that I am in favour of the establishment of an international organization for the prevention of war and the maintenance of international peace and security, and that I believe Canada should become a member of such an organization under acceptable conditions. And I am happy to heed the advice which the Pope has given along those lines. I have, in fact, already made a public statement on that matter: I refer to my declaration published in the January 1944 issue of Maclean's Magazine.

Speaking for the group which I represent, the bloc populaire canadien, I made the following statement:

We are in favour of a permanent international institution which would have the characteristics of a genuine league of nations:

It would group together all the civilized states, or at least the majority of them.

It would grant to them, small or large, equal rights; in consequence of this it would not become the mere tool of imperial powers and imperialists, as was the Geneva league.

It would prepare to establish a truly international order, both from the economic and the political point of view.

In our opinion Canada should work to form some such institution, then join it and take on responsibilities in proportion to her importance and interests.

That is what I said scarcely a year ago.

Mr. Speaker, in order to achieve the object it has in view, the organization which it is proposed to establish will have to be truly democratic, rather than being, in some regards, a replica of the league of nations, formed in 1919 and which, in spite of the outstanding services it has given, has all too often been, in the hands of certain powers, the means of promoting their selfish and materialistic interests.

Its aim should be, as was said in a recent statement of the Catholic episcopate of the United States:

To include all nations, while respecting the equal rights of every one, great or small, weak or powerful.

Since the object is to devise means for ensuring international peace, I regret that neutral countries like Switzerland, Sweden, Portugal, Ireland and others have not been invited to the conference, and especially that the Vatican has not been requested to send representatives there.

No one can question the desire to cooperate in the general welfare, and the absolute impartiality of a world power like the Papacy. Who is unaware of the efforts made by the Vatican with a view to ending the conflict and ensuring future peace in a spirit of Christian charity?

And what about the absence of Poland, a country obviously doomed to be eternally victimized? If there is a country which should have an outstanding place on that occasion, it is surely the one which has suffered most from this war. The Prime Minister should make the necessary representations.

What part shall we play in that conference?

In the first place, the part of a free and independent country, with all these words imply. The Prime Minister has set forth the aims and principles outlined at the Dumbarton Oaks conference and referred to in the resolution, and they have been highly approved. These aims and principles must be upheld and our representatives must endeavour to set up an organization which will guarantee that they will not be violated.

The security council will be called upon to play an important part. In view of the extraordinary powers with which it will be endowed, it must be more representative than is advocated in the suggested proposals if it is not to be made the tool of one of the great powers. Recent events make it necessary to act cautiously. Indeed, the security council which is the supreme authority entrusted with the maintenance of universal peace, will be composed of five permanent members (United States, United Kingdom, U.S.S.R., France and China) and six other members elected by the other nations. Decisions must be approved by seven of the eleven members. Moreover, if any one of the five great nations were guilty of an act of aggression, it could use its power of veto against any sanctions contemplated against it. I feel that should such authority be granted to the five great powers it would be tantamount to recognizing that might is right. This would be a violation of the democratic principle, of the principles which are to be the basis of the contemplated international organization. Its hands would be tied. As this is one of the proposals which will be discussed, I would ask the Canadian representatives to demand a larger representation on the security council for the secondary and smaller nations, and to refuse the right of veto to any of the five great powers.

[Mr. Raymond.]

We want an enduring peace based on right and not on might.

The San Francisco conference must be approached in the light of past history and of possible future events. Since the outbreak of the war, England, the United States and Russia held several conferences. Canada was neither invited nor represented. And yet we were vitally concerned.

The Atlantic charter, which held out hopes for the post-war period, was the outcome of one of these conferences. Alas! what has become of this Atlantic charter which was accepted by the great powers? It has been violated. What are the views of the Prime Minister in this respect?

We have lost track of the number of treaties broken by Russia since 1939. On November 30, 1939 while Russia was a member of the League of Nations, she ruthlessly attacked heroic Finland, notwithstanding a pact of non-aggression between the two nations; this prompted the Prime Minister to say in a broadcast on February 23, 1940:

Finland is fighting gallantly against brutal aggression.

Later on, Russia occupied the Baltic States and part of Roumania, and took Bulgaria and Yugoslavia under her control.

The partition of Poland, in violation of a treaty and of the Atlantic charter, with the approval of Mr. Churchill, is the latest act of brigandage committed by Russia.

A compromise has been mentioned! Who will benefit by that compromise?

One thing is certain; all relations between peoples are impossible when there is no mutual faithfulness to the pledged word, and no power may arrogate to itself the right unilaterally to break a treaty which does not suit its purpose.

What is to become of the reasons invoked to justify the declaration of war in September, 1939: respect for the treaties, for the territorial integrity of the countries; protection of weak nations; struggle for the safeguard of Christian civilization, of democracy?

I have said so already and I say it again, there is no such thing as a war for ideologies; there are only wars of interests. It was true in 1914; it is true for the present war.

I enumerate these facts in order to prove how important it is for our representatives to oppose the assumption, by any of the great powers of the right to veto a decision and, further to obtain that the secondary and small nations be better represented on the security council, in accordance with the principle of the "sovereign equality of all peace-loving states," as set forth at Dumbarton Oaks.

As the control of armaments will come under discussion, I suggest that the export of weapons from one country to another be prohibited and that the various states alone be authorized to manufacture them according to their protection needs, to the exclusion of all private enterprises.

Let us not forget that the rearmament of Germany by gun manufacturers of various countries is responsible for the 1939 conflict.

One of the proposals to be considered at the conference deals with economic and social cooperation in the international sphere.

I shall refer, if I may, to a statement I made in this house on September 9, 1939, on the occasion of the declaration of war by Canada:

Border disputes are of little moment in comparison with the disorder in production and trade which reduces certain countries to famine.

The publications of the universal assembly for peace, a body established by the league of nations with a view to deal with international situations which are apt to provoke war, contain a detailed analysis of the three principal economic causes of war: the problem of raw materials, that of labour and that of trade outlets.

In one of these works it is stated that:

"No more than individuals, can the proletarian countries resign themselves forever to remain such in neighbourhood of richly endowed and satisfied nations. Until such time as the world takes the necessary steps with a view to systematically and logically solving these problems in a spirit of international fellowship, there shall exist this struggle for economic life, too often the prelude of military war."

Walter Lippmann, the famous American publicist, openly sympathetic to the so-called democratic nations, has written:

"The great crime of post-war politics in Europe, was that the victorious powers took advantage of their supremacy to monopolize the resources of the world."

Mr. Speaker, post-war problems will be of various kinds; one of the most important will concern the economic and social order.

Real peace implies social peace. It matters little whether social life is simple or complex, whether the needs are few or many. What does matter is that the needs be met according to order and justice.

Society must sincerely devote its efforts to the improvement of material, intellectual and moral conditions; it must recognize the principle of equal opportunities for all and realize that worldly goods, which are necessities of life, are not the privilege of a few, but exist for the benefit of the masses.

The peace that is to follow the present war must be more than a clever balance of military powers, it must be founded on real efforts to establish international justice.

Let us work for the realization of political understanding and reconciliation among the various nations, based on justice, while remembering that all human beings have equal rights to life.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (MacLeod): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate on this motion to approve the acceptance of the invitation by four of the great powers to an international conference in San Francisco, I desire to make but a few observations. In the first place there should be the closest cooperation among nations for the preservation of peace and security. I believe, therefore, that the invitation should be accepted, and that a delegation representing Canada should attend this conference. In my own mind this is perhaps the most momentous conference to be held in the history of mankind. As a matter of fact, when I think of the issues at stake; when I realize that this conference may determine the destiny of the nations of the world for centuries to come, I am a bit surprised that so little time should be given in this house for the discussion of such great issues as are involved here.

As I say, decisions may be made that will seal the destiny of nations for centuries to come. There is perhaps one tiny qualifying clause in the proposals; that is the last clause, which provides that no commitments will be made until the results of the conference have been brought before this parliament and approved by it. But I am fearful lest in practice that last clause may turn out to be simple routine. As I see it, the real question is, what sort of world do we want? It is not enough to say that we want a peaceful world. We also want a free world, a world free from want, free from fear, free to worship God according to the conscience of each individual. We want freedom of expression. We want a world where we are free to live out our own lives, a world of freedom to live with our own consciences.

In my short experience and perhaps my limited thinking it seems to me that there are two great world philosophies. One is the philosophy of authoritarianism or totalitarianism, the philosophy which paves the way for a world dictatorship. On the other hand we have that democratic concept of the way of free men. I am going to suggest that the one philosophy is anti-Christian, a philosophy which regards man as the servant of the state, a cog in the machine, a philosophy which believes in force and compulsion. On the other hand we have that Christian concept which regards as of some importance the dignity of the individual, that man is a free moral agent, that man has a soul. That philosophy believes in the principle of persuasion rather than compulsion.

I have some very strong personal convictions along these lines. Each of those philosophies has a world programme. One is a programme designed eventually to bring to fruition a world dictatorship, and to enthrone in the world all that is anti-Christian. It has a programme of propaganda, and we must be very careful along those lines, for there is a programme of anti-Christian propaganda filled with deceitfulness and lies, the workings of which are after the order of the one who, from the beginning, was a liar.

Mr. JAQUES: And a murderer.

Mr. HANSELL: And, as the hon. member for Wetaskiwin says, a murderer. If it is allowed to come to fruition it will issue in world mass murder on a scale such as this world has never before seen. That is what I regard as the danger of that particular philosophy.

The other philosophy, which I describe as Christian, also has a programme of, shall I say, propaganda, although it is a vulgar word to use in that connection. It believes in the propagation of truth; for the greatest Man of all mankind once said: "Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free." That philosophy proclaims the good news of peace and of righteousness.

Although what I shall say might be unpopular in some places, I would dare say that all the great conferences, and particularly those designed to determine the future destiny of nations, cannot leave God out, and expect an era of righteousness and peace, nor will there be peace until the Prince of Peace returns, whose right it is to reign.

[Mr. Hansell.]

I say I have some very strong personal views along those lines, because I believe—and I think the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) would be with me in this—that the quotation from Holy Writ is true where it states that "We wrestle not against flesh and blood but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places."

And I say that as this delegation goes to a conference as important as the united nations conference in San Francisco it cannot go without recognizing that behind all the scenes of human activity a battle is going on that will mean either the supremacy of right and truth, or the downfall of righteousness and truth and the enthronement of all that is evil. That is one thing I claim we cannot escape.

If the Canadian delegation in its deliberations at San Francisco expects to bring these two great philosophies together, so that each will be in a league with the other, I am afraid they are doomed to disappointment. One is at war with the other.

I believe the ideals, the objectives, the desires and the beliefs of those nations comprising the British commonwealth are that the nations of the world should live in a world of free men. British idealism, if I may put it in that way, is opposed to the authoritarian philosophy, the philosophy of totalitarianism and world dictatorship. Let the British nations that are represented at San Francisco sell out to what might become a world dictatorship, and I say the day will come when people will read Holy Writ with a new meaning.

An hon. MEMBER: It will be too late.

Mr. HANSELL: Yes, it will be too late, for the time will then be that "He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh". Make no mistake about that. I believe the British commonwealth as an association of nations has been and can be a bulwark against totalitarianism. This has been and will be because among the British commonwealth of nations there is a free association of nations with a common tie.

In this connection might I read a clipping of a reprint from a book by Sir Norman Angell, entitled, "What Comes First". So as not to detain the house, without destroying the context I shall abridge the article somewhat. Sir Norman goes on to say this:

Upon what do hopes of democracy and freedom in the last resort depend? The Germans are brave, but the world has little hope of democracy or freedom from them. The French are brave, and they passionately desire freedom and democracy. The Russians have shown bravery unequalled perhaps, certainly not exceeded, in any of the armies now fighting. They are dying as no other soldiers have died, not unwillingly, not forced, not driven and with a faith in their cause certainly as great as the faith of the young nazi in his. But the Russian has not yet achieved democracy in the western sense. His government is a dictatorship.

It was not merely or mainly British courage (no greater than the courage of other peoples) which first of all prompted Britain to challenge the Hitlerite power at a time when Russia, America and so many others who have since joined the struggle, were neutral, or like Russia, politically associated with Hitler. If the British community throughout the world has done some service to the cause of freedom it is not the service merely, or chiefly, of courage. It is the service of a certain political attitude or temper. No Vichy governments were possible in Britain or Canada or Australia or New Zealand or South Africa. The last-named perhaps came nearest such a possibility but the genius of Smuts kept it at bay. The British morale for resistance was not, first of all, a matter of "guts" but a capacity for national unity—a unity which did not spring suddenly into life with the war.

Those statements I believe to be correct, and right at this point I wish to ask a question. The Prime Minister has already stated that if there are any questions to be asked in this debate he would appreciate our asking them throughout the course of our remarks and then when he comes to reply he will do his best to give satisfactory answers. Personally I believe that we should have moved into committee of the whole house where the debate could have been carried on with experts from the Department of External Affairs present, with the Prime Minister, so that we could have had question and answer on this very important subject. But such is not the case and the house is at a disadvantage in consequence, because the Prime Minister will close the debate when he makes his reply and then there can be no more questions. But since he is willing to answer questions I have a number to ask him. These are not necessarily all my own because the members of this party in the house are associated with me in asking them—and we want the answers.

Speaking of the unity which exists between the nations of the British commonwealth, I will ask the Prime Minister this question: Would adoption of these proposals in any way weaken the ties or relationship between the countries which comprise the British empire, and if so, in what manner and to what extent? I have these questions written out in order here, Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and so on, and may comment on them a little bit, but for the convenience of the Prime Minister, and so that they will not be buried in Hansard I shall hand them to him to facilitate his reading of them and giving the answers.

I would like to know whether the proposals now outlined as a basis for discussion at San Francisco will give us the absolute right to control our own internal economy; or is our own internal economy to be tied to some external authority? If it is, I claim that that is one of the greatest dangers there can be not only to Canada but to the British commonwealth of nations.

I should like to ask in my second question whether, if the proposals are adopted, would the control of this nation's currency and credit remain within our own power? In other words, would we retain absolute control over our own currency and credit?

I ask a third question. Do any of the proposals or principles involve a return to the gold standard, and if so, will the Canadian delegation oppose such a step, or will the government as far as it is concerned oppose such a step? In this connection, and to put my questions in somewhat of logical order I would ask another question which is important with respect to our own internal economy, and I want the members of the house to get this. If the proposals are adopted would Canada and any other individual nation be able to negotiate a trade agreement upon a basis satisfactory to the two countries concerned without any interference by the world organization? If they are not able to do that, there is a red flag of danger just ahead.

I ask a fourth question, and this is in respect of the Bretton Woods proposals. Do any of the proposals or principles involve the acceptance of the Bretton Woods proposals, and if so, will the delegation oppose such a step, or will the government as far as it is concerned oppose such a step?

I notice that there is a good deal of concern expressed in England about these matters at the present time and that public meetings are being held, attended not only by important individuals but by very large crowds of public-minded citizens. I notice also that some experts are beginning to put out warnings to the British government with respect to these matters. The other day I picked up the Ottawa Evening Citizen, containing an article by A. C. Cummings, of the London News Bureau, which no doubt appeared in several other papers in Canada. The article says in part:

The British commonwealth representatives, headed by Field Marshal Smuts, will begin their preliminary discussions on April 4 and consider details of the proposed economic council, world court and other business on the conference agenda.

That was not the part I particularly wanted to read, but since I have read it, I wonder if Canada will have any representative at these preliminary discussions. I think it would be well if the Prime Minister would tell us that.

The article goes on to give an account of some warnings which are heard in England to-day. After discussing the relations of the three great industrial powers, namely the United States, Russia and Great Britain, the writer points out that Britain may find herself in a very unfavourable position should either the United States or Russia gain tremendous advantage by further developments of their immense industrial power. He states:

Despite Foreign Secretary Eden's assurance to the contrary, fears that British delegates at San Francisco may be confronted with the alternative that either they accept the Bretton Woods monetary proposals or they will not obtain the world security plan outlined at Dumbarton Oaks are expressed by the noted economist, Doctor Paul Einzig. He thinks that under the Bretton Woods plan Britain would be required to abandon existing monetary arrangements with the dominions, that within five years—

Here is something for my Conservative friends to listen to.

—the so-called sterling area would have ceased to exist and that the Ottawa system of imperial preference could not survive.

Mr. JAUQUES: That is the big idea.

Mr. HANSELL: That is the big idea.

Such a weakening of the British commonwealth, he considers, would be suicidal in the event of another world war—especially when it is recalled that in 1940 the only nations to give Britain effective help in her deadliest hour were the dominions.

These are words worth taking note of.

It was in my mind to ask whether the present vote is to be regarded as one of confidence in the government's foreign policy. Perhaps there is no need to ask that question, because it is expected that an election will be held soon, and there is no virtue in putting the government out at the present time because they are going to die the natural death of all governments when their term of office expires. When they are dead I hope we shall bury them so deep that they will never rise again.

Speaking of elections, I do not want to sound a partisan note. So far this debate has been pretty well managed in that politics have not largely entered into it. The Prime Minister, when he opened the debate, said that it was not of a political nature, and that we must stay clear of trying to gain political advantage, and we were told that the delegation which is to go to San Francisco is to be inter or non-political. But I should like to ask him, when the election is called, which it will be before the report of the committee can possibly be presented to this house, will he refrain from bringing the matter into political discussion during the election?

[Mr. Hansell.]

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): You said something that time.

Mr. HANSELL: I will ask him, also, is this vote to be regarded as a vote of confidence in the delegation? If it is, perhaps the Prime Minister should have announced before this debate commenced who are to constitute the delegation.

Another thing I think the Prime Minister should have done is to have called this parliament in time to submit this whole question to the appropriate parliamentary committee in order that the subject could be thoroughly investigated, witnesses called, and nothing left undone to provide parliament as a whole with a full and complete picture of all the intricacies involved. But he has not done that. I suppose I could at this moment move that the matter be referred to one of the standing committees; if I did so a vote would be taken, and I understand such a motion is not debatable. But there is now no time for such action; there would have been if the Prime Minister had not been watching the political straws a few months ago. There is not time now; he has gained a round in this matter at the expense of all parties in the house. But I have a question which I will ask him and which I will also put to the leader of the Progressive Conservative party. I do so because I do not know who will be in power after the election.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): You have an idea, though.

Mr. HANSELL: Whoever is in power will have to deal with this matter, because it requires ratification by parliament. I ask of anyone who may be prime minister in the next parliament, will he assure this house that as far as he is concerned this whole matter will be brought before the appropriate committees of the house for full investigation before any commitments are made?

I am not satisfied with the last clause as it stands. The statement that the charter will be "submitted to parliament for approval" is a very general one. Will he say that this matter, if economic proposals are involved, will go to the banking and commerce committee; if armed force is involved, to some other committee; if a matter of trade, to yet another committee? In other words, will he undertake that the proposals will undergo microscopic examination by the proper committees whose duty it will be to report to parliament, and will he promise that these committees will not be loaded with his own supporters; and will other parties in this house promise the same thing? I contend that this is important and calls for an answer.

I shall make one statement on behalf of this group and then I desire to present an amendment. My statement is as follows: Speaking on behalf of the Social Credit group, I wish to state that we are desirous of seeing a delegation from Canada attend the San Francisco conference and take part with the representatives of the other nations in a sincere, determined effort to work out an effective method of guaranteeing peace and security with freedom throughout the world. Therefore, because voting against the main resolution as it is worded would of necessity be voting against even accepting the invitation to attend the San Francisco conference, we will vote for the main resolution. But we oppose the acceptance of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals in any form or modification which embodies by stipulation or implication the international monetary stabilization technique of Bretton Woods, which gives any board of officials power to interfere in the monetary, financial or economic affairs of any state.

And now I propose the following amendment:

That the resolution be amended by striking out clauses three and four respectively, re-numbering clause five as clause four and substituting for clause three the following:

3. (a) That this house is of the opinion that an acceptable charter for an international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security should be constructed on a pattern in which the full national sovereignty of each cooperating nation is insured, and in which free peoples are freely associated for the mutual benefit of all striving for the attainment of a common ideal of peace, freedom and security.

(b) And this house therefore disapproves of the monetary stabilization technique emanating from the Bretton Woods conference designed to fetter all peoples to the gold standard and which would result in rendering the Canadian economy subservient to external control.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member concluded his remarks?

Mr. HANSELL: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I concluded with the presentation of the amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: The resolution, which I need not read in its entirety proposes:

1. That this house endorses the acceptance by the government of Canada of the invitation to send representatives to the conference;

2. That this house recognizes that the establishment of an effective international organization of the maintenance of international peace and security is of vital importance to Canada, and, indeed, to the future well-being of mankind; and that it is in the interests of Canada that Canada should become a member of such an organization;

3. That this house approves the purposes and principles set forth in the proposals of the four governments and considers that these proposals constitute a satisfactory general basis for a discussion of the charter of the proposed international organization.

I do not think I need read the rest of the resolution. I will simply refer to clause 3 which, I think, is the essence of the resolution now presented to the house.

In the amendment as proposed by the hon. member, 3 (a) might be considered an enlargement of the preamble of the clause, taken in conjunction with clause 2. Paragraph (b) imports a new subject of discussion which is not within the four walls of the motion. It is a subject which is foreign to the resolution before the house. I shall therefore have to rule it out of order.

The law is well established and has been the subject of discussion many times in the house. I will read the decision given by Mr. Speaker Lemieux on March 17, 1927. The remarks which I make with regard to the amendment now before the house are, I think, apropos and in accord with that decision. I quote:

Amendment ruled out, because it raised a new question which could only be considered on a distinct motion after notice.

The house resumed the debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Woodsworth—that, in the opinion of this house, no disposition of the natural resources, under the control of the federal government, shall be effective until ratified by parliament.

And the debate continuing;

Mr. Church, seconded by Mr. Gott, moved an amendment thereto:

That all the words after the word "that" in the motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"it be referred to the standing committee of this house on mines, forests and water-powers, to consider and investigate all leases, grants, or permits issued during the past year in respect to natural resources under the jurisdiction of the Dominion of Canada, known as 'water powers'; with power to send for all papers and documents, to summon and examine witnesses, regarding any such leases, grants and permits.

"And further, with power to the said committee to report whether such leases, grants or permits are in the public interest, and whether the interests of the federal authorities are amply protected.

"And also, to report whether, in the opinion of the committee, the said lease or permit in respect of the Seven Sisters falls in the Province of Manitoba should be revoked and cancelled, and if so, upon what terms and conditions.

"And to report all matter and findings to this house."

Mr. Speaker: In my humble opinion the amendment is out of order for the following reasons. Beauchesne, section 397, states:

"An amendment must not raise any question which by the rules of the house, can only be raised by a distinct motion after notice."

The honourable gentleman will notice that the question before the house is an abstract one. It reads:

"That in the opinion of this house, no disposition of the natural resources, under the control of the federal parliament, shall be effective until ratified by parliament."

By his amendment the honourable gentleman asks, inter alia, that the lease of a specific water power called the Seven Sisters falls, be investigated by the committee on mines, forests and water powers. What is the procedure in this matter?

What is the procedure in this matter? I read from Bourinot, Fourth Edition, at page 321:

It is an imperative rule that every amendment must be relevant to the question on which the amendment has been proposed, and this rule has been invariably insisted upon by Canadian Speakers.

Then farther down:

If such a practice were tolerated, all the benefits of giving due notice of a motion, and allowing the house a full opportunity of considering a question, would be practically lost. A member would then be in a position to surprise the house at any moment with a motion of importance—

This is undoubtedly a question of importance.

—and the necessity of giving notice would be superseded to all intents and purposes. It is not, therefore, surprising that the latest English decisions are in accord with those of the Canadian Speakers. Sir Erskine May, in later editions, however, lays it down as "an imperative rule that every amendment must be relevant to the question on which the amendment is proposed."

I have, on many occasions, looked over the vexed question of amendments and subamendments, and the ruling is uniform on the subject that no new question must be introduced on an amendment. It must be relevant to the main question. In the present instance the resolution is an abstract one while the amendment refers to a specific subject different from the main one.

No new question must be introduced by an amendment to the question before the house. A new question has been introduced in the amendment in paragraph (b) which reads as follows:

And this house therefore disapproves of the monetary stabilization technique emanating from the Bretton Woods conference designed to fetter all peoples to the gold standard and which would result in rendering the Canadian economy subservient to external control.

I am satisfied that paragraph (b) in the amendment now offered is new matter which can only be raised by a distinct motion after notice. It is not relevant to the resolution before the house and I therefore rule it out of order.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would Your Honour permit any discussion on the ruling?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. SPEAKER: There is only one method of discussing a ruling from the chair, and that is by an appeal.

Mr. J. W. BURTON (Humboldt): There is no desire on my part to prolong unnecessarily this debate; therefore, my remarks this evening will be very short. However, as one of the junior members of this group I should like to make a few observations in connection with the motion under discussion. May I express my appreciation to the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for the clear-cut, straight-forward wording of the motion he presented for our consideration. This is such a departure from what seems to be his usual practice that it is no wonder our friends of the Progressive Conservative party were caught flat-footed and unprepared to proceed with the debate when it was opened by the Prime Minister.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I rise to a question of privilege? I know the hon. member does not desire to misinterpret the situation. I thought when I rose on a question of privilege early to-day it would be sufficient to make every member understand that a statement such as is now being made is not in accordance with the facts. I do not want to protest again, but I trust that such allegations will not be repeated.

Mr. BURTON: I am sorry that the leader of the opposition is so touchy on this matter. I accept his correction.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): He is only telling the truth.

Mr. BURTON: But nevertheless the fact remains that the hon. members of the Progressive Conservative party fumbled the ball. It was picked up by the leader of this group and he carried it over for a touchdown.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): He made a foul.

Mr. GRAYDON: It was only a part of the alliance of the hon. member's party with the government; that is all.

Mr. BURTON: If the hon. members of the Progressive Conservative party will just have a little patience I may say something later on that will please them. Prior to the opening of this session of parliament the Prime Minister was quite frank in stating that certain people would not be chosen as delegates to go to the conference at San Francisco. He furthermore gave the impression that this would be a non-partisan delegation consisting of members from both sides of the house.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Of his own choosing.

Mr. BURTON. But he did not say that it would be a fifty-fifty proposition. In my opinion anything less would be only a poor imitation of President Roosevelt's arrangement for the delegation representing the United States. When we consider that President Roosevelt has had a recent mandate from the American people and then stop to think that this parliament will have passed its allotted span of life before the conference takes place, we will realize that our delegation will be handicapped and weakened if the majority of its members are supporters of a party of which there is a question of its being able to obtain a fresh mandate from the Canadian people.

My purpose in raising that point is my keen desire and hope that our delegation should be in a position to carry as much weight as possible at the conference and leave no question in the minds of delegates from other nations as to whether or not our delegates represent the full viewpoint of all our Canadian people.

I can speak quite frankly in my plea for an equalized representation because I have no desires or aspirations to be a member of the delegation; nevertheless there are plenty of experienced members on this side of the house to choose from. When the invitations were being sent to the various nations inviting all peace-loving nations to attend, many people wondered why only those nations that had declared war should receive the invitation. My answer to such questions has been, that there are times and places when the only way you can love peace is to be willing to take off your coat and fight for it.

What some people, yes, and even a few members of this house forget is that this is not a peace conference to settle the present war. Yesterday we heard the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka) make an eloquent plea for the people of the Ukraine. Prior to that, on Thursday, March 22, the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann) pleaded the case for poor, long-suffering Poland. Both of these hon. members are to be congratulated for the able way in which they have presented their respective cases. I would, if they are so kind as to allow me, join with them in their plea for justice. But in view of a statement made by the Prime Minister during the course of his speech, I would say that we are pleading this case in the wrong court at the wrong time. Let me quote from the Prime Minister's speech of Tuesday, March 20, when on page 22 of Hansard he said:

In some quarters there appear to be misconceptions as to what it is intended the San Francisco conference should accomplish. It might be well, were I at the outset to remove one prevalent misconception. The purpose of the conference has been set forth clearly in the communication of March 5 on behalf of the inviting governments which I have just read. The conference at San Francisco is not the peace conference: It will have nothing to do with the preparation of the treaties of peace. It will not discuss the terms which the united nations will impose on Germany and on Japan at some future time. It will deal only with the constitutional framework of the future society of nations. The purpose is to provide for the maintenance of peace, once peace has been secured.

Therefore in my opinion any discussion as to terms, boundaries and so forth in connection with any country cannot be of any help at the present time, because these are matters that can be dealt with only after the cessation of hostilities. Our delegates to the peace conference will have to deal with these problems. But we hope that at San Francisco machinery will be set up to guard the peace of the world for many years to come; and if, unfortunately, the peace conference should leave unsettled any questions such as those referred to by hon. members, I submit they can be brought quite properly before the security council under section A of chapter VIII of these proposals. I believe every hon. member has a copy of this pamphlet, which is headed: "Proposals for the establishment of a general international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security." On page 10, under section A of chapter VIII, the heading is: "Arrangements for the maintenance of international peace and security including prevention and suppression of aggression." I contend that cases such as have been brought to the attention of this house, if they exist after this organization has been set up, will be dealt with in such a way that the people of these different countries may have their views considered.

Some people become quite vexed when suggestions are made warning our delegates of certain pitfalls or dangers. They seem to take such warnings as personal affronts to the leaders of the three great powers. Let me tell those of such mentality that the youth of the united nations have been called upon to pay a tremendous price to free the world from such slavish following of a fuhrer. While we are prepared to give all due credit to the ability and leadership of Prime Minister Churchill, President Roosevelt and Marshal Stalin, our democratic people will never allow any one of these, or a combination of all three of them, to become Hitler's counterpart. I believe that if the suggestions and warnings offered by the leader of our group, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), are carefully considered by the delegates they will be able to make a greater contribution to the success of the conference.

I also believe that the point of view expressed by the leader of the Social Credit group, the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) with regard to Bretton Woods, is well taken. The hon. member made one statement, however, with which I cannot agree, when he said the combined military strength of the British empire, France and the United States had not been sufficient to enforce oil sanctions against Italy when that nation was starting on its path of aggression. In my opinion the main reason why oil sanctions were not imposed against Italy, and why our delegate who had proposed such action was so quickly reprimanded, was that there were oil interests which had greater influence at court than did the people who later on had to pay the price, through their sweat and blood and tears. Those self-same interests and other cartels are still flourishing in most countries. Will they be lurking around the corridors at San Francisco? I leave that to your imagination, Mr. Speaker, but I believe my guess would be as good as any; in fact I would not be very much surprised if their emissaries should try to run the show.

The events of the last twenty-five years make it all the more necessary that our delegation to the conference should be as representative and as strong as possible. There will be need of careful consideration before many important decisions are made. Let no one kid himself or mislead the public by saying there are no causes for fear. Nevertheless every effort should be made to set up a fair and workable arrangement to safeguard the peace of the world in the years to come. If we fail in that endeavour there is grave danger that the next world war may destroy our entire civilization. Therefore, I am sure the prayers of this young, virile, Christian nation will go with the Prime Minister and the delegation he leads to San Francisco.

In this connection I should like to add a word to what was said by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell), who preceded me. I was very much touched when he dealt with this point. His training over past years enabled him to express his thoughts much better than I can do, but I should like to say I am satisfied that unless the delegation from this country and all the delegations that sit around that conference table at San Francisco pay heed to the warning given by the hon. member for Macleod; unless they are prepared to take God into that council and try to bring about a fair and just arrangement, they will be erecting the framework of the new structure on a foundation of shifting sands.

[Mr. Burton.]

There may be some who will scoff at the idea of trying to establish an organization to maintain the peace of the world. They may point to the failures of all such attempts in the past. May I remind such people that it is told of the late Thomas Edison that when he was informed of the failure of his two-thousandth experiment in the search for a suitable filament for the electric light he replied, "Well, that leaves two thousand less to try in future." Did he throw up his hands and quit? Just imagine the loss to civilization if he had done so! Other people adopt a hopeless attitude and say there always have been wars and we will continue to have wars as long as man inhabits the earth. That is only partly correct. It is true that there will be constant combat between the forces of good and the forces of evil, but only until the Prince of Peace reigns supreme in the hearts of men. Have the people of the world ever tried that method? Two thousand years ago the Prince of Peace came to bring peace to the world. This reminds me of the words of the gospel, wherein it says:

He was in the world, and the world was made by Him, and the world knew Him not.

He came unto His own, and His own received Him not.

After two thousand years the greater part of the world pays only lip-service to that great commandment He gave us, to love our neighbours as ourselves. We have not only failed but have refused to follow His example and teachings. He drove the money-changers from the temple, but most of the nations of the world still worship at the feet of the golden calf.

At this time of the year, when we are commemorating His suffering, death and resurrection, it is also proper that we remember the suffering and death of many of His brothers, our fellow citizens, who have paid the supreme sacrifice so that we may live.

Let us pass this motion, unanimously and ask our delegates to give the necessary leadership along these lines, so that this structure will not be built on a foundation of sand. And, having done that, in future years we may look back to this Easter time as having also been the dawn of peace.

Mr. J. SASSEVILLE ROY (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, before setting out my remarks on the subject matter of the resolution now before the house, I should like to say a few words of welcome to the hon. members for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe), Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix) and Rimouski (Mr. d'Anjou), who have come to sit with us. Indeed I am very happy that these hon. gentlemen have joined the independent group in the house. This will prove an important factor toward assuring the election of all independent members in Quebec on the next polling day.

I was amazed when I listened to the speech of the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond). The hon. member questioned my logic, and tried to show contradiction in what I said last year on February 8 in respect of conferences which were held and attended by three or four of the great powers, but to which the Canadian nation was not invited. One is amazed to see a man attempting to find contradictions between what has been said in the past, and what one is going or not going to say in the future. Surely that is an example of good logic! Nevertheless the hon. member is permitted to discuss what he believes to be my opinions in respect of certain definite matters—although I have never discussed his opinions, particularly when I do not know what he is going to say or do. And even if I did know, surely it is the duty of one hon. member to respect the opinions of others. However, the hon. member need not worry; I am not annoyed; I have been amused, and what he has said has permitted me to relax a little.

The hon. member has recalled what I said last year when I blamed the government for not having insisted upon representation at those great conferences—the one at which the Atlantic charter was drawn up, the conference at Casablanca, those at Quebec and Yalta, and so on. I purpose once more to-night blaming the government for the very same reason. It is one among many other very important reasons why I oppose the resolution now before the house.

The hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie read some of the clauses in the resolution, number 3 of which states:

(3) That this house approves the purposes and principles set forth in the proposals of the four governments, and considers that these proposals constitute a satisfactory general basis for a discussion of the charter of the proposed international organization.

While later on in his speech the hon. member emphasized his opposition to the consequences of those proposals of the Dumbarton Oaks conference, yet he said at the beginning of his observations that all that the government was proposing was acceptable. This looks to me like a contradiction.

I should like to say a few words about what was said last Friday by the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bertrand), when he raised the question of separatism. At page 159 of Hansard he is reported as follows:

The class of people to whom these gentlemen are appealing have only one definite article in their programme—the separation of the province of Quebec from the rest of Canada. That is a programme which would bring immediate civil war if Quebec tried to enforce it.

That is the talk we always hear, Mr. Speaker; but the truth surely has its rights, even in the mouth of a minister of the crown. I challenge any one to find in any of our speeches or in any of our acts anything that could lead one to believe that we could have supported such a policy. On the contrary we have always preached and are still preaching sound collaboration between the two ethnic elements of our country.

I pause to inform you, Mr. Speaker, that at one time in our province there was a move for separatism. Some years ago a Liberal member in the Quebec legislative assembly moved a resolution to separate Quebec from the rest of Canada. That Liberal member was afterwards a minister in a Quebec Liberal cabinet. He also came to this house as a Liberal member, and finally was appointed by the present government to one of the most important positions in our province, namely that of a seat on the bench of the court of appeal. I refer to the Hon. Mr. Francœur. If this man, the only one in Quebec to promote a policy of separatism, could be so generously treated, then surely it goes without saying that we all must know those who are the sponsors of such a policy.

In order to be in a position to understand the matter under discussion we should first try to ascertain what is to be the true character of the San Francisco conference. When we understand its character, I should be very much surprised to find there are any others, like the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie, who do not understand and respect our opinions.

Too many people are inclined to speak about the San Francisco conference as if it were to be a peace conference. That is giving a false impression. The conference has for its object the setting up of an organization having for its purpose the maintenance of peace. We should not confuse the maintenance of peace with the establishment of peace itself. The two things are altogether different.

After witnessing this horrible world massacre, Mr. Speaker, we all eagerly desire a true peace and strongly call for its permanent maintenance throughout the world. But before deciding to share in the working out of a scheme of the kind proposed at the Dumbarton Oaks conference, before leaving for San Francisco, we ought to know first what kind of peace the great powers controlling the conference intend to impose upon the world. What will be the spirit at the basis of the establishment of the peace which we are going to engage ourselves to maintain? And for whose benefit will the depositions of such a peace be?

San Francisco Conference

Second, what will be the effect of this conference upon our country? How can we figure out that our participation in this conference will be worth anything to ourselves as well as to all the other nations when we know that our government, after having drawn our country into this war, has not found the means of having had a single word to say in any of the conferences which have taken place during the last five years?

Third, what is the exact international situation of our country when even here in this chamber we see the government declaring that they are going to try to obtain from other nations recognition of us as a kind of middle state between the great powers and the small powers, and on the other side we see the official opposition claiming that there should be another great power composed of the nations of the British commonwealth of which our country would be only a part?

Fourth, what are the prospective guarantees for a fair and durable peace so solemnly promised by our immediate leaders and which is expected by the whole of humanity when we know what is going on in Europe at the present time?

Is it the proper time to set up that organization for the maintenance of peace before peace itself is made? What are the reasons for such a hurry?

It is only the answers to these questions that can enable one to form an opinion on the present resolution. The conclusion one would draw would be positive or negative according as he bases his decision on the policy of imperialism and international finance, on/or a policy of Canadianism against world-wide cartels and all sorts of international financial schemes.

As Canada was not represented in the most important conferences of the Atlantic at Casablanca, Teheran, Quebec and Yalta, we are not aware of the character of the decisions taken at these conferences. What were the secret agreements reached? Would it not be only elementary to know that before deciding on the course of action that we should take in regard to the San Francisco conference?

What must seem the most extraordinary to intelligent people is the fact that we are endeavouring to organize the maintenance of a peace of which we do not know the first word.

[Mr. Roy.]

Then the question may arise, what kind of peace are we to have? What role will Canada play in the establishment of the peace itself? Will we, as usual, endorse all the decisions already taken by the great powers? Will that peace be based on democratic principles and Christian justice? Will the only guardians of social doctrine in the world—I mean the representatives of the different Christian churches—be invited, as they were for the winning of the war, to bring forth at these conferences the sound directives upon which peace must be based if it is to be one of social justice and last forever? Will that peace be the Versailles kind of peace? That is to say, will it be the work of the international financiers and their representatives? Will that peace be only the expression of will of the dictatorial power and materialist thinkers, Russia?

Would it not be the most elementary kind of wariness, Mr. Speaker, that we should know these conditions before accepting the invitation to go to San Francisco? The main objective of that conference is to set up an international body empowered with the means to maintain peace in the world. Its authority must be backed up by armies and guns. That is to say, if it offers a possibility for permanent peace, it alike represents a permanent danger of war. That possibility is interdependent on the nature of the peace treaty that will be made at the conclusion of hostilities. The supreme control of that organization will be left in the hands of the four great powers only. That is full of significance.

The hon. leader of the Social Credit group, the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) has made the clearest analysis of that significance that has been submitted to you, Mr. Speaker. Here is what he said on the subject and I thank the hon. member for having permitted me to quote his words. He said:

Now the government is asking this house to approve a policy which involves the establishment of a world organization under an executive body which would have effective control of the armed forces of all nations and could mobilize economic sanctions against any nation for the purpose of imposing its dictates.

That is what the Dumbarton Oaks proposals involve which are to form the basis of the San Francisco conference. However, those proposals cannot be considered without reference to the Bretton Woods proposals, which involve a centralization of economic power on a world scale by setting up a world authority with control of the monetary policy of all nations.

It will be argued that the Dumbarton Oaks proposals specifically provide that each nation is to have its sovereignty. But what is the use of talking nonsense like that when you at once proceed to set up an organization where it is impossible for any nation to have its sovereignty?

It will be argued that the Dumbarton Oaks proposals envisage the control by each individual state of its military forces until it surrenders it. But there will be such mechanisms set up in this whole arrangement, including Dumbarton Oaks, UNRRA, the monetary fund, the international bank and all the rest, that such pressure will be brought to bear on any nation which hesitates to surrender the control of its forces that it will be obliged to surrender those forces in order to subsist.

Thus we find that the policy that the government is asking this house to approve involves the surrender of Canada to an international authority of all effective sovereignty and the concentration of power in an alien-dominated international group over, first, our economic policy, second, through this, our political policy, and third, of the armed forces. In short the power of the proposed international authority will be absolute. Every vestige of effective democracy will be destroyed and Canada will become a vassal state under an overriding international dictatorship. The British commonwealth will be swallowed up in a federated agglomeration of servile states. The relationship of this parliament to the world authority would be that of a Canadian village council to-day to this parliament. Human freedom would be a mockery, and we would have a world totalitarian dictatorship fastened upon us until conditions became so intolerable that a universal revolt would destroy it. And, Mr. Speaker, the design of the planners of this whole set-up is that when this universal revolt occurs there will be fastened upon the people in their helplessness and uncertainty and chaotic condition another dictatorship which will be one of military power.

The hon. member goes on to express his amazement at the Prime Minister being "so anxious to surrender every vestige of effective national sovereignty to some, as yet unspecified, group" whose interests are not ours.

This is the meaning, Mr. Speaker, of the proposals of Dumbarton Oaks which the government is asking us by the present resolution to endorse.

It is a tremendous responsibility which rests upon hon. members to authorize at this time a government to go to San Francisco with no mandate and engage Canada in such a perilous adventure, knowing, as we all know, that this government not only has no mandate but has no longer the confidence of the people, as is well proven by the results of all recent by-elections. Further, the government has not ventured to proceed with ten by-elections which, according to the law, should have been held.

In spite of an adverse mandate, the Liberal government has plunged Canada into participation and has made our contribution more tremendous than anyone by the stretch of the imagination could have thought of.

Now the war is nearing its end, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), not being satisfied with his responsibility for the actual war, goes ahead now, before being thrown out of political life by the people of this country, in a desperate effort to engage Canada not only in the future wars which the empire may encounter, but in any war that may occur anywhere. His record as a participationist will be a nice thing for the Liberal party. The debate on the Dumbarton Oaks proposals may bring about all kinds of consequences. One of these is tied up with the maintenance of an international military force, which may very well mean for Canada the maintenance of compulsory military service. We should fear that probability. It is all very well for the Prime Minister to say that Canada's delegation will do its utmost to well serve Canada's interest. But what is the situation of us, members in this house, who are asked to take the tremendous responsibility of adopting a world policy of which we do not know anything, since it is based on decisions and secret agreements which are hidden from us? Our situation cannot but be false to the utmost. The point is that we are required to rely entirely upon the ability of the government or of the Prime Minister.

I deeply regret that I, for one, cannot feel all the confidence in the Prime Minister which I should like to have. Past experiences have taught us to be careful. I will give a few examples of the Prime Minister changing his mind.

In 1937, after a political campaign waged by the Liberal party in the constituency of Lotbinière against participation in any war, the Prime Minister wired to the winner as follows:

The electors of Lotbinière have voted for a Canadian who places the national interest above all.

That telegram was dated December 28, 1937.

On August 11, 1944, the same Prime Minister made this declaration in the House of Commons, as reported in Hansard, at page 6275:

... I do tell this House of Commons to-day that my visit to Germany had as its objective to make it perfectly clear that, if there was a war of aggression, nothing in the world would keep the Canadian people from being at the side of Britain. That was known to the German government at that time, and my action in the matter was fully known to the British government; but I did not talk about it at the time, for it is just as well that some of these matters should not be spoken of until later years.

That contradiction should be enough to support my contention that the policy of the Prime Minister is one of furtiveness and concealment.

Speaking over the Canadian radio network on February 3, 1940, the Prime Minister warned the people of Canada against the National government proposed by Mr. Manion, saying:

Just recall conscription of the union government.

On January 26, 1942, the Prime Minister made the following statement in support of the anti-war pledges of the Liberal party in Quebec, as reported in Hansard, at page 46:

Every hon. member of this house knows that, except for the assurance that, in the event of a European war, there would be no conscription for service overseas, this parliament would never have decided, in the immediate and unanimous manner in which it did, to stand at the side of Britain in the resistance of aggression and the defence of freedom.

Hon. members are also aware that if, at the time when Canada's participation in the war was challenged in an election in the province of Quebec by a government professing a different political faith, a like assurance with respect to service overseas had not been given in the name of the present government by the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin) and other Liberal leaders and members of the House of Commons from the province of Quebec, the verdict of the people of that province might have been wholly different.

At that time, the people of the province of Quebec turned out of office the government that had sought to thwart Canada's war effort, and placed in office under the leadership of Hon. Mr. Godbout, a government which was prepared to cooperate with the federal administration in furthering the national effort. I doubt if any service at the time meant more to the allied cause than that rendered by the people of the province of Quebec in thus demonstrating the unity of Canada in its war effort.

Yes, it was unanimous, but it was obtained under false promises. I could give many other examples of the same kind. But that should be sufficient to prove that the people of Canada at that time were deliberately misled, and there is evidence to-day that they have also been misled by some other slogans and promises during the present war. Have we not been told that we were fighting for democracy, for liberty and for Christianity? Now we are watching the corner at the right awaiting the emergence of the 'victory' of democracy and Christianity. We have been informed that victory is about to be realized. At the same time we are looking at the left corner, the opposite corner, and there we see something of a different complexion. In other words, we may witness the victory of totalitarianism and materialism over democratic and Christian principles, and that may be the achievement for the maintenance of which we are asked to work.

Speaking on Friday last, the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Lalonde)—I am glad to see that he is in his place—

Mr. LALONDE: I am here.

Mr. ROY: I know you are there, in body I am sure, if not in spirit. The hon. gentleman accused the member for Charlevoix-Saguenay

[Mr. Roy.]

(Mr. Dorion) of not being logical in urging the presence of the Pope's representatives at this conference and in opposing, on the other hand, Canada's participation at San Francisco. He went on to quote Pius XII as favouring the setting up of an organization of the type of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals inserted in the present resolution. But the hon. member did not state the fundamental conditions on which such an organism could work in accordance with the Pope's suggestion. That is very important.

Should those conditions be observed and some of the guardians of Christian doctrine be invited, our attitude would be different, because then we would be offered a certain amount of security with regard to the results.

Mr. LALONDE: Would you be in favour of the conference then?

Mr. ROY: I have just said yes. If the hon. member is not aware of what has been done along that line he is not eligible for participation in this discussion. However, I will try to make clear to him that we are in favour of such a conference being held, but what we are opposed to is the wrong way in which our government and the great powers are going about it. We contend that it is untimely for two reasons. First, peace has not yet been made; and, second, the present government has no mandate to engage Canada's future.

Mr. DUPUIS: You want to send Mr. Bracken instead?

Mr. ROY: No, Mr. Dupuis shall be sent.

Mr. DUPUIS: I will rely on my chief.

Mr. ROY: Mr. Speaker, in conclusion—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROY: You are getting tired, eh?

An hon. MEMBER: Very much.

Mr. ROY: The people of Quebec are getting tired too, and you will find that out on the next polling day.

Mr. DUPUIS: Your friends the Tories are enjoying it.

Mr. ROY: The hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Dupuis) is nearer the Tories than I am because he has been supporting the Liberal party, which is on the road to imperialism and Toryism, and since 1940 it has been in accord with the Tories. So that a Liberal Tory or a Conservative Tory is nothing but a Tory.

Mr. DUPUIS: You voted with the Tories; I voted against them.

Mr. ROY: In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, if Canada is to receive consideration from international leaders only when needed for hard labour, we cannot agree to their expectations. These are a few of the reasons why I oppose the resolution.

Mr. ARMAND CHOQUETTE (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, before proceeding with the remarks I intend to make this evening, I wish to take up a statement in the speech delivered by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy). I want to state immediately that I do so in the best spirit, simply to do justice to the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond). The hon. member for Gaspé said that the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie blamed him for having, last year, demanded that Canada participate to the allied conferences. On the contrary, the hon. member voted last year for the proposal made by the hon. member for Gaspé. What he took the hon. member to task for, was the inconsistency of the attitude he takes this year against our being a party to the San Francisco conference with that he took last year when he urged upon the government that we be represented at the allied conferences. The government of the United States of America, on behalf of itself and of the governments of the United Kingdom, of Russia and other countries, has invited the government of Canada to send representatives to the conference of the united nations to be held on April 25, 1945, at San Francisco to prepare a charter for a general international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security.

I am not opposed to the setting up of a powerful organization that would strive to maintain peace and to adopt joint and efficient measures to prevent and eliminate all threats to peace, to encourage good relations between all nations and to establish international cooperation.

I do not think any one would object to such an organization that would be truly democratic.

Does not the Pope, in the speech he delivered over the Vatican station on Christmas eve:

Consider that the unity of mankind and the community of peoples is a moral necessity and the crowning-piece of social progress.

And the Pope added:

The recognition of that principle is the key to both the future and the peace. No world reform, no peace guarantee can break away from that principle without losing its strength and without being inconsistent.

The inalienable rights of the individual require as their safeguard the authority of the state. The same holds true for the nations. Their individual sovereignty will always run the risk of being violated by a stronger neighbour if it is not supported by the supreme authority of a truly democratic league of nations.

By these words, the Pope recognizes the necessity of an international organization for the maintenance of world peace.

And further down in his same message, Pious XII does not hesitate to confer the widest powers to a central authority which he would like to see.

invested, by general consent, with the supreme power to kill at its source any menace of individual or collective aggression.

In case of aggression, judicial intervention by the other nations will follow and the organization for the maintenance of peace will punish the aggressor by means of economic, or other, sanctions. However, whatever powers this authority may possess, it must never sanction any injustice nor detract from any right to the detriment of any nation, be it amongst the victorious, the neutral or the defeated countries.

Mr. Speaker, it is evident to-day that the people are divided between an ardent longing for peace and a genuine terror at the thought that this horrible war may be but the prelude of something still more dreadful.

Surely the world of to-morrow will not resemble that which we have known. There has been too much disruption, too much suffering.

The proposals set forth by the four great powers and which are to serve as the basis for the discussion of the functioning of this organization, are not all acceptable; some are even fundamentally opposed to the principles of democracy; I refer more particularly to the membership of the security council and to the right of veto granted certain powers. It shall be the duty of our representatives to oppose these suggested proposals.

A careful study of the decisions reached at Yalta by the leaders of the three great powers, viz., the United States, Russia and England, shows that these decisions are based much more on a brutal policy of force than on a policy of sound justice and right. The organization to be set up must see to it that such abuses are eliminated.

What has become of the Atlantic charter to which we had pinned so many hopes? We are now told that it was not a legal document involving real obligations. Was that all a joke? Or are we regarded as fools at the present time?

The decisions taken at Yalta will have to be reviewed by our delegates in view of the injustices which they involve and because they are not binding. President Roosevelt himself has given the American delegates who will represent their country at the San Francisco conference the assurance that they were in no way bound by the decisions taken at Yalta, although the American government and the President himself were present at that meeting. Who would now suggest that such decisions could be binding on our Canadian representatives?

The bishops of Scotland have used harsh words in condemning the Yalta compromise, saying "that a Christian nation had been sacrificed to an atheist and totalitarian state."

The Polish government in London and their followers have no alternative; they must, whether they like it or not, yield to that decision even though they may feel that such an agreement places them in the hands of Russia.

Let us remember the fate of heroic Poland, set forth as the first motive of our participation in the war.

After having so gallantly withstood nazi opposition, Poland was entitled to the admiration and protection of all civilized nations; and particularly as regards the three great powers, she had secured the right to a restoration of the boundaries she had before 1939.

Since the opening of this debate, Mr. Speaker, some hon. members have contended that if we participate in the San Francisco conference we will be required to participate in any future war. I do not see how, by taking part in a conference the object of which is to discuss the setting up of an international organization for the maintenance of world peace and security, we would commit ourselves to a greater extent than if we had remained at home. On the contrary, the aim of the San Francisco conference is primarily to discuss means to prevent future conflicts.

Further, it must be remembered that the decisions taken at San Francisco, which will be accepted by our representatives, must be ratified by parliament before becoming binding upon Canada. For my part, if I feel that those decisions are opposed to the interests of Canada, which I want free and independent, I shall vote against them.

Mr. Speaker, I was elected to oppose the war policy of the present government. I was and I still am opposed to the participation of our country in that disastrous conflict. I already went on record as against conscription and billion-dollar gifts to foreign countries, and I also voted against all those measures.

It is suggested today that we should participate in the establishment of an international organization for the maintenance of peace and security. I agree with that principle and I believe that our government should send delegates to that conference.

I have no objection to Canada's participation in the conference as a free and independent nation, due regard being given to our interests. However, I wish to say, at this stage of the debate, that to my mind it is more important that our country should be represented at the San Francisco conference than that she should attend conferences of the British commonwealth, which unfortunately, smack of imperialism.

I consider that we should always have a free hand.

I wish to recall to Canada's delegates at the San Francisco conference, so that they may be guided by them, the following words of the late Governor General, Lord Tweedsmuir:

Canada is a sovereign nation and cannot take her attitude to the world docilely from Britain or from the United States or from anybody else. A Canadian's first loyalty is not to the British commonwealth of nations but to Canada and to Canada's king and those who deny this are doing, to my mind, a great disservice to the commonwealth.

Mr. Speaker, the words I have just quoted are now more important than ever, and we cannot repeat them too often.

In the past, we have resented, and rightly so, the fact that we have not been invited to conferences held by the great powers, and at which decisions of deep concern to our country were taken. This time, we are invited to participate in the discussions, to state our views, to cooperate in the working out of the charter of an international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security. I do not see why we should withhold our cooperation.

I have not approved the war measures of the government, but I approve their peace measures, and this is one of them.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the Prime Minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should like to proceed immediately with my reply to hon. gentlemen, but since it is nearly eleven o'clock possibly I may have the privilege of calling it eleven o'clock.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

Wednesday, March 21, 1945

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. POULIOT*ALLEGED TAPPING OF TELEPHONE WIRES USED BY MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I regret profoundly to have to rise to a question of privilege to claim respect for the privileges which you have, sir, and which every private member of this house should have. I will admit that in time of war there may be certain curtailments of liberties and of freedom, but there are some rights that belong to members of parliament which must be jealously guarded by each one of us because they affect all of us. If you ask me, sir, what is the subject matter of my question of privilege, I will tell you that it is an abuse which some members have noticed for some time and many members from all parts of the house have mentioned to me, namely, the tapping of telephone wires and the recording by the Bell Telephone officials or by government officials of private conversations of members of parliament.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Was she a blonde?

Mr. POULIOT: Some members may joke about it, and I regret very deeply that some other members laugh at such silly remarks as that just made. It is a shame to them. It means that they know nothing of the rights of members of parliament; they know nothing of what we claim as our rights in a democratic country.

On Wednesday or Thursday, in the middle of last week, I telephoned to inquire about my son, who was not well, and I heard a noise that lasted two minutes over the telephone—I wonder if I will have to pay for it. On Sunday night last I telephoned from Riviere du Loup to Ottawa, to a friend of mine of the press gallery, and there was the same noise, but this time it was not for so long. This morning I had a lengthy conversation with an official of the Department of Labour who had come to my county and done such good work that I telephoned to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) to congratulate him on the efficiency of that official. Again I heard the same noise. That means that not only are our long distance calls tapped but also our local calls: I wonder if there is a member of parliament with a head on his shoulders who will tolerate that for a moment! It is an abuse and a crime and it is on behalf of my colleagues as well as myself, on behalf of all those who want the privileges of parliament to be respected that I denounce this practice.

Here is what I ask. I ask that the president and the general manager of the Bell Telephone company be called as witnesses before a committee of this house to give evidence under oath with respect to this matter. I want also to have the sworn evidence of the manager of the Bell Telephone company in this city of Ottawa, in Toronto, in Montreal, in Winnipeg, in Quebec City, in Halifax and in Saint John, and then we shall know who is responsible for this thing.

My last word is this. When there is a fight for democracy in the whole world, I do not see why such Himmler methods are practised in this country; and I hope that when the Prime Minister goes to San Francisco he will not go there as the leader of a government which might be a gestapo, and an ogpu combined.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I do not know whether I caught the significance of the last words of the hon. member, but if he was reflecting in any way on the government in the matter to which he has referred I would ask him to prefer some charge in the proper way and we shall see that it is investigated.

May I say that the fact that conversations may be heard over a telephone is nothing new. I remember many years ago having been appointed as a commissioner to look into the question of the conditions under which telephone operators worked, and I found, much to my surprise at the time, that the exchanges had what were known as "listening boards" for the express purpose of taking down conversations which were heard over the telephone. The matter was brought up in this House of Commons, and if I am not mistaken a measure was subsequently passed making it an offence to disclose any information which was obtained in that way. The reason given at the time was that the companies found it desirable to know whether telephones were being used for private purposes or for business purposes. It has been public knowledge ever since that there is the possibility of conversations over the phone being heard by others in some way. But to insinuate that a government is adopting methods of espionage in connection with the use of the telephone or the telegraph is going very far. May I tell the hon. member that I do not think there is the slightest justification for believing that any department of this government, or any government, would lend itself to that kind of thing.

Mr. POULIOT: If the right hon. gentleman will permit me, my information is that it is a war service rendered by the Bell Telephone company to the government.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): May I say that this is a matter which, of course, affects the membership of the house at large. I know nothing about the charges or allegations made by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) but it is shocking if that situation exists, and I suggest to the Prime Minister that if charges are made, perhaps the proper standing committee, that on privileges and elections, might be convened, assuming the situation is such as requires an investigation of this kind. We should not have the slightest breath of suspicion upon the government or upon parliament in respect of a matter which affects in such a vital way the members of the House of Commons. I think that is a fundamental right which we all have, and I would not like to think that it was being impaired in any way.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think something will have to be preferred in the nature of a charge with sufficient evidence to warrant investigation. The government cannot be investigating every allegation or rumour which is made. But no one is or could be more anxious than myself to prevent anything of the kind being even a matter of suspicion.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I suggest that the Prime Minister make inquiry at his early convenience in the ministry of war services to see if they maintain a service of listening in? I do not know anything about this charge—if it can be dignified by that term; I do not think it can—of the hon. member for Temiscouata. But I had reason to believe between 1940 and 1943, when I had the honour of leading the opposition, that something of that sort was going on, and I think I had the manager of the Bell Telephone Company in to see me. I know this, that all my telegrams were censored, that they were read, and I protested most vigorously against it. It was possible to have excerpts taken from my telegrams and letters. But no harm came of it and the matter was allowed to drop.

I think there may be some basis for the position taken by the hon. member for Temiscouata; and the only ministry I can think of which would know about this is the controlling censorship branch.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): No evidence has been placed before the house on this matter, and we have had the assurance of the Prime Minister with regard to it. I believe there is authority under the defence of Canada regulations to do this kind of thing and I have heard it said that it has been done. I think it would be in the interests of the government and of this house if some inquiry were made. The Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), who is in charge of the defence of Canada regulations, may know definitely whether anything of this sort is done; and perhaps he would be prepared to give the house an assurance after himself inquiring into the matter. It should be cleared up, because we hear these suggestions from time to time, and the power, I believe, does lie, under the defence of Canada regulations, with the ministry.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I know of no censorship of telephone conversations; but I will inquire from the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, who is in charge of the security services, as to whether or not there is any system of the kind in vogue.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Better inquire of your colleague the Minister of National War Services (Mr. LaFleche) too.

ROYAL AIR FORCE

LOSS OF AIRCRAFT EN ROUTE TO CANADA WITH AIR MINISTRY OFFICIALS

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Defence for Air): Mr. Speaker, I very much regret to inform the house that word has been received that an aircraft in which Commander Brabner and other senior Air Ministry officials were coming to Canada is reported as missing and must be presumed to have been lost. These officials were coming to Canada to attend the "Wings" parade at Uplands to-morrow.

The government of Canada extends its very deep sympathy to the families of those who are missing.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should just like to supplement the words of the Minister of National Defence for Air by repeating how profoundly our country as well as the United Kingdom will feel the loss of these public servants, some of them well known to us here, and all of whom have rendered such great service in a gallant way in the course of the war and whose lives were very precious to the state. The reference which my hon. friend has made is to officials coming from Britain to Canada to be present at the ceremony which is to take place to-morrow; the names of those who are lost will be announced later. I may say that included among the number are some who have played a very distinguished part in the great work of the air force in Britain and in connection with the commonwealth air training plan.

Mr. STIRLING: The Royal Air Force.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes; they are all of the Royal Air Force. I should like to have it known that this parliament and the people of this country will sympathize deeply with the relatives of those who have been so greatly bereaved, and with the British government and people in the tragic loss of these distinguished public servants.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): May I associate this party with the words spoken by the Prime Minister, and at the same time extend our sympathy as well and express the hope that better news may yet come with respect to all on board.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggarr): We should like to associate ourselves with the remarks which have been made. Knowing the distinguished careers of the gentlemen, the news that they may not arrive at the function to-morrow is indeed a great disappointment; but greater still is the sorrow that comes to their families, with whom we deeply sympathize.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): We desire to associate ourselves with the kind things that have been said. There is one remarkable fact that I have observed on many occasions in the course of this war. Men have gone through all the perils of tours for example, operational flights, successfully and without injury and have been released, and on the way home they have met disaster. It is something which it seems almost impossible to understand, but that is war. We deeply sympathize with those who are bereaved.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): May I add one word to what has already been said? It grieves us very much when great men are taken from us, especially when, as some of us recognize, there is in the character of these men the quality of humility, and that quality is also outstanding. I could not help thinking of an experience that has come to me personally in the loss of my own son, on the occasion of which Air Marshal Breadner and some of the highest officials, even in their busy lives and with their tremendous responsibilities, took enough time out to send a personal word expressing their regrets, signed by their own hands. It is something that brings home to our minds, I think, the difference between our way of life and that perhaps of people who live under some other form of government. I am sure we all regret the passing of these great men and sympathize with the families of the loved ones in the sorrow that has come to them.

PRISONERS OF WAR

STATEMENT WITH RESPECT TO SENDING OF PARCELS BY NEXT OF KIN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. R. LaFLECHE (Minister of National War Services): In a statement on Monday, relating to conditions among Canadian prisoners of war in Germany, the Prime Minister referred to information recently received by the Department of External Affairs which indicated that as a result of conditions in Germany brought about by the Allied offensive, there was a definite prospect that it would be impossible to deliver parcels individually addressed to prisoners of war and that a further statement would be made by myself.

On February 15 I issued a press release explaining that, owing to the evacuation of Canadian prisoners of war in certain camps to other parts of Germany following the advance of the allied armies, it had been decided that personal parcels should not be sent by their next of kin in Canada until definite information had been received as to the camps to which they had been transferred.

All information received from the protecting power, the international Red Cross, the British and other governments has been studied by officers of my department and of other departments, including the Department of External Affairs and the Departments of National Defence, who are concerned with the welfare of Canadian prisoners of war. The present situation resulting from the recent allied drive has been carefully reviewed, and it is the unanimous opinion of these departments that having in mind the present situation in Germany, we should concentrate our efforts in getting Red Cross parcels and medical parcels to our prisoners. It is very doubtful whether individual parcels will even reach Germany, but if they do there is a danger that they may displace food and medical parcels, and also that they may fall into enemy hands. Further there is a most important fact which either is not generally known or at least seems to be overlooked, that the distribution of personally addressed parcels is made through the German postal service, which, according to reports, has been disorganized, and therefore parcel post service in Germany is virtually non-existent. It seems highly improbable that any personal or permit parcels would be delivered to the addressees. Consequently it is the recommendation of these departments that for the present no further parcels addressed to individual prisoners of war in Germany should be accepted for dispatch. Notification to this effect will be sent individually by my department to next of kin in Canada, who I have every confidence will fully understand the reason for this decision.

We shall continue to watch the situation closely and should there be any developments favourable to the sending of personally addressed parcels, the suspension will be lifted and next of kin promptly informed. My hope is that the successes of the allied forces which we are following so eagerly will result in speedy liberation of all prisoners of war and thereby solve a problem that has given us such grave concern.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): May I ask whether Red Cross parcels are getting through to prisoners?

Mr. LaFLECHE: They are, through special efforts that are being made in that direction. I would recall to my hon. friend an article that appeared in the press this morning explaining how that is being done by truck from Switzerland. The trucks are painted white so that our aviators and, we hope, the enemy, will allow them to go through.

Mr. McGEER: Is it not a fact that parcels are going through from Sweden and that the Germans are cooperating in effecting delivery of those parcels to the prisoners in prisoners of war camps? I understand that the cooperation has reached the point where prisoners of war are manning the trucks and handling the parcels. If that is so, it seems to me that those interested in prisoners of war should know it.

Mr. LaFLECHE: We do know it. What the hon. member has said is the fact, but the statement I gave a moment ago deals not with Red Cross parcels but with personally addressed parcels for our prisoners of war in Germany. I explained in that statement that the delivery of these parcels is made by the German postal service, which is disorganized.

Mr. McGEER: But is there any reason for believing that the cooperation that the Germans are now extending with respect to Red Cross parcels would not be extended if there were parcels from next of kin available for distribution on the same basis?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I am glad to say that the possibility is being explored, but these conditions are changing very rapidly.

[Mr. LaFleche.]

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

HOSPITAL SHIP "LETITIA"

Mr. AYLESWORTH:

1. Were tenders asked for by the Department of Munitions and Supply for hospital equipment for the new hospital ship, formerly the Letitia?
2. If so, who were the tenderers and what were the tenders quoted?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. No. Early in 1944 Wartime Shipbuilding Limited was instructed to supervise the conversion of an armed merchantman (the Letitia) to a hospital ship, the work of conversion to be done with the utmost urgency and completed at the earliest possible date.

Sources of supply for the necessary equipment were immediately investigated and, in such cases as would not cause delay, competitive prices were sought and received, but formal tenders were not called. A large part of the equipment, such as hospital beds, metal furniture and galley stores could not be procured in Canada but was available if immediately ordered in the United States. Through the cooperation of the United States navy and the United States maritime commission valuable assistance was given in the procurement of these and other technical stores, which greatly speeded the work of conversion.

Considerable of the equipment used on the Letitia is the same type as that bought by the Department of Munitions and Supply as the result of tender for the first hospital ship, Lady Nelson, and at no increase in price.

2. Answered by No. 1.

MEAT PACKING PLANTS AND ABATTOIRS—RELEASE OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

How many men have been released by meat packing plants or abattoirs throughout Canada since December 1, 1944, by provinces and by months?

Mr. MARTIN:

Non-Military Separations from the Meat Products Industry
Source: UIC 751-B—"Statistical Report on Employment Operations by Industry"

During four-week period ended Dec. 28/44:

	Male	Female	Total
Canada .....	1,097	441	1,538
Maritimes .....	37	5	42
Quebec .....	386	50	436
Ontario .....	178	98	276
Prairies .....	457	275	732
Pacific .....	39	13	52

During five-week period ended Feb. 1/45:

	Male	Female	Total
Canada .....	1,482	769	2,251
Maritimes .....	66	17	83
Quebec .....	210	94	304
Ontario .....	303	137	440
Prairies .....	838	494	1,332
Pacific .....	65	27	92

During four-week period ended March 1/45:

	Male	Female	Total
Canada .....	2,131	775	2,906
Maritimes .....	22	13	35
Quebec .....	236	73	309
Ontario .....	314	160	474
Prairies .....	1,484	513	1,997
Pacific .....	75	16	91

HUDSON'S BAY COMPANY—TAXES

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. How many stores and trading posts does the Hudson's Bay Company have in the western provinces and British Columbia?
2. Is the Hudson's Bay Company exempt from paying income tax and all other special war taxes?
3. Is the company exempt from paying import duties and sales tax?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1. No information.
2. No.
3. No.

SUGAR CONTROL

Mr. BLACKMORE:

1. Who is the sugar administrator for Canada?
2. Who is the deputy sugar administrator for Canada?
3. Was either of the above directly or indirectly connected with the cane sugar industry?
4. Is either of the above still connected with the cane sugar industry?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Mr. S. R. Noble, O.B.E.
  2. Mr. H. J. Hobbins.
- 3 and 4. Mr. Noble was not and is not directly or indirectly connected with the cane sugar industry. Mr. Hobbins is on loan to the wartime prices and trade board, on a full-time basis, from the Czarnikow (Canada) Limited, sugar and produce brokers.

DEFENCE INDUSTRIES LIMITED—PARRY SOUND PLANT

Mr. NOSEWORTHY:

1. Are there optional purchase or other clauses contained in the government agreement with Defence Industries Limited covering the disposition of the plant operated by that company at Parry Sound, Ontario?
2. If so, what are the terms of such clauses?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. Yes.
2. The terms of disposal are as follows: If the government wishes to sell the plant it shall give Defence Industries Limited the right within 60 days to purchase the plant or any part thereof at a price the government is willing to accept from any other party. If the offer is not accepted, the government may sell same to any other party at a price not less than that at which it was offered to Defence Industries Limited.

COARSE GRAINS AND LOW GRADE WHEAT—FREIGHT RATES

Mr. PERLEY:

1. What were the freight rates on coarse grains and low-grade wheat on July 31, 1930, from Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan, to the Pacific coast?
2. Have any reductions or increases been made in such rates?
3. If so, on what dates and to what amount?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. On all grain, the carload rates on July 31, 1930, from Moose Jaw, Sask., to Vancouver, B.C., were: When for export to British and foreign countries, 25 cents per 100 pounds; when for domestic consumption, 50½ cents per 100 pounds.
2. Effective March 10, 1933, on coarse grains and low grade wheat there was published from Moose Jaw to Vancouver carload rate of 39 cents per 100 pounds.

The tariff stipulates that the rates named therein will only apply when a certificate, signed by the Deputy Minister of Agriculture, province of British Columbia, is surrendered by consignee showing that the grain covered by such certificate is to be used for feeding live stock or poultry, and there is also required the surrender of an inspection certificate of the board of grain commissioners for Canada, certifying that shipment consists of grain of a grade specified in the tariff.

On other grain, rates shown in answer to No. 1 above are still in force.

3. Answered by Nos. 1 and 2.

R.C.A.F.—DOG CREEK, B.C., AIRFIELD

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. Is there a R.C.A.F. airfield at Dog Lake near Williams Lake, British Columbia?
2. If so, when was this airfield constructed?
3. From whom was the property purchased?
4. What amount of land was purchased by the government for this airfield?
5. What was the purchase price of this property?
6. Was this property part of a larger parcel of land?
7. What was the assessed value for taxation purposes of the whole property?

Questions

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. Yes, at Dog creek, not Dog lake, near Williams lake, British Columbia.
2. Work commenced in September, 1942, and completed in November, 1943.
3. Expropriated from Diamond "S" Ranch Ltd. (David Spencer Limited), by the filing of plan on April 26, 1944.
4. Area expropriated—911.42 acres.
5. The former owners' price for the expropriated land was considered too high and the case is being referred to the Exchequer Court of Canada for determination of the compensation payable.
6. Yes, part of the property of Diamond "S" Ranch Limited.
7. The assessed value of the expropriated land in 1943 was $3,641.49.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Is the industrial development bank yet in operation?
2. If so, how many loans have been made?
3. What is the total amount of the loans to date?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Yes.
- 2 and 3. The Industrial Development bank is not a branch of the dominion government but a subsidiary of the Bank of Canada.

Section 29(1) of the Industrial Development Bank Act requires that "The bank shall, within twenty-one days following the end of each calendar month, make up and transmit to the Minister of Finance in such form as he may prescribe, a statement of its assets and liabilities at the close of business on the last day of the preceding month." This statement as at February 28, 1945, appeared in the Canada Gazette of March 24, 1945, and showed loans and investments (excluding dominion government securities) at $79,229.77.

In addition, section 29(2) provides that "The bank shall make up and transmit to the Minister of Finance at least once in its fiscal year or more frequently if so directed by the minister, in such form as he may prescribe, a classification of its loans and investments and of the loans guaranteed by it." Provision is made for the publication of this statement in the Canada Gazette following its receipt by the minister.

CANADIAN ARMY—VOCATIONAL TRAINING

Mr. MUTCH:

1. Has the Department of National Defence instituted methods of job training into static establishments of the Canadian army in Canada and the United Kingdom?
2. If so, when did this begin?

[Mr. MacInnis.]

3. What is the practical purpose of such training?

4. By what percentage is it expected that personnel in such static units may be reduced in numbers?

5. Have such establishments been reduced in personnel since the courses began?

6. If so, by how many?

Mr. ABBOTT:

1. Yes.

2. NDHQ—July, 1944.

CMHQ and Districts—November, 1944.

3. The job training programme is set up in three parts, namely, job instruction training, job methods training and job relations training. The purpose of this training is as follows:

Job instruction training teaches improved analysis of section duties and the preparation of job breakdowns. This provides a better method of training individuals to do their specific jobs; quickly, correctly and conscientiously.

Job methods training teaches a planned critical analysis of all jobs and is designed to eliminate unnecessary detail and, in general, streamline work of static formations. It is the purpose of this course to teach personnel to make the best possible use of man-power, materials and equipment.

Job relations training teaches supervisory personnel how to achieve better cooperation with personnel under supervision. It is actually a course in man-management.

4. It is not possible to estimate an expected percentage of personnel reduction as a result of this type of training. See also answer to question No. 6.

5. Yes.

6. According to the reports received, 24 personnel in the United Kingdom and 112 in Canada have been released to date. This represents a financial saving of approximately $272,000 per annum. These reports do not cover seven military districts where the job training programme has yet to be introduced.

QUEBEC ARSENALS

Mr. LaCROIX:

How many men and women were working at the Palace Hill, St. Malo and Valcartier arsenals, in the district of Quebec, (a) on January 1, 1944; (b) on March 15, 1945?

Mr CHEVRIER:

(a)	Male	Female	Total
January 1, 1944:
St. Malo .....	3,183	3,943	7,126
Valcartier .....	944	1,926	2,870
Palace Hill .....	426	125	551
Total .....			10,547

(b)	Male	Female	Total
March 17, 1945:
St. Malo .....	2,875	1,962	4,837
Valcartier .....	792	956	1,748
Palace Hill .....	285	53	338
Total .....			6,923

QUEBEC CONFERENCE, 1944

Mr. RAYMOND:

1. Was the Churchill-Roosevelt conference held at Quebec in the month of September, 1944, convened at the invitation of the Canadian government?

2. What was the total cost of such conference to the Canadian government?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. The location of Quebec made it particularly well suited as a place for the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, together with their staffs of military and civil advisers, to hold their important conferences concerning the supreme direction of the war. At the time of the first Quebec conference in 1943 the facilities that were available proved to be very satisfactory and contributed in considerable measure to the success of the conference. Accordingly, when the Canadian government received an intimation that developments in the war made a further conference necessary at the end of last summer and that Quebec was the most convenient site, the government invited the president and the prime minister to hold their meeting there. His Excellency the Governor General was graciously pleased to place his quarters in the citadel at the disposal of President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill.

2. $214,240.68.

OTTAWA CAR AND AIRCRAFT—LAY-OFFS

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. How many employees were laid off by Ottawa Car and Aircraft Limited, during each of the following months: December, 1944; January, 1945; February, 1945?

2. How many employees have been laid off thus far in the month of March, 1945?

3. Are further lay-offs pending?

4. How many veterans of the present war are among those laid off in each of the periods indicated above?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. December 1944, none; January 1945, none; February 1945, 11 males, 2 females.

2. 246 males; 77 females. In period December 1, 1944, to March 23, 1945, 100 males and females dismissed for cause. In period December 1, 1944, to March 23, 1945, 260 males and females left voluntarily.

3. No information.

4. Six.

FORT NORMAN OIL WELLS

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

Is the army of the United States of America discontinuing the following activities now being carried on by it in Yukon and Northwest Territories through the agency of Standard Oil Company:

1. The extraction of oil from wells at Fort Norman in the Northwest Territories?

2. The piping of oil from said wells to a refinery at Whitehorse, Yukon?

3. The operation of said oil refinery?

4. The piping of gasoline from said refinery to Fairbanks, Alaska, and to Watson Lake, Yukon?

5. If so discontinued, will the government of Canada undertake to continue the production of oil and oil products for the use and benefit of industries and residents of northern Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: 1, 2, 3 and 4. According to information received from the United States government the answer to these questions is in the affirmative.

5. There are many factors involved in any such decision and these are at present under examination. Any decision with regard to the future use of wartime installations will, of course, not necessarily affect the continuation of commercial oil operations centered at Fort Norman.

ALASKA HIGHWAY

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

Is it the intention of the government of Canada to maintain and keep open for traffic and public use the highway known as the Alaska highway, within Yukon territory, after said highway is surrendered to Canada by the United States of America?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is a matter to which careful consideration will continue to be given by the government. No definite information can be given at present.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

1. Are buildings erected at Whitehorse, Yukon, and along the route of the Alaska highway in Yukon, by or on behalf of the army of the United States for occupancy by personnel of said army and the staff and crews of contractors on said highway to be surrendered to the government of Canada?

2. If so, will said buildings be available for purchase by the public and what will be the method of sale and transfer?

3. Will an official or officials of the government be located at Whitehorse in Yukon with authority to dispose of such buildings in Yukon?

Questions

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. Such buildings will be acquired by the Canadian government from the United States government on the basis provided in the exchange of notes of November 22 and December 20, 1944, which has been tabled to-day.

2. Those buildings not required by the Canadian government will be offered for sale, in the same manner as Canadian surplus assets, through the machinery established by the government for disposal of war surplus.

3. Local representation will be provided should that prove necessary or useful for the purpose.

GENERAL MCNAUGHTON

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

1. On what date was General Andrew McNaughton relieved of his command of Canadian army?

2. Has General Andrew McNaughton been retired from the Canadian army?

3. If so, at what date did retirement become effective?

Mr. ABBOTT:

1. 26th December, 1943.

2. Yes.

3. 1st November, 1944.

AVAILABILITY OF TRACTORS FOR RETURNED SOLDIERS ENGAGED IN FARMING

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans' Affairs): The hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) asked a question yesterday with respect to the availability of tractors for soldier settlers. With his permission I should like to file the answer now. The question and the answer follow:

Mr. ROSS:

I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans' Affairs, Mr. Mackenzie, and I am sorry that I have not been able to send him notice of it.

It has to do with a return received yesterday which indicates that the V.L.A. board have frozen tractors and a lot of farm machinery for future delivery. A number of our young men who own their own land have not the equipment to work it with and it is late in the season. I ask that equipment be released to men who, having been overseas and discharged, are in a position to pay cash for tractors in order to put their crops in.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Regarding the tractors which have been purchased to meet the minimum requirement of veterans who will become established under The Veterans' Land Act during 1945, I wish to say that steps have already been taken to release all of the tractors which it is felt will not be needed to meet the actual needs of veterans coming under the act. During this month the following quantities have been released back to the suppliers:

[Mr. G. Black.]

Alberta . . . . .	82	Manitoba . .	29
Saskatchewan . .	110	Maritimes . .	19

There are no tractors on order for British Columbia, only 100 available for Ontario and 25 for the province of Quebec. It is felt, therefore, that it would not be in the interests of those veterans who will come under the act to release a further quantity. These quantities were released to implement companies in accordance with the arrangement which was made at the time orders were placed for these tractors and the administrator for farm equipment has issued a request to implement manufacturers to reserve such released tractors for the use of veterans who are operating their own farms without government assistance. He has also instructed his rationing officers to see that his request is carried out by implement companies. We feel confident, therefore, that the tractors we have released will find their way into the hands of deserving veterans who are operating their own farms.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

GENERAL MCNAUGHTON

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

1. Has General Andrew McNaughton at any time been granted any pension from the federal treasury of Canada?

2. If so, what amount annually and when was it paid?

3. At what date and on what basis was said pension granted?

DEFENCE SERVICES—ORDNANCE STORES

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. At what places in Canada are the major ordnance stores kept for each of the three defence services?

2. What has been the cost of the, (a) storage buildings; (b) facilities, at each such place?

3. At what places have premises been under lease; stating the owners, the cost of renovations, cost of improvements and equipment, the yearly rental paid, additional charges or costs?

4. What was the maximum value of stores at each such place in 1944?

5. What has been the total cost of all supplies placed in such ordnance storage?

6. What is the cost at each place of supplies reported, (a) surplus; (b) obsolete; (c) total for all places?

MARITIME PROVINCES AIRFIELDS

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. What has been the total expenditure on each of the airfields in the maritime provinces to date?

2. How many of such airfields have been completed stating estimate cost to complete the others?

3. How many private or municipal airfields in the maritime provinces have received government assistance stating amount of such expenditures for each airfield?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

AMSTERDAM, SASK., POST OFFICE

Mr. NICHOLSON:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and other documents in the possession of the Post Office Department in connection with complaints regarding the post office administration at Amsterdam, Saskatchewan, since June, 1940.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESS REPORT OF VISIT TO WASHINGTON OF CANADIAN MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I call the attention of the government to an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail of this morning under a Washington dateline to the effect that two hon. members of this house conferred with the acting Prime Minister of Australia and the foreign minister and also with United States officials. The article goes on to say that they appeared before a closed meeting of the United States senate foreign relations committee with the acting Prime Minister of Australia and foreign affairs minister. Did these two private members of parliament have the authority of the government or the Canadian Ambassador at Washington, and as to Australia, of the Canadian Ambassador for Australia, or did they go over the head of this government? The article also refers to the Empire Parliamentary Association. The two Canadian members are gentlemen who are old friends of mine. I have great respect for the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) and the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman), yet they only acted as private members of the association. The Empire Parliamentary Association met in annual meeting yesterday. They did not authorize any such trip. They knew nothing about it, and no such office as "executive secretary" exists. The president is the Speaker and the secretary is the Clerk of the House of Commons. I think on an occasion like this it might do a great deal of harm to have a story such as that contained in this article go out, as it leaves the wrong impression at a time like this and will do harm.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member for Broadview is perfectly right. I should like to have the credentials of the two hon. members read.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I might say that I know nothing about this matter other than what is contained in the article to which my hon. friend has referred, and from what he has just said. I gather the visit to Washington of the two hon. members to whom he has made reference is a purely unofficial one and has to do with matters pertaining to affairs of the inter-parliamentary union. It is in no way an official visit.

Mr. CHURCH: The Empire Parliamentary Association, as I see it, is for the British empire only; it is not a pan-American affair, and they had no authority to represent the association there at any time.

INCOME TAX

QUESTION AS TO POSTPONEMENT UNTIL AUGUST
31 OF FILING OF 1944 RETURN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance or the acting Minister of National Revenue. Will the 1944 personal income tax return have to be filed on or before April 30, or will the date be extended to August 31? I ask this question because chartered accountants would like to get the answer as soon as possible.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Acting Minister of National Revenue): The matter is under consideration.

INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION

DUMBARTON OAKS AND BRETTON WOODS—INQUIRY
AS TO PART PLAYED BY LEO PASVOLSKY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I should like to direct three questions to the Prime Minister, which, because I was unable to get them to him before the house assembled, I would not expect him to answer to-day. As soon as the Prime Minister finds it possible to do so, will he inform the house as to the part played in the Dumbarton Oaks and Bretton Woods conferences by a certain foreign-born, Leo Pasvolksy, prominent in financial circles in the United States? Will the Prime Minister tell the house who were the men who drafted the final act of the united nations monetary and financial conference held at Bretton Woods, and will he also tell the house who drafted what is known as the Dumbarton Oaks proposals for the establishment of a general international organization? Was it, by any chance, Mr. Leo Pasvolksy? Will the Prime Minister tell the house whether or not he has heard a report that this same Leo

Privilege — Mr. Diefenbaker

Pasvolsky is to accompany the United States delegation to San Francisco in the capacity of intimate adviser?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I might as well answer my hon. friend at once. I am not in a position to give him any information on any of the questions he has asked, nor do I expect that any amount of inquiry would enable me to give him a reply.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It would be of the first importance to the people of this country to know the answers to these questions.

POWELL RIVER WHARF

FACILITIES FOR LOCAL SHIPPING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works on behalf of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair): When the government sold the wharf at Powell river they undertook to provide suitable facilities for local shipping. My information is that several of the fishing boats have been sunk because of the lack of proper facilities. Will proper facilities be provided immediately, or when will they be provided?

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): I have just received notice of this question. If the hon. member will put it on the order paper I shall give him the answer.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: This is urgent. Hospital boats are being tied up to-day because of the lack of facilities. The notice went in two and a half hours ago. With all due deference, when boats are being sunk and a hospital boat is tied up, I think the matter is urgent.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

RECOMMENDATIONS OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION WITH RESPECT TO CLASSIFICATIONS, ETC.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): On March 22 the civil service commission made a report to parliament regarding the protective service and other members of the House of Commons staff, which will be found in Votes and Proceedings No. 4. When that report was brought down I asked Your Honour what was the next step to be taken in connection with it, and I think Your Honour indicated at the time that it would be a matter for parliament. I take it that the action must be initiated by the government. May I ask the Prime Minister, or the Minister of Finance, under whose jurisdiction this may come, as to what the government intends to do with respect to it this session?

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I do not know whether it is under my jurisdiction or not, but if it is a matter for the consideration of the government I think I can say that the government will give it that consideration very promptly.

Mr. SPEAKER: In connection with the question asked by the leader of the opposition, I may say that a memorandum with respect to the matter has been prepared by the Clerk for submission to the government.

PRIVILEGE—MR. DIEFENBAKER

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT OF MR. WOOD, IN DEBATE ON MARCH 23

Mr. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I rise to a question of privilege arising out of a statement made by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Wood) as reported at page 177 of Hansard, in which he uses the following words:

So far as compulsory service is concerned the hon. member for Lake Centre to-day said that if Canada is to be a force behind the security council it is necessary that she should have compulsion for the purpose.

Then he goes on:

Would the hon. member for Lake Centre say that Australia should have conscription before she should be on the security council? Would he say that General Smuts of South Africa should institute compulsory service before being able to make a contribution to society?

May I say that I never made any such statement as that alleged by the hon. member for Brant. I at no time advocated that the forces to be contributed by Canada should be compulsorily raised in Canada.

Mr. WOOD: On a question of privilege, I am glad to hear the hon. member for Lake Centre say that he did not make any such statement.

SAN FRANCISCO CONFERENCE

PROPOSED GENERAL INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION FOR MAINTENANCE OF PEACE AND SECURITY

The house resumed, from March 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King to approve a resolution to send representatives to a conference of the united nations at San Francisco to prepare a charter for the maintenance of international peace and security.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when on the nineteenth of this month I introduced in this house the resolution which is now before hon. members, I believed that the object of the resolution was so completely in the interests of Canada, that the importance of the conference to be held at San Francisco was so self-evident and that the purposes to be attained through such a conference were so all-important that the resolution would receive the unanimous approval of this House of Commons and like approval in the other house.

Having followed the debate closely it is a great satisfaction to realize that in all probability when the vote is taken this afternoon the resolution will receive the support of all hon. members. I believe all the parties that have responsible leaders already have intimated their intention of supporting the resolution. But there are four or five—I am not sure of the number; we will know later on—who term themselves independent members of parliament from the province of Quebec, who have stated that they intend to vote against the resolution. I should like my first word to be an appeal to them in the interests of Canada as a whole to reconsider their intention to take any such step at this time. It is not too late for Canada to speak with a single voice on the desirability of bringing into being an organization that will help maintain the peace of the world. I should like, as I am sure all hon. members of this house would like—as I am sure even those hon. gentlemen themselves in time will come to wish—the world to know that when we were on the threshold of making a contribution toward that great end, Canada spoke with one voice. I speak directly to the hon. gentlemen who have indicated that they intend to vote against this motion. I want to make clear to them that in voting against the resolution they will not be representing the feeling of Canada. I want to make it equally clear that they will not be representing the feeling of the people of the province of Quebec. I would go further and say that they will not be honestly representing the feeling of the people of the constituencies which they represent in this parliament if they vote against this resolution.

Mr. ROY: That may be your opinion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am stating my view, and I believe history will prove that I am in the right. If my hon. friend continues to have any doubt may I at once, for his edification as well as that of his constituents and indeed that of the people of Canada at large, read once more the resolution which is before the house so that everyone in this country may understand what it is that he and those who may vote with him against this resolution are really doing at this time. The first clause of the resolution reads:

That this house endorses the acceptance by the government of Canada of the invitation to send representatives to the conference.

They would refuse even to send representatives from this parliament to this conference at San Francisco, to be attended by the representatives of some forty-four nations which are united together in the cause of freedom, and which now wish to take the step of trying to bring themselves closer together in a great world organization which will help to maintain peace once this terrible war has come to a close. The second clause is:

That this house recognizes that the establishment of an effective international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security is of vital importance to Canada, and, indeed, to the future well-being of mankind; and that it is in the interests of Canada that Canada should become a member of such an organization.

I ask those hon. gentlemen, in the light of what they themselves know and have witnessed during the past five and a half years of war, how can they vote against a resolution which says that it is in the interests of Canada to have an organization which will prevent anything of the kind arising in the future? The third clause of the resolution reads:

That this house approves the purposes and principles set forth in the proposals of the four governments, and considers that these proposals constitute a satisfactory general basis for a discussion of the charter of the proposed international organization.

What are the purposes and principles which they are asked to endorse? Here is what they will be voting against when they vote against this resolution. They are:

The purposes of the organization should be:

1. To maintain international peace and security; and to that end to take effective collective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to the peace and the suppression of all acts of aggression or other breaches of the peace, and to bring about by peaceful means adjustment or settlement of international disputes which may lead to a breach of the peace;
2. To develop friendly relations among nations and to take other appropriate measures to strengthen universal peace;
3. To achieve international cooperation in the solution of international economic, social and other humanitarian problems; and
4. To afford a centre for harmonizing the actions of nations in the achievements of these common ends.

These are the purposes this house is being asked to endorse, and apparently those hon. gentlemen are unwilling to take that step. The principles against which they will be voting, because they are part of the resolution, are as follows:

In pursuit of the purposes mentioned in chapter I the organization and its members should act in accordance with the following principles:

1. The organization is based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all peace-loving states.

San Francisco Conference

2. All members of the organization undertake, in order to ensure to all of them the rights and benefits resulting from membership in the organization, to fulfil the obligations assumed by them in accordance with the charter.

3. All members of the organization shall settle their disputes by peaceful means in such a manner that international peace and security are not endangered.

4. All members of the organization shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force in any manner inconsistent with the purposes of the organization.

5. All members of the organization shall give every assistance to the organization in any action undertaken by it in accordance with the provisions of the charter.

6. All members of the organization shall refrain from giving assistance to any state against which preventive or enforcement action is being undertaken by the organization. The organization should ensure that states not members of the organization act in accordance with these principles so far as may be necessary for the maintenance of international peace and security.

In other words hon. members of this house are being asked to approve the sending of a delegation to San Francisco to help frame a charter, and to see that as far as may be humanly possible nothing is inserted in that charter which will do other than serve the great objects for which it is being brought into being, the purpose, as I have said, being to further world peace by pacific means. I have read all the purposes and all the principles, and I fail to see how any citizen of any country, loving his country and thinking of its future, could wish to do other than endorse those principles and purposes with his whole heart.

The fourth paragraph of the resolution reads:

That this house agrees that the representatives of Canada at the conference should use their best endeavours to further the preparation of an acceptable charter for an international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security.

And lastly:

That the charter establishing the international organization should, before ratification, be submitted to parliament for approval.

Again I make my appeal to those hon. members to consider their position as citizens of Canada, and particularly as members of the parliament of Canada, because their vote will be viewed significantly by nations beyond the confines of this country. Every hon. member who comes into this parliament has an obligation to his country in relation to its domestic affairs; but at a time like the present he has an even greater obligation in regard to its position in the world as we know it to-day, and as we know it may become in the future, unless we do all in our power to preserve peace on this globe for the centuries to come.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

So I appeal to my hon. friends to meet their obligations to Canada as a whole, as her position will be viewed by nations abroad when they read the results of the vote which will be taken this afternoon. I would like to see that vote one hundred per cent of the House of Commons and of the Senate of Canada. I would suggest to hon. members, if they are still unconvinced, that perhaps they might absent themselves when the vote is being taken, rather than have it broadcast throughout the world that in Canada there were members of her parliament who felt they were unable to further a great world need such as in this resolution it is sought to meet.

I now come to the answering of questions which have been asked. I promised at the outset that I would seek to answer questions which were asked by hon. members in the course of the debate, and that I would do so when I made my reply. I have followed the debate very closely, and, if I have not noted all the questions, certainly I have noted the most essential of them. There has been a great deal of repetition, and therefore I shall not seek to do more than to reply to the really essential points under discussion. It is a sort of longer catechism on world organization. I am afraid my reply will have largely to take the form of reading questions asked, and then endeavouring to answer them.

But first of all may I say a word about the preliminary skirmish which took place between my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) and the leader of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell), as to who was the better prepared to participate in the debate. Since there was a sort of veiled insinuation made by someone that there was a certain close relationship between the leader of the C.C.F. and myself in regard to the speech I had made and the one he had made, let me make it perfectly clear that nothing of the kind has existed, either in connection with this debate or, so far as I know, in connection with any speech made either by him or me at any time. I treated both hon. members in the same way, and sought to give each of them an opportunity to be prepared when the moment to speak arrived.

May I say that the question of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals has been before the country and before hon. members of parliament ever since October 9, 1944, when I released to the press a short statement in regard to the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, and suggested in the statement that not merely members of parliament but citizens of Canada generally should study those proposals. Surely it cannot be said that there has not been sufficient time for hon. members to study them.

I have in my hand the text of the press release I made on October 9, regarding the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. I find the following:

The statement issued to-day deals with matters which deeply affect the future of every Canadian. I commend it to the careful and earnest study of the people of Canada. The issues raised will, I hope, not become a matter of party controversy, since they far transcend party lines.

I outlined how far agreement had been reached at Dumbarton Oaks, and made reference to the fact that some of the matters were being held over for further consideration.

In conclusion I had these words to say:

It is scarcely necessary for me to say that, before any final commitment is entered into with respect to the participation of Canada in a general international organization, there will be the fullest opportunity for discussion in the parliament of Canada.

That was on October 9. At that time I was advising not merely members of parliament, but the people of Canada generally, that these were important proposals, deserving to be considered and studied most carefully—which they have been. The press of the country has been full of opinions expressed in reference to these proposals.

But, coming to the particular meeting of parliament, I made it known as early as I could that this matter would be taken up at the session in which we are now engaged, and that it was one of the two important subjects which would demand the attention of parliament at this time. That announcement was made in no limited way. It was given over the national network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on March 2. In the course of my remarks I said this:

Since the Crimea conference, an additional reason has arisen for a brief session of the present parliament . . .

The purpose of the forthcoming conference at San Francisco is the creation of a general international organization to maintain peace and security in the post-war world. I have already mentioned the necessity of Canada being represented at the conference. It is vital that Canada should be able to speak with a clear, strong and united voice in world affairs. It is therefore desirable that the Canadian delegation should go to San Francisco with an assurance of the widest possible measure of support from parliament. An expression of such support will be sought at the forthcoming session.

That was on March 2; and it was March 19 when we met here. Meantime I had a brief interview with my hon. friends the leader of the opposition and the leader of the C.C.F. I was sorry I could not reach my hon. friend the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Blackmore) as he was not in the city at the time. But on the Friday prior to our meeting on the Monday I asked the two leaders I have mentioned to come to my office, that I might indicate to them the order of business the government proposed for Monday. I outlined then to those two gentlemen what we proposed doing. I went further, and read over to each of them the resolution I was proposing to introduce. They therefore had full knowledge of the resolution given to them, in order that they might be in a position to be prepared to speak and, if they so desired, to give in advance to members of their parties the substance of the resolution. I do not know that I could have done more than that—except to have given each of them a copy of my speech. However it was not written at the time—or had not been completed. It was in process of incubation, but was not finished. Perhaps I may say that, much as everyone seems to be making declarations on his own behalf. It was not finished until within an hour or so of my coming to the house.

What followed will speak for itself. The main thing at the moment is that hon. members have expressed themselves fully and freely with respect to the proposals, and that they should have made such comment and criticism as they thought best.

I have very little exception to take to most of the criticism and comment to which we have listened, except in one particular. I refer to a deliberate misrepresentation of what I said, and the endeavour—not by one, but by one after another of members of the official opposition—to have it appear that I had made certain proposals with which as they well know I myself had had nothing whatever to do. I shall refer to that a little later. I speak of it immediately because I feel it reveals a pretty poor order of debate on a great international matter such as the one being considered, one in respect to which I have from the outset expressed the hope that it would not be viewed as a matter of controversy between one party and another or as a matter between the government and its opponents, but that it would be viewed above party considerations, in a manner that would make its appeal to the nation as a whole as an expression of Canadian unity. But hon. gentlemen opposite have become so much accustomed to directing their attacks against myself and misrepresenting my position that they cannot refrain from so doing even in a debate on a great international question. It only indicates how biased they have become in their point of view toward anything the government may undertake.

San Francisco Conference

One other thing I might perhaps comment on a little is just why it should be necessary for hon. gentlemen opposite always—if not always, it is so nearly always that I fail to remember any occasion to the contrary—to seek to imply some ground for suspicion as to the truth of what one is saying. Just why every now and then at least, when a member of a government makes a statement which he says is true hon. gentlemen cannot accept the statement on his word and without searching for some ulterior partisan political motive in the making of it, I cannot understand.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): You said the first day that we could ask questions and then you stopped us.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Page the ex-Minister of National Defence.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps my restless friend will try to keep quiet. I know that it is very hard for him to do so.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Then do not make misstatements.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If hon. gentlemen opposite are determined to get into a rebellious mood, I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to protect me so that I may make my speech without interruption. I think I shall find it possible to look after myself as long as I can be heard, but I at least want you to see that this house has an opportunity of listening to what I have to say.

May I come to the first question that was asked, namely why no Canadian representative was at Dumbarton Oaks? That question was directed by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson). He said he felt very much put out that Canada had not been represented at Dumbarton Oaks. He regarded it as a reflection to some extent on Canada's war effort and all that Canada had done in the course of the last five and a half years.

I need scarcely say to hon. members of this house that Canada was not represented at Dumbarton Oaks for the same reason that some forty other united nations were not represented there. Someone had to make a beginning to bring into being this great world organization and the beginning was made by the great powers. I would ask hon. members, would it have been possible to have thought of any group of nations which could have been assigned the obligation of seeking to make the framework of a united nations world security organization that could have met with greater acceptance than that the great powers should have been chosen for that end. Unless the great powers are able to agree among themselves on basic principles and proposals I see no hope at all for any world organization. One matter that ought to bring the greatest possible satisfaction to all of the peoples of the world to-day is the fact that the four great allied powers have been able to sit down in conference and agree on proposals which are as comprehensive as those which are now before us and suggest that they should be used as a basis for discussion of a charter to maintain peace after the termination of the war.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

As hon. members know, it was at Moscow in November, 1943, that the United States, the United Kingdom and Russia met and that the United States and the United Kingdom subsequently met with China, to take the first steps in giving form to a world organization to preserve peace. They thought that a beginning could not be made too soon, and in the declaration of Moscow there was set forth the statement that immediate steps should be taken by them to see that a beginning was made. It was representative officials of those powers who met at Dumbarton Oaks.

I was asked if Canada had not been invited to Dumbarton Oaks; if we had not gone there because we were not invited. That is one reason why we did not go, and a very good reason. But I do not think it was any reflection on Canada because we were not invited, any more than it was a reflection on Belgium, or Holland, Brazil, Australia or any other country of the united nations. Too many cooks sometimes spoil the broth, and to have the representatives of the great powers meet in the first instance and see what they could do was I think the successful and wise way of proceeding. That is why the Dumbarton Oaks conference was limited as it was to the representatives of the great powers.

But even at Dumbarton Oaks they did not succeed in getting complete agreement. Some matters had to be left over for further consideration, and they were considered at Yalta. We were not invited to Yalta, nor was Australia, or New Zealand, or South Africa or any other of the united nations, except the great powers that were represented there.

At Yalta these great powers tried again to see if they could not find some basis on which they could agree which would be sufficient to enable a great conference to be held of all the powers for the purpose of bringing a world security charter into being. Happily they were able to reach such an agreement, and we have now presented to us what is an agreement between the great powers looking toward the establishment of this great organization for the preservation of world peace. I would say that nothing could be more fortunate than the fact that what would be the most difficult of all steps to obtain, namely, a measure of complete agreement between the great powers on the maintenance of peace in the post-war world, has already been attained. Surely after that has been attained, the lesser powers or the other countries, by whatever name you wish to call them, will be glad and ought to be ready to cooperate in every way with the great powers in bringing the charter into a form which will make it commendable, so far as any charter can be made commendable, to all.

The hon. member for York-Sunbury asked: Does not preservation of peace depend on the great powers, apart altogether from their representation on a security organization?

Of course it depends on the great powers. But that does not mean that the likelihood of the great powers being kept in agreement will not be very much increased by all of them becoming members of a great world organization and assuming definite obligations in that organization. That is what this particular treaty will help to do. It will pledge every member of the organization which will include all the great powers, to subscribe to all that is set out in the charter. This will mean that is set out by mere chance or without any set arrangement, these powers will meet and confer but that they will continuously be kept in touch with one another not merely in dealing with questions of peace and war once things have come to the danger point, but rather to deal continuously with the causes which create war, and to deal with them particularly before matters have reached an impasse in circumstances that might lead to war. So that this world organization, once brought into being, will contribute in a very large way to keeping perpetual agreement between the great powers and in helping to make their efforts to maintain peace most effective. Part of the work of the organization will be to see that all the nations will be dealing in a general assembly with questions of the possibility of war and with the conditions that create war. The procedure of the general assembly will correspond in many ways to that of this House of Commons. The council will resemble more or less the executive which has final control in certain matters. Every hon. member of a representative parliament knows that the actions of an executive are controlled by knowledge of the attitude which will be taken by members of the representative body. The opinions and decisions of the legislative assembly will be continually exerting themselves upon the great powers which will have permanent seats on the security council.

The next question asked was in regard to the meeting in London, why no minister has been sent there, what instructions have been given to Canada's representatives, and what collaboration there is to be later on with the United Kingdom and other members of the commonwealth at San Francisco.

I think it is obvious, at the moment at least, why a Canadian minister is not now in London. It is a little difficult for one who occupies the position of Minister of External Affairs and Prime Minister to be in two places at the same time, and in matters of this kind one has to decide where one's first duty lies. It has not been possible for me personally to go to London at this time; but may I say that, in the invitation extended by the British government, that government has shown itself much more understanding in the matter, and may I add, much more courteous than hon. gentlemen opposite who have insinuated that there was a special or sinister reason why Canada was not being represented by a minister in London at this time, that reason being they would have others believe—I may as well state it quite frankly—that the present Prime Minister is always seeking to pull away from closer contact with other parts of the British commonwealth. It is being sought to spread that kind of impression as widely as it can be everywhere; it is repeated ad nauseam by hon. gentlemen opposite. I would ask them to tell me one time in the whole of my life when I have not stood first and foremost with every member of the British commonwealth in furthering our common interest. They expect a man to take a great responsibility, to act as the head of the delegation to a great world conference of the kind we are considering, and before he starts off they do all in their power to render him ineffective in whatever he attempts to do. They are seeking to spread the impression that, if I lead the delegation from the parliament of Canada at San Francisco, in some way I shall be sulking in the corner all the time I am there, not wishing to have contacts with other members of the British commonwealth. And that, after the part I have played as leader of the government of this country during five and one-half years of war, to say nothing of the many other years I have sought to serve Canada and the commonwealth of nations of which Canada is one.

Hon. gentlemen opposite will find out when the opportunity comes—and I am thankful to say it will be given fairly soon—for them as well as the government to appear before the people of this country, whether or not the people of Canada feel that I have done my duty by the British commonwealth of nations, by the British empire, through every hour of the time I have been serving as Prime Minister of this country.

My hon. friend asked, have we given instructions to the delegates going over? Instructions? We have been discussing this question with members of the British government for over a year past. I personally sat at the council table at Downing street with the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and his colleagues and discussed these very matters which relate to world organization and the position which should be taken by representatives of different parts of the commonwealth when they came to consider proposals such as those subsequently drafted at Dumbarton Oaks. We have been exchanging communications back and forth during the last year, getting the opinions of the British government, getting the opinions of different parts of the commonwealth, and giving our opinions. So far as the present meeting in London is concerned it is, as I described it, a meeting for the purpose of exchanging opinions and of seeing whether, as a result of further consideration of the different points which have been raised, there are some matters which might be met in this way or that way—seeking in all that is done to serve the ends of useful conference. We shall be represented at the meeting at London by the Right Hon. Vincent Massey, High Commissioner for Canada, who is a member of the Canadian privy council and has seen all the communications which have passed between the British government and ourselves, and most, it not all, of those which have passed between other parts of the British commonwealth. We shall be represented also by Mr. Hume Wrong, associate under-secretary of state for external affairs, who, more than any other man in this country, has from the beginning of its consideration to this hour followed every move in connection with the formation of this world organization, so far as it has been humanly possible for anyone to do so. Mr. Wrong has been present at meetings of the cabinet when we have been discussing these matters. We have benefited by his expert opinions and suggestions, and he has full knowledge of our attitude. He does not need any special instructions to take to London at the present time. He knows our mind and will be able to represent it fully there. I may add that he will be able day by day to keep us informed by cable and in a similar way we can keep in touch with him as regards any question which may arise.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Why, then, should hon. gentlemen seek to create an impression that I am deliberately staying away from a meeting in London in which there is the fullest representation and the best representation on the official level that could be given to any meeting which could be held there?

Now as to collaboration with other parts of the commonwealth at San Francisco. Whoever accompanies or is part of the delegation will perhaps be a little surprised to discover how completely all these matters which are of common interest will be discussed between all those who represent different parts of the commonwealth. We have all sought from the beginning to approach these great world affairs with as much of one mind as it is possible for men with different environments to have. Why endeavour to create suspicion that we are seeking in some way to create divisions among ourselves, more particularly when we are dealing with foreign nations.

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition next asked me about representations made by Canada to other powers. So far as Canada's representations to other powers are concerned, we have communicated to all of the great powers the views which I expressed in my opening address. They have been communicated to all the governments of the British commonwealth; some other governments have obtained them through their ministers here. There has I think been the fullest disclosure of our point of view that could be desired.

As to proposed amendments by other countries, about which another question was asked, we have been informed of some views which are likely to be expressed on behalf of other states. In one or two cases we have been informed of amendments which they are likely to move. This information has been given to us in confidence. In processes of negotiation, governments do not place every suggestion or view on the table for all kinds of interpretation and commitments to be made before finality is reached. What is done in all these matters is to have as full an exchange of opinions and views as possible, and then ultimately to decide on what specific amendment, if any, it may be desirable to present.

So far as the government is concerned it is not our intention at the present time to suggest anything specific in the way of amendment, but when the delegation reaches San Francisco and there have been discussions with other members of the commonwealth and other nations, it may be deemed advisable for Canada to bring forward certain amendments. If such is the case the amendments will speak for themselves and the government will take full responsibility for any amendment it proposes.

Now I come to the mention of the Canadian delegation, in reference to which I have been asked several questions. First of all as to how the delegation will be chosen. It will be chosen in Canada exactly in the same manner as delegations have been chosen in the United Kingdom, and in the United States, in all of the nations of the British commonwealth, and so far as I know also in accordance with what is being done by all nations that are sending representatives to the conference. That is to say, the responsible government, the government in charge, will take responsibility for appointing the delegation. The delegation to go from Great Britain was appointed by Mr. Churchill, the delegation representing the United States was appointed by Mr. Roosevelt, and the delegations from Australia, New Zealand and South Africa have been appointed by the prime ministers of those dominions. The Prime Minister of Canada will take a similar responsibility to that assumed in other countries.

In connection with Canada's representatives, it seems to be assumed that it will be my responsibility to head our delegation. May I say at once to hon. members of this house that I deeply appreciate what I hope I may regard as an expression of confidence in myself, not politically but so far as this particular mission is concerned, as I gather it from the remarks made in the course of this debate. It is assumed that I shall take that responsibility, and in the belief that it is the wish of this House of Commons that I should so act, I am prepared to go to San Francisco as head of the delegation.

I must say, however, speaking to this house and to the country, as it is my duty to do, that some regard must be had for the circumstances in which I find myself in undertaking that responsibility. Some hon. members have been kind enough to refer to a possibility that has found circulation that I might be asked to accept a very responsible position in connection with the work of organization of the conference. I think those who have had this kindly thought in mind for even thinking of anything of the kind. That it should have occurred to anyone that I might be chosen for a position of great responsibility at the conference is in itself a compliment and an expression of confidence which I value very deeply. May I say, however, that even if there were such a possibility, and I know of no reason why there should be, I would myself not find it possible to accept a position of the kind. It must be obvious that I cannot free myself, during the remainder of the period of this parliament at least, from the responsibilities which as Prime Minister of the country I have at a time of war, and anyone who has that responsibility will, I am sure, feel that he should give to that all-important aspect of public affairs as much in the way of concentrated attention as it is possible to give. So that in going to San Francisco I shall not be freeing myself of that obligation and duty but I shall be taking on the other in addition to what I now assume.

But there is another circumstance of which hon. members are well aware. We shall be having a general election in this country very shortly. I cannot say when yet, because I cannot fix the date at the moment, not knowing when the Ontario election may take place. That is another feature that within the last few days has come into the picture, because any date we may select will necessarily have some relation to the date fixed by Ontario for the provincial election. I had hoped that the election might follow very shortly after the termination of this parliament; I do not mean the date of polling, but that the beginning of the campaign might take place even while the San Francisco conference itself is on. It would be impossible to be sure that in going to San Francisco in those circumstances one would be able to remain there even to the close of the conference. Personally, I intend, in assuming the responsibility entailed in going to the conference, to regard that as the obligation which the country wishes me to regard first of all, and I hope that the members of my party, as I am sure they will, will realize that, in not being able to be in Canada for at least a period of a month, at any rate in all probability three or four weeks when the election campaign may be on, the reason in any way is not that I am not anxious to do all I possibly can to see that the present administration is returned to power and that its policies are made to prevail in the next few years. Rather, the reason is that I feel that the greatest responsibility at the moment is to do what can be done in the name of this country to help to bring into being this great world organization for the maintenance of peace.

I should not, perhaps, mention anything so immediate and personal as one's obligation to one's own constituency. I have found, in the course of these war years, that it has not been possible for me to visit the constituency which I represent in this parliament. I had hoped time and again to find it possible to make a trip through the country and to spend a few days in the constituency, but that has not been possible. As I see matters to-day, if added to the other obligations which I am assuming at the moment there is the obligation to the constituency, to be there for a period of time during the campaign, it may be exceedingly difficult for me to meet that obligation. I do believe, however, that the people of Canada will realize the position in which I am placed in that regard, and even if I should not find it possible to be present for my own nomination, I have no fears that there will be a complete understanding of the reasons. These things I speak of simply because they will come up within the next few weeks, and what I am now saying will also explain why, in assuming the larger obligation which is involved in heading Canada's delegation to the world conference in California, it will not be possible for me to discharge other responsibilities in as full a manner as I should like to be able to meet them,

It has been suggested that there should be representatives of agriculture, labour, veterans, industry, business and so forth on the delegation that goes to San Francisco. I think the mere mention of that list makes apparent the difficulty there is in making selections for a delegation of the kind. The line has to be drawn somewhere, and I have felt that nowhere could it more properly be drawn than by confining the representation on the delegation to those who are and have for some time been the representatives of the people in one or other of the houses of parliament of Canada. I hope that in reaching that conclusion it will not be felt that I am doing anything other than seeking to give to the Canadian parliament the important place which it should hold at all times in the respect of the nation as the representative institution of the people of this dominion.

As to delineating policies that the government should have, before going to San Francisco, I do not think I need to add to what has already been said. I have made clear what our policies are, and I believe hon. members are on the whole pretty generally agreed that the right attitude is being taken.

Now it is said that the government will have no mandate to represent Canada after April 17. Mr. Speaker, the government is receiving its mandate at this moment from parliament. The purpose of the resolution that is before the House of Commons is to have this House of Commons decide whether Canada is to be represented at the conference, and the principles and proposals which the delegates are to support while there. The resolution when it passes this house will be the mandate of this

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

House of Commons to the present administration to see that a delegation from Canada goes to the conference at San Francisco and that it acts in accordance with the provisions of the resolution.

I cannot understand how any hon. members can feel that because a general election may be on, owing to the life of parliament having expired, the government ceases to have any functions or any duties. Some government must continue to carry on. The government of the country must carry on whether it is at a time of an election or at any other time. I cannot see that there is other than full responsibility on this administration to carry out the obligation to see that there is proper and ample representation of Canada at San Francisco.

The British government is sending a delegation to San Francisco. It may be that while the delegation is at San Francisco there will be a general election in Britain; I cannot say. But if there were, would anyone say that that delegation should come back because it has no mandate? That is another thing that I cannot understand—why some hon. gentlemen opposite always raise questions with respect to anything which this government does or anything that I may do, which they would not think of raising in regard to any other government or any other individual similarly placed in the United Kingdom or another of the nations of the commonwealth. It has become a habit and I suppose they find it difficult to free themselves from it.

Questions have been asked about the relationship of the new organization to the league of nations. I cannot answer that question offhand. I assume that when the new organization comes into being it will gradually take over the functions and many of the organizations that have been associated with the league of nations. I think of one in particular, the international labour office, for example. The international labour office, I am sure, is the most important of all the bodies that have been associated with the league of nations. Some sixty per cent of the expenditure of this parliament on league of nations matters goes toward the support of the international labour office. We are proud in Canada that we have had that office located in Montreal during the last few years, practically throughout the years of the war. I have no doubt in the world that the international labour office will become a part of the new united nations organization. It will receive, I am sure, every support toward that end, and doubtless it will be so with other of the special bodies connected with the league of nations. What I imagine is probable is the league in part will continue to operate for a time, and gradually as the transition period ends the new organization will completely replace the old one. But there are matters of legal adjustment that have to be made and they take time.

I come now to the question of military agreements and commitments which have been made a central point of criticism in this debate. And here, Mr. Speaker, I take very strong exception to the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite in seeking to make me responsible in the public mind for certain positions with which I have had nothing whatever to do. In discussing military commitments hon. members opposite—it started with the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green)—began by saying that I, the present leader of the government, had put forward certain proposals as to what was to be done in the application of force and in using force outside of Canada. Two proposals of the Dumbarton Oaks conference, one after the other, were referred to as my proposals. The hon. member for Vancouver South, first of all, said that it was possible to interpret what I have said one way or the other. Then he gives not the right interpretation, but one of his own which he knew very well was not the right one, but the wrong one; and thereafter everyone who followed him, I think without exception, in the official opposition deliberately used wrong interpretation as though it were the right one and argued therefrom. The reason I take—

Mr. GREEN: I said exactly what I meant.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, I know. I am not surprised that the hon. member said what he did say, because it is not the first time he has spoken in debate. The reason why I am taking exception so strongly to this is that my hon. friends opposite are creating in the minds of some nations a certain opinion, or are endeavouring to create a certain opinion, in reference to Canada's attitude, towards the Dumbarton Oaks proposal, which may have a very serious and far-reaching effect among the delegates from other countries who will be present at San Francisco.

Mr. GREEN: The Prime Minister gave the impression.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They are endeavouring to have the idea gain ground that Canada is now taking a certain position with respect to the use of power by force, and how it is to be applied; an impression which is a wholly erroneous one, and an infinite amount of mischief may as a consequence be done before the meeting takes place at San Francisco at all. Perhaps my hon. friends do not realize the extent of the mistake they have been making in that regard. Let me mention another thing of the same kind. Everything that they have been saying about the British commonwealth not working together in harmony is pretty certain to be inimical and harmful to members of the British delegation and to all who represent any part of the British commonwealth when they meet at San Francisco. It is not a question of the effect of what they say on our domestic politics. People in Canada know hon. gentlemen, know what they have been saying for the last twenty years, and they know what value to attach to it. The citizens of Holland and Belgium, France and Brazil; all the other American republics and the other countries who will be represented, do not know how true or false any impression may be. What they now hear is that the Canadian delegation which is going to San Francisco is already committed to certain attitudes or it is not going to take certain attitudes, and some of those countries may well become prejudiced against Canada in advance. That is the part that causes me very real concern. I feel it deeply because hon. gentlemen know better and ought to have been guided more correctly in the words that they used.

Mr. GREEN: The Prime Minister should not have said what he did say.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just a moment. In order that there may be no mistake as to what I am saying, I shall make use of some notes I have before me.

The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon), speaking on Wednesday, March 21, asked these questions, or made this representation, as reported at page 65 of Hansard:

With respect to these points I should like the Prime Minister to make clear when the agreements which are mentioned in the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, and referred to in his speech yesterday, are likely to be entered into by the states subscribing to the charter, and this is what I mean by that statement. Will there be any agreements entered into at San Francisco, or will the agreements be entered into after approval and ratification of the charter have been given by the respective governments, or will the agreements be entered into only after the peace treaties have been signed?

I shall answer that question as follows. I said in my statement of March 20 that there was a good deal of obscurity about the methods by which the proposals relative to military agreements would be developed. I would not have spoken in this way had I been in a position to answer the question asked by the leader of the opposition. I think I can deal definitely with one of his points. No military agreements will be negotiated at San Francisco, nor could any such agreements come into effect under the proposals until they had secured the approval of the security council. I suppose no one now can say just when the agreements would be concluded, if the provisions relating to them are included in the charter. Further the leader of the opposition said:

It would appear that the extent of our contribution with respect to force will be governed by the agreements rather than by the charter itself. We should be told whether there will be one blanket agreement covering all our contributions in this regard or whether there will have to be a special agreement covering each particular operation in which the organization may require men and equipment and, if so, will each of these special agreements have to come before parliament for approval and ratification in each instance?

Here too I am unable to give much further information, except to state positively that under the proposals as they stand any military agreement involving a contribution from Canada to any other member state will be subject to—and I quote these words:

. . . the ratification of the signatory states in accordance with their constitutional processes.

The general scheme put forward in the proposals is designed to make it possible for the security council to know in advance what armed forces, facilities and assistance would be available to it to deal with whatever dangers might arise. In my own statement on March 20 I spoke in part as follows:

As they stand, the acceptance of the proposals would in no way commit Canada to send forces beyond Canadian territory at the call of the security council. If any such commitment were sought, it would be embodied in a later agreement, freely negotiated by the government of Canada and coming into effect only after it had been approved by parliament.

There I was stating a fact. The proposals that are before us are not proposals I have made; they are proposals made by the great powers acting together, seeking to get as large a measure of agreement as possible. They are their proposals and, as I read them, I think I can see what was in the minds of the great powers when those proposals were framed in the way they have been. The great powers realized that if this organization was to serve the purpose for which it is intended it would need to have not only the support of the great powers but the support of as many of the united nations as it might be possible to bring into membership in the organization. In drawing up these proposals, which are only for the purpose of affording a basis of discussion when it comes to creating a charter, they were careful so to frame them as not to make it impossible for some of the lesser powers or other powers to join in bringing this great organization into being. It is sometimes forfotten that in planning this charter, if it is to be effective, it is not only necessary in the first instance to get other nations into the organization, but it is essential that those other nations shall have behind them the public opinion of the people of their countries.

In creating a great organization of this kind steps have been taken one at a time in order to remove grounds for suspicion. We have heard from hon. gentlemen in the far corner what their suspicions are. There is not ground for one of them in anything that is to be found in the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. The proposals have been drafted very carefully in order to make it possible to bring this organization into being; then, after it is created, the further steps that are necessary will be taken one by one in order to ensure the permanence of peace. In all that is done there has been the most positive assurance given that whatever may be the constitutional procedure of the different nations in their legislative bodies, that constitutional procedure will be followed before anything becomes an obligation upon the nation concerned. That is not my proposal; it is a statement of fact in the proposals given to the world after the Dumbarton Oaks conference.

After I had made my statement it must have been wholly clear that it was intended to be simply a statement of fact in regard to the proposals as they stand. It was not intended to bear and could not rightly bear the construction which has been placed upon it, unwarrantably, by certain hon. members opposite. I wish now to correct the impression they have sought to convey, so that other nations may know there is no justification for it. I am not so much concerned as to what the people of Canada may feel in regard to what hon. gentlemen opposite have said, for they will understand it; but other nations may not, and I want other nations to know that my statement could not honestly be said to convey the impression—and here I repeat what different hon. members opposite have said—that in entering a world organization Canada has not very much to worry about or that there is very little obligation; or that the government is trying to leave open an exit from some of the obligations that Canada will be asked to assume at San Francisco, implying that such action was an attempt to appease the isolationists of Canada; or that it was offered as a sop to the isolationism or the little Canadianism of a minority in this country in order to ensure support for the resolution.

Still less were my words intended to create the impression mentioned by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), that instead of doing her part—and I quote his words:

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

. . . to underwrite world security absolutely and unequivocally, Canada will underwrite it conditionally and partially.

I say that seeking to foster throughout the world that kind of impression as to the position this government representing Canada intends to take at San Francisco is doing an irreparable injury, in advance, to the work of the conference itself. The hon. member for Vancouver South said it did not help to have the Prime Minister use the words—and he quoted:

As they stand, the acceptance of the proposals would in no way commit Canada to send forces beyond Canadian territory at the call of the security council.

The hon. member went on to represent that this was a return to the no-commitment policy of pre-war days, and he argued that it gave the impression that Canada had very little obligation to assume, and that the government is still trying to leave open an exit from some of the obligations Canada would be asked to assume at San Francisco. May I say to my hon. friend that this is a rather curious line for a member of the Progressive Conservative party to take. I cannot remember that there was any outspoken support for any policy of commitments in advance from the Conservative side of the house from 1930 onwards.

Mr. GREEN: We have been complaining about your no-commitment policy for ten years.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My statement was a simple statement of fact in reference to the Dumbarton Oaks proposals; and to say that the statement of the fact was an attempt to appease the isolationists of Canada is reading into it a wholly unwarranted construction. There is one inescapable answer to my hon. friend about "the no-commitment" matter and the things for which this administration stands. There was no commitment to go into the present war. There was no commitment on the part of Canada to play the part she has played in this war. There was no commitment that Canada should go on fighting this war as she is now doing so valiantly. The reasons Canada went into the war; the reason Canada is fighting as she is to-day; the reason she is playing the part she has played in this war, is that Canada was at liberty, of her own free will, to play the part she thought she should play in the great cause of world freedom.

My hon. friend suggests that we should be part of some commonwealth unit which should have the right to say what shall be done by all the members of the commonwealth. I ask him this question: If that view had prevailed, does he think Canada would have been playing the part that she is playing to-day in this war I say that a complete answer to the hon. gentleman as to whether the policies of this government have been sound is found in the way in which this country responded to the needs of the world at the moment we had a practical situation facing us. I repeat that if there had been commitments in advance this country would never have gone into the war in the united manner in which it did. This country would never have given the army that she has given, the navy she has given, the air force she has given, the munitions she has given, the food supplies she has given, the financial aid she has given and the mutual aid in different forms she has given if there had been any effort to commit her in advance to any or all these things. She has given her all in a total war effort because there were no commitments, and because the heart of Canada was sound, and we did not need to be making any commitments.

Another thing that strikes me as extraordinary is that hon. gentlemen opposite always find it necessary to belittle Canada's war effort—Mr. Churchill has not found it necessary—

Mr. GREEN: Now, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GREEN: Some hon. members who are shouting "sit down" will not be here to shout it in a few weeks. The Prime Minister must withdraw that statement. He has no right to say that about our belittling the war effort, because it is entirely incorrect.

Mr. REID: It is not.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): It is.

Mr. GREEN: We did not make any attempt to belittle Canada's war effort, and never have. But the Prime Minister is of the view that the war effort is the war effort of the Liberal party. He cannot charge me with that, and it must be withdrawn.

An hon. MEMBER: What about throwing the rifles overboard?

An hon. MEMBER: What about Bracken in Grey North?

Mr. GRAYDON: Surely there must be some order in the house.

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down.

Mr. GRAYDON: Surely a mechanical majority like this is not allowed to control the whole of parliament.

Mr. CASSELMAN: Mr. Speaker is on his feet.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: We would like to have the truth about the rifles.

Mr. SPEAKER: As I heard him, the hon. member was taking exception to a statement made by the Prime Minister. I do not think there was anything objectionable in it.

Mr. GRAYDON: He referred to every hon. member over here, and made a statement which is not in accordance with the facts. I have heard no member belittling Canada's war effort, and I know that upon reflection the Prime Minister will want to withdraw that statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have nothing to withdraw. I wish to make it perfectly clear that never at any time have I claimed that the war effort of Canada was the war effort of the Liberal party. I claimed it was the war effort of the Canadian people, a war effort which was wisely and generously directed.

Mr. GREEN: I would ask you for your ruling on the point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker has ruled upon it.

Mr. GREEN: Perhaps the hecklers will keep still. The Prime Minister was referring to me, stating that I had belittled Canada's war effort. I did no such thing. It is a common rule of debate that a statement of that kind should be withdrawn, and I appeal to Your Honour for protection.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has tried to belittle everything I have done, in every utterance he has made, more or less.

Mr. GREEN: You are not Mr. Speaker; I want a ruling.

Mr. CASSELMAN: Mr. Speaker is on his feet.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have the floor.

Mr. CASSELMAN: No; Mr. Speaker has the floor.

Mr. SPEAKER: As I caught his words the Prime Minister said, "I cannot understand why my hon. friends opposite should belittle Canada's war effort." I did not interpret that as referring only to the hon. member for Vancouver South. It was a general statement referring to the opposition.

An hon. MEMBER: And you are doing it every day in the week.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): We are not.

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friends have been seeking all along to create the impression that certain proposals put forward in respect of the Dumbarton Oaks statement were proposals of mine, and that I was responsible for the interpretation they themselves were giving to them. And they have sought to give to those proposals an interpretation which is not justifiable at all.

The last hon. member to speak last night in the debate, from the official opposition side of the house was the hon. member for Parkdale, (Mr. Bruce). Had I happened to be in the house at the time I would have taken exception to his remarks at once. I have read them, and find that at page 261 of Hansard he said this:

The Prime Minister, however, soon lapsed again into another state of unreality when he declared his intention—

"His intention."

—to refer all matters of aggression to parliament and to await its decision before taking action. The delay and uncertainty, if such a procedure were carried out, would be the most certain way of bringing about a third world war.

That, Mr. Speaker, is an absolutely untrue statement. I have made no declaration of any kind, either directly or indirectly, which could be construed as indicating an intention of referring all matters of aggression to parliament, and of awaiting its decision before taking action.

Then, at page 262 of Hansard, the hon. member for Parkdale said:

If this is all the Prime Minister contemplates there will be general agreement, but when peace is threatened, to make a proviso that the consent of parliament must be obtained before our armed forces can be used, as proposed by the Prime Minister, is to invite another world conflict.

I have made no proposal with respect to how our armed forces are to be used. I could not do so. As yet the organization itself is not in existence, and until the organization is in existence and treaties have been made, no one will be able to know what will be expected of any nation. And more than that, until we know what the terms of peace are, and what the great powers propose to do in maintaining peace, and what is provided for controlling Germany and Japan in the years to come—and these are only a few things—until we know these things we do not know what force may be required or what demands may be made upon any country. I have made no proposal whatever, and the hon. member knows it. And yet here is his statement that— . . . when peace is threatened, to make a proviso that the consent of parliament must be obtained before our armed forces can be used, as proposed by the Prime Minister, is to invite another world conflict.

Well, considering its source, I would not attach so much importance even to that, were it not for the fact that these statements are being taken up by press correspondents, who are passing them on not only to our own country but to other countries as well. Looking at one of the morning papers I find this, in reference to yesterday's proceedings in parliament:

Doctor Bruce made several clear-cut points. First he emphasized the danger of delay if the Prime Minister's idea were followed to have each individual call for Canadian force to support the world organization promised on an appeal to parliament.

I have had no such idea. I have given expression to no such idea. I have now no such idea. And yet those statements go out before this conference convenes. They go to nations in all parts of the world, and are read by them, and their actions to some extent may be governed accordingly.

I am not going to leave this matter without quoting to hon. members opposite from one of their newspapers, one which in connection with most matters has supported them very strongly through thick and thin. I quote from an editorial in the Ottawa Journal of March 23, 1945, and put it on Hansard because I hope it will be to hon. members opposite a sufficient answer as to how a leading Conservative journal interprets my remarks as made in the House of Commons. Under the heading "Misunderstanding Dumbarton Oaks" the editorial reads:

Parliament's discussion of the San Francisco conference appears to be accomplishing one good end. The end of removing widespread public misconceptions regarding Dumbarton Oaks.

For example, surprise is being expressed over what is called Prime Minister King's "disclosure" that the council of the world security organization could not automatically commit the member nations to contributing men and resources in the event of an outbreak of aggression. Also, so well-informed a newspaper as the Toronto Globe and Mail speaks of a "pooled force of military power . . . capable of action at the first threat of aggression."

Mr. King, of course, made no disclosure; spoke nothing new. The world security organization, as proposed by Dumbarton Oaks, will have no army of its own, and there will be no "pooled military force." Actually, the idea of an international police force, at one time advocated in certain quarters, has been universally rejected.

What is proposed instead is in section 5 of chapter 8 of the charter:

"In order that all members of the organization should contribute to the maintenance of international peace and security, they should undertake to make available to the security council, on its call and in accordance with a special agreement or agreements concluded among themselves, armed forces, facilities and assistance necessary for the purpose of maintaining international peace and security. Such agreement or agreements should govern the numbers and types of forces and the nature of the facilities and assistance to be provided. The special agreement or agreements should be negotiated as soon as possible and it should in each case be subject to approval by the security council and to ratification by the signatory states in accordance with their constitutional processes."

Prime Minister King's interpretation of this, in its application to Canada, is:

"The agreements would limit the military aid pledged by members to what each member was ready to give of its own volition. The agreements might include provisions governing the circumstances in which any forces could be called upon to serve abroad. These arrangements would need separate approval in accordance with the constitutional processes of the country. In Canada that would mean approval by parliament before such agreements were ratified.

"There is at present a good deal of obscurity about the methods by which this part of the proposal would be developed in practice. One point, however, is clear. As they stand, the acceptance of the proposals would in no way commit Canada to send forces beyond Canadian territory at the call of the security council. If any such commitment were sought, it would be embodied in a later agreement, freely negotiated by the government of Canada, and coming into effect only after it had been approved by parliament."

The editorial then goes on:

Mr. King's interpretation seems to us reasonably accurate. We very much doubt whether any plan which proposed that a country such as Canada must keep on hand an army, navy and air force, plus supplies of armaments, to be at the call of a council for service at any time anywhere in the world, and regardless of possible disagreement over the rights or wrongs of the issues involved, would have the least chance of acceptance. The security council of this world organization will not be infallible. It will be made up of human beings as liable to error as the rest of us; and, consequently, to argue that a few such human beings should be given uncontrolled power over the armies and resources of scores of nations, their whims become world law, is surely to argue the impossible. Without at all making a fetish of national sovereignty we think we can say that the nations of the world, including our own, would never submit to any such condition.

I think I may leave there the final word in regard to whether or not I have correctly interpreted the proposals of Dumbarton Oaks in the statement I made to the House of Commons.

Some other questions have been asked, one, for example, with respect to the revision of treaties. I am unable to say what will be done with regard to the revision of treaties until I know what may be outlined by the conference toward that end.

Something has been said of Canada seeking a permanent seat on the council. May I say a word in that regard. The hon. member for Lake Centre asked whether there was any move to secure a permanent seat based on the expected contribution of Canada. I can assure the hon. member that the Canadian government neither has advanced nor has any intention of advancing a claim to rank equal with the great powers on the security council.

There is also a good deal of talk, much of it critical, of an alleged desire on the part of the Canadian government to see Canada enrolled among the middle powers. I was careful in my statement to say nothing to support this unfounded assumption. The truth is, however, that Canada, although not large in population, has attained through the vigour of our people and the extent of our resources a position in which Canadian interests are world-wide. The potential contribution of Canada to the purposes of the world organization for peace cannot be measured by counting heads. It can, however, be estimated by regarding the not inconsiderable part, military, economic and financial, which our country has taken in the alliance with the great powers.

Had time permitted I should like to have had something in particular to say concerning the suggestion of having "a single voice" speaking on behalf of the commonwealth. In order not to detain members too long I shall refer them to what I said in a previous debate in this house. Some hon. members seem to forget that this subject was debated very thoroughly in this house at the last session of parliament. At that time I made a comprehensive statement on behalf of the government as to its position in regard to having the commonwealth speak, as hon. gentlemen say, with "one voice," and I just wish to give them what I said at that time and to point out that since then none of them has answered the question I asked in the statement I then made. I said that the British commonwealth of nations has never been, nor can it now be, a single entity in international affairs. The British commonwealth is not a nation; it is rather a fraternity of nations, who are by formal definition and by long practice, "autonomous communities, in no way subordinate one to the other in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs." There has never been a serious attempt to make the British commonwealth a single personality in international affairs. It was never done in the league of nations or in any of its subsidiary agencies; nor has it ever been suggested as applying in the inter-governmental bodies created during the present war.

We cannot at this stage of our history as a free nation turn back upon the process by which we reached free nationhood. But that is what hon. gentlemen opposite are seeking to do. They are seeking to go back to the days prior to the last war, prior to the conference held at the time of treaty making. They are seeking to undo the work that Sir Robert Borden and his colleagues successfully performed in gaining for Canada her right to sign that treaty as of herself, instead of simply being lumped with the other nations of the commonwealth all as one. They are seeking to undo the work of the imperial conferences of 1923 and 1926, at both of which I was present myself and of which I can speak with some authority, where the declaration concerning equality of status which I have just quoted, setting out the position of the different nations of the commonwealth and which is known as the Balfour declaration, was made, not by Canada alone but by Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and the United Kingdom. They would throw that into the discard altogether, as well as the Statute of Westminster, which was enacted, not by this parliament, but by the United Kingdom parliament, making clear the completely autonomous position of each nation and its individual personality and individual rights. Hon. gentlemen opposite would throw all that away for the sake of having it appear that in some way this government is lukewarm to the commonwealth. They would undo all this work in seeking to do injury to the government.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

The simplest answer I can give to the point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South is to repeat to him and to this house a statement which I made on August 4 of last year. In concluding certain remarks about the relationship between the nations of the commonwealth and the organization of peace I then said:

Inside the commonwealth we can and do manage as a rule to reach agreement on the general lines of policy which our governments should pursue in dealing with major issues. We find it possible to agree because we have the will to agree and cherish similar international ideals and purposes. If, however, the countries of the commonwealth had to reach agreement by some political process yet to be devised, so that all were bound to carry out a single policy, there would be a very different story. The world council is to be an executive body. It must be capable of prompt and single-minded action. The United Kingdom, which is indisputably a great power, will sit on the council in its own right, and its influence there will be enhanced by its special relationship with the countries of the commonwealth. The United Kingdom representative will, however, be responsible to London and will take his instructions from London alone.

Here are questions which hon. gentlemen have not answered:

Supposing we were to change this so that he would become a representative of the British commonwealth, should he have to withhold action until he has received instructions from half a dozen governments? What should he do if these instructions were in conflict? Should he follow the majority opinion even if it is violently opposed by the government, parliament and people in one or more commonwealth countries? At the very best, action would be delayed and decisions blurred. At the worst we would run the risk of rendering the commonwealth impotent in international affairs and perhaps of disrupting it.

I say to the few in Canada who have advocated such a change that the prestige abroad of the British commonwealth was never higher than it is to-day. The prestige is based upon a belief that in the British commonwealth there has been evolved a unique alliance of a peculiarly tough and enduring kind whose members act together not because they are under any strict obligation to do so but because they have the will to act together. Our friends abroad, furthermore, have discovered that the primary objects for which the members of the commonwealth act together are objects which can be shared by other countries of good will. They realize that the commonwealth is not a power bloc exploiting its own interests but a group of like-minded nations whose close association has in the past formed, and should form in the future, a most reliable element within the framework of the world order.

I think I have come to the end of what I have found it necessary to say this afternoon in answer to questions raised in this debate; but I recall that my hon. friends of the Social Credit group also directed a number of questions to me. Last evening the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) asked a number of questions and requested that I reply to them to-day. Perhaps I might say I have concluded the longer catechism. I come now to his remarks, which may be classified as the shorter catechism.

The first question is:

Would the adoption of these proposals in any way weaken the ties or relationship between the countries which comprise the British empire? If so in what manner and to what extent?

The answer is: the establishment of a general international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security would, I believe, strengthen the association of the countries of the British commonwealth. Certainly it could in no way weaken or impair it.

The next question is:

If the proposals are adopted, would the control of this nation's currency and credit remain within our own power? In other words, would we retain absolute control over our own currency and credit?

I might say that before my hon. friend asked that question, I had prepared an answer to give to his leader in relation to what he had had to say on the Bretton Woods proposals, and I will give this answer to both hon. members and to their party, at this time.

A word as to the speeches made by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) and the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore). The contribution of these hon. members to the debate consisted very largely of an attack on the resolutions of the united nations monetary and financial conference, generally known as the Bretton Woods proposals. I confess that I am somewhat surprised to find the Social Credit party bringing aid and comfort to the more reactionary international bankers, who have been the chief critics of the Bretton Woods proposals.

The hon. member for Acadia asked: does approval of section 3 of the resolution before the house imply an endorsement of the final act of the Bretton Woods agreement? The short answer to that question is, no; the house is not in this resolution being asked to endorse the Bretton Woods proposals. At the same time, I am convinced that collaboration among nations in the economic and financial field is a vital part of any effective system of international security.

The Bretton Woods proposals are technical and complicated and I do not propose to enter into a discussion of them. I should be greatly perturbed, however, if by failing to comment on the substance of the hon. members' observations regarding Bretton Woods, I were to leave with the house the impression that I in any sense agreed with those observations. I do not believe that the hon. members gave an accurate interpretation of the proposals, nor do I believe that analysis will support the criticisms they have made.

Member after member in the course of this debate has properly insisted on the great importance of achieving international collaboration in the economic as well as in the political field. It is increasingly recognized that prosperity, like peace, is indivisible and that it cannot be achieved through anarchy, or through measures of extreme economic nationalism. The edifice of peace we are seeking to construct will totter if it is not founded on conditions of material well-being throughout the world. We should be making a very poor approach indeed to the great problems to be dealt with at San Francisco, if we failed to take a constructive attitude toward the proposals which the delegates of forty-four united nations assembled at Bretton Woods have, after long study and deliberation, put forward for the consideration of governments.

The next question is:

Do any of the proposals and principles involve the return to the gold standard?

The answer to that question is, no.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wonder whether the Prime Minister would permit a question, just to clarify the situation with respect to Bretton Woods. He does not need to if he does not wish to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I feel I have covered that pretty fully.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The Prime Minister has not covered it at all. Bretton Woods has two definite proposals; one has to do with the international lending body and the other has to do with the international stabilization body. The one to which the international bankers are opposed is the lending body. The one to which the social creditors are opposed is the international stabilization body. It is important to get that straight.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is not the main point at the moment.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think the Prime Minister ought to deal with it.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member has it backwards, anyway.

Mr. BLACKMORE: No, I have got it straight.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The next question is:

If so, will the government, as far as it is concerned, oppose such a step?

So far as I am concerned that is answered by the previous reply.

My hon. friend's next question is:

Do any of the proposals or principles involve the acceptance of the Bretton Woods proposals?

The answer is, no. Next:

And if so, will the government as far as it is concerned oppose such a step?

That is answered by the answer to the preceding question.

Is this vote to be regarded as a vote of confidence in the delegation?

The resolution now under consideration by the house sets forth clearly the points on which approval is sought. The house is asked to endorse acceptance of the invitation to send representatives to the conference and to agree that the Canadian representatives should endeavour to further the preparations of an acceptable charter for an international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security. I have already stated that the government will accept its constitutional responsibility for the selection and appointment of the delegation. I do not think that the question of approval or disapproval of the delegation, one way or the other, is involved. Then the next question:

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Will the Prime Minister assure the house that as far as he is concerned this whole matter will be brought before appropriate committees of the house for full investigation before any commitments are made?

I must thank my hon. friend for assuming that I shall continue to be Prime Minister after the next election. I would say to him that the resolution now before the house states that the charter establishing the international organization should, before ratification, "be submitted to parliament for approval". When it becomes necessary to take action in order to secure the approval of parliament, if the present government is in office opportunity will be given to consider what form of action and what method of procedure would most appropriately give an opportunity for adequate parliamentary consideration and discussion.

The last question is:

If the proposals are adopted, would Canada and any other individual nation be able to negotiate a trade agreement upon a basis satisfactory to the two countries without any interference by the world organization?

The answer is, certainly; the proposals before the house do not relate to the conduct of international commercial policy.

Two other important questions were asked. I imagine hon. members might think I had evaded them were I not to mention them and reply. I shall do so very briefly. The leader of the opposition said:

Too little was said by the Prime Minister and too little has been said in this debate on the question of opening the channels of trade. . . . When the Prime Minister replies I suggest he give his views with respect to the possible functions and powers of the economic and social council in this regard.

I cordially agree with the leader of the opposition that world peace and world trade are inseparable partners. There is not much I can add to my earlier statement with regard to the functions of the economic and social council in this connection. I do not expect that questions of trade will arise directly at San Francisco. We shall be concerned there with a new world order in which it is to be hoped that trade can flourish as never before. The general assembly and the economic and social council would have the responsibility in the world organization for facilitating "solutions of international, economic, social and other humanitarian problems and promoting respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms". There will be specialized international bodies brought into relation with the economic and social council dealing with various aspects of these general functions. Promotion of trade is undoubtedly an essential element in promoting human welfare but it must be carried on through many agencies.

Now for the final question; the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) asked whether the delegation at San Francisco would support the establishment of an international educational agency or commission as an integral part of any organization set up to maintain peace. He also referred to the proposals which have arisen from meetings of the allied ministers of education in London and asked whether Canada had been invited to take part and, if so, what the position of the Canadian government was.

It is contemplated that a specialized organization or agency should be established as one of the inter-governmental bodies to be brought into relation with the world organization through an agreement between the economic and social council and the appropriate authorities of the organization concerned with education. I do not anticipate that there will be much discussion at San Francisco of the nature of the international agency to deal with education. Negotiations have already been in progress for some time looking to the development of plans in this field; and the San Francisco conference will have a great deal of work on its hands. The Canadian government has kept in close touch through the Canadian high commissioner with the discussions in London. They took the form initially of meetings between the ministers of education of allied governments. We have indicated that Canada would hope to take part, within the limits of its constitutional responsibilities, in such an organization if it be set up. Consideration has been given for some time to the preparation of a constitution for an educational agency and it is to be expected that definite proposals will be presented before long.

I have at last concluded the replies which I undertook to make to the questions that have been asked.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think the Prime Minister has overlooked a question which I asked and which I think is germane to the discussion, and that is as to the status of the delegates whom the government will choose from outside its own supporters or ranks. I asked that question of the Prime Minister and he seems to have overlooked it in his answers. I wanted to know whether they would go as full-fledged delegates or advisers, and what freedom of expression, and so on, they would be guaranteed while there in accordance with the arrangements which have been made in the republic to the south. Perhaps he would elucidate that point.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am very much obliged to my hon. friend for bringing the question to my attention. I had inadvertently overlooked it. I hope that all members will go as members of one delegation. I should like to see Canada represented by one delegation which would be able to speak for the whole dominion and to speak apart altogether from party affiliations. The alternative would be to have members of opposite parties present as associates or advisers, but I should think that the public of Canada would much prefer to have all representatives from the different political parties go as members of one delegation. I should hope that the discussions in this house in the last ten days might make it apparent that it should not be difficult for members of all parties to agree in representing Canada's point of view on what position should be taken on whatever matters may come up for discussion. The government will have to take responsibility for any decisions that will be reached, but there will be no desire whatever to prevent any member of the delegation, were he to find it impossible to agree with other members, to make his views fully known. I would not wish to place restrictions on anyone, but of course each delegate would be expected to take full responsibility for what he himself might say. I very much hope, however, that the house will agree that the best manner in which Canada could be represented at the conference would be along lines I have suggested.

Mr. GREEN: I asked the Prime Minister what the attitude of the government would be towards regional organizations, particularly in the Pacific. He said nothing about that. I wonder if he could make a statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is another question which I regret having overlooked. I do not think it would be possible to express an opinion on what will be done in the matter of regional organization until at least the present war is over. My hon. friend is primarily and rightly interested in British Columbia's position, and no doubt he has in mind what might be desirable in relation to the Pacific. So far as the Pacific is concerned, the main business now is to defeat the Japanese. I think all of us are agreed on that as the objective. When the Japanese are defeated we shall know what conditions may be imposed upon them by the allied nations that bring about that defeat, and we shall know later what provision is to be made to see that they are kept in their place, if I may use so mild an expression, for time to come. Until those eventualities are known I doubt whether it would be possible for me to say what will be done in the way of making provision for regional organization, but the charter of the organization will doubtless have some reference to the question. It is a difficult matter to decide, I admit. It is a question that can be settled finally only in the light of conditions as they may develop.

San Francisco Conference

Mr. GREEN: Does the Prime Minister think that such organization may be necessary?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot say whether or not it will be necessary until I know the circumstances to which I have referred. Then it will be possible to express an opinion.

May I say this one word in conclusion. If another war breaks out in twenty or thirty years it will be more horrible than this war, which has been more horrible than the last one. The barbarisms of the enemy will exceed those of to-day, just as the barbarities and atrocities of the enemy to-day exceed those of our enemies of a generation ago. In another war the last restraints would go, and unrestrained savagery, equipped with new and frightful weapons, would spread over the world.

All should pray that the San Francisco conference will result in an effective agreement. I wish to close on that note because it is the thought which to-day I know is uppermost in the minds of peoples everywhere. If we have another conflagration such as we have had in this war, this country stands to lose more than any other country on earth. Canada has more to lose in another world war than any other country because of the great resources we have, because of our climate, because of the character of our people and because of our situation between the continent of Europe and the continent of Asia and our enviable position in the western hemisphere. It behooves every citizen of the country to do his utmost to ensure, if it is at all possible, that an appalling condition such as even now we are witnessing shall never arise again.

Here may I quote a sentence that impressed me very deeply in a letter I received last night, so deeply that it rather caused me to wonder whether, even yet, in our discussions we have really grasped the significance of the coming conference in San Francisco and the imperative importance of making it a success. I had written to Field Marshal Smuts, who, I learned, would be coming to the San Francisco conference from London, and had invited him to pay a visit to Canada either before the conference itself or on his return from it. I am happy to say that Field Marshal Smuts has promised to accept that invitation, and we may look forward to having him, one of the greatest statesmen of the world, as a guest of this country. General Smuts played a very prominent part, as all know, in the last great war.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

He had very much to do with bringing into being the league of nations. He has an experience I believe unsurpassed by any man, not excepting anyone, on matters pertaining to world organization; it was for that reason that in the reply that I received to my message 'o him last night I was so much impressed by certain words he used. His reply was as follows:

My very warm thanks for your kind invitation to me to visit Canada. I look forward with deep interest to this prospect which I hope will be realized either before or after San Francisco. I also look forward to pleasant repetition fruitful contacts with you during the conference with all its possibilities for success or failure.

"With all its possibilities for success or failure." I say to hon. members of this house, we as citizens of Canada cannot afford to utter any word, to take any step, which may do other than help to make that conference a success, because if it is a failure, God alone knows what will happen to the future of this world.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Mackenzie King) which was agreed to on the following division:

YEAS

Messrs:

Abbott	Crerar
Authier	Crête
Aylesworth	Cruikshank
Bence	Dechene
Bertrand (Laurier)	Denis
Bertrand (Prescott)	Desmond
Black (Chateauguay- Huntingdon)	Diefenbaker
Black (Cumberland)	Donnelly
Black (Yukon)	Douglas
Blackmore	Dubois
Blair	Dupuis
Blanchette	Edwards
Bonnier	Emmerson
Booth	Esling
Boucher	Eudes
Bourget	Evans
Bradette	Fair
Brooks	Farquhar
Bruce	Fauteux
Brunelle	Ferland
Bryce	Ferron
Burton	Fournier (Hull)
Cardiff	Fraser (Northumber- land, Ont.)
Cardin	Fraser (Peterborough West)
Case	Fulford
Casselman, Mrs. (Edmonton East)	Furniss
Casselman	Gershaw
(Grenville-Dundas)	Gibson
Castleden	Gillis
Chevrier	Gladstone
Choquette	Golding
Church	Goulet
Clark	Graham
Claxton	Grant
Cleaver	Gray
Cloutier	Graydon
Coldwell	Green
Corman	Gregory
Coté	Hansell

Hanson (Skeena)	Marier
Harris (Danforth)	Marshall
Harris (Grey-Bruce)	Martin
Hazen	Matthews
Healy	Maybank
Henderson	Mayhew
Hill	Michaud
Hlynka	Mills
Homuth	Mitchell
Howden	Moore
Howe	Mullins
Hurtubise	Mulock
Ilsley	Mutch
Isnor	Neill
Jean	Nicholson
Johnston (Bow River)	Nielsen, Mrs.
Johnston (London)	Nixon
Jutras	O'Neill
King, Mackenzie	Parent
Kinley	Perley
Kirk	Picard
Knowles	Pinard
Kuhl	Poirier
Laflamme	Pottier
LaFleche	Pouliot
Lafontaine	Power
Lalonde	Purdy
Lapointe (Lotbinière)	Quelch
Lapointe (Matapedia-Matane)	Ralston
Leader	Raymond
Leclerc	Reid
Leduc	Rennie
Leger	Rhéaume
Little	Kickard
Lockhart	Roebuck
McCann	Rose
McCuaig	Ross (Calgary East)
McCubbin	Ross (Hamilton East)
MacDiarmid	Ross (Middlesex East)
Macdonald	Ross (Moose Jaw)
(Brantford City)	Ross (St. Paul's)
Macdonald (Halifax)	Ross (Souris)
Macdonald	Ryan
(Kingston City)	St. Laurent
McDonald (Pontiac)	Sanderson
McGarry	Senn
McGeer	Shaw
McGibbon	Sissons
McGregor	Soper
McIlraith	Stirling
MacInnis	Stokes
McIvor	Taylor
MacKenzie	Thauvette
(Lambton-Kent)	Tomlinson
MacKenzie (Neepawa)	Tremblay
Mackenzie	Tripp
(Vancouver Centre)	Tucker
MacKinnon	Turgeon
(Edmonton West)	Tustin
MacKinnon	Veniot
(Kootenay East)	Ward
McLarty	Warren
McLean (Cape Breton)	Weir
North-Victoria)	White
McLean (Simcoe East)	Whitman
McNevin	Wood
MacNicol	Wright—202.

NAYS

Messrs:

d'Anjou	LaCroix
Dorion	Roy—5.
Lacombe

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Administration service—

427. Advisory committee on agricultural services—further amount required, $1,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: The advisory committee on agricultural services I understand was set up by representatives of leading agriculturists throughout the country, and I was wondering what special work had been done by the committee this year which would necessitate additional travelling expenses of $1,000. I do not speak in any critical mood because I know that the work of this committee is highly commended by those who are interested in this special kind of work. In a previous session I raised the question as to the further utilization of these agricultural brains throughout the country who are brought in to advise the government from time to time, and I was wondering if this increased appropriation meant that the government was extending the work of the advisory committee. If so, I commend the increase if it is going to mean that the policy of the government is being extended for the greater utilization of the advisory committee on agricultural services. I think it would commend itself to the house generally. Can the minister say anything about that?

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Acting Minister of Agriculture): The Minister of Agriculture is out of the city to-day and to-morrow. I think the explanation of the increase is that the advisory committee has been called in more frequently than was anticipated when the original amount was put in the estimates.

Item agreed to.

Science service—

428. Botany and plant pathology—further amount required, $8,907.

Mr. PERLEY: Would the minister explain what this further amount is required for? It is a considerable sum.

Mr. CRERAR: I am only the acting minister while the minister is away and possibly my knowledge of this item is no greater than that of any other member of the committee, except that in connection with many of these items there is the cost of living bonus which has probably increased the original appropriation. I think that explanation would apply also to several of the following items.

Mr. PERLEY: It is quite an amount to pay for temporary assistance. Can the minister say how many were employed and for how long?

Mr. HAZEN: I would call the minister's attention to this fact. There seems to be a distinction made between temporary assistance and the cost of living bonus. If he will turn to page 9 of these further supplementary estimates he will find under "Trade and Commerce" the item "cost of living bonus and other pay-list items" and also an item for "temporary assistance," so that temporary assistance and the cost of living bonus seem to be two different items altogether.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend is quite right. I presume that additional clerks and stenographers were required to give temporary assistance.

Mr. HAZEN: The minister cannot furnish us with the number so employed?

Mr. CRERAR: I have not the details here, and if my hon. friend wishes the details perhaps we had better let this and the other agricultural items stand until one of the officials is here.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think it would be wise to let these agricultural items stand since there are several on which I desire information.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

435. Bank inspection (inspector general of banks' office)—further amount required, $3,750.

Mr. PERLEY: Would any of this $3,750 by any chance be required for the inspection of the chartered banks following the labours of the banking and commerce committee last summer?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): No. This amount is just for the ordinary running expenses of the office of the inspector general of banks. He is an official of the government and has a certain staff.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Does this item cover the inspection of the industrial development bank? Does its inspection come under this department?

Mr. ILSLEY: The industrial development bank, to the best of my recollection, is not subject to the inspector general of banks. He has jurisdiction, I think only over the chartered banks and the Quebec savings bank.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Is the industrial development bank open for business yet?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

[Mr. Crerar.]

Mr. PERLEY: How many applications have there been already for loans from this bank and how many applications under the Farm Loan Improvement act.

Mr. ILSLEY: I tabled an answer to-day relating to the industrial development bank. While the bank has been in operation for some months, the aggregate amount of the loans is not very large. The amount was given in the answer which I tabled to-day. The hon. member for Peterborough West says that it is $79,000 up to some date in February. The act provides that a report is to be made covering certain details of the operation of the industrial development bank at the end of the fiscal year, and that report will give all the information which the statute requires.

With regard to the loans under the Farm Improvement Loans Act the regulations under that act were not completed until recently, about a month or two ago, or less than that. I think the banks are just getting into operation under that act, and I cannot get any information as to the number or volume of loans that have been made to date.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to raise a point about bank inspection which I had hoped last August to raise in connection with section 82 of the Bank Act, but owing to the hot weather I did not do so. Will the minister in the recess of parliament look into the matter of bank inspection, especially under the clause of the new act regarding the banks building skyscrapers throughout Canada? The law provides that banks may not engage in real estate except in taking collateral security. In many cases the banks, in my opinion, are violating the act in this respect, and there should be an inspection to check it up. It is important that we should know what the position of these chartered banks is, and by what right they erect these big buildings, much larger than are required for their business, and deal in real estate in the more important cities right across Canada. In seven years they revert to the crown, but the treasury board, as I understand it, can give an extension for another seven years. The act says so. The law should be carried out. The banks have certain powers, but they should not be extended to what amounts to speculation in real estate, using trust funds for the purpose of erecting all over the country buildings which compete with other mercantile institutions engaged in the building business. I repeat that I hope the treasury board will give attention to this matter. I raised this same point with the Hon. Mr. Dunning, the predecessor of the present minister, and he said he would look into it.

We have a new Bank Act, and I contend that this very important clause should be enforced. Let us have a proper system of inspection. We all remember the failure of the Home bank and the suffering which it caused, particularly in the city I come from. That failure occurred mainly through lack of inspection. Some changes have been made in the act, and I draw the committee's attention to the fact that in this respect the law is not being carried out. If a bank were to expend ten to fifteen million dollars on a large building when, for their own specific purposes, they do not require a building costing more than a million dollars, they are engaging in real estate and carrying on a regular real estate business. They do it by means of agreements which evade the purpose of the law, and apparently the banking and commerce committee overlooked the situation when the section was passed. The minister should have a conference with the inspectors and see what the banks are doing in this connection.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall look into the matter to which the hon. gentleman has referred.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Can the minister tell us where the branch of the industrial development bank is located in Alberta? I had a request this morning concerning a loan, and I do not know just where to tell the man to apply.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am sorry I do not know, either.

Mr. FAIR: Has a farmer to be in a very sound financial position with the chartered banks before he can get a loan under the farm improvement loan legislation?

Mr. ILSLEY: The banks are expected to exercise business judgment in making loans, but, naturally, with a guarantee of ten per cent of the losses, it is expected that they would lend more freely than they otherwise would.

Mr. TUSTIN: Under "bank inspection" we find "sundries"; and in the very next item, "sundries" again. If you go down these supplementaries you find quite a considerable sum of money under "sundries". Would the minister explain that? It seems that the word has been used very frequently in relation to large sums of money.

Mr. ILSLEY: One of the officials will be here shortly, and I will give the hon. gentleman some instances of "sundries".

Item agreed to.

Superannuation and retirement benefits—

§36. Superannuation and Retirement Acts, administration—further amount required, $3,000.

Mr. GILLIS: Has anything been done to correct what I consider an injustice? The minister will remember that at the last session the Minister of Justice piloted a bill through the house which changed the retirement regulations to make available funds of deceased civil servants to the stepmother. "Mother" and "father" were covered previously; "stepmother" was not. There was a case I have been working on for the past year, and when the regulations were brought in that particular section was changed to include a stepmother, so that, in my opinion, cases at that time outstanding could be rectified. When the minister was presenting this very item to the house I asked him if the proposed change would be retroactive so as to cover cases which were outstanding. His answer at that time was, maybe not; it might be necessary to have an order in council passed, but he did not think there would be any difficulty. Since the law was changed I have written to the Minister of Finance and other people endeavouring to have that particular case corrected. Apparently cases outstanding at the time of the change are not affected at all, and it appears to be impossible to get the necessary order in council. I think it is a great injustice. Whatever equity the deceased civil servant may have by way of superannuation is part of his estate; if he has a stepmother or stepfather or a next of kin the estate may be left to them, and I think that particular money should accrue to it. The minister is familiar, I believe, with the case I am talking about. Is there a chance of having anything done to benefit cases outstanding at the time this provision was changed?

Mr. ILSLEY: I would say, no. I would be pretty firm on that, for this reason. The law has to be administered as it is at the time. I do not remember the details of the case, although I know that the hon. gentleman wrote me and I replied to him, I think about as I am replying now. When the law is changed so as to let in another class of beneficiaries it applies to the deaths in the future, to what takes place after the act is passed. If it did not, one would have to go back one year, two years, three years and so on, and there would be no real limit on grounds of justice as to the time to which one could go back. I do not think we dare start that.

The hon. gentleman says that the fund is part of the estate of the deceased; but that is not the theory on which the Superannuation Act is constructed. The fund is in the nature of insurance for the retiring civil servant and for certain named classes of dependents; if he does not have any dependants it does not go to anybody, and that is the reason for the rates. The rates are constructed on that basis. If that were not so, if it were just paid in any event to somebody, I suppose that the rates payable ought to be considerably higher. I do not think we can deal retroactively with those cases, because that was the law at the time, and the cases were dealt with in accordance with that law. While the treatment of the civil servant on superannuation who retires after the change in the law is better than it is in the case of one who died before, that is often the fact when laws are changed; it is almost impossible to give them retroactive effect.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not satisfied. The minister's argument is all right up to a point. I do not say that it should be paid to anybody at all, but the injustice in this particular case was recognized by a change in the regulations. The regulations must have been too rigid or they would not have been changed, and they were changed to include this particular category. Perhaps the reason for the change was largely the fact that many people were bringing pressure to bear on the particular case I had in mind. It was really a matter of destitute circumstances in the family and there was injustice there which necessitated a change in the regulations. Personally, I suggest that, for a particular case, if there are extenuating circumstances an order in council is quite in order, seeing that we have passed thousands since the outbreak of the war. I am still suggesting, in accordance with the observation of the Minister of Justice when he piloted the bill through, that it should not be difficult to pass an order in council in a case where there are at least extenuating circumstances, and the one I had in mind was certainly such a case.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member for Lethbridge asked me where persons resident in Alberta should apply if they desired to get in touch with the industrial development bank. Apparently they apply at Vancouver. The memorandum I have is to the effect that if they are located in Alberta or British Columbia application should be made to the Vancouver office. Apparently there is not yet an office in every province.

Item agreed to.

437. Government's contribution to the superannuation fund—further amount required, $40,795.

Mr. O'NEILL: A civil servant receiving a salary of $150 a month and a bonus of $18 a month pays income tax on the $150 plus the $18, but in contributing to the fund he is not permitted to contribute on the $18, and that makes quite a difference in the course of four or five years in figuring out the superannuation of that employee. Can the minister explain how the conclusion was arrived at?

[Mr. Ilesley.]

Mr. ILSLEY: The cost of living bonus may be of temporary duration and does not become part of the salary of the civil servant. His salary is that set up in the classification and the cost of living bonus is a war-time addition. I do not know how long it will continue or whether it will be increased or reduced, but it has never been regarded as part of his permanent salary for superannuation purposes. I do not think the fact that income tax is payable on it is relevant. It is a certain part of his income but it is not part of his permanent salary, and it is on his permanent salary that he is superannuated.

Mr. BOUCHER: Has this item anything to do with the policy adopted last session where certain prevailing rates employees were permitted to take advantage of the Superannuation Act?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not the details of this before me. Does the hon. gentleman wish to have the item stand?

Mr. BOUCHER: Possibly the minister could tell me whether the item has anything to do with the adoption last session of the principle whereby certain prevailing rates employees were allowed to take advantage of the superannuation fund. I thought it might have something to do with that. If so, it would indicate that comparatively few are given that privilege.

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot tell whether that is what necessitated the additional amount. I suggest that I might write to the hon. gentleman giving the information. If, however, he thinks it is a matter of sufficient public interest to warrant having the item stand it can be held over.

Mr. BOUCHER: I would be glad to let the item pass on the understanding that I shall get the information, but I should like to know to what extent the prevailing rates employees were given the advantage of the legislation passed last year and to what extent government contributions were made in that regard.

Mr. ILSLEY: All right.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

438. To provide for transportation, dressing and dyeing, and other expenses incidental to receiving and disposing of fur seal skins accruing to Canada pursuant to provisional fur seal agreement between Canada and United States by exchange of notes dated December 8 and 19, 1942—further amount required, $85,000.

Mr. STIRLING: Will the minister explain how the crop belonging to Canada has worked out this year?

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Minister of Fisheries): This year we had to have the fur skins processed in the United States instead of in Great Britain owing to labour conditions there. We would have been unable to get delivery fast enough to meet the market requirements in Canada, and we have to pay so much more in customs duties. That makes up the difference. We had 3,977 fur skins processed and the customs duty was $88,096.20, which made an excess of $85,000.

Mr. STIRLING: Is it not a fact that Canada's share, now that Japan is out of it, has increased materially and consequently we have a larger crop?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): It is not due to that fact. It is due to the excise and customs duties which we have had to pay because we had them processed in the United States instead of in England. For the last two or three years we have had more fur skins than before since Japan has been out of it.

Mr. BROOKS: As I understand, the raw fur goes to the United States to be processed and is returned to Canada.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes.

Mr. BROOKS: Why should there be customs duty on that?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Because those are the regulations. We have to pay the war tax and the war exchange tax and excise and customs. It is only a book entry.

Mr. BROOKS: Do we get the money back?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Is that the case, though? Do you get the money back when the cured skins are returned.

Mr. MICHAUD: When the skins are sold on the market.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister explain it?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We sold our skins for $282,000 and it cost $158,000, so we had a net of $123,000, but out of that we had to pay customs duty on the processed skins.

Mr. BROOKS: Is it not possible that the skins might remain in the United States and then you would have to pay customs duty on those remaining?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes, but there is duty paid to our own customs on those coming back.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

439. Departmental administration—further amount required, $28,000.

Mr. MacINNIS: I should like to say a few words on this item which comes under departmental administration. It will be a long time before we can again discuss any matters relating to labour and there are two or three things which are causing discontent in the ranks of labour at the present time. I refer to certain parts of P.C. 1003, and the other is wage control order P.C. 9384. One of these orders was passed in December, 1943, and the other, I believe, in February, 1944. I understand that changes in these orders have been advocated ever since they were passed. As a matter of fact, when P.C. 9384 was passed in December, 1943, a storm of protest, such as was seldom heard in the labour movement, occurred right across Canada. Some amendments were made to this order, but it is still unsatisfactory because the chief objection to it was not removed. There was considerable comment on this order during the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne in the session of 1944, and I myself drew attention to what I considered to be the chief trouble with this order. It is called a wage control order, but I pointed out at the time that the title was a misnomer. I said that it was not a wage control order at all; that it was a wage stabilizing order; and that is made clear in section 14, paragraph (a) of the order itself, which reads as follows:

It is the purpose of this order:

(a) to provide for the establishment of wage rates incorporating therein cost of living bonuses, payable in respect of the rise in the cost of living; and

(b) to stabilize the wage structure in Canada established in this manner in order to maintain stability in prices and prevent increases in the general cost of living; and

(c) to provide machinery for an orderly rectification of any gross inequalities and injustices in wage rates so established, in so far as this is possible consistently with the paramount principle of the maintenance of the stability in prices, and this order shall be administered and enforced to give effect to these purposes.

That is to give effect to the purpose of maintaining prices. My contention of that time has been supported quite recently by no less eminent an authority than the national war labour board itself. I shall read from their decision in that regard. The national board was dealing with a particular wage case, that of the employees of the Canada Starch Company. The decision was given on November 28, 1944. In this case the Ontario regional war labour board ordered or recommended an increase in wages of five and five and a half cents an hour. On an appeal by the company, the national board in referring to the recommendation of the regional board said this:

The war labour boards are given power to authorize or direct increases of wage rates thus established only to the extent necessary to rectify a gross injustice or gross inequality.

Then they go on to interpret "gross injustice" and "gross inequality" as a glaring or a flagrant injustice or inequality. Prior to that time regional war labour boards felt free to deal with cases on their merits, depending on conditions in the municipalities in which the cases arose. But the ruling of the war labour board no longer allows the regional board to do that. As a matter of fact, as I mentioned in February, 1944, the result of this order is not to regulate wages; it is to freeze injustices. And I may say, quoting again from the decision of the board:

To say that the purpose of an order is to stabilize the wage structure, as we understand the term, is to say that wage rates must remain stable and unchanged, unless an applicant can establish that his case meets the strict test laid down.

And the strict test is that the condition complained of is a glaring or flagrant injustice or inequality. It does not matter how low the wages are or how much they are out of line with other wages, unless it is, in the opinion of the board, a glaring and flagrant injustice they must remain as they are.

The national board's decision goes on to say:

The regional board here appears to have proceeded upon the basis of what it thought to be fair and reasonable rates. But we must say that the war labour boards under the governing order in council P.C. 9384, are not fair wage boards or minimum wage boards; they are wage stabilization boards set up to administer a set of specific rules.

Nothing can be clearer than that. I repeat, I drew this to the attention of the house more than a year ago. I showed that the regional boards had no authority to deal with the situation on the basis of the more intimate knowledge they would have of the conditions prevailing in these cases. But here is the peculiar thing in the decision of the national war labour board. They took the case as if it had been referred to them in the first instance. They disallowed the five and five and a half cents recommended by the Ontario board, but they granted three cents which the company was prepared to grant. In granting the three cents this is what they said:

Having in mind the nature of the employer's operations and their location, we find that these rates, when the three cents that the company is prepared to pay is added to them, compare very favourably with the rates paid by industries similarly located.

A few paragraphs above the national board says that the regional boards are not fair wage boards or minimum wage boards, that they are stabilizing boards. They themselves, on the very same principle, grant an increase; mind you, an increase that the company was already prepared to pay.

I submit that there should be better coordination between the operations of the regional boards and the operations of the national war labour board. In my own city of Vancouver there was a most flagrant demonstration of lack of coordination between the operation of the national and regional boards. In a case concerning the street railway employees and the railway company the regional board gave a general award of 3½ cents an hour. On appeal the national board wiped out this award completely. The employees went on strike. The board here laid down an ultimatum that it would not further consider the matter unless the employees went back to work. In return I believe the employees issued an ultimatum that they would not return to work until the national board withdrew its ultimatum. In other words, ultimatums were thrown around pretty freely. The amazing thing in that case was that the Minister of Labour stepped in—I am not finding fault with him—or his national officers stepped in, and they were negotiating with these employees right along until a settlement was reached. Perhaps a little more could be said about that matter, but I am not going to bother saying it now.

I should like to impress upon the minister the importance of making amendments that will deal effectively with the point I have just drawn to his attention, a point that is causing a great deal of trouble. Personally I believe that more weight should be given by the national board to the rulings or recommendations of the provincial boards.

I should like to draw attention to another matter, which I mentioned over a year ago; that is, that the burden of maintaining the price structure, as far as labour is concerned, is placed upon the shoulders of the lowest paid workers in the less protected industries. Workers employed in an industry that is essential and more or less protected can usually have their grievances attended to by a stoppage of work, whether the stoppage is legal or illegal. Employees in a poorly paid industry, which is not sheltered and in which, because of that fact, wages are particularly low, can do nothing but grin and and bear it. I do not think that is a satisfactory state of affairs.

I should like now to say a few words about the labour code or labour relations order, P.C. 1003. There are three particular amendments which are long overdue as far as this order is concerned. I believe the order itself was a step in the right direction, and was, I think, welcomed by everyone interested in harmonious relations between employers and workers in industry. The first amendment that should be made to this order is in section 5, which deals with the certification of bargaining representatives. It is not the bargaining representatives who need to be certified but the bargaining agency. Once the bargaining agency is determined that agency itself will appoint its representatives. All through this order, however, reference is made to bargaining representatives, and to that extent the order does not recognize trade unions at all. If it were not for the fact that in subsection 3 of section 4 reference is made to a collective agreement, which can only be an agreement between a trade union or an employees' organization and the employers, a person would have no alternative but to come to the conclusion that the purpose was not to recognize trade unions as such. That is a matter which I believe should be rectified.

My second point is that the determination of the bargaining agency should be by a majority of those voting, at least if more than fifty per cent of the employees concerned vote. The principle that the union must have a majority of all the employees of the plant is, in my opinion, wrong. If it were applied in this house very few hon. members would be able to take their seats here; yet we feel that we are democratically elected. Therefore I would suggest to the minister that he give close attention to the desirability of amending this provision.

My third point concerns something that is not in the code but which should be in it. I believe company unions should be outlawed, definitely and completely. They have no place in the relations between employers and employees, and there can be no democratic organization of workers as long as company unions continue to exist. I should like the minister to look into these matters, and I am sure he will find that the points I have raised are causing discontent in the rank and file of the organized labour movement in this country.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): First of all my hon. friend dealt with the wage stabilization order, P.C. 9384. I want to tell my hon. friend very frankly, and I think I say it without fear of successful contradiction, that the price and wage stabilization policy of this government has done more for the working men and women and the farmers of this country than any legislation ever placed on the statute books by any government.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is not on the statute books.

Mr. MITCHELL: Then we will say anything introduced as a policy under the War Measures Act by any government. What is the record? At the present time the agricultural income of this country is $1,800,000,000, or more than three times what it was in 1935. If my memory serves me correctly, and I think it does, the wage bill of this country in 1939 was $2,300,000,000. To-day it is $4,800,000,000. Since the introduction of this wage-freezing policy about which my hon. friend has spoken the cost of living index in this country has gone up 3.1 per cent. In the same length of time in the last war it went up twenty times as much, which is some indication of what this policy has done for the people of this dominion.

Looking into the future may I say that no instrument devised by man is perfect. If there are any of these perfect people in this country I should like to take a look at them and give them jobs at their own salaries. Some of the people who have criticized this policy most vehemently will be those who at the conclusion of the war will demand its retention. Those who are as old as I am—my hon. friend is probably a couple of years older—will have a vivid recollection of what took place at the conclusion of the last war. At that time there was absolutely no control; there was complete anarchy in the price structure of this country. The cost of living increased roughly one hundred per cent from 1914. I have a vivid recollection of all that after coming back from the last war.

I can remember paying $60 for a suit of clothes that was not worth $15. I can remember when sugar was twenty-five cents a pound and when I had to pay ninety cents a pound for my first Christmas chicken dinner. Potatoes on the Hamilton market were selling, not by the bag or basket but by the potato. If you look over the world in general at the moment you will find that in those countries where they have had no control of prices and the other things necessary with it, there is chaos and disorganization. All you have to do is think of China at the moment when aeroplanes are flying in currency from the Himalayas to bolster up the chaotic conditions brought about by inflation.

I would say this, and it is a matter of opinion, that possibly some of the conditions that existed in Greece were brought about largely by the complete collapse and the inflationary movement of currency which took place there. Who is it that suffers under those conditions? It is not the big fellows whom my hon. friends like to talk about; it is the average man and woman on the street. The big fellow is often able to pay his obligations in what some people are apt to call phoney money. I have always held the opinion that it is not the amount of money you have in your hand or pocket that counts; it is what you can get for that money after you have it.

I have a vivid recollection, and I suppose my hon. friends have also, of the inflationary movement that took place in Germany. At one time they reached such a stage that they were paying people twice a day and giving them a half hour off in which to spend their money, because if they kept it more than an hour it was valueless. When it comes to regimentation and discipline I doubt if there are any people in the world superior to the German people.

I think it is a great tribute to the Canadian people—I am not accusing my hon. friends of this—that notwithstanding the sniping of irresponsible persons against this courageous action they understand what it is for and have cooperated in order to make possible this price and wage stabilization policy.

I think this is the only country in the world where both the regional and national boards are representative, apart from the chairmen, of both industry and labour. As we all know, in the United States the general public is represented, while in Australia they have special courts for this purpose. I think the degree of cooperation we have had by responsible persons in the administration of this policy speaks well for the future.

My hon. friend talked about groups who were organized, or whatever the case may be. I would call this price and wage stabilization policy a charter and set-up for the defenceless people of this country, particularly for our womenfolk who have to spend the money after the men have earned it. It has imperfections like any other document prepared by human beings, but I would suggest to those persons who would adopt toward this policy an attitude the nature of which might cause its break-down that they look more closely into it before they go too far.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Whatever government may be occupying these benches, even if it is my good friends of the C.C.F. or my good friends of the opposition, they will find it necessary to maintain a policy of this description, particularly in the post-war period when you will have the emotional let-down which you get after any great war such as the one we have passed through and where you have the demand for consumer goods such as we had after the last war and such as we shall probably have after this one. That will be the testing time of the policy. It will be just as difficult to maintain that policy at that time as it was at the time when we were the only nation of the united nations that went out to stabilize this kind of thing away back in 1941 or 1942. I do not think I can say much more about that at the moment. I have sketched in particular and general terms what I think is necessary.

As I said, it is easy to criticize and I appreciate constructive criticism either in this house or outside it. But it is not going to be said of me that I had anything to do with the breaking down of the living standards of the great masses of the people of this dominion. Let other persons take the doubtful honour of advocating a policy or putting out propaganda of that kind.

I come now to P.C. 1003 and I appreciate the constructive criticism of my hon. friend. This was a revolutionary document in the sense that for the first time in the history of this country the basic principles of trade union agreements or the right of the workers to organize was adopted as a policy of the national government. What did we have to do? Under normal circumstances labour relations, under the constitution of this country, come within the purview or the orbit of the provincial governments. First of all we held a conference with all the provincial governments at which the basic principle of the right to organize was agreed upon.

We then consulted with labour organizations and with the employers and we drafted what we thought was a pretty fair basic document. We sent copies to the provinces, to the labour organizations and to the employers' organization. In return we received 170 suggested amendments to the document. We endeavoured to weave as many of those amendments as we could into the original document, and after there had been perusal by all the parties who had taken part in the framing of the document approval was announced by labour, by the provincial governments and by the employers.

I am ready to admit that when you deal with labour relations there cannot be any finality. I stated that when I announced this in the House of Commons. It is like a trade union agreement. I am sure that one of the brotherhoods in my hon. friend's own organization has accused the officers of negotiating an agreement through which you could drive a coach-and-four. I think it speaks well for the draftsmanship that only three amendments have been suggested. After all is said and done, a trade union agreement is not a legal document but is something that is based on character, good will and conciliation on both sides, and you will find in the labour organizations of this country that an agreement which has been reached with an approach of that kind has stood the test of time. Neither the one side nor the other can call the other side a scoundrel to-day and expect to make a satisfactory trade union agreement to-morrow.

Take the railroad organizations in this country. Speaking in a broad and general way they are probably the best paid and have the best relationships with their employers across the table of any industry in Canada. I suppose that in the course of time we shall be asked by responsible national organizations on both sides of the fence and by some of the provincial governments to make amendments, but I think my hon. friend will agree with me that under normal and stable relationships, whoever may make suggestions for amendments, it is necessary that the original parties to the drafting of the agreement be consulted. I think that is the only fair and proper course to pursue and my hon. friend may rest assured that when the time comes that will be done.

This must be, at all events, a half decent document because in the first year of its operation, strikes in this country were reduced by over fifty per cent. The proof of the pudding is in the eating. I think the credit belongs not only to the trade unions but in a measure to the employers in this country. It indicates also that the document has been drafted in the direction of stable labour relations. I hope I have answered some of the points my hon. friend raised.

On the economic side I think the policy of this government was courageous. It was a policy that has been followed by most of the nations. On the labour relations side we have laid at least the foundation-stone of stable labour relations in the Dominion of Canada, provided there is conciliation on both sides and the ability to see the other fellow's point of view.

Mr. MacINNIS: I should like to say one word in reply. If the Minister of Labour had begun on the note on which he ended I would not have said anything because I simply wanted to bring certain things to his attention. But when he tries to leave the impression with the house that we here, and myself in particular, want to wipe away all regulations, he is just talking nonsense. All this talk about carrying an aeroplane load of paper money and all that sort of thing does not do credit either to the minister himself or to the house, and the same is true of what he told us about what happened in Germany after the last war. That sort of talk is just nonsense, and no one knows it better than my hon. friend. I have no desire to see all regulations removed. As a matter of fact, no one in this house realizes the need for regulations better than I do, and the need for them after the war too. What my hon. friend told us about what happened after the end of the last war happened, be it remembered, under free enterprise.

Mr. MITCHELL: It was the same thing in Germany under socialism.

Mr. MacINNIS: But they did not have much opportunity to cooperate. These are the things I want my hon. friend to remember.

There is another thing I want him to remember when he talks about strikes. There is an abnormal situation in the labour movement to-day, and I think the minister knows it, that makes for harmony. That situation may be changed very quickly because those who are most insistent upon maintaining harmony to-day were only a short time ago the militant ones in the labour movement who did not want harmony to exist. Anything may happen any day to put them on the other side of the fence, so that the minister should not be too complacent about the conditions in industry at this time. I happen to know from my experience in the labour movement just how these things go, and I am not a bit too sanguine about how long this harmony is going to last.

Mr. DIFENBAKER: There are one or two points on which I should like some information from the minister. They arise out of a statement made by the hon. member who preceded me. It is in connection with the surveys which have taken place during the past year with a view to assuring a higher degree of employment after the war than many of those who are defeatist believe will be possible. I have read with considerable interest a number of speeches delivered by the minister at various times since the last session with regard to this important matter, which indicate that he is giving thoughtful consideration to this problem, which is of transcendent importance to the people of Canada and of the other countries of the world.

The question that I have in mind is this. What is the government now doing and what has it done to assure employment after the war, especially in view of the reduction in production in war industry that is now taking place and will take place on an ever-increasing scale during the ensuing months? I read that the minister said some weeks ago over the radio that Canada had a very fine set-up in connection with the matter of post-war employment. He went on to say, and this is a sentiment that I am not critical of:

I am one of those who believe that we can have full employment in peace as we have had during the war.

But he added these significant words in that radio speech of his about a month ago.

But merely to state that there will be a job for everybody willing to work will not produce that job.

One of the acts of this government has been to appoint under the labour department a committee designed to survey post-war employment possibilities in this country. The committee has made its report but the report has never been produced to parliament, although it has been asked for on several occasions since it was made. Up to now it remains the secret of the government and is not available to the public at large. We in this parliament have the right to ask that this report be produced, or in any event that it be brought down to the last of February, so that at this session we shall be able to discuss this important matter. If we do not discuss it here, certainly it will receive discussion during the days ahead of the election which apparently is at hand. None of us who believe in the system of free enterprise will have any indication as to the plans that the Department of Labour has worked out through its experts to the end that the largest degree of employment which is possible to be achieved will in fact be achieved. Therefore I ask the minister to produce this report. He has been asked for it on a number of occasions, not in the house but during the period while the house was not in session, and as yet there has been no indication that the government is prepared to produce this report.

There is another matter on which I should like the minister to outline the plan of the government. It has to do with the 250,000 women who are to-day employed in the various war industries. The reason I ask that question is that when the minister was in Winnipeg some time in November last the question was asked him there, according to the Winnipeg Free Press, as to what plans he had with respect to employment in other industry, or what plans in general he had with reference to these women who of necessity, with the reduction in war production, will find themselves unemployed. The answer he gave as recorded in the press was a simple, "I don't know." I think by now, having regard to the survey which has been made, the minister will have a plan that will bring at least a degree of hope to these women who have patriotically sacrificed during the period of the war in order to assure full production.

I come to a further matter, which has to do with agriculture. I find, in "Canada at War", the March issue, that the manpower situation in so far as industry as well as agriculture are concerned is reviewed at some length, and it is there stated that in high priority industries in Canada to-day, exclusive of agriculture, there are approximately ninety thousand vacancies. It goes on to point out that as far as agriculture is concerned there is a serious shortage to-day, and that it is expected that the farm labour situation will be more difficult to cope with in the coming season of 1945 than in 1944. I realize the difficulties in connection with agriculture, and something of what the farmers have had to put up with to-day, something of the difficulties which they are experiencing in families where the old people are looking after the agricultural work on the farm, having two, three and four sons in the armed forces; and I am glad to see that the minister intends to do something in order to relieve this situation. But as far as I can see, the plans to-day are still in the nature of paper plans. They look fine on paper, but when it comes to implementing these plans the difficulties begin. I remember well that in June, 1944, the minister stated that the Department of Labour was going to interview individually the 500,000 men who were rejected from service in the armed forces, with a view to removing them where necessary to more essential employment. As far as agriculture is concerned the numbers that have been moved to agriculture are insignificant compared with the numbers in general that have been moved. As a matter of fact, the situation to-day as far as manpower is concerned is quite serious for the men who come back from overseas.

I was in Regina the other day, and in conversation there with a man well aware of the rehabilitation plans of the government, when I asked him what positions are available to-day in so far as my own province is concerned for the men who return from overseas, the answer is, "All we have is jobs on the farms and in the mines; practically nothing else". This is a serious matter. These men coming back to-day in dribbles find themselves unable to secure work. What will the situation be when there is complete demobilization.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

I know the minister put out further amendments—an amendment to the national selective service civilian regulations on March 19, and again great powers are given to the department. The department is given authority to direct any male of sixteen to sixty-five years, whether employed or unemployed, to a job in agriculture. That, as the minister said in his recent speech at Windsor, just establishes still further the fact that no man in the history of Canada is as powerful or has been as powerful as he.

I ask the minister to advise how many men were directed to agriculture by his department during 1944; how many men to-day, according to the census which was recently made by the department, is it anticipated will have to be transferred to agriculture in order to maintain the production which is so necessary to the war effort, and particularly at this time, when food shortages are occurring in various parts of the world.

I am in entire agreement with this amendment. It gives the minister power to do these things. I ask him how is it intended to carry out the powers which have been granted? Powers which are unused are worthless. He has a power which I do not think he enjoyed before in this connection. He now has the power to authorize the payment of workers' transportation and the removal expenses of workers' families to such areas during such periods as he may approve. What is he going to do? What are his immediate plans, with the approach of spring work, to assure that available employees will be made available to agriculture in all parts of Canada? To what degree is it intended to utilize the information which was secured in 1944 by the survey of the men who were found unfit for the armed services, to be made available for agriculture?

I realize that the minister has a difficult job in this connection, and what I am saying this evening is not in a critical vein; it is designed merely to get information; for everywhere in my province, where the man-power from the farms has gone forth to war in a manner which has earned the commendation of the people of Canada as a whole, those who are on the farms are saying, "Our boys are overseas, they are serving, and we are not complaining, but we ask the minister immediately to let us know whether or not during the present year the necessary man-power will be rendered available." I ask the minister to discuss this matter at some length, to place before the country at this time his plans, to take the people into his confidence, because the farmers of Canada, too, realize not only the problem but at the same time the solution which is available at his hands by reason of the survey which has been made.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is a pretty tall order. I thought these were just the supplementary estimates, and the war estimates will be before the committee after the supplementaries have been dealt with.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This is not a war estimate.

Mr. MITCHELL: Selective service comes under the war estimates. But I have no objection to facing up to his queries. In the first place he referred to something I said about facing up to the post-war period. In that connection I make this prediction. It will depend upon those who are administering the affairs of the country, because, like my hon. friend, I believe in free enterprise, and I think it is an obvious fact that if you do not know what makes the clock tick before you get responsibility you will never know because you will not have time to learn; you will be too busy.

When you compare the expansion in the agricultural, industrial and economic structure of the country, when you take into consideration the men we have put into the fighting forces, I think any fair observer will agree that we have not done a bad job. Of course, anything can be made to look all right on paper, but that is something like the writing of a symphony. You can write a policy and make it look all right on paper, but if my hon. friends opposite are ever fortunate enough, or perhaps unfortunate enough to be sitting where we are sitting they will find that the experience is not quite the same as the anticipation. A man may write a symphony but he does not know what it will sound like until it comes out of the organ. In the same way, it does not matter what kind of government you have, you have to try the legislation you pass on the men and women of the nation.

My hon. friends, I think, will agree with me that the engineering of material things is simple compared with the engineering of human beings. That is a very difficult science, and, I repeat, when you take all the facts into account we have not done a bad job.

My hon. friend spoke about something I said in Winnipeg. Well, that previous statement I made about what makes the clock tick goes there too. I sincerely believe that with the right kind of policy we need have no fear of the post-war period in this country, but if we are to have any disorganization and conflict of ideas, with a government that is not strong enough to govern, we do not know what we can expect. I do not think we can continue to go forward as we have done in this war unless we have stable government in Canada. Surely that is elementary. We do not know what will happen in Europe. He would be a wise man who would prophesy what the condition will be in Germany six months or a year from now, or what the condition will be in France, or Italy, or Greece, or any of the liberated countries six months or a year from now.

With regard to any nation that has ever amounted to anything in the history of the world, you will find that its prosperity has been predicated on its ability to trade, and that brings in the question of finance as well as tariffs and all the other inter-related problems.

Another question my hon. friend raised was the survey. I do not suppose that was the first survey ever made in this country whether by government or by my hon. friends or by the C.C.F. As I said the other day, I have a vivid recollection of their leader saying eighteen months ago that by last spring there would be an unemployment problem involving one hundred thousand. What was the real situation? Last spring we had one of the tightest labour conditions in the history of the country and had it not been for the mechanics of selective service I do not know what we would have done.

I do not think any political organization, no matter what its composition may be, no matter what its philosophy or its economic theories or form of government, can get into power and stay there on the basis of a fear complex, because that is a dangerous thing. The approach should be positive rather than negative, not too much pie in the sky. Politicians, of course, have to spread a little bit around but I would issue this warning: When you people get the population into the clouds you have to get them down again. Do not forget that.

An hon. MEMBER: It is the richest country in the world.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, but you cannot build a country on phony money. I have a simple definition of money. I have expressed it before and I may repeat it now: If it isn't hard to get it isn't money. I suppose all hon. members here know perfectly well what took place after the last war; they know what the conditions were not only in Canada but in the countries of Europe. I can remember the various changes in government that took place in Great Britain and I think it is fair to say that the policies of some of those governments were based on what I have called pie in the sky. When they got responsibility, they just did not know what to do.

[Mr Mitchell.]

My hon. friend mentioned figures and spoke of a continuing survey. When it is completed, if it is worth publishing, it will be published, but I am always afraid of any fellow who walks around with a stack of figures under his arm. I remember in the old depression days many people in this country thought they had a solution if only they had a tabulation giving the number of people unemployed in the country.

An hon. MEMBER: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. MITCHELL: Please do not interrupt; I will be here until April 16 if necessary. I am not running away from it. To revert to what I was saying a moment ago, however, I maintained in those days that it was not figures we wanted but jobs. I can well remember, as I am sure the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) can, the discussions we used to have in this house about the unemployables. To-day all those unemployables have disappeared like the snow in the spring. They are at work. You cannot call men and women unemployable until you have offered them jobs which they cannot take, and if we concentrate on jobs rather than statistics we shall get ahead. So much for statistics.

Now I come to farm labour.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is the minister going to produce this survey of his own experts?

Mr. MITCHELL: I answered that the other day; you will find it at page 149 of Hansard.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: What does it say?

Mr. MITCHELL: You can read, you went to school. My hon. friend is a schoolteacher and if he can make a thing so complicated that he does not understand it himself he thinks I should.

With regard to the farm labour situation, I would say very seriously that every year it gives us cause for grave concern. Let us be frank and honest about it. You cannot take half a million people off the farms, put nearly a million people in uniform and increase your industrial structure by about three quarters of a million—I am guessing on that figure—and still be where you were before. That is elementary. But what we have been able to do since the outbreak of this war, to the undying credit of the farmers of this country, is to take off bigger and bigger crops every year. That has been made possible. I remember the decisions that I had to make when I first came into the ministry and saw the tremendous drain from the farms of the country. We had to say to the people in agriculture: You cannot leave; you cannot be called up.

I would say to my hon. friend, if he is ever a cabinet minister—sometimes it is a pretty lonely place; it is the end of the road—he will have to say yes or no. If he is ever fortunate or unfortunate enough to be in my position I hope that he will have to make some of the decisions that I have had to make from day to day. That was one thing we had to do. At the moment I think it may be clearly stated that the agricultural people of Canada have been treated from the man-power point of view, or the problem has been faced from the man-power point of view in a more practical way possibly than in any other country of the united nations. At the moment there are roughly 168,000 people on postponement in agriculture compared with only 33,000 in the industrial structure of the country. That should give some indication of how we have faced up to the problem.

May I pay a tribute to every provincial government. They cooperated wholeheartedly with the federal government. Last year we spent upwards of $600,000 in the movement and placing of men and women in the agricultural structure of the country in the on and off seasons. We moved people from Ontario to the west. We moved men from the farms in the winter to the basic industries and back to the farms in the summer. We tried to take advantage of the peculiar climatic conditions in this country and swing the man-power back from the two structures in the off seasons. Of course that had to be regulated by the seasons. I am sure hon. members will appreciate some of the difficulties with which we were confronted in working out this plan. When you get the plan on paper and you are confronted with a problem of this magnitude it is sometimes very difficult to predict the future. What we endeavour to do is to move the people in conformity with the close and start of the season in different parts of Canada. I think we have been reasonably successful. We have received cooperation from the provinces. What we set out to do was to mobilize the man-power in the particular provinces to the best of our ability.

Mr. SENN: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. SENN: In regard to the movement of farm labour from one part of the country to another does the minister not think it would have been wise, particularly when we have price ceilings, to regulate the wages of these men as well as their movement?

Mr. MITCHELL: I appreciate the problem the hon. member has raised. I will answer it.

I do not mind my trend of thought being broken. I do not know of anything more difficult than the regulation of wages in agriculture in Canada. We tried to do that with the soldiers, when we took them out of the army and put them on the farms, and we got into endless trouble. In one province there may be different wage structures in two adjoining counties. It is a most difficult thing. We did give it some thought but we had to give it up because of the urgency of the situation. We thought it would probably do more harm than good if we attempted regulating the wages. I appreciate my hon. friend's question. It is a difficult question and it has worked hardship in certain parts of the country on both sides of the fence from the point of view of the employer and the employees.

May I continue with the mobilization of man-power for agriculture? We also have an arrangement with our American friends, particularly in western Canada, where combines are brought in from the Dakotas and Montana to Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba and back to the Dakotas again, to help one another out. Then we have the men on leave from the armed forces; but the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence can best explain that to you.

We have gone a step farther this year. Under selective service we can direct anybody to agriculture. I would make this prediction: before this year ends the food situation in the world will be more desperate than munitions ever were. That is my firm conviction. I am guessing and I may be wrong. But I think the greatest problem will confront us in the, I hope, not very distant future, and that will be the food problem. The mobilization of man-power in its broadest aspects should not be treated as a political question; it should be treated as a national question. We talked of the man-power muddle and all that sort of thing three or four years ago. Obviously when you set out to organize a nation you are bound to be in a little bit of a muddle at first. But so far as agriculture is concerned I think it can be truthfully said that the farmers, in cooperation with the provinces, and may I say that people particularly in the smaller towns of the various provinces in Canada, have done a man-sized job in the production of foodstuffs in this country. So far as I am concerned, let the credit go where it may. So long as we get the job done I am satisfied. If there is any hon. member who has any ideas on the man-power side of production in agriculture, I should like to hear from him, because it is not a party question, it is too important for that.

I have tried to do the best I could with the questions that were asked. I hope I have answered them to the satisfaction of the hon. member. If there are any more I shall do the best I can with them. I should like the hon. member to appreciate the fact that I am speaking largely from memory. I have a large department.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): While endorsing the request of the hon. member for Lake Centre, I should like to say a word about agricultural labour. The minister told us first of all of what a great job stabilization had done for industrial and agricultural labour. I entirely disagree with him that agricultural labour is stabilized. I am one of those who had asked the Minister of Agriculture every session to try to do something to stabilize agricultural labour, to establish wages in this country in the interests of both labour and his employer, the farmer. I think some attempt should be made to do that. The question has been raised by the hon. member for Haldimand to-night and by other hon. members during the past session. While there are directives to send men from other industries to the farms, it is in a most unhealthy situation to-day because industrial wages are still much better than farm wages, notwithstanding that farm labour wages have more than doubled since the commencement of this war.

The minister spoke of the agricultural income which has certainly multiplied since the commencement of this war. I would also remind him that agricultural production has increased over thirty-three per cent during that time also, and the plight of the farmers, at least in my part of the country and throughout the prairies, is much worse to-day than it has ever been since 1919. There is no argument about that at all. We have old people selling out and leaving their farms idle this summer. That is happening right in my community. It is a very difficult problem. I agree with the minister when he says we are likely to have a national food shortage. I am afraid of that too.

Mr. MITCHELL: I did not say that; I spoke of international conditions.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I was going to enlarge on that and say that if we did our duty internationally we would have a food shortage. I am sorry the Minister of Agriculture is unavoidably absent this evening, because I believe these two departments should be very closely linked together. I argued these matters a year ago, and I do not think the Minister of Agriculture was very much impressed with what I had to say. However, I have looked up my remarks at that time, and I am sorry to say that the predictions I made then, purely as a guess, have come true to-day. Look at the decreased hog production, the decrease in dairy production, and so on. What I said a year ago was only my opinion, but those statements are being borne out to-day. Our hog production is down some thirty-two per cent throughout this country, and it will be much lower before the end of the year.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. WOOD: Do not overlook the fact that beef production is up.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I grant that, but we should not be very proud of the way we are handling beef production in this country. It is true that beef production is up twenty-five or thirty per cent, but the way we are handling it is nothing of which to be very proud.

Mr. WOOD: You are the only one beefing about it.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): If you will just keep your seat you will have plenty of chance to ask questions later on.

The CHAIRMAN: While this is a wide open discussion I suggest that agriculture should not enter into it at the moment.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am speaking about agricultural labour, which I think is very much to the point right now. As I have said, I still believe the Department of Labour should do something to regulate farm wages. During the last harvest we had people who were afraid they would not ask enough money for their labour, so that they did not want to work at all. But you will always get some farmer who will pay these ridiculously high wages that are asked; then the whole wage situation is ruined in that particular community. I believe the government should have taken some action in that connection. I am not advocating cheap farm labour at all; I believe a scale of wages should be set up in fairness to the farm labourer and in fairness to the industrial worker. That is what I have advocated since the beginning of this war, and I believe the government should have tackled that problem.

The minister suggested that our man-power question was perhaps a muddle some years ago but that the situation was better to-day. I maintain that the man-power situation is as serious to-day as it has been at any time in the past, particularly in regard to agriculture. I have never asked that men should be left on the farms to deplete the armed services. Far from it; I do not think any member of this house has done more than I have to try to get men into the armed services. But I believe we should have had a definite man-power policy, and no minister in this house is more responsible for the lack of such a policy than the Minister of Agriculture. Back in 1940, when he was Minister of National War Services, a national registration was taken in this country. At that time I thought the minister would evolve some policy under which people would be directed to industry, to the armed services and to agriculture. That has not been done to this day, and as a result we have a lamentable man-power situation in Canada. No branch of industry in this country has suffered more than agriculture as a result. I say we must continue to think of the armed services first until this war is won, but I still maintain that this man-power policy is just as piecemeal and half-hearted as it has been at any time in the past. If our agricultural production is to be on the basis it should be in order to fulfil our obligations to the other united nations, then the Department of Labour and the Minister of Agriculture will have to do something to regulate the wages paid farm labour in this country, and I make that statement having in mind the welfare of both the employee and the employer.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend is trying to out-Solomon Solomon, and it cannot be done.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Why can it not be done?

Mr. MITCHELL: I said you could not out-Solomon Solomon.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Some two years ago I asked the minister to evolve a wage scale for agriculture, in exactly the same manner that this had been done under the controls administered by his department. I am not one of those who like controls, but I believe this should have been done just as it was done for industrial labour. I believe it could have been worked out quite satisfactorily on a parity basis. If now, after our experience since 1939, you say it is still fair to have a regulated wage scale for industry, to control the prices at which agricultural products may be sold, and still force the producer to bid in the open market for his help, certainly I do not understand your formula at all. I still hope you may do something in that respect, because we are facing the most serious agricultural man-power problem that we have had to contend with since 1939.

Mr. MacNICOL: I was very much interested in what the minister said; but when he refers to the fact that there has been a very great increase in employment since 1939 I want to remind him that this came about directly as a result of the war. There was a greatly increased demand for labour for the production of munitions, of course, but I hope it will not be long until the war ends, and then the minister is going to find the very lack of jobs about which he said something a moment ago, the lack which prevailed before the war. To-morrow some minister of this government will have brought before him a concrete example of what is coming. A delegation will be in this city to-morrow in reference to the closing down of the shipbuilding yards in Toronto. I do not know how many men are going to be laid off, but I know the last time I was in those yards a great many men were working there. That is the problem you are going to be up against. It is not the fault of the minister. He cannot help it, and I am not going to censure him in any way; but I should like to know whether he has any programme which will provide jobs. For instance, when this delegation comes here to-morrow will the responsible minister be in a position to say, "Well, now, we can place these five hundred men in other positions at once." That is only a start; there will be five hundred thousand, if war ends, to be placed before very long, and I should like to know if the department is really planning any programme. Perhaps that is not a problem for the Minister of Labour; it may be a matter for the Minister of Reconstruction. But it is somebody's problem. I meet it every time I go home." I will meet it on Saturday. A great many men are looking for jobs to-day. I had three letters from Toronto this morning from people wanting jobs. What is the programme, if there is one? It may not come under this vote, and if the minister does not want to discuss it now that will suit me quite well. But there should be a programme. One of the minister's predecessors, a very capable man, the late Hon. Norman Rogers, went into the matter thoroughly and he had a programme. Has the minister any programme?

Mr. MITCHELL: I am not afraid of the question my hon. friend is putting to me, but I think it comes principally under the Minister of Reconstruction. In the Department of Labour we do the placing. We have the placement machinery, the unemployment insurance and so on. I do not want to put forward any argument that might deviate from the argument to be presented by my hon. friend the Minister of Reconstruction when his estimates come up.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister will appreciate that once the war is over the working man is going to come to the Minister of Labour. If I were the Minister of Labour I would consider it my business to see that labour is employed. I would think it was my business to initiate and operate a programme to provide jobs for labour. We have a Minister of Justice; we have ministers of this and that, but the Minister of Labour is the man who will be appealed to by labour. To-morrow somebody will have to answer this delegation that is coming here. Does the minister know about this delegation that is coming to-morrow?

Mr. MITCHELL: Let us get it down to simple terms. The reason why there are nineteen members of this government is the magnitude of the task. I can remember when there was a Prime Minister who thought he could do it all himself.

Mr. GRAYDON: He is doing it now.

Mr. LOCKHART: That is no change.

Mr. MITCHELL: That was not so long ago. You understand that I do not say that in any critical sense; it is simply an observation. Every man to his own last. I believe in free enterprise, but I believe also that when socialism comes in the front door, freedom goes out the back. I cannot imagine this House of Commons with 245 members running anything, any business. I am speaking of business.

Mr. MacNICOL: When you refer to the government I agree with you.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friends had their chance. There was more unemployment during the period their government was in power than at any other time in the history of this country. I say without fear of successful contradiction that there has been more employment during the life of this government than during the life of any other government in the history of Canada. Let the record speak for itself.

As I say, every man to his own last. I think I am running a large enough organization. My job is the placement of men through the employment service.

Mr. MacNICOL: I agree.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not think I could run two departments. I do not think I could run finance and labour even though this spills over into finance. The primary job of the Department of Reconstruction is reconstruction, and my hon. friend will have an opportunity to speak on that phase of government policy when the estimates of the Minister of Reconstruction are before the committee.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister stated in effect at Winnipeg or in the west that there was a programme, and I am trying to find out what that programme is, because the workingman is going to appeal to him as the Minister of Labour. The Minister of Labour is the man to whom the workingman will go for a job. I take a lot of interest in the men who are coming here to-morrow. When I go home these men say to me, "What is going to be done for us after the war?" I cannot tell them and apparently the minister cannot tell me; yet that is the business of the Department of Labour.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

The minister said a moment ago his job was to provide jobs, and I agree with him. He then said something about the government or the department not running anything, and I said, "I agree." I am thinking in a business way.

Mr. MITCHELL: I want it made perfectly clear that I am speaking in a business way.

Mr. MacNICOL: One need only go to Fort McMurray to see where $1,500,000 and more has been spent by the government on a plant, but I shall deal with that later on. It is impossible for government to operate a business. At that plant they have a staff of 203, I am informed, where previously there was a staff of sixty-seven. The present staff of 203 produces fifty barrels a day, while the previous staff of sixty-seven produced from 300 to 400 barrels a day. The government cannot run business. But after the war the working man will be appealing to the Minister of Labour. He is the only minister to whom he can go. He cannot go to the Minister of Finance; he cannot go to the Minister of Justice; he cannot go to the Minister of Fisheries; he cannot go to the minister of this or that; he must appeal to the Minister of Labour.

This delegation coming here to-morrow is to represent from four to five hundred men to be laid off by the shipyards. Is the government going to tell these men where they can get jobs? This will be only a start. I really want to help the minister; I want to see him take the reins in his hands and make preparations to give jobs to men. When the men come back from the war they are not going to stand around twiddling their fingers and asking for a job, or I will be surprised if they do. They will want jobs.

I do not want the minister to adopt the attitude of other ministers and tell me that it is not his business. I am a labour man and a business man. I have had perhaps more to do with the employment of men than any other member at the moment in this house. I worked up from the bottom to the top. I have been a labour man all my life and my heart has always been for the labouring man.

Mr. DONNELLY: What a man!

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes, what a man. Of course the hon. member for Wood Mountain would not know the first mortal thing about labour. He might be able to pull teeth or take a nail out of a finger or give a man a dose of salts or something like that—

An hon. MEMBER: Or a permit for liquor.

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not think he would do anything like that. But if I ask him to place a hundred men, give them jobs and pay them out of profits, I should like to see him do that, and I am saying that in the kindest way. I like the Minister of Labour, and I always have, but he has been a labour union man. I do not know that he ever had anything to do with giving jobs, and that is a different thing altogether. Men are given employment by industry and their wages are paid out of profits. The profits may be small or large—I am not going into that—but that is the only way that jobs can be provided. You cannot draw on your bank account all the time; you have to have a return to provide jobs. You buy your raw materials in the cheapest market and you sell what you manufacture in the most reasonable market you can find. Perhaps I am out of order and all this does not come under this item, but as the minister himself has said his business is to provide jobs. I agree with him and I want to help him to provide jobs.

I will be interested to see just who handles this delegation that is coming here on behalf of five hundred shipworkers who are to ask where they are to get jobs.

An hon. MEMBER: Now.

Mr. MacNICOL: Right now. Not only that; there will be another big factory sending a delegation here representing, not five hundred people, but perhaps ten thousand. That is what will happen when the war ends, because there is no use in filling shells with powder that cannot be used. A man working in one plant told me that they would have to keep it going because there were fourteen thousand men and women working there. A shell does not last very long and the powder deteriorates, but no sane man is going to run a shell factory and put powder into shells that will not be used.

The minister has been able to do a good job so far because there has been a tremendous demand for labour, but that demand will cease after this war the way it did after the last war. The last war ended on November 11, 1918, and I can remember 925 happy men working and drawing their pay every two weeks. Within a week or ten days, I have just forgotten the exact time, that staff was reduced to 150; in three weeks more the factory was working three days a week and within three months they were all laid off except the office staff. Does the minister think these munition plants are going to turn their wheels just to make a wind? Certainly not. It is a big problem and I should like the minister to tell us what programme he has? I think it was at Winnipeg that he said he had a programme. Men will be displaced by hundreds of thousands, and that is a problem we have to face. I can tell the minister this, that the men will not just sit and twiddle their thumbs this time, or sell shoe laces on the corner or come rapping at the door to sell pins. They want work. What is the minister's programme to give them work?

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not wish to be accused of repetition, and I do not want my hon. friend to think for one minute that I am running away from his question. Up to this minute we have been able to place everybody, speaking in a broad way, through selective service. My hon. friend was a manufacturer himself and no one knows better than he does that you cannot change over from war to peace without creating pockets of unemployment. That is the reason for the establishment of unemployment insurance in this country. There is no man breathing who can maintain continuity of employment in the sense that my hon. friend indicated. The Minister of Reconstruction has already stated that he is going to set aside one day a week—I think it was Monday—for consultation with labour organizations in this country if they so desire, and he is doing that. You are bound to have some unemployment when factories are turning from war production and tooling up for a new operation. My hon. friend understands that. As I said earlier this evening you have to be pretty careful when this war is over that you do not create an emotional condition that will be pretty hard to handle.

Mr. BRYCE: I should like to take this opportunity of renewing some of my requests to the Minister of Labour. I think it would be foolish of me to let an opportunity like this go by when he seems to be so good natured and jolly to-night. Perhaps I shall have better success this time than I have had in the past.

Last session I asked the minister about the calling up of farmers' sons for service in the army, and he assured me that that would be taken care of. But I can assure him that the very same thing is happening to-day that happened a year ago. When you find a widow with two sons fighting overseas, and you take the third son into the army, I think that is unfair. I can give the evidence to the minister. I know a farmer close to my home. He has only two sons and both have been called up. It is necessary in the interests of agriculture that these men be postponed. The minister said a few minutes ago that we are producing bigger and better crops than ever before. Yes; we are producing to-day bigger and better crops of what the Minister of Agriculture does not want—wheat. We do not need any more wheat; the Minister of Agriculture has said that in speeches all across the country. On the other hand, our butter stocks are as low to-day as they have ever been. We are short of butter. Why? Because we have not the help on the farms to milk the cows. The hon. member for Souris said that we are down thirty-two per cent. We are down fifty per cent in our hog production in Manitoba and there is no prospect of the situation improving for some time because we have not the help.

Without taking up too much time I ask the minister if he cannot do something with respect to the calling up of farmers' sons. Once a farmer's son is called up and gets into the army, it takes a regiment of soldiers to get him back out of it. The minister knows that because he has been in the army just as I have been. You can go and talk to the commanding officer, but it is a hard job to get a man out of the army once he is in. It should, however, be easy for the minister's department to find out just what the situation of these farmers' sons is before they are called up and attested. Can the minister give any assurance that he will do something about the matter this time, or is he just going to give a promise that will not mean anything?

Mr. MITCHELL: It is fundamental that ignorance of the law is no excuse. We have broadcast and advertised what the regulations are with regard to the calling up of farmers' sons and men working in agriculture more than any other thing. I cannot go around personally to tens of thousands of people and whisper in their ears: You do not have to be called up. But we do publish advertisements in the newspapers and broadcast over the radio just what the regulations are, applying to men working in agriculture. It has all been put on Hansard too. As I said to my hon. friend last year I cannot go around and tell every man personally just what the regulations are, neither can my organization. My hon. friend comes from Manitoba. I have some knowledge of the board there and I think it is a very good board, presided over by Mr. Justice Adamson. There is a limit to what I can do. I shall always be glad to listen to the representations of any member of the house, no matter on which side he sits but I cannot, and I would not if I could, surreptitiously or in any other way indicate to these boards what they should do. Once a man gets into the army he is out of my jurisdiction completely. It is then a matter for the military authorities. If there is any other way that my hon. friend can suggest of acquainting these men of what their position is under the law and regulations I shall be glad to hear it.

[Mr. Bryce.]

Mr. BRYCE: Once a man is in the army you cannot do anything about it. That is just my point. I know that the minister cannot get into personal contact with every man, but his department calls the men up and the department could find out what the position of the man was in civilian life before calling him up for the army. There is your contact, and there is a slip-up there.

Mr. MITCHELL: If a farmer's son wants to join the army, the navy or the air force, I cannot stop him from doing so because this is still a free country, thank heaven. But I think they all know what the law is with regard to workers in agriculture. If they do not, I do not know how we can get it over to them. A man engaged in agriculture does not even have to have a medical examination. All he needs to do when he gets his call is to say he is employed in agriculture, and he is left there until his case is investigated.

Mr. HATFIELD: Oh, no.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend says, no. I should like to know of any case to the contrary. After all is said and done, when you are sending out calls like this organization is doing, to upwards of a million men, there is bound to be a slip made some time. In passing, let me say that I sometimes wonder how some people who on the public platform advocate that every man should be in the army are yet so solicitous of those people who do not want to go into the army. It is a very difficult policy that I have to administer in justice and without fear or favour.

As to the question raised by my hon. friend, if he has an answer I should like to know what it is. The procedure is so simple. Every boy or girl in this country is taught to read and write, and newspapers are still printed. We put advertisements in the newspapers; we send out letters. If one can do any more than that, I do not know what it is.

Mr. LOCKHART: What about the thousands of emergencies that arise.

Mr. MITCHELL: Well, let us have the "thousands of emergencies". The mere fact my hon. friend says there are thousands does not indicate that there are.

Mr. LOCKHART: Well, there are. I can give the minister fifty right now.

Mr. BOUCHER: I wish to mention to the minister a recent situation, as far as selective service calling men into the army is concerned, which, I think, needs his attention. In a case brought recently to my attention a farmer's only son, having served for three years in the air force in this country and having been willing at that time to go active, found that requirements in the air force were no longer as urgent as they had been, but that the requirements at home to assist his aged father and mother were very serious. He asked for a postponement and was advised by his commanding officer that he had a fit and proper case for discharge to permit him to go back to the farm. He was allowed twenty-one days' leave after which he was to pick up his discharge papers. This was in February; whereupon a new regulation was issued which provided that he was no longer entitled to discharge after having served for three years in Canada before being called up, but that he would be re-drafted from the air force to the army. My point is that if national selective service call for a man they should say where he fits into our manpower picture. This man has not a chance to go back to the farm; the discharge promised him is now denied him by a change in the regulations whereby, having served for only three years in Canada instead of three years overseas, he is being drafted—in effect, contrary to the promise made to him—into the army notwithstanding that he is required on the farm. If I were the Minister of Labour, being in charge of national selective service, I would say that that individual should be sent to the farm and not to the army at this particular time. He has served for three years, has been willing at all times to go overseas and do his part but was not permitted to do so, and there is no help on the farm to continue the production which is so urgently needed. He should be given a chance to apply again for a discharge and state his case to go back on the farm, instead of which he is being drafted from the air force into the army. It may be that we badly need men in the army, but we certainly need assistance in agriculture; and I think the minister in charge of selective service should not have allowed manpower to get out of his control and be handled by the two departments of national defence so that they can swap personnel and increase their numbers.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend is a total conscriptionist, but he has put up a pretty fair exhibition of straddling the fence.

Mr. BOUCHER: Not by any means.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let the hon. member wait a minute; I did not interrupt him. He wants men in the army but he wants them out. He says, "I do not know why this man was three years in the air force in Canada; I do not know whether he should go in the army or not." He can do this sort of backing and filling; I cannot. A man who has been in the air force in this country has the same rights as a civilian liable to call for the army. There must be something wrong with the information my hon. friend received. The right to disagree is one of the bases of human freedom, but I might as well tell the hon. member that his position has been that he wanted them all in the army or in the fighting forces. He and his party have talked about Great Britain and the United States, but what is the position there? In Great Britain they move men back and forward from the army, the navy, and the air force almost automatically, by direction, and if the hon. member does not know how it is done he should go and see it in operation. In the United States they do the same thing. I repeat that this man has as much right to ask for a postponement as any civilian who has not yet been called under the N.R.M.A. regulations.

Mr. HATFIELD: I could tell the minister of hundreds of cases where the last boy on the farm is called up; a circular comes along with the letter calling him up, stating, if he wants a postponement because of being needed on the farm, to write in and ask for it. The boy in every case has written in asking for a postponement. The registrars do not reply to that letter until the date of his call-up has expired; then he reports, and then he is in the army.

Mr. MITCHELL: What is the location of that farm?

Mr. HATFIELD: Hundreds of these men have asked for postponement and stated their case, but have never received a reply to their letters.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend talks about "hundreds."

Mr. HATFIELD: Yes, hundreds.

Mr. MITCHELL: I would say to him, if he can, give us the hundreds, but at least give us one. I have used this argument: you cannot put a thermometer in a man's mouth and pull it out and say he is a farmer. You cannot always put a thermometer in a man's mouth and take it out and say he is a socialist. The mere fact that a man says he is a farmer does not make him one. He may be the only man in Canada who thinks so.

I am administering this policy and I know some of the difficulties and complexities. A man may be on what we call a pulp farm. My hon. friend knows about pulp farms where the biggest part of the year they are cutting down trees, and they have lots of ten or fifteen acres, or as the case may be. That may not be a farm. But I should like to look into the case raised by my hon. friend. As I pointed out earlier in the evening, the regulations affecting the agricultural structure in this country are as generous as those operating in any of the united nations. At this very moment 168,000 farmers are on postponement. I am speaking from memory and I am open to correction, but upon looking at some pre-war figures I found that at the time there were only about fifty thousand hired men in Canada. I suggest that when one of my hon. friends talks about hundreds, and another hon. friend talks about thousands, it is not hard to imagine what they say in the little red school-house; I imagine they say "millions" and "billions".

Mr. HATFIELD: I know one farmer's son who went down for his medical examination to the depot and they had him sign papers to enlist. He did not know he was enlisting until he got back home, and they sent the mounted police after him.

Mr. WRIGHT: The minister asked for suggestions with regard to satisfying the demands of agriculture for labour. He says there are 168,000 men on postponement to agriculture. Every fall these men receive a notice from selective service telling them that they must take a job in some other industry during the winter months. Anyone who works on a farm, especially a stock farm, knows that help is needed on a farm if you are raising hogs, feed cattle or milk cows, and it is needed nearly as much, or more, in the winter than in the summer. Nevertheless in this country, especially during the past two winters, these men have been taken from the farms, and that is one of the main reasons for the present drop in agricultural production. One of the ways in which it can be stopped is to see that these men are allowed to stay on farms in the months in which they are needed. That has not been done in the past.

Mr. MITCHELL: I agree that one of the most difficult things in this country, in the United States and in Great Britain has been the stock farm situation, more so than general farming. I know that we could not have produced the pulp we produced had it not been for the movement from the farms in the winter to the forest, and I know what was accomplished in the malleable iron industry because of the swing. When you are moving a quarter of a million men some are bound to get through the mesh, but we have insisted that they go back to agriculture when the season opens in the spring. I am receiving communications from persons who left agriculture and do not want to go back, but they simply have to go back, and that is all there is to it. You have to insist on that if you hope to have the production we have had in the past.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Would the minister give the names of the 168,000 men.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. MITCHELL: I can say that my hon. friend is not one of them.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: They are all from Quebec.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. At the present time we are on supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1945. I believe that early next week we shall go into supply on the war appropriation bill and all departments will be called again so that the discussion that is taking place to-night will be repeated then. That is not a procedure that makes for proper deliberation and I would ask hon. members to keep as much as possible within the orbit of the estimates now before the committee.

Mr. GILLIS: I agree with the Chairman, but the discussion has rambled quite a bit, and I suggest that decisions of that kind should have been made earlier in the debate. It is late now to start enforcing a rigid rule. I am not going to say anything about selective service, or discuss all the ramifications of the department, because I appreciate the fact that these are war departments which can more properly be discussed in connection with the war estimates. I would make this observation, however. I have listened to my hon. friends to the right; I listened to the hon. member for Davenport, who has left the house for the moment, talking about private enterprise and suggesting that this was the only means of finding jobs in the post-war period. The suggestion has been made that business will look after the problem, and in the next breath these gentlemen appeal to the government to find employment for thousands now being laid off. Private enterprise, however, has not been interfered with; it is still in the field and still has the right to lay off, and the only thing it is doing is to lay off. If my hon. friends want to lay the employment problem on the doorstep of the government, then private enterprise has failed in that field. It has had seventy-six years of a chance and it is time someone started to direct and look after it.

I will not pursue the subject raised by the hon. member for Vancouver East. I think myself it is a subject on which some decision should be made at this session because it has a great bearing on post-war employment. The minister will remember that when the national wage order and the national code were introduced in the house the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and I pointed out particularly what we regarded as its defects. The attitude of the minister at that time was that all legislation will be improved in course of time by the method of trial and error. Within the last seven or eight months there have been some obvious defects in the legislation. I will not go into the wage order to any great extent, but I submit that the application of the wage order in the past several months leaves much to be desired. The wording is grossly unfair and unjust and it should be removed, because the war labour board is a three-man board and the wage stabilization order is administered in relation to controlling prices. The whole approach to the problem, so far as the board is concerned, has been in its relation to controlling prices. The minimum fixed by the government in the wage field is thirty-five cents an hour; unless you are below that your wage rates are not considered unfair or unjust, and under the wording of the order that is the only approach which the board can take.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not so.

Mr. GILLIS: Oh, yes. If you check up you will find it is so.

Mr. ILSLEY: Plenty of wages are raised that are not below thirty-five cents an hour.

Mr. GILLIS: That is true, but at the same time, if the board wants to interpret the order literally it can legally make that decision and make it stick. I think the wording of the order should be changed to read "based on the ability of the industry to pay". Then the board would have some latitude in determining what is fair or unfair for that particular industry.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think I should say that is the very thing they did not want.

Mr. GILLIS: Who did not want?

Mr. MITCHELL: Labour—a price ceiling clamped on to ability to pay. If you had a ceiling there, with ability to pay, the employees would not have a chance.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not talking about a price ceiling but wage rates.

Mr. MITCHELL: If it were based on ability to pay, I question very much whether the national board would have granted an increase in wages to the miners as they have done.

Mr. GILLIS: If you want to open up that field—

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not want to do that.

Mr. GILLIS: I understand that to-day, so far as industry is concerned—and it applies to practically every industry in Canada—wages have come out of the treasury of the country. Everyone who has something to sell in the country has been subsidized.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, no.

Mr. GILLIS: You can "oh, no," as much as you like, but when the minister tries to make a comparison between this war and the last, saying that in the last war prices were so and so, did he ever look at the tax structure in the last war as compared with this war? That is not a criterion. Things that happened in the last war are in the past. Take the Dominion Steel and Coal company's figures released by themselves. I question them very much, and until there is an impartial analysis of their ability to pay, the minister does not know, and I do not know, whether we are doing right or wrong in subsidizing that industry. There is a commission now probing that question.

In the application of the wage order I think those two words are being taken advantage of at the present time. The hon. member for Vancouver East and I have pointed out that in one or two of the decisions made the interpretation placed on the wording by the board was that there must be a flagrant discrepancy in the wages as compared with other industries. I know there have to be wage controls; I am not quarreling with that, and perhaps some will be necessary in the immediate post-war just as they were necessary during the war. I am not accepting every theory that I hear on inflation either, because the only time you hear the cry of inflation is when you start talking about raising the basic rates. Nobody squawks when you lift the ceiling on salaries. That is fine.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, they do.

Mr. GILLIS: Nobody says very much when profits of industries or earnings of banks show an increase from year to year. That is all fine. But any time you talk about putting five or ten cents on the wages of the average worker it is referred to as inflation; it is going to have inflationary effects. I know this is not the time to go into these theories.

Mr. ILSLEY: The ceiling on salaries and profits is much more severe than the ceiling on wages, deliberately made so.

Mr. GILLIS: You would not think so if the figures that the government release from time to time are correct. I think the last figures that I saw showed that eighty per cent of the wage-earners across Canada were still in the income group of one thousand dollars. I am speaking of the average income. There should not be very much inflation there. You cannot buy very much on that kind of income.

Mr. KINLEY: Eighty per cent?

Mr. GILLIS: Those are the government's own figures. The hon. member had better look them up. The trouble with most government members is that they do not read the government's figures.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let me say to my hon. friends that those figures have to be broken down. The over-all figure of eighty per cent earning less than $1,000 a year includes everybody, apprentices and right down the line. When I make this observation I say to my hon. friend that I do not take second place to anyone in this country in the feeling that the workingman should get what is coming to him, but it is hardly fair to make a bald statement like that without breaking the figures down. I know something about the figures the hon. member is speaking about.

Mr. GILLIS: That is the way they were put out. I am not breaking them down. That is the way I saw the figures. They were government figures. There should not be any danger of inflation with that kind of spending power. I merely suggest to the minister that the time has come to do something about it. I shall not take up the time of the committee to put on the record the opinions of labour organizations of the country. If they were investigated it would be found that they are demanding or clamouring for an opportunity to sit in with the government and revise this particular wage order. I could tell the minister quite a story about the last wage negotiations of the mine workers. The war labour board has usurped the bargaining rights of the unions. An appeal is made to them; they make a decision; there is no appeal from it and the union stops functioning. There should be some way of going back to conciliation, placing the board in the position of the employer and for it to make a decision that could stand up before an impartial referee. There are many changes that could be made which would be beneficial. I merely suggest that at some time or another the minister should get together with those who are responsible to the labour organizations across Canada and try to have some adjustments.

[Mr. Gillis.]

The next thing that I am concerned about is P.C. 1003. When that order was passed the Prime Minister announced to the house that he was selecting an eminent person from the legal profession and placing in his hands the authority and responsibility of drafting labour jurisprudence for Canada, bring the rule of law within the trades union movement. We heard a lot about the rule of law in international affairs in the last few days. The board held meetings across the country, probed opinions from all directions and finally sat down and wrote two reports, a majority and a minority report. Then that eminent person resigned, went back to his profession and became one of the leaders of the Tory party. I hope he does not wind up in San Francisco.

When order in council P.C. 1003 was brought down it was a step in the right direction. When it was tabled in the house some of the hon. members of this group pointed out that there were two or three things wrong with it. First, it did not outlaw company unions, and I definitely believe it should have done so. Second, when union certification is arrived at, instead of the union being certified as the bargaining agency it is the representative of the union that is certified. In the application of the code unions have found themselves in this position. They had an agent who was working for them. Something happened; either he took sick or moved away, and according to the code the employer had the right to say that another representative from the same union should have the right to sit in and bargain for the employees in that particular organization. I think the wording there is ambiguous. It should definitely state union certification rather than the certification of a representative.

Within the last few weeks there has been a new trend in the application of the code. Unorganized people desiring to become members of a union make application to the board. The board has taken the attitude that before they will direct a vote to be taken in a plant to determine the bargaining agency the union must show a paid-up membership of at least fifty per cent of the employees in the plant. That is an impossibility, and it completely defeats the purpose for which the code was intended. I ask the minister to check that, because a test of any legislation is its application, the people who are administering it, the way it is to work, and so on. The personnel administering it has a lot to do with it. I do not think anybody who drafted it ever intended it to work in that way. I think it should be corrected. When application is made by the employees of a plant the only fair way to determine the percentage of those desiring to become members of that union is to take a free vote properly supervised. When that vote is taken, if the majority in the plant favour union certification it should be gone ahead with. That is something that should be corrected immediately. One could take a long time on this aspect of P.C. 1003, but I believe these are two things that should be corrected. The whole purpose of P.C. 1003 was to provide for collective bargaining.

May I be permitted to say one word with respect to selective service. I am interested in selective service because I think it is going to be one of our most important peace-time organizations; the regulation of employment, the reversing of the machinery of induction into the service. There are well-trained personnel there. They have learned something about the job. There is one defect in the machinery. Selective service has the right to direct an employee to an employer, but there is no obligation on the part of the employer to accept that employee. I think that should be corrected. If the legal machinery provided by the government in the employment field has the right to tell me where I should go to work, then the employer should be obligated to accept me when I get there. I cannot refuse. If I refuse I am out. If I happen to be the recipient of unemployment insurance and I refuse employment I lose my unemployment insurance. But I have had case after case—and it is becoming tense in the mining districts, where there is no heavy employment—of employers not wanting to take men back from the service because they are not one hundred per cent fit. I think the machinery should be tightened up. Surely if you have the right to direct me, the employer should not have the right to refuse me. That is all I have to say, but I would suggest that the minister check up these two or three points, not because I have mentioned them, but because they are being said by those who are directly interested and employed by the labour movements.

Mr. MITCHELL: I thank my hon. friend for the suggestions he has made, particularly those with regard to selective service. That is an aspect which never occurred to me; but I hope I will live to see the day, in the not very distant future, when there will not be any direction at all.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not think you will ever see it.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to add just a few words to the remarks that have been made by my colleagues from Vancouver East and Cape Breton South.

The CHAIRMAN: Before the hon. member proceeds, I do not want to be too strict in these matters, but I have no doubt that when we have the war appropriation measure before the committee of supply we shall have a repetition of what has been said to-night. These are the supplementary estimates only, for the year ending March 31, 1945. There will be ample opportunity, when the officials of the various departments are here, to ask any questions that may be desired. As a matter of fact, I believe most of the discussion this evening has been out of order. I do not want to be too strict, but the Chair has some duty to keep the discussion focused on the matter before the committee.

Mr. KNOWLES: I appreciate your position, Mr. Chairman, but it seems to me the minister has been correct in agreeing to deal with these matters under the head of departmental administration.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not say this in a sarcastic way, but I believe the points in connection with P.C. 1003 were very ably covered by both the hon. member for Vancouver East and the hon. member for Cape Breton South. If my hon. friend is going to develop the same arguments on the same points could we not just take it as read? It is getting late, and I will be back next week with the war estimates.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister has hit the nail on the head. I do not intend to go over the ground covered by the two hon. members to whom he referred. I intend rather to mention one or two other points, and to call to his attention the fact that at least one labour body with which I have some association has made definite representations to the wartime labour relations board of Manitoba. I refer to the Winnipeg district trades and labour council. The minister and I enjoyed a very fine banquet on the occasion of their fiftieth anniversary, not long ago, in the city of Winnipeg. I wish to remind the minister that when we were debating this subject last year, on April 28 and May 5, he indicated quite definitely that this legislation, particularly P.C. 1003, might require amendment as a result of the experience of the months that were then ahead. We are hoping that he will realize now that experience has proved that to be the case. Speaking about P.C. 1003, the minister said, at page 2663 of Hansard for 1944:

I do not know of any legislation that has ever been passed that did not require amending at one time or another.

Perhaps it would be my best course to summarize the concrete suggestions that have been made in connection with this matter by the Winnipeg and district trades and labour council. In the first place they suggest that when any group or organization applies for certification and it is found that the company has contributed to that organization in any way, machinery should be set up for a full investigation into the activities of that body, and such machinery should be provided in the order. Further in their representations on the same general point they ask, just as the hon. member for Cape Breton South and I asked last year, that there be definite provision in P.C. 1003 outlawing any form of company unionism. The minister will remember that at that time he indulged in a few quips, but the point we were trying to make was that the order needed to be more definite on this point; that it should be tightened up, and that teeth should be put in it.

The next suggestion made by the Winnipeg council is that when a secret ballot is being taken only the representatives of the union or unions and the board should be present. A further suggestion is that provision should be made in the order for the compulsory signing of contracts where unions are certified by the wartime labour relations board. The next suggestion is that there should be provision for a closed shop when a majority of the employees make that request. No doubt the letter, a copy of which I have before me, is in the possession of the minister or his department. In it he will find the actual wording of an amendment suggested by this body to section 19, subsection (2) (c) of P.C. 1003 which would make it clear beyond any doubt whatsoever that unions would have the right to seek a closed shop provision in collective agreements. Further suggestions are that the board be given authority to issue a directive for the reinstatement of employees who are discharged, suspended or demoted for contravention of the provisions of the regulations; also that the board should have authority to issue a directive for the payment of back pay to such employees, and be able to issue a directive for the disestablishment of company dominated unions.

I am giving these points rather hurriedly, not particularly expecting the minister to reply to them to-night since, as he has suggested, these matters will come up again, but in the hope that he will give consideration to representations of this kind which are being made by labour bodies right across the country.

One other suggestion has been made, and I offer it even though the minister may want to turn it into a compliment to his labour code. It is that the government take steps now by way of negotiation with the provincial governments to see to it that a national labour code is made part of the law of this country, not only under the War Measures Act but in peace time as well. I express the hope that, to-night or next week when the matter comes up again, the minister will indicate the results of the consideration I trust he will give to the various representations I have outlined.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. MITCHELL: I know the way we talk in lodge meetings and when we go out to get votes. If I understood my hon. friend aright he said we should have national legislation; at least that was the import of it. I am sure he knows, probably better than I know, that constitutionally, without an amendment of the British North American Act, you cannot legislate on these matters nationally. Under the constitution they are the prerogative of the provinces. Some people may have the view that it should be the other way around, but when you are talking to your membership I think it only fair that you should point out this aspect of it to them, that it is not a question of legislation by the national government at the moment but a question of provincial responsibility. Let the responsibility rest where it should.

Mr. KNOWLES: If the minister will read what I have said he will find that I referred to the necessity for cooperation with the provincial governments in the matter. I am not going into that whole question again, but I repeat my request that he give consideration to the points I have mentioned so that he can deal with them when this matter comes up again.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND RESOURCES

Lands, Parks and Forests branch —

443. General administration, operation and maintenance of services, including Wood Buffalo park—further amount required, $15,000.

Mr. TUSTIN: The Minister of Finance said he would explain the meaning of the word "sundries". This is an item of $15,000, and I should like an explanation of it.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): Well, "sundries" is a generic term used to describe some of these items. This item is to cover the cost of a survey on the Bear river from the Mackenzie river to Great Bear lake around a series of rapids, and it also covers the cost of sending in some equipment. My hon. friend is probably aware that the radium mines are located at the eastern end of Bear lake and the only means of transportation apart from air transportation is by Bear lake, through Bear river to the Mackenzie river, up the Mackenzie river and then through the waterways system to Edmonton. In order to cut the cost of this transportation a road is being built around these rapids.

Item agreed to.

Indian Affairs branch—
446. Indian hospitals and general care of Indians—further amount required, $240,000.

Mr. PERLEY: Could the minister give us a break-down in more detail than is given on page 7? It states there that $193,000 of the total of $240,000 is for professional and special services.

Mr. CRERAR: This vote is to supplement the vote of last year for medical services for the Indians. During the year it has been found that there have been substantial increases in cost. The Indian affairs branch operate several hospitals and it has been found that the cost of food and help and supplies has increased more than was anticipated when the estimates were prepared and submitted to parliament over a year ago. I can give my hon. friend the break-down: supplies and materials, $30,000, travelling expenses, $8,000. This was not foreseen and is required because of a few epidemics which broke out among the far northern tribes and it being necessary to send in some medical service.

Mr. LOCKHART: More than the average?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. That accounts for $8,000. Freight and express, $500. Then the large item is $193,000 for "professional and special".

Mr. PERLEY: Where is most of that being spent?

Mr. CRERAR: It is being spent all over Canada. Increased amounts of money have been required for the treatment of tuberculosis among the Indians and there has been an increase in travelling expenses of doctors and an increase in the cost of obtaining doctors because of the shortage of medical men owing to the numbers in the armed services.

Mr. LOCKHART: Have you the relative amount that was spent last year for the treatment of tuberculosis?

Mr. CRERAR: The vote this year is up substantially. The estimates that were tabled the other day for the year ending March 31, 1946, show on page 22 an item of $2,425,000 for medical, Indian hospitals and general care of Indians, as compared with $1,829,000 last year. The $193,000 in this particular item is to supplement a vote that was not sufficiently large last year.

Mr. LOCKHART: The minister said that some of this increase was due to the treatment of tuberculosis among the Indians, and I wanted the other figures.

Mr. CRERAR: I am referring to the item of "professional and special" which provides an amount of $193,000 out of the $240,000.

Mr. LOCKHART: You said that included the treatment of tuberculosis?

Mr. CRERAR: Increased numbers of Indians have been under treatment for various medical and surgical reasons, including those suffering from tuberculosis, and there has been a marked increase in rates of hospitals treating Indians. We have had to increase the per diem rate paid to hospitals for the care of Indians. In many cases doctors' fees have increased on account of doctors being absent from their regular posts on military service, and we have had to pay mileage charges for medical attention from more distant points.

Mr. PERLEY: What portion of this amount would be spent in Saskatchewan and also how many hospitals for Indians have you in that province?

Mr. CRERAR: There is just the one at Fort Qu'Appelle.

Mr. PERLEY: What portion of this amount would be spent there?

Mr. CRERAR: I have not that information here, but it would be available when the main estimates are under consideration some time in the future.

Mr. BRYCE: Could the minister give us a break-down by provinces later on?

Mr. CRERAR: I just told the hon. member for Qu'Appelle that I have not that information here; these are supplementary estimates.

Mr. BRYCE: Could the minister let us have it at a later date?

Mr. CRERAR: I could have it made up and sent to my hon. friend if it is of particular interest.

Mr. BRYCE: The Department in Ottawa provided for special services for Indians but they never got them. It was not the fault of the department here because they made the arrangement to provide these services for the Indians in my constituency but they never got them. I want to trace why this was not done and I want the minister to help me.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not know what my hon. friend is referring to when he says—

Mr. BRYCE: I will tell you.

Questions

Mr. CRERAR: Will my hon. friend sit down until I finish. I do not know to what he is referring when he says that arrangements were made for special services in his constituency but they were not carried out. Whom were they made with? Were they made with the hon. member?

Mr. BRYCE: The Minister of Mines and Resources seems a little touchy.

Mr. CRERAR: I object to that.

Mr. BRYCE: You sit down now.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend is not a very old member of this house or he would not act as he is acting.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think both hon. gentlemen need to go to bed. Perhaps we might call it eleven o'clock.

Mr. CRERAR: I was speaking when my hon. friend interrupted me. We do not make very much progress in that way. I suppose the item can stand until to-morrow.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, March 29, 1945

The house met at three o'clock.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, March 29, 1945.

Sir:—I have the honour to inform you that Hon. Patrick Kerwin, acting as deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber to-day, Thursday, the 29th of March, 1945, at 6 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,

Sir,

Your obedient servant,

F. L. C. Pereira,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

VETERANS' LAND SETTLEMENT—HALDIMAND COUNTY

Mr. SENN:

1. To date, what properties have been purchased in Haldimand county to be used for the establishment of returned men on the land?

[Mr. Bryce.]

2. From whom were such properties purchased?

3. What was the total amount paid in each instance?

4. What acreage was obtained from each purchase made?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre):

As at February 28, 1945.

1. N.  $\frac{1}{2}$  Lot 36, concession 2, township North Cayuga; N.  $\frac{1}{2}$  Lot 26, concession 4, township South Cayuga; E.  $\frac{1}{2}$  Lot 8, concession 2, township Moulton; Pt. Lot 18, concession 3, township Oneida; S.  $\frac{1}{2}$  Lot 9, concession 1, township Seneca; Lot 17, concession 1, township Sherbrooke; Pt. Lots 16 and 17, concession 1, township Rainham.

2. A. E. Nablo, E. Norrington, W. I. Walker, W. I. Mitchell, H. Gowling estate, J. Meinczinger, J. Daley.

3. $4,600, $4,800, $2,800, $4,800, $4,300, $3,800, $4,600.

4. 100 acres, 100 acres, 14 acres, 85 acres, 100 acres, 100 acres, 92 acres.

ALBERTA IRRIGATION SCHEMES

Mr. GERSHAW:

1. What steps have been taken toward developing the St. Mary and Redcliff Ronelane irrigation schemes?

2. Are negotiations under way with the province of Alberta regarding an agreement for the completion of this work?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Progress has been made towards completion of the necessary plans and surveys. Construction of the Redcliff-Ronelane irrigation project will be commenced by the dominion in 1945 if conditions permit.

2. The St. Mary River development is regarded as a post-war project. Steps will be taken to arrive at a formal agreement with the province of Alberta when the time has come that consideration may be given to construction of the works. Construction of the Redcliff-Ronelane irrigation project will be undertaken under a general agreement with the province of Alberta dated April 30, 1943, relating to water development projects.

WHEAT—CROPS OF 1935-36 TO 1944-45—STORAGE

Mr. PERLEY:

What amount was paid by the Canadian wheat board for storage on grain in each of the crop years 1935-36 to 1944-45 inclusive, (a) to interior elevator companies; (b) to interior terminal elevators; (c) and terminal elevators?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

(a) Storage on wheat paid and accrued to country elevator companies:

1935-36 .....	$ 2,300,942 89
1936-37 .....	32,311 10
1937-38 .....	—
1938-39 .....	5,002,872 41
1939-40 .....	8,279,105 97
1940-41 .....	14,509,003 28
1941-42 .....	12,514,785 16
1942-43 .....	9,978,455 82
1943-44 .....	10,596,975 74
	$63,214,452 37

(b) and (c) Storage paid to terminal elevator companies:

1935-36 .....	$ 1,402,132 57
1936-37 .....	70,834 74
1937-38 .....	—
1938-39 .....	1,807,670 18
1939-40 .....	3,823,632 70
1940-41 .....	7,158,510 72
1941-42 .....	7,824,575 20
1942-43 .....	6,233,418 30
1943-44 .....	4,667,454 01
	$32,988,228 42

Payments made during the 1944-45 season, up to February 28, are:

Storage to country elevators...	$5,613,020 08
To terminal elevators.....	3,096,144 40

(This last figure is exclusive of accrued storage).

JAPANESE NATIONALS—POST-WAR ALLOCATIONS

Mr. REID:

1. Have any representations been made by any province to the Japanese security commission or the government regarding the reallocating of those of Japanese origin or nationality following the end of the war?

2. If so, what provinces have made such representations and what representations have been made?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

INCOME TAX—RURAL INVESTIGATORS—COST OF COLLECTION FROM FARMERS

Mr. WINKLER:

1. Do rural investigators for the income tax department receive any payment on a commission basis?

2. By provinces in the years 1943 and 1944, or for any convenient interval in that period, what was the cost of collection of income tax from farmers, based on $100 tax collected?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1. No employee of the taxation division, Department of National Revenue, receives remuneration on a commission basis. All are paid on a salary basis only.

2. Information as to cost of collections from farmers or any other class as a class is not maintained. However the over all cost of collecting taxes by the taxation division in the 1943-44 fiscal year was 49 cents per $100 collected.

VETERANS' LAND SETTLEMENT—PURCHASES OF LAND

Mr. WRIGHT:

1. What is the total acreage of land purchased by the government for veteran land settlement in each of the provinces of Canada to date, (a) small holdings; (b) permanent farm units?

2. What is the total acreage approved for purchase but purchase not yet completed by the government in, (a) small holdings; (b) permanent farm units?

3. What is the total number of units purchased to date in each province, (a) small holdings; (b) permanent farm units?

4. What is the average cost per acre to date of land purchased in each province, (a) small holdings; (b) permanent farm units?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre):

Return as of February 28, 1945

1.	(a)	(b)
British Columbia .....	8,727·77	11,246·80
Alberta .....	558·76	92,476·03
Saskatchewan .....	3·66	71,507·00
Manitoba .....	552·14	70,655·45
Ontario .....	2,465·37	15,126·08
Quebec .....	81·75	2,743·00
Maritimes .....	2,315·25	25,313·50

2. Information not available. Number of properties approved for purchase but purchase not yet completed:

	(a)	(b)
British Columbia .....	675	236
Alberta .....	32	602
Saskatchewan .....	18	423
Manitoba .....	35	606
Ontario .....	177	236
Quebec .....	28	96
Maritimes .....	127	380

3.

British Columbia .....	650	227
Alberta .....	24	295
Saskatchewan .....	5	211
Manitoba .....	29	258
Ontario .....	111	153
Quebec .....	5	25
Maritimes .....	94	204

4.

British Columbia .....	$ 134 49	$ 66 60
Alberta .....	192 96	18 02
Saskatchewan .....	1,095 96	14 29
Manitoba .....	170 90	18 70
Ontario .....	214 86	44 51
Quebec .....	308 00	36 00
Maritimes .....	83 73	25 28

Questions

RADIO BROADCASTING—GOOD FRIDAY PROGRAMMES

Mr. CHURCH:

What church services, if any, will be broadcast on the C.B.C. at Toronto on Good Friday, March 30, next, or by private stations?

Mr. LaFLECHE: The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is arranging on its networks special programmes to mark Good Friday. The corporation is not in a position to indicate in advance whether or not private stations are planning to broadcast church services on that day.

Mr. CHURCH: The reply of the minister, as handed him by the C.B.C., is that they are arranging network special programmes, and the minister says he has no knowledge in regard to the private stations. The list of programmes for to-morrow does not include any services of this kind, and I suggest that the minister should consider applying the principles of the Lord's Day Act to Good Friday, because so far during this war there have been no special services broadcast on this day. My question remains unanswered.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I have already explained to the hon. gentleman that I gave him the reply as I received it from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I added that I had tried to get what I believe is in existence—a copy of the printed programme for the week during which Good Friday occurs, that is this week. I wanted to give my hon. friend an answer this afternoon because Good Friday is to-morrow. As to the last remarks of the hon. member, I shall have great pleasure in passing them on to the board of governors of the corporation.

Mr. CHURCH: So far the programmes have been all grand operas, jazz, but since the war have come on this day principally from Hollywood.

Mr. HOMUTH: And soap and stomach pills.

Mr. CHURCH: On this day, since the war started, religious broadcasting is here to stay whether the C.B.C. like it or not.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I know I should not speak too much at this time, but it is hardly fitting to belittle what the corporation is doing. In the reply I gave this afternoon the hon. gentleman will find that the C.B.C. is preparing special programmes in consequence of to-morrow being Good Friday. Good Friday is observed by the corporation by putting on special and appropriate programmes.

[Mr. I. A. Mackenzie.]

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

SUGAR BEET INDUSTRY—ASSISTANCE TO PRODUCERS

Mr. BLACKMORE:

1. Did a delegation from The National Sugar Beet Producers Association of Canada tender a submission to S. R. Noble, J. L. Ilsley and J. G. Gardiner on or about February 7, 1945, in Montreal, in an effort to obtain assistance for beet producers of Canada?

2. If so, what kind and degree of assistance did they ask for?

3. Was their request granted?

4. If not, why not?

5. On or about February 12, 1945, did a delegation of the same organization make a submission to Messrs. Ilsley and Gardiner in Ottawa?

6. If so, what kind and degree of assistance did they ask for?

7. Was their request granted?

8. If not, why not?

9. What price does the dominion government pay at present for cane sugar refined?

10. What price does the dominion government at present pay beet sugar refineries for beet sugar refined?

Mr. ILSLEY: Return tabled.

R.A.F.—PENHOLD STATION—DAMAGE TO PROPERTY

Mr. SHAW:

1. Has any department of government received, since September, 1944, a report respecting certain alleged property damage done to furnishings and/or installations at the Penhold S.F.T.S. (R.A.F.)?

2. If so, was an investigation made?

3. What did such an investigation divulge?

4. If property damage were done, what was the total cost of repairs and replacements?

5. What action, if any, was taken against those responsible for such damage?

PERMITS TO CIVILIANS TO VISIT BATTLE AREAS

Mr. WINKLER:

1. How many civilians from Canada were given free transportation and accommodation to visit the forces in Britain and the battle areas in, (a) 1944; (b) 1945 (until March)?

2. Who were they, and how long did the visit last, including passage in each case?

UNITED STATES DEFENCE PROJECTS IN CANADA—FORT MCMURRAY

Mr. DECHENE:

1. Are some of the buildings erected by the American army at Fort McMurray, Alberta, not otherwise disposed of, being surrendered to the Canadian government?

2. Has the government received a request from the war veterans of the Fort McMurray area for the use of one of these buildings? If so, what action is being taken?

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—CHECKING OF LEAVE PASSES AT TRAINS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. How many soldiers are daily travelling on the trains throughout Canada and each military district, checking leave passes of members of the forces, (a) army; (b) navy; (c) air force?
2. Do any of these come from the C.W.A.C., and how many of each class?
3. Are separate ones for each of the services necessary?
4. What is their pay and other allowances?

AIR TRAINING PLAN

WINDING-UP CEREMONIES THROUGHOUT CANADA—MESSAGES FROM BRITAIN, AUSTRALIA AND NEW ZEALAND

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): As hon. members are aware, ceremonies are being held today at stations of the Royal Canadian Air Force throughout Canada to mark the winding up of the British commonwealth air training plan. These ceremonies will be a vivid reminder of how world-changing in their effects have been the events which have filled up the months and years since the original agreement was signed on December 17, 1939, by representatives of the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia and New Zealand.

The air training plan has been one of the most striking achievements in Canada's contribution to the organization of victory. More than 150,000 men have graduated under the plan as trained aircrew. All of them have shared in that comradeship in arms which is perhaps the proudest possession among the great fraternity of fighting airmen. Not a few have laid down their lives in defence of the great cause of the world's freedom. They belong to the chivalry of God.

When the principle of a joint air training plan was first agreed upon, but a few weeks after the outbreak of war, the then Prime Minister of Great Britain, the Right Hon. Neville Chamberlain, said in a message to me that "with the facilities which Canada possesses this cooperative effort may prove to be of the most essential and decisive character." The progress of the plan has attracted the commendation and praise of leaders of many of the united nations. Hon. members will recall that when the Right Hon. Winston Churchill spoke in this House of Commons chamber on December 30, 1941, he referred to "the wonderful and gigantic empire training scheme" as "another major contribution made by Canada". A little later, President Roosevelt spoke of Canada as "the aerodrome of democracy"

Throughout the perils and fortunes of war, fighting airmen trained in Canada have daringly and gallantly carried the battle for freedom with increasing vigour and effect far across and above enemy lines in all parts of the world.

A sense of history surrounds the winding up of an enterprise as extensive and powerful as the British commonwealth air training plan has been. May the comradeship in arms be carried by our fighting airmen far beyond the days of war into the years of peace. Through the sovereign air may they continue to pass, not as messengers of winged death to those who have betrayed their fellow men, but as harbingers of peace for all mankind.

I have received to-day from the Prime Minister of Great Britain, the Prime Minister of Australia and the acting Prime Minister of New Zealand messages which I think it is of importance to record and which I shall now read. First I shall read a message from the Acting Prime Minister of New Zealand, the Hon. Walter Nash:

The ceremonies to-day mark the conclusion of one of the most outstanding enterprises in the history of the commonwealth in this war. The scheme providing for the training in Canada of air and groundcrew personnel from all parts of the commonwealth was bold and imaginative. The men who were responsible for its conception have done an outstanding service to the peoples of the commonwealth and the memory of their work will never be forgotten.

We cannot pay too high a tribute to the Canadian government and people for their work in the execution of this scheme. From all parts of the British commonwealth thousands of young men trained in Canada have joined the forces in Britain, and from bases there have assisted in the magnificent air defence of Britain and in the great bombing missions against Germany which are yielding such tangible results to-day. Men trained in Canada have operated on every front in this war. They have all executed their tasks with high distinction and great gallantry. They have given an earnest of the solid training which they received in Canada.

Not only has the air training plan played a signal part in the victorious progress of the nations of the commonwealth but it has brought closer together the peoples of our countries. We in New Zealand have grown nearer to the government and people of Canada and the friendships made by our men in Canadian homes—where they were ever hospitably received—will long endure. Though our union in this great venture comes to an end to-day our association will remain in the concluding years of the war and through all the years to come, intimate—and should this be possible—even closer than to-day. It will inspire the co-operation which if progress is to be maintained must prevail through all the years to come between the nations and peoples of all parts of the commonwealth and empire. We are, by working together, learning to live together.

Next is a message from Right Hon. John Curtin, Prime Minister of Australia:

Australia has been proud and privileged to have been a partner in the British commonwealth air training scheme which is now terminating. Our men who have been trained there have an indelible mark in operation in every theatre to which they were subsequently posted and their record is one of which this nation is proud.

Air Training Plan

Australia salutes men of our fellow partners who have been trained under the scheme. The comradeship established by Australians with their fellow-Britishers is something which offers a great hope for peacetime cooperation.

The Australian people and government offer to the Canadian people and government their warmest thanks for the wonderful hospitality shown to Australia. It will never be forgotten.

Finally, there is the following message from the Right Hon. Winston Churchill, Prime Minister of Great Britain:

At this moment, when the memorable British commonwealth air training plan is being brought formally to an end, I send you, the Canadian government and the Royal Canadian Air Force, my warmest congratulations on the successful accomplishments of a spacious task imaginatively conceived and most faithfully carried out.

This master plan has done much to speed us along the road to victory. In Canada alone trained air crews, of whom more than half were Canadian, have been turned out at an average rate of twenty-five thousand a year over the last five years.

Moreover, the quality of the training has been outstanding and has shown itself triumphantly in superiority which we have gained over the enemy in every type of air combat.

In witnessing, as we now do, consummation of a fine achievement, it is fitting that we should recall the training which has been carried out with equal success, though necessarily on not so big a scale, in Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and Southern Rhodesia, and, of course, advanced training which has been carried out in this country for all parts of the British commonwealth. All alike have done magnificently.

I am glad to learn that, although the joint training plan is being wound up, the training in Canada of air crews from this country is to be continued and I thank the Canadian government and the Canadian people most warmly for this further help.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Associating our party with the remarks of the Prime Minister on the occasion of the ending formally of the British commonwealth air training plan, I should like to indicate to the house that not only has this been a successful adventure in wartime cooperation among the various units of the commonwealth, but, if I may say so, it augurs well for the future relationships between commonwealth nations, because what we have been able to do together in time of war we shall surely be able to do similarly in time of peace in collaboration and cooperation.

The closing of the plan brings to my mind at once two things. One is that while these boys have been trained to the extent, as the Prime Minister has said, of 150,000, there have been, if my memory serves me correctly—I have not the records with me—losses among

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Canadian boys who have participated in that plan to the extent of something like 12,000 since the plan went into operation. We must to-day recognize that the loss in men is heavy in war; and the fact that we have lost 12,000 from the flower of our manhood in air operations shows the heavy drain that is made upon our nation in times like these.

Then there was the other matter mentioned by some of the prime ministers of other dominions, namely, the associations that have been built up and cemented and welded by the fact that so many of the boys from other parts of the commonwealth have been received in such a cordial manner and shown the splendid hospitality of Canadian homes. That seems to me to be one of the practical results of the commonwealth air training plan from the social angle. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in joining with the Prime Minister's remarks I say to you that we are hopeful in Canada that many of these young men will be Canadian citizens in the future. Having sampled our hospitality and knowing something of the great resources and opportunities of our country, we are hoping that they will come here, settle down and become citizens of Canada. If they do they will be royally welcomed.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggart): We, too, would like to associate ourselves with the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon). As this great plan draws to an end it is indeed gratifying to the people of Canada that the Prime Minister has received the messages he read to the house to-day. As I sat listening to these messages I thought of the young men from all the commonwealth countries, and indeed from countries that were occupied by the enemy, who have not only trained under this remarkable scheme—and I think the department responsible, and if I may say so, the former minister, should be remembered as having played a great part in this scheme—but who have sacrificed their lives. Quite a number of boys whom I had taught, and who were among the brightest lads that I have ever known, were trained under this plan. Many of them have sacrificed their lives. We should remember that some of these boys could find no place in our social life before this war began. I think that we owe a debt to the educational institutions that prepared these boys. I hope that even if times become difficult again when the war ends, the views sometimes expressed in criticism of what were known as educational frills, or the suggestion that education was too extended, will be largely silenced because of the part played by the products of our educational institutions in this great war.

Those of us who have travelled across the country during the war and have met these fine young Canadians and indeed young men from all the united nations, on the trains and in other places ought to pay tribute to their splendid behaviour. We are glad indeed to join in congratulating the department upon the planning of this remarkable scheme, and to say how pleased we are that we have been able to contribute in this important and successful branch of our armed services. The Prime Minister said it was one of the great contributions of this country. I am inclined to believe that history may regard it as Canada's greatest contribution to the common war effort.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): This is an occasion on which we can all justifiably feel much satisfaction. No matter what may be the party to which we belong, we must grant and should grant freely without grudging that it was a great move on the part of the government to establish this commonwealth air training plan. I think it calls, too, for a feeling of gratitude that Canada was guided to embark upon this plan which was ultimately found to be so important in the final outcome of the war.

I cannot help thinking, however, that we should perhaps have sounded somewhere in parliament on this occasion a note of warning. I hope that the winding up of the commonwealth air training scheme does not indicate a disposition on the part of our government or of the British commonwealth in general to relax their effort too soon, before they are positive that this war is over. We British peoples have made many grievous mistakes in the past by failing to be adequately prepared for what might be a sudden and unexpected menace. I trust that we just do not wind up too soon, that we keep ourselves girded until we are positively sure that danger's dreadful night is past.

Mr. J. G. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I have not had an opportunity before to mention this, but this is the opportunity. Along with three other colleagues, the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris), the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), and the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly) I visited Australia and New Zealand last summer. We went to practically every city in these two dominions, and everywhere we went we were asked to take back with us an expression of appreciation on the part of the people of those two countries for the way in which the Canadian people had treated the boys who were over here training under the air training plan.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): I have had reason to observe the progress that has been made in this commonwealth air training scheme, having had no less than six air training schools situated in my constituency. The people of Canada through the respective administrations and the staffs of the various countries involved have indeed done a great job, and I am only a little sorry that the former Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) was not able to carry out his duties up to the present time. I think a good deal of credit is coming to him. I am pleased that the Prime Minister and others have made reference to those trained under this plan who have given their lives on the altar of sacrifice.

While the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was reading a tribute to this air training scheme I happened to open a letter from a lady in Edmonton who had just lost a son. Enclosed was a little card in memory of her son, Donald F. McDonald, sergeant observer. As the Prime Minister was paying tribute to the boys who have lost their lives, I could not help thinking of the sacrifices that had been made by the mothers who had given their sons in their country's cause. I wonder if I may be permitted to put on Hansard two or three verses that evidently were written by this boy's mother:

In the sombre land of Germany,
They have laid my son to rest;
The 'wings' he won while here on earth
Lie still upon his breast,
But his soul, the indestructible,
Flew far above the sod
And joined the throng of worshippers
Right at the feet of God!

Sleep peacefully, beloved son
In earth's last little bed,
What matter that 'tis German soil
Supports your lovely head—
Your Soul, by His eternal grace,
Hath seen the beauty of His face.

So rest, my dearest one, rest,
Your loved "crew" by your side,
That hallowed plot in Germany
By your young blood sanctified,
Shall always and forever be Of Canada a part—
Your Canada, our Canada,
To which you gave your heart!

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): In any air training plan the empire should come first as a unit, and then you can branch into the international field. All the bases should belong to the British empire. It is all right to let others use them, but we should retain sovereignty over all of them.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STATEMENT IN REGARD TO FARM LABOUR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): On Tuesday the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) and the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) asked about the provision of labour for the opening farm season, and I would like to supplement what I stated in the course of the discussion on the supplementary estimates last evening.

Instructions were sent to all selective service offices across Canada that farm workers on temporary permits in other essential industries during the winter months must return to agriculture on April 1 or at subsequent dates mutually agreed upon by the provinces and ourselves. We shall appeal to men in other industries to reciprocate by assisting whenever possible during peak seasons on the farm. Local selective service officers have been given authority to direct any male worker from sixteen to sixty-five years of age into specified agricultural employment. Steps will be taken to move farm workers from less to more productive farms. Officials of the Department of Labour have already discussed a draft farm labour agreement with five of the provincial departments of agriculture, and the remaining discussions will be held very shortly.

We expect that the total commitments through these agreements for sharing expenditures on recruiting, transporting and placing farm labour within the provinces will exceed the total of last year, namely $660,000. We plan again this year to arrange for the movement of workers between provinces to help meet urgent harvesting needs. The cost of this is borne by the dominion government. In addition we expect there will be a greater movement of farm workers within the provinces. One substantial incentive toward this end is a reduction in transportation charges, recently agreed to by the railways. This cost is shared by the dominion and the provinces.

Negotiations have already begun with farm labour officials in the United States for the movement of labour and harvesting outfits across our common border. We are also considering in cooperation with the provinces the recruiting of farm workers in Newfoundland to help in the maritime provinces.

We are now devising methods for a more complete check of men on farm postponements. This is being done to ensure that these men are making the type of contribution to farm production that we have a right to expect of them.

We plan to expand the use of prisoners of war labour in agriculture. Several new projects are now under consideration. No stone will be left unturned in utilizing all other special sources of labour such as Indians, conscientious objectors and Canadian Japanese.

[Mr. Church.]

Members have knowledge of the reinforcements required for overseas. In view of this we cannot depend on as much assistance during the coming summer from the three services as we have secured during the past two seasons. I have, however, discussed this matter with each of the ministers of national defence. In the case of the air force the provisions for spring leave have again been put into effect. In view of increased commitments we shall not be able to count on any substantial assistance from the navy. From the army we have the assurance that the representatives of the district officers commanding appearing before the mobilization boards will be instructed not to oppose the postponement of men who are employed in the production of dairy and live stock products. Farm leaves, including special spring and harvest leaves, will continue to be granted. They will naturally be limited by the fact that many men formerly available have been sent overseas. However, men who have returned from overseas on rotation leaves will be eligible this year to help on the farm.

RADIO BROADCASTING

INQUIRY AS TO PERMITS FOR STATIONS IN WESTERN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply, under whose jurisdiction apparently licences are granted to firms operating radio stations, during the period of the war. A day or so ago the Free Press carried a news item to the effect that a radio station would be opened immediately at St. Boniface, Manitoba, and that stations were planned for Gravelbourg and Prince Albert, Saskatchewan, and Edmonton, Alberta. In view of the fact that there is already a ninety-eight per cent coverage by CBK and the private stations, is it a fact that the minister has granted permits for the opening of these additional stations, as set out in the article to which I have referred? If not, is he now giving consideration to the question whether or not they will be opened?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Speaker, my duties are simply the administration of the radio act, which is the technical allocation of air waves. Recommendations in the matter of new broadcasting stations come from the C.B.C., through the Minister of National War Services. My recollection of the facts is that a licence has been issued for a station at St. Boniface, and that at the same time applications were made for licences for the three other stations referred to by my hon. friend. The permit for the station at St. Boniface was issued, with the distinct understanding that it was without prejudice to the applications for licences at the other points. That was on the recommendation of the C.B.C. When further recommendations come forward from C.B.C., they will be considered by the government.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: If I may ask a supplementary question, has the C.B.C. recommended to the minister, who as he says is in charge of the allocation of wave lengths, the issuance of licences for Prince Albert, Gravelbourg and Edmonton?

Mr. HOWE: The answer is no.

FARM PUMPS

INQUIRY WITH RESPECT TO INCREASED QUOTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, based on a letter from the Brandon Pump and Windmill Works stating that they have ninety orders for farm pumps, some dating back to last October, and that they are definitely needed. They have asked for an increased quota, as they have on hand materials to continue the supply. The application was refused, with instructions that they could make up stock and hold pumps until after July 1. This equipment is urgently needed now by farmers, in Manitoba at least, in order that they may continue to do their part in the food production programme. Will the minister have the order altered so that these pumps can be obtained?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I will bring the request to the attention of the wartime prices and trade board, but I know from the correspondence that passes through my office that the demand for pumps far exceeds the supply, and the equitable allocation of the available supply of pumps is a very difficult matter to arrange satisfactorily. For instance, I was just reading in the office last night or this morning a bitter complaint from the owner of a triplex house, in which there were families comprising fifteen children, who was unable to get a second pump for the property, although it was badly needed—because, as he put it, farmers were given the preference in the allocation of pumps. In other words, he said, the government puts the interests of cattle above the interests of children. I just cite that instance to show how difficult it is to distribute pumps in a way that will be satisfactory to all those who require them.

POWELL RIVER WHARF

FACILITIES FOR LOCAL SHIPPING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): I should like to ask the Minister of Fisheries or the acting minister whether any request has been received from the fishermen of Powell River for suitable docking facilities. This is very important to them.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): As the Minister of Fisheries is not in his seat at the moment perhaps the question can stand as a notice, to be answered at the next sitting.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND RESOURCES

Indian Affairs branch—

446. Indian hospitals and general care of Indians—further amount required, $240,000.

Mr. BRYCE: Before adjournment last night I was trying to get certain information from the minister which I failed to receive, but to-day it has been supplied by his department, so that is quite satisfactory.

Mr. MacINNIS: Some time ago I saw a report that the minister was going to appoint a commission to look into the incidence of tuberculosis among the Indians. Has that commission been appointed, and if so, who are its members?

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): I think my hon. friend must be under some misapprehension in thinking that there was any proposal to establish a special commission to investigate the incidence of tuberculosis among the Indians. Last summer special investigations were carried on among the Indians in the northwest territories and the Mackenzie river country, from the point of view not only of health but also of education. Possibly that is what my hon. friend has in mind.

Tuberculosis among the Indians is under constant review. The department has the advantage of the experience of the health departments of each of the provinces; I think I am correct in saying that almost every province has one or more special institutions for the treatment of tuberculosis, and many Indians are treated in these institutions. In addition several sanatoria have been started by the department especially for the treatment of Indians afflicted with tuberculosis, and that programme is being extended. Ten years ago there was no special attention given by the department to tuberculosis among the Indians, but during the present fiscal year something like $700,000 has been spent on this particular phase of Indian health. It is the programme of the department to expand that work steadily. Tuberculosis among the Indians affects not only the Indians themselves but has a vital bearing on the health of the white population.

Mr. MacINNIS: I must accept the minister's explanation, but I was under the definite impression that I heard over the radio or read in the press of the appointment of such a commission. If there has been no such appointment, the matter can be discussed at some other time. Two or three years ago I drew the minister's attention to tuberculosis among the Indians, and I am glad that investigations have taken place to the extent that he has indicated.

There is one other matter I wish to bring up, and if it has already been rectified, a simple affirmation to that effect will be quite satisfactory. I had word from the secretary of the British Columbia hospital association that certain hospitals on Vancouver Island, the Port Alberni hospital, the hospital at Duncan and the hospital at Nanaimo, had notified the Department of Indian Affairs that they would accept no more Indian patients unless the department paid the standard per diem rate asked for. The department paid it in the case of these three hospitals, but St. Joseph's hospital at Comox made a similar request, which was refused. Why was the request refused in connection with one hospital when it was granted in connection with the other three? Or perhaps the request has been granted as far as St. Joseph's hospital is concerned.

Mr. CRERAR: I am afraid I am unable to give a specific reply to the question asked. My recollection at the moment is that the rates have been increased in a good many hospitals, if not in all. There are factors of operating cost to be considered. A hospital may be located at a point where the costs of operation are higher than those of a hospital located at another point. Several Indian hospitals are administered by the department, and one of these is located in British Columbia about sixty miles east of Vancouver. Our officials think that through the operation of these hospitals they get a reasonable check on operating costs. The increase we are asking in this supplementary vote is accounted for to a considerable degree—just how much I cannot say—by the fact that rates of payment have increased.

Mr. MacINNIS: Would the minister at some time give me in writing a detailed answer to my question?

Mr. CRERAR: If my hon. friend will give me in writing details of the information he wants, I will see that the department supplies the answers if it is possible to do so.

Mr. MacINNIS: I rather think they will be in Hansard, but I shall give them to the minister.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Health branch—

447. Combating venereal diseases; administration—further amount required, $90,250.

Mr. COLDWELL: Could we hear just what the situation is with regard to this particular scourge and what steps are being taken to educate the people?

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Health and Welfare): This item of $90,250 relates wholly to an educational campaign that was conducted last year by the department in an effort to combat venereal disease. A meeting was held as far back as 1943 and a special committee was set up composed of representatives of the armed forces, the provincial departments of health, other interested parties and the dominion health council. These meetings led on to a meeting on August 9, 1944, at which this special campaign was decided upon, and the campaign was authorized by an order in council passed the same day.

The campaign consisted of newspaper advertising, radio programmes, publicity by way of films and other educational material along the same line. It was worked out by the department in cooperation with other government departments and the armed forces. This was carried on under the direction of my predecessor, the present Minister of Veterans' Affairs. The result of the campaign was that public opinion was awakened, and we believe that it helped to create more favourable conditions for the provincial and other agencies to tackle the job. There has been close cooperation between the division of the department having to do with venereal diseases and the provincial health officers and the armed forces.

[Mr. Crerar.]

The hon. member asked what the present situation was with regard to this scourge. I think I can say that there has been a steady and fairly marked improvement with regard to venereal diseases in the army and other armed forces since 1942, and we believe also that there has been a considerable improvement in the civilian population. Statistics of venereal diseases in this country and in all others are notoriously unreliable because of the failure to report all cases, and so it is really impossible to say with any accuracy what the situation is so far as the civilian population is concerned. The belief is that there has been an improvement.

Since I had nothing to do with the planning of the campaign which was entirely to the credit of my predecessor, I think I can tell the house that the publicity was very well received throughout the country. It met with approval in other countries and several foreign health authorities have indicated that they would like to use the same material in similar campaigns.

Mr. COLDWELL: Has any plan been worked out by the department in cooperation with the provincial health and educational authorities to provide some education along these lines to the senior students in our high schools, technical schools and universities? As we all know from the statistics that have been brought to our attention, in the United States this scourge has been prevalent among children in the late adolescent years. One of the difficulties facing the authorities has been to find the carriers, who are not in many cases of the type that were supposed to be carriers in former years. During the war there has been a considerable relaxation of morals, and I was wondering if any plan had been worked out to inform students in our high schools and universities, or possibly senior groups outside of our educational institutions. The facilities are already available through our schools and universities.

Mr. CLAXTON: The plan I referred to was designed to appeal to all classes of the community, which would include senior students in the high schools and colleges. Publicity was carried on in the newspapers and magazines, over the radio and by means of films. A federal-provincial conference of venereal disease control directors was held between August 8 and August 11, 1944, and I understand that it considered the question raised by my hon. friend. This is, of course, ultimately a matter for the provincial authorities. I am not aware of anything that this department has done toward making specific suggestions along that line to the provincial authorities, but I can assure my hon. friend that we will take his suggestion into consideration. I shall see that it is brought before the dominion health council at its next meeting.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am anxious that this government should do something along this line. In some of the provinces the appropriations that have been made for this work have not been spent. I think there has been some neglect on the part of certain provincial authorities. During the last several years the federal authorities have tried to do something to improve this situation.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I understand that Hon. R. P. Vivian, minister of public welfare in Ontario, has carried on a campaign in this respect for over two years. He has taken it to the schools, and he has also had lecturers going around.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was not referring to Ontario.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): No, but I wish to mention that this has been done. I know it has been taken up with the local councils of women throughout Ontario.

Mr. COLDWELL: Frankly I was thinking of Saskatchewan.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): There is no doubt that similar work is needed all over the country. I wanted to ask the minister if it is being carried on at all by the national health associations, of which, I understand, he is trying to form industrial and other branches.

Mr. CLAXTON: The Health League of Canada is one of the organizations which has carried on a very active work in this field. It is assisted by an annual grant of $5,000 from the federal government, and also, I believe, by very close cooperation from the officers of the department. A number of other organizations are actively concerned with this matter, but do not receive a specific grant from the federal government. In addition to Ontario, to which my hon. friend referred, a number of provinces and many educational authorities conduct lectures and give demonstrations of the type suggested by him and by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): It was found in Ontario very hard at first to break down the prevalent hush-hush feeling with regard to venereal disease. Eventually, largely by taking it up with the local councils of women all over the country, and especially in Ontario, this attitude has been changed, and I know that the subject is openly discussed at their meetings.

Mr. CLAXTON: The committee may be interested to learn that this campaign of publicity was quite new in the history of health advertising anywhere in the world, and it was entered upon with, I believe, some trepidation by my predecessor in office. The advertising dealt with this matter with great frankness, although in quite a proper and unsensational way. I can tell my predecessor, and I am sure he will hear it with satisfaction, that the campaign was not only greeted with great praise from all parts of Canada, but no single complaint was received from any source, and I think it did a great deal, as the hon. member for Peterborough West suggested, to break down the hush-hush attitude toward this disease.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I agree that it is time to get over this hush-hush attitude, but I do not like what has been said about the armed services. I am not apologizing for anything which happened in Ontario; nobody can account for what happens there.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): It is the cleanest province in the country.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Not from all we have seen; but an allusion has been made to the armed services which I entirely resent, and I want the minister to correct any impression it may create. No one in Canada has anything to fear from the armed services, and as an old soldier I object to any intimation that this trouble is confined to the armed services.

Mr. MacINNIS: I understand that Colonel Williams, who was in charge of venereal disease control, has returned to his former practice in Vancouver. Has anyone taken his place here, carrying on what he was doing?

Mr. CLAXTON: I am glad to say that Doctor Georges Leclerc, who was Colonel Williams' assistant, and who was brought into this work in the army first, and then into the department by Colonel Williams, who had himself done such fine work, is acting as his successor. Major Leclerc, after graduating from the university of Montreal, did post-graduate work in this field at New York, at Johns Hopkins, as well as a long internship in Montreal, and he is thoroughly competent in his field.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I say a word in connection with the wonderful work carried on by Colonel Williams, not only in British Columbia, which has pioneered in reforms in this direction, but also for the Department of National Defence and for the former department of pensions and national health. As my hon. friend knows,

[Mr. G. K. Fraser.]

Colonel Williams' services were requested on several occasions by international authorities to undertake this work in a large international way. In regard to his successor, who has been mentioned by the present minister, when this campaign was launched last year I felt it my duty to address a great meeting of some fifteen hundred people in Ottawa. This very able gentleman was present and addressed the same meeting, and I can vouch for everything the minister has said as to his excellent qualifications to succeed one of the greatest authorities in the world—Colonel Williams.

Mr. FULFORD: About a year ago all hon. members were invited to the railway committee room to hear Doctor Williams lecture. It is a crying shame that there were only a handful there. At this lecture motion pictures were shown which were prepared for the armed services—I have special reference to those prepared for the air force. I think that those pictures in a modified form could and should be shown in every high school in the dominion. They were by far the best material on the subject of venereal disease that I have seen.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I agree.

Mr. CLAXTON: Since the hon. member asked me about the educational campaign to be carried on among schools, I have received a note that programmes which are being designed and worked out for them will be discussed with the provincial authorities at a very early day.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Income tax division—

448. District offices—further amount required, $775,000.

Mr. PERLEY: Will the minister give us a little information with respect to this amount, which is quite large? In the detail found on page 8 the larger amount is for temporary assistance. What is the nature of this temporary assistance? Does it include special inspectors in the income tax branch?

In this connection I may say that I was recently in the income tax office at Regina, trying more or less to help out some farmers who were having a little difficulty in making out their forms; and the official in charge told me that quite a number of special inspectors had been appointed to go through different districts and municipalities and confer with farmers, not only from the point of view of getting complete statements from them, but in some measure to assist them, which I think is all right. I am proud of the fact that the department's statement shows that of the total income tax paid by farmers in the whole dominion, nearly half was paid last year by the farmers of Saskatchewan. No doubt the minister has seen that statement; and I want to commend the farmers of Saskatchewan and express the pride we feel regarding what they have done. But I was just wondering if more of these inspectors had been put on in Saskatchewan than in other provinces; for in the statement issued by the department it may be seen that last year in one province the farmers' payments were as low as $5,000, although that province has as many farmers as we have in Saskatchewan. I hope that the increased number of inspectors who are operating in Saskatchewan is not accounted for by the fact that our farmers pay so much more income tax than those of other provinces. I trust that a special raid is not being made upon them owing to that fact. Will the minister say whether the item for temporary assistance includes these inspectors?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Acting Minister of National Revenue): This supplementary estimate for $775,000 is to take care of the tremendously increased staff in the department. When the estimates for 1944-45 were being prepared there were 3,961 employees actually working in the various district offices across Canada. Actually the staff in all the district offices on January 31 of this year numbered 5,606. This item is purely for the payment of salaries and cost of living bonus for these temporary employees, running into these large figures in all the districts in Canada, from the Atlantic to the Pacific. There is no concentration of new employees in any particular province or in any particular district. It is just the increase in staff throughout Canada to take care of the enormously enlarged volume of taxation work resulting from the great prosperity in the country.

Mr. PERLEY: I got it direct from the chief of the inspection office in Regina that there were ten or twelve going around Saskatchewan. Would this include those inspectors?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): If those men have been taken on in this past year they will be temporary and will be included in this figure, but I cannot tell without knowing who they are and looking up the records to see when they were taken on.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Are there any working on a commission basis?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I have already answered that question to-day. There are none working on a commission basis. They are working on salary.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): This seems a large item for temporary assistance. As representative of the constituency I have been asked many pertinent questions with reference to this matter, because in the last two years in my province the inspectors have spent a great deal of time at every municipal office in my riding. I am not objecting, but I wish to make a comparison. They hold sittings at every municipal office in my constituency and have got in contact with every farmer and it has probably paid the government very well that they have done this. But in the constituency adjoining mine, in a different province for that matter, I have conferred with the municipal officials and I gather that they have never heard of a taxation inspector being in the municipality, and in some instances they do not know whether the farmer is sent any income tax forms. Yet they are producing much the same as the people in my district. As a result of that experience I have been wondering whether the same policy is followed in every province or whether a certain latitude is given to different provincial administrations under the federal income tax set-up. I should like to know whether certain provincial administrations are given the latitude to work out their own policy and their own system of inspection under the provincial jurisdiction. If a little later the minister could give us the number of employees in each province it would be very useful, but what I am particularly keen to find out is whether a different policy is being followed in each of two different provinces side by side, because the amount of money collected in comparable districts is not the same. These questions are being asked me and I cannot answer them.

Mr. COLDWELL: Those of us who come from Saskatchewan have all been asked these questions, because it is an extraordinary thing that nearly fifty per cent of the income tax paid by farmers has been paid by the farmers of Saskatchewan.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Nonsense.

Mr. COLDWELL: Am I right?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The year before last, I believe.

Mr. PERLEY: Forty-five per cent.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Forty-two per cent.

Mr. COLDWELL: We have been wondering whether the methods vary or what exactly the difference is, because when we look across the country and realize that our farmers in Saskatchewan in the last couple of years have enjoyed good crops and, I will not say high prices, but better prices than before, nevertheless it does seem strange that the conditions should be as indicated. It emphasizes the need, in provinces like Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta, where the returns fluctuate so much from year to year, of some proper method to be applied over a long period of years. Apart altogether from that, I may say to the member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) that we are being asked why it is that the farmers of Saskatchewan are paying so much more in income tax than the farmers of other provinces, and we cannot give a satisfactory answer.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Last year I brought up a matter which I will again bring to the minister's attention. I hope that when the minister is spending this money next year—as a matter of fact I do not think he will be in that position next year—

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): No, back to my Trade and Commerce department.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I was going to say I hope Peterborough will be considered. At the present time the individual has to go to Kingston, seventy-five miles away to get any satisfaction at all; otherwise it has to be done by letter, and letters are not satisfactory. It costs the chartered accountants in Peterborough a great deal of money every year telephoning and writing to Kingston, and in view of the fact that the staff at Kingston is one of the smallest in the country it is hard for them to get the work out. I am not blaming them, because they have been short-staffed. In fact, last year they put on an extra man to look after succession duties. I trust the minister will consider sending a man to Peterborough when it comes to tax payment time to help in the filling out of returns, because the people should have somebody to guide them. We are the largest city in the whole district and we have not had any consideration at all when it comes to the payment of income tax.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Several members have mentioned the total amount of taxes paid by farmers in the various provinces, as recently announced in one of our financial papers. I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, that I also have asked questions, only I have asked them of the department. I was assured, and I am fully convinced, that exactly the same basis of collection is in vogue in all the provinces. There has been no particular concentration of collection agents or individuals connected with the various district offices in any province. The figures I quoted show, however, an increase across Canada of from 3,961, when these estimates for the present year were made up, to 5,606 on the last day of January of this year, and that increase has taken place in all the offices throughout Canada.

(Mr. Coldwell.)

In reference to the question asked by the hon. member for Peterborough West, I did not quite catch what he said but I shall see it in Hansard, and if it is what I think it is I will take the matter up with the deputy minister in charge of income tax. I will see that it is brought to his attention.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Thank you very much.

Mr. HATFIELD: Is the report published in the press correct? It says that the payment in New Brunswick was only $449. I know of one farmer who paid $2,500 in 1943.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): He may not have been classed as a farmer; I cannot say. I shall be very glad to have the name of this individual so that I can look it up and report to the hon. member.

Mr. PERLEY: I did not say as much as I should like to have said with respect to the special inspector, because the hon. member for Souris came near to saying what I had in mind. I understand that the special inspectors are working in some constituencies in Saskatchewan more than in others. I am not going to name the constituencies, but I wish to protest against these special inspectors and the temporary assistants. How many are working in Saskatchewan and in what areas or constituencies? We may not have the opportunity until late this fall to say anything further on this.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Perhaps not even then.

Mr. PERLEY: I venture to say that we may have more to do with it than the hon. members sitting opposite now. A number of farmers have come to my office, after travelling quite a few miles, complaining about the income tax that they are paying and of their having been put into a higher bracket this year on account of the products they have raised on their farms, the stock, and so on. They ask me to bring it to the attention of the minister. This may not be the proper time, but I should like to mention it now. I am thinking of one farmer who is short of help. He has no sons. He was not able to get a man, but he was able to conduct his farm operations by tractor and combine and do all the work himself with the help of a man in the fall when he was combining and trucking it away. His wife and two daughters milked the cows, fed the chickens and hogs. The result of their work in milking ten cows and feeding the hogs increased his receipts some $1,500, along with the wheat and other products. That put him into a higher bracket, so that he paid nearly $800 more tax. This is what he asked me to put before the minister. Consideration should be given to the type of farmer who was carrying on farming operations such as his. He claims that the milk and cream from those ten cows put him into a higher bracket and cost him $700. He said, "Do you think that my wife and daughter are going to milk those cows this summer? Not at all. We will allow the calves to suck the cows." A farmer such as the one I have mentioned should be given some consideration. He might be exempted in respect of the income from the dairy products. If he had a certain number of cows he should be taken out of the class of a dairy farmer who milks twenty or thirty cows. Because his wife and two daughters milked those ten cows he had to pay an additional $700 or $800 income tax. He told me that his wife and daughter would do no milking this summer. One of his daughters is not very well. I have two or three other similar cases that I could bring to the attention of the committee, but I am not going to take the time now. Consideration should be given to farmers such as the one I have mentioned, so that they will not lose the whole income by being put into a higher bracket.

I should like the minister to give me information as to where the inspectors are working in Saskatchewan. I know he has not the information at hand at the moment, but if he can get it for me I shall appreciate it. It is not necessary to put it on Hansard, but I should like to have it.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I shall be very glad to look it up and give it to the hon. member. I may say for his benefit, and for the benefit of a couple of other hon. members from Saskatchewan who have interjected remarks, that I have been approached by my colleagues, not in the government, but representatives from Saskatchewan sitting on this side of the house, who have complained to me that they believe the inspectors referred to by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle have been concentrated in their constituencies, working to their disadvantage.

Mr. MacINNIS: They may have gone in there inadvertently.

Mr. LEADER: If I am in order I should like to make a few comments with regard to farmers paying income tax. I hope you will be a bit lenient with me, Mr. Chairman, because I may not have the opportunity of addressing the committee again on this or any other important matter.

I came into the chamber a few moments ago in time to hear the last part of the statement made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggan. He said that he had been asked why the farmers of Saskatchewan were paying most of the farm income taxes in Canada. Well, I can suggest this to him—

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): In 1941.

Mr. LEADER: I think it applies to the present day, Mr. Chairman. I suggest to him that he answer the farmers of Saskatchewan and of any other province in this way, that if they would go into the more intensified system of farming they would have some expenditures to set against their income. That would help the people of our country, give them a more secure foundation and make for permanent agriculture than constantly growing wheat and doing all the work with the combines, and not even having hired help to pay as they would have on those diversified farms. That is the answer I would give to the Saskatchewan wheat farmer and also to the wheat farmer of Manitoba.

We are concerned about the question of farmers paying income tax in Portage la Prairie. We have an assessor and I think he gathers up quite a lot of money there. I think he is trying to carry out his duties to the very best of his ability. I believe the farmers are agreeable to paying income tax; if they are in that category I myself think they are very lucky.

I wish to tell you, Mr. Chairman, that when the assessor meets a farmer they meet on this basis. The assessor asks the farmer some questions and the farmer admits he did not keep an account, that it is more or less guesswork. This gives the idea to the assessor that the farmer is trying to beat the government. Then he questions the farmer further and asks him why he has not kept records. The farmer gets the idea into his head that this assessor is trying to make out that the farmers are all crooked. That is the basis on which they work when they start to review their income tax returns. I think that we as farmers should keep proper records, and if the assessors were doing their duty—and I think they are—a lot of dissatisfaction which now exists would disappear.

We in Portage la Prairie are quite concerned about this, and we had two or three meetings. I have some resolutions that were passed at meetings dealing with farmers' income tax. With your permission, Mr. Chairman, and with the indulgence of the committee, I should like to read these resolutions and perhaps make one or two comments. There are four or five of them.

The CHAIRMAN: This discussion may come up again on the war appropriation resolution. I am afraid if it continues now we shall have it repeated.

Mr. LEADER: I am aware of that, and it was because I wanted to be fair that I asked the indulgence of the committee: If I can get that indulgence and am in order I will take perhaps five or six minutes to deal with these points.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. LEADER: The first recommendation is:

That the income of farmers for income tax purposes be averaged over a period of four years.

I know the farmers have asked that their income be averaged over a period of five years, and I was rather surprised that our local of the federation of agriculture in Portage la Prairie had cut that down one year. I did not say anything but this just shows their anxiety to have something done to take care of the losses which they suffer during the bad times. The second recommendation reads:

Whereas the application of income tax to the proceeds of live stock dispersal sales is causing severe hardships; therefore be it resolved that seventy-five per cent of such proceeds of dispersal sales of live stock raised on farms be exempt from income tax as return of capital and twenty-five per cent be recognized as current income.

I believe that is exactly what was submitted by the federation of agriculture two or three years ago, that seventy-five per cent of the proceeds of live stock sales be classed as capital rather than income, but the department persists in classing it as income. I can cite one case, that of a man who over a period of thirty years built up an excellent herd of dairy cattle. When he got older and was unable to get help, he disposed of his herd together with his farm equipment. The cattle brought a return of $5,000, and he is still fighting with the income tax department because they are asking him to pay tax on the $5,000 worth of cattle which he sold. He gathered that herd together over a period of years, and if anything is capital I submit that should be classed as such. Oh, I know the assessors can spread it over a period of five years, but certainly that is not good enough. The farmers have to pay the tax in the long run; there is a great deal of bookkeeping to it and not very much saving to them. The third recommendation is:

[Mr. Leader.]

That the farmers be relieved of the requirement of deducting income tax from wages paid to hired help, as past experience shows that the farmer has to bear this tax by paying higher wages.

In the discussion on this point I was given to understand that if a farmer goes out to hire a man—and they are hard to get—offering him the going wages, the man will say, "What about deductions from my wages for income tax purposes?" The farmer replies, "Well, I have to do it," to which the man says, "Then you will have to pay me what you deduct." So the farmers claim they are paying higher wages as a result. The assessor comes right back and says that can be charged as wages against your income. So it can, but in many of these cases it will mean that the farm labourer will not pay any tax, and he should not pay any tax, and it all makes unnecessary work for the farmer. The next resolution is:

That discrimination exists between a farm couple who are only exempt $1,200 and a city couple who may claim exemption up to $1,860. Therefore the exemption should be at a parity with the city couple, provided such amount is earned on the farm.

I see the Minister of Finance in his seat, and he may wonder what they are driving at. On the printed form it states that a man's wife can get a job and claim the exemption of $660 which is given a single person, without the husband losing his status as a married man, with an exemption of $1,200. Therefore the total exemption they may claim is $1,860. That is being done right along. The farmer's wife cannot leave home and get a job. They have not a restaurant right around the corner, like people living in the city, and they are allowed only $1,200. But, as the hon. member for Qu'Appelle stated a short time ago, it is the farmer's wife and his small boys and girls who are milking the cows and feeding the hogs, trying to keep up production in this country when hired help cannot be found. They would be glad to pay hired help, but it is unprocurable. So the farmer's wife, his daughters and small boys undertake to do this work, yet that couple are exempt to the extent of only $1,200. If they were living in the city the wife could get a job somewhere else, and their total exemption would be $1,860. Is it not possible to give that to the farmer whose wife stays on the farm and helps maintain production in this country, instead of seeking a job somewhere else? I say it is possible. The farmers of Portage la Prairie are asking for this, and I endorse their request whole-heartedly. The next recommendation is:

That a fixed price of $1 per day be allowed for board of hired help on the farm.

I think at present an allowance of up to $1 a day may be made, but many of these assessors interpret that provision in different ways. They may allow 75 cents a day, 85 cents a day or perhaps $1. They have the authority to allow up to that amount, and the farmers are asking that this be placed on the income tax form, so that the assessors will not be able to interpret it differently, as they are doing now in many districts.

The sixth recommendation is:

That the income tax should be so clear and specific that all decisions of assessors should be uniform in their application.

These assessors are given discretionary powers, and they make different adjustments. Sometimes these people get together and wonder what is the reason for the difference. I got this right from the head office in Winnipeg. One man may be allowed only $15 as pin money for his wife, while another assessor may think a farmer's wife should be granted $100 to $150 as pin money. When that situation exists you can see the confusion it causes in the minds of these people. They are asking that this be made statutory and placed right on the income tax form, so that the assessors will not have this discretionary power, though I think they use that power to the best of their ability. From the experience I have had with the assessors I believe they are trying to do their best.

The seventh recommendation is:

That dependent children under eighteen years of age paid up to $400 per year (board included) be exempt. This should be inserted in the income tax form.

That is something a great many of the people in Portage la Prairie did not know a thing about. I believe it was only through my own efforts that they found they could allow as much as $400 to a dependent child, including board, which could be charged against income as expense. Some of them were getting that; others did not know a thing about it. I do not think the assessors are very much concerned with pointing out these things. They are concerned with how to get hold of the money which they believe the farmers are trying to gyp them out of, in a good many cases. So they are asking that this be stated plainly on the income tax form.

I want to apologize for having said this much, Mr. Chairman, though it really was not such a great deal after all. However, I have only done my duty as I see it, and I thank the committee for its indulgence.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): In addition to what I have said already and the questions I have asked, I want to support the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie. When the budget was under discussion a year ago we argued these same matters pretty strenuously. This is perhaps the next important item, as far as the farmers are concerned, to the shortage of farm labour which has brought about the reductions I mentioned last evening in the production of hogs and dairy products. I can assure you that in my part of the country the percentages I mentioned last evening do not begin to give a picture of the reductions that have taken place in hog and dairy production. I have met farmer after farmer who, after interviewing the tax inspector at the municipal offices, have said, "We are going to put the calves on the cows as quickly as we can," and they have done so. I have one neighbour whose wife and children help him with the milking of twenty cows. After he interviewed the tax inspector last fall and received his assessment, he commenced milking only enough for his own family and delivering perhaps a little can of cream once a week; the calves got all the rest. That situation prevails throughout my part of the country. Where farmers were raising perhaps more than a hundred head of hogs, they have cut down to one brood sow. These people say, rightly or wrongly, that milking these cows and feeding these hogs, without help, is on the same basis as overtime work for organized labour. In the busy seasons at seeding and harvest time they have to milk the cows and feed the hogs before daylight and after sundown. We are not going to do it and be assessed to the extent we are by the federal government, although we are agreeable to paying our share.

Mr. ILSLEY: Labour pays income tax on overtime, and for the most part they do not refuse to work overtime on account of the tax.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I have known a lot who do, and some of them belong to the best paid and best organized trades. They not only do not work overtime, but more than that, they take a holiday. They do not admit why they are doing it, but I know why; it is to avoid the heavy income tax. I know you have to have the money, but you have overdone this thing. I cannot see how you are going to overcome it so that it will not be a racket, but I do say that where you are satisfied that a farm couple are working and doing so much they should be allowed the same exemption as the married couple in the town gets where both husband and wife are working. Farm production is definitely on the decrease, and you are only beginning to see the effects of your taxation. I gave some percentages on that last night, and before this time next year the situation will be greatly aggravated. The thing is overdone and the effect on production should be taken into consideration now.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not want to prolong the discussion on the supplementary estimates. I had hoped they would be finished by six o'clock so that we could get a bill over to the senate and obtain royal assent. But matters have been opened up which are of great importance, and I am sorry that we have not sufficient time to enable the house to give them full discussion. If we did that with all these items we should never get our supplementaries through, because we are dealing with practically every department and the committee, is discussing each item as if it were an item in the main estimates and covering a very wide field.

I want to say just a word about some of the suggestions that have been made with regard to the taxation of farmers. The farmers are taxed like everybody else in business. At the present time I do not think there is any difference. I do not think that the farmers receive any favours, nor do I think they are discriminated against in any respect. There was in the Income War Tax Act last year or the year before the privilege of carrying backward or carrying forward losses, which was more favourable to farmers than to other businesses, but now I think that situation is equalized.

With regard to the allowance to a wife who helps her husband in the store, she is not allowed for that income taxwise, nor is the wife of anybody else who helps her husband in a profession or business. In the early part of the war we made a change in that principle, which we could not very well justify on a basis of principle, in the case of the wife who goes out and gets a job and earns money. But you know how much she gets. You know she is working every day straight along, and we found that if we were to get married women to go into the factories and work—and we needed war production in the worst way—we would have to allow them to be taxed as if they were single persons without asking the husband to sacrifice his married status for income tax purposes. At that time the married women were beginning to flock out of the factories and go home, and so we made that change.

In the case of the farmer's wife it would be impossible—though I am willing to consider it again—to extend that rule to a case where no money is paid to the wife who works part of the time on the farm and part of the time in the house, and where no check is possible as between individuals. So it would have to be universal, I think, and if that were done, it would have to be extended to women doing housework in towns and cities for their husbands. The result would simply be that the exemptions would be increased by that additional amount. If members can work out some way of administration that does not lead to that result, I should like to hear it.

In the case of the children, the children may be paid for working without losing their status as dependents, if they are not paid more than $400 a year. As I understand the law, and I think I am correct, if they are paid more than $400 a year, or paid beyond a certain amount, they lose their status as dependents, but it can be deducted from the income of the farmer and shown as a deduction.

With regard to averaging income over four or five years, a great deal of thought has been given to that. I do not know of any country where incomes are averaged now. I am not sure about other countries but my recollection is that in the United States losses may be carried back or carried forward two years. In this country they can be carried backwards one year or forward three years.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Are they not averaged in Britain? I understand that they are.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am very doubtful of that; I am not sure. There are certain disadvantages about averaging. It means that a farmer may be called upon to pay a heavy income tax in a year in which he has no income whatever because he had a large income perhaps three or four years before. A farmer who retires and has no income would have to continue to pay income tax beyond the period when he was earning an income. I have not made a study of the situation to see what all the disadvantages of averaging are, but we do not do it for business and we do not do it for farmers because of those objections. It would be very hard to administer because there would be this bringing forward of the back years.

With regard to herds, on principle I do not see how the increase in the value of a herd can possibly be regarded as an increase in capital. If a person is in the business of buying and selling cattle or of buying cattle and fattening cattle and selling cattle or of milking cows and later selling the cows, what he makes includes the increase in the value of the herd as well as the current receipts in the case of a dairy business. I do not see how it can possibly be regarded as an increase in capital, with this exception, that if he pays income tax on the same basis as that on which a business man pays income tax—that is what is called the inventory basis—it is only an increase in the value of his herd which is regarded as income, just as the increase in the inventory of a merchant is what is regarded as income. So the income tax authorities have tried to give every facility to farmers to enable them to get from a cash basis back on to an inventory basis, and when they do that, they may regard some of the original investment there as capital, but of course any increase in the value is regarded as income, just as current receipts are regarded as income. When a farmer buys farm machinery he is not in the business of buying and selling farm machinery and the same when he buys a farm, and any increase in the value is an increase in the capital and is not taxable. But any increase in the value of his herd is not an increase in the value of a capital item but an increase in something which it is his business to buy and sell and make a profit out of. I think the income tax authorities have gone as far as they can to assist agriculture in getting from a cash basis on to an inventory basis. Had agriculture been on an inventory basis throughout the years, the question would never have arisen. It arises simply because agriculture has been on a cash basis.

Those are some of the difficulties that confront the authorities when they are dealing with this matter. There is not so much difficulty about the income tax or its application as there is about the weight of the tax. It bears very heavily on everybody, on the salaried individual, the wage-earner, the member of parliament, the farmer and everybody else.

There may be a certain discouragement of production, but I think of what the people have done during this war. I think of how they have paid their income tax without any question, perhaps in some cases it has been because they could not avoid doing so. Many have been perfectly willing to work overtime; they have been willing to put forth extra efforts to the stage of nervous collapse. These people have been willing to pay income tax on their overtime earnings. Of course, there have been some who would not do so. However, I think the record of the Canadian people under this heavy income tax in time of war has been pretty good.

I look forward to the time when the income tax may be lightened. I think that is the change that will be most welcome rather than to attempt to put the farmer in a preferred position in regard to these matters as compared with other businesses.

Mr. LEADER: Why not accept the recommendation that was made to the minister some years ago by the federation of agriculture and supported by farmers? This was that in the case of live stock twenty-five per cent would be counted as an increase for income tax purposes and the other seventy-five per cent would be considered as capital. Otherwise we are going to have this trouble continually because every assessor will make a different adjustment. That is what is creating all the trouble. I want to say definitely that the same condition exists in my part of the country as the hon. member for Souris depicted a moment ago.

Hog production is down at least thirty per cent, and I think the main reason for this is the fact that the department does not recognize that the farmer's wife and family are entitled to some pay for the work they do while the farmer is doing perhaps two or three men's work. The difficulty could be overcome if that one condition was changed. I know the answer will be that we cannot have class discrimination, but when the department attempts to put agriculture on the same basis as that of a storekeeper it is wrong.

The ordinary business man does not have to face the same hazards as the farmer. If you gave a married man an exemption up to $1,860 that would help to take care of much of the discontent and dissatisfaction and misunderstanding there is at the present time. You would also increase food production because these people are willing to work if they are paid for it.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): The minister mentioned that a great number of people were willing to work overtime although the major portion of their overtime earnings might go into consolidated revenue fund because of taxation. The minister has had two years to think up some formula to take care of those who will not work full time knowing that if they do they will get into a higher taxation bracket. Has the minister anything in mind that would take care of that?

Mr. ILSLEY: The elimination of the compulsory savings made a great improvement.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is unfortunate that this discussion has come on at this time. I am as anxious as any one else to see the supplementary estimates passed. However, since the question has been raised I want to associate myself with what has been said by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie and the hon. member for Souris.

Regardless of any theoretical consideration as to the justice or injustice of the effect of the income tax structure on the farmer, at the present time we are confronted with one great problem, that of getting production. I have listened to pleas over the air by officials of the Department of Agriculture urging farmers not to go out of hog production because they will lose the British market. You would think that the people who were making those pleas had never lived on the land at all; you would think that they lived in a realm of nebulous vapour instead of realizing that the farmer is confronted with hard, cold business facts. He must try to make a profit out of his work. The farmer considers that there is a tendency on the part of the federal authorities to take the full value every time he makes anything, while they will not help the farmer or assume any responsibility when he takes a loss.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is clearly wrong. By the amendments made to the income tax act last summer losses are permitted to be carried ahead three years and carried back one year. There is no tax on capital gains in this country. It is entirely improper to say that we want to take the gain when the farmer makes one, and that we give him no advantage when he makes a loss. When he makes a loss he does get an advantage, and when he makes a capital gain it is not taxed.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Let me present this concrete case. When my father died we had a herd of cows that were worth $135 each. That was in the autumn of 1919. We paid $45 a ton for the feed to feed them during the winter, but we had to sell them in the spring for $45 a head. What provision is there in the income tax structure to provide for such a terrible loss?

Mr. ILSLEY: There would be a loss in the year's operation. Will the hon. gentleman suggest a figure for the total loss?

Mr. BLACKMORE: It amounted to about $15,000.

Mr. ILSLEY: If there had been a profit in the year prior to that or in any of the three following years the $15,000 could be subtracted. It could be extracted from the profits of the previous year to the extent of those profits, and then further subtractions could be made for the succeeding three years. In that way the loss would be spread over a five year period.

Mr. BLACKMORE: But suppose the farmer was driven into liquidation as a result of that experience. Would there be a return of the taxation he had already paid?

Mr. ILSLEY: Certainly not.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is the point; the farmer is faced with that sort of thing. I should like to read a resolution which was passed by the united farmers of Canada, Saskatchewan section.

The CHAIRMAN: Surely this discussion is going far afield. We are now on the supplementary estimates and I think we should try to keep within the item.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Since other resolutions have been read I should like to read this one. It will take me only a minute.

For income tax purposes farmers' incomes must be paid on a five-year income average, and any incomes used to make payment in respect of principal on the home half-section of land and interest (other than debts incurred for normal current living expenses) to rank as production costs and shall be exempt from income tax. Payments made out of current farm income on all debts incurred prior to crop year 1939-40 to be exempt from income tax.

At the present time I will say no more than to associate myself with hon. members who have already spoken; but when the time comes for the regular discussion of this matter I shall probably have a great deal to say, because much must be said if the production of food in this country is not going to be lessened to a dangerous degree.

Mr. PERLEY: On the third day we were here I directed a letter to the deputy minister and asked him to give special consideration to the case I set out. I am not going to state now what it was, but I wish he would please look that up and give me a reply.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I shall make an inquiry.

Mr. FAIR: I want to associate myself with the hon. members who have already spoken on this question. I do not think it is necessary to go into it in detail, because in 1942, when the budget was discussed, I placed before the house several arguments to which proper consideration has not yet been given. The figures quoted by the minister are very fine in theory, but in practice, when it comes to making good the farmers' losses, I do not think they are any good whatever. Until the farming industry is placed on a proper and sound basis we are going to have inequalities, injustices and dissatisfaction. I want to emphasize particularly that because of our taxation structure, as well as other things, farm production is being restricted to a very great extent.

Item agreed to.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

450. Post offices, including salaries and other expenses of headquarters and staff post offices and supplies and equipment for revenue post offices—further amount required, $2,071,056.

Mr. HAZEN: Last autumn—I do not know the exact date—a petition was sent, I am informed, by certain persons who live on what is known as the Cottage road and the Old Black river road in the village of Simonds, in the county of Saint John, New Brunswick, asking for a free delivery mail service. No reply was received to this petition and no action has been taken. On February 7 I wrote the Postmaster General at the request of some of these petitioners, pointing out to him that there are over fifty families living on these roads who have no mail delivery and that in order to get their mail they have to go to the Little River post office, which means a trip for some of them of about seven miles. I pointed out that a service of this kind is badly needed in the vicinity and I hoped that he would give the matter favourable consideration. I received a letter from him in reply, dated February 14, in which he said that he would look into the matter and see what could be done. My question is, has he had an opportunity to look into this matter and consider this request; if he has done so, what conclusion has he come to; if he has not yet come to a decision, will he give the matter his immediate attention?

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): I shall be very glad to call this matter to the attention of the Postmaster General. It is more or less localized, and I imagine that if he advises my hon. friend as to the proper answer to the question he asks, that will be sufficient.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

Mail subsidies and steamships subventions.
Eastern local services.

457. Mulgrave, Arichat and Canso, service between—further amount required, $27,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: With respect to eastern local services across the strait of Canso, it may be that I am on the wrong item when I ask about this, but I wonder whether any department of government has given consideration to the reconstruction programme in connection with better transportation across the strait. It was a matter which, when I visited the locality a year ago, was most prominently in the minds of Cape Breton island people. Has some further move been made to build a bridge or provide some permanent means of transportation from Cape Breton island to connect it with the mainland of Nova Scotia? Perhaps the minister will indicate whether the government has something in mind, because it seems to me that it is a pretty urgent project, one to which attention should be given as soon as war conditions will conveniently permit.

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD: (Minister of Transport): As a result of the recommendations of the reconstruction committee, and of representations made by the government of Nova Scotia and by members of parliament representing that section of the province, the Minister of Reconstruction has asked the Department of Transport to have the survey remade and checked up for permanent facilities—either a bridge or causeway—across the strait of Canso.

Item agreed to.

Canada Grain Act—

459. Canadian government elevators including equipment—further amount required, $114,160.84.

Mr. BRYCE: I should like to know how many government elevators are operated by the government?

Mr. CRERAR: The Minister of Trade and Commerce is out of the chamber for a few minutes.

Mr. BRYCE: Perhaps I may ask my questions and put them on Hansard, and he can answer them.

Mr. CRERAR: He will be glad to do that.

Mr. BRYCE: I want to know how many government elevators are operated by the government; which ones are rented, and to whom; the rent that is charged; and also the capacity of each elevator.

Mr. CRERAR: That will be drawn to the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I have no doubt he will be able to supply my hon. friend with the information.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS' AFFAIRS

Rehabilitation branch—

465. Rehabilitation division—further amount required, $173,000.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Will the minister be good enough to inform us in a few sentences whether or not the rehabilitation services are set up in Toronto and the organization is established?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans' Affairs): Perhaps I had better briefly explain, first, the purposes for which the vote is asked. This is entirely for salaries and cost of living bonus for additional staff required to administer the war service rehabilitation services, in respect of which staff no provision had been made, and also for furniture and equipment required for such additional staff, provision for which was made by order in council on November 17, 1944, which authorized the expenditure of $50,000 from the war appropriation, subject to recovery from supplementary estimates.

As regards the second item—I suggest that we deal with both, by consent of the committee, because that would be more convenient—the War Service Grants Act, 1944, came into force on January 1, 1945. It was necessary to engage staff to administer part II thereof, that is, the credits part, from that date, positions having been established for such purposes at head office and in the district offices as follows: director of war service grants; assistant director of war service grants; administrative district supervisor; rehabilitation grant department; solicitors; law clerks and other clerks.

Provision has been made in the main estimates of 1945-1946 for their salaries for the coming fiscal year, so that these are the amounts already incurred to the end of the present fiscal year, and all the elements of discussion on these two items will come into the main estimates or possibly in the war appropriation estimates at the appropriate time.

In regard to the question asked by the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris), we are making substantial progress in the Toronto area in connection with rehabilitation. We have, of course, problems of hospitalization, but we have an excellent advisory committee of private citizens who are assisting the boys as they come back and who are thoroughly familiar with the legislation passed by parliament in the last five years, both by statute and in orders in council. We have had the assistance of public spirited men like my hon. friend in regard to some hospitalization problems and the provision of accommodation for nearly two hundred boys in the Toronto East hospital.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Toronto East General.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, the Toronto East General. The hospitalization problem is well in hand. The hard weather we had some months ago kept us somewhat behind in the construction of Sunnybrook hospital, but Christie street has been completely renovated, and we have other accommodation in St. Thomas and elsewhere, so that we are reasonably satisfied that we shall meet the problem.

[Mr. I. A. Mackenzie.]

As regards the general problem, that will not be settled this year or next year. There are new problems constantly arising and they must be met as they present themselves. But we have the basic fabric of solid legislation for rehabilitation, and that will be constantly improved by discussion in this House of Commons.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): But there is a district office actually functioning now in Toronto?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes. Our main difficulties, however, have been twofold: first, the question of adequate space, and, second, adequate staff. Once we solve these two, I think the legislation is sufficient to look after all other considerations as they arise.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Up to the moment you have not the space required or the full staff?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No; we have not the eventual space which we are looking for in order to function.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not desire to delay the passing of the estimates, but although I believe the minister has done a good job in making progress in his department, I wish to point out that the general situation as regards treatment of veterans leaves a good deal to be desired. I am sure the minister himself will agree with that statement. I should like to read to the house a brief excerpt from a letter from Lieutenant-Colonel John Wise of the Disabled Veterans Association, Vancouver, written on March 27, 1945:

Hansard records the statement from the Hon. Ian A. Mackenzie, Minister of Veterans' Affairs, as follows:

"Men do not need to apply for pensions: They will be granted automatically when medical examination shows the need."

That statement is utterly discredited, since in innumerable cases no such award, or entitlement, has been granted.

The crux of the situation is revealed by the factual records of this association, which shows that many cases have already been presented to the Canadian pension commission covering a period of so-called adjudication, totalling, for the 1914-1918 veterans, a quarter of a century without obtaining any finality in the proper adjudication of claims.

I will not give any details to support these statements. I merely put the excerpt on record as bearing out my assertion at the opening that there is much yet to be desired. I am not satisfied with the way we have treated our men of the last war and I am afraid we are beginning to mistreat a good many of the men who are returning from this one.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I appreciate the remarks of my hon. friend. I have had several letters from the same gentleman from whose communication he has quoted. We have investigated every single case submitted to us and he has entirely misconstrued my public statement. My statement was that there was automatic examination of all cases now, without the necessity for an application for pension. That was not a statement that all pensions would be granted in all cases, for that would be impossible, and that is the effect of the sentence read by my hon. friend. I think it will be agreed that this house—I do not say any government or any party—has done a tremendous amount of good thinking in regard to legislation for soldiers in the last five years. The task is not yet complete, and I hope that, whoever comes back after the next election, there will be immediately set up a committee on soldiers legislation in this house to deal with pensions, veterans allowances, training, vocational and educational, covering the whole scope and sweep of what we have been doing in the last five years, so that we shall have a consolidation by the next parliament of all that has been enacted, some of necessity by order in council, during that period. Moreover, I hope that many men in the present war will be members in this house so that they can bring their fresh thoughts to bear upon the problems. In that way we may achieve a splendid consolidation of soldier legislation which will not be equalled by that of any other country.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I join with the minister in what he has stated. One of the shining things in parliament is the fact that, in so far as veterans' affairs are concerned without regard to party, all of us have endeavoured to contribute our part to the end that the rehabilitation plan evolved by parliament shall be parliament's plan, belonging to no party in the house.

In regard to rehabilitation, there is one particular matter I wish to bring to the minister's attention, for the reason that if anything causes ill feeling or concern it is very difficult to gain the support of people for any claims of rehabilitation when they believe that there is unfairness in any one phase of what has been done. What I have in mind is the War Service Grants Act. Under that act at the present time those who return from service are entitled to a service grant. It is payable, however, only to those who return, excepting in certain specified cases. One of the causes of major complaint in regard to the whole situation of veterans rehabilitation, and also the consideration of dependents' rights, has been the fact that there is no provision for the payment of this grant to the mothers and fathers or to the estates of soldiers who, had they returned, would have been entitled to the grant, but who having given their all in the service of their country are unable to leave their rights to their estates.

This is a matter one hears on every hand and veterans organizations throughout the country are asking that something be done. But there is no fairness in the fact that while their loved ones would have earned this gratuity for the service they had given had they survived, because they have made the supreme sacrifice their estates are being denied the payment that these men had justly earned. I know the minister has given consideration to this, but I ask him not only to give consideration but at the earliest possible day to bring in an amendment and not to wait until the next parliament. An amendment in this one case could not be brought before parliament but it could be brought in by order in council—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Would the hon. member approve that course?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, no one on this side of the house has been more critical of order in council government than have I. I have pointed out the dangers and difficulties. I realize that there are, however, cases where order in council is necessary. I am not in any way excusing the government for waiting until this late date to convene parliament, thus preventing the full discussion of these matters that would otherwise take place. But realizing the shortness of the time that is available to parliament and knowing the general demands for just this piece of legislation, I for one, while taking the stand that I have always taken that orders in council have been used altogether too much during the past five years, would be the last to hold back from those who are entitled to it the payment of this gratuity by the technicality of opposing the bringing into effect of the legislation by order in council.

There is a second matter to which I should like to refer, namely, the payment of the grant to the loved ones of young men from this country who saved civilization in May, June, July and August of 1940, in the air over London. Numbers of those were Canadians who went over in 1938 and 1939 and joined the Royal Air Force. When they make the supreme sacrifice the payment cannot be made to their dependents. I know of a case where an only son was one of that valiant band of heroes who saved Britain at that time.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): With the Royal Air Force?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes. That boy paid the supreme sacrifice. There is no provision for the payment of the grant to his estate.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Is he entitled to the British gratuity grant?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: His people were not so advised. I think consideration should be given to the inclusion of such cases as that.

I should like to refer to hospitalization. In that connection I hear that so far as the men who are coming back to-day are concerned, not in great numbers but in an ever-increasing stream, there is a considerable degree of criticism of the available facilities for their hospitalization. During the last session of parliament I mentioned a place in Saskatchewan where there is mineral water that has been found very valuable in the treatment of neurological diseases. That was in the town of Manitou Lake, Watrous, Saskatchewan. I again bring this to the attention of the minister. The soldiers from Saskatchewan who have returned from overseas suffering from neurological conditions naturally would like to have an institution as near home as possible. We have the facilities at Watrous. According to scientific opinion the mineral waters there are equal to a spa. Curative benefits have been shown on a number of occasions. There is an available place there to start a hospital which was set up by the Saskatchewan government in 1931 or 1932. It could be extended. I know much benefit would come to those men suffering from these diseases.

I should like to bring a third matter to the attention of the minister in the same spirit in which he made his remarks a few minutes ago. All of us who served in the armed forces of this country in the last war are as anxious to cooperate together as any group in this house. One of the things that I will always remember, and one of the things that has most appealed to me in parliament is the wonderful spirit of fellowship that prevails among all in this parliament, irrespective of party, who had the honour of serving in the armed forces in either the last war or this one.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Just a word; I want to thank my hon. friend not only for his remarks but for the spirit and tenor of them. With regard to the hospital situation, on the 3rd of March, 1945, there were 2,315 in hospitals from the last war; from national defence this war, undischarged 2,918; discharged this war 3,337; and others, 208, making a total of 8,778. They were disposed as follows: in departmental hospitals, 6,653; in contract hospitals, 2,125; making a total of 8,778. Hospital accommodation is as follows: patients in departmental hospitals, 6,653; vacant beds, 1,425, or a total of normal beds, 8,078. Emergency accommodation: departmental hospitals, 1,381, making a total departmental accommodation of 9,459. Under construction, to be completed by July 1, 1945, 2,623 beds; to be completed by December 31, 1945, 2,650; to be completed by July 1, 1946, 2,330; an additional number 1,050; total under construction, 8,653 beds. If you combine these two totals, normal beds 8,122 and the total under construction 8,653, you will get a total 16,775.

[Mr. I. A. Mackenzie.]

May I say to my hon. friend that, as he very well knows, the problem is not a national one, it is a regional one because of the natural sentiment of relatives to have the cases coming back in close vicinity to their own homes. That is very understandable and a very human reason too.

On the point raised by my hon. friend with regard to the war service grants, I think he asked me a question in the house the other day, and I believe I told him on that occasion the matter was now receiving the active attention of the government. My hon. friend is aware that in February of the present year an amendment to the gratuities legislation was passed in England to make the cash part of the gratuities—they have not the credit that we have here—available to the estate of the deceased.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is what I have in mind.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We have been discussing it for three or four months, and the department has set up special committees in conjunction with the three national defence departments to study the whole thing. The matter is now receiving the most active and sympathetic consideration. Whether we can take action by order in council in a somewhat limited way, or whether we decide upon the principle and introduce legislation here, is something yet to be decided.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What appears to be the argument against the granting of the payments to the estate?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): A rather strange thing is that last year when this legislation was put through to grant war service grants my hon. friend, who is very alert as a rule, and other hon. members, advanced no arguments along that line. The question was not advanced in the house. We put a definite limitation—

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say just a word on that? Of course the reason why there may be mistakes in the legislation of last year—and I am wondering that we have not found dozens of flaws, instead of the few that seem to exist—is that in the speech from the throne, in January, this government envisaged the introduction of this legislation, but it was not brought down until long after. We asked for it in the house continually, but right up to almost the very last minute the house was sitting the government was not ready to bring it down. Time after time I asked the minister when it would be brought in; and I do not think there was ever less opportunity to debate an important piece of legislation in this parliament than was the case in connection with this measure. It is all very well to say we had time, but if I remember correctly the bill was brought in and given first reading one day, and we were asked to debate it the very next day. There was no opportunity to get the reaction of veterans' organizations or of the country at large, and with the limited opportunities hon. members had to deal with that legislation I wondered when the first explosion would come with respect to flaws in it. That is the answer to the minister's question, as to why people were not alert to the flaws in the measure as it went through. When legislation is being rushed through parliament you cannot expect hon. members to do justice to it. The responsibility definitely rests upon the government, and nowhere else.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Certainly I do not appreciate the political angle being introduced into this very fine discussion I was having with the hon. member for Lake Centre. I want to tell my hon. friend the leader of the opposition that we worked on this legislation for two solid years. We worked in this very building until two and three o'clock in the morning. We consulted veterans' organizations all across Canada in regard to the terms of this legislation. I also want to tell the hon. gentleman that this is the most generous war service gratuities legislation in the world at the present time. I do not like this sort of political sneaking such as my hon. friend interjects into what was a very fair-minded discussion with the hon. member for Lake Centre.

Mr. GRAYDON: But you said the hon. member for Lake Centre was not alert when the legislation was passed, and I was answering that statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am explaining certain matters which were raised in a very fine spirit of fairness by the hon. member for Lake Centre, and it has been twisted in a political piece of sneakery by the leader of the opposition. I resent that most bitterly.

Mr. GRAYDON: Now you are just playing politics.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is exactly what your interruption was, and we are not playing politics in this matter at all.

Mr. GRAYDON: Let us keep our tempers, and not do that sort of thing.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): "If you can keep your head when those about you are losing theirs—". However, that is the situation with reference to the first question raised by my hon. friend. The matter has not been disposed of as yet. This has been done in England, but last year the house imposed a limitation, as my hon. friend knows, in regard to those who were receiving benefits under the Dependents Allowance Act, and that may possibly cut away quite a lot of people who are entitled to benefits.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Does it look hopeful for the amendment?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am afraid I am too much of a Caledonian to make any promises at the moment.

The third point raised by my hon. friend was in regard to the R.A.F. That matter also is receiving consideration at the present time, and it is a very difficult question. They have gratuity legislation over there, but I am going to look into the question of the extent to which our boys who went there before 1939 are protected by the gratuity legislation in the old land. Perhaps by Tuesday or Wednesday of next week I may be able to refer to the matter again.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Then there was the question of the facilities at Watrous, which I brought up last year and which the minister said would be investigated.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I shall be glad indeed to look into that at once.

Mr. FAIR: Since the minister is feeling happy again may I ask whether the brief presented on March 5 by the president and secretary of the soldier settlers association of Canada has yet been considered by the cabinet and, if so, whether the decision has been a little more lenient than was the case previously?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I must commend my hon. friend for his persistence and sincerity in regard to this matter. This question was reviewed by the government on August 25 last, and the recommendation was rejected. About a month ago my hon. friend and a delegation of two, I think, met me in my office, and I promised that I would bring the matter again to the consideration of the government. The government has reaffirmed its former stand, but has decided that the rate of interest chargeable against old soldier settlers should be reduced from 5 per cent to  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. That will apply not only to those under the Veterans Land Act, not only to those who were old soldier settlers and reenlisted in this war, but also to all soldier settlers under the Soldier Settlement Act.

Mr. FAIR: Will that be made retroactive to 1919, or whenever the contract was entered into?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am afraid not.

Mr. FAIR: Then I can tell the minister that after the election I will be back with a great deal more help, to fight this thing to a finish.

Mr. TUCKER: As a member of the committee which dealt with veterans' affairs in the last parliament, and being very much interested in the problem, I should like to say that as far as I have any influence at all with the minister I would urge him sincerely to give the most favourable consideration possible to making war service gratuities part of a soldier's estate. Those who have lost loved ones in this war, who expected that when they came back they would receive this gratuity, cannot understand why it should be withheld because their sons lost their lives fighting for their country. I am sure the withholding of these gratuities will not be upheld by the government in the future, and I think the sooner this step is taken the better it will be.

The other matter I wished to bring to the attention of the minister is this. I understand that under the regulations a person who reaches England during this war will be entitled to the benefits of the War Veterans Allowance Act, whereas in the last war a man who reached England and was kept there through no fault of his own received no benefit at all. I realize that the number who would be affected by what I am saying may not be very large, owing to the fact that if a man draws a small pension he can come under the act even if he did not get out of Canada during the last war and also because of the provision that veterans of two wars receive the allowance. But I know a few estimable people who served in the last war, who got as far as England but no further, through no fault of their own, who to-day are told that nothing can be done for them until they reach the age of seventy, the same as any other citizen who was not in the army at all. In view of the fact that presumably those who reach England during this war will receive the benefit of the war veterans allowance I urge upon the minister that the old veterans of the last war should not be treated less generously.

[Mr. I. A. Mackenzie.]

Mr. KNOWLES: On the question of the payment of gratuities to the next of kin, before we got off on a little by-path the hon. member for Lake Centre asked the minister to indicate the arguments against such payments. The only argument I heard him give was that certain limitations were contained in the legislation passed by parliament last year, although some of us did not understand it in that way at the time. Apart from that the rest of us cannot understand the objection at all, and neither can the people who are affected. I wonder if the minister would indicate what the arguments are against paying the gratuity to the next of kin without any question. Perhaps if we knew the arguments we could answer them. We would like to know the position of the government, and why it has taken so long to come around to the position which hon. members generally hold on this matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I think the committee had better wait for proper consideration to be given the arguments pro and con, before I endeavour to answer the question just addressed to me.

Item agreed to.

Direct payment to veterans and dependents—
466. Widows' compassionate allowances to be paid under terms and conditions approved by the governor in council—further amount required, $20,000.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is this item, by any chance, to take care of any of the additional requests that have been made to the government from time to time by women's organizations representing the people covered by this vote? I will not take the time of the committee to go into the matter, although if we had more time I certainly would do so. The minister knows the various points these women have brought to his attention on several occasions, such as increasing the amount paid to these widows; lowering the age limit; making it available to the widows of veterans who served in the last war even if they only got to England; making it available to widows of imperial veterans who have established a certain period of residence in Canada; also free hospitalization and a number of other matters. I know that representations have been made to the government quite frequently by these women, and I should like to know whether this vote is evidence of any consideration having been given to these requests.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): As of December 31, 1944, there were 1,953 in receipt of this allowance. This legislation came into effect on April 1, 1943. The following awards have been made:

April 1, 1943-March 31, 1944.....	1,298
April 1, 1944-December 31, 1944.....	732
Reinstatements April 1, 1944-December 31, 1944 .....	4
	2,034
Cancellations .....	81
	1,953

The expenditure to December 31, 1944, was $507,396.04. The amount voted was $700,000. It is estimated that an additional $20,000 will be required to meet expenditures to March 31, 1945.

The sum of $1,000,000 has been provided under vote No. 412 for the fiscal year 1945-46.

Representations have been made to me by the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Cote), in regard to the same point as that mentioned by my hon. friend on behalf of the Canadian non-pensioned veterans' widows' association—non-pensioned, that is, until we gave them pensions—which has passed resolutions as follows:

1. That widows' allowances be raised to $40 a month, payable to all non-pensioned widows of Canadian servicemen whether they served in war theatres or elsewhere.
2. That the dependent's allowance paid the mother of a serviceman in any British force be raised to $35 a month.
3. That dependent mothers of sons who died as a result of service in any of His Majesty's forces be granted a permanent pension of $60 a month.
4. That veterans' children, irrespective of age, who are so incapacitated mentally or physically as to be incapable of earning a livelihood, be eligible for orphan's allowance.

The present addition is under the statute and the regulations previously passed by this house and does not represent any new benefits.

Mr. KNOWLES: No action has been taken on those resolutions?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No; I think we have done very well.

Mr. KNOWLES: Too little and too late.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps you might consider doing a little better in the future.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Marketing service—

434. Marketing of agricultural products, including temporary appointments that may be required to be made, notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act, the amount available for such appointments not to exceed $15,000—further amount required, $3,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think this is the last of the agriculture items, and I just want to point out, in case some question may arise later, why we are not directing questions to the ministry with respect to these agriculture items. There were some matters that we wanted to take up with the Minister of Agriculture had he not been unavoidably absent, and we are reserving those until either the war appropriation estimates or the civil estimates are before the house. I state that so that there will be no misunderstanding of why these items have been passed as they have been to-day.

Item agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of Ways and Means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Mr. ILSLEY: I move:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1945, the sum of $5,654,976.27 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilesley thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 2, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1945.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

San Francisco Conference

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Charles H. Larose, Esquire, Assistant Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Honour, the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the house went up to the Senate.

And having returned,

Mr. SPEAKER informed the house that the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General had been pleased to give in His Majesty's name the royal assent to the following bill:

An act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1945.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at 6.20 p.m. until Tuesday, April 3, 1945, at three o'clock.

---

Tuesday, April 3, 1945

The house met at three o'clock.

SAN FRANCISCO CONFERENCE

VOTING POWERS IN UNITED NATIONS ASSEMBLY—
PARTICIPATION OF POLAND AND ARGENTINA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to direct to the Prime Minister certain questions of which I have given him notice to-day. They are these:

Has Canada been fully informed of every decision reached by the three great powers at the Crimean conference? If so, when was this government informed of the proposal to give Russia and the United States of America additional voting power in the assembly of the united nations?

Has Canada expressed any opinion to any of the powers as to our reaction to this proposal and, if so, what opinion was so given?

Also, has Canada been consulted relative to the proposed participation of Poland and Argentina in the San Francisco conference; and in addition to that, has the Prime Minister received any intimation from other powers which would indicate that the San Francisco conference will be postponed?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I might answer my hon. friend's questions in the order in which he has raised them. To make the statement clear I shall repeat the questions as they have been presented by him.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

First: "Has Canada been fully informed of every decision reached by the three great powers at the Crimean conference?"

My answer is: I cannot say.

"If so, when was this government informed of the proposal to give Russia and the United States of America additional voting power in the assembly of the united nations?"

My answer is: As stated by President Roosevelt, the question was not one of giving three votes in the proposed general assembly to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics but of admitting the Ukrainian and White Russian republics as separate members of the united nations.

I might say to my hon. friend that word has now come from Washington that President Roosevelt has decided that the United States will not request additional votes in the assembly to be proposed at the San Francisco conference. The President's decision was announced this morning by Secretary of State Stettinius.

The next question is: "Has Canada expressed any opinion to any of the powers as to our reaction to this proposal and, if so, what opinion was so given?"

That is the proposal about extra votes. The answer is: No opinion has been expressed by Canada.

The next question is: "Has Canada been consulted relative to the proposed participation of Poland and Argentina in the San Francisco conference?"

The answer is: No; this would be a matter solely for the inviting powers.

The final question is: "Has the Prime Minister received any intimation from other powers which would indicate that the San Francisco conference will be postponed?"

The answer is: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: With regard to the second question, I do not think the Prime Minister gave—at least I did not hear him—an answer as to when this government was informed regarding the request for greater representation at the San Francisco conference.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not know that I understand my hon. friend's question.

Mr. COLDWELL: When did the government first learn that a request was to be made by the United States and Russia for larger representation? I understood what he said about the United States just now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The answer is that the government had no information about it at all. The information the government had was as to the possibility of the Ukrainian and White Russian republics becoming separate members of the united nations by decision of the San Francisco conference.

Mr. COLDWELL: When was that information received by the government?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot answer that offhand. My impression is that it may have been in some communications relating to the Crimea conference.

POWELL RIVER WHARF

FACILITIES FOR LOCAL SHIPPING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, the Acting Minister of Fisheries on Thursday last kindly said that he would accept the notice of question I asked the Minister of Fisheries regarding the Powell River wharf. I have had several more wires in regard to it and I should like to know why the question has not been answered. May I repeat the question? I should like to ask the Minister of Fisheries or the acting minister whether any request has been received from the fishermen of Powell River for suitable docking facilities.

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Minister of Fisheries): This question does not come within the jurisdiction of the Minister of Fisheries. The question of wharves falls within the jurisdiction of the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: He knows nothing about it.

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): The question has been placed on the order paper and I expect to have an answer to-morrow.

COMMODITY SUPPLIES

PRESS RELEASE RESPECTING CONFERENCE WITH UNITED KINGDOM MINISTERS OF FOOD AND PRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): A press release has been given out this afternoon with respect to a conference that has been held in Ottawa during the last two or three days between two members of the British government and members of the present administration in relation to the question of the supply of essential commodities, particularly food. I thought it would be proper if this intimation were given to parliament in the first instance.

Mr. Lyttelton, Minister of Production, and Colonel Llewellyn, Minister of Food in the United Kingdom, have spent three days in Ottawa and have discussed in detail with the Canadian government the question of the supply of essential commodities, particularly food. Special attention was given to the pressing needs of the liberated areas of Europe and to the supply of those foodstuffs which are in world-wide shortage, such as meat, fats and oils, dairy products and sugar. These meetings were preliminary to discussions which are to take place in Washington shortly. The President of the United States has invited Canadian ministers to take part in the Washington discussions, and the invitation has been accepted.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide, inter alia,

1. That sums not exceeding $2,000,000,000 be granted to His Majesty towards defraying any expenses or making any advances or loans that may be incurred or granted by or under the authority of the governor in council during the year ending March 31, 1946, for—

(a) the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada;

(b) the conduct of naval, military and air operations in or beyond Canada;

(c) promoting the continuance of trade, industry and business communications, whether by means of insurance or indemnity against war risk or in any other manner whatsoever;

(d) the purposes of the War Appropriation (United Nations Mutual Aid) Act, 1943, as amended by the War Appropriation (United Nations Mutual Aid) Act, 1944; and

(e) the carrying out of any measure deemed necessary or advisable by the governor in council in consequence of the existence of a state of war.

2. That the governor in council be empowered to raise by way of loan under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, such sum or sums of money, not exceeding in the whole the sum of $2,000,000,000 as may be required for the purpose of defraying such expenses or making such advances or loans, the principal and interest of any such loan to be a charge upon and payable out of the consolidated revenue fund.

3. That the governor in council be empowered to reexpend, advance or loan moneys that may be received by way of refund or repayment of advances, loans or expenditure under the War Appropriation Acts of 1939 (second session), 1940, 1941, 1942, 1943 and 1944.

War Appropriation

He said: This resolution seeks authority to introduce a measure which, if enacted by this Parliament, will be entitled The War Appropriation Act No. 1, 1945.

I wish first to say a few words in regard to the form of the bill. Apart from the necessary changes in amounts and dates, and with two exceptions to which I shall refer later, the bill is in exactly the same form as that of the main War Appropriation Act passed last year. Its essential features, therefore, are the following:

(1) A grant of authority to expend, subject to allotment by the treasury board, for various enumerated war purposes, the sum of two billion dollars, together with any moneys received as refunds or repayments of advances, loans or expenditures made under the authority of previous war appropriation acts;

(2) Continuation of the grant of certain powers to the government to perform certain functions connected with the war as agent for the government of any allied country, and, in the exercise of these powers, to make certain expenditures or assume certain obligations temporarily; and

(3) The grant of authority to the governor in council to raise, if necessary by borrowing, the moneys required for the purposes of the legislation.

I said a moment ago that there had been two changes made in the form of the bill, as compared with the form of earlier measures of the same kind. The second of these is the addition of a new paragraph (d) to section (2) of the bill which provides that one of the purposes for which the appropriation may be used is the giving of Mutual Aid assistance to other united nations in accordance with the provisions of the War Appropriation (United Nations Mutual Aid) Act 1943 as amended by the War Appropriation (United Nations Mutual Aid) Act 1944. Thus, we are proposing to ask parliament for only one appropriation to cover the whole of the expenditures on Canada's war effort, both direct and indirect, during the next few months. In other words, the two billion dollars which we are requesting will cover not only the expenditures in respect of our own armed forces and other direct war activities, but also the expenditures necessary to carry on the functions of the Mutual Aid board. There has been no change in the functions and powers of that board and there is therefore no necessity for any change in the legislation.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

The first of the two changes to which I have referred is a very minor one, but it draws attention to the essential nature of the bill, that is, the fact that it is an interim appropriation only. This change is to be found in the preamble to the bill, which points out that the term of this parliament will have ended on the 17th April next, and that therefore it is expedient to provide funds for the continued prosecution of the war until the new parliament assembles.

I need not emphasize that this parliament is now meeting for its sixth and final session, which must terminate by April 17. It will therefore be a new parliament, newly elected by the people of Canada, which will be responsible for supervising the affairs of this country and shaping Canada's war effort during at least the major part of the new fiscal year. It will be a government, responsible to that new parliament, which should have at least the major responsibility for formulating not only the nature and extent of Canada's continued war effort during that period but also the financial policies and programmes necessary to carry on that war effort. Therefore it did not seem appropriate that the government at this stage should bring down plans for the new fiscal year as a whole, or do anything that might even appear to commit the next parliament to a precise and definite programme covering the period for which it alone will have jurisdiction. On the contrary, all considerations seemed to point to the desirability of limiting our actions regarding war financial programmes in this parliament to the granting of an appropriation intended only to cover the period up to the time when the next parliament can take over, and further to the desirability of not embarking on any major changes in policy at this time.

Hence the appropriation which is now being requested is an interim appropriation designed to cover our estimated expenditures, during approximately the next five months, for war and Mutual Aid purposes on the basis primarily of the policies and commitments now in effect. This seemed to be the minimum period for which it was reasonably safe to provide. It may, of course, be that the new parliament may assemble before September 1, but if so it will do no harm to have an appropriation that will extend a few weeks beyond its assembling and will therefore give some time for a new interim war appropriation measure to be passed.

Hon. members may be interested to know how we arrived at the figure of two billion dollars. I will now try to throw some light on this point. Needless to say, any forecast of war expenditures covering any future period must necessarily be attended by a very considerable margin of error. On repeated occasions in the past I have called attention to the difficulties we have faced in making such forecasts and to the hesitation with which some of them have been advanced. At the present time, however, the difficulties are abnormally great. We now know that victory in Europe is certain, and most of us believe that it is also reasonably near, but no one can tell whether that means one month or three months or six months hence. And certainly it would be a mistake to take too optimistic a view. If we relax or "let down", we may be sure that we shall prolong the war's duration. Even if we assume that the war against Germany will be over by some specified date, it is going to take a considerable time to repatriate our men from overseas and to demobilize them, and there are necessarily still many uncertainties as to the nature and course of the war in the far east and the share which we can most effectively take in bringing it to an end. Providentially, the course of developments in that theatre of war during recent months has outrun the expectations of most of us, and, it would appear at least to a layman that the forces of our allies under General MacArthur are considerably ahead of their schedule. Nevertheless war is dynamic and unpredictable. We have had surprises and disappointments before, and we may have them again in both Europe and Asia. With such factors in mind, we have gone on the general principle that the only safe thing to do was to assume that our direct and indirect war expenditures would keep up during the next five months at approximately the rate at which they have been running during the last five or six months.

That is how we arrived at the figure of two billion dollars. We have simply projected into the next five months the rate of expenditures of the last five or six months, assuming no changes in major policies and no fundamental changes in conditions. As I shall explain later, we are estimating that the books for the fiscal year 1944-45, when they are finally closed, will show our total expenditures for war and Mutual Aid during the year at approximately $4,652 million. Five-twelfths of that sum would be $1,938 million. But, of course, expenditures during the last few months were higher than during the early months of the fiscal year. If we assume that the forecast I have just given for the full year is correct and deduct therefrom the expenditures recorded by the comptroller of the treasury for the first seven months adjusted to correct the effect on the monthly distribution of expenditures of certain temporary accounting advances, then the expenditures during the last five months of the fiscal year would work out at $2,282 million. Another basis of calculation would be to take five-sixths of the estimated expenditure during the last six months of the last fiscal year; this would give a figure of $2,218 million. However, the two amounts just mentioned are higher than the expenditures are likely to be during the first five months of this fiscal year, because expenditures for the closing months of any fiscal year always include a certain amount of clearing up of outstanding accounts. Under all the circumstances, therefore, it seemed to the government that the appropriate size of the appropriation which should be requested from parliament at this time was two billion dollars. I trust that this will carry the judgment of the house.

As I have already indicated, we have tried to make a forecast of probable aggregate expenditure for war and Mutual Aid purposes during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1945, and have arrived at the figure of $4,652 million. Even though it was estimated at a late date in the fiscal year, that figure may be subject to some adjustment when the books for the year are closed but it is likely to be somewhat too high rather than too low. The chief explanation for any such possible variation is, of course, the difficulty of getting the necessary bills rendered and completing the necessary checking of vouchers and other details. This difficulty is particularly great in the case of purchases from, and activities in, other countries where our troops may be located or from which we may be purchasing supplies. However, I would not expect any variation from the figure given to alter the foregoing general conclusions regarding our requirements for the next five months. I believe it will facilitate the understanding and discussion of our current war programmes if hon. members have before them the breakdown of this estimate of our expenditures during the fiscal year 1944-45. With the permission of the house I shall, therefore, place on Hansard a table showing the estimated total expenditures for war and Mutual Aid purposes during the fiscal year 1944-45, classified by departments and major functions. For comparative purposes the corresponding figures for actual expenditures during the fiscal year 1943-44, are also given in the table, although these are to be found as well, of course, in the public accounts for that year which were tabled on the first day of the session.

War Appropriation

Forecast of War Expenditures (including Mutual Aid) for the Fiscal Year 1944-45
Compared with Actual War Expenditures for 1943-44

	Estimated expenditure 1944-45	Actual expenditure 1943-44
	(000 omitted)
Agriculture.....	$ 95,839	$ 64,293
Auditor General's Office.....	275	196
Civil Service Commission.....	541	496
External Affairs, including Office of the Prime Minister.....	342	661
Finance—
Comptroller of the Treasury.....	9,258	8,404
Housing Conversion Programme.....	4,122	841
Wartime Prices and Trade Board.....	13,400	13,728
Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation Ltd. ....	110,468	81,519
Canadian Wool Board.....	500	221
Old Age Pensions.....	8,750	3,062
Payments to millers and other manufacturers of wheat products for human consumption, etc. ....	19,700	20,500
Payment of the premiums on the purchase of Dominion of Canada registered stock .....	15	13
Contribution to the Unemployment Insurance Fund.....	940	....
General.....	409	173
Fisheries.....	636	234
Justice.....	73	77
Labour.....	24,086	19,639
Legislation—
Senate.....	19	....
House of Commons.....	73	23
Mines and Resources—
Immigration.....	747	351
Lands, Parks and Forests.....	432	578
Mines and Geology.....	1,698	1,793
Surveys and Engineering.....	3,719	6,682
Munitions and Supply—
Administration.....	9,500	9,957
Expansion of Industry and Production of War Supplies.....	205,000	677,804
National Defence—
Army Services .....	1,355,000	1,312,348
Naval Services .....	407,000	369,556
Air Services .....	1,325,000	930,666
Sundry Services .....	60,000	16,457
National Revenue .....	....	4
National Health and Welfare.....	1,536	1,164
National War Services.....	25,072	13,967
National Film Board.....	1,260	1,220
Post Office .....	1,347	280
Privy Council .....	66	85
Wartime Information Board.....	2,185	759
Public Works .....	7,024	6,467
Royal Canadian Mounted Police.....	3,885	4,267
Secretary of State.....	268	364
Soldier Settlement of Canada.....	35	58
Trade and Commerce (including National Research Council).....	11,549	12,183
Transport.....	36,599	76,088
National Harbours Board.....	369	453
Veterans Affairs—
Treatment—Defence Forces .....	11,000	6,456
Pensions—Defence Forces .....	13,000	5,637
War Service Gratuities (Statutory).....	18,000	....
War Service Reestablishment Credits (Statutory).....	2,000	....
Civil Defence .....	650	1,724
Sundry.....	8,973	2,972
Total War Expenditures.....	$3,802,360	$3,674,420
Active Assets:
Loans and Advances chargeable to the War Appropriation.....	35,018	91,906
Mutual Aid expenditures.....	815,000	912,603
Total: War and Mutual Aid expenditures plus loans and advances chargeable to War Appropriation.....	$4,652,378	$4,678,929

The total, it will be noted, is a huge figure. It is very close to the peak of $4,679 million which our direct and indirect war expenditures reached during 1943-44, a peak which reflected the costly process of providing initial equipment for our armed forces, completing defence construction and providing capital for war production. However, it is only natural that our war expenditures should be high in a year in which we have reached the climactic phase of the war against our No. 1 enemy and during which our armed forces on land, at sea and in the air, have been almost constantly engaged in active warfare. This involves, of course, the consumption on a colossal scale of the equipment, materials and supplies of war. When I introduced the War Appropriation bill last year I had expected that the reduction in the year 1944-45 would be somewhat greater than the $27 million now estimated, but a few months later when I brought down the budget I took occasion to warn the house that not only our cash requirements but probably our actual expenditures as well would be higher than our original estimates. Increased costs of maintaining our armies in active warfare and the assumption of responsibility for the cost of advanced training of, and reserve stocks for, our R.C.A.F. squadrons overseas were the chief factors responsible for the increase.

In case the house may be interested in receiving a preliminary forecast of the grand total of expenditures on all accounts for the fiscal year, 1944-45 I may add that ordinary expenditures are now estimated at $754 million, capital expenditures at $3.9 million, special expenditures at $7.6 million, expenditures resulting from government-owned enterprises at $1.4 million, and other charges at $47.8 million, making a grand total of $5,467 million. This compares with the budget estimate of $5,152 million and with actual expenditures of 1943-44 of $5,414 million (including in all cases the increase in active assets) chargeable to the war appropriation.

Returning now to the breakdown of war expenditures for 1944-45, I may be permitted to call attention to a few of the more important items.

In the service departments, army expenditures are now estimated at $1,355 million as compared with the original estimate of $1,535 million and with actual expenditures of $1,312 million during 1943-44. Naval services expenditure is estimated at $407 million as compared with the original estimate of $410 million and with actual expenditures during 1943-44 of $370 million. Air services are now estimated at $1,325 million which represents an increase of $235 million over the original estimate and of $394 million over actual expenditures for 1943-44. These variations are mainly due to increases in the costs of overseas operations. As compared with 1943-44 there has been a substantial increase in the number of R.C.A.F. squadrons and as well a larger proportion of the more costly types of squadron. The increase as compared with the original estimate has been due primarily to the inclusion of the costs of advanced training overseas of aircrew for R.C.A.F. squadrons and the cost of reserve stocks held for these squadrons overseas. Canada has undertaken to bear these costs as they are properly part of the cost of operating a Canadian air force on the fighting front. Sundry national defence services, which now include the cost of military relief, a new item which was explained to the house last summer, are estimated to account for $60 million as compared with the estimate of $22 million, excluding military relief.

There has been a substantial reduction in the expenditures of the Department of Munitions and Supply. The total for this department is now estimated at $215 million, which compares with the original estimate of $183 million and with actual expenditures during 1943-44 of $688 million. The sharp reduction from the fiscal year 1943-44 reflects lower requirements for the construction and equipment of war factories and the disappearance of requirements for funds to be used as working capital in war production. In fact, we expect to have a credit available on working capital account and under the terms of the act these repayments form a part of the war appropriation.

For the war activities carried on by all other departments or agencies of government the probable total expenditure for 1944-45 is now forecast at roughly $440 million as compared with an original estimate of $375 million and with actual expenditures of $358 million in 1943-44. I shall mention a number of the factors responsible for this increase.

War expenditures of the Department of Agriculture are now estimated at $96 million for the past year as compared with the original estimate of $74 million and with actual expenditures of $64 million during 1943-44. The increases are due to the higher cost of subsidies to encourage the wartime production of agricultural commodities. Under the finance department, subsidies paid by and other activities of the commodity prices stabilization corporation, an agency of the wartime prices and trade board, are expected to cost $110 million as compared with the estimate of $140 million and with actual expenditures of $82 million in 1943-44. Labour department war expenditures, largely connected with the national selective service and the war emergency training programmes will be approximately equal to the estimate originally submitted but will exceed actual expenditures of the year 1943-44 by nearly $5 million. War expenditures of the Department of National War Services are now estimated at $26 million, up substantially from the original estimate of $16 million and the 1943-44 expenditures of $15 million. These increases are due almost wholly to increased requirements of the war auxiliary services and the inclusion of an allotment of $5 million as a government contribution to the cost of sending a much larger number of food parcels to prisoners of war in Europe and the far east. The only other significant increase as compared with 1943-44 is one of nearly $37 million shown in the expenditures of the Department of Veterans' Affairs. Costs of treatment and of pensions for veterans of the present war and sundry charges are up substantially and in addition, as a result of the passing of the War Service Grants Act at the last session of parliament, the government expects to pay $20 million for war service gratuities and reestablishment credits during the fiscal year, 1944-45.

War Appropriation

The only other item to which I think attention need be called is Mutual Aid. We now estimate that total expenditures under this heading for the year 1944-45 will approximate $815 million. The available appropriation, it will be recalled, was $887 million, including $87 million carried over from the previous year. In 1943-44 Mutual Aid expenditures amounted to $913 million. Much larger Mutual Aid expenditures during the fiscal year just closed were made on behalf of the U.S.S.R., Australia, India, France, China and UNRRA, while the amounts required by Britain as Mutual Aid were reduced temporarily because Britain was able to pay for a larger proportion of her requirements from the abnormally high British receipts of Canadian dollars last year arising from the payment of the costs of Canadian forces overseas.

In this summary I have limited myself to the merest reference to the more significant categories of expenditure during 1944-45. In view of the method we have used in determining the amount of the interim appropriation being requested, these 1944-45 expenditures appeared to offer a better basis on which to organize the questioning and discussion by hon. members than any attempted break-down of the estimate of two billion dollars for the next five months. We have, therefore, not attempted to allocate this figure to departments and it would be difficult to do so at present with any degree of precision because of the current uncertainties in the war situation, but if the house should desire to have some forecast of how this total might eventually be divided, each of the ministers concerned will be able to discuss the probable requirements within his field of responsibility.

[Mr. Hilsley.]

When hon. members have had an opportunity to study the table I have placed on Hansard, they will be in a better position to select the items which are of special interest to them, and I have no doubt that my colleagues who are responsible for administration of the particular departments or agencies will be happy to give any additional information and such explanation as the house may desire.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I shall not speak at great length in discussing the subject now before the house, but there are some pertinent observations I desire to make in connection with certain general matters relating to the war appropriation resolution, and the situation generally:

The task of governing a nation at war is a heavy and exacting responsibility. The governing of a nation at war by a one-party administration cannot fail in the very nature of things to bring added difficulties to those in power. Nor can it fail to bring as well corresponding difficulties to those in opposition. I have always contended that His Majesty's Loyal Opposition, in a war-time period, has a serious and difficult role to play. In discharging our responsibility, in accordance with practice in democratic institutions, I have never conceived it to be the function of an opposition to criticize the government only for criticism's sake, a procedure which does justice neither to the opposition nor to the government. Our job is to cooperate with the administration, where to do so is clearly in the national interest. Our job, too, is to meet the government in head-on collision when we feel that their policies are no longer consonant with the best interests of the people of Canada.

Our duty never lies in surrendering to the government, although at times there seems to be a feeling across the house that any course other than complete surrender indicates a lack of cooperative spirit on the part of the opposition. Following that policy this party can properly claim that not a single vote for war purposes has been opposed by us since war broke out. True, we have criticized, and that is not only our privilege, it is our bounden duty to the public. But we have never obstructed, and this policy we shall pursue with respect to the war appropriations on this occasion as well.

Cooperation, however, cannot be a one-way street. We do not receive at all times from the present government the measure of co-operation to which we feel we are justly entitled. In between sessions of parliament we are largely ignored, but in that respect we are no worse off than the public generally. The circumstances with respect to the calling of parliament for the present session indicate clearly the fashion in which this government, on occasion, treats the opposition, this parliament and the people of Canada. Let me make the position clear.

At the close of the session on December 7 last, the Prime Minister adjourned parliament until January 31. When I inquired as to whether a new session would be convened at that time, the Prime Minister was rigidly non-committal. Nobody heard anything more till the Prime Minister began to have a lengthy correspondence with the citizens of Grey North in January. While he intimated he needed his Minister of National Defence in the Commons to take part in the parliamentary debates, he failed even then to make clear to those electors whether or not he intended to call parliament. On January 31 we met and prorogued until February 28. Nobody heard anything more until February 28, when the silence of the east block was broken long enough to say that prorogation had been extended to March 31. Two days later the Prime Minister went on the air and indicated that parliament would meet for a new session on March 19. The whole procedure seemed to lend some support to the view that the government was pushing parliament and the people around, and, what made it look worse, at a time when everything indicated, including the Grey North bye-election, that the government had lost the confidence of the people, had lost confidence in itself, and held only the artificial confidence of a parliament elected five years ago.

Either this parliament should have been convened in the middle of January or a general election should have been called. The failure of the government to call a general election and its failure to do more than have a token session of parliament leaves the government open to the suspicion that it was reluctant not only to face the people but to face a full session of parliament.

The government knew that parliament's tenure expired on April 17. They knew because time after time the Prime Minister pledged himself against an extension of parliament's term. Still they allowed two solid months to go by without calling parliament and attempted to squeeze three months' national business into a little more than three weeks. That is the answer to the following questions which are being universally asked to-day: first, why was there no debate on the address? Second, why there is so little time to discuss the war and civil estimates? Third, why are business and the taxpayers generally denied a budget until next September or October?

Parliament now finds itself with only about ten sitting days to discuss, criticize and pass over $500 million of civil estimates and $2,000 million of war appropriations as well. This strait-jacket session gives the opposition an opportunity to do no more than lightly touch upon some of the more outstanding subjects of criticism. The public will have to understand that because of the time element we are unable to do the job that we normally would be expected to do.

We shall not hold up the appropriations for either peace or war. So far as it lies within the power of the opposition so to do, we shall see that this supply is granted the government before parliament expires. But, in following this course, this party does so on the clear and definite condition that we are not necessarily committed either to the policy or to the amounts involved when the Progressive Conservative government comes into power and compiles both the war and civil appropriations for submission to the next parliament. As in the case of interim appropriations and supply in other sessions, all our rights are hereby reserved and none surrendered by virtue of the passing of these interim appropriations. In saying that I am only making the reservations that have been normally and customarily made on previous occasions when interim appropriations have been before the house.

As a party we have given careful consideration as to how the remaining few days of this session can best be utilized in the public interest in connection with the war appropriations. In view of the fact that the present proposed appropriations are of an interim character, I believe the minister will agree that it may not be possible to follow rigidly in every respect the procedure adopted when the war appropriation resolution was before the house in previous sessions. Some hon. members may desire to speak to the resolution while the Speaker is still in the chair, in order that some special point in which they may be interested shall not be excluded from debate in committee by the possibility of there not being sufficient time to cover all departments before the parliamentary term expires. I suggest to the minister that the proceedings when we go into committee be so adjusted and arranged that this possibility shall be removed, so far as possible. I think the minister will understand the point I am trying to make clear—that such provision be made as will ensure that important departments of government may not find that they have not been dealt with before the session finally ends.

War Appropriation

Such a situation, of course, could not and never did arise in an ordinary session, for the very simple reason that the committee took the necessary time to examine all the war departments of the government. I should like to emphasize that it is important that the most be made of the limited time we have, and that the public may not have occasion to feel that any department is being neglected. The public will understand that within such a short period of time only the highlights of the expenditures can be touched at all, but on the other hand they will expect that as few of the highlights as possible be omitted. With this in mind our party will facilitate the passing of the appropriations, as well as the civil supply. At the same time we shall require the fullest possible information during the discussion.

Before I conclude I desire to make one further observation. A substantial part of the war expenditures of this government is raised by way of loans sought from the people. In the coming month Canada's eighth victory loan will be launched. The campaign will be ushered in amid circumstances which will require a clear understanding on the part of the public that this above all other times is no time to let up. The European struggle is not yet over, as the minister pointed out this afternoon. I was glad he did not take too optimistic a view in that regard. The Pacific war still has to be won. A let-up to-day means a let-down to-morrow for those who on the war fronts of the world have never let us down. We cannot, we must not, we will not let them down.

Canada, up to the end of December last, had lost in this war more than 30,974 dead and 41,540 wounded. Let us therefore not forget the part which every dollar lent will play in hospitalization of the wounded and reestablishment of our armed forces generally. They did the job for us; now we must do the job for them. Let Canada's eighth be Canada's most outstanding and successful victory loan achievement. In that achievement this party, as in previous loans, offers its wholehearted and unstinted support.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, until the members of the house receive the break-down which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has placed upon Hansard this afternoon, it is difficult to discuss these war appropriations in anything like detail. The minister has already stated that the government is asking for five-twelfths of an annual appropriation based upon the expenditures of last year and the experience of the past few months. In that I think that the minister and the government are wise, because, as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) has stated, emphasizing the remarks of the minister, while the European war looks to be close to a victorious conclusion, it may nevertheless drag on for some time in guerrilla fashion, if not in an organized way, and consequently Canada's participation in the war may last longer than the period by which many of us dared to hope it might be shortened, if I might put it in that way. Hence it is that the appropriations before the house should receive the support of all the members, reserving as we do our rights to discuss any particular item and to scrutinize the expenditures to be made by the war departments for war purposes.

I should like particularly to emphasize the importance of making ample provision for economic aid. I note that provision is being made for Mutual Aid for the united nations. No matter what we may be called upon to do within the next few months in the actual field of warfare either in Europe or in the Pacific, it is certain that Canada will be called upon to do a great deal in the provision of food and other supplies for the peoples of the United Kingdom and the occupied areas of Europe. Consequently it seems to me that this appropriation, based, as the minister has said, upon the expenditure of last year and the experience of the last few months, is founded upon an assumption that is fundamentally sound.

This parliament is nearing its close. In ten sitting days its life will have ended, and it is therefore appropriate that in the circumstances in which we meet there is the hope, which has I think been constant throughout the course of this war, in spite of what has just been said, that we would not be engaged in an election controversy in this country during a period of grave fighting overseas. I am hoping that we have now reached the stage when an immediate general election, for such it is that faces this house and country, may be fought on issues that are wider than the single purpose or in that sense the narrower issue of winning the war. For after all, when the budget is brought down by a government newly elected, whatever may be its political complexion, its principal function will be, not as it has been in the past five years—the provision of huge money appropriations and the making available of vast supplies for the conduct of the war—but rather the making available of appropriations for the post-war period. Consequently to the extent that the measures covered by this war appropriation also look to the conversion of Canada to peace-time economy, I think that all members of the house should agree to give them their utmost support.

[Mr. Graydon.]

We shall have, we hope, before another year is past—indeed let us hope even before the first session of the new parliament is called—a number of our men and women returning to us from overseas. We have to make careful plans and adequate appropriations to bring about the rehabilitation of these men and women, who have performed a service to our country which I believe everyone recognizes and which has never been surpassed in our history, in order that we may find useful jobs, useful places, useful opportunities for them all. These appropriations do provide for that to some extent.

Thus there is our own domestic field; a wide field of international relations; the necessities of looking towards the nations beyond the seas and providing Mutual Aid. For let us bear this in mind, Mr. Speaker, that this country has been united for a single purpose, the purpose of winning the war, and so far as we are able we must remain united for the purpose of laying the foundations of an enduring peace. I am of this opinion, that the post-war period upon which we are about to enter will be in many respects a greater challenge to democratic peoples than even the war itself has been, and that the problems which we shall have to face, and which in a measure are dealt with in this appropriation for the next five months, will challenge our finest statesmanship, as it will in every one of the democratic countries.

And so, Mr. Speaker, speaking for this party in this house, we are prepared to facilitate the passage of these estimates in every respect consistent with proper inquiry into the expenditures that are to be made. That is what the country expects of us. That is what we desire to do. We therefore reserve further comments until we receive the breakdown of the expenditures by departments.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, as everyone knows, Canada is still at war, and wars cost money—much money. Social Crediters are determined to win that war. They realize that the government is charged with the responsibility of conducting the war. We assume that the government know how much money they need. They have told us what they need, and Social Crediters propose to back the government in voting the necessary supply of money.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I propose to say a few words about veterans' affairs. I do so because it is altogether likely that that particular department will not be under consideration until the dying days of the session, and in fact there may be no adequate time for the consideration of the various problems having to do with the men and women who are representing Canada on the field of battle.

I do hope that the government will see fit to bring down during this session certain legislation dealing with veterans' affairs. While I realize that is asking a lot, there are nevertheless certain defects in our present veterans' legislation which might very well be remedied at this session; defects which will be recognized by members of the house on all sides, so that I am quite sure there would be very little delay in putting through the necessary amendments. At any rate it is vital that action should be taken on these questions before the fall. The new house will probably not sit until after a lapse of six months, or perhaps longer, and the intervening delay may very well mean great injustice to many thousands of our young men and women.

During these last five years the main job of Canada and of the Canadian parliament has been to wage war; but complementary to the waging of war there is always the care of those who are doing the fighting, and care for their dependents. I suggest to hon. members that the time will be here very soon when the first concern of the Canadian people and of the Canadian parliament will be the care of these young men and women and their dependents.

In meeting these problems we are against a time limit. There is only so long in which to make the necessary changes. In a few months' time thousands upon thousands of our young men and women will be coming back to their homeland and we must be prepared to see that they are properly treated when they do come back. The Canadian people are uneasy about the whole question of absorbing the young men and women back into our national life. There is great anxiety and determination to see that they get a proper start. People are asking that these young men and women be given fair treatment and that there be no delay.

To show members of the house how far civilians have gone in some parts of the country, I would point out that in my home city of Vancouver there has been set up a rehabilitation council of greater Vancouver made up of leading citizens of all parties and occupations. I believe that the government has agreed to the setting up of such a council, but the people who comprise the council have not been willing to accept any money whatever from the government. They are raising funds by private subscriptions, believing that if they carry on in that way they are far more likely to get the good will of the men coming back from the forces, and will be much freer to make suggestions, as well as complaints to whatever government may be in power. The Minister of Veterans' Affairs no doubt knows whether similar councils have been set up in other cities; I presume so.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. GREEN: I think it is a very good idea, because after all the whole question of looking after the people who come back can be adequately handled only if there is cooperation on the part of the people throughout Canada.

And now to come down to suggestions as to changes that should be made, my first suggestion is that there be a change in our approach to the whole problem of the young men and women who are returning. Our approach at the present time is to talk about rehabilitation, to talk about putting them back into jobs. It is of course very good to put these young folks back into jobs, but there is the danger of our looking back to the year 1939. Perhaps it can best be described as trying to set up a 1939-model Canada. I do not believe that is what these young men and women want at all. I do not think they want a 1939 Canada, but something far better. They want a 1946-model Canada. You see, Mr. Speaker, they have developed. They have had a great deal of training in the forces. There has been far more training given in all three forces in this war than there was in the last one. These young people have travelled widely. Sometimes people have complained bitterly about the troops and sailors and airmen travelling back and forth from one side of Canada to the other. At least it has had the advantage that hundreds of thousands of our young people know far more about different parts of Canada than many members of parliament.

Many of these young people have travelled abroad and all have developed a fitness, a keenness that they would not have acquired in the ordinary course. Take the case of a young lad of eighteen or nineteen who went from school into the air force. He had a wonderful course under the air training scheme and has risen to be perhaps a Wing Commander. That young man is now in a position to accept great responsibility. He is not coming back to his old position. He is coming back a trained, responsible citizen of Canada, able to undertake great responsibilities. And that is true in practically every case. I do not suppose there are many young men or women in any of the three forces who have not developed a great deal during their service. I suggest therefore that the better approach to the problem is not to talk so much about rehabilitation or putting these people back in jobs, but to regard these young men and women as a great asset and to realize that we must seize the opportunity to get their services in agriculture, labour, industry, business, in the professions, in public life and in every other field of endeavour in Canada.

[Mr. Green.]

We should grasp this chance to get in new blood, to bring in these young men and women. For a short time, a year or two, they may be inexperienced in the line they undertake. No doubt they will be restless at first; they may be impatient, and it may be a little hard to cooperate with them. But they will bring to any business or profession new ideas and a broader vision as well as a finer spirit. They have therefore a valuable contribution to make, and eventually they will be of great assistance to any firm that gets their services.

I suggest to the Minister of Veterans' Affairs that he try to direct his publicity in this way. Let him have some of his advertisements take that approach. Point out to the Canadian business men, to the Canadian people generally, the great value of these young men. Point out that the people at home should be on the alert to get the services of young men and women coming back into civilian life.

The same thing might be done by members of the house. Most of us will be fighting an election in a few weeks' time. We shall be campaigning for several weeks, speaking, I hope, to many thousands of people, if we can get so many to listen to us. Well, here is one thing on which there need be no division. Every one of the members of the house during the election campaign could very well point out to his listeners the great value there is in these young people. If that is done it will be rendering a great service not only to the young men and women themselves but also to the nation.

To sum up, I suggest, first, that here is an opportunity to strengthen and improve the nation by getting these young people into our national firm, Canada Unlimited, not as beginners but as full-fledged partners.

Other suggestions come to mind, but I propose to mention just two or three to-day. One is that these new partners in our Canadian national life should be given the maximum in training. I believe there is some disappointment that such a small number of the men and women who are being discharged are taking vocational, technical and school training. Might it not be worth while for us to provide that vocational training can be taken without interfering with the reestablishment credit or the land settlement plan? At present the War Service Grants Act reads differently. I refer to section 8. Reestablishment credit is only given to those who do not elect to take benefits under the Veterans' Land Act or any vocational, educational or technical training benefits. I think it would be a good investment for us to allow every young man or woman who wants to take this type of training to get it, and in addition to give them the full reestablishment credit.

I can see that many of them would not want to take the vocational training, because they would prefer to get the reestablishment credit. These credits are for such purposes as helping to buy a house, helping to buy furniture, working capital for one's profession or business, purchase of tools or payment of premiums on a returned soldiers' insurance policy and for other similar purposes. Men who take university or vocational training want to be able to establish homes too, and they want to be able to take out this insurance, buy furniture and so on. Therefore I suggest that the restriction contained in section 8 be removed. Of course that would mean an amendment to the War Service Grants Act.

Mr. ILSLEY: What would the hon. member think about discrimination that would arise as between one soldier who got $6,000 or $7,000 worth of reestablishment benefits as against another who could not avail himself of more than $500?

Mr. GREEN: I think that any man or woman returning from the forces who wants to take vocational training or training in a school or university should be allowed to do so, and that he or she should also get the reestablishment credit. The fact that they take training should not interfere with the reestablishment credit. At the present time too few are getting the training. I think it would be a very good investment for Canada if the wider provision were made.

I do not wish to deprecate the work that has already been done. A great deal has been done in the way of reestablishment, but there is more to do, and the new government of Canada, no matter what its complexion may be, must continue the present plans, and greatly expand them.

I suggest that all handicaps to the establishment of these young men and women should be removed. For example, I hold in my hand the report of one which came up in Vancouver just about two weeks ago. The heading of the dispatch is as follows: "Prices board order holds up rehabilitation of air veteran." This veteran wanted to go into the taxi business. He had been a taxi proprietor before he enlisted. He had two or three cars operating and when he came back he tried to open up the same business, but there was an order of the wartime prices and trade board, administrator's order A-58, issued March 31, 1942, which provided that no new taxi or U-drive licences can be issued. Perhaps by this time that obstacle has been removed.

Mr. ILSLEY: For a year.

Mr. GREEN: But there are so many thousands of these orders running around loose that some provision should be made by the government to make sure that these veterans are not handicapped or prevented from becoming reestablished in business.

Mr. ILSLEY: Would the hon. member give me the date of that clipping?

Mr. GREEN: It is from the Vancouver Province of March 16, 1945.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In the city of Vancouver?

Mr. GREEN: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: People have been free to start new businesses for practically a year now.

Mr. GREEN: This was the hold-up; city council was advised it could not issue a licence because of that order. It is particularly important that the men coming back should be encouraged to enter into their own businesses. They have shown great initiative, just as the Canadian troops did in the last war, and there must be no obstacle whatever placed in the way of their starting up a business of their own.

Another difficulty that has come up is in connection with supplies. Take the purchase of vacuum cleaners or washing machines for the home. They are in short supply at the present time. Firms are taking lists of prospective customers. Well, a firm may have several hundred people on the list. An airman comes back and wants to set up a home. He finds he is No. 600 or No. 700 on the list, which means he will have very little chance to get that equipment for his wife. Some provision should be made to enable returned men to get a fair proportion of these supplies.

There should be a speeding up in the payment of gratuities. I realize that it is a big job. There are many thousands of cases involved, yet sometimes they do get horribly held up. A case came to my attention just recently in which a man applied in October of last year and up until last week the gratuity had not come through. He cannot get his reestablishment credit until he gets the first gratuity cheque. That means holding up his whole reestablishment and the result is discontent in many parts of the country. If there is not a big enough staff available at the present time, then the staff should be increased. In any event there has been too much delay in getting out these gratuity cheques.

War Appropriation

I believe provision should be made for the payment of a gratuity to the mothers and fathers of men who lose their lives. Take as an example parents who are getting on in years—who have reached the age of sixty-nine or seventy. They may not have been actually dependent on their son when he enlisted five years ago, but they had every reason to expect that he would be helping them in their declining years. Under the present law there is no possibility of that gratuity being paid to them because of section 4 of the War Services Gratuities Act. The whole basis is dependency. Unless the parents are dependent upon the man they cannot get any gratuity. A change should be made there. I am not asking that the gratuity be paid to a distant relative or to anyone really not directly affected, but I do think it should be payable to the mother and father. I suggest that the government give consideration to this change, which should be made without further delay.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If I may ask my hon. friend a question on the point he has been discussing, would he recommend paying the gratuity to the mother and father as against paying it to the estate of the deceased, as has been recommended under the English gratuity system?

Mr. GREEN: There was some discussion about this the other day. At the moment I am not prepared to go so far as to say that in every case the gratuity should be paid to the estate. That may be the fair way; there are strong arguments in favour of it, but at the moment I am confining my submission to the payment to the mother and father. In many cases the mother and father would not want it; to get the gratuity of their dead son would be the last thing they would want. But there are cases where the gratuity is badly needed and should be paid. Another case I have had is where the boy has been assigning pay to his father to help pay for the home. That was not regarded as dependency and therefore the gratuity could not be paid.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Just to help along the discussion, would my hon. friend recommend that the parents make application for the gratuity or that it be automatic?

Mr. GREEN: I should think it would be better to have them make application. That is only my personal opinion, without giving that particular point very careful thought. Another suggestion is that we should make certain that the men and women coming back disabled to civil life get adequate compensation. There is no such certainty under the present law. A man is discharged and the pension commission rules that his disability was a pre-enlistment condition. This applies to men who have served overseas as well as to men who have served only in Canada. That has been the decision in many cases. I believe the pension commission have been very unwise in their rulings along this line, and I suggest that a change should be made in the Pension Act by inserting a new provision to this effect—and I am quoting now a proposed amendment:

It shall be presumed that an applicant's condition as recorded on his admission to the service was in fact his condition at that time, and that any subsequent deterioration was due to his service.

In this war men joining up have been examined very carefully, far more carefully than we were in the last war; yet perhaps two or three years later, upon discharge, they are given this ruling: "Oh, you had this condition before you enlisted, and therefore you are not eligible for pension." I had the case of a man who had been an outstanding logger in the interior of British Columbia. He enlisted in the forestry corps; he was hurt overseas and was finally discharged, totally disabled to the extent that he is unable to carry on his previous work. In his case a finding has been made that he had a pre-enlistment condition, aggravated on service and therefore is not eligible for full pension. That injustice would be removed if some provision such as I suggest were inserted in the act.

Then I believe there should be an amendment to the act to make the insurance principle apply to all those serving in Canada who enlisted to fight. That point has been raised in the house many times during the last five years; at every session of parliament there has been a fight about it. The insurance principle did apply prior to May 21, 1940, but since then the applicant for pension who has served only in Canada must show that his disability arose out of or was directly connected with such military service. In connection with disease it is almost impossible to show this, with the result that many thousands of young Canadians who were not able to get overseas, though quite willing to go, have been disabled and now can get no recompense. That provision should be changed. The insurance principle never should have been taken out of the act. As hon. members know, as a sort of substitute, subsection 3 of section 11 was passed, providing for hardship cases; but it involves all the ignominy of a means test and is really just an escape clause from the obligations of the state. I have no objection to subsection 3 being retained for the hardship cases, but certainly the other provision should be made by reinserting the insurance principle.

In any event, whether or not the government is willing to reestablish the insurance principle, provision should be made for treatment for disabilities incurred during service. If a man cannot qualify for pension as a result of the insurance principle having been wiped out, when he is disabled during service, he cannot even get treatment except for the first year after discharge, unless again he is able to show that he is practically eligible for relief, that he is almost in the bread line in which event provision is made for a cheap kind of treatment; where men have been disabled during service they should be entitled to treatment as long as they live. Certainly that provision should be inserted either in the act or in the regulations.

Then there is the dual service pension. Last fall, after the house had adjourned, an order in council was passed providing for what is known as a dual service pension. It was for the members of the veterans' guard, a basis being the fact that the recipient had served in two wars. That is a very good principle. There is no doubt that these men, who have given perhaps ten years to the service of the state, should receive a pension; but unfortunately the payment is not made in the form of a pension. It is really just a war veterans' allowance and again is based on a means test. Unless the applicant is very hard up he cannot get that pension. I suggest to the ministry that the basis for this payment should be the service of the man; that it should be a reward for service, or in other words a service pension, just as we pay a service pension to General McNaughton or any other man who has served in the permanent forces of Canada. That should be the basis for the payment. I am not making any submission to-day as to the amount that should be paid, but it should be a service pension. The present provision means that a man's earnings are restricted. If he goes out and gets a job and earns more than a very small amount, I think about $10 a month if he is single, then he loses the allowance or has it reduced. The whole principle is wrong; payment is made on the wrong basis. In addition, I understand that it does not apply to a member of the veterans' guard who served in the imperial forces during the last war. He cannot qualify for the dual service pension. I suggest that this restriction should be lifted. I am told that quite a large percentage of the men in the veterans' guard served in the last war not with the Canadian forces but with the imperials. I see no reason why they should not be eligible for this pension.

The recipients of the war veterans' allowance, both men and women, should be allowed to receive or earn higher income, without having their allowances cut. At the present time a single person can earn only $10 a month, approximately, in addition of course to what we call casual earnings, without having a reduction made from the allowance. During the war many of them have been working, and they should be encouraged to do so in the post-war years. I believe it would be a great help if that earning allowance or income allowance were increased. The war veterans' allowance should certainly be extended to cover those men who served with the imperial forces in the last war and were domiciled in Canada, say, prior to the outbreak of this war.

I have only one other suggestion, which has been offered at other times, and particularly I believe by my good friend the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). It is that the men who served in the merchant navy, in the fire-fighters corps, in the auxiliary services overseas such as the Y.M.C.A., the Knights of Columbus, the Salvation Army and the Canadian Legion, should be treated in exactly the same way as the men in the army, the navy, and the air force. These men have undergone great risks. Really they have constituted another arm of the services, and should be treated in the same way.

There are several other suggestions which could be made, but I shall not place them before the minister to-day.

I repeat that a delay of six months or perhaps more in facing these problems would be very unfair to the young Canadians who, of all people in this nation, should surely be the last to be treated unfairly. I ask the ministry to consider these questions and to bring down legislation during the present session to remedy some of the defects to which I have referred; or, in any event, to make a statement before the house dissolves and to take action at as early a day as possible. Let us always remember that these young men and women who have served are Canada's greatest asset. No matter what we do we can never adequately repay those who have suffered, and the dependents of those who will not return, for the sacrifices they have made for this nation.

Mr. W. GARFIELD CASE (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, this is the first opportunity I have had to convey my greetings to members of the house. You may be sure I have formed many impressions. No moment can be greater in any man's life than that which I experienced when I was officially presented to parliament by my hon. friend the house leader of the Progressive Conservative party (Mr. Graydon) and the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson). Indeed I felt both humble and proud: humble, because it was a momentous occasion in my life to march down the aisle, as it were, in full view of all those who have been playing their part in seeking to mould history in this great nation; proud, because I was elected by a majority of the people in a riding which will forever remain historic; elected by a majority of the people in Grey North to serve in a free parliament, the one great institution which remains the real prize for all freedom-loving people.

The people who sent me here are watching. They are interested in the course I pursue. They expect me to play my part, and within the limits of my ability I address myself to that task, confident in the hope that reasoned judgment of men of good will and purpose will prevail, that we may keep abreast of the times, and that our nation may play its full part in the onward march of civilization.

I am pleased that my first recorded vote in this assembly was cast to indicate my hope that a formula may be found to guarantee the peace of the world. What a great moment!

I should like to tell you something about my people and about my constituency. Sometimes I feel we are all too prone to forget the people who send us here. But I shall not forget that in the face of terrific odds, in an atmosphere of confusion and doubt; as it was intimated that the by-election might be called off; that there was no issue save one, a seat for my honourable opponent, the Minister of National Defence, Mr. McNaughton. In this arena of doubt and confusion I presented as clearly and forcibly as possible the stand my party had taken during the special session of this parliament. The stand was weighed by my people of Grey North, not in any partisan sense, but in its broadest application. Thus, Mr. Speaker, I come to the house with a definite mandate direct from the people—a mandate which says in clear and unmistakable language that this government will be held strictly to account for any policy which fails in its objective to provide for equality of sacrifice and equality of service. My people have said that they do not believe the government has provided such a policy; they have said they believe the government's manpower policy is weak, that it is a half-hearted, piecemeal, unsatisfactory, makeshift man-power policy.

[Mr. Green.]

The history of the world is indeed the history of the world's great men, and my highly honoured friend, the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) will find his place in history among the great men of his generation; but he would have found a greater place in the hearts and minds of the Canadian people if he had given effect to the people's will as expressed at the polls. This would have meant a great deal to the troops overseas, as evidenced by the scores of messages I received from them. They expected this, I can assure you.

War, of necessity, places a great strain upon democratic institutions. Surely, we have slipped—indeed, as the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) would say, we are bordering on fascism. One thing I do hope and pray and that is that after San Francisco we may with dispassionate minds determine our future manpower policy so that all those who enjoy Canadian citizenship within the British Commonwealth of nations will be taught to realize that they must share its responsibilities. Reward seeks sacrifice and sacrifice seeks reward. "You cannot have your cake and eat it", said the sage. Neither is it fair that the burden of responsible citizenship should bear more heavily upon one class or section than upon another.

My constituency is vast in area and populated by people ninety per cent of whom are English, Irish and Scotch. The other ten per cent are the salt of the earth, the best citizens in the world, with a keen sense of their responsibility. They are just as much devoted to British ideals and institutions as are those of direct British stock and origin. A large percentage of my people make up the farm and rural population. During the war this great county of Grey has produced more live stock than any other in Ontario. Our field crops are of a character and quality which makes their contribution effective and worth while. Grey county apples enjoy a world-wide reputation. Their texture and flavour are unequalled anywhere.

Yet our farmers have suffered because of this government's ineffective manpower policy. Farm women and children in Grey county are entitled to my highest commendation. They have worked hard under great handicaps while their sons have gone forth to war. They sought to produce from the fertile lands of Grey, food in abundance to feed the masses, and the fighting forces of Canada and her allies. My riding boasts of three Victoria Cross winners, namely Billy Bishop, V.C., Tommy Holmes, V.C., and David Currie, V.C. It is to the credit of my people and the soldiers of Grey that not one man was marked A.W.O.L. or listed as a deserter. Our industries are working at peak capacity in war production and the men who man these factories are loyally devoted to their task. Many are unionized, with very happy relations between the worker and management. The products of our factories, as the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) knows, are vital to our war effort.

All in all, I can be most proud of my riding and the folks back home. Farmers, labour, leaders of industry, merchants and all others have played their full part in this war. Every victory loan, as the Minister of Finance knows, has been oversubscribed and will be again. Every Red Cross and other war charity appeal has been properly and fully provided for, as witness our most recent appeal on behalf of the Red Cross—the largest quota we have ever had went better than 133 per cent over the top. We are a people, serious in our purpose and determined to play our full part in bringing this conflict to a victorious conclusion.

Then, when peace comes, we want to face the problems of peace. We desire most to have our service personnel properly rehabilitated, secure in a job, but I hope a grateful people will not be niggardly with the rewards they have earned and which are justly theirs. Do not give all the money to top-ranking generals; save some for the boys over there. God knows we will never discharge our debt to them, and to their interests I address my best efforts. There must be no repetition of 1919, when service men threw their badges away in order to get a job. If necessary we may have to humanize the rehabilitation problem by encouraging employers to adopt a most sympathetic understanding and give these men a chance to adjust themselves back to normal life. I have been more than impressed by the manner in which private enterprise is playing its part. Industry is indeed to be congratulated, and many have been making a tremendous contribution to soldiers' families by maintaining their wages on a level equal to the soldier's pay before he enlisted.

It is easy for us to talk "justice" and "generosity" in connection with our plans for the rehabilitation of these men and women. But we must go farther. We must see that those two principles are practised. And, if we have to err, we must err on the side of generosity rather than on the side of a too strict interpretation of what is "justice".

Let me give an illustration of what I mean by showing the type of injustice which is perpetrated by narrow rules and regulations. It will be remembered that the totally inadequate discharge clothing allowance which was in effect at the beginning of the war was, after members of the opposition, veterans and their associations and members of the public had brought the strongest pressure to bear, raised from $35 to $65, an amount which was still insufficient to reclothe a discharged man properly. Further pressure resulted in the amount being raised to the present sum of $100, a sum which I do not even yet regard as adequate. On the occasion of each increase in the discharge clothing allowance it was not made retroactive. Consequently we have cases such as those of which I have been informed, of men who lost limbs at Dieppe and were unfortunate enough to be discharged from the army a few days before the new allowance came into effect instead of a few days afterwards. All they got was the lower allowance, whereas men who had never left Canada and were lucky enough not to be discharged until the higher rate was in effect, received a larger sum. You are going to find it hard to convince those Dieppe veterans and others who are in the same position as themselves that "justice" and "generosity" have been practised in their cases.

Then take those men who deserve every consideration we can give them, the men who twice in a lifetime have put on uniforms to help their country in its hour of need, the veterans of both the first and the second great war. In mentioning these men, Mr. Speaker, I desire to pay special tribute not only to those who are with the armed forces at home and abroad in the regular services, but particularly to the members of the veterans' guard of Canada who, it must be remembered, have been of all our men and women on service longest in contact with the enemy.

I do not think that the people of Canada have a full and complete realization of the arduous task which these two-war veterans have performed and of how well it has been done. Since, years ago, the first German prisoners were brought to Canada, the members of the veterans' guard have been in charge of them. Their duties have been carried on under difficult conditions. They have had to be on the alert every minute of the day and night, watching over an enemy whose cunning and determination are of the highest order.

War Appropriation

Their job has been done, not in the comparative comfort of camps such as Borden, Debert and others, but away in the wilds far from home, with much less opportunity than the average service man of seeing their own folks because of distances and difficult travelling conditions. They have carried on uncomplainingly in 40 below temperatures and in blazing wilderness heat. They have set up a magnificent record, in far-away desolate spots such as Angler and Neys, for keeping our enemies committed to their charge under control. They have been, in practically every sense of the word, and certainly in the spirit, front-line troops again; and I believe these men should be paid exactly the same gratuity for their service in Canada as the men on service overseas receive, rather than the lesser sum due for service in Canada.

The rehabilitation of these men will not be easy. Many of the plans which have been evolved will be of little use to them. You cannot expect the man of fifty-five to take advantage of the educational opportunities which are open to the younger men. It is of no use to put a man of fifty-five on the land, under the Veterans' Land Act, with a twenty-five year contract to work out. It is asking too much even of a group of men who have proved their toughness and, let us not forget, men who did not get any too good a break after the last war, before Canada had learned how to treat her men returning from service against the enemy.

The Department of Veterans' Affairs has not given adequate study to the problems of these men, who in all justice and common sense deserve all the consideration which this country can give them. It is true that the dual service pensions act has been brought into being for their benefit, but what is this act? It is nothing but the War Veterans' Allowance Act dressed up under another name. It is nothing but a species of relief, sugar-coated. It is, in plain English, relief. It has created a very great deal of resentment among the members of the guard, who, seeing it for what it is, are properly resentful of the fact that their long service is being recognized by what is nothing better than a hand-out—something just enough to keep body and soul together.

I repeat that their problem is a special and a pressing one. The ages of these men prohibit them from taking advantage of many of the provisions of our rehabilitation plans. The same factor will be a serious disadvantage to them when they have to compete in the labour market against men many years their junior. Passing a relief bill is not good enough. The Department of Veterans' Affairs must give much deeper study to their problems, must formulate plans to fit them into our national economy. They have given many years of useful service to this country, have many years ahead of them. They must be given employment—not the dole.

[Mr. Case.]

There is one more class of those to whom we owe so much for whom I feel little is being done. I refer to the men of the mercantile marine, the men without whom our armed forces and our allies could not have gone very far. They have, in every sense of the word, been on active service. I have heard from many of these men and they are much disturbed at the lack of recognition of what should be accorded in respect of their future. I know it has been said on many occasions that this subject is being studied. We need study all right, but we need some action too. Our talk of rehabilitation, of justice, of generosity, has a hollow ring to men of the groups of whom I have just spoken.

Let me add one more word to say that in the matter of gratuities a deceased soldier's next of kin, his beneficiaries, executors or administrators, should receive the gratuity he would receive if he had lived. Surely this is reasonable and fair; and I think the basis of settlement should be his length of service to the end of the war just as though he had lived.

Again, may I say I have been greatly impressed by the House of Commons. Yet I am asking myself a question having to do with San Francisco: How can the government or Canada's delegates speak for Canada when we shall have no parliament? To whom will the delegation report? The Prime Minister has no right to anticipate the personnel of the next parliament; he may not be a member of the next parliament. Many of the delegates may not be members of the next parliament. Parliament is supreme; parliament must answer to the people. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister has placed Canada in an untenable position. We should have had a general election earlier, so that whatever government was elected would have a mandate from the people. Now, at the most formative period in the history of the world, Canada will be without a parliament. Recently the Prime Minister drew a parallel comparing our position with that of Great Britain. I submit that there is no comparison. There they have a national government whose term of office is protected. Our parliament, this parliament, will never assemble again after April 17. I cannot imagine Mr. Churchill dissolving the British House of Commons and then going to San Francisco—certainly not; he would want to report to the parliament which authorized him to attend the conference.

I should like to think also of the unlimited possibilities my riding offers in the post-war future. I hope I can persuade the government not to spend all its money elsewhere, but to survey carefully our possibilities.

Mr. ROWE: They did spend a lot in that riding in the recent by-election.

Mr. CASE: Our hundreds of miles of streams offer a fisherman's paradise. Our inland lakes and the great Georgian bay likewise offer respite to the busy man. In fact, we are a great tourist centre through which passes the Blue Water highway from Sarnia to Orillia, and we would like to improve our facilities to provide for the great friendly army who will invade our area for their holidays. Part of my riding is included in historic Huronia now being rapidly developed as an outstanding tourist attraction—more will be heard of Huronia soon. Tourists provide us with the greatest possible export market, an export market which brings the money into our centre, yet the goods and produce are consumed right at home.

I have in mind an immense conservation and reforestation scheme for my county. I should like to see a national park and game preserve developed. Reforestation provides a self-liquidating debt—and our possibilities are unlimited. However, we want better transportation facilities. In fact, as quickly as time will permit I hope to have a complete superficial survey of all our potentials.

I shall always remember my municipal experience. Municipal governments are indeed the bedrock of democracy—they are close to the people, they can interpret and anticipate the people's wishes, their desires and their needs. I intend to work closely with every municipal council in my riding. I can rely on their advice, and in a spirit of cooperation we will build for the future, sincere in a desire to leave behind something for which future generations can be grateful and proud.

May I venture the hope that we may all look beyond the immediate horizon, that we may appreciate how compact the world has become by modern communication and transportation, that we are citizens of that world society, and that we must accept certain obligations if we are to reap our fair reward.

An airport is very necessary somewhere in the vicinity of Owen Sound or Meaford. We must be on the air map of the future. In the meantime, Owen Sound has had completed on its own initiative a survey of a possible airport site. This area offers tremendous possibilities of national importance, as it will accommodate land, amphibian, and sea planes. We also need improved railroad facilities. I look upon our railroads as a national necessity, particularly in time of war; and surely in view of our experience in the past our future development should have the defence of the nation in mind. A great improvement could be secured by an outlet between Owen Sound and Meaford. Being the end of the line has restricted and hampered the development of both of these centres.

It was always difficult for me to understand why some naval training stations were located in rather unusual areas when we have such splendid natural facilities at Owen Sound, Meaford and Thornbury. Owen Sound boasts of one of the finest natural harbours on the great lakes. It is the last to freeze up in the fall and the first to open in the spring. This year set a record when boats cleared on March 24. However, the harbour facilities have been neglected. We need improved retaining walls and docking facilities. I propose to ask the department to make an inspection of both Owen Sound and Meaford harbours, so that a proper sum may be placed in the estimates to maintain and improve this great national asset.

Owen Sound, the scenic city, the city of the Greys, has a rehabilitation committee composed largely of veterans of the first war. They are seeking to provide for the rehabilitation of our armed service personnel, and the local branch of the Canadian Legion is doing a commendable piece of work. Wherever the legion have club house facilities, I would urge the government to seek their full cooperation. They understand the veteran's problem, and the government could quite properly designate certain legion members as agents of the department, and pay them accordingly.

Owen Sound also has a post-war planning committee to programme public works and civic improvements. However, like most planning bodies, they are looking to the government for over-all leadership. The government of Ontario—now appealing for a new mandate—has already consulted municipal authorities about post-war planning. They now await a dominion-provincial conference to coordinate plans. This conference is long overdue, yet I am sure hon. gentlemen opposite will appreciate how necessary it is if our planning is to be effective and to avoid overlapping. The county of Grey has also named a rehabilitation committee, having as its object the restoration of our armed service personnel to normal life and activity.

War Appropriation

I hope, Mr. Speaker, my reference to my riding has been reasonably interesting. After all, I represent North Grey—the only voice they have—and while I shall willingly address myself to problems of national concern, still I must not forget the people who sent me here. No organization is stronger than its weakest link, and I want our link strong and virile.

The town of Meaford is one of the prettiest in Ontario. There is where they hold fishing derbies. Their great fleet of fishing boats attracts thousands of tourists and visitors annually; indeed the industry is of national importance. Meaford is also the centre of apple growing and the home of thriving industries, all working, I am happy to say, at full capacity. In nearby St. Vincent township is the tank range, with a terrain said to be more suitable for this type of training than any other in Canada. Thus my riding has provided the facilities to train men for a most vital and important type of warfare.

Owen Sound has a civic auditorium arena. It is a centre for young people, and has played a great part in minimizing juvenile delinquency. I recommend to all hon. members that they do all they can to promote healthy play-centres in their communities. It will pay big dividends in citizenship. Give the young people an opportunity to expend their pent-up energy in good healthy sport and recreation. A strong, healthy, robust child is indeed an asset to the nation. Keep them playing at good clean sport; teach them to play the game. Life's problems will not be so great if they are healthy in mind and body.

Thornbury, surrounded by Collingwood township, is the centre of Ontario's finest orchard district. They have storage facilities for the product, and at both Thornbury and Clarksburg are processing plants. This to my mind is important, as we should constantly seek to process our natural products at home. Processing the product provides work for local people, and the finished product is more easily stored and can be marketed more regularly than in its more perishable state.

Owen Sound is flanked by Sydenham, Keppel, Sarawak, Derby and Holland townships, and by the village of Shallow Lake—once the centre of a sizable cement industry. Euphrasia township boasts of the Eugenia electric power development, with head water three times the height of Niagara Falls. Osprey township rounds out a great riding, of which I am justly proud—thirteen municipalities in all, in twelve of which the Progressive Conservative stand on man-power was endorsed by majorities.

[Mr. Case.]

I should like, Mr. Speaker, to make a passing reference to Poland, as a matter of record. In the years 1941 and 1942 we had stationed in Owen Sound the Polish Legion. We grew to have a very fine impression and appreciation of these splendid people. Everyone knows how much they have suffered, and surely they have steadfastly sought to contribute their all. I sincerely hope that the post-war world settlements arrived at will be to the satisfaction of all concerned, and I have faith and confidence to believe that it will be so.

No remarks from a newly elected member of a great party would be complete without some reference to his leader. I want to say that I believe that John Bracken has sought to prepare himself for a great task as has no other leader before. His contacts from coast to coast in Canada have surely fitted him for the high office of prime minister, and I do believe that he will discharge his duties with honour and distinction to himself and to the people of Canada.

As one who has a deep appreciation of all those who seek to serve in public office, may I say that I know my immediate predecessor from North Grey was respected by all members of this house, just as we at home respect and honour him. I know that you will all regret that his health has not shown the improvement his friends had hoped for, but I feel I can carry from this chamber the best wishes of all for his future comfort and happiness. Mr. W. P. Telford served North Grey for a total of almost fifteen years, and his late father was one time a member of parliament for our constituency. I should like to pay just tribute to one who has served so long and who enjoyed in marked degree the confidence of his fellowmen and women.

I have appreciated, Mr. Speaker, the many courtesies extended to me by members and officials of this house, and I hope they will bear with me while I find my way about and seek to discharge my duties to my constituency of North Grey and to the people of Canada.

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): I wish to speak for a little while on the subject raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), but before doing so I should like to make a brief comment on the speech to which we have just listened. As one who took some part in the campaign referred to by the hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Case), I can well understand his sense of pride in winning that election. I am quite confident that either of the other two contestants in that election, and the parties that they represented, would have felt a similar sense of pride in having won the election.

With what the hon. member has said about his people and his constituency, I am in agreement. I had the good fortune to enjoy their hospitality for four or five weeks. Concerning the issue on which the people cast their votes in that election, I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for Grey North. I have no doubt that the people who went to the poles in that election had one thought in mind only, namely, whether the government's policy had provided ample and adequate reinforcements for their kin who were serving overseas.

I was interested in the hon. member's reference to his leader, but I noted that not much was said about the part which that leader contributed to the hon. member's election. I had in mind particularly a statement made by the hon. member's leader just on the eve of the election, too late to be refuted by anyone taking part in that campaign, a statement that was no credit either to the member elected, to the leader himself, or to the party that he represents.

I wish to deal briefly with a number of items raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South, particularly the question of education in relation to the men who are returning from overseas. I have said in this house on numerous occasions that every possible opportunity should be afforded any man or woman who has served in this war, on his return, of securing or improving his education. I am confident that Canada can make no better investment than to give, without stint and without limitation, every man or woman who has served in the forces an opportunity to pursue his education in so far as he has ability or the desire to do so.

I have had occasion to learn that a considerable number of those whom I have met have refrained from taking vocational education or education in any other form because by accepting it they will deprive themselves of further credit and financial assistance. I would urge the government to consider seriously the possibility of removing any restriction that may hamper or prevent any man or woman who has served in the forces from taking vocational or any other form of education.

These people, particularly the young men and women, have given up the very best years of their lives. They have given up, many of them, the years during which they would normally have acquired education. There is nothing this government or this country can do that will fully compensate them for the loss of those years. I suggest that the least we can do for them is to make available to them every opportunity to gain as much education as they desire and are capable of acquiring.

On the question of gratuities I shall comment briefly. I fail to see why the government has refrained from paying a soldier's gratuity to his next of kin after his death. I have in mind a number of cases where the father and mother were not declared dependents by the soldier who served overseas and yet they made great sacrifices for many years in order to educate that youth. Unquestionably they looked forward to the day when they could expect some reward or when such boys and girls might in turn be able to help them for all they had done for their children in their youth.

Some of these people are in need of the gratuity which the son would have received had he not died before the gratuity could be paid. I have in mind one case which is now under consideration by the department, the case of a boy who had spent a year in Christie Street hospital and received word from the government just a few days prior to his death that he was entitled to a $400 gratuity. The mother applied to the officials soon after the boy's death, hoping that she would receive that gratuity. She was informed, of course, that because she had not been declared a dependent the gratuity must be returned to the government.

It seems rather unfair that because that boy died a few days before it would have been possible for him to receive that gratuity his parents, who would otherwise have come into possession of it, were not permitted to receive it. I think there is good reason for a revision of the regulations.

While I am on that point I would mention once more the position of dependent mothers. I find there is still discrimination against these mothers as compared with wives. I have spoken on this matter a number of times in the house, and I would ask the government once more to consider a revision of the regulations which limit both the amount received and the amount which may be earned by dependent mothers without affecting their dependent's allowance.

Other questions pertaining to the veterans returning from the war have been raised. I should like to ask the minister, who possibly will speak on this subject, to explain to the house quite clearly just what are the factors which qualify a veteran for assistance under the Veterans' Land Act.

I had brought to my attention yesterday the case of a man who has served in the two wars. I think he was overseas for two years in the first world war and received an honourable discharge after four years in this war. He sought assistance to enable him to buy a small holding of land adjoining the city of Toronto. After he had made application it was some five months before he received any further news from the veterans' land officials. Five months after he had made his application he was asked to appear before a committee. He had been given every reason to believe—

War Appropriation

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What was the date of that letter?

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: He first applied and was asked to submit details last September. He next heard from the officials on March 12 of this year.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Would my hon. friend be kind enough to give me the name privately?

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I will, gladly. He had been given to understand by the qualifications committee before which he appeared—he had been given no assurance, but he had reason to believe—that his qualifications were satisfactory; that he would have no difficulty in securing assistance to purchase this small holding on which to grow berries and raise chickens. The small holding consisted of one and a half acres of land and a three-room cottage in the suburbs of Toronto. It was to cost $2,500. On March 28th he received notice—I have the notice before me—informing him that he did not possess the necessary qualifications to warrant assistance under the act for the purpose which he desired. When he got in touch with the officials again and asked for details he was informed that the job he was holding at present is not a permanent one. Apparently that was the reason why he was to be disqualified from receiving assistance. The man is employed at present by a manufacturer in Toronto. To all appearances his job is a permanent one. He had intended to remain on that job for about a year, after which he had hoped to be able to earn his living on this plot of garden land.

Two questions arise. This man is just over fifty years of age, and I am wondering whether the question of a veteran's age and the nature of the job on which he is employed are factors of importance in determining whether or not he is to qualify to secure assistance under the Veterans' Land Act for the purchase of a small holding adjoining a city.

There is another matter that I want to bring to the attention of the minister. Last week I met in the country a veteran of this war who had lost a leg and had been supplied with an artificial one by Christie street hospital. When I saw the man he was limping around and complaining of great discomfort. He told me that he had applied to the hospital a number of times and a number of attempts had been made to improve the limb that he was wearing. I suggested to him that he should get in touch with the officials again; that I was confident they would do everything within their power to see that he was given a limb that he could wear without discomfort. He was so disgusted that he told me he fully intended to discard the limb which had been provided by Christie street hospital and to purchase a limb at his own expense from a private company. In conversing with him and others I find that a number of veterans of this war have discarded the limbs which have been provided by the hospital and the government for what they claim to be more satisfactory or better limbs made by private companies. If the minister has information on that I should like him to make a statement because there is an impression abroad among veterans who are wearing artificial limbs—I have talked with several of them—that they are getting from Christie street hospital an inferior quality of limb and that private companies can provide them with a superior or better quality of limb.

[Mr. Noseworthy.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I interrupt the hon. member? I shall be very glad to have the names of those war veterans to whom he refers. May I say at once that Christie street hospital stands the highest of any hospital supplying artificial limbs anywhere. That is not the verdict of Canadians only but of others in other countries. I shall be very glad to give the hon. member written testimony to that effect.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I am not giving this information in criticism of the department. It may well be that there are those who are seeking to exploit the great war veterans.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is quite correct.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Or attempting to persuade them that they have—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I assure my hon. friend that this is no new story?

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: —a superior limb. I think it should be made abundantly clear to the Canadian public and to the great war veterans concerned that this government is providing them, as it has every right to do, with the very best that can be procured in the way of artificial limbs.

A number of references have already been made to the question of the merchant marine. I should like to refer to that branch of the service now. I have before me a letter written by an officer serving on board the SS Coronation Park. The letter is dated "Somewhere in the south Pacific", and is from a member of my own constituency, one with whom I am acquainted and in whose integrity I have every reason to believe. Several points are raised in this letter which I think need some clearing up. The first question raised is whether or not any provision has been made whereby the merchant marine may be able to vote in the forthcoming federal election. This letter was written on March 12. On that date the members of the crew on board this particular ship had not heard any word whatever of any provision being made for their voting. At that time they had heard from the Tokyo radio that there was likely to be an election in Canada about April 17 or soon after, and they were quite concerned because so far as they knew no provision had been made whereby they could register their vote.

The second point raised in this letter that I wish to call to the attention of the government is that this officer claims that the crew on board this ship sailed from Vancouver into the southern Pacific, into areas where white men had scarcely been able to live in pre-war days, into an area where they were exposed to the various epidemics that are prevalent in that climate, such as malaria, yellow fever, cholera and the like. Not one of that crew received before sailing, an inoculation of any kind or was given any protection whatever against such diseases as were prevalent in that area. There appears to have been gross neglect on the part of the medical authorities in that case. The men on this ship I am told, had to provide their own safeguards, and neither before nor after they sailed, up to the date of this letter, were they given anything by way of inoculation.

The third question is as to the nature of the contract made by the government, or those responsible for government ships, when those ships are chartered to the war department or the wartime shipping board at Washington. These men are serving on a Park ship, a government ship, which had been operated by a private company in Vancouver. They were chartered by that private company to the wartime shipping board at Washington. They are engaged in carrying materials of war to United States soldiers in the southern Pacific. They are working under exactly the same conditions and doing the same type of work as United States seamen on board liberty and victory ships; yet I am informed that they receive a war risk bonus of $44.50 a month, while Americans, taking the same risks and doing that particular job, receive a war bonus of $5 a day over and above one hundred per cent of their basic wage; and that American seamen have an income five to seven times that of Canadian seamen doing the same work on very much the same type of ship.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Did my hon. friend say five to seven times the amount?

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: From five to seven times.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Surely that cannot be right.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: That they receive in wages and bonus from five to seven times the amount received by Canadian seamen.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Has my hon. friend concrete figures to substantiate that statement?

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: The figures quoted by this officer for some of the Americans indicate that they receive as much as $350 a month, including their bonus, while serving in that particular war zone.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I ask where that is published?

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Those are figures given me in this letter from an officer serving on a Canadian ship in that zone. Someone in the department responsible might indicate just what is the nature of the wage contract with Canadian seamen working for the war shipping board at Washington, carrying war materials to United States soldiers and running the same risks as United States sailors, and how their wage scale compares with that of the United States sailors.

Those are the points to which I wanted to call the attention of the government at the present time. I have others which will come up when the estimates of the various departments are under review.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): I am one of those who believe this house should have been called together two months ago in order to examine these huge expenditures now before us. We realize that the interim budget presented to-day is on the same scale as that of a year ago, which was the largest in the history of this country. Although we sat for some seven months last year it was impossible to get all the details we would have liked in connection with that budget. Therefore I believe the public will realize that with less than ten sitting days before us it will be impossible to obtain all the information we would like to have from the various ministers. If we consider that some ten departments are involved, it means that we can devote only one day to each department before this parliament must be dissolved. Therefore I should like to refer to some questions concerning the departments which we may not reach before dissolution. To point out how difficult it is to get information, some questions have been on the order paper since March 19, and have not been answered as yet. That is particularly so in regard to questions concerning manpower, a subject about which I wish to ask some questions and make some references. I refer to one question in which the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) asks:

1. How many men drafted under the provisions of the National Resources Mobilization Act and sent overseas under the order in council of November, 1944, who did not volunteer for active service, have arrived in the United Kingdom up to March 1, 1945?

2. How many of such men have been sent to the continent up to March 1, 1945?

3. How many of such drafted men volunteered for general service before leaving Canada up to March 1, 1945?

4. How many of such drafted men volunteered for general service after arriving in the United Kingdom and up to March 1, 1945?

5. How many of such drafted men who did not volunteer for active service, either before leaving Canada, or after arrival in the United Kingdom, have been sent to the continent up to March 1, 1945?

6. How many, if any, of such drafted men who did not volunteer for active service either before leaving Canada or after arrival in the United Kingdom have been in active combat up to March 1, 1945?

That question has been on the order paper since March 22. Another one asked by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) has been on the order paper since March 19, and is as follows:

1. How many of the 16,000 draftees lately made available by order in council for overseas duty are now overseas?

2. Have any of these men served in the 1st Canadian Army on the western front? If so, how many and in what units?

3. How many of these 16,000 are absent without leave?

4. How many of these A.W.O.L. are classed as deserters?

5. Have any of each class covered by questions 3 and 4 been apprehended? If so, how many?

6. How many of these have been tried by a court martial and what has been the punishment given in each case?

7. Will all of these men be tried by court martial?

8. Did these A.W.O.L. draftees have their rifles and ammunition with them?

9. If so, have such rifles and ammunition been recovered?

Those are questions which I think should be answered, because there is still a controversy in this country in regard to the manpower problem. I refer to these two questions because I have seen letters written during last month by boys in the theatre of war who are not satisfied with the present reinforcement situation, despite the national broadcast by the Prime Minister on March 2 and other statements which have come from the Department of National Defence. These boys still write home complaining about the reinforcement situation, and we are not able to get answers to these questions which have been on the order paper since the opening of this session.

(Mr. J. A. Ross.)

I have another problem which may seem personal. However, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) spoke about men in the ranks not receiving the same consideration as some generals in the matters of pensions and the like. Right here I wish to commend the hon. member for the splendid effort he put forth this afternoon on behalf of the veterans of this and the last war. I say he did a grand job, and in commending him may I support everything he said in their behalf.

I have been asked by many service men as to what pension, superannuation or retirement allowance has been granted General McNaughton, and with that in mind have placed three questions upon the order paper. I do not know whether I am being given the runaround by several ministers. However, may I refer to those three questions, because, as I say, many service men have asked me what pension or superannuation General McNaughton, now Minister of National Defence, receives from the public treasury?

When I received those requests it was my duty to get all the information I could get for my constituents and, with that in mind, at the beginning of this session I placed this question on the order paper:

1. Was General Andrew McNaughton granted pension after retirement from the Canadian Army during the present war?

2. If so, what amount annually?

3. What was the basis for granting of this pension?

The first of those questions was answered, no, and the second and third were indicated as having been answered by the answer to No. 1.

It was pointed out by others that it may have been that he was not retired. With that in mind I placed another question on the order paper, as follows:

1. On what date was General Andrew McNaughton released of his command of Canadian army?

2. Has General Andrew McNaughton been retired from the Canadian army?

3. If so, at what date did retirement become effective?

The first of those questions was answered, "December 26, 1943"; the second was answered, yes, and the third, "November 1, 1944." Therefore it would seem that November 1, 1944 was the date upon which his retirement became effective.

Believing that this answer was somewhat technical I placed on the order paper a third question which dealt with something more than retirement. One of my colleagues says that I should have consulted a lawyer. Probably I should have; and I am not sure that it would not have stuck even a lawyer.

My third question was as follows:

1. Has General Andrew McNaughton at any time been granted any pension from the federal treasury of Canada?

2. If so, what amount annually and when was it paid?

3. At what date and on what basis was said pension granted?

That question was answered by the statement that no pension had been granted by the pensions branch.

A fourth question stands in my name on the order paper, in which I ask if any superannuation or retiring allowance has been granted from the federal treasury at any time. I have gone through many of the auditor general's reports, from the last war up to the present. I think it will be realized that we are still a year behind with those reports. While I have discovered where he has received approximately a quarter of a million dollars from the federal treasury there is nothing to indicate that a pension or retiring allowance ever was granted, for which I am able to get any information.

I think the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) should be able to give an answer as to whether any order has been passed by the treasury branch, and I should like to have that information before these items are passed, or before the close of this parliament.

Then, coming to the man-power question, I refer to this matter because it continues to be handled by the government in exactly the same fashion as it has been for some years past. Just before I came to Ottawa a group of farm lads who had just reached the call-up age went in and volunteered for active service. None was advised that his place was on the farm, although I can assure the house that each of them was sorely needed for agricultural production this spring and summer. But they, like many others, under this system of call-up, did not want to be drafted. They went in and volunteered, to beat the draft. That is the policy behind this man-power system to-day, the one that is still in operation. No great change has taken place. I say that I know each of those boys was needed personally on the farm. As I see it, each of them could have done a better job on those farms than they could do anywhere else under present circumstances. They were accepted in the armed services.

More than that, we have to-day the same unfair call-up practice that we have had throughout the war. Those portions of this country which are producing the most in the matter of foodstuffs so greatly needed are the same districts which are supplying the greatest per capita enlistment for the armed services. And that is the position to-day, despite the turn-over we saw last fall in the Department of National Defence, and the stories about man-power and how it would be handled in the future. I say it is being handled on exactly the same basis to-day, and those people who were trying to produce those great quantities of foodstuffs which are so necessary are still the same people who are supplying the man-power for the armed services.

I raise this objection, without any desire to repeat arguments which have been made. However, according to government statistics, our production is going down to-day, instead of up. I gave figures the other night showing that hog production in Canada has already decreased by thirty-two per cent, and it will be decreased by much more than that before the end of the year. Dairy production is down, as are many other commodities essential for the food requirements of this and other countries. We even have a controversy right to-day with our good neighbour to the south respecting the matter of supplying certain foodstuffs to the united nations.

I say this condition should not exist. We are going along, after five and a half years of war, with just as great a manpower muddle as we have had at any time during the war. This affects agriculture much more seriously to-day than it has at any other time.

In this connection I should like to ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), when his department is before the house, to answer a question asked by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) as to what became of the survey of armed services and those medically unfit. What will be done with those men? Will they be returned to agriculture? I suggest he should take up this matter, and make a statement upon it.

As a matter of fact, as was pointed out to-day by the Minister of Finance, it looks as though we will certainly win this war now, or at least within a period of a few months.

War Appropriation

But when the war is won we shall be faced with the all-important problem of reconstruction. I do not think this government has a proper reconstruction policy for the country. In this respect I am sorry the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) refused to hold a dominion-provincial conference, because I am one who believes, rightly or wrongly, that you cannot have a proper reconstruction policy in Canada without consulting the provincial governments. In my view it would be impossible to do so. I have discussed the matter with provincial and municipal officials, and they all feel that we cannot have a sound reconstruction policy for the future until such time as a dominion-provincial conference has been held, and some discussion has been had on the matter.

Coming back to the matter of the present man-power policy, I was amazed to-day to hear the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) talk about the lesser issue of winning the war. I believe that was what he said this afternoon, when discussing this subject. To my mind that is the all-important issue before this country and the world to-day. I am sure there is no one in the house who would feel very happy about the solution of our post-war problems if we did not first win the war, and do everything we can for those gallant men and women who have played their parts, and many of whom have given their all, in this greatest issue of all time for our nation.

Mr. MacINNIS: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar did not use the word "lesser" at all. He used the word "narrower" which, in the circumstances, was the proper word.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I stand corrected. He referred to a narrower issue; that was his exact wording. I do not think it is a narrower issue, at all. I say the winning of the war is the greatest issue. However, I simply refer to that in the thought that our post-war period plans would not mean much to the country, if the winning of the war were not the first and greatest issue. To my mind we owe a great debt of gratitude to those men and women who have won the war for us, and who make our post-war plans possible.

Then, speaking again of man-power, in my view the Department of National Defence should tell us about the man-power situation in the armed services, and bring that information up to date. I have referred to two questions which have been before—

Mr. ABBOTT: The reason why the question to which the hon. member refers has not been answered is that it requires obtaining a good deal of information from England. We hope to have it almost any day. There is a great deal of information asked for in that question, as my hon. friend will notice upon looking at it. It has not been possible up to the present time to get all that information. However as soon as it is here I can assure my hon. friend that his question will be answered.

[Mr. J. A. Ross.]

Mr. ROSS (Souris): But it was asked sixteen days ago, and I remember a period only last winter when it was possible to gather information on very short notice—hours or days—to tell the people of this country that the shortage of munitions and equipment was more important at that time than the man-power question. On instructions of the Department of National Defence a censorship was placed upon any reference in newspapers to the man-power situation at that time.

I should like to have from the department the number of men who have been A.W.O.L. or who have deserted up to date. I am satisfied that the figure will be greater than the figure of 16,000 given in the order in council with reference to N.R.M.A. men.

Mr. ABBOTT: You may be surprised.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I may be, but I say that I fully believe the figures for the Canadian army to date will be greater than those we have had. The parliamentary secretary has given the answer right now when he says that I may be surprised.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have not the figures with me, but the hon. member may be surprised when he gets them.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I still make the statement that they will be greater than the 16,000, that is all told to date.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Do you mean for the whole five years? Do you mean every one who has gone absent without leave since the beginning of the war?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I say that many of these men would not now be deserters if it had not been for the half-hearted, piecemeal policy which has been applied to the army to date. You people are much concerned about the throwing away of rifles and so on, but I want to tell you that many of these troops have thrown down their rifles and deserted—

Mr. GIBSON: Throwing some more mud.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am not throwing mud; I am just making a statement. I sympathize with many of these men. They tell me that it was the duty of this government to have taken a stand as to where they could best serve. As I say, I am in sympathy with many of these chaps who have stated that the government should have directed where they should go.

I should like to have answers to some of these questions because I feel it may not be possible to consider all departments in the ten days before us. I have not been able to find any reason why this parliament should not have been called two months earlier in order that we could have got more of this information. It is due to the people of this country who are being taxed very heavily. I repeat that a lot of this money which the people are giving quite willingly is being wasted by the expenditures of certain departments.

I do not think I should take further time now but I do want answers to these questions. I hope when the minister's department is before us he will deal with these matters and give us as much information as he possibly can.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, we had intended to make what remarks we wanted to make when this figure had been broken down under the different headings, but since we seem to have got into a debate there are a few remarks I should like to make. The hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Ross, Souris) misinterpreted what the hon. member for Rose-town-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) had to say. That sort of thing is becoming a habit in the house. I was sitting behind the hon. member and I do not think there was any possibility of misunderstanding him.

He referred to the narrower issue of the war—

An hon. MEMBER: Winning the war.

Mr. GILLIS: The narrower issue of winning the war in the sense that it related to the over-all picture of establishing a proper peace. The building up of a world organization was a much broader matter than that of discussing Canada's contribution to the war. In dealing with the war we would be dealing only with the internal problems of this country, assisting as best we can with outside problems. In considering the other picture we are dealing with an organization which we hope will embrace the whole problem and make the world safe in the future. We hope it will attain the objectives for which we are fighting. I do not think there could be any misunderstanding on that.

I do not wish to be critical of my hon. friends, but after listening to some of the discussion here one is led to believe that some people are afraid that the war might end because they would then have nothing to talk about. I sympathize with them. To say that no reconstruction programme is possible without consultation with the provincial governments does not agree with my conception of this matter. I contend that no adequate reconstruction programme is possible under private enterprise. There will have to be definite and fundamental changes in the whole economic set-up before there can be any possibility of a proper reconstruction programme.

I should like to deal briefly with a few matters that come under the Minister of Veterans' Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie). I think it is right here that we find the basic necessity for reconstruction. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) made an excellent presentation and brought to the minister's attention many matters with which I am in accord. I am going to try to miss those if possible because I do not think repetition adds very much to the discussion.

At the last session we set up a ministry which I understood was to look after the problems of the returned service personnel. I thought it was an excellent idea to bring together the problems of the service personnel and place them in one department to be presided over by a minister who I felt was sympathetic and knew the problems. However, I am afraid that he is not presiding over the department as I should like to see him preside over it.

I refer particularly to the decisions being made in connection with gratuities. These are not being made by the Minister of Veterans Affairs or the Department of Veterans Affairs; they are being made by the Department of National Defence. In my opinion that is not what was intended when the Department of Veterans' Affairs was set up and I believe that is something that should be corrected by this house. I think attention should be focused on it at this time.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I interrupt just to clarify the situation? Gratuities as such are being paid by the paymasters general of the various districts, whereas the reestablishment gratuities as such are being paid through the Department of Veterans' Affairs after we are notified what the amount of the gratuity is to be.

Mr. GILLIS: The cash grants are being paid by the Department of National Defence?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is right.

Mr. GILLIS: And the decision as to who is to get the gratuity is also made by the Department of National Defence. I do not think national defence should have anything to do with that particular matter. That is a veteran's problem and it should be dealt with by the Department of Veterans' Affairs. I remember when the Veterans' Grants Act was tabled in the house a question was asked of the minister in connection with the dependents of service personnel who had died or been killed overseas or during service, whether such grants would be paid to the next of kin. The minister replied that these would be paid if there had been an assignment of pay.

The first intimation I had that this was not being applied in that way was when I received a letter from a woman who had had two sons killed. In the case of one boy there had been an assignment of pay from 1939 to December, 1943, but his pay had been stopped just a few weeks before he was killed. Because the assignment was not in effect at the time of his death, then ipso facto no gratuity was indicated. That was discussed backwards and forwards, and a change was made. The decision then was that unless they were wholly or partly dependent no gratuity was indicated. That decision was made in the house and the members left this house with the understanding that an assignment of pay to the next of kin, not necessarily specifying father or mother, was all that was necessary. But then the Department of National Defence or some brigadier who is administering the regulations took it upon himself to change that. My conception of pension legislation is that everything depends upon its administration. You can write the law as you like in this house, but if you appoint people to administer it who are not sympathetic and handle the regulations to suit themselves, they can make quite a mess of it, and I contend that that is what is taking place on this particular angle of gratuities.

The minister asked the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), first, if he thought that the gratuity should go to the estate of a deceased soldier. I say, yes, it should. It belongs to him, and it should be part of his estate. The minister's next question was: Should the next of kin have to apply for the gratuity or should it go to them automatically? I say that it should go automatically.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If it goes to the estate it would go automatically.

Mr. GILLIS: That is right, but I am saying that it should go automatically because the minister asked that question.

Another badly treated section of the service about which I am going to say a few words is the merchant seamen. I believe that something has been done to broaden the scope of the rehabilitation regulations, and I am not going to touch on that angle until we have the break-down and the presentation of the minister. But I say to the minister who is handling pensions and national health and has supervision over the hospitals that something should be done for merchant seamen who are injured on service. I know one who was in hospital in Sydney for four months with a fractured vertebra and both legs broken. He was in hospital there for four months, a long distance away from home, and while in hospital there he got no pay and allowances, no compensation—nothing. He wrote to everyone he could think of for help of some kind but the answer was always the same—there is no provision. Whether he will get any pension or not when he leaves the hospital is still being probed.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Was he a Canadian merchant seaman?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Serving on a Canadian ship?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes. The man filled out a lot of forms, but nothing was done for him and he lay there in hospital for four months without even money enough to buy cigarettes. He was injured on service. He fell into the hold of a ship out on the high seas. Under those circumstances when a merchant seaman is placed in the hospital some provision should be made whereby he would be granted an allowance or compensation of some kind to help him along while in hospital. But there is nothing at the present time. That is something that should be taken care of, and taken care of as soon as possible.

Then there is this business of a dual pension. That is an old, old story. The Canadian Legion has been fighting for the last twenty-five years to have the legislation in Canada made applicable to the imperial veteran residing in Canada who enlisted in the British army. As I say, it is an old story and I do not need to elaborate upon it because every member has received long memoranda and resolutions on the subject which have been passed by the veterans guard of Canada right across the country. What they are asking for is that any veteran of both wars who resided in this country in 1939 shall have the dual pension order made applicable to him if serving in the veterans guard and if he was domiciled in Canada at the time of enlistment. The minister who has been dealing with veterans' problems for a long period of time knows more about that story perhaps than any other member of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In which province was the seaman my hon. friend spoke of hospitalized?

Mr. GILLIS: Nova Scotia, at the naval hospital at Sydney.

I wish to say a few words on the matter of discharges. There are six different types of discharges, and they are all indicated by code numbers. There is a discharge known as 1029 (12)—“services no longer required.” There are certain limitations attached to it. I cannot figure out that type of discharge myself. I have written to the Department of National Defence several times about it, but apparently they are stuck on centre—“that is the form”—“that is how the discharge works”—“there is no reason to change it,” according to National Defence. I met a young man about twenty-eight years old who had been overseas for three years and who came back to his military district in Canada and was discharged, and the type of discharge he got was 1029 (12)—“services no longer required.” Anyone reading that man’s discharge papers who does not understand the set-up immediately concludes that it was a dishonourable discharge because the man is, to all appearances, physically fit, the war is still on, they are scraping the bottom of the man-power barrel for men, and here is a pretty husky-looking fellow with all his limbs who is let out of the army because his services are no longer required. I cannot understand it, and that type of discharge militates against the man’s prospects in many ways. When he goes to an employer seeking work and the employer sees that he was discharged from the army because his services were no longer required, and can see that he is a husky-looking fellow with apparently nothing the matter with him, he concludes, “he would not be a very safe person for me to employ.” I have never been able to understand why a man is let out with that type of discharge.

When a man is let out because he is medically unfit, that reason is given on the discharge papers. If he is let out for misconduct, that is written in so plainly that no one can miss it. But what is the explanation of letting a man out who is physically fit? I have never been able to get it straightened out in my mind. I have got in touch with the department and they say that it is not a dishonourable discharge. They say, “We have to let him out,” but they do not say why they have to let him out. The man cannot get a pension. He has difficulty getting into hospital. I am not sure whether he gets rehabilitation benefits or not. I think that type of discharge should be discontinued, and the real reason for discharge definitely stated on his discharge papers. I should like the Minister of National Defence or his representative in the house to check up on this type of discharge, 1029 (12), and tell the house why they let out a man who to all intents and purposes is physically fit, a man who is not discharged for medical reasons, who looks all right, with only the reason given “services no longer required.” I should like to know what is wrong with him.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GILLIS: When the house rose at six o'clock I was dealing with the question of discharge. There is another type of discharge which I think should be examined into and some latitude allowed. I refer to discharge because of misconduct. This applies to both sections of the army and air force, male and female. Any service personnel discharged because of misconduct immediately lose all the rehabilitation benefits, gratuities, et cetera. I have no objection to its being applied in that way to the habitual deserter, the man who goes absent without leave and who generally misconducts himself to such an extent that he deserves to get a discharge of that description.

I have in mind, however, boys who went into the service at the age of eighteen or nineteen, being away from home for the first time, and who commit their first infraction of the regulations as a result, perhaps, of taking a few drinks of beer. In consequence they become involved with the civil authorities and receive a sentence in the civil courts, and they are immediately discharged after two or three or even four years of good service to the country. That classification is immediately cut off.

I think there should be some latitude where the age of the person concerned might be taken into consideration, the number of times he has committed an infraction of the rules, and some compensation allowed him for the service he has rendered the country. I look at it in this way. The average civilian becoming involved with the civil courts receives a sentence and when he is released his debt to society is paid. But any service personnel committing a similar infraction of civil law, in addition to receiving the full sentence that applies to civilians is also sentenced in the form of a fine to the extent of the rehabilitation he may be losing, his gratuity, and in addition to that there is handed him a discharge certificate that reads in bold letters,

War Appropriation

"misconduct". Wherever such a boy or girl goes looking for employment the question is asked: "Were you in the service?" "Yes". Then, "Where is your discharge certificate?" And immediately on the production of that certificate employment is refused. I submit that we are giving these young people something they will carry with them for the rest of their natural life, a discharge that precludes the possibility of employment.

I have seen discharge certificates of two girls, just young kids, who had committed some slight infraction of military law, and I am thinking that the system we have to-day of employment agencies across Canada will be carried forward into the post-war period so that these young girls—and young men too—in addition to suffering the penalty imposed by military law or by the civil courts, will carry with them something that the ordinary civilian does not bear for a similar infraction. This will militate against them for the rest of their natural lives.

It is necessary in some cases, but there are extenuating circumstances and some latitude should be allowed the military authorities who are handling matters of discipline in the way I have outlined. I am not going to go further than that because I believe that the question will be given some attention. Certainly it is a terrible way to send a young girl out of the service. It is perhaps not so bad for the boy, although he is certainly getting a sentence that is not imposed upon civilians for similar infractions of law.

There is another matter I have not heard touched upon. This has to do with a forgotten section of our service. When the commonwealth air training plan was first established it was difficult to get trained personnel to give the necessary instructions in elementary flying, and I believe that schools were started across Canada, largely by commercial pilots, men who had paid for their education and had a licence to carry on that kind of work. I understand there is a ruling that when the war is over the only people who will be allowed to do commercial flying in Canada will be the personnel who have seen service in the air force overseas. They will have priority and that rules out completely the men who gave up their vocation in order to establish the commonwealth air training plan. I have here a brief from a group of pilots and I presume the minister and other members of the house as well have received it. I will not go into this matter to any extent, but I think the government should consider carefully the contribution which that particular classification made. The commonwealth air training plan was perhaps Canada's greatest contribution to the war, and the men who really started it off and in consequence were precluded from going overseas or engaging in the regular activities of flyers of the type they were turning out, should be given full consideration.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Is my hon. friend referring to the civilian flying clubs?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes. I say, that classification should be given full consideration along with the air force who are doing the flying, because in my opinion they did an essential job at the beginning of the war, and, for that matter, all through the war. We can do nothing but sing the praises of those men for the flyers they turned out, carrying the banner of Canada in the air overseas.

There is another angle to this matter of allowances which I would bring to the attention of the minister. I mention most of these questions because I have tried to straighten them out with the department and have not been successful. There are many cases where two or three boys out of one family are in the service. The mother died some years ago, and in the case I have in mind two boys have been overseas for approximately four years. Their sister had been keeping house for them for twelve years. The home is their own and the boys were maintaining it. She tried to establish a claim for allowance but was not successful. She has no income except the assigned pay of the brothers, but the income is not sufficient to pay the taxes on the property, with the result that year by year the taxes are getting into arrears and the town threatens to sell that property.

Those boys left their jobs and they are fighting for their country and for their home. The chances are that when they come back that home will be gone for taxes and the sister, who had kept house for twelve years, may be in a boarding house somewhere.

I have tried with the dependents' allowance board to get the allowance but have not succeeded. I tried the dependents' allowance advisory committee to see if some provision could be made to protect that property, but the board ruled it out on the ground that there must be an allowance before action can be taken. There the matter stands. There are three years' taxes owing on that property. The sister cannot keep it up; the brothers are liable to lose it and they are in the service. I think there should be some provisions whereby the dependents' allowance advisory committee could have the necessary latitude to protect the property of the boy in the service under circumstances such as I have described. That is not an isolated case; I myself have had several of them.

I should like to say something directly to the Minister of Veterans' Affairs with respect to the hospitals that come under his department. I am going to mention Camp Hill hospital in Halifax particularly. There is an excellent hospital there. There are a lot of patients in it but the personnel of the hospital is completely inadequate. The medical staff leaves much to be desired. I go in there occasionally. I visit around. I know the personnel well and I know they are doing a good job with what they have, but from what I have seen there the hospital is completely understaffed medically. Second, the hospital itself leaves much to be desired with respect to treatment for personnel who may have serious operations. There is no place to which patients may be moved so that they can be quiet and be by themselves. Wards are large. Take an amputation case or a man with a serious abdominal operation. He is put in one of those big wards. He might as well be put in a machine shop. There is a lot of noise going on and all that kind of thing. I suggest that small private rooms be provided in these hospitals where men who are seriously ill can be segregated and given an opportunity to rest. I believe that if the medical staff is not augmented there the two doctors who are looking after the patients will be in hospital themselves. Perhaps there was an argument two or three years ago that the medical personnel was not available. I do not think that holds good to-day because air force hospitals, army hospitals and the like are being maintained all across Canada. I think sufficient personnel can be taken from these hospitals to maintain the regular permanent establishments such as national defence hospitals will be in the future. I myself believe that these are the hospitals that should be properly staffed and every facility provided now so that they can do the job which they will have to do in the future.

I look upon the other hospitals as merely temporary establishments to take care of emergencies and the like. I believe that in so far as the regular national defence hospitals are concerned the whole matter of maintenance personnel and rehabilitation personnel necessary to implement the programme that the government has outlined such as gratuities, vocational training, out-of-work benefits, and the like, needs to be jacked up a hundred per cent. When the minister replies he will likely say that the personnel is not available. I do not believe that holds good in Nova Scotia. Before coming into the house I made a check with the national selective service offices in the area from which I come. I found some eight hundred registered unemployed in the area. Many of them were service personnel. Many of the service personnel were good material for civil service positions. In fact some of them had applied and I believe that the personnel necessary to put the machinery in operation could be found among veterans of this war who are seeking employment.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre):
In what area is that?

Mr. GILLIS: In the Cape Breton area, on the island of Cape Breton. When one considers the position of the war in western Europe to-day one feels that one of the most immediate needs of the country is the perfecting of the personnel who are to look after demobilization; the business of rehabilitation, placing of men back in work, vocational training and the like, is the immediate problem that should be taken care of. The machinery to do that job should be perfected now instead of waiting for demobilization when there will be a lot of confusion, misunderstanding and so on.

There is another thought that I wish to leave with the minister, and it is an old one. I refer to the problem of returned service personnel coming back to heavy industry. I had a lot of experience with this after the last war, having worked on boards, tribunals, and the like. Men are discharged with a ten per cent disability. To all intents and purposes that is their medical disability. They go back to a city where there is available employment in offices and the like and perhaps they are handicapped only to the extent of ten per cent; but if they go back to an area where there is nothing but heavy industry such as steel plants, coal mines, farming and so on, while they may have only a ten per cent medical disability, they are disabled a hundred per cent in so far as employment in those industries is concerned. They cannot take employment in heavy industries. That is what is happening in many sections of Canada. The men are returning to sections of the country where there is no employment except in the industries I have mentioned. While their disabilities are not great from the medical point of view, nevertheless they find themselves, when they go to selective service, a hundred per cent disabled, because they cannot take employment.

Another thing I would urge upon the minister is to fight with everybody in his department for the immediate establishment in Canada of the necessary vocational training schools to put the vocational training end of rehabilitation into operation. I consider the most important part of rehabilitation the routing of men into a school where they can take a course for employment for which they have an aptitude in order that they may be sent to something where they can be permanently rehabilitated and take their place in society. Gratuities are fine, but they last only a short time. When the gratuity is spent the man is in exactly the same position he was before he received it. It is necessary that he should have it in the first five or six months to relieve his mind and give him a chance to look around; but it is also necessary to establish these schools so that when the gratuity is spent he has grounded himself for some kind of employment. In the earlier stages they are receptive to that kind of thing. But when they drift around for five or six months it will not then be so easy to get a man back to school. If these advantages are available when they come back first they will take advantage of them. If they mill around for a few months they are likely to become discouraged and it will then not be so easy for them to do the job. I just leave these thoughts with the minister because I consider them necessary in the immediate post-war period.

War Appropriation

