Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): There are several matters to which I should like to refer while the debate is in its present stage. I think we are all conscious of the fact that we have a great many veterans returning to Canada at the present time. We know they are all facing the problems of rehabilitation. In my part of Canada it is recognized that while many are being successfully rehabilitated there are a great many who are still encountering considerable difficulty. Members should, and I believe do, appreciate fully the magnitude of the task which is confronting not only the government but all the people of Canada. In connection with this matter I think veterans and their relatives look to parliament and to the government for guidance. In the matter of rehabilitation they are quite justified. I say, too, that they expect to see through the actions of the government and of parliament a reflection of the appreciation which I think they believe we should see in their heroic achievements.

Reference has been made during this debate to the payment of the war service gratuity in the case where the serviceman becomes a casualty. As yet no one from this group has expressed an opinion on this matter; therefore, to strengthen the hand of the minister, who I believe will fight to have the gratuity paid to the estate of the deceased service man, I should like to put our stand on record. Recently the legislative assembly of Alberta passed a resolution with respect to this matter. We endorse the resolution. It was considered purely from a non-partisan point of view. The resolution was sponsored by Mr. Williams, veterans' candidate in the provincial legislative assembly, and seconded by Mr. Ward, one of the service representatives. I should like the house to bear with me while I read this resolution, which received the unanimous endorsement of the provincial legislature:

Whereas under clause 1, the War Service Grants Act, 1944, which provides for payment of war service gratuity to members of the armed services on discharge, it is set forth, that if a member of the armed services dies on service or after discharge, before he has been paid war gratuity in full, payment of gratuity or the unpaid balance thereof shall be made only to a person to whom or in respect of whom, dependents' allowance was payable on behalf of such member immediately prior to his death,

And whereas a large number of men and women in the armed services have dependents to whom or in respect of whom, they are unable to have dependents' allowance established,

Therefore be it resolved that we, the members of the Alberta legislature assembled here, do hereby request the dominion government to amend the said bill so as to provide for war service gratuities being paid to the estate of all members of the services who die on service or after discharge before said gratuity has been paid in full.

Let me emphasize that this resolution was unanimously endorsed by the members of the legislative assembly of Alberta. It may have come to the attention of the minister prior to this time.

One case comes to mind when I speak of this matter and, without mentioning any names, I think I should give one or two details in connection with it. A young lad was enabled to attend university only because his father mortgaged his business. After completing either two or three years of his university course this boy joined the Royal Canadian Air Force and later was killed overseas. The agreement with his father—understood, of course—was that upon the completion of his course he would pay back to his father the money raised through the mortgage. While overseas he did make certain payments to his father; but the long and the short of it is that after the lad died nothing could be claimed by his father, with the result that the business is still mortgaged and a real hardship has been caused. That boy's father does not look upon the gratuity as compensation for the loss of his son. Never; but I do believe that in fairness the gratuity should certainly be made part of his estate and paid to it upon the serviceman's death.

The next matter to which I should like to refer is the granting of the Memorial Cross to the widow or the mother of a member of the service personnel who lost his life while on duty. I understand that regulations governing this award were established by order in council P.C. 4210, dated August 27, 1940, as amended by order in council P.C. 2135, dated March 28, 1941. These regulations define a mother as follows:

"Mother" means the woman who gave birth to the sailor or soldier or airman or seaman.

Let me point out what has happened. Two cases in my constituency have come to my attention in which lads were adopted when very tiny babies and lived with their parents, so-called, for a period of twenty-five to thirty years. They then enlisted and lost their lives. Under this regulation those mothers are refused the Memorial Cross. It is not as though that cross cost very much. Those boys never knew any other mothers. They called them "mother"; those women looked upon the boys as their sons, and it is easy to understand their feelings when they receive word that because they did not give birth to those boys they are not entitled to the Memorial Cross.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What is the number of the amending order in council?

Mr. SHAW: It is P.C. 2135 of March 28, 1941. I may say that the correspondence with this one mother occurred during recent weeks. In this case this woman has given two other sons to the service. They have not lost their lives, but they are serving overseas. Her husband operated rather an extensive farm but he died about a year ago, and she feels that his death resulted from overwork caused by losing the help of the sons and inability to obtain adequate help to enable him to carry on. I urge whoever may be responsible for this to consider favourably the amendment of these regulations. I could understand opposition if a pension were involved or if the cost were very great, but this is just a cross showing that the mother has given a son, and should apply, whether it be an adopted son or any other.

The next matter to which I wish to refer is the so-called disembarkation leave. It is my understanding that when a service man has been injured during the performance of his duty and is sent back for later discharge he is entitled to one month's leave, provided he can take that leave within a period of three months. This has caused a good deal of hard feeling, if I may call it that, among service personnel, because a service man who has been severely wounded and has to be hospitalized for a period of more than three months is not entitled to that disembarkation leave. As a matter of fact I have a letter from a service man, and it might be of interest if I were to read just one paragraph from it. This lad served overseas for three years. As a consequence of his service he was very severely wounded and is now back in Canada. He has been deprived of that thirty days' disembarkation leave, and he says:

There seems to be some misunderstanding amongst the service men in regards to cancellation of disembarkation leave after three months back in Canada. It appears that discrimination is shown, that a fellow hit with a big shell loses his leave due to the fact that he spends three months or more in bed; whereas a fellow who is hit with a small shell is in a position to enjoy this privilege. We feel that you should suggest to the house that in the next war, or in continuing this war, all shells be made the same size, so that there is no cause for this discrimination.

Of course there is some sarcasm there; in fact he adds:

Perhaps Mr. King would be pleased to take this matter up at the San Francisco conference.

Anyway I think it indicates that there is unfairness there. Those boys are bound to place considerable emphasis upon things which to some here at home may appear to be of little consequence.

I have had many communications from service personnel holding lance ranks in the field. I refer to lance-corporals and—I did not know such a rank existed—lance-sergeants. The man in question was a lance-sergeant and was injured while on the battlefield. In fact the jeep upon which he was riding disappeared, as a result of the explosion of a land mine. He is back, but I doubt whether they have found the jeep or the other soldiers involved.

This man held lance rank on the field, but when sent back to England, and before being returned to Canada, he was automatically forced to revert to the lower rank, and draw the lower pay. He feels the government is doing that only because of the dollars involved between the rank of corporal and that of lance-sergeant. With those thoughts in mind, his feelings are understandable. I maintain that in all fairness the higher rank should be recognized.

I have another case in mind, but I shall not give much detail, because the minister has been most kind in connection with it. He is working on it right now, and I am hopeful that a satisfactory conclusion may be reached. At this time I wish to deal only with the principle involved. This young man, the father of two children, enlisted for service overseas. He had not been there long when his wife—well, I presume one would say she went berserk. I am not sure whether that would be the proper expression. However, the fact is that she deserted her children, with the result that an aunt was obliged to take them. Later on, the father was killed on the battlefield.

Is there any specified sum to which these children are entitled? In this instance the commission granted a pension of $27 a month for the two children, to remain in effect until they reached the age of sixteen years. I should hate to think that $27 was anything other than an arbitrary sum decided upon by the pension commission. I cannot understand why those children should not be entitled to something almost approximating what the wife would have received, had she remained with the children, and had her husband been killed. My understanding is that her pension would have been considerably more than $27.

I am not criticizing the minister, because I must point out that he has been cooperative in the matter, and I am hopeful that a satisfactory solution will be reached. However, the inspectors of the commission are going back to try to determine what it actually cost to keep those children. I should have thought that would have been done before the sum of $27 was arrived at. Any of us who have had the privilege of providing for children—food, clothing, shelter, medical, dental and optical attention, educational and other services—realize how preposterous the sum of $27 actually is. I hope they will not go to that mother and say, "You have several children of your own; therefore you can keep these two for a few extra dollars." I hope that will not be the method of approach. Certainly somewhere there must be some indication as to what the proper amount should be. When I record these facts I speak for all those who find themselves in similar difficulties. I have heard many complaints from returned servicemen, those who have come back on the so-called rotation leave after spending a number of years overseas.

We understand that they receive a month's pay and allowances plus fifty cents a day. Those men say, "For those of us who have homes to return to, the fifty cents may be quite satisfactory. But how about those who have not homes?" The man who asked me that question had been overseas for five years, and had shown himself to be a capable man and a first-class soldier. He told me that during the victory loan campaign he was organizer in his unit, and used every persuasive measure to get the boys to contribute. He told me that they did so, most generously, but that he felt ashamed of himself when he realized that some of the boys, from whom he had secured almost their last dollar, had to go back on their rotation leave, and were limited to only a few dollars, worked out at the rate of fifty cents a day.

I have no particular recommendation in this connection, but merely wish to say that I run into these cases all too frequently. Then I have one other matter in mind. I do not know how often this condition arises, but when a set of circumstances is drawn to my attention two or three times in a month I am obliged to conclude that the condition described is general. I have in mind a gentleman fifty-two years of age, a farmer, who enlisted almost immediately at the outbreak of war, proceeding overseas with the first division. He fought with distinction through North Africa and Sicily, and into Italy, having been wounded four times and mentioned in dispatches. This man returned on rotation leave. During his absence he had hired a man and his wife to manage his farm, and it took about every dollar he could get, in addition to what the farm produced, to meet his agreement with that couple.

Upon his return he applied for discharge or return to the battlefield. Now, let me emphasize that this man had been in the army for more than five years, of which four years had been spent overseas, that he had been wounded four times and was mentioned in dispatches. This man was fifty-two years of age, and yet his application for discharge was refused. Instead, they took him to Calgary and gave him a job—I do not know what else I could call it—of carrying afternoon tea to the officers and to some of the C.W.A.C.'s.

I would not mention a case of this kind, were it not for the principle involved. Hon. members know how that soldier feels, and what he would be bound to say in his community. Yet he is no different from any of us or from the minister himself. I am sure the minister would feel that to have to perform a task of that kind is not a fit and proper reward for the service that man has rendered to his country.

I believe I have dealt with almost everything I had in mind. While I am not permitted to ask a question at this stage of proceedings, I should like to learn from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilesley) if the eight-cent excise tax charged against cigarettes sent by the Red Cross to soldiers in the service also applies to cigarettes sent overseas? The package with which I was furnished was one provided to a member of the services here in Canada. This lad has unusual ability to express himself, and I should think the minister would be interested in hearing what he has to say. Incidentally, he was severely wounded and, while back in Canada, is unfortunately still confined to hospital but hopeful that he will soon be out. This is what he says:

I am sending a package of cigarettes to illustrate the point I am drawing to your attention, and I feel it would be quite fitting during this particular time, since this Red Cross appeal to the public for voluntary contributions.

And he has underlined the words "voluntary contribution." He continues:

You will notice an eight-cent excise stamp which is found to be on every package issued. It would appear as though the government were trying to balance the budget on these voluntary contributions, which to me seems most unfair. The cigarettes inside have the Red Cross insignia which is proof that they were intended for this purpose.

The public contribute generously to the activities of the Red Cross, and rightly so. We hear reports from overseas and from returning service men about the excellent work being done by this fine organization. But I wonder how many contributors realize that the minister involved—it may be the Minister of National Revenue; perhaps I am referring to the wrong one, but they are all in the same family—is right there to get his eight cents from each package of cigarettes purchased with the money which the public have contributed to the Red Cross believing that it was all going to provide comforts for the boys in the services. I should like to have the minister give some attention to this matter.

These boys who have been in the service for a long time have had a most difficult time. They have acquitted themselves most magnificently and, as I said earlier, while these may seem to be little things to us they possibly take on much larger proportions to these lads.

I feel that none of us should endeavour to make political capital when dealing with service men and the affairs of service personnel. I said in my opening remarks that these boys are looking to us as members of parliament; they are looking also to the government to do the right thing, to do the fair thing, at least to show through what they do for the personnel the appreciation which these boys rightly feel we should hold for their heroic accomplishments.

Mr. L. A. MUTCH (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, the turn which this debate has taken toward matters affecting the reestablishment and rehabilitation of our service personnel prompts me to say a few words, because in the nature of things I have had fairly close association with the rehabilitation programme as it is being carried out in connection with the more or less piecemeal demobilization now taking place. It seems to me that if we approach the problem of the rehabilitation of our service men from the point of view that the rehabilitation legislation is an attempt to reward those who have had active service, no matter what we do we shall fall far short of what would be the natural objective of those who understand and appreciate the contribution to our safety, indeed to our very existence, which these serving personnel have made.

Consequently I think the members of all parties, as well as the government, who share in the responsibility to the returned service personnel would be on sounder ground if they would regard all rehabilitation efforts and legislation, not in the nature of a reward for service but rather as something designed to help the service personnel who are to be demobilized to help themselves.

I have made some study of the rehabilitation legislation which is currently on the statute books and which is currently being put into effect in connection with those returning from active service. I am satisfied that the one idea which runs through it all is a desire to assist those, who have made a sacrifice for which we cannot presume to pay, to drop back into their place in the community with the least possible further sacrifice as a result of their service. When you come to look at the actual legislation you realize that, designedly no doubt since it is so consistent, it does achieve that objective.

To begin with, when the soldier returns after having served overseas he is given a month leave of absence as quickly as he can be moved from the depot in order to provide him with some little period of time in which he can adjust himself to family and civilian conditions before it is necessary to make anything in the nature of a decision as to just what his place in civilian society will be. Under the present set-up, on his return there are facilities, within the Department of National Defence itself, to make him fully aware of the opportunities which lie before him. Every inducement is made to help him understand his own capabilities. In few, if any instances, is there an attempt made to shuffle him off to the first available job at the first opportunity. Rather there is a desire to encourage him to seek to go back into civilian life, not on the basis of something as good as he had before, but on the basis of what his capabilities show he will have a chance to achieve.

Those of us who went through the last war and the period of rehabilitation afterward will remember the disadvantages suffered by all returned service personnel when they came back into civilian society. Where the returned man had to enter into competition with a man who had been working at his trade throughout the period of the war he was at a disadvantage in that he had, perhaps, lost something of his skill. If he had had no opportunity to accumulate savings, if he had gone away as a boy and came back as a man he found it almost impossible to assume the obligations of a home, in many instances for years to come.

The personnel returning at the present time have an advantage, first of all, by reason of the fact that their gratuity is paid out in periods varying on the average from four to seven months. They are thus able to seek the place in society where they desire to be without having to make a hasty decision. If they have lost skill during the period of their service they may take a refresher course and thus be able to go back into their trade on a competitive basis with men whose service has been rendered at home.

If they have been married during the period of their service or if they desire to marry shortly after coming home they have the advantage, if employed in an insurable trade, of having their unemployment insurance taken care of as though they had been working. Within a couple of months they will have the advantage of the family allowances. Both of these pieces of legislation tend, not to reward them for what they have done, but to reduce the discrepancies between their position in society and the position of those men whose service has been given at home.

Under the provisions of the insurance legislation it is possible for a soldier who has suffered some disability in service to secure the same degree of protection for his family by taking insurance and at more reasonable rates than his more fortunate brother has been able to secure during the period of his service in civilian occupation.

Members of parliament are fully aware of the legislation designed to protect the man who desires to return to the job he left before he enlisted. They know also of the training being provided for those who had no jobs before they went to war but who have shown some aptitude for a particular job or trade and desire to fit themselves for some specific occupation.

Most of the complaints which have been made with respect to vocational training have arisen because to a considerable degree the training scheme was conceived on the basis of there being a mass demobilization. At the present time, when demobilization, extensive though it is, is only a small fraction of what it must eventually become, and before too long we hope, it is not always possible to take individuals in certain selected communities and provide for them that type of vocational training which they desire, unless it is possible for them to train on the job to which they hope eventually to go. The facilities for vocational training have been seriously overtaxed both by civilian needs and by the use which has been made of these facilities by the armed services to train technical personnel. It is because it is realized that it is not possible to grant to every returned soldier, immediately upon discharge, the type of vocational training that he desires at the place where he desires to take it, that the legislation permits him to elect to take that training over a period of some fifteen months after his discharge or after the end of the war, whichever be the later. In the majority of instances this would not work a hardship because in almost every area in Canada to-day there are opportunities for temporary war-time employment to fill in the intervening months.

I should not like the impression to go out from the debates in this house that the somewhat vexed question of the payment of a deceased soldier's gratuity to his estate or his family has been brought to the notice of the government only by members of the opposition group. I can say with some authority that the weight of pressure upon the minister and the government to deal more generously in the matter of paying the gratuities to the families of deceased soldiers has been approximately in proportion to the percentages represented by the opposition and government groups in the house. It is not always either desirable or effective to exercise whatever weight a member may have through the medium of public debate. I know from many conversations that I have had with members of the government, the pressure that has been upon them with respect to this matter. I am aware of how helpful some of the comments of members of the opposition have been to the ministry, who realize the need of some provision of this kind. I should like to say on my own behalf that the imperfections which exist and which we shall experience from time to time with new situations, are not the discoveries of individual members or individual parties, and it seems to me that the best hope of achieving those changes which from time to time will be necessary, lies in the type of cooperative and explanatory discussion which has taken place so far in this debate.

There is in the minds of some people throughout the country, and it is implied in the expressions of some members of the house, a consuming fear that we shall again run into problems of rehabilitation paralleling those which occurred not immediately after the last war but which accumulated with varying intensities in the ten or twelve years following the last war. I should like to suggest in that connection that many of us have I think been overlooking at least this one consideration which I believe will go a long way toward lightening the shock of rehabilitation which was felt after the last war. I am reminded that something over ninety-five per cent of the men and women serving in the Canadian armed forces to-day are Canadian born. They come from communities throughout the length and breadth of Canada, and they will return in the first instance, at any rate, to the communities whence they came. There they have in their parents, in their families, in their friends, in the businessmen of their communities—and this has been exemplified over and over again in the activities of civilian committees throughout the country—a degree of contact which did not exist for the veterans returning from the last war because, as we remember, only about 225,000 out of some 600,000 Canadian soldiers in the last war happened to be Canadian born. Thousands of men who fought in the Canadian army and brought distinction to Canada and returned to Canada to make their contribution to this country from then on until now, were men who had been but a short time in Canada prior to the last war. They came back to a country which they knew but ill, but a country to whose glory and prestige they had contributed so much. There is a vast difference between going home to a community in which you have a place with your family by right of birth, and in going back, not to a home, not to a position, not to a particularly well-established place in the community, but to a country which was glad to see you but which did not have that personal interest in your welfare which the parents and families and friends of the veterans of to-day's armed services will have.

Therefore, we should look upon rehabilitation not just as something to be manufactured by members of this House of Commons, not something which is to be a governmental reward for service, but as something, once the war is out of the way, which is worthy of the greatest cooperative effort which the people of Canada can make. It seems to me that if we go forward in that spirit we do not need to be fearful of the problem of rehabilitation. But neither have we the slightest justification, because the boys and girls will be going home to their own communities to a place which is theirs by right of birth, to feel that we are absolved of responsibility. If by our speeches here or in the campaign which is to come we give or seek to give, even unconsciously, the impression that we intend entering into a competition in offering rewards, then much of the thought and foresight which have gone into the planning and preparation of our rehabilitation programme will be undone and we shall be in danger of creating another migrant body of dissatisfied people, this in spite of the chance we now have by cooperative effort to bring back into the communal life of this country our own sons and daughters and make them feel, not that we are rewarding them, but that we are determined that they shall not suffer further for that which they have done.

It will not be good enough to say to these people, "Here is a job which gives you economic independence." It will not be good enough to say to them, "You went to do what was no more than your duty," because they concede that. It will not be good enough to say to them, "Now that you are back and are none the worse for it you can fend for yourselves." That will not be good enough. What is required of us in this house and in the whole country is that we keep before us what I believe the conception of the department to be, that it is the obligation, the duty and the high privilege of all of us to help these people to help themselves, to find within the structure of our community and of our social and political life their rightful place. Keeping that in mind, then I believe these inequities, inequalities and discrepancies which arise from time to time, tackled in that spirit, will not present any permanent difficulty.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Before allowing the motion to pass, I should like to say a few words in connection with some of the legislation passed since the war broke out. Since springtime is about here, and is indeed here in several parts of Canada, and since a number of veterans of this war will soon settle on the land and go to work under legislation recently passed, I feel it my duty to say a few words in that regard. Before I deal further with that, however, there is another matter which I think should be considered, and that is in connection with similar legislation passed at the close of the last great war.

This matter has been taken up on several occasions but I am sorry to say it has not had very much favourable consideration by the government, either this or previous administrations. We have on several occasions brought to the attention of the house the situation of the soldier settlers under the old soldier settlement board. During 1944 the soldier settlers were very active, going so far as to send a delegation of nine to Ottawa to present their case. At that time we were not given any satisfaction as to what the government's answer would be to the request of the old settlers, that request being, of course, that clear titles to their land be given them.

Early this year the Minister of Veterans' Affairs replied to me that the government would not grant these clear titles, and as a result the soldier settlers' association sent a delegation of two, whom I accompanied here, to place before the minister a further brief. In order to give the house some idea of the standing of these settlers, I feel I can do no better than read that brief so that it may appear on Hansard. The brief was presented by the president and secretary of the Soldier Settlers' Association of Canada. Mr. Harold Baker is president and Mr. Alfred J. Sibley secretary, and the brief was presented on March 5 last as follows:

March 5, 1945.

To the Honourable Ian A. Mackenzie, Minister of Veterans Affairs,
Ottawa, Ont.

Sir: As representatives of the Soldier Settlers' Association of Canada, we have the honour to present this further brief of our requests to the government made on May 23, 1944. We still, as before, ask for a clear title to all lands held by soldier settlers as at March 31, 1944, under the Soldier Settlement Act of 1919.

Practically all of these settlers are now over 60 years of age, indeed some are beyond the 80-year mark. Because of information given in your letter of the 3rd of February to Robert Fair, M.P., we have again come to Ottawa, driven by necessity, to arrive at a definite decision acceptable to those old soldiers whom we represent. As at March 31, 1944, there were 6,153 soldier settlers still holding contracts on their farms and who owed a total of $7,715,954.01.

The average indebtedness of all soldier settlers under the scheme was $4,358, and the average indebtedness of those still holding contracts is $1,254 as at March 31 last.

This represents 29 per cent of the average original loan. In spite of the fact that several reductions were made in the original debt, and of the fact that the settlers, their wives and families have worked for the past 25 years, only 4,130, or 16 per cent of the original number have acquired titles and 6,153, or 25 per cent of the original number are still holding contracts, while almost 60 per cent have either quit voluntarily or been forced off their farms. In connection with the above figures, it must also be understood that many settlers who have acquired titles or kept their contracts in good standing have used up money that should properly have been used for the proper maintenance of the settler and his family and the upkeep of his buildings, machinery and other equipment, and also includes sums of money that have been returned to the farms by the members of the settlers' families who have worked in war industries or have enlisted in the services. The average annual cost of the administration of the scheme is approximately \$1,100,000 or  $\frac{1}{4}$  of the total amount owed by the settlers as at March 31 last. Plainly speaking, seven years of this administration would eat up the whole of the present debt.

[Mr. Fair.]

Taking the foregoing into consideration we are convinced that the government would actually save money by granting clear titles now without any further payments. Failure to do this will force a number of the present settlers to apply for war veterans' allowance benefits which will cost the government $720 a year for the settler and his wife, and in two years the government will have paid more than the present average indebtedness of the settlers, whereas, if clear title is given, many of the settlers will not apply for the allowance.

The Veterans' Land Act is now becoming operative, and many of the contract holders under that act are sons and daughters of the old soldier settlers. If the present plight of the old settlers is allowed to continue, the effect on the morale of the new settlers might well be disastrous, as the unjust treatment and sufferings of the old settlers are well known throughout the country. Under the Veterans' Land Act the settlers get a grant of 38 per cent of the original loan. The amount now owing by the old settlers is only 29 per cent of their original loan. The rate of interest under the Veterans' Land Act is 3 $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent; under the Soldier Settlement Act the rate of interest on current accounts was 5 per cent and 7 per cent on arrears.

Because the Soldier Settlement Act legislation was enacted for the rehabilitation of veterans of great war 1, and because economic conditions that existed during past years made it impossible for the settlers to pay, we believe our request is reasonable and just. Our request has the support of thousands who signed a petition early last year, as well as the Alberta legislature, the 20,000 members of the Alberta farmers' union, the Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities, the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, the United Farmers of Canada Saskatchewan Section; the United Farmers of Alberta, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and the Executives of the Alberta and British Columbia commands of the Canadian Legion. We believe that our request for clear titles for all holders of contracts under the Soldier Settlement Board Act, as at March 31, 1944, is reasonable and just, and your immediate favourable consideration will be appreciated.

Respectfully submitted by

Harold C. Baker, President
Alfred J. Sibley, Secretary.
Soldier Settlers' Association of Canada.

I may say that during the present year the Saskatchewan legislature has joined in with those who have already signed and the Alberta legislature and the Alberta farmers' union have also once again endorsed this request. I have the resolutions here, but I do not think it is necessary to read them because they have been in the press and have been discussed all through western Canada and in many parts of eastern Canada.

After presenting this brief we had a very nice talk with the Minister of Veterans' Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie). I feel quite satisfied that the minister is sympathetic. If that is not correct perhaps the minister will contradict me. I also feel that several members of the cabinet are sympathetic, and I only wish we could have an opportunity of giving the members of the house a chance to vote on this question. If that were done I believe we would have a very large majority voting in favour of it. But I am sorry that we have some men in this house—men who apparently have quite a little power—who do not want this to go through. I see one of them sitting here now. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) is not favourable to this going through. He feels that we are now making good collections from these men, and he also feels that contracts should be honoured. All of us are in favour of contracts being honoured, but when an unjust contract is made then I think some adjustment should be made even to civilians. I believe that is only right.

Debt adjustment legislation has been passed and has been in force over the years; and because the farming community as a whole all throughout Canada has been at a disadvantage over the years, particularly between 1930 and 1940, I feel that something drastic should be done in connection with these contracts. Had the government of the day—and I am including both Conservatives and Liberals in this—seen to it that farmers received their proper percentage of the national income during the years that these contracts have been in force then there would be no need for me to be pleading again on behalf of the old soldier settlers to have clear titles granted.

During the depression years we had at least thirty-three per cent of the population of Canada living on the land, and when that portion of Canada's population received no more than five per cent of the national income I ask the Minister of Finance if the government was honouring its contracts and its obligations? Why did not they step in then and do something about it? They did not. The farmers were taking the rap, and that was quite all right. When we go back to 1932, five per cent of the national income was all that the farmers had, and yet the settlers and farmers in general were expected to pay up their debts.

I could, if I wished, name others who are not treated in this way. To go back to the Minister of Veterans' Affairs, I said a moment ago I believe he is sympathetic, but he has as director of the soldier settlement board and the Veterans' Land Act a gentleman who apparently is not sympathetic. If that director is not sympathetic, then I feel we have other men who are sympathetic to the soldiers and who are just as efficient as he is, and I believe in the interests of the success of the Veterans' Land Act a change should be made in the department.

The arguments presented by the Minister of Veterans Affairs—and I believe the arguments were passed on to him by the director of that department—are that payments and pre-payments are being made. I will admit frankly that farmers are in a better position to-day to make payments than they have been for quite a while, but I think the price that we are paying in flesh and blood and sacrifice is much too high. We had to have a war before farmers could be prosperous enough to pay off their debts, and that is no credit to this or any other country. Payments are also being made because members of the old soldiers' families are working in war industries to-day and some of them are in the services. Payments are also being made because a number of these old soldiers are afraid of being put on the road, as numbers of other soldiers have been, and when their families come back there will be no roof for them to get under. Some say we are not turning any soldier settlers off the land, or at least very few. Very recently I had a return brought down which I believe justifies what I have said. During the years 1930-31 to 1943-44, a fourteen year period, we had no less than 2,064 of these old soldier settlers sign quit claim deeds. That means an average of 147 settlers in these fourteen years signed quit claim deeds. Why did they sign quit claim deeds? Simply because they could not make their payments. We also had during that 1930-31 to 1943-44 fiscal year period 934 of the old veterans of great war one kicked out on the street, and in many cases with no place to go. Why were they served these thirty-day notices? Simply because they could not pay. That is an average of 67 of our old veterans kicked out every year from 1930-31 to 1943-44.

There is one thing I should like the house to take particular notice of. In 1938-39 we had 143 of these old veterans kicked off the land; in 1939-40 at the time the war broke out we had 162 kicked off and in 1940-41 no fewer than 192 kicked off.

We have passed a lot of legislation here that deserves favourable comment, but the Veterans' Land Act may turn out, unless something is done, which I intend to suggest before I sit down, to be a repetition of the old soldier settlement board legislation. After what our men and women have gone through over the years I do not think we should ask them to go through the treatment endured by the old soldiers.

Another argument passed on to the minister from the director, I believe, was that if these clear titles are granted now to the old veterans of great war one the soldiers under the new Veterans' Land Act, will not pay, but will demand the same treatment. I see in that an admission by the government that the Veterans' Land Act is going to be a failure. If these men are given proper conditions there will not be any need for them to ask for clear titles without making full payment. To my mind this argument is an admission by the government that we are going to have a drop in the price of farm products that will not allow these new settlers to make their payments.

Before going on to deal with the Veterans' Land Act, may I say that when this scheme was started we had 25,017 settle on the land. On March 31, 1944, 4,130 or sixteen per cent, had clear titles after twenty-five years labour on the land, 6,153 still held contracts. That amounts to twenty-five per cent, leaving almost sixty per cent who had deserted their farms or were forced off. Is that a bright future for those who intend to settle under the Veterans' Land Act? In order to make the Veterans' Land Act a success I believe we should have it administered by an efficient and sympathetic director. I have already dealt with that but I again wish to make it plain that we must have a different head in that organization. An increase in the amount provided for live stock and equipment should be made. It is only $1,200 at the present time and that would pay about two-thirds of the price of a tractor.

I do not care how good a farmer a man may be; unless he has sufficient equipment he cannot make a success on the land. In the past we have spent millions of dollars in training these men efficiently to destroy human life and property. Why not provide a few millions now to set them up in business, so that they can make a living on the land? Those settlers are bound by contract; and I say "bound by contract" because they have signed up for land, live stock and equipment based on to-day's prices for farm produce. If those men are to make a success; if they are ever to get clear title to their land, I feel that the government is duty bound to guarantee them similar prices for their products during the period they are paying back that loan. By that I mean that if wheat is worth $1.25 a bushel to-day and later on those settlers have to sell it for seventy-five cents a bushel, then the government should give them a book credit of fifty cents a bushel, if they are ever to get title to their land. I do not care if we give them all their land, live stock and equipment free; if we compel them to produce at below the cost of production there is only one thing ahead of them a little later on; that is to be kicked off their land by a dictator director, as has been done with a number of the settlers of great war No. 1.

I suppose that suggestion will be met with the reply that we have passed legislation providing that prices of agricultural products will be maintained at certain levels. I am quite ready to admit that such legislation has been passed; but I think the government also will admit that we have not been given any figure on which those prices will be stabilized, and the success of this legislation will depend entirely on the level that is set for prices of farm products. Between 1930 and 1940 the farmers received 9.4 per cent of the national income. If prices of agricultural products are fixed on that basis, then the legislation will not be worth the paper it is written on. If prices of farm products are brought up to such a level that the farmers of Canada will receive their proper percentage of the national income, then the legislation will be successful.

I do not want to take up very much more of the time of the house, but I would remind hon. members that the governments of Alberta and British Columbia have made provision for grants of land to men who enlisted from those provinces and who wish to return to the land there. I will let some of the British Columbia members give the details of their legislation, but in the case of Alberta a man who enlisted from that province will receive a half-section of land in a soil-tested district. During the first three years he will not be asked to pay one penny. During the remaining seven years he will be required to turn in one-eighth of the returns from his crops. The government has gone farther and suggested to the dominion government that if they will pay half the cost of clearing and breaking forty acres of land after the settler goes in, the Alberta government will pay the other half. Then, at the end of ten years, instead of the bailiff being sent there to kick the man off the land, he will be given clear title to that half-section. In the long run I believe this will be cheaper, and I think we owe it to the veterans of this war.

Then, in order to clear a blot from the statute books of this country I suggest that even before the next election the government make available some $8,000,000 or even less to clear off the indebtedness of those old soldiers who are still working under the soldier settlement board legislation. This war is costing us something like $16,000,000 a day. Can we not afford to spend half of that amount to free these old soldier settlers of the past? Once more I ask the government to give this matter favourable consideration, because what has been done is not good enough. I do not wish to see the veterans of this war getting at our hands the kind of treatment that has been handed out to the soldier settlers of the last war.

Mr. WILFRID LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, we are being asked in this resolution to vote two billion dollars for the conduct of naval, military and air operations beyond Canada; the greater part of that appropriation will be for the war against Japan. I wish to voice at once my objections against conscription under any form for the dispatch of soldiers, sailors and airmen for service in the war against Japan, which Canada declared before the United States had itself decided upon it. I take this stand for the following reasons:

Firstly, the costs entailed by the dispatch of such forces will cause the maintenance of the present taxes in this country, and I think that our industry and commerce which will be called upon, after the war with Germany has ended, to proceed with the reorganization of their business with a view to their conversion to peace-time activity, will not be able to do anything along those lines so long as taxes have not been lowered. Secondly, our population of 12 million, which is now greatly reduced through our war effort, will not be able, in view of the extent of our territory, to plan for the development of our natural resources so as to compete with those countries which, not being at war with Japan, will necessarily have forged ahead by taking advantage of the period during which war with that country will last, and this to our detriment on world markets, because that war can still last for one or two years.

Thirdly, it will be contrary to all promises previously made by the Liberal government to the people of Quebec to send against his will a single one of our fellow-citizens to fight outside this country and especially against Japan, whether it be under the form of a voluntary system involving a hypocritical and disguised conscription, as was shown by the administration of the National Resources Mobilization Act, or by virtue of an act establishing outright conscription for overseas service, as happened in the case of bill 80 passed by this house a short time after the resignation of the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) from the cabinet, and under which the order in council of last fall was passed.

Why should we let our country fall more deeply into debt when the whole world recognizes that we have done more than we were humanly able to do? No one can foretell how much longer the war with Japan will last. President Roosevelt himself has stated that the road to Tokyo would be much harder than the road to Berlin. Why should we not avail ourselves of the opportunity offered, based on common sense and good logic, to show that we are able to act independently without submitting to the dictates from London?

The other day, I heard the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond) state, in a speech, that the San Francisco conference would stand as an affirmation of our independence. However, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has taken upon himself to refute him most emphatically, when he stated, right after the speech of the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie, as reported in Hansard on Wednesday, March 28, 1945:

Hon. gentlemen opposite will find out when the opportunity comes—and I am thankful to say it will be given fairly soon—for them as well as the government to appear before the people of this country, whether or not the people of Canada feel that I have done my duty by the British commonwealth of nations, by the British empire, through every hour of the time I have been serving as Prime Minister of this country.

There is also this other statement of the Prime Minister of Canada, made on the previous day and also reported in Hansard. I quote:

Why does my hon. friend say that Canada will not do her full part in the British commonwealth, after what she has done during this war?

That is to say Canada will continue to be a colony of the empire as heretofore.

Besides, the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie said, in his speech, that our group had always hoped that Canada might participate in previous conferences, such as those held at Dumbarton Oaks, Bretton Woods, Yalta, et cetera; this, he claimed, should be a reason to incite us to take part in the San Francisco meeting. However, it is precisely because our country has not taken part in any of these other conferences, and this in spite of our protests, that we are justified in refraining from cooperating in the San Francisco meeting; for, at all these previous conferences, decisions have been taken without our consent, such as the dismemberment of Poland, the right to veto, and the three votes granted to Russia, the assumption of control over our economic set-up by international finance following the decisions taken at Bretton Woods. All these decisions will be ratified by the San Francisco conference, as the Prime Minister has frankly admitted in his speech.

Why should we pay the price of secret or public agreements to which we have never given our approval? Why should we allow our country to be drawn into another conflict following decisions which we have never concurred in?

I am not surprised by the stand taken by the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie, for he did not vote against the act mobilizing our human and national resources which has resulted, for our people, in a hypocritical and disguised conscription and the setting up in our country of an economic dictatorship which has sounded the death knell of small businesses and small industrial plants by denying them the quotas of goods and materials to which they were entitled for the benefit of large trusts which, owing to the National Resources Mobilization Act, had representatives on all government bodies who were known as dollar-a-year men.

I respect the views of the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie, but by his stand in regard to the National Resources Mobilization Act he has contributed in setting up in our country the worst economic dictatorship in our history, the repercussions of which will be felt long after the war is ended.

The representative of a newspaper expressed the wish, in his daily column, that the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie be chosen as one of Canada's representatives to the San Francisco conference. I sincerely believe that he deserves this appointment and I trust that this time he will be more successful than in 1938 when he was mentioned for appointment as Canadian representative in Paris, at the very moment when he voted for the war appropriations which involved our country into a disastrous participation in the war.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER (Mr. Bradette): Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. ROY: On division.

Motion agreed to on division and the house went into committee, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR NAVAL SERVICES

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): Mr. Chairman, the estimated amount required by the Department of National Defence for Naval Service for the five months, April to August, 1945, is $140,043,500.

Before the committee comes to consider the naval estimates I shall try, following the practice in previous years, to give a general account of the work of the Royal Canadian Navy during the past twelve months.

[Mr. W. LaCroix.]

In some respects I feel I could do no better in this regard than to invite the committee to read an article that appears in the Canadian Geographical Journal, for November, 1944, from the pen of Commander William Strange, R.C.N.V.R., brilliant radio writer and journalist. Commander Strange styled his article "The Wonderful Year", taking his title from the lines of the two-hundred-year-old naval march, "Heart of Oak":

Come, cheer up, my lads, 'tis to glory we steer,
To add something new to this wonderful year.

The last year has been truly a wonderful year of achievement for the Canadian navy.

Ships. When I last spoke to the committee, just a little over a year ago, when the estimates of this department were under consideration, I said that the number of fighting ships in the Canadian navy was roughly 250. To-day our fighting ship strength stands at about 370. Thus, we have added some 120 fighting ships to our navy in the past year. Included in the number are a cruiser, several destroyers, many frigates, corvettes, minesweepers and smaller fighting craft. Besides the fighting ships more than 550 patrol and auxiliary vessels now fly the white ensign, an increase of more than 100 of such craft during the year.

Personnel. Personnel of the Royal Canadian Navy now number more than 95,000, included in which figure are nearly 6,000 members of the Women's Royal Canadian Naval Service. This represents an increase of about 15,000 over the figure of one year ago. The navy has now virtually reached its contemplated full strength in personnel. Recruiting from now on will be limited to the numbers necessary to replace casualties and discharges.

While on the subject of personnel, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say that no fewer than six of my colleagues in the cabinet have sons in the Canadian navy, and, in addition, many other hon. members in the House of Commons have sons and daughters in that service.

By provinces, enlistments in the navy have been as set out in the following tables:

	Officers	Ratings
Prince Edward Island....	55	1,368
Nova Scotia .....	626	6,515
New Brunswick .....	162	2,570
Quebec .....	1,280	11,792
Ontario .....	2,284	41,218
Manitoba .....	281	8,110
Saskatchewan .....	185	6,782
Alberta .....	218	7,792
British Columbia.....	1,126	11,868

I take now the next matter, that of operations, particularly of convoys. Our main task in the past year has remained the task of convoy work in the north Atlantic. It was to that task that we bent our energies from the beginning of the war, and it is to that great task that we must devote almost entirely our efforts until the war with Germany is brought to a successful conclusion. The importance of the Atlantic lifeline, the great ocean highway which links the British isles and the American continent, has been stressed so often and by so many people that I need not at this time emphasize its significance.

In the early autumn of 1940 one of our first corvettes was putting out on her maiden voyage from the harbour of Halifax. She was commanded by Lieutenant George Hay Stephen, R.C.N.R., a native of Scotland, but for many years a resident of Montreal. Lieutenant Stephen is now Commander Stephen. He is a winner of the O.B.E., the Distinguished Service Cross, Bar to the Distinguished Service Cross and a Mention in Dispatches. It was felt that some sort of ceremony should be arranged for an occasion that seemed historic and accordingly a band was stationed on one of the great piers of that harbour. As the little ship sailed out from the safety of her port into the perils of the great Atlantic, the band, at the request of the Scottish-Canadian captain of the corvette, played that widely known and justly popular air, "The Road to the Isles". That little ship was indeed taking the road to the Isles. Not, it is true, the road of the song, but the broad high road of ocean that leads to the great isles themselves, the great isles that in those days stood alone in Europe against the might and savagery of German attack.

I may tell the committee that since September, 1939, more than two hundred million tons of cargo have been moved over that road. Without that vast amount of food and war material and without the troops which crossed the seas in safety, it is not too much to say that the fight in Europe could not have been carried on. If the nazis had been successful in blocking the great ocean paths to Britain, the liberating armies of the Allies would not be in western Europe at this hour. The invasion, and all events that have followed, were made possible—and let us never forget this—only by the fact that throughout the dark and terrible days when enemy submarines threatened to overwhelm us, the men of the sea held the ocean lanes clear, fought the convoys through, fed and supplied the island fortress of Britain, cheerfully bore the fierce hardships of the North Atlantic, died like heroes when their hour came, and earned the gratitude of all civilized people for their efforts.

The task of convoying on the North Atlantic has been one of tremendous greatness and I would not have it understood that the Canadian navy alone has been entirely responsible for its execution. British ships and United States ships have contributed mightily to the success of this vast operation. On the other hand, I am proud to point out that at certain periods within the last few years more than one-half of the entire burden of transatlantic escort work fell upon the shoulders of the Canadian navy. At one stage, during the summer of 1944, Canadian ships did one hundred per cent of close escort work on the north Atlantic and at the same time they formed thirty per cent of the striking forces in that area. Last summer the largest convoy ever to sail the Atlantic, a convoy of 167 merchant ships, carrying more than one million tons of cargo, sailed from North American shores and reached its destination without the loss of a single ship. The protection for this great armada was provided by the escort vessels of the Canadian navy.

Invasion. I recall that two years ago when the naval estimates were under discussion some regret was expressed by an hon. member that the Canadian navy did not have ships capable of taking part in an invasion of Europe. That hon. gentleman, I have no doubt, was thinking of larger types of ships than we had in operation at the time. I can say now, however, that when the great assault on nazi held territory was opened on June 6 last the Canadian navy, in addition to all its convoy duties on the broad Atlantic, was able to supply more than 100 ships and nearly 10,000 naval personnel for the task. We allocated for this purpose two fleet destroyers, nine escort destroyers, two support groups of frigates, nineteen corvettes, two flotillas of minesweepers, two flotillas of motor torpedo boats, two landing ships, fourteen assault craft and thirty landing craft for infantry.

At the same time, and for some time before, our four tribal destroyers the Iroquois, Athabaskan, Huron and Haida were engaged with four like ships of the Royal Navy in assault work in the British channel and the bay of Biscay. These ships were all grouped in what was known as the tenth destroyer flotilla and from April to September of last year this flotilla compiled one of the most remarkable records of the entire war. In a little more than four months these eight ships sank thirty-six German ships, including destroyers, minesweepers, trawlers, armed merchant vessels, tankers and a submarine and damaged fifteen other enemy ships, with the loss of only one of their own ships, the Canadian ship Athabaskan.

It is difficult to single out any particular persons for special commendation but the commanding officers of these ships, perhaps, deserve to be particularly mentioned:—Captain H. G. DeWolf of the Haida who, for his gallantry and skill, was awarded the D.S.O., D.S.C. and four Mentions in Dispatches; Captain Rayner of the Huron, who received a bar to his D.S.C. and two Mentions in Dispatches; Commander J. C. Hibbard of the Iroquois who received a bar to his already won D.S.C.; and Lieut. Commander John Stubbs of the Athabaskan, who had won his D.S.O. two years before, who received the D.S.C. for preinvasion work and who unfortunately is still missing.

I should like to make some mention of the great successes enjoyed before, during and since the invasion day by our two flotillas of motor torpedo boats. These small but extremely fast and effective ships have been operating with coastal forces in the United Kingdom for several years. Their work is hazardous and exacting. They operate mainly at night and when they engage the enemy they do so at very close range. These ships are not named but are given a number. I should like to put on the records of this house the name of Lieutenant Commander Anthony Law of Quebec city, who has been awarded the D.S.C. and a Mention in Dispatches, who commands one of the flotillas, and the name of Lieutenant Commander James R. Kirkpatrick of Kitchener, Ontario, who commands the other flotilla, and who also has received the D.S.C. and a Mention in Dispatches.

Enemy losses. Since I last spoke to the committee about a year ago Canadian ships have destroyed or shared in the destruction of ten submarines and in the probable destruction of six submarines.

Since the beginning of the war Canadian ships have destroyed or shared in the destruction of twenty-two enemy submarines, have probably destroyed eight submarines, and probably damaged seven more submarines.

In the same period, that is, since the beginning of the war, our ships have participated in the sinking of forty-four enemy surface vessels, in the severe damaging of twenty-six enemy surface vessels, and in the capture of one enemy surface vessel. The enemy vessels sunk or damaged included destroyers, minesweepers, trawlers, E-boats and merchant ships.

Add these two achievements together and you will see that Canadian ships of war have sunk, either by themselves or in company with other ships, a total of sixty-six enemy vessels of various types, have damaged twenty-six others, have captured one, have probably sunk eight and probably damaged seven more.

Enemy devices. The Atlantic campaign, for it is a campaign rather than a battle, is still being fought out. In recent months the enemy has adopted certain new tactics and made certain improvements in his submarines, mention of which has been made several times in official statements as well as in press dispatches. One of the significant new developments is that of the "Schnorkel," or breathing device which enables the submarine to get air and to charge its batteries without coming to the surface. This apparatus makes detection of submarines a great deal more difficult. There is no doubt that the enemy's construction of submarines is still continuing despite air attacks on submarine yards. There is also reason to believe that some of the German submarines have a greater under-water speed than formerly. In recent months enemy submarines have concentrated their efforts, to a greater degree than formerly, in coastal waters. Under a tactic of this kind there is no reason to believe that Canadian coastal waters will be free from these under-water marauders. It may well be that we shall have submarine attacks in Canadian waters on an increased scale. I do not wish to alarm the committee or the country, but I remind the committee of what was said a few days ago by the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Great Britain in their joint monthly statement on submarine warfare, that an enemy with a large number of submarines is always a threat to our shipping. Where that threat may be manifested in future months no one can predict, but we have no reason to assume that our waters will be immune, and therefore we cannot accept any relaxation in our anti-submarine measures.

Merchant ship losses. It may be said now, that in the years 1940, 1941 and 1942, the enemy was able to sink more merchant ships than could be replaced. We had not yet gathered our full strength either in escort ships or in merchant ships, but in 1943 the tide turned. In 1943 the united nations' losses of merchant ships were only about one-half of what they had been in 1942. In 1944 merchant ship losses were about one-third of what they were in 1943. These figures prove that our warship strength was growing and that we were able to offer greater protection to our convoys.

The year 1943 was remarkable for another fact and it is this: not only were our sinkings of merchant ships less than they had been in the year before, but our construction of merchant vessels was much greater than it had been in the previous year. The same comment may be made about the year 1944. Our merchant tonnage at the end of that year was considerably greater than it was at the beginning.

For the present year, 1945, while it is true that the enemy has shown greater activity than in the months immediately preceding, nevertheless the loss of merchant tonnage this year is not such as to cause alarm, and at the same time our successes against enemy submarines last month were satisfactory.

Losses of Canadian warships. I regret to have to report that from the time of my last statement to this committee and up to February 28, 1945—that covers a period of nearly one year—we have lost as a result of enemy action the Tribal destroyer Athabaskan, the frigate Valleyfield, the corvettes Regina, Alberni, Shawinigan and Trentonian, the minesweeper Clayoquot, and two motor torpedo boats.

From the beginning of the war up to February 28, 1945, we lost twenty ships by enemy action and twelve from other causes.

Casualties. Our casualties from the beginning of the war up to February 28, 1945, are:

Killed on active service.....	1,498
Other deaths .....	224
Wounded or injured.....	388
Prisoners of war.....	87
Missing .....	44

The sympathy of the committee and of the house will be with the relatives and friends of these gallant men who have given their lives in their country's service.

Decorations. On the other hand, I am proud to say that since the beginning of the war 1,168 Canadian naval officers and men have been recognized by His Majesty the King, and by foreign governments, for their gallantry and devotion to duty. Last year I placed on Hansard a list of those so honoured, and it included some 519 names. In the past year the number of decorations won by the Canadian navy amounted to 649 and therefore surpassed the total number won in all the previous years of the war. This fact alone indicates the growing size and the increased operational scope of this navy. With the consent of the committee I should like to place on Hansard, without reading it, a list of the men so honoured from the time of my last report up to and including March 20 of this year.

Pacific war. I have said many times, as I have said to-night that the role which we assumed at the beginning of the war, namely, that of convoying merchant ships over the Atlantic still remains our chief and our primary task. Last autumn many people felt that the war in Europe was about to end and we were urged by some to detach some of our Atlantic forces and send them into the Pacific, with a view to their acquiring experience of naval conditions in that theatre of war. We did not respond to this suggestion, and I think we were right not to do so. Until the great Atlantic campaign is over, that vast undertaking which ranges over an area extending from the gulf of St. Lawrence on the west to the northern Russian ports on the east, and from the Arctic circle to south of the cape of Good Hope—until that great campaign has been successfully terminated we cannot divert our escort ships to other areas and other waters.

This is not to say that we have given no thought to the war in the Pacific. We have not forgotten that we were one of the first countries, if indeed not the first, to declare war against Japan. I may tell the committee that many communications have passed and many conversations have been held between representatives of our service on the one hand and officials of the British admiralty and of the United States navy on the other with regard to the Pacific war.

Already a fine cruiser, His Majesty's Canadian ship Uganda, acquired from the British government, has been made ready for the Pacific war and she is at this very moment in Pacific waters under the command of Captain E. R. Mainguy, O.B.E., of the Royal Canadian Navy. Within a short time we shall commission another Canadian cruiser. It was our wish that Canadian cruisers should bear the names of our provinces just as our destroyers bear the names of Canadian rivers and our frigates and corvettes bear the names of Canadian cities and towns. But the Uganda had already seen gallant service with the British navy, although she was practically a new cruiser when we acquired her, and for this reason, as well as at the earnest request of the Protectorate of Uganda and of the British Admiralty we did not choose to change her name.

But for the new cruiser we have selected the name of the senior Canadian province, and within a few weeks His Majesty's Canadian ship Ontario, carrying painted on her funnel, as all Canadian warships now do, a large maple leaf, will be placed in commission. A few weeks ago I had the pleasure of inspecting the Ontario in the great Belfast yard where she is being built. She is thoroughly modern in every respect. Her command will be entrusted to a proved veteran of the sea, Captain Harold Grant, D.S.O., of the Royal Canadian Navy.

With these two cruisers we intend to send into the Pacific two aircraft carriers if the necessary arrangements for their acquisition can be made, and I believe they can be made. So far as naval personnel are concerned, these carriers will be manned entirely by Canadians. The flying personnel will come from the British fleet air arm, but many of them I hope will be Canadians who have enlisted in that fine service.

Along with these two cruisers and two aircraft carriers we plan to send a number of destroyers and frigates. I am not able to state publicly the exact number of ships we shall send, or the exact number of men involved; but I can say that the Canadian naval unit in the Pacific, while it will not at all compare in size or strength with the British naval force or with the magnificent United States Pacific fleet, will nevertheless be a good deal more than a mere token force. It will, I believe, worthily represent Canada in the Pacific war.

The Naval Service. Ninety per cent of our navy men belong to the Naval Volunteer Reserve. They are civilians who have turned to the sea. They are men who left their farms and their factories, their offices and their books; but they have learned quickly and well. Many of them are now in command of ships. I pay my tribute to these men, but I do not forget those officers and ratings of the permanent naval force of Canada who have done so much to train and to teach the navy of to-day.

The lot of these permanent force men in our three services was not a happy one between the wars. Reductions that were made year by year in the estimates for defence services were followed by corresponding reductions in personnel, and the life of the permanent force officer was one of uncertainty and unhappiness. I have always held the view that if we are to have defence services at all we should attract able young men into these services. To do this it is necessary that they be guaranteed some continuity and certainty of employment, and we should also give them in peace some of the tributes we are glad to pay to them in war.

The marvel is not that our defence services have made some mistakes; the wonder is that they have done as well as they have done in this war, when one considers the difficulties and hardships that these services have had to endure.

I pay tribute also to those civilian members of the naval service—clerical staffs, supervisors, officials of various kinds, labourers in our dockyards and elsewhere who have played so important and valued a part in the development of our naval effort.

I should also like to thank once more the great host of people in Canada who are not members of the naval service, whether on the civilian or on the uniformed side, who have done so much to encourage and sustain the naval effort. I include in this group members of the Navy League in all parts of Canada, officers of Sea Cadet corps, members of women's auxiliaries, civic officials and others in hundreds of Canadian cities and towns who have been active in the adoption of ships and in the provision of comforts for them, and thousands of other persons whom time does not permit me to mention by name but who have in numberless ways cheered and encouraged the naval service in its work.

In 1941 when we had to decide whether certain buildings to be erected in Canada should be of permanent or temporary construction, it became important to come to some decision as to the size of our post-war navy. In that year, the government took the view that the post-war navy should be, in round figures, 9,000 officers and men. That is not a large figure, I admit. It may be that it should be regarded only as a minimum, but at all events it is a figure five times greater than the figure of September, 1939.

The permanent naval force after the war will be supported, of course, by the Naval Reserve and the Naval Volunteer Reserve, and a committee of naval officers has prepared a carefully worked out and comprehensive report for the future organization of these reserves.

As I present, for the fifth time, the estimates of the Department of Naval Service, I look back with pride on what the officers and men of the department, supported by the Canadian people, have accomplished in five and a half years. The six ships of war have been multiplied sixtyfold and the 1,700 men on active service have been increased more than fiftyfold.

Our shipyards, which were dormant before the war, have awakened into vigorous and fruitful activity and have built more than 90 per cent of the ships that we now use and they have as well built many ships for other members of the united nations.

Our repair facilities have been developed; docks and marine railways have been established; permanent homes have been created for nearly all of the Naval Reserve Divisions, which at the beginning of the war were all living in rented quarters. Training establishments of various kinds have been set up where our men receive not only the general training that all sailors require, but where they can acquire, and where many have already acquired, skill in such trades as those of machinists, electrical artificers, radio artificers, shipwrights, welders, motor mechanics and the like. That taken together, Mr. Chairman, represents a story of growth and progress that nobody dreamed of in the early days of the war.

In those early days, in the autumn of 1939, the Canadian naval staff visualized our navy's task, to put it in their own words, as "the giving of reasonable protection to the trade in our harbours and in the focal points in the vicinity of our coasts." A few months later it was felt that the utmost number of new recruits that could be handled in the Canadian navy was 4,500. Any others in excess of that figure should go, so it was recommended, to the British admiralty for service with the Royal Navy. These estimates and recommendations were no doubt based upon Canada's naval experience in the last great war. But they fell far short of the actual performance. Bit by bit the strength of the navy has grown, and its responsibilities have increased. Our men have fought on every sea of the world. They have brought honour and glory to this land. They have been actors in a great drama which now seems to be drawing steadily, inexorably, to its close. Soon they will come back—those who are left—back over the great oceans where their laurels and honours have been gathered. They will come back to knit up the ravelled skein of their lives, and some of them will dwell far from that element which was once their home and their battle ground. Yet I venture to say that so long as memory lasts, the recollection of these great days will be with them, and along with the consciousness of duty done, they will carry in their hearts forever the image of a gallant ship and the spell of the great sea.

Mr. STIRLING: The story which the minister has unfolded to us this evening is just one more chapter in the grand account which will be handed down to those who come after us of the accomplishments of the Royal Canadian Navy. He will agree with me that he has done no more than sketch in the outline of what has been accomplished for Canada by Canada's navy. There must come to our minds many questions which we should like to ask that would enable him to amplify the story which he has told, but we realize we must wait for the answers until later days when more information can be given.

I was very glad that the minister referred to the great difficulties which were encountered in those earlier years when the idealism of disarmament was overshadowing us. But that Canada's navy has been able to accomplish what it has accomplished is due at least in part to the plans and the groundwork laid down after the great war in preparation for the time of pressure whenever it should come. I think of Sir Charles Kingsmill, of Rear Admiral Hose, and of Vice Admiral Nelles, when references are made to the carrying out of these plans. Very roughly the plan was that there should be a small, compact, highly trained permanent force, and that we should always be able to call on the assistance of the Royal Navy and of all the training necessary with that highly trained force. I remember that just ten years ago the Royal Canadian Navy permanent force consisted of 900 officers and men, that the Royal Canadian Naval Reserve consisted of just under 200 officers and men and that the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve consisted of just under 1,000 officers and men. Adding these up you will find a total in the blue uniform of just over 2,000, and the minister tells us this evening that the figure of last year has gone on growing and that now there are 90,000 officers and men serving under the white ensign.

I am glad he paid tribute to those chiefs of the naval staff whom we look back on and whose service we appreciate. I remember so well when the idealism of disarmament was over us all, as I phrase it, having a conversation with Rear Admiral Hose. He was then chief of the naval staff, and indeed pretty near the end of his tether of endurance because of those cuts in estimates which were considered necessary and because of the criticism which unfortunately was too often levelled at Canada's small navy. I met him again on the eve of his retirement. He had just returned from a trip across Canada, the purpose of which was to visit all the establishments of the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve. He was extremely pleased that at the time of his retirement he should find those various centres in all the provinces of Canada, seven-eighths of them far removed from salt water, not only set up to complement, small though that complement was, but with a waiting list. And, Mr. Chairman, it is surely a tribute to the people of Canada that, whether it be the call of blood or whatever the reason may be, when the first call came the people responded from every province, as the minister has recounted this evening.

On this occasion I should like to pay my tribute to the work carried on by Vice Admiral Percy W. Nelles. He entered the Canadian navy, as hon. members will remember, as a cadet, and he stepped up the ladder, putting in his time of service and training with the Royal Navy, and of course benefiting therefrom. He carried us through those years of depression when, unfortunately, the estimates were indeed low, meeting the difficulties which presented themselves at that time; and I would remind hon. members that included in those difficulties was the criticism of ignorant men who all too often were inclined to argue that the dollars spent on the Royal Canadian Navy would have been better spent in some other way. Think for a moment what it would have meant if that had been done! It would have meant that when the call came, when the pressure came upon us, we should not have had that magnificent nucleus from which we could expand. The plan to which I had reference a moment ago was that from this small band of highly trained sailors we should be able to expand the Royal Canadian Naval Reserve, which is formed of those who serve in the merchant ships, and the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve, through its various establishments across the country, and by that means, following the course so wisely laid down, arrive at what the minister has been able to describe this evening.

The war is yet to be won. The minister has indicated that when the trouble in the Atlantic ceases our part shall be played in the Pacific as all Canadians would wish it to be played. But I presume that before this phase comes a certain amount of demobilization will be taken in hand, and in that connection there are two matters which I should like to bring to the minister's attention and on which I would ask his comments. The first is in relation to that preference which is given under the civil service commission, and of which cognizance is taken in the making of other appointments. As I understand it, that preference is only granted to those who have served overseas. I suggest that in these considerable numbers the minister has described there must be very many who would have been only too delighted to serve overseas had they been given the opportunity. Duty compelled them to remain in Canada, and I wonder if there is not some way in which that preference can be extended to them in their applications for service after demobilization. The other matter concerns itself with the arrangements for demobilization leave, which I understand differ in the three branches of the service. I think it would be of considerable advantage if it were possible to have similar arrangements in all branches, so that in the work of rehabilitation the sailors may be granted opportunities similar to those accorded the other two services. I should like the minister to give the committee the benefit of his opinion on that point. Perhaps he would also give us some information as to the progress already achieved under that branch of the navy which has to do with rehabilitation, and describe what has been accomplished so far in that regard.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Chairman, in considering the estimates for the Canadian navy the first thing that comes to my mind is the gallant service that has been rendered by the men of the merchant marine. We know what they have gone through; we know the perils they have had to meet, whether serving under charter to the Royal Navy, with the Canadian navy or on our inland waters. We remember the days when the U-boats were sinking so many ships in the Atlantic; and with all this in mind one wonders why the government of Canada has not treated these men more or less in the same way it has treated those serving in the Canadian navy. The men of the merchant marine have practically enlisted for the duration of the war. No one can say they have not rendered wonderful service, and I believe some revision should be made to bring their pensions more nearly in line with those of the navy. I hope the government will take this point into consideration.

I do not think anyone but a Scotsman could have made the address in honour of our navy to which we listened to-night. An Englishman might have done it almost as well, while an Irishman perhaps would not have done quite so well. The first English, Irish and Scottish people to come to this country were principally sea-faring men, with the spirit of adventure in their blood. They came to this country and settled it, but they had the sea in their blood, and when the call came they wanted to get into the Canadian navy. In days gone by, whenever they could find a little pool of water they founded a yacht club or made some arrangement whereby they could go boating; they still loved to be on the water. To my mind that is one reason why we have the stuff that we have in the Royal Canadian Navy to-day.

Canadians have always been willing to help out the navy. Just here I should like to pay my compliments to the Navy League of Canada, which has done so much for this country, and on which some of my best friends have served.

No nation in the world will ever be worth its salt unless it is a maritime nation. We must never forget "Hearts of Oak". And even those boys who live away out on the prairies, where there is very little water, must never forget the traditions of those little islands over there, the traditions of the sea and of the navy, and all that those things had meant for civilization and for progress in the world.

I take great pleasure in viewing what has been done by the boys who have gone from Toronto to service in the navy. I take pride, too, in what has been done by the yacht clubs in my city. What Toronto needs, however, is recognition, and with our great love of the sea, and a realization that world trade depends upon the sea, we in Toronto say that our rights should be recognized.

Then, further, we should have that easy access to the sea which for so many years we have been trying to get. Already access can be gained from western Canada to points as far east as Toronto. But what we want now is the development of the St. Lawrence waterways. When we have that we shall have something to satisfy the lads who have come from my part of Canada. They will take some satisfaction from our being developed into an ocean port.

The minister spoke about shipbuilding. Let me point out to the committee that many of those frigates and corvettes were built in the Toronto shipbuilding yards.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): That is right.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Those are the most efficient yards in Canada.

Mr. POTTIER: Ho, ho!

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The hon. member says "ho, ho"; would he mind rising in his place, and contradicting my statement?

Mr. POTTIER: I am agreeing with the hon. member.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): That is fine; he agrees with me. I just wished to make that point clear, because I am sure those lads in the navy would like to know what has been done in the shipyards of Toronto. I repeat that the Toronto shipbuilding yards are the most efficient in Canada to-day, and that in those yards ships have been built cheaper than in any other yards in Canada. I am telling the committee something that is worth knowing.

Certainly I do not want to see those yards dismantled. We know that after the last war many of the lads who served in the merchant marine left the service. Toronto was not an ocean port, and the result was that many of the shipyards at that point were dismantled and went out of business. The remarkable feature, to my mind, is how those men, who had such a keen interest in the navy, stuck to it, despite all that was done to their native city of Toronto. Some of the shipbuilding industry went to Port Arthur, and other sections of it went to other points.

As I have said to the minister before, there is no more naval-minded city in Canada than the city of Toronto. I know he will agree when I say the Royal Canadian Yacht club and the Queen City Yacht club have contributed more officers than almost any other yacht clubs in Canada, and perhaps in the world.

Again may I compliment him upon his speech, and also thank him for the fact that at last we are to have a permanent barracks in Toronto for the Royal Canadian Navy. I pay my tribute to all who have done so much for the naval service, and would mention particularly the navy league. May I, briefly, compliment the minister upon the manner in which he has handled his job.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister give the committee some idea of the plans for recruiting for the navy during the present fiscal year?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): We plan to take into the navy only such numbers as will be necessary to replace casualties and other men who, for some reason, leave the service. We estimate that about 500 a month are all that we require for that purpose. It is on that figure that our present recruiting scheme is based.

Mr. GREEN: There will be no increase in the total number of naval personnel at the end of the fiscal year?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I should think not. Naval strength is now at about its maximum.

Mr. MacINNIS: For some time I believe there was a waiting list of naval recruits. Does that condition still maintain?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Yes. There are still more offering to come into the navy than the navy can accept. There is still a considerable waiting list.

Mr. STIRLING: Are they all coming in through the R.C.N.V.R.?

War Appropriation—Naval Services

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Almost all. A few are coming in through the permanent R.C.N.; but the great bulk of prospective naval men would be R.C.N.V.R.

Mr. STIRLING: Under what condition are those coming into the permanent force being accepted? Are a certain number required?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): The strength of the permanent R.C.N. was, at February 28, 1945, 4,371. It is somewhat less than half of the allotted complement of the permanent navy. So that a young man wishing to transfer from the reserve to the permanent navy, if suitable, could be accepted.

Mr. STIRLING: What about the lad who has set his heart on the navy, and who perhaps has been coming along through a sea cadet course? He desires not only to enter the navy but to make it his life work. Is such a lad being received direct in the R.C.N., or has he to enter through the R.C.N.V.R. and take his chance on being transferred to the permanent force?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I cannot give my hon. friend a definite answer. He could go direct into the R.C.N. if he wished. There is still a considerable gap there between the present strength and the allotted complement. I can look into the matter and give my hon. friend a definite answer to-morrow.

Mr. EDWARDS: I had a case recently of a young lad who wanted to join the navy, but he could not get in unless he was willing to sign up for seven years.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): That has always been the rule with the permanent navy.

Mr. EDWARDS: He cannot join for the duration of the war.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): He can go into the reserve for the duration of the war, but if he wants to enter the permanent navy he must go in for a fixed period. I think it has always been seven or five years.

Mr. EDWARDS: The young lad I had in mind wanted to get into the navy for the duration of the war.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): He should join the naval volunteer reserve.

Mr. EDWARDS: I am given to understand that he could not join the R.C.N.V.R., that he would have to sign up with the R.C.N. there being no vacancies in the volunteer force. I should like to know if men are being taken into the R.C.N.V.R., and, if so, are allotments being made to the different sections of the country?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): There are only 500 a month to be taken in and when that is divided up among twenty divisions, it gives only twenty-five a month per division, which is less than one a day. That is a small number for each division. Then a division might have a considerable surplus on hand so that recruiting might be quite slack. The allotment of 500 is divided as evenly as possible from one coast to the other.

Mr. ISNOR: I am sure that all members of the committee were impressed with the recital of the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services, and I know we are all in accord with the words of appreciation expressed by the hon. member for Yale with regard to the wonderful achievements of the Canadian navy. There is one matter in which I am particularly interested and on which the minister did not touch. I refer to the future policy with regard to repairs to naval ships.

As the minister well knows we have an exceptionally fine dockyard at Halifax. The facilities of this yard have been extended to a great extent and it is now able to take care of the great majority of the ships. Those of us who live on the Atlantic coast see the ships sailing in and out of Halifax and we see also the large number of naval ships coming to port for repairs. I am wondering if any policy has been set out in regard to the development and carrying on of repair work during the post-war period, particularly the repairing of naval ships.

I can remember back in 1924 and for many years afterward trying to impress various ministers of defence, particularly the late E. M. Macdonald, that we had at the port of Halifax a very fine dockyard, well equipped to carry out all repairs. At that time most of these repairs were being handled by outside concerns, and I always felt that we should maintain a sufficiently large permanent force to take care of all the repairs necessary to Royal Canadian Navy ships.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Is my hon. friend referring to the naval dockyard, or to repair facilities generally in the port?

Mr. ISNOR: I am referring to the Halifax dockyard and its ability to take care of ships of the Royal Canadian Navy.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): My hon. friend knows that in addition to the repair facilities at Halifax and in that area generally we have repair facilities at other points in the province, notably marine railways on the south shore of Nova Scotia, at Sydney, in Cape Breton, Pictou and other points. I would hope that the hon. gentleman is not too optimistic when he sees some problem about repairs in the post-war period. The problem in the past has been to get something to repair. However, I think he is quite right in asking that we should follow the practice which is fairly commonly followed in Great Britain, that is, to have a good deal of the repairs done in the naval dockyard. My only hope is that the navy will be large enough to present some problem in that regard.

Mr. ISNOR: You have a good yard there; there are facilities and men available, but you lack a dock large enough to take care of warships, both in the Royal Navy and in our own navy. I am suggesting that you should plan things so that, instead of our warships and British warships being sent to the southern states for repairs, this work could be done in our base Atlantic port, namely, Halifax.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I see more clearly what my hon. friend is suggesting. He will remember that we have established a floating dock at Halifax capable of taking ships up to 25,000 tons, which means anything short of a battleship. Anything in the line of a cruiser, a destroyer, a frigate, a corvette or a minesweeper could easily be handled in that harbour. Ships larger than that, such as battleships, could be repaired in Saint John where there is a large graving dock capable of taking any ship in the world. I thoroughly agree that we should have in Canada facilities for the repair of our own ships and the ships of any other friendly nation which may be in distress, no matter how large they may be. We should have docks and repair facilities large enough to deal with this problem and I hope we shall be able to maintain and perfect them as time goes on.

Mr. POTTIER: I do not wish to prolong this debate, but I fear that there may be too great centralization in the post-war period. I hope the minister and his officials will not forget—the minister has made reference to this—that there are establishments not only at Halifax and Saint John but at other places. These establishments have the personnel, the equipment and the machine capacity to take care of all repairs. These yards have served their purpose for the present time and I think the time will come when you will need them. At least they should be kept in good condition and kept operating when at all possible.

Mr. HAZEN: What personnel is now in training at Deep Brook, and what staff is there at the same place?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): The total number of personnel at Deep Brook is 6,917, roughly 7,000. How many of these are staff, instructors, and the like I cannot say, but I will get the details for my hon. friend to-morrow.

Mr. GREEN: What is the policy of the government with regard to building the larger warships? I realize that some destroyers are being built at Halifax. Is it planned that all destroyers for the Canadian navy in the future are to be built in Canada? And what about cruisers? I have here a press dispatch of October 17, 1944, in which Mr. Edmond Sharp, a shipbuilding expert who was sent over from Great Britain to help in the building of destroyers at Halifax, is quoted as saying:

It will be a great disappointment to me personally if Canada does not continue with the construction of destroyers.

And he added that cruisers, too, were well within the scope of Canadian shipyards. I think it would be interesting to the house and to the country to know just what the plans are.

With regard to the building of these larger ships, last year there was a brief submitted to the government by the Canadian Shipbuilding and Ship Repairing association in which certain recommendations were made having in mind the maintenance of a shipbuilding industry in Canada in the post-war years. One of the recommendations read as follows:

That all Canadian naval vessels shall be built in Canada, and that the government make representations to the British government to establish a policy whereby educational orders for British naval vessels may be placed in Canada in the post-war period.

Will the minister make a statement with regard to the attitude of the government toward that recommendation of the Canadian Shipbuilding and Ship Repairing association?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): We have no plan in mind for the post-war building of destroyers. We have certain destroyers now in hand in Canada, namely four Tribal class destroyers. Beyond that we have not planned for the future. There is no reason whatever in my judgment why Canada should not build its own destroyers and its own cruisers too, if necessary. It can be done. One of the destroyers built at Halifax will, in a matter of a few months, be in commission. Work on this ship has been delayed for some time, though no fault can be attributed to anyone. Destroyer construction was new work for this country—both the building of the hull and the building of the machinery—and labour problems added to the difficulties of the contractors.

Mr. GREEN: Is that the first Canadian-built destroyer to be put into commission?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): She is not yet in commission but will be in a few months.

Mr. GREEN: And she will be the first Canadian-built destroyer?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Yes. There is no reason why we cannot build destroyers here, and if we can build destroyers we can build cruisers.

As to my hon. friend's other point, whether the British government can be induced to place "educational orders" in this country I cannot say. Britain will, of course, after the war be seeking export markets and she has always been a pre-eminent country in ship-building. I should doubt whether Britain would feel like parting with any of that very valuable part of her export trade. Beyond that I can say nothing at the moment, although I do not think the government has reached any definite conclusions on the point.

Mr. GREEN: There is one other question having to do with the post-war Canadian navy. The minister said that the government plans on having about 9,000 personnel in the Canadian navy. Can he give us some idea of the ships that are to be in that navy and whether there are to be units stationed on both Atlantic and Pacific coasts?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): We have always looked on Halifax as one of our great bases in the east and Esquimalt on the west coast, and I should think there always would be units of the navy on both the east and the west coasts.

As to the exact composition of the navy in the post-war period, my hon. friend will understand that the nature of navies changes. I would hope that in the post-war years the naval air arm would have the place that it deserves. That is why we have made a small beginning, but nevertheless a beginning, in that field of naval warfare at this time. Exactly what ships will be in the navy I do not know. There would always be destroyers I should think, and having regard to the trend of warfare I think we should have aircraft carriers. Beyond that it would be very difficult to go just now. I would hope that we might have a couple of cruisers, but I could not go into any greater detail at this time.

Mr. GREEN: The plan would be to have some of the heavier ships on each coast. Is that correct?

[Mr. A. L. Macdonald.]

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Yes, if we can use the plural at all in regard to the post-war navy. If we have heavy ships certainly I should hope that some of them would be on the west coast.

Mr. GREEN: I said on each coast?

Mr. STIRLING: Will the minister be good enough to give answers to those two questions I asked?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I should like a little more time to reflect on them.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, April 4, 1945.

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

VETERANS' LAND ACT—VICTORIA AND CARLETON, N.B.

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. How many farms have been purchased in the counties of Victoria and Carleton, New Brunswick, under the Veterans' Land Act?
2. From whom was each purchased?
3. What was the price paid for each farm?
4. How many of these farms have been settled upon by veterans?
5. If they are not all settled, what provision is being made to keep the farms under cultivation until they are settled?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre):

The undernoted answers are restricted to farm properties as distinct from acreage acquired for small holding purposes.

1. 25.

2. Arthur Le Bel, C. H. Grath, Mrs. S. Rideout, R. Green, W. B. McIntyre, Mrs. R. Clark, J. P. Millie, W. Murchie, C. Wilson, H. Black, Mrs. J. MacBride, A. White, C. Culberson, D. C. Smith, Mrs. L. M. Daye, L. Kilpatrick, J. H. Kilpatrick, R. W. Williamson, W. Pryor, Mrs. M. J. Hayward, T. Neill, J. Jewett, R. B. Tompkins, A. W. Wilson, H. Webb.

3. $2,000, $4,250, $3,800, $3,600, $3,800, $4,000, $1,800, $2,800, $4,500, $2,750, $3,000, $4,600, $4,000, $2,000, $2,800, $2,300, $6,200, $2,000, $1,200, $3,950, $3,100, $4,000, $1,650, $1,500, $3,200.

4. None.

5. Properties acquired in advance of settlement are maintained in at least as good condition as when purchased, and wherever possible improved, by arranging for their operation under individually negotiated lease agreements which take into consideration such factors as repairs to fencing and drainage, improvement of water supply, running repairs to buildings, cultural practices for the improvement of the state of cultivation, erosion control and the seeding in some cases of areas to legumes and grasses. The possibility of arranging an appropriate lease is an influencing factor in determining whether a specific property will or will not be purchased.

ST. JOHN'S, NFLD., BARRACKS

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Is there a naval or other barracks situated on the south side of the harbour at St. John's, Newfoundland?
2. If so, what is the total cost of the barracks?
3. Have these barracks been put in use?
4. If so, to what use were they put?
5. If not, when will they be used?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City):

1. There is a naval barracks on the south side of the harbour at St. John's, Newfoundland, which was built to accommodate naval personnel employed in the new machine shops, storehouses, etc., which have been erected on the south side of St. John's harbour in order to increase the ship repairs facilities at that port. All these buildings were constructed with the approval of the British admiralty, and at their cost, but under the supervision of the Canadian naval service. The title to and ownership of all these lands and buildings is vested in the British admiralty, and the Canadian government is responsible only for their operation and maintenance.

2. Total cost $747,232.62, charged to admiralty account.
3. Yes, but not to full capacity.
4. Partially occupied for accommodation, recreation, headquarters of fire marshal and workshops.
5. It had been planned to make full use of these facilities by May 1, 1945, but this depends upon the course of the battle of the Atlantic and also upon the operational requirements of the admiralty.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES—GANDER, NFLD.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Does the T.C.A. have property at Gander, Newfoundland?
2. If so, what has been the cost of construction and maintenance of this property?
3. Of what does this property consist?
4. What staff is employed on this property?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. Trans-Canada Air Lines does not own any property at Gander, Newfoundland, but does own radio and aircraft servicing equipment at that point as well as certain office furniture and furnishings in buildings rented from the R.C.A.F. used as offices and for accommodation of passengers.

2. Total value of this equipment is $45,809.83.
3. Answered by No. 1.
4. Total T.C.A. staff at Gander consists of twelve men.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES—TORBAY, NFLD.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Has the T.C.A. property at Torbay, Newfoundland?
2. If so, what expenditures have been made on this property?
3. What staff is employed on this property?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. Trans-Canada Air Lines does not own any property at Torbay, Newfoundland, but does own radio and aircraft servicing equipment at that point as well as certain office furniture.

2. Total value of this equipment is $8,493.37.
3. Total T.C.A. staff at Torbay consists of fourteen men.

RED DEER, ALTA., DOMINION GOVERNMENT OFFICE SPACE

Mr. SHAW:

1. What is the total annual amount of rent paid by the government of Canada for buildings and/or office space rented for government use in the city of Red Deer, Alberta?
2. From whom are the properties rented and what is the amount of rent paid in each case?
3. What use is made of the space thus rented?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull):

Premises	Lessor	Occupants	Annual Rental
Space on second floor of Snell block, Gaetz ave.	Harold J. Snell	Department of Veterans Affairs	$3,216
Two-room suite in Metro block, Gaetz ave.	Dr. F. E. Dodds	Wartime Prices and Trade Board	360
Adjoining office on second floor of Metro block, Gaetz ave	Dr. F. E. Dodds	Wartime Prices and Trade Board	300
Three-room suite on second floor of Metro block, Gaetz ave	Dr. F. E. Dodds	Unemployment Insurance Commission	660
Total			$4,536

Questions

The lease of the three-room suite in the Metro block for the accommodation of the unemployment insurance commission expires on May 9, 1945. The unemployment insurance commission has advised that this space is not suitable and requested that larger quarters be provided. To meet their present requirements, authority has been given to lease space in the Snell block, Gaetz avenue, at an annual rental of $2,280, fixed by the rentals administrator.

PREFABRICATED HOUSES—LIVERPOOL, N.S.

Mr. GILLIS:

1. What was the total cost of building prefabricated houses at Liverpool, Nova Scotia?
2. What was the unit cost of building prefabricated houses at Liverpool, Nova Scotia?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1.	Cost of land and land improvements for 75 houses .....	$112,716 25
	Cost of construction of 50 houses .....	152,968 82
	Cost of equipment (stoves, etc.) .....	3,619 46
	Total .....	$269,304 53

Type H3 & H4 28 houses average cost .....	$ 2,855 00
Type H13 & H14 15 houses average cost .....	3,491 00
Type H21 & H22 7 houses average cost .....	2,952 00
Total .....	$152,969 99

(Without services or land)

NOTE: It was originally intended that 75 houses be built at Liverpool. After construction had been started, industry advised that instead of 75 houses, 50 only would be required. In the meantime the underground work had been completed. The building material for the extra 25 houses was then shipped to Halifax and is now being erected there.

CLARE SHIPBUILDING COMPANY,
METEGHAN, N.S.

Mr. GILLIS:

1. What equity has the Canadian government in the Clare Ship Building Company in their plant at Meteghan, Nova Scotia?
2. What was the value of land and building expropriated for construction?
3. What was the total cost of dredging and for building of the docks?
4. What was the marine railway expenditure?
5. What was the value of lend-lease equipment and the conditions of contracting?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. $51,161, which includes $46,661 paid to private property owners for expropriation of lands, and $4,500 fire fighting equipment.

[Mr. A. Fournier.]

2. $46,661 paid to private property owners. No evaluation has been made or funds paid for property expropriated from the Province of Nova Scotia and the Clare Ship Building Company.

3. The cost of dredging alongside of and extension to the government public wharf was $78,965.01. No new dock was built.

4. There was no expenditure by the Canadian government for a marine railway.

5. Nil.

FISHERIES DEPARTMENT—OFFICES IN SYDNEY, N.S.

Mr. GILLIS:

1. Has the Department of Fisheries an office in Sydney, Nova Scotia?
2. If so, where is it located, giving street, address, and so on?
3. From whom is it rented?
4. What rental is paid per annum?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull):

1. Yes.
2. Three offices on second floor of Masonic building, 4 Dorchester street.
3. John MacNeil, K.C.
4. $498 per annum.

ALASKA HIGHWAY—HAINES CUT-OFF

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

1. Why was the road built by the United States from Haines, Alaska, to connect with the Alaska highway abandoned?
2. Will the government undertake opening and maintaining that road as a highway from tidewater into Yukon, or even that portion of it within Canada connecting with Whitehorse, Yukon, for use in developing the valuable Canadian mineral deposits served by it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. The government has received no notification from the United States government of any decision to abandon the road.
2. This is a matter requiring consideration by the government on which no statement can be made at present.

NOVA SCOTIA AND PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND REGIMENT

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. What was the embarkation strength of the Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island regiment (North Novas)?
2. How many reinforcements have been assigned to this regiment since it went overseas?
3. How many casualties have been reported in this regiment since embarkation?
4. How many have been casualties for two or more times?
5. How many have been reported as fatal casualties or missing?
6. How many have been reported as prisoners of war?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have already spoken to the hon. member who asked this question. Most of the information asked for is considered to be such as it is not in the public interest or in the interest of security to give publicity; I may be able to give some of it privately. I therefore ask that the question be dropped.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

CANOL PROJECT

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

1. In view of the public announcement that the Canol project in Yukon and Northwest Territories will close down June 30, next, will the agreement between the governments of Canada and the United States of America be carried out, namely, that a valuation of the project be made and the government of Canada given a three months option to purchase it at the appraised value?

2. Will the government of Canada purchase the property and continue it in operation for the development of Yukon and northern British Columbia?

3. Has the government considered and discussed with the governments of the United States of America, of Alaska and of British Columbia the advisability of jointly operating the project for the development and benefit of Yukon, Alaska and northern British Columbia?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. The agreement referred to between the Canadian and United States governments continues to be in effect.

2. This is a matter to which careful consideration will continue to be given by the government. No definite information can be given at present.

3. No such discussions have taken place although there have been general discussions with the United States government about the future of the project.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—DRUMMONDVILLE DISTURBANCES

Mr. CHOQUETTE:

1. Has an investigation been made into the Drummondville incident which occurred on February 24 last?

2. Who made the investigation, and has a report been submitted to the Minister of Justice?

3. Has the Minister of Justice ordered an investigation?

4. Is it the intention of the Minister of Justice to give instructions to that effect?

5. Was Inspector Zaneth, of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, authorized to give advance information to certain newspapermen about the raid that was to take place at Drummondville on February 24 last?

6. If so, who authorized him?

7. Were proceedings taken against such inspector?

8. Is it the intention of the government to take such proceedings?

9. What is the country of origin of Inspector Zaneth?

10. What is his racial origin?

11. When did he enter Canada?

12. Has he been naturalized? If so, on what date?

13. How long has he been a member of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

14. Does Inspector Zaneth speak French and English fluently?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. Yes.

2. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Yes.

3. Answered by No. 2.

4. Answered by No. 2.

VOTING OF WIVES OF ARMED FORCES

Mr. HATFIELD:

Will there be any provision in the election act to entitle the wives of members of the armed forces to vote who have not resided in Canada a full year previous to the date of the election?

Mr. McLARTY: No.

WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD—PERMITS FOR MAKING OF DOUBLE-BREADED COATS

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Has the wartime prices and trade board or the controller of men's clothing issued any permits for the making of double-breasted coats?

2. If so, to whom were the permits issued?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Yes.

2. Permits for the making of double-breasted coats were issued in the following instances:

(a) In cases of physical deformity.

(b) In cases where special physical measurements of the individual require a double-breasted coat, such as extreme oversize or excessive corpulence.

(c) Members and staffs of diplomatic corps, or others enjoying diplomatic immunity.

(d) Firemen, railway conductors, trainmen, etc., (in each of these cases it is understood that double-breasted coats are permitted when vests are not worn with the uniform).

(e) Upon presentation of a doctor's certificate testifying to the need of a double-breasted garment in the case of special illness.

Questions

TORONTO SHIPBUILDING PLANT

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the government decided to close the shipbuilding plant located at the Toronto harbour improvements at Fleet street and Spadina avenue after war contracts are completed?

2. Will this plant be put to other civilian uses for shipbuilding, (a) during the present war; (b) after the war?

3. What action has or will be taken in the matter?

4. Has the government received any communications on this subject from the city of Toronto or other public bodies?

Mr. CHEVRIER: This shipyard was built to meet a wartime emergency and is owned by the government. It is now engaged in building minesweepers for United Kingdom

VETERAN'S LAND SETTLEMENT—QU'APPELLE CONSTITUENCY

Mr. PERLEY:

1. How many farms have been purchased in the Qu'Appelle constituency to be used for the establishment of returned men, and from whom were such farms purchased?

2. What was the amount paid per acre?

3. How many options have been taken on farm properties?

4. How many returned men have been established or settled on farms in Qu'Appelle constituency to date?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre):

As at February 28, 1945.

While the property records do not take constituency boundaries into account, in this instance it is possible to supply the information in the desired form.

1. Eleven. M. E. Wilde, F. Horsley, Director of Soldier Settlement, F. O. Callin, Mrs. M. D. Woodward, Canadian Bank of Com-account. It is not known now what action will be taken when present contracts are completed. Correspondence has been exchanged between the city of Toronto and the department with regard to the use to which the plant can be put when present contracts are completed.

EXPORTS, 1939-44

Mr. HANSELL:

1. What are the totals of Canada's exports for the years 1939 to 1944 inclusive, to the following countries, (a) the United Kingdom; (b) United States; (c) Australia; (d) Argentina; (e) Spain; (f) Russia?

2. What are the total imports for the same years from each of the above mentioned countries?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

merce, Director of Soldier Settlement, Mrs. M. Murton, C. H. Murton, Schupp Estate, G. W. Prior.

2. $11.10, inclusive of existing improvements.

3. It is not the policy of the administration to take options. Forty-six farm properties have been approved for purchase in the Regina regional area, which includes Qu'Appelle constituency, but the transactions have not yet been completed.

POWELL RIVER WHARF

Mr. CRUICKSHANK:

1. Has the Powell river wharf been sold, if so, what provision has been made for fishing boats and other small craft?

2. Have satisfactory temporary floats been provided?

3. What will be done to assist any boat owners who have lost their boats while docked at the temporary floats?

4. If any further boats are lost will the government replace them?

5. How long will it be before the new Westview wharf is completed?

6. Are the present approaches to the temporary floats considered safe?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull):

1. (a) Yes; (b) The sale is subject to the condition that the company shall give proper accommodation at its own wharf to the present traffic at Powell River, until such time as suitable wharfage facilities have been provided by the crown for the use of the public at Westview.

2. Temporary floats have been provided, but department is urging improvements in such.

3. Matter under investigation.

4. Answered by No. 3.

5. December, 1945.

6. Matter now being investigated.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON PRISON REFORM

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What clauses of the royal commission on prison reform have been put into effect, and when?

2. Has any effort been made to establish the Borstal system in Canada?

3. Why has it not been acted on, and is it the cost of the same that prevents any action?

4. What action, if any, will be taken in pursuance of the remarks of the Honourable Chief Justice R. S. Robertson, of the court of appeal, Toronto, before the local council of women, in Toronto, yesterday, March 28, 1945, to the effect that "the methods used are a relic of fifty years ago," and the sentences shocked the court?

5. Is the intention to instal the Borstal system in 1945, on the lines of that established in England twenty-five years ago?

6. Will an opportunity be given to deal with this matter before this session concludes?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. See list attached to return tabled the 18th April, 1944, in answer to question by Mr. Church dated the 9th March, 1944, as shown on Hansard, page 1303. In addition to the recommendations contained in the said list, the following have been implemented since April 1, 1944:

(1) More powers given to wardens and classification board respecting dissociation of convicts.

(2) More diversions for convicts approved of.

(3) Basic increase of salaries under $2,100 has been granted, effective April 1, 1945.

(4) Uniform of certain officers is now being made of the same material as that used for superior officers' uniform.

(5) Free movement exercises have been extended over a much longer period.

(6) Smoking is now permitted during physical exercise periods.

2. The matter has been under consideration. See answer to question 1 of the said return, tabled the 18th April, 1944.

3. See answer to question 2 hereof and statement by Minister of Justice on July 21, 1944, as reported in Hansard at page 5241, which stresses two reasons in addition to costs, namely, (a) the constitutional question involved owing to penitentiaries being under dominion jurisdiction and other prisons under provincial jurisdiction, and the necessity to have a general system applicable to all those condemned to detention, and (b) the difficulty of getting suitable personnel during the war.

4. None at present by the Department of Justice. It would appear that the institution specially referred to is under provincial jurisdiction. See answer to question 3 hereof.

5. No. See answers to questions 2 and 3 hereof.

6. No provision has been made to allot special time for this matter at this session.

GENERAL MCNAUGHTON

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

1. Has General Andrew McNaughton at any time been granted superannuation or retiring allowance from the federal treasury?

2. If so, what amount annually and when was it paid?

3. At what date and on what basis was said superannuation or retiring allowance granted?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. No.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

FORT NORMAN OIL WELLS

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

Is the army of the United States of America discontinuing the following activities now being carried on by it in Yukon and Northwest Territories through the agency of Standard Oil Company?

1. The extraction of oil from wells at Fort Norman in the Northwest Territories?
2. The piping of oil from said wells to a refinery at Whitehorse, Yukon?
3. The operation of said oil refinery?
4. The piping of gasoline from said refinery to Fairbanks, Alaska, and to Watson Lake, Yukon?
5. If so discontinued, will the government of Canada undertake to continue the production of oil and oil products for the use and benefit of industries and residents of northern Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1, 2, 3 and 4. According to information received from the United States government the answer to these questions is in the affirmative.

5. There are many factors involved in any such decision and these are at present under examination. Any decision with regard to the future use of wartime installations will, of course, not necessarily affect the continuation of commercial oil operations centred at Fort Norman.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

WAR ASSETS CORPORATION—AIR FORCE BOOTS

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Has the War Assets Corporation sold any air force boots?
2. If so, to what firms were they sold?
3. How many pairs were sold?
4. At what price were they sold per pair?

THOMPSON MACHINERY COMPANY, LIVERPOOL, NOVA SCOTIA

M. GILLIS:

1. What equity has the Canadian government in the Thompson Machinery Company located at Liverpool, Nova Scotia?
2. What depreciation of excess profits was allowed this company to cover wartime construction and garage installations at Liverpool, Nova Scotia?

BEEF

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

1. What quantities of beef have been shipped to, (a) United States; (b) Great Britain, in each year since 1940?
2. What is Canada's home consumption of beef in each year since 1940?
3. What was the cattle population of Canada as on January 1 for each year since 1940?

[Mr. I. A. Mackenzie.]

4. Has there been any request for Canada to ship (a) beef; (b) cattle, to the United States or Great Britain?

5. What quantities of beef have been shipped to other countries in 1944?

WARTIME INFORMATION BOARD—SPEAKERS

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Have speakers been engaged by the wartime information board to speak in Canada, the United States or elsewhere?
2. If so, in what places did they speak?
3. Who were the speakers in each place?
4. Did they receive any money for speaking? In (a) fees; (b) travelling expenses?
5. If so, what speakers received money?
6. What was the amount of each payment?

CANADIAN NATIONAL EXHIBITION GROUNDS, TORONTO

Mr. CHURCH:

1. How many soldiers are housed at the Canadian national exhibition grounds, Toronto, and from what active units?
2. Will this property be given back to the city as soon as possible?
3. What buildings are being used for demobilization purposes?
4. What amount has been spent by the government on the above property since the war started; were tenders called for such work, and what amount has been spent on repairs, renovations and new additions to buildings?
5. What department made such repairs and who was in charge of same for the government?
6. Was this camp used for Toronto soldiers or those from units from all parts of Canada?
7. Have any requests been received from the Canadian national exhibition or the city to terminate the existing lease when the navy move to their new barracks and the R.C.A.F. to Trenton?
8. How many soldiers housed at the above grounds will be going overseas (active), and how many are of the home guard, on administrative work or district depot work?

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—PRESS AND PUBLIC RELATIONS OFFICERS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Does the rule for members of the forces, that they must not write to the newspapers or speak at public meetings apply, (a) to press liaison officers; (b) to public relations officers and publicity department officers of all classes?
2. Do these various officials wear uniforms; are they part of the military establishment and, if so, what rank?
3. What are their travelling hotel and all other expenses and allowances since the war started?
4. What officers or officials in No. 2 district have delivered public speeches in Toronto, offending the said city, and what are their salaries, emoluments and travelling expenses since the war started?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

EMPIRE PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

Mr. LACOMBE:

For an itemized statement showing the amounts paid, the names of the persons to whom they were paid, by the Empire Parliamentary Association, on account of the government grant of $25,000 for the conference held in Ottawa in 1943.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION—
RENTAL OF PREMISES IN REGINA

Mr. KNOWLES:

For a copy of maximum rental decision No. S1-20-6915, dated September 8, 1944, giving the approval of the rentals administration of the wartime prices and trade board to an increase in the rental for certain premises rented for the unemployment insurance commission, from the Bank of Montreal, in the city of Regina.

PEMBINA, ALTA., FLOOD CONDITIONS-

Mr. KUHLE:

For a copy of all correspondence and all other documents passed between the government or any department thereof and the government of the province of Alberta from April, 1944, to the present date, concerning the Pembina valley flood situation in the province of Alberta.

RADIO BROADCASTING

QUESTION AS TO ISSUE OF LICENCES FOR NEW STATIONS IN SASKATCHEWAN AND ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National War Services. During the holidays I was in Saskatchewan and I found that in that province applications for sales of shares of companies to operate new radio stations at Prince Albert and Gravelbourg, Saskatchewan, are being asked for. I am informed that a similar campaign is going on in Alberta. The other day I directed a question regarding this matter to the Minister of Munitions and Supply, and now I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National War Services. Has the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation made any recommendation to the minister regarding the issue of licences for the operation of new radio stations at the places I have named, and before such licences are issued are the public to have an opportunity to make representations as to whether or not licences should be issued in those provinces?

Hon. L. R. LaFLECHE (Minister of National War Services): I have great pleasure in confirming what my colleague the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) said the other day, that the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has not recommended the issue of licences for stations at Prince Albert, Gravelbourg and Edmonton. I trust that my reassurance will be accepted by my hon. friend. As to persons having an opportunity to make known to the board of governors their views on the matter, anyone who wishes to communicate with them may do so. Certainly if my hon. friend has something to say he has every right to communicate with the board.

COMMODITY SUPPLIES

CONTRACTS WITH BRITAIN—QUESTION AS TO RESUMPTION OF MEAT RATIONING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Has the Minister of Agriculture, on behalf of the government, signed an agreement with the British authorities for the provision of additional amounts of meat and other farm products during the coming year? If so, will this involve the reintroduction of meat rationing in Canada and, if so, at what date will this be made effective?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Yesterday Colonel Llewellyn, the British minister of food, and I signed three contracts. The first was for the delivery of all possible quantities of bacon and ham for the year 1946. A contract is in existence now for the delivery of all possible bacon and ham for 1945. We also signed a contract for the delivery of all possible quantities of beef to Great Britain during 1946. A contract is in existence already for 1945 providing for a minimum quantity of fifty million pounds of beef. A maximum quantity is also set out in the contract, but there is on file a cable received from the British ministry of food last summer indicating that they were prepared to take under that contract all the beef they could obtain from Canada, so that in effect there is no maximum quantity under the contract for beef for 1945. The other contract which was signed yesterday covers eggs, and is for quantities somewhat greater than we delivered last year; but the British are prepared to accept even greater quantities of eggs than are covered by the contract if it is possible for us to ship them.

The second question has to do with government policy, and the matter is still under consideration.

Mr. SENN: Would the minister inform the house whether there is anything in the contracts with regard to the prices to be realized for these various commodities.

Mr. GARDINER: The price of bacon and ham is the same price that has been in the contract for the last two years, 1944 and 1945. The price for beef is the same as in the contract for 1945.

Mr. SENN: What about eggs?

Mr. GARDINER: The price for eggs is on a little different basis, because a considerable proportion of the eggs going this year are shelled eggs as against dried eggs last year; but the prices are approximately the same.

PRODUCTION BONUS ON HOGS

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Is the minister aware that there will be a very considerable decrease in the production of hogs in western Canada? Only to-day I had a letter from one farmer who raised two hundred and fifty hogs last year and who will not raise more than one hundred this year. The farmers are concerned about the bonus paid on A-1 and B-1 grades of hogs. Will the minister say whether he is considering increasing the bonus to what it was before it was reduced last year, and making it uniform throughout Canada, in order to encourage the production of hogs this year?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not know that I can give any definite information with regard to the production of hogs, except as it is shown in the figures with regard to marketing, but the present position in regard to the marketing of hogs is that deliveries to date this year, together with estimated deliveries for the remainder of the year, would indicate the marketing of about the same number of hogs in 1945 as were marketed in 1943. It is true that marketings were very considerably higher in 1944, and as compared with last year our marketings will be down this year.

The question of the payment of higher premiums has to be considered in the light of what has been done elsewhere. It is true that the legislature of the province of Saskatchewan passed a resolution asking that these premiums be increased to $5 on a grade A hog and I think $3 on a grade B, and the legislature of the province of Alberta has either passed or is considering a similar resolution. I have replied to persons writing from both these provinces saying that at the present time we are paying a premium of $3 on a grade A and $2 on a B-1 hog, and that this premium applies right across Canada. Ontario is paying an additional premium of one dollar on A's and 50 cents on B-1's and each of the other provinces, from Ontario to the Atlantic, is giving some additional assistance over and above that given by the federal government in order to induce greater production of hogs. I have suggested to those writing from both provinces that I do not know of any reason why they should not do the same thing, and I have based that on the experience we have had with other provinces. Cheese was the first product considered from that point of view. Most of the cheese is produced in Ontario and Quebec, and when we were asked to increase the premium on cheese all across Canada we pointed out that to do so would probably bring into competition with the natural cheese producers of Canada, cheese producers in other areas. Therefore we said that if these provinces desired to have a higher premium and consequently greater production they ought to pay the premium and they have done so.

The same has happened in connection with hogs, as I have indicated. A proposal has been made that we should guarantee prices of potatoes. We have made the same type of statement in that regard, that to do so might interfere with production and with marketing in certain areas. All I have to say with regard to the resolutions passed in the province is that they have it in their power to put an additional premium on hogs if they so desire.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Is the minister sure of the fact that it is uniform across Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: It is uniform as far as we are concerned. We pay $3 for A hogs and $2 for B-1 hogs anywhere in Canada.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CONDITIONS IN LARGE CENTRES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): I should like to give notice of a question I wish to ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply; I regret that I have not had the opportunity to send him formal notice. Will he give consideration to making a statement with regard to housing conditions in the large centres of population, particularly having in mind the representations made to him on behalf of the large metropolitan area of Toronto, for those who find themselves without proper housing accommodation and who feel that the responsibility for the lack of this accommodation is perhaps partly a federal matter? I would ask the minister to consider giving a statement before the house rises.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I must advise my hon. friend that responsibility for housing rests with the Department of Finance. My own responsibility is limited to providing housing for war workers, though that has been extended at times to meet emergent conditions.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Then may I ask the indulgence of the house to make it a joint question to the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Munitions and Supply.

POSITION OF OCCUPANTS OF WARTIME HOUSES

Mr. N. J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln) I should like to supplement what the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) has just said. I wonder if a statement could be made in the near future advising the people who are now in wartime houses what their position will be.

They are very much concerned now particularly since we have been getting good war news; they are afraid something may develop that will be detrimental to them, and I think it would be only fair to let them know what their position will be.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 3, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

STATEMENT AS TO SERVICE OF CANADIAN FORCES AFTER VICTORY IN EUROPE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Before the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services proceeds in committee I would ask hon. members to allow me to make a brief general statement which is applicable to the forces in all the services. The statement will, I think, facilitate discussion in the committee in reference to all the services.

With the war in Europe progressing towards a satisfactory conclusion, it is opportune that I should outline briefly the further service which may be required from our Canadian sea, land and air forces under the circumstances which will exist when victory in Europe has been achieved, and in particular that I should indicate the part which it is proposed Canada thereafter will undertake in the war against Japan.

In Europe it is necessary not only to secure complete victory, but that achievement must be confirmed, and the continued maintenance of peace assured. Where needed, after the cessation of military operations, the inter-allied army will continue in occupation of Germany. The size of this force has been set to give continuing assurance that Germany will not be able to resist or evade the settlement which will be imposed on her.

The burden of maintaining this force will be shared among the allies and all will be appropriately represented.

From time to time, as progress is made, and as considerations of safety and security permit, reductions will be made in the size of this army of occupation.

The quota which Canada has undertaken to maintain is modest having regard to our resources and to our direct interest in the maintaining and safeguarding of the peace of the world.

Immediately following the cessation of hostilities in northwest Europe, progressive reduction in the numbers of our soldiers and airmen overseas will commence. This will proceed at the maximum rate which is possible with available shipping. The world supply of ships is very limited and these have to be shared to meet the needs of all. It is therefore to be expected that some time must elapse before our forces can be reduced to the small continuing quota required in the allied forces for the occupation of Germany.

As hon. members of the house are aware, the Canadian navy has been deployed primarily to assist in the maintenance of the security of the shipping routes in the north Atlantic. As stated last night by the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services, these requirements will continue for some time and are a first charge on our capacity.

It has been the policy of the allies up to the present to concentrate against Germany all the forces which could be employed there.

As matters have worked out, the United States with forces which they have had available have been able to develop a tremendous assault against Japan. Recently a British naval force has joined the United States fleet in the Japanese theatre.

In Canada these plans have meant that, excepting the expeditions to Hong Kong and the Aleutians, practically the whole of our military effort has been applied in the war in Europe. In consequence the question of our participation in the further efforts which must be made in the east has had to be left for final decision until the time approached when we would be free to turn our attention to that theatre.

The Pacific is a region of vast distances. Transportation which was a difficult problem in Europe and a limiting factor on all our operations, will be even more difficult in that theatre. This of itself strictly limits the size of the forces which can be employed with advantage. Canada's effort to maintain her just part in the further prosecution of the war against Japan will, as measured in numbers, necessarily be very much less than has been the case in the war in Europe. These considerations are most important in respect of the contribution of the Canadian army, but they also apply to the Canadian navy and to the Canadian air force.

There will, on the other hand, be a continuing need for great supplies of munitions and other equipment of special types, many of which have been invented and developed by Canadian engineers and specialists, and in some of which Canada is the only source of supply.

There is not only a continuing need for everything we have done in the production of foodstuffs to help feed the United Kingdom and the armed forces, but this requirement has been very greatly increased by the needs of the liberated peoples of Europe.

Apart from all else, it is to our interests to help in every way the reestablishment of the peoples who have been broken in war. They have borne the shock which otherwise might have come to us in our own homeland. We must give them every assistance we can. What we do will be returned in ample measure when, in the years to come, we are again able to enjoy normal peaceful relations and renew our trade with them.

The general considerations which I have indicated require that, with the cessation of hostilities in Europe, we shall have to turn our efforts to a considerable extent from the operation of our armed forces to the maintenance of our war industry, and to the development of our contribution in foodstuffs, materials for reconstruction, relief and rehabilitation. There will be ample work to do in Canada for all whom it will be possible to demobilize: work of immediate importance and pressing need, both for the future conduct of the war and for the reconstruction and development of our own internal economy.

The Minister of Finance in introducing yesterday the resolution which is now before the house, was careful to point out that it will be a new parliament, newly elected by the people of Canada, which will be responsible for supervising the affairs of this country and prosecuting Canada's war effort during at least the major part of the present fiscal year. The minister said, as reported on page 366 of Hansard:

It will be a government, responsible to that new parliament, which should have at least the major responsibility for formulating not only the nature and extent of Canada's continued war effort during that period but also the financial policies and programmes necessary to carry on that war effort. Therefore it did not seem appropriate that the government at this stage should bring down plans for the new fiscal year as a whole, or do anything that might appear to commit the next parliament to a precise and definite programme covering the period for which it alone will have jurisdiction. On the contrary, all considerations seemed to point to the desirability of limiting our actions regarding war financial programmes in this parliament to the granting of an appropriation intended only to cover the period up to the time when the next parliament can take over, and further to the desirability of not embarking on any major changes in policy at this time.

Speaking of Canada's share with the allied forces in the war against Japan, the Minister of Finance added, on page 367:

... there are necessarily still many uncertainties as to the nature and course of the war in the far east and the share which we can most effectively take in bringing it to an end. Providentially, the course of developments in that theatre of war during recent months has outrun the expectations of most of us, and it would appear at least to a layman that the forces of our allies under General McArthur are considerably ahead of their schedule.

While it is true that it is impossible to predict with accuracy the nature and course of the war in the far east or to decide at present on the part which Canada can most effectively take in helping to bring to an end the war against Japan, the nature of Canadian participation has been constantly kept in mind by the government, and has been given most careful consideration over a considerable period of time. The question is one immediately related to the over-all plans of the allies and to combined strategy in the far east. It is not possible, therefore, at the present time to do more than refer in general terms to what is contemplated. The determining factor, I need scarcely say, will be based on the needs of the situation as, from time to time, they may manifest themselves.

Prior to the Quebec conference of September, 1944, it was decided that on the conclusion of the war in Europe, Canada's participation should be effected in the operational theatres of more direct interest to Canada, namely, the north or central Pacific.

The matter was discussed in principle at Quebec. It was agreed at that time that the actual form and extent of the Canadian forces to be engaged could not be finally settled until the strategic situation, which will exist after European hostilities have terminated, could be assessed with greater accuracy, and that when that time came the appropriate Canadian contribution to the defeat of Japan would be determined with United Kingdom and United States authorities in the light of the situation then existing. All, therefore, that is possible at the moment is to describe the broad lines upon which it is intended that Canadian forces will participate in the Pacific.

It has been agreed, as already stated by the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services, that the Royal Canadian Navy will cooperate with the British Pacific fleet. This force will be built up in the Pacific as and when the situation in the north Atlantic permits.

As regards the army, it is proposed to provide a force to operate with the United States army. This force will be concentrated in Canada for reorganization and training prior to dispatch to the Pacific theatre of operations.

Squadrons of the Royal Canadian Air Force will take part in operations against Japan and Japanese held territories, in cooperation with the Royal Air Force.

These navy, army and air force contingents will be formed in part from personnel now serving abroad and in part from personnel now training in Canada. It is not intended to detail men for service in the Pacific. This applies to general service personnel as well as to all others. The men to make up whatever military force is to be employed against Japan will be chosen from those who elect to serve in the Pacific theatre.

No one serving in the European theatre will proceed to the Pacific without first having the opportunity of coming home. All personnel returning from abroad will be granted thirty day's disembarkation leave, in addition to any normal leave to which they may become entitled during their period of duty in Canada while the several forces are being reorganized.

It is still too soon to say when any final decision can be reached as to the relative contributions of the different services or to the numbers from any one service. The determining factors, as I have said, will be the actual need for and the probable effectiveness of the forces to be employed.

As the present parliament will have expired on the seventeenth of this month, it will be for the government responsible to the new parliament to determine not only the nature and extent of Canada's continuing war effort, but also the necessary financial policies and programmes. In these circumstances, the present administration has been careful not to do anything that might even appear to commit the next parliament to precise and definite programmes. In what I have stated of plans proposed, I have spoken only for the present government and of the programme and policies we intend to follow if again accorded the confidence of the people.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of the statement which he has just made. The Prime Minister referred to the changed situation which is apparent in Europe and spoke of the forces to be employed in the occupation of German and other territories. I should like to ask what will be the policy of the government with respect to the bringing back of members of our armed force. There has been talk from time to time of a policy of first in, first out. It does seem to me that the government ought to indicate what will be the broad principle adopted in that respect. For those who have borne the brunt and heat of battle over a long period of time it would seem to me that the government ought to have some word with respect to how soon alter the cessation of hostilities they may be able to come home to Canada to their loved ones.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am quite ready to answer any questions my hon. friend may ask, but I think it would be better if questions relating to the army should be answered by the parliamentary assistant who is acting for the Minister of National Defence. Similarly, questions relating to the naval services and air force respectively should be answered by the ministers of those departments. These are in part departmental matters, and I would prefer, if it is equally agreeable to hon. gentlemen opposite, that the ministers immediately directing those departments should make the replies.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is the Prime Minister able to undertake that that question will be answered by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have one other question which perhaps the Prime Minister himself may wish to answer, with respect to the raising of the Canadian forces for operations against Japan. I take it from the Prime Minister's language that the forces will not be raised on a compulsory or widely distributed basis across Canada, but will consist of those who are prepared to serve against Japan although they may have already borne the heat and brunt of the battle overseas in Europe. Would the Prime Minister indicate the government's policy in that respect?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend in his concluding words said that some would have to serve notwithstanding their having borne the brunt of the battle overseas in Europe. There will be no compulsion in connection with the service against Japan.

Mr. GRAYDON: My point was this. Somebody has to bear the brunt of the Japanese war, and I wanted to point out to the Prime Minister that under his policy it may be that those who have served in the heat of battle overseas in Europe may find that in order that the necessary forces may be raised they will have to volunteer and carry the battle against Japan also.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Only those who elect to serve will be the ones who will be included in the forces used against Japan.

Mr. GREEN: Is that same principle to apply to the men who will serve with the Canadian troops of occupation in occupied Germany?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not sure that I caught my hon. friend's question.

Mr. GREEN: Is the same principle to apply to the men who will serve in the Canadian Army occupying Germany after peace comes in Europe? The Prime Minister will realize that there will have to be continual replacements of men in that army, with new men going from Canada all the time. Is there to be compulsion in regard to those men?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not catch the full significance of my hon. friend's question when he began to speak.

Mr. GREEN: But the right hon. gentleman understands it now?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, but I would prefer that it be answered by the minister of the department immediately concerned rather than by myself at the moment.

Mr. ROWE: Would the Prime Minister care to say whether this means that the N.R.M.A. men will be the first to be demobilized?

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR NAVAL SERVICES

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry? When we adjourned last night we were considering the naval vote.

Mr. STIRLING: I think the minister was to give answers to certain questions that had been asked.

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): The hon. member for Yale asked first of all a question with regard to the preference granted by the civil service commission to persons who have served overseas. I would say to my hon. friend, though he probably knows it well, that the only civil service preference at the moment is to men who have actually served overseas. There is no preference under the Civil Service Act for men who have served in Canada only, even though they may have volunteered, as many of them have, for service anywhere. This matter has been under discussion for a considerable time by the three men—one in each of the defence services, one army man, one air force man, and one navy man—who have to do with the matter of demobilization. They have been giving a good deal of study to it, as have the heads of the personnel branches and the ministers of the three services. The matter is one that relates too, to the Department of Veterans Affairs. I can only say to my hon. friend that I shall be glad to continue these discussions with my colleagues, the heads of the two other services and with the Minister of Veterans Affairs, in the hope that we may arrive at some satisfactory solution.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. STIRLING: May I ask in that connection where does "overseas" begin? Ships which have served in the gulf of the St. Lawrence, around the immediate coasts of Canada, even as far up as the Hudson Bay strait, or Iceland—do men serving on those ships come within the category of those who have served overseas?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I cannot draw an exact geographical line, but there is a well-known definition of overseas service. Any ship in the high seas I think is taken to be a ship which is overseas.

My hon. friend also asked about demobilization leave, and pointed out that there was a difference in the leave granted by the three branches of the service. I wanted a little time to consider that question, because I was not too familiar with the practice in the other branches of the service. I find, as I would expect to find, that my hon. friend is quite right. There is a difference in the manner in which demobilization leave is granted to personnel of the different services. I am quite in agreement with my hon. friend that it should be put on a uniform basis, and that matter is under discussion by the personnel heads at this moment. I thank my hon. friend for bringing the matter to my attention.

My hon. friend also asked for some information as to the progress achieved by the demobilization and rehabilitation branch of the navy. We have an officer in the naval service known as the chief staff officer, reserves. He is a member of the naval board and of several other boards, and committees in the service, but one of his prime duties is to supervise rehabilitation. He has under him at headquarters a staff of seven officers and several ratings, also one officer in the United Kingdom who goes around the various ships and establishments there; also two officers on the west coast and five officers on the east coast, which includes of course the Newfoundland command. All these officers have been trained in their particular kind of work, and they have been going around for about a year now explaining to officers and ratings on the ships and elsewhere the terms of the rehabilitation programme and answering any questions that these officers or men wish to put to them. That work will be continued, and I am confident that the staff engaged in it will be enlarged so that every man who leaves the navy will have a chance to make himself thoroughly familiar, if he is not already familiar with the terms of the War Service Grants Act and the regulations made thereunder, and with any other information that might help him to rehabilitate himself back into civil life. I must point out that the naval services department is not responsible for the actual rehabilitation of its personnel. These are matters that come under the jurisdiction of the Department of Veterans Affairs and of the Department of Labour; but we are glad on a voluntary basis to assist, even in these respects, wherever we can.

Mr. STIRLING: Does the work of that branch cover the interests of the Women's Royal Canadian Naval service, also?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Yes. One of the rehabilitation officers I have mentioned—I forget her name—is a woman

Mr. MacNICOL: In his introductory remarks yesterday the minister, as reported on page 404 of Hansard, gave some very revealing figures as to the number of personnel from each of the provinces that enlisted in the Canadian navy. Coming from Ontario, I cannot help but feel proud of what this province has done. Of a total of 98,015 officers and ratings, Ontario sent 43,502. Ontario is removed from the sea a considerable distance, and the number of her people who enlisted in the naval services speaks well for her patriotic fervour. The figures also reveal a wonderful showing by the western provinces, which are removed a long distance from the sea. Manitoba enlisted in the navy 8,391, the fourth highest number among the provinces. Manitoba people may well be proud of the part their boys who are serving on our fighting ships have taken. The province is at least two thousand miles from the Atlantic and more than a thousand miles from the Pacific. It shows that boys born on the farms and in remote areas of the country do not lack patriotic enthusiasm for the navy. Alberta, which is not one of our most populous provinces enlisted 8,020, and may well be proud of the position it occupies in this respect. I have not figured out the percentage for each province; judged by that standard the results in some cases may be even more creditable. Saskatchewan, the province most largely engaged in agriculture, enlisted 6,967 officers and ratings. I cannot but feel, and my sentiments are shared, I am sure, by the minister, that the Navy League of Canada deserves a great deal of credit for the educational work it has carried on for years in season and out of season. It has excellent branches in Manitoba and in Saskatchewan; and while I am not so familiar with conditions in Alberta I believe there is a large branch there. Of all the ministers we have had at the head of the naval services, none has supported the navy league as strongly as the present minister of naval services has done. I have noticed the effects in Ontario.

Mr. BROOKS: We have only had one naval minister.

Mr. MacNICOL: My colleague says we have only had one naval minister; but we have had ministers of defence, and I still say that none of the ministers has supported the Navy League of Canada as well as has the present minister. Of the enlistments in Ontario, ratings constitute 42 per cent plus, and officers 36.7 per cent of the total for all Canada.

I wonder whether the minister has figures, which could be tabulated in much the same form as those he tabulated yesterday, of the number of ships produced in each of the provinces, giving, if possible in tonnages, the total produced in Ontario, where quite a number have been built, and also elsewhere. I do not know whether the minister could also furnish percentages.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I have not the figures with me at the moment, but I shall be very glad to get them for my hon. friend. There has been a very excellent production of ships in Ontario. My hon. friend knows the great yards in that province—at Toronto, of which mention was made yesterday; at Kingston, Collingwood, Midland, Port Arthur and so on, where they have produced a great many of the smaller type ships—and also what has been done in British Columbia. Some ships have been built in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and a good many along the St. Lawrence river. I can get the figures, and I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. REID: We all listened last evening to the speech of the minister for naval services, and I personally want to say to him that I think it is the finest speech he has made in the house. I was particularly interested in his statement that in 1941 the government considered post-war plans for the navy. Is that the only discussion or the latest discussion which the government has had as regards post-war plans for the navy? According to the minister's figures, last year 120 ships were added to the navy, which now possesses 370 ships. If the naval personnel is to be reduced to 9,000 it will mean that a great number of ships will have to be disposed of. I should like to know if a later discussion has taken place, and how it was possible at that time, in the light of world conditions, to make any forecasts of what the post-war navy should be. Could the minister enlighten members of the committee, particularly myself, as to whether we are going to have, following the end of the war, what is usually termed on this continent a two-ocean navy?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): My hon. friend has raised a very interesting question, and I shall answer him quite frankly by saying that there has been no change since 1941 in the estimate of the post-war navy. While the matter has been discussed, of course, at one time or another in a general way, the figure of 1941 still stands as the accepted figure for the moment. As to a two-ocean navy, the question was raised last night by an hon. member opposite, and I then expressed the hope, which I now repeat, that we shall have a navy of such size after the war as to permit of a reasonable number of ships on the west coast and on the east coast.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I had the privilege of visiting over the Easter week-end the naval hospital in Halifax. I should like to congratulate the minister upon his valuable recital, which enables one to appreciate more fully the contribution of the Canadian navy in the present conflict. Could the minister make a statement as to the plans which have been made to date regarding research into tropical diseases with a view to fighting in the Pacific?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Yes, I am glad to be able to tell my hon. friend that for a good many years we had the benefit of the experience in this line of a doctor, Surgeon Lieutenant Commander Little. I think he came from the city of Guelph, but he had practised medicine in the east, for some years in Formosa, and perhaps on certain parts of the Asiatic mainland. He was therefore very familiar with tropical diseases. He, along with other doctors in the naval service, has been giving attention to that very point since the outbreak of war with Japan. Considerable investigation has been done, consultations have been held with the doctors of the United States and elsewhere, and I think that the matter is well in hand.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Has the minister or his department considered granting to the boys who have been serving in Newfoundland service gratuity equal to that received by the boys who serve overseas or on the ocean? I ask that question because some of our boys are in Newfoundland and it is difficult for them to return to Canada on leave. It takes quite a time on the boat and one and a half days on the train. The boys are not any too comfortable there. It is not like Halifax or Esquimaux.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Apparently my hon. friend has looked into the matter. I suppose Newfoundland is not considered overseas. Western hemisphere means Newfoundland and therefore the men serving in Newfoundland would receive only the lower scale of gratuity. My hon. friend is quite right. I am bound to say to him that I have not given consideration to that particular matter. I assume he is dealing with the men who are on shore in Newfoundland, not at sea.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I brought it up last year. Take a man on a minesweeper. He is in and out of harbour but he is in harbour perhaps every night.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Well, I should think that would be different.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I do not know whether there has been a ruling on it; if there has not been, I think the minister should obtain one.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): To begin with, a man on a minesweeper would likely be away from port more than one day. These minesweepers often go away for days, weeks perhaps.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Some of them.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Without looking into it definitely I should think he would be entitled to the higher gratuity.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Some are away longer than one day, but I understand others are out only during the day and come back at night.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): If they go on the high seas that is definite. The War Service Grants Act refers to outside the territorial waters of Canada in a seagoing ship. If they are on that type of work it would certainly entitle them to gratuity at the higher scale, and I should think the fact that they are in harbour perhaps for a night would not bar them. I shall be glad to look into the point more fully.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Today an answer was brought down to a question of mine in regard to the new naval barracks on the south shore of St. John's harbour, Newfoundland. The answer indicates that these barracks are under admiralty account.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Yes.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Does that mean that the British admiralty has paid for them, or has the Canadian government paid for them?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): We hope that the British admiralty will pay some time. We have actually paid the contractors for all the buildings that have been built in St. John's, but it is charged up to the admiralty.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That would be on the north shore.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): No.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Avalon and at the naval dockyards.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Yes, and this is the same.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): It is charged to the admiralty.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Yes.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The minister expects that it will be repaid to Canada after the war?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I would rather my hon. friend put that question to the financial experts of the Department of Finance. There is a big account there. They will do the best they can with it. It amounts to a large sum.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Did the British Admiralty select the site for the barracks?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I am not sure about that point. I should think certainly they would be consulted because they were paying for the buildings. They at least had a voice in the matter; but the site was inevitable. I think on account of the purposes for which the buildings were to be put. The new machine shop and storehouses are on the south side of the harbour; consequently I think it would be necessary—certainly it would be desirable—to have the barracks near at hand.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): If any of the men get out of the barracks at night they are apt to fall right down in the harbour, the place is so extremely steep.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Yes, it requires some skill and sobriety to navigate there.

Mr. CARDIFF: In regard to the clothing allowance, I believe the order was changed last October 1 to $100. Do those who were discharged previously get any consideration in that respect?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): No; we did not make it retroactive. There has been a great deal of discussion back and forth, but it was finally decided we could not do it; at any rate we did not do it.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister said yesterday that one of the Canadian cruisers is already serving in the Pacific and another one will join her and possibly two flat-tops and certain other destroyers and other craft. Would he apply the statement that the Prime Minister made a little while ago to the navy and explain how it would work, for instance, with regard to the cruiser that is already serving the Pacific? The Prime Minister suggested we should turn to the three ministers of national defence for any elucidation of that statement. Would the minister describe in a little more detail how it will apply to one of His Majesty's ships of the Canadian navy? Did the officers and ship's company of that cruiser have the opportunity of stating whether or not they desired to serve in the Pacific? Will the companies of other ships that will be subsequently sent there be lined up and asked whether it is their wish to serve in the Pacific? A large number of those serving in our ships are Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve who signed on for the duration. How does that affect their disposition in whatever parts of the world it is desired that they should serve?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Let me take the last question first. The service is for the entire war including the war with Japan. Every man in the Canadian navy is liable for service anywhere until final peace is declared. Now let me take the cruiser that is in the Pacific. No question of the sort which my hon. friend raises arose in connection with that cruiser because the European war was still going on. I am sure any naval man would go wherever he was sent. The question raised by my hon. friend will come up when the European war is over and when some men undoubtedly will feel that they should return to civilian life. I anticipate no great difficulty in securing the number of volunteers necessary for the navy, bearing in mind the relation between the number proposed to be sent and the number now serving. Every man in the navy, of course, is a volunteer; there are no N.R.M.A. men in the navy.

Mr. STIRLING: That is so, and I follow the minister in regard to the ship that is already there. I take it from what he now says that when the European war is over the men on any craft subsequently sent to those waters will have to volunteer, but that those already serving in those waters will not even be asked whether they wish to continue, but will remain there.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): That ship has been in commission now for six months, and I should think that during the summer or fall, assuming the European war to be over, if some men on board the Uganda feel they should return home, we would allow them to do so if we felt that we could replace them. Perhaps I should not make that broad statement, but I should think very sympathetic consideration would be given any man on the Uganda who, having put in a year of service on that ship, and the European war being over, wished to return to civilian life. I think such a request would be very carefully and sympathetically dealt with.

Mr. STIRLING: Under those circumstances would the minister feel satisfied that if a considerable number of a ship's company were returned for those reasons, he could fill their places with volunteers?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Yes. That is what I will have to do, under the pronouncement that has been just made.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Has the minister any idea how many naval personnel have signed up for the Pacific war? I understand that a great number have done so.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): We have sent around a questionnaire to all our men, but we have not the complete returns in as yet. We have not asked them to sign up; we have asked them to indicate whether or not they are prepared to go to the Pacific. Our ships are so widely scattered that it is difficult to get the whole story.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): But have they not signed up?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): No. I suppose they may call it signing up; some of them have indicated a wish to go to the Pacific, while others have indicated a wish to be demobilized whenever the European war is over. But there has been no signing up.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Does the questionnaire also contain a question to this effect: "Do you wish to join the R.C.N.?" I have had letters from a number of the boys in which they say they have signed up for the Pacific war, while some say they have signed for the permanent navy.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Well, for some years we have been holding out the Canadian navy to these volunteer reserve and naval reserve people. We have been asking them. "Do you want to transfer to the permanent navy?" Some officers and some ratings have expressed that desire; and that goes on constantly. I cannot say that this particular question is on the questionnaire dealing with the Pacific war, nor am I sure there is a written questionnaire on that point. Certainly tests have been made and officers have been instructed to find out.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): There is no special recruiting for the Pacific war?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): No, there is no special drive or pressure or anything of that sort.

Mr. GREEN: Is it the intention that there shall be a special enlistment for the Pacific war? Will there be an enlistment to fight in the Pacific?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I doubt if "enlistment" is the correct word. Certainly those who have indicated a desire to go to the Pacific will be given the first preference for that theatre. That is true.

Mr. GREEN: If a man says on his questionnaire that he would like to serve in the Pacific, then he will go to the Pacific and will not be asked to sign anything else?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Well, his attestation carries him right through the Pacific war as well as the European war.

Mr. GREEN: So that in effect by answering "yes" on his questionnaire a man is signing on for service in the Pacific?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): If he is needed. There may be too many, of course. By means of that questionnaire we shall endeavour to get to the Pacific the men who want to go there. We feel that they will be happier and the ships will be happier. Our aim is to please.

Mr. GREEN: Then the men who have indicated a desire to go to the Pacific will not be asked to sign anything further; they will be sent automatically to fight in the Pacific?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): That is right.

Mr. LOCKHART: Have those who have gone already signed something in addition?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): No, not those who have gone already.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is apparent from the answers of the minister that the pronouncement made by the Prime Minister this afternoon, while of first magnitude as a matter of political importance, is going to be very difficult of application. As I see it, and apparently the minister agrees, the difficulty is as to how this announcement is going to be carried into practical effect. It is not a new thing, for I have before me a press clipping of November 1 last in which the announcement made this afternoon by the Prime Minister was predicted in almost complete detail. This press report goes on to point out, in its statement of expected policy, that all service men for the Pacific will be recruited on a voluntary basis and a month's leave in Canada will be given to those who have been on active service in other war areas.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): That is not an official statement, I take it?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No, Mr. Chairman, it was not official, but the gentleman who wrote it certainly had unusual powers of prevision, and did not miss very much in the conclusions at which he arrived in regard to what the announcement would contain. Is it correct, then, that before any of the members of the Canadian navy will serve in the Pacific, they will be brought home to Canada and given a month's leave?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): That is contained in the statement of the Prime Minister, and of course that is the policy.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: So that is the policy that has been arrived at. Then the statement says it is intended that those who serve in the Pacific shall be limited as far as possible to single men. I would ask the minister if any such policy has been arrived at in regard to the naval personnel who will serve in the Pacific.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I have heard nothing on that point. I do not think the Prime Minister made any statement as to that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Then what about an international force? There has been some reference recently in Washington to the effect that a major part of Canada's contribution to the security council will be made by the Canadian navy. I would ask the minister whether or not such a course has been determined upon.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): My hon. friend is entering into spheres that are beyond the navy. As a mere service minister, I may say that I do not think anything has been decided about the nature of this security force which may be formed after the war, but if there is to be a security force and if this country is to contribute, I should hope that the service which has acquitted itself so well would have some part in it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That will be all the questions I will ask in that regard. The Prime Minister said that all we had to do was to ask the ministers and the information would be forthcoming, and it is no criticism of the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services to say that apparently the announcement made to-day is as much a surprise to him as it has been to most of the other members of the house.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): No, it is a matter of government policy.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What I rose however to do was to ask the minister a few questions regarding opportunities that are available to ratings who have the necessary qualifications to secure commissions. In looking over the list at page 404 I find it indicates that while in certain provinces one-tenth of the personnel have the hope of receiving commissions, in other provinces only one-fortieth or onefiftieth have the same opportunity. While that might be understood in part by reason of the fact that some of these sailors have lived adjacent to the sea or have had certain training, I have a complaint which I bring to the minister's attention. This applies to men in the navy from the western provinces. They find on occasion that while they are recommended for commissions and have the necessary qualifications, their recommendations in many cases do not pass beyond the commanding officer of the ship to which they are attached. I would suggest that some arrangement be made whereby a rating is given the opportunity to be brought before one of the various boards by personal application and without the necessity of that application being approved by the commanding officer of the ship to which he is attached. I have in mind one or two young men who have been at sea for a considerable time. They have the necessary education and the ability as evidenced by the marks they received in their examinations, and yet they find it impossible to get their applications before the boards charged with the responsibility of determining their ability as prospective officers. I would ask the minister to outline in some detail the system at present in effect and also to make it easier for young men with ambition to advance themselves; because there is nothing more discouraging than for a young man with ability, who looks ahead to the day when promotion will come his way, to find that his applications for advancement, or for the opportunity of advancement, do not receive the consideration they deserve.

There is one other matter. What is the intention of the government with respect to the continuance of Canadian naval college? What I had in mind in that regard is this. There are many young men who would like to make the navy their career. What opportunity will be given a young man of that type to join the Royal Canadian Navy when the war is over? On what basis will the choice be made where there are more applicants than the number which it is expected will be in the navy after the war? Personally I think that every opportunity should be given on an equal basis for young men everywhere in the country to enlist in the service of the permanent force, and that all should be made to realize that their applications will receive identical consideration by the responsible boards.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): In answer to the first question, I may say that up to the last report I have, that is up to February 28 of this year, there were no fewer than 3,254 promotions from the lower deck to commission rank. That would be something more than forty per cent, or about forty per cent of the total officer personnel in the Canadian navy. I think it is difficult to find anywhere more satisfactory proof than that that promotion is open.

Dealing with individual cases, there may be of course some cases where boards make a mistake, or a commanding officer might make a mistake in his estimate of a rating's ability to hold a commission. I do not know of any way of preventing that. I have had perhaps more concern and worry over the findings of boards than over anything else I have had to deal with, but I know of no other way than to select the best officers available and put them on a board and abide by their findings. A great many parents feel, and it is a natural sentiment on their part, that their boys are worthy of commission and are fit for high rank in the navy, but that judgment is not always unbiased. I think that the officers on the boards do the best they can. It is true we require a man to have some recommendation from his commanding officer before he goes before the board. I do not think we could dispense with that; otherwise the boards would be required to sit all the time, to move around all the time, and it would be a cumbersome and almost impossible method.

If a rating feels that he has a grievance in any respect he is entitled to make it known, and theoretically at any rate it will be attended to. I doubt if any change in the system can be worked out at this date.

With regard to the number of officers from certain provinces being greater than from others in proportion to the number of ratings, that is undoubtedly the case. If anyone looks at the figures he will find that in certain provinces there are more officers in proportion to ratings than in others. I dealt with that last year and the year before, and explained it at length by the fact that in certain provinces at the beginning of the war there were a good many men trained in the mercantile marine either on the great lakes, on the rivers or on the Pacific and Atlantic oceans, and these men were available at once, and have been available ever since, to take commissions as officers and to take command on ships. Therefore these provinces have had a higher proportion of officers than the completely inland provinces such as Saskatchewan and Alberta where opportunities of that sort are not open to their citizens.

Mr. BROOKS: I understood the minister to say last night that there will be two aircraft carriers in the Pacific. Where will he get the crew? I understand that these carriers will require crews from the fleet air arm. Are we training these men in Canada or in Great Britain, or will they be withdrawn from those who are serving with the British forces?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Before I deal with that question I should like to apologize to the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) for not answering his question with regard to the naval college. It is my keen desire and one of my fondest hopes that the naval college will be continued after the war. Instruction at the college was discontinued for a period of nearly twenty years and one effect was that there was not the entry into the Royal Canadian Navy of nearly as many officers as would have been the case had the college continued. During that period it was necessary to send boys to the Royal Navy for training. While the training there was quite sufficient it was inevitable that we did not get so many who were willing to go to England as we would had we had a college establishment in this country. I am most hopeful that the college will continue after the war in its magnificent setting in British Columbia and with the splendid staff it now has to handle instruction and discipline.

In connection with entry into the college, the examinations are the same for all Canada. Every student, no matter in what province he may live, must write the same examination. The only change being made this year is that the questions are being printed in French for French-speaking students, but that does not constitute a fundamental difference in the means of testing their aptitude. I think the present system is fair. Each province gets a certain quota and after that it is open to the boys making the highest marks.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Do I understand the minister to say that the naval college is to be restored to Nova Scotia where it was located before it was discontinued? Certain branches of the naval college work have been carried on in that province in the last few years, and I believe the people take it for granted that the college will be restored to Nova Scotia where it properly belongs and where it was located before it was discontinued because of the calamity that overtook Halifax and resulted in the destruction of the college buildings.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Unfortunately the college buildings were destroyed as a result of the Halifax explosion, and the college had to seek a home in strange lands.

Mr. STIRLING: No.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): In other places. I think for a time they worked in connection with the Royal Military college at Kingston, and then they moved to Esquimalt. This is where the difficulty begins for the hon. member for Cumberland. When the college was discontinued its location was at Esquimalt, so Esquimalt has a certain claim through being the last place at which the college was located.

Then I am told that the climate in the winter time in that part of the country—I refuse to yield as far as the summer is concerned—is propitious to outdoor training and boat work and that sort of thing. Of course there will always be a considerable number of naval establishments in Nova Scotia. That is inevitable because of the position of that province on the great Atlantic and because of its unequalled harbour at Halifax. That province has had two hundred years of association with the naval life of this country and it is bound to continue as a great naval base.

With that in mind certain buildings which have been erected since the beginning of the war have been made permanent. As I indicated last night, while it may not be possible to establish two naval colleges in the country, and it may be that the naval college will continue in British Columbia, I would hope that there will be sufficient other naval activities in Nova Scotia more than to compensate for the loss of this educational institution. Nova Scotia has a great many educational institutions and perhaps we should operate this one in some other place.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): The British Navy never trained or earned its traditions in balmy seas such as the minister depicts as existing in British Columbia. The British Navy under Drake and Nelson, or Bruce Fraser in this present war, was not trained in seas like that. It was trained in the seas off the British coast, in the English channel, in the North sea off Scotland, and in the seas around Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. The minister has a deep interest in Nova Scotia and it is to him that the people of that province look to safeguard their interests. I cannot understand why this naval college should be stationed at a place where people from the prairies, from England and from all over the world go to retire in order that they may live in peace and sail their little sail-boats on the balmy seas. It is in the seas that touch Nova Scotia and the Atlantic coast that British sailors and Nova Scotia seamen have been trained. They have built up a history over hundreds of years, and every one associated with the British Navy or the Canadian Navy is proud of their traditions in the days of Drake, in the days of Nelson, in the days of Bruce Fraser and his associates in this war.

The people of Nova Scotia who have followed the sea have great traditions, they have great accomplishments and it will be with keen disappointment that they will learn that the naval college which was located in Nova Scotia is to be taken permanently from them and located beside the balmy seas of the Pacific coast.

There is very much more that I might say, Mr. Chairman, in this connection. I am going to make this statement, which I am sure the minister himself would like to make if he were free to do it, but he is not free. I am sorry I was not here yesterday when he made his statement to the committee, but it showed at the time the table was compiled an enlistment in the navy from Nova Scotia of 626 officers and 6,515 men, a total of 7,141, which is I believe the highest percentage of enlistments for any province of Canada. I have not calculated the figures for all the provinces, but I believe our enlistments in Nova Scotia are fifty per cent higher than the enlistments in Canada. I know that the minister is not free to speak for these men of Nova Scotia, but I am going to speak for them. I say that every one of these men who has voluntarily enlisted from the province of Nova Scotia is prepared to serve in any theatre of war until the war is over. They do not have to be asked to volunteer, because they are ready, aye ready, following the tradition of the British Navy. They do not wish it to go forth to our enemies the Japanese or to our friends and allies in the United States that they have to be coaxed to go into the Pacific to carry on the war against Japan. They are ready to a man, to serve their country and the British flag anywhere, and they will not be satisfied with the statement given to this house and the people of Canada and the people of the United States and all our allies to-day by the Prime Minister of Canada. I know that the minister, who has done well in giving leadership to the Canadian Navy is not satisfied with the statement that has gone forth to the world to-day from the Prime Minister. Again I say that every one of these men who has enlisted from the province of Nova Scotia is prepared to serve if duty calls him until the war is over—and let the enemy and our allies know it.

Mr. REID: We from the Pacific coast do not want to get into this breeze that has arisen in the house, but after listening to the last speaker the thought is in my mind that he might be wondering why the minister allowed the Canadian navy to go to the Pacific coast at all. Be that as it may, when you look at the figures given by the minister to the committee and realize that more men from British Columbia have enlisted in the navy than from all the three maritime provinces, if that does not merit some recognition for the Pacific coast, I do not know what will. I rather took it from the last speaker's remarks that the spirit of the British navy flourished only on the Atlantic coast. But the actual figures, I say, speak for themselves.

Mr. PURDY: The hon. member for Cumberland undertook too much when he undertook to speak for everyone in Nova Scotia. He represents only one constituency in that province, and if I wanted to be nasty I might say that he represents it by a minority vote. It is all very well for him to get up and say what Nova Scotia has done. We all know how well Nova Scotia has done in the matter of enlistments. But we are not in the habit of carrying our hearts on our sleeves. History will tell what Nova Scotia has done when the time comes to speak of that. The hon. member for Cumberland wants to send every Nova Scotian in the navy into the Pacific war against Japan. There is no question that they are ready to go, but I say that the boys from Nova Scotia who enlisted at seventeen and a half or eighteen years of age, not having completed their education, should have the opportunity to return to their schools and colleges when the war in Europe is over and only a partial contribution is required from Canada to carry on the war in the Pacific. They should be allowed to complete their education so as to be able to take their rightful places in this world as Nova Scotians and Canadians. The hon. member for Cumberland would send every one of those boys into the Pacific war.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): He did not say that; he said they would all be willing to go.

Mr. PURDY: Certainly, if needed, and I have said that too. But when we do not need them, I object to his trying to send every Nova Scotia boy into the Pacific war and keeping the rest out. We can do our share; we have done it many times; but our boys want a chance to rehabilitate themselves like the boys from the rest of Canada. The hon. member for Cumberland bit off more than he realized when he said that he would send them into the Pacific war.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I do not want to get into this Nova Scotia battle over the question of supplying man-power for the Pacific war. I want to bring another matter to the minister's attention. Young ratings now training at the naval schools have told me that they were interviewed and given the choice of either getting out of the naval service, and being drafted into the army, or signing up for the Pacific theatre of war. If that be so, it is simply carrying on the same man-power policy for the Pacific war that we have had through the N.R.M.A. These young chaps told me they would like to prepare themselves for civil life when the war in Europe is over, because many of them left high school or university to go into the service. We all know what takes place in connection with the N.R.M.A., how once you are in that army they endeavour to force you to volunteer to serve in an actual theatre of war, and these young chaps told me that rather than do that they preferred to continue in the navy and sign up for the Pacific war. I presume that what they told me was a statement of fact, and the minister can correct it if it is not so.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Surely there must have been some misapprehension on the part of these young men. I cannot understand a naval officer telling any number of men: You must get out of the navy or sign up for the Pacific war; because it is obvious, as the Prime Minister stated this afternoon and as we all know, that the naval requirements of the Pacific war will be very much less than that of the Atlantic war. So when the Atlantic war ends, a considerable number of men will have to be set in process of demobilization. It would seem impossible to say to a man: You have either to get out now or volunteer for the Pacific war. If that were said, I regret it, and I will take every step to investigate and see that no more of that happens. But I think that the young men must have been mistaken.

Mr. MAYHEW: How many men are there in the Royal Canadian naval service and how many Canadians have enlisted in the British navy?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): In connection with this dispute between the east and the west, I have here a comment which was made on one occasion by a very distinguished officer. He said we must always remember that we are a two-ocean country; therefore I am sure the hon. member for Cumberland would not want all the naval establishments to be in Nova Scotia. The second comment this officer made was that while it is true that cadets may do their schooling in British Columbia, they must get in a great deal of their sea time around Nova Scotia. So with that explanation I may perhaps leave the matter.

My hon. friend asked about the fleet air arm, whether we were training men for that service. As I explained yesterday, at the moment we are supplying the naval personnel while the British are supplying the fliers and the planes for the ships. But we have now trained or under training a total, officers and men, of 725, as air crew, engineers, and maintenance.

Mr. BROOKS: Where are they receiving their training?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Some of their training has been had in this country and some more of it in England. I believe that some of the mechanics can get trained here. The fliers do some training here and they complete it in England. They may do a little training of this sort in the United States; of that I am not sure, but the actual flying on and off the carriers would be done on the other side. I believe a great deal of the preliminary work might be done in this country; some of the mechanics' work can be done on this side.

Mr. BROOKS: Shall we make an effort to draw Canadians from the British fleet air arm?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Yes.

Mr. BROOKS: Or shall we have British fliers?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): As I pointed out yesterday, when we draw men from the British fleet air arm we believe that they will give us Canadians wherever they can be spared, feeling that that arrangement will work out better, because when you have Canadian fliers and Canadian sailors on the same ship there are no problems as to rates of pay and that sort of thing. I would point out that the number of men in training or now trained for the fleet air arm is more than would be required to man a ship; and that these, with other Canadians whom we may borrow from the British fleet air arm, would be able to take care quite adequately of these two carriers.

Mr. ROY: I should like to know from the minister if the Germans are still holding a piece of land in France on that section of the coast which includes Dunkirk, St. Nazaire and Bordeaux, and if so, whether they have some submarine bases in that section.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I believe they do hold Dunkirk and a little land in the vicinity, but I do not know that they have a submarine base there. They had some submarine bases further down the west coast, at St. Nazaire and Lorient and elsewhere, for a considerable time. I do not know whether the bases at St. Nazaire and Lorient still exist. Probably that area has been cleared.

Mr. ROY: I find it strange that the allies could have afforded to push back the Germans all over, from France, from Holland, from Belgium, and far into their own country, while they allow that little piece of land to be occupied by the Germans. That is a question a good many people are asking.

An hon. MEMBER: Ask Hitler that.

Mr. MITCHELL: Why don't you page the Bloc Populaire?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Those fellows are just a souvenir.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): It is a question of military strategy, and one for the army commanders, rather than for me, to answer. I should think they have thought of that matter. It may be that the number of men needed to reduce Dunkirk by direct assault would be fairly large. The last report I saw indicated that the Germans have some twelve thousand men in Dunkirk, so that the allies would have to detach a considerable force to take the city. It may be the fact, and I have no doubt it is, that they believe they can employ the men to better advantage in going ahead with their great drive, as they are doing now, and letting Dunkirk be taken care of in due time.

Mr. MAYHEW: I do not want to get into this Atlantic-Pacific dispute. I just want to say that I think the minister showed courage in placing the college at Royal Roads, and will show good judgment in letting it stay there. The minister said the other day that we have over ninety thousand men in the Canadian navy. How many of those are Royal Canadian Navy?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I am sorry I did not answer my hon. friend before. The number in the Royal Canadian Navy, officers and ratings, is 4,371. That is the permanent force strength.

Mr. MAYHEW: And you said the other day that you had approximately seven thousand in training at Deep Brook. How many have you at the present time at Esquimalt?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): At Naden and Givenchy there are altogether 2,700.

Mr. MAYHEW: Are those trainees?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): They are officers and ratings. Some of them, I suppose, would be trainees. I should think a great many would be staff. That brings up the question which was asked yesterday by the hon. member for St. John-Albert, who I am sorry is not here. He asked me about the number of men at Deep Brook—that is, Cornwallis. I may say I told him yesterday that the total number of persons at Deep Brook is approximately seven thousand: of these, 2,625 are staff, 4,167 are trainees; giving a total of 6,792. That is much larger than the number at Esquimalt. Since Cornwallis opened no fewer than 40,190 persons have received training of one kind or another there, training as officers, as officer candidates, as new entries, training in the accounting branch, in the women's branch, in gunnery, in mechanical arts—nearly 8,000 have received training in that field alone—training in the medical branch, in physical instruction and in other lines.

Mr. MAYHEW: In spite of the fact that the naval college was put at Victoria the minister has not been unmindful of the welfare of his own people. How many of the Canadian navy, both R.C.N. and R.C.N.V.R. are serving with the Royal Navy?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): The total I have here is 654. That has been very considerably reduced from what it was at one time when we had more than 2,000 serving there. That means on loan to the Royal Navy; it does not include certain people serving in motor torpedo boats and other craft where the crews are all Canadian. The figure of 654 would cover, I think, cases where there are a few Canadians on British ships, perhaps two or three officers for each ship. It does not take into account instances where the ship is all Canadian manned even though owned by the Royal Navy.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Last year and the year before I asked the minister what was being done with regard to getting out a Royal Canadian manual on seamanship. We are now using the British one, which is out of date.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I do not know that we have done anything on that. I think we print a great many books for the British. It may be that we print some of these manuals on seamanship for them, but I am not sure. We have not undertaken to write a new manual on seamanship. I doubt if it would be an undertaking in which we would wish to engage during the war, but that can be given attention at some other time.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I know that some of the boys have been buying for their own use Knight's "Manual on Seamanship", which is the United States manual and is right up to date, even just to a few months ago.

Mr. BRUCE: In the general review which the minister gave of the work of the navy, of which we are all very proud, I did not notice that he said anything about the Royal Canadian medical service and the work that it has done. Could the minister give us a list of the number of their hospitals and where they are located, the number of patients in each hospital, the number of cases suffering from wounds and the number suffering from sickness, the number of medical personnel and the number of nurses, the medical personnel afloat and those doing work in the hospitals ashore or in any other capacities ashore? If the minister has not the information available to-day perhaps he will give it to us on another occasion.

I should like to pay tribute to the work done in the Royal Canadian Naval Medical Service under the able direction of Surgeon Captain McCallum, who has performed outstanding work in organizing, developing and stimulating the work of that service. I should like also to pay a tribute to the work of Surgeon Captain Best, who has been responsible for some valuable contributions in research. May I mention one subject which not only will interest those who are serving in the navy but will be of equal value to those who go to sea later on. I refer to the work he has done in connection with seasickness, first, in investigating its cause and then in suggesting a remedy for the relief of this disagreeable malady. It will be interesting to learn the amount of work that has been accomplished by the Royal Canadian Naval Medical Service. If the minister cannot give us the record now, will he give it to us on some subsequent occasion?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I am sure that the head of the medical service, Surgeon Captain McCallum and all the others associated with him will appreciate most highly, as I do, the complimentary remarks of the hon. member for Parkdale, who himself was connected with the Canadian Army Medical Corps in the last war and who enjoys in his own profession a splendid reputation throughout the land. I cannot give him all the information, but I can give him some and I shall present the remainder at a later date.

There are in the Canadian navy now 407 doctors and 298 nurses. There are nine general hospitals and two convalescent hospitals. There are two in Newfoundland and one in Sydney. The hon. member for Cumberland must listen to this now. There is one hospital in Sydney, one in Halifax, a fine hospital, partly permanent and partly temporary, one in Shelburne, one at Cornwallis, a very fine hospital, one at St. Hyacinthe, one at Esquimalt and one at Niobe. That is the base overseas. Then there is a convalescent hospital at Toronto, Eaton Hall, a building lent to the navy for the duration of the war by Lady Eaton. I think it is twenty miles outside the city. The hon. member for Parkdale is probably familiar with it.

Mr. BRUCE: Yes; it is a beautiful site and building for a convalescent hospital.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): There is a convalescent hospital in Montreal, the Peter Holt house, a gift to the navy for the duration of the war by Mrs. Holt.

Mr. BRUCE: If I may ask a supplementary question, have we any Canadian naval hospitals overseas? Second, is it the intention after the war to reduce the number of hospitals and, if so, could the minister give an estimate of what the reduction will be? Is it also the intention to reduce the number of medical officers and nurses and, if so, by how many?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): There is one hospital overseas; that is the hospital in the depot ship Niobe near Greenock, Scotland. I cannot say at the moment how many of these hospitals will be maintained after the war; of course that will depend on the size of the navy. Again, it is difficult to say at this time how many doctors and nurses will be retained. When we laid down the complement for the navy in 1941 we did set out a certain number of doctors, I think fifteen in all, as the permanent establishment. All these things will have to be settled in the future.

Mr. BRUCE: Have you, in the naval medical service, sufficient hospitalization for all the patients requiring treatment in that service at the moment?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I think so. I have heard no complaint on that score. I shall be glad to consult the medical director general, however, to see if there are any shortages. I do not know of any at the moment; I think the hospitalization is adequate for the purpose.

Mr. BRYCE: I should like to ask the minister a couple of questions in connection with marriage regulations in the navy. I understand that when a man in the navy marries a civilian bride she immediately gets the separation allowance of $35 a month, but that if he marries a girl in the service she does not get that allowance for six months. If that is the case I think it is very unfair, because the civilian bride may have been earning $100 or $150 a month, while the other girl has been earning only $1.20 a day. Could the minister give me some information about that?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I will look into that matter. I think there is a rule or at any rate it was suggested that there should be a rule, that service men should not marry for six months after going into the service, or something like that. That may be what my hon. friend has in mind. I do not think the separation allowance is denied the wife of a sailor for six months, but there is some rule about six month's notice, or waiting for six months, or something like that.

Mr. BRYCE: I think the minister misunderstood me. If the girl comes from the army she is barred from collecting twice. I think that is very unfair. I do not know whether the minister is listening to me now.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I will get the information. Does my hon. friend say this should be the case; a man in the army marries a girl in the army, and they should both go on drawing their pay and she should get a separation allowance as well?

Mr. BRYCE: She does not get it until after six months.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I will look into the case.

Mr. BRYCE: Will the minister also find out for me what is the allowance for a man living out in Halifax? Is it $1.25 a day?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Yes.

Mr. BRYCE: Do you think that is sufficient?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Well, I do not know. It is sufficient for a good many, I suppose. Some may find it a little hard.

Mr. BRYCE: I do not like the way the minister answers that. I do not think it is fair. Let you or me try to live on $1.25 a day in Halifax or in Ottawa. We just cannot do it. These men who have offered their lives that we may live in a democracy are entitled to something better than $1.25 a day.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): There are several questions I want to ask, but before doing so I should like to make one or two observations. I was very much pleased with the minister's splendid review of the work of the navy. It was a fine story, well told. I think one can say that to-day in naval power Canada ranks third among the allied nations. I was particularly interested in the references made by the minister to the port of Halifax. Perhaps I may be permitted to point out to the committee that two of the officers mentioned yesterday as having attained very high rank and won decorations for gallantry in action were Halifax men. They were Captain H. G. De Wolf, D.S.O., D.S.C., and Captain Harold Grant, D.S.O. I might add that Vice Admiral G. C. Jones, C.B., chief of the naval staff, is also a native of Halifax. Each of them learned to sail on the waters of Halifax harbour.

I do not propose to take issue with the hon. member for Cumberland when he places an estimate on the value of Atlantic sailors as compared with Pacific sailors. I have no doubt he formed those estimates after due reflection. I agree with the hon. member for Cumberland that we in Nova Scotia would like to see the old naval college back in the port of Halifax again some day. I am quite sure we have in that city now very fine educational institutions, but we can always make place for the Canadian naval college. I should like to refer to the fact that since the outbreak of war Halifax has become a first-class, admirably equipped naval base. This is quite fitting, for this port is the principal Atlantic base for the Canadian navy. Although we have not the Canadian naval college there, we have H.M.C.S. Stadacona. It has been developed as a great naval barracks and training establishment. H.M.C.S. Stadacona has a seamanship school at which are taught all phases of seamanship required for ratings up to the rank of chief petty officer. It also has a torpedo school and a mechanical training establishment where personnel are trained for engineroom work. The whole dockyard area at Halifax has been practically reconstructed. We have the great floating drydock mentioned yesterday by the minister. New wharves also have been constructed, together with new naval stores buildings, new administration buildings and new workshops. Across the harbour we have a new, modern and in every way well equipped naval armament depot. There also have been improvements and additions to the central victualling depot. I mention this for the purpose of expressing my appreciation, as one of the members for the county of Halifax, of the most excellent work done by the navy in my constituency.

There was one observation made by the minister yesterday which greatly pleased me and in which I was much interested. He expressed the view that there was no reason why destroyers and cruisers could not be built for the Canadian navy in Canada after the war. It happened that, owing to the great slump in shipping in the period between the first and second great wars, the shipyards throughout Canada were at a low ebb in equipment, facilities and trained personnel for the building of ships. The result was that at the outbreak of the present war many of the shipwrights had to be trained from the beginning. Fortunately, as luck would have it, at that time the ships required for warfare were of comparatively simple construction. Consequently it was possible to have these built quickly, and they filled a pressing need. Later on it became necessary to have more highly skilled workmen engaged because modern warships require a greater degree of skill in construction—much greater than do merchant ships. My purpose in pointing this out is to indicate how unfortunate it would be if the building of naval ships were allowed to fall into disuse and be discontinued when the war is over. It would be almost impossible to exaggerate the handicap it would have been to the successful prosecution of our naval war effort if we ourselves were not able in Canada to supply some of the ships needed for that work.

It is, I think, certain that at different times throughout the war we could not get from other countries the warships needed and we were dependent to a large extent on our own work. I would therefore urge the government to adopt a policy, when post-war reconstruction is considered in all its aspects, whereby at all events for the replacement of ships in our own Canadian navy we shall make use of our own shipyards. As the older ships fall into disrepair, replacements should come, whether of small or of large construction, from our own shipyards. Men trained in skilled trades in our shipyards should not be allowed to lose their skill and disappear.

The questions which I wish to ask the minister are these:

1. What, if any, new construction for naval purposes is planned in and around the port of Halifax?
2. Are there any plans for a further concentration of naval properties in any place in Halifax with the idea of reducing the need for extensive naval transportation facilities?
3. What lands in Halifax acquired for naval purposes since the beginning of the war will be declared surplus to War Assets Corporation?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): First of all, my hon. friend asked what new construction was planned in Halifax for the Canadian navy. One new building we propose to erect there is in course of planning now. It is a chain-testing building in which chains can be tested instead of being sent out of the country for that purpose. Another bit of construction is to improve No. 3 camber in the dockyard, and then we have in mind some place where cordite cases may be kept until they are needed to be refilled. These cases cannot be thrown into the open; a building is necessary to store them. These are three items of construction we have in mind, and there is the possibility of some improvement to the waterfront in the dockyard. That may be undertaken.

My hon. friend asked whether we planned to concentrate naval properties in Halifax. He had in mind, I suppose, the possibility of reducing—

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): Reducing the tax-exempt property of the city.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I should say that practically all naval properties in Halifax will be concentrated in five places in and around Halifax.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): It would save transportation.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): There will be a saving in transportation. First of all there is the dockyard itself, then the R.C.N. barracks, H.M.C.S. Stadacona, and then the central victualling depot. Those, I should think, after the war would practically contain in themselves all the naval activities in the city of Halifax. Outside the city we would have the Bedford basin magazine and the armament depot on the Dartmouth side. These five buildings should pretty well take care of all naval activity in and around Halifax.

As to the land or buildings that might become surplus, it is a little difficult to say at this moment what land or buildings might be so affected. There are some buildings in the city which we shall probably not use after the war, but exactly what they will be it is not easy to say at the moment. Probably a good many or nearly all buildings outside those five I have mentioned would be surplus.

The hon. member for Selkirk had a question about dependents' allowance. I think the regulation in that regard was suggested by the dependents' allowance board. It states that no allowance should be granted to the wife of an officer or rating if such officer or rating was single at the time of being called up for active service unless he has completed six months' service from date of entry into active service. I assume the purpose of that was to prevent hasty marriages of members of the forces.

Mr. JACKMAN: Of the total Canadian naval personnel, how many are at sea and how many on shore duty?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I have not the exact figures, but I should say, roughly 40,000.

Mr. JACKMAN: The minister said that he was quite certain that there would be enough volunteers from the navy to fill the complement of men required for the Pacific war. Could he tell us how many personnel from Canada are likely to be engaged in the Pacific war?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I do not think I could give my hon. friend that figure.

Mr. JACKMAN: The minister has said that he feels quite certain that there will be enough volunteers from the Royal Canadian Navy to make up Canada's contribution to that war. At the present time we have approximately 90,000 men and women in the Royal Canadian Navy and the minister must have some idea of what Canada's contribution is to be.

I should like to know also whether our allies, particularly Great Britain and the United States, are adopting the same procedure as that outlined this afternoon by the Prime Minister when he said that the enlistment at the time of entry into the service would be extinguished and that if there was to be any participation in the Pacific war there would have to be what would be tantamount to reenlistment.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): In answering the first question, the best I can do for my hon. friend is to say what I have said before, that is, that the number to be used in the Pacific war will be considerably less than the number used in the European war. I do not think it would be proper for me to make public the number to be engaged in that war.

With regard to the policy to be adopted by the United States and Great Britain in connection with the Pacific war, I do not know whether they have made any change in their present system of getting men into their services. My hon. friend knows that both the United States and England since the beginning of the war have operated under a system of draft or compulsory training.

Mr. JACKMAN: Canada is going to cut down its naval personnel for the Pacific war, and I should like to know if the same thing is going to be done by our allies, particularly Great Britain and the United States.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I do not know exactly what the size of the British fleet in the Pacific will be. It has been stated that it will be a fairly strong fleet, but that does not mean, of course, that it will be the complete British fleet as it exists at the present time. There are ships that might do quite well in close waters but which they might not want to send to the Pacific. That is a matter upon which my hon. friend would have as much information as I.

Mr. JACKMAN: Is it a fair question to ask whether ships carrying munitions across the Pacific will have to be convoyed?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I assume that there will have to be some convoy work. Wherever there are enemy submarines or any enemy planes or possibility of enemy attack, protection will have to be provided.

Mr. JACKMAN: Has the Canadian navy been assigned any particular duty in the Pacific?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): No.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like to have a statement from the minister as to the cost of property, the cost of improvements, the cost of buildings and construction and the cost of equipment at Deep Brook, Sydney and Esquimalt. Also if the minister has not already made a statement, I should like to know what progress is being made in the construction of tribal class boats at Halifax. I should like to know how many of these boats are in service, or when it is expected they will be completed and be in actual service. Is it intended to extend the original programme?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I cannot give my hon. friend all the answers, but I can give him some figures with regard to Deep Brook. The estimated main contract cost was $8,663,000 in round figures and there has been expended to date by the Dominion Construction company on construction work, $8,645,000. A total of $57,000 was paid out for the purchase of land. Then there were other things such as power supply, pipelines and railway sidings, which brings the total expenditure to date to $8,893,000.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Does that include equipment?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): All I have here are the capital charges but I can get the equipment separately later on. This will disappoint some people because they predicted that it would cost a great deal more than that. So far as expenditures on land and buildings and other capital items are concerned, they have been within the estimate.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): The minister has not given the cost of the equipment.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I have not and I cannot give that. I told my hon. friend I would get it for him.

[Mr. A. L. Macdonald.]

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): That is perfectly satisfactory. I do not wish to annoy the minister but I should like to have it clear.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I understand my hon. friend perfectly. I told him that I did not have anything but the capital cost, but I will get the other details either to-night or to-morrow.

As to Sydney, capital costs of all kinds, including land, buildings, wharves, dredging, oil storage, roads, marine railway, storage buildings, sprinkler system, telephone system and so forth amounted as of February 28 of this year to $10,698,000, as I make it out from these figures, and I think that is right. That is against an estimated cost of $11,218,000, so that we have been able to get along with a little less than the estimate. Again I have not anything beyond the capital cost. I will get the other details to-morrow.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Does that complete it, or is there some other work projected?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): There might be some small odds and ends still to be done, but that can be taken as the virtual completion of the contract. I will find out exactly what remains to be done.

I am afraid I have no figures for Esquimalt. There was a considerable naval development there before the war, but we have added to it since the war. I can find out just what our costs have been.

Mr. POTTIER: What has been the expenditure at Shelburne?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I have not that before me but I will get it.

Mr. GILLIS: The figures given to the hon. member for Cumberland with respect to Sydney had to do with the Point Edward job, where a pier was destroyed before completed, was it not?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): The one that was destroyed by fire?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I think it was pretty well completed.

Mr. GILLIS: Was it rebuilt?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Yes.

Mr. GILLIS: And the cost of rebuilding is included in the figures given by the minister?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I have not looked into that. I do not know whether there was any insurance. I suppose there was, probably held by the contractor.

Mr. GILLIS: That was exactly what I was thinking of.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I will look into that.

Mr. GRANT: In order to keep the record straight I should like to correct a mistake that was made by the hon. member for Cumberland when speaking a few minutes ago. He said that Nova Scotia had contributed fifty per cent more men to the navy than any other province.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): No; fifty per cent more than the average for Canada.

Mr. GRANT: I just wish to point out that according to the minister's own figures Prince Edward Island has contributed more men to the navy in proportion to population than any other province, including Nova Scotia. The hon. member for Cumberland covered up his remarks with such balmy and soothing eloquence that I almost overlooked his error.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I am not envious of Prince Edward Island because Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island have all through this war been running hand in hand together in their enlistments in the army, navy, and air force. They both have an equally honourable and creditable record. Their men have enlisted for service in any theatre of war and I am very proud indeed to be associated with the members for Prince Edward Island in paying tribute to their record.

Mr. PERLEY: Since there is a little boasting going on by the maritimers about enlistments I should like to put something on the record which the public of Canada ought to know. I think we all agree that the Canadian navy is doing a wonderful job and too much praise cannot be showered on the achievements of our men. According to the minister's statement appearing on page 404 of Hansard, of the 90,000 naval ratings over twenty-five per cent came from the prairie provinces and nearly 7,000 of them from Saskatchewan. A great many of these men who enlisted from our province hardly knew how to step into a rowboat, certainly not into a canoe, and had never seen as much water as would cover a ten acre surface until they joined the navy. But these men from the prairies have made a wonderful record for themselves. They seem to take to the sea kindly. They have done a wonderful job. Many of them have won promotion purely on their meritorious service in the navy. It is worthy of record that the three prairie provinces have contributed twenty-five per cent of the ratings in the Canadian navy. I just wanted to say a word of praise for the men who have enlisted from Saskatchewan and the other prairie provinces in the Canadian navy.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: We have five V.C.'s from British Columbia. Can you top that in the maritimes?

Mr. MacNICOL: Can the minister tell us where the eighty-seven men of the naval service were taken prisoner of war.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Most of them were taken prisoner when the Athabaskan was sunk off the coast of France just before the invasion. There were one or two prisoners also taken in the Mediterranean.

Mr. MacNICOL: Were these men of the Athabaskan who were taken prisoner picked up by German submarines.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): They were picked up, I think, by German surface craft.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has the minister a break-down by provinces of the 1,498 who were killed on active service?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I can get that for my hon. friend.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Has the department any recruiting policy for obtaining officers and ratings for the permanent naval service in Canada, and, if so, to what extent is recruiting proceeding?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): We discussed that at some length last night, when probably my hon. friend was not here. I said that we now have about 4,300 in the R.C.N., the permanent navy, whereas we aim at a post-war total of 9,000. So that there is room in the permanent navy for about 4,700 more. We have been taking some officers and also a few ratings into the permanent service. We have asked those who are in the reserve—the naval volunteer reserve or the naval reserve—to apply, if they wish to transfer to the permanent navy. Some, though not a great many, have taken advantage of that; I think the majority are waiting to see how things are at the end of the war and then make up their minds. But we have had some transfers in that way, and also a few direct entries into the Royal Canadian Navy.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Defence for Air): Mr. Chairman, it has been the custom for the Minister of National Defence for Air to provide the committee with a detailed and comprehensive statement of the condition and progress of the Royal Canadian Air Force. Hon. members will, I am sure, appreciate the hesitation with which I embark upon such a task. In the short time during which I have been connected with the air department I do not pretend to have mastered all its problems, or to have been able to make myself familiar with all its activities.

War Appropriation—Air Services

But I think that anyone would be justified in feeling a full measure of pride in being able to speak on behalf of such a magnificent body as the R.C.A.F.

I can take pride without assumption, for I have had nothing to do with its achievements. If there is any one man who can take full credit it must be the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), who guided the expansion of the air force during the dark and difficult days of the war.

With the consent of the committee—and I am sure the members would not want me to take the time of the committee in reading it—I should like to table a statement of the cash estimates for the first five months of the 1945-46 period, amounting to $453,876,000 and as a comparison the actual expenditures for the previous five months period ending 31st January, 1945:

Royal Canadian Air Force
Estimates 1945-1946
1. Estimated cash requirements (5 months) .....	$453,876,000
Consisting of:
Air training organization....	$ 95,555,000
Western hemisphere operations .....	103,290,000
Overseas war establishment....	254,985,000
Departmental administration..	46,000
	$453,876,000
2. Actual expenditures (5 months ending January 31, 1945)....	$651,754,278
Consisting of:
British commonwealth air training plan.....	$151,567,745
Western hemisphere operations .....	80,507,952
Overseas war establishment....	419,635,856
Departmental administration..	42,725
	$651,754,278

Note: There were extraordinary expenditures overseas amounting to approximately $150,000,000 during this period.

You have already been made aware that two objectives have dominated the Canadian policy in the air war against our enemies. The first objective—that of training sufficient aircrew to provide superiority over the enemy in the air—has been attained in abundant measure through the British commonwealth air training plan. The second objective—the creation of a strong fighting air force—also has been attained to an extent which has brought everlasting glory to this dominion.

The British commonwealth air training plan. It is the achievement of the first objective about which I should like to speak first. A great deal has been said and written about the British commonwealth air training plan but I have yet to encounter a single example of exaggeration.

Members of this house, I am sure, have followed with interest the course of the plan, through those half-forgotten days of peril when it was obvious that the British isles would be under constant and heavy aerial attack by the enemy; and the broad farm lands and prairies of Canada, thousands of miles removed from possible enemy action, suggested themselves as ideal for the training of vast numbers of empire airmen.

I need not recall to your minds the fateful decision which had to be reached when France collapsed and a German invasion of the United Kingdom seemed imminent. The question to be decided then was whether or not to cast aside the British commonwealth air training plan and send every available R.C.A.F. aircrew and aircraft overseas to defend the British isles.

The long-range view was taken that it would be better to provide a larger number of trained aircrew at a later date than to send a token force to the defence of Britain, and the justification of that decision can be seen by the daily record of our aerial operations. The wisdom of this decision can be judged too, by the fact that there have been created reserves of aircrew sufficient to meet all anticipated requirements.

You will recall that at the spring sitting last year this house was informed that after a careful examination of the situation, it was possible to commence a gradual process of contraction of the training plan. The process of rolling up the great carpet which had been laid down across the dominion since December, 1939, has continued steadily.

Then last autumn the partners to the plan reviewed the situation and reached the conclusion that adequate provision had been made to meet all conceivable eventualities in the air, until the end of the war. Therefore the partners by mutual consent, decided that it would not be necessary to continue the training plan beyond the date at which the agreement would normally run out—March 31, 1945.

The last classes of students graduated at schools across this country on the 29th March, and ceremonies were held at that time to mark suitably the completion of the first phase of Canada's biggest single contribution to victory.

I do not propose to bore you with a flood of statistics, but before proceeding to discuss the variety of circumstances which arise out of the conclusion of this phase of Canada's war effort, I should like to tell you that the plan graduated a total of over 131,000 trained aircrew. Of these, 72,729 graduates, or over 55 per cent, were members of the Royal Canadian Air Force.

In case anyone may gather the impression that the winding up of the British commonwealth air training plan is an indication that we are reducing our effort before negotiating the last laps in the race to victory, I should like to emphasize that the decision to allow the training plan agreement to run out on its normal date was solely the result of the fact that the training plan had accomplished its purpose.

In examining decisions with respect to the plan it must always be borne in mind that the intake and production of trained men under the training programme were planned and regulated, not to provide for immediate needs, but for the operational requirements of from eighteen months to two years ahead, as those requirements were estimated by the high command. Our training programme was never a hand-to-mouth scheme, such as it was in Germany. At any one time in Canada, men were being trained who could be expected to be required as much as two years later.

Training continues. Neither does the termination of the British commonwealth air training plan mean the end of training in Canada. The R.C.A.F. will continue to train men for its own requirements and we will continue to train additional aircrew for the Royal Air Force on a contract basis. For obvious security reasons it is impossible for me to indicate the numbers of men to be trained under this programme but it can be disclosed that for the training of R.A.F. personnel only, the R.C.A.F. will continue to operate three elementary flying training schools, four service flying training schools, one air navigation school, one central navigation school and a reconnaissance and navigation school.

In addition we will continue to maintain and operate six operational training units on normal training for the R.A.F. and R.C.A.F. as well as seven schools of various types to provide refresher and certain specialized training for the R.C.A.F.

As an insurance against an unfavourable turn in the progress of the war a further nine schools are being retained on a care and maintenance basis under a "shadow" organization, pending final disposition. These are capable of being reopened, if necessary, on short notice.

All schools in which training is suspended and which are not included in the new "shadow organization" continue on a "care and maintenance" basis until their final disposition is decided. Later on I will make reference to the methods of disposing of surplus assets.

Transfers to Army. There is another aspect of the consequences of winding up the training plan in which hon. members are vitally interested. It is obvious that a large number of men who have been engaged in operating the training programme—instructors, administrative officers, clerks and ground crews—became surplus to requirements. Some of them were required for replacements overseas, but it was possible to release many from the service. Some of these men, as you know, became eligible for call-up under the National Resources Mobilization Act and for a time they were released from the air force and then the normal call-up procedure followed. Recently, however, new regulations were put into operation which make personnel who are to be discharged from the R.C.A.F., and who are eligible for call-up, immediately available to the army as reinforcements.

Men in this category are being medically examined by an army medical board prior to discharge from the R.C.A.F. and if they are physically fit they receive a call-up notice which becomes effective, after any period of leave to which they are entitled, as soon as discharge from the R.C.A.F. is completed.

Aircraftmen and leading aircraftmen, on enlistment in the army for general service, receive credit for their service in the R.C.A.F. in determining their initial army rate of pay; that is up to 4 months service, $1.30 per day; 4 to 6 months, $1.40 per day and over 6 months, $1.50 per day.

In addition, an arrangement has been concluded between the army and the air force under which airmen of non-commissioned rank, including W.O.'s II, although enlisted with the rank of private, receive pay of their R.C.A.F. rank at standard rates during retaining in the army, and for six months thereafter, with a maximum of ten months. At the expiration of that period it is anticipated that many of the men concerned, by reason of their already recognized ability, will have obtained the equivalent rank in the army.

All gratuities and clothing allowances will be carried over and will become payable when military service has been completed.

This arrangement does not, of course, affect qualified aircrew personnel or any personnel who have served overseas.

Reserves. With respect to aircrew a different situation prevails. When, last autumn, it was decided that the training plan could be allowed to run out, we were in a position of having considerably more aircrew than were immediately required. And many more have become available as final classes graduated. It is true that we had more aircrew than could be usefully employed at once, but at the same time we had to be cautious. It was decided, therefore, that as men graduated they should be transferred to the R.C.A.F. reserve, subject to recall. They were free to enter civilian occupations but they constituted sound insurance against any eventuality.

That eventuality appeared within recent weeks. The stepped-up tempo of the air assault against the enemy on the western front resulted, not in higher casualties, but in aircrew completing their operational tours considerably more rapidly than formerly. Men who had been making one or two trips a week against enemy targets were suddenly flying almost every day, and even, in cases of some short trips, twice a day.

In order to provide replacements for these men as their tours expired, it became necessary to recall some categories from our reserve. The warning call has gone out to some members of all categories except pilots, and navigators "W", of whom there is still an adequate surplus in the service. Here again it is impossible for security reasons, to supply figures, but I can give you positive assurance that our reserve of trained aircrew is quite sufficient to cope with any situation which is likely to arise.

There is another category of R.C.A.F. personnel who are being released and transferred to the reserve. They are the "tour-expired" men who have returned from overseas. All of them have completed one or more tours of operations against the enemy, and, in addition, have completed periods of instructional or other duties.

All members of aircrew who complete an operation tour are entitled to 30 days leave in Canada before undertaking a second tour.

On the completion of a first tour aircrew are usually required to complete a non-operational tour before returning on leave, but leave to Canada is granted before a second tour is commenced.

Not all aircrew personnel are required to undertake a second operational tour, but the skill and experience of some of those who have completed a first tour are required in our overseas squadrons in order that they may act as leaders for less experienced crews.

Members of aircrews who have completed one or two tours, or on completion of three years' overseas service, if surplus to overseas requirements are returned to Canada. After a period of leave they may be posted to general list duties in Canada or appointed to non-flying list duties. Provided they are not in certain restricted categories, those who desire to retire may be transferred to the reserve, subject to recall later if their services should be required.

I would like to make it clear that in no cases are aircrew personnel who have completed two operational tours reposted overseas except on a strictly voluntary basis.

With respect to other members of the R.C.A.F. officers on the non-flying list, ground-crew and members of the Women's Division, after the completion of three years' overseas service they may elect repatriation, or retention overseas for a further period. If they elect repatriation it is arranged as soon as a replacement is available, and if they elect to remain overseas they are retained, if they can be suitably employed.

You will agree, I am sure, that with this policy there can be no quarrel. These men and women have done their appointed tasks. But their number has not yet reached a very considerable total. It will increase fairly rapidly from now on, but in January, for instance, only 185 officers and 224 other ranks on the flying list who had seen service overseas were discharged, retired or resigned.

Rehabilitation Services. To prepare for the transition of our personnel from service to civilian life a series of release centres have been established across the country. Here they have their final medical examinations, and move on to the care of the Department of Veterans' Affairs. But long before they actually reach a release centre, and while they are still serving, members of the R.C.A.F. can commence preparation for their return to civilian life.

In the early days of the war the air force devised a highly efficient system of personnel selection, a system which was later accepted as a model by the United States. It was a system of choosing the right man for the right job.

Now, when we are preparing to return men to civil life, the system is being reversed so that we may choose the right job for the man; and to assist him educational services have been provided to prepare the man for the job.

Out of the air force's personnel selection organization there has been created an organization for what is known as "personnel counselling".

As a result we have a highly effective team composed of the personnel counsellor and the education officer. The personnel counsellor is trained to guide and assist members of the force who often have very hazy ideas as to what to do after the war. The education officer assists members to undertake training or studies, and by means of correspondence courses, directed reading and trade classes, opportunities are provided for men and women to continue their formal education, to improve their general knowledge or to secure vocational training.

Through the facilities of the Canadian Legion educational services more than 150 courses are available, many of them carrying credits recognized by Canadian departments of education and universities.

As an example I will mention the case of a Flight Lieutenant who required a pass in trigonometry to complete his senior matriculation. The education officer provided all possible help with the result that he completed his course of studies during his operational tour. Then he was told of the place and time of his examination. He returned from an operation against the enemy early one morning; flew 100 miles to write the paper, but found that he could not remain for the full time allowed for writing the examination since he had to go on operations again that evening. However, he completed the paper; flew on operations that night that won him the Distinguished Flying Cross, and learned some time later that he had also passed his examination.

Many thousands of our men have taken advantage of these educational opportunities and I think I can safely say that in the midst of waging war, the R.C.A.F. is, at the same time, doing everything possible to prepare its men—and women—for peace.

Disposal of surplus. I mentioned a few moments ago that I should like to discuss briefly another circumstance arising out of the winding up of the air training plan—the disposal of surplus assets.

The major portion of R.C.A.F. surpluses have been referred to the crown assets allocation committee for disposal through War Assets Corporation. As units close down, some of their equipment is required by other units of the R.C.A.F. and the balance is reported for disposal. Furthermore stocks held in equipment depots are progressively and systematically reviewed in the light of future R.C.A.F. requirements, and any surpluses discovered are reported for disposal.

Large numbers of aircraft have, of course, become surplus to our requirements and these are reported for disposal by the allocation committee which has been charged with the task of disposal to the best national advantage.

The accumulation of large amounts of surplus equipment has necessitated the formation of a number of reserve equipment maintenance units to store equipment required for future R.C.A.F. needs, and a number of surplus equipment holding units in which are placed the surplus awaiting disposal through the War Assets Corporation. In some cases War Assets Corporation will take over the entire site together with all stocks stored in the buildings. As of March 1, 1945, the Department of National Defence for Air has cancelled 232 leases and has declared 94 properties to the crown assets allocation committee as surplus to requirement.

Up to the end of February there had been sent to crown assets from the B.C.A.T.P. alone, surpluses valued at $131,630,138. In addition some $30,000,000 of surplus equipment from our western hemisphere operations has been made available for disposal.

Operations. I come now to discussion of what, in my opening remarks, I referred to as our second great objective—the creation of a strong, fighting air force. This subject, naturally, I should like to discuss at great length, and in the most complete detail. But there are imposed upon me the security restrictions which prevent my giving any details or particulars that would be of benefit to the enemy.

I am sure that hon. members will not require any words from me to inform them of the magnificent work that members of the R.C.A.F. are doing both in our Canadian units and in formations of the R.A.F. The story of their achievements is being told daily in the newspapers but there are a few points which I might mention to assist the committee in appreciating the superlative accomplishments of our fighting airmen.

One of the best indications of the outstanding nature of the services provided by members of the R.C.A.F. is the fact that up to the end of January last, a total of 5,166 honours and decorations had been awarded to R.C.A.F. personnel. Of these, 2,372 were Distinguished Flying Crosses and 433 were Distinguished Flying Medals.

At the close of my remarks I should like to table a list which provides a summary of these honours and awards for the information of the committee.

I will also table, with the consent of the committee, a list giving the names and addresses of those who have been awarded decorations for gallantry since the last list was tabled in the house.

As an example of the brave acts for which these decorations have been awarded, I will read the citation for the award of the Conspicuous Gallantry Medal (Flying) to Flight Sergeant W. E. Crabe of Fingal, Ontario. I chose this example at random and because it was recent. It is typical of many scores of others:

Flight Sergeant Crabe was the mid-upper gunner of an aircraft detailed for a sortie one night in February. They bombed their objective but soon after leaving the target, the aircraft sustained severe damage. The rear gun turret was wrecked. Flight Sergeant Crabe went at once to attend to the rear gunner. Assisted by another member of the crew, he cut away the side of the turret and then, tying a rope around himself, Flight Sergeant Crabe climbed into the wrecked turret. He was completely exposed to the slipstream, in imminent danger of falling and was not wearing his bulky parachute. Heedless of the danger and despite the intense cold, Crabe toiled until he succeeded in freeing the gunner and getting him back into the fuselage. Unfortunately the gunner was dead, but although Flight Sergeant Crabe's efforts were in vain, his brave and determined bid to save his co-gunner were worthy of the greatest praise.

There is one other exploit which may already have come to the attention of hon. members which illustrates so well the quality of courage that is common to all ranks, from the highest to the lowest, and from all parts of Canada.

In this case, awards were made to an air commodore, a flight sergeant, a corporal and two leading aircraftmen, all of whom distinguished themselves in the same exploit.

Air Commodore Arthur Dwight Ross, O.B.E., of Toronto and Winnipeg, the commanding officer of a large R.C.A.F. bomber base, was awarded the George Cross, the empire's highest award for gallantry, other than in the face of the enemy.

Four airmen who aided in the rescue, also were honoured. The George Medal was awarded to Flight Sergeant Joseph Marcel St. Germain of Montreal, and to Corporal Maurice Marquet of Meadow Lake, Saskatchewan. The British Empire Medal (Military Division) was awarded to LAC Melvin Muir McKenzie of Tehkummeh, Ontario, and LAC Robert Rubin Wolfe, Toronto, Ontario.

The joint citation accompanying the awards was:

One night in June, 1944, an aircraft, while attempting to land, crashed into another which was parked in the dispersal area and fully loaded with bombs. The former aircraft had broken into three parts and was burning furiously. Air Commodore Ross was at the airfield to attend to the return of aircraft operations and the interrogation of aircrews. St. Germain, a bomb aimer, had just returned from an operational sortie, and Corporal Marquet was in charge of the night ground crew, whilst LAC McKenzie and LAC Wolfe were members of the crew crash tender. Air Commodore Ross, with the assistance of Corporal Marquet, extricated the pilot who had sustained severe injuries. At that moment, ten 500-lb. bombs in the second aircraft, about eighty yards away, exploded, and this officer and airman were hurled to the ground. When the hail of debris had subsided cries were heard from the rear turret of the crashed aircraft. Despite further explosions from bombs and petrol tanks which might have occurred, Air Commodore Ross and Corporal Marquet returned to the blazing wreckage and endeavoured in vain to swing the turret to release the rear gunner. Although the port tail plane was blazing furiously, Air Commodore Ross hacked at the perspex with an axe and then handed the axe through the turret to the rear gunner who enlarged the aperture. Taking the axe again, the air commodore, assisted now by Flight Sergeant St. Germain, as well as Corporal Marquet, finally broke the perspex steel frame supports and extricated the rear gunner. Another 500-lb. bomb exploded which threw the three rescuers to the ground. Flight Sergeant St. Germain quickly rose and threw himself upon a victim in order to shield him from flying debris. Air Commodore Ross's arm was practically severed between the wrist and elbow by the second explosion. He calmly walked to the ambulance and an emergency amputation was performed on arrival at station sick quarters. Meanwhile, Corporal Marquet had inspected the surroundings, and seeing petrol running down towards two nearby aircraft, directed their removal from the vicinity by tractor. LAC McKenzie and LAC Wolfe rendered valuable assistance in trying to bring the fire under control and they also helped to extricate the trapped rear gunner, both being seriously injured by flying debris. Air Commodore Ross showed fine leadership and great heroism in an action which resulted in the saving of the lives of the pilot and rear gunner. He was ably assisted by Flight Sergeant St. Germain and Corporal Marquet who both displayed courage of a high order. Valuable service was also rendered by LAC McKenzie and LAC Wolfe in circumstances of great danger.

"Courage of a high order". "Worthy of the greatest praise". Surely this restrained language of official citations may be applied equally to the thousands of members of the R.C.A.F. who operate over Europe, the Mediterranean, India, Burma and the lonely waters of the Atlantic, Pacific and Indian oceans.

The enemy threat to our own shores has been removed but it has been none the less essential to maintain adequate western hemisphere operational units and, of course, there has been no relaxing of our campaign against the U-boats. The R.C.A.F. is responsible for convoys and anti-submarine patrols in the western half of the north Atlantic and much of the credit for the frustration of the U-boats must go to those men who day after day, in the foulest kind of weather, fly these long, lonely, arduous patrols which take them frequently to mid-Atlantic and often all the way across. Opportunities to strike at the enemy are few and far between but our men have had their "incidents" as they call them.

I hardly need recall to members of this house that the late Flight Lieutenant Hornell, the only member of the R.C.A.F. to be awarded the Victoria Cross in this war, was flying an aircraft attached to an R.C.A.F. squadron stationed at Iceland, when he flew to attack a submarine in complete disregard of his own safety.

Flying from the United Kingdom there are other R.C.A.F. squadrons engaged in an equally relentless warfare on the U-boats.

Bomber Groups.—Then in the United Kingdom there is our own R.C.A.F. bomber group, of bomber command, which shares with the R.A.F. and the air forces of the United States the proud credit for hastening the day of victory. Air Vice Marshal McEwen, who commands the group, was in Canada recently, and, as an indication of the extent of the R.C.A.F. contribution to the aerial offensive, members of the committee will be interested in knowing that he reported that last October the Canadian group dispatched the largest force of 4-engine bombers ever sent against any target by any group in the history of bomber command.

In 1943 our bomber group flew 7,355 sorties and dropped 13,639 tons of bombs. Last year the group flew 25,353 operational sorties and dropped 86,503 tons of bombs. And this was accomplished with the lowest loss percentage of 4-engine aircraft in the whole of bomber command.

With the invasion of Normandy the character of the group's operations changed to some extent. Previously it has been engaged exclusively in strategic bombing by night. But with the landing of troops, the group took tactical bombing in its stride. Between the dusk of June 5 last and the dawn of June 7, aircraft of the group flew 478 sorties with the loss of but a single aircraft. Since then the R.C.A.F. group has continued to play its full part in support for the army as well as continuing to share in the strategic strikes against the enemy's war potentials—its industrial and rail centres.

Fighter units.—Then across the channel there is another phase of R.C.A.F. activity. There, the R.C.A.F. comprises a major part of the 2nd tactical air force which provides close support for the First Canadian and Second British Armies.

This year up to the 15th March, Spitfires and Typhoons of R.C.A.F. fighter and fighter-bomber squadrons had flown 10,575 sorties during which sixty-one locomotives were destroyed and 165 damaged; 648 railway cars were destroyed and 228 damaged; 214 motor vehicles destroyed and 413 damaged; 395 railway cuts were made and 124 enemy aircraft were destroyed and eleven damaged.

I mention aircraft last, and for a good reason. Shooting down aircraft has long ceased to be a priority job with our fighter pilots. They have long ago subdued the hun in the air. Their mission has been to shoot him off the ground. They have done that with phenomenal success, not only with their cannon, but with rockets, and they have blasted him with bombs. The figures I quote here are all the more noteworthy, for they have been accomplished during a period when operational flying has been curbed by weather conditions.

Never in warfare has an air force operated so close to the enemy's line as these fighter-bomber boys of the invasion spearhead flew last summer. That aerial umbrella, the R.A.F.'s most outstanding single engine group, was then composed of 60 per cent Canadian pilots, and the first airfield in Europe, an R.C.A.F. one, was operating on D-day, plus 4.

I will cite one day during the German collapse in Normandy, when all roads towards the Seine were cluttered with German disorder. That was August 18, when this fighter-bomber group accounted for 1,074 vehicles destroyed, 1,929 damaged, in addition to seventy-three tanks destroyed, ninety-one damaged. One Canadian Spitfire wing headed all others that day, just as it did on frequent occasions, both in air and ground destruction. It alone destroyed 230 vehicles, damaged 445 others, in addition to four tanks destroyed with Spitfire cannon, and nineteen damaged. That will give you some idea of the job our fighter-bomber squadrons are doing on the other side, carrying on in Holland and into Germany what they inaugurated on that narrow Norman beachhead last June. They have never let up. They are harrassing and disorganizing the enemy at his most vital points immediately behind the lines at which our ground forces are steadily thrusting.

Then too there are night fighter, night intruder and artillery spotting squadrons, there is a fighter squadron in Italy and two transport squadrons in India; and there are the thousands of R.C.A.F. personnel serving in R.A.F. units in widely scattered theatres of war—all of them daily adding lustre to the wings of the R.C.A.F.

In the recent crossings of the Rhine, one R.C.A.F. transport squadron was employed in dropping parachutes, as well as supplies and equipment.

All told, in addition to the thousands of Canadians serving with the R.A.F., there are more than 45 R.C.A.F. squadrons on service as units overseas.

Overseas mail squadron. There is one aspect of R.C.A.F. operations, not quite so familiar to members of the committee, to which I would like to make specific reference; that is, the operation of an overseas air mail service. You will recall that in December, 1943, the air force undertook to assist in carrying the armed forces' mail to the various theatres of war. The first Flying Fortress converted for this job took off from Rockcliffe loaded with mail on December 15, 1943. In January, 1944, the load carried by the squadron totalled 11,600 pounds. Twelve months later the load totalled 469,638 pounds for one month, and in the intervening twelve months the service had been extended so that aircraft of the squadron were flying 9,923 miles of regular routes, as compared with 3,500 miles at the beginning of 1944.

In addition to the transatlantic service to the United Kingdom, local service has been provided to the Canadian armed forces in the Mediterranean area and a daily service is provided from the United Kingdom to Canadian forces on the western front. A regular service is also provided to Goose Bay and Iceland.

The squadron has completed 235 transatlantic crossings and the whole service has been carrying more than 400,000 pounds of mail per month.

The future. Some hon. members may have noticed that, because the B.C.A.T.P. had fulfilled its purpose, and because it was possible to release some of our personnel, there was a disposition in some quarters to suggest that with the end of the war in sight we were resting on our oars.

Nothing could be further from the truth. The R.C.A.F. will play its full part to the end and while, because of altered circumstances, our requirements at home have grown less, it is no indication that our blows at the enemy grow weaker.

Even when the fighting in Europe is finished, the R.C.A.F. will be represented in the occupation force. It is not possible to inform the committee at this time what the exact nature of our representation will be, but I can say that units—that is squadrons—of the R.C.A.F. will be included in the aerial police force which will be required for the occupation of Germany.

[Mr. Gibson.]

In addition, discussions have been in progress for some time and are continuing with regard to the extent of our air force's participation in the second phase of the world conflict—the war to defeat Japan. It may be stated that R.C.A.F. squadrons will be operating in cooperation with the R.A.F. against the Japanese in the Pacific, but the number and composition of our units have not yet been definitely decided.

Certain squadrons will be detailed for service in the Pacific, but the wishes of the squadron personnel will be considered before being detailed for such service. They have already volunteered for the duration of the war for service anywhere in the world, but it is inevitable that a certain number of the personnel will wish to be replaced before the units embark for service against Japan. All personnel who may be selected for such service will have a period of leave in Canada before proceeding on operations in the Pacific.

I know I have succeeded in painting only a rough picture, but I think it is sufficient to convey to the members an impression of the efficiency of the R.C.A.F. as a striking force. I think we can say, without being in the slightest degree boastful, that in the air war, Canada, in proportion to her size, is making a contribution as great as any member of the commonwealth or any of the united nations.

When all that can be said is said, and all that can be written is written of our great plans and our broad achievements, it is the individual achievements of our men that will live in the hearts of our people. Those boys who have made the B.C.A.T.P. and the R.C.A.F. a success, came from families in every walk of Canadian life, from rich and poor alike, from the farm and from the city, from high school and university. The least professional of soldiers, they are the most gallant of citizens. Coming from different atmospheres of a nation of widely divergent views, they found a common patriotism and a common purpose.

Their selfless endeavour, their common patriotism and their unswerving purpose are a grand example to us in our Canadian task.

I want to place on Hansard list of honours and decorations awarded to members of the Royal Canadian Air Force.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I am sure that the committee has listened with a great deal of interest to the splendid record of the air force. One thing which it occurred to me to ask the minister is, in view of the large number of members of the air force who are prisoners of war in Germany, the increasing damage being done to the German reich, and the danger to these prisoners of war, what is the department doing with regard to trying to provide some neutral or protective territory within the reich to protect these men from the injury to which they are exposed by being in concentration camps and other prisoner of war camps in Germany? Several reports in the papers have caused a great deal of concern to those families who have members in prisoners of war camps. This is the case not only as regards the air force, but the army as well. Will the minister tell us what is being done?

Mr. GIBSON: I am not in a position to state that, since bombing operations against the enemy come under the control of bomber command in Europe. I have no doubt whatever that they take every possible precaution to avoid the dropping of bombs on concentrations of our own prisoners and on places where our men are likely to be quartered inside Germany.

Mr. GRAYDON: What is the policy of the department with respect to the commissioning of men who are prisoners of war in the prison camps in Germany? I have in mind one particular case where normally, I believe, a commission would have been granted, but because he is in a prison camp his commission has not been completed. Some commissions, I believe, have been granted. If the minister would care privately to investigate the particular case I have in mind I would be very grateful to him. This man was brought down over German territory in 1941 and has been in a prison camp ever since. Others under similar circumstances to those in which he finds himself seem to have been getting commissions. I was wondering whether there is any set departmental policy covering cases of this kind.

Mr. GIBSON: The fact that a man has been taken prisoner does not preclude him from receiving a commission when the recommendation for it has been made before the non-commissioned officer was shot down or taken prisoner; commissions are dealt with under those circumstances in the ordinary way. It does not follow that each one will automatically get a commission, because these things go through the usual routine of being screened before the commission is granted. But if the recommendation has been made, the fact that the man has been taken prisoner does not preclude him from securing the commission. If I get the name of the airman referred to I shall be very glad to investigate that particular case.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am sure the committee appreciates the splendid story which has been told this evening. As I said the other afternoon, in my opinion the air training plan and our air force will probably be looked upon in the future as Canada's greatest contribution to the winning of the war. Of the many great things this country has done during the war, perhaps this will be regarded as its greatest contribution; and I am sure that whatever we may have thought in days gone by about the necessity of maintaining any sort of armed force in the period before this war began, to-day the country and this house will be unanimous in believing that we should maintain our air training plan and adequate forces to meet any contingency which may arise. I think the lesson of this war leads everyone, regardless of opinions which may have been held in the past, to that inevitable conclusion.

I rose to speak because when we were overseas last autumn we heard some dissatisfaction among the ground crews. To-night the minister gave a citation of bravery shown by members of a ground crew; and again I have been told, by men who have done the flying and to whom we all are according the praise which is their just due—and I would not for one moment wish anything I say to be misunderstood as belittling the splendid job which members of aircrews have done during this war—that perhaps there is a lack of recognition in our country of the part which has been played overseas by members of the ground crews; that in all kinds of weather, under all sorts of circumstances, they are the men who have conditioned the machines, who have loaded the bombs, who have taken tremendous risks in doing that kind of job, and we may have not been able to recognize that to the extent it should have been recognized before. But when we were across, some of the men suggested that they had been there for a very long time without recognition in the way of promotion, and that from time to time men who had been recently promoted in Canada were sent over to England with the ranks which they had acquired in Canada, ranks higher in many instances than those of men who had been serving for a long time with the ground crews in Great Britain. I thought this was an opportunity to raise the matter with the minister, not in any spirit of criticism of the minister or his predecessor, for whom I have the very highest regard, but rather that it may be looked into. If there is anything in the kind of criticism which has been made and which I have passed on to the minister, it should, I think, be rectified; and it is only with that end in view that I now place it before him.

Mr. GIBSON: Of course that is always a very difficult problem. You do not want to prevent the man who has secured stripes from going overseas because he has stripes, or force him to revert when he is going over. The matter will be taken care of to some extent, I think, by the system which has been adopted of bringing men back when they have had three years overseas service, but I should be glad to have that looked into and see if there have been cases in which an injustice has been done.

Mr. GERSHAW: May I ask the minister to give us a little more detail as to the procedure regarding disposal of the material which is no longer required by the air force? For instance, some of these flying training service schools are abandoned; for months they have been lying idle, and the material which is in them is in great demand. City councils and large school districts are anxious to obtain some of these buildings for dormitories and some of these materials for various purposes. Could the minister tell us what the procedure will be, who will have priorities, and how will buildings or other materials be disposed of?

Mr. GIBSON: I mentioned that, briefly. It is not easy to go into details on a matter of that kind, but the air force decides what material, what buildings, what equipment it needs for its own use. Then the other services are given an opportunity to determine what they may need, and if there is equipment or if there are buildings that are not required by the services they are turned over to war assets allocation committee, and that committee finds out whether any of the government departments can use any of the equipment that has been turned over. If not, it is passed on to War Assets Corporation for disposal. The air force itself does not dispose of any of the properties that it ceases to require.

Mr. GERSHAW: Do provincial governments have priority?

Mr. GIBSON: That is a matter that has to be taken up with the War Assets Corporation. I know that in many cases every effort is made to cooperate with the local municipalities, sometimes the provincial governments, to assist them, particularly where there are buildings which may be necessary for housing purposes. But it is not easy to distribute or get rid of all this equipment at one time. I know that at some of our schools we have surplus equipment holding units in which we are having to retain men to care for this equipment and look after it until War Assets Corporation have been able to take it over and dispose of it. That is a matter which War Assets Corporation will look after.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Could the minister give us a break-down of what he has in Canada at the present time? The intention is to maintain thirty-two schools in the form of training schools, navigation schools, or special courses schools. I believe originally there were about a hundred schools across Canada. It looks as if we are retaining about one-third of them. Could the minister give us a figure of the capital assets of the schools which are being dispensed with at the present time? He said that $131,000,000 had been turned over to Crown Assets Corporation for disposal. Can the minister break that up into buildings and equipment that we have in Canada at the present time and it is intended to maintain?

Mr. GIBSON: No, I have not those figures here. I will endeavour to see if I can secure the list and I shall be glad to let my hon. friend have it. It might take some time to prepare such a list as that.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister said that there were 72,729 personnel in the R.C.A.F. Is he able to give us a break-down of that number by provinces as the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services gave in his report?

Mr. GIBSON: I do not think I gave any figure such as the hon. member mentions.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister said that 131,000 were trained under the air training plan.

Mr. GIBSON: That is graduated from the commonwealth air training plan for the R.A.F.

Mr. MacNICOL: And 72,729 were in the R.C.A.F.?

Mr. GIBSON: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has the minister a break-down of that number by provinces?

Mr. GIBSON: No, I have not that here. I suppose it could be obtained. That is, the number of students who graduated from the commonwealth air training plan from all parts of Canada. I will find out if that can be obtained and let the hon. member know.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to find out something about the programme the department has for providing employment. This number represents some of the best men in the service. As a rule they are educated men. I know a great many of them, as do other hon. members. They are men who have matriculated and some who have university training. That applies particularly to pilots. I believe all the navigators are required to have matriculation. They are all young men. Many of them enlisted at seventeen, eighteen and nineteen years of age. They enlisted before they had any experience in anything. They went directly from school. Therefore, when they come out their experience will be only what they have learnt in the service, which, of course, will be good. What is the programme to find suitable, congenial employment for these young men when they come out of the air service?

Mr. GIBSON: That, of course, is not one of the functions of the air force, to find them employment when they leave the air force, but it is one of the functions that we have assumed, to assist in their training and education while they are in the air force so that they may be qualified to take positions when they are discharged. For so doing we have the personnel counsellors whom I mentioned to determine what the men's capabilities are. We have the education officers who assist them in securing whatever training or courses of instruction the man requires in order that by the time he is discharged he will be fitted for or part way along in his educational training so that he will have lost as little time as possible in his training programme after the war. The steps to be taken to reestablish men in civil life do not come under the air force department.

Mr. MacNICOL: I thought the minister mentioned counsellors and said that some machinery was being set up to furnish counsellors. I assumed that the young men could apply to these counsellors. I think that would be all right. They will hardly know what they want to do. Somebody should direct them along that line. Take as an example my part of the city of Toronto where there are hundreds of factories. I have often said that whoever is going to be in charge of providing employment for these young men when they come out of the fighting services—we are talking about air personnel to-night—should get in touch with the managers, engineers, technicians, and so forth of private companies. I am sure that these men would be glad to sit in with a council or group to discuss the matter. I am sure that these companies would be willing to subscribe funds to pay for someone to sit in on this council to whom these young men could come for advice to prepare them to decide on what they want to do after the war. Because of their age when they joined up they have not had any experience and they will want advice. Is there any sort of board or machinery to be set up, such as I have suggested, composed of those who are employing people—I do not see any use in putting men on the board who have never employed anybody and who know little about employment—to whom these young men could apply to be directed as to what they may be best fitted for when they leave the service?

Mr. GIBSON: I had a case brought to my attention just the other day. It was that of a member of the Women's Division who had the idea she would like to qualify later to become a doctor. I understand that after some discussion with the personnel counsellor it was suggested to her that she should qualify as a chemist. While she was stationed at one of the training schools arrangements were made whereby she could go out in the evening, spend a certain length of time in consultation with one of the local chemists and get a certain amount of experience of the type of work that had been proposed. In that way she was able to find out for herself whether she really had any liking for that particular work. That is what the personnel counsellor is trying to do, find out the qualifications of various members of the force and then put them in touch with opportunities of securing some experience along those lines.

Mr. MacNICOL: The young men about whom I have been speaking so far have been pilots, navigators, air gunners and so on, all of whom must have had a substantial education. What about the ground crew? They are men of a different class. They have been perhaps garage men or mechanics of one kind or another, because during the war their job has been to repair planes, to keep them in order and have them fit to go up. They will be older men. I have been wondering if the department has a record of the companies from which these various men came and whether those companies have given an undertaking that they will reemploy these men in the jobs they formerly occupied.

Mr. GIBSON: Of course a member of the force is entitled by law to his position with his former employer. There will be cases where the men themselves, especially if they were youngsters when they joined and have since acquired a great deal of experience, will not want to return to some of the positions they held prior to the war. A man in that position undoubtedly is looking around to see what qualifications are required for a better position.

Mr. CARDIFF: I followed the report of the minister very closely, and was especially interested when he stated that quite a number of these airports would be retained for some time. We have several airports and air schools in the county of Huron, and I was wondering if a decision had yet been reached as to which are to be retained. Would it be possible to get a report from the minister as to the location of the schools and airports that are to be kept in operation?

Mr. GIBSON: I do not wish to make public a list of the airports that are being retained. Any such list would not be final or complete at the present time, and some of the stations we are using to-day will eventually be closed. However, if my hon. friend will let me know the particular ports in which he is interested I shall try to find out the disposition that eventually will be made of them.

Mr. CARDIFF: I believe we have four airports and schools in the county of Huron, and I was wondering if some of them would be retained.

Mr. GIBSON: I will look that up.

Mr. HANSELL: So that I may not be bobbing up every once in a while, perhaps the minister would take a note of one or two things I should like to ask during the course of my remarks. First of all may I thank the minister for the efficient and commendable way he has met me in connection with the cases I have brought to his attention since he has been the minister responsible for this department. While I am saying that may I also thank his predecessor, to whom I believe a great deal of credit is due for the way in which he handled this air training plan from the beginning. I should like to thank his predecessor not only for the way in which he carried through the whole air training scheme but for the way in which he attended to the few matters I brought to him personally. While I am saying that may I thank all the ministers of the present government for the way in which they have treated me. I have had no fault to find with them when I have come to them with individual cases. I must take this opportunity of thanking them because, while I shall be back after the next election, I am afraid some of the ministers will not be here.

The minister mentioned the matter of decorations, and I am sure our hearts were stirred as he told the story of a number of brave acts which had been performed by members of the air force. I am sure that story could be duplicated many, many times. I should like to mention one matter, however, which has come to my mind and which I have heard mentioned by others, although not in any spirit of criticism or complaint. I am quite willing to leave the matter of decorations with those responsible for them; they know more about it than I do. However, it has occurred to me, and I should like to have the minister comment a little on it, that perhaps decorations are given to commissioned officers a little more readily than to non-commissioned officers and men. I recall hearing or reading the story of a bomber that had been almost ripped apart by flak and cannon fire. It was doubtful whether the pilot could bring the machine back to its base, and he told the crew that any who wanted to bail out had permission to do so. Part of the crew bailed out; one or two or three remained with their pilot. I have forgotten all the details of what happened, but the pilot brought the plane back to its base and said that he never would have been able to do so but for the heroic part played by the two or three men who had elected to remain with him. I think they had to throw out some ropes and tie the tail, or something of that kind. These men stuck with the ship at the risk of losing their own lives. The pilot received the decoration; the other men were mentioned. I am quite willing to leave the story there and to agree that those responsible did the right thing; but I must confess that in my mind was left the question, "Well, why didn't the others get decorations, too?" I realize that the pilot was responsible, but the others were just as brave. The others were not commissioned officers; I think they were flight sergeants.

Speaking of decorations, may I supplement what was said last night by the hon. member for Red Deer in regard to the Memorial Cross. According to the regulations the Memorial Cross is given to the mother or widow of the deceased soldier, airman or naval serviceman. I am going to urge, and I would ask the minister to assure me that he will press for it, that the Memorial Cross be given to the next of kin if the mother or the widow is not living. That is only fair. There are boys who have given their lives. They were not married and their mothers are not living. No one in the family gets the Memorial Cross. I hope the minister will tell the committee that he will urge that the regulations be changed in this regard. The boy gave his life; he sacrificed his all, and the family, because the mother has gone before, is deprived of the Memorial Cross.

I come now to the matter of commissions. I believe that consideration should be given to the question of giving commissions to all the aircrew who go on operational flights. All aircrew on operational flights should be commissioned officers. It may be a little late now to make that suggestion. Nevertheless the war will continue in the Pacific and I make that suggestion from firm conviction.

I am not an expert in these things and I do not think a person needs to be an expert to have a certain amount of common sense which tells him a few things. We know there are commissioned officers, perhaps quite qualified, who may have earned their commission, who have not yet taken an operational flight. I submit that when a man, no matter whether he is an air gunner, tail gunner, mid-upper turret gunner or whatever he may be, has reached the place where he is efficient enough to go over enemy territory in a bomber and face the flak of fighter planes he is worthy of a commission. I should like the minister to give some answer to that and even to say that he will urge that that be done.

As regards war assets, I am not going to take up much time in discussing the question. I will simply urge that where municipalities or provincial governments or even associations are asking for some of this equipment they should be given the preference especially in some cases that I might mention. I recall that a few months ago it came out in the papers—I am not raising it now to create what might be called a scandal, because it is water under the bridge—that in Calgary they were burning some obsolete planes. It appeared to be a scandal at the time, but of course the officials have all the answers. There is no question about that. Whether the answers will satisfy common sense is another matter. The answer was that the aeroplanes had been dismantled and everything worth anything taken out and that the material that was burned was of no particular use to anyone anyway. I am quite willing to accept such an answer, but I wonder if they found out whether the cowl of the plane or anything upon it was of any use to anyone.

Not long after that I had a representation from a certain club. They said to me, "Do you think, Mr. Hansell, that we could get one of those planes?" I replied, "I don't know; what do you want it for?" The gentleman who spoke to me said, "We don't care whether it runs or not; we don't want to fly it; we should like to put it in the children's playground and we will pay for bringing it down from the air school or wherever it may be. At any rate, put it in the playground so that the youngsters can play around and have a great old time." I thought that was a good idea; I would not mind going to the playground and pretending for a while myself. I said I would look into the matter to see if it was possible to get one of these planes for the youngsters to play with. I have not had time to see any official. Perhaps this little remark of mine will serve as notice that I want an aeroplane for that playground.

Do I understand that the Minister of Munitions and Supply will take part in this debate? Shall we have the privilege of asking him questions in committee?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If the opportunity presents itself either the minister or his parliamentary assistant will take part in the debate.

Mr. HANSELL: Thank you. Then I can leave the matter until then, because I have a few questions which I should like to ask, seeing that this war assets business is, as someone says, hot potatoes. Now is the time to get the information on it.

Before I sit down there is one other matter I would urge. It is not a new one. It has been discussed before. I refer to the matter of war gratuities being applied to the estate of those who have been killed in action. Primarily I think it is considered that the war gratuities are for the purpose of reestablishment. It seems to me that consideration should be given particularly in the case of widows who, even though they may get full pension, certainly are entitled to the war gratuities that would have accrued to their husbands had they lived. The mother or wife should be considered.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am sorry I was engaged in conversation at the moment and did not hear what the hon. member said. Would he be good enough to repeat the question.

Mr. HANSELL: I understand that the war gratuities that are given to the men are primarily for the purpose of rehabilitation or as a reward for service. The question is this. I suggest that war gratuities should also be given to the widow of the deceased soldier or airman.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is the case. The war service grants legislation is divided into three parts. First, there is the cash gratuity regardless of rank; second, there are limited allowances based to a certain degree on rank; and, third, there are reestablishment gratuities which are under the direct jurisdiction of the Department of Veterans' Affairs. Provision was made in the act of last year to have these gratuities payable to those who are under certain conditions in receipt of dependents' allowances and under other conditions, to dependents in receipt of assigned pay. There has been a suggestion made during the present session to make the gratuities payable in any event to the estate of the deceased soldier, airman or sailor.

Mr. HANSELL: Do I understand that that is being done now?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is covered by the act of last year.

Mr. HANSELL: I want to know if the gratuity is to be paid to the next of kin or to the estate of the deceased soldier?

Mr. MITCHELL: That is not what you said before; you said to the widow.

Mr. HANSELL: All right; I am just extending it to the estate. It really does not make much difference. I do not wish to take up a lot of time in having the minister explain this, but I do want him to know there is a feeling that the gratuity should go to the estate.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I think I told the hon. member for Lake Centre the other day that some two or three months ago we appointed a committee representative of the three defence services and the Department of Veterans' Affairs to look into the question of gratuities to be paid either to the next of kin or to the estate of the deceased. I am happy to inform the committee this evening that action has now been taken to make gratuities payable to the estates of deceased service men.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is that automatic?

Mr. HANSELL: I applaud the answer given by the Minister of Veterans' Affairs.

Mr. GIBSON: Perhaps I might reply to the questions asked by the hon. member for Macleod. He intimated that he thought officers were getting an unduly high proportion of decorations. I think it is recognized that in the air force there is a higher proportion of officers than in any other service. Commissions in the air force have not been restricted to anything in the nature of the old school tie. A man who has distinguished himself on active service or during training is eligible for a commission and consequently the brightest men and the men who are recognized as leaders are the ones who get the commissions. Possibly they are more likely to qualify for decorations.

The hon. member suggested that every member of aircrew should have a commission. He may be right and that is a matter of opinion, but I do not think we should have a force composed entirely of officers. Commissions are not given because of the risks taken, but are given because of the responsibility that must be assumed. While the air force has a large percentage of officers it has never been deemed advisable to have every member of the aircrew automatically made an officer.

Another point raised was in connection with the Memorial Cross, and the hon. member suggested that this decoration should be given to the next of kin instead of its being restricted to mothers. I cannot agree with him and I will not undertake to support his suggestion. The Memorial Cross is not awarded to the man himself; it is awarded to the mother. It is particularly a mother's or a wife's award. The next of kin may be entitled to the medals which have been won by the soldier, sailor or airman, but the Memorial Cross is not awarded to him. The Memorial Cross is awarded to the wife or mother in recognition of the particular sacrifice that was made when she lost a husband or son.

I can assure my hon. friend that his request for an aeroplane for a playground will be investigated to see if it can be secured. I am glad to assure the hon. member, as he has just heard from the Minister of Veterans' Affairs, that gratuities are now to be paid to the estates of deceased service men.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Will these gratuities be paid automatically?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I hope to be able to table the order in council to-morrow.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): In the case of the air force a man may be missing and not presumed to be dead until six months later; what would happen in that case?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If my memory is correct, out of 188,000 who had been discharged up to about three or four weeks ago, 103,000 gratuities have been paid. My hon. friend will recall that when the legislation was passed last August the Minister of National Defence announced that the first payments could not be made until January 1. In several cases the first, second and third payments have been made by the paymasters of the various defence departments. Once the Department of Veterans' Affairs is notified that an application for a cash gratuity has been authorized by those who have examined into the records we issue ledger credits to the particular district. Already we have issued something like 80,000 ledger credits covering the reestablishment credit portion of the war services grants legislation. The paymasters have worked very hard, but in some cases it has been necessary to get documents from overseas and there has been some delay. However, in the next month or two I think the payments will be right up to the applications.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): In the air force when a man is missing he is not presumed to be dead until six months later. How long after that period would it be before the gratuity is paid? The condition here is a little different from that prevailing in the army or navy.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The gratuity would be payable immediately the certificate was passed.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The death certificate?

Mr. JACKMAN: Does that cover all cases?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Would my hon. friend be good enough to wait until the order in council is tabled to-morrow?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Yes. I also wanted to inquire of the minister as to what is being done with regard to the boys in the meteorological service connected with the R.C.A.F. I have a letter before me from a man in this service. He states that the men in the auxiliary services, the men who are just running canteens and so on, get travel warrants, hospitalization and so on, which the men in the meteorological service do not get. Referring to one of these men he says:

This chap, injured and dying, couldn't legally be admitted to hospital although he had been on the station three years. He got first aid and the O.C. took him into the army hospital and then was the subject of a number of long distance calls to find out what to do with him.

Referring to a friend of his who had enlisted in the navy he said:

Maybe you never thought of it, but suppose Gord and I left our work to go back to teaching, say next June or so, he would be paid (maybe in instalments) about $700 cash on his discharge plus at least a month's leave. (Part of the cash would be a month's pay in advance, in other words) and I think they get transportation home. I would get nothing—not even a railway ticket to Toronto so far as I know, and some of these chaps have lost their jobs already and have nothing to go back to. This in spite of the fact my job requires special university training, while lots of officers in "Gord's" work never saw a university and we took a course in meteorological work which I would bet a month's pay was harder than any "Gord" took and our work is more responsible.

I shall not read the rest. These are all university boys. I know the minister or the former minister has had correspondence with them and I wonder if he would give the committee some idea of what is to be done with these boys in the meteorological service. Why are they not taken into the R.C.A.F.? The work they are doing is all for the air force.

Mr. GIBSON: The members of the meteorological service are members of a civilian organization which comes under the Department of Transport. They are not part of the air force and so they are not treated as members of the force.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): They are working at the air station.

Mr. GIBSON: Of course they are, but they work not only for the air force but for the T.C.A. As I said before, they are a civilian force. The air force is giving some consideration to taking some meteorologists into the air force, but up to the present time we have had no branch into which meteorologists were taken as a part of the air force.

Mr. BROOKS: I should like to ask a few questions about the young men who are now on the reserve of the air force. A great many of these young men were just boys at the beginning of the war, but as they grew up to be seventeen and a half or eighteen their whole ambition was to get into the air force. Now, after taking their training, they are on the reserve and are at a loose end. I should like to know whether it is possible for them to join the army, whether arrangements have been made with the army for taking them into that service, and, if so, what the rate of pay is while they are in the army and for how long that rate of pay will be granted. If they join the army will they be called back into the air force if they are needed? I ask these questions because I have heard a rumour that arrangements are being made to allow these young men to join the army and that they will be recalled to the air force if needed later. I know the minister's answer will be that these young men should get employment or go back to school. It is very easy to tell them to seek employment or go back to school, but it is much harder for them to do so because of the training they have had and their experience. There are a great many of them. The minister must know of a great many cases himself and no doubt has a great deal of correspondence about the question. It is a matter that should be cleared up at the present time.

Mr. MAYBANK: Might I add a word along the same line and perhaps the minister could answer us both at the same time. I understand that the hon. member for Royal was referring to pilots.

Mr. BROOKS: No; I was referring to aircrew.

Mr. MAYBANK: My question relates more particularly to those who are pilots. Quite a number whom I know are very much disheartened over the fact that they are not being given their chance. There is nobody to blame for that, and I do not know that they are blaming anybody. Nevertheless there is a great deal of heart-burning among these young fellows who are on the reserve as pilots and who fear that they are not likely to be called up. Could the minister give us an intimation of the number who have been called up from the reserve, perhaps making a comparison between the number of pilots called up and the number of navigators, air gunners and so forth, in order that these young men might be able to deduce what their chances of being called up are? I can quite understand that neither they nor anybody else would suggest that some of those now in the air force should be discharged so that they might be taken in. A lot of these boys are greatly worried over their inactivity, and certainly it is a fact that they cannot get suitable employment at the present time. I have found that to be true in hundreds of cases. I do not mean to say that they cannot get any kind of employment, but they cannot get the type of employment they would go into if they were out of the air force altogether because the moment they go to an employer and he finds out that they are on the reserve, he knows he may have them in his service for only a little while and on that account he is not very willing to employ them. So that, altogether, there are several things conspiring to lower very greatly the spirits of these chaps, and if there is anything the minister can say to make them more hopeful I should like to have him do so.

Mr. GIBSON: When men are transferred to the air force reserve they can, if they so desire, apply for transfer to the army, and if they have a commission already in the air force or are suitable for a commission in the army I understand that they are granted a commission in the army. If on the other hand they are not suitable they have the option of going on the aircrew reserve. Those who have not got commissions are transferred on the ordinary basis carrying into the army the same rank that they had in the air force, under the conditions I stated earlier this evening.

Mr. BROOKS: How long will they retain that rank?

Mr. GIBSON: For a maximum of ten months. Certainly a man who is qualified as aircrew and finds himself not able to be accepted at once and goes on the reserve has my greatest sympathy. I know a very large number of them are looking forward to the time when they will be called up to the air force. Some of them have already been called up. Notifications have gone out to quite a number of them. We endeavour to call them from the top of the list down; that is to say, the man who graduated some time ago is more likely to be called for overseas service than the man who graduated last week.

Mr. MAYBANK: How are these call-ups distributed?

Mr. GIBSON: According to the demand from overseas. At the present time they do not need more pilots, so that we are not calling up pilots from the reserve, but as the demand for pilots develops we shall call them up.

Mr. MAYBANK: I appreciate that they are called up according to the demand, but I was wondering if the minister could give any intimation as to how the call-ups are distributed among pilots, air gunners and so forth.

Mr. GIBSON: No, I cannot because that depends entirely upon the demand. There might be a demand, for instance, for wireless air gunners.

Mr. MAYBANK: My reference was to the past.

Mr. GIBSON: My hon. friend is suggesting that I should give an indication as to the rate at which they are being called up because that would let the young men on the reserve calculate, he says, how soon they might be called up themselves. It would also be information for the enemy as to how fast we are having to call our men up. I would not want to give the actual figures as to the rate at which they are being called up or as to the categories.

Mr. BROOKS: Suppose some of these young men have obtained a position and are not anxious to leave it. Can they get a postponement?

Mr. GIBSON: I am glad the hon. member brought that up. The men were notified when they were first put in reserve that they would not likely be called up for six months, and in any event they would get three months' notice. Some of them have had notice within the three months stating that they might be called up before the expiration of the six months, and they are told that if they are in positions or have any other reasons why they do not want to report at that time, they should indicate the fact at an early date. A man who is, for example, attending university, in the middle of a course, or has a position which he has just entered, may not want to leave at once. We have on the reserve list many others who are anxious to be called up, and consequently we are postponing those, or a large number of those, who for one reason or another desire to stay on the reserve.

Mr. CARDIFF: Going back to the subject of gratuities, I should like to ask one question to clear up a situation I have in mind, where a boy was killed who was not paying any dependents' allowance. The question was raised as to whether the next of kin would be entitled to any gratuity in his case. He was one of a large family, and his father and mother are not able to make a sufficient living for themselves. I wondered whether there was any possible chance of getting a gratuity for them.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Under the new order in council which I hope to table to-morrow afternoon, the deceased's portion of the cash gratuity will go to the deceased's estate, and my surmise is that in ninety per cent of these cases it will go to the parents. At any rate it will go to the deceased's estate.

Mr. BROOKS: I do not think the minister answered one of my questions. If these young men join the army do they sever their connection with the air force, or are they still subject to call later on to the air force at such time as they would have been called if they had not joined the army?

Mr. GIBSON: If a man transfers to the army he would not be subject to recall to the air force. He would sever his connection entirely; because the army could not operate if we had strings on a large number of its officers. But as I said, if he washes out in the army in getting a commission he is entitled to go back on the air force reserve. If the transfer goes through and he becomes an active member of the army, he would continue in that capacity.

Mr. BROOKS: I do not think that is altogether fair. If a young man joins the army and there is the possibility of his going back to the air force he should be given the opportunity. He has had a lot of training in the air force and they have placed him in a position where he has waited for a long time. I do not see why, if at a later date he wants to go back, he should not be given the opportunity. To my mind that is just another unfairness which has been added to the situation the young man has been placed in. I hope the minister will give this matter some further consideration.

Mr. MacINNIS: Since this matter has come up for discussion, there is a point which should be made in regard to the rehabilitation of, particularly, men of the air force. It has been mentioned several times this evening that some of these young men left school, or left their first job, or perhaps went, without having a job at all, to enlist, and have become pilots and other officers in the air force, receiving a rate of remuneration which perhaps in civil life they would not receive for many years; and I am told, in conversations with people both here and in the United States, that their rehabilitation is going to be a very difficult problem, for various reasons. I remember the former minister of national defence for air, the hon. member for Quebec South, dealing with this matter in the house a short time ago. What I wish to suggest to the minister is this. The country spends a great deal of money and care in training these men for the jobs they have to do in the air force, jobs which will last in any event only a very short period of time. Their jobs are now finished or will end very shortly; they are coming back into civil life, and they have to be trained, not for a job whose duration is a few months or years, but for a life occupation. I would suggest to this government, or whatever government may be dealing with the matter after the war, that we should not be niggardly in providing for the training of these men, but should expend as much care and money in training them for their life's work as we have done in training them for their jobs in the air force. If we do that, in the ultimate analysis it will pay the country. They have experienced things we cannot understand; the strain, I am sure, has been terrific. They will not be the same men; the period of adjustment will be a long one. So that I suggest to whatever government is to deal with this matter that it put in as much time and care and as much money in training these men as future citizens of Canada as has been expended in training them for the air force. If we do that, I am sure we shall get the same kind of results.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If my colleague will forgive me for trespassing on a discussion of his vote, I would inform the hon. member for Vancouver East at once that I am in complete accord with what he has just said. As one who has some responsibility in the Department of Veterans' Affairs for the policies already adopted in regard to the training of those who are coming back to us from the forces overseas, I appreciate very much the spirit in which he has approached the matter. I believe that every member of the committee will recall the eloquent and moving speech made by the hon.

member for Quebec South in this chamber two years ago upon the very matter referred to by my good friend the hon. member for Vancouver East. I suggest that as far as our department is concerned there is a greater scope in regard to both vocational and educational training of ex-members of the Royal Canadian Air Force than in any other direction; for one reason, on the whole, when they left us to save us, they were younger than members of other branches of the forces. I agree with my hon. friend that, whatever parliament assembles here after the opinion of the people is registered, whatever government is in power, nothing can be finer or truer or greater in our international purpose than even to extend as much as possible the provisions you have now in your post-discharge reestablishment order for the training of these men, to see that they have every opportunity in the structure of our national, social, economic, and, yes, our public life. Because they should be trained not only vocationally and educationally, but I believe humbly and sincerely that they should be the leaders of Canada to-morrow.

Mr. JACKMAN: May I ask several questions? The first one has to do with these gratuities. The only reason why I raise it again, in order that it may be settled very clearly now, is that in regard to clothing allowance the matter was not made retroactive, and none of us could understand why that was the case. Would the minister undertake that, in the order in council which is now being drafted—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am afraid it is passed; otherwise I could not refer to it.

Mr. JACKMAN: Will the minister please do his best to make sure that all cases which have arisen during this war are covered, so that there is no cut-off date as there is in the matter of clothing allowance, et cetera?

The other matter to which I wish to refer is that of commissions. We had lengthy discussions in the committee in previous sessions. Would the minister say something about the R.C.A.F. personnel who formed aircrew with R.A.F. squadrons? In previous years we found that commissions came through very slowly when some of our personnel were attached to R.A.F. squadrons. Perhaps the minister will be good enough to give figures to the committee showing the number of aircrew in the R.C.A.F. who have commissions and those who are non-commissioned, and the number of aircrew who are commissioned in the R.A.F. and those who are not?

In previous years we discussed the method of demobilization out of the air force. As I recall it the hon. member for Quebec South presented several alternatives to us and then tossed the ball across the floor of the house and said, "What would you do in these circumstances?" We could not do any better than he was suggesting, and there was no final conclusion. Has the department finally arrived at a method of demobilization which is fair? Are they going to adopt the principle of first in, first out, or are they going to demobilize air force personnel having regard not only to length of service but to their dependents and other factors which may be taken into consideration?

I should like the minister to elaborate to some extent on this matter of personnel counsellors in the air force and in the Women's Division. He mentioned it. Exactly what is the set-up? Exactly how many personnel counsellors are there? Could he give it to us on the basis of so many per thousand in the air force, or according to units, so that we can understand it?

I was a little bit shaken by his denial of responsibility for the future of the boys in the air force. I do not think the minister meant to rid himself entirely of responsibility once the men were formally demobilized. Surely there is a responsibility on the part of the air force to make sure that everything that they can do is done for the personnel. The very existence of these personnel counsellors is an indication that the air force has some conscience in this regard. Who is to be responsible for placing the men demobilized from the air force? Would it come partly under the Department of Veterans' Affairs or partly under the unemployment insurance commission who are supposed to be able to find jobs for Canadians if they have none?

One further question in regard to the air cadet league; what relation has it to the Department of National Defence for Air? Are we appropriating any money at this time for its continuation and support? I understand the intention of the air cadet league, wherever they get the money from, is to maintain about 30,000 members for the present.

This is my final question. Would the minister say a word or two in elaboration of the part which the Royal Canadian Air Force will play in the Pacific war? To what extent will the present personnel be reduced once we have victory in Europe and are engaged solely in the Pacific fray?

Mr. GIBSON: I do not think I can remember anything more like a rapid fire machine gun than my hon. friend. He has rattled out these questions so speedily that it is difficult even to keep track of them. But I will endeavour to answer them as well as I can. With regard to those that I am not able to answer at the present time I will get what information I can later. With respect to the question of the air cadet league, that is, of course, a civilian organization which has been of great assistance to the air force. It has looked after the training of air cadets. In the past the air force has endeavoured to keep very close connection with it and assist it in every way possible. I had the pleasure of attending a dinner of the air cadet league here about a week ago, and while I could not give them any definite assurance as to the extent of the support we would be able to give them after the war I did tell them that we wanted to retain our close contact with them; that we are going to assist the cadets as we had done in the past. Arrangements are being made again this year to take the cadets to camp and give them some flights. They do get some financial support from the government, although I do not know the amount.

At one time I understand they had some difficulty in regard to commissioned officers. It was felt at one time that perhaps there were more officers with commissions than could be justified. That has been straightened out now with the result that every cadet corps, if they have at least seventy-five cadets, are entitled to have commissioned officers in their organization.

With regard to the question of personnel counsellors, we have 256 fully trained personnel counsellors at the present time. They have been established in units all over Canada. In addition, there are some sixty-five positions that have been established overseas, including the United Kingdom, Egypt, Italy and India. A number of positions are being established at release centres throughout Canada where their duties include the completion of forms as well as counselling the personnel who had not had an opportunity prior to their appearance at the release centres—

Mr. JACKMAN: Do these counsellors have other duties in the air force, or are they solely devoted to that one?

Mr. GIBSON: I understand they are solely devoted to that purpose.

With regard to the question of demobilization, it will largely be on the basis of first in, first out, although we cannot guarantee that it can be carried out entirely in that way. If a unit is brought back and demobilized as a unit there might be some men who have had lesser service, who will be demobilized, than others who have been in longer with another unit perhaps still serving overseas. But in the air force we perhaps are not as badly off as in the other forces. Indeed we are bringing back men from overseas after they have had three years' service there, so that by degrees we have been getting men with the longer service reestablished in civil life as they have completed their long years of service in the force.

Mr. JACKMAN: There is no cut and dried formula?

Mr. GIBSON: There is no cut and dried formula that will guarantee that a man with a certain period of service will not be demobilized before somebody else who may have a longer period of service; but the endeavour throughout is that the first in, first out policy will be carried out.

The hon. member also asked a question as to what extent the R.C.A.F. will cooperate in the second phase in the war against Japan. We have had discussions on that. They have been going on for some considerable time but the extent of the contributions has not yet been definitely determined. They depend to a considerable extent on the conditions that are existing at the time we complete the first phase; that is the end of the war with Germany. The air force will be acting in cooperation with the R.A.F., and I had the pleasure of meeting the officer who is going to command the R.A.F. He was out here a few weeks ago. We had discussions at that time, but no final action can be taken until we know exactly where we are going and exactly the task that we shall be given and to what extent airfields will be available or whether we shall have first of all to construct airfields before our squadrons can actually go over there and start operations. Those are matters which cannot be actually determined at the present time, although, as I have said, discussions are going on and every effort is being made to arrive at as definite an arrangement as we can reach so that plans may be made, for instance, to bring back to this country the squadrons that will be nominated for service in the east. They will be brought back first, given a period of leave and put through a period of remustering and training prior to their dispatch to the Pacific sphere.

Mr. JACKMAN: Will the personnel have to volunteer for the Pacific war?

Mr. GIBSON: What it amounts to is that while we designate the units that will be sent there, any of the personnel who indicate that they do not wish to continue further will be replaced; and since we have a very large number who will be wanting to go, there will be no difficulty in filling those places.

Mr. JACKMAN: The other question I wanted to ask was in regard to the commissioning of aircrew. Formerly we found that R.C.A.F. boys serving with R.A.F. squadrons did not receive the same recognition as far as commissioning was concerned as did the boys serving in our own units. Would the minister care to make some reference to that matter? I also asked for the figures, if the minister has them handy, in regard to the percentage of aircrew in the R.C.A.F. who are commissioned and the percentage non-commissioned, and the percentage of aircrew in the R.A.F. who are commissioned and non-commissioned.

Mr. GIBSON: I have not those figures as to percentages, but I can say that my predecessor had very strong views on the question of commissioning, and I understand that the commissioning of members of the R.C.A.F. serving with the R.A.F. is entirely in the hands of the R.C.A.F. That plan has been in operation now for some considerable time. The Royal Canadian Air Force takes responsibility for giving commissions to its members, whether they are serving with R.C.A.F. or R.A.F. squadrons.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I believe the committee will generally approve the plans the minister has outlined, particularly in regard to the skeleton training force that is being set up across Canada. I should like to state that the Yorkton district is appreciative of the good judgment exercised by the officials in selecting Yorkton as one of the permanent bases for training. No. 23 flying training school has replaced No. 11 which had one of the finest records in Canada for efficiency, and Yorkton is on the direct air line between Winnipeg and Edmonton.

In regard to this training, I think the people of Canada are glad to see the lead that has been given by this department in regard to the personnel counsellor courses that have been given. I should like to ask the minister how many men and women will be requiring (a) university training and (b) technical training as a result of the work of these counsellors so far. Those who have made a survey of this situation are somewhat concerned about the facilities available in this country for university and technical training; and if the government is to continue with this plan I think it would be well advised to look into the possibility of using some of the schools which already have facilities for educational centres to accommodate these people. I am quite sure that most of the provinces would welcome the cooperation of the dominion government in their rehabilitation plans, possibly leading to some joint scheme under which the provinces and the dominion could work together in this particular educational field. It would be just too bad if some of these schools should be turned over to War Assets Corporation, without consideration being given to the possibility of using them as training schools or educational centres.

Regarding rehabilitation, a good many of the men returning from overseas will not know for at least a few months what they would like to do. Possibly a year or even two years will be required by some of these people to settle down into the normal course of life. I think it might help a great deal if the government could give us some idea of the number of men they plan to retain in a sort of permanent force. Is it the intention of the government to have a more or less regular air force, or is it rather the idea that refresher courses will be given in these various schools to ex-members of the air force and others who may want to take the training, so that we may have a fairly large number of private citizens who have taken training but are not necessarily attached to a regular force? I believe a good many men who have been in the air force would like to continue that life, to which they have found themselves well adapted. They will be asking whether or not there is a possibility of staying on in some sort of permanent force.

There is one thing I should like to tell the government, arising from my personal experience with boys who have taken part in the air cadet scheme. These lads in the high schools took a great interest in this work and became very much air-minded. I thought it was rather unfortunate that when it was decided to halt enlistments, these boys were not taken in and given every opportunity to join the air force. Their disappointment was very great after having trained with the cadets for a couple of years, after having obtained top marks, only to find when they came of age to enlist that there was no opportunity to go into the air force, and that they were left only the army in which to enlist. There is a sort of esprit de corps among men who have been in the air force and boys who have trained for it. When the minister stated that men who were surplus to requirements were being discharged from the air force and taken into the army it occurred to me that he might have done a great service to these men if he had made arrangements with the Department of National Defence to have them taken into the army as a sort of air force division, remustered as army. There may be military reasons why that could not have been done, but after talking to men who have had to go into the army I believe some such scheme would have worked advantageously to both services.

Mr. GIBSON: I must say to my hon. friend that I am very proud indeed of my connection with the air force, but when I think of my past connection with the army I do not like to hear him say they had "only the army to go into." I believe any man who has the honour of serving in the army should be proud of it, although I realize that there was a great deal of disappointment on the part of those who had served in the air cadets and who had looked forward to continuing into the air force. However, I do not think we would have been justified in continuing to take men into the air force after we had trained a sufficient number to meet all possible requirements.

I had the same idea as my hon. friend, that it would have been a good thing to form say air force battalions in the army, to allow those men who were released from the air force, or who had been air cadets, to continue to wear the uniform and to operate as air force units in the Canadian army. I took up that matter with the Minister of National Defence, and found that there were several fairly strong reasons against it. One was that they could not serve overseas as a unit in view of the fact that our army was right up to establishment, and to replace any one unit would have meant disbanding a unit already serving in one of the overseas divisions. It was not felt that any unit that was serving overseas, having won great distinction throughout the war, would appreciate being told that they would be disbanded to make way for a new air force battalion just formed. Consequently that idea was not proceeded with.

As to the question of university training, I should like to have the parliamentary assistant speak on that, since he has had a good deal of experience with the work the universities are doing to take care of service personnel.

Mr. MACMILLAN: With reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden), it will be interesting to the committee to know that the universities of Canada are making every possible provision for these men and women when they come back. We expect thousands of them to apply for university courses. Because of the nature of air force work, the educational standard is, in general, higher than in the other services. It is estimated that over sixty per cent of the men in the air force have had junior matriculation or, better, senior or two or three years at college. There has been a break of from one to four years and these men and women will have to pick up their education where they left off. In my own university, for example, over 300 have come back this year; 220 came back in January. Instead of having one date for registration at the beginning of the college session, the universities have now changed that to three dates; in other words, if a man is mustered out in December he does not have to wait until next September to begin his college course. Provision is made to have him begin his course in January and again on the first of June. In two calendar years he covers three years of college work. His course is accelerated. I am sure the committee will be glad to know also that the impression these men have made on the university authorities throughout Canada has been excellent. During the war years, as we know, the number of women students has largely increased while the number of men students has decreased, and in the interests of the future of the country it is absolutely essential, as the hon. member has said, that provision be made for the continued education of these young men when they return. Some went overseas at the age of eighteen or nineteen, and they are coming back at the age of twenty-two or twenty-three to resume their interrupted studies. Our experience is that for the first few days they find life a bit strange; but, to use their own language, they get back on the beam quickly and they stay on the beam. It is my opinion, and the opinion also of others who have come in contact with them, that these young men will be the stabilizing force in this country. They must be cared for and guided, and no expense should be spared to carry them forward to their objective; otherwise we are heading for disaster. These young men have given evidence of industry, diligence and seriousness and they are disciplined. They are the greatest asset that this country possesses at the present time.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I asked for some figures as to the approximate number of students who would require university training, whether or not the university facilities in Canada are sufficient and whether it would be possible to use some of the training school building equipment now there to meet the requirements. Or do the present facilities in Canada meet the requirements for university training? There will be many thousands coming from the army, as well, it must be remembered.

Mr. MACMILLAN: It is difficult to predict the number who will apply for university training. The universities of Canada at present are not adequately equipped for increased numbers, but they are making provision for the necessary equipment, in accordance with the demands that may be made, in extending buildings, laboratories and teaching personnel.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Does that apply to technical training across the country?

Mr. MACMILLAN: I understand it does.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: One matter on which I should like to secure some enlightenment has to do with the discharge of men from the air force and the various regulations that have been passed since October last with regard to drafting these men into the army. To begin with, there was a rule, if I remember rightly, that any of these men who had been in the air force for two years or over would not be subject to call-up in the army. Then in October that order was changed and provision was made that men were not subject to call if they had been in the air force for three years and over. Another change was made on January 15, making these men liable regardless of the time they had served in the air force, provided, of course, they had not served beyond the confines of Canada or in coastal patrol. If there is one thing more than another which we must endeavour to prevent it is the feeling of resentment and frustration in our armed forces. There were 4,200 discharged in the month of November and they went into civil life. Some of them accepted discharges and others in due course enlisted in the army. Upon their discharge from the air force they received the outfit allowance of $100. Then, later on, they joined, in many cases, voluntarily, the army believing that they would retain the outfit allowance which had been paid to them, and after they found their way into the army they were informed that monthly deductions would be made from their pay until the $100 had been repaid.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Pretty cheap.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is difficult for these young men to understand that. They entered the army after having received their discharges in the regular course of events, and it seems difficult to understand why such a picayune ruling should have been made. Particularly is that so when these same young men see discharged from the air force, because of oncoming age or the effluxion of time, senior officers receiving retirement allowances running into several thousands of dollars. I know of nothing—and this applies particularly to western Canada where quite a large number of the 4,200 come from—that has caused as much ill feeling as this action. I would ask whether something could not be done toward restoring the situation that prevailed and removing this order that is now in effect.

I have certain other questions to ask, but I should like an answer to this one. It has caused resentment and it seems inexcusable for the small amount recovered. These men are almost being penalized for having joined one branch of the service, agreeing to serve in all parts of the world; and then by the exigencies of service they find themselves unable to serve in the branch they desired and having assumed service in another branch they are actually made to pay back the amount to which they were entitled under the law for clothing allowance on discharge.

Mr. GIBSON: That is a matter on which I am not really in a position to speak because it comes under the jurisdiction of the army. The air force discharged these men and carried out the normal discharge procedure. It gave them a clothing allowance and leave with pay. When the first lot were let out it was understood that they would not be called up by selective service if they had had two years' service. Later on, that was extended to three years' service. Following that again, it was announced that the individual who had not had overseas service was liable to call for the army.

I might say that it did cause some confusion in the air force because we had adopted the policy, when we had to reduce to requirements, of giving the men the option of retiring if they had had so many years of service. A man who had had two or three years of service understood that he would not be called into the army if he was discharged. But then a change was made in the national selective regulations and these men wanted to stay in the air force instead of having to go into the army. So that we did suffer to some extent in our own force by having men who were in the process of being demobilized wanting to stay. We were not going to put them out against their will, so that our demobilization was really held up. We did keep in any who wanted to stay, and then in order to reduce to requirements we had to put out those who had the least service.

The refunding of the $100 clothing allowance is being done by the army, I understand, in order that a man will have $100 standing to his credit when he is eventually demobilized from the army. He has already drawn one clothing allowance, and it is not considered proper that when a man is serving through the war he should draw more than one clothing allowance. Therefore it is being built up by the army in that way. Whether any change has been made in the method is something that should be inquired into on the next estimates.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The principle is there. These men were discharged from the air force. The minister's argument does not appeal to me. Supposing a man is discharged from the army and later on reenlists, having again achieved a category that would permit reenlistment. There is no reason why he should be penalized through not receiving the money to which he was entitled on discharge. I ask the minister to give consideration to this matter. It is only a small matter, but it has caused ill feeling.

It is in connection with matters like this that parliament has a responsibility. I was pleased to hear what the Minister of Veterans' Affairs had to say this evening with respect to the order in council that was passed to-day. That matter was brought before parliament because of the consideration that had been given to it, because of the reinforced public opinion that had been brought to bear. As a result the payment of gratuities to estates is now provided. If it had not been for the creation of this public opinion, that matter might very well have remained in abeyance.

To-day the Prime Minister outlined in some detail the war effort of this country following the conclusion of hostilities in Europe. When he was asked certain questions he stated that they should be reserved for the ministers. Therefore I wish to direct certain questions to the minister with regard to the air force in particular.

According to the Prime Minister service in the Pacific area will be entirely on a voluntary basis. I have in mind men of the R.C.A.F. who are members of aircrew and ground crew in various parts of the east. Those men were sent there in the course of their duties and because of the service for which they had enlisted. When the war in Europe ends are those men to be given an opportunity of deciding whether or not they will continue to serve in the far east or be returned to Canada? That is a matter of particular importance, and an answer from the minister would be most helpful to the hundreds and thousands of Canadians who are serving to-day in faraway Pacific areas.

In Great Britain similar provisions are being made to those outlined by the Prime Minister to-day in connection with the demobilization of a portion of the armed forces after the conclusion of war in Europe. However, special provision has been made in Great Britain, and I believe also in the United States, for those men who decide to continue to serve after the conclusion of the war in Europe. They are to receive higher rates of pay or special allowances additional to those now being paid to men in service anywhere in the world.

Is it the intention to follow that system in this country and make provision for what in the British plan is called special campaign pay for Pacific forces? In October last the Canadian press carried an item to the effect that the announcement made to-day by the Prime Minister would be made some time about November 1. Mention was there made that the question of special campaign pay for Pacific forces would be decided and that when the plan was announced information in that regard would be forthcoming.

According to the plan announced some six months ago in the United Kingdom the special allowance for operations against Japan will range from $1.54 a week for the private who is willing to serve in the Pacific to £3.17.0 a week.

Mention has been made that the first in, first out principle is to be followed in demobilization. We might as well face the issue once and for all. Having regard to the collective responsibility of the cabinet I am sure the minister will be able to answer this question: What about the N.R.M.A. army in Canada? What about those who are unfit for overseas service? What about those who may be in process of training when the war in Europe ends? Are they to be discharged, with the exception of those who will be needed in agriculture or who have special qualifications for industry? Are they to be in a position where they will be able to secure the jobs that ordinarily would be available to men who have served longer in the war areas?

This is a matter that is exercising the minds of these men. We talk of rehabilitation plans, but first and foremost we must assure these men who have served the longest overseas that on their discharge from the armed forces positions will be available to them. One hears a great deal about the post-war period and what is to be done in the matter of rehabilitation. We hear it said that a job is to be secured for every man. I submit that before this special session is completed the Minister of Reconstruction should place before the house and the country something of the plans of this government to enable the membership of this house to place its collective views before the minister to the end that this very important matter shall receive consideration. The reason why I mention that is this. Someone this evening asked the question whether the Minister of Munitions and Supply was going to be available to the house before this debate concluded, and the answer given was, as I remember it: He will be here, or his parliamentary assistant, if there is sufficient time. Mr. Chairman, there is no more important matter than the rehabilitation of these men in the post-war period, and the man who should come before parliament is the minister himself, and not his parliamentary assistant. We have a right to know what the government's plans are. We have a right to know what actual scheme the government has other than glittering promises of jobs without the assurance that those jobs will be available. I do through you, Mr. Chairman, ask the government to assure this committee that the minister charged with this responsibility will be present in the house to place his plans before parliament.

There were some other questions that I might have dealt with, but these were the particular matters I desired to bring to the minister's attention. There is no unity about them, but I did not want to be continually rising, to ask questions. I ask the minister to place before the house and the country the answers to these questions.

Just one more word in regard to rehabilitation. I was very much impressed with the statement made by the parliamentary assistant with respect to the training these men are receiving in the universities and the fine way in which they are reacting to that training, but I feel that there is one change that should be made in this educational scheme. To-day we find that these young men returning to Canada after years of service overseas have to decide a most important matter, whether they will go into business, whether they will accept assistance under the Veterans Land Act, or take a secondary or university education, realizing that, whatever choice they make, it is final.

One thing which these young men bring to my attention is this, their fear that after years of experience in service, if they choose a university or secondary school education and suffer two failures there, they will lose not only the right to continue their educational course but also the other rehabilitation opportunities that otherwise would be open to them. I think that rule of two failures which results in an ex-serviceman being out his educational course should be changed and some discretionary power should be permitted to rest with the authorities to the end that those who are ambitious should not be denied the opportunity of continuing their education by reason of the fact that they have suffered two failures in the course.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is the case now in connection with vocational training. That discretion rests with the minister.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I realize that, but I would like the discretionary power to rest as well with the head of the educational institution in question.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): You cannot have control in that way.

Mr. MAYBANK: Would the minister's decision not depend to a considerable extent on the recommendation of the educational authorities?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Undoubtedly yes.

Mr. GIBSON: The hon. member for Lake Centre made some reference; I think he used the word "resentment" concerning the retiring allowances received by some permanent force officers who have retired from service. I think it ought to be made clear that the permanent force officers, who retire and receive a pension, are in the same position as civil servants, in that they have been contributing toward their pension during their period of service in the permanent force, and consequently they are not just receiving a pension from the government but something toward which they have been contributing during their whole period of service.

The hon. member also said that those now serving in the far east will be uncertain whether they will be asked to volunteer out there for further service without having an opportunity of coming back to Canada. I can assure my hon. friend that before any units are detailed for service in the east they will be brought back to Canada for thirty days' leave at least before their service recommences.

The question of higher rates of pay for servicemen in the east has not been considered at all. As a matter of fact, I heard of it for the first time to-day. It may be that because the rates of pay in the British forces are lower than the Canadian rates it is necessary to give them some increased amount. I do not know whether that applies to service generally in the east or only in the tropical areas. But we will give consideration to that and find out just what is being done and see if there is any justification for doing it with our own forces.

The hon. member for Davenport, whom I see in the house now, asked me for a breakdown by provinces of the personnel of the R.C.A.F. I have the figures here and with the consent of the committee I will put them on Hansard.

War Appropriation—Air Services

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Has the minister unanimous consent to place the figures on Hansard? I take it that that is agreed.

Mr. GIBSON: The figures are as follows:

Area of permanent residence	Strength as at Feb. 28, 1945
	R.C.A.F.	W.D.
Ontario .....	71,008	3,678
Quebec .....	19,070	868

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I should like to ask a few questions of the minister, but I preface them by expressing the common understanding that the minister is, of course, new to his department. Nevertheless some of the statements that he has made to-night will not upon a very close examination stand up against the actual facts.

The hon. minister says: First in, first out. The minister says that he has no cut and dried formula with regard to first in, first out. He knows, as his parliamentary assistant knows, and as we all know, that there is what might be termed a cut and dried formula with regard to first in, first out, and that the appeals which have been made to the hon. minister and the officers who ably surround him have fallen on deaf ears.

The hon. member for Yorkton said that some young men who had been living in the skies for the last three or four years wanted to stay in that service. The minister knows, as well as the rest of the members of the house, that they have been given no option in the matter but to be out, and that many of them were out on March 31, on Saturday last, without very much discretion or consideration being exercised by the minister and those charged with responsibility for that department.

I do not decry the idea of a cut and dried formula with regard to the conduct of war matters, nor do I decry it with regard to the conduct of this very important Department of National Defence for Air. But let us give some thought to these young men who during the last four or five years have known nothing but service in the R.C.A.F. and are suddenly cut off and asked to get out of that service. Observing what has been going on, I for one cannot sit idly here and listen to the minister when he makes the statement that there is no cut and dried formula. There is a cut and dried formula in the broad sense of the term, a formula which to my mind is working a hardship on the finer sensibilities of these fine young men who have done so much for us and for civilization during the last four or five years. I ask the parliamentary assistant who knows whereof I speak, who knows of the case of a boy who has been in the air 1,600 hours by day and 500 hours by night, if he did not within the last ninety-six hours say to me in the corridor, "No, nothing can be done for him; he must be demobilized." Yet we sit in this house and listen to replies from a ministry that says to us, "We have no cut and dried formula." I admit that the matter was not of sufficient moment for us to bring it to the attention of the minister, who is a very busy man, but it went through all the stages of departmental consideration, right up to the parliamentary assistant, who was told that I would be forced to mention the matter on the floor of the house. And we, members of the House of Commons, charged with the responsibility of getting consideration of those whom we represent, listen to these suave answers coming from the ministry, that "there is no cut and dried formula," and, I suppose, are expected to go home satisfied. I say that is not good enough. It matters not for us, but it matters for those young men between the ages of twenty-five and thirty who are the real citizens of Canada to-day, and who have had their finer sensibilities shocked by finding themselves discharged without consideration when, as the hon. member for Yorkton said, they want to stay in. Yet the minister rises in his place this evening and tells this honourable committee that those who want to stay in will be kept in, while within the last ninety-six hours we have evidence that those who want to stay in—and there are not many of them—find themselves summarily asked to get out, to put the thing in plain language. I hope that you, Mr. Chairman, and the minister will understand that I could not sit idly by and listen to that explanation when it is not borne out in fact.

May I close my remarks with the plea. Those who want to serve us—perhaps there are only one or two per cent—those who have been in the service for years and have striven to be of real service to us, do not summarily dismiss them. Surely there is some groove, some niche into which they can be fitted to carry on in this service. Although we are demobilizing the ninety or perhaps ninety-five per cent who want to return to civilian life, others, who are a real asset to Canada, should not be discouraged, should not be summarily dismissed, because this war is not over. It may be over as far as Europe is concerned, but the struggle will not end there. It was my privilege after many miles of travel to meet the Canadian boys who are known as the "Lost Squadron" of the Royal Canadian Air Force. I saw them six or seven months ago in India. I met them and reviewed them and learned that they felt they were the lost squadron of the R.C.A.F. I also learn that they had rescued many hundreds of survivors of merchant ships which were sunk by Japanese submarines. Patrolling the Indian ocean, they effected these rescues, many thousands of miles from where we are sitting to-night, and glad they were to give that service. Many scores of those whom you are summarily dismissing—"first in and first out"—would like to continue and to bring honour to Canada by services of that kind. Why, then, sit calmly here and assent to the minister's declaration that "those who want to stay in may stay in", when, at least in my humble opinion, that is not a statement of fact. Let them continue to serve in Indian waters and in the Pacific. As one of them said to me within the last two or three days, "If Canada does not want me, after the service I have given to this country in the air force, I will join up with the forces in China, or anywhere. But I want to stay in the air." I do not myself just understand that complex; but these are of a younger generation; and if they want to stay, let them stay where they can bring honour and credit to Canada; do not discharge them from their chosen vocation and put them in employments in which they are not anxious to serve.

Mr. GIBSON: When I was speaking of the question of policy of "first in and first out", I was referring to the matter of demobilization after the war. My hon. friend has got that twisted with the reduction of requirements which the air force was forced to bring into effect with the closing of the British commonwealth air training plan. Where it became necessary, on account of that reduction, to release men from the air force who were no longer required, the opportunity was first given to those with the longest service, if they so desired, to retire.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Whether they desired or not.

Mr. GIBSON: If a sufficient number did not wish to retire, those who had the least service, who had just come in and were eligible for call up in the army, were then released. That has been the policy which the air force adopted. It is not at all to be confused with the policy that is adopted in connection with demobilization after the war.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, April 5, 1945

The house met at three o'clock.

WAR SERVICE GRATUITIES

MERCHANT SEAMEN AND FIRE FIGHTERS

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I desire to table a regulation under the War Measures Act, made by order in council of April 4, 1945, P.C. 2239, amending the war service gratuity regulations.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Since the minister has laid this order in council on the table may I ask him if the government has under consideration the questions raised by various speakers in the house during this and other debates, in regard to bettering the situation of the merchant seamen and the Canadian firefighters, with respect to the war service grants and other matters?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I had no notice of this question but I can assure my hon. friend that from time to time all these matters are not only being considered by committees under the auspices of the general demobilization committee, but also discussed by the government. Every single matter mentioned in this debate has received consideration by the government.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does the minister think any further amendments are likely, by order in council or otherwise, during the sittings of this parliament?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The action taken by the government from time to time will be declared with due expedition.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

MOBILIZATION ACT—REINFORCEMENTS—ABSENCE WITHOUT LEAVE AND DESERTIONS

Mr. BRUCE:

1. How many of the 16,000 draftees lately made available by order in council for overseas duty are now overseas?

2. Have any of these men served in the 1st Canadian Army on the western front? If so, how many and in what units?

3. How many of these 16,000 are absent without leave?

4. How many of these A.W.O.L. are classed as deserters?

Questions

5. Have any of each class covered by questions 3 and 4 been apprehended? If so, how many?

6. How many of these have been tried by a court-martial and what has been the punishment given in each case?

7. Will all of these men be tried by court-martial?

8. Did these A.W.O.L. draftees have their rifles and ammunition with them?

9. If so, have such rifles and ammunition been recovered?

Mr. ABBOTT: Stand.

Mr. BRUCE: When may I expect an answer to this question, which has been on the order paper since March 19?

Mr. ABBOTT: I mentioned this matter the other afternoon. The answer will be given just as soon as we can get certain information from England, which we must have in order to answer the question. I think I may be able to give my hon. friend a good deal of the information in general fashion when I come to make my statement on the estimates, but some of the information for which he has asked has to be obtained from England, and they have been fairly busy over there the last little while.

RADIO LICENCES—RENÉ VÉZINA, MONTMORENCY VILLAGE

Mr. LaCROIX:

1. Was Mr. René Vézina, of Montmorency village, appointed group leader to take charge of door-to-door canvassing for the sale of radio licences in Montmorency village and on the island of Orleans, in the federal electoral district of Quebec-Montmorency, Quebec?

2. If so, on what date?

3. Has he been dismissed since? If so, on what date and for what reason?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. Yes.

2. March 6, 1945.

3. (a) Yes, March 20, 1945; (b) it was considered that Mr. Vézina, a student, could not devote sufficient time to a door-to-door canvas.

WARTIME INFORMATION BOARD—SALARIES AND LIVING EXPENSES

Mr. POULIOT:

1. What (a) salary, and (b) living allowance was paid to: Miss Hamel (External branch); Miss M. Mascoe (news desk section); Miss C. N. Logan (Latin-American section), and Miss C. M. Kuhn (magazine section) of the wartime information board?

2. What is, (a) their age; (b) their occupation, and (c) past experience?

3. What (a) salary, and (b) living allowance was paid to: Mrs. M. Fielden (news desk section); Mrs. B. Thompson (news desk section); Mrs. L. E. Bangs (air mail and cable section), and Mrs. E. Pulford (background information section) of the wartime information board?

[Mr. Bruce.]

4. What is, (a) their age; (b) their occupation; (c) past experience, and (d) the name and address of the husband of each one of them?

5. Who are the women, if any, who receive more than $3,000 per year in the wartime information board?

6. What is the occupation and salary (including living allowance) of each one of them?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. (a) Annual salary: Miss J. Hamel, $1,620; Miss M. Mascoe, $1,200; Miss C. N. Logan, $1,920; Miss C. N. Kuhn, $1,500. (b) Living allowance: Miss J. Hamel, none; Miss M. Mascoe, none; Miss C. N. Logan, none; Miss C. N. Kuhn, none.

2. (a) Age: Miss J. Hamel, 30; Miss M. Mascoe, 28; Miss C. N. Logan, 33; Miss C. N. Kuhn, 32. (b) Occupation: Miss J. Hamel, secretary; Miss M. Mascoe, stenographer; Miss C. N. Logan, editor (Spanish); Miss C. N. Kuhn, stenographer. (c) Past experience: Miss J. Hamel, secretary; Miss M. Mascoe, stenographer; Miss C. N. Logan, secretary (Spanish); Miss C. N. Kuhn, stenographer.

Remarks: Miss C. N. Logan resigned September, 1944; Miss C. N. Kuhn resigned February, 1945.

3. (a) Annual salary: Mrs. M. Fielden, $2,520; Mrs. B. Thompson, $1,080; Mrs. L. E. Bangs, $1,140; Mrs. E. Pulford, $1,380. (b) Living allowance: Mrs. M. Fielden, none; Mrs. B. Thompson, none; Mrs. L. E. Bangs, none; Mrs. E. Pulford, none.

4. (a) Age: Mrs. M. Fielden, 36; Mrs. B. Thompson, 49; Mrs. L. E. Bangs, 32; Mrs. E. Pulford, 39. (b) Occupation: Mrs. M. Fielden, editor; Mrs. B. Thompson, stenographer; Mrs. L. E. Bangs, stenographer; Mrs. E. Pulford, stenographer. (c) Past experience: Mrs. M. Fielden, newspaper reporting and free lance writing; Mrs. B. Thompson, stenographer; Mrs. L. E. Bangs, stenographer; Mrs. E. Pulford, stenographer. (d) Husband: Mrs. M. Fielden (P/O R. Fielden, killed in action 1941); Mrs. B. Thompson (H. Thompson, Bank of Nova Scotia); Mrs. L. E. Bangs (W. S. Bangs, R.C.A.F.); Mrs. E. Pulford (H. L. Pulford, M. & S., Ottawa).

Remarks: Mrs. B. Thompson resigned February, 1944; Mrs. L. E. Bangs resigned January, 1945.

5 and 6. Miss B. Thomas, radio officer, New York, $3,900 per annum.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ADDITIONAL CONTRACTS TO AIRCRAFT INDUSTRY IN WINNIPEG—LAY-OFFS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Munitions and Supply, notice of which I gave him earlier to-day. The minister will recall that on January 31 and February 1 he met a delegation of aircraft workers from Winnipeg, together with the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) and myself. A that time the minister indicated that additional contracts would be made available to MacDonald Brothers Aircraft, Limited, at Winnipeg, sufficient to prevent the lay-offs then pending. In view of the continuing lay-offs at this plant and the large numbers seeking work in Winnipeg, will the minister indicate whether the work which he promised for Winnipeg on February 1 has been made available, and if not will he make a statement respecting the situation?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I met a delegation of aircraft workers from Winnipeg, and told that delegation that while the contract for trainer planes was coming to an end another contract was being allocated to take its place. I pointed out that the new contract would not require the same concentration of workers as did the old one. That arrangement has been carried out. A very substantial new contract has been placed in the plant. I told the workers that a period for retooling would be required, and that the full effect of the new contract would not be felt until June. I believe that forecast is being carried out. I have no information as to how many men are employed now at MacDonald's, but I think the numbers are on the increase rather than on the decrease.

THE WAR

RESIGNATION OF JAPANESE GOVERNMENT—DENUNCIATION BY SOVIET GOVERNMENT OF NEUTRALITY PACT WITH JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this morning two separate but perhaps not unconnected events took place which are encouraging indications of growing Japanese difficulties.

First, we learned that the government of General Koiso had resigned. Before the Japanese leaders had had time to recover from their defeat at Iwo-Jima, they have received in the last few days an even more staggering blow, namely, the bombardment by the United States and British naval forces of the Ryukyu islands and successful landing by the United States forces on Okinawa, the largest island of this archipelago. Okinawa comprises a prefecture of Japan proper; hence this is the first invasion of the Japanese home land itself.

Secondly, we were informed by news broadcast originating from Moscow that the Soviet government had denounced its neutrality pact with Japan. This pact, as hon. members will recall, was signed in Moscow on April 13, 1941, and ratified by both governments on April 25 of the same year. This pact was neither a non-aggression treaty nor a treaty of friendship; it was strictly a limited neutrality pact. Article 3 of this pact reads:

The present pact comes into force from the day of its ratification by both contracting parties and remains valid for five years. In case neither of the contracting parties denounces the pact one year before expiration of the term, it will be considered automatically prolonged for the next five years.

Although the denunciation of this pact by the Soviet government does not itself change the formal diplomatic relations between the two governments we can be sure that this move of the Soviet government has added appreciably to the anxiety and difficulties of the Japanese war lords.

INTERNATIONAL COURT OF JUSTICE

INVITATION TO SEND CANADIAN DELEGATE TO MEETING AT WASHINGTON

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The Canadian government has received an invitation from the government of the United States, on behalf of itself and the governments of the United Kingdom, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the Republic of China, to send a representative to a meeting of the united nations committee of jurists, which will be convened at Washington on April 9, 1945, for the purpose of preparing a draft of the statute of the international court of justice.

In accepting this invitation, the United States government is being informed that the Canadian representative on the committee will be Mr. John E. Read, K.C., legal adviser of the Department of External Affairs.

The questions relating to the preparation of a statute for the establishment of an international court of justice have been studied by the Canadian Bar Association. Regional groups were organized representing the bench and bar of the different provinces of Canada meeting at Halifax, Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg; Edmonton, Vancouver and Victoria. The studies made by the regional groups were examined by a general committee of the Canadian Bar Association, including the president and all past presidents, as well as representatives of the regional groups. The committee was under the chairmanship of Chief Justice Farris of British Columbia, and the studies, as a whole, were under the direction of the President of the Canadian Bar Association, Mr. F. Philippe Brais, K.C., of Montreal. Close contact has been maintained at all stages with the American Bar Association, which has been following similar lines.

Privilege—Mr. Mackenzie King

In order to make the results of these studies available at the meetings in Washington, Mr. Philippe Brais and Chief Justice Farris have been asked to take part in the meeting of the committee of jurists, as advisers to the Canadian government.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MACKENZIE KING—REFERENCE TO EDITORIAL IN MONTREAL GAZETTE OF APRIL 5

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is one further matter to which I should like to refer, involving a question of privilege. I do not often rise to discuss articles appearing in the press, but this is one statement which I believe, in the form in which it appears, requires correction.

In an editorial entitled "The Unfairness Is To Be Maintained", appearing in to-day's Montreal Gazette, there appears the following paragraph:

The Prime Minister declared that Canada's war against Japan would be modest and vastly smaller than the war it is now waging against Germany. For this drastically curtailed participation he offered several explanations. On the one hand, he referred to the great spaces in the Pacific theatre and the difficulty of concentrating large bodies of men. But this explanation was followed by another of quite a different kind.

And then these words are quoted:

"The quota which Canada has undertaken to maintain is modest, having regard to our resources and our direct interest in maintaining and safeguarding the peace of the world."

If hon. members will look at Hansard they will observe that the passage referred to is an explanation following something which was stated before. It did not follow at all. As this paragraph reads, one would gather that the quota being referred to was the quota which Canada was sending to Japan. I was not speaking at that time about the quota which Canada was sending to Japan. I was speaking about the quota which would remain in occupied Germany for the purpose of controlling the situation there. The text is quite clear, as it appears at page 433 of Hansard:

In Europe it is necessary not only to secure complete victory, but that achievement must be confirmed, and the continued maintenance of peace assured. Where needed, after the cessation of military operations the inter-allied army will continue in occupation of Germany. The size of this force has been set to give continuing assurance that Germany will not be able to resist or evade the settlement which will be imposed on her.

The burden of maintaining this force will be shared among the allies and all will be appropriately represented.

From time to time, as progress is made, and as considerations of safety and security permit, reductions will be made in the size in this army of occupation.

The quota which Canada has undertaken to maintain is modest having regard to our resources and to our direct interest in the maintaining and safeguarding of the peace of the world.

Up to that time I had not begun to discuss the war with Japan. Yet this editorial states that my explanation as to the factors of distance and difficulty of concentrating great masses of men was followed by another quite different explanation with regard to the force which would be sent by Canada against Japan. It really would be most unfortunate if the country were to be misled by an editorial of the kind, and for that reason I draw attention to it.

VETERANS' LAND ACT

ALLEGED EXCESSIVE PAYMENTS FOR LAND IN WINDSOR AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Veterans' Affairs based on an article appearing in the Windsor Daily Star of March 27, 1945, and the Globe and Mail of to-day referring to a letter addressed to Paul Martin, K.C., member for Essex East and parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour. This letter which is from S. C. Askin, president of the Canadian real estate board, protests the payment of $20,000 under the Veterans' Land Act to Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Oliver of Sandwich West, for a farm of less than eighty acres. This is $250 an acre for land for which a farmer would not pay more than $75 an acre. This sale of the Oliver property to the, director under the Veterans' Land Act was recorded at the registry office in Windsor in January last. I believe the member for Essex East has brought the matter to the attention of the department. Will the minister say what investigation has been or is being carried out with respect to this property.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I have received no notice of my hon. friend asking these questions, but this matter was brought to my attention for the first time, I think yesterday. I am informed by the director of veterans land settlement that a thorough investigation has already been made and that this purchase was recommended by an advisory committee made up of some of the most estimable citizens of Windsor. A further investigation is now being made and discussions are to be held with those representing the real estate board of Windsor in regard to the prices paid for the land in question.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Wednesday, April 4, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Mr. Chairman, I have one or two questions I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence for Air. Perhaps one reason for my speaking is that a certain group of men have gathered in Ottawa in convention. I understand that they held a meeting at a certain house downtown to which I was not invited. However, I am informed that they wondered why the voice of Fraser Valley had not been heard. It is going to be heard now. Yesterday I happened to be walking down the corridor behind some of these gentlemen and I heard one of them say, "I do not suppose we will ever get in there." Another one in the group replied, "Oh, yes, we will; the member for Peterborough West is in there."

Mr. GRAYDON: Of course they were really looking at the senate.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The hon. member for Peel and I are very good friends. When the hon. member wanted to get away from the cares and worries of leading the opposition he came to the Fraser valley. I want to pay a compliment to the opposition. I was disappointed in the debate on the San Francisco conference, particularly the part taken by members from my own province. When the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) spoke I think he was just talking nonsense. However, when he spoke on veterans' affairs I think his speech was worthy of commendation. He offered some constructive criticism, something that I hope to do before I am through.

This group of seventy-five men have been gathered together in the city of Ottawa at tremendous expense. Apparently they have been disappointed in what they have seen in Ottawa, and I cannot blame them. I think the opposition has been very fair in its criticism of matters concerning veterans' affairs. I can understand the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) being a trifle disappointed and possibly a little bitter once or twice.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What about?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: If I had offered to give up my seat and then had to wait two and a half years to have it taken up so that I could go to the other place, I should be disappointed. As I say, I think the opposition has been fair in this matter, with the possible exception of the small opposition in the far corner, which might be termed a carbuncle, though they do not bother us at all. This group of men have come here from all over Canada at tremendous expense to the big interests of Toronto. I read an interesting thing in the Ottawa Journal of Tuesday, April 3. I should like to table this in order to save it in Hansard, because I do not blame this body for being disappointed. In a paid advertisement is listed the different amusements in the theatres and so on, and heading that list of amusements is the C.C.F. public meeting. It is stated that Mr. E. B. Jolliffe, the leader of the opposition in Toronto, is to speak.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is Mitch Hepburn going to be there?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Mitch Hepburn will be the leader of the next government in Ontario.

An hon. MEMBER: That would be an amusement.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Toronto has gone to considerable expense to bring these members—no, not members—

An hon. MEMBER: They will be.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That is very well spoken.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That is all right; you can make your speech later on. You have not nerve enough to try to make one. As I say, these gentlemen are here from all across Canada. I think it is an admirable idea because this is the only time they will see Ottawa. They are seeing it at the expense of Toronto; I come here on a pass.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I want to make a few suggestions. Every day the hon. member for Peterborough West gets up on the orders of the day and says, "I have something in my hand that I would like to ask about." I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence for Air a few questions.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): You listen to it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: When you have to fill in your time you have to listen to nonsense. I think the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) made a very good suggestion. There are members of the Liberal party who think that anything the Conservatives offer is wrong. There are also members of the Conservative party who think that anything the Liberal members offer is wrong. I agree with what the hon. member for Lake Centre said last night about asking men who had been discharged from the air force to pay back their clothing allowance, I think at the rate of ten cents per day. The Prime Minister is in his seat and I want to say that Canada is too big; our war effort is too wonderful to do anything like that. I read in last night's paper of what some of our men who have been prisoners of war have had to go through. As I say, Canada is too big a country, Canada is too generous a country to ask any man to pay back his clothing allowance. These men were given their discharges in good faith by the Department of National Defence for Air. I am not a lawyer but I doubt if this action would stand up in court. These men were given honourable discharges but because of the exigencies of service they have been recalled. As I have said, Canada is too big a country, too generous a country; Canada is too proud of her war effort to ask that this clothing allowance be paid back. If we have made a mistake, let us admit it. The people of Canada will not blame this or any other government for making a mistake provided it is honest enough to admit it. I feel very keenly about this matter, as do the people of my riding.

There is another point I should like to direct to the attention of the Minister of National Defence for Air. I think too many airmen who have done their tour of duty overseas and have been sent home to Canada are now being asked to return overseas, especially when so many qualified and experienced airmen in Canada are aching for a chance to get over. We have spent a lot of money training these men, although money does not matter, and surely they should be given the privilege of going over, even though it means some additional training, so that we may keep at home those men who have done their tours of duty.

There is one other matter I should like to bring to the attention of the Minister of National Defence for Air, and I intend also to bring it to the attention of the acting Minister of National Defence. I am not attempting in any way shape or form to detract from the magnificent record of our air force. But who is winning the war to-day? It is your infantry and your army, make no mistake about that. In any war it is the same thing. I want to suggest to the Minister of National Defence for Air that we in British Columbia, at least in my part of the province, and it is the finest part of the province, object strenuously to so many men in the air force—I do not want to let my eyes stray or my remarks might be misconstrued—fighting so gallant a battle in Canada throughout the duration. Speaking as an old soldier I cannot understand how a man can be discharged from the air force to play professional hockey when he cannot peel potatoes in the air force. It does not make sense to me. I do not play hockey myself, but I cannot understand how a man can play hockey for a team under the managership of a man from Toronto who says we have not enough trained troops when he cannot peel potatoes or do some other useful work in the air force, while at the same time farmers' sons are being called up every day in the western provinces. There is no question about that. These members of the air force are being discharged to play professional hockey while farmers' sons are being called up. If the R.C.M.P. want to find some deserters they should go around to the N.H.L. and Conny Smythe. I shall not take up any more time now but I shall have something to say when the army estimates are before the committee. It is the army that is winning the war, and they are entitled to consideration.

I will leave one word with the opposition.

An hon. MEMBER: We can look after ourselves.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: A ship without a rudder cannot go very far, or a party without a leader. The opposition have been clamouring all along for an opportunity for the people to decide who shall run this country for the next four years. All right; why not close this house to-night and let the people decide? An hon. member beside me says that you cannot do that. I say that every dollar of expenditure voted now has to be supervised by the new parliament, and so if the opposition have confidence that they are going to win, let them go to the country and let the people decide.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I would ask the minister or the parliamentary assistant to give a little more information regarding the personnel of the counsellors to whom he referred yesterday. I would like information regarding the nature of the qualifications required of those who take that course, the number of counsellors who have already trained, the number of those trained who are actually now engaged in counselling, the number, if any, of those counsellors who have been discharged, and the number who are back in their units.

I have a second series of questions regarding vocational training. First of all, just what is being done to provide accommodation, facilities and equipment across the country within our educational system for the vocational training of men discharged from the air force as well as from the other services? I have heard said that much of the vocational training is for trades which require very little training, similar to some of the training that was done at the end of the last war. I noticed that at the end of the last war a great many soldiers were trained for the barber trade, for instance, or for a great many other trades that required very little training and very little expenditure. Is provision being made to-day for anyone discharged to be trained say in toolmaking or other vocations which require lengthy training and involve the expenditure of a considerable amount of money?

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Defence for Air): The member for Fraser Valley raised the question of clothing allowance being recovered from members of the air force who have been discharged. As I stated last night, the clothing allowance is not being recovered by the air force from those discharged who are called up for the army. It is being recovered by the army and a fund is being built up for the men when again they are discharged from the army. That is a matter that should be taken up I think when the army estimates are under consideration.

As regards the returning of aircrew from overseas, when a man has completed an operational tour he is, where possible, retained in this country. But a certain number are required to do a second tour, as it is necessary to have squadron leaders with experience to lead groups of the new men when they go over, and so a certain number are required to take a second tour.

The hon. member for York South asked as to the personnel of counsellors. I have not the figures here, but I will have the information prepared that he asked for and let him have it.

He also asked what provision was being made for training men discharged from the air force and the other services in certain trades. That matter comes under the Department of Labour, and I will ask the Minister of Labour to answer that question.

I should like to answer a question asked last night by the hon. member for Rosedale. He asked for the percentage distribution of R.C.A.F. flying personnel by officers and other ranks, and suggested that the Canadians serving with the R.A.F. did not have as high a percentage of officers as we have in our own Canadian squadrons. I am glad to say that this list which I will place on Hansard, shows that the percentage is very much the same; that the R.C.A.F. attached to the R.A.F. overseas have sixty-two per cent of officers. With the permission of the committee I will now place the list on Hansard:

Percentage Distribution of R.C.A.F.

Flying Personnel

By Officers and Other Ranks*

Group	Per cent Officers	Per cent N.C.O.'s
R.C.A.F. units overseas.....	63	37
R.C.A.F. attached to R.A.F. overseas .....	62	38
R.C.A.F. in Canada.....	66	33
R.C.A.F. in Canada and R.C.A.F. units overseas...	65.4	34.6
Total trained R.C.A.F. flying personnel .....	64.8	35.2

*Excludes undergraduate aircrew trainees.

Mr. MITCHELL: My estimates are not before the committee, but the hon. member for York South asked about vocational training for those discharged from the armed forces. Since 1941, when France fell, we have trained upwards of 400,000 people under the Labour department in cooperation with the provincial governments, and from that my hon. friend will appreciate the fact that we have the mechanics and the machinery to carry the load of training those discharged from the armed forces. My hon. friend spoke of toolmaking. That is one of the highly specialized metal trades. If my hon. friend has had any experience of the metal trades he must know that you cannot train toolmakers in a school; you have to train them in industry itself. I admit you can give a man the basic principles of mechanics in a technical school, but his real education as a toolmaker must come by experience in the industry itself; it cannot be obtained out of a book.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I did not suggest that training could be given in schools, but what I wanted to know was whether the government is making provision by which men discharged from the forces can secure education and training in those more advanced vocations. I quoted toolmaking as being one of these.

Mr. MITCHELL: May I say that I was an electrician, at least I thought I was, and I served an apprenticeship of four years. I would say that a toolmaker's is a more highly skilled trade, because, as I sometimes say, you can often get lots of brigadiers but you cannot get many toolmakers. The only way I know in which a man can finish his training as a toolmaker is in the industry itself. My hon. friend, as a school teacher, knows that all you can give in a school is basic principles.

I remember going to a technical school in order to increase my knowledge of the trade to which I was apprenticed as a boy; but I do not think it is practical or possible to learn such a business from a book or any school.

Mr. REID: It just cannot be done.

Mr. MITCHELL: As the hon. member for New Westminster just said, it just cannot be done. If my hon. friend knows of any way in which the time it takes to make a toolmaker can be shortened, I should be very glad to learn of it.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: The minister still has not answered my question. Is the department making any provision whereby the men who take such part of the course, let us say in toolmaking, as they can get in a school, can be assisted, after completing their technical training in the school, to become proficient in toolmaking or any of the other mechanical trades which require training additional to that which is received in the schools?

Mr. MITCHELL: I thought I had answered my hon. friend. I suppose he knows as much about these things as I do. I do not believe that any agency, government or other, can insist that an employer should employ any individual. The proof of the pudding is in the eating of it. Speaking of toolmaking, it was estimated at the outbreak of the war that there were in Canada 2,300 toolmakers. That is not very many. The situation was considered to constitute a bottleneck in the machine tool industry in 1941 and 1942. Notwithstanding that, we built up the largest industrial structure in the history of this country. My hon. friend can rest assured that machinery mechanics are there, and that training for those young men—I might say, in a general way—will be available to them should they desire it. As the Minister of Veterans' Affairs has already pointed out, although 200,000 have already been discharged from the armed services it has only been necessary for his department and mine to make provision for the training of 7,040 of those who have been discharged. I think the question put by my hon. friend is largely academic.

Mr. HAZEN: Have any members of the R.C.A.F. who were prisoners of war escaped or been released by reason of the advance of the Russian army into eastern Germany? A number of German prisoner of war camps were in the eastern part of their country, and as the Russians advanced they were moved from time to time. Some of the wives and relatives of our prisoners of war are concerned as to their present whereabouts. Also, would the minister let us have the number of casualties in the R.C.A.F. since the outbreak of war, and the number of prisoners the Germans have belonging to the air force? Would he also let us know the number of casualties, breaking down the figures to show the number in aircrew and the number in the ground force?

Mr. GIBSON: The figures for casualties, accumulated from September 9, 1939 to February 28, 1945, give a grand total of 18,206 lost on service. Of these, 8,842 were officers and 9,364 other ranks. I have not yet any particulars as to whether members of the R.C.A.F. have been released from prison camps on the Russian front, but as soon as any word is received of course their relatives will be notified.

Mr. HAZEN: The minister did not give us any breakdown of casualties as between ground crew and the aircrew. Has he those figures?

Mr. GIBSON: I have not those broken down as between ground crew and aircrew, but I can get that information.

Mr. HAZEN: The minister did not mention, either, how many members of the R.C.A.F. were prisoners of war. Has he those figures?

Mr. GIBSON: No, I have not the number of prisoners of war, but I can get that for my hon. friend.

Mr. HAZEN: The other evening, when the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services presented his statement, he said that in 1941 the government took the view that the post-war navy should consist of, in round figures, 9,000 officers and men. Has any consideration been given by the government to the strength of the R.C.A.F. after the war?

Mr. GIBSON: The R.C.A.F. staff have been compiling alternative plans for the post-war air force. No definite decision has been reached as to what the air force will consist of after the war. I think it depends to some extent on what international relations have been built up by the end of hostilities. We have not at the present time any definite plan as to what it will consist of.

Mr. HAZEN: Is it the government's intention to keep open the air school at Pennfield Ridge and the ones in Charlottetown and Chatham, New Brunswick? What is the nature of the instruction being given there at the present time?

Mr. GIBSON: Pennfield is an operational training unit and it is being kept open for that purpose.

Mr. HAZEN: Is it the intention to continue it?

Mr. GIBSON: While operational training continues it will be continued.

Mr. HAZEN: Is there any possibility of reopening the school at Chatham, New Brunswick, which has been closed?

Mr. GIBSON: I would not say there is no possibility, but there is little likelihood of it.

Mr. FAIR: In the past provision has been made to train men on their discharge from the air force. Are any restrictions placed on the officers who arrange for that training? I have in mind men who left the teaching profession to join the air force and after discharge desired to take university training. I understand that several teachers have been refused such training. They have been told that they are now school teachers and can earn a living in that profession. I think we all realize, however, that many people who enter the teaching profession regard it as a stepping stone to something better in the future, and I am wondering whether teachers who have been discharged from the air force should not be encouraged and given university training.

Mr. MITCHELL: That comes under my department, and I might as well answer it now. There has been, particularly in my hon. friend's own province, a great shortage in the teaching profession. At one time in some provinces it was intimated to me that many schools would have to close down. That was so about a year ago, and that condition still exists. It is essential that we have some control over the teaching profession, just as we have over coal mining, base metals and so forth down through the line. No one appreciates more than I do what my hon. friend has said about school teaching being sometimes the basis of a career, but until labour conditions are stabilized in the country—and I am speaking in the broader sense—it is essential that we should have some control and should see that the younger people are given the necessary education in order that they may go on to university. I shall be just as happy as my hon. friend when we no longer have control over any civilian in the community, and that goes for school teachers and everyone else.

Mr. FAIR: I had no particular reference to Alberta. I was speaking of the teachers in Canada as a whole. In the press a couple of days ago I noticed something to the effect that there would be a "defreezing" of certain positions after September 1. If the reason the minister has given explains the fact that teachers have not been allowed to go on to university, will that restriction be removed after September 1?

Mr. MITCHELL: I referred to Alberta only because my hon. friend happens to come from that province. I can assure him that my department cooperates with all the provincial governments, and we have had no better cooperation than we have had from Alberta. But while we are defreezing positions, to use my hon. friend's language, the teaching profession will be in A priority.

Mr. FAIR: That is not exactly what I wanted to find out. I want to know whether that restriction, if it has been due to a shortage of teachers, will be removed when the requirements have been fully met.

Mr. GIBSON: These matters should be left until the Department of Labour comes up. They have nothing to do with the air department.

Mr. CASE: I want to make representations to the minister on behalf of the dependents of air force personnel. This really applies to all services, but since we are dealing with the air minister's department I would urge these representations upon him. I was pleased to note from the statement made by the Minister of Veterans' Affairs that the gratuity portion will go to the deceased veteran's estate. I would urge the government to consider paying the rehabilitation credit to the widow of the deceased soldier, airman or naval rating. I can understand the great necessity for this in view of their position, where they are left practically on their own. I would also recommend that the government give consideration to a policy which would make provision for small loans to small businesses. I understand that the provision at the present time is quite extensive and makes allowance for large sums of money, but at the moment there are in my own riding individuals who could use credit to good advantage and who would be worthy of it. I think that consideration should be given to the question of small loans for small businesses.

Mr. GIBSON: I will refer these matters to the Minister of Veterans' Affairs, seeing that they come under his department. In answer to the hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. Hazen), who asked for the total number of prisoners of war in the air force, the number of prisoners of war and interned as at March 31 was 2,216.

Mr. MAYBANK: I desire to revert to the subject of men who have been discharged from the air force and called into the army being required to pay back the $100 clothing allowance. What is the situation with reference to men in the air force who have been placed on the reserve list? If they have been granted the $100 allowance and are called back into the air force, are they required to return that $100 as is now done when they are called up by the army? It is not so with reference to men off reserve.

Mr. GIBSON: Those who are transferred to reserve get the clothing allowance. If they are called up it is proposed that it be not deducted.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is a matter upon which I should like to secure some information. It has to do with the retirement of a number of senior officers in the air force during the past year or so. Recently there was the retirement of Air Marshal Breadner, and not very long ago the retirement of another high officer. What is the basis upon which retirement allowances are made? These senior officers have given years of service—22, 23, 25 and 28 years—and are retired at the age of 49, 50 and 51 and in the main they receive allowances that are exceptionally large.

I am going to bring to the attention of the minister certain of these officers who have retired, to ascertain from him why their services should not have been utilized. I mention particularly at the moment Air Marshal Edwards, Air Vice Marshal Kenny, Air Vice Marshal Croil, Air Vice Marshal Godfrey, Air Vice Marshal Cuffe, and Air Vice Marshal Shearer. These men retired in 1943 or 1944, prior to March 17 of the latter year. The minister pointed out last evening that they retired under a system whereby they contributed five per cent of their annual salary to a fund from which the pension was payable; but the striking point in connection with these officers is the fact that if at the outbreak of war, in 1939, Air Marshal Edwards, for instance, had been retired at his then rank, the amount he would have received as pension would have been $2,484 a year. In a matter of less than four years, as a result of his service and the boosts in rank that took place during that period, his pension became $5,744.61 a year. In the case of Air Vice Marshal Kenny he would have received $2,464; when he retired his pension was $4,170.40. In the case of Air Vice Marshal Croil the amount would have been $3,450 at the beginning of the war; by the time he retired it was $5,600. Air Vice Marshal Godfrey would have received $3,024; at the time of his retirement he received $5,720.15. Air Vice Marshal Cuffe would have received $3,072, in 1939 and at retirement it had increased to $5,026.80, while Air Vice Marshal Shearer's pension increased from a possible $2,376 to $5,027 at time of retirement in 1939.

[Mr. Maybank.]

Could not some use have been made of the services of these men? It may be argued that when they were moved out of the way it created an opportunity for the advancement of others. But these are experienced men. When the minister replied to the leader of the opposition in regard to the retirement of Air Marshal Breadner, on March 20, he mentioned rumours. Why would a man with the ability and training of Air Marshal Breadner be retired at a time when his services could not but be valuable to the country? The explanation given by the minister was not very reassuring. He was asked whether or not Air Marshal Breadner agreed with the decision that had been arrived at under which the unusual arrangement—to use the minister's words—that had previously existed for reporting was changed after the present minister took office.

Mr. SLAGHT: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Oh, yes.

Mr. SLAGHT: Am I correct in my recollection that after the incident mentioned by my hon. friend Air Marshal Breadner declared publicly that he agreed with his retirement, as a proper step to have been taken?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, Mr. Chairman, now we have another under-secretary. I am directing my question to the minister, and I do not think he will need the assistance even of the hon. member for Parry Sound. The minister will be able to answer without that help.

Mr. SLAGHT: As I understood him, the hon. member said he would permit a question. Now he evades the answer. He can do that if he wishes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am not under cross-examination by my hon. friend.

Mr. SLAGHT: That is the usual alibi when a gentleman permits a question and then refuses to answer.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: After all, Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman can make his speech, or even carry on some cross-examination. The fact remains that it is unusual to see him here, and I am glad he is in his seat today. I am directing my question to the minister and asking him whether there was any disagreement.

Mr. SLAGHT: In reply to that intended slur, let me tell my hon. friend that his eyesight is very bad because I am in my place as frequently as he is in his.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The question asked by the hon. member for York-Sunbury, at page 16 of Hansard, was as follows:

Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury): But the fact remains that he did not concur in the new arrangement.

Mr. Gibson: I did not say that.

Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury): I am saying it.

Mr. Gibson: I would not say that.

Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury): Did he agree or did he not agree?

After some further words by the hon. member for York-Sunbury the minister replied:

Mr. Gibson: I did not say he did not concur in the new arrangement. I said he did not wish to remain on under the new arrangement.

I think some clarification is due in this case. Air Marshal Breadner gave great service. It is true, as the hon. member for Parry Sound says, that after this discussion took place in the house Air Marshal Breadner did make the statement the hon. member mentioned. He did say that; but in the way he answered the question the minister left the impression that all was not well in this regard. I think the country has a right to know why the existing arrangement was changed. What was the reason for the change? What allowance will Air Marshal Breadner receive following his retirement from the force? I should like also to obtain from the minister a list of all officers of the rank of air vice marshal and senior thereto who have been retired from July 1, 1944, to date, and the amount each receives by way of pension.

Mr. GIBSON: Those who have been retired since July, 1944, were Air Vice Marshal Cowley, Air Vice Marshal Stephenson, Air Vice Marshal Ferrier, Air Vice Marshal Anderson, and Air Marshal Breadner. Air Vice Marshal Ferrier receives a pension of $5,027.65. Air Vice Marshal Cowley receives $4,730.93, and Air Vice Marshal Stephenson, $5,566.32. The pensions of Air Vice Marshal Anderson and Air Marshal Breadner have not yet been fixed. I understand an approximation is that Air Vice Marshal Anderson will receive in the neighbourhood of $5,148 and Air Marshal Breadner in the neighbourhood of $7,028.

I was asked on what basis these pensions are fixed. I would say they are set both in consideration of length of service and also the rank and appointment the man was holding at the time of his retirement. Those matters are all laid down in pension regulations, and I should say they are more or less automatic. It has been suggested that if these officers had retired prior to the war they would have received lower pensions. Of course that is quite true, and they would be retired with considerably lower rank. It must be remembered that the air force has expanded tremendously during the war. Those who had been in the permanent force before the war naturally received promotion in order to hold senior positions in the greatly expanding air force. And with those promotions and additional responsibilities they, of course, became entitled to higher pensions upon retirement.

It has been suggested that we should not retire senior officers. In a young force, such as the air force, in which the men comprising the force are youthful, it would be most discouraging if they felt that all the positions at the top were filled, and that when they reached an age when they would cease flying there would be no staff positions available for them. Consequently there has been a progression in the senior ranks, making way for those down below.

I am sorry indeed that any words of mine should have created an impression that there was any disagreement with Air Marshal Breadner upon his retirement, because there was certainly none at all. As I said before, when he went to England he went on a special arrangement whereby he reported directly to the minister. He had been chief of air staff in Ottawa, the highest position in the air force. When he went to England he was overseas chief of staff and reported direct to the minister. It was decided that the overseas representative should come under the chief of staff here. Air Marshal Breadner agreed with that, and also agreed that his retirement should be proceeded with, that he had reached the top, and that he should make way for others coming along. There was no disagreement whatsoever. I think the statement Air Marshal Breadner himself made in England cleared up that point very well indeed.

Mr. BROOKS: I should like to revert to a question I asked the minister last night. I was not altogether satisfied that I understood his answer. My question had reference to the young men joining the army from the reserve air force. I know there are many officers and many non-commissioned officers involved. In his reply the minister stated:

If a man transfers to the army he would not be subject to recall to the air force. He would sever his connection entirely; because the army could not operate if we had strings on a large number of its officers.

That applies to officers. Does it apply to sergeants? My question is whether the same rule applies to sergeants as applies to officers who join the army from the air force. Could the non-commissioned officers return later to the air force if they received a call from that branch of the service?

Mr. GIBSON: It is rather indefinite, in this way: We have sergeants who are on aircrew. Those sergeants on aircrew are transferred to the R.C.A.F. reserve, and if they went into the army they would not normally be callable back to the air force. If an officer washed out for his commission he would be taken back to the aircrew reserve of the air force. Respecting non-commissioned officers who are ground crew, and who are being demobilized I would say that they are not put on air force reserve. They are given their discharge, and if they go into the army they are in the army and there is no return for them to the air force.

Mr. BROOKS: I understand that. Is it the answer, then, that officers and non-commissioned officers from aircrew who go into the army are not subject to call again to the reserve, should their services be required?

Mr. GIBSON: They are not recallable to the air force.

Mr. BROOKS: When I happened to have the privilege of being overseas not so long ago I had the honour of visiting some of the Canadian squadrons in Yorkshire, England. I was proud indeed of the work being done by those squadrons, and was thrilled to see them going out on their flights. It is my understanding that thirty-four flights is considered a tour of duty; is that correct?

Mr. GIBSON: I should not wish to be quoted in my statement as to a tour of duty, because a tour may vary, according to the type of aircraft flown. For instance, a bomber tour may be quite different from a fighter tour. Thirty-four flights might be proper for one group.

Mr. BROOKS: That was the required number in the squadron I happened to visit, and it occurred to me that it was a large number. Has the department ever considered the possibility of lowering the number of flights in a tour so as to make it possible for some of those young men who have been trained and who are anxious to go overseas—and there are thousands of them—to take the place of other men who have had a number of tours? I saw a number of the men in our air force, and it seemed to me that many of them were tired and would welcome a lowering of the number of flights required in a tour. I mention this as a possible solution of the problem facing the minister of arranging for the sending of these men overseas.

Mr. GIBSON: Tours to-day are much lighter than they were in the early part of last year, in that at that time an aircraft leaving England had to fly a considerable distance over enemy territory or enemy occupied territory before reaching its target. To-day many aircraft can fly over allied territory, and be over occupied territory for only a very short time before returning to base. So that the risk involved in a tour is now considerably less than it was formerly. One other point comes up, and that is that pilots gain knowledge through experience. It is considered that as a man approaches the end of his operational tour he is more valuable to his squadron than a new man would be. The result is that we would not want to cut down tours to a point where our bombing squadrons would consist almost entirely of inexperienced men. Where a second tour is required it is always considerably shorter than the first one.

Mr. BROOKS: But is it not a fact that when bomber crews are made up they are placed first on easy flights, that they gain experience in that way, and later are given the more difficult flights? It seems to me these young men could be given the easier flights at first, so that they could work their way up to the more difficult ones.

Mr. GIBSON: I understand that that is done.

Mr. PERLEY: I should like to bring a special case to the attention of the minister. At the outset however may I express my appreciation of the treatment and courtesy I have received from the parliamentary assistant to the minister. On several occasions he has helped me iron out difficult problems, and I take this opportunity of thanking him.

As I believe the parliamentary assistant will recall, this case concerns a prisoner of war who wanted to be transferred from the R.A.F. to the R.C.A.F. This case is special through this man being the first Canadian to be taken prisoner overseas. He was flying before the war broke out and he went to England when the show started, to join the R.A.F. He was taken prisoner and has been a prisoner for more than five years. The last word his mother had from him was that he expected to be released. I do not know how it got through in a letter, but he said the Russians were very near to the camp. You will realize that if this boy had been able to get his transfer to the R.C.A.F. he would have been drawing a much higher rate of pay.

Then there is the question of gratuities when these prisoners are released and returned to Canada. Upon what basis will gratuities be paid? Will special consideration be given to a case such as the one I have mentioned? There was no possible way of this boy getting a commission or any decoration for valour. He has been a prisoner from the very start, but that fact should not be held against his getting some special consideration.

This is an interesting case in another way. A boy with whom he went to school joined the R.C.A.F. and was also taken prisoner about four and a half years ago. He happened to land in the same camp and they have been together ever since. The boy who was in the R.C.A.F. receives higher pay than the boy who was in the R.A.F., yet they were raised together, went to school together and were taken prisoner within six months of each other. I hope I have made it clear that this is a special case through this man being the first Canadian to be taken prisoner of war.

I should like to say a word with respect to boys who have been discharged. Within the last two months five boys from my own town have been discharged, all of them having been overseas for four or more years. I took up their cases with the minister and I am glad to be able to say that three of them are now in the university while the other two are on the way to getting satisfactory employment. The matter of university training came up this afternoon, and I thought I should direct the attention of the committee to what has been done in these cases.

Mr. GIBSON: A large number of boys went over to join the R.A.F. after the outbreak of war and many of them have been permitted to transfer to the R.C.A.F. As to the particular case mentioned by my hon. friend, I do not know just when this young man joined the R.A.F., and whether he would be entitled to transfer.

Mr. PERLEY: He was flying in Canada for a short while before war broke out. He was anxious to get into things and he went over right away because he thought that was the only way he could do it.

Mr. GIBSON: A commission cannot be put through until the prisoner of war is released, because it is necessary for him to have the usual medical examination. When this man is released and puts in an application for transfer it will certainly be considered.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): There is one matter I should like to bring to the attention of the minister, a matter which my colleague from Halifax and I have already brought to the attention of the former minister of national defence for air and the parliamentary assistant. I refer to the case of Harold M. Cassidy of Halifax. Mr. Cassidy is a veteran of the first great war. He enlisted for overseas and served with one of the infantry battalions from Nova Scotia. When the present war broke out he felt that he should play some part in it; he offered his services and finally secured employment with the R.C.A.F. as a barracks officer. He was taken on the strength of the eastern air command in November, 1941. I am informed that he was assured by the officials of the eastern air command that he would be given free quarters and rations. I may say the salary of a barracks officer is a very modest one.

Mr. Cassidy was transferred to Gander airport in Newfoundland. Upon arrival there he found that the promises of accommodation were not going to be met. He protested, strongly, and finally authorization was obtained to have him paid an allowance of $1.70 per day effective from April 1, 1942, several months after his arrival in Newfoundland. He received that allowance up until the time he left Newfoundland, and no question arises as to that. However, he never did receive an allowance for the period of his stay in Newfoundland up to April 1, 1942. He continued to protest, but he did not get any satisfaction. Not only did he get no satisfaction but on the contrary one of his pay cheques was withheld and some deductions made to cover mess charges alleged to have been incurred by him at Gander. He claimed they had all been paid, and I must say that his position was supported by what were apparently clear receipts which he had obtained when he left Gander. It must be remembered that the justness of Mr. Cassidy's claim was recognized when authorization was given by the treasury board, or whatever authority it was, to pay him an allowance from April 1, 1942. It would seem to me that when that principle was recognized the authorities also recognized that there was some injustice being done him which demanded a remedy and that therefore payment of his allowance should be made effective as of November, 1941.

I would urge upon the minister that he constitute himself, or have his deputy constitute himself a jury of one to look into the facts of this case. I have a lengthy file on it, but the material facts could be summed up and made available in a very few minutes. My colleague and myself have devoted a good deal of time to this case, and I am sure that if the minister or his deputy would deal with it as a jury would, there will be no hesitation in meeting Mr. Cassidy's demands. I have mentioned the matter to the parliamentary assistant, and I have no doubt that he has looked into the file. I told him yesterday that I was going to mention it to-day.

Mr. GIBSON: I understand that this Cassidy case is rather complicated and has some unusual features. It has been under consideration in the department for some considerable time and I shall be glad to look into it.

Mr. BENICE: I am not entirely satisfied with the explanation that has been given in the case of Air Marshal Breadner and the substantial pensions which are being paid to members of the air force who are now being retired. I must say that I agree personally with the stand which the minister took when he assumed this portfolio and decided that the situation should go back to what it was prior to Air Marshal Breadner's going overseas, when the officer who then held that position had to report through the chief of the air staff in this country. It is obvious, it seems obvious to the public, that Air Marshal Breadner was anxious to go overseas. I do not know him personally. I presume that he is an admirable officer and certainly he had a good war record. He wished to go overseas and to have while serving overseas the compensations he enjoyed in connection with income tax and all that kind of thing, but he refused to accept the discomforts of the situation of having to report to a new chief of air staff, having himself held that high position in Canada, and instead reported direct to the minister.

Mr. POWER: Perhaps I can straighten my hon. friend on that point, because I had something to do with it. Air Marshal Breadner did not have anything to do with it. I ordered him to report direct to me. I take all the responsibility.

Mr. BENICE: Possibly now that the member for Quebec South is in the house he might explain after I am through why Air Marshal Breadner should not report to the chief of air staff in this country, and why a man who is as young as Air Marshal Breadner should be allowed to retire at this time merely because of the fact that he does not wish to report to the chief of the air staff in this country. It seems to me that men in high positions in the forces, particularly in the permanent force, are allowed to do things which junior men of the forces are not allowed to do. Why should Air Marshal Breadner be given the opportunity of retiring when there is a war on? A man with his talents should be retained in the service of his country. I do not think that personal convenience should be taken into consideration in this matter at all. After all, the war is still on and we should take advantage of the services of these men.

Last year I took up the matter that has been referred to by the hon. member for Lake Centre, the substantial pensions now being paid to members of the permanent force owing to the fact that we have had a war. I know that the public do not understand why anybody or any particular branch of the service should be able—may I put it this way, and not unkindly?—to profit to the substantial extent they can do because of the promotions in rank that they have had in the last four or five years. The public just do not understand why a man who, if he had retired five years ago, would have received a pension of $2,400 is now allowed to retire on a pension of over $5,000 when he is still around fifty. Most of us in this house who are fifty think we are still young and capable of performing useful service to our country. I think these men could have been retained in the service with profit to Canada. I would ask the minister to let us know the total amount being paid in pensions to permanent members of the air force who have retired.

The minister referred to war service gratuities coming under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Veterans' Affairs, which department has to look after the big problems that arise in connection with the veterans. I wish the minister would give some consideration, if he has not already done so, to the Canadians who joined the R.A.F. either before the war or after the beginning of the war and subsequently were attached to the R.C.A.F. I have a communication from the minister's department to the effect that these men, or their widows in case of their death, are not entitled to the war service gratuity that is being paid to members of the R.C.A.F., despite the fact that in some cases they have been attached for a number of years to the R.C.A.F. and have been performing duties with the R.C.A.F. The matter was particularly drawn to my attention by the case about two years ago of a man from my own city who had been attached to the R.C.A.F. for about two years, although he was a member of the R.A.F., having gone over to England either prior to the war or at the beginning of the war. As the minister knows, the difference between the pension that the British government pays to the widow and what the Canadian government normally pays in respect of a man killed in the service of his country is made up by the Canadian government. What happened in this case was that the British government paid a gratuity to the widow, and when the Canadian government started to pay the difference in the pension they deducted so much per month to take care of the gratuity that had been paid to the widow by the British government. The point I am trying to arrive at is this. In view of the fact that this government and other governments have taken the stand that the widow of a man killed in the service of his country is entitled to be pensioned at the rate this country pays, it seems to me that the same stand should be taken in connection with war service gratuities, and that this widow should be entitled to the war service gratuity she would have received if her husband had joined the R.C.A.F. instead of going over to England and joining the R.A.F. at the beginning of the war. I draw that to the minister's attention because it seems to come within the purview of his department, and I think should be drawn to the attention of the Minister of Veterans' Affairs.

Mr. GIBSON: It is true that the difference between the R.A.F. and the R.C.A.F. gratuity will be paid by Canada if the airman was domiciled in Canada at the outbreak of the war and returns to Canada and makes a claim within one year of his discharge. That brings up the question of the man who prior to the war had gone overseas and joined the R.A.F. or the British army and had ceased to be a Canadian citizen and had become a British subject. They do not qualify. Otherwise the man who had served ten or fifteen years in the British army would be entitled to come to Canada and say: Pay me the difference between the gratuity paid by the British government and the gratuity paid by Canada as if I had remained in Canada all my life.

Mr. BENICE: I do not think the minister understood what I was getting at. The pension department claims that the gratuity is part of the pension, and in this particular case, when they came to pay the pension to the widow, they deducted the gratuity that had been paid. I wrote to the minister's department and asked if it was not only fair that the R.C.A.F. should pay the war service gratuity that would have been paid if the man had been serving as a Canadian with the R.C.A.F.

Mr. GIBSON: I quite agree with my hon. friend that the Canadian gratuity has nothing whatever to do with the pension, and that any such gratuity payment should not be deducted from the pension payable to the widow. If my hon. friend will let me have the particulars I shall be glad to look into the case.

Mr. POWER: Mr. Chairman, I do not need to take the part of the minister, because I realize he has made it perfectly clear, since the presentation of his estimates began, that he needs no assistance. But as certain policies have been called into question for which I feel that he should not have to bear the burden of the blame, if there is to be any blame, I should like to say a word, because those policies were entirely my own and developed by me in spite perhaps of some opposition on the part of a great many people.

With respect to the pensions mentioned by the hon. member for Lake Centre, I think the committee should know that they are a matter of law. The Militia Pensions Act applies equally to the air force, the army and the navy. The rights which these men have in respect of retirement are fully laid down in the Militia Pensions Act. I cannot say from recollection when last it was amended, but the act itself has been in force and effect for at least thirty years. Whether the latest amendments provide greater advantages for those about to be retired I cannot say offhand; I would have to look up the act; but certainly no change was made in any militia pension legislation since the start of the war. Every one of these men has contributed to the fund: this is a contributory pension in the same way as superannuation and pension under the civil service. If there is anything wrong with the act it is the duty of parliament to amend it.

As to the pensions being considered over-generous, perhaps they are, but these men are only taking advantage of what the parliament of Canada in its wisdom decided to allow them.

Comparisons have been made as to the pensions which they would have received had they retired prior to the war and the pensions which they will actually receive at the present time. Perhaps that is a fair comparison. On the other hand it must be recognized, I think, that owing to the very great and rapid expansion of the air force, from something around 4,000 men to over 200,000 men, it stood to reason that the leaders of it, the men who were doing the good work in it, should at least get rank comparable with that held by people in other forces. Would you have the chief of air staff of Canada, who has the full control of 200,000 men, only a wing commander, or even a group captain? Men who have control of far fewer people and have far less important jobs to deal with day by day in the Royal Air Force or in the United States air force, or any of the other forces, hold titles equivalent of air marshal and so forth. I for one did not want to put the Canadian air force in an inferior position.

Then with regard to the policy of retirement, for that I take the full blame if there is to be any blame. Having returned here after the last war and become a member of parliament, day after day one heard complaints in parliament and through association with troops who served in the last war, about the number of "brass hats" that were still at the militia office down here in the Canadian building. The general complaint of returned soldiers after the last war was that there were too many generals, that there were too many people who had served as high-ranking officers who were still at the head of affairs, and it was time to give a chance to the lads who had actually seen service. Knowing that feeling, and in order to help the morale of the boys who were working overseas, I developed—not without opposition—a policy of my own on which I stand or fall, that, every man who served overseas was to be given to understand that he would have the right to promotion to the highest grade in the air force. I may have been wrong; if I was wrong I am willing to take the blame, but I do not think that the blame should be placed on the minister who is actually directing the administrative affairs of this department. I wanted to impress on every single member of aircrew and of the air force that nothing was going to stand in the way of his promotion during the war or after the war, and that when he returned here, if he remained in the force or had to deal with the force in any way at all, he would not be faced by a solid wall of stagnant brass hats bringing about stagnation in every rank of the service. That may have been wrong. If it is wrong I am in the judgment of the house.

Mr. BENICE: You are talking about the permanent air force, are you?

Mr. POWER: This is the permanent force.

With regard to Air Marshal Breadner, here was the situation towards the middle and end of 1943. The air training plan was about to reach its peak. The job had been organized and was about to reach complete fruition. The schools were pretty well established. In any case we knew where they were going and just how to establish schools at that time. Organizing ability was no longer as necessary as it had been. On the other hand, we were sending thousands of men overseas; we were organizing our overseas squadrons. Some we had organized, and we proposed to organize more. With the increased number of people overseas we had more responsibility and additional duties. Our responsibilities were not only to our men but to their parents and to the people of Canada. The chief of the air staff had been Breadner. He and I met every day of our lives. We were in constant consultation with respect to matters at home and matters abroad. I say without the slightest hesitation, and I think everybody knows it, that things did not always go too smoothly with air ministry and other people overseas. Times there were when I had to go over myself to straighten out matters; at other times people from air ministry had to come here. Things had to be settled by personal contact and personal arrangement. There were such things as leave, the length of tours of duty, the command of Canadian squadrons—innumerable things. Breadner was fully in my confidence. He knew everything that had gone on. The cables from his predecessor came through Breadner and were discussed by me with him.

[Mr. Power.]

We had on the other hand here in this country Air Vice Marshal Robert Leckie, who had been lent to us by the Royal Air Force at the beginning of the war, who had been air member in charge of training, who had done a wonderful job in the training, but who of necessity knew nothing of our relations with regard to our operational squadrons overseas. Breadner did, Leckie did not.

Breadner, I think, was entitled to go overseas. It was well understood through the senior ranks of the air force that sooner or later the higher ranks would have to retire to make room for the men who had been doing the fighting overseas. I thought Breadner was entitled to the opportunity of going overseas. I believed he was the best man, on account of his tact, his knowledge of the situation, and because he was well known to everyone in the Royal Air Force, was on good terms with them, and was fully acceptable to the air ministry. So I said to him at that time, "In order that there shall be not too much red tape and too much trouble, I want you to send your cables direct 'Breadner to Power' and I will answer you 'Power to Breadner'". That was the situation then, and Air Marshal Leckie became chief of staff here. When the new minister came in, for reasons of his own, he took a certain course of action. I think perhaps he was right. He did not know Breadner as I knew him; he had not been so fully in the picture of our negotiations and discussions with the British air ministry, and it is entirely likely that he wanted to have here at his side somebody who would be able to advise him as to what was going on overseas. It then became a question for him to decide whether he should retain Leckie or bring Breadner back over here. I have no blame to attach and no criticism to make of the minister for the action which he took. I think that in his place he did the only thing he could do. I was in a position where, so to speak, I could drive a tandem; he was not, because, through no fault of his own, he had neither the knowledge nor the contact with the people with whom he had to deal. That would probably explain the change of policy.

One more word. From the very tone of my voice people will know that Breadner was a friend of mine. I am proud to say that he was; and so was Leckie. Both of them have done magnificent work for the country, and to insinuate that Breadner had any unworthy motive at all, either in going overseas or in returning, is something I resent very much, as I would resent it if it concerned my dearest friend. Breadner deserves well of the people of this country. He has lost his only boy in the same service to which he devoted his own life, and it ill becomes any of us to attack him or to impute motives to him.

Mr. BENCE: Can the minister reply as to the total amount paid out in pensions to members of the permanent air force?

Mr. GIBSON: Does the hon. member mean pensions payable to members of the air force?

Mr. BENCE: Retirement allowances.

Mr. GIBSON: Going back how far? The air force is twenty-one years old now and we are paying pensions to permanent force men who have retired at various times during that period. I can get the complete amount.

Mr. POWER: Get the army and the navy at the same time.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I should like some more information on the subject we have been pursuing. Will the minister put on Hansard, if he cannot give it to the house now: (1) a list of those of the air force with rank of air vice marshal or higher who have been retired since January 1, 1943; (2) the years of service which had accrued to the credit of each of the men retired; (3) a list of those promoted to the rank of air vice marshal or higher since January 1, 1943, together with the length of service which had accrued to each of these; (4) the number of officers with the rank of air vice marshal or higher now on the force in the R.C.A.F. and the number of officers of that rank who were on the force on January 1, 1943.

I have another question with regard to pensions. Are all those men who were retired to be in receipt of the pensions named from the date of retirement, or were those pensions to be the ones which they would receive possibly some years from now? Are any of those men who were retired required to continue payment into the pension fund for any period of years?

Mr. GIBSON: Pensions are payable from the date of retirement, and of course they are based on age and the number of years that the officer has served when the pension is determined. Pensions are paid only to officers who retire from the regular forces. They are not paid to men who may have achieved high rank during the war on a temporary commission basis.

Mr. JACKMAN: Are those pensions taxable?

Mr. GIBSON: They are taxable as income, yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: Was not a change made some time ago whereby a pension given for war disability was not taxable?

Mr. GIBSON: That is correct.

Mr. JACKMAN: But if it is given for service, for having put in time, it is taxable.

Mr. GIBSON: That is taxable as income, yes.

Mr. BENCE: Would the minister let us know first of all whether there have been any recruitments to the permanent force since the beginning of the war?

Mr. GIBSON: No, there have not.

Mr. BENCE: At the present strength of the R.C.A.F., how many are permanent force and how many non-permanent?

Mr. GIBSON: I have not got that broken down. I could get the figures. We have not taken on any permanent air force since the outbreak of war.

Mr. BENCE: I was interested in the remarks made by the member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) who indicated that it was his policy to retire high ranking officers so that members of the permanent force could be raised to those positions. I should like to find out what the position is with respect to raising members of the non-permanent air force, who have given wonderful service and who when the war is over will receive only the war service gratuity paid to every other service. I am particularly interested in those men who have given four or five years to the air force, having left civilian jobs without having an opportunity of securing substantial pension on retirement allowance at the end of that time. I think the ministry should pay more attention to that aspect of the matter.

Mr. MacNICOL: At the time of crisis last fall in connection with the infantry and lack of reinforcements in France it came out during the debate that many young men were being induced, or persuaded, or were volunteering to join the air force and also the navy, though we are now speaking specifically of the air force. It has come out to-day that there are at present 200,000 in the R.C.A.F. That is a very large number. I have not yet heard anything said about the, to me, most unfair treatment given to large numbers of young men, well educated men, graduates of universities or of the higher schools, who joined the air force and after serving one, two and often three years, were summarily dismissed, or discharged, or released—whatever is the right word to use—and within a short time, their names having been sent to infantry headquarters, were called into the army. I have in mind one young man—he was one of hundreds—who had been in the air force three years. He was a bright young man, having been associated in some way with the ground crew. He was a fairly well qualified mechanic. I believe his duties pertained to that part of the R.C.A.F. After being discharged from the air force he was called into the army, much to his dismay because he loved the air force work. I presume he must have had some training in the air force in marching and military exercises, because after he was sent to England he remained there for only three months before being sent to France and eventually, I suppose, to fill the depleted ranks in Holland. His wife received a letter from him telling her that he had been in England for three months and at the time of writing the letter had been in France for three days, and that he was being sent right up to the front. Almost at the same time as she received the letter, or at any rate very shortly afterward, she received word that he had been killed. To me that did not seem the proper training to give a young man who had spent three years in the air force, and I have been wondering just why so many young men, who had been thoroughly trained in their work with the R.C.A.F., should be summarily dismissed, much to their chagrin, and then sent to another branch of the service. It was unfair. Why did it occur? Why were they permitted to join the air force, only to be treated in this way?

Mr. GIBSON: The reason is not hard to give. We built up in this country a tremendous air training organization. That organization completed its job; it turned out the number of aircrew required, and then it became necessary to close down many of the schools that had been established from one end of the country to the other. The closing of those schools released a large number of men who had served only in Canada. No men who had served overseas were transferred from the air force to the army. Any man released from the air force who had served only in Canada was available for call to the army under national selective service regulations.

Mr. MacNICOL: When I was home last Saturday I met a young man, no doubt only one of many—later on I am going to ask how many there are—who also will suffer a great deal of disappointment. He has been in the air force for three years training as a pilot. He must have spent some of his time in taking other training as well, because during those three years he trained at Lachine; he attended some sort of school in Montreal; he was sent to Calgary; he was in either Manitoba or Saskatchewan as well, and finally he trained here at Uplands. Why should this young man have been sent back and forth across the country, first to one school and then to another, instead of being put through for his chosen calling so that he could get into the service and commence operations? Why was it necessary to send him up and down the country, back and forth, at great expense?

Mr. GIBSON: I cannot give the details of that particular case.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is only one of many.

Mr. GIBSON: I do not know whether the boy passed in the courses he was taking, or what courses he was taking; whether he was proceeding from an elementary flying training school to a service flying training school and then perhaps to an operational training unit. In the meantime he may have been taking courses of one kind or another as a specialist in certain branches. Unless I had the man's name and number I could not give any information. If I had that, of course I could trace his record and find out just what he had been doing.

Mr. MacNICOL: I said he was just one of many. He has now graduated as a pilot, I suppose one of the last to come through. I said to him, "What are you going to do now? Are you going overseas?" He replied, "No, I don't know what I am going to do. I am put on some kind of reserve, but apparently I am not in active service." Then I asked, "Are you going to be paid?" I presume he will still be on call, if necessary; I believe he told me he was subject to call if and when required. I have forgotten what he told me about being paid during this interim period, but I should like to ask the minister if that young man, who is only one of hundreds or perhaps thousands for all I know, who has been thoroughly trained and is now a pilot, wearing his wings, is to be paid during this interim period. He cannot take a position, because he may be called at any time.

Mr. GIBSON: No; the men transferred to the reserve are not on pay. They are eligible to take civilian employment or to go to universities and take whatever courses they desire, but they are not on pay while transferred to the reserve.

Mr. MacNICOL: That university course will be at the expense of the department?

Mr. GIBSON: Oh, yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Well, that is something; but on the other hand I really think it is most unfair to turn these young men out like that with nothing on which to live. In that connection I should like to ask how many young men there are in Canada who recently graduated and are on call.

Mr. GIBSON: I do not think I should give that information. There are a good many thousands but I do not want to give the actual figure.

Mr. MacNICOL: A good many thousands?

Mr. GIBSON: Yes, but I do not want to give the exact figure.

Mr. MacNICOL: Perhaps I should not have asked for it, but what the minister has said seems to me to indicate something very radically wrong. I am not blaming the minister or his predecessor, who was very highly qualified by his personality and his aggressiveness to build up a real air force, and who deserves unstinted praise for what he did. He is not in the chamber at the moment, so that I can say this. I am sorry to see him out of the department; I think he deserved better than he got, but he has left behind him a real record of aggressiveness and success. On the other hand it does not seem to me to be fair to all the services that such a large number as many thousands of these young men should be left running loose, subject to call, with no pay or allowances and nothing to do.

Mr. GIBSON: I am sorry my predecessor was not able to gauge exactly when this war would end, but two years ago he had the terrible responsibility of having to lay the foundation for classes that would not be graduating for eighteen months or two years. If D-day had not been successful; if we had not pushed the Germans back into Germany, as we are doing now, we would not have had these reserves to our credit but would have been sending these men overseas to replace the heavy casualties we would have suffered. At the present time we have driven the huns from the skies; we are not having those heavy casualties, thank God, and consequently we have a reserve. That is due to the foresight of my predecessor, not to any mistake he made or to any wrong calculations, because he could do nothing other than take every precaution to see that there was no shortage.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am not criticizing what the minister's predecessor did, but I am thinking of these thousands of young men who now have nowhere to go. In that regard I have another question. Is the minister able to give the probable or approximate cost to the country of training one of these thousands of young men who now are not to render any service to the country?

Mr. GIBSON: It has been estimated roughly at about $30,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: Each?

Mr. GIBSON: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Something has been said about the airfields. I have been on a number of them, and as far as I could see they certainly have been well constructed. I should like some information as to what is to happen to them. They cannot just be left untended; if they are they will become grown up with weeds or shrubbery or something like that. Are any of these fields to be allowed to return to their original condition?

Mr. GIBSON: If the air force has no further use for them, it turns them over to the war assets allocation committee, and then they are sent to the War Assets Corporation for disposal. I do not know what uses will be made of them. Some will be used by civil flying clubs, I should think; but I do know that the air force retains only the number it requires, and turns over the remainder for disposal.

Mr. MacNICOL: Something was said yesterday about the rehabilitation of these fine, well-trained, capable, mostly well-educated young men who joined the air force and who, through the use of their own native ability and the application of their educational qualifications, have rendered such fine service over Europe. What is to happen to them when they return to Canada? I have heard nothing from any department setting out a concrete and reasonable plan whereby they may be given an opportunity in civil life to obtain the living which they so richly deserve.

I had in mind one special use which could be made of a few of them, and which might result to their benefit. Before the war there was at least one first-class school in Canada which made an honest effort to educate young men in aeronautics. I refer to the Toronto Central Technical school on Harbord street. I recall on one occasion coming to Ottawa, when the Bennett government was in office. I attended with a committee from the Toronto board of education and from the technical school, to request a loan of aircraft engines which were considered obsolete, so that the school might prepare young men for the work which so many of them have had to do during this war.

With that comparatively poor equipment, lent generously by the government, good work was done. My suggestion is that after the war the government should give whatever is required of the different types of aircraft to the technical schools across Canada, to be used in their classes for the instruction and training of young men in the next few years. That type of service will be required after the war, and those young men could learn about aeronautics through the classes in technical schools, and the use of aircraft made available to those schools.

I would suggest further that, working through the technical schools, the department might offer a few score or a few hundred—whatever might be available—of those fine young heroes, to act as instructors in those schools. I can picture one of those boys returning, with half a dozen decorations on his breast, decorations well earned for heroism. I can see him standing in a class or in front of an aircraft in a Toronto school—perhaps the great Central Technical school on Harbord street. Those men would be well qualified to instruct in aeronautics and aero-engines. I can picture, too, the favourable impression they would make upon any class of boys within the next three or four years.

I would suggest that the department get in contact with technical schools across the country, perhaps beginning with the large Central Technical School in Toronto, with a view to obtaining the services of those returned men to act as instructors. Those heroes could be sent to the schools, and in that way would be given an opportunity to render a service. Perhaps in the beginning the government could assist by paying the salaries of those instructors for two or three years, instead of turning them out on the streets to look for jobs.

Mr. GIBSON: I believe the hon. member asked about what is being done to assist in the employment of personnel after discharge from the forces. I understand there is a voluntary citizens' committee in almost every city and town to assist in this work. In the Toronto area Mr. J. G. Clark of the Robert Simpson company is chairman, and an arrangement is being made to have a retired or discharged air force officer to act as liaison between the committee and the air force, so that there will be the closest possible contact between the local committee and the men being demobilized.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the minister answer my last thought, namely as to the use of returning aviators in the technical schools across Canada?

Mr. GIBSON: That is a matter which really does not come under my department. It would be within the control of the Department of Labour.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. MacNICOL: The department might very well interest itself in its own personnel. Those boys have done a wonderful work in the skies of Europe, and they might very well be lent to those technical schools for two or three years.

Mr. BRYCE: I should like to ask about farmers' sons who were in the air force and have been discharged, but who upon returning to the farms have been called up immediately. Has any arrangement been made whereby these boys may have postponement? Postponements at the present time are for only a matter of two months. Has the government considered the advisability of giving them a discharge for a couple of years, or something of that kind? They have served their time in the air force. It does not need them, but they are badly needed in western Canada to-day.

Mr. GIBSON: They are not called up for the air force; service is entirely voluntary in that branch. However, instructions are going out to the various commands that, wherever possible, anyone applying for farm leave, who can be released, should be released for such farm leave for the spring and fall.

Then a question was asked respecting the number of casualties as between aircrew and ground crew. I have before me the following table:

As at February 28, 1945:

	Air crew	Ground crew	Total
Killed or died.....	12,004	902	12,906
Currently missing .....	3,045	45	3,090
Currently prisoners of war .....
Serious or dangerously wounded or injured (not fatal) .....	2,172	38	2,210
	879	357	1,236
	18,100	1,342	19,442

Ground crew include 17 airwomen killed or died and 21 airwomen wounded or injured.

Mr. TUSTIN: In what position is the young man who, after receiving his wings and being placed in reserve, attends university? Would he be allowed to finish out his year, if he were called, or would he be taken out of the university immediately?

Mr. GIBSON: We have many cases of young men who have been transferred to the reserve. In practically all cases where men are attending university, or in some special employment, an extension of time and permission to continue the studies are given.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Are all the air force reserve now called up again? Just before I left Calgary to come to Ottawa several men on the reserve were discharged from the air force, and therefore were not receiving any pay. They are having a great deal of difficulty in getting employment. Some of them have been faced with the handicap of being unemployed while still on the air force reserve. They went to selective service but selective service had nothing suitable for them. In one instance a position was opened by the dominion government in the post office at Calgary and this one man who had been a pilot officer tried to get the position. They said to him, "You are on the reserve" and when he replied that he was they said, "We could not give you this job because you may be called up again." When he asked what he was to do in the meantime he was told that while they were sorry for him, if he could not eat that was his responsibility. Many of these have not been recalled and they are in a similar position.

Mr. GIBSON: The reserve have not all been called up, and I quite agree with what the hon. member has said. I have heard of similar cases where men on the reserve have applied to selective service for positions and have been told that, being on the reserve, they could not be taken on. I took the matter up with the Minister of Labour and I understand that it has now been rectified, that there will be no discrimination because they are on the reserve.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Have instructions been sent to the selective service offices that these men are to be placed? Unless that is done I can visualize a situation where they will go to selective service and find that there is nothing there for them. Provision must be made so that these boys can be placed in positions where they can earn a livelihood. They should receive their pay up to the time jobs are provided. The government has a definite responsibility there.

Mr. GIBSON: They get a month's pay on retirement.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Some of them have been off for three months so that the month's pay would not meet their requirements. They still have to eat. Perhaps the minister could see if an extension could be made to cover the period until positions are obtained. That is the only solution.

Mr. LOCKHART: I concur fully in what the previous speaker has said. There are many cases where men have been off for three months or more. I know the minister has an intense interest in this matter and I suggest that he follow it through with selective service. May I refer also to the clothing allowance. It is all right for the minister to say that this matter has passed out of his hands, but I should like to present to him the situation facing these men who have received the $100 clothing allowance and now when they are in the army find that deductions are being made to recover it. In many cases the money has been spent. The allowance would not buy much more than a suit of clothes and an overcoat. These men should not be asked to pay it back, even though they are not given a clothing allowance when they get out of the army. Many of these men have asked me to present their views whenever I have an opportunity. It would be merely a book-keeping entry not to deduct for this allowance and then not pay the allowance when the men get out of the army. I ask the minister to try to prevail upon army headquarters not to take back this money but to let the matter rest in abeyance so that it can be cleared up at the finish of the war.

Mr. BENCE: From time to time cases come to the attention of members of parliament in connection with applications for compassionate transfer back to this country from Great Britain or some other theatre of war. I have in mind one case where a couple had two sons in the services. One was killed overseas and then the father died. The mother was in a precarious state of health and application was made for the compassionate transfer of the other boy back to this country from Great Britain.

I should like the minister to explain the procedure that is followed in determining whether compassionate transfer will be granted. I have received information from the minister's office to the effect that in these cases a thorough investigation is made and a report sent overseas. Then the authorities overseas decide whether compassionate transfer will be granted. I was rather surprised that since the greater part of the staff is situated here in Canada they did not make the decision after finding out what the situation was overseas. In other words, why was the decision not made in this country instead of in Great Britain? There may be good reasons for that but I find it hard to explain. I thought possibly the minister might give a short statement.

Mr. GIBSON: It is difficult to deal with these applications for compassionate transfer. A large number of them have to be investigated, and the final decision is left with the authorities overseas who know whether or not it is possible for a man to be released. After all, the necessities of war must come first, although every effort is made to grant compassionate transfer when it can be granted without interfering with the war effort. It is not possible in many cases to allow a man to come home because a relative is ill. It may be found that there are other members of the family in this country who can take care of the person who is ill.

The matter is complicated further by the fact that bomber crews are trained together as a team. I understand there is a strong feeling among these crews that if they lose one of their members, there is a reduced confidence in their ability as a team. It has always been felt that it was not desirable, unless absolutely necessary, to break up a crew by sending a man home.

If it is a Spitfire pilot for example, or some other man who is flying alone, it might be that he could be spared more readily than one of the members of a bomber crew. It is for these reasons that it is left to the overseas authorities to find out whether a man can be spared, but they rely on the authorities here to make an investigation as to the circumstances surrounding the claim.

Mr. GILLIS: I wish to join with the hon. member for Bow River in what he has just said. It is one of the most important matters pertaining to the air force which have been discussed since the minister appeared before the committee. A large number of personnel are now leaving the air force and many more are waiting to go out. They are very anxious to know whether there is any employment for them and just where they will fit in when they go out. That feeling has been general among these men during the past three or four months. As the hon. member for Bow River pointed out, it is quite evident that there is no understanding between the Department of National Defence for Air, selective service and those responsible for the maintenance of these men while they are awaiting call to some other branch of the service. This is a matter that should be settled once and for all before this session closes. I believe that no man in the service who has been let out and is awaiting call or who is on reserve—he may be awaiting a call to the Pacific—should have to kick around any section of this country for three or four months or for one month or even a week without pay. If he is on reserve he is still definitely an obligation of the government, and I think the minister should have a definite understanding with selective service that, wherever possible, these men should be placed, and where it is not possible to place them they should be maintained. I think it is necessary to do that.

The minister made the statement, and was very emphatic about it, in connection with air force personnel who are leaving the service at this time, that if they found employment every reasonable means was taken not to uproot them. But that is not borne out by the facts. I have a letter here from the Nova Scotia command of the Canadian legion. They have been taking up with the government for a few weeks one particular case that I have in mind. It is an individual case but it illustrates the principle. It is the case of an air force flight sergeant who took his discharge from the service specifically to go into a little business of his own. He was discharged for that purpose in January of this year after four and a half years of service. He invested some money in a little business, along with another member of the air force, and to all intents and purposes he had rehabilitated himself. But within a month from the time of his discharge he was called into the army.

Mr. GIBSON: The army or the air force?

Mr. GILLIS: The army. The Nova Scotia command of the legion had a lot of correspondence with the department over this case and they got nowhere with it. The man after being called up for the army decided to stay in. He took his discharge from the air force specifically to go into the little business with another member of the air force; the two of them got together and established a little business, and after this man had reestablished himself in that way he was called up for the army within one month of his discharge. Now that was a piece of sheer stupidity.

Mr. GIBSON: He was not on the reserve?

Mr. GILLIS: No; he was discharged specifically for the purpose of going into a little business of his own.

Mr. GIBSON: I mean he was not recalled from the reserve.

Mr. GILLIS: There is no difference.

Mr. GIBSON: Oh, yes, there is.

Mr. MARTIN: Will the hon. member be good enough to give me the name of that man privately?

Mr. GILLIS: I shall be glad to give my hon. friend the file. There are service personnel in Canada who are not required at the present time. Certain categories are placed on the reserve. Placing them on the reserve gives them a chance to look around and decide what they will do in the future. This personnel are not required in service and are being discharged for the purpose of rehabilitating themselves in civilian life. That is what this man did. He established himself in a business, and then the army called him up within a month of his discharge. This sort of thing is causing a lot of friction, anxiety and trouble, and definite regulations should be made to prevent it from happening. That flight sergeant and his partner constitute only one case. Nevertheless it has gone all through the Nova Scotia command of the Canadian Legion; it has been taken up with the department; and the legion, after using all the machinery at its disposal, get nowhere and send the case on to me because they have reached the end of their rope. I say that cases of this kind are sheer stupidity, which is causing a lot of turmoil and a lot of friction quite unnecessarily.

I have three questions to ask of the minister. What is the status of Canadian nationals in the Royal Air Force with respect to gratuities, rehabilitation and so forth? There are some 2,500 of these Canadian nationals in the R.A.F., from the last figures I have. They are men who left this country in 1937, 1938 or 1939 before the R.C.A.F. was formed.

Mr. GIBSON: Before the R.C.A.F. was formed?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes.

Mr. GIBSON: Before the war?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes.

Mr. GIBSON: He is not a Canadian national then.

Mr. GILLIS: He is a Canadian national. There are 2,500 of them who went over in 1937, 1938 or 1939, and are in the R.A.F. at the present time. The matter of their transfer was discussed in the house at the last session and arrangements were made to allow them to transfer, although not many of them are being transferred. But they are Canadian nationals who got into the war a little sooner than we did, and most of them will be returning to Canada when the war is over. I should like to know their status with respect to rehabilitation if they return to Canada after the war. They are in the same war as we are; they have the same enemy, the same objective, and they are citizens of this country.

I should also like the minister to tell the committee what is the status of commercial pilots who in the early stages of the commonwealth air training plan were utilized in Canada in giving elementary flying training. They were really the basis of the whole plan. They are commercial pilots who trained themselves, paid for their licences, and they have been in the service since the outbreak of the war, but they were precluded from going overseas because of their essentiality to Canada. I understand that in the post-war period, first priority goes to service personnel who saw combat service overseas. That rule relegates these commercial pilots completely. I do not know, and I should like the minister to tell the committee, just where they stand with respect to gratuities and rehabilitation. Would he define their status in that regard?

I have another question relating to the permanent force. Quite a large percentage of the R.C.A.F. are in the permanent force. I am not thinking of the air vice marshal but of the fellow downstairs, the fellow doing ground work perhaps. Many of them will stay in the service after the war. Some of them have been in the service for seven or eight years, since before the war. Where do they stand after the war with respect to gratuities and the other benefits for service personnel who are taking their discharge now?

I would point out with respect to personnel counsellors that this position is reserved for the officer class. Now there are hundreds of flight sergeants, gunners and so forth, who have all the necessary qualifications for that position, but they are prevented from going into that work simply because they are not in the officer class. The course is not available; and many of the repatriated service personnel who have the qualifications are not permitted to take the course. They are "sore" about this, and I think rightly so. As I understand it, they are not commissioning any more service personnel in Canada for the purpose of qualifying non-commissioned officers for the job of personnel counselling. That is wrong. A boy who has intelligence and educational background sufficient to make him a navigator, a pilot, a gunner, and so forth, is just as much entitled upon his return, if he has the necessary qualifications, to be appointed as a personnel counsellor as are the officer ranks. It is a sore spot; it is class distinction, and it is time that we got away from that kind of thing.

Mr. GIBSON: The question of Canadians enlisted in the R.A.F. is one which is now being given some consideration. I refer to those who went over before the outbreak of the war. Those who went over after the outbreak of war and are in the R.A.F. will have had made up to them the difference between the gratuity paid in Great Britain and what they would have received had they been taken into the R.C.A.F.

The matter of commercial pilots is somewhat different, in that they are civilians, and while it may be true, as my hon. friend said, that they have been precluded from going overseas, they have also been receiving civilian rates of pay, which are considerably higher than R.C.A.F. rates of pay.

Mr. GILLIS: That income is taxable, is it not?

Mr. GIBSON: Yes; but I have seen a calculation which has been made as to how their pay compares with that of air force pilots, and even with the tax they are considerably better paid. But I do not want it to be thought for a minute that they do not do valuable work. I understand that some of these men have put in as much as two thousand hours, doing very valuable instructional work in our training schools. But they were not part of the R.C.A.F.

As to the gratuity to those who are in the permanent force, that will be paid to them at the conclusion of the war; it is not being held until they retire from the force.

As to the personnel counsellors, that is a difficult matter. We have to set some sort of standard of educational qualifications which will be accepted. While I realize that there may be much good material available at the present time, there is a restriction which has been put on regarding those eligible to take up personnel counselling in the service.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Supplementing the remarks of my colleague, may I say there are two kinds of personnel counselling—in-service counsellors and also counsellors who have been organized under the auspices of the Department of Veterans' Affairs in cooperation with the three defence services; and we hope to have one thousand trained before the end of this year, after taking a course of several weeks here in Ottawa, from the services and from the department, who will be the post-war counsellors. There are in-service counsellors, as well as out-of-service counsellors.

Mr. GILLIS: Appointments to the out-of-service counsellor positions will be open to all ranks?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Oh, certainly.

Mr. GILLIS: I think the fair way to appoint any of them is on a competitive basis; let them write examinations. If I were a rank-and-filer in the service the last fellow I would come to and consult as to my future in civil life would be an officer; I would rather take the fellow with whom I was shoulder to shoulder in the line and in the skies, whom I knew and who knew me. Of course the out-of-service counselling is very important, and that is where the real job will be done. In-service counselling is more or less limited to advice as to how to proceed, and so forth. I am glad to hear the minister say that the out-of-service counsellors will be drawn from all ranks, because there are brains in all ranks. The fact you wear four rings in the navy does not mean you have got all the brains.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The minister mentioned this afternoon the matter of disposal of materials which the air force would not need, and told us, as he did last night, that any materials which were left over from the dismantling of the air training ports would be handed over, first, to one organization, the name of which I have forgotten, and then to the War Assets Corporation; after that it would be otherwise disposed of. Could he give specifically what steps are followed when, let us say, an airport goes into the hands of the War Assets Corporation? Supposing that a city in one of our provinces desires to purchase material, contiguous to that city, in the hands of the War Assets Corporation; to whom does it apply? Will the War Assets Corporation advertise, for example, in all the Canadian papers the fact that this material is available, and will they allow all people who so desire to bid for the material; or will they dispose of it in the open market, where all will get a chance?

Mr. GIBSON: I think that question should be raised on the estimates of the Minister of Munitions and Supply, who could give the hon. member full details. I cannot detail the procedure which will be adopted.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have raised the matter again, although it has already been led up to twice, as a sort of notice so that the minister having charge of that work will be able to answer the question. There is a great deal of suspicion in the country that there may be people "on the inside" who somehow will obtain inside information and have the first chance at such things as I have mentioned, with the result that the cities will not be able to get them.

Mr. BENICE: With reference to questions which have been asked and are not yet answered, in the event that the minister's estimates are concluded within a short time, will the minister subsequently during this debate give the information in the house which has been requested by various hon. members?

Mr. GIBSON: Yes, whatever can be secured. I have already received information to answer one question, as to how many of the permanent force, officers and airmen, are in the R.C.A.F. at the present time. There are 232 permanent force officers and 2,406 permanent force airmen serving as such. In addition, there are 1,104 special reserve officers who were formerly permanent force airmen.

Mr. BENICE: What does the minister mean, "serving as such"? Were they in the force before the beginning of the war?

Mr. GIBSON: Yes, they were in before the war.

[Mr. Gibson.]

Mr. GREEN: I would ask the minister to give the committee some outline of the policy of the government with regard to the telecommunication facilities which have been established by the government in the more isolated parts of the country. I understand, for example, that there have been extensive installations in Gaspé peninsula, northern Manitoba, the Mackenzie river area, northern British Columbia, Yukon Territory, along the Pacific coast, and in the northern part of Vancouver island. Many millions of dollars have been spent on these installations. I believe there are four departments concerned, namely air, the army, transport, and public works. There is some concern felt as to what is to become of this splendid communication system after the war. For example, some of the people in central British Columbia and on the coast are wondering whether much of the equipment will be taken over by the War Assets Corporation and sold as surplus. I think it is important that some thought should be given to this question now before the war ends and there is a rush to get things cleaned up. We feel that this communication service is vital both for the defence of the country and more particularly for developing those more remote parts in post-war days. For example, I believe there should be small feeder services built from the main lines, most of which are already in. With small feeder services built into different areas of population a great flip would be given to development in those sections, and then from those small areas small portable radio equipment might be rented to miners, prospectors and trappers, so that no matter where they were carrying on their work they could be in touch almost instantaneously with the town in which they had their homes. It would mean so much to those parts of Canada. One main line that has not been completed is from Prince George into the Peace River block in British Columbia. The suggestion has been made that there should be connection from Prince George to Dawson Creek. Another feature of it is that this would be a great help in rehabilitating men who have seen service, say in the signal corps. Hundreds or even thousands of men could be employed.

At the present time there is divided control. I have mentioned four departments and no one seems to know who is boss. If that condition continues into peace time there is bound to be confusion and there may not be the development that is required. I suggest that consideration be given to having a single administration in charge of these telecommunication facilities. Perhaps there could be set up a branch in one of the departments and eventually we might have a ministry of communications for Canada. I throw out these suggestions and I should like to hear from the minister whether or not the government has any policy in this regard.

Mr. GIBSON: I cannot give any outline of a programme that has been designed in this connection. The matter is receiving attention at the present time. A survey is being made and, as the hon. member has said, there are some very valuable lines. It is questionable whether we should maintain some of the land lines that exist at the present time or whether they should be replaced by radio telephone. That is being studied now and the survey will show what lines should be turned over to private companies, what should be retained for government use, and what departments should operate them.

Mr. GREEN: One other question, and it has to do with meteorologists working with the air force. I was out of the house last night when the question was raised by the hon. member for Peterborough West. The minister did not give a full explanation of the situation. Apparently these men have been actually working with the air force for many years.

Mr. GIBSON: Not under the air force.

Mr. GREEN: But they have been with the air force for many years and have been asking to be in the force. I have been told that the air force would like to get them as air force officers but the Department of Transport will not let them go. Whether that is so I cannot say, but in any event I think there is great unfairness to these men. They cannot get rehabilitation. They will not be treated as men who have served and therefore they lose preference. One case was submitted to me where a meteorologist wanted to work with a school board, but he could not because he got no preference. This school board gives the returned man first priority and the man could not get it. He was told, "You were a civilian working for the Minister of Transport." I think the situation can still be remedied. I suggest that the men with the air force, who have been with the air force throughout, should be made air force officers and not treated as civilians, when they are actually out on air force stations all the time. Could the minister give us any further explanation?

Mr. GIBSON: While some are with the air force they are by no means all with that force. There are some stationed at air force stations, but they are stationed throughout Newfoundland and in the Hudson's Bay area and they are employed as civilians under transport. The fact that some happen to be servicing in a station with an air force squadron does not make them part of the air force. I know there is a feeling on the part of some officials of the air force that we should have some on our strength so that they would be available for overseas operations, and consideration is being given to commissioning some of them so that we shall have them as officers of the air force.

Mr. GREEN: The R.C.A.F. has no meteorologists on strength overseas?

Mr. GIBSON: No.

Mr. GREEN: Will any be taken on in the Pacific area?

Mr. GIBSON: That is the plan, yes.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. D. C. ABBOTT (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): Mr. Chairman, I have been very much struck with the friendly and almost genial atmosphere in which this debate has proceeded up to the present, and perhaps I may be permitted to express the hope that as far as possible that may continue during the remainder of the defence estimates.

At the outset I should like to table, as has been done by the ministers who have preceded me, a list of the names of 2,461 members of the Canadian army to whom honours and awards for gallantry have been granted. The committee will recall that two previous lists have been presented, and the names which I am presenting to-day bring the total up to 3,365. Included in the list are the names of two members of the army who have received the Victoria Cross, the highest award for gallantry, at the hands of His Majesty the King. The citation covering the award to Major David Vivian Currie was given to the house by the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services on November 29 last. The other Victoria Cross was awarded to Private Ernest Alvia Smith of the Seaforth Highlanders of Canada. I shall have occasion to refer to that citation a little later on in the course of my remarks.

Mr. GRAYDON: "Smoky" Smith.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, "Smoky" Smith. The list follows:

At the outset I should like to give a brief outline of the operations of our forces since D-day. I realize my own limitations in attempting to do so, but it has been customary in the past and I should like to do it again. As the committee knows, on June 6 our third Canadian division, with the second armoured brigade, landed on the Normandy coast. At that time they were under the command of the British Second Army, with whom they had been training in pre-invasion tactics for some months prior to the assault. Although our troops had no previous combat experience they lived up to the best traditions of the Canadian corps in the last war, and were actually the first unit of the Second Army to reach their objective, for which feat they received the commendation of the army commander. Troops of the first Canadian paratroop battalion were among the first troops to land on the soil of France; and I think it can be a source of gratification to us here in this house that one of our number, our good friend the hon. member for Lotbiniere (Mr. Lapointe) led his company up the Normandy beaches on that first day.

By the end of the month of July all the field formations of the Canadian Army other than those serving in Italy were engaged; and about the last of the month General Crerar, the army commander, assumed command of the eastern sector of the British-Canadian front, having under his command the second Canadian corps and a British corps. The committee will recall that fighting during the month of July was extremely heavy. The gains made were not of a spectacular nature; nevertheless the work our troops were doing, holding the left flank, was exceedingly important. They steadily drew in more and more of the German armour until at one time they had against them some nine divisions, I think; and the splendid work they did was an important factor in permitting the United States forces operating on our right to make a breakthrough into the Brittany peninsula.

On August 7 the second Canadian corps mounted its attack toward Falaise, and as the committee will recall a breakthrough was achieved which contributed materially to the closing of the Falaise-Argentan gap and the destruction of a large German force estimated at some 32,000 killed and 90,000 captured in that pocket. It was during those operations that Major David Currie gained the Victoria Cross, to which I referred a moment ago.

That operation was followed toward the end of August by a rapid advance up the channel coast, the Canadian forces always holding the left flank. There was some opposition met in crossing the Seine, and then a rapid advance was made on the port of Dieppe. I think the committee will be interested when I tell them that the second Canadian Division made an advance of 62 miles in one day, to Dieppe. To those of us who served in the last war that seems almost incredible. The result was the capture of Dieppe with its harbour facilities almost undamaged. So rapidly was that advance made that they caught the Germans completely by surprise. They were able to spot the demolition charges in the docks because the cement was not dry over the top of the charges. In the result they captured the port intact, and that proved of the greatest importance in the operations which followed. Over 50,000 tons of vitally needed material, principally gasoline and ammunition, were poured in through that little port in a period of about ten days, and made all the difference in the rapid success of operations up the coast. The committee will remember that the tactics adopted by the Germans were to hold on to the channel ports, preventing us from getting short lines of communication; and incidentally they were very successful in those tactics. Le Havre held out for some time. Dieppe was the only port we captured intact in the fairly early stages.

Our troops continued on up through territory which I am told was named by the troops "Doodlebug Alley" because there were so many concrete fortifications of one kind or another. They did not meet very much opposition, with the exception of some rearguard actions along the Somme; and that has a familiar ring to a good many of us here who served in the last war. By that time they were getting up into territory that many of us remember, but there was no serious opposition until the operations around the mouth of the south shore of the Schelte. Those operations were undertaken by the Canadian corps, and, as the committee will recall, were most successful. On October 6 our troops established a bridgehead across the Leopold canal, which was followed by an amphibious landing in the rear of the German forces in the estuary, which outflanked their canal line. The clearing of the north shore of the estuary was accomplished by a Canadian thrust westward up the neck of the peninsula to meet British troops who had crossed over from the south shore of the Schelte. Actually the Canadian part in the clearing of the estuary was completed on November 4, and by November 28 a large convoy of ships entered the port of Antwerp headed, I think very appropriately, by a Canadian freighter.

Those operations, as the committee knows, were of a very difficult nature and, as I suppose was inevitable under those conditions, our casualties were very heavy. Those of us who had some experience in fighting in Belgium under fall and winter conditions in 1917 can have some idea of what conditions were last fall, and I am told by those who were there that Holland is even worse than Belgium.

The clearing of the Schelte released the Canadian Corps for operations elsewhere, and it moved, still holding the left flank, to the Nijmegen area.

The period following that offensive, the end of November, until the offensive to clear the west bank of the Rhine started early in February, was of a relatively quiet character. Through no fault of ours, I suppose, Von Runstedt struck south of our line, and in fact the Canadian corps was not engaged in active operations between the time it finished the job of clearing the Schelte estuary until the commencement of the offensive on February 6, to clear the west bank of the Rhine.

That offensive opened, as I say, on February 6 between the Maas and the Waal rivers against strongly fortified positions and across flooded and rain-soaked terrain. During the first part of the operation the enemy's opposition was not particularly heavy; but as the prepared defences were reached opposition stiffened, and the advance was a slow and particularly difficult one.

The effect of the operation, although it was not spectacular, was important, and drew off a considerable number of enemy divisions. And it was the first blow that ranked with the offensive of the United States Ninth and First Armies across the Cologne plain two weeks later, which resulted in the conquest of all the German territory west of the Rhine and north of the Moselle river.

It is not necessary to review the operations of the army in recent weeks. They are familiar to all hon. members in the committee. But, as has been the case since D-day, June 6, the Canadian Army is still operating the left flank.

Coming now to the operations in Italy, and going back just a little bit before D-day, the committee will recall that the first allied troops to enter the city of Rome at the beginning of June was a party of 150 Canadians and Americans forming part of the first forward service force. At the time our troops were mostly concentrated around Cassino, south of Rome, following the breakthrough of the Adolf Hitler line. For a time after the cracking of that line the first Canadian division operated in the Florence area. But about the middle of August the corps moved over to the Adriatic sector, and took part in that slow, stubborn drive up the east coast of Italy, which brought them to the Senio river. There was not anything very spectacular in that drive, nothing to attract public attention in the way the operations in northwestern Europe had done. But it was tough, hard going, fighting from one river to another, under conditions which from all accounts were worse than anything any of us knew in France twenty-six or twenty-seven years ago.

For a time after the first of November the corps remained out of the line, but at the beginning of December they went in again, and immediately opened a successful attack over difficult terrain and stiff opposition. During January and February the front in Italy remained static, and operations of the corps were mostly confined to patrol activities under conditions of heavy snow.

Those operations, as I say, were not spectacular, not as spectacular as some others; nevertheless the operations on the Italian front have had the effect of tying up some twenty to twenty-five German divisions which could certainly have been usefully employed in other theatres.

This is rather a bald account I have been giving of the operations and achievements of our troops for the last eight or nine months. In what I have said I have made no reference to the courage, endurance and self-sacrifice of those thousands of young Canadians who made these achievements possible. I believe I can best illustrate just what that courage and endurance amounts to if I read to the committee the citation on the granting of the Victoria Cross to Private Ernest Alvia (Smoky) Smith of the Seaforth Highlanders. This is the citation:

The king has been graciously pleased to approve the award of the Victoria Cross to:

K. 52880 Private Ernest Alvia Smith, the Seaforth Highlanders of Canada.

In Italy on the night of 21-22 October, 1944, a Canadian infantry brigade was ordered to establish a bridgehead across the Savio river. The Seaforth Highlanders of Canada were selected as the spearhead of the attack and in weather most unfavourable to the operation they crossed the river and captured their objective in spite of strong opposition from the enemy.

Torrential rain had caused the Savio river to rise six feet in five hours and as the soft vertical banks made it impossible to bridge the river no tanks or anti-tank guns could be taken across the raging stream to the support of the rifle companies.

As the right forward company was consolidating its objective it was suddenly counter-attacked by a troop of three Mark Five Panther tanks supported by two self-propelled guns and about thirty infantry. The situation appeared almost hopeless.

Under heavy fire from the approaching enemy tanks, Private Smith showing great initiative and inspiring leadership led his platoon group of two men across an open field to a position from which the piat could best be employed. Leaving one man on the weapon, Private Smith crossed the road with a companion and obtained another piat. Almost immediately an enemy tank came down the road firing its machine guns along the line of the ditches. Private Smith's comrade was wounded. At a range of thirty feet and having to expose himself to the full view of the enemy, Private Smith fired the piat and hit the tank putting it out of action. Ten German infantry immediately jumped off the back of the tank and charged him with schmeissers and grenades. Without hesitation Private Smith moved out onto the road and at a point blank range with his tommy gun killed four Germans and drove the remainder back. Almost immediately another tank opened fire and more enemy infantry closed in on Smith's position. Obtaining some abandoned tommy gun magazines from a ditch, he steadfastly held his position protecting his comrade and fighting the enemy with his tommy gun until they finally gave up and withdrew in disorder.

One tank and both self-propelled guns had been destroyed by this time but another tank swept the area with fire from a longer range. Private Smith still showing utter contempt for enemy fire helped his wounded friend to cover and obtained medical aid for him behind a nearby building. He then returned to his position beside the road to await the possibility of a further enemy attack.

No further immediate attack developed and as a result the battalion was able to consolidate the bridgehead position so vital to the success of the whole operation which led to the eventual capture of San Giorgio Di Cesena and a further advance to the Ronco river.

Thus by the dogged determination, outstanding devotion to duty and superb gallantry of this private soldier, his comrades were so inspired that the bridgehead was held against all enemy attacks pending the arrival of tanks and anti-tank guns some hours later.

Private Smith was from British Columbia, but I take some pleasure in saying that his mother was a French Canadian from Bonaventure county in the province of Quebec.

Mr. REID: Better keep the record straight: from New Westminster.

Mr. ABBOTT: These operations which I have reviewed so sketchily and so inadequately have, of course, had their price. As the committee will recall from figures published the other day, casualties which have been sustained by the army since June 6, 1944—D-day—amount in all to 46,866, of whom 11,638 are killed or dead, 537 missing, 2,131 prisoners of war or interned, and 32,560 wounded.

I know the sympathy of the committee will go out to the families of those who have made this sacrifice.

I now propose to give to the committee a brief outline of the organization of the Canadian Army overseas, and the method of reinforcing that army, and the organization of our army in Canada, followed by some figures as to the present strength of the army and the changes in strength which have taken place over the fiscal year which ended last Saturday.

In view of the wide interest in the subject, I make no apology for describing the organization of the Canadian Army overseas. I realize of course that a good many hon. members will be familiar with what I am about to say. But it will, I believe, be useful to have the description on the record.

Basically, the Canadian Army overseas is composed of three infantry divisions, two armoured divisions, two independent armoured brigades, two heavy artillery groups and several specialist groups of engineers and signals, with of course, certain ancillary troops necessary to maintain and service these establishments.

The plan of the Canadian Army adopted in 1942 provided for an army of two corps. Initially, the three infantry divisions and the two armoured brigades were to be grouped in the first corps, and the two armoured divisions in the second corps.

Of course, you cannot merely put two or three divisions together and call the result an army corps. The various divisions have to be held together by a corps headquarters with a corps commander and staff and a variety of service and supply units and formations known as corps troops.

Equally, when two or more corps are combined in an army, there must be an army headquarters with an army commander and similar service and supply units and formations which are known as headquarters and army troops.

In general terms, it may be said that a division is a formation which is normally of a certain definite composition and strength. There are two kinds of divisions in the Canadian army—the infantry division with three infantry brigades, and the armoured division with one armoured brigade and one infantry brigade; each having the required components of artillery, engineers and the like. The same is not true of an army corps or an army. These of necessity are much more flexible in their composition.

Hon. members will recall that when we hear that Germany has so many men on the western front it is always measured in terms of divisions, not in terms of corps or armies.

A corps may be composed of two or more divisions, either infantry or armoured as circumstances may require; an army of two or more corps. In a war of movement, it is sometimes essential, for tactical reasons, to transfer divisions from one corps to another. In the present war, it has frequently been necessary for the commander in the theatre to transfer whole army corps from one army to another, in accordance with strategic needs and developments. Since D-day every Canadian division without exception has, on occasion, fought under British command, and in northwest Europe every British division but one has at some time fought under Canadian command.

Consequently, when our first division and one of the independent armoured brigades and their ancillary troops were sent to Sicily in July, 1943, they were attached to a British corps in the British Eighth Army. Later on when the decision was taken to send the fifth (armoured) division to Italy, the first Canadian corps headquarters was also sent to Italy. This corps came under command of the British Eighth Army and from time to time was responsible for the handling of the Canadian and of British and other divisions as required by the tactical situation.

The second, third and fourth divisions and the other armoured brigade were regrouped in England as the second Canadian corps. In addition, we had in England, the army headquarters and army establishment which had been created before there was any thought of sending Canadian troops to Italy. What was more natural than to assign a British army corps to serve with the Canadian Army in England? It was simply the counterpart of having a Canadian corps serving with a British army in Italy.

In other words, when we hear about British or Polish troops serving with the First Canadian Army, that does not mean that there are not enough Canadian divisions overseas to make up an army which would be exclusively Canadian. All it means is that, because one Canadian corps has been serving in Italy, an army corps of non-Canadian troops must substitute for it as a part of the Canadian army in northwest Europe.

For a small part of the time since the clearing of the Schelte the First Canadian Army has been made up of more than two army corps. As a consequence, the majority of the troops under General Crerar's command have at times been other than Canadians. But the First Canadian Army is truly Canadian because its commander, its headquarters staff and most of its army troops—that is the whole structure of command and control—are Canadian. The Canadian people have every right to be proud of the tribute to the efficiency of our army headquarters implied in the heavy responsibilities which have repeatedly been assigned to General Crerar and his staff.

From time to time, there is criticism of the decision taken in 1942 to create the First Canadian Army. It is argued that the largest formation Canada should have undertaken was an army corps, such as we had in the last war. I can see no object, at this stage, in taking sides in that argument. The Canadian army exists and it cannot now be changed. But it should, perhaps, be pointed out that five divisions and two armoured brigades, two heavy artillery groups and several groups of signals and engineers would have made a large and cumbersome corps.

Another point has some relevance. The dispersal of the same number of Canadian divisions under non-Canadian command would not have reduced and in all probability would have increased the reinforcement requirements. Such a course would also have made almost impossible the organization of adequate Canadian medical, postal and similar services.

One point I wish to make very clear since there has been some misunderstanding in this connection. All Canadian divisions and other smaller formations overseas have been reinforced exclusively by Canadians. When we hear of British or Polish or American troops in the First Canadian Army what is meant is that a corps or a division of such troops is fighting under Canadian command.

In the recent offensive in the lower Rhineland, only about a third of the troops in the First Canadian Army were Canadian. But this was a very high honour and tribute to Canada. I have been told that at one stage of its glorious history in this war, there were no British divisions serving in the famous British Eighth Army. Yet no one questioned its right to be called a British army.

It would be quite easy to give the committee plenty of examples of regroupings of army corps taken from experience in the present war. The practice of course is not a new one. Many hon. members will recall that during the last war the Canadian formations at the second battle of Ypres formed part of the British Second Army. Sixteen months later, on the Somme, the Canadian corps formed part of the British Fourth Army. At Vimy Ridge, the Canadian corps was part of the British First Army. At Passchendaele, Canadian troops fought in the British second army. Simultaneously, other Canadian troops were fighting as part of the British Third Army.

In my own case the battery with which I was serving was not even attached to the Canadian corps it was attached to the first British corps. I have reason to remember that because after we came out on rest after Passchendaele I was able to get leave to go to Italy, which was not permitted at that time if you were attached to the Canadian corps.

During the spring of 1918, some Canadian troops were divided between the British First and Third Armies in the neighbourhood of Vimy Ridge, while other Canadian forces were fighting near Amiens with the British Fifth Army. It is also interesting to recall that at Vimy Ridge in 1917, troops of the British fifth division fought with the Canadian divisions as a part of the Canadian corps. I recall these examples both because they are part of the history of Canadian arms and because they illustrate so well the principle applied in the shifting of formations from one army to another in accordance with battle needs.

I am now going to take further liberties with the patience of the committee in order to give a brief description of the organization for handling reinforcements for the Canadian Army in the United Kingdom and in the actual theatres of operations.

The organization in the United Kingdom concerned with the reinforcements for the Canadian Army in the field is called the Canadian reinforcement units. Under one headquarters, there is a group of units each on a definite establishment, designed to hold and to continue the training of reinforcements for each of the arms and services in the army. Naturally, the number of reinforcement units for each arm or service depends upon the number of reinforcements to be held. There is, for example, more than one unit for the armoured corps and the artillery. There is one unit each for engineers, signals and army service corps. There is a general reinforcement unit for those services which are so small that they do not require a separate unit for their reinforcements.

The organization for holding and training infantry reinforcements is somewhat different in character. It consists of two infantry training brigades made up of infantry training regiments, each of which has a depot battalion to administer the reinforcements and two training battalions to train them as nearly as possible to field conditions. Each regiment holds, administers and trains reinforcements for particular infantry battalions in the field.

Reinforcements are dispatched from Canada to the Canadian reinforcement units in the United Kingdom month by month, according to projected requirements overseas and, of course, to the shipping available. Reinforcements are dispatched to the particular reinforcement unit or infantry training regiment for which they are intended. Upon disembarkation, they proceed direct to these units.

Upon arrival at the reinforcement unit, the state of training of the reinforcements from Canada is assessed. If further training is required, the reinforcements receive such further training before being dispatched to the theatre of operations. If no further training is required, their training and fitness is maintained until they are called forward into the theatre.

Reinforcements are called forward from the United Kingdom by the general officer in charge of the Canadian elements of the lines of communication in the theatre. Perhaps I should explain that for ease of movement and the like, the headquarters which among other tasks has to handle the reinforcements and which is directed by this Canadian general officer to whom I have just referred, is divided into two groups designated 1st and 2nd echelons.

The demands for reinforcements from the United Kingdom are met weekly or more frequently if necessary. These demands are based on estimates of reinforcements which will be required to replenish the pool for each arm or service held in the theatre, and on the casualties which it is estimated will be suffered up to the time the reinforcements will arrive.

In the theatre, there is a Canadian base reinforcement group made up of a number of reinforcement battalions. These battalions are designed to hold reinforcements and to maintain the state of training of these reinforcements until they are called forward for action.

In addition to the reinforcement battalions in the group at the base, there is a forward reinforcement battalion normally located in the corps area. This battalion is divided into companies to hold an appropriate number of reinforcements for each unit in each division and in corps troops.

At each divisional headquarters and at corps headquarters, there is an officer who is a representative of the officer in charge of 2nd echelon at the base. This officer receives a copy of the daily casualty reports from the units. On the basis of these reports, he demands reinforcements from the forward reinforcement battalion and informs 2nd echelon.

By having officers representing the reinforcement agencies attached to the fighting formations, who can make their demands for reinforcements direct to the forward reinforcement battalion, the movement of reinforcements is expedited and the reinforcements can join the units as quickly as transportation facilities permit. Naturally, their movement forward is dependent upon conditions of battle at the time.

The organization of reinforcements for armoured units is somewhat different. Here it is necessary for reinforcements and replacement tanks to move forward together. While bringing their tanks forward, reinforcement crews have an opportunity to get to know the particular tank they will take into battle. Although the organization differs somewhat, the basic principle is the same. Reinforcements are held well forward and are demanded direct by the fighting formations.

The organization of reinforcements is truly a stream. As reinforcements are called forward into battle, other reinforcements take their place in the forward units, others move from the United Kingdom to the units at the base, still others from Canada to the United Kingdom.

Because it is flexible, the organization permits of the ready reinforcement of the units in a division. No matter with what corps a division may be serving from time to time, it is able to get its own reinforcements. In this connection, I should perhaps point out that the reinforcing of units in the field is done territorially as far as possible. Except in cases of extreme urgency, reinforcements recruited from a particular part of Canada join a unit from that region in the field. Moreover, except for emergencies, which do arise from time to time in battle, a soldier who has served with a unit and leaves it for one reason or another, and later joins the reinforcement stream, becomes a reinforcement for his own old unit.

Finally, I should perhaps say a word about the difficulties which often arise in moving men forward while a battle is going on, particularly a battle of movement. It is, of course, not possible to replace every casualty the moment the casualty occurs. There is also the problem of absorbing reinforcements into the fighting units, and the effect upon the morale of the unit of such absorption. Every old soldier knows that no unit and no commander is ever satisfied with the reinforcements sent to them when they first arrive. Old soldiers know, too, that if the men are properly selected and properly trained, they can be quickly absorbed into the unit, and before many days have gone by, become veterans all ready to criticize the next batch of reinforcements.

The Army in Canada. Now about the Army in Canada. Canada is the base of operations of the Canadian Army overseas. This country is the source of supply of reinforcements, weapons, munitions, equipment and supplies for the fighting units. Hon. members may be surprised when I remind them that the total effective strength of the army in Canada is some 175,000 men and, in addition, some 13,000 women. Apart from those in hospital or those awaiting discharge, all are engaged in military activities which the government's expert military advisers regard as essential to the prosecution of the war. Most of these activities are in direct support of the army overseas.

In cooperation with the other services the army in Canada has had to provide for the security of our own country and nearby areas, like Newfoundland, against direct assault or raids. As the tide of war has receded, this task has fortunately made smaller and smaller demands on the army's man-power, but there are still coastal garrisons and garrisons for strategic or vulnerable areas which have to be provided, if undue risks are not to be taken.

The main task of the army in Canada is to support the Canadian Army overseas. Men and machinery have to be provided for the enlistment, enrolment, administration and discipline, medical and dental care, and the training and dispatch of reinforcements. Then too the army has the task of providing personnel and machinery to receive, sort out, counsel and discharge those who have completed their military service. The army in Canada does not itself manufacture weapons, equipment and ammunition, but it has a considerable staff engaged in testing, designing and improving munitions, in receiving them from the manufacturers and arranging for their warehousing, issue and shipment for our own forces overseas, and also to the armies of our allies who are supplied with Canadian munitions.

The army in Canada administers and guards many thousands of prisoners of war. In addition, it provides certain services to the navy and the air force, which represent an overall national saving in man-power.

The man-power of the army in Canada is distributed roughly as follows:

1. Fifty per cent of the total number of men in the army in Canada are directly related to the reinforcement of the army overseas.

- (a) Thirty-five per cent of the troops in Canada are themselves in training as reinforcements, destined for overseas service. As this number represents men at all stages of training, the number is much greater than the number fully trained and ready for dispatch at any one time.

(b) Fifteen per cent of the troops in Canada form the staffs of the training centres in which overseas reinforcements receive their training. They comprise instructors, administrative, housekeeping and welfare personnel.

2. About ten per cent of the troops in Canada are employed as operational troops ensuring the security of our national military base. They include soldiers manning coastal defences, anti-aircraft guns, and the like.

3. Another fifteen per cent of the troops in Canada are employed in recruiting and discharge depots, in working on behalf of the navy and air force, in guarding prisoners of war and internees, and in miscellaneous duties.

4. The balance, some twenty-five per cent, of all the troops in Canada, provide the house-keeping staffs for the rest of the army in Canada, including medical and dental care, provost, supply, engineering and mechanical maintenance, pay and chaplain services, and so on.

These figures show that the greater part of the army in Canada is not engaged in what is loosely described as "home defence". The proportion of the total engaged in these operational activities is now less than ten per cent and reductions continue to be made. Most of the activities of the army in Canada are essential services being performed for the direct benefit and support of the army overseas.

By far the largest proportion of the soldiers employed in Canada (apart from those being trained as reinforcements for overseas) are in the older age brackets, lower medical categories, or are members of the C.W.A.C. It has long been the policy of the government and the military authorities to withdraw from units in Canada those who are suitable and able to serve overseas as their services are required, and as rapidly as they can be replaced by personnel in lower categories.

It may be as well at this point to mention one fact that seems little realized in the country. That is, that at no time during the present war have more than a third of the soldiers in Canada been N.R.M.A. or so-called "home defence" personnel. Of the numbers at present in the army in Canada, approximately 35,000 are N.R.M.A. and 140,000 general service personnel.

[Mr. Abbott.]

The Strength of the Army. Turning now to the present strength of the army and the changes in the strength which have taken place over the last fiscal year, in the case of the army overseas, security considerations make it impossible for me to do more than give an overall picture, but for the army in Canada and territories adjacent to Canada, I can give a little more detail.

The army overseas, that is, in the United Kingdom and in Europe, has increased during the fiscal year from about 240,000 to about 285,000.

Of the increase of approximately 45,000, nearly one-half has been in personnel employed or held as reinforcements. The remainder is in hospitalized and other non-effective personnel. Increases in these items are to be expected in view of the action in which the army has been engaged over the year.

The increase has been effected by the dispatch overseas of some 80,000 troops. As was stated in the house in February last year, it had been planned to dispatch overseas only 48,000 during the fiscal year. The committee will, I feel sure, appreciate the magnitude of the effort which has been made to bring about, during the fiscal year, the dispatch overseas of two-thirds as many again as the number which had been originally planned.

The army overseas includes some 2,000 nursing sisters and other members of the nursing services and some 1,500 members of the C.W.A.C. Most of the members of the C.W.A.C. are employed in the United Kingdom but some have gone even further afield. The nursing sisters are employed in hospitals both in the United Kingdom and in the theatres of war.

I shall not for the moment give details as to the present reinforcement situation but I shall return to this a little later on in the course of my remarks.

As regards the army in Canada and adjacent territories, the then Minister of National Defence in presenting the estimates to the house in February, 1944, stated that the strength amounted to over 215,000. At the present time the strength of the army in Canada and adjacent territories numbers only about 175,000, plus about 9,000 who, although carried on strength, are on extended leave to engage in agriculture, mining or various essential industries. The decrease of 40,000, that is, from 215,000 to 175,000, is accounted for as follows: 80,000 have been dispatched overseas and about 55,000 have been struck off strength for various reasons; a gross decrease of 135,000. On the other hand, there have been nearly 65,000 enlistments and enrolments, and approximately 30,000 returned from overseas, a total increase of about 95,000; leaving a net decrease of about 40,000.

Of the 175,000 now in home army establishments, some 15,000 are in operational units, and some 80,000 are employed in training or other non-operational units. These compare respectively with 55,000 and 75,000 a year ago.

The total of the two is the true basis of comparison since there has been some reclassification of units, formerly considered as operational, to non-operational status. For example, servicing units in the coastal commands were last year almost all classified as operational since their duties were mostly concerned with the maintenance of the operational troops in the infantry and artillery units of the commands. With the reduction of the scale of defences consequent upon the changed strategical considerations, the role of these servicing units is now largely non-operational and they are now so classified.

The total now employed in operational and non-operational units amounts to 95,000 and is some 35,000 less than the number so employed a year ago.

Attention is constantly being devoted to releasing from service in Canada as many fit men as possible in order that they may proceed overseas as reinforcements. Apart from commissioned officers, the number of men who are of age and physical standard suitable for duty as infantry overseas who are still employed in operational or non-operational units is now only about 21,000, many of whom have already served overseas. This includes men in certain infantry units which it has not yet been possible to relieve from operational duties either in Canada or in various islands in the Atlantic and in certain units engaged in cold weather tests. As soon as these units can be released the fit personnel will be sent overseas as reinforcements.

The committee will, of course, understand that a certain number of men of the highest physical standards must be retained in Canada for training duties, provost and other special work. Moreover certain warrant officers and specialist tradesmen must be retained even if they happen to be of suitable medical category for service overseas. However, to the extent that such men can be released by replacing them with men returned from overseas they will be dispatched overseas.

The number in the training stream, that is, undergoing training in the numerous training centres and schools across the country and including men recently enlisted or enrolled in district depots, amounts to about 65,000. As these men complete their training they will go forward as reinforcements to the army overseas. Those who for one reason or another become ineligible for overseas service will be employed in units in Canada according to their qualifications and wherever possible, will be used to release fit men for service overseas.

In the district depots, apart from men newly inducted into the army who are accounted for in the training stream, there are about 15,000 men. These men are in what are known as the appraisal, placement and rehabilitation wings. They include men who have returned from overseas who are posted to district depots while they are on disembarkation leave. When their leave is completed they report back to their depot and are either found suitable employment or may be discharged. Men from units in Canada which are disbanded or men who are found unsuitable for the training or employment in which they are engaged may be posted to depots until further employment is found for them or until they are returned to civil life.

Over and above the 175,000 men to whom I have referred, there are some 1,000 nursing sisters and other members of the nursing service, and some 12,000 members of the C.W.A.C.

The department also employs some 10,000 full time civilians in military establishments. These civilians fill many posts which might otherwise have to be filled by high category men.

As I have said, there are among the 175,000 men in the army in Canada and adjacent territories about 35,000 N.R.M.A. soldiers. In addition, 6,000 of the 9,000 men on extended leave are N.R.M.A. men.

The 35,000 N.R.M.A. troops are distributed throughout the various units which go to make up the army in Canada. They are to be found in every training centre in Canada, in every depot and in practically every unit in Canada whether operational or non-operational and in the numerous units serving in the islands off the Atlantic coast and in the territory of Labrador.

I hope the committee will forgive me for dwelling on this point, but in spite of repeated statements, the misapprehension still seems to exist in some quarters that the N.R.M.A. are a separate and distinct body apart from other troops. This is not the case—the N.R.M.A. troops are not segregated and concentrated in one camp or in a number of camps, but as I have said, are to be found throughout the army in Canada.

War Appropriation—The Army

Last November figures of the N.R.M.A. strength were published in considerable detail. In view of the interest in these figures, which I am sure is shared by members of the committee, I have had comparisons made in tabular form of the strength as it then existed with the current strength. With the permission of the committee I will place these tables on Hansard. These tables, in which the figures have been shown in round numbers, are as follows:

Table I

Table I shows that the 35,000 are divided roughly as follows: 7,500 in operational units, 12,500 in non-operational units, another 12,500 in the training stream and 2,500 in depots. Of the 20,000 suitable for infantry there are 5,000 in the operational units, 5,000 in the non-operational units and 10,000 in the training stream. In accordance with policy, the number suitable for infantry employed in operational and non-operational units will be reduced still further and the men will go forward as reinforcements.

Table II shows that the present strength is divided as follows: 8,200 from Ontario; 14,200 from Quebec; 2,500 from the maritimes; 8,100 from the prairie provinces and 2,000 from the Pacific command.

[Mr. Abbott.]

I should mention that these statistics are compiled on a basis of military districts. Thus, the provincial break-down is only approximate because of the part of Ontario included in military district No. 10 and the part of Quebec in military district No. 3.

Table III shows that of the 35,000 at present on strength, 3,200 were enrolled in 1941; 13,600 in 1942, 9,200 in 1943 and 9,000 in 1944 and 1945.

As was stated in the house last year, it was planned to take into the army, both by voluntary enlistment and through the N.R. M.A., 5000 men per month, or 60,000 for the fiscal year ending March 31. This number was obtained, in fact, slightly exceeded.

Although the army has taken in during the fiscal year over 5,000 men per month, the net drain upon our man-power is much less than this, for discharges from the army to civil life have on the average run close to 4,000 per month; thus the net drain upon the civilian economy is only a little over 1,000 per month, or about 15,000 for the year.

Many of those discharged have been lowered in category and some will not be able to resume work as strenuous as that in which they were employed before enlisting. Nevertheless, these 45,000 discharged men constitute an important return to the Canadian working force.

At the beginning of the last fiscal year, we had in Canada over 55,000 operational troops, many of whom could be drawn on if necessity arose as reinforcements for the army overseas.

As the committee knows, that necessity did arise and many of the units were dispatched overseas as reinforcements both before and after the passing of order in council P.C. 8891.

I cannot conclude my remarks with respect to our army here in Canada without making some reference to the role which has been played by the reserve army. That role is familiar to all of us and it is unnecessary for me at this time to say more than that the government fully realizes that it has not been easy for busy men—many of whom are in the older age brackets with family obligations or employed in important and exacting war-time civilian duties—to devote their evenings and holidays to the work of the reserve army. Nevertheless, it is important that they should continue their efforts in support of this force. They are giving valuable assistance in maintaining throughout the country a continued interest in the Canadian Army and its activities, and in military affairs generally, and are setting a very necessary example of preparedness to all citizens, especially to our youths many of whom enlist in the active army after a brief period of service with a reserve unit. Great credit is due to those who have taken part and are continuing to take part in the activities of the reserve army for their splendid contribution to Canada's war effort.

The Reinforcement situation. I now come to the present reinforcement situation and what has taken place in regard to provision of reinforcements since the house met in special session in November and December last.

In open session I cannot state exactly how many reinforcements we have, but I can say that at the present time the reinforcement situation generally, and in the infantry in particular, is much better than was forecast in the estimates put before the house in the secret session.

We had at the end of March over 75 per cent more fully trained, fit and available infantry reinforcements in the theatres or in the United Kingdom than was forecast in the projections put before the house in the secret session. Moreover, we also have in training in the United Kingdom more infantry reinforcements than we estimated that we would have.

The principal reason why the infantry situation is better than forecast is, of course, that battle casualties have been lower than estimated, although this has been in part offset by a higher incidence of sickness and other non-battle casualties brought about by the extraordinarily difficult conditions under which our troops have been operating. Notwithstanding the fact that casualties have been fewer, our planned dispatches of reinforcements overseas have been not only fully maintained but substantially exceeded.

I shall now try to tell the committee in some detail what has taken place since P.C. 8891 was passed.

The first step was to select the battalions which would proceed overseas as reinforcements. Certain battalions had to be ruled out, at least as regards early sailings, because they were employed in garrison duty in Jamaica and Newfoundland and others had already been selected for cold weather exercises which have taken place in northern Saskatchewan and northern British Columbia.

Of the units which remained some had, of course, to be retained for operational duty in accordance with the scale of defences which it is necessary to maintain. Thus the decision which had to be made was as to which units should go and which units should remain.

Although some units had to be retained in Canada, the physical standards for these units are not so high as are the standards for operational duty overseas, and to the extent that they could be spared, high category personnel from these units were posted to the units proceeding as reinforcements.

The selection of the units was made by the general staff in consultation with the G.O.C.-in-C., Pacific command, in which area most of the units were situated.

To meet the additional 10,000 to be dispatched before the end of January, it was decided that ten units should proceed at a strength of 1,000 each. This is about 25 per cent greater than the normal establishment of an infantry battalion.

The first sailing which left Canada consisted of 14th brigade headquarters, the Oxford Rifles, the Winnipeg Light Infantry, the Royal Rifles of Canada, the St. John Fusiliers and the Prince of Wales Rangers.

On the second sailing, which left a week after the first, there were the 15th brigade headquarters, the Fusiliers de Sherbrooke, the Regiment de Joliette, the Regiment de Chateauguay, the Fusiliers du St. Laurent and the Prince Edward Island Highlanders. In addition, there were the Irish Fusiliers and the Midland Regiment.

I should mention that although the names of these various units are of territorial significance, the personnel of the units were actually drawn in every case from several military districts. Since that time, the 31st (Alberta) Reconnaissance Regiment and the Dufferin and Haldimand Regiment have also proceeded overseas.

A unit which had been serving in Newfoundland at the time of the passing of P.C. 8891 has now been relieved by another unit consisting largely of low category men. The unit which had been relieved is now in Canada and will in due course proceed overseas.

Personnel in units engaged in the cold weather tests are also scheduled to proceed overseas in due course. One of these tests has already been concluded, but the other, in which it is planned to study the effects of spring conditions, will continue a little longer.

In all, the numbers in units warned for overseas were nearly 18,000 other ranks, of whom a little over 14,500 were of N.R.M.A. status.

Of those warned to report for the third sailings, 6,311 were reported as not accounted for on January 16. Of these 1,993 surrendered or have been apprehended up to the end of March. A further 639 were found on investigation to have been in hospital or otherwise properly accounted for, leaving a total of 3,679 still unaccounted for.

Of those warned to report for the third sailing, 736 were absentees and not accounted for at the time of sailing. Of these, 339 have since surrendered or been apprehended, leaving 397 still unaccounted for.

Of those warned to report for the fourth sailing, thirteen were absent and unaccounted for at the time of sailing, and of these, seven since surrendered or been apprehended, leaving a balance of six unaccounted for.

Summarizing what I have just said, this left 4,082 still unaccounted for at the end of March.

The approximate distribution of these by military districts of enlistment or enrolment is as follows:

District of enrolment	Number
1, 2 and 3—(Ontario).....	450
4 and 5—(Quebec).....	2,400
6 and 7—(Maritimes).....	100
10, 12 and 13—(Prairies).....	1,000
Pacific command .....	150
Total.....	4,100

The details which I have given above refer to the units which are sometimes loosely called N.R.M.A. units. As has been mentioned, about 20 per cent of the strength of these units consists of general service men.

In addition to the N.R.M.A. men who have been dispatched overseas in units, reinforcements have also been dispatched from the training stream.

The total number of men of N.R.M.A. status dispatched overseas up to the end of March is 11,836. By military districts these are as follows:

M.D. 1, 2 and 3—(Ontario).....	3,466
M.D. 4 and 5—(Quebec).....	2,391
M.D. 6 and 7—(Maritimes).....	888

In addition, over 2,400 men who were N.R.M.A. soldiers last October have since proceeded overseas as general service soldiers. Thus, the total exceeds the 14,000 additional reinforcements from the N.R.M.A. which it had been expected to dispatch before the end of March.

The total conversion of N.R.M.A. since November 1st has been 10,279 and new enrolments in the N.R.M.A. 4,626.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, to round out the statistical data which I have been giving to the committee, I think I should say that total enlistments and enrolments in the Canadian Army since September, 1939, have been over 700,000 all ranks, which includes over 20,000 women. This compares with total enlistments and enrolments in the last war of approximately 619,000.

In the course of these remarks, I have endeavoured to give the committee as fully as possible the data I believe it may wish to have. But if there are any other figures it is desired should be given which can be given without transgressing security rules, those figures will be forthcoming. I am sorry I have taken so much time. I am conscious of my own limitations in attempting to describe what the army has done and what is the present position. Nevertheless as an old soldier, although a very humble one, I am very proud to have been given the opportunity of speaking for our Canadian Army. It is a magnificent army, of which I think all of us can be proud. It has fully maintained the traditions of the Canadian corps of the last war. It is the army of every part of Canada. Every province, every town, every village and every hamlet are represented in it. A good many people have been responsible for its creation, but perhaps there are two who, more than any others, have made the greatest contribution to the building up of that magnificent fighting force. Those two men are the present Minister of National Defence, Mr. McNaughton, and his immediate predecessor the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Ralston). It certainly is not for me to attempt to appraise the relative contributions which have been made by these two great Canadians, but I can and do say that they have been magnificent contributions, which have earned for each of them the gratitude of every man, woman and child in this country.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is always very difficult to follow a minister or a parliamentary assistant who has delivered a detailed recital such as we have heard this evening, but I think I speak for all hon. members of this house in complimenting the parliamentary assistant upon the graphic and complete way in which he has placed before us the problems of our army and the reinforcement situation in general.

This evening I am in the position of having no prepared speech, but I wish to ask a certain number of questions that have arisen out of the remarks made by the gentleman, with a view to ascertaining certain matters that have exercised the public mind in recent months and which even now, after the recital of the hon. gentleman, remain unanswered by him.

When he speaks with such pride of the Canadian Army and its exploits he voices the ideas of all of us in all parts of the house. The Canadian Army is performing exploits to-day which have earned the commendation of men in every land of the united nations.

As I listened to him telling the story of the original set-up that was intended for the Canadian Army I express the hope that I did almost a year and a half ago, that in the near future Canada's overseas forces will be in truth a Canadian Army, and that the men of Canada will be united together in one corps, adding to the exploits of Canadians overseas not only in this war but in the last.

I mentioned a moment ago that there are certain matters which have been unexplained, and that there are some things which have disturbed the public mind. The matter of manpower is still of pre-eminent importance, and recent events have intensified the interest with which the people of Canada will study the report given by the hon. member. The Prime Minister's speech of yesterday and the series of events which began in November last all require elucidation to a greater extent than has been done this evening by the hon. member.

I speak in no sense of disrespect, but the continuing in office of the Minister of National Defence after his rejection in the constituency of Grey North; the removal or forced resignation of Major General Parkes, V.C., one of Canada's heroes; the incidents that have taken place in various parts of Canada, culminating in the recent incident at Drummondville; the serious disregard of discipline as revealed by the fact that even to-day 4,082 of the 18,000 directed overseas remain unaccounted for; the continuance in this country of a policy of inequality of service and of sacrifice—all these and more, cumulatively and individually have aroused serious doubts in the minds of the people of Canada, which only a fuller explanation, if given by the hon. member, will resolve.

One thing of which he did not make mention this evening is the fact that during recent months numbers of men who have been overseas for a period of five years have been returned to Canada on furlough. That is something worthy of commendation. The suggestion originally came from hon. members on this side of the house, when we stated our belief that those who had been overseas the longest should have an opportunity of being restored to their loved ones.

Now I come to the matter of absenteeism. During recent days questions have been asked respecting absenteeism, and as to what is being done to apprehend these men who have deliberately defied the laws of this country. There has been no serious attempt at enforcement of the law in this regard, and to illustrate what I have in mind I shall refer to a matter which has taken place recently.

My information is that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, while they have received instructions to locate these absentees, and to assure equality under the law in this regard, have at the same time, since an unfortunate incident and trial respecting the apprehending of a man who had broken the law, found themselves faced with a memorandum preventing their carrying out their responsibilities in this regard. I refer to a direction which has been issued, as I am informed, to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, preventing them in effect from carrying out the law in this connection.

This memorandum, as I understand it, was delivered to the mounted police several months ago, and reads as follows:

All members of the force should familiarize themselves with the criminal code and C.I.D. Instruction Book with respect to the use of fire arms in police work. If as the result of the use of arms members of the force are charged in court, the responsibility for their acts and the providing of counsel is entirely that of the member or members concerned. . . .

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is a rather serious matter. These men are asked to line up the absentees in this country and to bring them in; and yet at the same time they are advised that if it becomes necessary for them to use force, through firearms, the responsibility for their doing so falls upon themselves in the matter of the securing of counsel, and meeting the charge.

Mr. MAYBANK: Is there any difference between those instructions and the instructions usually given to police officers?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: These are the instructions that were given, as I say, some months ago, in a memorandum which was sent out.

Mr. MAYBANK: Are they not the usual instructions?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am endeavouring to make an argument, and if my hon. friends do not agree they will have their opportunity to answer later on.

Mr. CLEAVER: Why not answer the question?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Never mind the insinuations; get down to the question.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I never interrupt hon. members, I sit here and listen to their arguments, and I ask the same courtesy I invariably give to other hon. members when speaking in the house. Whether or not these directions are different from or the same as those previously given, this I believe, is the first time directions such as these have been given, and just at a time when the police forces of the country require the undivided support and approval of the people of Canada, and the widest possible power for the carrying out in effect of the responsibilities that are theirs.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Would the hon. member tell me from whom he understands these directions were issued? By whom were they given?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: They were given to the mounted police in this country.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Would the hon. member mind telling me what his information is as to the source of these directions?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister asks me the source; I ask the minister were these the instructions?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I cannot say. There were no instructions given by any one but the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and any he gave were given on his own responsibility and as a result of his own experience in the administration of the force. The minister responsible to the house did not know until this moment about the instructions my hon. friend has read.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Regardless of that fact, I have referred to the instructions which I am informed were in fact given. Speaking about the punishment of wrongdoers, does the minister tell me that there has been any serious endeavour to enforce the mobilization regulations of this country having regard to the record of absenteeism which has been revealed this evening by the parliamentary assistant? Can it be said that there has been any serious endeavour to enforce the law when during 1944 only 4,503 men were punished for failure to comply with the regulations, and of those one-half were charged with the comparatively unimportant offence of failing to notify the mobilization authorities of a change in address? In 980 cases the charge was withdrawn when readiness was shown to comply with the law.

I think all of us are in agreement, the minister as well, that if a law on the statute books merits the support of the people of Canada, it merits the support of the law enforcement officials of this country. No information was given by the parliamentary assistant as to what was done with those who were apprehended. In one statement made by General McNaughton he stated that those who were wrongdoers were going to be punished, that those who were absent for more than twenty-one days would be punished as deserters. I ask the parliamentary assistant in that connection to place before the house and the country full information regarding the punishments that have been imposed on those men who have deliberately flouted the law of the country.

Mr. ABBOTT: We will do that.

Mr. MITCHELL: I might be able to tell the hon. member why we let some of them off.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The number that got off is certainly unusually high. If the government intends to uphold the law; if the government intends to make sure that delinquency shall be punished, is there any reason why those men who have deliberately flouted the law, who have deliberately defied the law, should not have their names made public to the end that the people of this country may be fully aware of those who are breaking the law? The men who to-day are defying the law should be made to realize that they will be punished when the war is over, regardless of when they are actually located or return home. In other words, the time has come when we should have the assurance that the law will be carried out.

When you look at the degree and extent of absenteeism it speaks volumes for the lack of enforcement; it speaks volumes for the lack of public opinion. In the midst of a war and under circumstances such as they are to-day, of 18,000 men who have been trained for two or three years, 4,082 still remain unaccounted for and 6,300 of the first numbers ordered overseas did not turn up. These things are serious. This matter strikes at the very heart of this country. This is delinquency the like of which few of us could imagine would exist during a time of war.

I have dealt with enforcement and the necessity of having full assurance that everything will be done to the end that the law will be upheld. I come now to one other matter which has been dealt with before in this house. This has to be repeated because, in spite of the protests that have been made in the past, the same course is being followed by the government at the present time and has been followed in recent months. We on this side believe that there is only one way in which this Canada of ours can be united, namely on a basis of equality of sacrifice everywhere in this dominion. I am going to refer to some recent statistics which indicate that even now there is no serious endeavour to enforce the National Resources Mobilization Act equally and fairly.

This confederation can be cemented in unity only when men all over this country realize that under our citizenship there is equality under the law. I say without hesitation, after listening to the statistics which the hon. gentleman placed before us this evening, that there is not to-day nor has there been since this government came into power, any serious endeavour to assure equality. I pointed out the inequalities of the call-up in 1941, but it could be explained then on the ground that it had arisen innocently. It might have been a coincidence in 1942 that there was then no equality. But when the same state of affairs was repeated in 1943 and in 1944, and in 1945 according to the latest record, namely, "Canada at War", issue 44, February and March, 1945, I say that a course is being deliberately followed by this government with its eyes wide open of not enforcing the law of this country equally, fearlessly and fairly everywhere in this dominion.

When we met in November last and it was announced that under the provisions of an order in council 16,000 men from the N.R.M.A. would be sent overseas, we on this side of the house endeavoured to secure an assurance from the government that there would be equality in the allocation of those men, that the distribution would be fairly applied everywhere. The hon. member for Souris asked General McNaughton, when he appeared on the floor of this house, this question as reported on page 6556 of Hansard:

Mr. Ross (Souris): There has been considerable discussion to-day about the 16,000 men who will be called up under the new conscription policy which has been announced. In choosing those men or any proportion of them, will it be done on a per capita basis in the military districts across Canada from which they originally enlisted?

The answer of General McNaughton was this:

Mr. McNaughton: No; they will just be taken from any part of Canada.

Now I ask the parliamentary assistant this question, will he place on the records of the house not only the composition, as he has done, of the numbers that have come from the various provinces, but the percentage that they bear to all who were in the N.R.M.A. forces available for overseas service?

Mr. ABBOTT: Is my hon. friend suggesting that untrained men should have been sent over?

War Appropriation—The Army

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No, but I presume that men who were trained would be trained without regard to province or territory. I would presume that the military authorities would not train some men from one province and not train men from another. I would presume that the training would be done equally, without regard to the locality from which the men came.

Mr. ABBOTT: That information has already been given in round figures.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am asking for the percentages which those chosen from each province bear to the total number available. It can very simply be given; there is no difficulty about that. If the figures reveal that there has been equality, then I for one will be the first to commend the government for having brought that about. I realize that there are those who will criticize or even ridicule it, but the people of Canada as a whole want the assurance from this government that in the administration of the order in council and the sending of those men overseas they have been sent over as nearly as possible equally, in proportion to the population of all sections of this dominion.

The parliamentary assistant by the question that he asked me would indicate that there had been equality. I took the trouble to look up the statistics put out by the government in the February-March issue of "Canada at War," the latest returns by provinces, in order to ascertain, first, the percentage of voluntary enlistments in each province, and, second, the percentage of call-ups in the various provinces. According to these statistics the percentages of the volunteers in each province is as follows:

Province	Per cent
Prince Edward Island .....	42.4
Nova Scotia .....	41.3
New Brunswick .....	38.4
Quebec .....	16.2
Ontario .....	40.9
Manitoba .....	39.4
Saskatchewan .....	33.3
Alberta .....	35.9
British Columbia .....	41.1

I repeat:

Those are figures from the official statement issued by the department with regard to volunteers.

Now I come to the matter of call-ups. I cannot understand, unless it is intentional, why it is that the call-up percentages in the various provinces range from 4.7 per cent to 7.2. Why is it that there is that disparity between the provinces in the matter of call-ups? Why is it that in some provinces there is such a low number called in proportion to the available number, while in other provinces there is a very much larger number called?

There can be no equality unless the call-ups in all the provinces are as nearly as possible equal, having regard to all the circumstances. Complaint is heard of the shortage of manpower on the farms throughout this country. Let me tell you, Mr. Chairman, that in my own province of Saskatchewan the call-up is almost the highest in the Dominion of Canada, and that call-up is still being operated so far as the farmers are concerned. The call-up in Saskatchewan is approximately 2.3 per cent higher than the lowest call-up in one or more provinces of this dominion. These things the hon. gentleman should explain. He should explain why it is that in the sixth year of war there is still an inequality that we on this side of the house have complained of from 1941 on.

There is some information that I should like to obtain. In November last the hon. member for Prince Albert asked General McNaughton when N.R.M.A. men could convert and still be regarded as volunteers, or, in other words, would not come within the purview of the order in council. I ask the parliamentary assistant now, has the right to conversion by the N.R.M.A. men been extended beyond the confines of Canada? Has it been extended so that those who are overseas are permitted to convert and thereby take themselves outside the ambit of the order in council?

Mr. ABBOTT: They have to convert before embarkation.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: According to the figures he has given this evening, 11,836 of the 16,000 covered by the order in council have been sent overseas.

Mr. ABBOTT: Having that status when they went.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Having that status when they went, they thereby come within the 16,000 provided for in the order in council.

Mr. ABBOTT: And approximately an additional 2,400 up to the end of March, because the figures I gave are accurate up to the 8th of March or something like that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: So that the situation to-day then is that approximately 13,400 of the 16,000 covered by order in council have come forward.

Mr. ABBOTT: Whatever those two figures add up to; that is right.

Mr. DIFENBAKER: Having regard to the offensive now in progress on the western front and in Germany, and having regard to the present rate of casualties and anticipated casualties, will the parliamentary assistant say whether or not any further order in council will be required in order to secure the necessary reinforcements? That is a matter upon which the hon. gentleman will have full information. If there is any threatened shortage of manpower required for reinforcements, is it the intention of the government to pass any further order in council?

Summarizing the questions I have placed before the committee they are: first, what about the matter of enforcement; second, what is being done to secure equality of service; third, is the reinforcement situation such, having regard to anticipated demands overseas, that any further order in council is expected or at present is being prepared?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know whether my hon. friend wants me to outline in detail the procedure which is followed with respect to apprehending these deserters, but, if so, I would be glad to do so.

First, though, let me deal with his remarks concerning the matter of call-ups and what he refers to as "equality of sacrifice"; and I point out to him, of course, that that is a matter which does not fall under the jurisdiction of the Department of National Defence. We ask the Department of Labour to provide us with so many men a month, and the responsibility of obtaining these men, the call-ups, is on the Department of Labour.

With regard to his other question, as to whether a further order in council will be passed in order to provide reinforcements, I cannot, of course, say whether or not an order in council will be passed; but I can say this, that if it is necessary to pass a further order in council in order to provide reinforcements, such an order in council will be passed.

Now, as to the procedure, the steps which are taken to apprehend absentees and deserters, the steps are as follows: On the eighth day of absence the officer commanding the unit issues a descriptive report showing all details of the man, his physical description, information regarding his home address, places he is likely to visit, and the like. This is circulated immediately, first to national defence headquarters here in Ottawa, second, to provincial and municipal police in the immediate vicinity of the soldier's unit; third, to all active depot units which may be able to assist in locating the man; fourth, to the civil police in the area to which the soldier may have proceeded; fifth, if it is thought he may have gone to the United States, the military attache at Washington is advised and he attends to the circulation of the description and so on to the federal bureau of investigation; sixth, the deputy assistant provost marshal, district headquarters and so on are advised; and finally, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, by the provost marshal. These are the steps which are taken to advise the various enforcement authorities.

Then as to the steps which are taken toward apprehension; in the first place inquiries are made locally in the areas to which it is thought the deserter may have proceeded. Second, the provost personnel work in close cooperation with the provincial and municipal police and with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Thirdly, the provost companies have special apprehension squads to apprehend absentees and deserters. Fourth, provost personnel may be granted permission to wear plain clothes for the purpose of pursuing their inquiries. Fifth, where considered desirable the next of kin are communicated with and are informed of the consequences of continued absence and that it will ultimately result in the stoppage of dependents' allowance and assigned pay. Sixth, arrangements have now been made with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police whereby they will actively participate by themselves and in cooperation with the provost personnel in the apprehension of absentees and deserters. Seventh, certain members of special apprehension squads have been appointed special constables under the R.C.M.P. Act for the purpose of apprehending absentees and deserters, and can now execute search warrants for the purpose of apprehending absentees and deserters in the same manner as civil police. Finally, an advertisement relating to the offences of desertion and absenteeism was published in all daily newspapers on or about the 26th or 27th of January. That advertisement recited the appropriate sections of the Army Act, the criminal code, the Militia Act and the defence of Canada regulations relating to absence without leave, desertion, inciting to desert, and the concealing of absentees and deserters. A brief resume of the contents of this advertisement was broadcast over the radio on the same date.

I think my hon. friend asked me for details as to the disposition which is being made of deserters. I have not that information at hand at the moment. I think I should be able to get it and give it to him to-morrow.

Mr. WHITE: When the parliamentary assistant speaks about the number of soldiers who did not report who were warned for duty overseas, in addition to the number of deserters or soldiers absent without leave, will he inform the committee how many other soldiers in the various military districts are absent without leave at the present time?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes; I can give my hon. friend the figures as of the 28th February. Those are the latest figures I have. If I remember, the hon. member for Prince stated, in bringing down the estimates last year, that the number then was approximately eleven thousand; and I take it that what my hon. friend wants is the cumulative total to date since the beginning of the war. Is that right?

Mr. WHITE: Yes.

Mr. ABBOTT: The total on February 28 was 18,943. That includes all branches of the service, C.W.A.C., everybody; that is the cumulative total from the beginning of the war.

Mr. WHITE: Can the parliamentary assistant break down the figures by provinces or military districts?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes; I have that break-down here. It is in two columns, by districts from which absence commenced and by districts of enlistment and origin. I take it that what my hon. friend would like is by districts of enlistments and origins.

Mr. WHITE: Yes.

Mr. ABBOTT: The figures are as follows:

Military district	No.
1.....	945
2 (and Camp Borden).....	2,092
3 (and Petawawa).....	602
4.....	7,800
5.....	3,713
6.....	262
7.....	391
10.....	1,083
11.....	629
12.....	736
	18,943

Mr. WHITE: Would the parliamentary assistant give the committee some information as to the procedure which is followed when a deserter is brought in; whether he is court-martialed, and some idea of the sentence and the punishment; and what is done in regard to missing equipment?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know that I can give my hon. friend a detailed answer on that. I might get a little more information from my officers. But the usual practice is followed. He is brought first before his commanding officer; and perhaps I might say at this stage, with respect to those men who went absent without leave after receiving notice to go overseas, it was felt, of course, that the purpose for which they went absent without leave or deserted was to avoid service overseas and therefore, if they were tried here and sentenced to detention or other form of punishment, they would accomplish what they had set out to do. So that, broadly speaking, when that class of absentee or deserter is apprehended he is sent to the base camp and shipped overseas as quickly as possible. Most of those cases have been dealt with overseas, the majority summarily by the commanding officers of the units. There have been a certain number of courts-martial, and I have promised the hon. member for Lake Centre to try to have for him to-morrow in greater detail the disposal which has been made of those cases.

Mr. RALSTON: May I first convey to my hon. friend my sincere congratulations on the most lucid statement he has made and on the way he has handled it. I did not expect that it was coming on so soon. There may be some questions which I shall want to ask. I have had one in my mind for some time, and that is with regard to the matter of the reduced casualties, for which we all thank God. I wonder if there is any objection to my hon. friend giving the committee what might be called the saving in casualties as compared with the estimate which was made at the time the house was in session last November. Certain estimates were made at that time and a certain result was to be arrived at; a certain number of men were expected to be on hand at the end of each month if the casualties occurred as forecast and if the numbers were sent over as planned. I understand from my hon. friend that the number of N.R.M.A. men sent over has been slightly more, and the casualties—I have made up a calculation of my own, but it is a matter which my hon. friend should give—have been thousands less. I wish to know if my hon. friend can give a statement as to how many fewer casualties there have been approximately up to the end of March than the number forecast at the November sitting.

Mr. ABBOTT: I cannot see the slightest objection to giving the information. I do not have it before me at the moment but I assume it is easily obtainable. I will get it and give it to the committee. On the question of casualties, my hon. friend has brought to my mind a point I had really intended to cover in my opening remarks. I do not wish to single out any particular branch of the service for special commendation, but one of the reasons why our casualties have been lower in this war than in the last has been, among other things, the splendid work done by the medical corps. They are operating in the forward areas, doing major surgery at forward dressing stations; and incidentally the nursing sisters are operating well forward in this war under gunfire. With the use of aeroplane evacuation and the new drugs we have, and with prompt blood transfusions—and in this the civilian population has contributed largely in providing plasma—the result has been that deaths following wounds have been very much lower than in the last war. I am glad my hon. friend brought this up, because I did want to pay this special tribute to the work done by the medical services in the army. I will get the information asked for.

Mr. RALSTON: Of the 11,800 N.R.M.A. men sent over up to the end of February plus the 2,400 up to the end of March, how many were trained infantry men?

Mr. ABBOTT: I cannot give that accurately at the moment, but a very large proportion of them were. If I can I will get the exact figures and give them to-morrow.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend will have in mind that there were a certain number of trained infantry planned to be sent over, and I should like to know whether or not that number has been exceeded. If it is a fact that the number of trained infantry are over the number planned, remembering the figures given last November with respect to the number of casualties forecast, and knowing the casualties which have been published in the newspapers so far, there must be thousands more overseas than were planned on. I would ask whether consideration has been given to substantially increasing the number of men coming back on rotation leave.

Mr. ABBOTT: Consideration has been given to that and I think we have about 4,000 back already on rotation leave. Consideration is being given to increasing that number.

Mr. FREDERIC DORION (Charlevoix-Saguenay) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, the few remarks which I intend to make will be of a general character because we have before us the entire resolution in which we are requested to vote a sum of two billion dollars for the purposes mentioned.

As has been the case with most of the resolutions introduced by the government, I notice in that resolution things that are, to my mind, almost conflicting. In fact we are asked to vote two billion dollars towards defraying any expenditures that may be incurred for the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada; secondly, for the conduct of naval, military and air operations in or beyond Canada; thirdly, for promoting the continuance of trade, industry and business communications, whether by means of insurance or indemnity against war risk or in any other manner whatsoever.

In this connection I wish to say a few words. Of course, if we were to vote an appropriation for the purposes mentioned under paragraph (c) of the resolution, no one could object. Indeed, I believe we should, as far as possible, "promote the continuance of trade, industry and business communications by means of insurance, or indemnity or in any other manner whatsoever." If, in this resolution, the objects and the amounts desired had been grouped; if, for example, we had been requested to vote a billion dollars for military purposes and another billion for the objects enumerated in paragraph (c), I do not hesitate to say that, as far as the purposes of paragraph (c) are concerned, no objection could have been raised. However, as I said a moment ago, in the present resolution, as in almost every motion submitted to us, the government has included certain items that are acceptable, while all the others are not. That is why I wish to state briefly the reasons which motivate my opposition to this resolution.

It is clear that we are now requested to pass war appropriations for the seventh consecutive year, as the first was adopted at the time of the declaration of war, in 1939. It is equally clear that this year, when the turn of events indicates that we are quite rapidly approaching the end of the war, the Canadian people were entitled to expect a certain lightening of the tax burden and a lowering of expenditures for war purposes.

Now, we have before us an appropriation comparable to those we voted during the last few years, that is in 1942, 1943 and 1944. Therefore, at the present time, when all can hope for an early conclusion of the war, when Canadian citizens who have been staggering for many years under a crushing burden of taxation could have anticipated early relief, the government offers us no prospect for the materialization of that hope which the whole population of Canada has so long entertained.

Under the circumstances I cannot see why we should have again to vote such considerable sums if we have only the occupation of Germany to deal with. It has been said that our forces should remain in Germany for some time, but on that score it would be rather easy and pretty logical, and also in accordance with past experience to have such occupation expenditures defrayed by the enemy, that is by the occupied country rather than by ourselves. As a matter of fact, in view of the war effort that Canada has achieved, the maintenance of all those occupation forces should be paid for by those countries which we shall occupy.

Another matter which gives me the greatest concern and which probably also explains why the appropriation is as large this year as in the last few years, is that we wish to pursue, as we have done in the case of Germany, the war against Japan. This afternoon the right honourable the prime minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) warned the house that the claim of some newspapers to the effect that he wanted to wage war against Japan on a moderate scale, was not correct, and he quoted what he had said in order to emphasize that when he mentioned a moderate effort, he was referring to moderation not in the war against Japan, but as regards the army of occupation in Germany. Therefore, it means that we are launching against Japan a war that will lead us no one knows where and which will cost us in munitions, men and money probably as much as the war in Europe. If we take such a course nobody knows what the outcome will be.

This is the very thing I want to oppose. I claim we have no reason to send expeditionary forces across the Pacific and we should not mobilize any troops to wage war on Japan when, in Asia there are whole populations anxious to fight that country; in China, for example, hundreds of thousands of men are ready to march against the Japanese as soon as they are supplied with the necessary weapons and ammunition. After five years of war in Europe, it would be only logical, just and reasonable that we refrain from sending troops to the Pacific, being content to supply weapons and ammunition to those who ask nothing better than to settle scores with Japan.

I said a moment ago that the present appropriations leave no hope to the Canadian people of a lightening of their burden, contrary to the general expectations.

I shall also make a few remarks concerning certain controls that have been irksome for too many years.

At the approach of the end of the war, and this is the present situation, it seems to me that the government could have released our people from some of the present restrictions.

I shall deal more particularly with the motor truck control which, in my constituency, as in all others, I suppose, make conditions more intolerable and calamitous than ever. The main industry of Charlevoix-Saguenay is forestry, which is of paramount importance. Indeed, my constituency supplies large quantities of wood for paper-making, fuel and other general commercial purposes. Well, last year, a good proportion of this useful wood was never taken out because the motor truck controller refused to grant permits for the purchase of trucks. It would seem that this year, at least during the few months that I have been making numerous personal calls on the controller, things have become even more worse than last year. Our people are refused permits to purchase the trucks they need while the dealers are running advertisements in the press offering trucks for sale. It is therefore evident that some of these vehicles are on the market, but our people are not allowed to buy them and, therefore, next winter, large quantities of wood will still remain in the bush, impending trade in general, whether of fuel wood or other forest products.

I shall bring a special case to your attention to show that these controls are often administered in a strange manner.

In the parish of Saint-Tite des Caps, county of Montmorency, there lives a certain Ludger Duclos, owner of two butter factories. Well, last summer, while production was set at the highest level, as this man could not sell his butter without taking in ration coupons in compliance with instructions from the wartime prices and trade board, he built up a large stock of this product. He then went to Quebec to reserve space in the cold storages, both those operated by the government and those owned by private concerns; but, unfortunately, nowhere could he find room for his surplus stock. Now, instead of going back home and destroying a large quantity of butter which he was unable to sell because his customers could not give him the necessary coupons, he did what every sensible man would have done under the circumstances: he disposed of his butter without asking for the required coupons. I have here a statement made under oath, showing that if he had to do that, it was on account of the fact that it was utterly impossible for him to find in Quebec an appropriate place for storing the surplus butter he had. Some time later that gentleman was arraigned before the Quebec police court, on a charge preferred by the wartime prices and trade board, and he was sentenced to pay a $500 fine.

It seems to me that, as the end of the war is in sight, those controls could have been eliminated so that our people might have sold their products on the domestic market without having to comply with the often absurd formalities of that board.

Mr. Chairman, an anomaly can be noticed in this country to-day. The Prime Minister said yesterday, that in the war against Japan nothing but the voluntary system of enlistment is contemplated, and we could see in the papers to-day, under large headlines, that in the war against Japan, volunteers only will be called. Now, if volunteers only are to serve in the war against Japan why should the Mobilization Act that was passed in 1940, be kept in force? That act, which is chapter 13 of statutes 3 and 4, George VI, has a preamble which reads as follows:

Whereas by reason of the developments since the outbreak of the present war a special emergency has arisen and the national safety of Canada has become endangered; and

Whereas it is, therefore, expedient to confer upon the governor in council special emergency powers to permit of the mobilization of all of the effective resources of the nation, both human and material, for the purpose of the defence and security of Canada, and

Whereas it is expedient that the said powers should be conferred upon the governor in council during the continuation of the state of war now existing,—

And so forth, and so on. The act was passed. Therefore, are there to-day such reasons as perhaps existed then—which I do not admit—and that could be thought to exist in 1940?

To any observer it becomes evident, as we now expect the war in Europe to end soon, that the question of internal defence and security of Canada is no more of importance for the present; it is clear that even if Canada was subject to attack in the past, this threat has now disappeared. Therefore, the repeal of the 1940 mobilization act is now in order.

If we mean to be sincere in saying that volunteers alone will take part in the war against Japan, let us repeal the 1940 mobilization act, so that no more of our young men, as at present, will be dragged handcuffed from their homes and led to the training camps. Disguised conscription still exists to-day perhaps more so than ever and, as already stated in this house, the soldiers needed to fight Japan in Asia will be drawn from the ranks of these conscripts.

For this reason, I submit that to be honest with the Canadian people, the 1940 mobilization act must be repealed. If, at the present time farmers were only granted leaves to work on their farms, I claim that it might then be feasible, at least temporarily, to suspend the enforcement of the 1940 mobilization act to avoid a situation which, in some instances, is really calamitous. Indeed, here is a case among possibly a hundred that I could bring to your attention. It constitutes a patent proof that our farmers' sons cannot get the necessary leaves of absence to work on the farms.

I wish to refer to the case of private E. Villeneuve whose regimental number is E-463443. This young man was serving in the army and last year he was given leave to work on his father's farm. Last fall, relying upon the instructions and notices published in the newspapers and even in the offices of selective service registrars, this young man left the farm in December to work for two or three months in the bush. It is a well known fact that generally speaking in winter a farmer who has only a few head of live stock in the stable, does not need as much help as at seeding time, in the spring, or in the summer and fall. In any event, a month after going to work in the bush, he received a notice that his leave ended on January 15, 1945 and that he was required to return to the training camp because he had not remained to work on the farm, in fulfilment of the object of his leave. I then got in touch with the Department of National Defence, and even with the minister himself, and I shall read an excerpt from the correspondence which passed between us at the time to show that if, in theory, the Department had the right to cancel the leave granted to this soldier, it is obvious from the correspondence which I have here, that this young man was justified in believing that he had the right to work in the bush for two or three months during the winter. I have here a notice dated December 21, 1944, issued by the Department of National Defence from which I quote the following.

In some cases, soldiers on compassionate farm leave have inadvertently received notices from the N.S.S., Department of Labour, that if the work on the farm is completed, they may be given employment in the woods or in the lumbering industry. These cases have been drawn to the attention of the Department of Labour.

This was on December 21. It is readily seen by this notice that there were differences of opinion in the Department as to whether these young men who had received leave of absence to work on farms would be allowed to work in the bush during the winter. After making representations, I received, on February 12, 1945, a letter from the private secretary of the minister of National Defence which reads as follows:

I have your letter of 23 January, 1945, with further reference to Private Villeneuve.

No instructions have been issued by the Department of National Defence that soldiers who were granted compassionate farm leave could remain on such leave during the winter months and accept employment with the lumbering industry. It recently became apparent that an erroneous impression was prevalent in farming and lumbering circles that such changes in employment were permissible.

War Appropriation—The Army

To correct this misunderstanding instructions were issued by this department to the military authorities concerned and by the Department of Labour to national selective service officials, that compassionate farm leave is granted expressly for the purpose its name implies and that extensions of such leave would not be granted for a purpose other than employment on the farm of an immediate relative.

This letter shows, Mr. Chairman, that "misunderstanding instructions" had to be coped with. Therefore if in the Department of National Defence it is frequently necessary to correct notices and to issue contradictory instructions, it is obvious that these poor soldiers cannot be blamed if they decide, after working on the farm for the rest of the year, to work in lumber camps during the winter in order to earn some money. Nevertheless, I made representations and I pointed out that the soldier's father was ill, that spring was at hand and that he was unable to look after his farm properly, but I failed nevertheless to obtain leave of absence for this man.

There is another point to which I desire to call attention. At the present time, when the end of the war in Europe is in sight, there is a class of young men who deserve special consideration. I refer to students. In my opinion, the government should allow immediately those students who were called under the mobilization act to resume their studies so that they may prepare themselves for the post-war period. All those who began a course of studies and who are anxious to proceed with it should be discharged from the army. This would not affect the armed forces by giving society in general the essential element of its development which she can only secure through the education of our youth. The case which I wish to point out will illustrate the necessity of granting general leave of absence to students and the injustice involved in the full enforcement of the mobilization act. About a month ago, I received from Baie Comeau, on the north shore, a letter from Mrs. Héliodore Montigny from which I quote the following:

In 1938, when students were scarce, the Eudist Fathers of Saint-Ann's College, Church Point, Nova Scotia, came to Baie Comeau seeking additional students. As the terms were reasonable, we decided to send our eldest son, who was then 15 years old, and his brother who was 12. This college being a bilingual one, this was an advantage as my husband is a labourer and our savings are very small. Having had some illness in the family, which placed an additional strain on our purse, we were forced to sell our property and to surrender our insurance policies in order to allow our boys to continue their studies. Finally we were forced to put the younger boy to work so that he could help his brother to complete his course. The latter obtained his Bachelor of Arts degree with distinction in June, 1944. Therefore, in September, 1944, he entered the philosophy class, after having spent seven years at college and undergone compulsory training. Last October he received his call-up notice from the Halifax district and he was forced to report there. The authorities refused to transfer him to the province of Quebec.

Here is a young man for whom his parents made tremendous sacrifices. As stated in the above letter, they even sold their property to allow him to complete his studies. And having almost finished his course he received his call-up notice. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that in view of the fact that shortly no additional men will have to be sent overseas, the case of this young man and of all the others in a similar position, should be settled and they should be allowed to continue their studies. And what is more serious, as stated in this letter, this student who was studying in Halifax because his parents wanted to give him the opportunity to complete his education in a bilingual college, was called up in the Halifax district. I appealed once more to the Minister of National Defence, Mr. McNaughton, to have him transferred to the Quebec district, where he was domiciled. I shall read the letter which I received from the minister himself under date of March 19.

Re: F-602624, Pte. J. P. Montigny

I have your letter of 19 March in connection with the above mentioned soldier who was not permitted to continue the commercial course on which he was engaged and who is now serving in the army in military district No. 6.

While provision was made for the continuation of university courses in certain technical subjects, on condition that the services of the student concerned would be available to the armed forces on graduation, no similar arrangement was made in connection with students on commercial courses. In any event the decision to enroll the soldier would be made by his national selective service mobilization board.

I notice your objection to Private Montigny being required to serve in military district No. 6, but I am sure that you will understand that when a soldier is enrolled in the Canadian Army it is necessary that the military authorities be free to station him wherever his services are required and that the individual preferences of soldiers could not possibly be taken into consideration without disrupting the whole organization of the army.

Yours very truly,

General McNaughton.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think that it would have inconvenienced military authorities if this young man had been assigned for training in the military district of Quebec where he is domiciled. Moreover, I think that it is time that the Department of National Defence with the Department of Labour should discontinue calling up our students and allow them to continue their studies.

There is another surprising fact in the present administration of the affairs of the country, which proceeds from the resolution. As I stated a moment ago we are called upon, by this resolution, to vote two billion dollars almost solely for war purposes. There is nothing to show that a portion of this money will be used to organize peace. There is nothing to show that this budget includes sums which may be used to provide work in peace time and to organize the post-war period when thousands of men will be released by war plants. Indeed, in reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix) the other day, it was shown that in the past year 4,000 workers had quit their jobs in the Quebec arsenals. And I believe that the same is true for all the other plants of the country. Therefore, it is more important than ever just now to take steps to help those people and provide work for them. Public works have been drastically curtailed; indeed practically none have been undertaken for five years. In my constituency, that of Charlevoix-Saguenay, along the coast, there are public wharves that have not been repaired or improved in the last five or six years. Last year's storms have practically demolished the wharves in many places. It is useless to ask the government to repair or improve them. We are constantly reminded that all available materials and funds must be used for the prosecution of the war. As the end of the war in Europe is in sight, I feel that it would be high time this year to earmark some of the public funds to undertake works which would benefit the public generally and for improving public services. This would give our population a ray of hope that relief is forthcoming.

There is another point which I desire to call to your attention. I do not see anything in the present administration which would allow our industries to seek foreign markets for their products.

And in this connection I would like to quote an article entitled "Signs of Peace," which appeared in the issue of April 2, 1945, of the Times in connection with what was taking place in England. This should serve as an example for us. I quote:

Signs of Peace

There were other signs of coming peace. On a Midlands country road, gaffers gasped at shiny new cars under test for post-war motorists. In a Warwickshire ammunition box factory, civilian gas stoves began coming off the assembly lines at the rate of one hundred a week. The government's new prefabricated houses were mushrooming all over bombed Britain.

From the ministry of supply came an unostentatious announcement that nineteen government owned war factories, employing 50,000 workers, had been released for civilian production.

Simultaneously came news that one of Britain's leading automobile makers, Standard of Coventry, whose trademark is a union jack, had been freed from war output a month ago. Dunlop of Speke (manufacturer of rubber products) had been similarly released last fortnight. The switch-over will swell each week. War contracts must be completed first, but plants may recon-vert before the end of the war with Germany. For roofless Britons, patiently trudging to work in their shiny trousers and shabby dresses, home front production will give priorities to clothing, building material, household equipment. Cars, tires, refrigerators, electrical gear, machinery will get preference for the vital export markets.

We should be guided by what is happening there, and organize more than we are doing now our foreign markets.

Before I conclude these few remarks, Mr. Chairman, I wish to draw to the attention of the government another matter. There is still time, before this session ends, to redress an injustice toward a considerable group of our people. I would like the government to grant, for the next federal elections, the vote to all young men of 18 years and over. These young people, who have done their share in and out of the army, are entitled to have a say in the management of this country's affairs because is it not true, that they are those who, during depression such as we have gone through in the past few years, have most to suffer from the decisions and actions of the government.

As regards finance, it is always possible for people who have money and use it even for war purposes to recover their investments, but in the case of the young people who are serving in the armed forces and who are called for service as soon as they reach the age of 18 years and a half, I submit that they are those who are primarily concerned in the conduct of the country's affairs, and even those who are not in the armed forces.

There should be no objection from any one to these young people of 18 years and over being allowed to vote in the next general election.

(Text)

Mr. LACROIX: Paragraph (b) of the resolution reads:

(b) the conduct of naval, military and air operations in or beyond Canada.

Will the minister tell me if the National Resources Mobilization Act, as amended by bill No. 80, will be the legal authority for the application of paragraph (b)?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know that I quite understand my hon. friend's question.

Mr. LACROIX (Translation): Here is my question: Paragraph (b) reads as follows:

(b) the conduct of naval, military and air operations in or beyond Canada;

War Appropriation—The Army

Will the implementation of this part of the resolution be carried out by resorting to the mobilization act as amended by bill No. 80?

Mr. ABBOTT: (Text) A bill will be founded upon this resolution granting $2,000,000,000 to His Majesty, and a portion of that amount will be used to pay the costs of the conduct of naval, military and air operations in and beyond Canada. I cannot see what connection there is between the National Resources Mobilization Act and bill No. 80 and the financial provisions which will be made in the bill to be founded on this resolution. Perhaps my hon. friend could elaborate a little.

Mr. LACROIX: You have to apply this item.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend has been in the house much longer than I and he knows that following the adoption of this resolution, if it is adopted, an appropriation bill will be introduced to provide a vote to His Majesty of $2,000,000,000 for the purposes to be set out in the bill. Those purposes will be substantially the purposes indicated in the resolution.

Mr. GRAYDON: I understand that the Canadian Pharmaceutical association has been in touch with the three branches of the service from time to time over a period of I suppose, one or two or three years. Memoranda have been brought to the attention from time to time of the heads of the three armed services, particularly the army, having to do with the status of pharmacists in the armed forces, and a suggestion has been made by the association looking toward the setting up of a pharmaceutical unit in the army. I have copies of the correspondence which has been sent to me in connection with the memoranda of the association, and I would ask the parliamentary assistant before his estimates are disposed of to explain what the policy of the government will be in connection with that application. It would be an imposition to ask him in his present position to reply now, but after consultation with the officials of his department perhaps he would outline to the committee just what the situation is and what the policy of the government will be.

Mr. ABBOTT: As the committee knows, I have not been associated with the department very long and I was not aware that these representations had been made. I shall inform myself on this subject and endeavour to give my hon. friend an answer to-morrow.

[Mr. LaCroix.]

Mr. WHITE: Were any officers or policemen injured or killed in the recent riot at Drummondville?

Mr. ABBOTT: I know that none was killed and I do not know that any were injured. I shall make inquiries and hope to be able to inform my hon. friend to-morrow. I think a statement was issued by the department shortly after the incident.

Mr. WHITE: Has the department given any consideration to increasing the pay of troops once they proceed overseas, and has any consideration been given to granting what is known as long-service pay?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know whether such consideration has been given but I shall be glad to inquire and give my hon. friend the information later.

Mr. GRAYDON: There arises out of overseas mail I received this afternoon a matter which might properly be drawn to the attention of the parliamentary assistant. I have heard this complaint before, but I did not think it had attained such prominence in the minds of those overseas as this letter would indicate. The letter was dated March 22, which would indicate that the mail service was not seriously delayed, and my correspondent, a man from my own town, writes me as follows:

One thing we would like to know is why aren't we issued with Canadian cigarettes in our rations, instead of British smokes?

He goes on to say:

The English fellows say that ours are much better than their own.

This is a matter which I do not apologize for bringing before the committee because it has often come to my attention before, but this letter is so recent that, as the opportunity is now afforded for questions and answers in committee, I would ask the parliamentary assistant to look into this complaint and let the committee know what the real situation is and what possibility there is of remedying it. This is perhaps one of those little things that nevertheless loom large in the minds of the boys overseas and I would appreciate it if the parliamentary assistant would tell us if anything can be done about it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall certainly make inquiries and give my hon. friend a reply. I have heard from friends of my own who have been overseas that the supply of Canadian cigarettes was pretty fair over there, that there are substantial supplies available. Why the issue consists of British cigarettes rather than Canadian I do not know, but I shall be glad to make inquiries and give my hon. friend an answer.

Mr. HAZEN: I should like to congratulate the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence for the army upon the report he has made to us this evening. It is clear, concise and very informative.

There is a question I should like to address to him which arises, not out of his report, but out of a dispatch that appeared in the Montreal Gazette of April 4, by Ross Munro, Canadian Press war correspondent. The article begins:

With the First Canadian Army in Northern Holland, April 3—(C.P. cable)—Together once more as an army, Canadians to-day established two bridgeheads over the Twente canal.

A little further on he says:

All Canadian infantry and armoured formations again are under General Crerar's command, as well as some British troops, but the latter are in the minority.

We hear rumours of one kind and another and this article gives rise perhaps to some speculation. The question I would ask the parliamentary assistant is this: Have the two corps of the Canadian Army been brought together again under General Crerar's command? If the answer to that question is in the negative, would he tell us if it is the intention of the military authorities to bring the two corps of the Canadian Army together under one head?

Mr. ABBOTT: I regret that I cannot give my hon. friend an answer to that question for reasons that he will probably appreciate.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): When the estimates of the other two branches of the service were before the committee there was considerable discussion of the clothing allowance deduction that is made in respect of men who have been let out of the air service or the navy and have enlisted in the army. A deduction is made from their pay. A great many of these chaps consider that a hardship, and considerable feeling has been aroused in the country over the way in which this matter is handled. I think this is the proper department to give an explanation, since the deduction is made by the army.

Before I sit down I should like to add my congratulations to the parliamentary assistant who, after such a short period in his present position, has given to-night such a lucid report on the affairs of the department.

Mr. ABBOTT: The question of the clothing allowance is now under consideration and I would ask my hon. friend to allow me to defer discussing it this evening. I may be in a position to say something to-morrow.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not think the parliamentary assistant answered satisfactorily the question asked a little while ago by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency. I do not think the parliamentary assistant avoided the question; perhaps he did not quite understand it. Perhaps I do not understand it either. But my impression of the question is that it was this. Under the National Resources Mobilization Act, as amended by bill 80, no authority is given to the government to send men into the Japanese theatre of war. Under clause 6 of the resolution the conduct of naval, military and air operations in or beyond Canada involves the voting of an appropriation for, in all probability, the sending of men into the Japanese theatre of war. But how can this resolution be made to apply when, under the National Resources Mobilization Act, the government has no authority to do that? I think I have the answer in my own mind; but perhaps that will throw some further light on the question.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend wants an answer now?

Mr. HANSELL: Yes.

Mr. ABBOTT: The answer, of course, is very simple. The government has full authority to send the military forces of Canada who are enlisted on a voluntary basis anywhere it sees fit to send them, and the moneys under the war appropriation which are voted can therefore be used to defray the expenses of a volunteer force anywhere in the world.

Mr. HANSELL: And that the National Resources Mobilization Act as amended applies to those forces that are conscripted for overseas service?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. GILLIS: I, too, wish to pay tribute to the parliamentary assistant for the manner in which he handled a very difficult job to-night. It just goes to show that all of the brains are not on the front benches.

Mr. ABBOTT: Or in the maritime provinces.

Mr. GILLIS: He has done an excellent job, and made things so clear that there is little room left for criticism; that is, if one is honest about it.

I should like to ask a question with respect to the application of gratuities. If one may judge from what has taken place in the last few weeks, this is the department which will have the handling of that problem. Has anything been done with respect to bringing the auxiliary services within the scope of the gratuity regulations? I am particularly interested in one classification. The Minister for Veterans' Affairs and the ex-minister of national defence will remember that at the last session I raised the question of the St. John ambulance service, and the information I got at that time was to the effect that they would not be included. Now I still pursue it because I cannot understand why a decision of that kind was made. To begin with, the St. John ambulance service is attached to the Canadian Army Medical Corps, and to all intents and purposes its members are performing exactly the same service as the nursing sisters. Take the ones in Canada, they are enlisted, subjected to military discipline, given a clothing grant, work in the hospitals, have charge of a floor, do exactly the same work as nursing sisters who—are classed as officers—and come within the scope of all the regulations. I cannot understand why the distinction should be made, with the V.A.D. attached to the army medical corps, subject to rations, discipline, and what goes with the military set-up.

Mr. RALSTON: Rations, discipline, and "quarters," which is the word the hon. member is looking for.

Mr. GILLIS: That is right. I cannot understand why nothing has been done to iron out what I consider an injustice. There is also the case of the fire-fighters and the Canadian Legion war services. Some of these latter went in on D-day, set up their equipment right outside Caen, put on shows, were in the thick of the fighting, underwent all the hardships, and have trailed the troops clear across the country up to the Rhine. When the gratuity is applicable to people who stayed back here in Canada I cannot see how the government can justify refusing it to people who have crossed the water and gone through all the hardship and danger which have been undergone by the auxiliary services who went overseas. I urge that the St. John ambulance corps personnel who are attached to the army medical corps, and perform practically the same duties as nursing sisters, should be in the same category for this purpose.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Possibly my hon. friend was not in the house when I explained that all these classes to which he has referred were dealt with in a brief statement I made to the committee during the course of these discussions, and they have been under the general supervision of the committee on demobilization and reestablishment and sub-committees dealing with every single class he has mentioned. The matter is definitely under consideration at this time with regard to the auxiliary services, the supervisors, and the fire-fighters. The whole matter is receiving repeated consideration, and as yet there has been no conclusion or determination. I can assure the hon. member that it has not been forgotten.

Mr. GILLIS: Does that include the St. John ambulance corps?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I should think so; I am not very sure. But it includes the auxiliary services, supervisors and fire-fighters.

Mr. GRAHAM: Since this will probably be the last opportunity, or almost the last opportunity, that we members of the present parliament will have to bring to the attention of those in charge of the department matters of great interest, I have thought it well to draw to the attention of the parliamentary assistant one thing which I am aware he already knows. It will be a matter of great concern, and the very strong desire of our men in Europe, once the struggle over there is ended, to return to their homes. I know the government must take care of the necessities which will present themselves when the organized struggle there is over, but I hope that every department of government which is concerned will keep in mind the very natural desire of our soldiers serving overseas to return to their native soil, and will have constantly before them the necessity of accomplishing that object as quickly as is possible under all the circumstances.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I think the parliamentary assistant deserves the compliments which have been passed around; and if he finds to-morrow morning that his hat is a little small for him, I am willing to "chip in" with half a dollar toward buying a new one.

Mr. ABBOTT: I accept the hon. member's offer; I need one.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The parliamentary assistant mentioned that at the front wonderful facilities are available for looking after the wounded. The other day I received a letter from a boy who was born on a farm a few miles from where I live, and in it he says:

I have recovered to some extent from my wounds, but I am not well as yet; I still have bandages on, but I am back in the front line.

Is that the custom, that they should be sent back?

Mr. ABBOTT: Most definitely not. I cannot understand it, and if my hon. friend will give me the particulars of the case I shall have it investigated. That is not the practice.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That is not the first case I have of the kind. I know the boy would not write to his wife in that way unless it was so. I will check up on the number—I have it in my office—and let the minister have it.

I do not think the department have that close cooperation with the selective service department which it should have. I say that for this reason. A boy in Peterborough was engaged in essential work and got one postponement and, since he could not be replaced, being an expert in his line, his employer wrote to the registrar asking that the postponement be continued for another term. He did not receive a reply from the registrar, and so about a week before the first postponement was up, he telephoned to the registrar and told him of the case. He was informed that since no decision had yet been made in regard to the boy the registrar could not say anything, but he suggested to the employer that he keep the boy on at his work. Before the postponement was up, the boy was called into the selective service office. The employer went with him, and the selective service officer told the boy that no decision had been made but he did not think the boy would get another postponement. But he never said that the boy would have to report. The boy went back and continued at his work. His postponement was up on a Saturday, and twenty-one days after that, although the selective service knew that the boy was working at this man's plant—there was no doubt about it—the officers went to the boy's house at three o'clock in the morning, took him out of bed and put him in the clink in the training camp at Peterborough. At eleven o'clock the next morning, owing to the fact that representations had been made to the authorities, the boy was let out on the understanding that he would return to the training camp by two o'clock in the afternoon and sign for active service. When this boy was given postponement the first time he was quite willing, if necessary, to go and sign for active service. He lived seven or eight miles from town, and before he got back, before two o'clock, when he was a few miles from town, he was picked up by the authorities when making his way to the training camp, and was put in the clink again. However, he was taken out and told that all charges against him would be cancelled. When he got to the military camp, however—I am not sure which one, but it is on record in the Minister of Labour's department—he was told, "You did not report for duty and we are docking your first month's pay twenty-one days."

Mr. ABBOTT: That is the first point where my hon. friend's criticism can apply to the army.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): But the military came in when they took the boy out at three o'clock in the morning. That is why I say there is no cooperation between selective service and the military, because selective service should have told them about the case.

Mr. ABBOTT: If the hon. member will give me the name I shall have the case investigated, but the responsibility for deciding whether a man would be taken in or not rests with selective service. I presume selective service in this case informed the army authorities that this man had been called for service and had not reported and asked them to go and pick him up.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): But selective service knew where he was. They knew where he was working and they knew he was not trying to dodge anything. He was willing to sign up in the first instance.

Mr. ABBOTT: On the facts given, the action appears to be arbitrary. If my hon. friend will give me the name of the case I shall look into it.

Mr. LOCKHART: I want one or two points cleared up in my mind in case there are more extended remarks I desire to make later on. The Minister of Veterans' Affairs spoke about consideration being given, and I wish to ask a supplementary question having regard to two or three accidents that occurred to fire-fighters overseas. What provision is made to compensate them? Perhaps the results might be serious in such cases. They do not get gratuities. Will the minister amplify that?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In all these cases I have mentioned, if they suffer injury while on duty overseas they are pensionable, but they are not yet entitled to the various other benefits of rehabilitation.

Mr. LOCKHART: That clears that point.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I amend that by adding, except those who are in receipt of pensions. Then they are entitled to rehabilitation.

Mr. LOCKHART: One other question. Has any list been compiled covering army personnel who have returned to Canada, from the point of view of the different theatres of war; I refer to men of four and five years' service? Have lists been compiled in that way?

Mr. ABBOTT: I cannot say whether lists have been compiled in that way. I doubt whether they have specific lists made up as to men serving in different theatres.

Duration of Parliament

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We get complete records in regard to length of service.

Mr. ABBOTT: But the hon. member is asking about different theatres of war. I will make inquiries.

Mr. LOCKHART: Have notices been sent to men who have returned on rotation leave—that would mean men with four years' service anyway—specifying the date when they will be called back for service overseas.

Mr. ABBOTT: No, I do not think so.

Mr. LOCKHART: Are you quite sure of that?

Mr. ABBOTT: The policy is that men returning on rotational duty are not sent overseas unless they express a desire to that effect.

Mr. LOCKHART: You feel sure of that?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am confident of that. It is possible that inadvertently a man may have been ordered to report back to a depot which he thought was one that would send him back overseas, but the policy is that long-service men returning on rotational duty are not sent back overseas unless they express that desire.

Mr. CHURCH: The government should be prepared with a programme for after the war so far as the army is concerned. The mother country has a plan; Washington has a plan, and we must never again leave this country in the defensive position which it occupied when the war broke out. While no country that I know of can carry on in peace time an establishment compared with that kept up during war, at the same time we must have a national system and the government should be prepared to bring forward a plan for the army.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

DURATION OF PARLIAMENT

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I desire to move that this house shall be adjourned to discuss a matter of urgent public importance. My motion is as follows:

Whereas on August 3, 1940, the Prime Minister, with the concurrence of the then leader [Mr. Abbott.]

of the opposition and of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggan, has moved a long adjournment of the house, provided that, "if in the interval for public reasons it should appear necessary to have the house reconvene, it will be possible for the government, upon consultation with His Honour the Speaker, to bring hon. members together in the shortest possible time";

Whereas that motion was carried and whereas similar motions were passed on December 6, 1940; June 14, 1941; November 14, 1941; August 1, 1942; July 24, 1943; August 14, 1944 and December 7, 1944;

Whereas from 1940 until January 31, 1945, with the exception of November 6, 1940, the opening of each session has taken place on the day immediately following the date of the prorogation of the previous session;

Whereas "parliament is the proper place to discuss the state of the defence of Canada should this country become further imperilled";

Whereas, especially in wartime, "the high court of parliament should be functioning";

Whereas, at ten different intervals since the beginning of this war matters of vital importance to this country and to the whole world have been referred to the consideration of parliament;

Whereas parliament is a democratic and national institution which could not be dispensed with, especially during the war;

Whereas the term of the present parliament is about to expire in eleven days, viz. on April 17, this month;

Whereas it would be in the public interest and in conformity with the British parliamentary traditions to extend the life of the present parliament for one year,

I move that this house shall be adjourned to discuss a definite matter of urgent importance, the government should take immediate steps to provide for the extension of the life of the present parliament for one year.

That is the conclusion that appears on the motion, but I would rather make it a little different. The conclusion should be that we should either have an election right now, and parliament should be dissolved before its life expires—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: —or we should have an extension of the life of parliament.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I have received a copy of this motion. It reached me immediately before my coming to the house, and I have read it carefully.

The standing order under which this motion is made is standing order 31 which reads:

(1) Leave to make a motion for the adjournment of the house (when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance) must be asked after the ordinary daily routine of business (standing order 15) has been concluded and before notices of motions or orders of the day are entered upon.

(2) The member desiring to make such a motion rises in his place, asks leave to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, and states the matter.

All of which has been done.

(3) He then hands a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed to the Speaker, who, if he thinks it in order and of urgent public importance, reads it out and asks whether the member has the leave of the house. If objection is taken, the Speaker requests those members who support the motion to rise in their places—

And so on. My difficulty in reading over this motion is with regard to the degree of urgency. It is the responsibility of the Speaker to decide whether there is that degree of urgency which would justify such a motion being discussed. I would ask the hon. gentleman to give me some idea as to why he considers there is that degree of urgency in the motion before the house.

I would also point out to the hon. member that when the house goes into committee of supply he will have the right then to discuss that which is contained in the motion. But I want to be satisfied about the degree of urgency, and I frankly confess to the hon. member that I have considerable doubt in my mind that there is that degree of urgency which would justify me in giving him leave to move his motion. However, in fairness to the hon. member I would be glad to hear him on the question of the degree of urgency.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, I am most grateful to you for giving me the opportunity to tell you why I consider this an urgent matter. As you so aptly said, according to the rules of the house a motion made by a member for the adjournment of the house before the orders of the day are called shall be "a definite matter of urgent public importance."

It is obvious that the life of this parliament will expire in eleven days. Between the date at which the term of the present parliament will expire and to-day there are two Sundays, so that there will be only nine sitting days before the end of this parliament. That is a matter of fact known to everyone. Before stressing my point I want to say that it is not the fear of the elections which has prompted me—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I have allowed the hon. member the privilege of speaking to his motion. This is rather unusual, but I thought the hon. member should have the opportunity at least to convince me that there is sufficient urgency to justify the motion. I ask the hon. member to address himself solely to the question of "urgent" as set out in our standing order.

Mr. POULIOT: I cannot tell it to you, sir, with motions of the hand. That is what we do in conversations with the deaf who are not blind, but we are neither blind nor deaf. I have great respect for you, Mr. Speaker, but there is an axiom of law, "donner et retenir ne vaut"; you cannot give and keep the same thing. If you are giving me that right, and I am thankful to you for doing so, please allow me the privilege of using it.

I have to prove something that is just as evident as sunlight at noon. If parliament had died yesterday we would not be sitting here to-day, and I warn the house that after nine possible sitting days there will be no more parliament.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I have given to the hon. member a privilege which is quite unusual, but I thought if it was not his right, at all events it was a courtesy to him that he should be allowed to address himself to the question of urgency. That is what troubles my mind in making a decision. As I read the motion I do not see that degree of urgency, and I have given an opportunity to the hon. gentleman to instruct me in that regard.

Mr. POULIOT: I appreciate what you say, sir, but I regret the insinuation of what you are about to do. With the one hand you give it to me and with the other you take it away.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would not have given the hon. gentleman an opportunity to discuss his motion if my mind had been made up. I am asking him to justify his motion in regard to the degree of urgency.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, sir; but now let us speak of that right which every member of this house has. No member on the treasury or front benches has any more rights than the back bencher has. I am astonished to have to defend the existence of parliamentary institutions in this chamber alone. I hope that members in other parts of the house will rise to defend our own parliamentary institutions.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is now getting all the privileges and rights which he enjoys as a member of parliament, and, as I have already said, perhaps more than I am entitled to concede. I wish the hon. gentleman would address himself to the question of urgency and to that alone.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, I shall not repeat indefinitely the word "urgency" but shall try to establish that there is an urgency about this matter, and a very definite and clear urgency. It is quite clear in the motion itself. I have not a copy of my motion before me, because I sent you the first one and then afterwards the one from which I had read, and I also gave copies to the leaders of the parties, but one of them has now been kind enough to let me have his copy back.

To summarize the whole thing, we have reached the time when parliament is like a man on his death bed who is in a state of mind where his will could be questioned before the courts. The very reason why there is urgency is precisely the short lapse of time before parliament comes to its death in nine possible sitting days, and if that is not enough reason to permit us to discuss this whole matter in order that the atmosphere of uncertainty in which we have lived since the beginning of the war may be brought to an end, we will see to it that hon. gentlemen will have to record their votes and say whether they are for or against this motion. They will have to cease to fear public opinion and assume their responsibilities.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I have given the hon. member an opportunity to give me some evidence as to the urgency of his motion. I must say that the hon. gentleman has not in my judgment supplied the evidence to justify his motion.

CANADA-INDIA

INQUIRY AS TO EXCHANGE OF HIGH COMMISSIONERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct a question to the Prime Minister. A dispatch from London appearing in the press this morning states that the representative of India told the commonwealth conference yesterday that he had a definite promise from Prime Minister Mackenzie King that a Canadian High Commissioner to India would arrive there soon and that negotiations with regard to the exchange of high commissioners are proceeding. I should be glad if the Prime Minister would inform the house on the point raised by the Indian representative, and, if possible, indicate who will be appointed as High Commissioner for Canada in India.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I say in reply to my hon. friend that the matter of exchange of high commissioners between Canada and India has been under consideration for some little time. It is wholly correct to say that Canada intends to send a high commissioner to India, and that India intends to send a high commissioner to Canada. The exchange of high commissioners will be reciprocal. The government up to the moment have not been able to decide on the particular person to be appointed as high commissioner from Canada but I hope that an appointment may soon be made.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Thursday, April 5, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

The CHAIRMAN: We are on the estimates for the army.

Mr. D. C. ABBOTT (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): There was a certain amount of unfinished business last night arising out of yesterday's proceedings in committee, and perhaps I might be allowed to dispose of that first before further questions are submitted.

I omitted to mention in my opening remarks yesterday that the appropriation that is being asked for, for the armed services, totals $699,235,000 for the five months period—$640,917,000 for the army services and $58,318,000 for sundry services, making the total I have mentioned.

The hon. member for Prince asked if it would be possible to give a statement of the total savings in casualties for the months of November, December, January and February, and he also wanted to know what proportion of the 11,836 N.R.M.A. men sent overseas were trained infantry. First, as to the savings in casualties, as my hon. friend will know, it is not possible for me to give exact figures as to casualties. The total casualties as reported in the newspapers are not the only source of wastage. There are also battle casualties and sickness, accidents and the like, to which I referred yesterday evening. I draw attention to the fact that in the period under review living conditions at the front were markedly adverse and coming at the end of prolonged action the normal wastage was exceptionally high. However, the officers of the department tell me that during the four months from November to February inclusive, as accurately as they can estimate it, the total savings in net wastage, that is after taking recoveries into account, have been somewhat less than 10,000; and, of the total saving in wastage, some 7,000 have been in the infantry. There have been some further savings in March, but figures on that are not compiled yet.

Mr. RALSTON: Has my hon. friend the figures by months?

Mr. ABBOTT: No, not at the moment. I remember now that my hon. friend asked for that information, and possibly I can give the figures a little later in the afternoon.

As to the state of training of those N.R.M.A. personnel, I am advised that it is extremely difficult to give specific figures as to the number of fully trained infantry who have proceeded overseas out of the N.R.M.A. personnel in Canada in October last, and that is due to the fact that a substantial number of these converted to general service prior to proceeding overseas. I made reference to that yesterday evening. Up to the last minute, changes were occasioned by absenteeism and adjustments between infantry and other corps. The best information available, however, is that approximately fifty per cent of all those proceeding overseas had completed normal infantry training, that is either through the training system or through long service in one or other of the infantry battalions—sometimes both. In other words, fifty per cent of those who proceeded would have completed the minimum of the equivalent of basic and infantry corps training. Those who were considered as fully trained infantry received the normal reconditioning and refresher training in the United Kingdom, while those who were not fully trained as infantry at the time of dispatch either received reconditioning and refresher training for service in their own arm or received the appropriate retraining as infantry. In the normal course of events a large majority of those who could not be considered as fully trained at the time of dispatch will have completed any additional training required by this time. The committee will recall that the first flight arrived about the tenth of January, and the second sailing, about the seventeenth of January.

Mr. RALSTON: I understand that the whole 11,000 were remustered for infantry?

Mr. ABBOTT: Oh, no; a considerable number of them were infantry personnel, I am informed.

Mr. RALSTON: I know—either were remustered or were infantry personnel?

Mr. ABBOTT: That I believe is correct, yes.

Mr. RALSTON: They were either remustered for infantry or were infantry personnel in the first place?

Mr. ABBOTT: I believe that is right, yes.

Mr. RALSTON: Does that apply to the 2,400, too?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid I cannot answer that offhand, but I assume that would be so. However I can verify that. I think those are the two questions asked by the hon. member for Prince.

The hon. member for Lake Centre asked me to give details as to the disposition made of the absentees or deserters. I mentioned in general terms that the practice followed was so far as possible to put these men on ships and send them over to the other side, and that disciplinary action would be taken there, because of the fact that the absenteeism or desertion had been for the purpose of avoiding going overseas. If they had been subjected to courts martial or other disciplinary action here, they would have achieved their purpose. In all, seventy N.R.M.A. soldiers have been tried by courts martial on charges of absence without leave or desertion after having been warned for service abroad. One case has been dismissed, and in three cases sentence has not yet been promulgated. I have here a record of the disposition. In the other sixty-six cases—I do not know whether my hon. friend wants me to give them in detail—the penalties vary from imprisonment with hard labour for fourteen months down to detention for fifteen days. I can give the particulars if my hon. friend wants them. But I repeat that the majority of the cases have been dealt with on the other side, summarily by the commanding officer of the unit. In most cases, I am advised, the punishment has been deduction of pay for varying periods of time. After all, the purpose was to make these men soldiers.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What happened to the rest of them?

Mr. ABBOTT: Well, that is what I am referring to now. I say, with the exception of the seventy odd who have been tried by courts martial, the cases have been dealt with summarily in the ordinary way by the commanding officers of their units; that the disposal of most of these cases has been made on the other side, where these men have been sent. In other words the effort has been to make them into soldiers, not to put them in detention for months or a year. They went absent or deserted in order to avoid going overseas. They have been sent over in the hope that they will be made into soldiers, and I am advised that the action I have mentioned has been taken in the majority of these cases.

I want to correct one point in an answer I made to the hon. member for Lake Centre on the matter of the status of these men on embarkation. He said, as reported in Hansard, page 582:

War Appropriation—The Army

I ask the parliamentary assistant now, has the right to conversion by the N.R.M.A. men been extended beyond the confines of Canada? Has it been extended so that those who are overseas are permitted to convert and thereby take themselves outside the ambit of the order in council?

I replied:

They have to convert before embarkation.

My answer is perfectly correct, but it may be misunderstood. An N.R.M.A. man may convert to general service after he is overseas, but that conversion does not avail against the 16,000 authorized by the order in council. In other words, in order to be considered as coming within the ambit of the order in council—to use my hon friend's language—they must have converted before going on ship-board.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Would the hon. gentleman permit one question? When this man, after arrival in England, converts, does he thereupon become a volunteer?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know whether he becomes a volunteer; he becomes a general service man and is entitled to whatever status that particular man has. I suppose he becomes a volunteer; I am not too much interested in refinements of meaning.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I think that is a fine example of "refinement." But what I have in mind is this. An order in council was passed recently extending, as I understand, rehabilitation grants to all those men who were sent overseas, regardless of whether or not they convert over there or in Canada. Why has this order been changed, or why was the direction changed which was referred to by General McNaughton, that conversion could take place only prior to embarkation?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know the statement to which my hon. friend refers. I am not familiar with all the details of the rehabilitation grants. But my information is that by converting to general service overseas there is some financial advantage if the man returns to Canada. That is my information.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the advantage?

Mr. ABBOTT: I cannot answer my hon. friend at the moment. I shall be able to give it to him in a few minutes. I am not sufficiently familiar with the details of these rehabilitation grants.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How many men converted overseas, then, after arrival?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have not that information either. I can tell the hon. member in general terms that there were comparatively few.

[Mr. Abbott.]

I wonder, Mr. Chairman, whether the committee would permit me to clean up a number of inquiries that were made last night. I did not have the information at the time.

The last question which the hon. member for Lake Centre asked me was to give a statement as to the selection of the 11,000 odd N.R.M.A. personnel by provinces, or districts, I think. I have that information and I will summarize it.

The total of 11,836 N.R.M.A. dispatched overseas represents 19.7 per cent of the total of 60,000 available at the time, and represents 28.2 of the 42,000 who, my hon. friend will recall, were all of a type suitable for training as infantry. That is split up between the various districts as follows: military districts 1, 2 and 3, Ontario 33.8 per cent of the number fit for infantry; military districts 4 and 5, Quebec, 14.7 per cent; military districts 6 and 7, the maritimes, 34.2 per cent; military districts 10, 12 and 13, the prairies, 39 per cent; Pacific command, 41.8 per cent. I would add to that this statement, that the numbers dispatched, 11,836, did not include approximately 2,400 who had converted to general service status prior to embarkation, and if those are included, and if the absentees and deserters are included, these percentages by districts are approximately equal.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Could the parliamentary assistant give the percentages including not only those who actually went over but the absentees as well?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have not got them here, but my officials tell me that by including the 2,400 and others it varies the percentages, although obviously this would not be completely accurate. That covers the questions asked by the hon. member for Lake Centre.

The hon. member for Lincoln asked me a question about rotation leave and the distribution as between the Italian theatre and north-west Europe. The total quota for December, January, February and March numbered 2,278, of whom 1,066 were from the Italian theatre and 1,212 from the United Kingdom and north-west Europe. Adding to those the numbers arrived or en route at the present time, we have totals of 1,431 from Italy and 2,370 from north-west Europe and the United Kingdom; or a total of 3,801 for the months to which I have referred.

The leader of the opposition asked about Canadian cigarettes. I am told that all rations to the Canadian army overseas, including cigarettes, are supplied by the British supply organization. Seven cigarettes a day are contained in each pack ration, and the field service ration provides six a day. It is not practical for the British to issue to the Canadian army overseas any type of ration, whether cigarettes or anything else, which is different from the general issue. It is understood that cigarettes issued are sometimes of British manufacture and sometimes of Canadian. As my hon. friend knows, in addition to the cigarettes issued with the rations, Canadian cigarettes are available to our troops overseas from two sources, first the auxiliary services, which come from the pool, averaging about twenty-five per man per month—

Mr. GRAYDON: Are they always Canadian?

Mr. ABBOTT: Those are invariably Canadian; and secondly, the Canadian tobacco depots overseas, from which gifts of 900 a month can be sent, or, if no gifts are available, each man can purchase 900 cigarettes a month for $3.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does the minister know what percentage of those rations of cigarettes which are given by the British organization to the troops represents Canadian manufacture? He said that some were Canadian and some were British. From information which I have from the boys, there are very few Canadian cigarettes among them. They seem to be all British, and that is what they complain of.

Mr. ABBOTT: That may be. I have no information as to the proportions. These field rations are put up in tins containing cigarettes and what-have-you, and they are the standard for our forces and the British forces.

Mr. GRAYDON: Will the parliamentary assistant do this for me, in view of the fact that there have been so many complaints. Will he call the matter to the attention of the proper authorities there? It is worth a trial at any rate, to see if the situation cannot be remedied. These boys should not have to write back with these complaints.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall be glad to do that. The hon. member for Souris asked a question about the much discussed subject of clothing allowances and deductions, and I said I hoped to be able to give information to-day. I may say frankly that the condition is not considered a satisfactory one. The complaints are justified, but the regulations as drawn create a very difficult administrative problem which our officers are working on now, and I think it can be safely said that it will be adjusted. When a plan can be worked out a rebate will be arranged, a rateable refund in full. I may add that the problem is not a continuing one, since there are no new cases. As to the men who are now called who have been in the R.C.A.F., the R.C.A.F. notifies the army, I understand, or selective service before a man is called and no clothing allowance is given, so that there can be no question of reduction. The matter is receiving the active and constant consideration of the officers, and I feel that a very satisfactory solution will be found.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): All those men will be reimbursed the deductions?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is a pretty fair assumption, yes.

Mr. GILLIS: While we are on clothing allowance, has anything been done towards removing the legitimate grievance that exists of paying one soldier $35 and another $65—and the allowance is up to $100 now. I am receiving letters that are pretty critical. Men who have been four and a half years, first over, have received the lowest clothing allowance, though clothing costs the same, while another fellow after two months gets $100.

Mr. ABBOTT: The standard rate is now $100, and so far as I know, no consideration has been given to reopening cases where at the time the member was discharged the scale was $35. I will make inquiries and see whether that is being considered.

Mr. GRAYDON: That should be retro-active.

Mr. ABBOTT: Finally, there has been some comment on the question of delay in the payment of war service gratuities. Payment of war service gratuities is a responsibility of the Department of National Defence, although it is really a part of the rehabilitation grant. I have been informed this morning that up to last night ninety per cent of applications have been sent to treasury for payment, and in the ordinary course the cheque issues within forty-eight hours on recommendation from the Department of National Defence. The total number on hand at the present time, under consideration last night, was approximately 7,000, and that is being reduced every day. The matter is well in hand. I may say that the complaints arise largely from two sources: first, where no application has been filed, the soldier being under the belief that he does not need to file an application to get gratuity, and secondly, where the application has been turned down and the soldier feels that this is unjustified.

War Appropriation—The Army

Mr. LOCKHART: What is the nature of the reasons?

Mr. ABBOTT: I cannot say at the moment.

Mr. McCANN: Has application to be filed?

Mr. ABBOTT: Application for war service gratuities must be filed in every instance.

Mr. McCANN: What about the soldier who is killed?

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I should have added that in the case of the soldier who is killed, that is a matter that comes exclusively within the jurisdiction of Veterans' Affairs.

Mr. BENCE: You have not even got the forms for that yet.

Mr. CHURCH: Last night I asked the parliamentary assistant some constructive questions. Some of the matters I touched upon have been already dealt with and I will not refer to them. I saw the McGill battery under Colonel Stack over at the Niagara camp during the last war. The young parliamentary assistant to the minister of national defence was, I believe, a member of that battery. I wish to compliment him on the answers he has given in Hansard. I have no criticism to offer against anybody personally, but I wish to point out to the government one or two mistakes made in this war in connection with first, overseas work and our army at the front, and second, the home army, so that we shall not fall into the fatal mistakes we made between the two wars.

My only object in coming to Ottawa as a member of parliament some years ago was to try to assist the returned soldiers and to do something for them and for the defence of the country. My particular object was to improve the conditions of the soldiers who had enlisted in the last war. Between the two wars there was a conflict in the house. Everybody seemed to think we would not have any more wars. The result was we threw away our defences and our friends and with the mother country threw away the finest army, navy and air force the world had ever seen. It will take a generation to get it back.

I was disappointed in some ways with regard to the overseas part of this war. I do not criticize the gentlemen who have occupied the office between the two wars. I found the former minister of national defence (Mr. Ralston) very obliging. I could get an answer in a day or two. So far as I can see he did his best to meet the situation. But there are some mistakes that have been made in the conduct of the war. In the first place I was very much disappointed that some of our forces overseas were kept so long in England and had no chance to march across the desert with Generals Montgomery and Alexander. We did not have any representation in that particular campaign. That may be due to the decisions of the officer commanding overseas; however, I do not blame him for it, but I do say that the former minister of national defence was absolutely right in what he said, namely, that in the last analysis the conduct of the war is on the minister of national defence and on the government of the day so far as they are the government of the day. The minister said—and he can correct me if I am wrong in this—in the final analysis it was the minister of national defence who would have the say. These are not his exact words but I think they are the sum and substance of what he said.

I believe that we have prolonged the war on the western front by withdrawal of ships and the air force to be used in other theatres—I do not know about the army. I do not believe we have sufficient over there for replacements at any time, and some are being withdrawn from there to be sent to the Pacific. There is no doubt that that has lengthened the war. There was a debate on this very matter in the British House of Commons and it was shown from the lists of divisions given that Britain and the dominions with France and Belgium had only about fifteen divisions on the western front whereas our opponents had a very much larger number. It has been claimed that that has lengthened the war. It was also shown that owing to lack of shipping by withdrawals the liberated countries through which our armies are marching had not the food with which to supply them, with the result that they were beginning to turn on the allies who had redeemed them. I do hope that that will be improved in the next few days.

There are one or two other matters to which I should like to refer. I believe that considerable time has been taken in returning men home. At Christmas only about one-fourth of one per cent got home, five or six hundred or a thousand. I do hope that those who have been overseas and borne the burden and heat of the day for going on to five years will be given some form of leave. There are a great many complaints coming in from the dependents of these men in Canada. I do not blame the department. War is war. As Sherman said, "war is hell." It is worse than that at present.

Other mistakes were made, and I shall now refer to one of them, namely, the use of the properties of the municipalities at home for camp purposes. We have a large camp at the exhibition grounds in the city of Toronto. Those grounds, buildings and permanent exhibits cost the city about $27,000,000. They gave that property free to the government during the war. There have been startling changes in voluntary recruiting during the war. There have been changes in the mobilization of our men. Men were sent to camps all across Canada. Some soldiers from Hamilton and the Niagara district went out to the coast. Some were sent to the maritimes. In the great war those overseas units were attached to some militia unit near home for overseas training. I think that was the better principle. They were attached to a militia unit with the result that they had local support for recruiting in their own community the overseas units they raised. The change was a great mistake in this war. The transferring of all these men across Canada was a waste of money. They were taken away from their own people. They could have got just as good training at home.

True it is that I do not wish to criticize any man in the department. I do not wish to criticize any official because probably some of them know more than members of the House of Commons. But I think a great mistake was made in connection with the work of the records offices with the result that we cannot find from the records office how many men have enlisted from each municipality. That information will be needed after the war. Other departments of government can give that information. The victory loan officials can tell you the next day how much money was invested all across Canada, how much from Hamilton, Vancouver, and so on. The income tax department can give that information next day and so can the Red Cross, by municipalities. There should be a different system in the records office. In my opinion it is a relic of the South African war.

The same thing is true with regard to the use of buildings. Very few Toronto soldiers now are housed in the buildings in Toronto. The government has spent a large sum of money, $7,000,000 or $8,000,000 on Camp Borden. The Niagara camp could have been extended by camps on the highways right around Toronto to Niagara which could have been used in that connection. After the war the government will have to decide on some new army policy. We are going into this nationalism in a very large way. We shall have to supply an army for service for overseas for some years after this war. We shall have to supply an army of a hundred thousand men if we are to carry out the programme that has been proposed by the internationalists at San Francisco. This is the sixth year of the war. Before the session closes the government will have to give us an answer as to their plans for the regular army, our militia, the reserve army, the home guard and the cadet services.

We are being told by individuals in Toronto that we have no right to sit as members of parliament because parliament's time has expired. I received two letters from constituents of the hon. member for Parkdale, saying that we have no right to sit here at all, because the life of this parliament has expired. Judging by what one reads in some of the newspapers Toronto city has no members of parliament here at all. We might as well sit in secret for all the news the public sometimes gets of what is going on here. In connection with the armed forces it would be far better if we had an election immediately. The winning of the war is the most important thing; other matters take second place. I say it would be far better if we had the principle that is applied in Washington, a fixed day for a federal election such as the fourth of November, or some other fixed day. In that way the forces would not suffer the way they are suffering to-day.

If we are to have a programme of internationalism as visualized by the San Francisco conference we shall require an army of 75,000 men. As I said before, I think the late minister was right. He was quite sympathetic with me when I said that every person in Canada should be able to use a rifle. They have that principle of recruiting in Norway. They had it years before this war started, and I pointed it out to the government between the two wars. I hope something will be done about that.

With regard to the cadet service, it is the most important branch of army work and has been so since confederation, and from confederation up to the second year of this war that work was carried on by the school boards and the boards of education of this country. It should be immediately restored and grants given all along the line, such as was done before. Uniforms and all that kind of thing should be given. No outside organization should have control of the cadet services in state schools. Some principals of the schools object to it. They object to other organizations coming into the schools and interfering with the cadet services. The cadet services were in many respects the backbone of the militia. I am in hopes that something can be done for them.

War Appropriation—The Army

Then, I asked that some consideration be given to the situation at the exhibition grounds in Toronto. How many soldiers are housed there? Will the property be given back to the city? As we know, the members of the Royal Air Force who were housed there have gone to Trenton, and there is a large new barracks being built for the use of the navy on the waterfront next to the baseball grounds, and will be ready in a few months. I walked past some of those buildings two or three times last week, and did not see any soldiers in them—with the exception, of course, of a few guards. But the fact is that there were scarcely any soldiers around the exhibition grounds at all. There is a large building in those grounds, the live stock arena, formerly used by the air force. I believe I laid the cornerstone of it, but I have not been in it since the war started. Toronto members of parliament have, during this war, not been invited to see anything up there. The live stock arena is now used for demobilization purposes; it could be located elsewhere in Toronto, and especially when the Department of Munitions and Supply has control of a number of huts along the waterfront. I know that, because I walk past them almost every day. I see very few people around them. They could be used by one of the departments of government for demobilization purposes and the entire exhibition grounds could be given back to the city. I understand two or three millions of dollars were spent on the exhibition buildings by the government for renovations, under the control of an official of the fair board.

It is my understanding that few Toronto soldiers were housed in those buildings in this war. Soldiers from all over Canada had to go to Camp Borden and other places to which they should not have had to go. The army at the start of this war seemed to have been the forgotten agency. Certainly it was in that position before the war started. Between the two wars the permanent force was ridiculed right in this House of Commons. We did not hear a good word for the militia and the military colleges and all that sort of thing. We were told that there would be no more war; we heard all sorts of statements of that kind, with the result that when war broke out Tommy Atkins was the forgotten man. There were some who thought that through Divine Providence or some other agency the air force would simply go over and destroy Germany, and that as a result we would need no army and no expeditionary force. Between the two wars I contended that an expeditionary force would be necessary, and that at least such force should be supplied with the most modern equipment.

[Mr. Church.]

Then, another thing is this. There are too many spokesmen respecting the forces over the radio and in press interviews. In my view radio has been one of the mischievous institutions we have had between the wars. I remember that during those years we heard over the radio a great amount of support for disarmament, and all that sort of thing. We never heard one good word on the radio about our militia forces or rearmament. I believe the late minister went into this matter, and I was glad to see it. The parliamentary secretary will remember that between the two wars members of the militia had to put their hands into their own pockets to buy typewriters, to pay office rent, to have cadet services, and other things of that kind. A condition of that kind should not exist. The government is spending four billions of dollars on the war, and it should be ready to remedy a situation like that in the peace army to be. I am now pleading for better treatment of the militia, better treatment in the future of the army and their dependents. I should hope the government would have something to say about it.

The treatment of soldiers' families requires consideration, too. We heard a long statement respecting the paying of gratuities, and the application of the means test before the payment of allowances. I admit that the Minister of Veterans' Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) did bring down an order in council respecting the Northwest Field Force, but I was sorry to see that a means test was applied. The result was that it affected men who in that northwest rebellion had walked across lake Superior at temperatures reaching forty degrees below zero, to save the dislocation of western Canada. We see a lot of men advanced in life, some of whom cannot be given old age pensions, and others of whom are receiving only very small amounts—possibly $40 a month by way of old age pension—to whom this means test is applied. That is the treatment they received, instead of having this money paid to them as a right, and not as a privilege. Between the two wars many of those conditions could have been remedied.

There is one further point I would make for the benefit of the parliamentary assistant. This is something the late minister tried to do, and affects soldiers of the forces who are not supposed to write to the newspapers. One of them wrote to a newspaper last Saturday complaining of my use of the words "ready, aye, ready". I know that the parliamentary assistant follows that motto too. I knew all about the Grenadiers and the Queen's Own, long before the writer of the letter knew about them. We know that according to regulations army personnel are not permitted to write letters to newspapers or carry on correspondence with members of parliament making complaints to them, and discussing camp conditions. This was pointed out to the former minister, and I believe he rescinded the order. Then a new minister enters the department. I could bring down a whole bale of correspondence, a pile a foot high, concerning the present Minister of National Defence, upon his return to Canada. I have a pile of newspapers containing interviews with him, both before and since he came home. Is there to be one rule for the private, another for the colonel and another for the captain? I say, no. We have a citizen's army, and a citizen who enlists in that army should not lose all the rights and privileges he enjoys as a private citizen. Those rights and privileges should be preserved for and applied to him. I hope the parliamentary assistant will bring these matters to the attention of the minister.

I should like to ask three or four questions, and then I shall have completed what I have to say. Perhaps I could finish in about five minutes, because I should like to see these estimates passed this afternoon. First, has the government any plan for the post-war? Have we any plan for the army and the militia, any plan for the reserve army or the home guard? Has any survey been made of proposed overseas services, in view of the coming international conference at San Francisco? Has any survey been made to ascertain what overseas bases will have to be given protection by Canada, and where? Are we going to make the same mistake in respect of the army as we made between the two wars? We know what a fatal thing it was so far as the defence of this country was concerned. There was a definite lack of everything an army needed when at last war broke out. When war came we knew that we lacked everything necessary for the conduct of a war. We had heard talk that there would be bombing from the air, that an air force was all that would be required over Germany, that no expeditionary force would be needed. If we do continue to have an army, a number of years will be required to equip it in modern fashion, because we know that modern warfare between modern armies is a highly technical affair. Those armies cannot be got together in a day.

War now is a complicated business, as is amply shown in the mechanism developed by the Department of Munitions and Supply. Before the war the army was starved. The same thing happened in the mother country. If I remember rightly, they had a standing army of about 225,000 men when war broke out. At that time they were twenty-five thousand men short, and could not get recruits.

We as a house should have something to say as to what is to be done in respect of mobilization plans, and particularly if we are to have all this internationalism. As I said last night, in view of our high income tax, no country can afford to have the same degree of mobilization in peace days as it would have in a time of war. A government can go only as far as the people of the country will allow it to go.

Before the beginning of this war I supported a policy of national service and equality of service and sacrifice. Conditions are changing. Under the voluntary system we have recruiting. In 1940-41 I saw recruits standing on University avenue because they could not get into the army. Those men came in from Aurora, Mimico and other points. The result was our voluntary system fell down through nobody's fault.

Ever since I have been a member I have advocated national service. In the light of our experience in this war can anybody say that the voluntary system has been sufficient to provide a regular and adequate army in time of trouble or for home defence or for overseas or home guard purposes? Can that be said in the light of the experience gained in the past war, in the period between the wars and in this war?

When the navy, army, and air force men return from overseas I believe that the government of that day will be forced by a revolution of public opinion to accept liability for national service by all citizens irrespective of class, creed or anything else. I believe that is coming.

No sport, either amateur or professional, should interfere with a citizen's duty under national service. These sports should be regulated as they are regulated in some countries. If participation in sport disables a man from military service who otherwise might be fit for it, then the state should step in and regulate that sport. It is the duty of the state to see that there is equality of service and sacrifice on the part of all our citizens.

In my opinion the voluntary system can never provide an adequate army, and I hope something will be done about it. The Minister of National Health and Welfare is starting a programme of physical fitness. Instead of leaving this to a civilian in the department who has had no overseas war experience, it should be left to the different boards of education. Grants should be provided along the lines I have indicated. I should like to find out the policy of the government in that connection.

We need a home guard for home defence, and what should be done must be quite apparent to the government. Our troops overseas have borne the burden and heat of the day. They have written the most glorious record in the history of this country. I have received letters from dozens of these men and they all tell me that they hope something will be done to establish an equality of service and sacrifice so that there will not be so many "stay at home" people who long ago should be at the war.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I do not agree with everything the hon. member for Broadview has said, but he has made some excellent remarks. Throughout the country people are saying that the hon. member for Broadview and some others have not sold their birthrights for pullman tickets to San Francisco.

I have a few questions to ask the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence. I am sorry his predecessor resigned, because my dealings with him had been most happy when I was looking after the welfare of soldiers. The present parliamentary assistant is a lawyer with considerable experience, a man who is well educated, a gentleman as was his predecessor. It is always pleasant to have discussions between gentlemen. I have a few questions I want to ask, but first I should like to get an answer to one in particular.

I have been informed that there has been a change made in the head of the Department of National Defence. I suggested to the present incumbent of this office that some reforms should be made at headquarters. I should be thankful to my hon. friend if he would tell me what reforms if any have been carried out at the headquarters of the Department of National Defence since the new minister took charge of the department. After he has answered this question, I shall have a few more to ask.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have been in the department only a short time and I am quite sure I cannot give my hon. friend particulars of all the reforms that have been instituted. Of course improvements are constantly being made. I shall make inquiries and endeavour to give my hon. friend an answer perhaps later to-day.

Mr. POULIOT: I would not think the reforms have been so countless that it is impossible for a man of the intelligence and experience of my hon. friend to enumerate them.

[Mr. Church.]

Mr. ABBOTT: I would not be sure about that.

Mr. POULIOT: I have sympathy for the present Minister of National Defence because of the abuse he was subjected to before, during and after the election in Grey North. As a defender of widows and orphans I have always had a soft spot in my heart for those who suffer persecution. I always am ready to lend a hand to those in trouble and to those who suffer from injustices. There are things neither I nor anybody else in this country can understand in connection with what happened in the Department of National Defence. What we do understand is that during the election in Grey North the issue at stake was not the welfare of the army; it was not the welfare of the country; it was purely a matter of putting out political propaganda for political advantage. I see the new member for Grey North is in the chamber. I congratulate him upon being elected, but I cannot congratulate him upon his victory, because the victory was not his; it was Doctor Shields' victory.

If the Minister of National Defence was defeated in Grey North it was also because the government afforded every facility, to use the Prime Minister's expression, to John Bracken to go overseas during the election to canvass the army against the Minister of National Defence. Then he came back to Canada after a trip he had made mostly at the expense of the taxpayers of this country with a halo of glory and glamour which he never would have had if some people had not been stupid enough to send him overseas at public expense to get that halo. It is most natural that crowds of people in Grey North filled the hall to listen to the man who had just come back from overseas. That would have happened in any constituency, because John Bracken was carrying a message from the soldiers overseas to their relatives in Canada; he was coming to tell them how the soldiers were whom he had met over there. He had travelled from battlefield to battlefield in aeroplanes that belonged to this country, and had been surrounded by brass hats. He was not photographed with them, but he was photographed with a few Tory nurses overseas. He came back to Grey North to give news of the soldiers overseas to their relatives. The board of strategy of the party had never thought of that; it was the government that thought of it, probably with the idea of getting John Bracken out of the way during the by-election in order that the minister might be elected by acclamation. I find, sir, that that was just silly—s-i-l-l-y—and if the Minister of National Defence was defeated in Grey North he can thank in the first place Doctor Shields, and in the second place his colleagues in the government who organized to send John Bracken overseas at public expense.

Mr. GRAYDON: And the Labour-Progressives.

Mr. POULIOT: Who would have gone to listen to John Bracken if he had not gone overseas at the expense of the Canadian taxpayer? But he came back a hero, the carrier of a message—not a message to Garcia, but a message not only to the people of Grey North but to the Canadian people at large, to all the relatives and friends of the hundreds of thousands of Canadian soldiers who are overseas. Therefore, unfortunate as it is, if the present Minister of National Defence was defeated he can thank his colleagues in the cabinet jointly and severally.

Another thing that I cannot understand is this. John Bracken and some other Tory stalwarts complained on the one hand of the mess in the Department of National Defence, and then on the other hand John Bracken was bold enough to suggest to the Prime Minister of Canada that he fire General McNaughton and replace him by his immediate predecessor, who was precisely the one responsible for that mess that he was complaining of. Where is the logic in that? Who gave the opportunity to think of saying that to the bright and intelligent electors of Grey North, one of the finest counties of this dominion? It is important to afford to the electorate the opportunity to think about certain matters, but the fact is so clear that it is not necessary to underline it to make the people understand that the issue at stake was partisan politics.

The suggestion, I say, was made by John Bracken that the Minister of National Defence should be fired and replaced by the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Ralston), although John Bracken had complained of the disastrous management of the department of which the member for Prince had been head for nearly five years. That is beyond my understanding. When the issue was mentioned by the hon. gentleman who now sits as member for the county of Grey North, I know very well that the whole thing had been organized by two men who were in government employ and who resigned at the same time, on the same day, and are now in the same law firm. They said: We need conscription in Canada for overseas service. Who were those two? Harry Borden and McTague, two of the principal advisers of John Bracken. Harry Borden had been appointed controller of controllers in the Department of Munitions and Supply, the most important position that a civilian has held during this war, and the other one had been chairman of the national war labour board—two fine images of fine citizenry. They were there, having everything in hand, to control the war effort of this country. They were inspiring the speeches of John Bracken—if they were not dictating them.

And now, sir, I will ask you one question. Who recommended Harry Borden for his job as general counsel of the Department of Munitions and Supply, and who recommended the former Judge McTague as chairman of the national war labour board? These are some of the questions that I have asked, and an order of the house was passed that the answers be brought down as a return, but they have not yet been answered. They should have been answered before this discussion began. There is no excuse for not answering them. Many of my questions were so easy to answer, requiring just a simple "yes" or "no". Why were they not answered? It is a matter of privilege for a member of parliament to have a return to an order of the house brought down promptly.

Do you not believe, sir, that it was pure political propaganda on the part of Borden and McTague to use John Bracken as their tool to boost the member for Prince as Minister of National Defence at the expense of the present incumbent of that high post? I submit the question to you, sir, and to my colleagues. It is a matter that interests the people. They were shaking hands under the table. I warned the Prime Minister more than four years ago, on February 21, 1941. I told him then that some people were there to stab him in the back. I was ridiculed. I was told to mind my own business. I was told that I was not a good Liberal. At that time I was not defending my own party only; I was defending parliamentary institutions, as I did at three o'clock this afternoon. But there, again, I was alone.

There are perhaps two or three members of the Conservative party in this house—no more—who sometimes talk against my native province. They have no reason for that. Outside of this chamber they are pleasant colleagues. Nearly all the hon. members who compose the Progressive Conservative party in this house are worthy of their electors, and I will say the same thing of the new member for Grey North. I have no grouch against him; the electors put him here, and he will be judged not by what he said during the election but by what he will do in this house. I have many friends on all sides of the house, and I respect them. I regret that the Conservative party, which was a great party, is led at the present time—and I do not say this of my hon. friend the house leader of the opposition, a personal friend of mine, who does very well, and should have been the leader of his party—by asses who are not members of parliament: ass No. 1, John Bracken; ass No. 2, Harry Borden; ass No. 3, former Justice McTague; ass No. 4, the former private secretary to R. B. Bennett who broke the glass in all the windows of the members' offices on the sixth floor the day he was fired, and Bennett had to pay for it. And they are the brains of the Progressive Conservative party! If I were a Progressive Conservative I would revolt against it, and I would tell John Bracken: Drop ass Borden, drop ass McTague, drop Bennett's ex-ass, or I will resign. That is the way they should speak. Now they have nothing to say; and imagine how humiliating it is for them! They should not trust John Bracken, because he is not a dyed-in-the-wool Tory; he is not an honest Progressive Conservative; he is a false Liberal. They should not trust him too much. And besides that, why should they trust Harry Borden, who is on the board of Barclay's bank, an institution which is the hyphen between international finance and the government of Canada? And former Justice McTague: "Justice",—what a name, "Justice"! And then the other fellow is just a scribe, who has a great facility for writing speeches which are read by the man who does not compose them. If my hon. friends of the Conservative party want to talk politics I am ready to talk politics with them, and paint a picture of their saints. I never visited their lobby, but they must have the ikons of all those great minds which are substituted for theirs in the framing of policies.

Now let us come back to Grey North. Here is something which has been repeated many a time—"equality of sacrifice". And those brass hats who are here in Ottawa and have never been to any theatre of war are supposed to sacrifice themselves much more than the drivers of trains who are in their cabs, than those who manufacture explosives, than those who are in the bottoms of merchant ships, than the farmers, than everybody else. The question of conscription is not new. I have fought it for five years, and never on political grounds, but for the benefit of this country. There will shortly be a victory loan. The Canadian people, who are heavily taxed, will nevertheless subscribe to the victory loan. Naturally the army will give a fine response, as it did before. But the main subscribers will be people in civilian clothes who contribute not only money but also work in the war effort. But what is done? What is said? The influence made by all those who spoke for and on behalf of the Conservative party is that it is only the man in the army who is doing his share for the war effort. I will ask each one of them—I will ask the hon. member for Grey North, the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce), the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), and one of the hon. members for Peterborough—not the one who is in the chamber, the other one—

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): There is only one member for Peterborough.

Mr. POULIOT: Peterborough is a great place.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Thank you.

Mr. POULIOT: And there are two members there.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): No no.

Mr. POULIOT: Well, it is the hon. member who usually sits nearer us.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hastings-Peterborough.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not want any confusion, because the hon. member for Peterborough West is not at all to blame. He is a first-class member who discusses things sometimes with a little violence, but that is all right; I am all for it; he has the right to do it and he does it very well.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): We are getting that way now.

Mr. POULIOT: I will ask those three hon. members and the hon. member who has just been elected: when they speak of equality of sacrifice, do they mean that the farmers are not doing their duty in this war? Do they mean that the railway men are not doing their duty in this war? Do they mean that the miners—et cetera, et cetera—all those engaged in the war effort, are not doing their duty? Do they mean that those who make munitions, some of whom have been burnt alive in their work, are not doing their bit for the war effort? They will never put it that way, but that is the fact.

Seeing that we are faced with the question of selective service and of man-power, I suggested this afternoon that there should be an extension of parliament, and I still believe so, because the question is so tremendous. An effort has been made to impress upon the house the real meaning of man-power in this war. For some members, though not for all, man-power means all men being fit for a training camp; but there are many occupations which are essential to the war effort and which cannot be filled by people coming out of hospitals or from homes for the tuberculous. Once I asked the Minister of Labour, what is the first duty of an able-bodied man of military age, and he told me his first duty was to join the colours. That is wrong. I am not at all an isolationist. I am supporting the army; I am supporting the soldiers and helping their dependents, and at times I have been alone in pressing the claim for better medical care for the army. Again I thank the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Macdonald) who was parliamentary assistant to the minister, for what he did for these men, in spite of the fact that I was ridiculed in some quarters because I was so persistent.

But if that is "selective service" the government should never speak of selective service. Why keep in the army men who are sick? Perhaps they could be useful somewhere else. I know men who were busy at essential occupations doing very necessary work as technicians and now they are peeling potatoes in camp, something that could be done by CWAC'S, by young girls or women who need no other experience. Such men would be much more useful in their previous occupations. I am fighting for the labouring man and I am surprised that some so-called labour members are speaking so loudly while I am defending the rights of the very people whom they should be looking after.

I have mentioned railway employees before. Who came to the defence of railway employees, pointing out that they were essential in their post? The minister for naval services and the former minister for air wrote to the Minister of Labour that they would have no objection to relieving those men if they were required for the railway. The only one who objected was the minister of national defence at that time. If men were sometimes objecting when enlisted into the army it was simply because the former minister did not pay any attention to the remarks I made for the improvement of his department. I suggested reform, but I have had the same success as I had when I talked to R. B. Bennett. I thought I was talking to a stone or a pillar post. No reform was possible. The brass hats were always right. "You are a civilian and you are wrong." It was enough that I was a civilian; I was considered wrong when I was fighting for the prosecution of the war.

I will tell the hon. member for Grey North that he made a great mistake in suggesting the return of the former minister of national defence of that post. He made a great mistake. He was probably inspired by Borden, McTague or someone of that sort. I regret it on his account.

Mr. CASE: I was inspired by the former minister.

Mr. POULIOT: He asked you to boost him?

Mr. CASE: I followed his record pretty closely.

Mr. POULIOT: That is even worse than I thought. I regret it, I say, for my hon. friend's sake. He is one of my contemporaries, but as a parliamentarian he is younger than I am. He is one of my colleagues and I will not dare to give him any advice, though I will tell him that he should not be too quick to believe what may be said by those who are experts in afterthought, unless he is able to read through their skulls to see what they have in the back of their heads. I will tell him that the fight that was carried on in Grey North was deplorable if considered from certain angles. It was deplorable not only in the way the hon. member was elected but in the fact that it was an encouragement to the handful of men who pay no attention at all to what goes on in the Department of National Defence, who have not at heart the welfare of the soldier or of the returned man, but who want to grab control of the natural resources of the country for five years after the war.

Mr. GREEN: There are several questions I should like to direct to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence. First, I would repeat a question I asked the Prime Minister on April 4, to be found at page 435 of Hansard. The right hon. gentleman had been announcing the policy of this government with regard to the Pacific war, and after he had made that announcement, questioned by the leader of the opposition he made this statement:

There will be no compulsion in connection with the service against Japan.

Then I asked him whether or not the same principle was to apply to the men who will serve with the Canadian troops of occupation in occupied Germany. The Prime Minister in his statement had also said that there would be Canadian troops in the army of occupation in Germany. I pointed out to the Prime Minister that there would have to be continual replacements of the men of the Canadian army of occupation; that there would be new men coming from Canada all the time, and I asked him this question: "Is there to be compulsion in regard to those men?" While the Prime Minister answered "yes" in one case, I think perhaps that was not a definite statement. He then threw the ball, or passed the buck, to the parliamentary assistant, and I should be very grateful if the parliamentary assistant would answer that question now.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes; I anticipated that the hon. member would want an answer to that question, but I thought he would appreciate it is not one that can be answered by a simple "yes" or "no". The position in that respect is this. Our commitment for the occupational forces in Europe is very small in relation to the present strength of the Canadian army overseas. On the conclusion of hostilities in Europe a rigid pool of shipping will be used, with first priority given to reemployment of the forces in the Pacific. The hon. member knows that all the shipping of the allied nations is pooled and is subject to direction of the general staff. That is the principle which will be followed with respect to that pool, and for that reason I am advised that it is bound to be some months before we are going to be able to repatriate enough Canadian overseas troops to reduce the size of our forces overseas to that of the occupational commitment. The problem therefore does not present any serious difficulties in its early phase. Should it become necessary to meet the situation other than by use of troops necessarily remaining in Europe because of the shipping pool then the following will be the policy: (1) those who express a desire to remain on such service will be given the first opportunity of employment, subject of course, to their possessing the required qualifications, and so on; (2) the remaining personnel required will be detailed from among those having served the shortest time overseas.

Mr. GREEN: But they will be detailed from those having served overseas?

Mr. ABBOTT: The shortest time overseas.

Mr. GREEN: In other words there is no intention of sending any troops from Canada at all, either general service or N.R.M.A., to take part in this army of occupation?

Mr. ABBOTT: Well, I would put it this way. There is no intention of sending any troops, let us say, three, four or five months from now, or whatever it may be. There is no intention of using shipping to send additional troops over from Canada. The first opportunity will be given to those who are over there to volunteer if they wish to do so, subject, of course to their qualifications. If a sufficient number do not express a willingness to serve, the remainder, enough to make up the required establishment, will be detailed; in other words, will be told to stay, and the persons detailed will be those who have had the shortest service overseas. The problem will not arise as a practical question for months, probably for a year at least.

Mr. GREEN: That is definitely the policy of the government?

Mr. ABBOTT: So I am advised.

Mr. GREEN: If this government is in power after the election, the army of occupation in Germany will be made up in the first place of men now overseas who volunteer?

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend says "the army of occupation"—our relatively modest portion of that army.

Mr. GREEN: I realize that. May I repeat: it will be made up first of those troops now overseas who volunteer for service in the Canadian army of occupation—

Mr. ABBOTT: I wish my hon. friend would not refer to it as the "Canadian army of occupation." It will not be an army of Canada. Canada will have a unit in the occupation forces.

Mr. GREEN:—second, those now overseas the shortest time will be detailed to make up any deficiency?

Mr. ABBOTT: Again, not "now overseas," but overseas at the time the force is constituted. The hon. member realizes that men are continually being sent over now. I think I indicated pretty clearly in my statement what it will be.

Mr. GREEN: I am going to try to get the parliamentary assistant to indicate a little more clearly.

Mr. ABBOTT: Then the hon. member will have to try pretty hard.

Mr. GREEN: There is no intention whatever of sending N.R.M.A. men to Germany when the fighting stops there in order to enable the men who are there now to come back to Canada; is that correct?

Mr. ABBOTT: So far as I know, I have given the hon. member a pretty clear statement in plain English of what I am advised the policy is. I cannot elaborate any further.

Mr. GREEN: Would the parliamentary assistant state—

Mr. GARDINER: State what you think.

Mr. GREEN: You keep out of it.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): You had better stick to the hogs and chickens.

Mr. GREEN: Will the parliamentary assistant say that my statement is incorrect?

Mr. ABBOTT: I will not say the hon. member's statement is incorrect, but I will repeat what I said before as the statement of government policy, and it is in plain straightforward English. First, those who express a desire to remain on such service will be given the employment, subject to their possessing the required qualifications. Second, the remaining personnel required will be detailed from among those having served the shortest time overseas. The hon. member is at liberty to draw his own conclusions from that statement. I think it is a perfectly clear statement.

Mr. GREEN: The parliamentary assistant said yesterday that there are 20,000 N.R.M.A. men available as infantry at the present time in Canada.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think I said there were 10,000 in the training stream at the moment.

Mr. GREEN: I thought the parliamentary assistant said that when they had finished their training the total available would be about 20,000.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is probably right. I have not the figures before me at the moment. If that is what I said, it is correct.

Mr. GREEN: Are more men being called up all the time?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: There is no doubt that there will be enough N.R.M.A. men on hand in Canada, should the fighting in Germany cease within the next two or three months, to comprise the Canadian commitment in the army of occupation.

Mr. ABBOTT: I should not be prepared to say that. I do not know what the qualifications would be. I do not know that the occupation force is to consist entirely of infantry. I assume it will contain representatives of other arms.

Mr. GREEN: There are now N.R.M.A. men in the other arms, are there not?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Could the parliamentary assistant give us some idea of the size of the Canadian commitment in the army of occupation?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid I cannot.

Mr. GREEN: I saw a report in the press just a day or two ago that the United States commitment was to be 200,000 men. Will the parliamentary assistant give to us and the Canadian people some idea of the commitment? This has to do with the post-war period, after the fighting is over. I do not see how there could be any contention that to reveal the figure will hurt the war effort. I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, and to this committee that it is the responsibility of the government to give the Canadian people at least an approximate figure of the Canadian commitment in the army of occupation.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid I am not at liberty to give it, for one very good reason, namely, that it is not settled yet. When it is, I daresay it will be possible to give it promptly.

Mr. GREEN: Will the Canadian commitment be at least a division?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not in a position to answer the question the hon. member has asked. I think the Prime Minister said in his statement the other day—I have forgotten his exact language—that it was relatively modest in comparison with our army overseas which, as the hon. member knows, now amounts to 285,000. That is the only information I am at liberty to give the committee at the moment. It seems to me the question is a little premature. We have not won the war yet, and we are now into an elaborate discussion on the army of occupation.

Mr. GREEN: If the number of men in this Canadian commitment were a division, what number of troops would be required to keep up that division? In other words there would be the division itself; then certain troops along the lines of communication, and more for replacements. It seems quite clear that there will be guerrilla warfare in Germany. There may be many casualties. Of course we all hope there will not be, but there is a possibility of heavy casualties. Then there will be sickness, and men coming back for one reason or another. What number of men would be involved if Canada is to maintain a division in the army of occupation?

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend is a skilful enough lawyer to know that I am not going to answer a hypothetical question.

Mr. GREEN: The parliamentary assistant cannot evade the question in that way.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not evading it. I am answering it by saying I will not answer a hypothetical question.

Mr. GREEN: That is not a hypothetical question. The parliamentary assistant has not condescended to bring his officials to the chamber, officials who could answer questions of this kind offhand.

War Appropriation—The Army

Mr. ABBOTT: It is my responsibility, as to whether or not I answer a question—whether I have officials here or have not officials here.

Mr. GREEN: Although General McNaughton, as the minister, did so at the session last fall. He did not know so much that he would not have his leading men come down to help him answer questions.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is not fair. Surely my hon. friend does not mean that. If the committee insists, I can have my officials here. But the other ministers have not done so. I admit I have not the background or the knowledge the others may have, but they proceeded without their officials, and I think possibly I can do so.

In any event, even if I had a dozen officials in front of me, I would not answer the question my hon. friend has asked.

Mr. GREEN: There is an atmosphere about the army estimates which would seem to be summed up in this way. "We have made our statement." Government supporters tried to rush them through last night, and get the whole thing over with. I submit that the committee is entitled to have answers to these questions.

Mr. ABBOTT: I can answer it in this way, that that is a matter of government policy which will be announced in due course.

Mr. GREEN: What? The number of men?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. Whether our occupation force is or is not to be a division is a matter of government policy which will be announced in due course.

Mr. GREEN: Well, the parliamentary assistant need not get excited about it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not excited—just having good clean fun.

Mr. GREEN: Whether or not it is to be a division is a question of government policy. But I am asking a question which the parliamentary assistant's experts can answer. What would be the number of men required to maintain an infantry division in the army of occupation in Germany? If his officials cannot answer, they should be able to.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend can probably answer the question as well as they can.

Mr. GREEN: Will the parliamentary assistant get an answer to that question?

Mr. ABBOTT: No; I do not see why I should. It is purely hypothetical. My hon. friend asks, if our army of occupation is to be a division, how many men must be maintained? Perhaps I am being a little narrow. It may be that there is no objection to giving that information; I do not know.
[Mr. Green.]

Mr. GREEN: I thought not.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall give the question some consideration to see if it can be answered.

Mr. GREEN: Thank you very much. In each preceding year the former minister of national defence was careful to give the house and the Canadian people the plans of the government for the ensuing fiscal year in regard to the number of men to be recruited. For example, a year ago he told us that he would require 60,000 men during the fiscal year from April 1, 1944, to March 31, 1945. The hon. member for Prince, who was then minister of national defence, will correct me if I am wrong. My recollection is that 12,000 were to be N.R.M.A. men and 48,000 were to be general service.

The parliamentary assistant this year, perhaps because of an oversight, has not given us that information. I say we are entitled to it, and should know what the plans are for the present fiscal year ending March 31, 1946.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think my hon. friend will realize that conditions are somewhat different from what they were last year. Future plans naturally have to be on a somewhat different basis from what they were last year, in view of the probable end of the war. I can tell my hon. friend that the call-up required in March was 7,500, which was on a higher scale than was contemplated last year.

So far as I know—and I would not be positive about it—I think the scale for the current month may be a bit lower. But decisions will have to be made this year almost on a month to month basis. In other words, we will maintain our training system so long as the military advisers of the government feel that the military situation is such as to necessitate it.

Mr. GREEN: Then at the present time the plan is to get into the army 7,500 men a month?

Mr. ABBOTT: That was done in March—roughly 7,500 men. I cannot be quite positive about April, but it is probably not very far below that.

Mr. GREEN: The parliamentary assistant cannot say what it will be after the month of April?

Mr. ABBOTT: No; the plan as I understand it at the present time is that we have to look at the situation almost from day to day and from month to month. Perhaps I should have mentioned that in my statement. But since we were not figuring for the full year on that basis I omitted to do so.

Mr. GREEN: Has not the parliamentary assistant some idea of the number that will be required in May and June, as a minimum? There must have been at least an estimate made by the Department of National Defence. It may be that the estimate would have to be changed subsequently. All hon. members could appreciate that. But has there not been any estimate made as to the number required for the whole fiscal year?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not sure about that. I presume my hon. friend is right, that some estimate has been made. But all the information I have at the moment is that we are operating on the basis I have indicated—so many in March, and so many in April. The situation is being constantly reviewed, because indications are that the war, in its more active stage, will probably be over within, we hope, a comparatively short space of time. Obviously it is not in the public interest to take too many men out of civilian occupations or off the farms, more than are necessary.

Mr. GREEN: Would the parliamentary assistant have any objection to letting the committee have that estimate?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not prepared to do that on my own responsibility. I would have to see whether or not I can give my hon. friend that estimate. Frankly I do not know what particular advantage it would have. However, I can make inquiries about it.

Mr. GREEN: During the last fiscal year the requirements were 5,000 a month.

Mr. ABBOTT: Originally 4,000 a month, I think.

Mr. GREEN: If I remember correctly we were told in November that 5,000 were being requisitioned each month.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct; it had been increased. But the original plan was for 4,000 a month, or 48,000 a year.

Mr. GREEN: And each month only 4,000 of those 5,000 were obtained; is that correct?

Mr. ABBOTT: I would have to verify this, but I think pretty well the full number of general service men were obtained for the year. As I indicated in my statement yesterday, a bit over the full 60,000 were enrolled and enlisted.

Mr. GREEN: If 5,000 were requisitioned, approximately 4,000 would be obtained; there would be a wastage of approximately 1,000, leaving 3,000. And of those 3,000, there would be 2,000 infantry and about 1,000 for other arms of the service. Is that correct?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid I cannot say whether it is correct or not.

Mr. GREEN: Was that the experience?

Mr. ABBOTT: I cannot answer my hon. friend. As he knows, I have not been long in the department.

Mr. GREEN: But is that correct?

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps the hon. member for Prince could say from memory?

Mr. RALSTON: Not without having the officials before me.

Mr. ABBOTT: I would have to verify that.

Mr. GREEN: What has been the experience in the department in connection with the requisition for 7,500? What number have come in as a result of that requisition?

Mr. ABBOTT: I will get that information and give it to my hon. friend a little later.

Mr. GREEN: There has been a considerable reduction in the number of N.R.M.A. troops in Canada. The figure given by the Prime Minister about November 9 of last year was approximately 68,000, of whom about 9,000 were out on farm or other kinds of leave, leaving 59,000 actually serving in Canada; is that correct?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is approximately correct.

Mr. GREEN: As I understand the figures given by the parliamentary assistant, there are now 35,000 serving in Canada, with about 6,000 out on farm and other kinds of leave; are those figures correct?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: So that there has been a considerable reduction in the number of N.R.M.A. troops in Canada.

Mr. ABBOTT: Very considerable.

Mr. GREEN: Quite a few have been sent overseas. Is it the plan to wipe out the N.R.M.A. army in Canada; I realize that it is not an army, but is it the plan to do away entirely with N.R.M.A. troops in Canada?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know that I can say that the plan is to do away with them. I think the policy will be continued of endeavouring to reduce the numbers of N.R.M.A. men as much as possible by their conversion to general service or otherwise. An appreciable step has been taken already. As I pointed out in my statement yesterday, there-is a considerable number of N.R.M.A. men here who are not in a physical category which would make them suitable for service overseas and who are now engaged in various house-keeping activities here in Canada which otherwise would have to be done by general service personnel.

Mr. GREEN: Is there any thought of stopping the call-up system?

Mr. ABBOTT: Not so far as I know.

Mr. GREEN: Is the call-up system to be used during the Pacific war if this government is in power?

Mr. ABBOTT: Presumably not.

Mr. GREEN: In other words, as soon as the war in Germany is over call-ups are to be stopped?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is a matter of government policy, but I would think that is a fair inference to draw from the statement the other day.

Mr. GREEN: That is the parliamentary assistant's statement?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is only my personal understanding, I must confess.

Mr. GREEN: That is not good enough. I would ask the parliamentary assistant to find out what is the government policy in that regard.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall be glad to do that.

Mr. GREEN: What is the position now with regard to the efforts being made to get N.R.M.A. troops to convert to general service? Is the Department of National Defence still carrying on the campaign for conversion?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know that I would call it a campaign. Some instructions are in the hands of district officers commanding to do all in their power to induce N.R.M.A. men to be active, but so far as I know there has been no change in policy in that respect.

Mr. GREEN: I ask that question because of a press dispatch which appeared in the Victoria Colonist of February 16, 1945, headed "N.R.M.A. men overseas may still volunteer." That confirms the statement made to-day.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Mr. GREEN: The newspaper report states: Notwithstanding the conscription policy adopted by the dominion government last November personal appeals on a planned basis are being stepped up to persuade N.R.M.A. troops to convert to general service status, whether such N.R.M.A. men are serving in Canada or overseas, it was learned yesterday.

Is that statement correct?

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not want to accept that statement at its face value so far as overseas is concerned. I do not think there has been any change so far as overseas is concerned. It is really a matter of the man's conscience once he is there.

Mr. GREEN: There is no campaign to get them to convert?

Mr. ABBOTT: What would be the purpose of doing that? They are over there fighting.

Mr. GREEN: The article goes on:

This was the first indication that the policy of appealing to N.R.M.A. men to convert to general service had been extended to overseas, and that N.R.M.A. soldiers compulsorily sent abroad may transfer to a voluntary service basis even after they have reached or served in a battle area.

It is understood that instructions have been received by all recruiting officers—

As I pointed out, this is dated February 16.

—and commanding officers in the dominion to conduct an energetic campaign among N.R.M.A. men with a view to obtaining as many conversions as possible.

Is that correct?

Mr. ABBOTT: I can only repeat what I have already said. So far as I know there has been no change in policy, but I will make inquiries as to whether any additional instructions have been sent out. I am inclined to think that news item simply refers to what has been going on for several months.

Mr. GREEN: Would the parliamentary assistant check up to see if there was not an order sent out by the adjutant general some time prior to the date of this article, which was February 16, setting out just what was to be done to get conversions from N.R.M.A. to general service?

Mr. ABBOTT: I will verify that and be able to give my hon. friend an answer in a few minutes.

Mr. GREEN: If any such order has been sent out I ask that we be shown a copy of it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall be very glad to do that.

Mr. GREEN: The article continues:

It is pointed out that an N.R.M.A. soldier may volunteer for "G.S." status at any time during his service in Canada or overseas, and commanding officers are requested to assist in a continuous effort to obtain conversions.

These efforts are to continue during all stages of an N.R.M.A. soldier's training and after, it is stated, and are to be designed on a planned basis.

It is believed that this planning is to be given priority among the duties of recruiting officers and all those concerned with the training or administrations of N.R.M.A. personnel.

Of course the answers to those paragraphs would be the same.

Mr. ABBOTT: I would think that is accurate but I will verify it.

Mr. GREEN: Perhaps the parliamentary assistant does not know whether the call-up system is to be continued for the Pacific war, but if it is will the same attempts be made to get men to convert from N.R.M.A. to general service?

Mr. ABBOTT: I think I can answer that by referring to the announcement that the government policy as far as the call-up system is concerned will not be in effect for the Pacific war. That will answer my hon. friend's second question.

Mr. GREEN: There is to be no call-up system for the Pacific war?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. GREEN: The whole plan of the Department of Labour to get in men will be dropped, and men for the Pacific war or who go from Canada to join the army of occupation in Germany will be straight volunteers?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is true, provided that the present government is returned to power. If my hon. friend's party is returned I do not know what it will do.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The hon. member for York-Sunbury did not say so.

Mr. ABBOTT: I know, but I am just pointing that out.

Mr. GREEN: In his statement the parliamentary assistant referred to P.C. 8891, which was the important order in council passed last year giving the government power to send 16,000 N.R.M.A. men overseas, and he said that up to date 11,836 had been sent over.

Mr. ABBOTT: To the end of March.

Mr. GREEN: There was some question about the other 2,400.

Mr. ABBOTT: Those men had N.R.M.A. status last October but they had converted before going over. I used that figure to show that 14,000 men who had N.R.M.A. status at the time of the special session had in fact gone overseas. The 2,400 are not charged, if I may use an accounting term, against the 16,000.

Mr. GREEN: The number charged against the 16,000 would be 11,836?

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I could clarify my statement a little. I do not think we have the figures right up to the end of March. I shall have to verify that because I can see there is a bit of confusion over it.

Mr. GREEN: Will the parliamentary assistant give us the number of the 16,000 who have been used up?

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall be able to give that in a few minutes.

Mr. GREEN: Why is the government unwilling to pass an order in council now, taking power to send over the other 20,000 N.R.M.A. men who are available in Canada now as infantry?

Mr. ABBOTT: Because it has not yet become necessary to do so.

Mr. GREEN: How many N.R.M.A. men are there in Canada who are actually fit to go overseas? The former minister of national defence and the Prime Minister told us in November that there were then 42,000 N.R.M.A. men fit to go overseas. How many are there at the present time?

Mr. ABBOTT: There are 20,000 who are suitable for infantry reinforcements. Whether there are some few additional who would be suitable for other branches of the service I cannot say at the moment. But of the 35,000 N.R.M.A. men in Canada 20,000 are of a medical category and type suitable for infantry reinforcements.

Mr. GREEN: That was not my question. How many are fit to go overseas?

Mr. ABBOTT: Have been trained, you mean?

Mr. GREEN: No. The parliamentary assistant said that 20,000 could go over as infantry. Are there additional numbers who could go over for other arms of the service?

Mr. ABBOTT: Of the remaining 15,000 there may be a few of a category suitable for lines-of-communication troops. I will verify that and give the answer in a few minutes. But the principal discussion has been of high category men, infantry reinforcements, and I did not consider that the committee would be particularly interested in lower category men. It would obviously only be a portion of the 15,000, but I will get the information and give it to my hon. friend.

War Appropriation—The Army

Mr. GREEN: So that to date there have been 11,836 sent over of the 16,000?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, and the additional number I referred to who have converted from N.R.M.A.

Mr. GREEN: General McNaughton announced as his policy last fall that 5,000 of the N.R.M.A. would be sent over in December, 5,000 in January, 2,000 in February, 2,000 in March and the remainder in April.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. GREEN: Will that estimate be reached?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not a prophet. It was reached by the end of March, and I have every expectation that it will be reached by the end of April.

Mr. GREEN: How many men sent over are over and above the normal reinforcement stream?

Mr. ABBOTT: I can only answer that by saying that the 14,000 who have been sent over were in addition to the planned dispatches as discussed at the November session.

Mr. GREEN: The parliamentary assistant has given some figures on the numbers of men who have converted from N.R.M.A. to general service. Can he break down that figure to show what numbers of those men converted during the first month after their enrolment, how many of the remainder were infantry and how many were for other arms of the service? Those figures were given last fall I think, and it would be interesting to have them up to date. I ask that because it is my understanding that a large proportion of the men who convert do so within the first few weeks of their enrolment, and that can hardly be regarded as conversion, certainly not in the same way as one would regard the conversion of men who had been in the N.R.M.A. for a year or two.

Mr. ABBOTT: Those figures are available. It might take a little time to compile them but there would be no difficulty in getting them.

Mr. GREEN: To travel over to the Pacific theatre of war, is the Canadian force which will fight against Japan to be merely a token force say a brigade or less.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid I cannot give my hon friend any information on that at the moment, since it is a matter of government policy which will have to be announced in due course.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. GREEN: Again I should like to point out to the house and the country that there would seem to be no reason why the Canadian people who will have to send their husbands and sons to do the fighting should not be given some idea of the number of Canadian troops that are to be sent to the Pacific, because that is the only way in which they can reach a decision as to what the policy should be with regard to Canadians fighting in the Pacific. It looks as though the government is just going to refuse to give any statement, any basis on which the people can make a decision, and I suggest to the parliamentary assistant and to the ministry that that is not being fair to the Canadian people. Certainly they are entitled to know and this house is entitled to know whether the Canadian force that is to go to Japan is to be merely a token force. Is the parliamentary assistant unwilling to answer that question.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not unwilling, but he is not going to answer it. I repeat again what I said, that it is a matter of government policy which will be announced in due course, but I am not going to announce it to-day.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): You have not a policy.

Mr. GREEN: This house is asked to vote money to carry on a war against the Japanese and surely we are entitled to know something of the plans. When the former minister of national defence gave his statements to this house he was always scrupulously careful to tell us what the plans were. He told us what they planned to do each year, how many troops would be sent over, how many men would be available, and so forth. All that information was given. But here, where there is not the same need for secrecy—

Mr. ABBOTT: Why?

Mr. GREEN: There is no definite date for troops sailing or anything of that kind. The Prime Minister said that this whole question of the Pacific war was discussed at Quebec last fall.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not suppose that my hon. friend would suggest that we should announce the sailing dates of the troops?

Mr. GREEN: The parliamentary assistant cannot duck out from under that easily. Surely the ministry should tell us at least whether the Canadian force against the Japanese is to be merely a token force. Will the parliamentary assistant say?

Mr. ABBOTT: No. I am not under cross-examination. I have said two or three times that it is a matter of government policy which will be announced in due course and I am not announcing it to-day. I do not know how many times I must repeat that. My hon. friend is entitled to his opinion that the policy should be announced; I do not quarrel with that, but he has had my assurance that I am not going to announce it and I can add nothing more.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest to the house and the Canadian people that the government knows what the plan is, but for election purposes consider it wiser to give the people of Canada no indication of it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not think any such inference is justified.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend is asking his question, may I suggest, for political purposes. He is accusing the parliamentary assistant and the government of acting for political purposes. I would just like to throw that back across the chamber at him, and the remarks he is making.

Mr. GARDINER: Purely a political question.

Mr. CRERAR: May I say this to my hon. friend—

Mr. GREEN: Say all you like.

Mr. CRERAR: Very well; I will say it whether I have the permission of my hon. friend or not.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Oh, no, you won't. He has the floor.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We are in committee.

Mr. CRERAR: May I say to my hon. friend that he knows as well as anyone else that the war in Europe is not yet over.

Mr. JACKMAN: So does the Prime Minister. He makes the statement.

Mr. CRERAR: He knows that many problems will not be clear until the war in Europe is over.

Mr. JACKMAN: Then why does he announce the policy?

Mr. CRERAR: As the Prime Minister told the house, it is in the light of the circumstances then existing that the decision of the government will be made at the proper time. When my hon. friend says, "You must tell us now how many men are going to go," I say that is an unreasonable position for the hon. member to take.

Mr. GREEN: The minister must not twist my words. I asked whether or not this means that it is to be merely a token force. That is the question which the parliamentary assistant refuses to answer.

Mr. CRERAR: May I ask my hon. friend what he means by "a token force"?

Mr. GREEN: If the minister had been in the chamber he would know. I said, a brigade or less.

Mr. SLAGHT: I wonder whether my hon. friend would permit me to refer him to the Prime Minister's words.

Mr. GREEN: No; I have the floor.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There is no such thing in committee of the whole.

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Chairman, I must ask to be allowed to put my question. I have the floor.

Mr. GARDINER: You are sitting down.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. The hon. member has now been on his feet for more than forty minutes.

Mr. GREEN: Oh, no. I rose to obtain a reply from the parliamentary assistant.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): No; the hon. member has been speaking for more than forty minutes—about forty-five minutes. It is, I think, an act of courtesy to permit a question to be asked.

Mr. GREEN: Is the chairman ruling that I have to stop?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): No; the hon. member can go on with his question; I think it is an act of courtesy to permit a question to be asked.

Mr. SLAGHT: Let me say to the hon. member I shall spend only a moment on the exact point he is discussing, because he referred to the fact that this matter was dealt with at Quebec. He heard the Prime Minister tell the house exactly what Canada arranged at Quebec. I am just going to read that, and it makes it crystal clear what the position is; then I am going to sit down, and if the hon. gentleman wishes to go on I do not want him to feel that I desire to cut him off. Will he give heed to this, as reported at page 434 of Hansard:

The matter was discussed in principle at Quebec. It was agreed at that time that the actual form and extent of the Canadian forces to be engaged could not be finally settled until the strategic situation, which will exist after European hostilities have terminated, could be assessed with greater accuracy, and that when that time came the appropriate Canadian contribution to the defeat of Japan would be determined with United Kingdom and United States authorities in the light of the situation then existing.

So I conclude by saying that the hon. member, having indicated that he knew the matter had been determined at Quebec, was putting a purely cheap political question to the young parliamentary assistant when he endeavoured to ask him about token force or no token force, because he well knew, unless he had forgotten it—I should like to think he had forgotten it—that the position I have indicated to the committee was exactly the position agreed to at Quebec.

Mr. GREEN: Now that that little outburst is all over—

Mr. CASSELMAN: He will have another one in a minute.

Mr. SLAGHT: You asked for it.

Mr. GREEN: —I will go on and ask my question. The position apparently is that the government itself does not yet know what number of Canadians will be needed in the Pacific war.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not think I am going to dignify that further question with an answer.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ABBOTT: Will my hon. friend please sit down when I stand up. He has been standing here and conducting—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Well, well!

Mr. ABBOTT: —a most devastating cross-examination in his usual swaggering style. My understanding of the rules of parliamentary debate is that when one speaker is on his feet the other one sits down. I will sit down and listen for another question. But let us pop up and down alternately, as it were.

Mr. GREEN: I would not have sat down if I had known the parliamentary assistant was going to sit down. What I want to know is this. The Minister of Mines and Resources has stated—he can correct me if I am wrong—that the government is not yet in a position to know what—

Mr. CRERAR: The Prime Minister's words are quite clear. He stated the position clearly in the extract from his remarks which was read by the hon. member for Parry Sound.

Mr. GREEN: I am asking the minister the following question—

Mr. SLAGHT: If the hon. member did not understand it the first time we will let him have another lesson.

[Mr. Slaght.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The hon. member for Vancouver South has the floor.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask the Minister of Mines and Resources, if the situation is that uncertain, if the government itself does not know, why does it announce to the house as a policy that service in the Pacific war is to be voluntary, and further, that the whole call-up system is to be scrapped? Can the minister answer that?

Mr. CRERAR: The Prime Minister stated the policy of the government the other day.

Mr. GREEN: I should like an answer to my question.

Mr. MITCHELL: Why don't you look at your own policy?

Mr. GREEN: Is the Minister of Mines and Resources unwilling to answer that question?

Mr. CRERAR: What question?

Mr. GREEN: He is senior in the cabinet; he should know something about these things.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, repeat the question again.

Mr. ABBOTT: And then sit down, of course.

Mr. CRERAR: And then sit down and give me a chance.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He has forgotten which question it is.

Mr. GREEN: The Minister of Mines and Resources said in his remarks that the Prime Minister had explained that sufficient facts were not known for the government to be able to decide a policy as to the number of troops that would be sent; and so on and so forth; and the minister has been ridiculing me for trying to get an answer to a question along that line. What I want to ask him is this: if that is the position, that the government does not yet know what Canada's commitment is to be, why does the government announce as its policy that Canada's share in the Pacific fighting will be done by volunteers exclusively; furthermore, that the whole call-up system will be scrapped?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Your leader said so last year in the house.

Mr. GREEN: That is a fair question. I should like an answer.

Mr. CRERAR: The Prime Minister stated the policy to the house the other day. My hon. friend, for the last fifteen minutes—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Twenty minutes.

Mr. SLAGHT: Forty-five minutes.

Mr. CRERAR: —has been making a great deal of the point that the government should state now the number of men it is to send to the Pacific area.

Mr. GREEN: I have never asked for the number of men; I said, an approximate idea.

Mr. CRERAR: Mr. Chairman, I did not interrupt my hon. friend, and I would be very grateful if he did not interrupt me.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. Just a minute. I wonder if the hon. member would take his seat.

Mr. GREEN: I am sitting.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The hon. member is only taking the edge of his seat.

Mr. CRERAR: The quotation from the Prime Minister's remarks the other day, which was read a few moments ago by the hon. member for Parry Sound, stated the matter clearly. The situation after the European war is over will be reviewed with the other allies in the Pacific area, and I take it that in the light of the circumstances as they may then exist the contribution that Canada shall make will be determined. No one knows. It may be that Japan will collapse before Germany does.

Mr. GREEN: Why do you announce your man policy now and your call-up policy, before you know the facts.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): You announced yours in two different ways last year through two different leaders in two days.

Mr. GREEN: Perhaps we can get back to the parliamentary assistant. When he has the information—

Mr. ABBOTT: I have some of it now.

Mr. GREEN: —concerning the number of men who will be required to maintain the division in the army of occupation in Germany, will he also get the figures with regard to maintaining a division in the Pacific field? That must have been very carefully worked out by the officers of the department. It is of vital importance, the question of casualties, and of course the ratio of casualties will probably be far heavier than it has been in Europe. I should think the ratio of sickness would be much higher than it has been in Europe.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is all speculation.

Mr. GREEN: Could the parliamentary assistant get those figures and also for a corps made up of two infantry divisions and a corps made up of an infantry division and an armoured division?

Mr. MITCHELL: While my hon. friend is speculating, has he given any thought to the possibility that the war in Japan may be over before the war is over in Europe?

Mr. GREEN: May I say to the Minister of Labour that no one hopes more fervently than I do that it will be over to-morrow.

Mr. ABBOTT: I wish to say, of course, that I have not given my hon. friend an assurance that these figures will be made available but I will see what can be done.

Perhaps I had better clear up one bit of information asked for. Charged against the 16,000 N.R.M.A. under the order in council is the number of 11,836 who were dispatched to the end of March. The other figure is 2,454, and they converted before going over and are therefore not a charge against the 16,000. I make that statement in order to clear up that point.

Mr. GREEN: You still have how many?

Mr. ABBOTT: The difference between 11,836 and 16,000. My mental arithmetic is not very rapid but the number will be arrived at in that way.

Mr. GREEN: Another statement made by the Prime Minister with regard to the Pacific was that the army would be fighting beside United States troops.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think he said they would be fighting under the United States, did he not?

Mr. SLAGHT: Forced to operate with the United States army.

Mr. GREEN: Last fall we were told that Canadian troops had been sent to Australia. A small number of men were sent there. I believe the explanation given was that they were either going on special work or going over to see conditions, and the thought at that time was apparently that Canadians would be fighting beside Australians. I am not making any statement as to where they should be fighting, but I should like to know when the change in that policy was made and what provisions will be necessary so that the Canadians may use United States equipment, in order to obviate the difficulty of one lot of troops having one kind of equipment and the other a different kind, which can be very serious, as the parliamentary assistant knows.

Mr. ABBOTT: That second point is very important. I agree with the hon. member in that regard, but he does not expect me to give an answer on it now, or perhaps even during the course of this debate. Naturally, the question of equipment is a very important one.

Mr. GREEN: Will the parliamentary assistant give us the reason for the change of policy?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid I could not do that. I do not know that there ever was a change.

Mr. GREEN: Some question was also asked about rates of pay for men who would be serving in the Japanese war. The British have increased the rate for men who have to serve in the orient. Why does the government not plan for an increase in the rate of pay to the Canadian troops?

Mr. ABBOTT: One answer is that our rate is now so very much higher than the British that it is hardly appropriate to compare the two. I believe that the Minister of National Defence for Air referred to that point the other day in the discussion of his estimates. The increase in the British rate for service in the far east is moderate, but our rates are so far above the rates of pay for the British army that that is probably the main reason why no consideration, so far as I know, has yet been given to any increase in pay for service of that kind.

Mr. GREEN: I would ask the parliamentary assistant to have that question discussed, because if our troops serve beside the Americans their pay will be much lower than the American pay and nothing is more apt to cause bad feeling. It would be very unfair to Canadian troops if they were put in that position, and I suggest that some plan should be made whereby our men receive additional pay.

When General McNaughton announced his plans last year he stated that there was to be a Canadian employment corps of N.R.M.A. men. They were set up to do labour jobs, public works, and he expected that the number would be about 9,000. The corps was to be composed of men who were not in the top physical category. Could the parliamentary assistant tell us whether that plan was put into effect and, if not, why not?

Mr. ABBOTT: P.C. 4729, dated October 3, 1944, provides for the employment of Canadian army personnel, including N.R.M.A. men on projects in Canada, which the Ministers of National Defence and of Labour deem to be in the national interest. The men so employed continue to be subject to discipline and the provisions of the army, and they are considered to be performing military duty. The following were considered to be in the national interest: 1. Department of Pensions and National Health hospitals; 2. Brickyards supplying brick for hospitals; 3. Flour and feed mills; 4. Cold storage plants; 5. Sugar refineries; 6. Food processing; 7. Grain handling; 8. Railway track maintenance; 9. Sawmills; 10. Malleable iron industry; 11. Nursing profession engaged in civilian and Department of Pensions and National Health hospitals; 12. Building of elevator to store soya beans; 13. Base metal mines; 14. Shells, components and filling; 15. Manufacture of synthetic rubber tires; 16. Coal yards and helpers in coal delivery. Of these, however, the troops were employed only in Nos. 1, 2, 8, 10, 12 and 16. Particular mention is made of those employed in railway track maintenance, comprising 500 in all, divided equally between the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific railways, 300 of whom were engaged from Port Arthur and Fort William to Winnipeg and the others in southern Ontario. This ceased after the coming of snow and was discontinued by December 2, 1944.

As of February 27, 1945, 171 soldiers were employed on industrial duty as follows: In Department of Veterans' Affairs hospitals under construction, thirty-two; brickyards eighty-five; malleable iron industry forty-four; coal deliveries in Toronto, ten. The army problems are confined to the subject of pay and provision of board and lodging, and these were resolved as follows. First, as to pay, the soldier receives his ordinary pay and allowances. Any excess received on account of his wages is not credited to his pay account but goes toward cost of administration. Second, as to board and lodging, the employer pays the cost of board and lodging, taking the cost from the amount payable for the labour. In the case of supervising non-commissioned officers, it has been submitted that these receive the actual cost of board and lodging rather than the set rate. No other problems concerning the Department of National Defence have arisen in connection with this matter. The Department of Labour apparently was faced with some local opposition to the employment of troops in certain industries, including a reluctance on the part of some civilian workers to work side by side with home defence personnel, and the department also experienced in several instances some difficulty in providing accommodation and meals. A further P.C. 9148, dated December 5, 1944, provides that soldiers employed on industrial duties shall only receive pay and allowances of rank.

Mr. GREEN: What is the total number employed on industrial duty?

Mr. ABBOTT: As of February 27, 1945. There were, prior to December 2, a total of 500 on local maintenance work.

Mr. GREEN: Instead of 9,000 there were only 171 now—

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know anything about the "instead of". There were 171 at the end of February.

Mr. RALSTON: Would my hon. friend permit me to mention a matter? I am very sorry but it is impossible for me to be here to-night. There is a matter that I should like to mention before six o'clock, namely, the question of the factors which will enter into consideration in connection with demobilization when the long looked-for time comes. I do not think any announcement has been made so far as the army is concerned.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes; I can make only a very general statement. Essentially the policy will be based on the principle of first in, first out. But the committee, or some of them, will remember the difficulties experienced after the last war by the British army adhering strictly to that plan. Officers of the department are now working hard on the plans to carry out demobilization in the fairest way possible. Essentially it will be based on the principle of first in, first out. But there will have to be taken into consideration compassionate grounds, the desire to see that families are reunited as soon as possible, the question of married men, and so on. I do not know that I am in a position to go further than that at the moment. That is the position in which it stands at the present time.

Mr. RALSTON: This is a matter about which I heard a great deal when I was in Italy and France last October, and I had hoped that plans for the army would have been pretty well crystallized and an announcement made by this time. I talked with the men over there and I tried to indicate to them what I thought might be the factors which would be considered. I just give these to my hon. friend for consideration by the department. I think the officers of the department know my views pretty well, but this is such an important matter that perhaps I should repeat them again. My view was that, as my hon. friend says, length of service should perhaps be the basic factor in connection with demobilization of men overseas—I am speaking particularly of men overseas—but that it should be weighted to some extent by the length of time a man had been overseas. In other words, you may find a man who has had four years' service altogether, three months of which were served overseas. Perhaps he might not be entitled to as much consideration as a man who had had three and a half years' service of which eight months or a year was in Canada and almost two and a half years overseas. To my mind there ought to be some method worked out whereby a weighting factor could be provided and length of service overseas given some additional advantage as it is in connection with rotation leave. The principle on which I go in connection with this is as follows: I realize that we have in Canada quite a few men who desire to serve overseas. Nevertheless they are in Canada in comparatively close touch with their families. When they get leave they have an opportunity to go home to their families; whereas the man who is overseas has not that privilege and that opportunity. Second, they have conditions in Canada which are quite different from those overseas. It seems to me that the element of separation ought to be taken into consideration in deciding which men should come home first; that is to say, the man with the short service overseas but perhaps with long service altogether in the army might perhaps wait until after the fellow who had a little shorter service in the army but longer service overseas had come home. That was one factor which seemed to influence the men overseas. I am not saying that a vote was taken on it. There was no discussion on it by way of criticism, but that was what I gathered from the talks I had with the men overseas.

Another factor I had in mind which should be taken into consideration—and it was on the same basis—was marital status. Take a married man and a single man of equal service all the way through. It seems to me that the married man ought to be given the advantage and that principle ought to prevail.

As I understand it, the air force and the navy have made their announcements. I know the British made their announcement a long while ago, before I went overseas. It was with the idea of canvassing what the men had in mind that I talked with them about the matter.

There is one further factor that ought to be considered. It was mentioned here last year and I have strong views about it, namely, that some assurance ought to be given that if the N.R.M.A. men are discharged first, measures will be taken to protect the right to employment of the man overseas when he comes back. It is quite possible that men will have to be discharged in Canada before the men overseas, because those who are overseas will be a long while coming back on account of shipping conditions. Therefore some measure should be taken and some announcement made with regard to the preservation of the men's right to a job and the opportunity for employment, so that all the jobs would not be filled by men who were discharged in Canada, particularly N.R.M.A. men. I mention these matters to the parliamentary assistant for conveyance to his minister and to the officers of the department. I feel this is a matter that cannot be given too thorough consideration and cannot be announced too soon for the relief and information not only of the men overseas but of their families as well in Canada.

Have any changes been made in the physical requirements of recruits? I have heard that changes have been made in the requirements of the "S", meaning stability, in pulhems; that is to say, that men who have been classed as S-4 and S-3 have been reclassified as S-2. I must say that I am a little concerned about that, although I can understand that we may go too far and the recruiting officers have thought the psychiatrists have gone too far in setting men down in that classification. I throw out this thought. I think the experience has been that when you attempt to put in men who are classed too low, particularly in the "S" bracket, you find that it reacts later because the men go out of the line just that much more quickly and become problem cases for consideration overseas in the retraining centres. I hope that the most thorough study and attention have been given to that matter and that a reduction has not been made without the concurrence of the men who are most fitted to decide, the psychiatrists themselves and the medical men, and the personnel selection officers who have charge of it.

Could my hon. friend give me any information on either of those points?

Mr. POULIOT: Six o'clock.

Mr. ABBOTT: On the first point, I thank my hon. friend for what he said in connection with the demobilization plan. Specific recommendations are now before the war committee, for consideration, and I hope it will be possible to make an announcement in a few days.

On the second point, I am not in a position to answer my hon. friend immediately, but I shall be able to do so right after the dinner recess.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is going to give, as soon as he can, the information with regard to casualties from month to month. I should like him to include (a) infantry casualties and (b) total casualties.

I should like also one further thing, and that is information which I asked from his minister. His minister felt at that time that the information could not be given and that it was difficult to compile. Second, security reasons prevented its being given. I have in mind a comparison, by percentages, of the actual number of trained infantry men who were on hand in the field at the end of each month, December, January, February, and March if it can be given. However, for security purposes, the information for March may be too close. I should like to compare that with the number of men who were estimated to be on hand, in the estimate given to the house last November. I should like a comparison between the two, not by giving actual figures, but by giving percentages on the actual available infantry on hand at the end of those particular months as compared with the estimated number on hand at the end of each month at the time of the November session.

It seems to me that giving an answer by percentages would not in any way divulge information which should not be given. It would give information to hon. members who were present on the earlier occasion. The minister did offer it to me personally, as confidential information, but I felt I could not accept it in that way because in my view it was information which should be in the hands of all hon. members.

In view of the fact that those figures will relate to a time which has passed—in the case of December a period of three months, two in the case of January and one in February—I should hope the parliamentary assistant would be able to give the information.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall try.

Mr. POULIOT: And the number of relatives who are kept in the army, although incompetent and physically unfit.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ABBOTT: When the committee rose the hon. member for Prince had asked me one or two questions as to whether there had been any changes in the physical requirements for the armed forces. I am advised that there has been no change of significance in the physical requirements since the hon. member was minister of national defence.

Then the hon. member for Vancouver South asked a number of questions and quoted a press clipping. He asked whether special instructions had been issued subsequently to November and prior to February 16 by the adjutant general relating to efforts to be made by the district officers commanding to obtain conversions to general service. The only instructions of that kind which have been issued to all district officers commanding is a circular dated January 13, 1945, which reads as follows:

1. It is important that all concerned understand that an N.R.M.A. soldier may convert to G.S. any time during his service in Canada or overseas.

2. It is of importance that as many conversions as possible are obtained before N.R.M.A. soldiers proceed overseas and efforts to that end must be energetic and continuous.

3. The existing procedure at district depots which is designed to bring soldiers into the G.S. ranks on induction must be carefully examined to make sure that no effort is being spared or overlooked, for experience shows that resistance to converting increases as the soldier enters the training stream and takes on the identity of an N.R.M.A. soldier.

4. Although a large percentage of conversions should take place at the point of induction, efforts to obtain conversions must continue during all stages of an N.R.M.A. soldier's progress through the training stream and after.

5. The basis of securing conversions to G.S. from the ranks of the N.R.M.A. must be a plan, and the designing of such a plan, and its operation and supervision, must be considered as one of the first functions of D.R.O.'s. It must also receive a prominent place in the thoughts and duties of all officers and O.R.'s who are concerned with the training or administration of N.R.M.A. soldiers.

6. G.O.'sC. and D.O.'sC. and commanders are requested to see that all D.R.O.'s and commanding officers are not only acquainted with these instructions, but that they pass them on to all ranks under their command. C.O.'s should be instructed to give this matter their personal attention and guide and assist their officers and men in a continuous effort to obtain conversions.

I am informed that those are the only instructions which were issued between the dates referred to by my hon. friend. With further reference to the N.R.M.A. and supplementing the answer I gave to the hon. member for Lake Centre with respect to conversions of N.R.M.A. men overseas, may I say that for the purpose of computing service for war service gratuities and general service the soldier receives credit regardless of where he is serving from the date he becomes a general service soldier. However, the N.R.M.A. soldier receives his gratuity only from the date he leaves Canada to serve in northwest Europe or the Mediterranean area to the date he returns home to Canada. The advantage gained by the N.R.M.A. soldier in converting to general service status to go overseas or while overseas is confined to the gratuity for such period of time as he may remain in the service after returning to Canada.

I hope I have made myself clear on that point. Otherwise, his gratuity dates from the time he serves overseas until the time he returns to Canada. If he returns to Canada as an N.R.M.A. soldier without having become general service his gratuity is computed on a time basis from the moment he started serving overseas until the time he returns to Canada, whereas if he converts overseas it is computed up to the time of his discharge from the service in Canada. There were one or two other questions the hon. member for Vancouver South asked, in particular the hypothetical question as to how many men—

Mr. GREEN: I will not admit it was hypothetical.

Mr. ABBOTT: Subject to that reservation, he asked how many men we would have to have if our portion of the army of occupation in Germany were to be, let us say a division. It is impossible to answer that definitely. If it is to be an infantry division, it is public knowledge that the strength of such a division is around 19,000 men. The number required to replace the wastage would depend upon conditions in Germany. If there was some sporadic fighting and men were likely to be shot the rate of wastage would be higher than normal wastage due to illness, rotation leave and so on. So that it is impossible for me to give my hon. friend more accurate information than that, according to what my officers tell me. If the conditions of occupation were normal I am told that the wastage would run about one per cent a month, but it is almost impossible to give any useful statement as to what it would be.

As to the position in the Pacific I am able to be even less specific. The strength of a division presumably would be the same, but the number of men required to keep it up would depend upon the part of the Pacific in which the division was operating. Since that division presumably will be operating with the United States forces I am advised that I cannot give any useful figure as to what the rate of wastage may be.

Mr. GREEN: Is there any standard rate of wastage?

Mr. ABBOTT: It varies a great deal, depending upon whether or not the operations are intense. I understand it is quite a complicated process and I cannot give my hon. friend a more definite answer than that. There were one or two other questions the hon. member asked, but since some of them involve the preparation of figures they are not available at the moment. If they can be obtained I will put them on the record.

Mr. GREEN: I asked the number of N.R.M.A. troops who were in a category which would make them fit for service abroad.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have asked the officers to make the necessary calculations, but since I have not received them I assume they have not been able to get them ready.

Mr. GREEN: I thank the parliamentary assistant for giving me these answers. I think it would be helpful to the committee and the country to sum up the statements of policy that have come out as a result of the discussion this afternoon. I say that the government policy as explained by the parliamentary assistant is extremely unfair to those young Canadians who have been doing the fighting. First, let us take the army of occupation in Germany. This is to be made up of young men now overseas who volunteer to stay on, but, if there are deficiencies in the Canadian commitment they are to be met by detailing men who are now overseas.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend realizes that is far in the future.

Mr. GREEN: We have in Canada at least 20,000 N.R.M.A. troops available for use. If they are not to do any fighting in the Pacific surely they could be sent to Germany to allow the men who have actually been fighting in Europe to come home.

As far as the Pacific is concerned we must not take it for granted that there will not be heavy fighting and heavy Canadian casualties. I hope just as ardently as any member of this committee, and for personal reasons, that there will not be any fighting by Canadians in the Pacific, but we cannot take that for granted. There may be very high casualties; the war has to be carried to the Asiatic mainland, to China and to Manchuria, as well as to the home islands of Japan. It is quite likely that the casualties from disease will be much greater than they have been in Europe, and perhaps as many as 100,000 young Canadians will be involved before the war against Japan is ended. Yet our men who have been doing the fighting in Europe are to be asked to volunteer again to fight in the Pacific. They should neither be asked nor expected to fight for this nation in the Pacific, while there are others in Canada who have done no fighting. Young Canadians in Canada are also to be asked to volunteer for fighting in the Pacific. The call-up system has never been very fair, but now that the call-up system is to be thrown overboard for the war in the Pacific, this voluntary plan only exaggerates the unfairness. The British have gone at the matter in another way. Here is a clipping dated February 4, 1944, and the heading is: "British man-power to serve until Japan defeated." The dispatch points out that one of the Labour members in the British House of Commons had asked Labour Minister Bevin this question:

When the war with Germany is over, as many as possible of our men will want to come home. Then I suppose volunteers will be asked for to deal with Japan.

Then Mr. Bevin interrupted and used these words:

I think I ought to correct that false impression. There will be no volunteers called for Japan. It is one war and the National Service Act will be applied until the whole thing is seen through.

In Canada exactly the opposite policy is to be adopted if the present government remains in power after the election. The attempt by the call-up system to bring about equality of service and sacrifice is to be abandoned. Our bravest Canadian sons are to die in the Pacific. I hope that the Canadian people will demand that this shall not be. I hope that they will demand that in the war against Japan there shall be fairness to all and favour to none. Only on that basis shall we ever build a united nation.

Mr. McIVOR: Mr. Chairman, I am not so much concerned about the sending of men to Japan because I think the Japanese leaders are more reasonable than the leaders in Germany, and therefore the war in Japan may be over before the war in Europe.

But I have a question to ask that is burning up a good many people in Canada to-day. Would it be possible for the Department of National Defence and the Department of Labour to get together and order that the sons of farmers now in uniform be put back on the farm? Some of those boys are badly needed on the farm, and on the farm they can contribute more to the war effort than in the kind of work they are now doing. The Minister of Agriculture would tell us that our farmers have been producing far more, with less help than ever before. This was brought home to me most acutely just about two months ago when I requested the officer commanding of a regiment to release a young man, a farmer's son, from service so that he could go home and help on the farm because his father was ill and had to be taken to hospital. I did not succeed and the father came out of the hospital before the doctor thought he should have. The next thing that happened was that I was called out to officiate at his funeral service. He had a splendid farm, and now the boy must be released from service and come back to the farm if the farm is to be held. My question is, would it not be possible for instructions to be given to selective service or to the registrars to have a check-up made of all military camps in Canada with a view to releasing from the service every young farmer in order that he may go back to the farm to give a rest to the old dads and mothers who are badly overworked on the farm to-day.

Not long ago I went out to a farm about thirty miles from Fort William. The boy had been killed overseas and his mother wanted to keep the farm for the other boy. She was milking more than nine cows, tending other cattle, and getting the vegetables in, and she was wearing patched overalls. I think something should be done to remedy the farm labour shortage. Our farmers are deserving of consideration. It is of the utmost importance to our war effort and our post-war effort that we should keep on producing to the hilt.

Another question I want to ask is this. When will the registrars for the call-up be notified that no more men are needed? I received word from England that some of our Fort William boys are just burning up to be the first to get into Berlin, and they cannot get across. But they may be first after all, because it is hard to keep them back. The question I ask is, when will this conscription end? I think the men are not needed now for military service and I should like to see particularly every farmer's son sent back to the farm, which is where they are needed. Their fathers and mothers have attained an age when they should be retiring and having a little rest and a little bit of encouragement.

Mr. GILLIS: I am going to change the subject a little. The parliamentary assistant may be inclined at the outset to think the matter that I am going to discuss comes more properly within the purview of the Department of Veterans' Affairs, but if he will bear with me for a few minutes I may be able to convince him that there is something that the Department of National Defence should do in this matter.

I do not know whether hon. members noticed in the Montreal Gazette this morning an item stating that about twenty-five per cent of all discharges from the army were for mental disturbances, psychoneurosis and so forth. That is quite alarming when it is realized that from coast to coast right across this country there is not, to the best of my knowledge, an institution of any kind where returning personnel suffering from that disability can be placed and properly treated.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is not correct.

Mr. GILLIS: It is correct so far as the province from which I come is concerned, and if it is not the case in other provinces I should like to hear some members elaborate on just what the situation is, because this is a most alarming development that we have to contend with among our discharged service personnel. The figure of twenty-five per cent given in the Montreal Gazette was taken from the latest issue of the Canadian Medical Journal, and it is an alarming proportion. What I have in mind is this. When the Pension Act was opened for review and related to the new forces in this war, the provision was removed completely that permitted a pension to be refused because of disabilities of a congenital origin. That led me to believe that, this time, service personnel suffering from neurotic conditions who were being discharged from the army would not be just thrown out indiscriminately on the ground that the weakness was there prior to enlistment, though having been aggravated slightly, and pensions refused and treatment neglected and no means provided for institutional care. I thought that phase of the pension machinery of Canada had gone by. Nevertheless you find that men are being discharged for that reason and with the assumption on the part of the board's examiners that the disability was pre-enlistment, maybe slightly aggravated by service, maybe not at all, and that the old scheme which was eliminated from the act by the pensions committee of this parliament is still being administered, to judge by the way in which this service personnel is treated.

As pointed out by the previous minister of national defence, in the army at the present time are expert psychiatrists whose duty it is to examine these men and determine the extent of their disability. I assumed, when that is done, provision would be made for their institutional care. That is not being done.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, it is.

Mr. GILLIS: Well, the minister can show me where I am wrong. I want to give him a few examples.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I must correct my hon. friend on a question of fact.

War Appropriation—The Army

Mr. GILLIS: I will give the minister a few examples before I am through. With these psychiatrists, paid by Canadian taxpayers, occupying positions in the Canadian medical set-up in the examination and treatment of service personnel, when cases arise of soldiers coming out of the service after going through the war, many of them discharged for battle exhaustion and similar troubles, these are the cases upon which these psychiatrists should be operating. When a man whose mental condition is impaired is discharged he should be treated by them, instead of being sent back, after four or five years in the army, to civilian life, weakened mentally, thrown out on the labour market to seek employment for himself. If his condition is impaired when leaving the service he will not be out long before he is ready for some kind of institution.

Just before coming to the house I had a visit from a young man who had been four years overseas and had been home for some seven or eight months. I have his name and regimental number. He had not received any gratuity. He had gone the rounds of selective service offices, but mentally the man was in no condition to take employment. Work had been found for him on two or three occasions, but he could not stay after a day or two. He was sent to the regular insane asylum in Halifax, spent some time there and came out. At the time I met him he had no place to stay, no one to look after him, and no funds. He came twenty miles to see me, and at that time he was in such a mental condition that he should have been in an institution with someone to care for him. Nevertheless he was "on the loose". Before my departure from Sydney I left him with the selective service people, so that they might try to do something about his case. In the meantime I endeavoured to start his gratuity coming forward.

I said a moment ago that I do not believe there is in Canada any adequate institution exclusively provided by the pension department to take in that type of case and see that it gets proper treatment. I know there is none in Nova Scotia.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is incorrect.

Mr. GILLIS: There is none in Nova Scotia. A commission, known as the Dawson reconstruction commission, has been sitting in that province for several months, probing general conditions; and it would be worth the minister's while to read an editorial in the Halifax Herald of April 4 on public institutions and welfare matters generally. I will read one short extract only on the question of the county asylums, which are the only institutions in Nova Scotia to which a case of this type can be sent. It is to such an institution that the man to whom I referred was sent. The report of the Dawson commission cannot be construed as being propaganda for political purposes, since the commission was appointed by the government of Nova Scotia, whose political complexion is the same as that of the federal government. Quoting the report, the Herald editorial states:

"Visits were paid to nine of these local institutions in the course of the survey field-work, and a distressingly wide degree of variation was evident as between the better and poorer county units. Some of the larger ones, more modern in their construction, provided clean, wholesome, comfortable surroundings in which it is possible to give decent and humane custodial care to the inmates; others, particularly the older and smaller units, are dark, dismal, evil-smelling and filthy to the point of almost nauseating the visitor who passes through them. What they must be to the poor wretches who are condemned to live the greater portion of their lives in them cannot even be imagined."

That is the only kind of institution in that province at the present time to care for what are estimated in the latest issue of the Canadian Medical Journal as twenty-five per cent of the disability cases coming out of the service to-day.

I raised this matter last year because of that type of disability in the air force. The former minister of national defence for air emphasized it and said that it was becoming quite a problem across Canada. I stressed at that time the necessity of institutions of this kind. I am not blaming the Minister of Veterans' Affairs, and I want to caution hon. members that we are not setting up a department to which the whole problem belonging to the three defence departments can be conveniently shelved until after the war is over, and everything blamed on the Department of Veterans' Affairs, because they are not going to be able to handle the problem. I think it is the responsibility of the national defence departments, whether of the air, the navy or the army. They have experts in the service, along with their medical boards, whose duty it is, before service personnel are discharged, to examine them, determine their disability, assess it for pension purposes, and examine them as to the need of institutional care; for when a young man is going out of the service with his mental capacity impaired because of war service, the thing not to do is to send him back to civil life to try to take advantage of the complex machinery set up for rehabilitation purposes, but to see to it that he is placed in a proper institution where he can be adequately treated until he is in a condition to go out and take his place in the hurly-burly of eking out an existence in this country.

I have run into several cases of this kind, and as a member from Nova Scotia I assert that there is no institution in that province where such problems can be taken care of. I am not expecting that that type of case will be treated in Camp Hill hospital. It is a medical-surgical set-up. It is staffed for that purpose. Experts in that particular line are not there. The institution is not equipped to care for them and the regular insane asylums are not the place for them. I think it is the responsibility of the medical set-up in national defence to see to it before they are routed out, and if the Minister of Veterans' Affairs is correct and there is an institution in Quebec, Montreal or Vancouver, then if a man is being discharged in Nova Scotia and there is no institution there, or in New Brunswick and there is none there, the thing for national defence to do is to see that that soldier, airman or navy personnel is sent to the part of the country where there is an institution. The wrong thing to do is to leave him to roam the streets in the condition in which I found that young man, endeavouring to work out his own problem.

Mr. RAYMOND: What is the number of the Canadian forces at present engaged in the war against Japan? Second, out of the $2,000,000,000 involved in the present resolution the sum of $699,000,000 is asked for army service, as I gather from the statement made this afternoon. Can we get any details with respect to this amount? How is this sum divided?

Mr. ABBOTT: As to the first question, I can only say that the number of troops engaged in the war against Japan is very small, consisting of a few specialists, and it is not possible for me to give the actual numbers. With regard to the break-down of the expenditures, the total is $699,235,000 made up as follows:

Canadian army overseas.....	$306,543,000
Active army in Canada and adjacent territories .....	324,011,000
Reserve army C.O.T.C.'s and cadet services .....	10,363,000

That makes a total of $640,917,000 being the amount for the army and related services, together with the following items:

Experimental station, Suffield.....	$ 909,000
Internment operations, Canadian cost .....	1,025,000
Inspection board of United Kingdom and Canada.....	3,576,000
Departmental administration .....	706,000
Dependents' allowance board.....	390,000
Dependents' supplementary grants fund .....	1,703,000
Imperial war graves commission..	9,000
Military relief .....	50,000,000

Mr. ROSS (Souris): With respect to the order that the parliamentary assistant indicated under which N.R.M.A. men can convert overseas, I am not sure that I followed him, but I understand that some of these people have the privilege of converting overseas. I refer to those in Britain.

Mr. ABBOTT: They all have the opportunity of converting overseas.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): At any time and anywhere?

Mr. ABBOTT: At any time at all. I dealt with that at some length this afternoon.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): How many N.R.M.A. men have actually gone to a battle theatre on the continent from Britain?

Mr. ABBOTT: I cannot tell my hon. friend that and I am not sure that the information could be very quickly obtained. Certainly it would have to be obtained from C.M.H.Q. in London because we do not have that record here when the men are off strength here and are on strength there. In that event I do not know whether they keep that detail. If my hon. friend wanted it I could have a cable sent over.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I thought I asked for that.

Mr. ABBOTT: That may be included in the questions my hon. friend asked. If it is, the cable has gone over.

Mr. BRUCE: I asked that question on March 19.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, and that is one of the things holding up the answer to my hon. friend's question.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The hon. member for Vancouver South asked a question with regard to estimated monthly requirements for the army. There must be some basis on which you operate. Young men are receiving their draft call to report on the first of May.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will elaborate the answer I gave on that.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Before my hon. friend does, will he be good enough to tell us what requests he makes of the Department of Labour for men as the country is divided into military districts and they send the call for the following months? Can he give us something of the programme month by month? That would fit in with the question asked by the hon. member for Fort William, and information in that regard would give the farmers a lead so that they would know how many more of their boys may expect to be called. The other day I was speaking to certain young chaps who had been called in the last few days and who are now on farms. As they are coming of age their parents are in a quandary, wondering which of these boys who are approaching the age of 18½ are to be drafted. Information in this connection would be of great help to many people.

Mr. ABBOTT: At the present time that is done virtually on a month to month basis. The March quota was 7,500. The department has to notify national selective service a month ahead. I am not sure about the quota for April; I shall have to verify it. It is less than 7,500, but whether 5,000 or 6,000 I am not sure. I have just been informed that it is the same for April, 7,500. It has to be decided each month because, in the condition in which the war is at present, the staff tell me that they do not care to project their requirements more than a month ahead. That is the basis on which we are operating, from month to month.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What is the date for the filing of requests for May? I am trying to get information for these people.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised by the Minister of Labour that the requests for May should be filed to-morrow.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Will my hon. friend be able to tell us what the requests will be.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I can give that information a little later this evening.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I should like to have it because it would be invaluable to people whose sons are coming of age.

There is another question that arises from the remarks of the ex-minister for air. There was quite a discussion as to the number of senior officers who had been retired on retiring allowances. Can the parliamentary assistant put on Hansard a list of senior officers, those over the rank of lieutenant-colonel, retiring since January 1, 1940, to date, and the retiring allowance or pension granted? I have had questions on the order paper seeking information which the servicemen wanted with respect to pensions or retiring allowances that would be allowed the present Minister of National Defence. With respect to his retirement on November 1, 1944, what pension or retiring allowance would he be entitled to and on what basis?

Mr. ABBOTT: The answer is being prepared. As regards the other information asked for, that also is being prepared and will be put on Hansard.

Mr. McIVOR: I quit before I was through, but since we are in committee I can start again. I should like to correct a misconception tion of a hockey magnate who endeavoured to correct the western common sense of the hon. member for Fraser Valley when he tried to tell us that a man is not fit for farm work when he is fit to go up against one of the best hockey teams in the senior league. Those of us who have gone through the mill in athletics know what it costs in thinking and in physical endeavour to be in shape to hold a place on a team. In the face of that to be told that it is easier to play hockey than to supervise a milking machine or two milking machines does not go down with me. When that same team was at the head of the lakes training, I think, in Port Arthur there was a bottleneck in grain handling at that port. Through the endeavours of the Minister of Labour and his representative there, who was a former member of this house, these young men were taken out of the rink and put to work handling grain. To the credit of the manager of that team they were allowed to do that. It was either do that or no more hockey. The boys did well, and after their work in the elevator and when they got a good bath or rub-down they were just as clean as ever. I just wish to correct the misunderstanding that it takes more energy and more perfect manhood to milk a cow than to play any game.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Since I made my remarks last evening regarding the enforcement of the regulations, and in particular in regard to the matter of desertions from those who were ordered overseas from the N.R.M.A. army, the parliamentary assistant to the minister has answered this afternoon certain questions which I asked yesterday. I made the statement that there was not the enforcement of the law that there should have been of the men who have been ordered overseas under the provisions of the order in council that was passed last November, but have deserted. I shall now summarize the answers that were given and bring them together under one head. As I see the situation they reveal that the kind of enforcement which is taking place makes a farce of law and order in this country. It is a matter that deserves the serious attention of every hon. member. Laws unenforced, however good they may be, unless there is a serious attempt to enforce them, it causes a disrespect of the law everywhere and among all citizens.

The parliamentary assistant to the minister gave a list of the numbers who deserted from the various provinces and from the various military districts. I have summed up the records on a percentage basis. This summary is based upon the records set forth in Canada at War, November issue, 1944, No. 12, at page 47. There is set out in detail by military districts the composition of the 42,000 N.R.M.A. men suitable for employment as infantry as at that time. The records show that in Ontario, military districts Nos. 1, 2 and 3, there were 10,250. According to the answer given by the hon. member this afternoon 450 of that number deserted, or 8.6 per cent. That figure is based on the number actually called up, namely, 3,916. By "called up" I mean called up and directed overseas.

Next comes Quebec, military districts Nos. 4 and 5. The numbers that were available and suitable for infantry was 16,300. According to the answer given this afternoon, 4,791 were ordered overseas from those districts and 2,400 deserted, or just over 50 per cent. In the maritimes, districts Nos. 6 and 7, there were 2,600 available for overseas service in the infantry. Of that number 988 were ordered overseas and 100 deserted, or approximately 10 per cent. On the prairies, from military districts Nos. 10, 12 and 13, 10,000 were suitable for infantry service; 4,899 were directed overseas and 1,000 deserted, or 21 per cent. On the Pacific there were 2,850 available; 1,342 were ordered overseas and 150 deserted, or 11 per cent.

That is a serious situation. It is a record of desertions that merits the serious attention of all who believe in a proper and fair enforcement of the law. What is being done in the matter of enforcement? I cast no aspersions on the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who operate as well as they can, having regard to the number of men they have in some of the provinces; but I ask you, Mr. Chairman, is there any serious endeavour to locate the over 4,000 deserters who are still at large in this country?

Mr. ABBOTT: Of course there is.

Mr. MITCHELL: Of course there is.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Then I point out that on February 2 the defence department announced with considerable pride that the number of deserters had then been reduced from 6,300 to 4,631; therefore on February 2 last there were 4,631 of these men who had not been located.

Mr. TRIPP: How do those figures compare with the last war?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am glad the hon. member has asked that because I have the records here and I shall deal with them. I did not intend to, but I will actually put on the record now the numbers who were sent overseas and generally the record in that regard.

Mr. TRIPP: The number called up.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I will come back to that in a moment. I have not the number of call-ups, but I often hear it said that so far as the adoption of the draft in the last war was concerned it sent few men overseas. I have the records here, month by month.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think Canada's record in respect of absenteeism compares favourably with that of any other of the warring nations.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am only taking what General McNaughton said. I have shown this record with respect to the draft, a record ranging from 50 per cent down to 8.6 per cent of desertions.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am getting tired of this blazoning of Canada as a nation of deserters.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This is not blazoning Canada at all; this is pointing out the facts. I am trying to present my argument fairly, and I am pointing out the fact that there is no serious endeavour on the part of the government to enforce the law.

Mr. ABBOTT: I deny that, and I deny it most emphatically. I can make an assertion just as well as my hon. friend can.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Certainly the only difference is that I supply the evidence.

Mr. ABBOTT: What the hon. member thinks is evidence.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am supplying the evidence.

Mr. GRANT: Tell us about the guns.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: And it is from the records of the department.

Mr. GRANT: Tell us about the rifles they threw overboard.

An hon. MEMBER: Are you still in the sea about that?

Mr. MITCHELL: Tell us about private Smith who tossed his rifle overboard.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Unfortunately I cannot hear those undertoned interruptions of the Minister of Labour.

Mr. MITCHELL: What I said was this: Tell us about Private Smith, who tossed his rifle overboard—the only plank in John Bracken's platform.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: You tell us about that. I am telling about records of the government. I am not dealing with matters such as those to which the hon. member has referred. But if we can have order restored I shall proceed.

War Appropriation—The Army

The parliamentary assistant has said that this is a good record. General McNaughton has said—

Mr. ABBOTT: I wish my hon. friend would not misquote me. I used no such words.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: General McNaughton said quite the reverse. As a matter of fact a newspaper article, referring to what he said in connection with desertion, states this, in the issue of January 24:

It was all right, he said, for 6,300 of those designated for overseas service to desert.

Mr. GRANT: What did Bracken say?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It continues:

"It served to screen out the good from the bad."

Mr. GRANT: What did Bracken say?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: And then General McNaughton said:

"I had a feeling that a proportion of them were all right, but a good high proportion were neither good to God nor man."

That is what the minister said. That is quite different from what the parliamentary assistant has said.

On February 2, there were 4,631 deserters. The number at the end of March, sixty days later, was 4,082. In other words, in a matter of sixty days, with all kinds of offers that had been made, and with all the endeavours the government has put forth, the number who have been found comes to around nine a day. That is not good enough enforcement. That is not serious enough enforcement.

I know the parliamentary assistant is as anxious as anyone to have the law properly enforced, and I should like to ask him this question: Why is not the widest publicity given respecting the names of these men? Are those who commit this very serious wrong in a time of war to be punished, regardless of when they are actually located?

Originally, on January 26, a public announcement was made by the department setting out the dire penalties wrongdoers would receive—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That they were liable to receive.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: —and setting out the nature of the offences against military law. Then, a little later, there were other advertisements. When these men are located, what punishments are being meted out to them?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Nothing; all is forgiven.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The total number of punishments by way of court martial is around seventy. I ask the parliamentary assistant to advise us what punishments were imposed by way of summary trial, particularly those imposed here in Canada by commanding officers. He says he has not the information from overseas. Certain questions were asked over two weeks ago by the hon. member for Parkdale, and they have not yet been answered. We are told that the information cannot be procured from overseas. But the information in Canada is available. Let us know, in the committee, just what penalties are being imposed here in Canada.

That covers, generally, the matter of enforcement, one which is now serious, and one which requires not derision but action on the part of the government, not ridicule but the whole force of public opinion designed to ensure that the law shall be enforced.

Then, did the resignation of Major-General Pearkes have anything to do with the question of enforcement of the law? What were the circumstances connected with his resignation? That information has not yet been made public. It was alleged by one member of the government that General Pearkes was deliberately holding up the war effort of this country. That statement has not yet been denied by any other member of the government. There is one man who can deny it, and that is the representative of General McNaughton in this chamber. General Pearkes has the right to receive from General McNaughton, through his representative in the house, a repudiation of any suggestion such as was made against him recently.

Mr. POULIOT: A general has not the right to be insubordinate.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is to be done about the question of enforcement? What is the number of enforcement officers now operating to enforce the law in each of the military districts?

When the parliamentary assistant has covered these matters I shall deal with certain others. If the hon. member for Assiniboia wishes to have the record with regard to the last war I shall be glad to put it on Hansard. From January 1, 1918 to December of that year 71,550 were sent overseas. The number of draftees who were enrolled during the entire period was 83,355. According to the director of the historical section of the Department of National Defence the number who went overseas was approximately fifty per cent of the number actually enrolled, namely, some 42,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How many of the zombies got to the front? Not one of them has got to the front who has not volunteered.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): How do you know?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have been after that information for three weeks and they will not tell me. Therefore I have a right to make a deduction.

Mr. ABBOTT: The hon. member for Lake Centre has asked two or three things, one being the question of making public the names of those who are absent without leave. I have taken a note of his remarks and the department will consider the advisability of doing that. I am not prepared to say anything more at the moment.

Then there is the question of General Pearkes' resignation. That took place before I became associated with the department but my understanding is that it was at his own request. If I may interject here I should like to say that the resignation of officers of high rank is quite a different thing from what applied to rear-rank gunners in the last war. The higher rank officers are permitted to resign but we were not.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That does not answer the question.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know that there is anything I can add to the statement which has been made public that General Pearkes retired at his own request.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He denied that.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have not seen that he has denied it; I have not seen any denial by General Pearkes. Can my hon. friend show me any such denial?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I understood he gave an interview that he retired at the direction of the department.

Mr. ABBOTT: He did not give an interview to me and I have never heard General Pearkes say that.

Then on this question of deserting I repeat what I said a moment ago. My hon. friend is perfectly within his rights, as is any other hon. member, to discuss this matter at any time, but I should like to point out one thing. When the estimates of this department were before the committee last February it was stated that at that time there were 11,000 men who were unaccounted for, and it did not even cause a ripple. Nobody asked any particular questions about enforcement and so on. Everybody knows that out of six or seven hundred thousand men many will go absent without leave and since this is a large country they may not be found.

Yesterday I gave the total number of 18,000 as the cumulative total of men who were still absent without leave. I may say that that figure compares favourably with the figures of the armed forces of any other country. Personally I am getting a little sick of this constant harping on this matter in our own country. A friend of mine who was in the United States tells me that Canada is being talked about all over the United States as having an army of deserters. It seems to me that we have had pretty nearly enough of that, and I am expressing only my own personal feelings.

Mr. ESLING: Mr. Chairman, with a view to avoiding controversy in the future I would request the parliamentary assistant to secure from the government and give to this committee a statement of policy as to the status of some 300 Canadian nurses who enlisted for service in South Africa. This government issued a call for volunteers and they advanced to those volunteering sufficient funds to cover the cost of uniforms and to provide transportation. Some 100 or more have resigned and have entered the nursing service in England.

These nurses claim that they did not have a full conception of the terms of their enlistment. They were not fully informed about the South African pay. Another matter that was not made clear to them was that there were to be deductions for maintenance. Several nurses in my district enlisted and they have written to me to say that they do not know where they stand. The pay is £14 less in South Africa than that paid to Canadian nurses, and in addition they have to pay £9 for maintenance which they did not understand they were to provide.

They would like to know whether they are to get any gratuities. I am told that if they accept the South African gratuity they will receive only fifteen shillings as against the gratuity which will be paid to Canadian nurses. I am bringing this before the committee because I have had it before the department for some two weeks but have not been able to find an official who will make a statement on the matter. At the present time it is in the hands of the judge advocate general.

A decided policy should be reached on this matter in order to avoid future contention. These girls wish to know what is in store for them in the future. One nurse states that she wants to take a health course at the university of Toronto and she would like to know if she will be entitled to it. Apparently there is no provision for benefits of any kind. They enlisted voluntarily but they claim that they were in the dark as to the payment they were to receive, as to maintenance deductions and as to gratuities when the war is over.

Many of them have signed up for the duration while others have come home. Then there are others in the central Mediterranean area. While they enlisted for service in South Africa, to-day they are nursing Canadian and other allied soldiers in Italy and other parts of the Mediterranean area. I feel justified in asking the parliamentary assistant to see that a definite statement of policy is made on the status of these nurses.

Mr. ABBOTT: I thank my hon. friend for bringing this matter to my attention. It is not a matter with which I am personally familiar, but I shall look into it and see if it is possible to make an announcement along the lines that he has suggested.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: If I may just reply to the remarks—

The CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. member for Vancouver East has the right to speak according to the list of speakers I have.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Then I rise to a question of privilege.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not see any question of privilege.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Certainly the hon. member has a right to rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. MacINNIS: What is the point here?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Are you running the house?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I rise to a question of privilege.

The CHAIRMAN: Before the hon. member states his question of privilege may I say to the hon. member for York-Sunbury that the Chair has tried to be fair to every member of the committee. At the present time there is quite a long list of members who wish to speak and I want to be fair to those members. After all, each member has the right to speak but that cannot be done all at once, but by alternating one after the other.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member for Lake Centre rose to reply to the parliamentary assistant and he was stopped by the Chair. He then said, "I rise to a question of privilege," and the Chair said "There is no privilege," which is altogether wrong.

The CHAIRMAN: The Chair did not say that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The record will bear me out unless it is changed between now and to-morrow, and that has happened lots of times.

The CHAIRMAN: I deny having used those words.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I heard them.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I rise, Mr. Chairman, to a question of privilege. My hon. friend sought refuge from answering the arguments I endeavoured to place before him by trying to leave the impression that it is I who raised the question of desertions. Let me point out this fact to him, that the man who first raised the question of desertions in this country was General McNaughton on January 26, when he pointed out how serious things were in view of the fact that 6,300 recruits had not turned up.

Mr. ABBOTT: I pointed out that the question of desertions was raised in this house last February.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If the hon. member for York-Sunbury will look up Hansard of February 28 he will find that a list of desertions both from general service and from N.R.M.A. was tabled that day by the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No one had raised the question of desertion in this house until the parliamentary assistant last evening as reported at page 578 of Hansard, took a page and a half to explain what to the people of Canada is unexplainable. He endeavoured to show what the situation was and gave statistics showing the number of desertions, and now when he is asked "What are you going to do about it except talk?" he seeks refuge in abuse.

Mr. ABBOTT: I gave that information yesterday because the question has been made a political issue in this country by my hon. friend and his supporters.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Tory machinations—that's all it is.

Mr. MacINNIS: If I can have quietness for a little while we might get on to something that matters. Something that matters to me is the question that was raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton South a little earlier, and I had hoped that the parliamentary assistant would have made some sort of reply. I am convinced that the argument and the plea made by the member for Cape Breton South are worthy of a reply. I do not think we shall be able to settle all the problems that confront this country within the next five or six days that this house may be in session, but there are several very important matters on which we should be assured that proper steps are being taken to deal with them before this session ends, because it will be some time before parliament meets again. If the people of the country know that these important matters are being looked after, the smaller matters will take care of themselves.

I think it is of the utmost importance that the five or six hundred men—it may be more or fewer—who have served in this war and who are suffering mentally or emotionally because of their service should be looked after properly. That is far more important than that we should raise a hullabaloo about those who have not served at all. I am not defending deserters. I think they should be apprehended, if possible, and made to perform their duty to the country. But the point that was raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton South was with respect to men who have performed their duty to their country and who are allowed to roam at large with no one to look after them in their difficulties. That is the point.

Fairly early in the war I brought such a case to the attention of the Minister of Pensions and National Health. A young soldier who became mentally deranged—and there was no institution at that time, I do not know what there is to-day—in which this man could be put and cared for except an insane asylum, either on the east or the west coast. After a short period of treatment this soldier's mental health was restored and he has remained so.

We should be assured, before this session ends that proper provision will be made so that ex-servicemen who are mentally or emotionally upset because of their war services will be properly cared for. If a person is ill or injured his condition is apparent on even a superficial examination, but that is not the case with a man who is mentally unbalanced or emotionally unstable. He may seem all right to-day but under a trying set of circumstances he may collapse altogether. His condition is more difficult of detection than injury or illness, and because of that he may not be as sympathetically dealt with as a person who is ill or injured. I know the parliamentary assistant is personally sympathetic to these cases. I know also from actual experience of the sympathy of the Minister of Veterans' Affairs with cases of this kind. Indeed, I believe the general impression in the cabinet is that he is too sympathetic; they do not want him to be as sympathetic as he is. But the point I wish to make is that we should be assured that proper provision will be made to take care of these cases because very shortly—I hope before we meet again—our men will be coming back from overseas in great numbers. Not only will there then be more cases of this kind, but conditions in the country itself—the difficulty of finding employment and of making their way in a competitive world—will be much harder than they are now. I trust that some reply will be made to the hon. member for Cape Breton South for his able presentation of the case.

Mr. ABBOTT: First I should apologize to my good friend the hon. member for Cape Breton South for not replying to his remarks. I listened to them with a great deal of attention and a great deal of sympathy, as I did also to the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver East, but I do not really think they would expect me to make a statement of government policy to-night. I do say now that I listened very carefully to what was said on the subject; I shall bring the remarks of the hon. member for Cape Breton South and the hon. member for Vancouver East to the attention of the minister and members of the government, and I express the personal hope that they will receive favourable consideration.

While I am on my feet I should like to answer the question asked by the hon. member for Souris as to the proposed call-up for the month of May. I am authorized by the Minister of Labour to say that the requisition for that month is 5,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Are there not institutions where servicemen who are mentally or emotionally upset can go for treatment? I was astounded to hear the statement made that there was none. I understood that there were four or five of them.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I did not reply to the hon. member for Cape Breton South at the time because I intended to defer a considered reply until my own estimates, if they are ever reached, were before the committee. I must, however, take immediate issue with him on the general statement he made. Hon. members of this committee know very well from their experience that, no matter how good your legislation may be, dealing with any type of soldier or sailor or airman who has served his country, there will be a case or two in a community which does cause just criticism. But I tell the hon. member that the question of the treatment of nervous cases has received in the last two or three years the most careful attention, not only by the Department of Veterans' Affairs which succeeded the former department of pensions and national health, but in practically full cooperation with the three defence services and their medical staffs.

May I sketch very briefly this evening—I shall elaborate upon this later on—the measures which have been taken? In the first place, the Department of Veterans' Affairs has commenced something which has never been done in this country before, in relation to the type of case mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver East as a slight emotional disturbance. We have begun already the provision of health and occupational centres for the treatment of the type of nervous case in which the man has lost his confidence or, may I say, desire for employment—one of the most difficult types of nervous disorder. We intend to have one of these centres in every province.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was promised a year ago. You have not done anything.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Oh, yes, we have. Three of these are actively under construction, and as I have said, it is intended to have them in every province. The basic idea is that there shall be about twenty small, unpretentious buildings, with farm land attached, that there shall not be overmuch discipline, but opportunity given to these lads to do voluntary work with a view of restoring their confidence and their desire to work in an ordinary way. This is largely based upon the successful experiment which has been carried out by the workmen's compensation board of Ontario. That is the first and the easiest stage. The average period of treatment for these cases is only about six weeks.

Then we have in some places special treatment centres organized upon the recommendation of the war-time committee on hospitalization, which represents not only the department over which I preside but the directors general of medical services of the three defence services, and meets, I think, two or three times a week and is giving constant attention to this question as it affects the dominion as a whole.

[Mr. I. A. Mackenzie.]

The question of neurological centres was raised in this house last year. These are for surgery cases, and we are expanding treatment centres for this class of case.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Where are they?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): They are located at the present time in five centres. I believe that one is about to be established in the maritime provinces, and we have them at various hospitals in the west. This is an activity which must be extended all across the dominion.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South stated that there is no centre in Canada for the treatment of what I think he termed neuro-psychiatric cases. I wish to tell him that two years ago we sent our medical experts to Great Britain, where they have, at Mill Hill, the most famous institution of its kind in the world for the treatment of the very cases he described. We have established a place at Scarborough Hill, fifteen miles from Toronto, where I spent three hours last Saturday speaking to the men who were there undergoing treatment. According to the medical experts the work being carried out there by Canadian specialists in neuro-psychiatry ranks with anything that is being done in any part of the world. The results have been marvellous. The number of these men who have been restored to the capacity and desire for employment is most encouraging. No doubt some few years hence, or sooner, we shall have to extend these facilities to other centres of Canada.

The last and most unfortunate of all these varieties of nervous case is the mental type. As hon. members are aware we have and have had for years our own institutions, dominion-owned, where the most expert treatment is given to such cases. Very often we need to cooperate with provincial institutions, and I must say that all provincial governments have cooperated with this department in the most exemplary way for the better care of these cases. I believe the institutions in the provinces, practically without exception, are doing splendid work.

I have touched as a layman—I hope, without saying anything which is medically wrong—upon the four great types of nervous disease with which the Canadian people must be concerned for many years to come. It so happens that unfortunately there is a good deal of truth in the first part of my hon. friend's statement, that a greater number of the returned men who are coming back for treatment are suffering from nervous complaints than from surgical complaints. They are, as he said, most difficult types to restore to normal activity and a normal view of life. That is a problem that parliament will have to deal with when many of us are not here. It will remain with us for twenty-five or thirty years. I am sure that, whatever the personnel of the next parliament, whatever the political complexion of the next government, they must keep on with this work, they must expand it, so that every man who has been wounded in his mind shall, if possible, get as much care, comprehension, consideration, sympathy and help as the man who has been wounded in his body. The wounds of the latter are visible to the eye; they can draw ready attention; those of the former are unseen, but they are wounds of a kind which I am certain will always have the kindly attention and the full sympathy of this parliament of Canada.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Témiscouata.

Mr. POULIOT: I will give a chance to the hon. member for Cape Breton South.

Mr. GILLIS: I want to thank the hon. member for Témiscouata for his courtesy. I merely wish to say that I am more pleased now than ever that I raised this matter. The department is intending to do something; the centres the minister speaks of are under construction; other facilities are being organized. What I am concerned about is that the end of the war in Europe is approaching; we may be faced with demobilization in a few months, and there are numerous cases at present in the part of the country I come from that are not in a position to get any institutional treatment. If, as the minister has pointed out, there are institutions in the centre of Canada where this type of treatment is available, I say that national defence, in discharging this type of personnel from the service, are falling down on their job by not routing this type of case to the centre which the minister says is available and is doing laudable work in Ontario. I did not know anything about it; I am very glad to hear of it, and I would urge that national defence boards, when dealing with personnel that are leaving the service, instead of sending this type into the street should be routing them to the centre which is established. I am very glad to hear the minister make the statement.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): With respect to what the former minister said this afternoon, does not the parliamentary assistant think that, as regards the men taken into the army, their medical is lowered in connection with "S"? They used to be taken in "S-2" and now that is "S-5".

Mr. ABBOTT: I answered that earlier this evening.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That would affect them to this extent that it would mean that the men discharged from the army would in many cases be mentally unfit.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not want my hon. friend to suggest, and I do not think he intends the impression to go abroad, that the standards of the army have been lowered and that, therefore, there are likely to be more mentally unfit discharged. The standards have not been lowered. I made that clear at the opening at eight o'clock this evening.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): But it has been lowered to "S-5".

Mr. ABBOTT: There has been no appreciable change in the medical ratings since the hon. member for Prince was minister of national defence. There has been some rearrangement of the pulhems system which I must confess I do not understand. I am advised by the officers of the department that there has been no real change in the medical standards.

Mr. LOCKHART: In the transfer of men to Scarborough Hill, from the point of view of dependents' allowance, is there a break whereby they are changed over in their status? I had a case brought to my attention this week where two months elapsed before the wife and children got the allowance. I was calling the matter to the attention of both ministers so that there would be no recurrence of this. It was a serious case but it has been straightened out.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will take a note of my hon. friend's remarks.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It would depend largely on whether the cases have been discharged. If so they are in our care and entitled to corresponding benefits and allowances under the Department of Veterans' Affairs.

Mr. POULIOT: I have profound admiration for the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence. His job is a most ungrateful one, and I cannot conceive how experienced members of parliament can assume responsibilities which are not their own, to defend the management of a department over which they have no control whatever. Although the parliamentary assistants who are at present incumbent as such have done exceptionally well, I still find that their situation is absurd, especially when there are ministers who hold several portfolios. The parliamentary assistants should be promoted and should have the responsibilities of the departments which they are called upon to defend in the house. My hon. friend the member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. Abbott) has done very well. He has answered questions very well but there are two points which have stuck me. With regard to the question that has been asked by the member for Peterborough West regarding medical category, everyone has read the official Gazette. The changes that have been made to the classifications in connection with pulhems are known to everyone.

Now to be unfit a man has to be nearly dead; he must be just as dead as this parliament. A man must be at least moribund. It is an ungrateful task, sir, to fight for the underdog. There are underdogs in the army; there are underdogs in civilian life. Those people are humble. Sometimes they are not afraid to speak, they are too shy. They need someone who loves them as fellow citizens to take up their defence and there is no better place to take up their defence than in this very House of Commons.

Well, now, the ratings with regard to grading under the pulhems system have been changed. They have been changed all through. They have been amended many times since they were first passed, so much so that a man who would have been rejected by the army as unfit two years ago when the pulhems tests were instituted is now kept in the army to do fatigue work, to wash the floors, to shovel the ashes, fire up the furnace and do things like that. It is absurd. When these men have a particular trade which is essential to the war effort they are kept there. They are specially trained in their occupation, a training that is most useful to the war effort and yet they are kept in the camp to do some common work that could be done by a man who is lame, who has one eye, who may have goitre and who may be unfit. Very often these men would do a much better job in civil life but they are kept in the army. It is impossible to get them out. Why? Because each sick man is one more soldier. It is not the ability of the man; it is not his fitness that counts; it is a question of numbers, one more man. Here we are. Let us keep him. It is impossible to let him go. And sometimes men have been kept in hospital under observation for more than a year. They were of no use to the army, they were of no use to the country; they were paid and they were there under observation. I wonder if it takes a year of observation by the doctors of the army to decide if a man is fit or unfit.

But there was something worse. I have heard my hon. friend speaking of deserters. I know why some boys are deserters. They are not all deserters. Not long ago I wrote to the Department of National Defence and mentioned the case of a man who was reported to me as a deserter. Afterwards they realized that it was a mistake of those keeping the files in the unit. That man was not a deserter at all, but because of the stupidity of the officers in charge of his unit he had the stigma of a deserter attached to him. He was no more a deserter than General Crerar, but he was so called.

Do you think, Sir, it is very interesting for a farmer who has never been out of his village to be called to the army or called back to the army when he knows that a cousin of his has been sentenced to two years in the clink because he had been out of his unit for three months? The matter was mentioned to the parliamentary assistant to the minister. It was not interesting for him or when any farmer knows that a man who is an agronomist and who is unfit was considered as fit by the medical asses of the army and was told to report. He did not. He was caught by the police and sent to the clink for nine months, and after his sentence was through was brought back for another medical examination and was found unfit. If the doctors had been competent that man would have been considered unfit for the army in the first place. He would not have been called a deserter and he would not have been a deserter.

Another thing, sir. Those men who are in charge of units are not all of the same type, but they are independent of each other and are free to interpret the regulations as they see fit. One says black; another says white. The third one says black, and another may say black or white. The rulings of the commanding officers are just as varied as the colours of the rainbow. But there is something worse. There was the classical case of a man who was suffering from a heart condition. It was indicated by the heart specialists on the pulhems sheet. It was erased by the chairman of the board. The man was sent to his unit afterwards. He reported to his sergeant that he was sick. The sergeant laughed and jeered at him, told him that he was a faker because his sheet was white. There was no indication of his heart disease on his sheet. He was sent to bed. He asked for the priest and the doctor. They were refused and he was found dead in his bed the morning after. That is a fine inducement for a boy to enlist in the army when he knows about it.

I asked for one investigation. The investigation was a tragic farce. It was not under oath. I ask the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount to have an investigation at which I want to be present to ask the chairman what happened there, so that the department gets rid of all these fake mortar-board doctors. That is it, and after all this the boys will know all about it and they will be glad to enlist. They would enlist when they know it is impossible for many French-speaking Canadians to have officers who speak their own language. They need interpreters to communicate with their officers. They are bullied; they are sent far away from home.

We are told we are in a free country. But they are put close to the wall, and those who do not want to volunteer must move one step backward. They cannot: the wall is there. They are humiliated. When victory loan parades are held, they cannot attend. They must endure all sorts of humiliations.

Then, afterwards, we hear hon. members, like the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) complaining about the deserters who come from one part of the country, the province of Quebec. He has always that province of Quebec in view. It will not help him. The hon. member is one of the brightest of our colleagues, but I regret most deeply that he does not make better use of the gifts with which he was endowed by Providence. He could do much useful work to promote the bonne entente, to promote what is called national unity. But instead of that he plays always on the same string of his false violin. It is most saddening. I like the hon. member, personally; but I cannot conceive his jumping up, like a jack-in-the-box, when he has something in mind about the province of Quebec which, in his view, is the black sheep of confederation. That is a fair interpretation of what he says.

The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) leaves the same impression, and the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White) the same thing. They give the impression that all the people of Quebec are untouchable, in the true Hindu sense, that they do not realize their duty, that they do not fulfil it, that the province of Quebec is the backward province, that the French Canadians are a bad lot, that they are ruled by the priests, that they speak a tongue that should not be spoken in this country, and that they are all isolationists.

That is the impression one gathers from the speeches of those hon. members—and it is unfortunate. It is unfortunate because we are bound to live together; we are bound to be in the same boat. And I cannot see how we of Quebec are to be thrown overboard, as some kind of Jonah.

When I see hon. members of the Progressive Conservative party, fine fellows, including those I have mentioned, I cannot understand why some of them do not protest against what is said by members of their party, and tell them that they are wrong. I invite them all to visit the province of Quebec and to come to my county. I invite them to meet the soldiers who have returned from the front, some badly wounded, some walking on crutches, some with glass eyes, and some with other disabilities. I want them to meet the relatives and dependents of the soldiers from Temiscouata who have died overseas, and others who have been decorated. I want them to meet the relatives of soldiers who have been decorated for gallantry in the front line—not only soldiers, but aviators and airmen. I want them to know about the soldiers and airmen who seldom get the promotions to which they are entitled, and which they deserve, but which are given to others. And why does that happen? Because in many cases they do not have French-speaking officers who put their names on the honour list.

And that is not all. With reference again to deserters; it was not the hon. member for Lake Centre who asked the Minister of National Defence, Mr. McNaughton, to see to it that the case of the soldier who dealt with the bomb which would have destroyed St. Paul's cathedral in London was considered. It was not the hon. member for Parkdale or the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough who mentioned to the Minister of National Defence that Sergeant Philip Konowal, V.C., of the Canadian Army, had not received the treatment he deserved, or who pointed out the shame of his having to clean spittoons and closets in the basement of the House of Commons—a man who was awarded the Victoria Cross by King George V, himself. We should be ashamed of that! I introduced the matter to the Minister of National Defence, who told me he would do something for him as soon as the reinforcement matter was attended to. But he did not realize that the best way to attend to the reinforcement matter is to make all grievances disappear, to hand out justice and fair play to the men who have come back from the army, to respect them and to give them jobs according to their valour.

What is inscribed as a motto on the Victoria Cross? It is "For valour". And the same thing applies to Major Triquet, who was a sergeant at Valcartier, a career soldier. I recommended him to the brass hats of the Department of National Defence, and they answered me that he was not the kind of timber from which officers are made. But everybody was honoured to shake hands with him. That was the answer I got from those people who have positively no war record, who have never been in any theatre of war, but who have won two wars in the capital city of Ottawa—wars and promotions.

There might be a certain amount of snobbery in that. There is a man who is a fool, and who is a brigadier over there in the judge advocate general's branch. He is a Tory, and he is boosted by the Tories; it is impossible to say anything about him. But he is a fool, nevertheless.

There are other fellows who suffer humiliation, and who are not treated as they deserve. They get nothing. I fight for them, and I shall continue to fight for them. I shall continue until this parliament dies, and after it is dead—if it is not renewed—

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Carried.

Mr. POULIOT: —I shall go to Yorkton, and continue there. I will tell the people of Canada why we have to fight for the underdogs so that they may be rehabilitated, and so that they may be treated in the manner they deserve, and as heroes should be treated.

I shall have something more to say, but I want to give everyone a chance.

Mr. GRAHAM: Speaking last night briefly to the committee, I introduced a subject which I feel is of importance such as to warrant my pursuing it a little further this evening. The matter I was referring to was the plans that must be made fairly soon to bring back the men and women who are serving in Europe. I said last night, and I emphasize it again, that it is a quite apparent fact that the one abiding desire of the men serving in Europe, once the war is over or their particular task is terminated, will be to return to Canada, to their homes and to the familiar scenes they have been away from for so long.

I have been delighted to note that in this debate the great majority of the questions directed to the parliamentary assistant has been in connection with the welfare and rehabilitation of these men about whom I am speaking. All these matters are of great importance, and when they come back and are settled in civilian life these matters will be the things they will be most concerned with. But upon the conclusion of the war these men will have an immediate and a natural desire to get home as quickly as possible.

In the conduct of our war effort we have profited greatly by the experiences of the past, and I am hopeful the government will display the same vision in dealing with the task of bringing home these men and women. This is something in the nature of an inter-allied problem. The problem facing the United States will be much larger than our own and perhaps the general problem will have to be approached on the basis of cooperation among the allies.

We have to keep in mind that the war with Japan may continue and that there will be a great demand for world shipping. We know there is a shortage of shipping even now to provide for the movement of men and supplies. Even when these ships are not needed to carry materials of war they will be needed to carry supplies, foods and other necessities to the liberated countries of Europe. So that we may have to search elsewhere for a solution of this problem.

The thought has struck me that if we have not ships and crews to bring back these men we have planes and aircrew quite capable of doing a goodly portion of this particular job. The science of aviation has found it possible in this war to move great numbers of troops by air. Air-borne troops have played an important part and in all likelihood they will be called upon to play an increasingly important part in this war. But on the cessation of organized hostilities we shall probably find we have a great surplus of planes. It is quite true these will not all be suited for the transport of human beings, but at least some of them could be fitted up and made suitable to assist in the task of bringing back our men from Europe.

Let me make another suggestion. Of all countries in the world Germany has perhaps developed the transport plane to the greatest extent and of the largest possible size. Upon the cessation of hostilities there should be great numbers of these transport planes formerly owned by Germany available to the allies. It seems to me that the Canadian government in cooperation with other allied governments should see to it that these planes are made available to Canada, to the United States and perhaps to other allies for the purpose of assisting in relieving the shipping shortage and getting our men back as soon as possible.

The Canadian makes a remarkable soldier. In the face of danger or in the face of the enemy he accepts discipline because his mind tells him that discipline is necessary for the achievement of the task he has to do. But when the task is done, when there is no clear-cut purpose in sight, he shakes off that necessity for discipline; he becomes restless and inclined to resent having to take orders, much more so than the soldier of those countries where the war tradition is stronger. We may have the same problem we had in the last war if we delay too long in bringing home those who are not needed to complete the job in Europe.

I hope that not only the Department of National Defence as represented by the parliamentary assistant, but the Department of National Defence for Air, the Department of National Defence for Naval Services, the Department of Reconstruction and any other department that has to do with this problem will see to it that plans are carefully laid for the bringing back of the greatest number of our men from Europe as speedily as possible after the task there is done.

Mr. ISNOR: I doubt if the remarks of the hon. member for Cape Breton South were worthy of a reply, but I was pleased indeed when the Minister of Veterans' Affairs replied so fully and completely to the hon. member. I do not think the hon. member for Cape Breton South was quite fair to his native province when he intimated in his remarks that there was no institution capable of taking care of mental cases from the armed forces.

Mr. GILLIS: I said, "equipped."

Mr. ISNOR: Or equipped; I will add that. Evidently he is unaware of the hospital facilities that exist to-day in Nova Scotia. His remarks would almost lead one to believe that not only was he referring to hospitals dealing with mental cases, but he was referring also to all medical institutions throughout the province.

Mr. GILLIS: I was quoting the Dawson report. That body was set up by your own government.

Mr. ISNOR: The hon. member has a habit of always interrupting. He read an editorial from the Halifax Herald. I think that was a fine editorial. However, when he read one particular paragraph he did so in such a way as to make the statement apply to all institutions, whereas it applied only to the smaller ones. I would suggest that he read the editorial again. I would refer the hon. member to the report of the Nova Scotia hospital for the year just closed. He will find that there were 101 cases sent to that hospital by the armed services. The hospital is situated on the eastern side of Halifax harbour. It is very well equipped to handle mental cases. It has an ideal situation with beautiful grounds, and the whole surroundings are such as the minister had in mind as to bring a measure of comfort to those who are so unfortunate as to return in a mental condition which does not make for the best type of citizen. We hope that through the medium of these institutions, particularly the Nova Scotia hospital, these men will be able, after treatment, to take their proper place in the life of our community. For the benefit of the committee and in fairness to Nova Scotia I think I should place on the record the number of cases that were treated at the Nova Scotia hospital last year. I find that from the army there were forty-two cases; from the navy twenty-six; from the air force nine; merchant marine twenty-four; ex-servicemen other than those in the forces, eleven; making a total of 101 cases treated during the past year.

I would also remind the hon. member for Cape Breton South that since the outbreak of the war 325 cases have been handled by that institution, so that when he makes a statement that we have no such institution in the province of Nova Scotia, he is hardly being fair to his native province.

Mr. GILLIS: That is an insane asylum. That is exactly what I am objecting to. An ex-serviceman has no business in an insane asylum, and if my hon. friend is satisfied with that, I am not.

Mr. ISNOR: I approach this question in somewhat the same manner, although from a different angle, as the hon. member for Cape Breton South; that is, from the point of view of a layman. There are, of course medical men representing constituencies in Nova Scotia who can speak more expertly than the hon. member for Cape Breton South or myself on this question, but I think it is generally recognized both by laymen and the medical profession that the Nova Scotia hospital is well equipped, not as the hon. member would say to handle insane cases alone, but rather as a mental institution. True, it was years ago referred to as an insane asylum, but to-day that term has gone into disuse and the hospital is now referred to as a mental institution.

Mr. GILLIS: What is the difference?

Mr. ISNOR: There is a big difference.

Mr. GILLIS: What is it?

Mr. ISNOR: My hon. friend might be a mental case but not insane. I do not mean that in a personal way, but, just in answer to my hon. friend's question. It applies equally well to myself or anybody. The Nova Scotia hospital has an exceptionally fine staff, consisting of a medical superintendent, an assistant medical superintendent, an assistant physician, a business manager, a dental surgeon, a consulting specialist, eye, ear, nose and throat, a superintendent of nurses, and a splendid staff of nurses, male and female, and day and night attendants.

This institution handled 841 cases last year, with an average daily number of patients of 403. I think the information I have given would lead any fair-minded person to say that we have in Nova Scotia at least one fine mental institution in Halifax hospital, apart from many others which are also giving splendid service. The Nova Scotia hospital treats patients throughout the province but is located in Halifax county. I felt in fairness that I should reply to the hon. member for Cape Breton South so that the record would be clear with respect to the situation in our province.

Mr. BRUCE: Mr. Chairman, as one of the medical men in the house, having listened to so much wisdom on medical matters from laymen, I think it is time that one of us spoke. I have noticed four or five other medical men present who have not yet participated in this discussion. For a time, as I listened to it, I thought I was attending a meeting of the Canadian Medical Association.

I find myself in agreement with what has been said by the Minister of Veterans' Affairs in regard to the attention which the subject raised this evening has been receiving from medical men in connection with the medical service, and I am sure that it will receive the same keen attention from the members of my profession in the Department of Veterans Affairs. I might point out that the former director of medical services, General Chisholm, is an eminent psychologist, thoroughly familiar with all the cases that have been referred to here this evening. If there is any man in Canada competent to handle that work now and after the war it is General Chisholm. So that I do not think we need have any fear as to the medical treatment of these patients, who, I quite agree with the member for Cape Breton South, are distressing cases and deserving of every consideration. I am confident that they will receive appropriate treatment and that arrangements will be made to take the very best care of them.

I hesitate to add any more encomiums to those already expressed on the splendid way in which the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence presented his report yesterday. I was particularly impressed by the knowledge he seemed to have acquired in such a short space of time and by the clarity with which he presented it to the house.

May I say, to begin with, that I agree with all the praise he gave to the great service that is being rendered by our armed forces. We are all very proud of what they have done, and when he read the citation of that gallant soldier, "Smoky" Smith, I am sure that all our hearts were touched. It was a marvellous record of initiative, courage, endurance and cleverness to have accomplished what he did, and we share with all Canadians in pride at his great achievement.

I should like also while I am on this subject, because of a remark made by the hon. member for Temiscouata, to say that we were equally thrilled by the citation of Major Triquet, to whom he referred, another man who received the V.C., from the province of Quebec. I must say to my hon. friend that he is quite wrong if he thinks I have any particular grievance against the inhabitants of Quebec. I have many friends amongst the French Canadians living in that province, and I admire them as citizens. Any criticism that I have ever made has not been of the French Canadians as such. It has been because leaders have educated them to believe that they would not have to serve in this or any other war under compulsion. In that respect they did a great disservice to this country. There is no doubt that national unity would have been promoted if during all these years they had been told that the privileges which they enjoy as citizens of this country, of freedom and sharing our natural resources, carried with it the responsibility of defending this country against aggression such as we have faced during the past five or six years.

Speaking of V.C.'s, I should like to present to the parliamentary assistant a petition. It is a very short one, and was sent to me to-day by one of the V.C.'s of the last war, an imperial veteran; I refer to Harry H. Robson, who is sergeant-at-arms in the legislature at Toronto. He submits the petition on behalf of himself and other imperial army V.C.'s, of whom there are four. H. H. Robson served in the second battalion of the Royal Scots Regiment; L. C. J. Toombs served with the Liverpool Regiment, Sergeant Best with the first battalion of the Derbyshire Regiment. All these are non-commissioned officers. He gives also the name of Captain H. Geary, V.C., East Surrey Regiment. All these men have resided in Canada for over twenty years; they have brought up their families here; they are paying taxes here, and he submits that Canada should take over the obligation of the very small yearly indemnity which is paid them. I am not sure of the amount, but it is small.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Ten pounds.

Mr. BRUCE: It would relieve the British government of the payment and the recipient would get it in Canadian money without the deduction because of the low exchange rates which obtain at the moment. I present that to the parliamentary assistant for his favourable consideration.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall be very glad to see that it is considered.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I inform my hon. friend that until last year all the amounts paid to holders of the Victoria Cross were from imperial sources. Last year this house altered that as far as Canadians were concerned; the amounts were increased and they are being paid now by the treasury of Canada.

Mr. BRUCE: Do you mean to Canadians?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Canadians, yes.

Mr. BRUCE: Those who are Canadian citizens now? Then it should apply to these men?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Not yet, but there was an alteration made last year by this parliament.

Mr. BRUCE: I am anxious that it should apply to these men in the future.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I see the point.

Mr. BRUCE: It seems to me a reasonable request.

Another item is that there are many units to which the prefix of "royal" has been given; for instance, the Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps. But there is one unit, the Canadian Armoured Corps, which does not bear this distinction. I suggest to the minister that he might take the necessary steps to have this corps designated as the "Royal" Canadian Armoured Corps.

I wish to ask the parliamentary assistant with regard to a question to which I referred earlier to-day, which was asked on March 19 and which he said he could not answer in toto without getting reports from overseas. I quite understand and appreciate that. But there are two or three questions here which he did not answer in his report yesterday or to-day and to which I think I should have replies either now or on the next occasion. I do not think question No. 4 was answered, which is, how many of those A.W.O.L. are classed as deserters?

Mr. ABBOTT: I can give my hon. friend that information now. I have some of it here. There are 3,323 N.R.M.A. soldiers belonging to units which have proceeded overseas who have been struck off the strength as deserters pursuant to findings of courts of inquiry, and who have not surrendered or been apprehended. That covers the answer to question No. 4.

Mr. BRUCE: Then No. 5, I think I can work out the answer from what the parliamentary assistant said to-day.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think I have given most of that information.

Mr. BRUCE: Yes, I think you have. No. 6?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have given that information, namely that seventy have been tried by courts-martial.

Mr. BRUCE: And you have given the answer to No. 7. There remains the question of how many of these draftees got away with their rifles and their ammunition.

Mr. ABBOTT: I can answer that, as it happens: about one hundred and forty men who have been reported absent without leave were in possession of rifles. None had ammunition.

Mr. BRUCE: And the next question follows naturally: have such rifles been recovered?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am able to answer that: 126 rifles have not been recovered. I am sorry to say that the other questions require information from the other side which we have not yet received.

Mr. BRUCE: I shall hope to receive the answer during the next week.

In the statement of the parliamentary assistant he made a comparison with what happened in the last war. May I remind him that we then had between four hundred thousand and five hundred thousand men overseas, included in five divisions, of which four served in France and the fifth remained in England and was broken up as reinforcements.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Mr. BRUCE: These four divisions were used in France as the Canadian Corps under Sir Arthur Currie. In this war we have five divisions overseas, as I understand, with 285,000 men serving.

War Appropriation—The Army

Mr. ABBOTT: As I explained in my statement, we have five divisions, two of them armoured divisions; we have two armoured brigades, and two heavy artillery groups, I think they are called, and several groups of specialists, engineers, signals and the like.

Mr. BRUCE: What are called ancillary services?

Mr. ABBOTT: There are ancillary services in addition to that, but these are definite establishments.

Mr. BRUCE: The point I was wishing to make is this. In 1911, three years before the last war, the population of Canada was 7,206,643. The population of Canada in 1941 was 11,506,655. This means that the population at the beginning of this war was practically sixty per cent more than at the beginning of the last war, and for that reason Canada should be able to supply a larger number to the armed forces. I have not taken into account here, perhaps the air force and the navy.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I might say to my hon. friend, if he cared to use it in the development of his argument, that broadly speaking our total enlistments and enrolments in the three services are now over a million, about a million and twenty or thirty thousand.

Mr. BRUCE: Over a million?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. BRUCE: Well, I have not added up the number in the air force in the last war, so that the disparity, according to the figures which the hon. gentleman has given me, is not as great as I had thought at first, and I think it is a creditable showing for Canada.

I wish to lend my voice in support of what was said by the hon. member for Vancouver South, in the sentiments he expressed regarding the war in Japan. It was disheartening to me to learn from the Prime Minister that when our men who have served in the European theatre of war return home they will be asked to volunteer to fight in the Pacific. Those men have served anywhere from one year to five years overseas. They have been separated from their families and loved ones for a very long time and all of them have done this on a voluntary basis. When they come back I feel quite sure, if I know those boys, and I do know many of them, they will not be satisfied until they have volunteered to fight in Japan or in the Pacific in order to finish this war. For, after all, the conclusion of hostilities in Europe will not by any means finish the war. One or two members have said today that the war in Japan may end before it does in Europe. I am afraid that is wishful thinking. I have had occasion to talk to a number of men who have seen service in the far east in this war and who have an intimate knowledge of what is going on in the vast expanse of the Pacific, and their opinion is that the war in Japan will not be finished under a year and a half or possibly two years. It means a long and difficult time before that treacherous race is subdued. They can easily get away from their own small island. Some years ago I visited Japan and China and am familiar with that part of the world. The Japanese can move into China, Manchuria, Manchukuo, which they took from China some years ago, where they have munitions factories established at the present time. I feel sure they can carry on the war for a long period.

We are committed to fight in the war against Japan and I should think something more would be expected of us than just a token force. The minister for the navy has said that a considerable naval force will be sent to the Pacific ocean, and I understand that squadrons of the air force will also be sent; but in addition to that, in the final work of winning the war, an army is necessary. I think that has been clearly demonstrated in subduing the forces in Normandy, Holland, Belgium, and now by what is going on in Germany.

It does not seem to me to be fair or just that we should leave the burden upon those young men who have already done such gallant service in Europe. Many of them are young; many of them have not established themselves in any career. When they come home they will have to find some occupation. It is quite easy to talk about full employment after the war, but I have not seen any plans yet that would cause me to believe that is assured. I hope it may be for these returned men, but we have in Canada some 35,000 able-bodied men in the home defence army, and it seems to me that, before we ask those who have stood the strain of war overseas for a period of two or more years to go abroad again to fight, we should send this home defence army to fight in the Pacific.

That would seem to be only a reasonable request, and, therefore I was greatly disappointed when the Prime Minister announced the other day that it was not his intention to do so.

There is another point. Is this home defence army to be demobilized in Canada when the war in Europe is over? If so, will they take all the jobs that are offering? If that is the case, then it will be more difficult for the men who have served overseas to find anything to do when they return to Canada, and in this regard it is unfair and unjust.

I should like to see equality of service and equality of sacrifice, and I believe that we shall never have unity in Canada until that is brought about. I will not prolong this debate further, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I am sorry that the member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) is not in the chamber at the moment.

Mr. ABBOTT: He is getting ready to go and help you in your election.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Anyway, he has been sent an urgent invitation and I hope he accepts it. I have always enjoyed his remarks in the house, but when he casts aspersions upon members in this group, about not fighting for the underdog or not knowing what the soldiers' problems are, the record will speak for itself to all fair-minded people. If you look over the membership of this house you will find among our members those who served in the last war and who know what some of the problems of the soldiers are.

There is one question I wish to take up with the hon. member in charge of the department and this is with regard to demustering. In the past six months there has been a great deal of remustering in Canada and overseas. There is a considerable feeling of resentment. I dealt with this matter in connection with the air force estimates, but in the army itself, when soldiers are remustered, often against their will, from other branches of the services into the infantry, they do not mind making the necessary move. But they do feel badly when, after having spent sometimes several years in training for special work in the air force and having received trades pay and promotion to corporals, sergeants, warrant officers and even commissioned officers, they find on remustering that these ranks are often taken away from them. Is it the policy of the Department of National Defence to bring these men down and have them revert to the ranks, cancel their trades pay and all their promotion when they are remustered to the infantry?

Mr. ABBOTT: Well, I will make inquiries as to the point raised by the hon. member and try to give him an answer on Monday. I cannot do so at the moment. Of course these men are soldiers and they have to do what they are told and go where they are sent.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It seems unfortunate and does not seem right to these men. I believe it affects the esprit de corps.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will not discuss it now because I should like to discuss it with the adjutant general and see what the present policy is.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: While the parliamentary assistant is doing that, will he get the number of men who have been remustered from other units into the infantry in Canada?

Mr. ABBOTT: Since when?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Since last November; the same with the overseas men, both on the European and Italian fronts.

The next matter I wish to deal with is one that was brought to my attention. I have not the figures and facts completely, but it is in regard to the number of officers in the Canadian Army who during 1942, 1943 and 1944 were surplus to Canadian requirements and have been on loan to the British army. How many of these men have been transferred or are on loan to the British army? What period of training have these men had with their new units or their British units prior to going into action, and the number of casualties, both wounded and killed, of those Canadian officers on loan? What I want to get at is whether or not these men were given the proper period of time in training with their British units and whether they became properly acquainted with the personnel of those units so that when they did go into action they understood the men and the men understood them? As the parliamentary assistant knows, that is a very important matter.

Mr. ABBOTT: Would the hon. member care for an answer to that now?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: If you have it, yes.

Mr. ABBOTT: In the fall of 1943 there was an acute shortage of junior officers in the British army, and the Canadian forces, not having been engaged in intense action had a favourable supply of officers. In order to give Canadian officers who desired service in an active theatre of war the opportunity of proceeding overseas at an early date, the possibilities of lending a number of junior officers to the British army was explored. By February, 1944, an agreement had been entered into with the British war office whereby Canada would lend whatever officers could be made available for service with the infantry of the British army. This was later extended to embrace a limited number of ordnance officers. Generally the terms of the agreement were that applications for service with the British army would be voluntary and officers were to be lent until such time as their services were required by the Canadian army. To facilitate their return if the need arose, service with the British army was restricted to the European and Mediterranean theatres of war. Officers on loan were to continue to draw their Canadian rates of pay and allowances, and the Canadian government would be responsible for pay, pension claims, et cetera. The war office agreed to accept Canada's selection of officers and retain them for a minimum period of three months. A special officers' training centre under the command of Brigadier Milton F. Gregg, V.C., was set up at Sussex, New Brunswick, and all officers volunteering for loan proceeded there for training and final selection prior to dispatch overseas. Between April 8 and July 9, 1944, a total of 623 infantry and fifty non-technical ordnance officers disembarked in the United Kingdom. Infantry officers were immediately posted to field units or utilized as first line reinforcements, and individual officers were given the opportunity of serving with British units with a Canadian affiliation or with their friends if they so desired.

This loan of Canadian reinforcement officers to the British army was carried out at a very opportune time, and a large number took part in D-day operations. Their conduct in action has been most exemplary and their service with the British army considered a worthwhile contribution to British Canadian post-war relations. The following is an extract from the report of the Canadian loan liaison officer:

All formation headquarters were high in their praise of Can. loaned officers and D.A.G. rear headquarters, 21 army group said that they were not only pleased but well pleased with the Can. loan material and that they would gladly absorb all the infantry officers that could be made available to them.

I cannot give my hon. friend any information as to the casualties among those officers, but I will make inquiries and see if we have any separate break-down for that.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Does that include the number of officers who were transferred from Canadian units in England to British units on Canadian loan, or were there any?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have not that information, but I will get it and give it to the hon. member on Monday.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Another matter that I should like to refer to is in connection with the number of men who are now serving on the Italian front who have had more than two and a half or three years' service in Italy.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. ABBOTT: The number of men with more than two and a half years' service in the Italian theatre of war?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Who are still there.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will have to get that information and give it to the hon. member.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I have one other question which interlocks with the Department of Veterans' Affairs. It has to do with soldiers' estates after discharge. I understand that on the death of a soldier the estates branch turns over the gratuity which he might have earned to his estate. What would happen in the case of a man who is discharged and is on one hundred per cent pension, but who had not received his gratuity allowance? Suppose the man died; what would happen to his gratuity? Would the Department of National Defence open up the estate of this man or would it be left to the Department of Veterans' Affairs?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The authority for the payment of the cash gratuity has been delegated from veterans' affairs to the various ministers of national defence; that is the cash part of it. The re-establishment credit part of the gratuity still remains directly under the Minister of Veterans' Affairs. In the case of a man who died or was killed a year or two years ago, that will be handled by the appropriate defence service. The application would have to be made by the person to whom his estate went in accordance with the terms of the legislation passed in, I think, 1940.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That application would not necessarily come from those who were receiving his portion of assigned pay?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Under the legislation of last year those who qualify under the regulations of the dependents' allowances, and those who are partly dependents under the category receiving assigned pay were entitled, but that was considered to be too limited. Now the cash gratuity of a deceased soldier, sailor or airman, goes to the person designated as next of kin in his estate.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That applies also in the case where the soldier has been discharged and has been on pension for say a year?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. BENCE: In connection with that point I understood the parliamentary assistant to say this afternoon that in the case of the application of the next of kin or the one who is entitled to the estate under the will, it will have to be made to the Department of Veterans' Affairs.

Mr. ABBOTT: This afternoon I was only referring to the application by the soldier himself generally. But my understanding is that, in virtue of the order in council which was passed the other day, payments are to be handled by the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. BENICE: That is the point I am making.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct. I am so informed, and I think the minister of Veterans' Affairs will confirm it.

Mr. BENICE: But that is contrary to what the Minister of Veterans' Affairs told the hon. member for Yorkton.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No.

Mr. BENICE: He said that it would be handled by the estates department of the particular branch, and that the application would be made to the estates department.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The records of the terms of the estate as designated by the deceased may be in the possession of the defence services. These must be communicated to the Department of Veterans' Affairs before the appropriate payments can be made.

Mr. BENICE: Do I understand in connection with all these estates that the appropriate branch, whether it be army, navy or air force, will advise the Department of Veterans' Affairs as to who is designated in the will to receive that particular estate, and that will be done automatically?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The information, so far as it is indicated in the terms of the will, will be communicated. But there might be cases where the information is not given. My instructions from the officials are to the effect that persons who have been designated in the terms of the estate must make application.

Mr. BENICE: In connection with that point, in view of the fact that each department has its record of deceased service men, the person designated in the will should be advised of the fact of entitlement to war service gratuities. I say that because I believe there are a great many, even under the legislation as it stood before the passing of the order in council, who were not aware of the fact that they were entitled to war service gratuities in respect of a husband or son who had been killed. I am hopeful that each branch of the service will communicate with such persons and advise them that they are in a position to make application, or that the department will turn their cases over to the Department of Veterans' Affairs.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That very point has already arisen in connection with the payment of gratuities, where allowable, under the legislation of last year. In some cases applications were not made. But I know the army paymaster took very strong action. Where he thought there was a good claim he notified the people concerned directly.

Then it was pointed out by the hon. member for Vancouver South that there might be some cases where those entitled to benefits might not wish to apply for or accept them. I was trying to emphasize that you must have a combination of notification to entitlement by the department concerned, and also give an opportunity to those who do not wish to avail themselves of the benefits to refuse such benefits if they so desire.

Mr. BENICE: I am surprised to hear the minister say that, because in a number of cases with which I came in contact no notification had been given, and they had no idea they were entitled.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That was corrected later on.

Mr. BENICE: I understand notice will go out now as a matter of course.

Mr. GRAYDON: Would the parliamentary assistant give the committee some information respecting the policy of the department in connection with the provision of quarters for those in army personnel who are married? Would he indicate where such quarters have been given, and at what cost has the provision of quarters for married personnel in the army been carried out? I am anxious to have that information from the parliamentary assistant.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall be glad to have that information on Monday.

Mr. EDWARDS: I should like to make some extended remarks respecting the health and welfare of our fighting forces, and particularly in regard to the establishment of a pharmaceutical corps. However, I could not complete what I have to say in four minutes, and I would therefore ask that we call it eleven o'clock.

War Appropriation—The Army

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Parkdale wished to ask a question.

Mr. BRUCE: I just wished to correct a statement made by the parliamentary assistant, possibly because of a lack of medical knowledge. He stated yesterday that the casualties have been fewer because of improved treatment, and improvement in medical services. I agree that the treatment has been excellent in this war, and that there has been a great improvement over what we had in the last war, because of new drugs, such as the sulfa drugs, penicillin, and dried blood. Casualty clearing stations have been carried up close to the front line. All this has resulted in earlier and better treatment. They have not diminished the casualties, but many lives have been saved.

Mr. ABBOTT: What I really said was—and I believe Hansard will bear me out—that deaths following wounds are very much fewer than they were in the last war.

Mr. BRUCE: There is no question about that.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, April 9, 1945

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—SALARIES OF SUPERVISING OFFICERS

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. What are the salary schedules paid by the Canadian National Railways to all employees in a supervisory capacity from vice-president down, except such classifications as are covered by wage agreements?

2. What are the salary schedules paid by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to all employees in a supervisory capacity from vice-president down, except such classifications as are covered by wage agreements?

3. How do the above salary schedules compare with those of class one railways in the United States?

Mr. MICHAUD:

It is not considered in the public interest that this question should be answered. The question has to do with the internal management of the Canadian National Railways and is of a type that all governments have consistently declined to answer.

2. No information.

3. No information.

TREASURY BILLS

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

1. What is the total amount of treasury bills held by the Department of Finance from each of the provinces?

2. What demands for payment of these treasury bills have been made to each of the provincial governments since 1930?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Manitoba, $24,774,950.27; Saskatchewan, $96,863,996.40; Alberta, $26,237,500.00; British Columbia, $34,467,140.05; Ontario, nil; Quebec, nil; New Brunswick, nil; Nova Scotia, nil; Prince Edward Island, nil.

2. In the case of the provinces of British Columbia and Alberta, the provincial treasury bills held by the dominion are in the form of one-year bills which have been renewed from time to time as they matured. They bear interest at 3 per cent per annum and full interest has been paid regularly. In 1941 and again in 1943, in view of the greatly improved financial position of these two provinces and the very large sums of money which the dominion was required to raise for war purposes, the Minister of Finance requested that these Provinces should endeavour to repay in cash at least a part of some issues of treasury bills as they matured rather than continue to ask for the renewal of the full amount of the bills falling due. There was, however, no formal demand for payment by the presentation of any of the maturing treasury bills to the bank designated on the treasury bill, as the paying agent of the province. The province of Alberta repaid a small amount in respect of one treasury bill which represented a security taken in respect of an over-payment of subsidy during 1914, 1915 and 1916.

In the case of the province of Manitoba, the provincial treasury bills held by the dominion are payable "on demand" and bear interest at 3 per cent which has been paid regularly. No formal demand has been made for the payment of any of these treasury bills.

In the case of the province of Saskatchewan, the provincial treasury bills held by the dominion are payable "on demand" and, with the exception of one bill for $42,240, bear interest at 3 per cent. However, the province is paying full interest only in respect of $7,008,600.03 of these treasury bills. The only case where formal presentation for payment was made in the case of a Saskatchewan treasury bill was the treasury bill for $16,468,852.49 given by the government of Saskatchewan in respect of its indebtedness arising under the guarantee of 1938 seed grain loans. This bill was not in the form which had been requested by the Minister of Finance in accordance with the dominion statute and the agreement with the province. However, the Minister of Finance upon delivery of the bill presented it for payment in accordance with its terms, and upon non-payment requested that the province pay off this obligation to the dominion gradually over a five-year period. Seed grain advances of the same type had been made in the province of Alberta in 1938 similarly guaranteed by the province of Alberta as primary guarantor and by the dominion as secondary guarantor, and the government of Alberta met its full obligation to the banks when the indebtedness became due.

ST. HONORE, QUE., AIRPORT

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. Has any work been done by the government on airport runways at St. Honore, in the Lake St. John area, Quebec?
2. If so, were any engineers employed?
3. What are the names of such engineers?
4. Where are their offices located?
5. Were they paid any fees for their services? If so, what total amount?
6. Has the work as originally carried out been accepted by the government?
7. If not, have instructions been given by the government to proceed with the rebuilding of such works?
8. Has the government made new disbursements in connection with such works?
9. If so, to whom were such payments made, and to what total amount?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. Yes, under the British commonwealth air training plan.
2. Yes.
3. Department of Transport engineering personnel—District airway engineer, O. L. Colborne—up to June 30, 1943; district airway engineer, J. H. Curzon—from July 1, 1943 to the present; resident engineer—G. L. Taylor; inspector—Carl Warren; inspection firm—F. J. Leduc & Associates.
4. The district airway engineer's office is located at 904 Confederation Bldg., Montreal, P.Q. The firm of F. J. Leduc & Associates is located at 354 St. Catherine East (Corner St. Denis), Montreal, P.Q.
5. Total amount paid out on Department of Transport engineering services, (salaries, expenses, etc.)—$20,156.18. Total amount paid out on fees to F. J. Leduc & Associates—$11,968.36.

6. Yes.

7. See answer to No. 6

8 and 9. No new disbursements have so far been made in connection with this airport, but a contract has been entered into with Mr. Louis H. Tremblay for the fencing of the right of way of the entrance road, at an estimated cost of $2,700. Mr. Tremblay has commenced this work, but no money has, as yet, been paid to him for the same.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND FERRY

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury):

1. Has actual construction been started on the hull of the new ferry for the Prince Edward Island service?
2. If not, what is the reason for the delay?
3. If construction has actually been started, how far has the hull been completed?
4. Who has the contract for construction?
5. What is the contract price?
6. Does the contract price cover the completed ship or is there a separate contract for the machinery?
7. Has a contract been let for the construction of the machinery?
8. If so, to what stage has construction advanced?
9. When does the contract for the machinery call for delivery?
10. When is it expected that delivery will take place?
11. What name has been given to the ship, if any?
12. When is it expected that the ship will be in operation on her designated route?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. Yes.
2. See answer to No. 1.
3. The following hull steel work is erected:—(a) complete flat keel and centre girder; (b) floors and girders and tank top-plating for about 140 feet of ship's length; (c) 50 bottom shell plates. The following is fabricated:—(a) 70 main and intermediate frames, both sides; (b) stringers for about 140 feet of ship's length; (c) 1 bulkhead. Pattern for stem completed and for stern frame 3/4 completed; loft moulds completed for 15 floors both sides and 140 feet side girders both sides.
4. Marine Industries Limited, Sorel, Que.
5. On basis of cost, plus fixed fee. The total estimated cost is $4,750,000.
6. The contract price is for the completed ship.
7. Marine Industries Limited have sub-let the work for construction of the machinery to Dominion Engineering Company, Limited.
8. The propulsion equipment includes a power plant consisting of 16-6 cylinder engines in sets of two, each set direct connected to a 1050 k.w. generator. The actual propulsion is done by four propellers each driven by a 3,850 h.p. electric motor. The auxiliary equipment includes a power plant consisting of three 4 cylinder engines each direct connected to a 330 k.w. generator. This power plant is for supplying the lighting and all ship's services. For the propulsion machinery engines all castings and about 3/4 of the forgings have been delivered to the shops, cylinders, cylinder liners, cylinder heads, main engine castings, crank and cam shafts are completely machined. All other castings and forgings are approximately 1/3 machined.

Twenty-four of the cylinders complete with lines are assembled on the crank casings and two crank shafts are being fitted in the crank bases. All plans for engines are complete.

All of the material for the eight 1050 K.W. generators has been delivered to the electrical factory and is now in process of manufacture. Shipment to the engine builder for assembly with the engines is scheduled to commence with two generators in August, continuing two each month, with complete shipment early in November.

Likewise all of the material for the four 3850 H.P. propulsion motors has been delivered to the factory. These being among the largest of their type ever built in Canada require a longer time for manufacture. Shipment to the shipbuilder will commence with two in January and two in February, 1946.

All the material for the control of this power plant has been ordered and about 90 per cent of it is in the electrical factory. Assembly has not yet been started pending completion of the necessary drafting of the design. Such drafting is about 90 per cent complete and assembly of the control equipment will commence shortly.

For the auxiliary power plant engine about half of the castings and forgings are in the shop, of which about half are machined. All of the material for the three 330 K.W. auxiliary generators has been delivered to the electrical factory and manufacture is well advanced. Shipment to the engine builder for assembly with the engines is expected to be complete early in November.

9. February, 1946.

10. As called for.

11. No name has been given to the ship as yet.

12. During the summer of 1946.

BRETTON WOODS

Mr. McGEER:

1. What powers, rights, privileges, opportunities or advantages now enjoyed by the government and the people of Canada will be given up, in whole or in part, as a result of the acceptance and adoption of the agreement reached at the united nations monetary and finance conference held at Bretton Woods, New Hampshire, in 1944, for the establishment of an international monetary fund and of an international bank for reconstruction and development?

2. What powers, rights, privileges, opportunities or advantages will the government and the people of Canada secure from the adoption of the above mentioned agreement?

Mr. ILSLEY: I should like to say a word about this question. I think it would be impossible to answer it without developing an argument for or against the recommendations of the Bretton Woods conference. The hon. member spoke to me about this question and I consented to its going on the order paper, but on consideration I do not think it can be answered. If the information is to be given I think it would be appropriate to give it by means of an analysis of the Bretton Woods proposals to be put out in a white paper. I should be prepared to give consideration to the desirability of having such a white paper prepared and tabled at the next session of parliament.

Question dropped.

R.C.A.F.—NO. 12 EQUIPMENT DEPOT, MONTREAL

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

What is the total value of the supplies and equipment lost, stolen and broken at number 12 equipment depot, R.C.A.F., Montreal, Quebec, since the beginning of this war?

Mr. GIBSON: To 31st March, 1945, losses, $27,111.35; thefts, $130.78; breakages, $6,414.50; total, $33,656.63.

HECLA, MAN., DOCK

Mr. BRYCE:

1. What money has been or will be spent for repairs on Hecla dock, Manitoba, for the fiscal year 1944-45?

2. Who received payment for this work?

3. Who is hiring the day labour on this project and at what rates?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull):

1. $2,023.42 (work completed).

2. G. A. Williams, lumber, $257.03; Departmental stock, lumber, $77.11; H. B. Magnusson, disbursements, $4; Fedor Thordasson, stone, $601; H. B. Magnusson, foreman, $560; S. K. Johnson, timberman, $257.42; W. E. Bell, timberman, $211.06; Reggie Johannesson, labourer, $49.68; Unemployment insurance commission stamps, $6.12.

3. (a) Labour hired by foreman through national selective service; (b) foreman, $7 per day; timberman, 61c per hour; labourer, 46c per hour.

EXPORTS OF OATS AND BARLEY TO THE
UNITED STATES

Mr. PERLEY:

How many bushels of oats and barley have been exported to the United States since 1943, by growers permit or direct by the wheat board or any other source, and what was the price paid by the United States per bushel?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The export of oats and barley did not come under the control of the Canadian wheat board until April 1943 and records of exports since that time have been maintained by the board through the issuance of export permits. The following figures include export permits covering the shipment to countries other than the United States; however, these are comparatively small.

During the period April to July 1943 export permits were issued for a total of 30,806,605 bushels of oats (including processed oats, oat groat products and mixed feed oats), for which a total equalization fee of $1,159,762.76 was collected. Of this quantity export permits were issued for 7,241,509 bushels on which no equalization fee was charged as contracts had been entered into prior to the establishment of equalization funds. The average equalization fee collected during this period on oat permits subject to a fee was 4.92 cents per bushel. For this same period export permits were issued for a total of 28,618,309 bushels of barley (including processed barley, barley malt and pot and pearl barley) for which a total equalization fee of $479,974.32 was collected. The comparative price situation in Canada and the United States did not warrant the assessing of equalization fees on barley until May 28, 1943; therefore, permits were issued for 25,471,055 bushels on which no fee was charged. The average equalization fee collected during this period on barley permits subject to a fee was 15.25 cents per bushel.

Export permits issued and fees collected during the crop year August 1, 1943 to July 31, 1944 are as follows:

Oats (including processed oats, oat groat products and mixed feed oats), permits issued, 69,163,151-08 bushels; equalization fee collected, $23,912,449.29; average per bushel, 34.57 cents.

Barley (including processed barley, barley malt and pot and pearl barley), permits issued, 27,920,010-30 bushels; equalization fee collected, $11,796,937.06; average per bushel, 42.25 cents.

The cost of western Canadian oats and barley to the United States purchaser would be the ceiling price for these grains in store Fort William/Port Arthur, which is 51½ cents per bushel for oats and 64¼ cents per bushel for barley, plus the equalization fee, plus forwarding costs from Fort William/Port Arthur to destination.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION—MARITIME REGION

Mr. HAZEN:

1. How many persons are employed by the unemployment insurance commission in the maritime region?

2. How many of them are veterans of this war or the last war?

3. How many permanent appointments have been made in the maritime region?

4. What are the names and addresses of all persons holding permanent positions in the maritime region, and which of them served in this or the last war?

Mr. MARTIN: In making reply to this question I would point out that the answer to part 1 is not complete in that it does not contain a break-down of the number of women employed; consequently an erroneous impression would be possible. Later, however, I hope to be able to table a supplementary answer to that part of the question, and subject to this reservation I now answer the question.

SEVENTH VICTORY LOAN

Mr. TRIPP:

1. What was the time period of campaign covered in the seventh victory loan?

2. What were the opening and closing dates?

3. Was any extension of time required to complete the canvass?

4. What was the objective in dollars, and was this attained?

5. What number of canvassers participated?

6. What was the objective in dollars for the province of Saskatchewan?

7. Was this objective reached during the campaign?

8. What was the total amount subscribed by this province?

[Mr. Martin.]

9. Has the province of Saskatchewan, under the Douglas government, conducted a campaign in which to raise funds to finance, or assist in financing, government-owned enterprises?

10. If so, what was the time period set for the campaign?

11. What were the opening and closing dates?

12. What was the objective in dollars?

13. What number of canvassers participated?

14. Was the objective in dollars attained by the closing day of the campaign, and what amount was subscribed to that date?

15. Was it necessary to extend the closing date of the campaign in order to reach the objective?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Three weeks.

2. October 23 to November 11, 1944.

3. No.

4. $1,300,000,000 in cash. Actual cash subscriptions totalled $1,517,642,700; (final figures are not yet available).

5. 14,742.

6. Cash objective—$35,355,000.

7. Yes.

8. Cash sales—$50,554,400.

9 to 15. Not of official government record.

PERIODICAL "MONEY"

Mr. BLACKMORE:

1. Are copies of Money, a small periodical published at 1165 Broadway, New York, denied entry into Canada?

2. If so, on what grounds or for what reason?

3. When was the ban put on?

4. By whom was the ban put on?

5. Upon whose authority?

6. What reason is given for maintaining this ban?

7. Would any person in Canada possessing a copy of this publication be held guilty of a punishable offence?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1. Yes.

2. This publication was prohibited on the recommendation of the censorship authorities, because it was spreading German propaganda.

3. June 20, 1941.

4. By the Department of National Revenue.

5. Under authority of section 39A of the defence of Canada regulations, 1939, on the recommendation of the chief censors of publications; and section 13 and Item 1201, Schedule "C" of the customs tariff.

6. See answer to question 2.

7. Any person would be liable to prosecution under section 63 of the defence of Canada regulations.

NATIONAL FLAG AND NATIONAL ANTHEM

Mr. LaCROIX:

When will the Prime Minister implement his promise made in 1944 to give our country a national flag and a national anthem?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This will depend on the opportunity he may have for so doing, and on the appropriateness of the occasion.

VETERANS' LAND SETTLEMENT—SIMCOE COUNTY

Mr. McCUAIG:

1. What properties have been purchased in Simcoe county for veteran land settlement?
2. What was the acreage and purchase price in each case?
3. How many properties have been approved for purchase and not yet completed?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre):

1 and 2. As at February 28th, 1945:

Land	Acreage	Purchase Price
N. ½ lot 5, concession 12, township Tecumseh	100	$4,700
S. ½ lot 17, concession 7, township Essa	100	4,500
N.E. ¼ lot 21, concession 8, township Flos	50	3,000
N.W. ¼ lot 6 and N.E. ¼ lot 5, concession 7, township Innisfil	100	3,500
E. part lot 15, concession 1, township Oro	85	4,600
W. part of W. ½ lot 20, concession 4, township Vespra	25	3,200

3. Statistical information is compiled by regional areas. In the Toronto regional office area which includes the county of Simcoe transactions covering 7 properties approved for purchase have not been completed.

DR. BELA EISNER

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Has Dr. Bela Eisner been appointed by the Minister of National War Services, or by the Department of National War Services, or by the committee on cooperation in Canadian citizenship, to do any work on behalf of said committee? If so, what is the nature of the work assigned to Dr. Eisner?
2. Were any Hungarian organizations in Canada consulted with reference to Dr. Eisner's appointment before it was made? If so, what organizations, and what were their views in the matter of Dr. Eisner's appointment?
3. Is Dr. Eisner receiving any remuneration from the government for the work he is doing? If so, how much?

Mr. LaFLECHE:

1. The services of Dr. Bela Eisner were utilized for a period of three months, September, October and November, 1942, for the purpose of obtaining a report on the general situation of Canadian Communities of Hungarian origin. He has not been connected with this department since that time.

2. Dr. Bela Eisner's services were recommended by the cultural council of Canadians of hungarian origin.

3. Travelling expenses only were paid for the months of September, October and November, 1942, in the amount of $414.95.

AMERICAN STERILIZER

Mr. AYLESWORTH:

1. What business house represents the American Sterilizer people in Canada?
2. Is Lieutenant-Colonel Wheeler, head of the directorate of hospital equipment and supplies, a director of the above concern?

Mr. ABBOTT:

1. Ingram and Bell Limited.
2. Yes.

JAPANESE NATIONALS—INTERPRETERS

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. Did the British government or any agency or department of the British government make a request of the government of Canada or any agency or department thereof for the services of persons of Japanese origin in Canada as interpreters or for any other purposes connected with the war?
2. If so, what number of persons of Japanese origin was asked for?
3. What disposition was made of the request?
4. If rejected, for what reason?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The United Kingdom government and other commonwealth governments have made requests to the Canadian government for the services of Canadians of Japanese origin for various purposes connected with the conduct of the war.

The governments concerned have been informed that their needs will be filled in so far as qualified individuals can be found.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—ROTATION LEAVE

Mr. CASE:

1. What is the procedure for rotation leave now in force for the armed forces overseas?
2. Is it automatic?
3. Does a soldier have to apply for such leave?
4. If so, how many applications have been granted?
5. Have any been refused?
6. If so, how many and for what reasons?

Mr. ABBOTT:

1. Rotation leave is granted on monthly quotas. Selections are made by commanders in the field for troops in theatres of operations and by Canadian military headquarters for those in the United Kingdom. Leave is granted on a priority basis having regard to the soldier's length of overseas service, amount of combat service, marital status, conduct, etc.
2. No.
3. Yes.

Questions

4, 5 and 6. This information is not available in Canada but could be secured from Canadian military headquarters. To do so, however, would involve extensive inquiry inasmuch as the details must be secured from unit commanders in the field, and require a great deal of time and labour to secure. To date a total of 4,084 all ranks have been returned to Canada under this scheme.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. What loans have been made by the industrial development bank, by months, since the beginning of its operations?

2. Has the industrial development bank opened, or does it intend to open, any branch offices other than those in Toronto and Vancouver?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Section 29(1) of the Industrial Development Bank Act requires that "The bank shall, within twenty-one days following the end of each calendar month, make up and transmit to the Minister of Finance in such form as he may prescribe, a statement of its assets and liabilities at the close of business on the last day of the preceding month." This statement as at February 28, 1945, appeared in the Canada Gazette of March 24, 1945, and showed loans and investments (excluding dominion government securities) at $79,229.77.

In addition, section 29(2) provides that "The bank shall make up and transmit to the Minister of Finance at least once in its fiscal year or more frequently if so directed by the minister, in such form as he may prescribe, a classification of its loans and investments and of the loans guaranteed by it." Provision is made for the publication of this statement in the Canada Gazette following its receipt by the minister.

2. The Industrial Development bank has opened branches in Toronto and Montreal and will open shortly a branch in Vancouver. The policy of the bank in opening additional branches will be determined by the board of directors in light of the volume of loaning business in other localities.

EDMONTON-FAIRBANKS—TELEPHONE LINES

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

1. On the withdrawal of American army personnel from Yukon, Alberta and western British Columbia, will the government of Canada acquire the telephone lines constructed by said army between Edmonton, Alberta, passing through Whitehorse, Yukon, and extending to Fairbanks, Alaska?

2. Will the government of Canada consider linking said lines with its government telegraph system?

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. Under the exchange of notes of June 23 and 27, 1944, the Canadian government undertook to reimburse the United States government for the construction of the telephone-telegraph teletype line from Edmonton to the Alaska boundary. The agreement provides that these facilities will be relinquished to the Canadian government.

2. The question of the future use of these lines is under consideration and no statement can be made at present.

PRESCOTT-OGDENSBURG FERRY

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Has the government paid any subsidy to the Prescott-Ogdensburg Ferry Company since the beginning of the war?

2. If so, what amounts have been paid?

3. Are further payments of any such subsidies contemplated?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1. Yes.

2. 1942-43, $11,640; 1943-44, $11,640; 1944-45 (to Dec. 31, 1944), $8,730.

3. Yes, a further payment of $2,910 will be made for the quarter ended March 31, 1945, as soon as claims are received and approved.

CANADIAN INSTITUTE OF INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Who are the members of the Canadian Institute of International Affairs, whom do they represent and what public office do they hold in Canada?

2. How many received an exit permit to go to England; what are their names, and for what purpose did they go?

3. Which of them, if any, are soldiers who served overseas in this or the last war, and in what capacity?

4. Was the trip approved of and did it have the sanction of the government?

5. In time of war, how many of these trips have been authorized and to where?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. I am informed that the C.I.I.A. is an unofficial body founded to encourage the study of international questions. It is associated with the Royal Institute of International Affairs in the United Kingdom, and with similar institutes in other countries.

2. In February, 1945, the following persons went to the United Kingdom to attend an unofficial British commonwealth relations conference held under the auspices of the R.I.I.A.:

Mr. E. J. Tarr, Mr. Victor Sifton, Mr. W. A. Irwin, Mr. B. K. Sandwell, Professor R. G. Trotter, Mr. Unwin, Mr. D. R. Michener, Mr. A. Brewin.

It is assumed that it is these to whom the question refers.

3. No information.

4. The journey was not made on official business.

5. No official authorization is necessary for travel to the United Kingdom provided the normal passport and other regulations are met.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

HOME DEFENCE TROOPS

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many home defence troops who were in Canada on February 28, 1945, were in, (a) operational units; (b) non-operational units; (c) in training?

2. How many home defence troops volunteered for active service in each of the months of January, February and March, 1945?

3. How many of the home defence troops are on extended leave from depots and in particular, (a) by provinces; (b) by military districts?

4. How many home defence troops ordered overseas or to some other part of Canada or who have been on leave, failed to report in each of the months, November, December, 1944, and January, February and March, 1945, (a) by provinces; (b) by military districts?

5. How many of these men have been apprehended in each of the five months?

6. How many have been prosecuted, and are such men punished for being absent without leave or as deserters?

7. How many in each province?

8. How many in each military district?

9. How many have been prosecuted for assisting or abetting defaulters in each of the said months?

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—INTAKE, ETC.

Mr. PURDY:

1. By provinces and/or military district and respective service, what is the estimated intake into the armed forces to date?

2. By provinces and/or military district and respective service, how many men are now enrolled in the armed forces who have not volunteered for overseas service?

3. What is the number of men in each province and/or military district of military age as represented by national registration figures, less total enlistments?

4. What is the quota of men presently placed on each province or military district by the Department of National Defence through the mobilization boards?

5. What percentage of the quota assessed has been produced during the past six months by each province and/or military district?

SUNNYBROOK HOSPITAL

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What progress is being made on the erection of the new Sunnybrook hospital at Toronto, and when will it be ready for occupation?

2. What additional hospital accommodation has been made since the survey of 1940?

TIDEWATER CONSTRUCTION COMPANY—EASTERN WOODWORKERS

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

What contracts have been entered into and what purchase have been made since January 1, 1944, with or from the Tidewater Construction Company Limited and the Eastern Woodworkers of New Glasgow, Nova Scotia, by the three Departments of Defence, the Department of Munitions and Supply, the Department of Public Works, the Department of Transport and the Canadian National Railways, stating purpose of contracts, payments made to date and estimates to complete?

CANADIAN ARMY

FARM LEAVE FOR SOLDIERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): May I ask the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence a question with regard to the present application of the government's policy on agricultural leave granted to soldiers?

Mr. D. C. ABBOTT (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): Perhaps it would better meet the convenience of the house if I gave the information when my estimates are before the committee. I have the material here.

INCOME TAX

UNITED MINE WORKERS, DISTRICT 26—DEDUCTIONS IN RESPECT OF YEAR 1943

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance arising out of a telegram received from the secretary-treasurer of district 26, United Mine Workers. It appears that for the year 1943 the employees of the Dominion Steel and Coal company were taxed at the source, but a certain percentage of the tax was not deducted. They claim now that the government has notified the company to deduct the unpaid portion of the 1943 tax plus the current taxes for this year. This is creating anxiety amongst the men, and the mine workers have suggested that the 1943 portion representing the refundable part of the tax be applied to the 1943 tax and the thing cleaned up in that way. Has the minister been approached by the organization I mentioned, and if so, is any action contemplated?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): This is properly a question for the Minister of National Revenue rather than for the Minister of Finance. I do not know anything about the situation; I have not been approached at all, but perhaps I might say a word. I gather that this is really a request that the refundable portion of the tax be applied in liquidation of the overdue taxes. That could not be done under the law, because the refundable portion is not repayable until two years after the war.

Mr. GILLIS: I had in mind that the question might more properly be put to the Minister of National Revenue, but I was led to believe by the telegram that representations had been made to the Minister of Finance; therefore I directed my question to him.

Mr. ILSLEY: The matter had not been brought to my attention. Perhaps it came before the officers of the department, but if so, I have not heard of it.

SEED CORN

EXPORT REQUIREMENTS FOR GREECE AND YUGOSLAVIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I do so now because seeding operations have already commenced in southwestern Ontario. My question relates to seed corn. Last year I understand that Yugoslavia and Greece gave orders for a substantial amount of seed corn from Canada. The corn growers in southwestern Ontario, in order to plan their seeding operations intelligently, would like to know if any similar order or request has been received this year. If the minister is not in a position to answer to-day perhaps he may do so to-morrow.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): No such request or suggestion has been brought to my attention. It may have been received by the wheat board. I shall make inquiries and let the hon. member know.

SAN FRANCISCO CONFERENCE

REQUEST FOR BEEF SHIPMENTS FROM CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUTCKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question either to the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Agriculture. Has any request been received from the United States government or the state of California for an allotment in any form of 500,000 pounds of beef for the forthcoming conference at San Francisco? I understand that any member with a good steak under his belt is more agreeable, and I should like to know what action is being taken in this regard.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure just what form the request took or to whom it was made, but inquiries were made as to whether Canada could supply a certain number of cars of meat to be used in connection with the San Francisco conference. As I understand it, the reply given was to the effect that any beef and pork that we were able to send out of the country was contracted for under an arrangement between the three governments, but that some supplies of turkeys were available. We are selling our poultry to the United States, a very considerable part of it to the United States army. Some turkeys, as I understand it, are to be sent to San Francisco.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: If I may ask a supplementary question, am I correct in assuming that we have no more beef in Canada than we have shipping facilities for? Are these turkeys that are to be sent cold storage turkeys?

Mr. GARDINER: They are turkeys that the people there are very anxious to get. They apparently think they are better than any others they can get.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What about the beef situation?

Mr. GARDINER: The beef situation is that we are sending all our surplus to Great Britain.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF CANADIAN DELEGATION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when on the 29th of last month I spoke in the house on the united nations conference to meet in San Francisco on the 25th instant, I referred in the following terms to the delegation that it was proposed to have represent Canada:

It is important to Canada that her representatives at the world security conference should be assured of the widest possible measure of support from parliament and from the people. It is important that our representatives should speak with a clear, strong and united voice. There is every reason to believe that the vast majority of Canadians of all parties desire to have Canada participate in measures to safeguard the peace which we hope to see established at the close of this terrible war. For this, as well as other reasons, it is desirable that Canada's delegation to the San Francisco conference should be broadly representative. As I have already announced, it is the government's intention to select representatives from both houses of parliament, and from both sides of each house. The government itself will, of course, assume its constitutional responsibility both for the selection of the delegation and for any decisions which are agreed to at San Francisco. It is desirable that the house should make its decision upon the resolution now before it, before the membership of the delegation is announced. Once the resolution is adopted, I would hope very shortly thereafter to be able to make an announcement. By associating with the delegation members of political parties other than its own, the government is seeking to lift and to keep the effort to achieve enduring peace above the arena of party strife.

It will be recalled that on the 28th of March the house all but unanimously adopted the resolution accepting the invitation of the United States and other great powers to Canada to be represented at the San Francisco conference. I have now pleasure in announcing to the house the proposed personnel of the delegation.*

As I have said, the delegation is to be representative of both houses of parliament and of both sides of each house. In deciding, first of all, on the size of the delegation, it was necessary to have some regard to the delegations that were going from other countries. In this I felt that particular attention should be paid to the personnel of the United Kingdom delegation. There are to be nine members of parliament in the United Kingdom delegation, four of whom are ministers of the crown. The other five have been selected from parliamentary secretaries to different ministers. The entire British delegation is chosen from the membership of parliament. It seemed to me, in these circumstances, that if Canada had a delegation of seven, that would be as large a delegation as we should expect to have. I am speaking now of the official delegation, not of the experts and assistants and secretarial staffs which may be necessary.

Having decided on a delegation of seven, the question of the division between the two houses was the next point considered; and there it seemed that the House of Commons would necessarily have the larger proportion of the delegates. It was decided to have five of the delegates chosen from the House of Commons and two from the Senate.

As I have said, the desire is to have the delegation in each house representative of both sides, both the government and the opposition. I think it will be generally conceded that if the representation from the Senate were made equal, that is to say, one from the government side and one from the opposition, it would be appropriate and expected, so far as the House of Commons is concerned, that the delegation would have at least one more representative chosen from the government side than from the opposition.

As to the selection from the government side, hon. members have kindly indicated they expect I should lead the delegation. I have asked my colleague, the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), to accompany me. I think our country would like to see the women of Canada represented on the delegation, and I am happy to announce that Mrs. Casselman, member for Edmonton East, has agreed to become one of the delegation.

As to representation of the opposition, I am sure that all hon. members will be pleased to have the leader of His Majesty's official opposition (Mr. Graydon) one of the representatives.

That leaves one more to be selected; and may I say that it is not always easy to make these individual choices. However, I personally, as hon. members are aware, have felt that we are not furthering what is best in British parliamentary procedure by giving too much in the way of recognition to groups as such. I believe in a government and an opposition; those that are for us are for us, and those that are against us are against us, whether they be Progressive Conservatives or C.C.F.'rs or Social Crediters or members of any other group that may be named. The choice which is being made at this time is not to be considered as a choice from any particular group as such it is the second choice from among the opposition in this parliament, gentlemen who have taken the responsibility, as representatives of the people in this house, of opposing the government with regard to certain of its policies. I have felt that if the choice were made in reference to the size of the following of the leaders of particular groups, that might be fair ground on which to base a decision. On that basis I have felt the house would welcome the appointment of the leader of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) as a second member of the opposition to be a member of the delegation.

May I say to my good friend, the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Blackmore), that personally I could not wish for a better travelling companion than himself, and I am very sorry indeed that I have not felt it possible to include him as one of the delegation. In selecting the leader of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation as a member of the delegation, I made that choice on the basis that he is a leader of a party which has a following in this house from more provinces than one, a following which to that extent is more representative of different parts of Canada and partakes more of the nature of a national party. The following of the hon. member for Lethbridge is confined, I believe, to one province.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We have representatives in Manitoba.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not in this house. Members of other groups, I believe, are confined to one province, or parts of a province. In the circumstances it would hardly be possible to enlarge the delegation to make it more representative than, I believe, it is under the proposed personnel.

As to the representation from the Senate, my thought was that the most acceptable representation would be found in choosing from the membership of the Senate, the leaders of the government and of the opposition. I have asked Hon. Doctor J. H. King, leader of the government in the Senate, to be the representative on the delegation of the government in the Senate; I asked Hon. C. C. Ballantyne as the leader of the opposition in the upper house if he would not accept to act as the other member of the delegation. I was particularly hopeful that Hon. Mr. Ballantyne might find it possible to accept, as he is one of the oldest members of parliament and has had exceptional experience in matters of international concern. If I am not mistaken, he was with Sir Robert Borden at conferences in London when questions relating to the formation of the League of Nations were under consideration, and at imperial conferences which dealt with allied matters; I sought to impress upon Senator Ballantyne that, with this experience, having regard to the questions which would come up at San Francisco, his presence on the delegation would be most helpful and in every way, I felt, warmly appreciated. Unfortunately Senator Ballantyne, for personal reasons, has not found it possible to accept. He has written me a letter which he has kindly intimated I might read if I thought it desirable to do so. I shall therefore read his letter:

The Senate
Canada

April 5, 1945.

My dear Prime Minister:

Referring to the two personal interviews which you graciously gave me last week in Ottawa when you invited me to be one of the Canadian delegation that will be attending the United Nations San Francisco conference to be held on April 25.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Please be assured that I deeply appreciate the high honour of being invited by you to form part of this delegation. Frankly, I can say that I would like very much to have accepted your invitation but owing to so many personal difficulties in the way which I explained to you at our interviews, I regret that it is not possible.

May I be permitted to wish you and your delegation a pleasant and safe trip and every success under your distinguished leadership.

Kindest regards,

Yours sincerely,

C. C. Ballantyne.

Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King,
P.C., C.M.G.,
Ottawa.

When I ascertained that Senator Ballantyne would not find it possible to become a member of the delegation, I invited the Hon. Lucien Moraud to become a member of the delegation as the second representative of the upper house. In inviting Senator Moraud, the government had in mind not merely the representation of the Conservative party, the opposition in the Senate, but also the desirability of having a French-speaking as well as an English-speaking representative of the delegation chosen from the Senate as well as from the House of Commons. Senator Moraud has had considerable experience in international problems. He has familiarity particularly with matters pertaining to South American countries, and for this as well as other reasons I believe his name will be most acceptable to the members of both houses and to the people of Canada. Had Senator Ballantyne found it possible to accept, I should have felt that from his long residence in and representation of a constituency in the province of Quebec, he would have been regarded as representing the French-speaking as well as the English-speaking people of his province and other parts of Canada.

In addition to the delegation proper there will necessarily be advisers. Here may I say at once that the government has had to consider carefully a situation which necessarily arises, namely the representation of special interests at the conference by advisers. When one begins to run over the list of special interests which would have to be considered, if a selection were to be made on that basis, the number becomes so large that it soon becomes apparent that the required numbers would be excessive. Having regard to the nature of the conference itself, which is to set up an international organization for the maintenance of peace and security, it is clear that the particular advisers required are those who possess special capacities and experience in international relations and who have gained that experience in large part in the public service.

As hon. members are aware, the public service of Canada possesses a body of exceptionally well trained experts, men and women who are expert in the particular fields with which they are immediately concerned, and who have given to them over years much thought and study.

We are exceptionally fortunate in Canada in having in our Department of External Affairs a body of highly trained officials whose standing, not only in our own country, but in countries throughout the world, is recognized as being as high as that of any corresponding group in any country. For this reason the choice of advisers is being made from those who will be best able to give expert advice and broad counsel on the special and specific questions of the setting up of an international organization. So far as it is possible special interests and special groups in this country will be kept in mind and should be protected through the generally representational character of the delegates. In any event there will of course be opportunity for special review when the resultant agreement comes before parliament for consideration prior to ratification. The senior advisers will be the following:

N. A. Robertson, Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs;

H. Hume Wrong, Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs;

L. B. Pearson, Canadian Ambassador to the United States;

Jean Desy, Canadian Ambassador to Brazil;

L. D. Wilgress, Canadian Ambassador to U.S.S.R.;

W. F. Chipman, Canadian Ambassador to Chile;

Major-General M. A. Pope, C.B., M.C., Military Staff Officer to the Prime Minister, Military Secretary to the Cabinet War Committee and Member of the Chiefs of Staff Committee.

Hon. members will see how exceptionally fortunate we are in being able to have as expert advisers at the conference a number of young men who have served in the Department of External Affairs in Canada, and have since been serving in other countries either in the capacity of ministers or ambassadors. In the time that they have served in these countries they have become familiar with the problems that are likely to present themselves to the minds of those who will be leading the delegations from these countries, and as a result, will be in an exceptional position to give to our delegation expert advice. May I mention, by way of example, Mr. Pearson, our ambassador to the United States, and the familiarity he already has with most of the questions likely to arise, and the study he has been giving them for a long time. I should speak, too, of Mr. Wilgress, who is our ambassador in Russia, and Mr. Desy, who is our ambassador in Brazil, and the familiarity they have gained of international problems in the time they respectively have been in Russia and in South America. The same is true of Mr. Chipman, our ambassador in Chile, who over many years has been interested in international questions, and who enjoys a high reputation as a jurist.

And, of course, any delegation going to a conference to discuss problems of world peace could not be more fortunate than to have as its chief advisers Mr. Norman Robertson, Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, and Mr. Hume Wrong, the Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs. No abler advisers on matters pertaining to their country's international relations will be found in any public service.

I should add that there will also be six or seven technical advisers to deal with particular problems requiring special knowledge, and of course whatever secretarial and clerical assistance is necessary to make possible the efficient discharge of the duties of the delegates.

The conference opens on the 25th of this month, and arrangements which have been made thus far are for the delegation to leave Ottawa for San Francisco on the 19th, which is Thursday of next week. I might add that delegations from other countries are already beginning to proceed to San Francisco. We will have in this city before the week is over some representatives from other countries who will be proceeding by way of Canada to San Francisco.

In order to reach San Francisco in time for the opening ceremonies on the morning of the 25th, it has been thought advisable to have arrangements made for our delegation to arrive not later than the 23rd. This allows for the possibility of a delay of a day.

I have given the house the names of the representatives comprising Canada's delegation, and have designated those who are to accompany them, and the basis upon which the selections have been made. I sincerely hope that hon. members will feel that in making those selections the government has sought to do what it believed to be eminently fair.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister's invitation to me as leader of the opposition to join the Canadian delegation going to San Francisco was not entirely a surprise to me, but it does provide an opportunity for me to make one or two observations at this time.

The arbitrary ruling out of my leader, John Bracken, as a possible choice of delegates—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: He ruled himself out.

Mr. GRAYDON: —was both unfortunate and groundless. We feel that Mr. Bracken has the best right to represent us, and on that point there is complete unanimity within the Progressive Conservative party. I have no doubt that this view is largely held throughout Canada by all unprejudiced people. Canada's interests would be more acceptably served were she to have at the security conference the present Prime Minister's most likely successor. That claim was strongly urged by us in the house debate, but it evidently fell upon unresponsive ears.

Anticipating that I might be designated as a delegate by the Prime Minister, I sought the advice and guidance of my leader a few days ago with respect to the course which I should follow in the event of an invitation being so extended. Mr. Bracken was firmly of the opinion that I had a duty to the nation and to my party to accept. I am following his advice and, subject to clarification of my position in the delegation, shall accept the responsibility which representation entails.

The task which lies before Canada's delegates to San Francisco is both heavy and compelling, but I shall strive to the limit of my energy, capacity and ability to render the very best service I can in the hope that Canada will, with the efforts of us all, make a worthy contribution to the high purpose and noble cause of world peace and security.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggart): Mr. Speaker, in accepting the invitation to membership in this delegation I wish to say I deeply appreciate it, not on account of any partisan advantage, but because I believe that in the future those of us who attend the conference will be called upon to assist whatever administration may be in power in this country, in furthering the cause of peace and universal justice throughout the world. I therefore shall be glad to assist in any way I can.

Mr. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I rise not to offer any complaint whatsoever against the decision. I believe it is fitting that it should be pointed out to this house and to the country that there are several serious aspects involved in this situation. In the first place the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made known to the country some time ago that he was desirous of having the opposition represented at this conference. Up to the present time the only voices that have been raised in this parliament in opposition to the general proposals upon which the San Francisco conference is founded have been those of the Social Credit members. The result is that in selecting the delegation the Prime Minister, who either did it on his own accord or upon advice, has successfully eliminated the opposition in this house and in this country.

Incidentally, I will challenge any man in Canada who considers himself qualified to accept the challenge to show any difference in any respect whatsoever between the Liberals and the Progressive Conservatives.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That is an insult.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Just one moment; furthermore, I challenge anyone who considers himself qualified to accept the challenge and establish his case to show any material difference between the trends of liberalism to-day and the avowed policy of the C.C.F. May I repeat that the Prime Minister has successfully eliminated the opposition from the delegation to San Francisco.

There is another matter which is of vital importance. We are considering a conference for the elimination of war in the world, if that be possible; we are considering a conference that ought to be aimed at the establishment of a world organization which will be able to guarantee to every nation participating the fullest measure of sovereignty consistent with the achieving of the objectives of the organization. Now the only party in Canada and in this house which had ever offered an alternative; which has indicated that there is a way of effecting an organization which shall be able to accomplish the ends of the proposed organization but yet at the same time guarantee national sovereignty, is the Social Credit party.

One other aspect of this matter is the question of eliminating the cause of war. Those who gave me the honour of listening to the speech I delivered on March 23—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BLACKMORE: —will remember that I pointed out that the San Francisco proposals did not aim to eliminate the cause of war.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker is on his feet.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The Social Credit party is the only organization that has proposed a means of eliminating the cause of war. Therefore it should be represented at the conference. By eliminating the Social Crediters the Prime Minister has eliminated from the conference all the possibilities—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Has the hon. member concluded his remarks? I must point out to him that there is nothing before the Chair at the moment dealing with either the merits or the demerits of the conference to be held at San Francisco. All that is before the Chair is the simple statement made by the Prime Minister with regard to the composition of the delegation. No argument or discussion can take place on that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Other hon. members have expressed their general attitude to the Prime Minister's announcement; that is all I was doing.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

STATEMENT AS TO DESIRABILITY OF SPEEDY WINDING-UP OF SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Before the orders of the day are proceeded with I think I should say a word or two to the house about the desirability of having some understanding reached as to the winding-up of the business of this particular session. I do that for two reasons. In the first place it is desirable that hon. members should know as early as possible what day we are to conclude the business of the house, that the government may have the opportunity of arranging for the proceedings of prorogation and the assent to the measures that may be passed in the interval. The other reason is one which relates itself to the delegation that is to go to San Francisco. In mentioning that I do so only because of the necessity of indicating to hon. members and to the country what is involved as far as I myself am concerned in seeking to be in a position to leave with the delegation on Thursday of next week.

As I have said, the conference opens on April 25. To reach San Francisco in time and to have satisfactory arrangements completed prior to the opening it will be necessary for members of the delegation to leave Ottawa next Thursday. If the house is to sit until eleven o'clock on Monday night of next week, the 16th—the term of the present parliament expires at midnight on the sixteenth—I must say that so far as I personally am concerned, I am afraid it will not be possible for me to leave with the other members of the delegation; I shall have to follow a little later on.

The house will realize, I hope, that there are very heavy obligations on my shoulders at the moment in considering an absence which will involve in all probability being away from Canada for a month or more at a time when the situation overseas with respect to the war presents many problems that could not and would not arise at any other time. I shall have to have the opportunity to discuss with my colleagues before I leave some matters related to the progress of the war which it has not been possible to take up while parliament has been in session during these last few weeks, and also to anticipate the situations that are certain to arise in the course of the ensuing month. As I shall be away for a month or more I shall have to discuss with my colleagues as well some matters related to the business of the country that will be taken up during that period, some matters that should receive attention before my departure and that of the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) who will be accompanying me.

There is the further fact that a general election in all probability will be called at a very early date. That again will depend on how long we are kept here before the term of this parliament expires. There are matters in that connection to which I shall have to give consideration before I leave for San Francisco. I would not make mention of these matters except on grounds of the proper discharge of public business. I ask no favours of anyone, but I do ask for consideration from all sides of the house with respect to what is in the public interest of Canada at a time when parliament is about to dissolve, when matters pertaining to the war of a very critical and exacting nature have to be considered prior to my absence of a month or more on a public mission in another country and with a general election pending.

May I say that I see no reason why this house should not conclude its business rapidly unless there is a desire on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite to keep the government as long as they can from going to the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been—

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The sooner you go the better.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friends opposite will conclude the business of this house to-day I will announce the date of the election to-morrow. I want to have it understood that just as soon as this house concludes its business—and it rests with the opposition whether we are to be kept here much longer or not—I am prepared within at least forty-eight hours afterwards to announce the date on which polling will take place at a general election throughout the country. In the light of that statement it rests entirely with hon. gentlemen opposite whether we close to-day or to-morrow or the day after or the day after that; but if we sit very much longer it will mean that I shall not find it possible to leave for San Francisco on Thursday of next week with Canada's delegation, though the delegation itself will proceed. Now in regard to the fixing of the date—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not see where the joke lies in saying "the fixing of the date," because I have said already that this depends upon hon. gentlemen opposite. When they are prepared to conclude the business here I have said that within forty-eight hours thereafter I shall be prepared to give the date of the elections and polling.

As to the winding up of the business of the house, I think it is quite clear that this session was called for two purposes, first to consider the San Francisco conference and questions arising in reference thereto, and second to make the necessary appropriations for carrying on the war and to vote the supply required to permit government of the country to be carried on during the period of the election and until the new parliament is returned. The first matter, the San Francisco conference, has been dealt with. In connection with the second, parliament already has voted the supply necessary in the way of supplementary estimates for the last fiscal year, and we are now asking that we be given five-twelfths of the necessary war appropriation and of the estimates for the coming year to cover the period of the election and the assembling of the new parliament.

It has been said by some hon. members that we are voting vast sums of money without much in the way of consideration; that the country will think we were giving very limited consideration to the large amounts we are voting. May I point out that we are not asking for anything in connection with a purpose which has not been approved already; that we are not asking for anything the purpose of which has not been sanctioned already by this House of Commons in a previous session. Everyone agrees that the appropriation for the war is necessary. There we are taking as the basis for what we are asking only the equivalent of an amount that was paid out during a corresponding period in the fiscal year just ended. With regard to supply for civil government, we are simply asking, to enable the government to carry on for the period of the election and the time required for the assembling of the new parliament, for amounts corresponding with those voted for the same services over a corresponding period of time. It is not a case where there is the necessity to further scrutinize possible payments. They have been scrutinized; they have been gone over. However, as I say it rests with hon. gentlemen opposite to prolong the discussion if in their opinion that should be thought necessary.

I feel that perhaps this house does not realize the length of time it is going to take to carry on an election and bring a new House of Commons into being, and why therefore it is advisable that we should have the election brought on just as soon as may be possible. Let me put it briefly in this way. After the dissolution of parliament and after the writs are issued, to all intents and purposes it will be two months until the date of polling. One month will have to elapse between the nomination and the polling, and it will take a month prior to nomination date for the electoral officer to give the necessary instructions and make arrangements for taking the votes overseas. The chief electoral officer expects that after the polling it will take another two months before all the writs are returned and a new parliament can be summoned. It will take even longer than that, because after the chief electoral officer has received the writs he then has to notify the clerk of the House of Commons that the writs have been returned, thereby giving authority for a new parliament to be summoned. The minimum period of time required to summon a new parliament is seven days; in all probability it will be a little longer. If there were undue delays in the return of some of the writs it would take still longer. That is a long period, but it is fixed by legislation which this parliament has enacted, and arises in part from the fact that votes will be polled in all parts of the world.

I expected that a question on this matter might be raised by some hon. gentleman opposite, so within two days of the opening of the present session I asked the chief electoral officer if he would prepare for me a memorandum which I could read to the house giving in the form of an official statement what I have just set forth in an offhand manner. I had better read this statement that it will be on record in Hansard:

Office of The Chief Electoral Officer

Ottawa, March 17, 1945.

In connection with the next general election, I am of the opinion that a minimum period of sixty days is required between the date of the issue of the writs and polling day.

The statute prescribes that the enumeration in urban and rural polling divisions shall commence on Monday, the 49th day before polling day, and the remaining 11 days are required by the returning officers to appoint the enumerators and to furnish them with the necessary instructions and supplies.

Before commencing their enumeration, on the 49th day before polling day, each enumerator must be informed by the returning officer, of the dates of the issue of the writs and polling day which have a bearing on the qualifications of some of the electors.

During the above mentioned period of sixty days, I do not expect that any difficulty will be encountered in the taking of the votes of war service electors stationed in Canada and overseas.

After giving careful consideration to the period required after polling day at the next general election for the return of the writs for the most difficult electoral districts, I have come to the conclusion that the earliest date upon which parliament could be assembled would be on a date two months after polling day.

It will not be possible, in any electoral district to hold the final addition of the votes and make the subsequent declaration of the elected candidate until eight days after polling day and in several electoral districts, owing to difficulties in communication the final addition of the votes is not usually held before three weeks after polling day.

Provision has to be made for adjournments of the final addition of the votes in several electoral districts where ballot boxes may be missing. Provision also has to be made for recount proceedings which, in view of the recounting of votes cast by war service electors in the overseas voting territories, will take more time than at previous elections. For example, if a recount was ordered in the electoral district of Ottawa West, the ballot papers cast by war service electors in India, Australia, Egypt, Italy, France and the United Kingdom, etc., relating to such electoral district would have to be recounted at the same time as the ballot papers cast by civilian electors.

Respectfully submitted,

Jules Castonguay,
Chief Electoral Officer.

As I have said, this is an official statement of the situation. I would draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that any moneys that may be voted from now on so far as this government is specially concerned, as distinguished from what pertains equally to members of all parties, will be a matter of supply for a period only of some two weeks, namely from the first of the present fiscal year to the 17th day of April. A general election is part of the necessary procedure of government in the country. It is something arranged, not for any particular party but for the people. I have heard some hon. members say, in the course of discussing matters here, that they want to get further information, that as representatives of the people they have the right to demand it, that parliament is the supreme authority. Parliament is not the supreme authority; the supreme authority is the people of this country. They are the ones we are asking to be allowed to go before, to determine what particular government or authority is to carry on the business of the country over the next five years.

All we are asking parliament to do is to vote the money necessary for carrying on the war and for carrying on the government during the period of the election and the assembling of a new parliament. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that they want an election; they profess that they are going to be returned, that they believe they are going to be the next government and so forth. All we are asking is to have sufficient supply voted for four and a half months. If they are returned, that will enable them to come into office that much sooner. It is not a special privilege we are asking for ourselves.

The government is not asking any favour of any one in asking the house to shorten this particular session. All we are asking is that the people be given the earliest possible opportunity to say whether they wish to have the present government returned to office, or whether they wish to return members of some other party to form some other government.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not expect to speak with perhaps as much heat as the Prime Minister has used in his plea for the shortening of the time of the session.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was not heat; it was enthusiasm and eagerness.

Mr. GRAYDON: So far as our party is concerned we have been striving conscientiously in this session, as we have in other sessions, to facilitate the passage of public business having regard to the duty and obligations which rest upon us with respect to the proper criticism of the estimates of the different departments as they are brought before us. I was surprised that the Prime Minister was so provocative in his remarks this afternoon.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I take exception to that. I know my hon. friend likes to have words recorded in Hansard, intended to leave a certain impression, but I say to him that I was not provocative. I was trying to meet his alleged wishes. I was seeking to impress him and others with our desire to get to the country just as soon as we can.

Mr. GRAYDON: If the Prime Minister feels that the word "provocative" is one he would not like spread upon the pages of Hansard, then I suggest he do not adopt an attitude so that we call for that accusation. Whether he intended it or not, to-day the Prime Minister was trying to swing the big stick around parliament. If he intended to seek the cooperation of the various groups in the house to expedite public business I should have thought he would not attempt to throw his political weight around as he was apparently attempting to do.

We have no desire to keep the government from going to the country. Why should we? So far as this party is concerned the government can go to the country when they like. We will welcome their going to the country. More than that, for some considerable time the Prime Minister has been afraid to go to the country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GRAYDON: This is a new angle the Prime Minister has thought up in the last few minutes. There is plenty of evidence that the Prime Minister has been afraid to face the people.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Now my hon. friend is becoming provocative.

Mr. GRAYDON: Of course the Prime Minister has just been whistling when going through his own political graveyard, and I do not want to deprive him of that.

May I say, and I say it in perfectly good humour, that this has been a strait-jacket session from beginning to end. The session should have been called in January, and it is the government's responsibility that the session is in the position it is. The government has attempted to squeeze three months' business into a little more than three weeks, and now the Prime Minister comes and asks us to squeeze it again. I am not so sure that that is a proper proposal for the Prime Minister to make.

So far as our party is concerned we want to examine, not with any political motive but in the national interest, the estimates of the different departments that are being brought forward under the war appropriations. I am inclined to think from the tone of the Prime Minister's remarks that the questioning and the criticism of the opposition are becoming perhaps just a little too severe and the Prime Minister wants to dissolve parliament so that we cannot have any more light thrown on the departments that are coming up under the war appropriations.

We have always cooperated with respect to the work before the session and we shall continue to do so. Any kind of threat or any attempt to wave the big stick is not going to interfere with our attending to the national business, which the people have sent us here to do.

My followers and I will consider the proposal the Prime Minister has made this afternoon and in due course we will make known our decision in the light of what we think is the national interest.

Mr. COLDWELL: As time is so short I think we should be occupying our time much better if we went into the estimates.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to ask the Prime Minister one question with reference to the memorandum he just read. One item has been left out of it that should have been included. How many days are allowed to expire between the death of this parliament on the seventeenth and the date of the general election?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not know that that would properly appear in the particular memorandum I have just read. This parliament will expire at midnight on the sixteenth—if this House of Commons is not sooner dissolved. I understand that my hon. friend is asking how many days after that can elapse before the date of the election is made known.

Mr. MacNICOL: How many days must elapse before an election must take place; what is the shortest period of time before the polling date?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is no set time. There have been instances where parliament has been dissolved and it has been several weeks before the date of polling was made known. I have, however, already indicated to the house that I have no intention of proceeding in that way. I am prepared to announce the date of the election before the expiration of this parliament by efflux of time if hon. gentlemen opposite give me the opportunity.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): I should like to ask the Prime Minister just one question on the basis of his lengthy remarks.

I do not think I can add very much to what the leader of the opposition has stated. The Prime Minister frequently asks for co-operation, but it seems to me that his understanding of cooperation is that it should be one-sided. It is always the opposition that is asked to cooperate. I am ready to cooperate at all times, but since the Prime Minister has said that the people are the supreme authority I am always going to ask myself whether cooperation is in accordance with the will of the people. That was a nice statement to make but as a matter of fact the supreme authority in Canada is the Prime Minister himself. That is all there is to it.

The Prime Minister said that if we concluded quickly he would be ready to announce the date of the election. Let us have some cooperation the other way. Let the Prime Minister announce the date of the election now and leave it to the opposition to decide whether the business of the house should be wound up this week.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would not presume to override what is implied either in the constitution of the country or by the authority of parliament. When parliament has concluded its business, it then becomes my duty to make an announcement as to the election. To do anything of the kind in advance would not only be assuming authority which my hon. friend, though quite erroneously, has kindly stated I already possess as being the supreme authority; it would be going far beyond that.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

RETIREMENT OF GENERAL PEARKES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence, in view of what the Prime Minister has just said, that only a few days more, as we all know, remain of this session. I have asked a number of questions on the order paper; they have been on the order paper for three weeks; also orders for returns have been passed by the house, yet no returns have yet been brought down in answer to my questions. I am anxious to receive these returns before this house dies. I would therefore ask the parliamentary assistant if I may now have copies of all correspondence, telegrams and communications asked by me some twenty-one days ago, passing between General Pearkes and the Department of National Defence.

Mr. D. C. ABBOTT (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence):

That question was passed as an order for a return. Probably the Secretary of State can answer my hon. friend's question.

Mr. BRUCE: Yes, it was passed as an order for return.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Mr. BRUCE: I should like to know when the return will be produced.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): I think that the hon. member for Parkdale raised on Friday last the question addressed to the parliamentary assistant, and I had an inquiry made as to the information with regard to General Pearkes. My hon. friend's question, as he worded it on Friday, rather implied that the question which was made an order for a return referred to General Pearkes alone, but actually it dealt not only with General Pearkes but with all his officers in the Pacific command. Under those circumstances I think the hon. member and the house will realize that it involves looking over a large number of files, not only here but at headquarters of the Pacific command. It was the wording of the question itself that makes that imperative and I presume has delayed the return to the order of the house.

Mr. ABBOTT: There was one other order for the production of correspondence and instructions. I think that return will be brought down to-morrow.

Mr. BRUCE: May I say in reply to the Secretary of State that the correspondence is all on file, and whether it relates to General Pearkes or his officers is immaterial.

Mr. McLARTY: The question was not limited to correspondence. It refers to information.

Mr. BRUCE: The question referred to is this, and it was passed as an order for a return on March 26:

Mr. Bruce:

1. Has the Minister of National Defence any information to cause him to believe that General Pearkes and his officers in the Pacific command did not carry out the minister's instructions to put forth their best efforts to induce draftees to go active?

2. If so, what is such information and the grounds for such belief?

3. Is there any information on the files of the Department of National Defence which establishes that General Pearkes did not, with fidelity, discharge his duties in securing the enlistment for general service of home defence personnel under his command?

And so on. Surely that can be answered here and at once. It is all humbug to say that you require a longer time.

War Appropriation—The Army

Mr. McLARTY: The hon. member for Parkdale has to do what each member of this house has to do, namely, assume that every department of government is acting in perfectly good faith, and to suggest that it is a matter of humbug when the preparation of the return involves a tremendous amount of work and going through a large number of files is surely not worthy of the hon. member for Parkdale. While he says that it should be answered here and now, he, like every other member of this house, will have to take the answer that is given by the department as to why any necessary delay ensues.

Mr. BRUCE: Last summer during the session I had an experience of the same kind when I repeatedly asked for returns to questions directed to the Minister of Pensions and National Health, and on the last day of the session I asked if it was too late to bring the returns down that he had delayed until the last day. He got into a state of great annoyance, and the session died and I did not receive those answers. I am afraid that is going to happen again in this case.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): In reply to the point just raised by the hon. member for Parkdale, may I say that I was ready with the replies on the last day of the session, but he did not find it convenient to remain here and went home.

Mr. BRUCE: I was here, but did not receive those replies, because you did not produce them.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as a matter of privilege, and in view of the fact that I am mentioned in the question, I should like to place on the table some correspondence between the Victoria council of the legion and myself in connection with it.

Mr. GRAYDON: What question is the hon. member referring to?

Mr. GARDINER: The question referred to by the hon. member for Parkdale.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Friday, April 6, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Isley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

[Mr. Bruce.]

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

The CHAIRMAN: We are on the estimates for the army.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make some observations on this resolution, which reads:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide, inter alia,

1. That sums not exceeding $2,000,000,000 be granted to His Majesty towards defraying any expenses or making any advances or loans that may be incurred or granted by or under the authority of the governor in council during the year ending March 31, 1946, for—

(a) the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada.

And so forth. The Prime Minister announced a few minutes ago that we are to send delegates to the San Francisco conference. The Prime Minister also stated that a general election is necessary to know in whom the confidence of the people of this country lies. Answering the Prime Minister I say that the delegates we shall send to San Francisco will not be responsible to the people of Canada because they will no longer be members of the House of Commons or elected by the people of Canada. Nor will it be a peace conference.

The CHAIRMAN: I believe it is time the committee confined itself to the estimates before it. We are not discussing the San Francisco conference now.

Mr. LACOMBE: Then, Mr. Chairman, I shall discuss other matters.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Translation): This resolution relates to all phases of the war. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has made this clear when he outlined to the committee the war effort that Canada intends to launch against Japan, after the victory of our armed forces in Europe. It follows from his statements that young men who have been mobilized for the defence of this country will participate in the war against Japan. That is another adventure for which those who have supported participation and mobilization must be held responsible. As I stated in the debate on the San Francisco conference—

Some hon. MEMBERS (Translation): Order.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): I ask you, Mr. Chairman if I may not at least mention it, since we are now discussing a resolution which reads in part as follows:

That sums not exceeding $2,000,000,000 be granted to His Majesty towards defraying any expenses or making any advances or loans that may be incurred or granted by or under the authority of the governor in council during the year ending March 31, 1946, for—

(a) the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada.

I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that there is equal justice for all in this house, and that we are at least allowed to make an incidental mention of the San Francisco conference, without being told by hon. members who support the government that it is against the rules of the house.

Mr. ABBOTT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, the San Francisco conference has nothing to do with the resolution now before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): Order. We are now considering the war appropriations of the Department of National Defence (Army). Knowing that the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) would be the last among the hon. members to proceed when he is out of order, I would ask him to confine himself, as much as possible, to the matter now before the chair.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): I am surprised that the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence should have interrupted me. Indeed, I heard in this house last Friday the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), as well as the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), reviewing at length the programme of the Progressive Conservative party. Nevertheless, we shall confine ourselves to the debate.

Compulsory military service will remain in Canada even after the war. I am opposed to this disastrous policy, as I have always been opposed to participation in the war, mobilization and conscription. The resolution now under consideration provides for the enforcement of conscription in Canada in its participation in the war against Japan.

I shall quote sub-paragraph (b) of paragraph 1:

(b) the conduct of naval, military and air operations in or beyond Canada.

Therefore, the estimates we are requested to vote will be used to conscript our men for all war theatres, including Japan, unless the mobilization act and the order in council P.C. 8891 are immediately repealed, since the mobilization act and conscription are still in force. Order in council P.C. 8891 will be enforced.

At the start of my remarks, I call the attention of the committee to excerpts from Hansard of March 30 and 31, 1939. The members will, once again, note in what way the government have kept their solemn pledges. The paragraphs I shall read in a moment have been published and reproduced by the Canadian National Liberal Association, with headquarters in Ottawa. Here are the sacred pledges that the government have taken on conscription. The right hon. the Prime Minister said:

The present government believes that conscription of men for overseas service would not be a necessary or an effective step. Let me say that so long as this government may be in power, no such measure will be enacted. (Page 2426, House of Commons Debates, March 30, 1939.)

The former Minister of Justice, the late the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe added:

I think I am true to my concept of Canadian unity when I say that I shall always fight against this policy; I would not be a member of a government that would enact it; and not only that, but I say with all my responsibility to the people of Canada that I would oppose any government that would enforce it. (Page 2468.)

Here is what the hon. the Prime Minister had to say about participation:

One strategic fact is clear: the days of great expeditionary forces of infantry crossing the oceans are not likely to recur. Two years ago, I expressed in this house the view that it was extremely doubtful if any of the British dominions would ever send another expeditionary force to Europe.

We have tremendous tasks to do at home, in housing the people, in caring for the aged and helpless, in relieving drought and unemployment, in building roads, in meeting our heavy burden of debt, in making provision for Canada's defence, and in bringing our standards of living and civilization to the levels our knowledge now makes possible. There is no great margin of realizable wealth for this purpose; we must, to a greater or less extent, choose between keeping our own house in order, and trying to save Europe and Asia. (Pages 2426 and 2419 of Hansard for March 30, 1939, re participation.)

On March 31, 1939, the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, former Minister of Justice, said, as reported in Hansard, page 2469:

I agree with what was said yesterday by the leader of the opposition and the Prime Minister, and what was said by Mr. Bruce of Australia, that the time for expeditionary forces overseas is certainly past, and it would not be the most effective way to help our allies. The men would be needed here; and in any event it is parliament which will decide about it.

Please note, Mr. Chairman, that these words were uttered by the Prime Minister and the former minister of justice barely five months before Canada entered the war by the express will of the government. At this stage of my remarks, I should like to have some literature issued by the National Liberal Association, with headquarters in Ottawa, distributed to my former Liberal colleagues. I shall hand this document to the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) who will see to it that it is passed on to the page boys so that everyone may be kept posted.

War Appropriation—The Army

And it is this same government, through the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bertrand), which dares to charge us with isolationism. It is the same party which, for twenty-five years, has advocated isolationism in Canada, and which dares to give us a lesson in patriotism.

And what of the sudden about-face of the present government which, in June, 1940, imposed compulsory military service in Canada? I quote the following from "Canada at War", issue of February-March, 1945, page 74:

The military call-up was instituted in 1940. In that summer, parliament passed the National Resources Mobilization Act, which is usually referred to as N.R.M.A. This is the statute which has provided the authority to the governor in council for the calling up of men for compulsory military training.

In a speech delivered recently in this house, the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix) warned the government against our participation in the Pacific war. However, the Minister of National Defence (navy) (Mr. Macdonald) has intimated that this participation was already an accomplished fact. Such a decision had been taken prior to the minister's announcement, and without parliament's authorization. Once more, the representatives of the people have been ignored in regard to events of the utmost gravity which again involve all our resources, as evidenced by the following excerpt from the February-March, 1945 issue of "Canada at War", page 86:

First official indication of the composition of the Canadian naval force in the Pacific was given by navy minister Macdonald in February. It will include ships ranging from frigates to aircraft carriers and will operate in close co-operation with the Royal Navy. Corvettes will likely be used sparingly, if at all.

The cruiser, H.M.C.S. Uganda, commissioned in October in a U.S. navy yard, will soon be at its battle station in the southwest Pacific. It will be joined by H.M.C.S. Ontario, a cruiser now being built in Belfast. Two light fleet aircraft carriers under construction in the U.K. are expected to join the Canadian navy for Pacific duty. Each will carry complement of 1,250 and be Canadian-manned except for air crew.

Canadian Tribal class destroyers, including the four now being built in Canada, will also serve in the Pacific. Probably not more than 250 Canadian ships and approximately 39,000 seamen may see action in the Pacific. With the exception of key men, these will be enlisted for service in that theatre on a voluntary basis.

The prime minister has, in the first place, claimed that Canada's participation in the Pacific war would this time, be on a voluntary basis. The government leader has broken so many promises and pledges and he has done so little to keep his word that I find it impossible to give credence to his statements. Total conscription, which already exists, will be enforced in the Pacific war as it has been on all other war theatres in the world. Such statements are mere propaganda on the eve of a general election. If the government guilelessly believes that the people will let themselves forever be deceived, they are mistaken, but if the government are sincere and loyal in that statement, let them repeal at once the mobilization act and order in council 8891 passed in November last. The government leader has, on the other hand, asserted that the draftees being trained in Canada will participate in the war against Japan. It cannot be said that they are volunteers—they are conscripts—the name "draftees" has been changed for that of "men conscripted for the defence of Canada". Therefore, I was right in my constant opposition to the government's foreign policy.

Mr. LEDUC (Translation): It was in order to save the country.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): On March 23 last, the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Lalonde) made the following remarks in this house, as reported in Hansard:

To refuse such cooperation would, in my opinion, mean a betrayal of mankind's interests.

Let those who advocate such a policy assume the responsibility for their action before the young Canadians who made the supreme sacrifice, before those who have suffered and who hope that their martyrdom will inspire to those who have not yet wept other humanitarian motives than paltry political advantages.

A little further on, in the same speech, he said: "We are neither cowards nor traitors".

The hon. member should be extremely cautious, because he lives in a glass-house. I shall show him in a few moments that we do not need any lessons from him in courage and loyalty.

At the time when the only member of the Quebec legislature who fought in Europe, was under fire on the beaches of Normandy, the Liberal party, for which the hon. member for Labelle takes up the cudgels, was treacherously stabbing him in the back. Lieut.-Col. Sauv e—

Mr. LALONDE (Translation): He had more courage than you.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): But you had not enough courage to defend him in his constituency, while I was contributing to his victory. The hon. member can answer me later. While Lieut.-Col. Sauv e, a member of the Quebec Legislature, was up against merciless opposition in that same constituency, through the action, the fault and the fanaticism of the party of the hon. member for Labelle—

Mr. LALONDE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order—

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): —who was the first—

Mr. LALONDE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order—

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): —dared to nominate a candidate to oppose the member for Two Mountains.

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): A point of order has been raised. The hon. member must take his seat.

Mr. LALONDE (Translation): I ask the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains to withdraw the words which he has just uttered. I do not think that the expression which he has used is worthy of a member of parliament. It is unparliamentary, and I ask him to withdraw his statement. Further, I had nothing to do with the candidature of Lieutenant-Colonel Paul Sauvé in Two Mountains. Those responsible for opposing him did not belong to the dominion Liberal party. If my hon. friend has a grudge against certain members of the Quebec Liberal party because, as he claims, they have broken a pledge not to oppose Lieutenant-Colonel Sauvé, let him take up the matter with Mr. Godbout and quit bothering us in Ottawa.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): Is the hon. member speaking on a point of order or is he making a speech?

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): The hon. member for Labelle has justifiably raised a point of order. I wish to indicate to the hon. members that they must confine their remarks to the matter under consideration. The committee is now examining the appropriations for the army. This is not an opportune moment to discuss the speeches which were delivered in connection with the San Francisco conference.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Let him make amends.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): I am not speaking about the San Francisco conference but about the fight waged against a company commander on the firing line. I never said anything about the fanaticism of the hon. member for Labelle, but I spoke about the fanaticism of the party to which he belongs. He seems to have misunderstood me.

Mr. LALONDE (Translation): Then you withdraw your statement?

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): I withdraw nothing, for I have nothing to withdraw. At this point in my remarks, I suppose I may quote from the February and March issue of "Canada at War", page 58:

Summing up the work of the First Canadian Army since it entered its first great battle as an army in France on August 7, 1944, General Crerar said in his Christmas message: "It has fought forward some 450 miles throughout France, Belgium and Holland. It has met and defeated, either in whole or in part, 59 enemy divisions, of which 11 were SS (Elite Corps) and Panzer type and 48 were infantry and other types. It has captured from the enemy nearly 120,000 prisoners. It has a right to be proud of its record."

It was at the very moment when the great battle of France was being fought, that the Liberal party was conducting a shameless campaign against a company commander who was risking his life, at every moment, on the firing line.

Even the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Claxton) had his word to say, on March 27. He might very well have started with re-edifying his popularity in the riding he represents in parliament. Let him tell us, for example, why the Minister of National Defence, Mr. McNaughton, was so shamefully defeated in Grey North? Mr. Chairman, the slackers who have allowed and encouraged the fight against the election of Lieutenant-Colonel Paul Sauvé, in Two Mountains, would no doubt be in a position to supply information about the campaign waged against General McNaughton. The junior member of the cabinet accuses me of being an isolationist and a defeatist. I answer him: You are a defeatist yourself, for the party to which you belong has done everything in its power to ensure the defeat of an officer at the front, while I was sparing nothing to make his victory possible.

The defeat of the Minister of National Defence in the Grey North by-election has caused the Prime Minister to hesitate about calling a session of parliament. However, he had made up his mind, long before, to remain in power to the very last day. The Prime Minister should have advised His Excellency the Governor General to dissolve parliament as early as June 18, 1940. . . .

Mr. LEDUC (Translation): Even before that.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): Indeed, on June 18, 1940, when the government introduced the mobilization bill they were stripped of their mandate. They had no authority to proceed with this legislation. They had been elected on March 26, 1940, on a policy of moderate, voluntary and free participation in the conflict.

The 1942 plebiscite was nothing but a shameful deceit. Did he need to be relieved from the pledges he had broken two years before? He had solemnly promised never to enforce conscription and scarcely three months after his election on March 26, 1940, he was already enforcing it.

It is desired to make us believe that conscription is in force only since November 1944. That is nothing but trickery and deceit! Ask the young men called for military training since 1940 whether conscription is in force in Canada, and since what time it is.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Since the beginning of the war.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): Ask the families of draftees who have been wounded or even shot dead by the military police, to tell you since what time conscription exists. Ask the young men who, since 1940, have been haled before the courts, and have been so arraigned for a period of almost five years, for having neglected to answer an order calling them for military training, whether we have conscription since 1940 or not.

Have not the people been enough deceived by unscrupulous politicians of every ilk? They have too long been a prey to fear, uncertainty and heaps of lies from a whole legion of public men. They only want the opportunity of restoring truth in its right place and of doing justice to their so oft-betrayed country. If the constitution is not a fiction, parliament should be dissolved at once. It should have been dissolved as soon as the government broke their pledges, less than three months after the general election held on March 26, 1940. It does not matter if London extends the term of the British parliament. We do not want to follow in the wake of London. We demand a general election without any delay. The reasons so far given by the Prime Minister for postponing a general election are but idle pretexts. The victory loan and the San Francisco conference should not delay the election. Who has ever proved that an election campaign would be detrimental to the victory loan campaign? Nobody. That is merely a political bugbear. As regards the San Francisco conference, those selected to represent Canada there will have no mandate to do so since the term of parliament will then have expired.

Let the government face their responsibility and go to the country. I understand their fear: It is hardly interesting for them to meet the electors after they have deceived and betrayed them so many times. But the day of reckoning cannot be eluded. Let them forward! The personal interest of a member or a government is of so little importance. There are so many problems that await a solution. The nation's interest is the thing which matters and that is what the people shall decide in the next general election. The citizens of this country will sever the last ties that bind them to a government which has done the very opposite of what they had repeatedly promised to do or abstain from doing. They will take away the government of the country from those who by an exaggerated war effort, an effort beyond our strength, have led them to the brink of ruination. They will spurn the blandishments and camouflage of a government which has consistently misled them before and since Canada's entry into the war. Is it not a fact that the Prime Minister has just declared, in reply to an article which appeared in a Montreal newspaper, that our participation in the war against Japan could not be a modest effort? He has left far behind his policy of a voluntary, free and moderate war effort. Since the Prime Minister himself has admitted that our soldiers who will take part in the war against Japan have already been mobilized for the defence of Canada, there can be no question of a voluntary system but indeed of conscription to be enforced once more. That is what we are opposed to and we will fight against it unremittingly.

The government is therefore making arrangements to attend the San Francisco conference while making preparations for a stepped up war effort. Canada will make international commitments which are still more dangerous. A warlike atmosphere rather than an atmosphere of peace will prevail at that conference. The events which I had foreseen are already taking shape. So far Canada has been very gullible and will continue to be the dupe. We have no possessions to defend and no territorial ambitions. While we shall defend British interests and American claims in the Pacific, thanks to a so-called peace conference held in an extremely strained warlike atmosphere, our delegates will agree, at that conference, that Canada, after all the sacrifices she has made, is ready and willing to police the world. To attain this purpose, conscription will be imposed in Canada even in peace time. Our youth will be liable to compulsory military service even when the war is over. This is a most condemnable policy which will emerge from the conference of San Francisco where predatory nations will as ever force their views upon intermediate and small nations. What business have we got in that adventure? For my part, I have already condemned this disastrous policy and I remain opposed to all those regrettable ventures.

Mr. EDWARDS: At the outset I should like to pay a modest tribute to the learned and brilliant man who has presented to the house the estimates and report of the Minister of National Defence. Through him, sir, I should like to express my tribute of appreciation to that distinguished scientist, that great soldier, that great Canadian who was the architect of the Canadian Army, the minister whom he has the honour to represent in the house. As a scientist, the minister appreciates scientific skill, knowledge and ability. Under his leadership the Canadian Army came to be regarded as perhaps the most efficiently effective of any of the allied armies; and because of that fact I approach him, through his parliamentary assistant, with a problem the solution of which I believe will mean much to the welfare and effectiveness of our Canadian soldiers, sailors and airmen, and at the same time give belated recognition to one branch of science in Canada to-day.

My remarks are directed primarily to the pharmaceutical services in the navy, army and air forces. For the last four years, though I did not know about it until last fall, the Canadian Pharmaceutical Association, composed of over four thousand registered, fully-trained and for the most part graduate pharmacists, has been urging upon the service ministers the use of trained pharmacists as such in the armed services, and their recognition as such, in accordance with their professional training and the contribution they make to the physical fitness and fighting ability of the men and women in the Canadian armed forces.

I was surprised, as I am sure many hon. members will be, to learn that this movement has not met with the immediate and spontaneous response which might reasonably have been expected; yet when I looked into the matter I found that in the United States it was only in 1943, after thirty years of effort, education, instruction and appeal, that the pharmaceutical corps of that country was brought into being by presidential decree following an act of congress. For over twenty years the pharmacists of this country have been agitating for the setting up of a pharmaceutical corps to service our armed forces, and for many more years a similar agitation has been carried on in Britain. Only the other day in a British journal I read the comment of a Canadian pharmacist, who said that pharmacy as practised in the British army had not changed since the days of the Crimean war, and I believe the same comment could be made, in regard to the pharmaceutical service rendered our fighting men and women to-day. I was astounded to learn, what I believe to be true, that while in every province of Canada a druggist or pharmacist is not permitted to compound or fill prescriptions containing drugs without having been licensed, following the granting of a university degree or after an apprenticeship of several years, nevertheless, as I appreciate the situation to-day, the men and women of our fighting services are supplied with drugs and pharmaceutical preparations by men and women who have no such qualifications, who have no knowledge of the value of such drugs and chemicals, and who have been given only the most cursory training—two or three months—in the dispensing of these supplies.

I was curious to learn why this situation should exist in the army and the navy and, I must confess to a lesser degree, the air force. As far as I can discover, in Canada, as in Great Britain and the United States, the opposition has come from the senior service, the medical branch, who apparently have resisted and continue to resist any inroads upon their rights or domain, as professional men. The whole opposition in the United States, as the congressional record reveals, came from the medical and surgical branch of the services. I believe the opposition in this country also comes from that branch of the services. That is the same branch which for thirty years opposed the establishment of a dental corps. Do hon. members realize that for the first time in 1939, and only since the outbreak of this war, we have had a Canadian dental corps serving all three branches of the services, the navy, the army and the air force? Such inquiry as I have been able to make from members of the dental corps, would indicate that there also the opposition to its formation came from the senior service, the medical branch. I believe it to be true that never in the history of the Canadian army, navy or air force have our fighting men and women received better dental care and attention. I believe it to be a fact that the Canadian airman, soldier and sailor is better looked after from the dental point of view than any other fighting man or woman in any other allied service. I believe that is directly due to the fact that the Canadian dental corps as such is free and independent, that it does not report to nor is it subject to the direction of the army medical corps; it reports to the adjutant general of the army. It administers a service overseas as well as across Canada to the navy, army and air force personnel without embarrassment or hindrance from the medical branches of those three services.

I believe that our fighting personnel are entitled to pharmaceutical services and treatment as good or even better than those provided for civilians. In addition to the hazards of actual combat and fighting with the enemy, the personnel of our army, navy and air force should not be subjected to the additional hazards of having injected into their bodies or having to take orally pharmaceuticals, chemicals and drugs which are administered and dispensed by other than the most capable and competent people. It is for this reason that I feel perfectly justified in representing to the parliamentary assistant that this situation should be thoroughly investigated, first, from the point of view of service to our fighting personnel and, second, with a view to giving belated recognition and granting the appropriate status, promotion and pay to a segment of the professional life of this country who have heretofore been denied recognition.

Similar recognition has been granted to the nursing sorority, if you will; it has been granted to the dental fraternity and to the engineering profession. Apparently it has been granted to the clerical staff because there is a separate corps of clerks. There is a pay corps as such which is remunerated and controlled within itself. I think the time has come when we should take a lead. Instead of standing by and asking what is done in Great Britain or what we have done in the past, we should do just as we have done in connection with clothing and equipment for the fighting services and in providing the tools of war. The Canadian soldier is entitled to the best that Canadian brains and ingenuity can give him, and we should carry this same principle through with regard to the pharmaceutical preparations, drugs and service which the fighting man needs and which should be the best that can possibly be supplied.

The establishment of the dental corps resulted in a decided increase in the physical fitness and well-being of our fighting services without any additional expense to the government. I believe that the setting up of a pharmaceutical corps to serve all three branches of our fighting forces would permit us to use the technical skill, knowledge and ability available to us, and would also result in a corresponding reduction in cost. Does anyone believe that you can provide separate pharmaceutical services, depots, transportation and dispensing facilities for the army, navy, and air force, each operated separately, as cheaply or as efficiently as you can provide such services with a corps concentrated under one control as is the case with the dental corps?

I am well aware, and I would expect the parliamentary assistant to make reference to it, of the fact that as late as May of this year there was a routine order passed covering part of the representations I have made to-day. Canadian army routine order 4444, dated May 6, 1944, states:

1. It is essential that a standard be set to cover the qualifications of all pharmacists, officers and other ranks, who may have the custody of, or who may dispense narcotics or other dangerous drugs. This refers particularly to personnel covering off vacancies for pharmacists on all military hospitals and medical inspection rooms.

2. The following standard will, therefore, apply:

(a) All personnel employed in the Canadian army (active) as pharmacists or dispensers shall be graduates in good standing in pharmacy, of a university or recognized school of pharmacy.

(b) Personnel qualified for group B and C under "Instructions regarding trade tests and rates of pay, pharmacists and dispensers", may be employed as assistants, where the establishment permits.

3. Unqualified personnel are, therefore, to be replaced immediately by personnel qualified in accordance with the above.

4. This order supersedes other instructions issued with respect to qualifications of pharmacists.

I draw your attention to the fact that that order, the first of its kind, was passed only as recently as May 6, 1944, after we had been in the war for over four years.

The air force is not tied down so much by precedent. As a rule it has been more alert and more ready to appreciate the value and necessity of providing its personnel with the very best of pharmaceutical and other services. After representations had been made, it took prompt steps to see that our airmen were supplied with pharmaceuticals and drugs only by competent men. In a letter dated July 20, 1944, to the chairman of the Canadian Pharmaceutical Association, the chief of the air staff states:

The following information in regard to your letter of July 12, 1944, may serve your purpose.

(a) Approximately eighty graduate pharmacists are employed in their professional capacity in the R.C.A.F. An establishment exists in all R.C.A.F. hospitals of thirty beds or over for registered pharmacists.

(b) The ranks of pharmacists, with few exceptions, are, to-day, from sergeant to warrant officer 1st class. Positions for commissioned officer pharmacists have recently been created in R.C.A.F. hospitals of one hundred and fifty beds and over.

(c) A division of pharmacy has been established in the Directorate of Medical Services for Air. Two officers, in the ranks of flight lieutenant and pilot officer, are in charge and are responsible to the Director of Medical Services for Air for the standards of pharmaceutical practice in the R.C.A.F. Both of these officers are graduate pharmacists.

(d) All non-commissioned officer pharmacists in the R.C.A.F. are in the highest degree of trade grouping and, as a result, receive an additional seventy-five cents a day for their rank.

I do not think the matter has gone far enough. I believe that the pharmacist profession as such, as well as the pharmacists in the armed services, are all of the opinion that they could serve Canada and the fighting forces more efficiently, effectively and economically if a pharmaceutical corps were established. I think the time has come when effect should be given to the considered and distinguished opinions of men who are most capable and most competent of passing an opinion on this subject. Unfortunately I did not serve in the last war for physical reasons, nor have I been privileged to serve in this one, but there are members of this house who did. I wonder if this experience is common to any of them. A veteran of two former wars and now a practising pharmacist writes as follows— for obvious reasons I do not wish to disclose his name:

Ottawa has laid down hundreds of regulations regarding the handling of dangerous drugs, namely narcotics, phenobarbital, the sulfas, even methyl hydrate for use in civilian practice but allows those with only rudimentary training to issue them for "the cream of the population." Is the service man not entitled to as much protection as the civilian?

When the medical officer goes up the line, the sergeant takes the sick parade whatever his qualifications. I've guzzled number nines at the order of these paper salesmen, gulped spirits ammonia aromas administered by equally incompetent.

Another druggist in the service writes me as follows:

Here in camp at our M.I.R. room—

I believe that is the medical inspection room.

—they dish out cough medicine and other medicine in old coke and whiskey bottles with no labels on them. It seems to me that men qualified for this job should be there in place of men who have no training.

I was speaking less than a month ago to a graduate pharmacist who is home in Calgary on leave. I asked him about this particular phase of army life, and I am advised by him that in a medical report centre in Montreal at which any serviceman may report for treatment the man in the dispensing room was not a trained or graduate pharmacist. He said:

I was there for a month, and he was senior to me; I helped him.

Another graduate of the university of Alberta, with the degree of B.Sc., Ph., a young lad, got a postponement for a year and a half from selective service in order to complete his course in pharmacy so that he would be more useful to the army or navy or air force, as the case might be, and what happened to him? He was told that there was no future for him as a pharmacist in the army or navy and that he had better go into some other branch of the service. He went to Cornwallis, the naval establishment, and despite his best efforts to transfer from gunnery into the pharmaceutical branch was peremptorily told to continue or he would be sent to sea as an able seaman. In that same naval establishment, a friend of his, who was a gold medallist, if you please, in pharmacy, in his final year at the university was an assistant sick-bay attendant, taking orders and instructions from a senior in that establishment who had received no pharmaceutical training, was a graduate of no school of pharmacy and would never be allowed to use the training he was receiving in the navy to dispense drugs in civil life. This gold medallist was taking instructions and orders from that other lad who was senior to him in point of service.

One of the results of this practice is that we are going to have two problems so far as the rehabilitation of these men is concerned. The young man who was a graduate pharmacist will have lost interest in his profession because he has not been allowed to practise it in the service; on the other hand, you have the bookkeeper or clerk acting as a pharmacist and dispensing drugs, if you please, to our heroes when he will not be allowed to dispense for five minutes in any drugstore in any province in the Dominion of Canada. That is not only a waste of Canadian brains and ability, but it is doing definite harm to enthusiastic young lads who are anxious to serve their country to the best of their ability.

I could go on and give many other instances which have been brought to my attention. Suffice it to say that I hope that the parliamentary assistant to the minister will, when he replies, let the committee know what the situation is and justify the opposition to a proposal which seems to be fair, reasonable, economical and practicable and which puts a premium on scientific knowledge, skill and ability, rather than upon seniority and tradition.

War Appropriation—The Army

The pharmaceutical association recommended to the three service ministers the setting up of a Canadian pharmaceutical corps with headquarters at Ottawa presided over by a colonel, who would be responsible only to the adjutant general, as in the case of the dental corps; that he should have three assistant directors of pharmaceutical services, one each to act as liaison with the army, the navy and the air force respectively. Surely we can profit from the experience of men of science, men of business ability, men who in the hard school of practical experience have learned how to serve the public and serve it well, efficiently and scientifically. I still believe that there are medical men in this country, particularly in this day of highly complex compounded drugs, who appreciate the value of the services of a highly trained pharmacist, and who will support the demands of the pharmaceutical association and of pharmacists everywhere in the services for the establishment of a pharmacy corps. I trust the intelligent, thoughtful people of Canada will demand that a service considered good enough for the sailors and the soldiers of forty, fifty, sixty and seventy years ago shall be discarded as not good enough for the soldiers, sailors and airmen of to-day.

Mr. ABBOTT: The same question was raised by the leader of the opposition the other night, and I shall see that my hon. friend's remarks are brought to the attention of the officers of the department. I think I should tell him, though, that my information is that the representations to which he has referred have already been carefully considered by the department, and it is felt that the formation of a pharmaceutical corps is not justified, or a practical suggestion, since the numbers involved would not appear to justify the separate administration of a separate corps. The records indicate that the establishments overseas and in Canada provide for fewer than three hundred duly qualified pharmacists. These establishments were prepared after careful consideration had been given to the requirements of the Canadian army. As he no doubt knows, a number of qualified pharmacists have been given commissions. In fact, an old friend of mine with whom I went to school a good many years ago, and who has been overseas since 1939, is a pharmacist and a major. But it has been decided that there is insufficient reason for the formation of a corps at the present time. However, it is useful that this matter should be brought up, because, while we are getting near the end of this war, there may possibly be another one. I fear it is a little bit late now to form a pharmaceutical corps, and my information is that the decision taken against it is pretty definite.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): How would it compare with the dental corps?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have not the information, but I am sure there would be a very much larger number of dentists than of pharmacists.

The leader of the opposition asked me another question the other evening, as to what was the policy of the government with respect to married quarters. I have made some inquiries as to that, and I find that there exist relatively few such quarters in Canada. Some quarters were built originally for this purpose at Halifax, Quebec, Kingston, Toronto, Camp Borden, London, Winnipeg, Calgary and Esquimalt, but in a good many cases it has been necessary to take over some of these married quarters for officers or to house active soldiers. So far as policy is concerned, the policy during the present war has been not to construct additional married quarters because of the shortage of materials and labour. What the policy will be in the future I am not in a position to say.

Just one other point while I am on my feet. The hon. member for Yale asked me to give a statement as to the position with respect to farm leave.

As the committee probably knows, there are now three types of farm leave: first, compassionate leave; second, leave granted to assist in hog, dairy and beef production; third, spring and harvest leave. Perhaps I might outline the conditions governing these three types.

First, as to compassionate leave. In order to obtain compassionate farm leave, without pay and allowances, which is granted for the purpose of working on farms owned by members of the soldier's immediate family where there would be undue hardship if the leave were not granted, a soldier must apply in writing to his commanding officer who will, after investigation, forward it with his recommendation to the general officer commanding or district officer commanding concerned, who may authorize leave for such period as he deems advisable, but not to exceed six months. Subject to the exigencies of the service, the same officers may grant extensions for such periods not exceeding six months as they may consider advisable. The facilities of the national selective service mobilization bureau, dependents' board of trustees, auxiliary services or any provincial, municipal or civic organization may be used to investigate statements submitted on behalf of the soldier when it is considered to be necessary or desirable.

Mr. SENN: Is the decision of the commanding officer ever reversed by headquarters?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid I cannot answer that question offhand, but I will make inquiries and find out. They are usually handled by the district officer commanding.

Mr. SENN: Yes; I understand that.

Mr. ABBOTT: Then there is a new type of leave—the hog, dairy and beef production leave. To obtain this type of leave, which is granted without pay and allowances, the soldier must make application in writing to his commanding officer and the same procedure as I have outlined for compassionate farm leave, is followed. It may be granted to any soldier not eligible for reinforcements, including personnel returned from overseas on rotation who, in the opinion of the general officer commanding, district officer commanding or commanding officer, will be able to assist in or promote the production of hogs or dairy products and beef and, particularly, to soldiers who have been formerly employed in such enterprises. The soldier need not be related to the owner of the farm or enterprise concerned.

Finally, there is spring and harvest leave. This leave, which is also without pay and allowances, may be granted to such personnel as can be spared for the purpose of sowing crops, harvesting and aiding in spring and harvest operations, provided that the soldier has had actual experience in farm work. Application will be submitted in writing by the soldier to his commanding officer who will, after investigation, forward it with his recommendation to the general officer commanding or district officer commanding concerned, who may authorize leave for a period not exceeding two months and may make such investigations as he may deem necessary before approving the application.

Those are the three types of farm leave.

Mr. SENN: After a soldier has proceeded overseas, is compassionate leave or leave for these other purposes ever granted?

Mr. ABBOTT: Well, a soldier may be returned from overseas on compassionate grounds; and I think, subject to check, that that would include compassionate farm leave. It is naturally perhaps rather more carefully scrutinized in the case of the soldier who is serving overseas than it is here, but a man may be returned from overseas on compassionate grounds.

Mr. SENN: He still has to apply to his commanding officer overseas?

Mr. ABBOTT: He would have to apply to his commanding officer overseas, and it would have to be dealt with by the military authorities over there.

Mr. FAIR: Is there any method devised whereby the granting of leave can be speeded up? It seems to me that quite considerable time is spent by the army authorities and selective service officials in arranging for leave or deciding whether leave can be granted. We are now into the spring season, and a number of men who should be released are not yet released.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know that any special method is being devised. Instructions have been issued to deal with these applications as expeditiously as possible, because it is realized that in respect of seeding leave, now is the time when men would be needed. I suppose the same applies to the new type of leave, namely, that to assist in dairy production.

Mr. FAIR: Then I have a further question to ask: Where soldiers have made application for leave to their commanding officers, and before such leave has been granted, they are transferred to another camp in Canada, possibly several hundreds of miles away from home. Will the department make arrangements to see that these men do not have to pay their railway fare back home?

Mr. SENN: I should like to emphasize that point, because I have known of cases where men have been removed to other camps. For some reason or another their applications have not followed them, and considerable time has been required to make out new application forms. There has been difficulty in getting those soldiers home in time.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall see that that point is brought to the attention of the department.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Lately I have received many requests respecting farm leave. The parliamentary assistant has pointed out that there are three types of leave for boys in the services who are to work on the farms. In almost every case, however, there seems to be some loophole. For instance, they are granted leave if they can be spared. I do not know whether this is intentional, but in many cases where farm lads are applying for leave they are being told distinctly that they are needed more in the army than in agriculture.

War Appropriation—The Army

I think the parliamentary assistant should know that in some cases the officers in charge of the camps where applications are made are refusing to accept these applications for farm leave. I am not going to say that the commanding officers always do that. In some cases even before the lads get to the commanding officer they are discouraged from making application. Then, as soon as a request is made for farm leave, as has been indicated, these boys are immediately transferred to some other camp.

Obviously, whoever is doing this is doing it for a purpose, namely to get the boys out of that jurisdiction before any pressure can be put on to have them released for farm leave. Some cases of this kind have come to my attention. I shall not deal with them specifically, because some are under investigation now—and I must say that the department has been very good in trying to trace down the facts.

There have been instances, however, where boys have made representations to the officers at their camps, especially in the west—and I have Calgary in mind—and they have been told outright, "We need you for the army, and that is where you are going to go; there is no use in your putting in an application for farm leave, because if your father cannot carry on his farm he had better sell it"

I do not think it is the intention of the government to have a condition of that kind. The army may take the position that they are requesting so many men from each district, and the only place from which they can get them is from the farms. One of the authorities on the mobilization board told me pointedly, "Ottawa tells us that we have to get so many men for the army, possibly 25,000. You know as well as I do that we have got nearly everybody around the country, with the exception of the lads on the farms. If Ottawa tells us we have to get 25,000 men from this military district, or this section of the country, will you tell me where we will get them, if we do not take them off the farms?" And so long as they are told they have to get 25,000 men they say they will have to get them from wherever they can.

So far as the army is concerned, it may be that they are faced with an impossible task. They are asked to produce so many reinforcements for the army; and, of course, the only place they can get them is from wherever they may be available. That would be the farms.

The parliamentary assistant has just indicated that leave was granted for beef and hog production, if the men were not eligible for reinforcements. If those boys are in uniform, either in the home defence army or in general service, they are eligible for reinforcements.

Mr. ABBOTT: By that I meant if they were of a category, physical condition, training, and the like, eligible for reinforcements. If they were line of communications troops, well and good.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): A case may come up where a boy might be in the home defence army, and might have an A-1 physical category. But that boy may be required on the farm; he may be an only son.

Mr. ABBOTT: He would be eligible for compassionate leave, but he would not be eligible for hog, dairy and beef production leave.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I speak from memory when I say that there was a stipulation as to his being spared. Which category was that?

Mr. ABBOTT: Hog, beef and dairy production leave. He does not have to be a farmer and does not have to be related to the person on whose farm he would work. Presumably he would not be given leave unless he had had some experience in farming. But, as distinguished from the other two types of leave, he does not have to be related or connected in any way with the farmer for whom he may work, provided that it is considered he is qualified to do that kind of work. Against that, he must not be of the physical category and training which would qualify him for reinforcements overseas. We have to provide a certain number of reinforcements of the men in that physical category. That is a top priority. It is ahead of growing beef and hogs, or the production of dairy products.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I agree with the parliamentary assistant. I have been one who has always contended that the army is one of our first requirements. But I also agree with the Minister of Agriculture who said last session that there had to be some protection for the farmer.

Mr. ABBOTT: If I might interrupt my hon. friend at that point, let us not get confused in this discussion between action taken by mobilization boards and the leave granted a man after he is in the army. My information is that military representatives on the mobilization boards—and they are handled by the Department of Labour, the selective service branch—have been instructed not to oppose the granting of leave to farmers under the circumstances. I think it will be found that there are very few farmers being called up to-day under selective service regulations, if they choose to claim exemption. There are a number of cases where chaps who have worked on the farm have entered the army and have been quite content to stay there, but when they are posted for overseas they then make application for farm leave. The committee will realize that a considerable amount of reluctance might be displayed to the granting of that leave in these circumstances.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I realize that some of these matters come before the mobilization boards.

Mr. ABBOTT: All of it, so far as the call-up is concerned.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Yes; and that necessarily comes under the Department of Labour. But in some instances both the army and the mobilization boards are responsible. I have in mind the case of a boy in uniform. He made application to the selective service mobilization board, of which Chief Justice Harvey of Edmonton was chairman. Every effort was made to discourage him in his endeavour to get off for farm assistance. Then, when it came to making application to his commanding officer, he could not even get there. There are many cases of that kind. If we are to have anything like the production for which the Minister of Agriculture is asking, especially in western Canada, some recognition must be given these boys. It is all right for the department to set out rules and regulations under which the boys can get compassionate leave for agricultural work. But if the army authorities are to override those regulations, and if when applications are made the boys are to be moved to some other camp, we in the west will be right up against it this spring so far as farm help is concerned. I think the parliamentary assistant should make further investigation in regard to the action that is being taken by the army authorities and the selective service mobilization board in hustling these fellows away so that they are not allowed to get back into agriculture.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will make some inquiries into that.

Mr. SENN: Before we leave this subject I should like to ask if regulations are issued to the commanding officers in regard to this matter?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct. Instructions have gone out with respect to this new leave and instructions had gone out previously with respect to the other two types of leave.

Mr. SENN: Are the instructions mandatory, or is it in the discretion of the commanding officer as to whether or not he grants this leave? That is the question I have been wondering about.

Mr. ABBOTT: Of course, where it relates to compassionate leave it obviously cannot be mandatory because there must be the exercise of discretion. In other words, the commanding officer or the district officer commanding must look at the facts and then exercise discretion as to whether those facts justify the leave.

Mr. SENN: In the instance where a boy obviously has a good case is it mandatory?

Mr. ABBOTT: In that case the general officer commanding in the district—

Mr. SENN: Does that hold true as well for harvest and seeding leave?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is true for harvest and seeding leave, but I am not sure about this new type of leave. That is a new one and I have not looked into it. It is certainly true of the compassionate and the harvest and seeding leaves.

Mr. SENN: I would suggest that the parliamentary assistant look into it again, because I doubt that it is mandatory.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am saying that it is not mandatory, I am sure it is not mandatory for compassionate, harvest and seeding leave. I am positive it is within the discretion of the district officer commanding. As to the other, I do not know. The Minister of Agriculture tells me that the same principle applies to the new type of leave; it is discretionary.

Mr. McGARRY: I should like to make a few remarks relative to the estimates of the Minister of National Defence, but before doing so I desire to offer a tribute to the parliamentary assistant for his eloquent and lucid presentation of the estimates. He has proved himself a worthy assistant to a worthy minister. Of course he had a good story to tell and all good stories are easy to tell. They are usually accepted with good grace. However, if it had not been for the efficient efforts of the minister who up to a short time ago had charge of the Department of National Defence, and the excellent efforts of his successor, the parliamentary assistant would not have had such a good story to tell.

I just wish to make a few remarks with regard to the estimates and I wish to refer first to a discussion that took place in committee last Friday evening with regard to the affording of adequate and proper facilities to look after our returned men who, unfortunately, through their war experiences have suffered mental wounds and disabilities. The hon. member for Cape Breton South who, I think, was the initial speaker on this subject—and I am sure he believes that every hon. member in this house is associated with him in his expression of compassion and solicitation for the providing of these facilities—referred to them; but I am inclined to think he as well as myself and other hon. members did not have all the information with regard to the facilities that are provided for the men who through the horrors and hardships they have undergone in this war have found themselves under a disability which perhaps demands more compassion than any other disability from which they might suffer. I mention this because one listening to the hon. member would be inclined to believe that no facilities were provided to take care of these cases. The Minister of Veterans' Affairs, upon whose estimates I believe this discussion should have taken place, enlightened not only the hon. member for Cape Breton South, but other hon. members as well as myself. I am sure that many of us did not know of the facilities that are provided at present, and probably knew little or nothing about the programme for extension of these facilities which has been formulated and is now under way.

I wish to refer to one part of the discussion mentioned by the senior hon. member for Halifax in speaking of the Nova Scotia hospital. I know a little about that hospital; I have had a good deal to do with it. I have had occasion to send patients there and I visited it several times. The Nova Scotia hospital has all facilities to treat neurotic and neurasthenic cases that any other institution would have that would be devised for that purpose. They have all the therapies. They have insulin therapy, electric therapy, hydro therapy, vocational therapy, thermal therapy and recreational therapy. I repeat that they have all the facilities that would be provided in hospitals that are set aside for that purpose. As the hon. member has said, the undesirable part of it is that there are insane people there. But the appellation of an insane asylum does not apply to the Nova Scotia hospital. Some years ago it was looked upon as a retention hospital. To-day it has outgrown that, and I know cases in my own constituency where people believed they were getting work weary or brain weary and have volunteered to go to this hospital and take treatment. In every case by taking the therapies provided there either individually or conjointly on the advice of the doctors they reaped satisfactory and lasting results. So that I say until we get hospitals specifically designed to look after such cases, the hospitals of Nova Scotia can very well carry on the treatment indicated in these mental cases. As a matter of fact, since the beginning of the war some 325 mental cases from the army, navy and air force have been treated with very good results.

In regard to the matter of having sane people in the same hospitals, every patient who enters these institutions is segregated with the class indicated by his diagnosis and prognosis, and I have every reason to believe that patients, whether civilian or service personnel, who require mental treatment of any kind, can be treated satisfactorily in the hospitals of Nova Scotia. There is no doubt that as the demobilization programme progresses the need for these special hospitals will increase; but as long as we have a Minister of Veterans' Affairs who is so compassionate and so generous in passing along recommendations; as long as we have such an eminent psychologist as Major Chisholm at the head of affairs, with his knowledge of medicine and mental diseases and his great executive ability; as long as we have in addition the hearty cooperation of all the provinces, I believe these poor men who are seeking treatment, and their friends, may rest assured that ample facilities will be provided.

So much for that. There was one other matter which came out in the discussion on Friday last, with which I should like to deal briefly. I believe the hon. member for Fort William made a strong appeal to the parliamentary assistant in regard to the release of young men for work on the farms. I heartily join with the hon. member in advocating the granting of either extended leave or of discharges to those needed on the farms. It seems strange to me that in all this talk about releasing men, or giving them leave, nothing has been said about sons of fishermen. These men are essential producers, and the pursuit of fishing is hazardous, particularly inshore fishing. Usually these men have a boat, with an engine. It is impossible for a man to do inshore fishing by himself; there must be two men in each boat. In my constituency I have dozens of men advanced in years who have made fishing their life work, who have the boats and all necessary equipment. Many of these old men spent the winter sitting in cold sheds repairing and painting their boats and getting their equipment ready for the spring. Now, however, unless their sons are released from the army, or at least given extended leave, I know dozens of men in my constituency whose boats will have to remain idle. This is not fair. I would ask the parliamentary assistant, the Minister of Labour and all who have anything to do with this matter to give this point their serious consideration. The fisherman, who is just as important a producer as the farmer, should receive the same consideration in regard to the release of his son from military service that is shown the farmer or the man engaged in any other industry.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. d'ANJOU (Translation): As on every other occasion, I wish to state clearly my position on the war estimates now under discussion in the house.

We are requested to vote two billion dollars in order to pursue our irrational and limitless participation in the present conflict. Out of that fabulous sum of money, about one billion dollars will again, this year, be given in pure gift, as a tribute to England. I shall return to this matter in the course of my remarks.

As a logical and natural sequence to the position I have always maintained on this matter of war appropriations, I condemn with all the energy and strength at my command, the request of the government for billions of dollars for deeds of carnage and destruction. Canada is on the verge of financial collapse and the government persists in bleeding white our population for the benefit of England and the infamous war profiteers who are pyramiding colossal and scandalous wealth, while thousands upon thousands of our Canadian youth are giving up their lives on far-away battlefields for the protection of foreign interests.

As long as war remains a tool for the vultures of international finance, it will not end and the slaughter that is now bleeding the universe will continue mercilessly for the peoples engaged in the present conflict.

What I oppose in the resolution are the amounts requested to continue our participation in the war and the granting of a new gift to Great Britain.

Following their usual custom, the government submit to us resolutions which have been muddled on purpose, so as to place in a dilemma those who have enough courage to fight their infamous war policy.

Mr. Chairman, as I have consistently done since the outset of the present war, I denounce with all the energy at my command, the gift to Great Britain implied in the present resolution. This annual tribute paid to England is proof enough that we are still at her beck and call. Why make gifts to a country immensely richer than our own, while the most abject poverty still exists in some parts of our land. In my riding, there are many new settlements whose population suffers from many ills and lacks often even the very necessities of life. Instead of treating with such liberality a country to which we owe nothing, except Christian forgiveness, the government would be far better inspired to ensure the welfare of our own suffering people. All for England and nothing for Canada, seems to be the motto of a government the sole worry of whom is Great Britain and who forget that there exists a beautiful country called Canada, which I recognize as my sole country, my only fatherland.

Speaking for his minister and for the government, the parliamentary assistant for National Defence stated that soldiers, airmen and sailors would participate in the fight against Japan and that they will go voluntarily. Mr. Chairman, I fear that that is just another one of those political promises. For twenty-five years, particularly during the course of the last general election of March, 1940, we have been given many of those solemn promises and sacred pledges which the government did not hesitate to violate after the election.

For my part, I believe that if the government are sincere they will immediately repeal our law of conscription. If they do not, we shall have every reason to fear a repetition of the same things that happened since 1940. They have promised, on the other hand, that conscription would cease with the close of hostilities in Europe. Unfortunately, they have not come to an end yet, and Heaven only knows when they will.

If we are to believe the papers, the Canadians have been sustaining heavy losses lately. Last night, I was listening to a radio news report saying that the Germans were resisting stubbornly in the interior of their country and that the Canadian troops were fighting in that area. When we look at the casualty lists we receive every day we notice these words: Killed in action; killed in action.

I am afraid the government will not only continue to send conscripts overseas but that they will be wanting more than voluntary enlistments in the war against Japan.

I now wish to draw the government's attention to what takes place in my county. I recall that in 1917 and 1918—I had then the honour, like I have to-day, of representing the county of Rimouski—government of the day which included the hon. minister of Mines (Mr. Crerar), right hand of the present

War Appropriation—The Army

Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), had dispatched to Rimouski county an army of provosts charged with the task of hunting up our farmers' sons even into the most remote forests. At that time, I denounced such a hateful method, and several members now sitting on the government side did likewise. It was a despicable method at the time of the union government and it is worse when enforced by a Liberal administration. At the present time, the military police are scouring the county of Rimouski, they are searching every parish and every by-road; they even break into the houses at night in an attempt to locate the young men who failed to report to military camps, and most of these young men are farmers' sons. When discovered, they are handcuffed and brought to the Rimouski gaol. After a few hours in gaol, they are taken to Valcartier and from there are put on board ships en route to Europe.

Well, what I denounced in 1917 and 1918, I denounce to-day. This practice is still more hateful coming from a government which for twenty-five years proclaimed itself to be against conscription throughout the country and particularly in the province of Quebec.

I remember that the Rimouski gaol, in 1917 and 1918, held as many as 150 farmers' sons. I must say that, through my intervention in this house, although it was not a Liberal government that was in power at the time but a union government, I was able to obtain the release of those 150 farmers' sons who had been thrown in prison because they were absentees, like those who to-day are being called absentees and deserters.

Mr. Chairman, I ask again for the immediate repeal of the conscription act. Not only do I ask that the government stop hunting those who come under the conscription act and sending them overseas, but I want the government to release permanently from the army the farmers' sons, the farmers and the farm help who are now in military camps throughout Canada.

Now, for the enlightenment of the supporters of the present government, may I read a circular letter with regard to the promises made by the Right Hon. Prime Minister and one of his colleagues, the late Hon. Mr. Lapointe, in connection with conscription and our taking part in the wars of the empire. Here is what Mr. Mackenzie King said about conscription—and this was published by the the Liberal organization with offices here, in Ottawa.

The present government believes that conscription of men for overseas service would not be a necessary or an effective step. Let me say that so long as this government may be in power, no such measure will be enacted.

And here is what Mr. Lapointe said:

I think I am true to my concept of Canadian unity when I say that I shall always fight against this policy (conscription); I would not be a member of a government that would enact it; and not only that, but I say with all my responsibility to the people of Canada that I would oppose any government that would enforce it.

And here are the words of the Right Hon. Prime Minister on our taking part in war overseas:

One strategic fact is clear: the days of great expeditionary forces of infantry crossing the oceans are not likely to recur. Two years ago, I expressed in this house the view that it was extremely doubtful if any of the British dominions would ever send another expeditionary force to Europe. We have tremendous tasks to do at home, in housing the people, in caring for the aged and helpless, in relieving drought and unemployment, in building roads, in meeting our heavy burden of debt, in making provision for Canada's defence, and in bringing our standards of living and civilization to the levels our knowledge now makes possible. There is no great margin of realizable wealth for this purpose; we must, to a greater or less extent, choose between keeping our own house in order, and trying to save Europe and Asia.

Mr. Lapointe declared later on:

I agree with what was said yesterday by the leader of the opposition and the Prime Minister, and what was said by Mr. Bruce of Australia, that the time for expeditionary forces overseas is certainly past, and it would not be the most effective way to help our allies. The men would be needed here; and in any event it is parliament which will decide about it. (Extracts from the Debates of the House of Commons, March 30 and 31, 1939.)

Mr. FAUTEUX (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the hon. member for Rimouski would allow me to ask him a few questions.

Mr. d'ANJOU (Translation): Certainly.

Mr. FAUTEUX (Translation): Did I understand that all those farmers' sons put in gaol in the county of the hon. member for Rimouski were arrested because they had not done their military service, and that they were subsequently sent overseas for that reason?

Mr. d'ANJOU (Translation): They were conscripts.

Mr. FAUTEUX (Translation): In that case, did I understand, first, that they were young men who had not undergone their military training, though they had been called?

Mr. d'ANJOU (Translation): They were. I say to the hon. member that they were conscripts and had not reported for military duty.

Mr. LALONDE (Translation): Well, that is a different thing.

Mr. FAUTEUX (Translation): With your consent, Mr. Chairman, the second question I wish to direct to the hon. member for Rimouski is this: Had these farmers' sons whom you have just mentioned and who were sent overseas, made a request for exemption from military duty as farmers' sons.

Mr. d'ANJOU (Translation): No, they had not, but it is for the same reason that the union government was condemned: I have already said so and it is easy to understand for one who wishes to try. I have mentioned absentees; by absentees we usually mean those who do not answer their call. If that practice was disapproved in 1917-18, I wonder why it is approved to-day.

Mr. FAUTEUX (Translation): They were not exempted in 1917-18.

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): Order. I would ask those who wish to speak to address the chair first.

Mr. d'ANJOU (Translation): I understand, but there are three or four hon. members speaking to me at the same time, as if there were two or three presidents in the house; to whom should I address myself in this case?

That is exactly what happened in 1917-18. The hon. member for St. Mary was not in the house at that time, neither perhaps was the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Lalonde), but I remember that some of the members who were in the house at that time are still here to-day.

Mr. FAUTEUX (Translation): In 1917-18, Mr. Chairman, farmers' sons were not exempted by law.

Some hon. MEMBERS (Translation): Yes, they were.

Mr. d'ANJOU (Translation): Yes, they were; there was even a court of exemption in my county. What was a crime for the union government is a crime still more atrocious and outrageous for a Liberal government who for the past twenty-five years promised us that never, under a Liberal administration, would conscription be imposed.

(Text) Mr. ABBOTT: I am only sorry that the hon. member for Lake Centre who has expressed doubts of the zeal with which the enforcement proceedings are carried on cannot understand French because, if he had heard the hon. member for Rimouski describe so harrowingly how the Rimouski gaol was crowded with deserters, I am sure he would have changed his mind.

Mr. EMMERSON: I regret that I was not in my seat on Friday when the hon. member for Kootenay West brought up the question of Canadian nurses who had enlisted in the South African forces. Hon. gentlemen will remember that in 1941 the South African government opened negotiations with a view to getting Canadian nurses because of the shortage of nurses in the South African forces, and some three hundred Canadian nurses were enlisted by the South African representative in Canada, with the aid of the national defence department. There were set out in a document that was submitted to all these girls who offered themselves for enlistment the terms of enlistment, the compensation and certain other conditions.

It will be remembered also that in those days many Canadian girls were anxious to get into the service and up until the middle of 1940 were still awaiting an opportunity to enter the Canadian nursing service. When they joined the South African forces they read the terms of enlistment which were presented to them, and while they knew that they would not get the same rate of pay as Canadian nurses serving with the Canadian forces, the language on the document was not quite clear to them and they did not understand that the terms of enlistment were different from the terms of enlistment with the Canadian forces. They understood that they would get rations and quarters in addition to their pay, but when they got over there they found that that was not the situation. Of course it was a matter of great disappointment, particularly to some who had dependents. It has to be remembered that these girls were told they would have to take enough equipment to serve them at least two years, because it was difficult to get uniforms in South Africa, so that most of them had to buy uniforms to the extent of three hundred dollars or over, but they had an allowance of only $150 for clothing. This meant that many of them had to borrow, and they made certain arrangements to pay back their indebtedness by assignments of pay. Of course those who had to assign pay to dependents found when they got over there that they would have no money left, because of the deduction for rations and quarters and, I believe, for laundry. The term of enlistment was for one year absolute, with an opportunity of renewal. We must give credit to the South African government, in this way. A number of the girls, although they had enlisted for one year, were released from the service, before the year was up, in order to marry. A number of the girls came back, but those remaining for a second term got an increase in pay, not to bring it up, however, to anywhere near the same level as is received by Canadian nurses serving in the Canadian forces.

I thought it advisable to make this explanation, although of course it is all water under the bridge. What especially strikes me and what I should like to emphasize is, as mentioned by the hon. member for Kootenay West, the matter of gratuities for these nurses who have returned and obtained their discharge. The South African representative here in Ottawa tells me that no provision has been made for gratuities for Canadian nurses serving in South Africa. It may be merely that he has not been notified of any gratuity. In any event our nurses, whether they serve in Canada or in South Africa or with any other of the commonwealth forces, are entitled to gratuities under Canadian legislation, but of course minus any payments of gratuity by other governments. But our Department of National Defence is not paying gratuities now because it is waiting to find out what will be paid by these other governments. It may be that there will not be any legislation.

Mr. GRAYDON: Some of these girls were transferred from South Africa to the Italian front, were they not?

Mr. EMMERSON: They are still with the South African defence force, but serving with South African units up in the north. Others returned to Canada and got their discharge; and some enlisted in the Canadian Army Medical Corps.

Mr. GRAYDON: So that those who are now in Italy are really with South African units?

Mr. EMMERSON: Not necessarily. So far as I know, those who were serving in North Africa did not go beyond Africa. They may have gone to Italy with South African forces, but I am not aware of it. I know that some went north with South African forces and served in Cyrenaica a year or two ago.

Mr. GRAYDON: I know that a nurse from my own town was in Pietermaritzburg, in South Africa, and then she transferred to Italy and is still there, as far as I know.

Mr. EMMERSON: That may be so. I think our Minister of National Defence should get into communication with the authorities concerned as quickly as possible in order that some gratuity shall go forward to those nurses who were not so highly paid while serving over there.

One other matter I wish to bring up is related to the policy as far as aircrew are concerned, according to the announcement made by the government. A great many of our aircrew, particularly those who have graduated within the last year, are being put on reserve and are not callable for service in the army. I think all hon. members agree that that is a good policy. I want to draw attention to the position of those civilian pilots who, back in 1940, when we were starting the empire training scheme, jumped into the breach. Those men, who had learned to fly at their own expense, were employed as civilian and staff pilots at our elementary schools and our observer schools. Now those schools are being closed and those men are out of priority employment but are subject to call by the army, and I wish to register a protest thereat. Those men who have given service in teaching pilots, many of whom are going on reserve, are returned to civilian status, or are out of the service, and are subject to call-up by the army. I urge very strongly that if the regulation is as I understand it to be, it should be changed. The matter has been submitted to me only recently, and as far as I can find out those civilian pilots are subject to call-up for the army. I would ask the parliamentary assistant to give me some information in the matter, and say if that is so.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know. That, of course, is not a matter which primarily concerns the Department of National Defence; it relates purely to national selective service. We indent on the labour department for so many men a month, and the Department of Labour provides those men.

On the question of the South African nurses, I told the hon. member for Kootenay West last week that I would see that his remarks were brought to the attention of the minister and the department. That is being done. I cannot give any definite answer other than to say that the matter is still receiving the most careful consideration of the appropriate authorities with a view to trying to straighten it out.

Mr. GRAYDON: They certainly feel they are getting a raw deal.

Mr. ABBOTT: Oh, no doubt. Many people feel that, of course.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is not exactly an answer.

Mr. ABBOTT: No, but you do not expect me to pass on the question myself, do you?

Mr. GRAYDON: I am beginning to expect less from you.

Mr. ABBOTT: You are justified in that.

Mr. RAYMOND (Translation): Mr. Chairman, before voicing the remarks I wish to make about the resolution now before us, I should like to deal with a statement made about me by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix).

The hon. member said that I did not vote against the act for the mobilization of human and national resources, although it has already been shown in this house, as any one can see by looking at page 925 of the official report for 1940, that the vote taken during the discussion of that measure was a vote on a ruling of the chairman.

This time, I shall answer him through his good friend the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy), whose truthfulness I think he will not dare question. Here is what that hon. gentleman said in an interview published by L'Action Catholique on August 9, 1940:

In connection with the last session, Mr. Sasseville Roy said that he had endeavoured to uphold without any fanaticism his fellow-citizens' opinions. He emphasized that no vote was taken on the mobilization bill and that no one should consider as representing the feeling of the house the vote taken during the discussion on a ruling of the chairman. In the opinion of the great majority of members, the stand then taken by the chairman was justified and it was very hard to vote against him.

What does the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency think of the evidence given by his friend the hon. member for Gaspé to the effect that no vote was taken on the mobilization bill?

However, as a vote was taken on a ruling of the chairman, the house should be interested to know what the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency replied to his friend the hon. member for Gaspé. On August 10, 1940, L'Action Catholique published some comments under the caption "Mr. LaCroix charges Mr. Roy with having run away at the time of the vote". And here is what the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency said:

I believe it would have been better for Mr. Roy to tell you frankly that he did not find the doors of the House of Commons wide enough in his haste to get out and abstain from voting so as to avoid offending his leader, Mr. Hanson. As a matter of fact, that was noticed by all members and it caused general hilarity, because Mr. Roy left the house at the very moment when the vote was about to be taken.

For the time being, I shall leave these two hon. members to ponder over their respective statements.

The resolution which is now being discussed is preliminary to the introduction of a bill which will be submitted for our approval. However, the resolution outlines in general terms the purpose for which this sum of two billion dollars will be used, and I wish to express my views forthwith on the matter.

According to the resolution, the sum of two billion dollars will be used, among other things, to defray the cost of the conduct of naval, military and air operations in or beyond Canada.

After the exaggerated and ruinous war effort put forth by our country, an effort which was beyond our means and much greater than that of the other countries concerned, and in view of the present trend of events, the Canadian taxpayer could have expected a substantial reduction in those expenditures. Unfortunately, such is not the case.

What is the present situation on the theatres of war? In Europe, everyone is agreed that the end of hostilities is near, very near indeed. The countries which had been invaded by the enemy have been almost entirely liberated. Germany, in turn, is being invaded from all directions. It is a general rout, and the enemy's armed forces have been cut down, weakened and deprived of the production of countries which they had overrun. On the allied side, there is an increase in the production of European war plants, and new armies are being built up among the liberated populations of Belgium and France who are thirsting for revenge.

And yet, the same Canadian establishments overseas are being maintained, additional men are being called up for training in Canada, farmers' sons are denied postponements, industrial and agricultural production is being stifled and our people are suffering hardship.

I have no hesitation in saying that military call-ups should be immediately discontinued—Canada is surely not threatened at present—and of course conscription for overseas service should be dropped. I suggest that our soldiers overseas be gradually released and replaced by those from liberated countries.

It is intimated that when the war is ended they may be retained for policing Europe. This is indeed inconceivable. After five years and a half of war, have we not done our share? I am absolutely opposed to this policy.

We need no longer be told that we are fighting for civilization, for the respect of treaties, for the protection of the territorial integrity of small nations. After the violation by Russia of one treaty after another, since September, 1939, in order to seize territory from her small neighbours, after the persecution carried out by Russia in Baltic countries and the massacre of thousands of Poles, after the violation of the Atlantic charter with the approval of Mr. Churchill, we may no longer entertain doubts as to the motives of the war. If the massacre of Poles by Germans was an act of barbarism, I cannot agree that the massacre of Poles by the Russians was an act worthy of a civilized country.

At present, in Europe, compromises are being made, at the expense of small nations, for the allotment of spheres of influence to Russia and Great Britain, and we are being asked to continue further sacrifices of all kinds.

Let us contribute to the relief of starving populations, very well, but I do not agree that we should ruin ourselves to ensure the material domination of a certain country rather than that of another, at the expense of smaller nations.

Let us now turn to the Asiatic war theatre, to the war against Japan. At the close of the Quebec conference, in September last, Mr. Churchill said that Mr. Mackenzie King had claimed for Canada a share of participation in the war against Japan. I fail to understand that ambition of the Prime Minister who would like Canada to fight everywhere, on land, on the seas, in the air, in every country where there is a war going on, when he knows the price will be the ruin of his own country.

I want our Pacific coast to be protected, but I am against sending our forces thousands of miles away to fight in the Pacific, where we have no interests to protect.

Why should we send our soldiers to fight in Asia? Not because they are needed. At the present time, the Japanese are on the defensive and the allies are continuously progressing without the help of our troops.

The parliamentary assistant for the army (Mr. Abbott) told me the other day that, at the present time, we have only a few specialists engaged in the struggle against Japan.

When we consider the population of the countries directly concerned in the conflict in Asia, namely, China, 500 million; India, 400 million; United States, 140 million; France, 40 million; Great Britain, 45 million; Australia, 6 million, and Russia, which has just ended her neutrality pact with Japan, 180 million, a total of 1,300 million people against less than 100 million Japanese, we wonder why Canada with a population of 11 million and a half would be anxious to increase further her war effort by defending the interests of other nations in the Pacific.

Is our war effort not large enough? It is claimed that it exceeds, in proportion to our means, that of any other country. As a result, the Canadian taxpayer is heavily burdened.

[Mr. Raymond.]

The monthly news letter of the Royal Bank of Canada of February, 1943 stated:

Our income taxes are the highest in the world in many income brackets.

The February, 1945 issue of the above news letter said:

It is interesting to compare the income taxes in Canada and in the United States, two neighbouring countries that are so much alike in regard to economy and the standard of living. The following figures, which have been compiled in December by the Financial Post apply to a married man without dependents for the year 1944:

Gross income	Canada	United States	Excess in Canada's tax rates over United States' rates
$ 2,000.....	$ 329	$ 130	153%
3,000.....	732	360	103%
5,000.....	1,628	850	92%
10,000.....	4,262	2,400	78%

And what interests have we to protect in Asia? None at all. We have no possessions to defend or to retake. The United States are interested in retaking the Philippines and securing naval bases; France is interested in recovering Indo-China; Great Britain is interested in dislodging the Japanese from Singapore and Hong Kong in order to re-establish her Asiatic trade. Let those countries defend their own interests. It does not concern us.

By the terms of the resolution, part of this sum of two billion dollars will be a gift to the united nations in the form of mutual aid.

I have always opposed the annual gifts granted first to Great Britain alone and later, shared, in a small measure, with two or three other nations, especially Russia.

However, this year, we have additional reasons for opposing this step.

The main worry of England is its post-war trade. I shall quote excerpts from newspaper articles as proof of this statement. First, we find the following in the issue of May 30, 1944, of the Citizen:

Citizen, May 30, 1944—British Plants Plan to Export Some Autos Soon.

London, May 30—British automobile manufacturers expect government permission to start making a number of cars for export, mainly for colonial markets, within the next few weeks, the Daily Mail said to-day.

The paper said the cars will be of ten or twelve horsepower and will sell for about $1,000.

Then, this, in the Star of October 19, 1944:

Britain Opens Trade Drive

London, October 19—Bidding for post-war world markets, hundreds of commercial travellers already have left Britain with government help to start a "buy British" campaign around the world, the Daily Express said to-day.

Harcourt Johnstone, secretary of the department of overseas trade, was quoted as saying the government was cutting red tape to expedite the missions and that British manufacturers were getting passports and visas within three weeks after applying for them.

Mr. Johnstone said Britain "is not going to be left out in the cold" in efforts to capture world markets.

While we are giving our goods away, England is thinking of selling her own in the whole world. In certain quarters, it had been claimed that these gifts would promote our export trade with England after the war.

Well, this was declared, recently, by representatives of the United Kingdom. I quote from the Financial Post, of January 6, 1945:

But when Lord Keynes and other British officials were here recently they made it clear that United Kingdom is quite prepared to take a very tough attitude toward future trade relations with "hard" or dollar currency countries like Canada.

Britain says in effect: "Beyond what assistance you give us under free gift or mutual aid, we are determined, in future, to stand on our own commercial feet. We will deny ourselves Canadian goods rather than go into debt or take your surplus products on credit."

These facts speak for themselves. England is willing to accept Canadian goods on condition that they are given her. As for buying them she would rather do that somewhere else.

Such are the consequences of our boundless generosity which is leading us into utter ruin.

Russia, on its side, has benefited by our mutual aid legislation, by an amount of about 25 million dollars, during the financial year ended March 31, 1944. I have no figures for the year just ended.

As I said a while ago, I have always been opposed to the gifts granted Great Britain and other allied nations. This year, my opposition is still more energetic, because the gifts made to England only help her in developing her trade at our expense; gifts made to Russia constitute an endorsement of the cruelties and injustices perpetrated against Poland and other small neighbouring states.

We have no right to tax the Canadian people to help Russia acquire new territories, to spread her domination over Europe and enslave small nations who rightly demand their freedom.

Mr. LALONDE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I cannot leave unchallenged the remarks made by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. d'Anjou) about farmers' sons. I shall only take a few minutes in order to keep the record straight so that the committee may not gain the impression that we have been ill-treated in connection with postponements for farmers' sons. If I have grasped the argument of my hon. friend, he does not want members of the provost corps or the military police to seek out defaulters and deserters. I cannot understand the mentality of my hon. friend who does not want the government and the military authorities to enforce the law. If those unfortunate young men, because they were not judiciously advised or were not familiar with the facts, have not asked for a postponement and have become outlaws, in spite of all the sympathy I feel for them, I must say that to my mind the police had the duty to enforce the law. On the other hand, my personal experience compels me to state that in my district all bona fide farmers who asked for a postponement, and who scrupulously obeyed the provisions of the law, had no difficulty in obtaining one. Those young men only had to sign in the presence of a notary an affidavit establishing their good faith and vouching for the importance of their farm. I can assert that only a very small proportion of those young men were not granted a military postponement.

Mr. FAUTEUX (Translation): It was perhaps because they had benefited from sound advice.

Mr. LALONDE (Translation): Or rather, it may be that those who complain were injudiciously advised. At all events, I should like to pay a tribute to the hon. the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) and his department, as well as to the registrar of the Montreal district. As far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, I must congratulate these gentlemen, because they did justice to the farmers of Labelle county. Each and every bona fide farmer who took the necessary steps without relying on his neighbour for securing exemption was granted a postponement and all of them are still on the farm where they contribute to the war effort. I do not know how things have gone in the county of Rimouski and I shall refrain from commenting on the situation there. But what surprises me is to see the hon. member for Rimouski rising in his place in defence of those young men who are outlaws. Such a stand is quite surprising to me. I think that if the hon. member for Rimouski, who is my senior in this house and for whom I have all the respect he deserves, will get to the core of the matter, he will find that in each case where a young defaulter had any trouble it was not through any fault on the part of the Minister of Labour or the government, but through the fault of the young man who did not comply with the provisions of the law.

War Appropriation—The Army

The second point I wish to discuss is the exemption of some farmers who are now in the army. I ask the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence to have the kindness to note—and I do not want to voice any criticism—that the Department of National Defence should appoint a liaison officer with whom we the members of parliament, who receive numerous requests from young soldiers, might deal with a view to having these young men who claim to be useful on the farm or in essential industries taken out of the army. At present, our applications are to be made to the Minister of National Defence and, naturally, as he is extremely busy, we have to apply to the officer commanding the military district. I must state frankly that the requests do not seem to receive the attention they deserve.

In my riding, as in all others, some farmers have enlisted voluntarily. They wished, of their own free will, to serve their country. Now, for very special reasons, such as the decease of their father, the disappearance of their brother, the increase in capital, they may wish to return to the farm. I must admit that, at times, it is almost impossible to obtain postponements. I suggest to the parliamentary assistant of the Minister of National Defence who has conducted the discussion with such ability and tact, that he advise the minister of his department to organize, between his colleagues and ourselves, the members of the house, and even the ordinary citizens who wish to submit requests of this nature, some kind of liaison machinery. I feel that this would facilitate the work and give full justice to the young soldiers who, in certain cases, would now be more useful on the farm than in the army.

(Text) Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): I should like to congratulate the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence upon his review of the activities of the Canadian Army during the past year. It was very full and comprehensive. I believe it will always be a matter of pride and satisfaction to Canadians that our armed forces took part in the invasion of Normandy and were present on D-day. Canadian divisions along the coast were assigned the most critical part of the line to hold. They formed the left flank of the allied armies, and were the hinge of the line. It is well known now, I think, that the success of the whole plan of battle depended upon the Canadian troops holding their positions against powerful German forces. Later, in the follow-up, Canadian divisions were in almost continuous battle for as long as five months, and I think history will record that during this period the decisive battles were fought which determined the fate of the German armies in western Europe. During this five month period our divisions had to absorb great numbers of reinforcements. These reinforcements were present at the break through at Falaise, in regard to which Eisenhower said that every bit of dust represented diamonds and every foot of ground was worth ten miles elsewhere. Then they were in the follow-up of the Seine estuary; they were in on the outflanking of Rouen, and were in the siege and final capture of important channel points. Then came the great fight for the Schelte, the clearing of the estuary and the opening of the port of Antwerp to allied shipping. This fight was described by Field Marshal Montgomery as the finest operation of the whole western front campaign.

All this speaks well for the training and spirit of the men who went to northwestern Europe, not only in the original formations but also as reinforcements. It was not an accident that when the time came to cross the Rhine and strike on into Germany we should find the Canadian Army again holding the pivotal left flank of the allied line. I believe the Rhine offensive opened on February 6, and on February 15 tribute to the work of the First Canadian Army was paid by Major George Fielding Eliot, perhaps the most noted military commentator in the United States. Under the caption "Canadian doing a good job", Major Eliot writes as follows:

The moment is perhaps appropriate for pointing out that General Crerar and his staff of the 1st Canadian Army have carried out with great skill and workmanlike precision every task so far entrusted to them. He and his army have a great deal of experience in operations over water-logged terrain, notably in the Scheldt estuary campaign.

The 1st Canadian Army may justly complain that it has been given—by the tough luck of war—more than its share of the "dirty work", but it has performed all its tasks well, just as it is performing this one.

To-night the newspapers report that Canadian troops have cut off the great cities of Amsterdam, the Hague, Rotterdam and Utrecht and have separated these cities from the main forces of the Germans.

I want to say a word about our troops in Italy. The troops there have had a long, tough and hard fight. In their ranks are to be found many of the most seasoned and battle experienced soldiers of the allied armies. They have had an uphill fight but they have fulfilled with complete success every task assigned to them. Young men who have served in that theatre and returned to Nova Scotia have told me of the loneliness of patrol work and of the isolation faced by the infantry platoons and other units and detachments. These men were fighting far from home and over very difficult terrain.

I have said that they were fighting an uphill fight, and that is literally true. These young men tell me that they always seemed to be where the Germans were looking down at them from higher positions. Tributes to the work of our troops in Italy have been paid by famous soldiers. The future will assess the value to the allied cause of the part they have played, a part that I am sure will be found worthy of the best traditions of the Canadian Army and of our country.

There is another matter I wish to bring directly to the attention of the Department of National Defence. A considerable number of young Canadians went to England before the outbreak of war to enlist in the British permanent army. Some of them left Canada because there were no suitable jobs available at the time, while others left through a spirit of adventure and a desire to see the world. These young men were fighting in 1939 and many of them were evacuated from Dunkirk. Some of them were from Halifax, most of whom joined the Manchester Regiment. Those who survived have seen much fighting in Europe, Africa or Asia.

After upwards of five years of war many are beginning to express the wish that they might be allowed to transfer to the Canadian Army. Some of them have in mind returning ultimately to Canada, taking advantage of our rehabilitation programme and possibly continuing their studies. Most of them were of high school age when they left. This matter has been taken up with the British war office and the answer given in the case of those in whom I am interested is that since they have been serving in the permanent army no transfer can be agreed upon at this time. If they had enlisted merely for the duration of the war apparently there would have been no obstacle or difficulty in their being transferred to the Canadian Army.

However, there is the difficulty that they are members of the permanent force and the present British regulations do not permit of their transfer. In view of the present state of the war in Europe—I think we all agree that it is close to an end—I would ask the department to make representations to the British war office with a view to having these young men given permission to transfer overseas to the Canadian Army. In due course I would hope that they will become entitled to the full benefits of our rehabilitation programme.

I notice the Minister of Veterans' Affairs is in his seat and there is another matter I should like to speak about. He knows that I have brought this up on many occasions and I am taking this opportunity to refer to it again. I have in mind the position of our merchant seamen. During the past two years there has been considerable discussion in the house about these men. Some of these men come in to see me from time to time and they want to know where they are going to fit into the government's comprehensive rehabilitation programme.

In many cases they have been serving on the high seas or in and out of coastal waters for two or three, four or five years. I do not think there is any question in the mind of any hon. member as to this being a hazardous occupation. I have some figures which I got this morning and which I should like to give to the committee with the object of showing the dangers that these men have to face and of making a comparison with the figures relative to the Canadian navy given to the committee a few days ago by the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services.

The information I have from the Department of Transport shows that there are 59,648 index cards of Canadian merchant seamen, active and non-active, on file in the central registry of the department. The number of identity certificates issued to Canadian merchant seamen was 39,308, as of April 1, 1945. Up to that date there has been listed as missing and presumed dead as the result of enemy action a total of 665 Canadian merchant seamen who were serving on vessels of Canadian registry and 381 who were serving on vessels of allied registry, making a total of 1,046.

A few days ago the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services told the committee that there were approximately 90,000 men in the Canadian navy, and that from the beginning of the war until February 28, 1945, there had been killed on active service, 1,498; reported missing, 44; made prisoners of war, 87, making 1,629 in all.

It is true that in our pension legislation there are some provisions which provide that when a seaman is killed or becomes disabled in consequence of enemy action or counter-action compensation is paid to him or his dependents. But we all know that the majority of fatal accidents at sea are not caused by enemy action; they are the result of the perils of the sea and the dangerous work these men have to do. Throughout the war these ships have been travelling in convoys without lights, and I should think there has been more destruction caused to our shipping in the Atlantic by collision at sea than as a direct result of enemy action.

When we are making adequate provision for the merchant seamen sailing the high seas, we should also consider the case of seafaring men, who, while not merchant seamen, are engaged in an occupation equally hazardous and equally essential to the war effort. When the bill upon which the War Services Grants Act was based was before the house for consideration last August the Prime Minister stated that its provisions were not intended to close the door to the claims of merchant seamen or of others who might be entitled to compensation for injuries which may not have arisen directly out of enemy action. He made it clear that it was not the intention to ignore claims of that kind. The armed services were dealt with first because the information as to the extent and nature of their services was available to the departments and it was comparatively easy to find a reasonably satisfactory solution concerning them.

When consideration is given to the claims of the merchant seamen, as the Minister of Veterans' Affairs has told us will be the case, I ask that consideration be given at the same time to the claims of the pilots at Halifax. They have been engaged in most hazardous work ever since the outbreak of war. They come under the Department of Transport; they are not employed directly by the naval authorities, but early in the war the transport officials advised these men that they would be partly under the control of the naval authorities. During the course of the war many of them have had to leave the port of Halifax. It is true that most of their work is confined to the port of Halifax and the territorial waters of Canada but at times they are taken away on the ships they are piloting because time or the state of weather does not permit the pilot to return to the inner harbour. To give the committee some idea of the dangers that the pilots in Halifax harbour have faced during the war, at the beginning of the war there were twenty permanent pilots and no temporary pilots. But in consequence of one disaster, when the pilot boat Hebridean was lost in Halifax harbour in collision with a foreign ship, no fewer than six of these twenty pilots were drowned, as well as the cook, engineer and a boatman of the pilot boat. There are to-day twenty permanent pilots and seventeen temporary pilots. I would ask the government, particularly the Minister of Veterans' Affairs, who I know understand the problems that confront not only the members of the armed forces and their dependents but also the members of these auxiliary services, if that is the proper term to use.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): How far do these pilots go out to sea?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): As a rule not much beyond the territorial waters of Canada. They go out seven or eight or ten miles sometimes, but to a large extent their operations are confined to the waters within the jaws of Halifax harbour.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): They do go out at times to waters infested by submarines?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): Yes, at different times. Some of them have been taken to the United States and some to the United Kingdom or wherever the ships happened to be going rather than incur the risks and delay of sending the pilot back to the dock in a small pilot boat.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Does my hon. friend know whether there have been many casualties among them in this war?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): Not as a result of enemy action, but I want to make it clear—

Mr. ISNOR: Nine lives were lost.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): Yes, but not as a result of enemy action. Six pilots and the three other members of the crew of the pilot boat I have mentioned lost their lives in that collision between the boat and a foreign ship. There is practically no compensation for these men. They were not under any provincial compensation law. They are entitled to a small pension from the pilots own superannuation fund, but the dependents of the five who were entitled to share in this fund receive an average monthly pension of forty-two dollars. The highest pension paid to a dependent family of these five pilots is fifty-five dollars a month and the lowest twenty-eight dollars a month. Each of the five had more than three children. Three of them had seven, eight and nine children respectively, all under the age of eighteen. That will give the committee some idea of the position in which the dependents were left because of this wholly unforeseeable disaster. I wish to thank the committee for listening to this recital, and I would urge as strongly as I can that the full benefits of our legislation for members of our armed services be extended to our merchant seamen and pilots.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like to direct one or two questions to the parliamentary assistant. I asked him a question the other day about professional hockey players and I have had an explanation given to me by the Conservative candidate for Trinity, Mr. Conny Smythe, but I am not quite clear on it. My question to the parliamentary assistant the other day was about professional hockeyists leaving the armed services to play hockey, and Major Smythe, who I understand is an excellent soldier, gives me this explanation in the Toronto Star:

"I didn't know peeling potatoes was a useful occupation," Major Smythe said.

Did Major Smythe never see a private soldier peel potatoes?

Mr. ABBOTT: Hear, hear. I did it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Major Smythe goes on to say that if peeling potatoes is a useful occupation, Conservative members of parliament should do it, or words to that effect.

Mr. MacNICOL: It would be all right if we were peeling Fraser Valley potatoes.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Certainly, because then you would be peeling those mealy-mouthed potatoes that melt in your mouth. I am not joking about this. It is a serious matter so far as I am concerned, and apparently it has got a lot of publicity right across Canada. Mr. "Red" Dutton, who holds a responsible position in a hockey organization controlling millions of dollars, says that these young healthy men who are playing hockey are "all players who have been either rejected or discharged as medically unfit or are deferred as farmers on seasonal work or are students." What I want to know from the parliamentary assistant is, in what part of Canada does a farmer get deferment to play hockey? This is Mr. "Red" Dutton, President of the N. H.—something, who says that they are deferred as farmers for seasonal work. My recollection goes back to one gentleman from Detroit who is doing three years for taking some of this "seasonal help"; and I cannot understand why in the Fraser Valley, right to-day, farmers' sons are being called up to fight—as any man should be—and they are not posing as farmers so that they can get seasonal deferment as farmers to play hockey. When I see Mr. Conny Smythe, that gallant soldier, coming back to encourage the mothers of Canada by stating that owing to lack of reinforcements we had lost extra Canadian lives—

Mr. MacNICOL: He is a gallant soldier.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I did not say he was not a gallant soldier, but it is not so gallant to tell the mothers of Canada that extra lives were lost because we did not have ample reinforcements, when he is employing and making money out of these boys deferred for farm labour.

Mr. BROOKS: That is the policy adopted by the government. It is their policy.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: According to your Conservative leader from Toronto, Mr. Conn Smythe, we are asleep and doing nothing about it. Well, I am trying to do something about it.

Mr. BROOKS: You are starting late. You should have started long ago.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: If you will read Hansard you will see I started four years ago.

Mr. BROOKS: I would be getting discouraged, then.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: A Liberal never gets discouraged.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): But it takes them a long time to wake up.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I got a letter from Peterborough only to-day. I should like to show you a picture which was sent to me from Peterborough to-day by a gentleman whom I do not know. It is a photograph of one of these gallant deferred men, when they need reinforcements so badly they must grab everybody. Here is this gentleman getting presented with a cup at St. Catharines, and underneath his picture it says that he, "who is employed as a shipper in the stockroom of a St. Catharines firm, is shown punching time in," with a lunch-pail under his arm. Are there not enough suitable one-armed soldiers in Canada who can act as punchers of time-clocks, if we are so short of reinforcements? What I want to know from the parliamentary assistant—and I do not want it passed by each time with a statement that it is a matter for the selective service; I am afraid I may not get a chance of a reply from the Minister of Labour—is this, if the army intended to call up farmers' sons, are they going to permit any further leaves or postponements of men physically fit, to play any kind of professional sport?

Mr. ABBOTT: So far as the army is concerned I can assure the hon. member that it does not give leave or postponements to play hockey or any other kind of professional sport. While it is true that it is the Department of Labour, selective service, that has the responsibility of calling men up, I know that no man has the right to get exemption from serving in the army because he plays professional or any other kind of hockey. It may be that some young men have fooled the selective service board by claiming to be farmers and have then gone out and played hockey: that is possible; I do not know whether it is the case or not. But certainly there is nothing in the regulations which permits a man to get exemption because he is a hockey player. So far as I am concerned he cannot get compassionate leave from the army for this purpose, and I know of no rule in the army or selective service regulations which permits men to be exempted from military service in order to play hockey.

Mr. GLADSTONE: The situation with respect to Canadian nurses who served in South Africa has been dealt with quite fully by the hon. members for Kootenay West and Westmorland. I desire to add my support to their effort to get consideration for these Canadian women. I do not know that I need to cover the ground again. As far as I recall, every point has been pretty well covered, except it may be that these young women are now in the position of having no recognition whatever in Canada even though they have been active in service in the allied cause. I have had communications from at least two of these nurses, and they are exceedingly anxious about their future position and status, as those who have contributed their part in the allied effort.

To bring out their view, perhaps I might quote in part a letter I have received from one of these Canadian nurses:

I submit this letter and solicit your assistance on behalf of the Canadian nurses who enlisted to go to South Africa. In 1941 South Africa appealed to Canada for trained nursing staff. Three hundred Canadian sisters volunteered and were enlisted at military districts throughout Canada. They were equipped with Canadian uniforms, with Canada badges on their shoulders, and later embarked for South Africa where they assisted in caring for allied casualties from the African campaign, India and Madagascar, and were later sent with South African hospitals to Egypt, Sicily and Italy.

The rate of pay was small in comparison to what the Canadian sisters serving in other theatres received.

I was one of those sisters and have recently been repatriated after thirty-two months overseas. On reporting to my military district no one knew anything about me. I was very bluntly given to understand we had never belonged to Canadian forces—and obviously were given no recognition in Canada for our services overseas.

There are many others returning to all parts of Canada, who have encountered the same difficulties. Those returning for hospitalization have been informed that the Canadian government assumed no responsibility for them.

I am appealing to you for assistance to gain a ruling whereby these sisters, although small in number, be given the same facilities and recognition regarding gratuities, et cetera, as

[Mr. Abbott.]

Canadians who have served with the imperial forces. We were, after all, representing Canada as Canadian citizens in Canadian uniforms in a common cause.

I plead with the government to go carefully into this situation. It seems to me that it may affect two departments; the Department of National Defence at present, as regards gratuities, and, possibly later, the Department of Veterans' Affairs, with respect to hospitalization. If they have no standing whatever where will such a Canadian nurse be in the event that later she becomes a war casualty? Will she be at the mercy of the government of South Africa, or shall we, through generosity or justice, in some way give recognition to the part that these women have played?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The status of all such people who were domiciled in Canada, if they were members of the forces and served with allied forces in this war, is receiving the active and immediate consideration of the administration at the present time.

Mr. GILLIS: I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant two or three questions with respect to the administration of regulations as applied to our forces. The first question has to do with the matter of leave. My understanding is that there is discrimination as between the air force and the army. Air force personnel serving in Canada or any other theatre of war on discharge receive thirty days' furlough, plus rehabilitation allowance. In effect they get two months extra pay upon leaving the service.

I understand that if army personnel serve in a theatre of war they get thirty days leave, plus rehabilitation grant, upon their return. But army personnel serving in Canada only do not receive that additional leave, and upon being discharged from the service receive only the rehabilitation grant of thirty days.

I am not objecting to what the air force is getting, but I do say that the army is entitled to the same consideration in the matter of leave before discharge. In the air force it is graded. If they serve for a year it is not applicable. If they serve for two years they have fourteen days coming to them; two to three years, twenty-one days; three years or over, the full thirty days. I suggest that the parliamentary assistant check this with the other services, and if he finds there is discrimination along these lines it should be remedied so that all branches of the service may be treated alike.

Another matter I emphasized when I spoke respecting air force estimates was the position of many boys in the service who, upon enlistment, left elder sisters at home looking after their homes. In many cases those sisters have given the best part of their lives in the maintenance of the homes. I have two specific cases in mind, where the boys are overseas. In one case no dependents' allowance was granted, although it was applied for. The result is that the sister's income is not sufficient to pay the taxes on the home. There is an accumulation of taxes, and the possibility of losing a home in which the boys have lived all their lives. I tried every department I could think of, including the dependents' allowance advisory committee.

I think some latitude might be permitted in that direction by way of extending the regulations so as to include this type of case, regardless of the fact that there is no dependents' allowance granted by the government. I could never understand why a girl in that position should not qualify for dependents' allowance. I checked the cases carefully, and there certainly was no reason why allowances should not have been granted. That is another point I would ask the parliamentary assistant to bring to the attention of his department, because I believe it is a responsibility of the Department of National Defence. I may be told that a case of that kind should go to the Department of Veterans' Affairs—or here, or there or somewhere else. But while a man is in the service he is the property of the Department of National Defence, and that is the department which in my opinion should deal with him.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. GILLIS: And it is that department which should iron out his difficulties. People tried to give me the brush-off, and told me I should go somewhere else with it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): I think there is provision for a sister who has no other means of support.

Mr. GILLIS: In the case I have in mind there was certainly no other means of support. There must have been faulty administration somewhere.

Mr. ABBOTT: All allowances made by the dependents' board of trustees are, of course, discretionary.

Mr. GILLIS: I have in my hand a memorandum issued by the wartime information board respecting post-war planning. These fellows seem to cause a lot of trouble. I find that at page 2, where it deals with the order granting certain tax concessions to service personnel after discharge, it concludes by saying that personnel on retirement are discharged to civilian status, irrespective of length or theatre of service, and become immediately liable for income tax. They were granting them certain concessions, if retained in the service after their return to Canada, by way of exemption from income tax. But immediately upon taking employment and earning money they become liable for income tax. I am thinking of this: Will the gratuities paid to service personnel who take immediate employment be subject to income tax?

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

Mr. GILLIS: It will not?

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

Mr. GILLIS: I would judge from what I have read that if you do not find someone who is sympathetic, it could be interpreted as including anything a man may have earned.

Mr. ABBOTT: No; the gratuity is tax exempt.

Mr. GILLIS: I spoke on Friday evening respecting the large percentage of service personnel being discharged for psychiatric reasons, and deplored the lack of adequate institutions, particularly in the province from which I come, to look after this matter. During the course of the discussion I was pleased to hear the parliamentary assistant agree with me at least to the extent of admitting that in that particular province no institution has been set up to care for that specific problem. I thank him for that support.

I was somewhat surprised, however, to hear a Nova Scotia member take the position that in speaking to the matter in the house, and pointing out the lack of adequate facilities in the province, I had done something wrong.

Mr. McGARRY: On a question of privilege, if the hon. member is referring to me, I made no such remark. I complimented him upon what he had said.

Mr. GILLIS: I was not referring to the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond, but rather to the senior member for Halifax.

Let me make it clear that it was not I who introduced the subject. The fact of the matter is that the Canadian Medical Association raised it in the last issue of the Canadian Medical Journal by pointing out that twenty-five per cent of all discharges from the services at this time were for these reasons. Second, I did not condemn the institutions of Nova Scotia; a government-appointed commission in that province, the Dawson commission, did that job. The fact of the matter is that I read in the house very little of the Dawson commission report.

War Appropriation—The Army

Mr. ISNOR: Did the hon. member read any of it?

Mr. GILLIS: I read it all.

Mr. ISNOR: All of it?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, on the matter of welfare—and I do not think you did. In fact, I am pretty sure you did not.

Mr. ISNOR: I wonder if the hon. member—

Mr. GILLIS: You sit down; I am speaking.

Mr. ISNOR: I wonder if the hon. member can tell us how many volumes comprised the Dawson report.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. GILLIS: The Dawson commission report?

Mr. ISNOR: Yes.

Mr. GILLIS: More than you will read for the rest of your natural life.

Mr. ISNOR: Sidestepping!

Mr. GILLIS: I am referring to the matter of public welfare, a very small part of that report. The commission set out a solid condemnation of the institutional facilities in Nova Scotia.

I have had the privilege of going through the Dartmouth institution. I wish to say for the benefit of the senior member for Halifax that I went through it from top to bottom and it took me a long time to forget some of the things I saw there. I wish to tell him also that I do not think he would want his son—I certainly would not want mine—after returning from service overseas to be put in that institution with the disability about which we have been talking since the discussion began. I believe that with a couple of months' rest in proper surroundings these boys could come back. The experience I gained by going through that institution certainly does not suggest that it has the proper surroundings to nurse back to health a boy who is suffering from battle shock, battle exhaustion, or the kind of thing from which they suffer on coming back from overseas.

While the minister may tell us that he is doing everything he can with respect to construction and getting the proper institutions together—and I am quite satisfied he has tried to do that—I would point out to him that this war has been on for five years. These cases have been coming back for at least the past four years. If we want to build a plant, a factory, a battleship or a cruiser we can find the necessary personnel and finance to get it ready in the shortest possible time.

I wish to say that in so far as the medical treatment the men are receiving and the facilities at hand while they are in the service is concerned, it is a hundred per cent. I saw Penfield's men doing brain surgery over in France. They had the very best of everything. I think it is a reflection on ourselves that when the men come out of the service, after we are through with them, particularly those who are suffering from a mental disability, every facility is not available to care for them and the very best of specialists provided. I think the very best of everything should be made available to them.

I met one man who went through that Halifax institution which the senior member for Halifax thinks is the proper kind of institution—

Mr. ISNOR: Is what?

Mr. GILLIS: The hon. member said it was all right; there was nothing wrong with it; it was a good institution. I met one man who had been some time in it. They did not do much for him. When I met him he certainly was not under institutional care; he was not receiving any gratuity; he was not in a mental condition to take employment. They found half a dozen jobs for him; he could not stay on them. He never should have been allowed to leave the institution.

The point I want to make, Mr. Chairman, is that the condemnation which I read into the records of this house was written by the Dawson commission, a commission appointed by the government of Nova Scotia. Secondly, the facts that the Canadian Medical Journal have set out with regard to that class of disability and the percentage coming back from the services at this time should shock us into taking immediate action on the question. While the minister has said that he agrees there is no proper institution in the province at this time to care for that problem he did not say what the plans were with respect to the maritimes in that connection. I trust that when he makes his report to the house he will give us some concrete statement as to what the plans are for the maritimes in that field.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not want to interrupt the continuity of any subject, but what I wish to speak about is not Halifax. I desire to ask the parliamentary assistant two questions. Before I do that perhaps I had better preface them with a few remarks to assist him in giving the answers. I believe that the policy of the government, over the past years at least, with respect to voluntary recruiting has been that a man may volunteer for any particular branch of the army that he desires to enter. I wish to know if that is still continued. There was a day—I have not noticed it recently—when a good deal of advertising was done in pressure campaigns of one kind and another to get young men to enlist. They were encouraged to enlist by being told that they could go into some branch of the service and receive some type of trade or education that would be of some benefit to them after the war. I remember having a few pamphlets come to my desk and pamphlets to this effect were distributed in public places. I understand that it does not always work out in that way; that young men who may enlist may find that they do not eventually get into that branch of the service that they desire. I have a case in point. I am using it only as an illustration. It has been said that you can prove anything by citing a case because there is a case for everything. I am now using this one only as an illustration and I want the parliamentary assistant to answer the questions that will follow. The father of this lad says this:

Referring to the promises made by the government to boys just becoming military age, to the effect that if they volunteered for service they would be given the opportunity to go into a branch of the service they preferred and seemed most suited. My son entered the army in August, 1944, and was placed in the infantry, given no chance of any other branch of the service; he was refused by the air force and navy for medical reasons and no vacancies at the time; he asked to be put into the artillery or any service other than the infantry preferring the railroad corps, service corps, motor transport or signal corps; whenever he made any attempt to speak of a transfer he was always put off with the suggestion that he would be given the opportunity at the next training station.

I consider the government should respect the promises made to these lads in this regard.

My son has now been placed on draft for overseas; the infantry training he has actually received totals approximately three months.

The letter is dated January of this year. Does the government still follow the policy of permitting volunteers to enlist with the understanding that they may qualify for any branch of the army? If so, I should like to know how it happens that this man was forced to stay in the infantry. If this is not the policy at the present time, when was it discontinued?

Having asked that question, I should like to make one other observation and ask an additional question. It seems to me that if we are to have satisfied soldiers in the army, and satisfied parents of these young boys coming out of high school and enlisting, we must fulfil our promises to them and be absolutely fair. It occurs to me that there are perhaps a good many men at present in the army in Canada who have been in the army for quite some time, perhaps a year or maybe four or five years. They are still in Canada. It does not seem fair to me that a boy like this young lad, perhaps of the required age, should come out of high school and enlist and in three months find himself in the draft. I took up this case with the department, and they looked into the matter; as I say, I am using it only as an illustration. The young chap was pulled off the draft for a week or two, and then put on again. I do not know where the young man is now; he may or may not be overseas. But I wish to ask the parliamentary assistant if the government has any policy under which those who have been in the service for the longest time should be the first to be drafted for overseas service. Would the parliamentary assistant mind answering those two questions, the first of which is in two parts?

Mr. ABBOTT: In reply to the first question, a volunteer enters the army as a whole. I do not recall that there was ever any policy under which a man could select his own branch of the service. It has always been the case that his wishes were consulted, and if he were qualified to serve in the artillery, the signals or some other branch of the service he would be allocated to that branch, always provided that there were vacancies in it. But he joins the army as a soldier. It may be unfortunate that there is not sufficient room in the army service corps or some other branch for all who want to get into it, but he must go where he is put.

As to the second point, my hon. friend asked if there was a policy as to when a man would be, as my hon. friend said, put on the draft for overseas, although I do not think that is the proper term. A man enlists as a soldier presumably because he is willing to fight, and he is sent overseas after three months, four months or whatever the time may be, according to the stage of his training and the available shipping. He will not be sent into the line to fight until he is fully trained; but I should think any young Canadian who enlists to fight would be anxious to get overseas as soon as possible.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not want to leave it at that. This is the result of having two policies, or two armies in Canada. Here is a young man who enlists of his own free will. The government may claim to have a certain policy; they may say to him, "If you enlist we will put you where we think you are best suited. Of course we may help you if you have any choice in mind." I do not know whether the pressure is as great now, but we all know there was a time when the army was pulling hard for voluntary enlistments, and young men were given all sorts of inducements to get them to enlist voluntarily. These young boys are not perhaps as mature as some of the older men in this house who are losing their hair and getting grey around the temples. They want to see life, and they enlist on the assumption that they may be able to enter some particular branch of the service. I have no doubt that this was encouraged. We cannot speak for every individual recruiting officer, but we know that pressure was brought to bear on the young men of this country to have them enlist. The parliamentary assistant has made a statement. I wish all Canada could get it and know that when young men enlist in the army they are going to be sent where the army wants to send them, and to the service into which the army wants to put them. The parliamentary assistant was very pronounced on that point. He usually conducts himself pretty well in this chamber. When he answered me a moment ago, I rather detected that he was getting a little impatient. I do not blame him, either, after sitting here hour after hour listening to all sorts of questions and complaints of one kind and another. But let Canada know; let the young men know that when they enlist they enter the army as a soldier and that is all there is to it.

Mr. ABBOTT: Hear, hear.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not say "hear, hear" to that whole statement, but I do say that fact should be made known. Let us not fool these young men any more about this thing. I suppose we shall have to be satisfied with the minister's reply, whether we like it or not.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): This afternoon the opposition were given quite a lecture by the Prime Minister about the time being taken in this debate. We were told that we were not getting through these estimates quickly enough so that parliament might be dissolved. I am the first member of the official opposition to discuss these estimates to-day. It is passing strange that some ten hon. members who were elected as supporters of the government should have occupied the time of the committee during the past seven hours. The parliamentary assistant has not had an opportunity to place upon Hansard the answers to a number of questions which were left in abeyance on Friday, although he has had the week-end during which to get the answers. I have one or two other questions which I should like answered at the same time.

I did not take part in the debate on the San Francisco security conference, but I wish to raise an objection in connection with it. I will admit that my objection comes too late, but it was raised during the debate by some of my colleagues and other hon. members. I was anxious to get on to the discussion of these estimates, so that I refrained from speaking during that debate; but if we compare our delegates with those going from Britain and the United States, at a time like this when our young men are making such sacrifices, it is passing strange that included among those delegates from Canada's parliamentary group there is not one who has ever seen active service. With the number of people from whom the government could have chosen, on the government side alone to say nothing of the opposition in both this house and the other, surely someone representing the armed services could have been included in that delegation. I believe that the armed services first of all and then agriculture and labour should have been represented at that conference if it is to mean anything at all, although I am not one of those who are overly enthusiastic as to the outcome of that conference, judging by past history. We have in this country men who have had wide experience not only in the armed services but in various public offices throughout the country, who could have accompanied the Prime Minister and his group to San Francisco, and I wish to register my disapproval of the way in which our delegation has been made up.

On Friday I asked the parliamentary assistant a question relating to the number of N.R.M.A. men who had gone over to Britain and had left there for the actual theatre of war on the continent, and I believe the hon. gentleman said he would get me the answer. I also asked for a list of the retired senior officers, with their retiring allowances, from January 1, 1940, to date, which might be placed on Hansard. Then another question was raised by the former minister of national defence in regard to the number of Canadian casualties to date, that is dead and wounded, for the infantry; the total to date, and these figures broken down by months. That is, he was asking for the figures since November 1 of last year. I trust the parliamentary assistant will be able to place that information on Hansard.

Another question which the hon. member for Lake Centre raised in the discussion on Friday last was with respect to the retirement of General Pearkes. I believe the parliamentary assistant said it was his understanding that General Pearkes had retired voluntarily, but I read in the Ottawa Journal of to-day that General Pearkes states that he received the following message from the adjutant general:

There is no suitable employment for which you can be recommended in the Canadian Army.

Some other correspondence between the department and the officials of the Canadian Legion and having reference to General Pearkes that probably had no bearing on this matter, was tabled this afternoon by the Minister of Agriculture. I think this matter should be cleared up. The department should issue a proper statement as to the circumstances surrounding the retirement of General Pearkes. I hope the parliamentary assistant will be able to put on the record the information for which I have asked.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think I can give most of it. First, my hon. friend asked how many N.R.M.A. men have actually gone to battle theatres from Britain. The latest figure I have is as of about a month ago and is 238. We have not had a report for the last month.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Had they gone active; were they general service when they left?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have no indication as to whether they had gone general service after they went over.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Before they left Britain.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is no indication as to that. The hon. member for Lake Centre asked how many men had converted overseas on arrival, and our records indicate that the number is one hundred and eighty-nine who had enrolled while they were on the boat, and ninety four after they had reached overseas. I have nothing to indicate whether the figure two hundred and thirty-eight to which I have just referred of a month ago were ones who had converted or were simply sent. There is no distinction made overseas between the two groups.

Then I think my hon. friend asked for a list of the senior officers who had retired.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The figure of two hundred and thirty-eight given by the parliamentary assistant seems to be a very small percentage of the total that have gone to Britain. What is the policy—

Mr. ABBOTT: I pointed out that that was a month ago, to the end of February. That is the latest figure I have in any event. I have the list of officers who have retired but it is fairly lengthy, and perhaps the committee would agree to its being placed on Hansard.

The CHAIRMAN: With unanimous consent.

There was another question asked with reference to the present Minister of National Defence; that is, his retirement on November 1, 1944 and what allowance he would be entitled to and upon what basis. My hon. friend will realize that he is not in receipt of a retiring allowance.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I wanted to know what he is entitled to.

Mr. ABBOTT: The information I have here indicates that his retiring allowance will be $8,960.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That is the annual allowance?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is the annual allowance, the annual pension. I cannot think of any other question that was asked by the hon. member for Souris.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): There was another question which was dealt with mainly by the hon. member for Prince; that is the casualties to date and by months.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have that information here and I can give it. On Friday last I mentioned to the committee that the saving in wastage for the four months period from November, 1944, to February, 1945, inclusive, as compared with the projected wastage was about 10,000 men. I have since been informed that on rechecking the figures the officers conclude that this saving is closer to 12,000, and that of that saving about 6,500 were in the months of November and December, 1944; about 3,500 in January, 1945, and about 2,000 in February, 1945. The saving in the infantry amounted to about seventy-five per cent of the total savings.

Mr. RALSTON: Have you the March figures?

Mr. ABBOTT: No, not yet.

Mr. RALSTON: Will they be available?

Mr. ABBOTT: I would think so. I will check and get them if possible and I can put them in later. The hon. member for Prince also requested the monthly figures of the number available. As I have already informed the committee, we had at the end of March more than seventy-five per cent more fully trained infantry reinforcements than we expected we would have. My hon. friend asked if I could give this month by month. At the end of December we had over ten per cent more fully trained infantry reinforcements than expected. At the end of January we had over forty per cent more than expected.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend says "over"; I suppose he means close to.

Mr. ABBOTT: Close to; that has been the standard phrase that is used. At the end of February we had over fifty per cent more than expected and, as I have already said, at the end of March we had over seventy-five per cent more than expected. Besides having more fully trained infantry reinforcements than estimated, we had in addition more reinforcements undergoing training in the United Kingdom at the end of each of those months than we expected we would have.

While I am on my feet I should like to elaborate upon a statement which I made in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Prince with respect to a possible change in the physical requirements for the armed forces. After the recess on Friday I said that I had been informed that there had been no substantial change, no change of significance. That is true; nevertheless there have been some variations, and in order to make the record clear I think I had better state what those were.

I am informed that the physical standards for vision for overseas were lowered by general order 548/44, dated December 22, 1944, and published in C.A.R.O. 5222, dated December 27, 1944. The effect of the order applying to the new standards for "E" is that personnel generally who were graded "E.2" and "E.3" for visual acuity now become grade "E.1." An increased number of serving soldiers in Canada is, thereby, made available as reinforcements, and acceptance at reception is increased by the number who would previously have been graded "E.3" and are now "E.1." I am informed that the changes brings our new vision standard into line with that of the British and United States armies, with the Canadian still slightly higher, and was set after due consideration of the duties to be carried out, and where.

Then a change was made in the "S" factor by the elimination of grade "3" by general order 58/45, dated February 24, 1945, and C.A.R.O. 5410, dated February 28, 1945. This comprised a slight lowering of standards as serving personnel with "S.3" in their pulhems profile are assigned "S.1" or "S.4," following medical review, according to rewritten standards for these grades. It is repeated that the new standard for "S.1" is very slightly below the previous one. Serving soldiers in Canada raised from "S.3" to "S.1," and recruits graded "S.1" and trained, have, therefore, a stability rating very little below that previously laid down for "S.1."

The application of the new standard for "S" means that a certain comparatively small number of serving soldiers in Canada upgraded from "S.3" to "S.1" is made available as reinforcements. "S.3" has not been assigned at reception since 1943 as doubtful cases between "S.1" and "S.3" were accepted for recheck with grade "S.1" assigned.

The above are the only actual lowering of standards of any account since early in the war. It is pointed out, however, that the minimum pulhems profile set for any given type of duty is being constantly changed according to requirements, except in the case of actual combatant troops, the minimum profile for which has not been changed to any appreciable extent.

Mr. RALSTON: Are there no "S.2" grades at all?

Mr. ABBOTT: I must confess that I am almost completely ignorant of what appears to me to be a complicated system, and I cannot answer my hon. friend's question.

Mr. RALSTON: So that my question may be plain my hon. friend said that "S.3's" were either regraded to "S.1", which raised them two notches, as I understand it, or they were put down one notch, making them "S.4". I wondered why, if they were regraded, they were not regraded as "S.2". I wondered why they were jumped two notches. I understand that there is a new standard for "S.1", and that it is slightly lower, to use my hon. friend's own expression than the present standard for "S.1" and lets in a comparatively small number additional to those who were let in under the previous grading.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. RALSTON: I recall that in November when the matter was discussed there was a proposal whereby, by a certain lower grading, particularly having regard to the "S" classification in the pulhems system, and possibly the eyes, although I am not sure about that—anyway the proposal was that by lowering the grading it might be possible to raise five hundred more men.

Mr. MacNICOL: Out of how many called?

Mr. RALSTON: It will be remembered that at that time 4,500 additional general service men were to be found out of the general service resources in Canada, and it was proposed that another 500 might be found, provided that the pulhems tests were regraded to some extent. I at that time expressed my dissatisfaction with that, because I thought that we should not lower the grading, and my successor came to the same conclusion. I was wondering if the change that is now made is any reversal of that policy or in what respect the lowering is being made whereby "S.1" is now not as good a grading from the point of view of stability as "S.1" was prior to this change in February.

Mr. MacNICOL: From what has just been said, are we to believe that men of lower physical category than formerly are now being taken in as A-1?

Mr. ABBOTT: No; this pulhems system is an elaborate and careful system of rating grades. Instead of having A-1 and A-2 as they did in the last war, when they used to tap your chest and look at your eyes and say you were A-1, or A-2, or C-1, or C-2, in this war we have a complicated system of grading, the pulhems system. They weight you for different considerations, for how your sight is, how your chest is, and one thing and another, and these ratings are being constantly changed. There are I do not know how many permutations and combinations in connection with the system.

I cannot answer the question of the hon. member for Prince except to say this. On Friday afternoon, when I asked the officers whether any substantial change had been made in recent months, they told me that while there had been some minor changes made there had been no—I have forgotten exactly the word used, but I think it was no substantial change.

Mr. RALSTON: Significant change.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think that was the word—no significant change made since my hon. friend was minister. I may have used a word that was a little too strong and that is why I have put this explanation on the record to-night. I have been assured that it does not mean that men of a low physical category are being taken into the army.

Mr. MacNICOL: But that is exactly what has been going on. I have been very much interested in what has come out in the last few moments. I shall not take up much time because I want to follow the Prime Minister's advice to shorten the debate, and it will have been observed to-day that certainly this group has not taken up much time. But for some time I have said that the policy is to take into the army the halt, the lame and the blind, apparently with the desire to fill up the ranks. I have a case in mind. I made a call on the family. I had not known that the only son had been killed, but while I was there the family was in the greatest distress and upon making inquiries I was informed by the mother and by a neighbour who had gone there to console the family that the only son had been killed overseas, and that he was almost blind when he joined the army, that he had to wear very thick glasses. The neighbour indicated the thickness of the glasses, saying they were that thick. I said, "How in the world did this boy ever get into the army with such bad eyesight?" The mother said that the son had told the doctor that he could not see very well, but the doctor told him that he would be all right in the army. First, he was sent to Camp Borden. He was there for less than nine months and then was sent to England. On his arrival in England it was found that his eyesight was not good enough to fire a gun, and he was put in a tank wearing thick glasses because he was unable to see. The tank was struck by a shell and this young man with others of the crew was killed. Picture a boy wearing very thick glasses, and having those glasses knocked off with the concussion of the shell striking the tank; he would be quite unable to see. He would be wholly lost without his glasses. I should like the assurance of the acting minister that the halt, the lame and the blind are not being run into the army.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will give that assurance with the greatest readiness and the greatest certainty too. May I say to my hon. friend the member for Prince that I have just been advised that there is no "S.2" classification. Why, I do not know.

Mr. RALSTON: They jump from "S.1" to "S.3".

Mr. ABBOTT: Apparently.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. ISNOR: I should like to make a few remarks in reply to the hon. member for Cape Breton South. I regret that he did not like the attitude I adopted in rising in my place to defend the reputation of the institutions of his native province and mine. He read an editorial from one section of the press of Nova Scotia. I should like to read for the benefit of the committee an editorial from another newspaper in Nova Scotia closer to the hon. member's own constituency. I refer to an editorial that appeared in the Eastern Chronicle, New Glasgow, of Thursday, April 5, dealing with the same subject, namely, the Dawson report. The editorial refers to the fact that Professor Dawson came from Toronto to do certain work and presented a report consisting of a large number of volumes covering various matters and subjects, including a report on the hospitals of the province. The Eastern Chronicle sums it up in this one paragraph:

Then a special writer, George F. Davidson, an expert from Ottawa, went to town with the asylums and gaols in Nova Scotia, and scored them severely. Some may not be what they should, but apparently this chap did not visit all. We can inform him that there is an asylum in Pictou county that in care, conduct and equipment, will compare with the best in Ontario. He made no exceptions. He included all in his general survey; or, to be fair, he should have done. . . . It was unfair and unjust.

And the closing paragraph of the editorial is this:

The Dawson report should be buried, and not embalmed. Don't waste time with it. Forget it. Pay the bill, and charge it up to error.

I pointed out and took exception to the words of the hon. member for Cape Breton South, when he stated that there was no institution in Nova Scotia able to take care of mental cases such as he described—

Mr. GILLIS: I said, "equipped".

Mr. ISNOR: —and I pointed out for the benefit of the committee that during the past year the Nova Scotia hospital had taken care of forty-two patients from the army, twenty-six from the navy, nine from the air force, twenty-four from the merchant marine, and eleven others, making a total of 101 cases handled by that institution last year. I further stated that since the outbreak of war 325 cases had been taken care of by this particular hospital. I will not refer to other institutions which enjoy a splendid reputation in our province, but let me say that for the life of me I cannot see why the hon. member for Cape Breton South should continually blacken the good name of our province in the manner in which he generally refers to matters pertaining to Nova Scotia. It is not long ago that, in the memory of all in this house, the hon. member went to Hamilton and made a statement with regard to the Prime Minister of Great Britain. Of course the hon. member nods his head; he recalls it. On another occasion he said we should do away with such men as Churchill.

Mr. GILLIS: You are absolutely wrong.

Mr. ISNOR: He meant, after the war; but still that was the general impression which was created. He makes statements and creates the impression that men of Mr. Churchill's calibre should be done away with—but, of course, after the war. What should we have done without Mr. Churchill during the present war?

Mr. MacNICOL: Lost the war.

Mr. ISNOR: I would venture to say, what should we do without Mr. Churchill's calibre after the war, remembering his splendid reconstruction policy and programme?

Mr. GILLIS: What has that to do with mental hospitals in Nova Scotia?

Mr. ISNOR: I am just pointing out the extravagant statements which the hon. member generally makes. I would also recall, although it is not directly in point with this discussion, that the hon. member predicted in 1943 in Nova Scotia that we would have a federal election before Christmas of that year. We are now in 1945, and we are still without that election.

To come back to the Nova Scotia hospital, the hon. member is always ready to jump up and interrupt, and no doubt he will want to answer this.

Mr. GILLIS: I managed to get you up, anyway; that is a good thing.

Mr. ISNOR: That is all right. I will take care of myself and I will continue to defend Nova Scotia. I pointed out the hospital record and I gave the figures the other day. They have a record for cures of something like thirty per cent of mental cases which go into their institutions for attention. Right here I believe I should again repeat what I said about the Nova Scotia hospital, a splendid institution which is carrying on its good work along with many other smaller hospitals throughout our province. To have the record clear, I am going to place on Hansard a question for the Minister of Veterans' Affairs to answer when his report is before the house. It is this: Does the Minister of Veterans' Affairs consider the Nova Scotia hospital is a proper place to take care of mental cases?

With that question I will rest my case as to whether the Nova Scotia hospital is a proper place for the purposes I have mentioned.

Mr. NICHOLSON: A few days ago the parliamentary assistant tabled the report of the national health survey conducted by the Canadian medical procurement and assignment board. I should like to take this opportunity of thanking the former minister of national defence for authorizing the preparation and publication of this report. According to the order in council which was passed in July, 1942, "the primary function of the board was to secure physicians for the armed forces and at the same time to endeavour to preserve adequate medical services for the civilian population." Surely all hon. members and all citizens of this country are anxious that the very best possible medical services be supplied for the three armed services.

I understand that when the present premier of Saskatchewan, Hon. T. C. Douglas, who is provincial minister of public health, was in Ottawa a year ago he took up with the Minister of National Defence the question of making available in certain parts of Saskatchewan personnel from the medical services of the army, navy and air force. I need scarcely remind the committee that the civilian doctors in all parts of Canada have been doing a very difficult job in recent war years.

According to this report, we now have over twenty-five per cent of our total medical personnel in the armed services; and from the table on page 21 it appears that Manitoba, with thirty-two per cent, has the largest percentage, followed by Saskatchewan, with 31.7 per cent. According to another table we find the population per physician by provinces as of March 1943 was as follows: New Brunswick, one civilian physician to 2,136 persons; Saskatchewan, one to 2,078; Prince Edward Island, one to 1,659; Alberta, one to 1,626; Nova Scotia, one to 1,450; Manitoba, one to 1,438; Quebec, one to 1,206; British Columbia, one to 1,168; Ontario, one to 1,068. In Ontario, where there are paved roads and good communications, it seems difficult to understand why there should be one doctor to every 1,068 persons, whereas in Saskatchewan, with a very small mileage of paved roads and an extensive mileage of mud roads, there is but one doctor to 2,078 persons. In my own riding, for example, we have just ten doctors for 57,000 persons or one doctor for 5,700. In the town in which I live, at one time six doctors made a good living; now we have only two doctors, and they are working literally day and night. I cannot understand how they stand the strain. I have been in their offices at ten o'clock at night, when the offices were still full of people waiting to see the doctor.

I understand that the Department of National Defence would consider releasing more of the senior medical men who have been in the service for some time, provided that there was a location where it could be definitely established that there was a shortage of medical doctors. Could the parliamentary assistant give us any information as to the number of medical personnel released to date, and the number that have been made available in Saskatchewan with a view of caring for the medical needs of the civilians?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid I have not that information here at the moment, but I could probably get it and give it to my hon. friend to-morrow. I doubt if there are very many, because we are still pretty short of doctors.

Mr. NICHOLSON: How about the general policy?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not in a position to say anything about that now, except, of course, that the general policy will be to release military doctors as far as it is possible to do so. Some have already been released. In my own city of Montreal I know of one doctor who had served overseas for two or three years who has been released in order to come back to a civilian practice in one of the large hospitals there, because of the serious shortage of physicians in that hospital. Just how far it has been possible to pursue that policy I cannot say.

Mr. KNOWLES: I understand that men coming home from overseas who are entitled to thirty days' leave are granted for the period of that leave a ration allowance of fifty cents a day, in addition to their regular pay and allowances. So far so good; but I am told that in respect of officers—in any event this is true of military district No. 10—there is granted an additional lodging allowance of $1.20 a day. This means that on top of the differences which already obtain, there is this further difference, under which men on leave from overseas receive an extra $1.70 a day, if officers, but only fifty cents a day, if other ranks. Does the parliamentary assistant know about that situation? If not, will he look into it, with a view to seeing whether anything can be done to eliminate what appears to be a matter of discrimination against other ranks?

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall make inquiries.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Mr. KNOWLES: I have another question relating, this time, to the payment of gratuities to next of kin, where the service man has become a casualty. If it is necessary for the next of kin in respect of whom dependency has not been established to apply for the gratuity, to what department does that person apply? I may say it is clear that service personnel apply to the service with which they are connected. On the other hand, where a dependent is on pension, he or she applies to the Department of Veterans' Affairs. But what is the situation in respect of next of kin whose dependency has not been established, many of whom have already made application and have been rejected? To what department do they apply?

Mr. ABBOTT: The Department of Veterans' Affairs.

Mr. KNOWLES: And it is clear that application must be made?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does the parliamentary assistant know whether notification to that effect is being sent to the large number of people who made application before order in council P.C. 2239 of April 5, 1945, was passed? Are people who made application before the order in council was passed and whose applications were rejected now being advised that they can make application again?

Mr. ABBOTT: I cannot answer yes or no. I doubt whether they are being advised, but I shall make inquiries to find out. There has been a good deal of publicity in the press within the last few days in respect of this new order in council which extends the right to the estate of the deceased. I should think that, human nature being what it is, most people who are interested would have seen it. But I cannot tell my hon. friend whether the people who applied for this benefit, when there was no legal right to receive it and whose applications were therefore rejected, will be notified to apply again to the Department of Veterans' Affairs. However, I shall find out.

Mr. KNOWLES: The reason why I feel they should be notified is—

Mr. ABBOTT: It was suggested the other night that they should be.

Mr. KNOWLES: My reason for supporting that proposal is this, that during the time before the order in council was passed many of these people were deeply hurt by the letters of rejection they received. In fact, in many cases they felt insulted by the way in which they were written. Despite the press publicity, many of them will not readily apply again. It is only fair to those people that they should now receive notification.

Mr. ABBOTT: I believe the matter is receiving consideration, and I shall see that it is looked into again.

Mr. KNOWLES: Thank you.

Mr. BRUCE: The Secretary of State this afternoon stated there would be some difficulty with respect to getting information in answer to a question of mine for production of correspondence, including letters and telegrams, between General Pearkes and any of his officers and the Department of National Defence. He pointed out that it meant going through a great many files, both here and out at the coast. In order to simplify the question, so as to make it easier for the department to answer, I shall modify it. I see, upon looking at page 621 of Hansard, that the parliamentary assistant after recess on April 6 placed on the record a reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver South earlier in the afternoon. That was in connection with a circular letter which had been sent out by the adjutant general to the district officers commanding on January 13, 1945. If the parliamentary assistant would produce a copy of the letter or telegram, or both, in reply to that circular, I should consider that quite sufficient answer to the question I asked. That should be very easy.

Mr. McLARTY: I am afraid, no matter how willing the hon. member for Parkdale may be to expedite the matter, once the order is passed by the house—and I point out we are now in committee—no member moving a resolution asking for a return, without consent of the house, would have any right to vary that order. I presume the ordinary procedure is to put a question on the order paper. I do not think we could accept the willingness of the hon. member for Parkdale, no matter how great it might be, and treat that as an abrogation of the order the house itself has passed.

Mr. BRUCE: If I do that, it would take two days before the question would appear on the order paper and a further delay before the answer would be received in the house. Of course that would defeat the object I have in view.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend's motion was one for the production of papers. I allowed the motion to pass, with the usual reservation, that any correspondence which was confidential was privileged, in accordance with the recognized rule, and therefore would not be produced.

I think the return in question will probably be brought down to-morrow. I find, however, on examination of the correspondence between General Pearkes and the minister and officers of the department, that all of it, without exception, is marked confidential and secret—apart altogether from the general rule that so far as I know it has never been accepted practice that correspondence between senior officers of the department and other officers of the same department would be producible in the house.

This happens to be a military department. General Pearkes was a district officer commanding. I can tell my hon. friend now that the return which will be brought down will not include any of the correspondence between General Pearkes and the minister or other officers of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. JACKMAN: You are afraid of it.

Mr. ABBOTT: No; we are not afraid of it; and if my hon. friend insists I shall be glad to make a statement as to General Pearkes' position.

Mr. BRUCE: The parliamentary assistant has replied in part to the question standing as No. 1 on the order paper, but he has not answered Nos. 2 and 3. Will he bring down that return to-morrow?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is not in order to ask it now. I shall do my best, certainly.

Mr. BRUCE: I should like now to refer to a statement the Minister of National Defence is reported by the Canadian Press to have made on March 18 while visiting the London military hospital:

My biggest job at the present moment is to see that hospitals throughout the country are ready as soon as possible so that the men from the hospitals overseas can be brought back to Canada. I want to get those men over as fast as I can.

Is there any change in the regulations from those that existed before when the Minister of Veterans' Affairs or his department was responsible for the wounded men who returned from overseas?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not aware of any change. As my hon. friend knows, some men who come back from overseas go first to military hospitals before they are sent to Department of Pensions and National Health hospitals or Veterans' Affairs hospitals, but so far as I know there have been no changes in the regulations.

War Appropriation—The Army

Mr. BRUCE: Is it a fact that there is a very great shortage of those hospitals available, and as a consequence men are not now able to return home for treatment and are therefore kept overseas for a longer period than necessary?

Mr. ABBOTT: No; I do not think that is correct. Of course, in common with a good many other things, we are facing problems of hospitalization for our returning service men. My hon. friend referred to a statement that the minister made in London. It certainly is a difficult problem and is one which is receiving the most constant and earnest attention. It will involve real difficulties, particularly in the period where a good many of our medical men are serving in the armed forces and are not yet available for veterans affairs hospitals. That was touched on a moment ago by the hon. member for Mackenzie. These are the difficulties that we are having to meet.

Mr. BRUCE: Is it not a fact that this refers to hospitals under the Department of National Defence and not under veterans affairs?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know. I have not seen the statement to which the hon. member is referring. I am afraid I cannot offer any comment on it.

Mr. MacNICOL: Earlier in his remarks I believe the parliamentary assistant said or admitted that a number of the N.R.M.A. personnel who had not volunteered before leaving Canada, on arriving in England still persisted in refusing to volunteer to go France.

Mr. ABBOTT: No; I did not say that.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is done with these men?

Mr. ABBOTT: I think the hon. member for Lake Centre asked me how many men converted overseas, and I said my latest information was that 189 of them converted en route and ninety-four after they got over there. None of them refused to serve as soldiers. There are still 11,000 of them over there who retain N.R.M.A. status.

Mr. MacNICOL: What happens to those who refuse to volunteer?

Mr. ABBOTT: Nothing. They are soldiers. They are over there. They will be sent to the front. Some of them already have been. There is no distinction between them and the G.S. troops.

Mr. MacNICOL: They are not kept in England until they do volunteer?

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There will be no distinction made between them after they arrive in the old country and the others. When they are directed to a theatre of war do they get the G.S. badge on their uniforms?

Mr. ABBOTT: No; I do not think they do. I will not be positive about that, but I do not think they do. I did not know they wore the G.S. overseas.

Mr. HOWE: "G.S." is not worn overseas by anybody.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There are certain questions that have not yet been answered and I should like to get an answer from the parliamentary assistant.

Before that is done I should like to refer to one statement made a moment ago by the parliamentary assistant in answer to the hon. member for Parkdale. The hon. member for Parkdale asked for production of certain letters that passed between General Pearkes and the Minister of National Defence, and the parliamentary assistant said that they would not be produced because they were confidential.

Mr. ABBOTT: And privileged.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: But first let us deal with the matter of their being confidential. Were they so designated on the letters?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: And General Pearkes' letters to the minister were so designated?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes; all of them without exception?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: All the correspondence without exception?

Mr. ABBOTT: All that I have in connection with this matter are designated "confidential".

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The question I had in mind was this: reference was made this afternoon to the matter of farm leave, compassionate leave, and the like. In the November issue of Canada at War is set out in detail the numbers of men of the N.R.M.A. personnel who are absent on extended leave.

Mr. ABBOTT: About six thousand, is it not?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: As of the date of this issue the number is 8,500. It sets out in detail the various duties for which leave was granted, farm leave, compassionate farm leave, farm duty and harvest farm leave; industry, logging, mining and other leaves. I asked this question as it appears on the order paper, question No. 11:

How many of the home defence troops are on extended leave from depots and in particular (a) by province; (b) by military districts?

Is the parliamentary assistant now in a position to answer that question as well as the several other portions of it? It has been on the order paper since April 3.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not in a position to answer it now. I must confess that I did not come prepared to deal with questions that are on the order paper. That question will have to be passed as an order for return because question No. 9 of it is a justice matter. As I explained to the hon. member when I spoke to him privately to-day, I am advised that we can answer questions Nos. 1, 2 and 3 comparatively readily. Questions Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7 and 8 would require a tremendous amount of work. It would involve going through part II orders all across Canada. I think question No. 7 could be fairly easily answered by the justice department. There is no possibility of questions Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7 and 8 being answered before the term of parliament expires. I hope I shall be able to answer questions Nos. 1, 2 and 3 to-morrow, which is a question day. I understand that for the reasons I have already given the question will have to be passed as an order for return.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I find it difficult to accept the answer given by the parliamentary assistant, for this reason: question No. 4 reads as follows:

How many home defence troops ordered overseas or to some other part of Canada or who have been on leave, failed to report in each of the months, November, December, 1944 and January, February and March, 1945 . . .

Surely that information is at headquarters?

Mr. ABBOTT: Possibly, but the hon. member has asked for it by provinces and by military districts. We may be able to do it by military districts; we do not keep break-downs by provinces. That has been told time and again. I pointed out it is not part of my duty to draft questions for the hon. member. If he frames his questions so that it is difficult or takes time to answer them that is not my fault. I shall be glad to get such information as is available and I explained that to my hon. friend to-day; but I do not produce the information myself. My officers are conscientious about this sort of thing, and when they tell me that it is difficult if not impossible for them to give certain information within a reasonable length of time I accept their statement. I do not dig the information out myself, but any information that can be obtained we shall give.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is convincing evidence that the information in regard to those who are absent without leave is not here.

Mr. ABBOTT: It can be obtained, but I cannot assure my hon. friend that it can be obtained before next Monday.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Not before next Monday?

Mr. ABBOTT: No; I cannot, from what my officers tell me.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Therefore the position of affairs so far as those who are absent without leave and classed as deserters is concerned is that the department is in a position where it cannot furnish us a record of the numbers before next Monday. Is that the position?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have already given some information as to numbers. As I indicated in my statement the other night there are approximately 6,000 N.R.M.A. men on extended leave. I can give that to my hon. friend right now broken down by military districts, in round numbers.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I would think so.

Mr. ABBOTT: But not by provinces.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Then let us have it by military districts.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend's question is not restricted to military districts; it includes provinces, and it has not been possible to secure that information. By military districts the numbers are as follows:

M.D. 1	700
M.D. 2	400
M.D. 3	200
M.D. 4	800
M.D. 5	2,000
M.D. 6	100
M.D. 7	100
M.D. 10	200
Pacific command	300
M.D. 12	700
M.D. 13	500
Total	6,000

Mr. RALSTON: In reference to the figures which have been given by my hon. friend with respect to reinforcements on hand and the lowering of casualties, with what I assume to be a consequent improvement in the reinforcement situation, I was pressing upon my hon. friend the other night this proposition. Assuming that the forecast we were given last November represented a satisfactory situation if it was attained; assuming what my hon. friend has just said, that the situation has been bettered by the saving of some 12,000 casualties in all arms and about 9,000 or seventy-five per cent of that total in the infantry, then I am asking whether it is not possible to utilize the additional 9,000 for the purpose of granting very much more extensive rotation leave than has been granted so far. It would seem to me that this would follow, provided that the situation without taking account of the savings in casualties was as forecast last November.

War Appropriation—The Army

In that connection I wish to mention to my hon. friend that I think he ought to check the figures and see whether the position would have been as forecast last November if it had not been for that saving in casualties. Speaking in the house the other night my hon. friend said, at page 577 of Hansard:

The principal reason why the infantry situation is better than forecast is, of course, that battle casualties have been lower than estimated, although this has been in part offset by a higher incidence of sickness and other non-battle casualties brought about by the extraordinarily difficult conditions under which our troops have been operating.

I feel that on the figures given by my hon. friend to-night, if I know anything about it, the statement that the principal reason why the infantry situation is better than forecast is the lowering of battle casualties is really an understatement; and I feel that my hon. friend ought to look into the question as to what the position would have been if the battle casualties had been as forecast, to see what the reinforcement situation would have been in that event. I must say that on a quick calculation it would almost appear, but I wanted my hon. friend to check, that the situation would be worsened than forecast if it had not been for the decreased battle casualties.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think I can assure my hon. friend that that is not the case, at least relying on the assurance of my officers. They tell me that is not the case, but I cannot say from my own knowledge.

Mr. RALSTON: I am glad to hear that, but if my hon. friend will take the figures which were forecast as being the numbers on hand at the end of each month, add the percentage he has given to-night and thereby arrive at the figure which is actually on hand now, and compare that with the saving in battle casualties he might find that not only does the increased percentage which he has given result from the lower battle casualties, but also that it takes these savings in battle casualties to make up a considerable part at least of the original number which it was forecast would be on hand.

[Mr. Ralston.]

I am emphasizing that if what my hon. friend says is correct, then there ought to be a substantial number of trained reinforcements on hand who could be utilized for the purpose of relieving men who have been in line four and five years, and very greatly increasing the number on rotation leave.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is being done.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend says that is being done. The other day my hon. friend stated that altogether some four thousand men had been sent home on rotation leave. I know what the figures were; there was nothing secret about them, and I think I gave them to the house. The fact was that in Italy in November there were probably between ten and eleven thousand men who were entitled to rotation leave, and four thousand is only four-tenths of that number. That was for Italy alone. I am saying that if there are on hand the number forecast in November plus the number which my hon. friend has given as a saving in casualties, then it seems to me, if the programme forecast has been carried out, there should be available sufficient to give rotation leave to the other six thousand at least. I say this in all seriousness, because this matter was impressed upon me when I was in Italy; it was one of the problems that I brought home with me; and one of the things to which I gave first attention was preparing the plans for rotation leave, which were on the desk of my successor when he took over. As I said to the house in November, just the second day before I retired, we had received assent of an arrangement whereby we could provide transportation. This matter of rotation leave is all important, and I cannot impress too strongly upon my hon. friend and the department the fact that these men ought to be taken care of if there is any actual surplus of trained reinforcements on hand. I am pointing out to my hon. friend that I think he ought to check and see if the surplus really is on hand, having regard to the figures as given to-night.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am satisfied that it is. The number of men returning on rotation leave this month is 1,500, and we are stepping it up just as quickly as shipping arrangements will permit.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I had in mind just what the hon. member for Prince has said. I have received letters from men who enlisted in 1939 and who have been overseas for years. They want to know when they are to get leave. They have been all through the Italian campaign. I do not know where they are now, but they want to know when they are coming back here, and if the figures are as the parliamentary assistant has given them it seems to me that something ought to be done.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend surely realizes that they cannot all come back at the same time. There is a shipping problem.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Then I will ask the hon. gentleman another question. Is the department bringing back first all those men who went over in 1939.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes; at least that is the principle, and I believe it is being followed.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Are any men who enlisted in 1940, or 1941 coming back from those areas on leave while men who enlisted in 1939 remain there? I have had letters from those men, and they do not think it is right for some of the fellows who enlisted later to be sent home while the 1939 boys are still over there.

Mr. ABBOTT: All I can say is that obviously the selection for rotation leave depends upon the officers in the theatres of war. The principle upon which leave is granted is length of service; the man who has been there the longest has a priority over the man who has not been there so long. Obviously you cannot lay down any definite, hard and fast rule in these matters, but that is the principle which is being followed.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): If it depends upon length of service why should any 1940 men be brought back while 1939 men remain there?

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps the 1939 men do not want to come back.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have had many letters from these men, and I do not see why something cannot be done about it.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, April 10, 1945

The house met at three o'clock.

HOUSING

LOANS FOR INDIVIDUALS IN SASKATCHEWAN— SECURITY AGREEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. H. BENICE (Saskatoon City): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that in all probability the Minister of Finance will not have an opportunity to be before the house for questions in connection with his department, I would draw his attention to question 3, which has been on the order paper since April 3, and which relates to the matter of making loans under the housing act available to individuals in Saskatchewan. I understand that many applications for loans have been made but are being held up pending the arranging of an agreement between the lending institutions and the dominion and Saskatchewan governments with respect to the matter of security. My constituency of Saskatoon is in a desperate position with respect to housing and I wish the minister would give us this information as soon as he possibly can.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I shall try to see that the question on the order paper is answered before the house adjourns.

ACCOMMODATION IN TORONTO AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): Has the Minister of Finance, or the Minister of Munitions and Supply, any further information with regard to the request made to the dominion government in the matter of further housing accommodation in the area of Toronto?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Some progress has been made in that direction. Mr. Pigott is here to-day, and it is thought that an announcement will be possible in the course of a few days.

WORLD FOOD SHORTAGES

ANGLO-AMERICAN-CANADIAN DISCUSSIONS— CANADIAN REPRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question, if I may, to the Minister of Agriculture. In to-day's paper reference is made to Anglo-American-Canadian discussions with respect to world food shortages. Can the minister advise the house who Canada's representatives at that conference will be?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Perhaps I might answer the question. The officials of the Department of Agriculture are there at the present time, and later it is anticipated that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) himself will be present.

Army—Farm Leave

RATIONING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, in view of what the leader of our party mentioned a moment ago, I would ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he is yet in a position to announce the government's policy in regard to the re-introduction of rationing in Canada.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The position is as stated the other day, that discussions are going on among the technical men at Washington at present, and discussions on the higher level are to take place at a later date; until these take place there will be no further announcement.

CANADIAN ARMY

FARM LEAVE FOR SOLDIERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. NORMAN J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, as the house is likely to adjourn in the near future, will the Minister of Labour, in view of reports which have come from national selective service in my community, which apply I think to the whole country, make a statement in respect to the special arrangements for farm leave which I have been told are being worked out in order to alleviate the serious labour shortage on farms throughout the country?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): That is up to my hon. friend. If we do not make much more rapid progress than we have been making up to the moment, this parliament may die on its feet.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Get some hockey players.

Mr. LOCKHART: I expected an intelligent answer from the minister. I want to know if arrangements are being worked out that will assure the farmers of sufficient help to harvest the coming crops.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Ask Conny Smythe.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not want the hon. member for Lincoln to break a blood vessel.

Mr. HOMUTH: The minister should not try to be facetious. It ill becomes him.

Mr. MITCHELL: If my hon. friend would show up in the house a little oftener he might learn something.

Mr. HOMUTH: I have been out trying to do my duty to the country by defeating the Liberal government.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MITCHELL: A few days ago—I do not know whether my hon. friend was here or not—I made an announcement on the policy of the Department of Labour with respect to the man-power situation in agriculture this year. It arose out of a question directed to me by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) and one of the hon. members associated with the C.C.F. If my hon. friend was not here I cannot help it.

Mr. LOCKHART: No, Mr. Speaker; the minister made an announcement of policy, but it was very vague. We still do not know what the policy is so far as the men in the armed forces are concerned, and I think there should be a clearer statement than has yet been made. I am drawing the matter to the attention of the minister.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You talk one story one day and another story the next.

SEED CORN

EXPORT REQUIREMENTS FOR GREECE AND YUGOSLAVIA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) yesterday asked a question with regard to seed corn. Seed corn comes under the administration of the seeds division of the Department of Agriculture, and therefore I should have attempted to answer it yesterday. Last February the combined civil affairs committee on military relief asked for three thousand tons of seed corn, which was subsequently shipped from Canada. Mr. Nelson Young, seeds administrator, advises me that he attended a meeting of the seeds committee of the combined food board on March 28 and that he endeavoured to find out if any further demands for seed corn would be coming along. Although representatives of the liberated countries attended the meeting, no one could indicate that there would be a further demand. Mr. Young's position is that the seed corn growers cannot be encouraged to plant seed corn in the absence of any actual export demand, notwithstanding the fact that such demands develop over night and are only likely to arise in any event during the coming winter months.

Mr. SENN: Would the minister tell us where this seed corn was shipped?

Mr. GARDINER: I have not the information as to where it went. I could get that.

EMBARGO ON HAY

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT TO DISCUSS MATTER OF PUBLIC IMPORTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. MARTIAL RHEAUME (St. Johns-Iberville-Napierville) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, under standing order 31, I beg leave to move the adjournment of the house to discuss a definite matter of urgent public importance which concerns the farming community of this country.

On October 20, 1944, an order in council laid an embargo on hay. At the beginning of March, 1945, a second order in council prohibited the export of straw and laid an embargo on that commodity. There are in this country 150,000 tons of hay for sale. In my constituency of St. Johns-Iberville-Napierville, at least 600 farmers are interested in the lifting of that embargo, because they still have on hand at least 15,000 tons of hay, and from 5,000 to 6,000 tons of straw. It is imperative that this embargo be lifted.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for St. Johns-Iberville-Napierville is asking a question which I think should be put on the order paper.

MOTOR VEHICLES

PERMITS FOR PURCHASE—LACK OF BILINGUAL OFFICIALS IN ISSUING BRANCH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): May I bring to the attention of the government the fact that there is nobody who speaks French in the branch here which issues permits for the purchase of motor vehicles, and also that there are no translators. I am not complaining of these officials, who are fine fellows, but none of them understands one of the official languages in this country, and that is the reason why some people who fill up applications in English have the first choice, and there is nothing left when the applications which are made in French have been translated. I therefore ask the government to see to it that there is appointed some French-speaking, or at least some French-understanding officials in that branch, or to see to it that they have a translator. If an application is made at Riviere-du-Loup it is sent to Quebec, from Quebec to Montreal, from Montreal to Ottawa, and then, if it is in French it is sent to a translator, and applicants have to wait for a month or two before the English translation reaches the officials concerned. I hope that the government will do something in this matter for the benefit of the French-speaking population.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Monday, April 9, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

The CHAIRMAN: We are on the estimates for the army.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I think the parliamentary assistant is to reply to a number of questions which I asked him on Friday afternoon.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes; I have a certain amount of unfinished business from Friday and yesterday. The hon. member for Yorkton, I think, asked me a question about remustering, what steps were taken to protect the position of other ranks who were remustering from one branch of the service to another. The regulation in that respect reads as follows:

The adjutant general may continue the pay and allowances of non-commissioned officers who have been withdrawn for re-training or who are reduced in rank, or who are re-posted or transferred, at the same rates which such non-commissioned officers were receiving immediately prior to being so withdrawn for re-training, reduced in rank, re-posted or transferred. Such pay and allowances as aforesaid may be continued during re-training and for the period of six months after posting or transfer to an operational unit or to any other unit in which the services of such non-commissioned officers are required, notwithstanding the rank held by such non-commissioned officers in such units or formations.

In other words, there is a substantial protection there; the same pay and allowances are continued during training and for six months after the expiration of that period. At the end of that time I suppose they have to take their chance along with the others.

Similar regulations to those for non-commissioned officers are also in effect as regards tradesmen employed in a trade, specialty, or as regards a general duty soldier, where the normal rate of pay would be less than that which the tradesman previously earned.

I think that covers what the hon. gentleman had in mind. As to the numbers at the time of the special session, it was mentioned that certain non-commissioned officers, tradesmen, were being made available under this arrangement and it was estimated that 750 of each would be made available for service overseas at an early day. The numbers withdrawn from units in Canada for this purpose were slightly less than 1,000 in each instance, and all except those who failed to complete reconditioning training will now have proceeded overseas.

My hon. friend asked me a question about the casualties in the forces among officers on loan to the British army. The figures are: killed or died of wounds, 103; wounded, 274; missing and prisoners of war, 37. That makes a total of 414.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How does that compare with the casualties within our own ranks in action?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have no direct comparison, but I may say that the proportion would be higher, for the reason that the majority of these officers went as regimental infantry officers. Some were captains, but most are lieutenants, and the casualty rate among the lieutenants, particularly in the infantry, is higher than the casualty rate for officers generally. I do not recall any other question my hon. friend asked me.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I asked about the number of men on the Italian front who had been there for more than two and a half years.

Mr. ABBOTT: There are none, because we have not been there for two and a half years, but from July, 1943.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: One and a half years, then.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have not that information, but I could get it fairly accurately. I will either give it to my hon. friend or put it on the record later in the debate.

Some hon. members asked how many men had been discharged from the N.R.M.A. to civilian life since November. I believe the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) asked that question. These are the figures:

1944—
November .....	696
December .....	643
1945—
January .....	544
February .....	461
March .....	467
Total .....	2,811

About sixty per cent of these discharges are medically unfit and over thirty-five per cent under the headings of services no longer required, compassionate grounds, and the like. Discharges under these headings include a large proportion of low category men since the service of high category men can always be utilized.

[Mr. Abbott.]

The member for Vancouver South asked for some indication as to how many out of the 7,500 men requisitioned for March were obtained. The figure is 6,179. It has been found from experience that of six men called, approximately four ultimately go overseas. One fails to complete training, for medical reasons or otherwise, one goes out of the training stream with a lower category, and four are trained and fit to proceed overseas. That has been found from experience to be a fair average.

Mr. GREEN: Of that 7,500, how many are N.R.M.A. troops and how many general service?

Mr. ABBOTT: I cannot give the exact number, but we have very few N.R.M.A. troops coming in now. When they receive the call they volunteer as soon as they are called for medical examination and we have very few new men acquiring, if I may put it that way, N.R.M.A. status.

The hon. member asked one other question as to the number of conversions of N.R.M.A. to general service during these four months. The figures are these:

1944—
November .....	2,244
December .....	2,841
1945—
January .....	1,445
February .....	1,892
March .....	2,115
Total .....	10,537

Mr. GREEN: Can the parliamentary assistant break down those figures to show how many converted within the first month?

Mr. ABBOTT: I made inquiries as to that, and the officers tell me it is virtually impossible to do it. The records are not kept on that basis. It would involve in fact examining the individual record of each individual soldier, and they assure me that it would be practically impossible. I cannot therefore give the information.

Mr. BROOKS: Is it correct for the parliamentary assistant to say that four out of six proceed overseas, or is it that four out of six remain in the army?

Mr. ABBOTT: Four out of six are eligible material to proceed overseas, and in the ordinary course, presumably, would go. What I really meant to convey was that of six men taken into the army as being fit at the time they are taken in, four are found medically suitable and sufficiently adaptable to become soldiers and fit to go overseas.

Mr. BROOKS: You said, "proceed overseas".

Mr. POULIOT: If I understand correctly, those who have served in the army in Canada, not having gone overseas, are temporaries in the civil service, just as are certain civilians who find jobs in the service. I would ask the parliamentary assistant if it is not true that their jobs are actually held temporarily and may be taken by men or women returning from overseas.

Mr. ABBOTT: Is my hon. friend referring to positions in the general civil service of Canada?

Mr. POULIOT: Yes.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not military positions?

Mr. POULIOT: No.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid I cannot answer that. I understand that under the Civil Service Act, or by virtue of some order in council, I do not know which, veterans both of this war and of the last war are given preference in the filling of permanent civil service positions. Apart from that I cannot speak from personal knowledge.

Mr. POULIOT: In my opinion the preference is unfair, and I will tell the hon. gentleman why. So long as one acts in conformity with the law of the land one should not be superseded or replaced by somebody else. For instance, if a man or a woman goes to report to the registrar, is called for training and is found unfit, then that person is in a position of inferiority compared to the person who goes to report before receiving the registrar's call. The first one is not a volunteer, but the second is called a volunteer even if he knew he was medically unfit. I want to make myself clear, because I do not wish to be misunderstood. There is a man with a rupture. He waits for the call of the registrar, then obeys the call and reports to the medical examiner and is found unfit. That man will have no preference. Another fellow who is in exactly the same medical class also suffers from a rupture. He may report to the medical centre before receiving a call. He will receive a button showing that he acted differently from the first one, although he will not be any more in the army, but neither of them has a preference. The preference will go to the one who has gone overseas.

There is another class of men who are medically fit, who volunteer and are taken into the army. They are in the active army; they were from the time of their enlistment. They want to go overseas, but they are kept here for one reason or another. After the war is over, those who have volunteered and who have been accepted in the army will have no preference, precisely because no attention has been paid to their requests to go overseas. This seems to me to be unfair to men and women who have fulfilled the requirements to secure such preference. Positions now held by persons who are competent and who have had several years' experience are applied for at times by men who have no such qualifications but have been overseas, even on a Cook's tour—it is not necessary to go to a theatre of war to have the privilege of being a returned man from overseas. Those who have been to Newfoundland have that privilege; those who have been to England—even before there was any blitz—are classified as having been overseas, and what is most ridiculous is that people who are not Canadians but who have come from overseas can enjoy that preference over Canadians who have done their duty, who have been acting according to the law and who are handicapped by not having been overseas—they, the non-Canadians, will get those positions. That is one of the most serious problems with which the post-war period will have to deal. My hon. friend will have to see that the Civil Service Act—that abomination whereby people from all nations of the world who have signed the treaty of Versailles as our allies have preference over red-blooded Canadians wherever they came from; even Japanese and Italians had preference over red-blooded Canadians until the beginning of this war—my hon. friend will have to see that that is changed.

The Civil Service Act may have been changed by an order in council passed by virtue of the War Measures Act, but no such legislation has come before us as members of parliament. We are interested in defending the rights of the men and women who are in the army and to whom the doors of the civil service will be closed when they are discharged from the army. I wonder what is the legislation to-day. I was talking with a boy and a girl who are in the army. Both of them volunteered from the start. They wanted to go overseas but they were not afforded that opportunity. When the war is over they may have some employment in private business, but the public service will be closed to them. Is that the way to deal with these men and women, these boys and girls, who have done their duty according to the law enforcement of this land?

There is something else that I wish to point out. Since the beginning of the war all men have been induced to go overseas. It was afterwards made to apply to women. All men have been told that their duty is to enlist, and not only to enlist but to volunteer, meaning thereby that a man who was in the army as a draftee, who had followed all the provisions of the law, was not a good citizen; he was considered an inferior citizen because he had not enlisted for overseas. How many are there in Ottawa who have enlisted for overseas with the understanding that they were to stay here and who boss the whole show not only in the militia but also in the air force and the navy.

I will ask these questions of the government: How many air vice marshals in the R.C.A.F. had no active fighting? How many air commodores in the R.C.A.F. had no active fighting? How many group captains in the R.C.A.F. had no active fighting? How many wing commanders in the R.C.A.F. had no active fighting? How many squadron leaders in the R.C.A.F. had no active fighting. How many flight lieutenants in the R.C.A.F. had no active fighting? I asked the questions in regard to the army and I was told that it was very hard to get and would take a long time. I still expect it. My hon. friend told me last week he might not be able to give it. I have not got it yet although I still honour a man who keeps his word.

Mr. ABBOTT: Or tries to.

Mr. POULIOT: I may be mistaken, but I give him the benefit of the doubt. It is the same in the navy; it is the same in the three branches of the army. Well, now, what will happen? After the war those men who will have been seconded to the three departments will take their jobs. Those jobs will not be taken by the men coming from overseas. The Ottawa bureaucracy is in a class by itself. I do not say that of all civil servants, some of whom I honour; but I see in the chamber my good friend from Vancouver South, who was with me on the civil service committee. He and the other members of the committee did their duty. We did not agree on every point, but they saw what was weak in the whole organization. We want everybody to have a square deal. We want those who have been honest not to have any trouble through being associated with those who knew how to get the juicy plums. I shall ask my hon. friend the parliamentary assistant to see that some corrections are made in order that those who have been acting according to the provisions of the law, when the law was in force, should not be penalized because they respected the law and abided by it.

In the second place I ask my hon. friend to see to it that the most competent employees in the civilian departments remain in their jobs; but if the preference is to be applied it must be applied to all. If we are to have an overseas preference, let them appoint people from overseas in such a way that these people will not be deceived, and in such a way as to not deceive those holding temporary positions at the present time. I do not want any class of individuals to be discriminated against, and I hope my hon. friend will speak to his minister about it so that something may be done. It can be done, provided that the head of the department is not afraid to deal with the parasites who are in the department. There are people in it who do positively nothing, who are nonentities, who are kept on because their work is related to that of Mr. So-and-So, or because they are the nephews of the illustrious Mr. So-and-So, or because they have given tips to somebody, or because they tell little secrets, or pass notes, or do things like that. That must cease; it is unworthy of men who have a true and high sense of duty to reward political stool-pigeons, even if they are gold-braided from head to foot.

I wonder if my hon. friend and the committee would allow me to ask a question in regard to Air Marshal Leckie. I know we are not discussing the air estimates—

Mr. ABBOTT: The army estimates.

Mr. POULIOT: I know; but these two war departments are so entangled that I hope the committee will let me ask this question:

Did Air Marshal Leckie have a plane made over for his personal use? If so, what was the cost? Is the said plane used only for official business? If not, why? Did the said air marshal, his wife and some friends go on at least one pleasure trip in the said plane? Was the plane damaged on one of the said pleasure trips, and if so, what was the cost? How much gasoline has been used on these pleasure trips? And what was the cost of each such trip to the taxpayers of the country? And how much gasoline was diverted from urgent war purposes?

That is one question I should like answered. I have another to ask in connection with Colonel Joan Kennedy, a member of the Canadian Army located in Ottawa. I should like to know how many army cars call at her place in a day and how much gasoline is used by those cars on these social visits. I should like to know how much time of drivers is wasted on such non-essential work, and whether there is a gasoline shortage. We see some men in the army driving gentlemen who are supposed to be propagandists. These are young, able-bodied men who are good chauffeurs and who drive Mr. So-and-So who writes fine pieces to boost the staff. That is all waste.

Will my hon. friend be kind enough to inquire into these matters and have these questions answered? I find them very interesting.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall certainly make inquiries as to the matters relating to the army, which my hon. friend has raised. No doubt the Minister of National Defence for Air will look into the other question.

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask just one more question? I thank the hon. member for Vancouver South, for whom I have a high regard. I do not share his views, but even when I do not agree with him I admire his persistence and courage. I am informed that when a man commits an offence against army regulations he is sent to a civilian gaol, where his fingerprints are taken and he is treated as though he had committed an offence against the common law. I am informed also that this is done in order that these men may be kept in gaol after the war is over. Previously a man who did not act in accordance with king's regulations and orders was sent to the clink, but now he is sent to a common gaol. I would ask my hon. friend if such is the case, and why the army should send these men to civilian gaols.

Mr. ABBOTT: If a man is tried for a purely military offence he is kept in military detention. If he is charged with an offence under the criminal code he is turned over to the civil authorities for trial. If convicted and sentenced I understand that he serves his sentence in an ordinary civilian gaol, which is natural. I know of no provision which entitles the army even to ask that the civilian authorities detain military personnel permanently for military offences. I shall make inquiries, however, and see if there is anything in the information the hon. member has been given.

Mr. POULIOT: I shall make my case clear. Here is a man who commits the offence of housebreaking, contrary to one of the provisions of the criminal code. He may be sentenced to gaol or to the penitentiary. On the other hand I do not see why a man absent without leave should be sent to gaol with the understanding that he would remain there for his full sentence after the war is over. I tell my hon. friend it will be pretty difficult for him to deny it. My information is that special instructions have been issued to that effect by the Department of National Defence.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall make inquiries. Personally I am convinced that no military personnel are incarcerated in civilian gaols for military offences. They may be tried in civilian courts for civilian offences, and in those cases they might have sentences imposed upon them and go to gaol. However, I shall verify the situation.

Mr. POULIOT: Will my hon. friend check the records with respect to the instructions given?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: The hon. member for Témiscouata has referred to the civil service preference as it affects men and women of the forces. It just happened that while he was speaking I received a letter from a young man in Victoria who had been an observer in the air force for four and a half years. He completed his training on December 9, 1941, which was just a day or two after Japan struck at Pearl Harbor. He had been posted for overseas service; and then, because of the Japanese attack, the posting was cancelled and he was sent out to the Pacific coast. Since then he has been flying as an observer up and down the Pacific coast. He is doing anti-submarine patrol work. All hon. members coming from the Pacific coast know that that is dangerous work, and that there have been many casualties among air force men engaged in it. Yet, while that service entitles him to the clasp to the volunteer service medal, and also entitles him to gratuity on the basis of overseas service, upon applying for a position in the civil service he finds he has no preference whatsoever. I suggest to the parliamentary assistant that that is an unfair situation, and one which should be remedied without further delay.

Mr. ABBOTT: I would be in agreement with my hon. friend. I am not particularly familiar with the civil service regulations, but I do agree that the service described is operational service, and it should command the same preference as that enjoyed by the man overseas.

Mr. GREEN: He tells me in his letter that there are a number of air force lads who find themselves in the same position, being unable to get the preference.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall make a point of seeing to it that that particular question is taken up.

War Appropriation—The Army

Mr. CHURCH: There are one or two matters I should like to point out to the parliamentary assistant. First of all, I would direct his attention to the civil and criminal law courts in Ontario, and particularly in the Toronto district. I understood from his predecessor that the law society had made an arrangement for the benefit of soldiers who were in trouble, under which they could have counsel representing them in the law courts. However, from press reports I see very little of those counsel in summary police court trials in the Toronto district. I do know that in cases before some of the magistrates in Ontario army officers without any authority by law come from the militia department and appear before the courts, hearing the evidence given before the magistrate and making comments unsworn or sworn. That condition should not exist. Then those soldiers, unable to pay the fine, may be sentenced to gaol buildings unfit for civilians. A great many of the gaols in the province are not good enough for civilians, and if they are not good enough for civilians they should not be considered good enough for soldiers. I am not asking the minister to reply to-day, because I realize he has not had notice of this complaint. I know he comes of a family who have had, next to the Prime Minister, a long connection with our city. One of his family was our city solicitor and a respected corporation counsel for a long time, and was a very able man indeed.

Then, is there not some arrangement under which the city could have the return of the Canadian National Exhibition buildings, as many of them are not being used for active army training? I pointed out the other day to the parliamentary assistant that certain members of the air force have been moved to Trenton. The navy has now nearing completion a large new barracks adjoining the baseball park. The other buildings are used for the district depot, and for demobilization purposes by the Minister of Veterans' Affairs. In view of the fact that many of the soldiers have not houses, or will not have them on May 1, could not some of these buildings now used by the Department of National Defence, and by other government departments as well, be turned over for the housing of soldiers? For example, Norway barracks, situated back of the baseball park, has been taken over by the city and has been fitted up with some first class apartments; it has provided housing for a great many soldiers from Toronto. I would ask the minister to look into this matter and to give the city back the exhibition buildings as soon as possible. At present they are not being used to any great extent by active service personnel.

May I point out that high rates are still being charged soldiers by the railways of this country for fares and meals. Those men who are stationed at Petawawa and at other distant points must pay almost a week's wages to go to their homes on leave or on week-ends. Could not further representations be made along the lines followed by the former minister, where he asked the railways for cheaper fares on the trains, cheaper meals, and an allowance for additional leave where personnel must travel long distances? In many instances the men get home only to find that they must go back almost immediately.

Surely in this sixth year of the war it is nearly time we had some plan announced with respect to post-war active militia and home guard. Have we any plan for an army in the post-war period? Are there any plans for a reserve army? I ask this, because if our Canadian delegates to San Francisco are to enter into internationalism they will find that we shall need 100,000 men as our share of protection for the bases on the seven seas. Another 50,000 will be required for home defence—along the Pacific coast, the Atlantic coast, the St. Lawrence waterways and the great lakes.

In respect of newspaper articles, I fail to see why any general or other high-ranking officer should have leave to break the rules of the department by writing to newspapers, when that privilege is denied the men in the ranks. Ours is a citizens' army, and the regulations should apply to all.

Respecting the return of the troops, may I point out that I represent a riding composed to a great extent of working men. I believe there should be some improvement in the condition respecting men who have taken part in the Italian campaign and have been overseas for nearly five years. A large number of Toronto units have fought in the Italian theatre. I know of a case in my own constituency where the husband has been overseas since the start of the war, having gone over with the first contingent. This man had been in the last war and was sent to Italy in this one. He contracted pneumonia very badly in Italy and was in hospital there for a considerable time. After great difficulty he was removed to England and was again placed in hospital. Now he finds he cannot get home because we are told there is not sufficient shipping and he is needed there for other duties. The result is that this man is doing guard duty in England and that sort of thing when he should get a discharge at once. Surely there should be one rule for all: first in, first out.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall take note of my hon. friend's remarks and see that they are brought to the attention of the proper authorities.

Mr. SLAGHT: Mr. Chairman, with reference to the first matter dealt with by the hon. member for Broadview, for his benefit and for that of hon. members generally in the committee, lest a wrong impression might have been left in their minds, let me say that any members of the armed forces in the Toronto district, to which the hon. member referred especially, who are in trouble, may have the benefit of legal advice and defence in any of the courts, from the police courts through to the assize courts. That service is rendered without charge, by reason of an arrangement with the benchers of the Law Society of Upper Canada and the York County Law Society, whereby they have brought into being a list of junior members of the bar who are willing to volunteer their services, when called upon by a crown attorney, magistrate or judge, to act without fee in the defence of any member of the armed forces. So far as the Toronto district is concerned there need be no apprehension about that, and I believe—the Minister of Justice would know better than I—that the dominion law society across Canada have made somewhat similar arrangements in all the great cities. My friend from Vancouver will know.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is true of Montreal.

Mr. SLAGHT: It is true of Montreal, and the law society have taken the initiative to see that no young man right across Canada goes undefended because he has not the money.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What the hon. member for Parry Sound has stated is in accordance with the facts everywhere in this country. No serviceman need go undefended regardless of where he is. Justice is not denied him by reason of failure to provide for his own legal defence. But I did not rise to deal with that matter.

I dislike bringing up a matter more than once, but sometimes it becomes necessary in order to get the information. I am going to refer to two matters only on which I believe the committee and the country are entitled to more information than has yet been furnished. As to the first, if the parliamentary assistant takes the stand that he took last night, then so far as I am concerned that is final, and, as the Prime Minister said yesterday, it will be for the people to decide who is right and who is wrong.

I refer to the retirement of General Pearkes. All kinds of answers have been given in this house in regard to this matter. The question has been raised that he was going to be a political candidate and that he intended to be a candidate while he was in the permanent force, although according to the regulations, no officer of the permanent force can be a candidate. General Pearkes has the right to know and the people of Canada have the right to find out why he was advised by the adjutant-general, as he says he was—and I quote now the words that he used in the interview he gave to the press yesterday:

There is no suitable employment for which you can be recommended in the Canadian Army.

That is the statement which General Pearkes says was made to him by the minister of defence.

Mr. ABBOTT: By the adjutant-general.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: By the adjutant-general, representing, of course, I presume the wishes of the minister himself. Now that is a serious statement. Yet when the hon. member for Parkdale asked for the production of the documents and the correspondence the answer that the parliamentary assistant gave last evening was:

I find, however, on examination of the correspondence between General Pearkes and the minister and officers of the department, that all of it, without exception, is marked confidential and secret—apart altogether from the general rule that so far as I know it has never been accepted practice that correspondence between senior officers of the department and other officers of the same department would be producible in the house.

I am not going to argue with the hon. gentleman over that statement at the moment, though in no way do I accept it as final and correct in every particular. The fact remains that an injustice is done to an officer who has no opportunity of placing before the house and the country, what actually took place; and if that be the rule, then, sir, I ask that that rule be dissolved in this case in the interests of justice.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am prepared to make a full statement on the question, and I shall do so as soon as my hon. friend gets through.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is exactly the point I was coming to. The parliamentary assistant says that he will make a full statement. If he is prepared to make a full statement and he makes it on the basis of the correspondence he has before him, then having made that statement we ask him not to form his own conclusions, or place his own conclusions before the country; we ask him to place the correspondence before us so that each one of us can form his own conclusion.

Mr. ABBOTT: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

Mr. ABBOTT: Has General Pearkes asked him to request that this correspondence be produced? I stated last night that aside from the question of privilege every communication is marked "confidential".

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have no hesitation in answering that. I answer it unequivocally, no. I have never had any correspondence with General Pearkes. But parliament has a duty and a responsibility to right wrongs. That is what parliament is for. I have never seen General Pearkes, nor have I ever spoken to him. But the people of this country want to know why a man of his experience and distinguished record, a record unequalled, certainly not excelled, should find himself advised by the adjutant-general that "There is no suitable employment for which you can be recommended in the Canadian Army." We in this parliament cannot permit justice to be denied by technicalities, and I am sure that the parliamentary assistant, a distinguished member of the bar, would admit that over and over again in the courts in the interests of justice the rules of evidence are sometimes extended in order to cover particular circumstances.

Mr. ABBOTT: This is not a rule of evidence, as my hon. friend knows very well.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No, it is a rule of the house, if what my hon. friend says is right.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is a rule of the house, plus the fact that every communication is marked "confidential," and I assume that that means what it says. I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend, and perhaps I should not do it, but perhaps it would enable him to judge a little better whether he should continue to insist on the production of the correspondence when he has heard the statement I am ready to make on my responsibility.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Hiding behind the privilege that we are not permitted to see the documents.

Mr. ABBOTT: Nonsense. Hiding behind nothing.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Not nonsense—facts. We are not asking for any ex parte explanation on the part of the hon. gentleman. The hon. member for Parkdale is asking for the documents. Then we can form our own opinions without the assistance of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have informed the hon. member for Parkdale that he is not entitled to get the documents.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is what I am coming to.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall make my statement and he can like it or not, as he pleases.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not mind questions, Mr. Chairman, but I do not like to be interrupted by speeches. The hon. gentleman takes the stand that these documents will not be produced. All I ask is this. Regardless of justice or injustice, regardless of fairness or unfairness to General Pearkes, is that the final attitude the parliamentary assistant takes?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: All right; then I will not pursue it any further. I will ask this, and I am not going to ask for the revelation of any documents which might contain secret information: is it or is it not the fact that the adjutant-general wrote General Pearkes using these words, "There is no suitable employment for which you can be recommended in the Canadian Army?" I am sure that is a very simple thing to answer. It requires no production of letters.

Mr. ABBOTT: The answer is, yes. And even—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. ABBOTT: When my hon. friend allows me to make a statement I will cover that point as well as a number of others.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: We now have the answer which I set out to get. So far as production is concerned, the hon. gentleman says he will not produce, and that is final. Now the people know that this man, with the distinguished record he has, was told by the adjutant-general: There is no place for you in the service of the country that you served so well.

Mr. MacNICOL: And he won the V.C.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I come to the second matter, and it is in regard to the answers the hon. gentleman gave last evening to the hon. member for Souris as to the N.R.M.A. men who converted overseas. You will remember, sir, that I asked a question as to whether a new rule had been made whereby these men who were sent overseas under the National Resources Mobilization Act could convert after they got overseas. Originally General McNaughton said in answer to the hon. member for Prince that the cut-off period would be embarkation; and the hon. member himself apparently did not know about the new rule, because he told me there was no foundation for the suggestion I made that they could convert overseas.

Mr. ABBOTT: I corrected that immediately afterwards.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes; I understand. What I want to find out is this. Last evening the hon. member stated that there were 189 who had enrolled while they were on the ship and 94 after they had reached overseas; and that 238 had been sent up either to the reinforcement pools or—

Mr. ABBOTT: To active theatres.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: —or to active theatres of war. Having regard to the fact that there were 8,000 fully-trained infantry soldiers in the N.R.M.A. ready for service overseas in November last, and that most of these men were overseas, it seems difficult to understand why the number who have been transferred for reinforcement purposes to active theatres as at the end of last month should be only 238. How many of the N.R.M.A. men who did not convert were in active theatres of war or in reinforcement pools there at the end of March? The hon. gentleman said yesterday that the latest information he had was the end of February.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Six weeks ago.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is a serious situation, Mr. Chairman. It takes six weeks for information to come from overseas to Canada as to how many N.R.M.A. men were sent as reinforcements to the units they were sent overseas to reinforce. I am sure the hon. gentleman has more information than he furnished us with.

Mr. ABBOTT: No, I have not.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: You have not?

Mr. ABBOTT: No, I have not, but I am going to try to get it. I have sent a cable to England to see if we can get the figures for the end of March.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: When was that sent?

Mr. ABBOTT: It was sent last night, I think. I asked to have it sent; I do not know whether it has gone.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is a hard thing to understand.

Mr. ABBOTT: This is not information that we keep on file. I have given my hon. friend a great deal of information, and I am willing to give whatever we can get.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This is information the people particularly want to have.

Mr. ABBOTT: We will try to provide it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: We want to know exactly how this thing is being carried out, because it looks as though something is holding it up, when it is considered that 8,000 fully-trained men go overseas and in a matter of two or three months only 238 find their way into a reinforcement pool or an active theatre. That is difficult to understand.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is to the end of February.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is to the end of February.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend will recall that the first flight left in January.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes. I appreciate that. What time in January?

Mr. ABBOTT: Early in January.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Will the hon. gentleman then say that this information will be forthcoming before the end of the present week?

Mr. ABBOTT: I cannot guarantee it will be here before the end of this week. I hope it will be. If it is not, I can probably arrange to give the press a statement or otherwise arrange to make it public. I will give that undertaking.

As to how many of the 238 men at the end of February had volunteered before proceeding to an active theatre of war, the answer is that one had, and 237 went over still with N.R.M.A. status. That covers the second question.

Coming to the matter of General Pearkes' resignation—

Mr. POULIOT: Before my hon. friend answers—

Mr. ABBOTT: If my hon. friend does not mind I should like to dispose of this Pearkes matter now. I was not particularly anxious to discuss, or at least I did not myself propose to volunteer a statement as to the circumstances surrounding the resignation of Major-General Pearkes. I made a statement in the house the other evening, which I believed was correct, that he had retired at his own request. I still believe it is correct, for reasons which I will explain to the committee. I saw in the papers the next day that General Pearkes felt that I must have been misinformed and that he had not retired at his own request, but at the request of the department.

I preface what I have to say by stating that General Pearkes, of course, was a permanent force officer and the amount of his pension varies according to whether he is placed in the retired list at his own request, in other words retires voluntarily, or is retired involuntarily, and he receives a pension twenty-five per cent higher in the second case than he would in the first. That is a matter which is of some importance and, naturally, a matter of some considerable concern to an officer who is contemplating retirement from the service.

On the 26th of November, 1944, General Pearkes indicated his willingness to retire from the service, giving as his principal reason that he felt that perhaps the Minister of National Defence might have lost confidence in him as district officer commanding. No action was taken on that request at the time. It was felt that General Pearkes was a capable, efficient officer, physically able to discharge his duties, and that there was no justification for retiring him. On the 5th of January, 1945, General Pearkes renewed his request, this time indicating that he felt that the status of the Pacific command had become rather less important than it was in the past, that it might be desirable to afford junior officers an opportunity for promotion, and requesting that he be relieved of his position as general officer commanding the Pacific command. That was January 5. That request and recommendation was not complied with at that time, for the same reasons that governed the decision not to retire General Pearkes on November 26. On January 23 General Pearkes renewed his request to be compulsorily retired, and at that time gave as his principal reason for making this recommendation that he no longer had confidence in the policy which the government was asking him to carry out. That, as I say, was on January 23, and I should add that at that time General Pearkes indicated that he realized it was unlikely that there would be any other suitable command in which his services might be utilized. No immediate action was taken with respect to that further recommendation, and on February 12 General Pearkes again renewed his request that the recommendation that he be compulsorily retired be acted upon. That was followed up with a further request, on February 14, that action be taken, and finally on March 14 General Pearkes was advised by the adjutant-general along the lines indicated by the hon. member for Lake Centre, that there was no suitable employment available for him in the

[Mr. Abbott.]

Canadian Army and that he was to be retired.

The effect of that action was of course that General Pearkes retired on a pension twenty-five per cent higher than he would have received had he voluntarily retired—if I may so describe it—from the army. It is perfectly evident of course that an officer who states that he has no confidence in the policy of the government is not—and he himself realizes it—suitable to receive another command; and therefore, unless we are to infer that General Pearkes expected to be retained on the active list at full pay, but performing no services therefor, we are driven to the inescapable conclusion that he expected to be retired from the army on full pension.

Those, Mr. Chairman, are very briefly the circumstances which led up to the retirement of Major General Pearkes from the Canadian Army. I have stated them in strict chronological order. Every one of the letters and telegrams between General Pearkes and the adjutant-general—let me say that was the channel through which the communications took place, either the secretary of the Department of National Defence or the adjutant-general—every one of those letters or telegrams which I have seen is marked confidential or secret, and for the reason which I gave to the house last night I do not consider it is in the public interest to produce them. But I suggest to the committee that as between retiring at his own request and compulsory retirement, we are simply playing with words. Retirement was effected in a way, and quite properly, which has enabled General Pearkes, a distinguished officer with a long career in the army, to retire at a pension twenty-five per cent higher than he would have received had he insisted that he simply wanted to retire.

Mr. GREEN: Was General McNaughton retired in the same way?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid I am not in a position to answer that question at the moment, but I have given the committee the circumstances surrounding General Pearkes' retirement. I want to make it perfectly clear that I did not raise this subject. I am very glad to give the information, but it was not raised by me, and I think I have given that information concisely and with complete accuracy.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Now that the hon. gentleman has gone so far, possibly he will now tell us what the matters were respecting which General Pearkes raised objection?

Mr. ABBOTT: I thought I had made that clear. I apologize. It was in connection with the instructions received from the Department of National Defence to continue the efforts to induce N.R.M.A. men to convert to general service. It was that point and that point alone.

Mr. GREEN: Have those instructions been read into Hansard?

Mr. ABBOTT: Those and the previous instructions that had gone out. Broadly speaking, the stand he took was that he did not feel that he could conscientiously continue to carry out the policy of endeavouring to persuade N.R.M.A. men to convert to general service status. I thought I had made that clear.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Has the hon. member a copy of the instructions that he gave?

Mr. ABBOTT: The only instructions given to General Pearkes were the general instructions issued to all district officers commanding. I think I read into the record yesterday or tabled the instructions which went out in the middle of January. I did so in reply to a question from the hon. member for Vancouver South.

Mr. GREEN: Are those the instructions?

Mr. ABBOTT: Those among others. General Pearkes received no special instructions. Circular instructions went out to all D.O.C.'s in Canada and he received no instructions different from those received by other district officers commanding. No distinction was made.

Mr. POULIOT: Although the news from October to December was good, that the allied troops were gaining ground in Europe, which was the situation when we met for the special session in November and December of last year, the discussion that took place in this chamber did not promote the cause of our men. It is my deep conviction that if it had not been broadcast by the ex-minister of National Defence, the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Ralston), the hon. member for Parkdale, (Mr. Bruce) the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and some others that our troops needed reinforcements, that there was a weakness in our lines, it is most probable that the German army would not have used its last shock troops as a trump card to take advantage of the deficiency in the Canadian forces that were described by the former minister of national defence, by the hon. member for Parkdale and by the hon. member for Lake Centre, who is now leaving the chamber—I am glad to see he came back. I could not understand sir, why the correspondence exchanged between the former minister of national defence and the Prime Minister was read to the house even with the assent of His Excellency. His Excellency had not the right to authorize the Prime Minister to read to the house some information that was in contravention of the defence of Canada regulations.

In every railway car there is a poster warning the passengers to be very careful about what they say. It shows a picture of a sailor who has been drowned because of some indiscretion. Nothing could be more in contravention of the defence of Canada regulations than the correspondence between the Prime Minister and the former minister of national defence, and the leading questions that were put by the former minister of national defence to his successor in office while he was answering questions in this house, and the other statements made by a former lieutenant governor of Ontario and a man of the reputation of the hon. member for Lake Centre, that our troops were worn out, that they needed reinforcements and needed them all the time. It informed German headquarters that there was a weak spot in the Canadian forces, and the weak spot was so great that the matter had to be aired in parliament; that a minister had resigned because the troops were not supported.

There was a campaign in the press; and as we have been told not to say anything even in a low voice that could reach the ear of the enemy I am sure that what was said by the former minister of national defence, whom I now accuse; the hon. member for Parkdale, whom I now accuse, and the hon. member for Lake Centre, whom I now accuse from my seat in this house, gave more comfort to the enemy than anything that could have been said at any time in this country since the beginning of the war. And what was the effect? The effect was that the German army, which was discouraged, the German army which was going backwards, received some comfort and encouragement because of those uncalled for and untimely statements; the counter-attack was organized and 60,000 men of the Canadian and American armies were lost in that counter-attack. Not only that; if those hon. gentlemen had kept their mouths shut last December our army would probably be in Berlin to-day far ahead of the Russians.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to make a correction. I do not wish the committee to labour under a misapprehension about what I said in my remarks with regard to the law society. I never criticized them in any respect. I may say to the hon. member for Parry Sound and the hon. member for Lake Centre that I am well aware of what the law societies of the country did in the last war and this war, especially the younger members of the profession. However, they did not do any more in those dark days than did the clergy, especially the surgeons and dentists, voluntarily for soldiers at home and their families. My remarks had relation to the courts in Ontario. I refer to the fact that in some cases under summary trials the offender has not legal representation. When the war started I asked the then minister of national defence, who unfortunately was killed, to appoint a lawyer or lawyers in No. 2 district to go into the police courts and the lower courts and act for soldiers. As the committee knows, many of them are charged with breaches of control regulations. If it were not for the war those acts would not be an offence. Because these young men are charged with those offences the women and children suffer.

I am well aware of what lawyers are doing all over the country. I was head of a police commission, the largest police commission in the overseas dominions, for over seven years. I am well aware of the fact that many of our judges, magistrates and crown officials and lawyers in that district are returned men themselves and that they do all they can for these young soldiers. But you have to consider the soldier has civilian rights. He does not lose his civil rights on becoming a soldier. Civilian inquests have become a dead letter in cases of soldiers killed in Canada. There are not enough returned men on courts martial. The court fines in our district are much larger than they are in other districts. My remarks were based to some extent on the remarks of Chief Justice Robertson of the Court of Appeal of Ontario regarding the treatment of minors, and no Borstal system for them. I made no reflection on the law courts, the magistrates, judges or the bar at all. I thought it would be unfair if hon. gentlemen took the wrong meaning out of what I said.

Mr. WHITE: I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant a question in regard to an article appearing in the Ottawa morning papers which is headed: "Eighteen-year olds told to join the reserve army." Has the parliamentary assistant a copy of the notice which was sent out? I shall appreciate if he will put it on Hansard or read it to the committee. Under what provision or under what act is authority obtained whereby eighteen-year olds can be instructed or ordered to join a reserve unit? Where did they get the authority to tell them that they would have to attend drill and summer camp and that they must obtain a certificate from the officer commanding and turn it in to the school principal? In view of the remarks of the parliamentary assistant to the effect that as soon as the war in Europe is over the present call-up system will be terminated, it seems most unusual to have a law or an order or a direction to this effect go out at this time. To how many schools in military district No. 3 was this notice sent?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am very glad my hon. friend asked that question, and I welcome the opportunity of making a statement to the committee on it. The article was brought to my attention this morning, and inquiries have been made to ascertain what were the circumstances surrounding the letter referred to. I have here a copy of the letter, which is signed by Major H. R. Starr, for Brigadier F. L. Armstrong, D.O.C., M.D. 3, which perhaps should be placed upon Hansard or tabled, as the committee prefers.

Replying to my hon. friend as to the grounds on which it might be considered that such a letter could properly be sent out, the position is this. Section 12 of the national selective service mobilization regulations, 1944, authorizes the district officer commanding to require any student who is in the designated age class for military service to enroll in the C.O.T.C. auxiliary training unit of his school, or in such other military unit as the D.O.C. may direct. The student is to undergo military training to the satisfaction of the district officer commanding. By proclamation published in the Canada Gazette of June 20, 1944, every man born in the year 1926 was so designated. However, although designated, no man may be called up for the active army until he reaches the full age of eighteen years and six months. The district officer commanding military district No. 3, Brigadier Armstrong, has prescribed that students of the age of eighteen who are attending high school shall take military training in the reserve army units. There is no new regulation involved in this requirement; the D.O.C. is acting under the authority of the mobilization regulations as quoted above. However, it is realized that youths who have left school to accept employment are not required by the regulations to undergo military training until called up for the army, and the district officer commanding military district No. 3 is amending his instructions following conversations to-day with defence headquarters. The order will now apply only to those students who have reached the call-up age of eighteen years and six months whose service with the active army has been postponed. For the information of the committee I have here a copy of the circular letter which was issued by or on behalf of the D.O.C., M.D. 3, which perhaps I might table. It contains instructions together with the list of reserve army formations which may be utilized, and probably it would be unnecessary to have the whole letter appear in Hansard. Perhaps the committee will be satisfied with the explanation I have been able to give.

Mr. WHITE: Did this notice go to all the high schools in the district?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not in a position to answer that question definitely at the moment. I am inclined to think perhaps it did, but I shall have to verify that and give my hon. friend an answer later, perhaps in a few minutes.

Mr. WHITE: Does this same procedure apply to all other military districts, or is it something special in M.D. 3?

Mr. ABBOTT: The regulations apply to all military districts. As I pointed out in my statement, however, and as my hon. friend will see when he reads it, the officer representing the D.O.C. was perhaps a little more zealous than the strict letter of the regulations would call for. As I indicated, the order now will apply only to students who have reached the call-up age of eighteen years and six months and whose service with the active army has been postponed.

Mr. WHITE: Then I should like to ask the hon. gentleman for some further information in connection with the approximately 35,000 men of the N.R.M.A. who are now in Canada. I do not think the parliamentary assistant made clear to the committee what will be the status of these men upon the termination of the war in Europe. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that as soon as the war in Europe was over the call-up system would end. He further went on to say that the forces going to the Pacific would be raised on a voluntary basis, and explained how the men required for Canada's share in the army of occupation would be obtained. I should like him to explain to the committee what is going to be the standing of these N.R.M.A. men in Canada on the termination of the war in Europe, and what is going to be done with them. Are they to be discharged, or are they to be retained in the army? If they are to be retained in the army, what will be the purpose of retaining them, and what will be their duties?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know that I can give my hon. friend a completely definite answer on that point. I can answer it to this extent, that they will not be discharged. They will be retained in the army; and the rule with respect to demobilization, based essentially upon the principle of first in, first out, will be followed. As to what will be done with them obviously I am not in a position to say. It is quite clear, as my hon. friend will realize, that there will be a considerable amount of military duties required to be performed in Canada for some considerable time after the armistice, such as manning depots and doing the regular housekeeping work of the army, if I may use that term. The only assurance I can give him is that these men will not be discharged as soon as the war in Europe is over.

Mr. WHITE: Would the parliamentary assistant go so far as to say that none of these men will be sent outside Canada?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is a matter of government policy, I think, on which I am not prepared to make any statement at the moment.

Mr. HOWE: The Prime Minister made the statement the other day. He said they would not be sent out.

Mr. CHOQUETTE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I wish to say just a few words before the conclusion of the discussion on the resolution recommending that this house should grant to His Majesty sums not exceeding $2,000,000,000, the greater part of which will be used for the continuation of this ruinous war and to make the gift of hundreds of million dollars to outsiders.

It is no longer millions but billions of dollars which, since the last six years, are spent at a terrific rate. We are told that the war in Europe is drawing to an end. We might have expected that the expenditures would have been much lower this year, but the appropriation is just as large as it has been for the last few years. The billion dollars of 1942, the billion dollars of 1943, and the $800,000,000 of 1944 increase to that extent our national debt. All this is due to the war, we are told.

From 1930 to 1939, the government refused to vote a few million dollars to relieve unemployment, to help workers and farmers. No money could be found, during the depression, to relieve distress, to raise the morale of those who wanted work. But since the war, it has been possible to find millions and even billions of dollars. Canada is doing in this war more than any other country in the world in proportion to her population, but nevertheless our country is very much less interested in this conflict than the United States and Great Britain.

War Appropriation—The Army

To-day thousands of families are unable to find suitable houses and others must live in wretched slums, while the government is getting ready to make to the United Nations another gift the greater part of which will go to England. When shall we have as leaders of this country men willing to behave as true Canadians, anxious to ensure the future of our beloved Canada?

Mr. Chairman, since the prospect of an early victory against Germany is being held out to us, why continue to call farmers for military service? At this time of the year heavy work must be done on the farms, and the government should rather discharge the farmers' sons and farm workers who are now in the army.

Canada is accomplishing a war effort that is out of proportion with her resources. Therefore I oppose with the utmost energy the granting of the sum allotted for military purposes in the present resolution. Before spending so recklessly for other nations the government has the stern duty to provide for our needs. What have they done along those lines? Enumerating all our needs would be too long; there is a labour shortage on the farms, caused by a mobilization act which does not make enough allowance for the needs of agriculture, lumbering, and industries of every kind, and the wood fuel problem has not been solved. It will perhaps be a national problem next winter, notwithstanding the fact that this country is bountifully supplied with forests. The making of gifts, the expenditure of billions of dollars, all that is considered quite proper by imperialists. As far as I am concerned, I am opposed to Canada remaining, within the empire, as a colony of which anything can be asked and which must give without any protest. Mr. Chairman, I have always been against the participation of Canada in this European war and I am no less strongly opposed to our participation in the imperialistic war against Japan. It is high time that the government of Canada should keep in mind the country's interests.

Mr. BROOKS: I am not sure that the matter I shall now bring before the committee comes under the parliamentary assistant's department. I understood him to say the other day, however, that all soldiers' affairs, more or less, would be given consideration by the Department of National Defence.

As all hon. members are aware, a great many of our men have married overseas. Many thousands of English brides, and brides from other countries, have been arriving and in future will arrive in Canada. Most of these marriages I believe will probably prove successful. A good many, however, have not been, and present indications are that there may be more of that kind.

I have had some correspondence with Red Cross organizations in my own province, and only to-day received a letter asking me to bring this matter to the attention of the house. Many brides who have come to this country have been deserted by their husbands. They are alone in Canada, with no friends. Some of them have made application to be returned to England. All sorts of difficulties are in the way, however, and nothing seems to be done. I believe the cases of which I have heard could be multiplied many times across Canada. Is the Department of National Defence or any other department of government looking into this matter? It is giving great concern to the Red Cross and other organizations in Canada.

Perhaps I might place before the parliamentary assistant the facts in connection with a case brought to my attention to-day. A Canadian soldier and an English girl were married in England in 1940, after which they lived together for two and a half years. During that time she worked continuously and saved $750. After two and a half years in England her husband was sent to Italy. There he was wounded, and after being returned to England subsequently came to Canada, arriving here in July, 1944. His wife came to this country on October 24 of last year. The couple settled in an apartment in Woodstock. Her husband was discharged from the army. It appears that he was addicted to drink. In a motor car accident his wife received serious injuries to her back. This woman was deserted by her husband and has been left in a helpless condition in Canada. She asks this question: To whom should she turn for immediate financial assistance and advice? What provision has the government made for such cases? The government may say that these are cases which must be dealt with by the civilian authorities, but it should be remembered that except through charitable organizations the civilian authorities in the smaller towns are not in a position to help these people. It seems to me this is a responsibility of the government. As I say, our soldiers married these girls in England or in other countries, and upon bringing them to Canada have deserted them. These wives are away from their homes and their people. There is no one to assist them, and every possible effort should be made to send them back to England or to their own people. Is any provision being made for cases of this kind? I am satisfied we shall have many more in a short time.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am glad the hon. member has raised this question. As he quite properly states, it is a most important one, the solution of which is becoming increasingly difficult as time goes on. As it happens I attended a meeting this morning at which this question was discussed at some length. The adjutant general, and his officers, are giving constant attention to the matter. As my hon. friend knows, that officer has been back from overseas only a short time, and is quite familiar with the condition to which reference has been made.

Mr. GREEN: Is the Department of National Defence questioning the good faith, the propriety or the efficiency of the actions of General Pearkes while he was general officer commanding, Pacific command?

Mr. ABBOTT: Well, that is a broad question. No; the Department of National Defence is not questioning the propriety of his actions.

Mr. GREEN: Well—

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I did not make it clear in my statement. They are not questioning, either, the propriety of the requests which he made as outlined in my statement. I simply stated the facts in reply to the request of the hon. member for Lake Centre.

Mr. GREEN: Will the parliamentary assistant agree with me when I say that General Pearkes deserves, for his work as general officer commanding, Pacific command, not only great credit, but also the thanks of the Canadian people?

Mr. SLAGHT: Has the general been nominated yet?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know that my hon. friend has any particular reason to ask me to deliver a eulogy on the work performed by General Pearkes. I said in my statement that General Pearkes is a soldier with a long and distinguished record in the service of this country. I do not know that it is either necessary or desirable for me, as an individual, to go any further than that.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. GREEN: I have the floor. We feel rather deeply about this question. In view of the nature of the attack made upon General Pearkes, perhaps I might make some further observations. The committee will recall that on December 7, 1941, the Japanese struck at Pearl Harbor. Next night we had a blackout in Vancouver, and fully expected to be bombed. Subsequently if the United States fleet, and its air force, had not defeated the Japanese navy at Midway, I think our nation would have been invaded. Those were very dark days on the Pacific coast, and we were very much concerned about the defences along that coast. It was under those conditions that General Pearkes came to us, not only as commander of the army on the Pacific coast, but also as commander of the air force and the navy. He was the general officer commanding, under a unified command of the three services. In that capacity the public believe, and I believe—I am quite sure the parliamentary assistant will not question this—that General Pearkes did a splendid job. He made our defences on the coast efficient and did a splendid job throughout. Then, in due course, he organized the Canadian forces that went to Kiska. Hon. members will remember that these were N.R.M.A. soldiers. General Pearkes was largely responsible for the efficient training of that force and for their dispatch, and I believe for the way in which they conducted themselves at Kiska. He has from the start been liked and trusted by the people of British Columbia and also by the United States officers. His duties there have meant constant cooperation and liaison with the United States forces and he stands very high with the United States commanders.

After the troops had come back from Kiska there was a campaign put on, a campaign requested by the Department of National Defence, in an attempt to get the N.R.M.A. troops to go active, to convert to general service. That campaign was led by General Pearkes, and it was led in the same dashing fashion in which he led his troops in the last war and also in this war. I have here a clipping from the Vancouver Sun of that time. The Sun, of course, is a paper supporting the present government. This clipping is dated April 21 of last year, and it describes what happened when General Pearkes went up to the city of Vernon in the riding of Yale and made a personal appeal to the N.R.M.A. troops who were there at the time. The article says in part:

General Pearkes spoke of the record made by "their arduous work on Kiska." He spoke in generalities for a few moments, then he said, "I have an important announcement to make."

The soldiers stiffened suddenly and those who had been talking were silent.

They anticipated that the next few words of the General would have considerable bearing on their future.

"The decision has been reached by the government," he said gravely, "that a portion of the men held at present in reserve in Canada will be moved overseas."

"Only three days ago I got official word from Ottawa that this group would move as units."

War Appropriation—The Army

The men shuffled and looked about to see how the others were taking the news.

Almost without taking a breath, General Pearkes continued:

"In the near future," he said, "you will have left Vernon and be on your way."

I should like hon. members to pay particular attention to the following words because they show the calibre of the man and the way in which General Pearkes carried out his orders to try to get the N.R.M.A. men to convert. He said:

Let me make an appeal, at this moment, to those of you who are wavering, to make up your minds to come in with the gang.

It is not customary for a general to do as I am doing here to-day.

It is not the usual thing for a general to make such an appeal to privates.

But I was a private and rose from the ranks and I love the private soldier.

The work you men did at Kiska, your readiness to engage the enemy there, made your names honoured throughout Canada.

I regret that we were not allowed to chase the Jap right into his homeland that time but that was out of my hands.

I am very proud to tell you that the experience you gained at Kiska makes you invaluable as invasion forces.

The need is urgent. Play the man's part—the part of young Canada.

We ought to be well on the road to victory this year but it will require the assistance and the cooperation of every single one of us.

Again, let me plead with you to get the spirit of Canada, to remember your comrades who died over there, to volunteer now and show the men overseas that you are with them heart and soul.

Go with the gang 100 per cent.

The dispatch goes on:

Grey-haired veterans of the first world war, listening to the appeal of General Pearkes cursed violently and wondered "what is wrong that the general officer commanding has to beg his men to get into the fight."

General Pearkes went from Vernon to Victoria, and we find the same thing happening there. Another report states that General Pearkes was in Victoria appealing to home defence soldiers to volunteer for general service. The report says:

General Pearkes' efforts are seen as a possible last effort to persuade the men to go active before action is taken at Ottawa. The measure of success his appeals have may be the determining factor in dictating future government policy.

General Pearkes continued his campaign for N.R.M.A. men to go active, and I have here a dispatch from Victoria dated April 29. The heading is, "Pearkes wins, whole regiment goes active." The dispatch says that the whole battalion, after hearing General Pearkes appeal, decided to go active. The article says:

This follows an active campaign carried out by General Pearkes, assisted by Major Paul Triquet, V.C., said an army spokesman.

Similarly good results are reported from Vernon where the brigade will parade before General Pearkes, the spokesman said.

The fully-trained and smart-appearing regiment paraded before Lieutenant-Governor W. C. Woodward who took the salute in the march past.

"I am thrilled and gratified by this morning's inspiring parade," General Pearkes told the battalion after the inspection.

"Three weeks ago there were less than 100 men in this regiment who had signified their willingness to go active.

"To-day over 600 have paraded before His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of British Columbia.

"All of you are volunteers. Many have come from this regiment; others, of their own free will, have transferred from other units in order to go overseas with you.

"For some this is the long-awaited opportunity now provided for you. Others have wrestled with old prejudices before they manfully made the decision.

"This is your answer. It is the same answer that was given in 1914 and again in 1939.

"It is the answer Canadians will always give whenever the need is urgent and whenever a supreme objective is in sight.

"Good-bye, good luck and God bless you."

And here is another dispatch headed "2,000 men 'Go Active' from Home Defence." This is from the Vancouver Sun of June 28, 1944. The article says:

"Since June 1" Major R. E. MacBean said, "we have taken in 1,700 former men of the home defence.

"The response has been most gratifying."

The article goes on to give details and towards the end says:

These are the men to whom Major-General George R. Pearkes, officer commanding Pacific command, said his farewells when he addressed them at Vernon recently.

Most of them were then home defence troops who signed over to go active overseas.

General Pearkes, may I say in all sincerity, carried on an honest wholehearted attempt to enforce the policy of the government. He met with success so much greater than that of any other officer in Canada that there can be no comparison.

When the trouble came last fall, when there was mutiny in different camps in British Columbia, General Pearkes did not stay in Vancouver and send out orders. He took a plane at once and went to Terrace, which was the scene of the worst trouble, and handled the mutiny in such a way that everything was eventually smoothed over. That is the type of leader he is. That is the type of work he has done in the Pacific command.

Some reference has been made to men going absent without leave, and a suggestion has actually been made that General Pearkes was responsible for men going absent without leave. But the figures from his command show that there were fewer absent without leave than from any other, that the percentage was very small. The record there is perfect. So that there is no justification for the attacks which are now being made against General Pearkes.

Last fall also, at the time of the special session here, we had statements showing just what type of work General Pearkes had done. I have here an editorial from the Vancouver Sun which, as I said before, is a supporter of the present government. This editorial says:

The fact is, of course, that these officers—

Referring to the officers about whom there was an inquiry made by Lieutenant-General Sansom:

—have done more than any others in Canada to uphold the volunteer system. Major-General Pearkes has probably been more aggressive than any commander anywhere in the dominion.

The editorial ends by saying:

In actual accomplishment the record will show that no district in Canada has done better than British Columbia for the voluntary movement and no commanding officer has accomplished more to that end than General Pearkes; and the same applies to his section commanders who were outspoken this week in reporting the attitude of the men with whom they had to deal.

Finally, after he had been attacked, we had a statement from Colonel W. G. Swan, O.B.E., D.S.O.:

Col. Swan recently retired from the Canadian Army, in which he served as chief engineer officer, Pacific command.

I am not sure of Colonel Swan's politics, but I think he also is a supporter of the present government. He said, concerning General Pearkes:

I had the honour to serve on General Pearkes' staff for two and a half years, which included the period of recruiting in question. Never by the smallest action or remark did General Pearkes give any indication that he was not wholeheartedly in sympathy with the government's campaign to enlist N.R.M.A. men for active service, although I feel quite sure it must have been a very distasteful task for him, as it was to many of his officers including myself.

How well the work was done can be judged by results. I haven't figures at hand, but I am sure no military district in the country made a better showing than Pacific command.

He goes on to refer to statements which have been made against General Pearkes.

That is the record, Mr. Chairman, quite apart from the record of this gallant officer in the last war, when he won the Victoria Cross, was made a Companion of the Bath, won the Distinguished Service Order and the Military Cross, and was probably the outstanding Canadian soldier of the last war. In this war he was taken over by General McNaughton as commander of one of the brigades; I think the second brigade of the first division. Then he succeeded General McNaughton as commander of the first Canadian division, and went from there to the Pacific command. There is a man with a record, a man of whom Canada can well be proud, and I suggest that it ill behoves anyone in Canada to try to smear General Pearkes. His record speaks for itself, and it will be a long time before we have a more outstanding soldier in this country.

Mr. GARDINER: It is a little difficult for me to understand why hon. gentlemen opposite talk all around this question. I have been surprised that the Globe and Mail, when they wish to find out why I arrive at a certain conclusion, should not direct their questions to me. I have always attempted to answer any questions which concern myself, and have never backed away from giving reasons as to why I arrive at certain conclusions, and therefore I have found it very difficult during the last two or three days to understand why hon. members refer to this matter without any mention of what they are really talking about. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down has very carefully skated all around the matter which he has in his mind, and has avoided putting a straight question—

Mr. GREEN: The minister is quite a little mindreader.

Mr. GARDINER: —as to really what was in my mind when I made the statement which I did earlier this year. So that I think, in fairness to the committee, and probably to relieve the minds of some people who seem to be considerably worried, I should place some of the facts upon the record and leave it for the people themselves to judge whether what I had in my mind was sufficient to warrant the remarks which I made.

In the first place, probably I should place on the record the statement of the press as to what I said. The Ottawa Journal of Saturday, February 17 expresses, I think, what was in the press as clearly as any of the articles which appeared, and therefore I am quoting to the committee from the Ottawa Journal. It says this:

Agriculture Minister Gardiner said last night that Major-General G. R. Pearkes, V.C., retiring Pacific coast commander, has been "acting for the Tories ever since he came back from overseas and there is no reason why he should not run for them."

Apart from the fact that the statement does not indicate why it was made, it is a clear report of what I said. It goes on to indicate later that this was a telephone conversation with a reporter, with more than one reporter as a matter of fact, and on each occasion the same thing was said. The forerunner of that statement was the announcement to me—the first time I had heard it—that General Pearkes had resigned. I would point out that the reference made a few moments ago by the hon. member for Lake Centre had really no bearing on what was stated. He implied that someone—and I assume he meant the Minister of Agriculture—had suggested that General Pearkes had resigned or had been asked for his resignation because of some political activities that he had undertaken during the time that he was a general in the army; and I repeat that the reference which was made was made on the morning that his resignation was reported in the press, and after he had ceased to be a member of the armed forces. The reporter called my attention to the fact that he had resigned and asked me if I knew it, and I said, "No, I did not know it but I had expected that he would resign." The reporter then went on to say that it was announced in the press in the same report General Pearkes was going to run in Nanaimo. I asked at that time what General Pearkes had to say about that, and was informed that he had been consulted and had refused to comment on it. Well, I went on to say that if General Pearkes was not prepared to deny that he was going to run against a brother officer who was, and had been from almost the beginning of the war, overseas, that since he had been acting for the Tories ever since he came back from overseas there was no reason why he should not run for them.

In that connection there are a few things I wish to say, but before doing so I will give the remainder of the interview. The other remarks do not require the same explanation. This paper goes on to say:

A Vancouver dispatch on Friday quoted one newspaper there as saying "one report declared" that General Pearkes would be Progressive Conservative candidate in Nanaimo constituency in the next federal election.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Then it goes on to quote what I said:

"I'd say further", Mr. Gardiner commented in a brief telephone interview, "that statements by General Pearkes and some of his officers have done more than anything else I know of to cause the high incidence of absenteeism in the army."

He added without elaboration, "the story has been continually coming out of British Columbia that the troops in the camps had been advised not to volunteer, that active volunteering would only be playing into the hands of the government and they ought to make the government compel them to go overseas."

I would call the attention of the committee to the fact that in this third and last statement which, as the press goes on to say, was the last I made in connection with it, I made no reference whatsoever to General Pearkes. I have not said at any time that General Pearkes made any such statement, nor have I said at any time that he gave any such order. But there are many members of this house who have heard the same rumour with regard to activities on the Pacific command and there are as many proportionately of the people of Canada who have heard the same rumours. There is no question in the mind of anyone that such rumours were coming out of the Pacific command during the period immediately preceding the moving of men out of British Columbia to other parts of Canada last fall. But I wish again to refer to the fact that neither in the short interview over the telephone with the press nor at any other time have I said that General Pearkes gave any such order or had anything to do with anything that was coming out of the Pacific command at that time.

I would call attention to the second matter, which is in these words:

I would say further that the statements by General Pearkes and some of his officers have done more than anything else I know of to cause the high incidence of absenteeism in the army.

Again, there was no reference whatsoever to the matters which were discussed this afternoon by the hon. member for Vancouver South and the matters which have been discussed most widely by the opposition press throughout Canada. An attempt has been made to bring these words into relationship with the efforts which were made in June of last year to enlist men for service overseas, and the articles read to the committee this afternoon have had to do with the activities of General Pearkes in connection with the securing of enlistments for overseas service during June of last year. But in no place at any time, either in this interview or anywhere else, have my remarks had to do with the activities of General Pearkes during June of last year in connection with enlistments. My remarks have had to do with other matters.

A good general is a good man to have operating an army, and there is only one question that would arise in my mind in relation to the remarks which have been made—and probably I should not even refer to that—and it is the fact that General Pearkes was on the Pacific command and that he was there after having been in England. I leave it at that.

Mr. GREEN: Another smear.

Mr. GARDINER: Another smear, my hon. friend says. There is not half as much smear in that as there is in the statement made which my hon. friend did not have the nerve to connect with anyone.

Mr. GREEN: I have the nerve; don't worry.

Mr. GARDINER: In the activities that have been going on in this house in the last week and a half, and in the remarks made by the Tory press from one end of the country to the other, as well as in the remarks made by Tory speakers throughout the country, there is no man who has been more completely smeared than General McNaughton, and he will bear comparison at any time with General Pearkes in connection with any of his activities.

An hon. MEMBER: How would you know?

Mr. GARDINER: I would have as much reason for knowing as my hon. friend. I have never gone around the country boasting of any services I have given at any time, and those services will bear comparison with those of any member in this house, and particularly those on the Conservative side. The matter of obtaining recruits for the service is not the question which is in mind at all.

We have been conducting a war through three different activities. Our first effort was to produce munitions and machines of war and we undertook that in the early stages of the war during the period our forces were not in operations, apart from our flying force, and it has been very successful. The second operation had to do with the conduct of our farms and the production of food, and the third operation was concerned with the providing of fighting men for our different forces. I think the records will show that all three of these undertakings have been not only carefully planned but carefully carried out, and the results speak for themselves. And nowhere have they spoken more clearly for themselves than in the figures that have been given to the committee in the last few days.

I was surprised, after the facts had been given to the committee, to find that there was any criticism at all. The Prime Minister came before the house last fall and reported that our army was in good condition both as regards training and as regards recruits; the people of the country apparently did not believe it, and the opposition in this house certainly did not believe it.

Mr. HOMUTH: And neither did the government; they changed their policy overnight.

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend says, "neither did the government." That was not the statement of the Prime Minister when he came into the house last session, but after listening to the discussions that went on, an opportunity was given the house and the country to learn for themselves whether the army was in proper condition last fall, or whether it was not and when we have the parliamentary assistant coming to the house and pointing out now that there are seventy-five per cent more reinforcements than are necessary—

Mr. GREEN: Because there are 12,000 fewer casualties, fortunately.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, my hon. friends opposite are such good operators of armies and authorities on war that they thought we had a general commanding the forces of the allies overseas, in the person of General Eisenhower, who was going to take the army which we had last fall—

Mr. GREEN: Oh, that was your estimate.

Mr. GARDINER: —and having kept them in operation for four weeks—

Mr. GREEN: That was your own estimate.

Mr. GARDINER: —he was going to continue to have them in operation for the next three or four months continuously. It was not my own estimate.

Mr. ABBOTT: It was the estimate of the former chief of the general staff.

Mr. GARDINER: It was the estimate of the former chief of the general staff, and now I am surprised to find members rising in their places and saying that what we really want to have is not the conscripting of men to go overseas, but conscripting them to come back from overseas. In other words, the results have been so particularly good in connection with operations having to do with the army that that is the kind of criticism that is made in this house at the present time.

Let us for a few moments deal with the situation I really had in mind, speaking of the activities of General Pearkes. As a matter of fact, I was delighted when General Pearkes resigned. I had had difficulties with him, not having to do with raising troops at all, but having to do with the question raised last night by the member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn). I will answer his questions from the orders of General Pearkes and from what he himself has placed upon the record. At page 671 of Hansard of yesterday the hon. member for Haldimand is reported to have said

I should like to emphasize that point, because I have known of cases where men have been removed to other camps. For some reason or another their applications have not followed them, and considerable time has been required to make out new application forms. There has been difficulty in getting those soldiers home in time.

That is, home in time for farm operations. Then on page 673 the hon. member for Haldimand says:

Before we leave this subject I should like to ask if regulations are issued to the commanding officers in regard to this matter.

And then farther down:

Are the instructions mandatory, or is it in the discretion of the commanding officer as to whether or not he grants this leave? That is the question I have been wondering about.

I could go on and read other questions of the same kind dealing with the same point. In other words, the question which has been bothering the mind of the hon. member for Haldimand is the same question which has been bothering me as Minister of Agriculture ever since General Pearkes came back to the Pacific command following his period in Britain. In that connection I have just a few of the many documents on my files dealing with this particular question. I am going to place on Hansard only a few of those in order to indicate what the attitude really was and to give an answer to the hon. member for Haldimand as to what the condition really was in that regard. Here is one of May 1, 1944. Everyone will realize that was right in the middle of the seeding season of last year. Members on the opposition side of the house were bearing down upon the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence last night and yesterday afternoon as to what the regulations really are with regard to getting the men out of the armed service in order to help in agriculture, and as to what the rules are with regard to men asking for postponement who have been called up under the N.R.M.A. regulations. Certain statements were made with regard to the matter. Last year the regulations were very much the same as they are this year. Farm organizations from one end of Canada to the other were pleading with this government all through February and March to get these regulations out and to let the people know what the position really was. Along in March the position was pretty well known.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

On May 1, when a certain case was being dealt with which had to do with a man who was in Pacific command and, therefore, whose application for his release for agricultural purposes had to go to Pacific command, this reply came back signed for the brigadier.

Mr. GREEN: Who was he, may I ask?

Mr. GARDINER: The brigadier's name is not here, but I give the hon. member the next order which is from General Pearkes. This is a copy that I have. It is signed for the brigadier by the brigadier i/c administration command. It reads as follows:

This application has been submitted to the appropriate national selective service mobilization board for consideration, which board has recommended that two months' leave be granted.

This is the case of a farmer who has made application for leave, and the army apparently then referred the application to the national selective service mobilization board, and here is the answer.

Mr. GREEN: Is it an N.R.M.A. man?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; it would be an N.R.M.A. man, or at least I would think so. He may be a general service man, but at any rate he is a gunner.

Mr. GREEN: That was at the time the campaign for conversions was going on?

Mr. GARDINER: I will give you all the information about that in a moment. Remember, the mobilization board had recommended two months' leave. The letter goes on:

However, as it has been ruled that no farm leave is to be granted at present, application is not approved at this time.

I say to the hon. member for Haldimand that in spite of the fact that government policy had been announced in connection with this matter; in spite of the fact that applications were being made to other military camps right across Canada, this was the position.

Mr. HOMUTH: No, they were not.

Mr. GARDINER: I will come to that in a minute. They were.

Mr. HOMUTH: They were not.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Which mobilization board was that?

Mr. GARDINER: I imagine this would be the one in Saskatchewan because it was a Saskatchewan man, and they recommended it. By the way, the mobilization board in Saskatchewan has had a lot of abuse. They recommended this farm leave, but it was denied by the Pacific command and the man was not allowed to go home in spite of the fact that the mobilization board had recommended that he be allowed to go home. This is the only source through which they would get information. Then, under date of April 25, there is an order signed by Major-General G.O.C. in C. Pacific command. It is addressed to all officers commanding units, Pacific command, and reads as follows:

The following is a statement of policy in this command with regard to compassionate farm leave as authorized by C.A.R.O. 3456 (as amended by C.A.R.O. 4259). Since all G.S. personnel—

This covers the point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South.

—may be withdrawn from operational units at short notice for overseas service and all N.R.M.A. are to be encouraged to enlist for general service so that they may be available also at short notice for overseas duty, commanding officers are not to recommend any soldier of overseas age or category, except in the most unusual and most urgent circumstances. These cases will then be referred to me personally for approval or otherwise.

Mr. HOMUTH: That is the answer.

Mr. GARDINER: I venture to say that with that kind of order issued no officer in that command would give leave to any applicant who made application.

Mr. GREEN: Did you complain to the Department of National Defence?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, I did, and I have a pretty thick file on it.

Mr. GREEN: What results did the minister get?

Mr. GARDINER: I finally got results which I will probably give the hon. member if I have sufficient time.

Mr. SLAGHT: What right had he to lay down the rule for that command?

Mr. GARDINER: That is the point I wish to raise.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Wherein did that rule differ from the rule of other commands?

Mr. GARDINER: I will come to that. Here is a letter from the department of reconstruction, labour and public welfare of Saskatchewan. It deals with the matter.

Mr. GREEN: Did you read General Pearkes' order in full?

Mr. GARDINER: No, but the other part makes it worse. Do you want it all?

Mr. GREEN: The minister had better not read it then.

Mr. GARDINER: Probably it would be just as well to put it on Hansard instead of reading it all, but on May 27, 1944, the following letter was written to me. Every hon. member from Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta knows that farm leave for seeding purposes is of no use to any one on May 27 in any year. What I am pointing out to the committee is that there were three jobs to be done. The government was providing by one means for the men who were necessary for the armed forces, and I think it has been pretty clearly demonstrated that the men had been provided, were provided and are still being provided. At the same time the government was required to supply the men for the agricultural areas. While my hon. friend has views about what happened out in the Pacific command, he did not say that most of the men in that command came from Alberta, Saskatchewan and Quebec.

Mr. GREEN: They came from all over Canada.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, but most of them came from those three provinces.

Mr. ROWE: What difference does that make?

Mr. GARDINER: If there is any honour coming to the troops that were gathered there—and I am sure there is a great deal—it is not all coming to the Pacific province of British Columbia; it is coming to the provinces represented by the soldiers in the camps in that province.

This letter is written to me. I had written to this body in Saskatchewan defending the activities of General Pearkes, the Pacific command and others who were acting in connection with this matter, and I had done so after consulting the minister. This is the letter which I received in return. It is dated May 27, 1944, and reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Gardiner,

I thank you for your letter of May 17. We are endeavouring to get some results on the case of the above-named, but in spite of assurances that you have obtained at Ottawa, I am afraid I cannot agree that applications for leave from Pacific command have been made on the basis of merit.

The wire of the G.O.C., Pacific command, to the Hon. J. L. Ralston, Minister of National Defence, states: "No blanket interdict has been given except that conditions laid down in C.A.R.O. 3456 must be fulfilled."

I have just read the order which was sent out, and it is not in those terms. Then he goes on to say:

I attach a copy of a letter received by me from the officer commanding first battalion, Canadian Fusiliers C.A. which indicates that their brigade at least was operating under definite instructions from Pacific command that no leaves under that order would be considered.

I suggest that this was a general situation in Pacific command, and that the one-half dozen or so leaves granted—

Listen to that.

—as compared to the several hundreds granted in other military districts, is evidence that the general policy was disregarded in Pacific command.

Mr. GREEN: Of course the operational troops were under Pacific command.

Mr. GARDINER:

I must say we have had excellent cooperation from officials in M.D. No. 12, and no reasonable request for leave has been refused. Military districts other than Pacific command have all been most cooperative.

Here is a copy of the letter referred to, dated April 19, 1944, and signed by C. L. Carey, captain and adjutant, and C. M. MacMillan, lieutenant-colonel commanding the 1st battalion, Canadian Fusiliers, C.A.

In answer to your M/N letter I am to state that according to directions received from Pacific command no leaves under C.A.R.O. 3456 will be considered by this brigade at the present time, due to exigencies of the service.

I could read a volume of correspondence which took place in regard to these cases. After these discussions, certain actions were taken by the government which did bring about some results, but hon. members from Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta know that in spite of all the pressure that could be brought to bear most of the men who applied for leave in connection with farming operations had great difficulty in getting that leave in sufficient time to do them much good. As a matter of fact I brought one case to the attention of the minister and finally to the attention of Pacific command, in which the young man concerned had applied for leave in the spring and had been refused. He applied for leave in the fall and was again refused. Finally they let him go home, in order to help with the harvest, on September 7, after the harvest was all over.

Mr. ROWE: That has been the case all over.

Mr. GARDINER: It was not nearly so general elsewhere. Finally, since the changes under discussion, he was discharged. If I were to bring the figures which bear upon the question raised a few moments ago by the hon. member for Vancouver South, they would indicate that there was only one reason why eventually more men were given leave from Pacific command, although most of them got their leave too late. The reason was that there were many more men in the Pacific command than in the other commands, so that eventually the figure there was somewhat higher than the figure in the others.

I bring up that point in order to answer the questions raised by the hon. member for Haldimand. I say to him and to anyone else interested, in this house or out of it, that if any further proof is required of what I have said already I am quite prepared to produce it, and it will show a number of things. It will show that because of these late decisions young men did come home from Pacific command finally only after a great deal of pressure had been brought to bear to have the order carried into effect. They did come home, and in some cases they went back to the Pacific command before their request for an extension of time had been allowed, with the result that some of them had to get a second leave in order to come back and finish their farming operations.

Mr. GREEN: Why did you not get after the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Ralston)?

Mr. GARDINER: I did; and finally the hon. member for Prince was not minister. The gentleman who became minister took action in connection with these matters, and we have had more success since that time. That is the position in relation to this situation, and I am not going to say any more with regard to General Pearkes except this. He may have been the best army officer in the world, but he did not have a proper appreciation of the importance of producing food in the Dominion of Canada if this war was to be carried to a successful conclusion. Not having that appreciation, of course he was not the proper person to continue to carry on as head of the Pacific command.

Mr. ROWE: Not under the middle of the road policy.

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend has talked a great deal about a middle of the road policy. I do not know of any party in Canada that has stayed more closely to the middle of the road on this particular question than the Conservative party. They have not had the nerve, at any time since this war started, to come out for conscription. They have not had the courage, at any time since this war started, to take a real position on any question having to do with man-power. They have simply sat opposite and tried to indicate to us that if they were in power they probably would do it a little differently, but on no occasion have they had the courage to come out and state their policy in relation to it.

Mr. ABBOTT: With one exception; the hon. member for Parkdale.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, but he is not the party.

Mr. ROWE: And our leader, Mr. Bracken, both before and since he became leader.

Mr. GARDINER: I think the farmers have a right to speak about this matter, as well as those associated with the military. I believe members of the opposition, as well as the government side, have demonstrated the need for someone to speak on behalf of the farmers. During the last two or three days the principal criticisms of the opposition have had to do with the question of whether we are to have farm leaves this year. I say that as far as we in western Canada are concerned we shall be better satisfied with our farm leaves because General Pearkes is not there to deal with them.

This situation did not develop suddenly in 1944. I have another file of correspondence here which I could read, showing that exactly the same attitude was taken in 1943. There had to be a battle every time this policy was brought into effect, in order to get men out of Pacific command to the farms to do the farm work.

Mr. GREEN: Your battle was with the minister, not with the commander.

Mr. GARDINER: No; our battle was with the Pacific command, trying to get them to do what was done in all the other commands across Canada in time to be of service. Eventually, when that result could not be attained, through pleading certain steps were taken which brought results, but the delays were fatal. Some may think I am the only critic in Canada of General Pearkes. Just for a moment I should like to bring to the attention of the committee some other correspondence I have on my file. At the time of my interview I did not raise the question with regard to enlistments last summer, but possibly the statement I made having to do with men going absent without leave may have been interpreted by some as having some bearing on that question. So that it might be advisable for me to complete the record by placing on Hansard some of the references which have been made to that matter. I have here a letter from a young man who was in the army, which well explains what I have in mind. It is dated April 22, 1944, and reads:

Dear Mr. Gardiner,

Some weeks ago I wrote to you asking about the policy of the government in connection with calling men for the army and keeping them in the reserve army because their medical category is too low for them to join active service. I know that this letter sounded like a typical whiner who has been "grabbed" by the army and didn't want to do his part. And since there has been no reply from you I am afraid this has been your interpretation of my letter.

In explanation of that I would only say that I had written him, but his letter had gone to where he had previously been, and he had been moved in the meantime. I do not think there can be any criticism of that particular move; I think the move was made probably for his own good, and the good of people generally. He goes on to say this:

I still, however, feel that I have been placed in a very humiliating position. As stated in my first letter, I have been kept in the reserve army after being rejected four times for the active army and the air force.

I am enclosing two newspaper clippings which express precisely the attitude of the military authorities of this country, as well as a large percentage of the men in the ranks and the civilian population toward the men in the same position as myself.

I know that my political activities will be very limited for some time, but when the time comes I can assure you that I will do everything possible to defeat the government which allowed this situation to arise. When a man can be referred to in the public press as a "soulless human corpse," simply because he was born with a minor physical defect, then I feel that he has a justifiable complaint.

Yours truly,

And here is the article which he enclosed, in order to justify the feelings which he had as a result of having tried to enlist four times, and finally finding himself in the N.R.M.A. But he was not objecting to that. He was objecting to what certain officers had said, and certain officers did. This article has to do with the very meeting to which the hon. member for Vancouver South referred a few moments ago, and this is the sentence to which he objects—

Mr. GREEN: What are you reading from?

Mr. GARDINER: From a Canadian Press report of April 22, 1944.

Mr. GREEN: What paper?

Mr. GARDINER: This, I believe, is from one of the Ottawa papers, but it is the same quotation as appeared in the paper which was read from earlier to-day. This is the quotation:

In his address, made to a group of soldiers at Vernon training camp, General Pearkes said: "Cease wavering, play the man's part and join the active army of Canada."

Now, the advice may be very good for some people, but to the young men of the classification of whom we were told last fall there were 17,000 in the N.R.M.A., men who were not physically fit, for a public man and the press of this country to be dubbing those men as zombies when, as this man says, he had on four occasions attempted to enlist, is not only an insult to them, but an insult to the country in general.

Mr. ROWE: Would you consider that any worse than the statement made by the present Minister of National Defence, Mr. McNaughton in Grey North during the by-election, that all who would not join the general voluntary army were neither good for God nor man.

Mr. GARDINER: I did not hear him say that, and I would want to have it verified before I attempt to meet it.

Mr. ROWE: Well, he made it.

Mr. GARDINER: Then the article mentions Major Triquet's activities in relation to these meetings. It comes to my mind, because of statements that were made from the other side of the house during the last short session. Men seemed to take pride in being able to rise in this house and speak of theatres in some of our cities where people sit absolutely quiet, begin to boo when certain pictures appear on the screen. I will never forget an experience I had—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): To boo whom?

Mr. GARDINER: Pictures my hon. friends on the opposite side of the house were speaking about, pictures of the leader of the government.

I will never forget an experience I had in one of the theatres of an eastern city when I sat in a seat in that theatre and watched pictures of persons connected with certain of our allies appearing on the screen, and listening to the applause—and I joined in it. And then, immediately following that, was the picture of Major Triquet, right after he had won the Victoria Cross. And when his picture appeared on the screen in that theatre they did not applaud.

An hon. MEMBER: Shame!

Mr. GARDINER: That is the best illustration I know of and the best answer I know of to give to the people who congregate in some theatres in some parts of Canada where they boast of their patriotism.

There is no place for the showing of that kind of feelings in a country such as the Dominion of Canada, or in any other country. And there are very few countries in the world where people are so free as to allow that sort of thing to happen.

Mr. GREEN: Why did you not start the applause?

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. GARDINER: I did start some applause. I came into the theatre just at the time that particular scene was going off the news, and I noticed no one applauded. So that when it came round again I started the applause. I got about a dozen or so to join with me in it.

I might say I had a similar experience in connection with another matter within the last week, in the same theatre.

Mr. ROWE: You usually do better in here.

Mr. GARDINER: This matter of discussing our public questions in the way in which they have been discussed in this house, with member after member rising in his place and saying, so many men came from this part of Canada, and so many men came from that part of Canada; and so many were called from this, and so many were called from that, and so many obeyed from this and so many obeyed from that—well, that is not the method by which unity is developed in any country. We, as a young country, with a future, with people from all over the world gathered here under one government, can surely find a better way of showing our appreciation of the work those men are doing in developing this country than by attempting to perpetuate that kind of sentiment.

In any event, that is one criticism which was found in the press by my young friend who wrote to me, and others have written to me along similar lines.

This calls to my mind an editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press, which paper I think has been critical of some of the criticisms made of General Pearkes. Under date of November 22, 1944, they say this:

Meanwhile it is obvious that General Pearkes' officers have seen fit to violate all the traditions of their profession. Soldiers, until they leave the King's service, are not permitted to engage in politics, and some of the statements made yesterday are nothing but political in the most controversial sense. Whatever the merits of their views, and however sincerely held, no army, in time of war especially, can possibly function if it is involved in political controversy.

Mr. GREEN: There was an investigation into that.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, but the investigation did not pass over the Canadian Press report which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press of November 21, and concerning which that editorial was commenting. In that statement the Canadian Press said this:

General Pearkes told the officers: "This conference will be conducted privately, but I will allow you a few moments before the meeting gets under way for you to talk to the press and express your own views on the home-defence question."

Then they went on to express their own views on the home defence question in a manner which, I suggest to the committee, whether intentionally or otherwise, did encourage men to go absent without leave. And it was these activities—denying to men the right to go home on farm leave, men who were entitled to it, and not giving them the same treatment as they got in military districts outside of Pacific command, was one of the inducements to men to stay home, absent without leave. And there were other things which were done, including the suggestions which were made in the speech to which I have referred.

No matter what General Pearkes may think about it, no matter what my hon. friends of the Progressive Conservative party may think about it I personally think—and I intend to repeat it—that those speeches which brand young men by calling them zombies, and that kind of thing, and the criticisms which were made of men who came from some other parts of Canada, as compared with those who came from the part in which we happen to live—all those things did have a tendency to make men go absent without leave, and more of that kind of thing came out of the Pacific command during that period than out of any other part of Canada. Possibly the reason for that was that there were men from the province of Quebec in great numbers in the Pacific command.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: And from Saskatchewan.

Mr. GARDINER: And great numbers from Saskatchewan, and also great numbers from British Columbia in the Pacific command. Perhaps the real reason for the statements made was because of that. But whatever the reasons were they did have the effect not only of encouraging but of compelling in some cases men to go absent without leave in order to take care of conditions which they found in their homes.

I wish to say in conclusion that so far as I am concerned I intend not only in this house but outside it to stand by the men and the women of this country who have given of their all in the fighting forces, in the forces that have worked in our munitions plants and in the forces that have worked upon our farms to produce what they have done with results of which we can all be proud. We do not need to defend any particular gentleman who perhaps was a good enough general in war and perhaps could have operated very well in some other place, and thus deny anyone the right to criticize his actions if they in any way retarded the production which was necessary for the prosecution of this war to a final conclusion and more particularly to bringing about peace in a manner which will keep this world free from war in the future.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Just before the dinner recess we listened to the Minister of Agriculture for almost one hour delivering a tirade against General Pearkes, V.C., D.S.O., M.C., who has recently been retired from the army. This same Minister of Agriculture, the hon. member for Melville, was the minister in charge of war services in the early part of this war, in 1940, when the registration of manpower of this country took place, and out of that registration nothing worth while, nothing such as I had anticipated, ever came. Since that time, during these years of war, the Departments of Agriculture and of Munitions and Supply and the Canadian armed services have vied with each other for the manpower of this nation. Certainly there has been a great lack of coordination as between agriculture, industry and the armed services; and following the plebiscite of April, 1942, the will of the people of Canada as then expressed has been ignored by this government up to the present date.

The minister added confusion to confusion in his discussion prior to the dinner recess. He demonstrated the great difference of policy which existed between the Department of Agriculture and the Department of National Defence. There is an absolute opposition of policy.

Mr. ABBOTT: What was the difference?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The difference was this: the minister said that the necessary foodstuffs could not be produced unless the men were released; and he harped upon the Pacific command. I could have cited many such instances as the Minister of Agriculture cited of attempts to get young men back on the farms, but the majority of the cases of which I have knowledge happen to have taken place in the eastern commands. His experiences and mine were exactly the same; but I think it should be realized that the operational troops of this dominion were at that time, for proper reasons, pretty well concentrated in the Pacific command. That is the significance of the differences which have been brought out.

The minister implied that he did not go about this country boasting of his services. I hope I shall not be accused of anything of the kind, and I do not want to be misunderstood, but I had the privilege of working with General Pearkes some years ago, and I say that he is a gallant soldier who has rendered great service to this country, not only in war, but in the parts of the country where he has been located in peace time he has been a great citizen. He has played his part in the community wherever he happened to be living and carrying out his military duties. This I know from many personal contacts with him. I think it is too bad that his record should have been attacked in the manner in which it has been.

In this connection may I be permitted to refer to a newspaper clipping, entitled "Pearkes says Gardiner Attack is Slanderous", dated March 8, 1945:

Replying to the charges made against him by Hon. J. G. Gardiner, Minister of Agriculture, Major-General George R. Pearkes, V.C., who recently retired as G.O.C. in C., Pacific command, made the following statement this week:

"On February 19 reports appeared in the press of statements allegedly made by Hon. J. G. Gardiner accusing me and other officers of the Pacific command of disloyalty; these charges he reiterated in a letter published over his own signature in the Winnipeg Tribune of February 27.

"The statements are false and slanderous, but since they referred to my official activities I could not refute them without disclosing information relating to military matters, which I had obtained in the course of my official duties.

"I therefore requested the Minister of National Defence to make a statement protecting the good name of the officers of his department. He is in possession of full details as to the effort that had been made last summer and of the results achieved to obtain volunteers for overseas service from among the N.R.M.A. soldiers in the Pacific command, and he also has complete information as to the steps recommended and those taken to prevent absenteeism of the men ordered to the assembly camps in eastern Canada preparatory to their dispatch overseas when the order in council which authorized sending 16,000 N.R.M.A. soldiers was published.

"I am not permitted to make public the facts and figures in my possession, because these are regarded as the property of the Department of National Defence, but my reputation and that of the other officers concerned could have been cleared by the Minister of National Defence.

"This, however, he declined to do on the grounds that he has no responsibility for the correctness or otherwise of statements published in the press which have not been issued by the Department of National Defence.

"I therefore feel duty bound to state in reply to the personal attack made by Mr. Gardiner through the press that throughout the whole of last year the officers of this command endeavoured conscientiously to apply the policies laid down by the government and that statements to the contrary are utterly false."

So much for that.

It was asserted by the parliamentary assistant this afternoon that the general should have been retired when he said he did not approve the policy of the government. That may be true. It is pertinent, however, to make a comparison between this case and that of the present Minister of National Defence, who has also stated that he does not approve the present policy of the government. He also retired, on November 1, and if my memory serves me aright he was appointed a minister of this government on November 2. Since then he has attempted to carry on in opposition to a policy which he has always said he believed in, a policy which this government has since enunciated. I do not see much difference; both generals were retired, but one received promotion to the ministry of a government in whose policy he does not believe.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is just this difference. A soldier may differ from government policy, but my understanding has always been that a soldier accepts the direction of the civil authority and does not attempt to impose his will upon that civil authority. He has never done so in any British country to my knowledge since the days of Oliver Cromwell.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Well, there you have the position as regards these two generals, both of whom have rendered great service to this nation.

The minister before the dinner recess emphasized the handicaps on agriculture in this country, but I have done the same each session since 1940, and I have found fault with the manpower policy of this country ever since that time. So far from his statement being correct that his opponents have no policy, I have had one consistent viewpoint since the fall of France and the low countries in 1940, at the time of our first session here, and I have never deviated from it.

It is true enough that our agricultural production has been falling off of late, but for this the policies of the government are largely responsible. I pointed out a year ago one item which would reduce hog production in this country more than any other factor, namely, that the government agree to pay a bonus in the delivery season of ten cents a bushel on oats and fifteen cents on barley.

Mr. GARDINER: If I may be permitted, it is quite proper to say that hog production is down, but it is not correct to say that agricultural production is down. It is not.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Well, then, certain items of agricultural production have declined as a result of the policies of this government. I have put on Hansard my prediction of what would happen with respect to hogs, because the farmer who grew this grain was not allowed to feed it to his hogs on his own farm and get that bonus. It is just adding to the transportation and manpower problems of this country apart from production on the farm, and that is one policy for which the present minister must take responsibility.

Another policy concerning which some of us have taken every opportunity to argue on the floor of this chamber is the matter of the discrepancies in income tax between the farmer and his wife and certain other married people. I may be going a little far afield under this item—

Mr. ABBOTT: Just a little!

Mr. ROSS (Souris): —but the minister recited all kinds of arguments before the dinner recess to support his case, and I am simply stating that in my opinion, while I do not wish to be personal or unfair, the minister is as much responsible for these difficulties as any other member of the government at this time.

With regard to the man-power policy we have the same policy to-day as has prevailed throughout this war. In my community there have not been many chaps who have been drafted because they volunteered first; yet I do not know any district in Canada which produces more foodstuffs per capita than we do. Just before I came here a group of farm lads just turned eighteen years of age volunteered for the army because, rightly or wrongly, they did not want to have it said that they had been drafted. I know these boys and their families personally and even at this stage of the war they could probably have rendered greater service by staying on the farm. But they did not want to have it said that they had been drafted. I agree with the minister that we have to step up agricultural production at this time to supply international demands, but the old manpower policy of the government is still in operation and with the rest of the government the minister must bear his share of responsibility for that policy. In fact, he must take even more responsibility than many of the other ministers, so far as this is concerned.

Mr. GARDINER: In order to make the record clear, the labour department has given instructions to the mobilization board that young men who ask for postponement when they are on farms, whether they are farmers' sons or whether they come from villages, so long as they are on farms at the time they reach the age of eighteen and a half, are to be given postponement if they ask for it; and in the three provinces in the west, out of 1,293 who asked for it in December and January over 1,200 were granted postponement.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am not disputing that point. I have always argued that we should have had such a manpower policy as would provide draft boards that would have the authority to advise young men where they could best serve the country, whether in industry, in agriculture or in the armed forces. Those boys who volunteered the other day, I may tell the minister, are not the sort of chaps who would ask for postponement, because they would not have their pals come back from overseas and throw it up to them that they had asked for postponement. Rightly or wrongly that is the situation under the policy to-day, and that is what is being done.

Something was said about casualties to-day and the parliamentary assistant referred to the fact that he had seventy-five per cent over the requirements for reinforcements.

Mr. ABBOTT: I know my hon. friend wants to be correct. I said we had seventy-five per cent more than the projected estimates. I did not say seventy-five per cent more than requirements.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Projected estimates?

Mr. ABBOTT: The estimates projected at the special session last fall. We have seventy-five per cent more than projected at that time.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am sure we all regret that there are any casualties at all. He said there were 12,000 casualties less than had been anticipated since that session last fall.

Mr. ABBOTT: No one regrets that, surely.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I have just this moment said that we are all happy about that, but there is a reason for it too. We are sorry that there were any casualties, but when we were here last fall our army on the western front was out of action for a while.

Mr. ABBOTT: No; they were never out of action. They were in a quiet section of the line but were never entirely out of action.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Many of the operations have been changed entirely and we are not in a position to argue the merits or demerits in that regard, but there are reasons for that situation, about which we are all pleased.

Before the dinner recess the minister made a statement to which I wish to refer. I presume he was properly reported. If he felt toward General Pearkes all that he led us to believe in his speech before the dinner recess, then I say that as a member of the cabinet he should have taken action probably more quickly than any other man in the government. It was his duty to do so, and he probably did in due course. However, there is another story that is printed concerning the minister and it has always raised a doubt in my mind. It relates to a meeting and is reported under date of December 11, 1944. I have here an article dealing with a meeting held at Welland on December 10. The report states:

"Public opinion can be wrong," Gardiner says.

Then it goes on to say:

"Public opinion can be wrong unless it is properly informed," agriculture minister Gardiner stated in an address last night, and blamed the Canadian-led Dieppe operation of 1942 on premature public demand for a second front. Addressing the Welland county Liberal association which nominated Labour Minister Mitchell, the incumbent member, as candidate in the next federal election, Mr. Gardiner said, in an apparent reference to the reinforcement crisis which resulted in the recent overseas conscription order in council: "At a time when we are being told that public opinion has won a wonderful victory, may I remind you that public opinion can be wrong," he said. "Public opinion only wins a victory that is a real victory when it is properly informed. Public opinion was never more wrong than when in 1942 it pressed one of the most gallant groups of young men that ever went into battle into Dieppe, just to prove we were not yet ready for a second front."

Mr. Gardiner said the war had reached the stage when "what we ought to do is sit down and figure out, with the advice of the government—when we can take it—how we can be of greatest use to our allies in winning this war."

With the last paragraph I am in agreement.

Mr. GARDINER: You will be with the other one too, as it was corrected. You would be in agreement with it.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): If that is the case I think this country should have a statement from the minister, because he was a minister of the government and, I presume, he shares in the responsibility for this operation. Surely he does not imply that the cabinet deliberately put these boys into action at that time just to satisfy public opinion, with the knowledge they had, which even private members supporting the government, as well as those of us on this side of the house, were denied. With all the knowledge they had, and which he implies was correct, surely, in order to satisfy public opinion, he did not agree to put those boys into that raid, which resulted in such terrible sacrifice. Surely he did not do that just to satisfy public opinion. I cannot believe that of a minister, and I think he should enlarge on that. We should have some explanation.

Mr. GARDINER: If my hon. friend wishes to look up the corrections that were made he will find that what I said was that if that was the result, then public opinion was very much misinformed.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That is not the way this article reads.

Mr. GARDINER: Get the corrected one. You will find it was corrected to that effect within a day or two after that statement was published.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I just have this article as it was published.

Mr. GARDINER: There is a very interesting statement in the Globe and Mail which corrects a number of things they said in commenting on the report at the time. Get it and read it.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am not able to follow all the press of Canada these days. That is quite an undertaking. However, if the minister corrects it, good enough. I thought it very strange coming from a member of the cabinet under those circumstances.

I wanted to make these points with reference to the manpower policy of the country because I was a bit surprised at the statements made by the minister before the dinner recess, seeing that he was in a position to do more about a proper manpower policy than many of his colleagues in the cabinet, since he was minister in charge of war services in 1940 when the registration was carried out. From that time on I thought we would have boards set up that would direct the people of the country into the proper channels, either industry or agriculture or the war services, wherever they could best serve, depending upon their training. But that is something we have not had. All the difficulties that he told us about before the dinner recess, in connection with the Pacific command, would have been absolutely avoided and a great deal of expense would have been saved the country. This second army has cost the country over $150 million annually for many years to keep a body of men out of industry, out of agriculture, out of the war and everything but the public treasury, and I do not think that is good business. And the same policy is still in force to-day.

I wanted to say a few words endorsing what the hon. member for Vancouver South said on behalf of one who cannot speak for himself on the floor of the house. The first year I came here I criticized certain persons in another corner of the house for everlastingly slandering certain people who were not allowed to speak for themselves.

Mr. GARDINER: Including General McNaughton?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Probably so; but General McNaughton was appointed by the government and he is in a different situation from most of the civil servants, who were not trying to become members of the house. After all, this government professes to respect public opinion. When given an opportunity the public decided that they did not want General McNaughton to be a member of this house; therefore I think we should respect public opinion. I do not wish to take up any further time on this matter.

Mr. WARREN: It is quite evident that the hon. member for Souris has become nettled about the way in which the debate on the Pacific command has gone. It is also quite evident that he did not like the light that was thrown on the discussion by the Minister of Agriculture. But he should bear in mind the fact that it was not anyone on the government benches who started it. He should also remember that much pressure was being brought to bear on the government benches with respect to the situation in the Pacific command. Personally I was very much interested in the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture and I should like to compliment him upon the remarks he made this afternoon.

I wish to point out to the minister that he was not in his seat when the hon. member for Souris made his opening remarks. I listened very carefully to the Minister of Agriculture and I must say it is not a fact that he went after the record of General Pearkes or his reputation, character or citizenship, or anything of that sort. If he found occasion to criticize some of General Pearkes' dealings with respect to the man-power policy, well, that was an entirely different matter. Certainly he made no reference at all to the personal record of General Pearkes.

I did not rise in my place for the purpose of discussing this question; but the hon. member for Souris made reference to a group of boys in his own community enlisting in the army. I suppose his community is much like the one in which I live. We are terribly short of manpower. It is very difficult to get help on the farm. What are you going to do with a boy if he considers it his duty to enlist in the forces? Who is going to tell that boy that his place is at home? It is just possible that if the boy feels it is his duty to serve in the forces, and pressure is brought to bear on him to stay at home, his whole life may be ruined thereby because he will have in the back of his mind the feeling that he missed an opportunity that was his to serve his country.

May I say a word with respect to the falling-off in the production of hogs as a result of the bonus on grain? I wonder if the hon. member for Souris is aware of the fact that because there was a subsidy paid on grain, barley and oats, shipped from the west to Ontario, a very large increase in hog production in the east resulted. Because of the subsidy paid on grain from the west hundreds of thousands of hogs were fed.

This is the first occasion since I came to this house that I have made any attempt to air any of my local problems on the floor. I know it is common practice of many hon. members to bring their local problems to the floor of the house. I have never felt justified in doing that, and I do not go very often to the office of a minister of the crown. I feel that these men are so occupied with the many duties that they have to perform that I should be able to find some way of settling my own local problems without taking up their time or without taking up the time of the house in airing them here.

Like most hon. members I get my share of local problems. Numerous people write me letters and numerous people come to see me. On this occasion, as a result of listening to the speech of the Minister of Agriculture this afternoon, I am going to relate an incident that took place within the last year or so within my own riding. It has often happened that if a young man was called up or about to be called up his parents or the man himself would come to see me and tell me his story, which would be to the effect that he was needed at home on the farm. Well, I would take the trouble to inquire into the circumstances and refer his case to the proper officials. From the experience I have gained through dealing with these matters I have found that the officials have endeavoured to be fair and I have not had any occasion to complain, except in this one instance. I did have one young man in the Pacific command; I do not know how he happened to be there, but he was there. His aged mother and he himself came to visit me on one occasion. He was home on leave. They told me the circumstances. There were more than a hundred acres of very good soil. The home had been burnt but was being rebuilt. This boy was the only boy left. The other boys of the family were away from home. The mother was seventy years old and all alone. There were cows to milk, hogs to feed, sheep to attend to and other animals to look after. This woman was trying to manage alone.

It looked to me as if this was a case where the boy ought to be sent home or at least given postponement. I took the matter up in the usual manner without any results. Later on in the season the boy did get home for a certain length of time, not early enough to put in any crop but long enough to take off the hay, and then he had to return to his unit. Later on, I think it was after Christmas, after a severe and heavy snowstorm, this woman and her brother-in-law came to see me. I presumed that the young man had come home on Christmas leave and I suspected, although they did not tell me, that the boy had overstayed his leave. But here was all this stock to look after and the old woman endeavouring to do it alone. The brother-in-law had more work than he could attend to. He lived over the hill and every morning used to walk through the snow to make sure that the old woman was still alive. I took the matter up again, and in the course of time I got a letter from the old woman telling me that two police officers had come, picked up the young man and taken him away. She was alone. That was the Pacific command. I do not think that could have happened in the district in which I have had most of my experience, but it did happen in Pacific command and bears out the contention of the Minister of Agriculture this afternoon. The hon. member for Souris observed that there appeared to be opposition in policy. Well, it would seem to me that as far as the Pacific command was concerned they were endeavouring to have a policy of their own, to conduct these matters in their own way without regard to any instructions they may have had from the government or what might be the policy of the government.

Mr. POULIOT: The Pearkes' case is obviously a clear and simple one. Here is a soldier who has his breast covered with medals and decorations for gallantry during the last war. That is granted. The Minister of Agriculture did not deny it. Everyone agrees with it. The first point to consider is this. When a soldier has shown gallantry on the battlefield a quarter of a century ago and has been rewarded for it, he is entitled to the respect of the community.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Hear, hear; of the Liberals, too.

[Mr. Warren.]

Mr. POULIOT: Exactly; of everybody. On the other hand, does it mean that this man will be infallible for the rest of his life and never make a mistake? That is going pretty far. If one is to have respect for those who have been awarded the high honour of the Victoria Cross by the King himself, then I believe those holding that decoration should show themselves to be brothers in arms, and should not snub one of their number because he has scars on his face, to the point of not inviting him to the Vimy pilgrimage, and not inviting him to the meeting in Toronto of Victoria Cross holders in honour of Major Triquet last spring. They should give us an example of fraternity, but that was not done by General Pearkes.

I am now reaching the crucial point of the argument. Last year there was no question of conscription for overseas except in the mind of the then jingo minister and some jingo brass hats and a few others who took every means to substitute their own will for the law of the land, in fascist fashion. As a Liberal and a democrat I have the right to say, as I have said, to Major General Pearkes, "You are too fascist. You want to substitute your own will for the law of the land." This charge can be made against the former minister as well as against General Pearkes. The hon. member for Souris spoke ably; the hon. member for Lake Centre spoke eloquently and the hon. member for Vancouver South spoke genially this afternoon, but if they will consider the case objectively they must come to the same conclusion that I have reached, and they will be bound to admit their mistake in defending Pearkes, who is a fascist, when our troops are fighting for liberty.

Mr. ROWE: You say that because the war is pretty nearly over.

Mr. POULIOT: I will ask my hon. friend to allow me to go on. If he wants to say something later on so that I can hear him, I will be in a position to reply. But I reserve the right to say to the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe that he, too, is a fascist.

Mr. ROWE: I am not quite as big a clown in my party as you are in yours. Go ahead.

Mr. POULIOT: I will remind my hon. friend that he was prevented from getting into power by the people of Ontario, who would not put up with him.

Mr. ROWE: You never even approached it. Go ahead.

Mr. POULIOT: I have no lesson to learn from my hon. friends. I call them fascists, but the hon. gentleman gets angry.

Mr. ROWE: You have been a prize clown for twenty years.

Mr. POULIOT: I will ask my hon. friend, who was the associate of R. B. Bennett, to give me an opportunity to go ahead.

Mr. ROWE: You are still the prize clown of the house. You left this side and went over there, but you are still the prize clown.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order.

Mr. POULIOT: Let him go ahead; I am rejoicing. The truth hurts. He is making politics, and he should not make politics with blood and tears, as he has done since the beginning of the war.

Mr. ROWE: This is a short session. You have not had as much time for buffoonery.

Mr. POULIOT: I can tell the hon. friend for Dufferin-Simcoe—

Mr. ROWE: I know you very well, better than you know me.

Mr. POULIOT: How can my hon. friend speak as he does now when he voted against the motion which I sponsored, with the hon. member for Kamouraska, for the defence of the farmers? We were never supported by him. He was always talking about it, but when it came to a vote we did not get his support. We had the support of others on his side, including the hon. member for Broadview.

Mr. BROOKS: Did you ever think of defending the country? You are talking about defending the farmers.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. I would call the attention of hon. gentlemen to the fact that the hon. member for Témiscouata has the floor.

Mr. ROWE: He has had it all day. He is inviting interruptions.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): But if the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe wants to speak, at least he should address the Chair.

Mr. POULIOT: I was so disappointed when my hon. friend was interrupted. Now, sir, I am sorry that I must make a little digression. Let me remind my hon. friends that time and time again we brought in motions asking, as they asked in their speeches, that farmers should not be conscripted; but when it came to a vote they always took the side of those who did not agree with us.

Mr. HOMUTH: Speak of your own party.

Mr. POULIOT: They were all right when making speeches, but when it came to voting—

Mr. HOMUTH: Go on back where you belong.

Mr. POULIOT: I am here by my own choice, but I cannot swallow the Tories; they are too hard to digest.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): You have something there.

Mr. ROWE: Mr. Chairman, that is only buffoonery.

Mr. POULIOT: I mean that Toryism is bologna, but cannot be digested by a man with an ordinary stomach.

Mr. HOMUTH: Then why don't you develop a stomach like the cabinet ministers?

Mr. ROWE: Page General McNaughton; he will stomach it for you.

Mr. BOUCHER: You are at least amusing your former colleagues.

Mr. POULIOT: I thought until now the hon. member for Carleton was not a Tory, but was just a plain, honest, Progressive Conservative. I never thought of him as a Tory.

Mr. BOUCHER: You are at least amusing your former colleagues on the government side.

Mr. BROOKS: He is trying to crawl back.

Mr. HOMUTH: You just love him when he says anything about the Tories, and you hate him when he says anything about you.

Mr. CHURCH: The Ottawa theatres are empty to-night.

Mr. POULIOT: As proof that Tories are fascists, they cannot conceive that anyone may disagree with them. According to themselves, they are the self-depositories of revealed truth. I find there is an element of exaggeration in holding such an opinion of themselves. I will continue by saying that in making a distinction between the Tories and the honest Progressive Conservatives, there is all the difference in the world between the two classes of gentlemen. The Tories are black, and the honest Progressive Conservatives are nearly white.

Mr. HOMUTH: And we are not spotted, either.

Mr. POULIOT: No, not spotted, but they look just as cruel as leopards.

Mr. ROWE: On a point of order, I should like to ask you, Mr. Chairman, if this parliament has turned into mere buffoonery.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROWE: We have boys who are fighting to the death for our liberty.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Who started it?

War Appropriation—The Army

Mr. ROWE: And this parliament has been detained from the 1st of January—jumbled, tricked and twisted—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ROWE: And only just a few days before this parliament ends we have to listen to this buffoonery, with our boys overseas doing all they can—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): You are the worst offender.

Mr. POULIOT: I rise to a question of privilege.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): On the point of order—

Mr. HOMUTH: What is the hon. member talking about?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Answering the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe, may I say that I did try to keep order, and that he was one of the worst offenders in not keeping order, or obeying the call to order. He kept speaking without even addressing the Chair. The hon. member can set a good example, and I agree with him that we ought to keep order in the chamber. However, I ask him to help me in doing that.

Mr. ROWE: If I wounded your pride in any way, Mr. Chairman, I will apologize; but still that does not affect the order in the chamber now.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): It is not a matter of my pride, but on the point of order I say that you are quite correct. We should have better order than we have had.

Mr. ROWE: You have killed the point entirely.

Mr. POULIOT: I appreciate what is being said. The remarks of the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe respecting buffoonery in the chamber came immediately after the remarks by the hon. member for Waterloo.

Mr. HOMUTH: And do not forget the "south" Waterloo, too.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The hon. member for Temiscouata has the floor and I would ask hon. members on both sides to keep order.

Mr. POULIOT: I appreciate what you have said, Mr. Chairman, and we shall now go on with this important matter.

There is something that must not be overlooked, and that is that last spring when we complained of the way in which a large number of draftees were dealt with in the Pacific command, Major General Pearkes was in command, and he remained there until about the time we met in November for the short session. At that time there was no redress. We were complaining that young men who were abiding by the law were being forced to do more than was required by the law. Who were these young men? They were precisely—many of them—young men who had started their training in 1940, at a time when the Minister of Agriculture was also Minister of National War Services. That was an incredible thing. The minister had to assume responsibility for the national war services regulations, which described agriculture as a seasonal occupation, mining and fishing as seasonal occupations, railroading as a seasonal occupation, and the young men engaged in these vocations were called up. I was also informed that those regulations had been drafted by three people, by a Quebec lawyer and a Toronto brigadier, who reported to a third party, the hon. member who afterwards became minister for air. Those regulations were all wrong. It was absurd to describe agriculture as a seasonal occupation. After the regulations were drafted a report was asked from five deputy ministers to confirm that description, and they reported that agriculture was a seasonal occupation, meaning by that that farmers work for only part of the year, which was untrue. Then the member for Temiscouata wrote articles in the press—they were in French—and sent a copy of each of those articles to each member of the cabinet to inform them about the work done by eastern farmers, how they drudged from dawn to dusk and sometimes later the whole year round including Sundays, so that it was impossible for a farmer to enjoy a legitimate rest. I understand that after the drought in the prairie provinces there was some unemployment among the farmers. Of course, conditions in farming in the west before the war were entirely different from conditions that prevail in the east. In the west the farmer has practically nothing to do in the winter.

Mr. FAIR: You had better come out there and try it.

Mr. POULIOT: I know that conditions are different in the west to-day now that you have more mixed farming. I was speaking of those who grow grain alone and own orange groves in California, and who do their seeding and harvesting with mechanized equipment. I am describing what I know. I do not mean that every western farmer owns an orange grove in California.

Mr. BURTON: Many western farmers raise more live stock than many of the farmers in the east where my hon. friend comes from.

Mr. POULIOT: I can tell my hon. friend what he probably does not realize, and that is that the dominion Department of Agriculture, as I have said before, has an eye only for the prairie provinces, and the east and British Columbia have never received the help that has been given to the three prairie provinces. I am not surprised that my hon. friend is boasting of what is done out in the west but it is done at the expense of the east. The idea was to help develop mixed farming in the west, and the farmers in the east have received no help whatever. To such an extent has that been so that if my hon. friend is fair enough to consult Hansard he will see that three years ago I proposed that the dominion Department of Agriculture be abolished and that the money spent by that department be distributed among the provinces in proportion to their farming population. Of course, that is a matter of opinion.

What I say is that the farmers of Canada have been defended in this house by only a small group of members of parliament who have taken every opportunity to inform the government on the essential activities of the farming population. That is what has been done, and the record is there for all to see.

The farmers were deceived through being called up for one month's military training. That was afterwards extended to four months when the Minister of Agriculture was in charge of the Department of National War Services. Before that four months had expired there was a change made by the head of that department and the four months was extended for the duration of the war. We protested against that.

Before conscription was brought in I offered to the government that I would raise a regiment in my own county within a week and I suggested that if every other hon. member would do the same we would have an army of 245,000 men within a week. But this is what the Prime Minister told me from his place in the house. He said that my proposal could not be accepted because it was not in the interests of agriculture; it was not in the interests of the forest industry; it was not in the interests of war industry at all, and it would be the worst possible error to call into the army farmers, lumberjacks and so on. Those facts are on the record.

How is it that the farmers of Canada have been defended in this house only by a group of men among whom there was one Conservative farmer? There are farmers in this house, but many did positively nothing when the time came to vote for the farmers. The record is there.

I also felt indignant that the farmers should be considered slackers and that those engaged in the forest and war industries should be considered slackers. They were doing their duty as farmers and in the forest and war industries. I wanted the rehabilitation of the farmers, and each time that an extension was made in the military training of those called up from the farm, what did I do? I tried to obtain amendments to the regulations that would benefit the farmers, not only of my constituency, not only of my province, but of every part of Canada. But I had to fight hard for that. I remember what help I got in having the regulations changed and recognition made of the farmers as doing essential work in the war effort. Farming was described in the regulations as a seasonal occupation. I did secure some recognition of the importance of the work of the farmer, the railway man, the lumberjack and all others who contribute so much to the war effort. I remember, I say, who helped me. The regulations were changed as a result of the support that I had from my late lamented friend, the former minister of justice, Mr. Lapointe. Two months or a month and a half before his death, in October, 1941, the regulations were amended; and I am not to boast of that; I have done my duty; but the member who worked the most to obtain these amendments was the member for Temiscouata; it was not the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe, although the electors of Dufferin-Simcoe have benefited from it.

And now what do we hear? That we have not done our duty, when a lawyer, a country lawyer if you will, has done precisely what should have been done by another gentleman, himself a farmer of repute, a farmer well known in the agricultural societies of Ontario, a former privy councillor, a former leader of his party in this province. He has done nothing to help the farmer. The work was done by men from Quebec and by a few men from Ontario, to one of whom I must pay tribute, namely the Conservative member for York East (Mr. McGregor), who has supported us, and also, at times, with the assistance of members of the C.C.F. and social credit groups.

In the matter of the plebiscite, I pay tribute to the hon. member for Broadview, who voted with us, not sharing our point of view, but who voted with us just the same and showed that he had courage.

War Appropriation—The Army

When the farmers were called for the first time for one month's training, the time chosen was the dead season of the year; they were there during the winter and they were confident that the training would not last any longer than that. They dreamed that they were going into the bosom of the Minister of Agriculture and they awoke in training camps. That is what happened. Of course I do not complain of the minister's acceptance of the regulations, but they were designed to conscript everyone for the army, farmers as well as others. If we had not protested; if we had followed the same line of conduct as the hon. gentleman who interrupted me a moment ago had done, I should not have been surprised if the farmers in the army were five or perhaps ten times more numerous.

And what have we gained by our stand? We have the reward of the Canadian people. We can enjoy their respect. We can go anywhere, and the farmers and the railwaymen, and all men engaged in war industries, will know who are the members who have supported them in the house, not only to exempt them from doing any military training, but to rehabilitate them in the minds and the eyes of their fellow citizens. Their hearts are full of gratitude and appreciation for what has been done for them. One has only to look at Votes and Proceedings of 1942, especially at the time of the plebiscite, and even before it was held, to see what work was done by a handful of hon. members, who suffered humiliation because they were true to their principles, because they knew the people among whom they were living and were not afraid to defend them in this House of Commons. In the Senate nothing was done. The fight was here. The fight was carried on by a handful of men who were not afraid to defend the rights of those who had showed confidence in them by sending them to the House of Commons.

If I am asked, Mr. Chairman, why I supported the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay at the election of 1942, I will tell you now. It was because women of a certain age had to register not long before his election. I was informed that women were to be conscripted, and that is why I thought at the time it was important that an independent candidate should be elected in the province of Quebec to show that Quebec was not in favour of the conscription of women. That is what happened.

I say this without peevishness and without anger. I say it quietly. I say it because it is my conviction. How is it that there are men whose belief is respected when they say they are conscientious objectors? The beliefs of Doukhobors and other sects are respected; the law makes special provision for them and grants them exemptions. But because the farmers of the province of Quebec have too much self-respect to play religion and politics together, they were forced into the army. If the minister says that production has not decreased on account of the fact that many indispensable farmers have been brought to the colours, I will tell him that perhaps the figures support his contention, but on the other hand agricultural production would have been much greater if farmers' sons had not been deceived as they have been.

And now, sir, speaking of industry, speaking of railroads, who is the member who has fought for railwaymen in this house? What have hon. Progressive Conservative members done to show that the railwaymen are worthy of the respect of Canadian citizens and have done their share of the war effort even if they have not military uniforms, even if they are in overalls? I remember the fight that I had last year and the trouble I had to secure the correspondence exchanged between the Minister of Labour and the presidents of the two big railway companies, in which these two gentlemen repeated exactly what the member for Témiscouata had been saying for months and years, that railwaymen were engaged in an essential occupation, that their work was vital to the war effort, that they were not slackers and that they should be allowed to continue their work for the welfare of the country. There again I met the junkers. I met the former minister of national defence, a man who has been overrated to the limit, who has been made what he is and given importance by his colleagues of the cabinet. I thank those who have never opened their mouths in his defence, and I regret deeply that the Prime Minister has made the considerable blunder of coming to his defence after the warning I had given him that his colleague was going to stab him in the back.

When the Department of National Defence was supreme in selective service, Major-General Tremblay was inspector-general of the eastern command. He was not there most of the time; he had to sit in an office just the same as a clerk. If the soldiers in the eastern command were suffering, it was because the inspector-general, instead of doing his work as inspector-general, had been instructed to stay in an Ottawa building to gather the largest possible number of farmers, lumberjacks and others for the army. How is it that recruiting was so difficult? It was because there was no order in the Department of National Defence, because the minister in charge was too busy appointing his friends, his pet friends to fat jobs instead of supervising the administration of his department, the most vital job of the war. That is what has happened; and who has fought against that incompetent minister if not the member for Témiscouata? If I did so it was not because of any rancour; it was because, from the bottom of my heart, I was convinced that he was incompetent. Events have proved to us that he is incompetent; and when the leader of the Conservative party went to Grey North and complained of the mess that the Department of National Defence was in he was absurd enough, illogical enough not to point his finger to the former minister as the one who was responsible for that mess. And some members listened to his questions as if he were an expert. What expert! He is just the Charlie McCarthy to the brass hat Bergens. Yet they listen to him. Again, I fought alone, or nearly alone, with a handful of courageous members, for the farmers. With my friends, the hon. member for Levis and the hon. member for Rimouski, I fought, with these exceptions, positively alone to defend railwaymen against the former minister of national defence as head of that department; and now is he a saint any longer? Is he a hero any longer?

Mr. GREEN: Would it be possible for the parliamentary assistant to amplify the statement he made the other day concerning the reserve army, which, as hon. members know, is what was formerly known as the non-permanent militia? In his statement the parliamentary assistant said that the reserve army was to carry on for another year—

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know that I mentioned any period of time.

Mr. GREEN: Well, carry on. He did say something of the disabilities or handicaps under which they are working. I suggest to him that the time has come when the whole reserve army policy should be reviewed. Many members of that army are older men holding responsible positions across the country. It has been a real sacrifice for them to belong to the reserve army and to put in the nights required for training and go to the camp each summer, and I suggest that, the war being in the position in which it now is, some change should be made. The suggestion has been made to me that after service for three years a member of the reserve army should be entitled to honourable discharge and, incidentally, that he should receive some badge for his service. The whole situation is not right and I suggest that some change should be made without further delay.

Mr. ABBOTT: I thank my hon. friend for his suggestions. The rather brief remarks I made about the reserve army the other day were intended as a tribute to the splendid work it has performed, and I said that for the time being, since we are continuing to maintain our flow of reinforcements, it was felt that the work of the reserve army should continue. I agree with what my hon. friend has said, that the time has probably now come for a very careful review of the line which the future activities of the reserve army should take, and I thank him for bringing the matter up. I shall see that it is brought to the attention of the minister, of the officers of the department, and particularly of General Phelan, who is in charge of reserve army activities.

Mr. GREEN: How many men are in the reserve army now?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have not the figures here.

Mr. ROWE: One hundred thousand?

Mr. ABBOTT: I may be able to give an answer in a moment.

Mr. ROWE: One hundred thousand, are there not?

Mrs. CASSELMAN: The other day the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) asked a question about appliances supplied for amputation cases in the present war, and I thought a rather bad impression was created about the quality and standard of appliances. I have been looking into the matter again. It is not the first time that I have tried to find out what service is being given to those who have suffered major amputations during these last months. I think there have been 1,640 cases since last D-day, which of course is a much smaller number than the 4,000 who were similarly wounded in the last war, maimed perhaps, and now back in ordinary civilian occupations.

These amputation cases deserve a great deal of credit for the way in which they treat themselves, for the moral courage of the highest order which they show throughout their hospitalization period and during the time they are being fitted and trained in the use of their new limbs.

The department here maintains a manufacturing department. The main manufacturing establishment and stores are in Toronto and there are twelve stations across Canada where men may be fitted with the standard product. The United States veterans' administration deals with civilian firms. In Great Britain they contract with civilian firms. Here we manufacture our own and I think our product will stand up with that produced in any of the other countries. When the men come back they may be fitted at any time in their lives or have their limbs altered. If they dealt with a civilian firm, as was suggested in a question that was asked, they would have one or two fittings and that would be the end. The department uses the best materials.

Last year, 1944, in February, an international conference was held here with representatives from the United States, Australia, United Soviet Socialist Republics and Great Britain to go into the question of the best appliances that could be obtained. A similar one was held this year in Chicago, in February, at which all the big civilian manufacturing firms had representatives from the United States, and our exhibits set up were praised as the equal of any.

As regards artificial eyes, the department here has made tremendous strides. Before the war a German cartel handled these supplies. The department has the only glass-eye maker in Canada. Along with the Corning Glass Works of New York and the university of Toronto they have developed an eye which is an excellent product. I just wished to correct any bad impression that had gone forth that care was not given along these lines to see that those who suffered maiming casualties of this kind were rehabilitated as far as possible.

There are one or two questions I desire to ask the parliamentary assistant. At what period in his hospitalization is a man who has suffered major casualties such as amputations discharged from the hospital under the army to the veterans' affairs department? Is he carried on pay and allowances until his discharge? Is there any difference in his pay during the time he is in the army hospital and in the care of veterans affairs if he needs later treatment?

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall ask my colleague, the Minister of Veterans' Affairs, to answer that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I first of all thank the hon. lady member for Edmonton East for her remarks in regard to the artificial appliances, both artificial limbs and eyes. Since some remarks were made in the committee earlier on this subject I had an opportunity of making a thorough investigation of world comments upon what Canada is doing in this regard, and I can repeat to-night what I said on that occasion, that Canada places second to no country anywhere in the world in regard to appliances that are given to our boys who are maimed overseas. Some time ago I noted that in the United States we were placed at the top as compared with all countries. It was my pleasure some months ago to interview personally a delegation from the U.S.S.R. and to give them three samples of various forms of artificial limbs as a small present from the Dominion of Canada. They will reproduce these artificial limbs in their own great country. I also had a meeting with one of the greatest surgeons on the continent who was attending the convention to which my hon. friend has referred. I also had the pleasure last week of attending the national convention of the War Amputations of Canada, one of the finest bodies we have in the whole dominion. They are cooperating with us and have been for years in regard to the placement of amputation cases. The rate of placement of amputation cases is very high indeed and will continue to be high for years to come. They themselves are abundantly full of courage in their own reestablishment and they have offered the department, and have done so for years, the finest and fullest cooperation in any plans whatsoever regarding their treatment once they are handed over to the former Department of Pensions and National Health, now Veterans' Affairs. We receive the fullest cooperation from them and one of their own officers is now in our department as a supervisor. I think it will be found that the amputation cases of Canada are the most contented and happy, and the most constructive of all our veterans.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: I happen to know something of the work of the War Amputations of Canada. I think they do a marvellous work. They have a placement officer in Halifax, I understand, who meets every hospital ship, talks with the patients who come in and tries to make them understand something of what is before them. It is a great thing to make a man look forward, with less trepidation, to what is before him. I think they do excellent work by sending a member of their group to the home where a casualty is reported in order that a man from the last war with a similar disability will tell the wife or the mother how he has been able to overcome his difficulties. I think they deserve the greatest praise and the individual deserves the great praise also in facing up to it and in doing what he can to fit himself again for a normal civil life. I thank the minister for what he has said.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have a short answer to give to the hon. member for Vancouver South. The latest reported strength of the reserve army is 83,000.

Mr. GILLIS: I should like to say a word in regard to the remarks of the Minister of [Mrs. Casselman.]

Veterans' Affairs in order to get some information. The hon. member for York South did not suggest that the work of supplying artificial limbs might be placed in private hands. That was the impression given by the hon. member for Edmonton East a while ago. What I understood him to say was this: We have had artificial limb departments in most of the hospitals of the Department of Pensions and National Health for the last twenty-five years. These departments have been caring for the maintenance of veterans of the last war for the last twenty-five years. It is a job in itself. These limbs have to undergo repairs every so often. The question that was asked by the hon. member for York South had to do with the amputation cases of this war. Because of the large number of amputation cases coming back this time, has the Department of Pensions and National Health been extended to care for the additional work in manufacturing artificial limbs?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

May I clean up one or two matters about which hon. members have asked? The hon. member for Mackenzie asked me how many medical men had been seconded from the army for civil work. I am advised the total is twenty-three, of whom four are in Saskatchewan. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked where the next of kin applied for war service gratuity. I am afraid some of my statements on that may not have been entirely clear; therefore I will make a final one now. Application is made to the service to which the individual belonged. In reply to his question as to whether those who may be entitled to the claim are being informed of their right to apply, I am advised that all the services are now obtaining lists of the next of kin from the estates branch and will notify them, that is the next of kin, enclosing the necessary application forms.

Mr. KNOWLES: Whether they applied before or not?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct. Just to close out the matter of the notice that went out to the schools about the calling up of boys of eighteen years of age, I am informed that the original circular letter went to every secondary school and to officers commanding all reserve army units, to the cadet officer, military district No. 3, and the officer commanding the 33rd reserve brigade, military district No. 3—

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the parliamentary assistant permit a question?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Suppose one of the boys becomes eighteen in March or April; is he permitted to finish his high school studies before he is called into military activity?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes; he is not called for military activities until he is eighteen years and six months old. If he is a student at eighteen years and six months he may claim exemption on the ground that the studies which he is carrying on are of a nature that would entitle him to exemption. But in any event he is not called into the army until he is eighteen years and six months old.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Is he classified as a student when he becomes eighteen years and six months old during the summer holidays?

Mr. ABBOTT: If, in fact, he is a student and if he can show that he is carrying on a course of study which is such as would entitle him to exemption, the answer is, yes.

Finally, the hon. member for Haldimand asked me to table the various circulars of instructions which have been sent out in connection with these various types of farm leave, including the new type of hog, dairy and beef production, and I do so now.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the parliamentary assistant explain why a larger sum is being asked for in the break-down for the army in Canada than for the army overseas, $324,000,000 in the one case and $306,000,000 in the other?

Mr. ABBOTT: I can only give a general explanation of that. Speaking offhand, I believe the difference arises from the fact that the army in Canada is charged with the cost of mechanical equipment, ordnance, ammunition and that sort of thing, which is purchased here; that accounts for the difference. The principal items of expenditure in the army overseas cover food, clothing, pay and allowances and so on. The amount charged to the army in Canada includes those factors also, and, in addition, fairly substantial expenditures for such things as motor transport, guns, ammunition, gratuities, dependents' allowances and so on.

Mr. STIRLING: Even though the mechanical transport goes overseas, it is still charged to the army in Canada?

Mr. ABBOTT: Quite so, because it is paid for here.

Mr. STIRLING: Then there is one other question, with regard to the unfortunate burning of ordnance depots in several parts of

War Appropriation—The Army

Canada. Would the parliamentary assistant give a list of those that have so burned, and the causes of the fires?

Mr. ABBOTT: I presume I could obtain that.

Mr. STIRLING: Could we have a statement dealing with those matters?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, a little later.

Mr. BENICE: I should like to raise one point with the parliamentary assistant because at various times it has rather disconcerted me. Quite frequently members of parliament receive communications or visits from their constituents inquiring why they have not received replies to letters addressed to various departments of the government, particularly the Department of National Defence. By approaching the minister's office I have always been able to get fairly prompt replies to my inquiries, but quite frequently I do not want to bother the minister's office; and on a number of occasions, as I say, I have been considerably disconcerted by not receiving replies to letters addressed to this and other departments. There may be some reason for this, but I should like to point out to the parliamentary assistant that a member's constituents feel he is the one man in Ottawa to whom they can go to get information, and when the member writes a letter to a particular department it seems to me at least an acknowledgment should be received within a very short time.

Mr. ABBOTT: I quite agree.

Mr. BENICE: Last Friday the parliamentary assistant said that, speaking generally, there was not very much trouble in connection with gratuities, except in cases where the person concerned was not entitled to a gratuity.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think what I said was that the trouble arose in cases where no application had been made and, second, where application had been made and refused.

Mr. BENICE: I have a case to which I should like to refer. It is rather a small matter to take up at this time, but it illustrates what I am referring to in connection with this matter of getting replies. In this particular case a notice was sent out on which was endorsed this statement: "Your cheque will be mailed February 20, 1945." This particular individual came to see me out in Saskatoon eleven days after February 20, and asked me to find out why he had not received his money. On March 3 I sent an airmail letter to the secretary of the Department of National Defence for the army, Ottawa. I had not received a reply when I left to come to Ottawa. After coming here I sent a letter under date of March 28. It is now April 10; and certainly as the representative of a fairly large number of people in this country I am entitled to a reply from a department of government.

Mr. ABBOTT: I entirely agree.

Mr. BENICE: I cannot explain to my constituent if I do not get a reply.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not blame the hon. member; and I do not know how I can explain, either. If my hon. friend will just give me a copy of the letter I can assure him that he will get a reply by an early hour to-morrow.

Mr. WRIGHT: I have had the same experience with this department in writing concerning gratuities, so that the case mentioned by the hon. member for Saskatoon is not the exception.

Mr. ABBOTT: On the question of gratuities, the committee will realize that this is a comparatively new function of the department. Some of us may remember that in the early stages of the war a good deal of difficulty was experienced in connection with cheques for dependents' allowances. I know when I first came here nearly five years ago I received many complaints from dependents who said their cheques were not coming regularly. I found that in the process of organizing the machinery to send out these cheques there was considerable delay. That gradually was overcome and the difficulties ironed out, so that to-day, judging by my own experience, the system has become pretty efficient, since in recent years I have received very few complaints in regard to delay in sending out dependents' allowance cheques. As I explained the other night, applications for gratuities are coming in pretty large numbers. The other evening the accumulated total had reached seven thousand. I believe these applications are being handled reasonably promptly, but I have no doubt the system will be improved as soon as that can be done. In the ordinary course the cheques go out within forty-eight hours after the application is approved. However, I will bring the remarks of the hon. member to the attention of the department. I regret that there appears to have been a failure to acknowledge letters; and I agree that letters from members of parliament in particular should receive prompt attention.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask the parliamentary assistant if there is any particular kind of case in which there will be any unusual delay in forwarding the gratuity to the next of kin? I have in mind a letter which was shown me by a colleague this afternoon, in which it was stated that it would be necessary for this case to go to the estates branch, and for the military estate of the deceased soldier to be wound up before payment of the gratuity could be made to the next of kin. In this case the soldier had died more than six months ago. This raises the question whether in all cases payment will be made fairly quickly, or whether there will be delay in instances such as I have mentioned.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend will realize that I am no expert in departmental administration or in the handling of applications of this kind, but, as I said a moment ago with respect to the remarks of the other hon. member, I will bring his statement to the attention of the officers of the department particularly in charge of the handling of these matters and ask them to do everything in their power to expedite the disposition of these claims. Personally I do not know of any particular type of case which may be more difficult than another. Obviously, as my hon. friend will realize, the application must be checked; verification must be had of the length of service and the amount of gratuity to which the claimant is entitled, and of necessity that takes some little time. It cannot be done in an hour or two, or probably within two or three days.

Mr. KNOWLES: I was concerned when I saw this letter because I had a clear memory of the wording of the order in council tabled the other day, which indicated that in these cases the amount of the gratuity was to be credited to the military estate of the deceased service man. If that is the case there may be instances in which there will be lengthy delay. I was hoping that it might be possible, since it has now been recognized that this gratuity should go to the next of kin, to have payment made without that sort of delay. There has been so much uncertainty and disappointment about the matter that I hope an effort will be made to deal with these cases as rapidly as possible.

Mr. ABBOTT: Obviously care must be taken to see that the gratuity is paid to the proper person, but I can assure my hon. friend that every effort will be made to see that these claims are paid as promptly as possible.

Mr. QUELCH: Could the gratuity not be paid in exactly the same way that back pay is given to the next of kin?

Mr. ABBOTT: I would imagine so.

Mr. QUELCH: If the dependents can establish their right to the back pay of the deceased soldier I should think their right to the gratuity would be established automatically.

Mr. ABBOTT: That seems reasonable.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is there any assistance that can be given to the next of kin to help them make out the papers that may be required? The hon. gentleman is a lawyer, and he will understand what I mean.

Mr. ABBOTT: That assistance is available at the headquarters of any military district. Legal assistance, if required, is available to the next of kin; the estates branch is glad to provide it.

Mr. ESLING: The parliamentary assistant answered a number of questions to-night, but he did not bring down a reply in connection with the status of South African nurses, in so far as gratuities are concerned.

Mr. ABBOTT: I cannot do that.

Mr. ESLING: The parliamentary assistant will realize that from a legal point of view they will say, "You have a contract." But those nurses are now in the central Mediterranean area nursing Canadian boys, and boys from Australia and New Zealand. All they ask is that they be entitled to the same gratuities as Canadian nurses. It is nearly three weeks since I instituted my inquiry. I know some decision has been arrived at, and I should like the parliamentary assistant to let the committee know what the status is.

Mr. ABBOTT: The Minister of Veterans' Affairs gave an answer last night, and it may be that he answered the point to which the hon. member is referring. I also added that some other features were still under consideration, and that no decision had yet been taken. That still holds true.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is correct.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not in a position to make any further announcement to-night. I assured my hon. friend that his representations would be carefully considered. The question was also discussed by the hon. member for Wellington South and the hon. member for Westmorland, and I may say that the representations of all three hon. members are being brought to the attention of the officers of the department who are making a most careful and, I trust, sympathetic survey of the matter.

Mr. ESLING: May we have a statement as to the policy of the government in this connection before the session ends?

War Appropriation—The Army

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid I cannot make any promise as to that. If it is possible to do so, it will be given.

Mr. ROWE: With regard to the expression of concern on the part of the hon. member for Edmonton East, on behalf of amputation cases and those described as medically unfit, I would ask the parliamentary assistant if he would not give consideration by giving those cases at least some extension of the privileges extended by the railway services. I understand that the moment they are discharged they have to pay full railway fare, and have a struggle to secure rehabilitation in their different localities.

Naturally, after four or five years in the services they wish to visit friends in different parts of Canada. I suggest that the parliamentary assistant might bring to the attention of his department, and to that of the Minister of Veterans' Affairs, the advisability of extending the same service to those men, at least until the war is over, that is given to those on active service. It seems to me unfair that men who have lost an arm or a leg, and who have been away for four or five years, should have to pay full railway fare, while able-bodied men in the services enjoy reduced rates. I urge on behalf of those men that at least for six or twelve months, if not until the end of hostilities, they be given those privileges.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The Department of Veterans' Affairs will continue to cooperate in every possible way for the sympathetic care and consideration of amputation cases in Canada.

Mr. BURTON: I should like to speak to a matter which has caused a considerable amount of heart-burning. This is a condition which, in my view, should be avoided, because it seems most unfair to ask what I have in mind from people who have made such great sacrifice.

Last fall some people living in my constituency received a telegram stating that their son was missing, following enemy action in Italy. They heard nothing further for a while. Then, later on, official confirmation of that telegram was received, stating that the son was still missing, that the authorities were sorry they could not give any further information at the time, but that everybody hoped for the best.

A considerable length of time after that those parents received a letter from a minister who has nothing whatever to do with any of the defence departments in an official capacity, consoling with them, and expressing sympathy to those people. That was all well and good; but in the same mail delivery they received a letter from the dependents' allowance board stating that, since the son had been missing so long, they would no longer pay dependents' allowance. It seems ridiculous to have received a letter of that kind, and in the same mail delivery to have received another one expressing sympathy, from an official member of the government, and the hope that everything will turn out all right. It seems to me something is wrong in the department.

I contend that, regardless of whether or not the son was missing, so long as there was no proof of desertion the allowance should not have been cut off, and particularly in the manner in which it was done. I am happy to say that the fears of the parents were relieved some months later—in fact, since I came to Ottawa—when they received unofficially, not through the department, word that the son is a prisoner of war in Germany. If we are to be so hard in calculating the dollars and cents due these people, then why do we go to the other extreme of writing letters to tell them how much we admire the services and sacrifices these men have made?

Mr. QUELCH: My understanding is that a soldier can receive rehabilitation benefits only if he has an honourable discharge. Would the parliamentary assistant explain exactly what might disbar a soldier from obtaining an honourable discharge? If he is overseas for six years, and has spent six months in gaol, is he prevented from receiving it? I have in mind the case of an airman on coastal operations who was sentenced for low flying. He was told that because of his six months sentence he would receive a dishonourable discharge. Surely because a man serves a six months' sentence that would not automatically follow?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know the air force rules. My hon. friend is quite right when he says that a service man is entitled to gratuities only if he receives an honourable discharge. There is provision, of course, for making appeals from decisions of courts martial. I understand a board of review will go over those cases with a view, not necessarily to changing the decisions, but for the purpose of making a thorough review.

The hon. member is quite right, however, when he says that a man is not entitled to gratuities unless he receives an honourable discharge. Certainly if he were sentenced to six months in gaol as the result of an offence which would justify such a term of imprisonment, I should think he would not receive an honourable discharge.

Mr. QUELCH: The minister knows very well that in the last war many a man who had a wonderful war record had some temporary lapse and got into trouble and was sentenced, and for that reason was given a dishonourable discharge in spite of his splendid war record. I think the benefit of the doubt should be given to the soldier who has a splendid war record behind him but has been sentenced to a few months in gaol and is therefore dishonourably discharged.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think such a case would be most sympathetically considered by the board to which I have referred and which is made up of representatives of all three services.

Mr. MacNICOL: In connection with this matter of dishonourable discharges I would ask the parliamentary assistant if he is familiar with the programme now followed in the United States where they make every effort to rehabilitate the soldier who has had some temporary lapse from good behaviour and give him a chance to make good and wipe out the words "dishonourably discharged" from his papers. A few days ago a father came to see me about his son who had been dishonourably discharged. After having taken part in an action during which the father claims that his son was knocked out or made dizzy, the son wandered back from the lines, finally was sent to a detention camp, and later on, after trial, was sent to prison. He is now in prison in England. If they can rehabilitate their young men in the United States to the point where they can wipe out the words "dishonourably discharged" from their papers, we can do it in Canada, too. After this war is over, many of these men, who may have taken part in strenuous active service and perhaps missed death by inches, when they return to Canada will have a difficult enough job in getting employment in competition perhaps with those who have not been over and also with those who have come back with creditable records, and I feel that we can rehabilitate the vast majority of our men whose papers are marked "dishonourably discharged" so that they will not be forever handicapped in applying for employment. Naturally, if an employer to whom they applied for work saw the words "dishonourably discharged" on their discharge papers they would have a difficult time getting any employment. I would, therefore, suggest to the parliamentary assistant that if he is not already familiar with it he inquire into the programme in the United States to which I have referred, and see if we in Canada cannot give these young men who come back dishonourably discharged an opportunity to rehabilitate themselves to the point where the words "dishonourably discharged" may be wiped off their papers, so that they may be given a chance to make a living.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall be glad to do that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Last year while we were considering the war services grant bill I pointed out to the minister who was piloting it that in my judgment the ruling under which a soldier lost his gratuity by reason of an offence committed was very unjust. I still believe that my contention was well founded. Take the case raised by the hon. member for Acadia. Let us suppose that a soldier has given good service for four years and then commits an offence as a result of which he is sent to prison for six months. What is the punishment for that offence? Six months. If, in addition to punishing the soldier by six months in prison, we take from him the war service gratuity which he has earned by four years of good service, we are punishing that offence altogether beyond what it merits. My judgment is this, that we should give the soldier his gratuity for every day of good service during which he earned the gratuity, regardless of whether or not he commits an offence later on in the service, even to the point of having a "dishonourable discharge." I just wished to bring that to the attention of the parliamentary assistant. I believe that much confusion, much dissatisfaction and much injustice will result, for the reason I have stated, from the application of the act as it stands.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not going to go into this matter again because I have done so two or three times already and my opinion is pretty well known. The parliamentary assistant mentioned a board of review.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not sure that that is the correct name. It is a board anyway.

Mr. GILLIS: Has the soldier an opportunity to present his case before that board, or is it just an inquiry in camera involving the examination of documents by two or three people?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know. This is a brand new thing. I am not quite certain that the arrangements are finally completed. Possibly I am a bit premature in referring to it, but such a board is being created, if it is not already functioning.

Mr. GILLIS: I think it is actually functioning. I cited a case in the house the other night and I had a call yesterday from an official of the department asking me for the name and regimental number of the soldier.

War Appropriation—The Army

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That was from my department.

Mr. GILLIS: That is right.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That shows how vigilant we are.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes. So that the board is functioning. What I wish to know is whether the soldier has an opportunity of presenting his side of the story before the board. I think the worst feature of the whole thing is that a dishonourable discharge destroys a boy's chances of getting work for the rest of his life, because the first thing he is asked for when applying for employment is "Where is your discharge?"

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend is an old soldier and knows that discipline must be maintained.

Mr. GILLIS: I agree, and I stated, when I spoke before, that when a man is twenty-four or twenty-five years of age and deliberately breaks military law, he should know at that age what he is up against and should be punished. But most of these cases are boys of eighteen or nineteen years of age who do not know what it is all about and the offence is not always deliberate. A young fellow came back from Italy, and on the second night home he was celebrating and got tangled up with a policeman. He was in uniform at the time, so that he got nine months in gaol, and automatically he is discharged. He had committed no infraction of military law on service, and when he got into this bit of trouble he was just celebrating, as he had a right to do. But he was punished as no civilian would have been. I do not blame him for celebrating. I know that if we who came back from the last war had all been caught for the many things we did by way of celebration, a good many of us would not be here. Therefore I say that there should be some opportunity for the soldier to present his side of the case before this board, and then the board would be in a position to separate the sheep from the goats and see that justice was done.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Two questions were asked by the hon. member for Edmonton East and I failed to hear them answered. I listened carefully to the reply made by the Minister of Veterans' Affairs but I had the impression that he had not heard what she asked. She asked just at what stage a soldier who suffers an amputation passes from the care of the army into the care of the Department of Veterans' Affairs. Would the minister care to answer that now?

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes; if the soldier is seriously wounded, and there is no opportunity of his being reconditioned up to the point of further service, he is naturally discharged to the Department of Veterans' Affairs and is under our care. In an amputation case he would be there until he is fitted up with appliances and able to return to placement in the community through readjustment processes. At the present time we have several hundred of them in our various hospitals in Canada.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member also asked, what is the relationship between the pay and allowances given to a soldier while under the army as compared with those which are given as far as soldier patients under the care of the Department of Veterans' Affairs are concerned?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I think the hon. member will find that in a serious case like that they have been generous in the Department of Veterans' Affairs. That has always been the case. There is very little complaint in Canada from amputation cases so far as the allowances are concerned. I think, if the hon. member will consult the officials of the soldier organizations, he will find that there has been very little complaint in that direction.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have been desirous of bringing a number of cases to the attention of the government, but I thought they should be brought at the time when the Department of Veterans' Affairs was being discussed. It seemed to me that a large percentage of the cases which have been presented here by hon. members were completely out of order, and that has put me at a considerable disadvantage, because I have tried to be somewhere near being in order. But since we are on this subject now, and having a sort of free-for-all, I will bring forward one case which I should very much like to have the Minister of Veterans' Affairs clear up. I received a letter the other day from a man in British Columbia in which he told me something which, I must say, astounded me; he said that his pension had been rated at fourteen per cent and that he was being paid ten per cent, and he said that several other veterans whom he knew were in a similar category to himself in this respect.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I should have to see the particular case. If my hon. friend will be good enough to let me have the particulars to-morrow morning I shall be very glad to look into it at once.

DEPARTMENT OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Chairman, in past years I have submitted the estimates of the Department of Munitions and Supply under eight items. I shall now place on Hansard a similar break-down, showing estimated expenditures for 1944-45, actual expenditures up to February 28, 1945; estimated expenditures up to March 31, 1945, and estimated expenditures for the period from April 1 to August 31, 1945:

Draft Estimated 1944-45, 1945-46

	Estimated requirements 1944-45	Expenditures to Feb. 28/45	Estimated expenditures to Mar. 31/45	Estimated requirements 1945-46 to Aug. 31/45
1. Additions and extensions to plants..	$ 60,000,000	$ 22,119,958	$ 27,319,958	$12,500,000
2. Cargo vessels—operated by Park Steamship Co. ....	75,000,000	130,805,489	132,805,489	12,500,000
3. Housing development.....	11,000,000	4,022,062	4,833,062	4,500,000
4. Miscellaneous property acquired....	3,000,000	2,650,033	3,150,833	2,000,000
5. Production subsidies and other miscellaneous war expenses.....	25,000,000	23,057,392	25,557,392	12,500,000
	$174,000,000	$182,655,734	$193,655,734	$44,000,000
6. Departmental administration.....	9,000,000	7,924,358	9,500,000	4,500,000
	$183,000,000	$190,580,092	$203,155,734	$48,500,000
7. Loans to commodity companies....
8. Revolving funds for working capital (recoverable advances).....		19,791,977 Cr.	21,000,000 Cr.
		135,939,326 Cr.	150,000,000 Cr.
Total funds administered.....	$183,000,000	$ 34,848,789	$ 32,155,734

While it is not possible to give final figures for the expenditures of the department up to the end of the fiscal year, the figures shown in the second and third columns are accurate enough to indicate that the department has stayed well within its estimates. I remind the committee, as I have done in other years, that the amount of the estimate for the Department of Munitions and Supply has no relation to the total sum of money to be expended by the department. The Department of Munitions and Supply is a procurement agency for the armed services of Canada and her allies, and the funds to finance the purchase of munitions and supplies are furnished by the requisitioning agency. The Department of Munitions and Supply furnishes the operating capital required in connection with the performance of contracts pending final settlement by the requisitioning agency. These moneys are, of course, recoverable advances. Our present position in this respect is shown in item 8, under the heading "Revolving Funds for Working Capital."

In making my report to the committee on the production programme in this the sixth year of the war, I should like to cite the following significant figures: The total commitment up to the end of 1944 by the Department of Munitions and Supply and its predecessors, the defence purchasing commission and the war supply board, is approximately $13,900,000,000. This figure includes, in addition to the total dollar value of production contracts placed, commitments for capital expenditures for production capacity, the value of orders placed abroad, defence construction and housing projects, and other miscellaneous items such as inspection costs. The total dollar value of production contracts awarded to the end of 1944 is $10,340,000,000. It may interest the committee to have a break-down by percentages of deliveries under these contracts as between Canada and her allies. This is as follows:

	Per cent
Canada .....	34
U.K. and other members of the British commonwealth.....	53
United States.....	12
Other members of the united nations.	1

In the early years of the war, we concentrated on meeting the requirements of our own forces. In recent years the trend shows a higher percentage of our output going each year to our allies. For example, in 1944 72 per cent of our production was for delivery to the armed forces of our allies. The figure will rise to 80 per cent in 1945.

The estimated total value of war production proper for the fiscal year 1944-45, excluding deliveries on orders placed abroad, defence construction projects and capital expenditures for production capacity, is $2,206,000,000, as compared with $2,499,000,000 for the fiscal year 1943-44. This shows a decrease in 1944-45 of approximately 293 million dollars, or 12 per cent. The committee will recall that in my report last June I forecast a decrease of approximately 7 per cent. This decrease is due in large measure to changes in military requirements, but increased efficiency of production is also a factor. We have made great strides in the past five years in the development of our industrial techniques. I am glad to be able to report to the Canadian taxpayer that efficiency of management and skilled labour is now being reflected in lower costs. May I pay tribute once more to the thousands of men and women in the munitions industry who are responsible for this achievement. The latest figures at hand show a total of 675,000 men and women employed on the manufacture of war equipment as of January 1, 1945. There has been a substantial decrease since January 1, 1944, but, despite this, there is every indication that our greatest labour shortage will occur in the next six months.

I have made a practice in previous years of tabling a statement showing capital expenditures on production capacity. I have had that statement revised to December 31, 1944, and I would ask that it be printed as a supplement to the Votes and Proceedings.

In previous reports to the committee I have attempted to sketch in broad outline the munitions programme for the ensuing twelve months' period, indicating as best I could the anticipated volume of production of individual items. Obviously, a forecast of this kind is difficult to make at this state of the European war. In the brief survey of the programme which I will submit to the committee, under the usual programme headings, I shall show the production for the calendar year 1944, the total production up to December 31, 1944, and the estimated production for 1945. I would ask the committee to remember, however, that except where items in a programme are for use in the Pacific war the estimates are subject to the revision which must be made when the war in Europe ends. As I stated recently, on the basis of the information now available we anticipate a cutback of not more than 35 per cent in our munitions programme with the cessation of hostilities in Europe.

Aircraft. In 1944 we produced 4,178 aircraft, as compared with 4,133 in 1943, for a total production to the end of 1944 of 14,696. Although the number of planes produced in 1944 is only slightly above that produced in 1943, the dollar value of production is approximately 10 per cent greater, because of the continuing emphasis on larger and more intricate types. I can best illustrate this difference by stating the production in terms of poundage. Our production in 1943 was 20,088,864 and in 1944, 27,892,414. In 1945 we expect to produce 2,261 aircraft, for a total poundage of about 21,300,000. It will be noted that our 1945 production in terms of units, while almost 50 per cent less than in 1944, is only approximately 25 per cent less in terms of poundage. The emphasis in 1945 will continue to be on front line service aircraft. During the year production at Victory Aircraft, the government-owned plant, will shift from the Lancaster to a larger type of 4-engine bomber. A new and improved model of the Mosquito bomber will also come into production. The production of the Curtis dive bomber will continue at the current rate. There also will be continued production of the Harvard, a secondary trainer, and the Norseman, which is now used as a transport craft. As announced last June, production of trainer types terminated in recent months, or will terminate shortly. We have been fortunate in obtaining substantial contracts for aircraft components from the United States for the manufacturing capacity released with the cessation of the trainer programme.

Ships. Cargo vessels. Up to the end of 1944 we had delivered 345 cargo vessels. 314 of these were 10,000 ton type and 31 were 4,700 tonners. The 1945 deliveries call for forty 10,000 tonners and twelve 4,700 tonners. Of our deliveries of 10,000 ton vessels up to the end of 1944, a number were equipped as stores issuing ships and as floating machine shops for the maintenance of naval escort vessels. The current programme also involves the production of these types. We have also recently placed contracts for thirty China Coasters of two types—350 tons and 1,350 tons, destined for war use in the Pacific ocean.

Naval vessels. In 1944 we delivered 123 naval escort vessels, for a total delivery since war began of 454. This figure comprises: 70 frigates, 122 single screw corvettes, 88 Fairmile patrol boats and 174 minesweepers. In addition to the escort vessel programme, we also have delivered 1,026 Minca barges, 1,612 ramped cargo lighters, 182 tugs, oil tankers and a wide variety of other smaller craft. Our programme for the production of frigates, single screw corvettes and Fairmiles was completed in 1944. During the current year we will deliver 52 transport ferries, 41 minesweepers, 73 tugs, and a number of smaller craft. We also expect to deliver two of the Tribal class destroyers which we have been building on the Atlantic coast.

Ammunition. During 1944 the output of gun ammunition was 30 million rounds. Although I advised the house last June that the gun ammunition programme would be curtailed, the invasion of Europe has resulted in a tremendous increase in requirements. We have had to revise our programmes accordingly. All of our capacity for gun ammunition is being employed at the highest possible rate. Current production is at the rate of six million rounds per quarter and two million additional cartridge cases, and we hope to increase this in the second quarter to seven million rounds and five million additional cartridge cases. In addition, we have very large orders for filled and empty components. The committee will perhaps appreciate the urgency of the demand for gun ammunition when I say that in terms of dollar value our production of this item will be higher during 1945 than in any previous year of the war.

Production of small arms ammunition declined from 1,500,000,000 rounds in 1943 to 1,200,000,000 rounds in 1944, for a total production to the end of 1944 of 4,200,000,000 rounds. Currently we are producing at the rate of 300,000,000 rounds per quarter.

Chemicals and explosives. Our total production of chemicals and explosives in 1944 was 1,350,000,000 pounds, for a total to December 31, 1944, of 3,350,000,000 pounds. During the past twelve months increased requirements for chemicals and explosives, due to the demand for ammunition, necessitated the reopening of plants which had been shut down and called for increased production from other plants where the output had been curtailed. Production of chemicals and explosives will continue at the present high rate so long as the demand for ammunition continues.

Guns. In 1944 we produced 16,100 barrels and forgings and 3,200 carriages and mountings, for a total production to the end of 1944 of 82,000 gun barrels and forgings and 27,200 carriages and mountings. Although the production of guns in 1944 amounted to only 50 per cent of our 1943 production, recent orders for barrels, forgings, and guns will maintain the 1945 production rate at approximately the 1944 level, in terms of dollar value. In terms of units, we expect to produce in 1945 24,000 barrels and forgings and 2,200 mountings and carriages.

In 1944 our production of small arms including machine guns, rifles, etc., was 530,000, for a total to the end of 1944 of 1,475,000 units. There will be a further decline in production in 1945, our latest forecast calling for an output of 250,000 units.

Armoured fighting vehicles, mechanical transport and railway equipment. The production of armoured fighting vehicles in 1944 was 14,200, for a total production to the end of 1944 of 45,700. While production of some types will terminate later this year, military developments during the past few months have resulted in additional requirements for some of the types now being manufactured and for other types not previously produced in Canada.

The production of mechanical transport declined from 173,000 units in 1943 to 147,000 units in 1944, for a total production to the end of 1944 of 700,000 vehicles. There was, however, an increase in the value of production in 1944, due to the manufacture of heavier types and because of the increased production of spare parts and trailers. We anticipate that the production of mechanical transport for military purposes during 1945 will be reduced by approximately 17 per cent as compared with 1944.

The production of railway equipment during 1944 was at a very high level, and this will be stepped up considerably during 1945. We produced 187 locomotives in 1944 and we are scheduled to produce 439 in 1945. The production of railway cars in 1944 was 8,948. This will be increased to 14,500 in 1945. A considerable part of this equipment will be for export.

Instruments and Communications. The production of instruments and communications equipment in 1944 was valued at $215,000,000, as compared with $165,000,000 in 1943. The total value of production to the end of 1944 was $480,000,000.

Construction projects. Defence, and other, construction projects undertaken by the department in 1944 were valued at $100,000,000, for a decline of 50 per cent as compared with 1943. The total value of construction projects, including housing, undertaken by the department since the beginning of the war is $745,000,000. A further sharp reduction in defence building will occur in 1945, when we estimate that the expenditure will be approximately $35,000,000.

General purchasing. Total purchases of personal equipment, foodstuffs, fuel, hardware and miscellaneous stores amounted to $3,405,000,000 as at December 31, 1944. The total value of such purchases made in 1944 was $417,000,000. This shows a decline from the previous year, and it is estimated that there will be a corresponding decline in 1945.

Controls. The control of strategic materials continues to be an important function of the Department of Munitions and Supply. In every case where it has been essential to war production, we have controlled the production and distribution of materials. Similarly when a particular material moves into easy supply due to a falling off in the requirements of the war programme, we abolish, or at least relax, the restrictions. Since I last reported to the house on the activities of the wartime industries control board some changes in administration have been made. In March, 1944, the wood fuel control amalgamated with timber control, and in December, 1944, the machine tools control was formally disbanded.

Mr. MacNICOL: Did the minister say that machine tool control was formally disbanded?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: No more control over machine tools?

Mr. HOWE: No; you can buy all you like.

I will now review briefly the supply position with respect to each of the materials under control:

Chemicals control. Late in 1944, because of the falling off of requirements of ammunition, it was possible to relax a number of control orders. The increased requirements of ammunition to which I have made reference earlier has affected the supply position, and, for the present at least, we have had to postpone further relaxation of regulations.

The production of sulphuric acid, soda ash, chlorine and caustic soda, is being maintained at peak levels. Due to war requirements, it has not been possible to increase the production of ethylene glycol anti-freeze, which means that the supply available for civilian use has had to be severely rationed. The supply of white pigments, chromic acid and chrome pigments has become critical, and these items are being kept under careful control. As already announced in the press, pencillin is now being made available through commercial channels. The supply from our own production at the present date is adequate to meet military requirements and a substantial quantity is also being made available for civilian use.

Coal control. I cannot stress too greatly the gravity of our position with respect to coal. Consumption of coal in Canada during the calendar year 1944 was approximately 45 million tons, compared with a pre-war consumption of about 26 million tons. Of this amount we have had to import 29 million tons. Reduction of output from our own mines in the maritimes and decreased imports from the United States, have created a short supply position in both commercial, and household, fuels affecting that part of Canada from the Atlantic coast to the head of the lakes. Fortunately, we have been able to substitute coke for anthracite coal, and to solve, to a degree, the heating problem of the householder. To add to the problems created by short supply, we have had transportation difficulties, and severe man-power shortages among the distributors. We have tried to meet these various problems by regulating both the quantities and the types that may be delivered to each householder. I think I can say that these control measures have prevented any cases of hardship. Fortunately, the situation west of the head of the lakes has not been so acute. Local mines which supply the bulk of the coal consumed in that area have been able to meet all needs. The continued reduced output from our eastern mines and the probability that our imports from the United States will suffer a further reduction indicate that the heating season of 1945-46 will present problems just as acute, if not more so, than those of this year.

Oil control. As I have pointed out to the house on previous occasions, we produce less than fifteen per cent of our own requirements of the crude from which all our petroleum products are refined. This means that the balance of our requirements must be drawn from the pool which supplies the demands of the fighting forces, together with the civilian needs of our allies. Similarly, the tanker fleet which brings crude to Halifax, to Portland for the Montreal pipe line, and to Vancouver, is the same fleet which must maintain the supply lines to the theatres of war. There is no type of armament on land, in the sea or in the air which does not require the use of some petroleum product. When one considers the magnitude and the intensity of allied military operations in Europe and in the Pacific and the distances involved, the difficulties of the supply problem become obvious. A single bombing raid over Germany may consume as much as 1,500,000 gallons of aviation gasoline. Confronted with these facts, we can all appreciate why gasoline rationing is still with us and why it will continue at its present level at least until the end of the war in Europe. Through our conservation measures, we have been able to meet all of our war and essential requirements of aviation and motor gasoline, fuel oil, lubricants, and other petroleum products.

Rubber control. I pointed out to the house in my last report that production from the government-owned synthetic rubber plant had come in just in time to offset the rapidly dwindling supply of crude rubber. During the past year the plant has reached capacity operation, and is now producing the highest grade of buna-S and butyl rubbers, at a cost which compares favourably with that of any other synthetic rubber plant on the continent. Production is sufficient to meet all of our war and essential civilian rubber requirements, but the continued high level of war requirements does not enable us to meet the full civilian demand, so that we must still ration tires. Our objective has been to supply tires to all trucks and passenger cars in essential services. I am glad to say that we were able to increase the number of passenger tires made available during 1944, as compared with 1943.

Metals control. During 1944, Canada's production of non-ferrous metals was of such volume that we were able to supply our own war and essential requirements and to contribute large supplies to meet the needs of our allies. In addition to exporting refined metals, we also exported large tonnages of concentrates. During the latter half of 1944 there was a substantial decrease in the war demands for some of the major non-ferrous metals. This enabled us to relax restrictions on the use of these metals, but during the past few months there has been an increase in requirements, especially for aluminum, lead, copper, zinc and molybdenum. As an example of this change in the supply position, I might cite the case of aluminum. Some months ago requirements for aluminum fell off drastically, requiring a major cut-back in production at Arvida. A few weeks ago, we were notified of large requirements for the United States, which will have the effect of bringing production back to near capacity for some months to come.

Even with our increased domestic requirements, we shall also be able to supply large tonnages of non-ferrous metals to the United States, the United Kingdom, Russia, and other members of the united nations during 1945.

Steel control. Our production of steel for the calendar year 1944, in mill form, was 2,494,353 net tons. Our total consumption was 3,330,886 net tons, which meant that we had to import approximately twenty-five per cent of our total consumption.

During the early part of 1944 the supply position of steel, with the exception of sheet and rods, was comparatively easy. We thus were able to allow a greater distribution of steel for civilian uses. In recent months the supply position has changed, and at the present time steel in almost all forms is in as short supply as at any time since the war began. This situation will prevail at least until the end of the war in Europe. This is especially so of sheet, which is the form of steel in largest demand for the manufacture of household articles. It is anticipated that, with the end of the war in Europe the steel situation will be greatly eased, and a larger supply will become available for civilian use.

Mr. MacNICOL: What about steel plate?

Mr. HOWE: The plate is not as bad as the sheet. We have a very large plate capacity in Canada, and we have been able to keep up with the demand without importing, but we have had to import very heavily in sheet.

Motor vehicles control. The demand for military vehicles of all types and replacement parts to maintain equipment in the field, continues at a very high rate, so that it has been possible to produce only a limited number of trucks for civilian use. Despite the fact that there was some increase in the number of trucks produced in 1944, the current supply is still far short of the demand. Canada is dependent on the United States for her supply of heavy-duty trucks, and as military requirements in that country have also continued at a high level, the current quota of imports, which has been fixed by the war production board, is considerably below the demand. As no passenger cars have been produced in Canada since April, 1942, and as the resumption of the production of passenger cars cannot be undertaken for some months after the cessation of hostilities in Europe, I would impress upon all car owners the very great need of maintaining their cars in good condition. There is a very limited number of passenger cars available for distribution but these are being distributed only to essential users. Fortunately, we have been able to maintain a fairly good supply of parts for the repair of both passenger cars and trucks.

Timber control. Due to the availability of additional labour, the production of timber in 1944 increased by about 100 million feet over the previous year. There was also an increase of approximately 850,000 cords in the production of pulpwood. Lumber production for 1944 was approximately 4,725,000,000 feet. This has been distributed as follows: 2,750,000,000 feet for home consumption and 1,945,000,000 feet for export for war uses. Production for 1945 is estimated at 4,850,000,000 feet. Of this amount we expect that 2,840,000,000 feet will be available for military and civilian uses in Canada. I think it significant that this represents about 154 per cent of the quantity which was used in Canada in 1939. As I mentioned above, wood fuel control came under the direction of timber control during the past year. Due to the various measures taken to stimulate production, I am glad to be able to report that adequate supplies of fuelwood have been made available in every part of Canada.

Construction control. Since its inception, construction control has had but one aim—the conservation for war and essential uses of building materials, especially lumber and steel. While requirements of building materials for defence projects have fallen off, the demand for materials for projects such as military hospitals and institutional buildings related to the rehabilitation programme, has increased. This, combined with the man-power shortage in many districts in Canada and the continuing shortage of steel and lumber, has made it imperative that we continue strict control of the licensing of construction projects. In determining the priorities for building permits, we have tried to take account of urgent housing needs.

I point out, as I did last year, that we are building up a tremendous backlog of building projects for the day when labour and building materials are available. This backlog will be of great value in the reconstruction period. In the meantime, I appeal for the continued co-operation of the public in our efforts to conserve building materials.

Ship repair and salvage control. We are maintaining repair facilities for the ships of our own navy, and our merchant fleet, and at the same time are providing repair services for merchant vessels of the United Kingdom, Russia, and other members of the united nations. From January, 1940, up to the end of February, 1945, over 32,000 vessels had been drydocked and repaired in Canadian ports.

Transit control. Some indication of the nature of the problem imposed on our passenger transit facilities may be gleaned by a comparison of the total passengers carried in 1938, with the number of passengers carried in 1944. The figure for city passenger services rose from 625 million in 1938 to one billion 404 million in 1944, and on interurban bus services, rose from 16.6 million in 1939 to 73.4 million in 1944. The continued operation of the staggered-hour system has made this increase possible without any severe dislocation of our transit systems. The wartime industrial transit plan reached its maximum level of effectiveness over a year ago, but there are still approximately 50,000 cars carrying 200,000 workers daily to and from work. While some relaxation of restrictions on interurban bus services has been possible, the continued shortage of gasoline and rubber will still require the control of taxi and trucking services.

Power control. Because of an improvement in the electric power supply, the power controller, in October, 1944, rescinded the control order, prohibiting the use of electricity for certain non-essential purposes in areas designated by the controller as power shortage areas. The power controller has also rescinded all orders designed to conserve electricity by limiting its use.

In recent years, there has been a serious reduction in the output of natural gas systems of Ontario. However, up to January 1, 1945, the deficiency between the available supply of gas from all sources, and the demands imposed by war industries and essential civilian services was met by the new output from the coke oven gas plant built by the government in Hamilton, the still gas plant built by the Union Gas company in Sarnia, and the use of propane, imported in tank cars from the United States.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has the minister figures pertaining to gas?

Mr. HOWE: I shall give them later.

In Alberta the gas situation is satisfactory, and in British Columbia, while the supply of other fuels is reasonably satisfactory, there is not sufficient reserve gas capacity.

Priorities branch. The priorities branch continues to operate as a liaison between Canadian industry and the priority authority of the war production board of the United States. In recent months, the branch has also become responsible for handling applications for the importation of industrial machinery from the United Kingdom, for post-war uses in Canada.

In conclusion, I can inform hon. members that Canada's war production machine is now operating at its highest efficiency. During the fiscal year 1943-44, war production from Canada's manufacturing industries had a cost value of $2,500 million. In July, 1943, employment in manufacturing industries for war work totalled 848,000 men and women. Since then, there has been a steady withdrawal of men from the war industries to the armed services and to civilian work, with the result that to-day the manufacturing industries are employing on war work only about 675,000 men and women. Due to increased efficiency, there has been only a slight drop in the value of our war production, which for 1944-45 had a cost value of over $2,200 million. Our manufacturing industries are now operating at peak production, consistent with available man-power, and this level of production will continue, at least until the end of the war in Europe. After that, the war with Japan will demand a large percentage of the output of our manufacturing industries. Any capacity not required for war will be converted immediately to civilian production.

The strength of Canada's productive industries in time of war has astonished the world, and must be a source of pride to every man and woman who has had a part in war production. I consider it a privilege to have been associated with men and women so conscious of their responsibilities and so diligent in carrying out their daily tasks. It has been a grand association, and a grand accomplishment.

Mr. STIRLING: It seems to me evident that in certain directions reduction has already commenced in the minister's department, both in staff, and in volume of work to be carried out. Can the minister foretell how those reductions are likely to proceed in the five months for which he is asking the committee to vote money? It is evident that in such directions as the erection of buildings for government purposes there have been considerable drops. How far does the minister expect that reduction to go in the near future?

Mr. HOWE: I have attempted to give a forecast in each branch. I think if the hon. member will check over my remarks in Hansard he will find I have given the best forecast we could as to those reductions. For instance, I have mentioned guns, and I have given the number produced in 1944, the estimated number up to April, 1945, and the forecasts for the five months following April, 1945. Those are the five months for which we are now asking an appropriation, and figures will be found for those five months in my statement. The uncertainty, of course, is the date of the ending of the war in Europe. There will be a cut-back, but not the cut-back that could reasonably be expected, considering the fact that all our armed forces are fighting on the European front.

Mr. STIRLING: Evidently I have not made myself clear. In each case I notice he forecasts reductions in the coming months. I was thinking more from the point of view of personnel employed by the department. As that reduction takes place the personnel affected will seek other employment. I am wondering to what extent the minister expects them to return to civilian employment, or to what extent he considers it possible for them to find other government employment.

Mr. HOWE: I have no doubt whatever that the balance of this year will see a very tight manpower situation. It is so extremely tight at the present time that we cannot do many of the urgent things we should like to do. For instance, in the building trade there is no such thing as ordinary labour. That has disappeared completely. In the skilled trades it is still scarce. There is not a foundry in the country that has a sufficient complement of men. That condition is holding back reconversion.

We must have manpower to convert, and the manpower can be obtained only as it is released from war employment. There seems to be a fetish in the minds of the opposition to forecast a great labour surplus. I wish I could be convinced that there would be a sufficiency.

Mr. STIRLING: I am wondering where they will go?

Mr. HOWE: I can assure the hon. member there will be enough places to go to. I only wish I could be sure there would be sufficient manpower to do the essential things that I feel should be done before the end of the year 1945. I am afraid we shall not be able to do the things we should do.

It takes manpower to create work. We cannot start many civilian operations to-day to do the things we should like to do because we cannot get the men to do it. If we could start them it would make for a much more rapid reconversion in the succeeding years. But I know my hon. friend has sufficient knowledge of production operations to realize that you must lay a foundation before you can build. But we are short of man-power to-day to lay the foundation for civilian reconversion that we should be laying at this time.

Mr. SENN: Perhaps I am mistaken, but I listened carefully to the minister and I did not hear him make an explanation respecting the supply of farm implements. He spoke about priorities and about industrial machinery, but not about farm machinery and tractors. Would he supply that information to-morrow?

Mr. HOWE: The reason is that farm implements are civilian supply; they are not war supply. Farm implements are regulated by the wartime prices and trade board. However, if the hon. member wishes, I could give some information about the matter to-morrow. It would come more properly under the estimates of the Minister of Finance. Tractors, of course, are not made in this country.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Before the committee rises, the Minister of National Defence for Air wishes to make a brief statement respecting a question asked earlier to-night.

Mr. GIBSON: When the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence was before the committee the hon. member for Temiscouata asked several questions respecting the Department of National Defence for Air. I was not in the house at the time and I should like to make replies to the questions that he asked. His first question was:

Did Air Marshal Leckie have a plane made over for his personal use?

The answer is, no. A service aeroplane in the communications squadron has been modified for passenger use. This plane is usually used by the C.A.S. on official visits, but is available also for other purposes. His next question was:

If so, what was the cost?

The answer is, the cost of the modification is unknown. It was done by the men in the communications squadron, mainly in their spare time, in station workshops.

His next question was:

Is the said plane used only for official business?

The answer is, yes. The next question was: If not, why?

The answer is: Not applicable.

His next question was:

Did the said air marshal, his wife and some friends go on at least one pleasure trip in the said plane?

The answer to that is, no. But Mrs. Leckie has on several occasions accompanied the air marshal on service trips in this plane in her official capacity as president of the women's auxiliary; once to Washington to discuss with Mrs. Arnold the organization of the women's auxiliary services in the United States army air corps.

His next question was:

Was the plane damaged on one of the said pleasure trips, and, if so, what was the cost?

The answer to that is: No damage was sustained by this plane at any time.

He next asked:

How much gasoline has been used on these pleasure trips and what was the cost of such trips to the taxpayers of the country?

The answer is: Not applicable.

His last question was:

[Mr. Howe.]

How much gasoline was diverted from urgent war purposes?

The answer is: Not applicable.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre) the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Wednesday, April 11, 1945.

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. ABBOTT

REFERENCE TO EDITORIAL IN TORONTO "GLOBE AND MAIL" OF APRIL 11

Mr. D. C. ABBOTT (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I rise for the first time on a question of privilege, arising out of an editorial which appeared in this morning's Globe and Mail, and which is headed "Worst Fraud Still to Come?" The first paragraph reads as follows:

If the figures on conscript reinforcements which Mr. Douglas Abbott, parliamentary assistant to defence minister McNaughton, gave the commons on Monday mean what they seem to mean, the worst of the man-power frauds has still to be faced. In his first report on the reinforcement policy last week Mr. Abbott produced some flattering statistics. The net result was to show that overseas reinforcements for the Canadian forces were 75 per cent above the estimates struck last fall.

I will not weary the house with the whole editorial. A number of figures follow; and the second paragraph concludes as follows:

But on Monday, in answer to questions, Mr. Abbott disclosed that only 238 of those 11,836 draftees had gone to the front. He was unable to say how many of these were "converts" or belated volunteers.

I pause there to say that I stated in the house yesterday afternoon that, of the 238, 237 were not "converts"; and I might suggest to the editorial department of the Globe and Mail that if they would consult with their parliamentary correspondent they might be able to give more up-to-date information.

The editorial continues with a lot more supposed analysis of statistics, and the second last paragraph concludes with this sentence:

And it gives a great deal of support to the evidence that the only draftees to reach the battle areas are those who converted.

The editorial finally concludes:

All that has happened is that 11,836 draftees (less 283 converts) have had a change of residence—from Canada to the United Kingdom. They are being treated as "zombies" there as they are here.

That statement is completely incorrect. The N.R.M.A. men who are sent over are placed in reinforcement units in the United Kingdom, and they are treated exactly the same as other soldiers, general service soldiers. The statement of policy was that there would be no discrimination against them. On arrival in the United Kingdom they take their place in what is colloquially known as "the queue", the line of reinforcements. They first undergo tests as to their standards of training, including some additional weapon training which is restricted in Canada on account of the limited supplies of certain types of ammunition, and undergo hardening training; and when they reach the stipulated standards of fitness and training they are held in readiness to send to any theatre as required to maintain that theatre fully. That procedure is followed in the case of these N.R.M.A. men as it is with general service men. There is no reason why they should be sent to the theatres ahead of general service men; they go in their ordinary turn.

I have referred to the 238 who had gone to the end of February. I have cabled to England for the latest figures; I have no doubt they will show that some additional ones have gone; and, knowing how anxious the Globe and Mail is to get before the people of this country the true facts with respect to our overseas forces, I feel that I should make this explanation.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is an uncalled-for reflection on a great newspaper.

DURATION OF PARLIAMENT

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the house for the discussion of a matter of urgent public importance. My motion is as follows:

Whereas section 50 of the British North America Act, 1867, is enacted as follows:

"50. Every House of Commons shall continue for five years from the day of the return of the writs for choosing the house (subject to be sooner dissolved by the Governor General), and no longer."

Whereas the return of the last writ for the last general election was on April 17, 1940;

Whereas the term of existence of this nineteenth parliament will expire on that date;

Whereas, during the first fifteen days of the sixth session of this nineteenth parliament, this house has considered only supplementary estimates for the last fiscal year and appropriations for the three war departments;

Whereas all the appropriations of the other departments and the civil estimates have not yet been considered by the house;

Whereas the British North America Act, 1867, was passed by the imperial parliament, and whereas it has been the practice of this parliament to seek amendments passed by the imperial parliament to acts passed by the imperial parliament;

Whereas the Houses of Parliament at Westminster will adjourn to-morrow until next Monday, April the 16th, for a long week-end;

Whereas to-day is the last day when this parliament could make an application for an extension of parliament to give to this house the opportunity to consider in full the war appropriations as well as the civil estimates for the current fiscal year;

Whereas in these serious and critical times this country cannot afford to be without parliament being available at a moment's call to meet any emergency;

Mr. Pouliot moves that this house shall adjourn to discuss a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the extension of the term of this nineteenth parliament to afford it the time and opportunity to consider the war appropriations and the civil estimates for the current year, which amount to billions of dollars.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member was good enough to let me have a copy of his motion before I came to the house, and therefore I had an opportunity to study it carefully.

I must point out that the form of the motion is not in accordance with the practice and usage of this house. It has taken almost the form of a petition and contains references which should be the basis of an argument.

I do not propose to deal with the motion on this ground which might seem to be technical, but I think it would be well that all hon. members of the house should state simply the motion to adjourn for the purpose of discussing a matter of urgent public importance and in effect give as reason that which is contained in the conclusion of the present motion.

On Monday last a motion for the same purpose was moved by the same hon. gentleman, the member for Témiscouata. I dealt with it then simply on the question of urgency as required by the standing order. I came to the conclusion that there was no urgency in the sense directed by our standing order and therefore ruled it out of order.

The present motion is different in form but the conclusion is in effect the same as that moved on Monday last by the hon. gentleman.

I think the meaning of our standing order has been very well expressed in a statement made by the Speaker of the United Kingdom house which will be found on page 78 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, citation No. 180:

Standing order 10 of the United Kingdom house, in force since 1882, also provides that a member may propose the adjournment of the house "for the purpose of discussing a matter of urgent public importance." On the 13th of April, 1894, a member asked leave to make that motion to discuss "the neglect of the government to take measures for the relief of agricultural depression during the present session." As forty members rose in support of the motion, debate was allowed, but on its conclusion, the speaker said: "I do not think that, under the standing order of 1882, a motion on a subject of this kind, having such a very wide scope, was ever contemplated. What I think was contemplated, was an occurrence of some sudden emergency, either in home or in foreign affairs. But I do not think it was contemplated—if the house will allow me to state my views—that a question of very wide scope, which would demand legislation to deal with it in any effective manner, should be the subject of discussion on a motion for the adjournment of the house, because, if that was so, we might have repeated motions made by the opposition of the day, not so much in the direction of censuring the government for action which had been taken or not taken, for bringing to notice some grievance demanding instant remedy, as in the direction of wishing to introduce legislation on some particular subject. That is not the purpose of the standing order of 1882, and would, I think, cut at the root of the order."

I have no desire and it would be improper for me to deal with the merits or demerits of the proposal contained in the motion. I think I may be permitted to point out to the house that this motion, if adopted by the house, would subsequently have to take the form of a joint resolution of both houses to be transmitted to the United Kingdom parliament. If the statement made in the motion is correct, namely "Whereas the houses of parliament at Westminster will adjourn to-morrow until next Monday, April the 16th, for a long week-end," the question of time would be a very material factor.

It is however my function to deal with this motion only on the ground of the requirements of our standing order, which is in its effect and almost in its words the same as the standing order of the United Kingdom parliament covering such motions, and in view of the statement made by the Speaker of that house, which I have read and in which I concur, I do not think that the present motion comes within the scope of standing order No. 31, and I therefore rule that the motion is not in order because of the lack of urgency.

[Mr. Speaker.]

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

DEFENCE INDUSTRIES LIMITED—PARRY SOUND

Mr. NOSEWORTHY:

1. Are there any conditions of disposal contained in the government agreement with Defence Industries Limited of Parry Sound other than those contained in answer to question given on page 297 of Hansard for March 28, 1945?
2. What are the conditions of disposal in the event of the plant not being sold to Defence Industries or any other purchaser?
3. What, if any, are the restrictions regarding the use of that plant in the event of its sale to any party other than D.I.L.?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. No.
2. None.
3. There are no restrictions on the use of the plant unless the purchaser proposes to manufacture explosives using the processes owned by Defence Industries Limited. If the purchaser proposes to use the processes owned by Defence Industries Limited, he is obliged to obtain a licence to use such processes. The terms of this licence are to be arranged by agreement between Defence Industries Limited and the purchaser, and failing agreement, the terms will be fixed by the commissioner of patents.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD—STAFF—WAGE CONDITIONS

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. What rate of wages does the national film board pay, (a) messenger boys; (b) picture framers?
2. By what scale, or on what basis, are wages paid by the national film board determined?
3. Is any individual responsible for determining the above wages? If so, what is the position of such individual?
4. What provision is made for increases?
5. Is the matter of a worker's dependents considered in determining national film board wages?

Mr. LaFLECHE:

1. (a) Messenger boys are paid $60 per month; (b) None employed.
2. Civil Service Commission rates of wages are the standard.
3. The Civil Service Commission ordinarily, and the government film commissioner when he acts under the authority of the National Film Act, section 12 (1).
4. Salaries are surveyed periodically to determine whether increases are to be recommended.
5. The wage rate is paid according to the job performed.

HOUSING—AGREEMENTS WITH MUNICIPALITIES, ETC.

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. How many limited dividend corporations have been formed in accordance with the National Housing Act, 1944?

2. Have any agreements with municipalities been entered into in accordance with the National Housing Act, 1944, and, if so, with what municipalities?

3. Have any grants for research purposes been made in accordance with the National Housing Act, 1944, and, if so, in what amounts?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1 and 2. All parts of the National Housing Act except part IV, which relates to home improvement and home extension loans, were proclaimed on January 18, 1945. At that time the Minister of Finance made a public announcement as follows:

"In bringing the National Housing Act into effect, the government also clears the way for the construction of low rental housing projects by limited dividend companies, financed to the extent of 90 per cent by the dominion government, for direct investment by life insurance companies in low cost or moderate cost rental housing projects, for grants by the dominion to the municipalities to assist in slum clearance and for special research projects and community planning. In the main, these are post-war projects . . .".

The limited supplies of materials and labour now available for housing purposes are being used by Wartime Housing Limited mainly to provide accommodation in certain congested areas for dependents of those in the armed forces and returning veterans, by the director of the Veterans' Land Act, by the National Housing Administration for house conversions, and for the construction of houses and apartments in the moderate and lower price ranges.

There have been numerous inquiries and preliminary discussions with respect to the formation of limited dividend corporations and to grants to municipalities for slum clearance, but in no case have negotiations been completed and it is obvious that the number of projects that can be proceeded with immediately is limited by the available supply of labour and materials.

3. No.

ST. LAWRENCE ICE-BREAKERS

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. On what date, in 1939, 1940, 1941, 1942, 1943 and 1944, did government ice-breakers begin their operations in the St. Lawrence?

2. On what date, in each of the said years, did they reach Montreal?

3. On what date did they begin their operations in 1945, and when did they reach the port of Montreal?

4. Did riparian owners on the St. Lawrence suffer any damage when the ice broke this spring?

5. Has the government investigated into this matter?

6. If so, what was the result of such investigation?

7. If not, will the government institute an investigation so as to define liability in the case of damage sustained by St. Lawrence riparian owners?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. To open the channel from Three Rivers to Montreal, ice-breaking operations began: 1939, March 6; 1940, February 26; 1941, February 25; 1942, February 18; 1943, February 12; 1944, February 20.

2. 1939, April 4; 1940, March 22; 1941, March 29; 1942, March 23; 1943, April 8; 1944, March 23.

3. 1945. Began at Three Rivers March 1; reached Montreal March 29.

4. No information.

5. No.

6. See answer to No. 5.

7. No. The government accepts no liability for conditions resulting from weather conditions.

WATERVILLE, N.S., EMERGENCY LANDING FIELD

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

1. What is the total cost of property secured for the emergency landing field at Waterville, Nova Scotia?

2. What are the names and addresses of the persons from whom such property was purchased, stating the acreage secured and the amount paid for each property or asked for same?

3. Have final payments been made, and, if not, what claims are outstanding?

4. What have been the costs of improvements and to whom have payments been made?

5. What are the estimated costs to complete?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. $27,990.

2. See statement hereto attached.

3. All payments have been made.

4. Payments made to various small suppliers and for work done by departmental forces

.....	$ 9,172 91
Payments to Municipal Spraying and Contracting Company for field development	.....	$145,400 78

DEPARTMENT OF RECONSTRUCTION—HOUSING

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Has the civil service commission established the position of director of housing, or some similar position, in the department of reconstruction?

2. What housing activities, or authority, has been vested in the department of reconstruction?

3. What position, if any, has J. M. Pigott held, or does he now hold, with the department of reconstruction?

Mr. CHEVRIER: A position was established by the Civil Service Commission of Director General of Housing Development, Department of Reconstruction, and Mr. J. M. Pigott, by order in council P.C. 114/9151, dated December 6, 1944, was appointed to fill that position at no salary. Mr. Pigott, however, has never acted in this capacity and the order in council will be rescinded.

By agreement with the Minister of Finance, direct responsibility for housing will remain with his department. Activities of the Department of Reconstruction will be confined to assisting the finance department and by stimulating housing construction.

Mr. Pigott is unpaid President of Wartime Housing Limited, a crown company responsible for building temporary housing for war workers. Wartime Housing Limited is, of course, at the service of other departments of government to meet emergent situations.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

EDMONTON AIRCRAFT REPAIR PLANT

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. What disposition is to be made of the aircraft repair plant at Edmonton, Alberta?

2. Is there an optional purchase or other contract covering this plant? If so, what are the terms?

3. Could not this plant be used for the retraining of discharged service men?

WHITEHORSE RADIO STATION

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

Will the government of Canada acquire the radio broadcasting station established at Whitehorse, Yukon, by the American army, when that army withdraws from Yukon?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

RADIO BROADCASTING—FRENCH LANGUAGE STATIONS

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

For a copy of all correspondence and other documents that have passed between May, 1944, and date hereof, between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation or any official thereof and the Minister of National War Services, referring to or connected with, the application or applications that have been made for the establishment of French-language radio stations at St. Boniface, Manitoba; Prince Albert, Saskatchewan; Gravelbourg, Saskatchewan, and Edmonton, Alberta.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

EXPEDITING THE WORK OF THE SESSION—

SUGGESTED MORNING SITTINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I wonder if I might make a brief statement with respect to the business of the house. This is perhaps a more appropriate time than on motions.

During the discussion prior to orders of the day on Monday, the Prime Minister indicated eagerness to have the present session cease its activities as soon as possible. To that proposal I attempted to place before parliament the unfair position in which the government's failure to call parliament at the proper time had placed the official opposition and other hon. members in the house who desire an orderly and regular conduct of the nation's business in time of war. I indicated at the time that the proposal of the Prime Minister would be considered by my followers and myself and that in due course we would make known our decision in the light of what we thought was in the national interest.

There is little real justification actually, in the light of what has taken place since last January, for asking parliament to pull in its belt a notch and prematurely cut off discussion. The failure of the government to call parliament when it should have been called last January lies at the bottom of the whole problem. The language and tone of the Prime Minister's remarks on Monday are said to have been construed by some as meaning that he might adjourn, prorogue or dissolve the house before the war appropriations and civil supply bills are through. In that connection I desire to point out that this party is plainly on record in this debate, that so far as we are concerned the war appropriation bill and the supply bill must be passed. I can scarcely believe that the Prime Minister would by adjournment, prorogation or dissolution, do anything to prevent the passage of his own government's war appropriation bill or the legislation respecting supply while there is still time to pass them. It would be a national catastrophe for either the government to decide or any other group to prevent the voting of the money needed to carry on the war and the civil government. We caution the government or any other group against incurring that heavy responsibility; if they do, it will be theirs alone. We are therefore prepared, Mr. Speaker, to sit in morning sessions from now on, and on Saturday of this week if necessary in order to clear up the order paper and to make it possible to obtain royal assent to all of the legislation before the end of the week. We feel that this offer of practical cooperation will meet with a similar cooperative response from the Prime Minister and the government.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I say just a word to my hon. friend. I was naturally pleased to hear him say that his party did not intend to prevent supply from being voted or the necessary appropriations made for the conduct of the war. He said that he was making the statement he has just made because my remarks of a day or two ago, on Monday, I think it was, were being construed as meaning that I might possibly have parliament dissolved before the effluxion of time by the constitution. May I relieve my hon. friend's mind immediately about any summary dissolution of parliament. If the business of parliament is not concluded before midnight on Monday of next week, this parliament will be dissolved because it has run the full limit of its time. I have at no time had any thought or intention of recommending dissolution with a view of shutting off discussion in the house. As a matter of fact hon. members well know that the sole reason the government has continued up to the last, or almost the last day of the term of parliament before going to the people, has been our desire to avoid a general election while the war was still in progress. This government would have gone to the people a year or more ago had we been considering our immediate political fortunes rather than what was owing to the men who are fighting Canada's battles at the front.

When Monday night comes I will have the satisfaction at midnight of realizing that I have been faithful to the mandate received from the day on which the people of Canada charged this government as a Liberal government with the duty of carrying on Canada's war effort. Hon. members will recall that there was before the country at the time of the last general elections not merely the Liberal party, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and the Social Credit party, but also a party known as a National Government party, which was the Conservative party under another name. The National Government party was defeated at the polls and the Liberal party was returned, while the war was on, by an overwhelming majority. I have felt that the people having themselves stated that they did not wish to have a national government, but wished to have a Liberal government direct the conduct of the war, it was a trust given to us which we should carry out, and my colleagues and I have acted accordingly. As I say, I shall be very happy indeed when Monday night comes to realize that during all the difficulties of this period of the war we have maintained that trust, and that at no time in the whole period have we done other than seek to make the war effort of Canada as effective as it could possibly be made. We have not failed to ask the house for any appropriations that we believed the navy, the army or the air force required, or for what was needed by the forces in the way of munitions and supplies, food and the like. We have not hesitated to ask this parliament to grant what was necessary and I am happy to say that parliament has given us its support to that end.

What has been done in the prosecution of the war, as I have said over and over again, has been done by the people of Canada themselves with the government acting as their agent in carrying out what it believed to be the wishes of the people. During the last two years, when my own party had thought it advisable that we should not be confronted with obstacles at the last minute, or that we should not wait longer than some other governments of the commonwealth have waited before appealing to the people, I could see the political advantage that might be gained in having an election, but I took the position very firmly that, while the men were fighting at the front, we should not, if it was possible to avoid it, have an election brought on at a time when they would not be free to discuss the issues with as much calm and regard for their own future as was desirable. This was the case, for example, at the time when we adjourned last August and could have immediately presented our programme of social reform to the people.

There have been other occasions when an election might have been politically advantageous, occasions that are well known to all hon. members of the house, but I have said, no, each time with only one limitation, which was that I would not ask parliament to deprive the people of the rights which they have under the constitution of saying what government was to carry on in Canada for the next five years. I said repeatedly I would not ask for an extension of the time of parliament and thereby deprive the people of their right to say whom they wished to have administer the country's affairs over the next five years. I have been true to that trust. I have held, as I say, firmly to the position that if we reached the time when the five years were up, we would go to the people as soon thereafter as possible. And that position has been maintained. Happily we have now come to the time when I believe we can say, in the words of the Commander-in-Chief, General Eisenhower, that German resistance has been crushed on the western front. I do not think it will be very long before German resistance on the eastern front and throughout the whole of Germany will be effectively ended. Therefore there is strong reason to believe that what we have tried our utmost to secure to Canada's fighting men will be secured to them, namely, that they will have achieved victory before they are obliged to consider the issues of a general election.

No one can say the war may not run a little bit longer than some at the moment anticipate. I shall be very greatly surprised if, before the San Francisco conference is concluded, as I said in a recent broadcast, the war in Europe will not have been officially declared to have been brought to a victorious close. We shall then have achieved what has been one of the great purposes of this administration, namely, to carry through Canada's part in this great war along the line of a total effort and that right up to the last hour afforded us by the constitution so to do. By delaying an appeal to the people until it was required by the constitution, we have secured to our fighting men like opportunities to those which other citizens of Canada will have of studying the questions that will be of most importance to their future. Therefore my hon. friend or any other member of the house need not be in the least concerned about the intention of the government to dissolve this parliament prior to the time at which the constitution makes it necessary unless the house itself should decide to get through with its business before that time.

Now I come to the question as to whether parliament should have been called earlier. Parliament has had five full sessions. It was adjourned early last December, and hon. members expected to meet again on January 31. When parliament adjourned on December 7 I said to my colleagues that, while we could not be sure when the war would end, obviously it was desirable for us to have a general election before the victory loan campaign came on, if the war ended or the decisive battles had been fought soon enough that we could feel that we were taking no chances that the men at the front would not have the opportunities I have just mentioned. Had the decisive battles been fought in the month of December, as was expected by many, or in January or February, as others thought, this house would have been dissolved at that time and the election campaign would have been concluding at about this time. I canvassed the situation carefully with the national war finance committee, to ascertain if they could not move back a little the date of the seventh victory loan to enable us to await somewhat longer the outcome in Europe before dissolving, if we were to have the election before the victory loan campaign took place. But I was told that it might prejudice the loan very greatly if any change were made in what had come to be the customary date. Reasons were given to me which I thought were sound, and, in those circumstances, naturally the government felt that it was our duty to the war effort of the country that no steps should be taken by us which would prejudice that all-important aspect of our war effort. So, as I say, if it had been possible to get the election over before the victory loan campaign, the election would have been over.

Then why was parliament called? The calling of parliament was planned for the simple reason that in the event of its being impossible to have the appeal to the people before the victory loan campaign, it was felt we should bring the house into session to see if some progress might not be made particularly in relation to the war appropriations, so as to leave that much less for the next House of Commons to undertake in the way of passing needed appropriations. It was not intended to deal with all the business of a new session, for that belongs to the new parliament that will come into existence after the general election. We had the assurance, by a two-thirds majority, that this house would aid the government in a vigorous war effort. With that assurance in mind, within two days after parliament adjourned on December 7, an effort was made to arrange to have the Minister of National Defence in his seat when the house next met should it be found possible and advisable that another session, however short, should be held. It was felt desirable that the minister should be here, since the subject we would take up first would be the war appropriations; and we sought immediately to obtain a seat for the minister. It was not possible to bring the house together earlier, because to carry out an election under our legislation as it stands to-day, even a by-election, requires at least two months from the time the writ is issued until it is returned. As I say, with the assurance that we would have the vigorous support of the house in our war effort, we assumed, I shall take it entirely upon myself and say I assumed, at a time of war that every hon. member of the house would appreciate a motive of the kind, and that no opposition would be offered which would make it impossible for the Minister of National Defence to be in the House of Commons to assist in getting through the estimates that might be necessary.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just a moment; I will explain my point of view to my hon. friends. I was seeking to oblige not only all parties in this house but the parliament that will follow it. I was seeking to carry out what I believed to be the wish of the people of Canada, that we should devote as much time as possible to getting on with the business of the country. For that reason, as I say, no time was lost. Within two days following the adjournment of the house we had secured the agreement of the then sitting member for Grey North, Mr. Telford, who unfortunately had not been in good health, to resign, so as to permit the minister to run in that constituency, on the understanding that it would be simply for the purpose of coming into this house for the remainder of this parliament, to assist in its work. When that proposal was made public I am right when I say it was generally assumed that there would be no opposition. I was given very strong grounds for believing that this would be the case. But I am not going into the circumstances that occasioned the opposition. All I would say in regard to the election in Grey North is that if hon. gentlemen opposite believe, as they say, that the result of the bye-election signified that their policy of conscription for overseas service was endorsed by the electors of Grey North, unless my hon. friend the leader of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) is prepared to say that his policy was the same as theirs—

Mr. COLDWELL: It was not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —their candidate regards the policy of conscription has been returned by a minority of votes in Grey North, rather than by a majority. In other words the people of Grey North turned down—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That applies to some ministers and to the leader of the government. The Prime Minister was returned by a minority vote.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend wishes to get in his word I am prepared to let him do so quietly, on his own, but I wish to be allowed to make my statement without interruption to this house. This is a matter which affects the whole question of government of the country, not only for the present but at all times. Let me put this position to my hon. friend who is interrupting me. Are we to have it assumed, first of all, that our parliamentary institutions, which are based on the working together of a government and an opposition, are not to be assisted and supported by the people of the country, especially in time of war, when the government has a right to count upon the reasonable cooperation not only of all parties in the House of Commons but of all the people in the country, particularly when its actions are directed wholly and solely toward promoting the war effort? I felt, having regard to all the circumstances, that to have the Minister of National Defence in parliament, in time of war, when we were going to discuss war measures, was wholly in the interests of all. But what was the position taken by hon. gentlemen immediately opposite? Every effort was made to prevent the minister from coming into the house, an effort in which, in combination with another party, they were successful. May I ask, was that assisting the government in carrying on its war effort? Carry that to its logical conclusion and what does it mean in its effect upon government in Canada?

Business of the House

Let me put this first. Let me take the position of the leader of the party opposite. The other day when my hon. friend, as leader of the official opposition in this house, was invited to be a member of the delegation to go to San Francisco, I was surprised to hear him say that he would first have to ask his leader, someone who has never been in this parliament at all, whether or not he should go. May I point this out, that from the beginning of this parliament, to this hour, there has been no leader of the Conservative or Progressive Conservative party in this House of Commons. Since the last general election, so far as the Conservative party is concerned, our relations to them have not been determined by the actions of the official opposition in this House of Commons. The control of the Conservative party has been carried on by some little group outside the House of Commons altogether. Hon. gentlemen opposite have not themselves been debating issues here; in taking part in discussions they have been acting upon, obliged to act upon, or claiming to act upon the dictates of others.

What is to become of our parliamentary institutions if that is to continue? I had not intended to speak of this at the present time. I had intended to speak of it during the general election, but I might as well mention it now. Our parliamentary procedure is based on the assumption of a government and an opposition, so much so that parliament itself has recognized the official status of an opposition, and that the leader of the opposition carries a special responsibility, and because of that responsibility parliament has voted to the one holding that position a salary equivalent to that given a minister of the crown. That has been done, in order that he might, on his own responsibility—not upon the say of someone outside—but on his own responsibility, as leader of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition, take a stand which will enable him to maintain our parliamentary institutions in accordance with the authority and dignity vested in his official position.

Since the last general election, we have not had in this house the leader of the Progressive Conservative or any Conservative party. There has been an acting leader; there has been a house leader, but that is all. He, however, has not been the leader of the party. What is the position at the present time? We have offered to the leader of the Progressive Conservative party, time and again, opportunities to enter this House of Commons. But for two and a half years he has not been here. This government would welcome his presence here, merely to make it possible for him—

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

An hon. MEMBER: York South.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, Grey North. Why did he not run in Grey North?

Mr. ROWE: York South.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If hon. gentlemen opposite were testing the strength of their party and the strength of their leader, they would have had their leader run in Grey North against the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. ROWE: We let the people of Grey North decide that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What was his position? He would not come into parliament himself and he sought to do all he could to keep out of parliament a minister of the crown. Follow that kind of thing, generally official, to its logical conclusion and you find the opposition taking the position that it will not be represented in parliament, but that if it can, it will do all in its power to keep out of parliament those who are taking part in the government of the country. As a result you have our parliamentary institutions completely sabotaged.

Mr. ROWE: That is not correct.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just a moment. I did not bring up this matter. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition has asked me why I did not bring the present session on any sooner. I am to some extent responsible for the calling of parliament and I ask this house and the country this question: Does anyone believe that after the kind of by-election that was waged in Grey North, and having regard to all the circumstances of that election, this parliament of Canada, this House of Commons, if it had been called, or reassembled the next day, would have been concerned, from beginning to end, with anything other than talking over and over and over again about what had happened in Grey North?

Mr. ROWE: You are talking about it now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I made it clear at the time of the by-election that we were quite prepared to bring this House of Commons into being shortly after that event if we had—

Mr. ROWE: Won the election.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the minister had been in a position to take his seat.

Mr. ROWE: If you had won the election you would have had a session of parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I made perfectly clear what I would do, and what I was seeking to do. Hon. gentlemen opposite would have had all the time they wanted to criticize the administration, if they wished to do so.

Mr. ROWE: You did not do it, though.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And my hon. friend was one who did more than anybody else—from what I can learn—to bring about a condition which would prevent that from taking place.

Mr. ROWE: The people of Grey North did that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And, further to what I have said, there was no obligation, under the constitution of Canada, nothing in the procedure of parliament itself, to render it necessary for the government to call another session. There was absolutely nothing. We had had our five sessions, and we know that this parliament has been one of the longest in the history of Canada. There was no obligation on the government. But the government, once it was clear that a general election could not be brought on before the victory loan campaign was over, anxious to do what was fitting, deemed it desirable to bring the House of Commons together for the purpose of voting the necessary interim supply which would be required over the time of the general election and the reassembling of a new parliament.

May I state there is another reason why parliament was called into special session. That was the invitation to the San Francisco conference. It was obviously desirable, the moment it was known that the conference on world security was to be called, that Canada should be represented at that conference. That rendered necessary the holding of the general election some time after the conference. But I say, if there had been no victory loan and no San Francisco conference and the decisive battles had been fought, this country in all probability would either have had an election over at this time, or would have been in the middle of it, or near the end of it. Once we had to consider the two things, the war loan and the San Francisco conference, apart altogether from the time of the cessation of hostilities, it meant that we had to hold the general election after those two events.

Here again may I say that the government is only too anxious to allow just sufficient time for an appeal to be made properly to the people of Canada after those two events are concluded, before the day of polling itself. So far as this session is concerned, all we are asking for is to give the people of Canada what they are entitled to have under the constitution, namely the right to determine under conditions governing a general election what government is to be in power in Canada for the next five years, and for the House of Commons to make this possible, through moneys supplied by parliament, rather than by governor general's warrants. That is what we are seeking to have done; let the people decide the government they want.

Mr. ROWE: That is what they decided in Grey North; let the people decide.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is another illusion my hon. friends have. They think the by-election, conducted in the manner in which the by-election in Grey North was conducted, was the voice of the people of Canada. They were never more mistaken. As hon. members must know, the government throughout the campaign did not extend the issue in that by-election beyond the one purpose stated; namely, that of making it possible for the Minister of National Defence to be in the House of Commons in the event of its being thought advisable and necessary to hold another session. We refused to discuss general issues. The purpose of the by-election was not for the discussion of general issues, at all.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): It certainly was.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was only for one thing. But hon. members opposite raised all kinds of issues, aroused all kinds of prejudices, all kinds of passions; everything that is worst in the public life of the country they tried to bring into that campaign.

Mr. ROWE: It was just a lack of confidence in the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When the appeal to the country is made hon. members opposite will find what the people of Canada as a whole thought of the way the by-election in Grey North was carried on by them from beginning to end.

Mr. ROWE: The people of North Grey answered you.

Mr. BENICE: Why don't you put Ralston back?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before hon. gentlemen opposite talk about putting anyone back who has already served in this house for many years they had better get into the House of Commons their leader, who has never been inside the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): How do you like that over there?

Mr. ROWE: He will be in the Prime Minister's place next fall.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says, "he will be in," and what will happen to him if he gets in? If hon. gentlemen opposite follow what they have done over the last five years they will have some persons outside the house, some little group—I will not say where they will be located or who they are—but a little invisible group dictating the behaviour and the whole policy of the party.

To come back to the question raised by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, I have already said that the government had called this session to consider the San Francisco conference matter and to consider as well the voting of the necessary war appropriations and supply to tide the country over the period of a general election. There are only two ways in which the war effort and civil government can be carried on during the period of the election, and that is by moneys voted by this house or appropriated by governor general's warrants. I stated when the house first met that we would sit from Monday until Friday, that we would not rise for Wednesday evenings, which is the practice we would ordinarily have adopted, but that we would sit the full day on all sitting days for the conduct of public business. We intend to do that till the last moment the house sits, if the house decides to sit until the last moment.

But I ask my hon. friend when he suggests to me that I should bargain with him as to the house sitting on Saturday and other mornings until we get through, will he give me a guarantee that no other members but himself and those of his party are going to speak at undue length and that by sitting on Saturday or even Sunday, were such a thing to be thought of, other members will not be determined to have the house run until the last hour of the last day so that in the absence of the war appropriations and supply being voted the country's business would have to be carried on during the next four or five months under governor general's warrants.

Mr. GRAYDON: Will the Prime Minister permit me?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly.

Mr. GRAYDON: Our party has considered this matter, and we are very anxious that the discussion should be brought to an end so that royal assent may be given on Saturday. I cannot guarantee what members down in the corner will do, nor can I give any guarantee with respect to members on the government side of the house. May I point out to my right hon. friend, who has made a plea for speed in the house, that I took the trouble to find out who was holding up business, and I find that outside of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence, who took up considerable time—and I am not complaining about that at all—twenty-three columns of Hansard on one day were consumed by government speakers, outside of the Department of National Defence; eighteen columns by Independents down in the corner; nine by the C.C.F.; seven by the Social Credit group, and seven columns by ourselves. I cannot guarantee to the Prime Minister what other people will do, but I can say that our party is anxious to close up the discussion and to get the war appropriation and the supply bills through so that royal assent may be given in the regular fashion on Saturday.

Mr. ROWE: We have had an hour spent in a post-mortem this afternoon.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the whips and the leaders will meet together and come to an agreement that they are prepared to have prorogation on Saturday provided this house sits to-morrow morning and Friday morning at eleven o'clock, I am prepared to say on behalf of the government that we will agree to that arrangement, but if we cannot get that agreement I can see no use in sitting in the mornings or on Saturday and we will continue to sit if necessary on Monday and see whether or not we are to get by votes of this house before the term of parliament expires, what is necessary to carry on the business of the country thereafter for the next four or five months.

May I say to my hon. friend that I am obliged to him for the suggestion he has just made and I thank both him and his party for being prepared to give the undertaking he has proposed.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggart): Mr. Speaker, I see very little use in coming to arrangements or agreements regarding the shortening of the session when this afternoon for a whole hour we have had a political discussion between two major parties. We in this group have endeavoured to facilitate the business of the house, and I know that my hon. friends to my left have endeavoured to do so to the very best of their ability; yet we have seen on the government side of the house member after member rise and make speeches which often had very little bearing on the subject matter actually before the Chair. I and those associated with me have been most anxious to see the business of the house concluded this week, but if this kind of discussion proceeds every day and the major parties continue to use up time which might be used for the discussion of the appropriations and estimates, I and my colleagues cannot be responsible for what happens. I think it is only fair that I should say that.

Mr. FRED ROSE (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word on this matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. There is nothing before the Chair, and I do not wish that there shall be a general discussion.

Mr. ROSE: In the past few days a lot of the time of the house has been spent in discussing party issues, while we have not yet considered the estimates of the Department of Labour and the Department of Munitions and Supply. Instead, electioneering issues have been discussed. The members of the house should be given a little time to consider some of the problems that are affecting the people of this country to-day, particularly labour problems. We have until Monday, and I think we can very well sit until Monday and take the time to consider these problems.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): May I ask your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, to point out to you that the discussion that has been going on between the leader of the opposition and the Prime Minister might very well have taken place on the motion brought forward by the hon. member for Temiscouata had he been permitted to go on with it, because all that has been discussed to-day is involved in the question whether or not the life of parliament should be extended. The speakers to-day have taken up much time in discussing the very matter we thought parliament should discuss, but it appears now that the rest of us are to be precluded from discussing that very thing.

SAN FRANCISCO CONFERENCE

REPRESENTATION OF POLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a couple of questions, notice of which I have already sent to him. I would ask if Canada was a signatory to the united nations declaration in Washington of January 1, 1942, and was Poland one of the signatories to the same declaration. This is particularly my question, although it is the third: did the Canadian government receive any note or communication from the Polish government on or about March 12 of this year protesting their exclusion from the San Francisco united nations conference? If so, was the communication answered, and what was Canada's attitude towards Poland's protest?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Secretary of State for External Affairs): As the hon. member for Macleod has said, he gave me notice of his three questions. The answer to the first two, which he has said are not so important, is "yes". The third question I would answer as follows. On March 19 the Canadian government received from the Polish minister for its information the text of a note which the Polish government had sent to the powers that issued the invitations to the conference to be held at San Francisco. This protest was not addressed to the Canadian government.

INQUIRY AS TO OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. P. PICARD (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I desire to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, to whom I sent notice of it a moment ago. In a few days will be held in San Francisco one of the most important conferences held up to now in connection with the organization of the world of to-morrow. There are rumours that, for the first time in the history of modern times, French will not be one of the official languages of a world conference. At a moment when the French nation is resurging from the trials of four years of barbaric domination, and is taking once more the part it has played in the affairs of the world in the past, it is to be wondered how it is that a practice of five centuries is to be set aside for the first time. I think there could be no more unwise decision than this one, if it is final.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PICARD: I am coming to my questions; I am through with my preamble. They are these:

1. Has the Secretary of State for External Affairs been informed of what will be the official languages at the San Francisco conference?

2. If the French language is not to be, for the first time in history, one of the official languages at a world conference, is it the intention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to make special representations so that the language used in the last five centuries as the language of diplomacy, and which happens to be one of the two official languages of this country, be recognized as one of the official languages of the conference?

Army—High School Students

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that I should be very much surprised if there is any ground for the rumour to which my hon. friend has just referred. I have received no information as to which or how many languages are to be official at the San Francisco conference; but it has been intimated to me that one of the first matters which will be taken up by the conference itself will be to decide what language or languages—one, two, three, four, or five—will be made official at the time; I think it would be unwise to express any opinion on the matter until the conference itself has had an opportunity of discussing it.

CANADIAN ARMY

MILITARY TRAINING OF HIGH SCHOOL STUDENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I have a question which I should have asked last evening of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence. It relates to the new rule and amended order as it applies to students at secondary schools and universities, and was referred to in reply to the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White). I wished to ask the parliamentary assistant if he would clarify the matter so far as military district No. 2 is concerned. I received a request to-day about it. From one school in our district there have been 1,750 enlistments of young men of eighteen years of age and thereabouts, and most of the smaller secondary schools have as many as 1,200. They receive military drill now in the schools by experienced soldier instructors from overseas, and other hours are taken up in military and physical training. There are only a few more months to go in this term, and I would ask the parliamentary assistant, with particular reference to the Toronto district which so far has lost nearly a thousand men of school age, if he will not confer with military officers and with school boards of No. 2 district with regard to next year's term starting in September, and further, that he will not interfere with arrangements in the present term, which has only about two months to run. I suggest also to the Minister of Labour, who knows something of what has been done in the secondary schools of our city, that a rule like that which has been passed does a great harm to recruiting, and is especially objectionable to some of these young students, many of whose fathers and brothers are overseas in the army. I ask the Minister of Labour and the parliamentary assistant to clarify this.

Mr. D. C. ABBOTT (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): The same rule applies to military district No. 2 as to all the other military districts, but these students are not subject to service in any case until they reach eighteen and one-half years, due to the change in regulations.

Mr. CHURCH: It has been said by a brigadier general of one military district that some of the schools need jacking and checking up. I think some of these brass hats require checking up sometimes, in view of these absurd rules.

PRISONERS OF WAR

CONDITIONS AMONG CANADIAN PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. H. BENCE (Saskatoon City): I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister. During the course of this session he and the Minister of National War Services have been good enough to make statements relating to the treatment of prisoners of war. In view of some of the alarming stories which are coming through the press and over the radio with respect to the bad conditions of released prisoners of war, could the Prime Minister, or someone on behalf of the government, if possible before the end of this session, or if not shortly thereafter, make a statement giving the most up-to-date information that can be obtained in connection with the matter? I would also suggest, in view of the difficulties which are being encountered overseas, that the government disclose as promptly as possible over the radio and through the press the official information they receive in this matter, because these stories, which one hopes relate only to isolated cases, are giving a great deal of concern to the next of kin.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I say to my hon. friend that I appreciate his raising the question, and I can assure him at once that the government is keeping as closely in touch as possible with this situation as it affects prisoners of war. We have asked in particular that some of these stories should be investigated. We have no reason to believe at the present time that there is any foundation for them. The statement which I made in the house on March 23 regarding what was to be expected with respect to the camps covers the ground as far as the government is in a position to state it; and we have no information from the protecting power, with which we have kept particularly closely in touch, to the effect that conditions have changed at all from what they were as I indicated when I last spoke to the house. My hon. friend's suggestion that such information as is available and authentic should be mentioned over the radio or in whatever other way may be thought advisable is, I think, an excellent one, and I shall be glad to ask that it be carried out.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WARTIME WAGE CONTROL ORDERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I have a question to put to the Minister of Labour of which I am sorry I did not get a chance to give him notification. As the minister is aware, there is widespread interest throughout the trades union movement in Canada in the amendments to orders in council 9384 and 1003, wage control and labour relations. When the supplementary estimates of the minister were under consideration, certain recommendations with respect to changes were made by members of this group. Is the government contemplating any changes in the orders mentioned?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): It is a question of government policy. My hon. friend is as well aware as I am of the constitutional structure of this country. The representations made to me were not made by the national organizations in a personal way, but the drafting of that code was approved by this administration and provincial governments, labour organizations and employers, and the code was introduced a year ago. It was a subject of negotiation and, might I say, of compromise and conciliation. If my hon. friend were in my position I believe he would be the first to take the position which I myself take. Until all the evidence is in, until consultation has been had with those responsible for its administration under the constitution of this country, it will continue to receive the consideration which it rightly deserves.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. POULIOT

REFERENCE TO COMMENTS IN DEBATE ON APRIL 10

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Eleven years ago Mr. Speaker Black ruled that the word "clown" addressed to a member of parliament was unparliamentary and had to be struck from Hansard. It had been said by a privy councillor of Mr. Bennett's cabinet and addressed to the then

hon. member for Témiscouata who now represents the same county. Yesterday the same word was addressed several times to me by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), and when he spoke I did not understand what he said. However, I will not ask you, sir, to force him to withdraw, nor will I ask you to have the words struck out of Hansard. I want to have it left there as a record of the humiliations I have suffered for defending the farmers and labour men. There is another thing that was said by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks). Speaking of me he said: "He is trying to crawl back,"—he probably meant to the government seats. I will tell my hon. friend that that is a kind of sport I have not indulged in for half a century. The last time I crawled was fifty-four years ago when I was exactly one year old. Since then it has not been part of my daily dozen.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

RECOMMENDATIONS OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION WITH RESPECT TO CLASSIFICATIONS, ETC.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): There is a question I should like to direct to the Prime Minister. Last August, I am not sure of the date, but I know it was near the end of the session, and at the beginning of this session, a report of the civil service commission was laid on the table—two reports, if I remember correctly—with respect to the House of Commons, and particularly the protective staff who are in the precincts of this chamber and of this House of Commons jurisdiction. It was left, as Your Honour stated, to be dealt with by parliament; but parliament cannot deal with it unless some initiative is taken by the government, and I was wondering if the Prime Minister had anything in mind in this regard during this session.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): As my hon. friend knows, this session was called for the specific purpose I have mentioned and there have been, I was going to say, innumerable requests that the government pass this amendment or that, or introduce this or that piece of legislation. We have felt it necessary, however, to hold to the purposes announced and not to go beyond them. In the circumstances it is not the intention of the government to introduce anything outside our announced programme. The matter to which my hon. friend has just referred is no doubt one that will be promptly taken up by whatever government may be in office at the first session of the new parliament.

War Appropriation—Munitions and Supply

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 10, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY

Mr. MacNICOL: I listened very attentively to the address of the Minister of Munitions and Supply, and the cardinal statement I took out of it, which I propose to discuss to-day, along with several other items mentioned in his speech, is the statement he is reported to have made at page 746 of Hansard of yesterday:

The latest figures at hand show a total of 675,000 men and women employed on the manufacture of war equipment as of January 1, 1945. There has been a substantial decrease since January 1, 1944, but, despite this, there is every indication that our greatest labour shortage will occur in the next six months.

Further on he makes this explanatory statement:

As I stated recently, on the basis of the information now available we anticipate a cut-back of not more than 35 per cent in our munitions programme with the cessation of hostilities in Europe.

Previous ministers were asked—I asked them myself—whether they had any programme to provide employment for the men in the services of their departments on their return. The reply was to the effect that the incoming Minister of Reconstruction—I believe that is the title—would be the one to take care of such a matter. What I have observed during this session so far is the lack of any programme or any statement from those addressing the house as to what is to be done in reference to employment. The minister of munitions did make a statement in that regard and he mentioned a number of subsidiary programmes in regard to employment, and therefore I feel it my duty to speak on the subject.

A few days ago I attended quite a large meeting in Toronto. There were a number of returned soldiers with their womenfolk and their families and the gathering was addressed by a distinguished soldier. Apparently a few days before addressing the meeting he had attended a large gathering of the Canadian Legion or the Canadian Corps, or perhaps a gathering of both. That speaker was alarmed because, he said, the returned members in these organizations had fervently discussed the problem of employment facing their organizations after the war and they could see no big programme to provide employment. I am sorry to say that is my own observation; I cannot see any big programme for the provision of employment after the war.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Chairman, may we ask for more order in the chamber. I cannot hear a word the hon. member is saying.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am sorry, but apparently there are a few members of the House of Commons who are not interested in the question of jobs and of employment after the war; and yet, next to the winning of the war, the one important matter for this house to consider is the subject of jobs and employment. This may not affect some of the ridings, but it greatly affects mine. I live in a riding of 70,000 people, all in the working class, 45,000 of them employed in industry, and if employment is not of interest to some hon. members, that is their funeral; it is not mine. Fortunately I feel that the working men of my riding will return me at the next election. If hon. members are not returned, I say it is their funeral, if they are not interested in the question of jobs. So many men cannot understand the problem, and yet that distinguished soldier, a man closely associated with the problem of relief in Toronto, said that, to him, the question of jobs was, next to the winning of the war, the major problem of the country. If I cannot present that clearly, I am sorry for those members who have no time except to gabble and are not interested in employment after the war.

The minister has said that some 675,000 were engaged in the making of munitions. When the minister speaks again I should like him to elaborate on that and tell us whether that 675,000 applies only to munitions plants or to all the thousand and one component plants; because 675,000 men and women seems to me to be a number that does not include those either directly or indirectly associated with the subsidiary plants making munitions. I should think they would number perhaps a million men and women. There must be that number engaged either directly or part time in the making of munitions. If, as the minister said, munition making is cut back thirty-five per cent when the European war is over, it would mean a reduction of 236,000 in that 675,000. That would present an immediate problem, because work would have to be provided for those 236,000 men and women. It is a large number to find employment for. That is the matter I am interested in, Mr. Chairman. My life has been associated with those who work in industry and with their problems. I hope it will always be the paramount problem with me.

In the course of his remarks the minister mentioned a number of different matters. I shall deal with them individually and each one briefly. I am sorry to take up the time of the committee at this late stage of the session, but knowing and believing the minister himself is chiefly interested in the work which comes under his new department I am sure he will welcome a few suggestions from me or from anybody else that will provide ways and means of creating employment.

The minister mentioned the problem of coal. It is a most important problem. I have advocated before, I advocate now, that when this war is over, Ontario—and I speak of that province because that is where I live—should be in a position to take not less than a million and a half tons of Nova Scotia coal yearly, and more if possible. It is the duty of the government of the day to provide much faster and cheaper conveyances than exist to-day to enable the Nova Scotia coal miners to deliver their coal rapidly in Ontario and at lower freight rates than now exist.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Why not Alberta?

Mr. MacNICOL: If my hon. friend will just possess his soul in patience, I shall come to that. I was trying to get to it as rapidly as possible. I am thoroughly familiar with Canada from one end of it to the other, and I try to leave out no portion of it when I am dealing with these matters. I hope that after the war, methods will be devised whereby a million and a half tons of Alberta coal can be brought to Ontario. My deskmate, the hon. member for Royal, who always stands up for his beautiful province of New Brunswick, asks about New Brunswick coal. Yes, New Brunswick too; when I speak of Nova Scotia coal I am thinking of the maritimes generally; they are pretty well together. I have used a lot of Alberta coal and Nova Scotia coal too. The Alberta coal is simply wonderful. The time has come for this government to establish a national fuel policy under which coal can be brought from both east and west faster and at a reasonable rate to the great buying province of Ontario, and, of course, Quebec too. I will confine my remarks in that regard to my own province, because in Ontario we buy several million tons of coal yearly. I am firmly convinced that our national coal policy should be designed to enable and induce Canadians to use Canadian coal to the greatest extent. Why do I say that? Because the trains bringing Alberta, Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick coal to Ontario would take back products made by the working men and women of Ontario. Let me give an example of what I mean. Last summer I was up in the riding of the hon. member for Yukon. He took me to a very large store in the city of Dawson. Standing beside the tool counter I observed that the tools on sale had been made in Davenport riding by the Gray Tool company, on Van Horne street, Toronto. This company make excellent tools of great variety. I am happy to say that during the war they have played a very important part in providing the tools required by the Minister of Munitions and Supply and companies throughout Canada.

I have been making a survey of the Yukon in the hope—I cannot speak of it to-day, but I will do so later—of encouraging and assisting in securing an additional market for the use of Norman wells oil or Fort McMurray oil when the latter starts producing it in any quantity. They are producing a substantial amount now at Norman wells, and I have seen many men and women working there. I feel it is my duty as a Canadian to do everything I can to provide a market to keep the people working up there. My one thought was that if we could deliver oil and gasoline to the Yukon buyers at a price comparable to what they are paying for it to-day in the Mackenzie valley it would mean a large expansion of production in the Yukon. I mentioned that to the merchant in whose store I was, and he said to me, "Why, Mr. MacNicol, it will be wonderful if we can do anything like that." I said, "What would it mean to you?" He said, "I am now buying about five tons of tools a year, and it would mean instead of five tons of tools I would be buying perhaps twenty-five tons of tools a year." That would mean a lot more jobs in the Gray Tool company and the tool companies in Galt, Stratford, Hamilton and Montreal and other towns and cities throughout the east, and so on, with all the different lines of goods that company sold.

I cannot see any other way to make jobs than that the producers of goods and equipment receive orders. The only way they can get the orders is for those who send in the orders to have a demand in their immediate vicinity for that business.

May I come back to the question of coal? If Ontario bought a million and a half tons of coal from Nova Scotia and a million and a half tons from Alberta, where in the latter province they have, I believe, one-fifth of the world's coal supply, it would mean return orders to factories in Ontario and elsewhere in compensation for buying the coal of those other areas. I cannot see how we can keep this country going unless we buy from one another. If we buy coal from the east and west they in turn will buy from us. This country must initiate national policies whereby Canadians will buy from Canadians everything that they can. This will create more employment. If the minister is returned after the election—if not we will have to supply a man to take his place from our side of the house—he will have to initiate programmes along those lines.

Some years ago I tried to set out how we could bring coal from Alberta to Ontario at a much lower rate. I have figured out the programme. If we had, I was going to say, what God might like to see us have, the Saskatchewan river in a position where it could again return to some of the glory of its early days as a transportation artery—and it could easily be done by the building of dams on the river—the coal could float down as far as Winnipeg and then be taken by special types of cars across the four hundred and fifty miles or more from Winnipeg to the minister's fine city, Fort William, where it could be loaded on boats and brought to Toronto. What I am suggesting to the minister is that if he has anything to do with it after the election he should try in every way possible to have coal brought from Nova Scotia and Alberta to the central provinces, the largest users of coal, more quickly and at lower cost; and if he remains the minister in charge I shall be glad to help him with what ideas I have in that regard.

The minister mentioned the matter of oil. If he has anything to do with coaching those who draw up the peace treaty, or if he is there himself, I hope he will make an effort to see that as part of what should come to us Canada obtains from Germany some of her wonderful hydrogenation plants by which, during the war, they have produced annually up to 250,000,000 or 300,000,000 barrels of oil from coal. Apparently they are away ahead of the rest of the world in that regard. If as part of our compensation the minister could obtain for Canada one, two, three or more of the German hydrogenation plants, one might be installed down in Nova Scotia or New Brunswick and one in Alberta, and the extra coal not shipped for use as fuel then could be turned into oil in both those provinces. It is well known that the Alberta oil fields, while very creditable, have not the capacity to supply this country with oil. But they have coal in both Alberta and Nova Scotia, and we were told in the reconstruction committee that in both cases the coal is suitable for the production of oil. It might cost a little more, but we have to keep our own people employed. Anything is better than having men unemployed; work is better than relief. To-day it requires millions of dollars in exchange to bring coal into this country, and more millions of dollars to bring in oil. I would much rather see those millions of dollars spent on the erection of plants in Nova Scotia and Alberta for the production of oil to supply Canadian needs. In that way we would provide a great deal more employment. I agree with what a distinguished soldier said at a meeting I attended in Toronto last week-end, that the greatest word in the English language to-day, next to "win the war", is "jobs". Anything that will provide jobs should be looked into and assisted in every way possible.

In connection with oil I should like to say a word about the Norman wells; I am going to tell the minister what I would do if the matter were under my control. I would do everything in my power to keep the Norman wells in operation. I went over that pipe line. It is small, of course; we all know it is not a commercial pipe line. But if we could get it for nothing there would be no capital cost, and perhaps even a four-inch pipe would do for the present to send oil across to Whitehorse and to supply the Yukon. I am not arguing for a moment that it is a commercial proposition, but it could become one if the demand were created. The engineers up there told me that when the demand arose a twelve-inch line would be ample for a very long time, and would provide a considerable surplus for shipment down the Pacific coast. So I hope the minister will consider the problem of keeping the Norman wells operating, and at the same time look into the production of oil from coal in both the maritimes and Alberta, to supplement what we are now getting out of the wells which our engineers tell us will never be able to take care of the Canadian demand by themselves.

The minister also mentioned transportation, and I want to say a word about that. I hope whoever is minister after the war will make every effort to speed up transportation in Canada, and to cut down its cost. Look at the situation in the maritimes. There is that right, tight little island of Cape Breton, with perhaps some of the best coal mines in the world. I do not know their capacity; the hon. member for Cape Breton South knows all about that, but we are told there is a considerable quantity of coal there. Look at the trouble they have getting that coal to the mainland. When the coal trains arrive at the strait of Canso just see what happens; I have watched them. Surely the time is past when a condition like that should be permitted to exist in this country. There ought to be a causeway or bridge to enable those trains to get quickly to the mainland from where the coal is produced. How can we compete against the world even in our own country unless we speed up and reduce the cost of transportation? The same observations apply to the west. I have often heard the hon. member for Vancouver South and others from British Columbia talk about the freight rates in that province. The time has come when this country, either through a national commission or otherwise, must make a thorough study into freight rates, with a view to cutting down the cost of transportation in order that Canadians may be able to compete in their own markets. To-day British Columbia is almost ostracized as far as freight rates are concerned. Look at the cost of getting things into and out of that province. It is no wonder that the people out there are indignant against the east. I do not believe they should be indignant against the east, but perhaps they are right because we do not raise our voices often enough, in this house or elsewhere, to assist them in their battle to bring down transportation costs.

I am ready at all times to support any reasonable programme that will bring about the more rapid distribution of the products of the outlying provinces; and by that I do not mean anything more than that they are far distant from the great purchasing centres of Ontario and Quebec. I am always ready to assist any programme that will permit the people of this great, rich, patriotic and heroic province of Ontario to deal more extensively with our good friends in the maritimes and the west. I know of no better way to promote unity in our country than by having greater trade between all parts of it, and cheaper and faster transportation. If my hon. friend remains minister in the next government—I am not prophesying that he will, or anything like that—I hope he will “take the bull by the horns” and do whatever is required to increase the speed and cut down the cost of transportation between one part of Canada and another.

In that regard a moment ago I mentioned the Saskatchewan river. I have gone over that river from its mouth to its source. It is a long journey, about a thousand miles. I have surveyed all its main branches, and every possible reservoir site in the Rocky mountains of any size where reservoirs could be built. That is another programme that should be undertaken. The P.F.R.A. administration has a fine map showing where these reservoirs can be built. They should be built. Nothing is as priceless to our western provinces, particularly Saskatchewan, as water. More than any other province in Canada, Saskatchewan must have water. It has little of its own; the water comes from the Rocky mountains, and runs away in the spring. I suggest that if the minister is still in office after the war he should see to it that the waters of the Saskatchewan river are conserved in each of its source branches. There are perhaps thirty-five to forty excellent sites for giant reservoirs, with the foundations available, in my mind created by God Almighty. I am a great believer in God Almighty, and see His handiwork wherever I go. He has created that large reservoir space, capable of serving in many instances up to a half million acre-feet of water. I think hon. members have heard me describe what an acre-foot of water is. The mouths of many reservoirs are contracted to a size not much wider than the length of this room, or at most two or three times that length, and right up against solid rock. My opinion is that it is a crime to allow that vast water resource to run away. Coming back to Alberta, it is even a greater crime to allow to take place in the Rocky mountains what has been taking place, and what the Alberta government has been praying that we help them prevent, forest destruction. I carefully examined the Crowfoot glacier and the Bow river glacier. The engineer who was with me told me that those two glaciers have shrunk to a much smaller size than formerly. I have forgotten the exact amount, but even if I remembered I would hesitate to give it or to accept it. There was originally a vast thickness, and they have shrunk as the glaciers have melted away. Glaciers are the source of Saskatchewan river water. One of the reasons given was the frightful destruction, through fires and otherwise, of the forests surrounding the glaciers. Those forests are in the foothills and mountains of Alberta and British Columbia. To neglect forest conservation is another crime, and one which will affect the destiny of this country, particularly our western provinces. I am as sure as I stand here, after making a survey, and through travel and examination, that this country cannot endure or continue to prosper unless the economy of the western provinces is maintained. It cannot be maintained unless the water resources of western Canada are rehabilitated and restored. This can be done by erecting dams along the Saskatchewan river, and those dams should be erected. In eastern Canada we have spent about $750,000,000, perhaps a billion dollars, on works of one kind or another, including canals, harbours, deepening and dredging channels. It was our duty to do it and we did it. But in the west we have spent only a paltry $2,500,000 on the St. Andrew's locks. And that is another programme I suggest might well be considered by the minister who happens to sit in the next government. If my hon. friend is in office I know he will grasp the situation. Because of his engineering knowledge he will recognize the importance of the rehabilitation of the Saskatchewan river.

Do not make any mistake about it; it is a tragedy to think that a river with an average flow of 27,000 cubic feet of water per second, a maximum flow up to 100,000 cubic feet per second, and a minimum or low flow, near Prince Albert, of less than 500 cubic feet at lowest, should be neglected. It is a tragedy, and a menace and danger to the economy of the western provinces. In that process of restoration the government would be creating business and giving the people out there a chance to live, and a chance to have employment. While I love my own province of Ontario, and have deep affection for my own people, I always like to think I am big enough to speak a word for the people throughout the whole of the country. And while I know that Ontario has made a tremendous sacrifice in this war, yet I know that whole western areas were depressed such a long time that young men of military age enlisted en masse, to the point where there were no young men out there. They had come through a depression, a depression they should not have been forced to endure—ten years of it. And when war broke out they enlisted en masse, and have made a record for themselves over there in the skies and on the land of Europe and on the seas.

No matter what the experience of this country may be after the war, the western provinces should be given their chance to shine in the sun. In doing that they will provide a vast volume of business for every factory and every town in Ontario and Quebec. That means jobs—j-o-b-s. They will have to have jobs after the war. And they will have no trouble getting those jobs if we only see to it that the country is opened up as it should be.

I did mention Saskatchewan's need of a transportation route for heavy bulk freight such as coal and wheat. Is there any reason why there should not be a ten-million bushel elevator at Saskatoon? There should be one, too, at Riverhurst, one at Medicine Hat, and possibly one at Lethbridge. I could do it, if I had it to do. There is no reason why 500-ton barges loaded with wheat or coal should not float down that river, just as they float down the Illinois and the Ohio rivers to-day as far as New Orleans. That is a distance a good deal farther than from Medicine Hat, Lethbridge, Saskatoon or Riverhurst to Winnipeg. If that water transportation were used the freight trains could be used to handle other types of freight. Farmers of the west would receive more for their wheat, and they would buy more. They would provide a higher class of freight, and our railways would get more business. I strongly favour supporting our railway systems in any fashion we can.

The minister mentioned something about power. Well, we know that the old province of Ontario is the shining example of the use of power. In this province we find great manufacturing establishments which have developed largely as a result of our wonderful hydro-electric power system. Although I do not know the exact figure, I believe that system now produces a good deal more than 2,000,000 horse-power. Perhaps the figure is closer to 3,000,000.

How can people in the west compete? I do not believe competition will hurt us down here. It would provide more business for us. The more the western towns and cities grow, the more business is provided for the rest of Canada. And barges at those grain elevators to which I have referred would be loaded with wheat at Saskatoon and the other places I have mentioned, and this would result in great numbers of jobs and considerable business. That is what we must do—make jobs. Our men and women must have jobs after the war.

I read lately that there has been some talk of the three western provinces forming a committee to carry out a suggestion—not one that I alone made, but perhaps I was the first to make it in the house, two or three years ago. That is a suggestion which would place the Saskatchewan river under the control of a board. In my view it is imperative that that be done. It would not allow Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta individually to do what it wants, with the river. That river belongs to all three provinces, and because of that I would support this movement in western Canada, one which I advocated myself two or three years ago, for the setting up of a board after the fashion of the Tennessee valley authority. It could be known as the Saskatchewan river authority. I should like to see an engineer from the federal government act as chairman, to see that each province gets what it is entitled to, and much more than it can possibly get under present circumstances.

The minister mentioned rubber. I spent five or six hours in that fine plant at Sarnia with which he had so much to do. I made a careful study of it, and inquired if it were possible for that plant to operate after the war in competition with Malaya rubber, and rubber from other places, provided that this country, which has invested $50,000,000 in the plant, would say, "There is the plant; you may operate it." How many are employed there now?

Mr. HOWE: I do not remember exactly.

Mr. MacNICOL: I know it is a very large number, somewhere in the neighbourhood of 4,000. If that plant were not kept in operation, that number of people would be out of employment. For that reason I would support any programme to keep the plant in operation. If the plant can produce rubber in competition with native rubber; if it can produce Canada's requirements, even if the government gets no return for the use of the plant the country will receive the benefit of the employment of four thousand men more or less, and it will be more, I presume.

I do not see why we should consider the capital cost of the plant. Anything that will provide four thousand jobs of steady employment for Canadians directly, and probably many more thousand jobs indirectly, would be a good investment, and I made up my mind that on the first occasion that offered I would suggest that the capital cost of setting up that plant at Sarnia for the production of rubber be forgotten, but let the government retain control. The cost of course was greater in war time. The sole thing to be taken into consideration should be the maintenance of the plant, which will provide steady employment at good wages and under proper conditions for the four thousand or more employees in that plant. That would be good business for Canada.

Something has been said about housing. I am not going to say much about that. But conditions to-day are a tragedy. I am besieged when at home from morning to night by the finest people, as all of the members are no matter where they come from, who come to me for help in finding a place where they can lay their heads and rest at night. The situation in Toronto is serious. I believe the minister is fairly familiar with it, and I would go so far as to say that perhaps he is doing everything that can be done to relieve the housing situation in Toronto. But certainly everything a grateful country can do should be done for the wives and families of the returning men and of those who have not yet come back, to provide them with a place where they can live. The provision of this necessary housing would mean many thousands more jobs, and if there is to be a shrinkage in production, as I presume there will be when the war with Germany is over, one of the main problems will be to find employment for those who are seeking work. Here is one means of providing employment.

The minister in his statement said something about air transport. My time has almost expired, but I want to say a word about that because I believe that after the war, air traffic will mean much to Canada and all other countries. At the outset let me say that I am not a supporter of the minister's programme of wiping out all other companies and giving the whole air business to Trans-Canada. I am in favour of supporting Trans-Canada to the limit. It is a fine company, with fine planes and a fine personnel. But last summer I travelled thousands of miles in the C.P.A. planes and I found them very comfortable and the personnel excellent. Everywhere I got off I discussed the problem of air traffic at the air fields, and I heard great disappointment expressed at the possibility of this great company's air service being done away with after the war. I would let them operate their planes after the war. I would go further and let the Hudson's Bay company operate planes if they want to; I do not know whether they want to or not. I would also extend the same facilities to T.T.C., which has made application to operate helicopters. I would allow them and everybody else who will operate air lines and conform with the regulations of the department in regard to safety and so forth to invest their money in air facilities and give employment to thousands of our people. It would open up that great north country. I forget just how much traffic the C.P.A. carried last year in that region, although I read the figures a little while ago. It is fine that such a company should make an investment of this kind in opening up that country. I do not know how it could be opened up fully except by air service. Having myself flown over all the far north, I am strongly in favour of any programme that will increase air traffic in this country—and that means a lot more jobs all along the line.

I do not want to take up any more time, but in conclusion I do want to press on the minister the absolute necessity of water conservation in the west. I might add a word about Ontario and Quebec. A great job remains to be done in these two provinces, one which I have long advocated, and that is the flood-proofing of the rivers. I had a letter from the Minister of Lands and Forests in the Quebec government and he gave me a list of a number of rivers that should be made flood-proof and on which water conservation should take place. He mentioned the Portneuf and a number of other small streams; the Chaudiere—but that is not a small stream; the Blondel; aux Chiens; Creek du Moulin; Cassault, Sault-a-la-Puce, and the L'Emoyne. Then there is the St. Francis and the Richelieu, in Quebec province, and in Ontario there are many rivers that should be made flood-proof—the Thames, for instance, and that in my judgment should be done promptly. I fear what might happen to the fine city of London, the fine town of Ingersoll, the splendid city of Chatham and the village of Thamesville if we do not act promptly to save them from disaster such as happened in Dayton, Ohio, through the flooding of the Miami river. There is a programme of flood-proofing and water conservation that will provide many thousands of jobs, and it will be a self-liquidating programme. The programme would include flood control, water conservation, reforestation, soil conservation and all that goes with it. While some of these things are not mentioned in the minister's statement, some of them were, and I can tell him that if he happens to be minister after the war—and the same applies no matter who the minister may be—he will receive my whole-hearted support if I am here in bringing into effect programmes that will provide jobs, not by the thousands, not by the tens of thousands but by the hundreds of thousands for the million soldiers we will have coming home, and for perhaps another million men and women who will be seeking jobs when they are laid off from the munitions plants.

This calls for a bold programme which should be planned immediately, a programme that will be self-liquidating so far as possible, like the irrigation plans I have suggested for Alberta and Saskatchewan. The latter is a programme that will provide thousands and thousands of jobs directly in the west and indirectly an equal number of jobs in the factories in the east right down to the town of Amherst in the riding of my good friend from Cumberland, who is always standing up for the maritimes. I can hardly say a word for any other part of Canada, but what my hon. friend asks: What about the maritimes? That is fine. I like a man to stand up for his own part of the country. Let me tell him that I saw in Lethbridge large quantities of stuff that was made in the towns of Amherst and New Glasgow. That just illustrates how far the benefits will flow.

From Cape Breton in the east to Aklavik in the Arctic and away up to the Yukon, all Canada from the east to the west and up north should be linked together. We should all buy one another's goods. If we do that there would not be one unemployed man in this country, if we have the government's benediction all along the line.

Mr. GILLIS: I hesitate to make any extended remarks at this stage, but the department now before the committee is perhaps one of the most important departments of government at this time. I consider that the Minister of Munitions and Supply, who is also Minister of Reconstruction, is going to be the man of the hour in the post-war period. That is why I wish to speak of the future of that department as related to the reconversion of industry.

I am sure we all appreciate the interest which the hon. member for Davenport takes in the maritimes. But the maritimes have been struggling along on sympathy for the last fifty years, and that sympathy has not been reflected very much in any economic betterment of the maritimes. I am going to suggest that in future, instead of just sympathizing with the maritimes we actually try to do something tangible that will be reflected in an improvement in the economy of that part of the country.

I am not going to discuss the fuel question. For the past five years in this house I have put on record my opinions as to what should be done. The government has seen fit to appoint a commission, which to-day is travelling Canada from coast to coast, examining the whole problem with the end in view of establishing a national fuel policy. I have some hope for this commission. I met them, and listened to their deliberations while in Sydney. I think they know their business, and I am reasonably sure that out of that commission will come some concrete suggestions for the organization of fuel in this country. When they bring down their report, based on the evidence they will receive—and they are getting the real evidence this time—I trust that, whichever party is governing this country, something definite and tangible will be done for the reorganization of the fuel industry because it needs reorganization. I will leave the matter there: it is being attended to.

My main concern with the minister's department is as to the future of what war industry there is in Nova Scotia. Most of the people in that province are considerably worried. For example, there is the Pictou shipyards. Although it is not a big industry it gives considerable employment, and to the best of my knowledge there is no programme for maintaining it after the war. I had the pleasure of visiting the town and I found that the matter is pretty well tangled up. I shall not go into it in detail; I think the minister has probably heard all the stories which I have heard. The Maritime Foundation company is operating it on a management fee basis. It is my information that they would stay there and continue that operation provided that they could buy the repair plant which is owned by the Ferguson Brothers. On the other hand, the Ferguson Brothers are prepared to take the shipyards over if they could also retain the repair plant. That is a matter of negotiation between the government and the companies; but before the minister concludes the discussion I should like him to say something definite as to the future of that industry in Nova Scotia in the post-war period.

There is also the gun plant at Trenton, Nova Scotia. It is a purely war set-up. The possibilities are that when there is no need for the commodity it is producing, the plant will close up. If it does, a considerable number of people now employed there will be out of work, and there will be no provision for returning service personnel there or in the Pictou area in the matter of employment. I should like the minister to give us some indication of the future of that particular industry.

Another one, in which I am more personally concerned, is the plate mill at Sydney. The minister and most hon. members will remember that in 1940 considerable discussion took place here concerning that plant. It was built in the last war—built and paid for by the Canadian government. The machinery at that time was moved somewhere else. In 1940 the government rehabilitated the mill and put it to work. It has done a good job. At the present time it is working, I believe, only one shift or half-time. There is considerable anxiety as to the future of that mill.

I wish to make a few remarks as to the matter of wages at the steel plant, because it ties in closely with the future of that plate mill. The steel-workers' union, local 1064, functioning at that steel plant in Sydney, have been trying for several months past to renegotiate or revise their wage agreement. Recently their representatives were in the city, and they left, I understand, without much assurance as to what could be done. The old wage agreement was in fact an order in council passed by this government. That order in council was No. 689. Most hon. members will remember the complete tie-up of steel in most of Nova Scotia and Ontario. Arising out of that dispute was the order in council that fixed the wage agreement and revised bonus arrangements and so forth; and that has been in effect since. I am informed—and if I am not correctly informed I want the minister to put me right—that an order in council, No. 1952, was passed on March 23 of this year constituting an agreement in the matter of subsidies as applied to steel. My information is that the subsidies are being revised. As I am informed there is a proposal under that order of three dollars a ton as a subsidy on the basis of present operations and four dollars a ton if the plate mill at Sydney closes. Now that arouses considerable concern. What I should like to know is, why the increase of a dollar a ton in the subsidy if the plate mill closes down? I may be wrong in this. I am merely raising it because I want the minister to answer concerning a matter which is causing anxiety, and if I am not correctly informed the minister can put the record straight. It would look as though there was a bonus of a dollar a ton to be paid for the closing down of the plate mill—which means unemployment, and the unemployment situation in that area at the present time is anything but good. There is actual unemployment there now. Returning service personnel are not able to get work in that area. I say "not able" advisedly, because just prior to coming into the house, and after having a lot of boys in and out of the office, I checked with selective service as to what the unemployment situation was like, and they told me there just is not any employment in any of that Cape Breton island area. It is a heavy industry section, with mining and steel plants. Service personnel coming back at this time are generally medically unfit for one reason or another; and while you may be only ten or fifteen per cent disabled from a medical point of view you are one hundred per cent disabled from an employment point of view if you wish to take employment in either of these industries. As a result, men coming back in that category are just unemployed. There is no provision for vocational training; it has not yet been started; there are no schools to send them to; things are at a complete standstill; and if the small bit of war industry which was established in that province during the war is to be done away with we are going to be much worse off than we were in 1939 when this war broke out. When the minister answers, having had a chance to check the facts, I suggest he should set the record straight as to the future of that plate mill in Sydney.

There is another matter about which I should like to jog his memory. For three sessions of this parliament there functioned a reconstruction committee, which, under the capable chairmanship of the hon. member for Cariboo, did a good job. It is one of the best committees on which I have had the pleasure of serving while in this house. It was the duty of that committee to endeavour to get the post-war picture in the field of employment. That committee met and examined witnesses from every class of industry, and they made certain recommendations with respect to the future. The Minister of Munitions is also Minister of Reconstruction. That committee tabled in this house, on Monday, January 24, a report which will be found in No. 39 of the minutes of the reconstruction and reestablishment committee. The committee made certain definite recommendations. This was from the last report. My conception, as a member of that committee, when the report was tabled in the house, was that the minister who would be handling reconstruction in the post-war period would have at his disposal and would hand to his staff the several recommendations made by the committee together with the evidence taken, so that they might plan the future in the field of employment. I wish to call the attention of the minister definitely to a part of that committee's report with respect to the maritimes. It will be found on page four. The committee states:

Your committee has given a great deal of thought to the economic situation of the maritime provinces.

I can say that they did; they discussed the matter thoroughly.

We recommended that in cooperation with these provincial governments the federal government undertake a survey or study of conditions, with the object of advising and helping in the taking of any steps that will bring about an improvement in the economic life of the people of those provinces. This improvement can be brought about in part through a proper development of the fishing industry; through assistance to farming community, by the application of the provisions of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, by the installation of rural electrification, and the extension of cold storage facilities; through proper forest services and extended utilization of forest products; through the introduction of additional secondary industry, where the operation of such industry is economically sound, by reason of proper markets and of primary production within the maritime provinces or in the neighbouring lands, such as Newfoundland.

This inquiry should include the extent, if any, to which the maritimes have suffered because of lack of proper distribution of secondary industry in Canada and also the possibility of securing extended markets—both Canadian and international—for all maritime production.

[Mr. Gillis.]

We are convinced that after the war—if pre-war conditions are permitted to prevail—the Nova Scotia coal industry will not be able to exist without assistance in the marketing of the output of the mines. The coal industry situation would therefore be an important part of the proposed survey.

That has been taken care of.

After the war transportation will play an even more important part than previously in economic development.

This is the part on which I wish to focus the committee's attention.

Therefore, in dealing with conditions in the maritime provinces, we strongly urge that the government give earnest consideration to certain proposed improvements in transportation facilities. These include:

(a) improvements designed to make communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland constant, reliable and adequate;

(b) improvements of transportation across the straits of Canso by the construction of a causeway or in such manner as may be judged most satisfactory, considering the amount of traffic and the conditions of ice, tides and current;

(c) regrading, realigning and double-tracking of the Canadian National railway from Sydney to points in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

Your committee has had a great deal of evidence and some discussion concerning transportation in Canada generally. There are some features of this problem upon which we are not yet ready to report. . . .

Such as matters affecting railways, bus companies, and so on. This matter of bridging the strait of Canso, realigning and double-tracking the main line is a very important part of any national fuel policy that may be set up in Canada. What I am concerned about is this. Though the reconstruction committee, after approximately three years' deliberation, and having discussed the matter from all angles and on many occasions submitted that report to the house, just about a month ago the Minister of Transport had occasion to visit Nova Scotia and in Halifax, either at a meeting or in a press interview, he was questioned on this particular project. The answers he gave at that time would lead everyone in that province to believe that so far as that project was concerned it was just a matter of determining its value as a project that would assist in the war effort. The minister said that the problem would be considered if it was still a problem, but that the maritime provinces, or the people of that area, would have to determine what they would be prepared to pay for the project, and so on.

My conception of his statement was that the report was forgotten; the government had no intention of doing anything about it; the war was over now and the problem was considered to have disappeared. I raise strenuous objection to that, and I should like the minister to clarify the situation when he gives his answers in the house. There is a great deal of interest and much anxiety in Nova Scotia with regard to the post-war period. We had no industry in the province to speak of when the war broke out and what has been established has been gradually siphoned off. The project that we were pinning our faith on in the eastern end, particularly for the purpose of relieving immediate post-war unemployment, was that project across the strait of Canso, in addition to some other little undertakings which the Department of Public Works would likely be carrying on, such as breakwaters and the repair of harbours.

This strait of Canso causeway proposal, in addition to tying the island of Cape Breton to the rest of Canada, would greatly improve the transportation problem from that end and would assist the coal industry. It would be definitely a major project that could be started in that end of the country and would relieve the shock of immediate unemployment on demobilization. I would ask the minister to consider that matter and give an answer when he gets an opportunity.

There is something else I would mention for the minister's benefit. Just before coming into the house I had occasion to meet representatives of the Cape Breton labour council. That consists of delegates of miners from all the different local units. They meet regularly and probe employment possibilities, the extension of social legislation, compensation and matters of that kind. They have also been dealing with selective service in the matter of employment. They received the same answers that I got as far as selective service was concerned. There was no immediate possibilities that they could see of assuring anyone of employment in that end of the country. This labour group took it upon themselves to meet with the regional directors of selective service. Representatives from the office in Moncton were there, and from the local selective service offices in the community as well. The object of the meeting was to discuss ways and means whereby the situation might be improved.

They made one concrete recommendation which I believe, when discussing post-war problems with reference to the mining industry, the minister should know something about, and that is the question of retiring older miners. They proposed at the meeting that the government should examine the possibility of retiring men from the mining industry after they have reached the age of sixty. A lot of people will say that at sixty years of age one is still able to do a good job. That is true in many fields of endeavour but it is not true in coal mining. When you reach fifty-five or sixty years of age in the coal mining industry, particularly if you have been shovelling coal, your back is pretty well broken. You have passed the peak of your maximum productivity. Everyone who knows the industry knows that is true. Let me give an example of what they do in New Zealand. In that country the pensionable age is sixty, but coal miners are pensioned at fifty-five. They are laid off that much sooner because they are broken down that much quicker in that heavy industry.

It was pointed out at the meeting to which I have referred that in that area there were approximately a thousand miners who had passed the age of sixty but were still obliged to work underground because there is no legislation of any kind to help them, or any other employment in which they can be placed. Because of that they must remain in the industry and try to eke out an existence. If the government considered the proposition of taking those thousand miners—and that figure is an approximate one; there may be more and there may be a few less—laying them off and giving them something to live on they would be providing room for a thousand younger men in that industry. Productivity under the ground would be increased in that way and production generally would be increased. It would create employment for the younger men and it would give the men who are worn out in the industry an opportunity of living perhaps a few years longer by getting above ground. That pension could work out something like the burnt-out allowance paid to war veterans. A man burns out much quicker loading coal in a coal mine than by fighting a war because the physical strain is a great deal greater. I can say that with some conviction because I have had some experience in both. The pension so established might work in this way—I am now giving my own opinions only—a man working underground might be given a pension of $40, $50 or $60 a month, or whatever figure was arrived at. After a few months' rest he might feel like doing some other kind of work. If he was able to find some other employment in a lighter industry he could then augment his pension.

Saskatchewan has established a pension for the totally incapacitated father. I am not stating this for political reasons but because it is a fact. It is not very much but it is a start. I understand that the pension or the allowance is only about $10 a month. But the wife also receives an allowance of an equal amount and there is an allowance of $12 for each child. The income is not adequate; it is low, but it is a start. What I am arguing now is the principle that has been established in that province with regard to men who are incapacitated. I consider that those men in the coal industry are incapacitated for the job they are on, but they are obliged to stay on it because there is no other means by which they can obtain a livelihood. I consider that those old men are really a drag on the industry. They have given their best days and have passed their maximum production peak. Money spent by the government in that way to take them out of that heavy industry would be well spent. If those men were retired and rested for a while, given a little sum of money to live on, the chances are they could be routed into some other form of employment and ultimately become gainfully employed at something else. At the same time younger men would get into the industry; production would rise, and probably enough could be collected in taxes on the additional earnings in the industry to offset what may be contributed as pension to the older people who are taken out of the industry.

I rose this afternoon merely to focus attention on the few points that I have made in regard to the maritime provinces because the session will be ending very soon. The Minister of Munitions and Supply and Minister of Reconstruction will be on the job for some considerable time. We do not know when the election will be called, but those who are working on planning the future, reconverting industry and preparing for demobilization must go on. We cannot slacken our efforts. The cabinet will be carrying on that work. I wish to leave those thoughts with the minister because definitely in Nova Scotia the points which I have brought out require clarification if for no other purpose than to relieve the minds of the people there as to their future, which is very uncertain at the present time.

Mr. PICARD: It is customary at this stage to state that we do not intend to speak very long. My intention is only to mention two or three of the different controls that the minister spoke about in his statement. One of them came to be better known to myself because last year one of the war expenditures committees looked into it carefully. I refer to rubber control. As they say, whenever a doctor wants to get a patient to swallow a bitter pill he usually first coats it with sugar. Therefore I will give the compliments first. I think our investigation of the rubber control proved that the investment of over $50,000,000, which may have been criticized in some quarters, was amply justified and was one of the most opportune decisions that the minister has made during the last few years. Had it not been for the construction of the plant at Sarnia, I believe that Canada would not be in the position in which it is to-day to keep its military rolling stock on wheels, and that it would not be possible for the country to keep as many of its civilian needs supplied by the motor vehicle industry.

I should like to refer to the recommendations made by that committee because if the reports of the war expenditures committee or any other committee are to be of any value they should not be buried and not considered. In the last five years the war expenditures committee have made many reports. Some of them were very good, almost all of them were, in my opinion, fair and unbiased, but I think few have received considerable consideration on the part of the cabinet. Anyway, I feel it is my duty, since at the end of last session we did not have an opportunity to discuss the questions that were brought down in the report, to outline to the committee the recommendations of the war expenditures committee. We sat for about twenty-five days, heard about eighteen or twenty witnesses and covered all the activities of the Polymer Corporation Limited, the Fairmont Company Limited, the rubber controller, the motor vehicle controller and also witnesses from the research bureau, the Department of Agriculture on all the technical questions connected with the production of rubber, either natural or synthetic or from plants grown out of the country or in the country. I had not intended to speak on that; therefore, I have no notes, but I think a word should be said about the report that was brought down last year. I should like to read the recommendations of the report. Some of them are really important and should be taken into consideration by the cabinet. They are as follows:

As a result of the survey of the rubber situation in Canada, of the activities of Polymer Corporation Limited, of Fairmont Company Limited, of the rubber controller and the motor vehicle controller, your subcommittee makes the following recommendation:

(a) that a survey be immediately undertaken of Canada's post-war needs in rubber and in motor vehicles.

We had in mind at that time that as part of the reconstruction work it might be useful for the rubber industry to know in advance the expected needs of the country and that they should keep their production schedules in such a state as to be able to meet it within the least possible delay or as quickly as possible after the end of the war.

(b) That proper steps be taken at as early a date as possible, consistent with war conditions, for the conversion of tire producing facilities, at present devoted to special army specifications tires, to civilian needs. That plans be immediately considered to speed up, as soon as war conditions make it possible, the readjustment of the motor vehicle industry from a war-time to peace-time basis with special consideration to the urgent needs of Canadian industry for trucks and other similar conveyances in order to enable the public to reorganize their activities in constructive channels that will necessitate expanded motor transport and the replacement of badly worn out equipment.

Some of our discussions in the committee in this connection were to the effect that it was most important that as soon as it was materially possible the motor vehicle industry should build trucks instead of going into the production of passenger cars, because there is a great demand throughout the country for trucks that are essential to the needs of industry in general. Many trucks have been treated in such a way that companies are left with depleted transportation equipment with which to carry on their operations, and this is particularly so in certain parts of the country. The committee had in mind that it would be a good thing for the department to begin planning now the channels into which the activities of the motor vehicle industry should be directed. They should not be allowed to start publishing wonderful designs of new stream-lined cars, but instead should be required to engage for a certain period after the war in meeting the actual transportation problem and supplying the trucks so badly needed by industry.

The recommendations continue:

(c) That the methods used during war time to stabilize the labour output in the truck manufacturing be extended in the post-war period to all the automotive industry in order to avoid the alternate peak loads and low ebbs of labour experienced in that industry before the war and that proved so disturbing to economic conditions in areas where the motor industry is located.

Our committee was told that prior to the war, in connection with trucks as well as passenger cars at certain periods of the year new models were produced in vast quantities, requiring large numbers of men; that as soon as these models were on the market the number of men employed was reduced, so that there would be high peak loads and low ebbs in the employment of men in the motor vehicle industry, greatly disturbing the economic conditions of the areas where the motor industry is located. We were told that during the war the controllers were able to stabilize the situation to a certain extent; that the production of trucks had been averaged over a period of twelve months, in order to employ about the same number of men continuously. As few as possible were employed, so that the remainder could work in other war industries or go into the army, but approximately the same number of men were kept employed all year. The committee was of the opinion that such controls should be continued after the war to regulate the production of trucks as well as passenger cars on a yearly basis, so that the labour market would not be disturbed periodically by peak demands at certain periods of the year and very low demands at others, resulting from the fact that new models perhaps would not sell as quickly as had been anticipated and the men would have to wait for the installation of the machine tools for the production of later models. The fourth recommendation was:

(d) That the research work pursued at the national research council and in the Department of Agriculture on synthetic rubber and on the possibility of producing rubber from Canadian plants be further encouraged by the inclusion in the next estimates of substantial amounts specially devoted to that work.

We thought, if I may speak for the committee, or certainly I thought the work that had been done by the national research council was such that larger sums of money should be devoted for that purpose. Whether or not these developments have reached the stage where local plants can be developed to produce Canadian rubber, these experiments are still well worth while carrying on. We have been spreading money around so lavishly that a few thousand dollars more for research in that field which, with the development of science, might free us from the need of obtaining natural rubber from other countries, would be well worth while. The fifth recommendation was:

(e) That in the post-war period the Sarnia plant remain with Polymer Corporation Limited, as a government-owned company.

Here we may be entering into a controversy, but personally I firmly believe that since this has been started as a government-owned project it would be folly to place it on the market, through one or other of the government organizations, and have it operated by a private company. I believe it should be carried on, as during the war, as a government-owned company. As I said, here we may be entering the field of legislation in connection with other than strictly business matters, and engaging in the controversy as to the relative merits of private and publicly owned companies; so that without going into any more detail I will just say that I was one of those who believed it was necessary that after the war such a company as had been entirely financed by the government should continue as a government project and should not be put into the hands, by purchase or otherwise, of private interests.

The last recommendation in our report was:

That as soon as is convenient after the war is over Polymer Corporation Limited readjust its relationship with the companies presently administering the different plants with a view to Polymer as a government-owned company operating and administering all these plants itself.

There again we come up against the discussion as to public ownership versus private ownership. I believe the present system has worked to the advantage of the country during the war, but I also believe that all these companies which have been administering the affairs of the Polymer corporation in connection with the production of rubber should be brought within the general scheme of the company, so that we might have one big unit operating the plant. I agree with those who think that if we had not gone to the private companies already operating such plants in the United States it would have been impossible to find the experts to run the plants in our own country. I believe we did the right thing at that time, but now that we have trained men in Canada to carry on this work I do not see why the country should not carry on the project itself, since the whole thing has been financed by the country. The rubber industry may come along and say this may provide competition for them. Some officials of the rubber companies have said that it might be a good thing to have such competition. During the war they have evolved processes for treating this rubber to the point where we are told that a certain proportion of natural rubber combined with synthetic rubber will produce better results. Scientific development and research are going on continually up to the point where, after the war, we may avoid paying to the rubber trust or combine which existed at one time the high prices which at times have been paid. Since this synthetic rubber will be produced, according to the figures shown to us, at a very low price, let us say something below twenty cents, or around sixteen or seventeen cents a pound, it would be at a price which would correspond favourably with natural rubber prices, and might have the added result of stabilizing the market, and preventing ups and downs in that market.

That, Mr. Chairman, completes the recommendations made in our report last year with respect to rubber control. I am glad to see the minister refers to that matter, and says that the company has carried on up to schedule. Although unfortunately it will not be possible to make as many passenger cars available to the public as they might wish, he points out, however, that conditions will be better.

If conditions are better, the public should realize it is because the government looked far enough ahead and organized the plant at Sarnia. For that reason more cars can now be equipped with tires than would have been possible otherwise. We would have been without tires for civilian needs, and our war machinery would have been seriously hampered, had it not been for that plant. I think that, generally, the public has a right to be satisfied.

The nigger in the woodpile in our report last year concerned motor vehicles control. I still have the same views I had last year, that this has been far from being as well administered as the rubber control, so far as the distribution of tires is concerned. We have not been able to get from the motor vehicles control any set of definite rules, with the exception of the statement that they would supply trucks to essential users. But, as in any good dictatorship, the decision as to "essential user" was left in the hands of the controller or his representative. But no such set of rules was produced or given to us by the motor vehicles controller as was produced by the other controllers, and especially that applying to rubber, where the nature of the operations of car owners would to a considerable extent determine the granting of a permit.

Perhaps I might quote from the same report from which I quoted a moment ago. It said this:

"Your subcommittee got a report on the distribution of permits to large categories of users but no report was available of the number of permits granted in each province or in each district of the wartime prices and trade board, as had been supplied for tires by the rubber controller. Your subcommittee is of opinion that a better picture of the permit distribution would have been available to the public had there been supplied to it a more elaborate detail of categories of users to whom permits were granted and a report as to the numbers supplied to each district of the wartime prices and trade board.

The subcommittee was told that there were no records existing——at the time. I have been told since that this procedure has been started since that time. We were told at the time that it was a very difficult process, and a very hard procedure to get these detailed reports.

The subcommittee was told that there were no records existing of distribution by provinces or districts nor was there a breakdown of items to determine how many had gone respectively to mining, oil, lumber, farming, etc. . . .

Industries were grouped together, but that did not give the committee a satisfactory answer to our request.

Repeatedly the subcommittee was told that the controllers office had work "not on distribution generally but on the essential features of each case". . . .

But if we carry on in this report we find out that we can find no specific rules, no rigid rules. At every moment we were told they were given to essential users.

At this point I would quote a few questions and answers from the committee's report:

Mr. Factor: It does, to this extent, that there is no definition of essentiality. It is left entirely to the judgment of the controller under the procedure.

Mr. Berry: I think that is a fair appreciation of the situation.

The Chairman: You mean the controller, or whoever his power is delegated to, decides and determines whether or not the application constitutes an essential application or an application for an essential user, and it is up to the controller or to his delegates to determine the essentiality?

Mr. Berry: Yes.

The Chairman: It is not specially defined but is rather left open for determination by the controller or his representative?

Mr. Berry: That is it.

Mr. Birchard: Except that he must be an essential user.

The Chairman: Yes, but the word essential user is left for determination by the controller or his delegates.

That is what prompted at the time the last sentence of our report with respect to motor vehicles control, which stated:

From the evidence it is therefore very difficult for the subcommittee to arrive at any conclusion as to the operation of this phase of the controller's work, except as to hope that the decisions of the controller and his assistants were fair and unbiased and that complaints heard at times in the public were not justified.

That is as much as we could do, because we could not be given enough information or details to satisfy us that there was any rule. The complaint I have to that is that, even now, only a small number of trucks are produced, and a large number of people are wanting them. From day to day more and more old trucks are going out of use. Agriculture and industry are in need of transportation facilities, and some of them are hampered now to the extent that they are faced with a serious problem.

It is all very well to say that conditions are fairly good, and to attribute the condition to the fact that we have to import some of the trucks from the United States. Yet, the truest sentence in that section of the minister's statement respecting motor vehicles control is the one where he states that current supply is far short of the demand.

That is quite true, and I suppose we cannot do anything about the matter. But the trouble is with the distribution. I say there is a condition prevailing there which is far from good. For instance, some people in the fall of the year will ask for a truck to carry out their operations in the following spring. I have seen that happen in my own district, when we are snowed in in the winter. Trucks will be brought in in the fall, and the garage operator will say that the truck is a 1928 model, possibly, that it has already run too many miles, and that it cannot be repaired.

Under those circumstances a man puts in his request, and files his form to get a new truck. He is told right away, "We cannot consider it now, because the roads are closed and you do not need it. We will look into it next spring." Then, next spring, instead of having these application forms considered at a given time, the man is forced to make out a new application. He may not know that, and may be carrying on in the hope that the application he made in the preceding fall will finally be considered after the snow has disappeared. Then he is told, "You have not submitted an application"—and he has to start all over again. This takes a long time in the spring of the year, when the roads are closed. I am thinking particularly of the lumbering industry in Quebec. The timber controller should have something to say as to the essentiality of the passage of timber from one district to another.

In my province the lumber industry, generally, is beyond access in the winter. The men who are operating there, and who wish to bring down their wood and lumber in the spring of the year cannot do so because their trucks are not available when the roads are open. Their application has not been considered.

The case has been brought to my attention of a man who had a permit last year and was considered an essential user. Although he got his permit he could not find in that district a truck, but in February or March of this year he located in the city of Quebec a new truck and produced his permit. But the permit had expired. So that now he finds he has to start all over again. He has a contract with the railways for ties, and last year he was admitted to be an essential user and was given a permit but could not get a truck. Now he finds out, when he has located a truck this year, that his permit has expired and that he is no more an essential user. The controller says that the essentiality has changed and that he cannot get a permit.

There are many other cases. There is the case of the man who is the only trucker in his village. He has a permit from the Quebec public service commission as a public trucker, the only one in the village. He has been asking for a permit since last August. His car is badly out of order and will not work at all, and he has waited and waited and cannot get a decision. This situation applies not only in the lumber industry but to the bringing of fuel wood into the city. Recently the minister warned the people to make provision for their next winter's supply of fuel wood, but it is hard to see at times how the fuel wood can be transported.

It is all very well to present statistics and say that so many thousand cords are to be cut and drawn, but where can you get the trucks to draw it? The people in a certain village have so many cords of wood, and no trucks, and that will happen again if the controller here does not understand the situation with respect to fuel wood better than he understands the lumber situation.

There is similar difficulty in the transport of milk. The city of Quebec is dependent for its milk supply upon the rural districts surrounding the city, as are all other big cities. Trucks engaging in that industry have been operating fairly well to the advantage of the large dairies who probably know better how to fill out their application forms, but there are many men who are not organized into companies and who gather milk in the rural districts and bring it into the city of Quebec. Their trucks were beyond hope of repair. They had a hard time to get a hearing from the controller. The investigations took a long time, and finally their applications were turned down. I admit that the milk industry does not suffer so much as the lumber industry, because the big dairies in the city—whether they have an expert to frame their applications or not I do not know—have, I am informed, certain satisfaction. But in my district there are many cooperatives who applied last fall for trucks to bring in milk to the cities, and they have not been able to get them.

The same difficulty is found not only in the timber industry, as I have said and in the milk industry but among general truckers also. In many villages they are entirely dependent upon a new supply of trucks to bring into the city the products of the surrounding districts. We have villages that are from ten to twelve miles from a railway station, and in the winter they really have a hard time. They have to use sleighs to take the products to the station.

In the summer they get their products delivered fairly easily, but the great need is to have somebody in the motor vehicle controller's office who understands the needs of their district. The whole question of motor vehicle control needs to be reconsidered and the machinery overhauled. I do not expect that it can be done in the short time that is left at our disposal before the election, but I would be remiss in my duty if I did not bring the situation to the attention of the minister and the committee. There is a deficiency somewhere in the departmental organization. First of all, the investigation takes too long. Primarily the application is made to Ottawa, but as the hon. member for Temiscouata said the other day, requests written in the French language have often been sent to Ottawa. That means they have to be translated, and afterwards they have to go before the revisers of permits, or whatever the title of that position may be, and it takes a long time. But I can say to the hon. member for Temiscouata that some of the requests that I have drafted in fairly good English have taken a long time too. But it is worse, as the hon. member for Temiscouata points out, when the poor devil gets a form in French, fills it in to the best of his ability, then has to go to the motor vehicles dealer and get a report on his truck and then send that to Ottawa, as he is supposed to do. The investigator first has the application translated; then he has to find out whether the truck is needed or not, so that it often takes two weeks or a month or maybe two months before the application reaches the desk of the man who has to make the decision. I do not like to bring in any element of the racial origin of people in that department, but it might have been fairer if there had been a few more people in that branch who could have understood the needs of the people of the province of Quebec, and then perhaps we would not have had to wait a long time for a decision. But even when the applications are made out in English they take half as long to be dealt with—too long a time altogether. If there were a few more people in that branch who understood the situation, the representations that are made could be dealt with more quickly and a decision could be given more quickly. But as things are at the present time the conditions in the lumber industry and in the milk and dairy industry in the province of Quebec with respect to getting satisfaction from the motor vehicles control branch are bad. I do not mean to say that they are worse than in the rest of the country, but I know they are bad in my province.

I might be answered that there is a war on and that it is impossible to have conditions perfect. That is true. The fact is that there are only a certain number of trucks and three or four times that number of people who want to use them, and that makes control necessary. We have had control over tires but we get a just and equitable distribution of tires, with very few complaints, and when a complaint is made it is soon dealt with. But when it comes to the distribution of the available trucks, how is it that we do not get the same consideration and the same efficient service that we receive from the rubber controller.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. PICARD: When the committee rose at six o'clock I was about to speak on the subject of the control of building construction. I see in the statement of the minister at page 750 of Hansard that conditions have—made it imperative that we continue strict control of the licensing of construction projects. In determining the priorities for building permits, we have tried to take account of urgent housing needs.

To this I have absolutely no objection. It is a sane approach to the solution of the problem of distributing fairly the construction materials and the labour available for the construction industry, the building trades. But there, again, I have another objection to the method of applying the control, similar to the one I made this afternoon to the motor vehicle control. I think the application of the rules which have been set up in the department, if we take the statement of the minister as the exact meaning of his words, has been followed in a very queer way. I see here the expression "urgent housing needs". We have seen projects being built in the city of Quebec the need of which is hardly justified for housing or other purposes, while at the same time in many of the adjoining districts permits for purposes which were fair and just, which should have been granted because of the need for housing and for accommodation, have been rejected, although they involved the use of much less in the way of needed materials than did some of the constructions which have been permitted in the city of Quebec.

May I be permitted to refer to one case? It always seems to me undesirable to stop being objective and to depict a problem or a question by some particular instance, but I think it is the only way to illustrate the argument. I have here a case where the conversion of a school was badly needed. A permit was asked for in July, and was rejected. The intention was to convert a school building into a convent in order to have better teaching, with more teachers, and to accommodate the teachers in the building. Because there was not in the department anybody acquainted with conditions in Quebec, they kindly suggested that the nuns should find rooms in different houses in the community. Maybe the nuns would have liked it, but it was, I think, against the rules of their order. The letter received from Ottawa was to the effect that it would be much more economical if they could find rooms for the teachers in the village. The permit required was of the amount of only $4,500, for the purpose of converting a large school building which was not equipped for winter accommodation and was divided into two large halls, in each of which were held three different classes. The application was to divide the ground floor into four different rooms, in each of which a different grade could be taught, while the second floor would house the teachers. It took three months of correspondence before we could get one of the assistant commissioners to see the point. I will frankly admit that I probably did the wrong thing: I told them that they were so far away from any controller that they might go ahead with the project. In fact, the permit came on the day the nuns entered the building at the end of October. The school term could not have been started had they waited for the permit. Another queer thing was that at one time, when they needed a plumbing outfit, they asked for a permit for that purpose and got it. They could not get the permit to make alterations but they got a permit to install the plumbing. Finally, on October 21, it dawned on the department that they might ask the superintendent of education of Quebec whether it was advisable to grant the permit; and the answer, contrary to all the department had maintained, was that instead of reducing the housing accommodation it would provide better schooling and everybody in the village would be much better off, that the department would lose no essential war materials, and that the workers employed there were local farmers who did the work in their spare time. If I had not been bold enough to tell these people to go ahead with their construction the school term could not have begun in October, because the permit was not received until the end of that month. If at that time there had been in the department an architect or an engineer who knew conditions there or who had been careful enough to inquire what the superintendent of education of Quebec had to say on the matter, that delay would not have occurred and I would not have been forced to do something which was not strictly proper.

Here is another case. A large institution, accommodating 2,500 people, needed a barn to house 120 head of cattle and various farm products in the winter. A request was made in 1943. They wanted a steel structure, but they were told that that was impossible, so that early in the spring of 1944 they changed the plans. The only thing they then needed was reinforced concrete for the lower floor, the balance of the building to be in wood. Yet they never got the permit. The correspondence has been carried on, and it was insisted that they should get along with the accommodation they had at the time. I have copies of letters which have been sent to the department stating that part of their production last fall could not be housed; they had no convenient place in which to put their vegetables; they had to sell part of their cattle because proper accommodation could not be had, and the old barn was falling to pieces. Again, I say that if there had been in the department somebody who wanted to deal fairly with the situation, a condition like that would not exist.

At the same time the government of the province of Quebec applied to Ottawa for permission to erect a huge building to house the workmen's compensation administration. These people were located in other government buildings, but they wanted to spread out a little and have a nicer place. At first, I am told, Ottawa refused the permit. The Quebec government then bought an adjoining building, a former Church of England convent—one of the only two, I am told, in existence in Canada—and then a request was made for an addition or an extension to the existing building. As it then stood, the building was two floors high and probably sixty feet long. The extension has eight floors, is 175 feet long and, compared with the first building, is a huge structure. They needed steel and reinforced concrete. The place was not required for housing accommodation, and it did not improve in any way housing conditions in the city of Quebec. As I have said, the permit was refused at first to a certain party, but when presented to the department by another engineer it was finally approved as repairs and additions to the existing building.

These are just illustrations. To some they may seem of small account. Yet how can the people have confidence in the administration of a control when such examples are known to them? I am far from pleased to have to say this, but in all justice and equity, and even if it is of no use because we are at the end of a session, I thought I should bring this matter before the committee.

I repeat that I dislike, and have never brought up in this house, the question of the racial origin of employees in departments, but if in each of the sections of the Department of Munitions and Supply there were a fair proportion of French-speaking employees they could avoid delays in the translation of correspondence, which at times takes weeks and months; and if there were a French Canadian employee connected with the head of the branch in any capacity who could look into these matters and give his opinion right away, these delays would be avoided.

That applies as well to construction control. There we might have had bilingual people who knew the local conditions better. The minister has found as his parliamentary assistant one of the brightest young men in the other racial group. Why could he not have tried the same experiment in the different branches of his department? In reply to a question asked by a member from the province of Quebec in 1940, as to why there were not more bilingual people from that province in the different departments, the statement was made that there was no accommodation for them. Since then, however, buildings have mushroomed in the city; there is a great deal more accommodation than at that time, and the number of French-speaking employees has not increased. Why does he not apply the same principle as in the case of his parliamentary assistant and look for able young assistants in the ranks of the other racial group? Let him apply that principle to his own department. As regards the higher-ups in the department, the only man who answered to the minister's requirements was a charming gentleman from Montreal who happens to be a friend of the minister, as he is a friend of mine. I refer to Mr. Wilfrid Gagnon. If the minister would only widen the scope of his friends in Quebec we might get a few more able young men in the department, and if the hon. gentleman comes in after the next election I hope he will act on this suggestion. Whether by that time the minister has succeeded in bringing Mr. Gagnon into a higher sphere, as some rumours have it, or whether for another reason the services of Mr. Gagnon could no more be secured, I hope the minister might widen the scope of his acquaintances in Quebec so as to bring in his department some more bright men of French-Canadian origin.

Mr. GRAYDON: What does my hon. friend mean by the "higher sphere"?

Mr. PICARD: A higher sphere than the department might be the cabinet. I do not know.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does my hon. friend suggest that Mr. Gagnon should join the cabinet?

Mr. PICARD: I am not suggesting anything. I say that there are such rumours, and if the minister succeeds in lifting his friend to the higher sphere he will have to be replaced, in the posts he previously held.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is Mr. Gagnon a Liberal?

Mr. PICARD: I think so.

Mr. GRAYDON: Then the hon. member had better not count too much on that.

Mr. PICARD: I do not agree with the hon. member. Whether the present Minister of Munitions and Supply is then in that portfolio or not, the Liberal party will be there to conduct the affairs of the country after the next election.

Mr. GERSHAW: The last speaker told of the difficulties in his district in getting permits for trucks. The condition is general, and in Alberta where the needs have been great and the distances considerable we, too, have had much trouble in getting these permits. But the people of Canada realize that rationing is sharing and they have loyally submitted to restrictions because they know what a difficult position the department is in.

There are few men in Canada who have as great a knowledge of industrial construction and of industry generally as the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). He has had a difficult job and has rendered great service as Minister of Munitions and Supply. I believe the whole reconstruction problem of converting the industry of Canada from a war-time to a peace-time basis will be safe in his hands.

I would call the attention of the committee to one post-war activity which I believe will bring rich results to the people of Canada. I refer to the irrigation problem in the dried-out districts of southern Alberta. We know of two projects there which have been surveyed and re-surveyed. At a cost of $20 million spread over six or seven years they could be completed. Four hundred thousand acres of land which is now of no use could be made productive and it would add greatly to the output of products that are needed in Canada. I refer to the Redcliff-Ronelane and St. Mary projects.

It is said that in Canada we have too much wheat and too little meat, but the reclaiming of this area would make it possible for the farmers who might locate there to produce meat, vegetables and fruits which are needed in the diet of the average Canadian. Canadians do not have sufficient dairy products, fruits and vegetables. They have not sufficient meat or eggs, and the reclaiming of this area would do much to help in the nutrition of Canadians. Sugar factories could also be constructed, as well as canning factories, quick freezing plants, so that these fruits and vegetables could be processed and used the whole year round. Moreover, the reclaiming of this area has been proven to be feasible. There are already practical schemes in operation in both districts and the water supply is available. If the projects could be completed where the ditch is already constructed the present irrigation districts would have more water and new areas could be brought under cultivation. This is badly needed if we are to save the waters of these international streams which may go to another country if they are not used here. In addition, the developing of these districts would provide homes for those who have suffered so much in their struggle to eke out an existence in the dried-out area, and also homes for many who are returning from the battlefields and are anxious to make a living on the land.

Mr. BROOKS: There are a good many speakers on the list and I am sure no one wants to take up too much time, but I wish to mention a matter that is very important to my section of New Brunswick. It was brought to my mind particularly this afternoon as I listened to the hon. member for Davenport and the hon. member for Cape Breton South. It has to do with the coal mine situation in New Brunswick. We have a small coal area in New Brunswick, but although it is small it is very important to the economy of the province. It represents about two per cent of the net value of all commodities produced in the province. While this area in New Brunswick is small, it is one of the oldest bituminous coal mining districts in North America. It is mentioned in history, in 1667; and in the seventeenth century coal was being shipped from the Grand lake area in New Brunswick to Boston.

Its importance can be emphasized in this way. It has grown until we now employ some 1,400 men in the industry and the livelihood of over 6,000 people is dependent upon it. We have as our market principally the province of New Brunswick. The hon. member for Davenport this afternoon mentioned the possibility of shipping maritime coal to Ontario, Quebec and other parts of Canada. We in New Brunswick have not shipped coal to Ontario; it is not feasible. We have shipped small quantities to the province of Quebec and small quantities to the state of Maine. But our important market—and I should like to emphasize this—is our own province of New Brunswick. The chief buyers of New Brunswick coal are the two railways, the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific. We also sell quite large quantities to the pulp and paper mills in our province, to the New Brunswick electric power commission, and then a certain proportion, about twenty-five to thirty per cent, is sold as consumer coal. I might point out to the minister—and I am sure this is a fact of which he is well aware—what we consider to be very unfair competition from the coal mines in Nova Scotia. Prior to the war this industry was being operated at a loss by a good many of the coal operators in the Minto district. Because of the great necessity for coal in the eastern provinces during the war particularly, the Minto mines have been operating almost to capacity. We are afraid that after the war a situation will again develop which will work to the detriment of the coal industry in New Brunswick.

To illustrate to the minister and to the committee the unfair competition from which we are suffering I shall quote from the submission of the New Brunswick coal producers association to the royal commission. I am reading from page 36:

A comparison of the subvention expenditures in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick in 1939 shows a marked difference on a per ton basis. The subvention paid per ton of coal moved from Nova Scotia was $1.23 as against 84 cents in New Brunswick. In terms of total output of the two provinces in that year (7,051,176 tons in Nova Scotia, 468,421 tons in New Brunswick) Nova Scotia received assistance at the rate of 42.3 cents per ton of coal produced, compared with 9.7 cents in New Brunswick.

I think anyone can see the unfairness exemplified in that statement. I should also like to state here and now that the coal producers of the Minto-Chipman area of New Brunswick approve whole-heartedly all the assistance that has been given the industry in Nova Scotia. They do not in any way wish to have that help or assistance lessened. But what they do ask is that the coal industry in New Brunswick be placed on the same footing as the coal industry in Nova Scotia. May I indicate further how this competition is most unfair to our coal producers? I said a few moments ago that the pulp and paper industry in New Brunswick takes a very large proportion of our coal and would take a much larger proportion if it were not for competition such as I have mentioned. I again read from the submission to the commission:

On a basis of freight per ton, some of the rates from Springhill Junction, Nova Scotia, are lower than rates from the Minto field to the same points in New Brunswick, as shown in the following figures.

From Minto to Bathurst the rate is $1.10 for 169 miles; from Springhill Junction, 80 cents for 188 miles; from Minto to Campbellton, New Brunswick, $1.50 per ton for 234 miles; from Springhill, $1.20 per ton for 253 miles. From Minto to Dalhousie, New Brunswick, the rate is $1.30 for 231 miles; from Springhill, $1.10 for 250 miles; from Minto to Saint John, 90 cents per ton for 101 miles, and from Springhill, 85 cents per ton, 155 miles.

It can be seen from these comparisons that the rate structure applied to the movement of coal from Nova Scotia to New Brunswick bears no relationship to the cost of service.

By quoting these two examples I believe I have illustrated the point I wish to make, namely, that the coal produced in New Brunswick is not receiving the assistance it should, and is not being placed on a fair basis with coal from the neighbouring province of Nova Scotia.

I should also point out that while we in New Brunswick are confined almost entirely to our own province, Nova Scotia can, does and should be given an opportunity in a larger sense to ship coal to Ontario and other parts of Canada and leave to this small province and this small area the coal that is produced in our own province. My desk-mate, the hon. member for Davenport, said this afternoon that all areas of Canada should work together as far as possible to assist those areas which need assistance. I recall that when I was overseas a few months ago I had the pleasure of meeting Sir Andrew Rae Duncan, and having a talk with him. It will be remembered that he is the gentleman who prepared the Duncan report on the maritime provinces. He told me that we in the maritimes were a long-suffering people because, according to his views and ours, the Duncan report has never been implemented. He also said that in certain parts of Great Britain there were areas that were not self-supporting. I believe he called them development areas. He also said that Great Britain under her reconstruction policy would see that those areas were helped by other areas and by the whole country. He pointed out, and I think I can point out to the committee, that the problem we have in this small area of New Brunswick is not the responsibility of the area only; it is not the responsibility of New Brunswick only; it is the responsibility of the whole Dominion of Canada. Sir Andrew Rae Duncan mentioned the coal mining area of Durham, the northern part of England and of Wales. He also mentioned other sections of England which would be helped by the whole country of Great Britain. I am satisfied that unless proper assistance is given to the area to which I refer it cannot be self-supporting and self-sustaining. It is the responsibility of the whole Dominion of Canada to see that proper assistance is given. Certain recommendations are made in this submission to the commission. I hope they will be fully implemented. I hope that the minister will see they are implemented and, as I said before, I hope that this matter will receive the careful consideration of the Minister of Reconstruction.

Mr. PERLEY: I am sure we all listened last night with a great deal of interest to the report and review that the minister gave of his department and the different phases of its work. I know we all agree that this department is possibly one of the most important departments that has anything to do with the war. If it had not been for the equipment and supplies provided for our men overseas they could never have made the progress and the success they are making to-day. Therefore we must give credit to the department that has been responsible for supplying the munitions and other materials necessary for these men to do that job.

I am not going to go into the minister's remarks in any great detail. He spoke about questions pertaining to reconstruction since he is the minister responsible for that department. He spoke about coal supplies, gas supplies and the like. I think the hon. member for Davenport covered that phase of the minister's remarks very well this afternoon and made a request for consideration of developing western Canada which would mean a great deal in providing jobs for the men when they come back and go a long way toward solving the question of employment when the war is over. The hon. member dealt with such matters as water conservation, power projects and other developments of one kind and another, and showed what it would mean by way of creating employment if we had a proper development of the resources of the three prairie provinces, and particularly Saskatchewan. I trust the minister will give serious consideration to the suggestions put forth by the hon. member for Davenport who,

I am glad to note, in the last few years has become interested in western Canada. When he goes out there now he can draw a grand crowd any time he wishes to speak. I heard him address a crowd who filled the hall because they felt here was a man from eastern Canada who was taking a real interest in the west. That is why I hope the minister will give consideration to some of the measures outlined by the hon. member to help create jobs after the war is over.

Last evening, just before the house adjourned, the minister stated that to-day he would make a statement with respect to farm implements. He had dealt with the question of industrial implements, machines and things of that kind, and in reply to a question by the hon. member for Haldimand said that to-day he would make a statement outlining the position with regard to farm machinery. The supply of implements for the farmers is an important matter in Canada at the present time. Many of our farmers have been working under very difficult conditions, and their old machinery is pretty well worn out. Many of them have sons overseas; they have been working by themselves, and they need new equipment, not only tractors which come from the United States but machinery that is produced in Canada. In addition, many of the boys who come back will go on farms under the Veterans' Land Act, and it is important that consideration be given to supplying the implements that are required to replace the worn-out machinery, and the implements that will be necessary to get these young men started. I hope the minister will give us a statement outlining the farm implement situation as it affects western Canada.

Mr. QUELCH: Mr. Chairman, the special committee on reconstruction and rehabilitation, under the able chairmanship of the hon. member for Cariboo, listened to representations from provinces and municipalities dealing with post-war plans within their boundaries. We found that progress in drawing up blueprints was somewhat curtailed because of the uncertainty as to what body would be responsible for financing such plans. As a matter of fact I recall that the premier of Manitoba emphasized the fact that he was unwilling to raise the hopes of the people of his province by suggesting that this or that project could be carried out before he received the assurance of the federal government that the necessary financing would be provided. He made it quite clear that it would be impossible for Manitoba to finance some of the larger projects in which they were interested, and that until he received the assurance of the federal government in regard to this matter he was not prepared to go ahead.

I should like to give an example of the sort of uncertainty that is being created by the absence of such a declaration. I wish to deal with the question of irrigation in the drought areas of Alberta. I have in mind one of the largest schemes ever produced on the continent of North America; that is the William Pearce project. The first survey was made back in 1922, and the purpose of the project was to irrigate a million and a half acres of land, one million in Saskatchewan and half a million in Alberta, at a cost of around $100,000,000. The water for this project was to be diverted from the North Saskatchewan river into the Red Deer river, and then by canal down to Sullivan lake. Nothing happened as a result of that survey. In 1938-39 a number of new surveys were conducted. At that time the proposal was still to utilize the water of the North Saskatchewan river, and provision was made also for a number of power projects, which of course, as the minister will realize, are very much needed in Alberta if we are ever to have the industries we need in that province. Nothing came about as a result of those surveys, no doubt on account of the outbreak of war.

This question of irrigating land in Alberta by diverting water from the North Saskatchewan river into the Red Deer river was discussed in the house committee on reconstruction and a good deal of opposition developed to the diversion of this water. I believe the hon. member for Davenport is well acquainted with the type of opposition I have in mind, because he was one of the hon. members who pointed out that such opposition would be met. As a result of that opposition I wrote to the superintendent under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act asking whether or not it would be possible to develop the irrigation scheme in Alberta by utilizing the waters of the Red Deer river alone. Mind you, under the original project in 1922 it was intended to irrigate only about half a million acres in Alberta, the other million acres being in Saskatchewan. It seemed to me it should be possible to provide water from the Red Deer river alone for the purpose of irrigating land in Alberta, leaving the people of Saskatchewan to irrigate their land from the North or South Saskatchewan river within their own province. The reply I received from Mr. Spence indicated a good deal of uncertainty as to whether or not it would be feasible to irrigate any large area of land from the Red Deer river. He said that if the irrigation were carried out it would be necessary to establish large reservoirs on the river or up in the mountains.

A new survey was undertaken in 1944, and I believe is still being carried on. This survey shows that it should be possible to irrigate about a half a million acres in Alberta by using the waters of the Red Deer river alone. The proposal is to place a dam on the Red Deer somewhere near the Content bridge, then carry the water by ditch over to Hamilton lake, and at the same time raise the level of Buffalo lake to what it was in former years. The estimated cost of this project would be only about $7,000,000. It is interesting to note that under the original project it would have cost $100,000,000 to irrigate a million and a half acres of land in Alberta and Saskatchewan. Under a modification of that scheme it would have cost around $23,000,000 to irrigate about 427,000 acres in Alberta. Under the scheme at present proposed it will cost only some $6,750,000 to irrigate about half a million acres in Alberta; and of course the people of this area are only interested in irrigation in Alberta. If the people of Saskatchewan prefer to irrigate their land from the Saskatchewan river, I know of no reason why they should not do so.

This scheme would provide work for 1,500 men for a period of eighteen months, and the benefits to be derived from the project would include among others, the following. First of all, it would provide irrigation for half a million acres of land and would supply water for over twelve hundred miles of creek that is dry to-day. It would make that area into one of the best farming districts in the west; and it must be remembered that services already have been established there. We would not be faced, as we would in a new country, with the cost of building up roads, railways, towns and so on. It would be possible to establish 7,500 new families in the area, or in other words to increase the population by something in the neighbourhood of thirty thousand people, of course in addition to rehabilitating the families already there.

As I say, it would provide for the raising of Buffalo lake. At one time Buffalo lake used to be a fine summer resort—good fishing, boating and swimming. It is the only lake for a hundred miles to the south and to the east, and therefore it draws support from a large area as a summer resort. But unfortunately, ever since 1916, that lake has steadily gone down, until to-day we find that summer cottages which used to be at the edge of the water are now a hundred yards away from it. The result is that one finds a long expanse of somewhat stagnant beach. In addition, the scheme would provide for the development of power on Red Deer river, which is much needed in Alberta.

I might point out that the people of the area are very much concerned as to whether or not the government is in reality going to go ahead with that scheme. Then we have the question of the railways. There is a Canadian National line from Scapa, running into Saskatchewan, which was built just before the depression years, and has never been completed. The steel was laid, and the line was ballasted as far as Hemaruka, but from Hemaruka to Scapa the ballast was never completed. The president of the Canadian National Railways takes the stand that there is not a sufficient amount of business in the area to justify the expense of ballasting the line. But he admits that if irrigation were carried out in the area the picture would be entirely different, and that the company might be justified going to the expense of completing the line.

It must be evidence that the only way of financing a scheme of that kind would be to finance it as a national project. It is altogether too much for a province to go ahead with, because it cannot stand the financial cost. We cannot expect private enterprise to carry it out, for the simple reason that you cannot charge the capital cost of irrigation against the land of the farmer. The history of the Canadian Pacific Railway Colonization company proves conclusively that you cannot charge that cost against the land; otherwise you would bankrupt the farmer. Once the irrigation project has been completed and the cost absorbed, the farmer would be in a position to take care of the maintenance of the project.

If the federal government were to finance a scheme of that kind as a national project, and absorb the cost, they could very well look upon it as a self-liquidating project, because as a result of the increased production they would be well reimbursed through the increase in taxation and excise duties collected. In addition, they would be relieved of the financial responsibility of maintaining that drought area in times of extreme drought, such as we have had in the past.

It is interesting to note that from 1918 to 1935 in the drought area of Alberta over $10,000,000 was paid out in relief. Since 1935 hundreds of thousands of dollars have been paid out under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and feed relief measures. If irrigation were put into the area a large amount of that expense would be eliminated. So that again I say that a scheme of that kind might very well be looked upon as a self-liquidating project, on the one hand through increased revenue and on the other hand through the lessening of liability.

And, mind you, the federal government has a direct responsibility in so far as that liability is concerned, because it was the federal government that urged the people to settle in the area in the early part of 1900. It will be remembered that back in 1908 and 1909 large posters were put up in England telling the farmers to come out to this country. When they went to the land titles offices to locate land they were not warned that the drought area was not suitable for settlement. Yet the federal government at that time had the reports of engineers showing conclusively that that land was not fit for settlement. Despite that fact, it allowed farmers to settle in there, with the result that the history of the area has been a tragic one. Millions of dollars of investment have been wiped out. Over sixty per cent of the population has had to move out. Now you find mile after mile without habitation.

I think it should be possible for the federal government to make an announcement in the very near future regarding its policy in regard to the financing of national projects, not only the one to which I have referred, but all national projects of a similar nature. If that were done it would greatly build up the confidence of the people regarding what is to happen in the post-war world. And we know this, that if we once allow the confidence of the people to be destroyed it will be a much harder problem to obtain a full development of the resources of this country afterwards.

I should like to mention one other thing—and I do not wish to be accused of indulging in any political attack when I do so. Nevertheless people are becoming somewhat sceptical of the way in which surveys are conducted. It seems that the government get busy making surveys just before an election, and after the election they seem to forget about them, and nothing is done. That happened in 1938-39; and now we have this project surveyed in 1944 just prior to an election. The people are wondering whether it is just another way of trying to obtain votes to support a government, and when the government is re-elected the project will be forgotten. Up to the present time no department of this government has been prepared to say definitely that this project will be carried out.

Surely it could be possible for the Department of Reconstruction to make the definite statement that this will be one of the post-war reconstruction projects. I would not expect the minister to say that this project would be started next year or the year after, but he could say that it would be included in the list of projects, and that as soon as the men and materials necessary to complete such a project were available it would be put into operation.

The people are afraid that once again we will hear the same old cry we heard so often in the depression years: Lots of men and lots of material, but no money. I think it is high time the government made it quite clear to the people that the financial policy which has been developed during the war under which no financial restriction will be allowed to hinder the development of war industry, will be carried on in the post-war period. It should be made clear that the motto in the post-war period will be that whatever is physically possible and desirable will be made financially possible.

When the minister speaks I hope he will be able to tell the committee exactly what the government's policy will be with respect to the financing of national projects. Is the government to be prepared to take on the responsibility of financing all of them? We know very well that during this war had the federal government said to the provinces, "We need air fields across the country; you put up thirty per cent; the municipalities will put up thirty per cent, and we will supply the remainder," we would not have had the air fields we needed. The only reason why we did have air fields was that the federal government absorbed the financial responsibility. The only reason why we have had the war effort we have had lies in the fact that the federal government was prepared to find the money for every project that was needed. Had there been some limitation regarding financing, like we had before the war, Canada would not have been in a position to make the splendid contribution she has made.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to join those who have expressed regret that the minister whose department is now before the committee has said so little at this stage in his capacity as Minister of Reconstruction. However, the matter I wish to discuss has to do with the minister in his capacity as head of the Department of Munitions and Supply.

During the course of his statement last night the minister, at page 746 of Hansard, outlined the situation concerning aircraft production. He pointed out that there is a necessary decrease in aircraft production in the current year, but concluded those observations with these two sentences:

[Mr. Quelch.]

As announced last June, production of trainer types terminated in recent months, or will terminate shortly. We have been fortunate in obtaining substantial contracts for aircraft components from the United States for the manufacturing capacity released with the cessation of the trainer programme.

It is on the basis of that last sentence that I should like to say a few words about the situation among aircraft workers in the city of Winnipeg, from which I come.

On April 5 last I directed a question on this matter to the Minister of Munitions and Supply which is found at page 505 of Hansard. On that occasion the minister cast some doubt on my statement that lay-offs were continuing to take place at MacDonald Brothers aircraft plant at Winnipeg. In fact he used these words:

I have no information as to how many men are employed now at MacDonald's, but I think the numbers are on the increase rather than on the decrease.

As the minister will recall, on January 31 and February 1 of this year a delegation of aircraft workers came from Winnipeg to Ottawa to see the minister concerning the contracts at MacDonald Brothers Aircraft Limited, Winnipeg. The hon. member for Selkirk and I had the privilege of accompanying the delegation and waiting on the minister on those two days. The second time we met him the minister gave us the forthright assurance that work would be forthcoming which would take care of the situation at MacDonald's in particular and in Winnipeg in general. In fact he gave us information which is substantially the same as the statement he made last night when he said that his department had obtained substantial contracts for aircraft components from the United States.

Mr. HOWE: I did not say any such thing. Let us tell the truth.

Mr. KNOWLES: My memory is very clear, and the hon. member for Selkirk was there as well when the minister told us that the situation would be taken care of at MacDonald's, and when we pressed him on the point he said that new work from the United States would be sent to Winnipeg. In fact, the minister said to me something like this: "All you want, Knowles, is to go out of this office and make a statement." My reply to the minister, and I am sure he will remember the conversation was this: "The kind of statement I want to make is to be able to tell the workers of Winnipeg that there will be work for them." The minister said in reply to that: "You can go back and tell the workers of Winnipeg that there will be plenty of work; in fact, that within a few months there will be more work than you will be able to handle back there."

Not being satisfied to leave the minister's office without something a little more definite than that, I pressed him as to what kind of work it would be and what assurance he could give us that there was definite work coming, and he spoke at that time in his office of substantial contracts from the United States and said that he would be able to place some of those contracts at MacDonald Brothers in Winnipeg.

Mr. HOWE: I said nothing about the United States. There was never any question of contracts from the United States. They were never contemplated. I told the hon. member the exact facts, that we were moving a contract from the Canadian General Electric Company in Toronto to Winnipeg and that the effects of it would be felt in June. I will thank the hon. member very much not to lead any more delegations into my office.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I resent that. It is the privilege of any member of parliament to lead a delegation to see a minister.

An hon. MEMBER: Make the minister retract.

Mr. KNOWLES: No; if the minister wants to make that statement, it is perfectly all right with me. My remarks and his will be on the record and will be read with interest by the members of the delegation—there were five of us—who were in his office and know what was said. The whole purpose of the visit of that delegation was to try to get the assurance that something definite would be done. Other members of the delegation, the aircraft workers themselves, said to the minister: "Can we be assured that this new work will be placed in time to prevent the lay-offs now taking place?" The minister's reply to that was that the full effect might not be felt until June. He went on to say that the government was not the kind of government that would tell a private company what they should do, but that if he were manager of the plant and knew of the contracts that were coming there would not be any lay-offs.

The fact of the matter is that lay-offs have continued. The members of that delegation went back to Winnipeg in early February quite happy as a result of their interview with the minister, and they assured the workers in the plant where they are engaged and the members of the union with which they are associated that the minister had the matter in hand, and that while there might be some temporary dislocation, there was nothing to worry about in the long run. However, despite that, lay-offs are still continuing.

I have a letter in my hand from Mr. Frank Murphy, the business agent of Spitfire Lodge, No. 741, International Association of Machinists, written after the minister made his reply to my question on the orders of the day last Thursday, in which the business agent tells me that a total of a thousand workers were laid off at MacDonald's in February and March and that there are now only about five hundred employees left at the airport compared with a figure of 3,500 when employment at MacDonald Brothers was at its peak.

This is not the first time, nor was the occasion, January 31 and February 1, the first time that I have discussed the matter of employment at Winnipeg with the Minister of Munitions and Supply and also with the Minister of Labour. It is a matter I have had occasion to discuss ever since I came to this house, and I feel that I must point out to the government that the treatment which we get from the two ministers falls into a well defined pattern. When we ask on behalf of Winnipeg for the placing of war contracts there to provide employment we are frequently told that the government cannot be asked to produce war materials that are not needed just for the sake of providing employment. That is a perfectly logical statement to make, provided that we did not get other kinds of replies when other questions are asked. But when we ask, on the other hand, as we have in recent months of the Minister of Munitions and Supply, who is also Minister of Reconstruction, that he start a reconversion programme in such a plant as MacDonald Brothers at Winnipeg, the minister tells us that there is a war on and that this is no time for the consideration of such matters.

Mr. HOWE: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I do not think I should be misrepresented. I can tell my hon. friend that the position in MacDonald Brothers Aircraft is so serious that Grant MacDonald was in my office to-day trying to buy the plant, and he said he was offering to buy the plant because of the prospects he had ahead. That is the difference between the real facts and the story my hon. friend is telling the committee to-day.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the minister indicate what the figures of employment are in the plant to-day?

Mr. HOWE: He told me but I do not remember exactly. They seemed to be higher than the figure the hon. member just gave. What was that figure?

Mr. KNOWLES: The figure I have in the letter from the business agent is 500.

Mr. HOWE: Grant MacDonald told me and I think the figure was 1,400. He is in the city and I will get a signed statement by him. My hon. friend's statement is in line with his usual accuracy. I have great respect for the word of any hon. member, but I must say that my hon. friend is amazing in reporting interviews he has had in my office.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister should remember that he gave us full permission to give publicity to that interview; in fact, he urged us to do so. But when he made his statement in reply to my question on the orders of the day last Thursday, the reading of that statement by members of the delegation who were in the office led them to express amazement at the contrast between the minister's statement in the house and the statement which he made to us in his office. I feel it is my duty to bring this matter out into the open.

I should like to continue with the statement which I was making as to the sort of treatment we have been given when we have pleaded for work in the city of Winnipeg. We have received the answers already indicated, but we have continued to press for contracts for the sake of employment, because we have had men in Winnipeg needing work. There are certain other answers which we get. First, we are told that the labour situation at certain times is tight. I admit that that may be the general picture over the country; and yet on almost every occasion when either the Minister of Munitions and Supply or the Minister of Labour has referred to the tight labour situation, we have had large numbers of men registered for employment at the selective service office in Winnipeg and unable to get it.

Another reply which has been given to us is that there is work in other parts of the country, and that these departments of government have sent people to Winnipeg to try to get some of these workers because they were needed in other parts of the country. But the fact is that the wages offered at these jobs in other parts did not make it possible for men with homes in Winnipeg to pick up and go, particularly for the short time for which employment was guaranteed.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Another answer which we got from both the ministers I have referred to—in fact it was the answer I had the first time I ever asked a question in this house of the Minister of Labour—is that there are periods of seasonal unemployment which we have to accept, that there is never full employment in Winnipeg in February and March, anyway.

But the point I am trying to suggest is that all these things combined have given the workers of Winnipeg—and not only the workers; I know something of what the members of the city council of Winnipeg, and of bodies such as the industrial development board of Manitoba think about this—the feeling that we have been given the runaround in connection with war contracts to provide sufficient work for Winnipeg.

On that basis I still hope that the minister, even if he feels provoked, will try to give the information which obviously I am seeking.

I wonder what has happened to the contracts which he had in mind when he assured the men on February 1 that work would be available. Have any contracts which he has offered to MacDonald's been turned down? Perhaps he might tell us also on what basis the contracts have been let to this firm. Has there been any change in the basis on which they have been let as between the earlier years of the war and the present time? Also I may say that workers in the plant have an interest in the question as to what is to happen to the government property at MacDonald's.

I wish that somehow we could get this across to ministers of the government, that when some of us stand here in this chamber and speak, even though they may think of us as members of another political party and as people they have to try to "sit on", they should remember that we speak for the people whom we represent. I am speaking in this question on behalf of the workers in the plant at MacDonald Brothers, Winnipeg, and one of the things they are interested in is what is to happen to that plant.

I notice, in the interesting figures which the Minister of Munitions and Supply laid on the table last night, and which appear in yesterday's Votes and Proceedings under the title "Government financed expansion of industrial capacity in Canada as at December 31, 1944", there have been some fairly substantial sums invested by the government in this plant. The amount actually expended by the government to that date at MacDonald Brothers Aircraft Limited for aircraft manufacture is $346,834. The amount actually expended at the same plant to provide facilities for aircraft overhaul and repair is $1,582,238. These two figures make a total investment by the government in the plant there of $1,929,081. An investment of fairly close to two million dollars is quite substantial. It indicates the value there is in this plant. The workers are interested in the kinds of uses which it might be put to as a result of reconversion, and they would be interested, even if the minister does not feel that he wants to give me the information, in knowing what is in store for the equipment in which this vast sum of public money has been invested.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend expects to be a member of the next government, I am sure. Why does he not give them his own ideas?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Oh, don't start him again.

Mr. GRAYDON: You are not suggesting that his group are going to be the next government?

Mr. HOWE: Well, he thinks so. I do not know why I have to supply all the ideas here for reconversion.

Mr. LaCROIX (Translation): Mr. Chairman, in connection with the resolution now before us, I must say that, so long as the National Resources Mobilization Act is kept in force, no reconstruction will be possible, because under that act, the government has succeeded in eliminating the small merchants and manufacturers, by allowing controllers who have interests in big business to withhold the raw materials, the goods and the equipment necessary for the creation and maintenance of new business and industrial establishments.

How can a returned soldier or any citizen in this country possibly start a new business or a new industry, if he is denied the means to obtain the materials and the goods necessary for beginning his operations? Surely, Mr. Chairman, monopolies will be glad to maintain such controls, because it is acknowledged that only those people whose establishments had come into being before the war can obtain goods today. Why would they not be satisfied, since such controls allow them to know beforehand the cost price of their manufactured product, as well as its sale price? You are as well aware as I am, Mr. Chairman, that only under conditions of free competition can a young man, a soldier or any citizen of this country start an industry or a business, by eliminating as far as possible the overhead charges that are scarcely avoidable in the case of big industries, which allows a newcomer to offer his goods or his manufactured product at a lower price, while making a reasonable profit. Once again, I claim that the National Resources Mobilization Act has set up an economic dictatorship in this country.

In this connection, I wish to deal with a statement from the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond) who has vainly endeavoured, the other night, to explain why no vote was taken on the National Resources Mobilization Act. He conveniently forgot to mention to the house that the amendment to the National Resources Mobilization bill moved by the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) and seconded by myself, and which is recorded on page 924 of the official report for June 19, 1940, read as follows:

That all the words after "whereas" in the preamble of the bill be deleted and the following substituted therefor: "the government's war policy must be free and voluntary."

He also forgot to say that it was at the request of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself, that a vote was taken as any one can see by referring to page 925 of the official report for June 19, 1940. I quote:

Mr. Mackenzie King: Have a vote.

Otherwise, we would have been just two members to request a vote, and according to the Standing Orders, there must be five.

Such intervention on the part of the Prime Minister was significant, and he explained it himself when he made the following statement, recorded on page 931 of the official report for June 19, 1940:

May I be allowed to say a word in reply to my hon. friend with respect to the vote this afternoon? I thought, and I still think, that the time has come when the country should know exactly where some men stand on all-important measures such as this. For the best of reasons I was not prepared to leave the impression that there were any members other than one or two who would support the amendment and who were not prepared to support the bill. For that reason I asked that the vote be taken.

It is true that the Speaker declared our amendment out of order, but it is true also that but for the significant intervention of the Prime Minister, no vote would have been taken. Inasmuch as the standing orders provide for appealing from the decision of the Speaker, the latter's decisions are not final and the members are to have the opportunity of submitting the matter to the house.

I contend, Mr. Chairman, that so long as the National Resources Mobilization Act, as amended by bill 80, remains on the statute book, the right hon. the Prime Minister cannot claim that volunteers will take part in the war against Japan; indeed, the act as it now stands gives the government the privilege and the right to send to any theatre of war the soldiers called up in this country. The right hon. the Prime Minister did not say to this house that it is an indisputable fact that the National Resources Mobilization Act constitutes an hypocritical and disguised conscription as a result of which there are two voluntary systems: the "voluntary" voluntary system and the "compulsory" voluntary system, and through the National Resources Mobilization Act the government enforced the latter.

I wish to point out, moreover, that the National Resources Mobilization Act has set up in this country an economic dictatorship such that the returned soldier who may wish to start a business of his own will be unable to do so as long as controllers are in charge of our national economy. And I shall prove my point forthwith. Mr. René Cantin, a returned soldier living at Giffard, in my constituency, applied to the wartime prices and trade board for a sugar quota in order to set up a candy and chocolate business. Now, I have just received from the wartime prices and trade board, through the sugar administrator, the following letter dated April 10, 1945. I quote:

Dear Mr. LaCroix,

Your letter of March 27 last on behalf of Mr. René Cantin, of Giffard, has reopened an application which this administration had found necessary to reject.

However, in view of your personal interest in this case, we have reexamined the matter carefully, but before informing you of our conclusions, we wish to outline the instructions received from the board, in accordance with government policy in regard to the granting of sugar quotas to soldiers who have been released from the service. We quote:

"In order to qualify for a quota of a rationed commodity, the applicant must have had previous experience in some executive capacity, of the business which he desires to engage in."

And further:

We do not want you to be under the impression that this administration is prone to split hairs in regard to the rehabilitation of discharged service men, but in view of the large number of such applications, a definite policy is essential and any exception would give rise to complaints against the board and this administration.

Therefore, this means, Mr. Chairman, that a returned soldier who is desirous of establishing an industry must have been a member of the board of directors or an officer of a company. To my mind such requirements are ridiculous.

I notice that the parliamentary assistant to the minister of Munitions and Supply is present in the house and I would ask him to kindly submit this case to his department, so that no more silly letters of this kind should be sent to members of parliament in future. This decision prevents any person in Canada from organizing a new industry or business enterprise unless he had been in business before the declaration of war; otherwise he is deprived of the necessary material or goods.

I have often heard in this house, statements attempting to prove that the policy of the government was to facilitate, by all possible means, the establishment of returned men in their own small business or industry. I believe the letter I have just quoted shows that the government is implementing an entirely opposite policy.

Mr. Chairman, allow me, at the close of my remarks, to express the following wish: let the Department of Munitions and Supply and all other departments put a stop to the necessity for us, of Quebec, to apply to Toronto every time we wish anything. Some time ago, I applied for the fixing of a leather quota for an industrialist of Loretteville, a town of my constituency. To obtain this quota, which was absolutely necessary for the running of the applicant's business, I was referred to the leather administrator with offices in Toronto.

I wrote this administrator, and do you know what he replied? He wrote: Mr. LaCroix, we have received the application of Mr. Gérard Bastien, of Loretteville, but as it was written in French, we had to send the form to Ottawa to have it translated. We are still awaiting this translation to answer your letter.

Mr. Chairman, this is ridiculous. I hope this policy will be changed. At the present time, we are on the way to admitting in principle that, only the trusts may subsist in Canada.

Mr. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Munitions and Supply) (Translation): I refrained from interrupting the hon. member's speech; however, I must point out to him that the two matters he raised to-night, referring to sugar and leather, do not concern the Department of Munitions and Supply. The sale of sugar, as well as leather, comes under the Department of Finance through the wartime prices and trade board.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, I had finished my remarks, but I understand the minister threw a question back at me which I did not hear. I have since been told what it was and I should now like to make a brief comment in reply. I understand the minister asked me what my solution of the problem would be. I point out to him that that is not answering the questions which I had put to him as minister in charge of the department at the present time; neither is it giving the information which the workers concerned have asked me to secure. Nevertheless I do not mind answering his question. I would say this to him: if he has the contracts from the United States referred to in his speech last night at page 746 of Hansard, for the manufacturing capacity released with the cessation of the trainer programme, and if some of those contracts can be allocated to Winnipeg, that should be done. If that cannot be done I suggest to him as I have done before on several occasions, particularly during the regular session of parliament last spring and summer, namely, that with a plant at Winnipeg worth $2,000,000, with workers there seeking employment, and it being obvious that some time soon a reversion programme must start somewhere, here is a good place to start it. The men themselves have suggested that since the buildings are large and spacious they may be such as can be used to do some research in prefabricated houses. When my colleague, the hon. member for Mackenzie, gets the floor a little later he may have something to say on that point.

I would also say to the minister that he was not giving me or the workers concerned any new information when he mentioned that Mr. MacDonald was in the city discussing with the government the possibility of purchasing the plant, because Mr. MacDonald has already told the workers that he would like to do that and that he was negotiating with the government on this matter. I point out to the minister that here is a plant in which nearly $2,000,000 of public money has been invested, and I hope it will not be the case of a fire sale, but that he will protect the public interest. In my view the plant should be retained by the government.

One other point; I trust the minister is going to answer my questions either to-night or to-morrow. I understand that on one matter he wants to make an answer to-morrow after he has consulted Mr. MacDonald. With regard to the employment figure let me make it clear that I was speaking about the plant at the airport.

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member said MacDonald's plants.

Mr. KNOWLES: For the sake of comparison I gave the peak figure of 3,500, which was the peak employment figure at the airport. The present employment there is 500, according to my information. If the minister finds that Mr. MacDonald has a higher employment figure he must break that down to the employment at the airport and the employment at the Robinson establishment. I shall be glad if the minister will get those figures from

Mr. MacDonald, and I shall also be glad if either to-night or to-morrow he will answer the questions I have put to him.

Mr. NICHOLSON: According to the statement made by the minister last night we are to have up to August 31 of this year expenditures of about four and a half million dollars in connection with the housing development. According to Votes and Proceedings the total expenditure in wartime housing amounts to $69,262,000. Hon. members will recall that at least once a year I have tried to impress upon the government the importance of providing adequate housing for the Canadian people as a part of our war effort. In this country and in every country it has been found that lack of adequate housing has been a serious factor in preventing maximum production of essential materials. It has been very bad for the morale of our Canadian people. Many of our young people have given their lives in defence of everything that they hold dear. "They are fighting for their homes" is a very common slogan, but many who have returned as heroes are now finding that they are the unwanted Canadians when it comes to finding a place in which to live. I have tried to impress upon the government each year that in allocating raw materials and manpower available we should be providing a substantial number of new housing units.

In nearly every major city in Canada we have a serious housing situation. I spent a few days in Halifax at Easter time and men of the army, navy and air force who are compelled to make Halifax their headquarters have, I believe, a real grievance in being expected to live in an area where so little consideration has been given to the housing requirements. The leader of this group, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggan, had occasion to make some comments regarding the serious situation in Halifax. The senior member for that riding took exception to what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggan had said and issued a public statement. One of the well-known doctors in Halifax came to the defence of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggan, mentioning:

. . . that Mr. M. J. Coldwell has been "censured in some quarters" for bringing to public attention the condition of the slums of this city. Surely this represents ostrichism in its blatant and unabashed form—that ostrichism which, head hidden in the sand, declares that the thing it does not want to see should not be seen even by more intelligent birds. Mr. Coldwell made no extravagant statement about our slums. No statement could be couched too extravagantly to describe their loathsome squalor. I have worked in the east end of London and in some of the less salubrious environs of Manchester, and I saw nothing there any worse than exists in Halifax. Our slums are a disgrace and a shame to us—a disgrace abounding and a shame reproaching. In tolerating them we have shown a criminal indifference. For they are more than a shame and a disgrace; they are a cancer eating into our very life and health.

But the most extraordinary statement in your report is that of Mr. Isnor's, when you quote him as saying that it is "not helping our war effort to have such statements made in the house, on the platform or over the radio." By what strange reasoning does he come to this conclusion? Does he believe that slum dwellers make better workers and soldiers; that slum dwellers more than people from better surroundings have finer stamina as fighters, greater resources and physical capacity as artisans? To those of us who know that the evil effects of bad housing and insufficient food cause an exactly opposite effect, a statement like Mr. Isnor's sounds distressingly depressing.

I suppose the situation in Halifax is more serious than in many of our cities, but Ottawa, Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and all our major cities have critical housing problems.

Two sets of answers were brought down today to questions asked by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggan. One of his questions was as follows:

What housing activities, or authority, has been vested in the Department of Reconstruction?

The answer is as follows:

By agreement with the Minister of Finance, direct responsibility for housing will remain with his department. Activities of the Department of Reconstruction will be confined to assisting the finance department and by stimulating housing construction.

I wish the minister would be good enough to elaborate on just how he proposes to stimulate construction. According to the act which was passed last year to set up the Department of Reconstruction, one of the duties of the minister was to formulate plans for industrial development and conversion, public works and improvements, housing and community planning, research and conservation and development of natural resources, and so on.

Then, according to the answers given by the Minister of Finance I find that the department which is supposed to be doing something is doing even less than the Department of Reconstruction, which has passed the buck. The first paragraph of the second question reads:

How many limited dividend corporations have been formed in accordance with the National Housing Act, 1944?

That is a straightforward question; the answer could be none, or ten or one hundred, but instead four long paragraphs were needed for the answer. I do not propose to take the time of the committee in reading them, but in fairness to hon. members it seems to me that when a straightforward question is asked we should receive a straightforward answer. The second paragraph of the question was:

Have any agreements with municipalities been entered into in accordance with the National Housing Act, 1944, and if so, with what municipalities?

Here we have an answer that goes all round the question and does not come near the point:

The limited supplies of materials and labour now available for housing purposes are being used by Wartime Housing Limited mainly to provide accommodation in certain congested areas for dependents of those in the armed forces and returning veterans, by the director of the Veterans' Land Act, by the national housing administration for house conversions, and for the construction of houses and apartments in the moderate and lower price ranges.

There have been numerous inquiries and preliminary discussions with respect to the formation of limited dividend corporations and to grants to municipalities for slum clearance, but in no case have negotiations been completed and it is obvious that the number of projects that can be proceeded with immediately is limited by the available supply of labour and materials.

I submit that the members of this house are entitled to information that will tell them exactly what has been done by the department. Last year we passed an act which gave members of parliament and the public the impression that this government was really facing up to the post-war housing requirements of the country. The third paragraph reads:

Have any grants for research purposes been made in accordance with the National Housing Act, 1944, and if so, in what amounts?

We did get a straight answer to that question; the answer is "no". I should like to direct attention to the fact that on March 24 of last year the report of the advisory committee on reconstruction, concerning housing and community planning, was tabled; and on one or two occasions I took the opportunity to congratulate the minister upon compiling such a comprehensive survey of the problem and outlining some of the steps which should be taken. In dealing with the urban housing needs in Canada, in the summary of findings and recommendations on page 11, we have a straightforward statement of the serious housing conditions which prevail in the cities of Canada. On page 13 it points out that a target of 606,000 units over the next ten years should be the minimum. Another estimate I have heard is 750,000 houses, which would mean 75,000 units a year over a ten-year period; and I believe it was the Minister of Labour, addressing a public meeting last year, who suggested that we should have at least one million units in the next ten years. In facing up to the housing programme, I think the only limiting factors should be what will be our available supplies of materials, what will be the labour situation, and is there a need. I do not think there in any doubt that we have demonstrated in the last five years that Canadians have been able to produce and use essential Canadian materials in the manufacture of tanks, guns, planes and other necessary implements of warfare. I believe we have a right to expect that the Minister of Reconstruction will formulate similar plans for the post-war period, and see that we have maximum production in connection with the building trades.

The chapter dealing with the income groups and housing policy points out that we have one-third of the people in the upper income brackets, who will always be able to supply themselves with adequate housing, and therefore no administration needs to worry about them. Then we have one-third of the people in the middle income brackets who will require assistance such as has been supplied under national housing. Finally we have another one-third of the people in the lower income brackets who in this country, and in every country, have never been able out of their small pay cheques to afford suitable living quarters. This survey, carried out by the government, points out that eighty-nine per cent of the people in the lower one-third of the population are paying more than a desirable proportion of their income for housing accommodation; and when that situation prevails it means that the children go without sufficient food or lack clothing.

There is another interesting section dealing with rural housing. Unfortunately we have never compiled any accurate statistics in Canada over a period of time as to the extent of our needs in connection with rural housing, but in the last census information was obtained indicating the extent of the job here in connection with rural housing. Certain recommendations have been made. It is recommended that the federal government should have a dominion town planning agency; but this shocking information brought down to-day shows that not a five cent piece has been spent under the legislation passed last year, or for research purposes in accordance with the National Housing Act of 1944. I think it should be as plain as a-b-c that a country as backward as Canada has been in connection with housing cannot in a month, or six months, or a year, go from where we were to where we should be in the business of providing adequate housing. It seems to me the very first job that should have been undertaken after this act was passed was to make appropriate provision for the necessary research work.

When I discussed this question more than a year ago I suggested that the government should call an immediate conference of dominion, provincial and municipal authorities to review the whole housing problem in Canada and work out a formula so that there might be agreement as to the extent of the slum clearance which might be carried on in the different areas, the part, if any, which municipalities would be expected to play, the role the provinces would be called upon to perform, and the part to be undertaken by the federal authority. But according to the information brought down by the minister the president of Wartime Housing Limited, Mr. J. M. Pigott, was appointed by order in council of December last to fill the position of director general of housing development, but now we find that he has never acted in this capacity and that the order in council will be rescinded. As I said, this is the most distressing information I have had for many a day, to find that right now, at the conclusion of the war, the Department of Reconstruction gives this sort of answer to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggart, while the Department of Finance, which is responsible for national housing, has an even more unsatisfactory reply to give to other questions. I urge that before this discussion concludes the minister should indicate why the Department of Reconstruction is shelving its responsibilities in the field of housing. He should give some indication as to how soon the people of this country can expect more dynamic leadership from some department of government with a view to solving an immediate and urgent problem that is so disturbing.

As I said earlier, men who have been away from this country for four or five years are now returning to join their families. When they have inquired about renting a house or an apartment they have been told immediately that if there are any children in the family the children are not wanted. Surely some department can take the initiative and demonstrate that people who are rearing children in this country are entitled to have as good accommodation as is available for those who are not serving their country in that particular capacity.

I should like the minister to outline clearly why his department has passed by this responsibility in the field of housing, and also outline what he proposes to do by the way of assisting the Department of Finance in stimulating housing construction.

Mr. HOWE: The Minister of Munitions and Supply has presented to the committee certain estimates for which he would like consideration. The Minister of Reconstruction has other estimates which will come up at another time, and I am sure he will be glad to discuss his estimates when the time comes. But I have heard nothing this evening about munitions and supply. Everything has had to do with reconstruction. I must say I have enjoyed it thoroughly, but I think that perhaps we might very well discuss munitions and supply to-night, and then discuss reconstruction in its proper place. I expect to make a statement of some importance on reconstruction to-morrow. But to-night, I would repeat that we are discussing munitions and supply.

Mr. NICHOLSON: In view of the fact that we have spent about $50,000,000 in the field of wartime housing I believe this is the logical place for the minister to make some statement as to whether he is washing his hands of all further responsibility for his activities in the field of housing. For the last four years the Minister of Munitions and Supply has been responsible for the major housing activities of Canada, and I think this would be the appropriate time for him to make some statement.

Mr. HOWE: Wartime Housing Limited was established to provide housing for industrial workers in war plants. The work was undertaken to make it possible to bring workers from one area to another, and to make sure that they were comfortably housed. That was the function of the Department of Munitions and Supply.

My hon. friend is mixing that with a different field of housing, namely, housing for the civilian population in post-war years.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I take second place to no one in my attitude in connection with the housing of workers. On many occasions I have brought this matter before the minister. As a matter of fact, he said that he did not think it was his problem, but that it was the duty of the city of Toronto to take care of that situation, so far as the housing of workers in war plants was concerned.

When we consider what has been done in other parts of the country and compare that with what has happened in Toronto we get some idea of the whole situation. In that city we find Victory Aircraft at Malton, and de Havilland aircraft, and the others at Leaside and Long Branch. The amount of housing supplied to those people is pure nonsense. That is why such an acute situation has developed. I take my hat off to the people of Toronto for what they have done to try to provide housing. But when the minister rises in his place and tells us that he is here in one capacity to-night and that he will be here in another to-morrow I say to him he is in both positions at the same time. I am reminded of the Mikado, where one man had all the portfolios and had to please each side.

I had no thought of taking part in this debate until I listened to the Prime Minister on Monday, and again this afternoon. I was anxious to see these appropriations put through as quickly as possible. When we look at these votes we must conclude that certainly it is impossible for the committee, in the short time remaining, to analyse what has been done. When the Prime Minister said that the Progressive Conservative party had belittled Canada's war effort I throw that back in his teeth, because we have never done that. As a matter of fact, I draw the committee's attention to a speech by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères made in this chamber not very long ago, where he said the government never did anything unless it was prodded and made to do so by the official opposition. That is a pretty strong statement to make.

Through all this time members of the official opposition have had in their minds only the prosecution of the war, and nothing other than trying to get this government to do what we thought it should do.

The Prime Minister has risen in his place and tried to explain why he did not call parliament earlier. All through the last four or five years he has tried to avoid parliamentary discussion; we were just a nuisance to him. Everything was done by order in council anyway. There has not been much legislation to speak of, and that which we have had before us has been hedged around by regulations. It was left to somebody else to make those regulations.

We have been deprived of one of our sacred rights, a right which has come down to us from Pym, Hampden and Charles I, the right of any person to lay his grievances at the foot of the throne, through his representative in the House of Commons. That right has been denied us. And I can say right now that there are plenty of grievances that could be laid at the foot of the throne.

Just think of what happened to-night. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was speaking, and the minister rose in his place and said, "I will thank you very much not to lead any more delegations to me." What a disgraceful thing to say! To think that a member of parliament has no right to take delegations to the proper place, so that people may get their rights.

The House of Commons has been threatened ever since last December. We have been told that if we did not do something which would satisfy the Prime Minister we would be out of luck, and that there would be no House of Commons. Well, if that is to be the case, and if the Prime Minister can say what parliament is to do, we had better change our constitution very soon.

We are now asked to pass these estimates for the Minister of Munitions and Supply, and we shall be asked later to pass estimates under the minister in his capacity of Minister of Reconstruction. People in my constituency are worried about what kind of job they will have. They are in war plants to-day, and they do not know what is to happen when those plants fold up. We have had no statement from the minister as to when they are to fold up or what is to happen. Perhaps he does not know himself. A little while ago we asked the Minister of Labour if he had had any survey made in connection with post-war reconstruction. He replied that a report had been made but he could not disclose it to us.

I want to tell him that it is a national tragedy that we have not a budget brought down to see what employment can be had now that the war with Germany is so nearly over.

These men who have been making the survey have been going around to different industries and interviewing business men and asking them: What are you going to do? The business men have replied: You tell us what you are going to do; then we will tell you what we can do. Business is anxious to make its plans for the post-war but does not know what the government is going to do. I doubt very much if the government have any plans for the post-war. That is about the situation.

The other day a delegation came here from Toronto in connection with shipbuilding work in that city. I was one of those who headed the delegation and interviewed the minister in his office. I must say he was courteous and we had quite a discussion but the delegation did not know very much more at the end of it than they did before. All we wanted to know was that Toronto was to get its fair share of whatever shipbuilding work was going on. The minister said we would. But the fact remains that there were ships in Toronto shipyards that were further advanced in construction than ships at other ports, yet work on them was discontinued at the Toronto yards and other ships were towed to Toronto, to be finished there. The minister knows what he is doing, I suppose, but what we in Toronto wish to know is what the future holds for us. How are these men to be employed? We should be given some idea of what plans the government have as a result of the survey that has been made.

I am proud of what my fellow-citizens in the city of Toronto have done. We have as great a record if not greater than that of any other city in the province and, I believe, in the whole Dominion of Canada in raising men for the armed forces. We have as good a record if not better in Toronto and the province of Ontario in the production of munitions and supplies than anywhere else in the dominion. Our workmen and women have given splendid service. They have helped the minister no end and have forced him to go on and do things. We are proud of them. Now we want to know what the Minister of Reconstruction has in his mind as to the future, so that there will not be chaos if unemployment comes when the war with Germany is over.

Mr. ROY: Mr. Chairman, decidedly the Liberal government keeps on playing with "the milliards" more lightly than most Canadian people can play with coppers. Nevertheless I should like to give some reasons why I am more strongly opposed than ever to this appropriation of $2,000,000,000 for the continuation of the government's policy of gifts and extravagant war expenditures. But since I have already outlined time and again my point of view on that matter as a Canadian I do not need to go over that again. I will confine myself to stressing some of the reasons which have aroused suspicion in my mind. The Minister of National Defence for Naval Services stated to the committee last week that German submarines were very likely next summer to enter our territorial waters and perhaps display greater activity in the St. Lawrence than ever before. Last Wednesday I asked the minister the following question, and I quote now from Hansard of April 4, at page 445:

I should like to know from the minister if the Germans are still holding a piece of land in France on that section of the coast which includes Dunkirk, St. Nazaire and Bordeaux, and if so, whether they have some submarine bases in that section.

The minister's answer was, and I am still quoting from the same page of Hansard:

Mr. Macdonald (Kingston City): I believe they do hold Dunkirk and a little land in the vicinity, but I do not know that they have a submarine base there. They had some submarine bases further down the west coast, at St. Nazaire and Lorient and elsewhere, for a considerable time. I do not know whether the bases at St. Nazaire and Lorient still exist. Probably that area has been cleared.

War Appropriation—Munitions and Supply

I questioned the minister again:

I find it strange that the allies could have afforded to push back the Germans all over, from France, from Holland, from Belgium, and far into their own country, while they allow that little piece of land to be occupied by the Germans. That is a question a good many people are asking.

The hon. minister replied to me as follows:

Mr. Macdonald (Kingston City): It is a question of military strategy, and one for the army commanders, rather than for me, to answer. I should think they have thought of that matter. It may be that the number of men needed to reduce Dunkirk by direct assault would be fairly large. The last report I saw indicated that the Germans have some twelve thousand men in Dunkirk, so that the allies would have to detach a considerable force to take the city. It may be the fact, and I have no doubt it is, that they believe they can employ the men to better advantage in going ahead with their great drive, as they are doing now, and letting Dunkirk be taken care of in due time.

I was astounded that the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services was not informed of the exact situation in regard to the presence of Germans who have been permitted to stay on the French coast since June, 1944, in possession of sea harbours on the Atlantic. Why they have been left alone there for such a long period of time the minister does not know. Do they have submarine bases there? The minister does not know either that or about their naval activities. It is to be noted that no mention has been made in the war communiques of these Germans remaining in possession of that coastal section. Why? Echo answers, why?

The reasons for my suspicion are based on some other as yet unexplained facts of major importance. Here is what I read in the Globe and Mail of April 5, 1945, under the heading, "Russian Magazine charges Britain, United States, deal with Nazis." The dispatch reads:

London, April 4—(C.P.)—In the midst of a world war "international American and British cartel interests" are dealing secretly in Switzerland to preserve their ties with "German monopolists" for post-war monopolies, the Soviet magazine War and the Working Class asserted in an article broadcast from Moscow to-day.

The article goes on at a certain length in the same tune.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. May I ask what that has to do with the Department of Munitions and Supply? We are dealing with the estimates of that department now, and I think the hon. member is out of order.

[Mr. Roy.]

Mr. ROY: If you will permit me, Mr. Chairman, although I would be pleased to abide by your ruling, I would point out that the whole of the resolution is now before the committee. I am speaking on the resolution and explaining why I am opposed to the appropriation. For the past five or six days we have heard speeches of this type to which no objection has been made.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I think the hon. member will appreciate the fact that it is only this departmental item which is before the committee at the present time. We have dealt as we came along with the items of the departments of defence; the naval department, the department for air, and so forth; we are now dealing with the Department of Munitions and Supply, and I should like the hon. member to keep to that subject.

Mr. ROY: No, Mr. Chairman; the whole of the resolution is before the committee. I know we are dealing with a special matter, but there is no such thing as limitation to one department; it is the whole of the resolution which is before the committee. If I am not correct, I am willing to wait for another occasion.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I think the hon. member should keep to the matter which is now before the committee, namely the Department of Munitions and Supply. The minister made a statement last evening in connection with his department, and we ought to confine our remarks to that statement and the various phases of it.

Mr. ROY: I shall certainly try to keep as close to the subject as the resolution is. If the resolution is taken out of committee I shall be out of order, but until that time I believe I am proceeding along the same line as that followed in most of the speeches we have heard in the past five or six days that we have been on the resolution. So that I await your decision on this matter. If the resolution is not before the committee—well, that is definite.

On April 17 last I addressed the Prime Minister as follows, as reported in Hansard, 1944 at page 2084:

A dispatch from London to the Canadian Press, dated April 5, quotes a Russian magazine which accuses British and American cartels of continuing to deal with German cartels under certain agreements, operating through Switzerland. Is the Prime Minister prepared to make a statement on this very grave accusation?

To which the Prime Minister replied:

My hon. friend has asked me a very large question, dealing with international affairs and concerning, as I understand it, Russia, Britain, Germany and Switzerland in relation to cartels. Not only should I want time to prepare an answer; I should want a great deal of time, and I am not sure that even then I could give an answer. The hon. gentleman has referred to an accusation or an assumption, and whether it is the one or the other I cannot say.

Mr. Chairman, that was surely not a denial of the Russian statement; it is rather an implicit admission that it is true. The conclusion one can draw from that affair cannot but be one of strong suspicion as to what is going on in the underground world of international finance which is governing the different governments of all nations at war.

Other facts of the same nature have brought about my suspicion in some other quarters, one of which is none less than the British House of Commons. Here is what I read in the British Hansard, page 930, October 1942. The question was asked by Mr. G. Strauss of the chancellor of the exchequer, whether the British representatives of the bank for international settlements had special permission of His Majesty's government to enter into business relations with enemy aliens, and whether he would give their names; and Sir Patrick Hannon asked what was the present position of the bank for international settlements. The chancellor of the exchequer, the late Sir Kingsley Wood, replied that the two British representatives were Sir Montagu Norman and Sir Otto Niemeyer.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Bad ones, both of them.

Mr. ROY: Yes, I know. He added:

The only British subjects on the staff at Basle are three subordinate officials, and they have nothing to do with the policy or management of the bank.

He said further:

This country has various interests and rights in the bank under international trust agreements between the various governments and it would not be in the national interest to change our connection with the bank as at present constituted and conducted.

Mr. Strauss: In view of the fact that the great majority of the shares are owned by the nazis, either directly or indirectly, would it not be very much more satisfactory if the British government and the Bank of England dissociated themselves from the bank for international settlements by withdrawing any representation and arranging that their interests should be looked after through Swiss sources—by Swiss bankers?

Sir K. Wood: No, sir, there would be no public advantage in that at all. We have substantial interests in the bank, and we have to safeguard them so far as we can.

Then, later, on October 13, 1942, Sir Kingsley Wood said this:

The Hague conference of 1930 provided for the ten creditor governments concerned to make long-term deposits with the bank for international settlements. The British share in these deposits amounts to 26,500,000 reichsmarks. These deposits, under the terms of the Hague agreements, bear no interest. The investments of the bank in Germany are part of its general assets, and bear no direct relation to these deposits, and I understand that interest is being duly paid on these investments to the bank.

My last quotation is found at page 1572, and is as follows:

Mr. G. Strauss: . . . We frankly have suspicions about the bank for international settlements, because of the history of the bank in the past and in particular in view of the behaviour of that bank at the time when the German army occupied Prague. The bank was then instrumental in handing over to Germany £6,000,000 of Czech gold, which it had deposited with the Bank of England in this country. The house will remember the very strong protests that were made from all quarters on that occasion. The house will probably also remember that it was only possible to drag the truth about these proceedings from the government at that time with very great difficulty. Every effort seemed to be made to hide that transaction from us. Therefore I suggest that it is an obligation on the house to-day to consider very carefully the recent activities of the bank for international settlements, and to consider whether in present circumstances we are wise to remain associated with that organization.

And he continues:

The second thing is even more serious. The report lays down principles for a post-war economic system. The house will agree that it is very dangerous for a body with which we are nominally associated—and, in the eyes of the world, rather closely associated—to issue a report laying down post-war schemes of reconstruction. The bank for international settlements is known throughout the world for, not only very close nazi associations, but its nazi domination. We have our directors still on the board, and that bank produces in its annual report proposals for setting up the economic basis of a new Europe after the war. That, I think, is very serious. It suggests to the German people that there is some form of collaboration between the nazis and the allies whom they are supposed to be fighting.

After the admission made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Kingsley Wood, may I say, with Mr. Strauss, that if our Canadian youth should know all about that state of things, it would not be very happy to die for that international dishonesty and mockery. Having all those facts present in my mind when I am looking at the lists of Canadian boys wounded and killed in action, I cannot refrain from asking myself if all those Tories, Liberal or Conservative, urging for more and more men to be sent into battle, for more and more money to be paid by Canada on the altar of that heartless and soulless finance, are really conscious of what they are doing.

Those are only a few odd things of what I see on that international political and financial front about which the people know but very little.

On our own political front, the situation is not less false. We have witnessed the most unexpected revolution since 1939 and the most incredible contradictions. May I be permitted to give a few examples.

Here is what I read at page 2426, session 1939, volume III, of Hansard. The Prime Minister said:

One strategic fact is clear; the days of great expeditionary forces of infantry crossing the oceans are not likely to recur. Two years ago, I expressed in this house the view that it was extremely doubtful if any of the British dominions would ever send another expeditionary force to Europe.

He goes on:

One political fact is equally clear; in a war to save the liberty of others, and thus our own, we should not sacrifice our own liberty or our own unity. Planning and coordination would be essential, but the necessary coordination could be made, and if this government were in power it would be made, without sacrificing those vital ends and conditions of our existence. . . .

The present government believes that conscription of men for overseas service would not be a necessary or an effective step. Let me say that so long as this government may be in power, no such measure will be enacted.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. I must ask the hon. member to discuss the question that is before the committee, namely the Department of Munitions and Supply.

Mr. ROY: Well, Mr. Chairman, I am really at a loss to know whether it is the resolution that is before the committee or whether we are discussing some item that is not specified. For five days now I have heard many members discussing the whole resolution and they were in order. Will you therefore tell me whether we are speaking on the resolution—yes or no? Will you tell me that? If so, I will abide by your ruling.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I must rule that the hon. member is out of order. If he wished to discuss the question of conscription or anything of that kind he should have done so when the defence department was before the committee. We are now discussing munitions and supply.

Mr. ROWE: What item?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding):

Mr. Roy.]

The minister made a statement last night and gave details which are now before the committee.

Mr. ROY: I will continue to make my point, why I am opposing the resolution that is before the committee. This pronouncement of the Prime Minister is very clear and quite formal. I am making my point, why I oppose the resolution, and I have serious reasons. It is of such importance, voting for or against this huge appropriation, that a member has the right to explain himself, using all the time that is allowed him. Yet the Prime Minister said, at page 2419 of Hansard—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. I must insist that the hon. member keep to the question that is before the committee. The question of conscription is not before the committee. I repeat, if the hon. member had desired to discuss that point at all it should have been discussed when the Department of National Defence was before the committee. I think the hon. member appreciates that as well as I do.

Mr. ROY: Well, Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to have to fight my case here but many members tell me I am right. Here is the resolution we have before us.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order.

Mr. ROY: The resolution covers all kinds of things as to Canada's security, defence, peace and order, and that involves our external as well as our internal policy. That is the resolution which is before me.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The Chairman is on his feet.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I hope the hon. member will cooperate with the Chair. I do not wish to be harsh in matters of this kind. I think the committee has been given great leeway all the way through, but I must insist—and I am perfectly right in insisting—that hon. members must now keep to the question before the committee. I so rule.

Mr. ROY: I should like to abide by your ruling, Mr. Chairman, but as I said, I wish to put this on the record. For five days general speeches have been made on the whole resolution at any stage of the discussion in the committee. You remember what has happened in this committee. My statement is quite true, and if I am not to be given the same amount of justice that was given to the rest—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order.

Mr. ROY:—since this debate started, I can speak within the rules long enough so that the debate may last longer than the government would like. All I ask is the same share of justice as has been given the rest.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I think the hon. member is hardly fair in using the words he has just used. I do want to be fair. As far as the Chair is concerned, I want to be fair to every member, but I must repeat that the hon. member is entirely out of order in discussing conscription on the matter with which we are now dealing. I must insist that he keep to the question that is before the committee.

Mr. ROWE: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, on what item is the resolution being discussed?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): We are now discussing the Department of Munitions and Supply. We have dealt with the naval department, national defence, and so forth, and we are now discussing munitions and supply and the statement the minister made last night.

Mr. BRYCE: I had no intention of taking part in this argument, but I was with the deputation to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred, and I wish to concur in what he said. I am quite sure he made a true statement of what really took place at that meeting. I am quite sure the minister remembers that we asked him before we left if we could make a public statement that there would be plenty of work in Winnipeg this summer, and he assured us that there would be and that he wanted us to say so. I had a conversation with the minister myself about re-tooling. It was off the record and I do not think it has ever been mentioned before by any member of the deputation or myself. I hope the minister does not mean what he said to the effect that we did not have the right to bring a deputation to him again. I hope he does not mean that I would not have the right to bring a deputation from my constituency of Selkirk if I felt like it and he was agreeable.

Mr. HOWE: It all depends on whether or not hon. members who come with deputations are prepared to quote me correctly. The previous speaker was not. My hon. friend said he remembers the conversation about re-tooling and he also talks about employment in the summer. I point out to him this is early April. He is quoting me correctly, and I have no objection to that; but I expect when members rise in their places in this House of Commons to quote me, they will quote me correctly. Is my hon. friend prepared to deny the suggestion that I am telling the truth?

Mr. BRYCE: I said I concur in what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said. I say that he made a perfectly truthful statement as to what was said at the interview.

Mr. HOWE: I will appreciate it very much if you do not bring any more delegations.

Mr. BRYCE: I assure hon. members that we asked the minister for his permission to bring the deputation and he agreed. At the same time we asked him when we should bring it and he said: "Why don't you tell them to come on Friday?" We said to him, "If we told them to come on Friday you would have told them to stay at home," because that had been our experience before. You have to bring them here and make arrangements for the minister to see them.

Mr. HOWE: I should just like to make this point clear. I am sure that the appointment for that deputation was made by a responsible union of Winnipeg and nothing was said about bringing C.C.F. members. The appointment was made from Winnipeg for a certain day and I was there to see the deputation. I must say that I have never made an appointment with a labour delegation and then not received the delegation on the day arranged. I resent the comment that if it had been on a Friday I would not have seen them at all. Unless my hon. friend is prepared to assume that I am a responsible minister of the crown, and attending to my business, I suggest that he just drop the conversation.

Mr. BRYCE: I am sure the minister will remember that we made the arrangements for the deputation. In fact, he complained to us because the deputation that was coming from Winnipeg had not made the arrangements before they came. I am not going to take up any more time, but it seems funny to me that we have people to-day criticizing government-owned plants, ridiculing them because they are no good, and still we are told that there are buyers ready to take over those plants to make money out of them.

Mr. MacINNIS: I admit I find great difficulty in following this kind of debate. A few evenings ago, when the Department of National Defence (Army) was under discussion, a fairly long speech on mutual aid was made by an hon. member to my left. To-night another hon. member started to speak on the same subject and after a while he got off it onto something else. I should like to say something on mutual aid but perhaps this is not the time. I intend to speak on the other side of mutual aid, and if I do not get another chance I wish to say right now that I hope the government, between the time this parliament is dissolved and the new parliament meets, will carry on mutual aid in as great a measure as possible to those nations which need it. I am going to leave it at that now, because I hope to have another opportunity of pressing the matter a little farther. I imagine that is the intention of the government and that is why the appropriation is in the estimates, and I hope that they will continue with it.

I should like to ask the minister one or two questions with regard to production in Vancouver. I notice that the hon. member for St. Paul's said that Toronto was very proud of her production records. I think the complaint that most other parts of Canada have is that they did not get the same opportunities to produce as Toronto did, and that in so far as we got those opportunities we have made a record of which we may be proud. As far as manufacturing on a large scale is concerned, Vancouver had two important industries, the aircraft and shipbuilding industries. In a statement last night the minister said that in the matter of units of aircraft, production would be down to about fifty per cent of last year, but in the matter of poundage it would be down about twenty-five per cent. Could the minister tell the committee how long the air production programme at present in operation at the Boeing plant or plants in Vancouver will continue and what is the prospect for reconversion after the war to some other useful production? In so far as shipbuilding is concerned I believe that at the peak of production there were some thirty thousand shipyard workers in the Vancouver area. I do not know how many there are there now, but I believe it is considerably less than that. How many of the forty 10,000-ton ships and of the twelve 4,700-ton ships are to be built on the west coast? How long will that programme last? I see by the papers that one of the yards, the Burrard South yard, is scheduled to close at the end of the year. Then I should like the minister to tell the committee how many of the naval craft, he mentioned last evening, are to be constructed on the west coast, and how long those contracts will last. And if it is in order at this time, although perhaps it may come under the Department of Reconstruction, I should like the minister to tell the committee what are the possibilities for a shipbuilding yard in Vancouver or in British Columbia after the war.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend suggests that Vancouver has not had the same opportunity to share in war work that other cities have had. I would point out to him that the population of Vancouver has shown a much sharper increase during the war years than any other city in Canada, and I assume that war work has had something to do with that. I just draw that fact to his attention.

My hon. friend brought up the question of work on aircraft. I suppose he knows when the end of the Japanese war will come, but I do not; so that I am afraid I cannot give him the exact date for which he asked. I may tell him that the Vancouver work is on the latest and largest bomber used in the war, the bomber that is doing most of the work in the Pacific, and I think I am safe in saying that until the Pacific war ends that work will go on. I believe consideration is being given to civil work; but while my hon. friend may be able to predict exactly what is to happen in this country two or three or four years hence, I am not able to do so with any accuracy. However, we have an excellent plant at Vancouver which has operated very well so far, and we hope it will continue to operate.

As far as shipbuilding on the west coast is concerned, I was speaking with our representative from there to-day about putting some more work in that area. He tells me it would simply mean transferring labour from existing work, that Vancouver is working to capacity. I assume he should know something about the matter; he has been in charge of shipbuilding work there for some years, and that is his opinion. He states that this will be the situation at least until after the end of this year. It is difficult to put in more work than the capacity will permit. My hon. friends have been running a campaign for three or four years on the theory that tomorrow everyone will be out of work. Strangely enough, men have not been out of work in any part of Canada. I have before me a list that shows we have 127,000 high priority jobs in this country that we are unable to fill. It is fun to predict unemployment ahead, but for the last three or four years my problem has been to contend with a shortage of labour to do the work we have on hand. When that situation changes I am sure we shall be able to cope with it.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have not been prophesying, nor has anyone to my knowledge been prophesying—

Mr. HOWE: Last spring your leader predicted 100,000 unemployed by last spring.

Mr. MacINNIS: Who did?

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member for Rose-town-Biggar.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is all right; my hon. friend will get the 100,000 soon enough, sooner than I would wish. However, I asked certain specific questions which the minister overlooked in order to indulge in a little criticism. I do not mind that; I can ask them again. I wanted to know how many of the forty 10,000-ton ships that are to be built this year will be built in Vancouver or British Columbia yards, and how many of the twelve 4,700-ton ships will be built there?

Mr. HOWE: I am afraid I have not that information at the moment. A certain number of 10,000-tonners are building there, but I do not think there are any 4,000-tonners. If my hon. friend will look about the yards the next time he is in Vancouver he can count them himself; they are all on the ways.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): We have a list which we are trying to follow in order to give every hon. member an opportunity to speak. The hon. member for Lethbridge is next.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have been waiting patiently for a discussion of the minister's estimates by the committee, but up to the present time, except for the last few minutes, it seems that hon. members have been interested in almost everything else. I desired to discuss at some length, while the minister's estimates were before the committee, three questions, namely irrigation, coal developments and housing. With respect to irrigation I should like to discuss the Lethbridge southeast water conservation project, sometimes called the St. Mary and Milk rivers water development project, under which it is proposed to store 738,700 acre-feet of water in ten reservoirs to irrigate 345,000 acres of land, at a total cost of $15,178,439, but it seems to me the proper time to discuss that matter will be after the minister has made his statement on post-war reconstruction and rehabilitation. I should like to discuss the question of coal from the point of view of processing it into oil, rubber and other substances. Probably that also would come under the minister's other department. I should like to discuss housing rather fully, but it seems to me that comes within the second division of the minister's work, so that I shall speak about these matters to-morrow and turn the minister back to those who have some questions to ask on the aspect of his work now under consideration.

Mr. EMMERSON: Several hon. members have spoken of the matter of controls. The controls in which I am particularly interested at the moment are those having to do with motor vehicles. I should like the minister to tell me how many trucks are to be released for civilian use this year and, if possible, the sizes of those trucks. I think all hon. members have heard complaints from people in their constituencies who have asked for permits to buy trucks and been refused. If my information is correct we have about 257,000 trucks in operation in Canada to-day. If we say that a truck lasts ten years, although I am sure it would not last that length of time, we can take it that ten per cent should be replaced every year. This means that we would require 25,700 trucks to replace those which have worn out. I think the public would like to know how many trucks are to be made available this year, and in what sizes. Then those whose applications for new trucks have been refused will have some understanding of the reason for the refusal.

Mr. HOWE: The average production of trucks in Canada from 1937 to 1940 was 27,259 per year. In 1944 the controller released 9,000 trucks, or 33 per cent of the pre-war average. This year we have made arrangements to manufacture trucks on two production lines and in 1945 we expect to have for release 12,181 trucks, or 44.6 per cent of the pre-war average. These are the lighter types of trucks, consisting chiefly of one-ton and two-ton varieties. We have made a sincere effort to keep trucks on the road, and to keep in operation transport which depends on trucks. In this I believe we have succeeded fairly well. There may have been some errors in judgment as to what was an essential service requiring protection, and what was not. But the fact remains that there has been a sincere effort to replace worn-out trucks required to carry on essential services. We are better off for trucks, in proportion to our pre-war use, than any other country of which we have record. I think even the United States is considerably below us in the proportion of pre-war manufacture being released to truckers in that country.

In the matter of heavy trucks we are in the hands of the United States. About the same number of heavy trucks will be imported into Canada this year as was imported last year.

We hope to keep industry depending on heavy trucks in operation to about the same extent as obtained last year.

Mr. SENN: I have listened with great interest to the minister's statement with regard to trucks. Last night I pointed out to him that nothing much had been said about agricultural implements, particularly farm tractors, and he said he would have some information to give. The situation in Ontario with respect to farm tractors is, to use the minister's expression, very tight. Tractors are being sold on a quota basis. I think the base year was either 1940 or 1941. Firms which sold a certain number of tractors in 1940 or 1941 are put on a quota basis in the same proportion as they sold in those years. This has worked a hardship in some respects, because there were certain firms which sold only a limited number in those years. Since that time they have been in a position where they have had only a very few tractors delivered to them for sale. I know of one particular area, right in my own district, where a firm has received thirty or forty applications for tractors, but they are allowed to sell only three a year. At that rate it would take a very long time for them to catch up on their orders.

In the meantime the farmers are suffering. I am not speaking particularly in the interest of the firms concerned. I speak rather in the interest of the farmers in that district, whose tractors have become so old that they are unable to operate them, and they are not getting their work done. I wish the minister would make a statement respecting the supply of tractors.

Mr. HOWE: I asked for the information from the administrator of farm machinery of the wartime prices and trade board, but it has not yet come to hand. I hope to have it to-morrow, at which time I shall be glad to give it to the hon. member.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Would the discussion of matters related to War Assets corporation, which is to dispose of government-owned plants, and other matters relating to the operation of the Park Steamship Company Limited boats come under the Department of Munitions and Supply, or would it come under the Department of Reconstruction?

Mr. HOWE: The Park Steamship company is a subsidiary of the Department of Munitions and Supply. War Assets corporation is a branch of the Department of Reconstruction. Therefore, while a discussion respecting Park Steamship company would be in order, there might be some doubt about War Assets corporation.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Who is responsible for the wage contracts made on behalf of the crews on Park Steamship company boats now operating in the South Pacific and chartered by the war shipping administration at Washington? I should like to have any information I can get respecting the nature of the wage contracts for seamen on those ships.

Mr. HOWE: Is my hon. friend referring to ships owned by the Canadian government?

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Yes.

Mr. HOWE: Those ships are placed in the hands of private operators, who operate the boats for government account under a management contract. Contracts between operator and seamen are negotiated contracts, but the position of the seamen is protected by the seamen's union. Terms of employment are thus agreed upon between the seamen's union and the operators, with the approval of the Park Steamship company.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: The ship to which I have reference, one of the Park Steamship company boats, was agented to the Seaboard shipping company of Vancouver, and I believe it was chartered by that company to the war shipping administration. The request I had arose from the fact that the war risk bonus paid Canadian seamen on that ship, which is operating in the southern Pacific and carrying supplies to the United States army personnel in that area, is $44.50 a month, whereas United States sailors doing the same type of work in the same waters have a war risk bonus of five dollars a day, and in addition to that their scale of pay is much higher. Has the government any responsibility or any control over the contract made by the agent with the wartime shipping board at Washington?

Mr. HOWE: The pay of the crews of Park ships is standard pay. As I say, it is negotiated between the seamen's union and the Park Steamship company, acting for all its agents. My hon. friend says there is a difference in the pay and war risk bonus as between Canadian and United States ships. He could go on and add that there is a difference between Canadian and British ships in that respect. In the case of United States ships, the Canadian scale is lower, whereas in that of British ships it is higher. He could go on to mention other nationalities in that connection. Our pay and allowances are not as high as those of the United States, which, I suggest, is quite understandable; but ours are better than the pay of any other country with the exception of the United States.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): If the minister will be good enough to have his organization review the evidence given before the war expenditures committee he will find that a constructive suggestion was made at the time, that it might be well to have a perpetual inventory available at all times of equipment at present in the hands of the administration which may be required here and there throughout Canada. I have in mind one particular case where a H.R.T. boiler of sizable capacity was wanted almost immediately and there was great difficulty in finding whether or not the organization under the minister's administration had such a boiler. It was only a $10,000 unit but would have avoided the necessity of manufacturing new equipment.

I have another case in mind where an organization is anxious to establish a plant somewhere between Cornwall and Oshawa along No. 2 highway, and is having difficulty in finding any inventory or listing of properties which the department or the crown has available. It might be well if a perpetual inventory of what is to be disposed of by the crown or the department in the next few years were kept and made available to those who might be interested.

Mr. HOWE: The department does maintain a central inventory, listing every separate item that is owned by the crown. It is not available to the public. It is a comprehensive record, comprising hundreds of thousands of machine tool listings. If a machine tool were wanted, we would be able to produce the list immediately.

So far as the sale of plants is concerned, the difficulty is that we are now almost at the peak of war production, and very few are available. The department is compiling a list of all the plants that will be available, and sketches of the plants and certain facts about them will be ready for distribution within the next few weeks.

Mr. POULIOT: Just before the adjournment I would ask the minister how many men from Barclays bank are in the Department of Munitions and Supply or in boards, commissions or other agencies under the minister. My information is that one of them is Mr. Henry Borden, K.C., who had an important position in the first place as general counsel with the department. Thereafter he became coordinator of controls and chairman of the wartime industries board or something like that. I should also like to know what the nature of those positions is and whether the coordinator of controls is the controller of controllers. This is one man who has been on the board of Barclays bank of Canada for some time. He is a nephew of Sir Robert Laird Borden, at one time Prime Minister of Canada.

Besides that, my information is that his firm has been treated with the fat of the land, especially in connection with Polymer corporation, and I understand that nothing could be done except through the firm of Borden, who took advantage of his job in the Department of Munitions and Supply to feed his partners and his firm to the limit. I am interested also in knowing if he has been replaced by Mr. Godsoe of the Confederation Life Insurance company. Mr. Godsoe is a Liberal; Mr. Borden a Conservative. His boss was Mr. Macdonald, who was on Barclays bank, who resigned to give his seat to the former minister of national defence. It seems to be a combine.

I should also like to know if Mr. Borden was recommended to the Minister of Munitions and Supply by the former minister of national defence and whether any other member of the staff or personnel of Barclays bank has been recommended to the minister by the former minister of national defence for a job in the Department of Munitions and Supply or for patronage of any kind.

Those are numerous questions, and I do not expect them to be all answered to-night, but I hope that to-morrow afternoon the minister will be in a position to answer them.

I also wish to know how much money has been paid for travelling and living expenses to Mr. Borden and Mr. Godsoe. Mr. Godsoe is also president of some political organization, or was, not long ago. That shows how impartial the department is, appointing a Liberal to succeed a Tory in such a high post.

I should also like to know exactly the nature of these three jobs, so that we may know what is the spirit of sacrifice of these dollar a year men who abandoned a lucrative practice to increase considerably the revenues of their firms. They are lawyers. I hope the minister will be kind enough to answer. I see him over there. I know he will tell me that I am not reasonable, that those men are making great sacrifices, that they are working there for the love of God, for the love of country and for the love of the king, and that members of parliament have no right to cast slurs at those gentlemen who are an example of virtue and disinterestedness and patriotism, that they are great souls, that Harry Borden is one of the greatest Canadians, that he overshadows the memory of his uncle, that Godsoe is the purest of all Liberals throughout Canada, that there are no men who will make as great sacrifices as Borden and Godsoe and that it is a shame for a member of parliament, especially the member for Temiscouata, to say such things with regard to such great men who are sacrificing their lives for their country in our great war effort.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Borden is a great Canadian, if I may say so.

Mr. POULIOT: He may be, but my hon. friend is just repeating my speech.

Mr. GRAYDON: You should not object to that.

Mr. POULIOT: I am not objecting, but you should treat them both alike, as twins, Borden and Godsoe.

Mr. GRAYDON: I will let the minister take care of that.

Mr. POULIOT: Both have occupied the highest post in Canada.

Mr. HOWE: I do not think we should adjourn with a statement of that kind going unanswered. Mr. Borden was one of the first employees of the Department of Munitions and Supply. He was with the original defence purchasing board. His services with the department antedate my own. I can say to my hon. friend that Mr. Borden had no relationship with Barclays bank until after he terminated all association with the department.

Mr. POULIOT: But—

Mr. HOWE: Sit down. I am speaking.

Mr. POULIOT: I will take no orders from the minister, only from the Chairman.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Borden was appointed a director of Barclays bank after he had terminated all association with the Department of Munitions and Supply. From the time of his joining the department, which was at the outbreak of the war, until he left the department, he took no salary from the department. He worked for actual expenses. His expenses were audited by the auditor general, and I assume they were his actual expenses, and that he did not live with great extravagance.

I may say that his firm did certain work for the Department of Munitions and Supply. It is a large firm, and it is quite understandable that they would do so. I can tell the hon. member that each year the firm of Borden, Sankey and Kelly delivered to the Department of Munitions and Supply of their own volition a cheque to cover every fee which they collected from the government on account of work performed for the Department of Munitions and Supply.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

As for Mr. Godsoe, he came into the department later on. It so happened that he succeeded Mr. Borden in the work he was doing when Mr. Borden retired from the department. There is no connection whatever and never has been any connection between Mr. Godsoe and his work and Mr. MacDonell, as suggested by my hon. friend. They worked for different firms, and so far as I know one was not on the board of the other firm, nor was there any connection.

As to Mr. Godsoe's politics, I have a suspicion, but I have never discussed them with him because I never thought it was any of my business to discuss them. He is a most efficient officer of the department and one whom I would be very sorry indeed to lose.

Mr. POULIOT: Now that the minister has repeated my speech, I expect that he will answer my questions to-morrow.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. CRERAR moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: To-morrow we shall continue with the estimates of the Department of Munitions and Supply, and when that is concluded, which I hope will be fairly early, it is proposed that other ministers having substantial amounts in this vote will make statements covering their particular part of it, and a discussion might follow those statements. I think that may expedite to some extent the work of the committee. There may be hon. members who are interested in certain features of the estimates which come in the department of other ministers, and I think this suggestion will probably expedite the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does this mean that now, for the short time we have, we are to have one minister's statement after another in the departments in the war appropriations?

Mr. CRERAR: Well, yes. What it means is this, that probably after munitions and supply is through, the Minister of Labour will make his statement; then the Minister of Veterans Affairs, a department in which there is a good deal of interest in the house, can make a statement, possibly followed by other ministers; and hon. members can note the questions they wish to ask in any of these departments and they can all be considered together. I understand that is the procedure which it is proposed we shall follow.

Mr. GRAYDON: I hope the minister is not suggesting that this is to be a ministerial parade that we are to witness for the next day and a half. I wish to suggest that one of the important departments in which a great deal of interest is centred is that of veterans' affairs, and some members of our group are anxious to have an opportunity of analysing the statement which the Minister of Veterans Affairs will make to the house and then of directing some pertinent questions with respect to rehabilitation, because, without any reflection upon other departments, that is one of the most urgent problems we have at the present time. I should like some undertaking from the minister that the Minister of Veterans Affairs will make the statement and permit questioning when the Minister of Munitions and Supply and of Reconstruction has finished.

Mr. CRERAR: That may be considered. I should think that when the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Veterans Affairs, I do not know in which order, have made their statements, that should be acceptable to the house; and if it is the desire of hon. members to discuss the statement of the Minister of Veterans Affairs, good and well; that can be done. I can assure my hon. friend that there may be worse things than a ministerial parade.

Mr. GRAYDON: I just could not think at the moment what could be worse; but maybe there are.

Mr. ROWE: The Prime Minister started one to-day with his political speech just before the election.

Mr. CRERAR: The hon. member contributed something to that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think the minister's suggestion is good and sound. There are those among us who would like to hear the statement of the Minister of Agriculture, too; and I do not see how we are to hear these ministers unless we have something resembling a ministerial parade. After all, we should have an opportunity to let various hon. members deal with the topics in which they are interested.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 11.10 p.m.

Thursday, April 12, 1945

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. POULIOT—INDEMNITY OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT—INCOME TAX

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, speaking as a backbencher, I rise to-day to a question of privilege. As a member of parliament I wish to say a few words at the close of this parliament with regard to our parliamentary indemnity as it is affected by the income tax. The press of the country understands quite well that the position of members of parliament is worse than ever. Poverty is not a shame but it is a great embarrassment. What are the duties of members of parliament? In the first place, a member has to attend the sittings of this house. Members leave their homes and incur considerable expense coming here to attend the sittings. I would like the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) to listen to me, sir. I address the Chair but I would like his ears to be well open. Members of parliament are considered as a class by themselves by some people who think they are minor individuals who do not deserve decent treatment.

Mr. HOMUTH: Some of them are treated too decently.

Mr. POULIOT: I remember that at college there were two brothers who were often fighting between themselves but when anyone came to separate them they united against the one who was butting in.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member come to his question of privilege as quickly as possible?

Mr. POULIOT: Yes sir, surely. But when some people who are concerned in this do not seem to understand the seriousness of the matter I have to make some comparisons, and the comparison was that with two brothers who were always fighting but who joined together against anyone who came to separate them. I do not suggest any fight to-day, but I want to put before the house and the country what has been stated in editorial comment by the leading press of the country.

Members of parliament have to hire stenographers; they have to pay for offices where they receive their constituents; they have to pay telephone bills; they have to pay for telegrams; they have to travel often outside the session to look after the interests of their constituents. They have to buy stamps costing a large amount of money, and our indemnity is mentioned as $4,000. We have to subtract from that amount $1,200 for income tax, and we have $60 in all for travelling expenses when we live more than four hundred miles from Ottawa. Well, sir, with $2,800 is it possible to run an office, to pay a stenographer, to pay telephone calls and telegrams, to buy stamps, stationery and so forth? Besides that, is it possible for us to go on like that without anything being credited to us by the income tax branch for the expenditures we are making in coming to attend to our duty?

Privilege—Mr. Ross (St. Paul's)

In England it is different. Members of parliament receive approximately $3,000 a year; but as the House of Commons at Westminster is much smaller than ours, there are seats for only one half of the members, and they are paid in advance, and they are not bound to attend the sittings. I wonder if the same thing is practicable here.

But what I will suggest to the government is, that at first, the expenses which are incurred by members of parliament in the carrying out of their parliamentary duties—travelling expenses, living expenses, office expenses—be deducted from the income tax on their indemnity.

Many hon. members who are professional men are sacrificing their practice in doing their duty as members of parliament. Other hon. members suffer the same prejudice. I hope the government will realize that consideration should be given at once to the well-deserving case of members of parliament.

MR. ROSS (ST. PAUL'S)—REFERENCE TO REMARKS
IN DEBATE ON APRIL 10

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, there is a matter which, as one of the elected representatives of the city of Toronto, I cannot allow to pass without saying a few words. On the tenth of this month the Minister of Agriculture, speaking in this house, made the following statement, as reported in Hansard, page 726:

I will never forget an experience I had in one of the theatres of an eastern city—

I do not know which city he is talking about.

—when I sat in a seat in that theatre and watched pictures of persons connected with certain of our allies appearing on the screen, and listening to the applause—and I joined in it.

Quite rightly so.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the privilege?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I shall get to it in a second. I must quote the minister's words:

—and then, immediately following that, was the picture of Major Triquet, right after he had won the Victoria Cross. And when his picture appeared on the screen in that theatre they did not applaud.

I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that that is an affront to the people of my city of Toronto and to every hon. member. I wish also to say that I have been in several theatres when this officer's picture appeared on the screen—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Just a minute—and there was greater applause for Major Triquet than for anyone else whose portrait was thrown on the screen.

POST-WAR RECONSTRUCTION

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY AS TO EMPLOYMENT AND INCOME

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): Mr. Speaker, acting in my capacity as Minister of Reconstruction, I desire to lay on the table of parliament a statement on government policy, having to do with employment and income, with special reference to the initial period of reconstruction.

I commend this document to you as deserving careful study. It is perhaps the most important government document that has been presented to this parliament in recent months. The document covers all major aspects of policy relating to the government's declared objective of maintaining a high level of employment and income in Canada. It is not a simple document, intended for light reading; rather, it must be studied, analysed, and considered, in order that its full importance may be understood. Because it is comprehensive in coverage, and because it seeks to explain the inter-relation of the various policies which the government proposes to pursue, it will reward your close attention.

Since 1939 the policies of the government have been directed toward the objective of total victory. Industry and production have been mobilized and expanded to the limit in pursuit of that objective. The government has, however, at all times, kept in mind the task of capitalizing the expansion of the war years, and of directing our enlarged productive capacity towards the maintenance in peace time of a continued high level of productivity and employment. Effective action to that end cannot be taken until the demands of war have slackened, but plans for its attainment can be made now, and the framework of principles and of administrative machinery can be provided for putting our plans into effect.

Last year this parliament passed the Department of Reconstruction Act. Subsequently I was appointed Minister of Reconstruction and set about the establishment of the new department. Under the statute which you approved, my responsibilities have been clearly defined. Primarily they centre around coordination of the actions of other departments and agencies of government to the end of assuring a rapid and smooth transition from war economy to peacetime economy; the formulation of plans for industrial development and reconversion; public works; housing; research; and the development of our natural resources. It is the duty of the department to find ways and means for carrying out these plans.

The organization of the Department of Reconstruction was undertaken at a time when the war in Europe was assuming new dimensions, and when allied attacks in the Pacific were extending the tentacles that will in due course, close upon Japan. Our war production during recent months has been at or near its peak, and the demands upon war industry and upon labour in Canada, have been greater than in any previous period. These demands will continue at peak levels until the defeat of Germany has been proclaimed. Until that day comes, we would be doing less than our share, should we embark upon extensive efforts of reconstruction and reconversion.

However, the primary emphasis on victory has not prevented careful planning for the period of reconstruction and reconversion and the establishment of governmental machinery for implementing these plans. Legislation introduced by the government during the last session of parliament has given some indication of the pattern of our post-war economy. The establishment of a Department of Veterans' Affairs and the measures placed in the hands of that department to assist in the rehabilitation of veterans; the establishment of a Department of National Health and Welfare and the provision for family allowances; the Agricultural Prices Support Act and the Fisheries Prices Support Act; the National Housing Act; the Export Credits Insurance Act and the establishment of an industrial development bank have all indicated the path which the government will follow. The Department of Munitions and Supply, while heavily occupied with our industrial war effort, has been clearing the way for prompt action on renegotiation of contracts, termination of contracts and the clearing of war plants so that rapid reconversion to peace time uses can be made possible.

The task of the Department of Reconstruction will differ widely from that of the Department of Munitions and Supply. The latter was called on to mobilize and expand production in Canada for a single purpose, the winning of the war, with the government its largest single purchaser. Reconstruction and reconversion involve the rediversification of our industrial economy and return to a situation in which the government is no longer an important purchaser. In many ways the task of reconstruction is the more complicated and therefore the work must be shared by all persons and agencies, public and private. Because of the breadth and variety of the problem, organization for reconstruction must cover a wide and comprehensive field. The new department is now organized and ready for action. Perhaps I can at this time give a very brief outline of the organization that is now functioning in a preliminary way.

One branch of the department is concerned with industrial reconversion and is meeting with considerable success in establishing industries new to Canada in the limited manufacturing space that is released from war work. While industry itself must take the initiative in converting war plants to peace time uses, our industrial reconversion branch will facilitate, stimulate and assist in every way.

A small committee within the department is dealing with applications for double depreciation as provided in the 1944 budget. These provisions are designed to stimulate new capital expenditures and further industrial expansion and reconversion. Capital expenditures in amount of $50,000,000 have already been recommended for double depreciation.

The coordinator of controls will maintain a close contact with all war time control agencies. It will be his task to work out modifications and removal of controls in a manner which will facilitate reconstruction and benefit our economy during the reconstruction period.

A vast amount of war surplus is being disposed of through agencies under the Minister of Reconstruction. Crown-owned plants and equipment will be returned to civilian production when no longer required for war and will be sold or leased to private industry promising substantial new post war employment. In considering the disposal of these plants probable stability of employment is regarded as more important than a high monetary recovery. Special attention is being given to providing rental premises for small businesses. Surplus materials are being disposed of through war assets corporation in a manner designed to benefit our economy as a whole and to avoid speculation and a waste of any usable goods.

Another branch of the department will stimulate industrial research and will render service to industry by placing at its disposal the most modern industrial techniques. It is hoped to duplicate in peace time industry the splendid services that research has rendered to war production. This work will be carried out in close cooperation with the national research council. The purpose will be to enable industry in Canada to make use of advanced scientific information and devices.

A coordinator of public projects will stimulate the planning of public works and map out the timing and nature of government expenditures on public works projects. The purpose will be to have in hand at all times a shelf of public projects already planned and available when needed to stimulate employment in any given area.

A coordinator of natural resources will stimulate planning of activities designed for the conservation and development of our natural resources. Special attention will be given to the development of our northwest territories, the management of which is a federal government responsibility. Special attention will also be paid to restoring the depletion caused by war to natural resources such as forests, mines and fisheries.

Civil aviation is a special responsibility of the Minister of Reconstruction. Through the director general of air development, the air transport board, the air services branch of the Department of Transport, and Trans-Canada Air Lines, the rapid development of commercial aviation within Canada and across the oceans will be advanced as rapidly as suitable equipment can be made available.

Export trade has been one of the greatest single factors in Canadian economy and must be expanded as a feature of our post-war economy. A foreign trade officer has been appointed to the Department of Reconstruction to cooperate with the Department of Trade and Commerce in formulating plans for a vigorous external commercial policy and to coordinate the work of that Department with other government agencies.

In order to keep the department in close touch with every part of Canada, local regional councils have been appointed, one in each province of Canada, and two in the large industrial provinces of Ontario and Quebec. These committees will have a permanent executive staff. The duty of the committees will be to keep the department informed of employment conditions in their respective areas, to recommend public projects suitable for their area, and to keep citizens within their area informed about the work of the department. These committees will be representative of the various economic groups within the area, and will include representatives of labour.

The work of the department will be of direct concern to labour as well as to industry and production, and the department will seek the full cooperation and assistance of labour in formulating and implementing of its reconstruction policies. In order to establish a close contact with labour, our organization includes a labour adviser, who will work in close collaboration with the Department of Labour.

The need for immediate and extensive reconstruction measures has not yet arisen, but the machinery is ready, and action will be prompt whenever we enter into the period of transition following the defeat of Germany. However, the machinery cannot operate without a comprehensive policy to guide it in its working, and set the targets for it. Here also the pattern has been set, the principles have been agreed upon, and the way cleared for action. The government document that I have tabled sets out the policy which will be applicable, particularly to the transition period following the defeat of Germany. The document is specific in the measures which are proposed for this transition period. It is not possible at this time to be equally specific regarding later measures, although the pattern for later measures is indicated in the statement of policy which I am tabling.

To attempt to summarize the document would be an invitation to hon. members to avoid giving study to the document itself. Therefore, I will not attempt such a summary. Once again let me urge you to read and study this important statement of government policy.

During more than five years of war Canada has continued to mobilize and expand its full productive capacity. On the industrial front, government, labour and management have been united together in the common objective of winning the war. On the production front, our farms, our forests, our mines and our fisheries have produced as never before. All our citizens have joined together with a common purpose, to back up our fighting men. The same united effort can win our post war objectives. Canada looks to the future with confidence.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply, who in presenting this statement appears in the role of Minister of Reconstruction, whether the government document to which he has just referred will be available for distribution to us at once?

Mr. HOWE: It is already in the distribution office.

Mr. GRAYDON: We should have copies if we are to give any study to it at this stage of the session.

Mr. HOWE: It is being sent to every hon. member.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): May I ask the minister if he has been in touch with the Minister of Finance, and what the proposed budget is in order to carry out the work he has indicated? I would like to have an answer to that question.

Mr. MICHAUD: I desire to lay on the table of the house—

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It is most important that we have some idea of that situation. We have not had a budget brought down, and yet the minister tells us what we are going to do. We do not know how we are going to do it, and it is about time we knew.

Mr. HOWE: The contents of the budget cannot be divulged until the budget is brought down. It will be brought down at the first regular session in this calendar year.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

TABLING OF ANNUAL REPORTS

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the table the annual report of the Canadian National Railway System for the year ended December 31, 1944; the annual report of the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited for the year ended December 31, 1944; the annual report of the Canadian National Railways Securities Trust for the year ended December 31, 1944, and the report of the auditors of the Canadian National Railways for the year ended December 31, 1944.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

MOBILIZATION ACT—REINFORCEMENTS—ABSENCE WITHOUT LEAVE AND DESERTIONS

Mr. BRUCE:

1. How many of the 16,000 draftees lately made available by order in council for overseas duty are now overseas?
2. Have any of these men served in the 1st Canadian Army on the western front? If so, how many and in what units?
3. How many of these 16,000 are absent without leave?
4. How many of these A.W.O.L. are classed as deserters?
5. Have any of each class covered by questions 3 and 4 been apprehended? If so, how many?
6. How many of these have been tried by a court-martial and what has been the punishment given in each case?
7. Will all of these men be tried by court-martial?
8. Did these A.W.O.L. draftees have their rifles and ammunition with them?
9. If so, have such rifles and ammunition been recovered?

32283—534

Mr. ABBOTT:

1. 11,836 N.R.M.A. soldiers have been dispatched to the United Kingdom under the authority of P.C. 8891 as of March 31, 1945.

2. Yes. To determine the numbers who have served and the units in which they have served would require reference to the general officer commanding in chief, First Canadian army. On the recommendation of the military authorities in the United Kingdom, it has been decided not to refer this question to him at present stage of operations. Further, on the recommendation of the military authorities in the United Kingdom, it has been decided not to disclose the names of the units in which they are serving.

3. 3,936 N.R.M.A. soldiers belonging to units which had proceeded overseas were reported absent without leave and have not surrendered or been apprehended.

4. 3,323 N.R.M.A. soldiers belonging to units which had proceeded overseas have been struck off strength as deserters pursuant to the findings of courts of inquiry and have not surrendered or been apprehended.

5. Approximately 3,700 N.R.M.A. soldiers of units which have proceeded overseas, who have been reported absent without leave, have surrendered or been apprehended. A breakdown of these, between those who had and those who had not, been struck off strength as deserters, is not available.

6. Seventy N.R.M.A. soldiers have been tried by court-martial on charges of absence without leave or desertion after having been warned for draft overseas. One case was dismissed and in three cases sentence has not been promulgated. In the remaining 66 cases, punishments awarded were:—

14 months imprisonment with hard labour .....	1
1 year detention .....	3
8 months detention .....	1

Questions

7. Not necessarily. The charges that are laid against a soldier and the manner in which he is tried is largely at the discretion of his commanding officer, who has power to deal with many offences either of his own volition or with the approval of the district officer commanding.

8. About 140 men who have been reported as absent without leave were in possession of rifles. None took ammunition.

9. 126 rifles have not been recovered.

Note.—The answers to questions Nos. 3, 4 and 5 apply only to N.R.M.A. soldiers from units which proceeded overseas as units and do not include any absentees among N.R.M.A. soldiers from training centres who were warned for despatch overseas as reinforcements from such training centres.

Mobilization Act—ORDER IN COUNCIL
OF NOVEMBER 1944

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury):

1. How many men drafted under the provisions of the National Resources Mobilization Act and sent overseas under the order in council of November, 1944, who did not volunteer for active service, have arrived in the United Kingdom up to March 1, 1945?

2. How many of such men have been sent to the continent up to March 1, 1945?

3. How many of such drafted men volunteered for general service before leaving Canada up to March 1, 1945?

4. How many of such drafted men volunteered for general service after arriving in the United Kingdom and up to March 1, 1945?

5. How many of such drafted men who did not volunteer for active service, either before leaving Canada, or after arrival in the United Kingdom, have been sent to the continent up to March 1, 1945?

6. How many, if any, of such drafted men who did not volunteer for active service either before leaving Canada or after arrival in the United Kingdom have been in active combat up to March 1, 1945?

Mr. ABBOTT:

1. Seven thousand seven hundred and forty-seven.

2. Two hundred and thirty-eight, of whom one had volunteered in the United Kingdom and 237 were still of NRMA status on leaving the United Kingdom.

3. Of those who were of NRMA status in October last, 1,312 have volunteered for general service and had, up to 1st March, 1945, been despatched overseas and arrived in the United Kingdom. Records have not been kept of men who volunteered before October, 1944.

4. Ninety-four.

5. Two hundred and thirty-seven.

[Mr. Abbott.]

6. Up to 27th February, 1945, seven soldiers who did not volunteer for active service either before leaving Canada or after arrival in the United Kingdom had been posted to field units. It is not known whether or not they actually engaged in active combat by 1st March, 1945.

ALASKA HIGHWAY—CANOL PROJECT

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

1. Have the costs of construction and maintenance of the Alaska highway and of the Canol project, or any part thereof, been paid by Canada?

2. If so, how much on each and for what?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

WHITEHORSE OIL REFINERY—USE OF SURPLUS OIL ON STREETS

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

Will the government of Canada, on the closing down of the oil refinery operated at Whitehorse, Yukon, by Standard Oil Company for the army of the United States, endeavour to arrange with the proper American authorities, that surplus oil at said refinery be made available to the town of Whitehorse for oiling its streets in alleviation of dust nuisance and menace to health, as was done by said authorities in 1944?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Inquiries have been made of the United States authorities as to whether surplus oil will be available for this purpose.

VETERANS' LAND ACT

Mr. CHOQUETTE:

1. How many district offices have been established in each province under the Veterans' Land Act?

2. What are the names and address of district supervisors and members of advisory committees appointed in the province of Quebec under the said act?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre):

1. There are seven district offices located at the following cities: Vancouver, Edmonton, Saskatoon, Winnipeg, Toronto, Montreal and Saint John, N.B.

Thirty-five Regional Offices have been established distributed as follows: British Columbia, 5; Alberta, 7; Saskatchewan, 4; Manitoba, 3; Ontario, 8 (and one sub-office); Quebec, 3; Maritimes, 5.

2. District Superintendent—Stephane Boily, 1253 McGill College Ave., Montreal.

Regional Offices: Montreal—Regional Supervisor, J. D. Belzile, 516 Dominion Square Bldg., Montreal.

Advisory Committee Members—R. Thomson, Farmer and Secretary Fruit Co-operative Society, Abbotsford; Gustave Toupin, Professor in Animal Husbandry, Oka; Azellus Lavallee, Farmer, Berthier; J. F. Demarais, Farmer, Iberville; L. C. McQuat, Farmer and Agricultural Agent, Montreal; J. W. Delaney, President Sheep Breeders' Association, Hull; L. J. Smith, Farmer, Aylmer; J. L. Wright, Contractor, Hull.

Quebec—Regional Supervisor, Henri Pintal, 39 St. Paul St., Quebec.

Advisory Committee Members—Dr. A. Morin, Deputy Minister of Agriculture, Quebec; Pierre Turgeon, Farmer, St. Anselme; R. Dionne, Department of Agriculture, Quebec; J. O'Connor, Farmer, St. Henri; E. Brisebois, Agronome, St. Romauld de Levis.

Advisory Sub-committee—C. A. Desrosiers, Power Company, Rimouski; G. Belzile, Chamber of Commerce, Rimouski; T. A. Bouchard, Farmer and Mayor, Luceville; Jules Rinfret, Agronome, Val-Brillant.

Sherbrooke—Regional Supervisor, D. J. Pomerleau, 4 Wellington Street, Sherbrooke.

Advisory Committee Members—J. R. Plante, Farmer and Appraiser, Sherbrooke; J. C. Blackwood, Farmer and Director Agricultural Society, Knowlton.

MIGRATION WITHIN THE EMPIRE

Mr. CHURCH:

What is being done regarding migration within the empire, including that from the British isles to Canada?

Mr. CRERAR: Stand.

Mr. CHURCH: Could we not have a reply to this question before the house closes? It is a matter connected with migration within the empire and from the mother country to Canada. I understand Australia and New Zealand have a policy and are getting immigrants. This would be of advantage to returning soldiers.

Mr. CRERAR: This is the first day on which the question has appeared on the order paper. I will see if an answer can be provided to-morrow, although I am not sure that it can be.

Question stands.

PENSIONS FOR THE BLIND

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. How many persons in each of the provinces and in the Northwest Territories were receiving blind pensions as at the latest date for which this information is available?

2. What was the average monthly payment in each province at said date?

3. Does the monthly average indicate in the answer to question (2) include any supplementary amounts paid by the provinces?

4. What supplementary amounts are paid by the various provinces?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1 and 2. December 31, 1944:

Questions as Orders for Returns

3. No.

4. British Columbia—A supplementary allowance of $5 per month is paid.

Alberta—A supplementary allowance of $5 per month is paid.

Manitoba—A supplementary allowance of $1.25 is paid to certain pensioners.

Ontario—A supplementary allowance up to 15 per cent of the monthly pension is paid to a maximum of $3 per month.

Nova Scotia—A supplementary allowance may be paid to certain pensioners at the discretion of the provincial authorities.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

MONT JOLI AIRPORT

Mr. LaCROIX:

1. What was the total cost of construction of the Mont-Joli airport?

2. What companies obtained contracts for such work, and what amount was paid to each of said companies?

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH AND WELFARE— EMPLOYEES RECEIVING OVER $3,000

Mr. CHOQUETTE:

What are the names, qualifications, last place of residence, present duties and yearly salary of each employee receiving more than $3,000 per year and appointed before April 8, 1945, by the Department of National Health and Welfare?

EXPORT OF CHEESE AND POWDERED MILK

Mr. LaCROIX:

1. During 1944, has any, (a) cheese; (b) powdered milk, been exported to the United States or to countries other than those of the British commonwealth?

2. If so, what quantity of each was exported from January 1, 1945, to date?

3. What quantity to each country?

4. From what province did such powdered milk or cheese originate?

5. What companies purchased such cheese?

6. Is the export of cheese or powdered milk outside the British empire now authorized, and under what conditions?

7. What is the quantity of cheese and powdered milk for which there is no market in the province of Quebec and which is likely to be lost?

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION— MARITIME REGION—SUPPLEMENTARY ANSWER

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, before we leave questions may I say that a few days ago I promised the hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. Hazen) that I would give a supplementary answer to a question answered on April 9. The question was:

[Mr. Ilesley.]

How many persons are employed by the unemployment insurance commission in the maritime region?

The answer was not broken down, and I now wish to do so. It is: Males, 185; females, 245.

The second part of the question was:

How many of them are veterans of this war or the last war?

The break-down is: Males, 68; females, 1.

HOUSING

LOANS FOR INDIVIDUALS IN SASKATCHEWAN— SECURITY AGREEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. H. BENCE (Saskatoon City): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance. On Tuesday he said he would endeavour before the house closes to have brought down an answer to question No. 3 on to-day's order paper. In view of the fact that we hope to close to-morrow and that questions are not in order after that, and in view of the further fact that this is a very important matter so far as the people of my province are concerned could the minister make a statement in the matter not later than to-morrow? He told me last January that he could not give any information then with respect to the application of the housing act in Saskatchewan. The people out there are wondering what is going on and what is going to happen.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I will make some statement or give some answer before the house closes. I have given a lot of consideration to the question. It is a difficult one to answer.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WARTIME LABOUR RELATIONS ORDER P.C. 1003

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour. Has the government or the Minister of Labour received a request from any or all of the national labour organizations in Canada for a meeting to discuss amendments to the wartime labour relations regulation order P.C. 1003? If a request has been received, has a date for such meeting been set?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): As my hon. friend probably knows better than I, or as well as I—because he is an older man than I am—

Mr. MacINNIS: Knowledge does not always go with age.

Mr. MITCHELL: He belongs to the same organizations as I do, and he should know that every year legislative bodies of the national organizations, including the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, the Canadian Congress of Labour, the Catholic Syndicates and the railroad brotherhoods, meet the government. I assume that when those delegates meet the government, something will be said about amendment to P.C. 1003. Only this morning my hon. friend attended a meeting at which I was present, and at which that matter was discussed.

Mr. GILLIS: I did not quite catch the minister's answer to the hon. member for Vancouver East. Did I understand him to say that no date had been set to meet the labour bodies in connection with labour legislation?

Mr. MITCHELL: That is correct. I have discussed it with the organizations concerned, but no date has been set.

DOMINION ELECTIONS

STATUS OF CANDIDATES IN THE CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence for Air two questions arising out of the filing of the order in council respecting the electoral right of candidates in the armed forces. My information is that commanding officers overseas object, or certainly do not look with favour upon, granting leave to officers and men from their units who are to return to Canada in order to participate in the respective campaigns. For that reason I suggest to him that uniform regulations, which would be mandatory and which would assure the return of those candidates to Canada at the earliest possible date, should be brought into effect. This should be done uniformly, and without regard to political faith. What has been done to assure that orders are being given to commanding officers in that regard?

My other question arises from the same point. I am informed that an order has gone out affecting officers and men who are to-day in Canada on leave. Even though they have been named as candidates, they are denied the right to appear on political platforms at this time. Instructions have gone out to the effect that they must not in any way actively and openly participate by making speeches on political platforms. Has consideration been given to a directive or order which would allow those candidates to speak on political platforms?

After all, we want to encourage as many as possible of the service men to become candidates.

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Defence for Air): The hon. member was good enough to inform me that he intended to bring up this matter. May I say that to-day I tabled order in council P.C. 2556, which amends a previous order in council P.C. 4075 dated May 30, 1944. The provisions of this new order apply to members of the armed forces serving overseas who may be candidates in dominion and provincial elections, and who have been selected as candidates and certified by the dominion headquarters of their parties, in respect of dominion elections, or by provincial headquarters of their parties in respect of provincial elections. They must be certified as being official candidates. If a candidate is not of any political party he is required to furnish his commanding officer with a statutory declaration declaring himself to be a candidate in such election. When that has been done, after the dissolution of the House of Commons or the legislative assembly a candidate as so defined, and subject to the exigencies of the service—that is the saving clause that must always be provided—may be transferred on application to the naval divisional headquarters, if he is in the navy; to the military district depot, if in the army, or to the air force command headquarters, if in the air force, nearest to the electoral district in which he is to be a candidate. On posting to that headquarters leave will be granted, without pay or allowances, to commence on the date requested in the application and terminating not more than two days after the election date. I might state that candidates as so described in the order may appear on public platforms in uniform and speak.

Mr. REID: What about the man who runs as an independent?

Mr. GIBSON: He applies to his commanding officer and makes a statutory declaration that he is a candidate.

CANADIAN ARMY

N.R.M.A. MEN PROCEEDING TO THEATRES OF WAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. C. ABBOTT (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the other day the hon. member for Lake Centre asked me to state how many men of N.R.M.A. status had proceeded to theatres of war up to the end of March. I had given figures to the end of February and I told him that I had cabled for this information and would endeavour to give it to the house. I received a reply this morning.

Up to the end of March, 1,705 men who had claimed N.R.M.A. status when they left Canada had proceeded to theatres of war. That represents an increase of 1,467 over the 238 who had proceeded to theatres of war to the end of February. Of this 1,705, a total of 1,651 still had N.R.M.A. status when they left England. What happened to them after they got over to the theatres of war I do not know.

Perhaps I might be permitted to emphasize that these figures bear out the statement which I made to the house yesterday that these men are treated in exactly the same way as general service men. They take their place in the queue and proceed as reinforcements to the theatre of war as they are needed.

PRISONERS OF WAR

CONDITIONS AMONG CANADIAN PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. GARFIELD CASE (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make an observation to the Prime Minister, having to do with his statement yesterday about prisoners of war. As you know, there are now appearing in the press pictures showing our prisoners of war in a very terrible condition. I have a letter from a friend who has a son who has been a prisoner of war since August, 1943. For a while they heard from him quite regularly and his letters were cheerful, but for a long time now they have not heard and these pictures are driving them almost to distraction. I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he could seek the cooperation of the press and periodicals and have them desist from publishing these pictures. I do not see where any good purpose is served by publishing them. Thousands of people whose loved ones are suffering under nazi tyranny must be undergoing terrible heartache because of these pictures. Because of what he said yesterday I know the Prime Minister is in sympathy with these people. I should like him to take this matter under advisement and seek the cooperation of the press and periodicals so that we may save these people some heartache and sorrow.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): As the hon. member has suggested, I have every sympathy in the world with those who have relatives overseas, in the prison camps, and who undoubtedly are faced with a critical situation. As I said yesterday, the government is seeking to take every means possible to get correct information. However, to ask me to seek to control the press is a pretty large order. It is one I have never attempted to carry out in any form. I know my hon. friend has certain influence with the press, and perhaps after the words he has just used they will take—

Mr. HOMUTH: His influence is a good influence.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: After the words he has just used I am sure they will take notice. I would imagine that in a matter of this kind the press would be only too anxious to cooperate with anyone of any party.

HOUSING

CONDITIONS IN TORONTO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of Finance to the serious housing condition now existing in Toronto. For the last few days there have been lines of people in front of the office of the emergency administrator on Bay street waiting for permits in order to obtain temporary shelter when there is none available. It is only nineteen days to the first of May and these people must be taken care of. I had intended to move the adjournment of the house to discuss this matter but some time has been taken up already discussing our rules. The minister wrote me on February 20 stating that it would not be possible to build any houses in Toronto because of war and a lack of materials. The emergency shelter control has not helped things; it has simply aggravated the housing situation in Toronto. As a rule large numbers of people would be going to the island and to the country for the summer, but if they do so these rules interfere with that exodus because it would be necessary for them to get permits when they come back to the city.

I have three or four suggestions I should like to make. First, that army and government property and that of outside commissions in or near the city be made available for temporary housing. This is necessary when many people are being thrown out on the streets on May 1. Second, that any building engineers now in the three forces be lent to the municipalities in order to help build temporary quarters. Third, that some of the irksome housing controls governing the building and renovation and reconstruction of properties be removed. Fourth, that some labour and a reasonable amount of used or unused building materials be made available from the war salvage administration and unused war plants, like the one at Pickering; also that there be made available some of the wooden huts now being used on the waterfront by the R.C.A.F. equipment depot.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): My hon. friend's suggestions will receive consideration. I might say that yesterday or the day before my colleague, the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) in answer to a question asked by an hon. member, indicated that the Toronto situation was being carefully considered. I understood the minister to say that he hoped to be able to make a statement within a few days.

Mr. CHURCH: You cannot get houses built by sending out shelter postcards. There is enough paper being wasted as it is when there are no houses available.

PENSIONS

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—RATES FOR VARIOUS DISABILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): May I ask the Minister of Veterans' Affairs if he is in position to state what the pension rates will be for various disabilities suffered from wounds or sickness attributable to this war. Similar information was available to the public during the last war.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans' Affairs): My hon. friend was good enough to send me notification yesterday of his intention to ask this question. As the reply is fairly lengthy, I ask permission to table it and I will send my hon. friend a copy immediately.

Mr. BRUCE: Could it not be placed on Hansard?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It will go on Hansard.

(The statement follows:)

Disability as defined in the Pension Act means:

"The loss or lessening of the power to will or to do any normal, physical or mental act."

Disabilities result from wounds, injuries or disease. Section 24 (2) of the Act provides:

"The estimate of the extent of a disability shall be based on the instructions and a table of disabilities to be made by the commission for the guidance of physicians and surgeons making medical examinations for pension purposes."

This table of disabilities was created in 1918 on the recommendation and advice of outstanding specialists, compensation board officials and others after a close study of the assessment tables of the allied governments. The table sets out percentages for fixed disabilities and is used as a guide only in arriving at the degree of assessment. It has been revised on several occasions and is the subject of constant study by the commission and its medical advisers.

Pension awards are subject to review from time to time and the degree of assessment is based on the degree of pensionable disablement at the time of examination. Amputation at the elbow would normally be a fixed disability whereas disabilities resulting from diseases such as bronchitis may vary from 5 to 100 per cent. For this reason it would be impossible to give the awards of pension for all cases of wounds and sickness but the following examples may meet the request of the hon. member.

	Single man — Pension per month
Loss of one eye is assessed at 40 per cent.....	$30 00
Total blindness is assessed at 100 per cent.....	75 00
Amputation at elbow is assessed at 70 per cent.....	52 50
Amputation at knee is assessed at 60 per cent.....	45 00
Amputation of both arms is assessed at 100 per cent.....	75 00
Loss of one kidney is assessed at 15 per cent.....	11 25

I might add that, as the hon. member is no doubt aware, the Pension Act, section 26, provides for an addition to pension in cases of helplessness.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

EMPLOYEES INVOLVED IN 1919 STRIKE—REQUEST FOR ROYAL COMMISSION ON PENSION RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister, notice of which I sent to him earlier to-day. Has the Prime Minister received from the heads of certain railroad unions in Canada a request for the establishment of a royal commission to investigate the matter of the pension rights of Canadian Pacific employees who were involved in the general strike at Winnipeg in 1919? If so, will the Prime Minister indicate whether consideration will be given to this request?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not receive my hon. friend's communication in time to have a search made of the departmental files, and so I am unable to say whether the trade unions have sent such a request to me. They may have. If they have, it will certainly receive consideration. My hon. friend is referring to a strike at Winnipeg in 1919 and a request for a royal commission to provide redress in the matter of pension rights. Is that it?

Mr. KNOWLES: That is right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I remember having had an experience somewhat similar of a strike in 1910 or 1911 when I was Minister of Labour, and we were unable to get redress for another twelve years, but we got it eventually. If any wrong has been done in this case I would hope that it might be remedied, even if it took forty years.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is because of the terrific battle the Prime Minister put up on that occasion that the unions have appealed to him for this royal commission.

Mr. HOMUTH: The marriage is getting closer than ever.

COAL

CLOSING OF BEVERLEY MINES, EDMONTON DISTRICT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. F. KUHL (Jasper-Edson): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply. I have a telegram from the local organization of the Alberta farmers' union in the district of Edmonton complaining that the Beverley Coal Mines in the Edmonton coal district, a mine from which most of the farmers there secure their coal, is being closed down. In view of the repeated appeal which the minister's department has made to the people of Canada to lay in their winter's supply of coal during the summer months, I would ask if he has been informed of the closing down of this coal mine, and if so, what steps he is taking in regard to the matter.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Speaker, I have no information about the closing down of the mine. The only thing that would close a mine down would be lack of an outlet for the coal. I hope that my hon. friend will advise those who have communicated with him to buy their coal early. We think that is important, both to the mining industry, and for the comfort of our citizens next winter.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL—PROCEDURE FOR THE PRESENT SITTING

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Before we proceed with government orders, perhaps the house will permit me to see if we understand clearly the procedure proposed for this afternoon. It was suggested last night, as I recollect it, that as the house might be anxious to get the fullest information from the ministers of the various departments, it might be advisable to have the Minister of Labour make his statement before discussion continues further on the Department of Munitions and Supply, and that following his statement the Minister of Veterans Affairs might make his statement, and following that any minister might be questioned on any matter in any order, if that is agreeable.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): May I make this observation with respect to what the Prime Minister has just said? Last night the acting leader of the government, the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) made mention of the possibility that a number of ministers might make statements to-day in connection with their departments. I raised objection because I did not think we should have statements made by ministers one after the other until we had first cleaned up the departments in which we were interested. It will not be agreeable to us—I say this in the most cooperative spirit—to have the Minister of Labour go on at the moment, because there are some matters in connection with the Department of Munitions and Supply that we would first like to have cleaned up. I know the Minister of Labour is very anxious to make his statement as soon as possible—if he is not, he ought to be; but in any event, as I pointed out last night, and this is no reflection in any way upon the Department of Labour, there are some urgent matters that we are anxious to take up with the Minister of Veterans' Affairs in connection with soldiers' rehabilitation, hospitalization, and so forth. If it could be arranged, it would be agreeable to us if the Minister of Veterans' Affairs would follow the discussion on the Department of Munitions and Supply with his statement, and then we might have questions, and then the Minister of Labour might make his statement. We are hopeful of giving the Minister of Labour an opportunity later on in the debate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My purpose in rising was just to ascertain what would be the best order, and certainly if that order is preferable we will take the business in the order my hon. friend has just indicated.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Wednesday, April 11, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Temiscouata.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Waterloo South was on his feet. I saw him. I think that this list of speakers in the hands of the chairman must be subject to modifications from time to time. Now apparently the chairman has a list of speakers carried over from yesterday. It is bad enough to have a list of speakers in committee without having a list carried over from yesterday. May I suggest to the chairman that, with his usual fairness, he do not tie himself too closely to any list of speakers.

The CHAIRMAN: Unlike the Speaker, I am not furnished by the whip with a list of speakers. Frequently a dozen members will get on their feet at once to address the committee, and as the leader of the opposition has stated, I always try to be fair and call upon speakers alternately from the different groups, without giving special privileges to any individual or to any group. At the present time I see the hon. member for Temiscouata.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member for Waterloo South was on his feet and he evidently intends to say something. If past performances are any indication, he will have plenty to say and he will say it exceptionally well. I am not suggesting that any one member should be allowed an exceptional amount of time, but there should be some reasonable division amongst the different groups.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was entirely unaware that there was anything in the nature of a list of speakers, and if that procedure is to continue I am afraid we shall be here a very long time. I think we should try to restrict the discussion, commensurately with a proper appraisal of the estimates. I heard what the Prime Minister suggested just now, and I am more or less in favour of it, but I wish to say something on reconstruction. The Minister of Reconstruction, however, is not on to-day and I do not propose to proceed; I will wait until the proper moment. I think we should try to keep to the subject at issue rather than to discuss all sorts of things altogether out of the picture, and if we are to have a list of speakers that is apt to happen.

The CHAIRMAN: May I say to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that unlike the speaker the chairman has no Speaker's list from the whips indicating the order in which hon. members will speak, he is placed in a very difficult position at times when there are ten or twelve members rising at once. I try to be fair and, generally speaking, I believe hon. members are satisfied with my recognition of speakers as I see them rise. I believe that the way I have dealt with this matter has always worked satisfactorily. In view of what the leader of the opposition has said, I think the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) should be allowed to go on.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I realize, Mr. Chairman, that you must have some list before you if the discussion is to be orderly, but I did not know that a list had been prepared, and when there is such a list and members know nothing about it, there is apt to be confusion. While I have no objection to a list being prepared, I suggest that everyone should know about it; otherwise the business of the house is likely to be prolonged rather than curtailed. So long as we know that you have a prepared list and that we are going to get in on it in our proper order, that is all right; but I do not think it will expedite the business of the committee if there is a list that no one knows anything about.

Mr. HOMUTH: In rising to make a few observations in regard to the Department of Munitions and Supply I do so because I feel that the people of Canada are not satisfied with the statement which the minister made. There were so many things left unsaid and so many things that should have been said that were not given us by the minister. Naturally, when a war is on, many charges are made regarding profits, regarding contracts being let unfairly, and matters that create considerable unrest in the public mind. At the beginning of the war we heard many stories about go-betweens, those men who had little offices set up in the various cities of the country. There was no equipment or machinery, but they happened to have the ear of the government and were able to get contracts.

Mr. HOWE: Name one.

Mr. HOMUTH: I will name them before I am through. You sit down.

Mr. HOWE: Just smearing.

Mr. HOMUTH: Many stories were current at the beginning of the war, and as the war went on, as the government became organized, as the Department of Munitions and Supply was organized, we thought that those things would come to an end. Every time a member on the opposition side in this house raised certain questions with regard to the letting of contracts or the cost of certain commodities, and started to criticize the government, they with their overwhelming majority yelled "sabotage" at those in the opposition and suggested that everything we were doing was intended to hurt the war effort. The fact of the matter was that many members sitting in the opposition who knew of certain things that were going on went to the departmental officials and told them the story and in every way tried to cooperate. We set up secret committees in this house, and sitting on those committees for a couple of years, I heard and saw nothing that could not have been given out to the public. In fact, I think that had it been given to the public, the public would have been much better satisfied, because they are quite prepared to accept the fact that governments are human. They are made up of human beings and can make mistakes. But it was that continual desire to hide things from the public of Canada that made the public suspicious.

We can remember the charges made with regard to the boots that were supplied to the army. Every paper in this country carried the story and blazed it forth in their pages, and the people of Canada began to wonder what type of boots were being supplied the Canadian Army. Whether there was any ground for these charges I am not prepared to say. Nevertheless, instead of having a public inquiry, instead of clearing the matter up and allowing the public to know the truth or otherwise of these charges, it was referred to a special private and secret committee, and the public never did hear the evidence in that regard. It is only natural that the public should become suspicious.

I could go on with many other matters. I thought that the minister, when he spoke in the house, would refer to shipbuilding in Canada. Charges were made of the tremendous cost of building ships in one yard as compared with another. We hear rumours now that in the Toronto shipyard five or six ships have been scrapped, one ship that was about ninety per cent complete and another about sixty per cent complete, and they were scrapped because, as the story goes, these ships were no longer wanted. The story goes out that they are now bringing ships down from the north, the same kind of ships, to fill up the Toronto yard. I do not know whether it is true; I do not know whether they have changed prices on the building of ships in the various yards in Canada. The people of Canada are anxious to know what is the truth with regard to shipbuilding in the country and whether the tremendous profits we knew they were making are being made to-day. These are questions the people of Canada wonder about.

We read in the papers that a certain building in Windsor was rented at a fabulous rental running into hundreds of dollars per month when the original rental was $89. There was public demand that this thing be investigated. It was investigated by the wartime prices and trade board and the rent was set back, even lower than it had been originally. But who knows the regulations with regard to rentals better than officials in the various departments of government? I can understand some man or woman owning a house and breaking the rental laws because of lack of knowledge of the law, but here are government officials who increase rentals 500 and 600 per cent and turn it over. Was it a friend of the government? I do not know. It makes people doubtful as to where their money is going.

We read now of a farm being purchased and there is a protest from the realty board at Windsor because of the tremendous price paid for it. Now they are investigating the matter. Here we are in the closing hours of the government—and it is the closing hour for this government; here we are at the beginning of the eighth war loan, and these things appear in the press, and people begin to wonder and wonder how their money is being spent, and whether the government is being as profligate with this money as we are led to believe it is—money which came out of the pockets of the people of Canada, which is taken out of the wages of the industrial workers of this country. We go and plead with them to buy war loans, we urge them to invest in victory bonds; and then they pick up the paper and read these things. I had thought that after five and a half years' experience, such conditions would have been cleared up and the contracts let by Munitions and Supply would have been based on a fair cost and a fair profit. Then there comes to my notice something which I think is one of the most scandalous deals in connection with the war effort. It does not involve millions of dollars, but if this is an example of what is being done in other branches and with other contracts, it is time for a very thorough investigation into these expenditures.

The government asked somebody, somehow, for a certain commodity which was to be used to pack war materials for overseas. A manufacturer in the city of Montreal was asked if he could supply certain materials. He said yes, it was in his line of business. He was asked to do this by another manufacturer whose machinery was not equipped to handle the job, and, realizing that another manufacturer had made the inquiry and that he had to resell the product, he gave him as close a price as possible, namely nine cents a pound, for this particular material. He then sold him some 400,000 pounds. Later he heard that the government was buying this type of material. He came to Ottawa to try to get a contract at the nine cents a pound at which the material had been sold for resale to the government. On his return to Montreal he was called on the telephone and told, "You have been in Ottawa; you have been interfering in this contract. Keep your nose out of Ottawa, because you cannot do yourself any good there." Within a month his contract was gone; the business was lost to him.

What was actually happening? This man was making a material which he sold to another manufacturer for nine cents a pound; and a fellow with a little insurance agency in Montreal sold it to the government at 21 cents a pound. On the 400,000 pounds there was a profit of $48,000, on an investment of $36,000. The man who originally made the stock sent samples to the department and offered it at the price at which he was selling to this agent. They could not buy it because first it had to go through the research department, and it was two or three months in that department, and then the report came back that this stock could not be used because it was too inflammable. Yet it was the very stuff of which the government had bought 400,000 pounds at a profit of twelve cents a pound to the in-between.

I called up the department two weeks ago and asked them what they were doing about this matter. I told them the story, and I said, "Surely you will let me know what is going to happen. Surely you are not going to let a thing like this go on." That was nearly two and a half weeks ago. I have not heard anything yet.

Mr. HOWE: With whom did you communicate in the department?

Mr. HOMUTH: I am not going to tell my hon. friend whom I called. My word is as good as that of anybody else in this house; and when I say I called someone in the department, I called somebody.

Mr. HOWE: As head of the department I am interested to know.

Mr. HOMUTH: Let me say this to the minister. For five years he and his colleagues have stood up in this house with their righteous dignity and their assurances that nothing could go wrong in their war effort, and every time we have raised a point of criticism hon. members sitting over there cry "sabotage" and say, "You are trying to hurt the war effort." The truth of the matter is that they have been getting away with a lot of stuff which they had no right to get away with, and the time has come when we had better tell the truth.

Mr. CHEVRIER: You have tried to prove a lot of that stuff, and you haven't succeeded.

Mr. HOMUTH: "Haven't succeeded"! There are a lot of things we could have proved, but we were sufficiently interested in the war that, instead of bringing scandal in the House of Commons, we went to departments and ministers and told them about it.

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member will be subpoenaed on this case two days after parliament dissolves.

Mr. HOMUTH: Why, listen! The Prime Minister threatened the people of Grey North, and you know what they did.

Mr. HOWE: This is not a threat.

Mr. HOMUTH: Let me say this to my hon. friend: I am quite willing to stake my seat on the basis that this is true.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is in jeopardy anyhow.

Mr. HOMUTH: And let me say to the minister—

Mr. HOWE: Your term will be over in two days anyway. That is a very safe offer from the bold lion from Waterloo.

Mr. HOMUTH: Let me tell the minister I am also willing to gamble with him that this charge is true. I will bet my character against his, and I am giving him big odds. Surely the minister does not believe that the people of this country are dumb. The minister recently spoke at East Hamilton. He made a speech at a convention there, and during the course of his remarks what did he say? He said, "We have spent $319 million in Hamilton." The only impression that was left was that this government was so good to the hon. member for Hamilton East and to the other hon. member for Hamilton that it spent $319 million in that city. These were great members; they were fellows who were able to get $319 million spent there. The fact of the matter is that Hamilton has the industries to do the job. This is not Liberal money; this is money which comes out of the pocket of every loyal Canadian citizen. It is not the government's money to spend; but it is our duty to see that it is spent properly; that is the thing we are interested in; and if my hon. friend wants to subpoena me when this session is over to give evidence in regard to this matter, I shall be glad to come, and he will not have to subpoena me either; I shall be only too glad to come. If the minister would set up a committee to-morrow we would go into it and prove that these things are true.

Mr. CHEVRIER: You have been making lots of charges, but you have never proved them yet.

Mr. HOMUTH: There speaks the inexperienced little boy from down in Northumberland.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Stormont.

Mr. HOMUTH: Stormont. Northumberland is louder.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Stormont is at least accurate.

Mr. HOMUTH: The reason I bring these matters up is that I believe the minister was not fair to the people of Canada when he made his statement the other day. Many matters under the control of the Minister of Munitions and Supply have been agitating the minds of the people of this country, such as shipbuilding, boots and so on; and they would like to know if these things have been cleared up. Are ships still being built at a tremendous profit, or are they not? The people of Canada are entitled to know. We are on the verge of another victory loan. Let me say to my hon. friend that there is not a member of this house who works harder than I do to put over a victory loan. There is not a Liberal member of the house who would go out and put in as much time and effort during a victory loan as I do. I am prepared to do that; I am only too willing to do it, but I say that now, on the verge of the eighth victory loan, the people would like to have had some of these things cleared up that have been in the press across this country. They have not been cleared up, and I think the minister was unwise in not dealing with them.

Mr. HOWE: Here we have a spectacle for the people of Canada. The loyal opposition in parliament have a duty to perform. That duty is to protect the public purse, to criticize the government, to see that moneys are well spent. We have been going through a time of war. The Department of Munitions and Supply has been spending money at a greater rate than it has ever been spent before in this country. We have been watching expenditures as carefully as we could. We have found one or two situations that had to be corrected, but we always found them ourselves; we have never had much outside help. We have investigated, and if there was wrongdoing those responsible were punished. Now we have a member of the loyal opposition, paid by the people of the country to do a job, rising in the House of Commons and saying he knows of a case in which the public purse has been defrauded; that he has a pipeline into the department to someone there whom he refuses to disclose—and I know he has been using it quite freely—

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. HOWE: Sit down.

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a point of order. Sit down.

Mr. HOWE: I will not sit down.

Mr. HOMUTH: Sit down where you belong.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. HOMUTH: I stand on my rights as a member. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. HOWE: I rose to make a statement, and I demand the right to do so.

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a point of order, as is my privilege.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I believe it is left to the discretion of the hon. gentleman who is speaking whether he is ready or willing to answer any question addressed to him. The hon. member for Waterloo South will have ample opportunity to raise his point of order when the minister has made a statement.

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. HOWE: The chairman has ruled.

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a point of order, and I have a right to do so at any time at all.

The CHAIRMAN: I have given my ruling on the point. The hon. gentleman knows very well that when a minister is making a statement he has the floor, and it is left to him to say whether or not he will answer any questions that are addressed to him.

Mr. HOMUTH: He has no more right in this house than I have.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I just intervene, Mr. Chairman, and point out that I believe it is a well established rule that any hon. member—

Mr. HOWE: No, sir.

Mr. GRAYDON: Just a moment; that any hon. member may rise at any time on a point of order or a question of privilege. That point of order or question of privilege must be submitted to the Chair, and the chairman then rules upon it. That is one of the inalienable rights of a member of parliament, or at least it has been ever since I have been in the house. I can quite understand that perhaps the minister does not want to be interrupted, but it is a rule of the house and I think it is only proper that it should be observed.

Mr. HOWE: A point of order is one thing and an interruption is another. The hon. member for Waterloo South is simply trying to interrupt me.

Mr. HOMUTH: I am raising a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN: When an hon. gentleman is making a statement he is allowed to proceed unless he gives permission to another hon. member to ask questions.

Mr. HOMUTH: No. The minister—

Mr. HOWE: Sit down.

Mr. HOMUTH: I will not sit down. The minister said I had a private pipeline into his department, and I want him to withdraw that statement.

Mr. HOWE: You said so yourself. Name your pipeline. You said you were in touch with a man in my department, and you refused to disclose his name. Is that a private pipeline, or is it not? I ask you to rule upon that, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: There is nothing on which to rule. I would remind the committee that we are reaching a stage when the situation is becoming really serious, and we should be able to get down to earth and go ahead with the work.

Mr. GRANT: Put him out.

Mr. HOMUTH: You come over and try it. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN: I have ruled that the minister has the floor. That is the ruling.

Mr. HOMUTH: Then if you are a cabinet minister you can do as you like in the House of Commons; if you are not, you can't.

Mr. HOWE: As I said when I started to speak, Mr. Chairman, I do think the Department of Munitions and Supply could have had a little more help from the opposition. Our department had a dinner last evening, and I commented upon the fact that in the hundreds of thousands of orders we have put through we found but very few cases of wrongdoing or attempted profiteering; and we always had the job of finding and cleaning them up ourselves. Three committees have been investigating the department from time to time. I have read their reports carefully, looking for any suggestion of anything off colour that we could clean up, but I have yet to find in those reports any situation that was not known to us many months before, and that had not been taken care of before the report was brought down. What has been the contribution of the opposition to the work of those committees? There has been one debate after another in the House of Commons as to whether or not the reporters should be allowed in the committee. That has been their contribution. I think that will have to be explained to the people if hon. gentlemen opposite are going to try to bring out any suggestions of laxity while on the hustings. My hon. friend is confessing that he knew about wrongdoing, the misappropriation of government money, and kept the knowledge to himself.

Mr. HOMUTH: I said I called your department.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HOWE: He knows of a case of wrongdoing. We have the machinery to recover that money; we are renegotiating contracts every day, but he refuses to tell who got government money improperly and illegally. He has made a charge which he refuses to substantiate. If that is statesmanship, then I say the hon. member for Waterloo South is a better man that I have ever given him credit for being.

Mr. POULIOT: Last evening I asked the minister a few questions, some of which he answered; but I am afraid that in spite of what has appeared in the newspapers the minister is not at all familiar with what goes on in his department. There are some good men in it. His parliamentary assistant is one of them. He is one of the most popular of our colleagues; he is gifted and a gentleman, something that is appreciated. There are others who are good men, and some who are not; that is a matter of opinion. Last evening I asked the minister if Mr. Henry Borden, K.C., of Toronto had been on the board of Barclays bank when he was counsel to the Department of Munitions and Supply, and coordinator of controls, and chairman of the war industrial control board. At page 806 of Hansard the minister was very definite, when he said:

His services with the department antedate my own. I can say to my hon. friend that Mr.

War Appropriation—Munitions and Supply

Borden had no relationship with Barclays Bank until after he terminated all association with the department.

Mr. Pouliot: But—

Mr. Howe: Sit down. I am speaking.

Mr. Pouliot: I will take no orders from the minister, only from the chairman.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Borden was appointed a director of Barclays Bank after he had terminated all association with the Department of Munitions and Supply.

Three times the rooster was heard. I have so much confidence in parliamentary institutions that I had the deep conviction that a minister would never dare to speak through his hat when answering a member of parliament in the house. This morning I got trucks of books from the library—big books, and especially several issues of the Bankers' Almanac and Year Book made and printed in Great Britain. In that part which relates to international banks and kindred firms I find in the issue of 1938-39, page 700, that Barclays bank (Canada) is situated at 214 St. James Street West, Montreal, and the directors are listed as: A. A. Magee, K.C., president; H. A. Stevenson, vice-president; Hon. L. A. Taschereau, LL.D., K.C.; Sir John Caulcutt, K.C., M.G.; W. O. Stevenson; J. S. Crossley; C. S. Macdonald, M.A.; Henry Borden, K.C.; J. L. Ralston, K.C. and general manager, H. A. Stevenson. This establishes well enough that Mr. Borden was in the bank, not after but before he was associated with the department. The issue of 1939-40, at page 700, gives the same information. In the issue of 1940-41 we find at page 686 that R. J. Magor replaced Colonel J. L. Ralston, K.C. That was when he became a member of the government of Canada for the second time. The issue of 1941-42, at page 687, gives the same information as is contained in the 1940-41 issue. The issue of 1942-43, at page 685, gives the same directors as in 1940-41-42. The issue of 1943-44 gives the same directors, with the exception of Sir John Caulcutt, K.C., M.G., and R. J. Magor, and with the addition of J. H. G. F. Vale. Then, last fall, Colonel Ralston came back to the board again.

But I was not satisfied with that. I was still under the impression that the minister was right and I was wrong, and that the Bankers' Almanac and Year Book was also wrong. I then looked into "Who's Who in Canada," where I found the information that Henry Borden was a director of Barclays Bank (Canada) in 1936-37. That information was contained at page 200. Ditto for 1938-39 at page 118; ditto for 1940-41 at page 324 and ditto for 1943-44 at page 512. And there was contained on the same page, and in the same issue, this information:

[Mr. Pouliot.]

General counsel, Department of Munitions and Supply, Ottawa, 1939-42, appointed chairman wartime industries control board, Ottawa, and coordinator of controls Department of Munitions and Supply, September, 1942, resigned 1943.

In the Financial Post Directory of Canadian Directors for 1941, at page 40, I find that Henry Borden, K.C., was described as general counsel, Department of Munitions and Supply, Ottawa, and director of Barclays Bank (Canada).

I am sending this fine copy to the minister, and the other one to Hansard.

Mr. HOWE: It seems I was wrong in my statement last night. I found out this morning that I was wrong and I am glad my hon. friend has corrected me.

Mr. POULIOT: I am satisfied the minister admits that, after I have proved to him that he was wrong. This is an acknowledgment. Let him remember that it is always dangerous to speak through one's hat. And as I am here to-day, I will try to be just as expeditious as possible.

As the minister has answered wrongly the question I put to him yesterday I shall be under the painful obligation of answering my own questions. This is the first time in the history of parliament that a member has had to answer his own questions because of the unwillingness of the government to do so. I hold in my hand a return which was passed on March 22. Some of these questions I can answer, and others I hope will be answered in due course by the government. These are the questions:

1. Was Colonel Allan Angus Magee, K.C., employed by the dominion government since the beginning of this war?

Answer: Yes.

2. If so, in what department, under what cabinet minister, in what particular capacity and for how long?

Answer: In the Department of National Defence, under Colonel Ralston, as military adviser—not financial adviser, but military; and just as long as he could have been after Pouliot's denunciation.

3. How much was paid to him each year for salary, and for living and travelling expenses?

Answer: No information yet.

4. Was he and is he still the president of Barclays Bank (Canada) Limited, and of Barclay Trust Company of Canada?

Answer: Yes.

5. Was there any other president of a Canadian chartered bank who was a dollar-a-year man?

Answer: No.

6. If so, who?

Answer: Answered by No. 5.

7. Was Mr. Henry Borden, K.C., employed by the dominion government since the beginning of this war?

Answer: Yes.

8. If so, in what department, in what particular capacity and for how long each time?

Answer: Already stated in the first part of my remarks.

9. What were the duties and responsibilities of each one of the positions referred to in No. 8?

Answer: To secure as much influence as possible to fatten his own legal firm and to collect plenty of electoral funds.

10. Was he a director of Barclays Bank (Canada) Limited, and, if so, since when?

Answer: Since a few years before the war.

I have some other questions here which I asked the minister, and which were answered wrongly. This is what the minister said:

As for Mr. Godsoe, he came into the department later on. It so happened that he succeeded Mr. Borden in the work he was doing when Mr. Borden retired from the department. There is no connection whatever and never has been any connection between Mr. Godsoe and his work and Mr. MacDonell—

I did not say "Mr. MacDonell"; I said Mr. MacDonald.

—as suggested by my hon. friend. They worked for different firms, and so far as I know one was not on the board of the other firm, nor was there any connection.

I must explain that. This is a family gathering. There is Magee, who is president of Barclays bank, and Colonel Ralston's adviser, and C. S. MacDonald, chartered accountant, and president of the Confederation Life Association of Toronto. He is Magee's brother-in-law, and MacDonald was a director of Barclays bank under President Magee.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Colonel Ralston's brother-in-law, do you mean?

Mr. POULIOT: No, MacDonald is the brother-in-law of Magee. This is a little genealogical intermission. He was a director of Barclays bank and a son-in-law of Mr. Justice Magee, the father of Colonel Magee. And Mr. Joseph Gerald Godsoe, who is now chairman of wartime industries control board, and coordinator of controls, holds the former position of Henry Borden and is assistant general manager and solicitor for the Confederation Life Association. Last fall Colonel Ralston was elected to the board of Barclays bank (Canada) to replace MacDonald.

I cannot understand why the minister said that Mr. MacDonald and Mr. Godsoe worked for different firms. The fact is that they work for the same company; Mr. MacDonald is president and Mr. Godsoe is the assistant general manager and solicitor. This has some bearing because Mr. Godsoe comes from the Burchell law firm in Halifax, the old Burchell and Ralston firm. This coordinator of controls was a co-director in Barclays bank with the former minister of national defence. His successor as coordinator of controls also comes from that same law office. The head of that firm is Mr. Charles Burchell. The firm was known as Maclean, Burchell and Ralston from 1912 to 1922 and Burchell and Ralston from 1922 to 1926. This is ignored by the parties who made up the answer to the return. Apparently they do not know what is a law office. I asked if he had been appointed high commissioner to Australia, Newfoundland and South Africa and, if so, when. The answer given was:

Australia, November, 1939.

Newfoundland, September, 1941.

South Africa, March, 1944.

Godsoe has an assistant as coordinator of controls. Surprising to say he also comes from the firm of Burchell and Ralston; he was a partner of Burchell and Ralston when they were practising together but that is ignored by the department. The whole business of the country is controlled by the firm of Burchell and Ralston or by their former partners who have every information and who are the controllers of the controllers in the Department of Munitions and Supply.

But that is not all. The former minister of national defence has an office in Montreal. He moved there from his native province when he was defeated by 3,000 in his own county and later on in the capital city of his native province by the same number of votes. He moved to Montreal where he was in partnership with a man named Kearney, who is now High Commissioner for Canada in Ireland. That is one of the most cosmopolitan places in the whole world. In that country our enemies have ambassadors just the same as the allied countries. Then Ralston junior was looked after, but I will not go into that in detail as he is a minor quantity.

All this shows that the people who were telling us that they were making such a sacrifice during the war were thinking of their own private interests and were practising nepotism to the highest degree. In fact this man Burchell has been gathering information in Newfoundland and South Africa and Australia while Kearney has been able to have contacts with the enemy, just the same as it is done in the bank of international settlements by Montagu Norman and Sir Otto Niemeyer who would shake hands under the table with representatives of the enemy. This is a serious matter. It is a matter of international finance. When I am driving my car and I see an obstacle in the way, I do not make a speech to that obstacle; I stop my car, remove the obstacle and proceed on my way. In my humble view it is high time for the members of parliament to act likewise. The conditions that now prevail are the same as the conditions that prevailed on February 21, 1941, when I denounced the conspiracy that was going on. The political plot of April, 1945, is much worse than the powder plot at Westminster.

On February 21, 1941, I rose in my former place to the right of Mr. Speaker and to the right of you, Mr. Chairman. You were in the chair on that occasion and you proved that you respected the British traditions of fairness and true parliamentary practice by not intervening when I expressed the feelings I had in my heart regarding the situation. At that time I said, as reported on page 896 of Hansard of February 21, 1941:

The air is thick and unbreathable. I have never witnessed such backstage intrigue as there is now in high quarters. I am disgusted with the ways in which intrigue is being carried on in the holy name of patriotism when we know that behind it is a group of scoundrels, buccaneers, racketeers, pirates, who are trying to get hold of Canada's wealth for their own purposes. It is hateful; and whether it comes from Winnipeg, Vancouver, Toronto or this city of Ottawa, it is no less shameful. We do not want to see the few enriched at the expense of the many.

And I added:

I do not hate Tories, but I hate Toryism, especially under the guise of Liberalism.

On May 10, 1943, at pages 2511 and following of Hansard, it will be seen that I exposed the personnel of Barclays Bank (dominion, colonial and overseas). That is all in the record there. There are many things worse than the grabbing of all jobs by the few; it is the government of the few rich who want to be always richer. That is a plutocratic oligarchy. There are many who are behind the scenes, who are behind the curtain, who are plotting now just the same as they were plotting in 1941. What do they want? They want power. They want the power to control our natural resources. We have reached the point where the common man is wondering who is holding the strings that make the government move.

I was sorry at the intrigue that was carried on in 1941 against the leader* of the Liberal party who was then my leader. I remember that Liberals were scandalized when I spoke as I did, but to their surprise two or three days afterward they heard my lamented friend, the former minister of justice, say the same thing. After one of the press agencies had sent out the dispatch containing the denunciation of the union government made by the member for Temiscouata it was acknowledged that no union government would be possible, even before the late Mr. Lapointe had spoken. Now, sir, we are in exactly similar circumstances. The Prime Minister of Canada is no more my leader. But when I disagreed with him I told him what I thought. I spoke to him sincerely. And was I not right, sir, in what I said in February, 1941? It took four years to acknowledge that I was right, but the facts are there. I regret to have been right in speaking as I did.

Now there is considerable intrigue to supplant the Prime Minister, and that intrigue is carried on by some men who are in his confidence, by some men who are near him, by some men who are entrusted with his secrets, by some men who play a double game, who act as Tories when they call themselves Liberals. I am not impressed by masks; I do not believe in political masquerades, and when we see men who are supposed to be leaders of the Liberal party but who are Tories at heart, men who have a sovereign contempt for our parliamentary institutions, carrying on intrigues of that sort I feel sorry for the Prime Minister although I disagree with him on many points. Those men have been made by the Prime Minister, and when I think of the two last ministers who resigned, the former minister of national defence (Mr. Ralston) and the minister for air (Mr. Power), I tell you, sir, that they are the last two that should have resigned and that all the ministers from Quebec should have resigned except those two because the Prime Minister has always been so kind to them; he has always protected them, and they have inspired his policies together. Both were joint ministers of the Department of National Defence. Both at times have been acting minister of the department now under consideration. They have not been fair. They have not been grateful to the Prime Minister, and the people who may think that they have acted as they did for the reasons that were given in the press are greatly mistaken.

I will not put the former minister for air in the same category with the former minister for national defence. But what I tell you, sir, and what I tell, through Hansard, the Prime Minister, a man who deserves respect on account of the high position he holds and a man who deserves from his close friends something better than treason—I warn the Prime Minister to beware. In the past he did not believe me when I was dotting the i's and crossing the t's. Now I warn him once more in this chamber and I mention facts that are known by all those who open their eyes to see and open their ears to listen.

It is saddening to observe that at the end of his career a man who has surrounded himself with colleagues and been kind to them, a man who has given them every opportunity to make themselves well and favourably known to the Canadian people, who has supplied them with the steps to obtain power, is about to be stabbed in the back precisely by those whom he considers to be his friends. The same thing happened under a Conservative government, when mention was made of a traitors' nest. We have a traitors' nest to-day. It is a group of men in politics and outside of politics who want to take control of this country. I regret to have to say things like this to-day. On two occasions I moved in this house for an extension of the life of parliament. It was precisely because what I say to you now, sir, I wanted to say after the victory loan and after the San Francisco conference, to give the Prime Minister the opportunity to go there with a free mind. But now whom can he trust? I know that he has a few true friends in the cabinet, but some others are watching to step into his shoes. Perhaps his shoes will be too big for them. Nevertheless their ambition is never satisfied. They are ready to commit that kind of murder which is called patricide—kill their father. As an old member of parliament I have been the witness of incredible events, but I say that the feelings of the Canadian people have been so much aroused by so much intrigue that the situation has become intolerable and the matter must be aired now. Are we to have a plutocratic oligarchy in this country? Shall this country be run by fascists? As I stated four years ago, it was easy to see that the movement for fascism was growing, not in the country, but in the minds of certain people who wanted to take this country over for themselves.

Sir, you know of some monsters with tentacles that sometimes reach far. These tentacles are many. But the monster has only one head, and in that case each tentacle wants to be the head, to succeed the Prime Minister, to pass over his dead body to the presiding seat of the council chamber. It is sad, it is unfortunate, but it is the most serious because if there is one thing that invites communism it is precisely that attitude of some men who want to have everything for themselves—water power, railways, transportation by air and by boat, banks, everything. They want control of everything and they do not realize that injustice cannot prevail forever. The Canadian people cannot be dispossessed of their legitimate rights.

Mr. McIVOR: Last evening the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) paid an outstanding tribute to the minister. Perhaps they did not intend it as a tribute, but to me it was an outstanding tribute that all the fault that could be found with the minister was what they thought was discourtesy in the matter of receiving a delegation. My experience with the minister has been that if my cause is just and fair he will hear me, and he will anyone else, in a courteous way, and you will go places with him.

I would pay my tribute to the minister first for the men he chooses to help him in his great task of building up his department. He selected a man whom I considered as straight and honest and efficient as any man in this house, even though he was a Conservative in the last house. I mean the gentleman who was defeated in the city of Hamilton last election and who was placed in a key position to watch contracts.

I do not forget that when the war broke out I could see contractors from different parts of the country buzzing around the halls in Ottawa. I was buttonholed by a contractor from Montreal who said to me, "What is the matter with the government anyway?" I replied, "What is the matter with it?" He said then, "You cannot get anywhere in getting a contract from that man Howe." I said to him, "No, not unless the contract is thoroughly investigated and everyone gets the same chance."

I think it is one of the outstanding feats in the Dominion of Canada that thirteen billions should have been spent in the way in which that money has been spent. I do not know how much thirteen billion dollars is. I know what $100 is, or $1,000, but when it comes to a million and hundreds of millions and thirteen billions my imagination cannot take it in. But thirteen billions, and not one dollar of graft can be put down to the government, thanks to the members of the opposition and of the government who gave their services in that committee to investigate war expenditures. If anything was found that was wrong the Minister of Justice was called in as well as the mounted police, and even though the offenders might be Liberals they were taken to the courts and lost their contract and paid their fine. I think the city of Port Arthur would do itself proud, and it would be an honour to the people there, if they elected the minister by acclamation, because he has earned it from all the people across Canada and especially from the head of the lakes.

I am not going to advise the people of Port Arthur because I know they have good sense and when they have a good member they will know how to hold on to him. When the minister comes back after the election I have two or three suggestions to make, one of which he can start on now, namely that the manufacturing that is going on at the head of the lakes, Port Arthur and Fort William, shall get an equal share of all contracts whether in the city of Montreal or in Toronto or anywhere else. Another thing the minister should keep in mind when he comes back is that the great lakes waterways should be opened up, and the third thing is the opening up of the transcanada highway, so that the people of the east who know nothing or very little about the west, and who have not seen particularly the beauties that are to be found at the head of the lakes, can get into their cars and drive along the highway and find out for themselves.

I pay my tribute to the minister because he knows how to treat labour. I represented a delegation in Fort William who did not come to Ottawa because they felt I could put their views before the minister. The Canada Car Union 719 wanted holidays with pay. What did the minister do? He was the first to put it across in Canada. The next thing they wanted was cooperation between the management and the unions and it is now a law in Canada. Because of the minister's fellow feeling for the man who has to toil I pay him that tribute. If ever I get a chance to say a word in Port Arthur it will be said, and it will be said not only by me but by others.

When hon. gentlemen try to find fault with the Department of Munitions and Supply they cannot find one dollar that has been mispent, or one man that has enriched his own coffers—and remember the minister is dealing with human nature as well, and there are many people who like to make a killing even out of the war. But not with the Minister of Munitions and Supply. When he comes back after the election as Minister of Reconstruction I expect he will carry on in the same way and hew to the line, and woe betide the man who wants to make a big profit.

Mr. ROY: Resuming my speech of yesterday, I will complete the last part of my [Mr. McIvor.]

exposé. I will complete the point I was making to show why I oppose this resolution. My remarks to-day will start where I left off yesterday. This pronouncement of Mr. Lapointe is very clear and formal—

Mr. HOWE: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, is what the hon. gentleman is saying relevant to the subject before the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN: I will hear what the hon. gentleman says before deciding whether his remarks are in order or not. I do not wish to have to repeat to-day, what I said yesterday, that I hope hon. members will keep strictly to the subject under discussion.

Mr. ROY: I quote from page 2419 of Hansard of the session of 1939:

Assuming, it is urged, that Canadians like other people will put their own interests first, what do our interests demand, what amount of knight errantry abroad do our resources permit? Canada, it is contended, is not a country of unlimited powers; it has not the capacity to stand indefinite strains. We have tremendous tasks to do at home, in housing the people, in caring for the aged and helpless, in relieving drought and unemployment, in building roads, in meeting our heavy burden of debt, in making provision for Canada's defence, and in bringing our standards of living and civilization to the levels our knowledge now makes possible. There is no great margin of realizable wealth for this purpose; we must, to a greater or less extent, choose between keeping our own house in order, and trying to save Europe and Asia.

Just think of this statement and bear in mind that Canada has spent some twenty-five billion dollars for war purposes since 1939 and you cannot but hold your head in your hands. The next day the then Minister of Justice, Mr. Lapointe, made this statement as reported at page 2468 of Hansard of the session of 1939:

We are not alone in that view. Australia has always been against conscription, South Africa will never have conscription. Ireland would never have conscription. I think I am true to my concept of Canadian unity when I say that I shall always fight against that policy. I would not be a member of a government that would enact it—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I know the hon. member for Gaspé would be the last man to try to break the rules. Surely the issue of conscription cannot be dealt with under the department which is before the committee at the present time, the Department of Munitions and Supply; and I know it is possible for the hon. member to keep within the orbit of that discussion which would be conducive to more dexterity in the discussion.

Mr. ROY: I have to-day asked the Clerk of the House if the resolution which was called by the Clerk after the orders of the day was before the committee as a whole resolution; and he said, "You are in order in making your point as to why you oppose it."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The Chairman controls this committee.

The CHAIRMAN: On the point of order, permit me to say that it has already been ruled, and that that ruling seemed to have been accepted, that the discussion should be limited to the department whose minister's statement was then before the committee. That rule was accepted by the whole committee for at least the last four years, and when a department was before the committee what was discussed was this or that item relating to that department. I believe that rule has been followed very closely by every hon. member, and I know it is also the intention of the hon. member for Gaspé to observe a rule which was readily and loyally accepted by all hon. members.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Since the minister made his statement on Monday that there was a shortage of building materials he has, I understand, given some undertaking to Windsor and Brantford with regard to housing. I should like him to tell us what that is. I wish also to inform him that in the city of Peterborough we have an extremely serious situation as far as housing goes, and it will be a hundred times worse after the first of May. I know of cases where mothers of men overseas are to be put out of their homes at that time; they have had due notice, of course, that the owners are taking over the property. In one case two boys have been returned wounded and the mother will have no place for them. This condition affects not only members of the armed forces who are returning with their wives, but also men and women in the munition plants and others. Has the minister anything to say as regards materials, whether any increases will be available, and as to the labour situation? In the case of Windsor and Brantford the minister said something, I believe, about releasing men to do building. In the Peterborough district it will be useless merely to give that order, because most of our building men, carpenters and masons, are in the armed forces, and many have given their lives. There is also a shortage of bricklayers. Quite a few houses remain unfinished because it has not been possible to get brick and other proper material to finish them. I have a letter from the city of Peterborough, a copy of which I believe was received by the minister, stating that there are a hundred people there financially able and willing to build houses if they can get material, labour and manpower. Will the minister make a statement on this matter, because it is really serious? I know that a house which was originally occupied by one family now contains nine families, although there are only three bedrooms. Every bit of space has been used. There is a family even in the attic, which I saw, and which has a roof only about five and a half feet from the floor. Not only is there absolutely no vacant houses in the city but there is none in the rural sections; all houses are occupied.

Mr. HOWE: I agree with my hon. friend that there is a serious shortage of houses. The department has been giving attention to it. We have made the manufacture of building materials a first priority. We have laid out a programme to provide material for at least 35,000 houses; and if we can increase the figure to 50,000 we shall do so. We shall attempt to direct the material to the areas which need it most. It is true, I believe, that in the cases of Brantford and Windsor I said that if arrangements could be made by the builders to organize themselves so that we could order in fairly sizable lots, I would direct material there for a certain specified number of houses. I would be very glad to extend that offer to Peterborough and to any other centre.

The difficulty about routing material into a point for the building of houses is to concentrate such operation. A contractor may build six or eight houses in a season, and there may be a great many contractors who are in the habit of buying in small lots retail from hardware stores. It is hard to serve that sort of trade by directing material; but if the builders in the hon. member's area could be induced to club together and buy in lots of material for fifty houses, that could be handled more easily.

We are most anxious to do everything we can to facilitate the construction of houses where they are most needed. The one thing we cannot manufacture is men, and manpower is the root of all the difficulty in housing. Men are needed to man the brickyards and the malleable iron foundries. We are short of brick and soil pipe because we are short of men to work in the various parts of manufacture which are the backlog of home building. Then, of course, there is a shortage of men to do the actual work in the field. This is a situation not peculiar to Canada. Britain, where so many houses have been destroyed, has a far, far worse situation than ours. There is some improvement here in conditions; we have built more houses in each of the last two or three years than were built in any pre-war year. but we have to do very much better than that to put our housing situation in shape. It is a difficult problem, and I ask the cooperation of every hon. member to try to organize matters in his district so that the department may be of the maximum help in meeting the problem.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): In Toronto, has not wartime housing put up brick houses?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Well, was there not an agreement with some society or builders' group in Toronto that they could have brick houses?

Mr. HOWE: There has been an arrangement in effect, I believe, for the last three or four years that if we could get applications for fifty houses we would give priority ratings on the materials for those fifty houses. That may be what my hon. friend refers to. The building of any house with brick in the city of Toronto is by private investment, not government operation. We are able, as I have said, to help the builder of fifty houses when it is physically impossible to help to the same degree the builder of six houses. It is just a matter of numbers. With a group of a hundred houses we could help matters more than with fifty houses.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): If Peterborough or any of these other cities could say, "We want fifty houses", and if they got together on that basis, what would they do to claim the material?

Mr. HOWE: Club together, get their material lists, and tell us to whom to ship material. For instance, pick out dealers to handle each type of material and let us ship out carload lots of materials for fifty houses to one dealer who will serve these contracts.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): To serve them all?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The construction control department would ease up on their permits so that they would go through for those houses?

Mr. HOWE: There is no difficulty about permits. There may be a little delay, because we are absolutely swamped with permits this year. During the last month they have come in faster than the department can handle them; I think about a thousand a day are being received. However, we are putting on extra staff and will cope with the situation shortly. I do not think there is any difficulty about permits, up to the number we think we can build this year. My hon. friend will appreciate that we do not want the permits to get too far ahead of the building materials; otherwise people are put to extra expense for no useful purpose.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I realize that, and the permit offices have been very kind to me. I think they have put through all the permits we have asked for.

Mr. CHEVRIER: You are very fortunate.

Mr. HOWE: Yours is a distressed housing area, and we do favour those areas.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Yes, it is. Before I sit down I should like to ask the minister a question arising out of a return I received to-day, in reference to trucks, particularly six-wheel trucks. These trucks are particularly suitable for snow removal, and I should like to know whether they were sold to municipalities. That is not shown here; it shows trucks sold to Defence Industries Limited and other industrial concerns, and to two towns. Do you try to have those trucks go to municipalities? Perhaps this question should come up in connection with the War Assets Corporation.

Mr. HOWE: Is my hon. friend referring to used trucks?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Yes, they are used trucks.

Mr. HOWE: I am not sure, but I think the vehicles controller tries to put them into the hands of those who need them most. I believe municipalities rank highest on the list, with the exception of provinces. We try to distribute them fairly evenly across Canada, so that they are not all sold in one locality.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): There was quite a demand for these trucks this year, on account of the heavy snowfall.

I should like to ask one other question in regard to new motor cars that have been in storage. I ask the question because a month or so ago I was in the basement of a large dealer in motor cars, where a number of new automobiles were stored. They were packed in bumper to bumper. I opened the only car door that could be opened, and my nostrils were greeted with a very musty smell. Are these cars checked by your department to see that the upholstery, in particular, is not allowed to deteriorate? I am afraid that will happen in some of these places unless they are checked.

Mr. HOWE: The few cars we have are stored with dealers; that is about the only place we can store them. If there is deterioration while they are in the hands of the dealer, that is a matter for the dealer. They must be delivered as new cars, and any mouldy upholstery must be replaced. I do not think we can inspect the storage places. The dealers are charged with the care of these cars, and I think it is up to the dealers to look after them.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Are these new cars sold only to doctors?

Mr. HOWE: For essential services. The pool is getting very small now, and we must protect our essential services.

Mr. CHURCH: Coming from one of the principal industrial districts of Canada, I wish to say a few words in connection with this department. I appreciate what it has done during the war. I think every Canadian rejoices in the fact that Canada has become such a highly industrialized country and has made such a great contribution. It is true that some mistakes have been made, but mistakes are bound to occur in every war.

I wish to refer briefly to four matters: coal, power, housing and reconstruction. I have had no politics since the war started, except the winning of the war; and I do not know of anyone on this side of the house who has had any politics. I can say to my hon. friends on this side of the house that it was the Conservatives who first advocated a national fuel supply, and it was the Conservatives who were responsible for the Duncan commission and report. I remember the debate in this house in the middle twenties, lasting two days, on my resolution regarding constitutional, cabinet and parliamentary reform; and within a few days the late minister of justice, Mr. Lapointe, announced that he was appointing a royal commission to go into these matters as they concerned the maritime provinces.

I come now to the coal question. I lived through the last war, and I saw the grave dangers that could arise through scarcity of coal. From the Conservative benches I brought the matter to the attention of the house immediately after my election for the then constituency of North Toronto, which at that time took in most of the city of Toronto north of Bloor street, from the Don almost to the Humber. My proposal then was for a national coal supply for this country, and that matter was discussed in the house for six or seven years in succession. The first debate took place on Monday, March 19, 1923, when the Conservatives proposed through me the policy which is at present the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, although at that time they opposed it for four or five years. The two great central provinces of Ontario and Quebec for many years depended at first for fuel upon the wood cut in the northern parts of the provinces and some peat. Then, with the development of the country generally they used anthracite coal largely in these provinces, and later at country fairs and exhibitions stoves were exhibited and anthracite coal came to be used.

I have always advocated a national coal supply. I saw the trouble we had in regard to coal during the last war. I remember when it was sold a bag at a time; that was all the fuel you could get. Before the United States came into the last war we were pictured in the great newspapers of that country as the country of the snows, as a country sitting on the sidelines and begging for a lump of coal. We were looked upon as a Lazarus, trying to beg for a few bits of coal, while at the same time we were exporting power to the United States. The first resolution moved and considered for three days, March 19, 1923, in connection with a national coal supply provided for a national policy, under which no part of Canada would be left dependent upon the United States. It requested that the house should immediately consider the initiation of an all-Canadian and British coal supply, in the best interests of Canada. A committee of the house was appointed, presided over by the present chairman of the royal commission on coal, at that time an able young lawyer and now Mr. Justice Carroll of the supreme Court of Nova Scotia. That committee reported favourably to the house, with the result that after three or four years a subsidy was proposed of $1 a ton on coal coming from the maritimes.

In connection with the harbour improvements the late prime minister of Great Britain, Mr. Stanley Baldwin, built a large industry at Ashbridge's Bay for the manufacture of granite plates and things of that kind. This coal policy was supported by a great newspaper in Toronto, the Evening Telegram, which at that time reported the proceedings of the house almost verbatim. I suppose we cannot expect anything like that, owing to war conditions. That newspaper did a great deal to make the people of this country realize the necessity of developing a national policy in connection with fuel. Last winter was quite severe, and we all know the difficulty we had in getting fuel. We had to take a mixed supply, and the coal we got would not heat our houses, let alone our industries, hospitals and so on.

There was a long debate on this subject, and I will mention only three or four of the matters which were discussed. Reference was made to the transportation problem, because between the two wars the coal question was largely a matter of transportation. I declared in favour of bringing Alberta coal down to the head of the lakes, and developing a national coal supply for this country, from Wales, the maritimes and Alberta. Ships could have been built to bring coal from the maritime provinces to central Canada. I plead with the minister to consider the use of wooden ships, because the ships built at the foot of Bathurst street were of great use, not only in transporting coal from Wales and the maritimes, but for other purposes as well. In the last war, in 1917, I saw from Swansea, Wales, ships tied up at the Ashbridge's Bay docks, carrying granite plates and coal from the Baldwin plant in Toronto.

We hope something will be done to develop this policy further. For several months of the year we are completely dependent upon a supply of coal. I shall not discuss that matter in detail, but I hope that some day the question will be debated at length in the house. It has been under discussion for years. Then, finally, just before an election, the government voted a subsidy of $1 a ton on coal for the maritimes.

There is always a friendly attitude among the people of Ontario toward the people of the maritimes and the west and in fact the same feeling exists throughout the country. It was found that the coal of both the east coast and the Alberta mines was suitable for the production of oil, and I made the suggestion in 1923 in that coal debate that oil pipelines should be built from the west to Ontario, so that there might be a further development of the oil and coal industry in the prairie provinces. This suggestion was made many years ago. At that time I urged to have a better deal both for the miners and for the owners of the mines. A condition of that kind is absolutely necessary, and such a policy is in the best interests of confederation.

At that time, when the matter of coal was being discussed, a question of freight rates arose. The time is coming, soon after the war, when there will have to be an investigation of freight rates in Canada because, as we know, the railway commission—now called the board of transport commissioners—is not carrying out its function. Under the Railway Act it is the duty and function of the board of transport commissioners, of their own volition, to investigate what freight rates are being asked. That provision has been made so that there will be equality of treatment, and equality of development of the country. There must be, by order in council, some further study of this matter by the government before an election is held, because these freight and passenger rates involve both railway systems. When we consider what the two railway systems have made out of this war, we realize the necessity for a review of the rates.

A return was made to the house showing the figures to the end of 1940, and they revealed that the two railway companies made more during the first fifteen months of this war than they had made in the four and a half years before the war. The time has come, I say, for a revision of those rates, and a federal inquiry, and it is the duty of the board of transport commissioners to go into this matter.

Then we still have Gallup polls across the country. I have said that they are all "Gallup" and no poll. They are now very active in connection with federal and provincial elections. No one knows who these people are, and I say they should be regulated by the high court of parliament and election regulations. They have tried to mislead the people by propaganda as to actual conditions in the country, and have not shown fairly what the people are thinking. I do not know anyone who has voted outside the house—and I do not care.

This empire has been built up on coal. The mother country and the dominions cannot exist without a proper national policy and empire policy in respect of coal. In my opinion the story of coal between the two wars is not an argument in favour of nationalization and state control, as against private enterprise. Let us remember one basic thing regarding coal, namely, that the former industrial supremacy of Great Britain and Canada was built up on that commodity, and our recovery from war losses will to a great extent depend upon it.

Only a few hon. members are aware of the hardships endured by the miners who go down into the pits to get the coal. During the years of the industrial slump there were few who realized, as I did, the conditions under which these men had to exist, and the dangerous nature of the work they did. I have spoken about that from 1923 on, the need for providing a living wage, and for a national policy so as to maintain the life of the worker in health and safety, and improve his living conditions. I am sorry there has not been a better deal given to miners and others in this industry, not only in Alberta and the maritimes, but also in Wales.

There is no doubt that in Britain many of these men have entered the armed forces and others are taking their places in the mines. Women are in those mines, too. I have seen pictures of women shovelling coal in mines located in the old country. The employment of young, inexperienced people under sixteen years of age, and of women, and all that kind of thing as we find it in England is not proper.

In view of the short supply of coal in the last winter—and dear knows where we shall be next winter, if we have weather such as we had in the past few months—something should be done to improve the fuel situation. If not, we shall be without houses and without fuel of any kind.

I would speak now about the coal drivers. I pointed out in the house on another occasion that retail coal dealers should be given another dollar a ton. We find that $125,000,000 is being spent on controls, but Donald Gordon has not a five-cent piece to give to the men who deliver coal, and are working for the small dealer. I have seen dozens of returned soldiers from the last war who have worked long hours night and day in zero weather and under difficult conditions at this job of coal delivery. Federal assistance should be given, through the municipalities and the industry generally, so that the dealers and workers I refer to would benefit. And that would apply not only to those delivering coal but to other deliverymen as well. Those men are not making very much money. There are too many amateurs in the country, and certainly too many amateurs, rather than experts, exercising these controls. Something should be done along that line. I appreciate the position of the industry in the maritimes, and also the situation of the mine owners. All through my life I have found that one must try to work with other people, and that there must be a little teamwork if one wishes to accomplish anything.

Then I should like to refer to the power situation, and the export of that commodity. Many people do not yet understand the great work of Sir Adam Beck and Sir James Whitney in connection with the hydro electric system in Ontario. This was begun by Conservatives, although many good Liberals helped the movement, too. However, it was mainly a Conservative activity. If it had not been for the great development of electrical power in that province, a fuel shortage would have been much more serious. This is an organization which exports power to the value of about $8,000,000 a year from Ontario to the United States. Under present exchange that would amount to about $10,000,000. That is the value of power which crosses the boundary line from Niagara and other points in Ontario.

As I said, every dollar of the $160,000,000 invested in hydro is earning interest. Without that investment, during the last war Ontario would have been bankrupt. The hydro organization reduced the coal, light and power bill of the province. That investment in Ontario saved an expenditure of many millions of dollars for coal, which would have gone to $30 a ton during the war had it not been for the hydro electric investment.

I say to the government that we must adopt a national reconstruction policy in connection with hydro electric energy in Canada. We have to-day about 42,000,000 horse-power in the dominion, but only about one-seventh of that amount, or 6,000,000 horse-power, has been fully developed. There may be a little more than that at the present time, but some of that development is for only part-time. We must have a national policy, supported not only by the dominion but by the provinces.

I was in the province from which the hon. member for Vancouver South comes—and probably he will follow me in this debate. I visited there in 1927, and was very much surprised to find that a country so rich in water power had not a hydro electric policy. I have been very much surprised at the lack of development in some of the other provinces. The time has come when the government should consider a national hydro electric policy as part of its reconstruction programme. Such a policy would cut domestic rates one-third and rates for commercial lighting, for industry and street lighting, almost one-third. That is what has been done in Ontario. I ask that something be done to meet that situation.

I am not in accord with what the minister has announced regarding our aviation policy. I do not believe that a monopoly will be in the best interests of this country. If we are to have conversion from a war-time to a peace-time economy we shall have to get busy along the lines I have suggested. I support the stand I took last year in connection with this matter, that the Canadian Pacific lines and the one up on Hudson bay and other private systems should be developed and allowed to continue. We would then have an all-Canadian policy first which could be developed into an all-empire policy for aviation.

War Appropriation—Munitions and Supply

If the war ended to-day there would not be a British plane or a British system operating in the Pacific. Our friends to the south have the advantage of us in that connection. If we intend to convert from a war-time to a peace-time economy we must not wait too long. The United States are way in advance of us regarding this matter. They needed two million electric toasters and they decided to adopt a quota plan to distribute them as evenly as possible among the industry in converting to a peace-time economy.

I should like to say a word about the housing situation which I have been complaining about since the start of the war. In 1935 the Bennett government considered a resolution which I proposed for a national housing and reconstruction policy. A committee of the House of Commons was appointed to study the whole question of housing, urban, suburban and rural, and met for months. That committee made a report to parliament, but I did not agree with all that was in it. Instead of a vast and costly housing commission I thought money could be lent through the banks at low rates of interest to build houses from standard plans.

Then the present government came into power and Mr. Dunning, who was then minister of finance, adopted the policy suggested with some moderations. About $86,000,000 has been spent. That was a great thing for Toronto and all our cities and the development of housing. On February 26, 1945, I again called the attention of the present minister to this situation, and he wrote me this letter:

I have your letter of February 19, regarding housing in Toronto. We are doing our level best to meet the Toronto situation. We have provided for the appointment of an administrator of emergency shelter, and we are hopeful that great benefit will be derived from this appointment.

There has been no improvement since except the sending out of a lot of postcards through the mail. If we are to provide shelter we must provide houses or some substitute for them. The situation could have been clarified had it not been for this administrator of emergency shelter. He is a good man personally, and no doubt he has done a lot. He is a valuable citizen, being one of our hydro commissioners, and I cannot speak too highly of him. The letter continues:

In your letter you urge the construction of a large number of houses. This simply cannot be done at the present time because of the shortages of building materials. While the war is progressing satisfactorily, the demands for war supplies are enormously heavy and there are not enough materials to meet these huge war demands and also provide for all the building that people would like to do and which under normal conditions would be desirable.

Naturally when money is plentiful and there is a shortage of housing accommodation, hundreds of thousands of Canadians would like to use their money for the purpose of building houses. A programme of this kind is, however, impossible without a serious crippling of the war effort, which, of course, must come first.

That is the same argument that was advanced in the other war. I can tell him that the people are sick and tired of it. In the city which I have the honour to represent I can point out considerable work that has been done by different federal departments in Toronto—properties of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on Yonge street, south of St. Clair avenue, purchased and then abandoned and left idle for months and months. Then the C.B.C. again comes along; it is one of the most mischievous corporations we ever had in Canada, took over a Jarvis street property and got all the materials needed. I do not know how many damage actions the city will have because of the condition from ice in front of this property on Jarvis street. Many times they did not even clean off the snow from the sidewalks. They were just as bad as the local commission in Ottawa on parliament hill.

If half the money that has been spent on some camps for the forces and the materials that have been used across Canada in putting up some of these camps that should never have been built had been used for housing it would have helped to relieve the situation. Soldiers have been moved from one part of the country to the other. Camps were built, especially on the prairies where in some cases there was no water or sewage supply, that should never have been built. Millions of dollars have been spent to transport the troops from one camp to another across Canada. There will be a day of reckoning after the war as to why we failed in connection with the housing situation. As I said the year before last, a hundred thousand houses will be needed immediately in Canada. I think the select committee reported in 1944 that 606,000 were needed. I think over a million houses will be necessary for Canada before many days are over.

On Bay street, Toronto, around Simpson's store, you will see a line-up of people just the same as they line up to get into the galleries here when we have special sessions like the electric storm the night before last. I never saw such a line-up of emergency shelter people. It is an insult to these people after the way in which they have been led around by the nose by national selective service, looking for employment. They have had to waste their time again trying to get a card for a room and they have been hounded from pillar to post for a job. Then along comes another commission called the shelter administration with no shelter available. They have no shelter to offer; all they can do is hand out postcards.

I should like to refer to the shipbuilding situation. In 1916 and 1917, when I was head of the city and one of the harbour commissioners, the government established a shipbuilding plant on the water front. A lot of money was spent. In some cases the ships built cost too much. I appreciate what the present minister has done with that particular plant and I think it is a credit to him and the government. I am not one of those who think that the government deserves no credit. The working people of Canada also deserve credit, as do the industrial leaders, for the work they have done during the war. They have set up a glorious record in our history.

I think the present minister has contributed a great deal to the success of the great industrial war movement. I am fair enough to say so, but I am sorry he has not seen fit to do more. A total of $36,000,000 has been spent on the harbour in Toronto, and in conjunction with the government a viaduct was built. The city paid one-third of the cost. The Welland canal has been deepened and we were able to have 600,000 tons of coal in that industrial area last fall. I do not know where the Toronto district and other surrounding cities and towns would have been had it not been for that great development. Water-borne traffic has brought in most of that coal there as well as other commodities.

I plead with the minister that something be done for shipbuilding workers. I was with them on a deputation the other day and we were told that it is proposed to sell the plant. There were two specific classes of ships built for the war. In view of the great necessity of food for the devastated countries in Europe I believe the time has come to build at this plant wooden type ships which could go up the great lakes and carry not only coal but grain and other commodities. With the development that is bound to come to this country and if we are to be a maritime power we shall have to do something along these lines.

I should like to say a word or two about the reconstruction programme of the present government. I have read the proposal made to-day by the minister and I think he has waited too long to propose the policy. It has been suggested that 50,000 houses shall be built when they are able to get the material. If we wait until our soldiers come home they will be without homes at all.

The minister provides after the war for 900,000 more workers in employment. Let us have no more idle talk of full employment. There will be no such thing as full employment in any country in the world after this war. Conditions will be desperately hard in this country after the war. We have squandered our natural resources at an awful pace. I am not one of those who believe in this new utopia that hon. gentlemen speak of, because in my humble opinion there will not be any utopia after this war. Everybody in Canada will have to work hard, and the first thing we should do is to abolish some of the irksome controls that have been fastened on this country. Some of them should have been abolished long ago.

Some people talk of a reduction in taxation. But how are you to reduce taxation when billions of dollars have been raised and spent during the war? That will be a burden on the taxpayers, directly and indirectly, for years to come.

I should like to say a word on reconstruction. This party has been attacked from many parts of the house. But the Progressive Conservative party has had a wonderful record. It has always been the party of social reform in Canada, seeking to improve the condition of the toilers. We have done more than any other party, federally and provincially, to better the conditions of the workers. We are not afraid of reasonable planning that is adapted to the circumstances. The period between the two great wars was the most disastrous in the history of this or any other country. We are living in a mechanized age. All that a great many people know is what they read in the newspapers, and dear knows they do not read much of what goes on in this house. The dictators solved the unemployment problem by preparing for war, and we should solve the unemployment problem, not by saying that we shall have full employment, but by properly preparing for the days of peace. We should develop the great natural resources of this country. We should raise the standard of living by better housing and by increasing consumption of consumer goods among the working classes, and shorten the hours of labour so that men and women will have time for some leisure and recreation. We shortened the hours of labour in Toronto in the last war by adopting in the fire and police forces and all public departments and commissions the eight-hour day and the platoon system. The city of Toronto has been the pioneer and leader all along the line in bettering hours of labour and working conditions, and so was the Whitney Conservative government of Ontario. We should go further.

in shortening the hours of labour so that men and women will have more leisure to enjoy the blessings of this life, if any are left after this war. The Conservative government of Ontario introduced the workmen's compensation act, and in federal affairs it was some of the Conservatives who first proposed in 1921 a national system of unemployment insurance, a national fuel policy, prison reform, health and hospital insurance and other social measures such as old age pensions.

The times call for clear thinking and plain speaking. Let us be honest one with another and put politics in the background. Let us put first things first and war winning first. Our economy and that of Great Britain are different from that of the United States and we should so rearrange matters that in the reconstruction period the working classes will not have to work longer hours or for lower wages. The best businessmen in Britain have shown what can be done by mass production there. They have been able to pay better wages, as high in some cases as those paid in the United States and produce an article just as cheaply. We should do the same thing in our country. British industrialists have shown all this can be done by factory reorganization.

Those who are attacking the Progressive Conservative party fail to point out that in both the federal and provincial spheres this party has been the pioneer of nearly all the social legislation the country has and was the first party to promote on a gigantic scale public ownership of the natural resources of the country in light, power and transportation, the taking over of the Canadian National railway and the important development of preserving the water powers for the people of this country.

It cannot be denied also that even in England the Conservatives have done similarly. In England Conservatism has given to the country a long line of great statesmen who have known how to tread the middle path of ordered progress and to sow a political harvest which subsequent generations of Englishmen have reaped a thousand-fold. It was Clarendon who restored Church and King on the basis of "those admirable and incomparable laws of government"; Danby who founded the party system; Edward Seymour who by sponsoring the Act of Settlement paved the way for the Protestant succession; Harley whose policy led to the adoption of the principle that the crown acts through responsible ministers; William Pitt the younger who revived the idea of the strength of parliamentary government when compared with the rule of the terrorist mob, and who gave the world and his country a priceless legacy of British opposition to arbitrary government and dictatorship; Peel who brought free trade to his country and converted the middle classes to Conservatism; Shaftesbury who stirred the conscience of his party on the urgent need for social reform; Disraeli who linked imperialism with democracy and issued his resounding appeal for the "two nations" of rich and poor to unite; Randolph Churchill, who in a brief life of intense activity gave colour and direction to the policy of Conservative for democracy; Joseph Chamberlain who fought the imperial trusteeship and brought idealism into imperialist economics; Baldwin and Neville Chamberlain whose financial "revolution" gave new life to British industry in the thirties and unconsciously paved the way in no small measure for the mighty war effort of the forties; Winston Churchill who led the country in "its finest hour." It is an impressive record of great names and great achievements, and in our own country we have had Macdonald, Cartier, Whitney, Beck and other great Conservative leaders who have done so much for the empire and the working classes of this country in peace and war alike.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Chairman, sad news has just come to me which I think the house should hear. I have just learned of the loss by death of a great and good friend of Canada in the person of President Roosevelt of the United States. I am sure that the house will feel deeply the tragedy of his death on the very eve of victory in Europe and will wish to convey to the family of President Roosevelt and to the country of which he is president, the sincere sympathy of every Canadian.

Mr. GRAYDON: The news which has just been conveyed to the house by the Minister of Munitions and Supply is so sudden and shocking that it is very hard to find words to express one's feelings. The death of President Roosevelt has deep significance not only for every citizen of Canada but for the world at large. He has been a great national and great international figure. His removal by death at this time when perhaps his services were the most needed in all his long and useful life is an occasion which the house cannot let pass without due recognition. This is a time of deep sorrow for every one of us. A great international figure, a great statesman, a great legislator of a great country, and above all a great humanitarian has been taken from us. I shall not say more at the moment, but perhaps on another occasion I shall have an opportunity to speak in a more extended way of the great affection in which we in this House of Commons of Canada and the people of this country have held the late President of the United States.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I just add a word to what has been said by those who have already spoken. I feel that the blow which has fallen on the democratic world at this moment is tragic for all mankind. We in Canada regarded President Roosevelt as a warm friend of our country, and one who in the very difficult days of the early period of the war, when his country was not completely aware of the great danger that overhung the world, was able to give us encouragement, confidence and assistance. On the eve of the San Francisco conference this is indeed a very grave blow, and we join with democratic people everywhere in mourning the passing of a great American and a great man, who belonged not only to the United States but to the whole of the civilized world.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The members of my group will desire to associate themselves with the fine things that have already been said. I have looked upon President Roosevelt as a great source of inspiration and of leadership and I believe that mankind will remember him with sincerest and deepest gratitude and reverence. We join with those who to-day are bereaved in the United States, and indeed throughout the world, in deepest sympathy for the members of his family, and trust that someone will be raised up who will be able to take his place during the trying days to come.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Chairman, in view of the sorrow of this house I suggest that we stand in a minute's silence in memory of the late President Roosevelt.

(The members stood in a minute's silence.)

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Progress reported.

DEATH OF PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT

EXPRESSION OF SORROW OF CANADIAN PARLIAMENT AND PEOPLE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, hon. members have learned of the death at Warm Springs, Georgia, this afternoon, of the President of the United States. Franklin D. Roosevelt was so close and good a neighbour, so great and true a friend of the Canadian people, that the word when received was as if one of our very own had passed away.

I hasten to express on behalf of the government, the members of both houses of parliament now in session, and on behalf of all the people of Canada, our deepest sympathy with the government and people of the United States. I wish at the same time to express our deepest sympathy for Mrs. Roosevelt and all the members of the family in their bereavement. Their sorrow and the sorrow of the American nation will be shared by the peoples of the united nations and by those who cherish freedom in all parts of the world.

The death of President Roosevelt is in truth a loss to the whole of mankind. Few lives have been more closely identified with humanity in its needs, its struggles and its aspirations. His services to the cause of freedom went far beyond limits of race and bounds of nationality. He was an undaunted champion of the rights of free men, and a mighty leader of the forces of freedom in a world at war. He has left to the world an enduring heritage by which his life, his faith and his courage have contributed to the well-being of his fellowmen.

It is a comforting thought at this time to know that before the close of his great career he had already helped to fashion the design of a world organization for the maintenance of peace and security. His rest at Warm Springs was in preparation for the journey to San Francisco to open the conference of the united nations. In this conference, he envisaged the culmination of his life's great aim—an enduring peace among the nations of the world.

It was my great privilege to have been a life-long friend of Franklin D. Roosevelt. I knew him very well. Of that friendship, I shall hope to speak at another time. My feelings at this moment are perhaps best expressed in lines of Matthew Arnold's, which perhaps I may be permitted to quote. They voice what, at this hour, I believe, lies deepest in the hearts of all:

O strong soul, by what shore
Tarest thou now? For that force,
Surely, has not been left vain!
Somewhere, surely afar,
In the sounding labour-house vast
Of being, is practised that strength,
Zealous, beneficent, firm!

I believe it is.

Mr. Speaker, as a mark of respect of our country for the memory of the President, the flag will fly at half-mast from the peace tower of our parliament buildings. As a further mark of respect I know that all hon. members would wish to have this house adjourn without continuing its proceedings to-day, and I move accordingly.

Death of President Roosevelt

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, to the suggestion with respect to adjournment I believe the Prime Minister will have the unanimous consent of this house. May I be permitted to associate His Majesty's Loyal Opposition with the tribute paid by the Prime Minister, and to say that the news of the great President's tragic passing has left the members of this house filled with dismay and weak with sorrow. The real significance of his death at one of the world's most critical hours, must be left in some degree for future times to assess. Measured by every yardstick President Roosevelt's name will echo and re-echo down through the world's hallways of fame as one of the most dynamic, powerful and successful leaders that democracy has ever given to the service of humanity.

He was enshrined in the hearts of every freedom-loving man and woman the world over. Millions of families to-night will feel the same bitter twinge of sorrow they would feel at the passing of one in their own family. President Roosevelt was a fearless, courageous and happy warrior. Whether he was battling against the dread ravages of his paralyzing affliction or fighting the good fight against political, economic and social wrongs, he never flinched, he never faltered, he never wavered.

When it became his task to throw his nation's weight against the temporarily victorious aggressor nations in this global conflict, he threw into that struggle every ounce of energy, effort and determination he possessed. Likewise in preparation for the equally compelling objective of preserving and maintaining permanent peace and security in the world, the late President was at the time of his death engaged in the same vigorous and resolute march to victory which had characterized his course of action through these many years.

I witnessed the inaugural ceremonies three months ago at the White House when Mr. Roosevelt was sworn in for his fourth term of office as President of that great republic. Seldom in my lifetime have I seen such genuine demonstrations and such touching scenes as I looked over those many thousands who had gathered to do homage to their war-time President. One could feel that that great mass of humanity was leaning heavily upon their fellow citizen and President with the profoundest conviction and confidence that the immediate future of their nation was in the best hands they knew.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

This world can ill afford to lose President Roosevelt as it emerges from this armed holocaust and enters the threshold of one of its most critical periods. As he throws the torch to other hands let us pray that the relentless pursuit of lasting peace shall be undertaken with the same grim resolution and fortitude which characterized every move he made.

Canada mourns to-night the loss of a great friend and a good neighbour. Seldom has a president of our neighbouring republic to the south been so close to the people of this nation. Nowhere in the world will the sense of personal loss be felt in a deeper way than in the homes of the people of this dominion. We are thinking of Mrs. Roosevelt and the family as they walk to-night through the valley of the shadow of death. Canada desires to share their grief.

Language seems so weak and inadequate to reveal one's feelings at a time like this, but I summon to my help those immortal words:

Lives of great men all remind us
We can make our lives sublime,
And departing leave behind us
Footprints on the sands of time.

Those footprints will never be erased so long as humanity reveres brave men in peace and war who are prepared to die that others may live.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggarr): Mr. Speaker, I can add very little to what has already been said and to the remarks I made at six o'clock, except to say that we agree with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) that this house should adjourn as a mark of respect to a truly great man and a tribute to the great people who have lost a great leader. I have no doubt that all across the world tonight men and women who have looked to the President as the spokesman for democracy during the critical period of the last several years will mourn with the people of the United States; and we join with them in that mourning. The United States has given to the world some great leaders. President Roosevelt, I think, will rank among the greatest of them, perhaps standing beside the great Lincoln who died under tragic circumstances at the end of a long and bitter civil war. Just after having taken office for a second time Lincoln passed away mourned by a great people, by a mighty nation and by human beings all across the world who have believed in freedom and democracy. To-night, on the eve of the meeting of the nations in conference to bring about the peace for which he fought, we feel the loss of President Roosevelt all the more. So, Mr. Speaker, we join with the Prime Minister, the leader of the opposition and the people not only of Canada and the United States but of the whole democratic world in mourning the loss of a world-statesman and a great soul.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, the members of my group desire to associate themselves with the kind and thoroughly deserved words which already have been uttered; and we approve the Prime Minister's action in moving the adjournment of this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before we adjourn we might stand as a mark of respect.

(The members stood in a minute's silence.)

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 8.15 p.m.

Friday, April 13, 1945

The house met at three o'clock.

PRESIDENT TRUMAN

MESSAGE ON ASSUMPTION OF OFFICE AS PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to read to the house a telegram which I sent this morning to President Truman, at the White House, Washington:

My colleagues in the government of Canada join with me in expressing to you and to the government and people of the United States our heartfelt sympathy and that of the people of Canada in the loss which the United States has sustained in the death of President Roosevelt—a loss which will be felt throughout the whole of the freedom-loving world.

As you assume the great responsibilities of your high office at this critical period in world affairs, we wish to assure you of the firm resolve of all Canada to maintain and strengthen the ever-deepening friendship and ever-widening co-operation of our two countries in matters of common interest and in the cause of world security and peace.

W. L. Mackenzie King,
Prime Minister of Canada.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE IN CONCLUDING THE SESSION— ANNOUNCEMENT OF GENERAL ELECTION ON JUNE 11

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should like to make a statement on the winding up of the business of the present session, a matter which we have discussed two or three times in the course of the present week.

This week, on Wednesday, April 11, I reminded the house that if the business of parliament were not concluded before midnight on Monday of next week, this parliament would be automatically dissolved. I stated that at no time had I any thought or intention of recommending dissolution with a view to shutting off discussion in the house. I added that, as hon. members well knew, the sole reason the government had waited up to the last or almost the last day of the term of parliament before going to the people had been our desire to avoid a general election while the war in Europe was still in progress. I have stated, over and over again, that the intention of the government was not to dissolve parliament if that could be avoided before the decisive battles were fought in Europe. That position was subject only to the limitation that the people should not be denied the right guaranteed to them by the constitution of electing a new parliament at least every five years.

In a nation-wide broadcast on March 2, I said:

Once the war in Europe is over, we feel there should be a general election as soon as possible.

On Monday, April 9, I gave to the house an outline of the minimum time which would be required for a general election, and placed on Hansard an official memorandum on that subject which had been given me by the chief electoral officer. That statement made it apparent that the earliest date at which a general election could be held, following upon the expiration of the parliamentary term, would be June 11. As to the completion of the business of the present session, it rests with hon. members on the opposition benches—and here I am not referring to any particular party or group but to all hon. members opposed to the government—whether the war appropriations and supply bills will be ready for royal assent on Monday next. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr.

Graydon) has said that so far as members of the Progressive Conservative party are concerned, they are prepared to conclude the debates in this chamber at six o'clock this afternoon. Intimations have also been given by the leaders of the C.C.F. and the Social Credit groups that they and their followers are prepared to assist the government in speedily completing the business for which this session had been specially called.

Were it possible to have the bills reach the other house this evening, that would permit of prorogation being arranged for Monday afternoon, April 16, at three o'clock. If that cannot be carried out, then the house will of course resume its sitting at three o'clock on Monday afternoon, to be continued, if need be, until eleven o'clock at night. Were this to happen, without the business being concluded and royal assent given to the bills before midnight, the government would be obliged to resort to governor general's warrants to meet expenditures both for the conduct of the war and for civil government over the period of the general election and the opening of the new parliament.

As hon. members are aware, I stated some time ago that a general election would be called before April 17. It may assist hon. members in deciding upon the course it is advisable in the public interest for them to pursue if I inform the house at once, on my responsibility as Prime Minister, that His Excellency the Governor General has authorized me to say that he is willing to approve a recommendation to have parliament dissolved just as soon after the conclusion of its business as may be possible. His Excellency has also authorized me to say that he is willing, at the same time, to approve the immediate issue of a proclamation for the holding of a general election on June 11.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Well, Mr. Speaker, at last they have been forced to go to the country. May I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the Prime Minister, that as a party we have been desirous of having the business of the house concluded and the various readings given the necessary bills by to-night, if at all possible. That has been our general policy with respect to this matter, and I was about to rise to indicate our desire to be cooperative in that respect. In doing so, however, I should like to point out that there is a tremendous amount of work still to be accomplished as far as this chamber is concerned. I take it that work which otherwise would take weeks and weeks will not be attended to because of the shortness of the session. The responsibility for that situation, as I pointed out the other day, does not rest with us but with the government. We are making a great sacrifice in order that the civil supply and war appropriation bills may be duly assented to before the expiration of this parliament, but, as I said in my address to the house the day before yesterday, we are anxious that the government shall not take it upon itself to adjourn, prorogue or dissolve before these bills are properly passed and the order paper cleared.

At this stage I should like to say to the Prime Minister that for quite a long time we have been hoping that he and his government would finally summon up enough courage to face the people. It is no wonder that we received with a great deal of interest and delight the announcement which has just been made. While we realize that it takes courage and fortitude on the part of the members of any political party who aspire to carry on government in these difficult days, nevertheless I want to tell the Prime Minister that no party or group in this house welcomes the announcement that the government is going to the country more than the Progressive Conservative party does, for the very good reason that after the appeal to the people we shall be ready and willing and prepared to form the next government of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have heard more forced laughs and hollow laughs from the government side in the last little while than I have for a long time.

I think it was the day before yesterday the Prime Minister had something to say about our leader, John Bracken. From the best information I can get, the problem of the Prime Minister now will not be to try to get John Bracken into the house but rather how to keep him out and get himself in. So while I sympathize with the government and its supporters in this rather serious hour, as far as they are concerned, still we hope that when we are the government we will receive the sort of treatment we have tried to accord them since we have been in opposition. We will understand their position. As the Prime Minister sits over here we will be watching him; but I am afraid the difficulty will be that he will not be able to sit over here after one election but that it will take one or two by-elections to get him here. In the days that lie ahead I will not forget the remarks of the Prime Minister during the last couple of years, when he did not quite sympathize with me but rather was somewhat critical from time to time because of the fact that my leader had not a seat in the house. When the appeal to the people is over the tables will be turned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is an old saying, Mr. Speaker, that actions speak louder than words. We have heard the words of my hon. friend, a great many there were, but I just wish he could have been on this side of the house, to have a glimpse of himself and his followers when I made the announcement that the election was to be held on June 11. While there was great applause from all other parts of the house I noticed that not a single member of the Progressive Conservative party rapped his desk—not until after I had spoken to my colleague the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) on my right and my colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) on my left, and suggested to them that they take a look at hon. members immediately opposite. I did that because not one of them was receiving the announcement with any degree of satisfaction at all.

In conclusion may I say that one has only to be on this side of the house—

Mr. CARDIFF: On a question of privilege, I would ask the Prime Minister to retract his statement that he did not see anyone on this side of the house rap his desk.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I repeat I did not see anyone of his party. My hon. friend may have been patting his desk, but not much more. I watched and I did not see anyone applauding in real fashion on the other side of the house. But what I did see at that time—and what I still see—was the gloomiest lot of countenances I have ever seen in my life.

Mr. GRAYDON: One word, after what the Prime Minister has said: I wondered why he had that rear-view mirror in front of him. Now I know.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggarr): Mr. Speaker, from the general feeling of the house I do not think much more business will be done at this session. May I say, however, that I think everyone would welcome the Prime Minister's announcement that the election is to be held soon in order that the people may make a choice. I do not think this is the time to indulge in idle boasting or anything of the kind. The government which will be formed after the next election must be prepared to face grave problems, in some respects graver than those the government now in office has faced.

I rose really to say this, that there is a tremendous amount of unfinished business. The Prime Minister has appealed to all hon. members of the house to facilitate the passage of the bills, in order that parliament may vote an appropriation, and that the government may be authorized in a democratic and proper manner to finance war and civil activities in the next five months. As I have said several times this week, we are prepared to facilitate the granting of the appropriations. But I should like to point out that there are very important departments of government which have not been questioned. For instance, there is the Department of Labour, the Department of Veterans Affairs, the Department of Agriculture, and other departments, none of which has been questioned, and about which a number of inquiries should have been made, and an opportunity for comment should have been given. In my opinion, parliament should have been called earlier. There has been time, however, to do the business of the country, had we stuck to business instead of spending several hours this week in political discussion in preparation for the election which has now been announced, the business of the country would have been much more expeditiously and efficiently done than has been the case.

I would say further that the rules of this parliament need revision. In the mother of parliaments, which is democratic to the core, the kind of discussion we have had in the last two weeks could not have been as prolonged as it has been here. With the tremendous amount of business facing the country, and the tremendous amount which will face the country in the future, I suggest one of the first things the House of Commons should do when parliament meets after the election, is to revise its rules to the end that the business of the house may not be held up by all kinds of often inconsequential or repetitious discussion.

I say the business of the country should have been done by calling parliament earlier. Under our present rules we knew that this situation might face us. We are now within a few hours of dissolution, and I join with the leader of the opposition, with the Prime Minister and with other hon. members of the house in urging that the business be wound up as efficiently as possible under the circumstances now prevailing in parliament. Then we can all go to the country with clearer consciences, and with the feeling that the job has been done, trusting to the wisdom of the Canadian people to choose the government they consider will give them the greatest and best service in the next several years.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of deep regret that when the house was called in November to discuss the question of conscription the government did not see fit to continue the session of parliament from that time to the present. I see no sufficient reason why that could not have been done. I dislike very much to think of leaving in the air some of the all-important matters which should have been considered with the greatest care by this parliament. I have in mind the document tabled yesterday by the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe), respecting employment and income. That is a document which should have occupied the time of the house, and should have been given the greatest possible care and attention for three or four weeks, in order that hon. members might fully understand what is really in the minds of those connected with the department. Yet we shall scarcely have time to refer to it.

As to the time of the election, our group and our movement are ready. They will be happy to meet the Prime Minister and the representatives of the other parties on the hustings or anywhere else.

There is one further matter, and that has to do with expediting the business. During this session our group has done everything within its power to expedite business, and we are prepared to continue to do so. We are not very well satisfied with the amount of time taken by some hon. members in the discussion of matters which in my view might well have waited until the next parliament.

HOUSING

LOANS FOR INDIVIDUALS IN SASKATCHEWAN— SECURITY AGREEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. H. BENCE (Saskatoon City): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilesley) make his promised statement in connection with question No. 3 on the order paper respecting the matter of the application of the housing act to Saskatchewan?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Yes. The questions are:

Mr. BENCE:

1. Have any lending institutions indicated their intention to the government of participating in the National Housing Act which went into effect on January 18, 1945, with respect to the province of Saskatchewan?

2. If so, how many of such institutions have so indicated?

3. Have any lending institutions indicated that they were not prepared to participate in the said National Housing Act with respect to the province of Saskatchewan?

4. If so, how many of such institutions have so indicated that they are not prepared to participate in the said National Housing Act with respect to the province of Saskatchewan?

Mr. ILSLEY:

Answer, 1 to 4:

On January 26, 1945, the Minister of Finance announced the coming into effect of the

[Mr. Blackmore.]

National Housing Act, 1944, and in the course of his announcement made the following statement commenting upon various inquiries received as to whether the act would operate in Saskatchewan and Alberta:

"The government is most anxious that all parts of Canada and all Canadians, whether living in cities, towns or villages or on farms, should be in a position to enjoy the benefits of the National Housing Act. The Canadian parliament in last summer's revision of the act went as far as it could to assure this result. However, if there should be provincial legislation of such a character as seriously to affect the rights of mortgagees, this may prevent prospective home builders from getting loans under the housing act. It must be remembered that these are joint loans, private companies putting up seventy-five per cent and sharing in the ultimate risk of loss. I intend shortly to invite representatives of the Saskatchewan and Alberta governments to come to Ottawa to discuss what steps these governments might take to enable the act to operate within their borders."

This statement was made following a conference during which the representatives of a number of lending institutions had expressed grave concern as to whether, in view of legislation that was already on the statute books or was threatened in one or both of these two provinces, the institutions would be justified in making National Housing Act loans, which are very high percentage loans, in these two provinces, and had pointed out the necessity of action being taken to remedy the situation if the National Housing Act was to operate freely and satisfactorily in these provinces.

Some time later the Minister of Finance had discussions first with representatives of the government of Alberta and later with the government of Saskatchewan for the purpose of discussing the legislation and other factors that were retarding lending under the National Housing Act within each province. Following these conferences, the Alberta government introduced and secured the enactment of legislation at the session of the legislature which has just closed, and lending operations under the act are being actively resumed in that province by a considerable number of approved lending institutions. It is understood that a bill was also introduced and passed at the recent session of the Saskatchewan legislature which was apparently intended by the Saskatchewan government to remove at least certain of the difficulties and the Saskatchewan government was asked to send a copy of the legislation which was enacted to the Minister of Finance, but no copies of the statute have as yet been received and it is therefore impossible to say if it is likely to result in active lending under the National Housing Act in the province.

There are three approved lending institutions which have never ceased to make National Housing Act loans in the province of Saskatchewan, although operations have been on a limited scale. No lending institution has made any definite statement to the Minister of Finance that it will not be willing to make loans under the National Housing Act in the province of Saskatchewan.

REQUEST THAT WINNIPEG BE DECLARED A CONGESTED AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. I regret that I was unable to send him notice, as my question is based on a letter that I received just as I was coming into the house. The letter is from the clerk of the Winnipeg city council. It relates to the fact that because the wartime prices and trade board has thus far found it impossible to bring Winnipeg under the emergency shelter administration, the city council has set up its own emergency shelter organization, but feels that the administration of this set-up would be more satisfactory if the wartime prices and trade board would bring the city under the government's emergency shelter regulations. They are anxious to know if the board will consider again the question of declaring Winnipeg a congested area. The city council offers the full cooperation of its own set-up. Will the minister bring this matter to the attention of the board?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Yes.

MEAT

RESTORATION OF HOG PRODUCTION STANDARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact we are not likely at this stage to have a detailed statement from him in committee, may I ask what steps are being taken to restore hog production in Canada to meet the serious shortage of meat which is threatening the allied countries, in the face of drastic reduction in hog production in Canada.

Mr. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I think this is the same question which was asked earlier in the session, and which I agreed to answer when my estimates were before the committee. But as I understand they are not now to come up, I shall answer at this time.

I would point out that that part of the hon. member's observations which form the question is as follows: "What steps are being taken to restore hog production in Canada?" And then he goes on to add, "in the face of drastic reduction in hog production in Canada." It all depends upon what one is referring to, whether that last statement is or is not correct. Hog production in Canada has been doubled during the period of the war. That is, we are marketing twice as many hogs now as we were in the last year before the war. In so far as the present is concerned, it is scarcely correct to say that there has been a "drastic reduction" in hog production in Canada. Inspected slaughterings for the first three months in the last three years were as follows:

	Hogs
1943.....	1,624,000
1944.....	2,824,000
1945.....	1,918,000

In other words, the slaughterings in the first three months of 1945 were 300,000 higher than the slaughterings in the first three months of 1943. However, if you compare the slaughterings in the first three months of this year with the exceptionally high slaughterings in the first three months of 1944, it will probably be correct to say that there has been a considerable reduction. Apart from that there has been a great increase in hog production in Canada as compared with any other period at any time in its history.

Then comes the question: what is being done? First, there is the ceiling on grain purchased to feed hogs. No matter in what part of Canada hogs are being fed, there is a ceiling price on the grain with which those hogs are fed. Second, freight is paid on grain to feed hogs in that part of Canada east of Fort William and in all that part of Canada located in the province of British Columbia. Third, there is a premium of $3 on grade A hogs produced anywhere in Canada and a premium of $2 on grade B 1 hogs produced anywhere in Canada. Fourth, there is a contract guaranteeing minimum prices until December 31, 1946 with Great Britain for all surplus hogs that can be produced and processed in Canada and sent to Great Britain. Fifth, there is the question of farm labour. An order has gone out from the Department of Labour to the man-power mobilization boards or the selective service boards throughout Canada to the effect that postponements should be granted, if asked for, to those who are engaged in the feeding of hogs on farms in Canada. In addition to that, there are the special instructions, which were read to the house the other day by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence, which have gone out to the armed forces to provide for the release of certain persons to assist in the feeding of hogs.

In other words, there is the regulation of feed; there is the payment of freight on mill feeds and other feeds; there is the payment of premiums from the treasury of Canada amounting to millions; there are the signed contracts guaranteeing a minimum price down to the end of 1946, and then there are the provisions being made of labour for this purpose to the greatest possible numbers.

SUPPLIES TO GREAT BRITAIN—RATIONING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, in view of the answer given a moment ago by the Minister of Agriculture that contracts had been made with Great Britain to take all the hogs that Canada can produce, and in view of what the minister said a few days ago that the food administrator in Great Britain had sent a cable stating last autumn that they would take all the meat we could send, is the minister prepared to state whether the government is ready to announce its policy on meat rationing?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I can only give the same answer I gave the other day, that this is a matter of government policy. If it were to be decided, it would not be the responsibility of the Minister of Agriculture to announce it.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

STATUS OF RECIPIENTS OF WAR VETERANS' AND WIDOWS' ALLOWANCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, notice of which I sent him earlier to-day. I realize that if it were not so late in the session Your Honour might take exception to this question, but in view of the circumstances that exist I trust that you will permit me to ask it.

When section 8, subsection 2 of the Family Allowances Act was under discussion last year, the minister, at that time parliamentary assistant to the President of the Privy Council, assured me that consideration would be given to my request for an amendment to this subsection so that the allowance would not be denied in respect of children of those receiving war veterans' allowance or the special allowance to veterans' widows. My point was that these children should be treated the same as the children of those in receipt of pensions under the Pension Act. The minister's assurance that my representations would be considered will be found on page 5876 of Hansard for August 1, 1944. Can the minister indicate whether this consideration has been given and whether the proposed change has been made? If not, will it be considered further?

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, consideration has been given to the point, but in view of the very considerable number of classes of people already in receipt of allowances and changes that have recently been made with regard to veterans and others, a decision has not been reached as yet. It is hoped that an announcement can be made within the next few weeks.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

SENIOR OFFICERS—ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ASKED IN DISCUSSION OF WAR ESTIMATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Defence for Air): I should like to lay on the table answers to questions that were asked during the course of the discussion of my estimates by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy), dealing with senior officers of the Royal Canadian Air Force.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

CLOSING OF WINDSOR, N.S., EMBARKATION DEPOT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence. Is the reported closing of the military embarkation depot at Windsor, Nova Scotia, correct? If so, what are the reasons for closing it, and what disposition will be made of the establishment?

Mr. D. C. ABBOTT (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): The hon. member was good enough to give me notice of this question. I am informed that the transit depot at Windsor is to be closed on April 15, the facilities being no longer required. Movements will be handled at Debert. The hospital is to be kept in operation, but the camp itself will be put on a care and maintenance basis.

NAVAL SERVICES

DEEP BROOK, SYDNEY AND ESQUIMALT ESTABLISHMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services if he will bring down the replies to the questions I asked when his estimates were before the house regarding the total costs for construction, equipment and land of the establishments at Deep Brook, Sydney and Esquimalt. When I asked these questions the minister promised that he would give the answers later, as he did not have the information before him at that time.

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): I am checking the figures now and I hope to have this information for my hon. friend by six o'clock.

CAPITAL COSTS AT CORNWALLIS AND SYDNEY, N.S.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): Mr. Speaker, I can now give to the member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) answers to the questions which he asked some time ago. I have already given him the capital costs at Cornwallis and at Sydney, Nova Scotia. The cost of equipment at Cornwallis, according to the figures I have here, was $803,000; the cost of equipment at Sydney, $746,000; new construction at Esquimalt, $5,032,000; equipment at Esquimalt, $1,069,000.

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): I understand that the figures which the minister has just submitted, added to the figures which he gave to the committee before, constitute the total capital expenditures and expenditures on equipment up to the present time, not taking into consideration operating costs?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): My hon. friend says, up to the present time. I think that the figures that I gave him for Cornwallis were up to December 6, 1944; that was for the capital cost. The figures I have given for Sydney were up to February of this year. There might be a slight increase by now over the capital figures I gave, but I do not think it would be very great. The figures I have given on cost of equipment should be added to the figures I gave on April 4 for capital costs.

DOMINION ELECTIONS

WAR SERVICE VOTING REGULATIONS—MERCHANT SEAMEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): Earlier in the session I raised a question as to what provision was being made by the government for the taking of the vote on the personnel of the merchant marine during the coming election. I wonder if the secretary of state can give us that information.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): The hon. member for York South was kind enough to advise me of his intention to ask this question, and in answer I should like to read a memorandum prepared by the chief electoral officer with regard to voting by those in the merchant marine. This reads:

By clause (c) of subparagraph 1 of paragraph 5 of the Canadian war service voting regulations, 1944, merchant seamen engaged in coastwise or foreign service are entitled to vote at the next general election as war service electors under the special voting procedure prescribed by the regulations.

Paragraph 36 of the regulations prescribe that these merchant seamen may cast their votes before any commissioned officer of the naval, military or air forces of Canada specially designated for the purpose of taking the votes of war service electors.

War service electors will vote during the twelve week days prior to polling day at the next general election.

Several voting places will be established for the taking of the votes of war service electors at Halifax, Saint John, Quebec, Montreal, Vancouver and Victoria, where these merchant seamen may cast their votes upon satisfactory proof of their identity and of their qualifications as war service electors, during the voting period of twelve week days.

Furthermore, these merchant seamen will be able to vote as war service electors in large ports in the United Kingdom and other allied countries.

MINIMUM NUMBER OF DAYS PRESCRIBED BY CHIEF ELECTORAL OFFICER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister how it is possible under the act to call an election in six days less than the minimum prescribed by the chief electoral officer?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I would say to my hon. friend that I consulted the chief electoral officer.

this morning in regard to the statement I intended to make this afternoon, and he gave me the fullest assurance that the election could safely be held in that time.

Mr. STIRLING: So this statement on page 658 of Hansard is inaccurate?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot say as to that, but I can say that I have the positive assurance of the chief electoral officer that polling can safely take place on June 11. I am surprised that my hon. friend should raise any question about our having an election then.

Mr. STIRLING: He raised no question other than that if a mistake is made under the act after the statement of the chief electoral officer it would be a very serious matter indeed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is quite right.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Thursday, April 12, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Chairman, there are two matters on which I would ask the minister to make a short statement to-day. The first has to do with government policy on the renegotiation of contracts for war supplies. In my home city of Vancouver there are quite a number of small manufacturing plants doing engineering work, largely in connection with the building of ships. These firms have made representations asking that the government investigate the whole situation with regard to renegotiating contracts, that the situation be clarified and some uniform system adopted, and furthermore provision made that they be allowed to get back in due course the refundable portion of the excess profits tax they have paid.

Most of these firms started in a small way, as the minister knows, and they have done excellent work manufacturing war materials of various kinds. They have provided jobs for a great number of men and women and have in reality built up new industries in our city. The situation is probably the same in many other centres in Canada. In view of the fact that their growth was, of course, largely a war development, they have been subject to heavy excess profits taxation and have been unable to retain sufficient funds to lay aside for the post-war days. Of that taxation, in the last two years—the minister will correct me if I am wrong—twenty per cent was considered as refundable, the plan being that they would get that much back after the war. We are told that they have planned to use that twenty per cent for conversion to production of civilian goods and as working funds for their operations in the days of peace. But a short time ago the Department of Munitions and Supply stepped in and has been carrying on the renegotiation of these contracts. I do not want to be taken as condoning for a moment the making of unfair profits out of war production. Every member of the house would be very much against that. But in some cases this work was done by tender, in competition with other firms, and now, after the work has been done and the excess profits taxes have been paid on that basis, these firms are faced with renegotiation of their contracts, and in some cases at least the refundable portion of their tax has been eaten up by reason of the renegotiation carried on by the Department of Munitions and Supply. Hon. members will see that that will have a direct effect on the ability of these firms to employ people after the war. It may force many firms out of business at a time when the government is relying on industry to provide a great number of jobs. That is the policy of the present government, and I am convinced that it would be the policy of whatever government is formed after the election; I do not think there is much chance that Canada will adopt state control of all these industries. It is therefore particularly important that these firms be given a reasonable chance to carry on and provide jobs.

The policy of renegotiation of contracts does not apply to firms which are doing civilian work; it applies only to firms on war work, which of course means that the latter are dealt with far more severely. I would ask the minister to make a statement as to policy in this connection. I repeat that these firms are asking that the whole situation be clarified. Apparently there are no uniform rules; each firm is dealt with on a separate basis; and I ask that an attempt be made to permit them to retain the title to the refundable portion of the tax they have paid. That is the first matter I am placing before the minister to-day.

The second has to do with the shipbuilding industry, which of course is the industry for which most of these smaller firms are producing. Last summer the Canadian Shipbuilding and Ship Repairing association presented a brief to the government which contained suggestions and recommendations having in view the furtherance of the interests of Canadian marine transportation. I should not like to be taken as agreeing with all of these submissions, but I shall read them to the house because I think they are very important. The shipbuilding industry is of great consequence to Canada, from the point of view not only of providing work but also of maintaining our navy in the days of peace. In fact it should be one of the key industries of Canada. These are the recommendations made by that association:

1. The government should restrict the coasting trade of Canada to vessels now registered in Canada and hereafter built in Canada.
2. That a national shipping policy should be enacted whereby Canadian ship owners engaged in foreign trade in and out of Canadian ports will be encouraged by all possible means, including subsidies if necessary, to build and register their ships in Canada.
3. That the government should give consideration, as a part of the post-war reconstruction policy, to the replacement of obsolete vessels employed in the government service by new vessels built in Canada.
4. That all Canadian naval vessels shall be built in Canada, and that the government make representations to the British government to establish a policy whereby educational orders for British naval vessels may be placed in Canada in the post-war period.
5. That steps be taken to reduce vessel orders awarded by the government to those shipyards owned and/or controlled by the government with a view to liquidation of these shipyards as soon as the war emergency permits.
6. That the government should promote a policy of aid to Canadian shipbuilders to enable them to build ships for foreign ownership, through the medium of loans secured by mortgages, or other approved financial arrangements.
7. That a committee be appointed by the government to study a policy of government purchase of Canadian-owned and registered vessels engaged in the Canadian coastal trade and which have become obsolete, at a fair valuation to be applied as a credit against Canadian built replacement tonnage.
8. That Canada's shipbuilding and shipping policies be controlled through one government authority, and that Canadian shipbuilders be invited to nominate representatives to all committees dealing with questions relating to marine transportation.

This will be of interest to the Minister of Fisheries:

9. That all vessels engaged in the Canadian fishing industry shall hereafter be built in Canada.

10. That consideration be given to the establishing in the principal shipbuilding districts of special facilities for technical education in shipbuilding and marine engineering.

These recommendations were submitted to the government, and press dispatches of September 11 of last year set out that an eleven-man interdepartmental committee was being set up by the government to consider a merchant shipping policy. The report went on to say that this interdepartmental committee would——report to the cabinet upon completion of this study and a meeting will then be arranged at an early date between Mr. King and members of the cabinet and the five-man executive of Canadian Shipbuilding and Ship Repairing Association, which submitted the brief.

In addition to the shipbuilders, the labour unions whose men were building the ships were very much interested in this brief, and asked that they also should be allowed to be represented at this meeting with the cabinet. That is very important, because, after all, to the unions it is a matter of jobs, of enabling the men and their families to live. Will the minister tell us whether or not that meeting has been held, and if not, when it will be held, and also what the general policy of the government is with regard to maintaining the shipbuilding industry after the war?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Chairman, with reference to the small machine shops on the Pacific coast, I may say at once that I have some sympathy with the owners of them. They started as small shops, as a rule, with little equipment, and they have become large shops with modern equipment—at the expense of the government; nevertheless they are faced with the post-war years with operating that sort of plant. Under the tax laws the standard of profits of these firms is low, and I think that any relief they should get should be in the direction of change in the basis of standard profits. It is the duty of my own department to place war contracts at the lowest possible cost consistent with fairness. That has been done with the main contracts. Where direct government contracts have been placed and where costs have been reduced, it has been the custom to have frequent renegotiations: For example, the shipbuilding industry, when it became more efficient was able to increase the profit on a ship from about $30,000 to as much as $300,000. Naturally the shipbuilding industry was renegotiated, and it is operating to-day on about a three per cent basis. That happens with every type of contractor that has a direct contract with the department. The costs are watched very carefully; we have our auditors checking costs, and as soon as the costs improve so that the profit becomes excessive, it is the custom to renegotiate the contracts with both retroactive and current effect.

The shops to which my hon. friend refers are not main contractors of the department. In other words, for the most part they do not receive contracts direct from the department; they are subcontractors of the shipbuilding firms; therefore they come in a special class. The government has no direct dealing with them; consequently it does not audit their accounts. Nevertheless, in examining the shipbuilding industry as a whole, it was found that whereas the costs for the finished ships have been brought down progressively as costs improved, the shipbuilders did not renegotiate their subcontracts, with the result that many were paying the same price for components in the third year of the war as they were originally. That led to an investigation of the position of the subcontractors, and it was found that they were the real profiteers of the war.

Mr. GREEN: The minister does not mean that in its worst sense?

Mr. HOWE: No, but I mean the people who have made excessive profits in the war are usually subcontractors.

Mr. GREEN: Any profits that they made were taken away by taxation.

Mr. HOWE: Taxation has nothing to do with the Department of Munitions and Supply. The tax collector comes in after the department gets through. Were it charged that any subcontractor had made thirty per cent I do not think anyone in this house would accept my explanation that it does not matter, because the tax collector would get part of it. That would not be an excuse at all. We must make sure that our contractors are not overpaid. My department has been steadily on the job of renegotiating war subcontracts, and it is a tremendous job. They run into many hundreds. But the work is progressing and the recoveries are really startling. I suppose the profits made by some of the small machine shops to which the hon. member refers run as high as twenty-five or thirty per cent of their turnover. Of course that is wholly excessive.

Mr. GREEN: I do not know the figures.

Mr. HOWE: My department simply sits down with the contractor and says: "Look here, an audit of your books shows that you have made this large profit. We do not think you are entitled to that profit; we think a reasonable scale of profit would be this." The amount we have recovered out of those transactions runs into millions of dollars. There has been no great difficulty in arriving at a fair settlement. It is true that the shops to which my hon. friend refers will not have the refundable portion of their profits which they expect, but they will have the refundable portion to which they are entitled in equity. So far as I am concerned my department had no option; knowing that those profits existed we had to go out and recapture them. That is what we are doing.

Mr. GREEN: Take a case where a firm tenders on a job in competition with others.

Mr. HOWE: They did not tender to us. Those firms were not main contractors of ours. They may have tendered to a shipbuilding firm, but even if that were done, a tender put in in 1940 should not govern the price being paid for the article in 1943, 1944 or 1945. In other words the original price may have been put in as a tender in 1941. As a rule the shipbuilding firms have not rechecked their subcontract prices as they should have done as the efficiency of the industry improved; therefore we are forced to do the job.

As I say these are not direct contractors of ours. The position of those firms is not as serious as my hon. friend might suppose. After all, most of them have been furnished with greatly improved and enlarged shops and greatly improved machinery. They are all fitted with the most modern machinery, and they are permitted to write them off under accelerated depreciation so that the small man is in a vastly better position to operate after the war than he was at the beginning of the war. He may require working capital; if so, he will, of course, have first recourse to the industrial bank which was formed to take care of exactly that kind of loan.

Mr. GREEN: That would mean they would have to borrow money and pay interest on it.

Mr. HOWE: Borrow working capital.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister be willing to have an investigation made into the position in which those firms find themselves?

Mr. HOWE: We are investigating every day.

Mr. GREEN: I mean taking them as a group and having the whole situation looked into.

Mr. HOWE: It is not a matter of a group; it is a matter of each firm. We do not deal with groups. Each company sits down with our cost accountant and renegotiation officer and his case is discussed. If some of his work happened to be private work, that is eliminated, because we have no right to negotiate private work. If the work is being done by tender, and if he has an exceptionally efficient plant, that is all taken into account, and my renegotiation officer and the firm never fail to agree under all the circumstances to a reasonable profit.

Mr. GREEN: How many years back can they go?

Mr. HOWE: Right back to the beginning of the war. We have officers from each department all across Canada doing that kind of work; and I may say to the hon. member that it is not small change they are recovering. To date the total gross recovery from renegotiation runs into $250,000,000. You may say the tax department would have recovered that, but at least $70 millions is not recovered by the government.

Mr. STIRLING: Are the adjustments retroactive?

Mr. HOWE: Oh, yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Sums are refunded?

Mr. HOWE: We take the responsibility for correcting the tax situation. If the firm has paid income tax on the income that it expected to have before renegotiating, we take its refund to the income tax office and have its income tax readjusted accordingly. All that is taken care of as part of our renegotiation. That is a very important part of our department and in my opinion it is an excellent piece of work that they are doing.

Mr. GREEN: What would happen if it was found that the firm was operating at a loss?

Mr. HOWE: That is taken into account too. We usually hear of that much more quickly than we hear of the profits. If a firm is operating at a loss, it does not go on very long before we hear about it.

Mr. MacINNIS: May I say a word on this subject? I have had letters from those firms about which the hon. member for Vancouver South has spoken. In my view the principle of renegotiating is accepted both here and in the United States where they have contracts of this kind. The only point that can be made is this: has renegotiation been carried on on a proper basis? Neither the hon. member for Vancouver South nor myself is in a position to express an opinion on that. I cannot see that a committee can be appointed to deal with it now. If the house were in session for a longer time and the war expenditures committee were sitting, then there would be a possibility of hearing these people and having them explain their case. In lieu of that we shall have to take the statement of the Minister of Munitions and Supply. He has given me an insight into it that I did not have before.

Mr. HOWE: As to the shipbuilding brief, I am glad my hon. friend has said that he would not support every chapter of it. I read the brief of the committee of shipbuilders. I pointed out that it was a one-sided brief. It asked for a great many things that the government should do, but I saw nothing at all in it showing what the shipbuilders must do.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is free enterprise.

Mr. HOWE: I have had two or three frank talks with the members of the shipbuilding industry. I thought the industry should have put in the brief something that was a little more reciprocal than that contained in the brief from which my hon. friend quoted a few minutes ago. In other words, if the industry expects help from the government it must put itself in shape to justify that help. To-day it is operating to capacity on a lavish scale with work enough to last many months into the future, and it is hardly the time to sit down with the government to decide how much government help it is entitled to. When the new government takes over, there is a job to be done with shipbuilding. I think there is a good deal of merit in the proposals of the shipbuilders that a maritime commission be established to handle every phase of shipping and shipbuilding. If this government is returned to power I should be disposed to recommend that to the government. At the moment we are stretching our man-power very tight. If I were to attempt to form a maritime commission to-day I would find it somewhat difficult to secure the men I would wish on that commission. They are busy on other jobs. The men I would want have responsible jobs which they cannot leave under war conditions. I think I can give a reasonable assurance that, if this government is returned, a maritime commission will be appointed.

Mr. GREEN: The minister did not deal with one aspect of my question. Has labour been consulted at all in regard to this question of shipbuilding? The unions were asking to be called into consultation on the question. Has that been done?

Mr. HOWE: We shall be glad to hear representations from labour when we are prepared to act, when a policy has been formulated.

Certainly it will be discussed with labour. Every major action of the government that has repercussions on labour is discussed with labour; and any plans we have in the direction of a new shipbuilding programme will be discussed with labour. As I say, however, it is a matter to be dealt with by the government that will take over after the election; and until the government is ready to take action, until it has its own plans formulated, there is little purpose in holding discussions with labour.

Mr. GREEN: I think the unions have several very helpful suggestions to offer.

Mr. HOWE: I have always found suggestions from labour very helpful. I can assure my hon. friend that if I had any intention at all of moving in the matter within the next few weeks, I should be consulting with labour to-day. As I have not, however, I think it should be left until we are ready to proceed.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: There is one clause in the brief referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver South in which I was particularly interested:

That steps be taken to reduce vessel orders awarded by the government to those shipyards owned and/or controlled by the government with a view to liquidation of these shipyards as soon as the war emergency permits.

Would the minister care to make a statement as to the policy of the government in that regard? Before he does so I would remind him that some eight or ten days ago a delegation from the Toronto shipyards, a government-owned plant, interviewed him. At that time fears were expressed that the yard was being gradually dismantled, that vital equipment was being or about to be sold. I believe the minister undertook to find out whether that was being done, and to let us know. Has he any further information on that subject?

Mr. HOWE: The future of the government in the shipbuilding business will be a matter for the maritime commission when it is appointed, or whatever government agency is in charge of shipbuilding in the post-war period. It is hardly fair to consider yards that were put up to do particular war jobs as industries. For example, the yard at Toronto was designed to build corvettes and minesweepers. Another yard was designed to build 4,700-ton freighters. Three yards were designed purely for the outfitting of ships fabricated in other yards. Whether or not they are shipyards might cause some little debate. We are quite prepared to place those yards in the hands of anyone who thinks he can make a go of them in the post-war period.

[Mr. Howe.]

They were not organized or built by the government with the intention that they should be operated after the war, when the classes of ships for which they were designed are no longer required. They were simply emergency yards to meet an emergency condition. As far as Toronto is concerned, some equipment was removed from the yard there for other government operations, and it is subject to recall if required. I think those interested, particularly those in the city of Toronto who have shown some concern, are aware of the fact that the assets of the yard are for sale, and I am hopeful that an offer for that equipment will be received in due course from someone who believes he can operate the yard successfully in its present condition.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I want to ask the minister a second question by way of following up the one I asked with regard to wage agreements with men serving on the Park ships. The ship I have reference to is the S.S. Coronation Park, one of the Park ships which was articulated to a Vancouver firm and then chartered by the shipping board at Washington. The information I have is that the crew on that ship signed their articles in Vancouver, contracting to serve for a year, with no knowledge whatever of what their future movements might be. They soon found themselves in the southern Pacific delivering war supplies to American soldiers, exposed to enemy attack from the air, from the surface of the water and from under water, and subject to all the tropical diseases that prevail. I am told that American sailors on Liberty ships, doing the same type of work, receive by way of war bonus one hundred per cent of their basic wage rate plus $5 a day, because of the dangers and risks involved in that particular area. Has the government any supervision over contracts made by a private company with another government for the use of Canadian ships? Canadian seamen on board that ship are receiving $44.50 a month in war risk bonus. American soldiers are getting up to $350 a month war risk bonus. These men have been there since November. The minister mentioned that their interests were protected by the seamen's union. I am told they have had only two partial mail deliveries in that area since November. While American sailors there can get mail within a week after it is mailed in the United States, our soldiers have to go as long as nine weeks without mail. There is not much the union or anyone else can do in that connection.

Incidentally when these men sailed they thought they were going on an ordinary voyage, and, as I pointed out the other evening, they were given no protection. Not a single sailor on that ship was given an injection of any kind as protection against tropical diseases; nor had they been given such protection up to March 12. It seems to me the government should assume some responsibility for the men serving on board their own ships and in the service of an allied country. These men have made a protest to the United States government by way of a petition, I believe signed by the entire crew. They want to know who is benefiting by the cheaper rate which prevails on Canadian ships as compared with American ships. Is it the American government; is it the private company which entered into the agreement with the United States shipping board, or is it the Canadian government? There is a vast difference between the cost of delivering goods in an American ship and in a Canadian ship, and it would seem that the men on the Canadian ship should receive more consideration than they have been given. I do not know what facilities the minister's department has for investigating a situation of that kind, but I should like him to make a statement.

Mr. HOWE: The Park Steamship company supervise the operation of all Park ships. A wage agreement has been negotiated with the men, through their proper negotiating agency, standard for all ships in all waters. If any ship goes into the combat zone, war risk insurance applies, and it is the Canadian scale of war risk insurance. The ship my hon. friend mentions as trading in the Pacific is by no means the only Canadian ship which trades in the Pacific. We have been operating ships to Australia since the first ship was built on the Pacific coast. I suppose at least a third of the Park fleet is in the Australian trade.

I think my hon. friend is mistaken when he suggests that this ship is chartered to the United States. It may take on United States war cargo, but all allied ships are operated in a pool. If a Canadian ship is not filled up with Canadian cargo the pool would order it to a United States port to complete the cargo from that country. That is only incidental. One would find United States ships in Vancouver harbour, topping off American cargo with certain cargo from Canada. But that ship is operated as a United States ship, just as a British ship is operated as a British ship wherever she may be sailing.

Tramp steamships call at many ports and carry the cargo of many nations. That is a practice which has been going on for years. Our scale of pay on all war business in Canada is lower than in the United States. There is nothing unusual about that. The pay of a steelworker in Pittsburgh is higher than that of a steelworker in Hamilton, but the cost of living for the steelworker in Hamilton is correspondingly lower than that of the steelworker in Pittsburgh. So, when it is all added up I think perhaps the Canadian is as well off as his American counterpart who receives higher pay. This applies all through. Our economy is on one scale, while the United States economy is on another, both as to the income and as to the expenditure of individuals. I have yet to be convinced that our Canadian worker is in any poorer position than his American counterpart in the United States.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: The information I have from an officer on that ship is that it sailed light to an American port, that it was hired by the war shipping administration at Washington, and since last November has been used to deliver American goods to American soldiers in the war zone of the south Pacific.

Mr. HOWE: If the ship were chartered to the United States government it would be a bare boat charter, and the ship would have an American crew. If it still has a British crew it is not chartered to the administration, but is simply a Canadian ship operating in the united nations pool. The fact that it carries American supplies continuously does not affect the position. One would find Swedish ships and the ships of other nations carrying war supplies in the Pacific. War risk insurance is paid, because those are dangerous waters—at least there is an element of danger; I do not think the Pacific has been anything like as dangerous as the Atlantic in any stage of the war. I do not believe it is to-day. Losses in the Pacific from submarine attack have been almost nil, whereas my hon. friend knows that losses in the Atlantic have been exceptionally heavy, both proportionately and in numbers of ships sunk.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Does that $44.50 per month war risk bonus apply to seamen?

Mr. HOWE: On every Park steamship.

Mr. ROY: Mr. Chairman, when I resumed my seat yesterday I was giving my reason for opposing the resolution, and was about to quote the words of the late Hon. Ernest Lapointe as they appear at page 2468 of Hansard for 1939:

War Appropriation—Munitions and Supply

We are not alone in that view. Australia has always been against conscription, South Africa will never have conscription, Ireland would never have conscription. I think I am true to my concept of Canadian unity when I say that I shall always fight against this policy; I would not be a member of a government that would enact it; and not only that, but I say with all my responsibility to the people of Canada that I would oppose any government that would enforce it. I agree with what was said yesterday by the leader of the opposition and the Prime Minister, and what was said by Mr. Bruce of Australia, that the time for expeditionary forces overseas is certainly past, and it would not be the most effective way to help our allies.

There cannot be any misunderstanding as to the Liberal government's external policy. Let us see where the evolution began. Speaking in New York on October 24, 1940, the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) said:

We have sent men and ships and guns and planes over the seas, and we shall send more and still more, so long as there is a single Canadian dollar left to be spent or a solitary Canadian citizen to take his stand in defence of freedom.

Was the government prepared to endorse the policy involved in that astonishing statement? Yes, it was. Here is what was said by His Excellency the Governor General in his speech from the throne one month later, as it appeared in Hansard of November 7, 1940:

The measures which will be submitted to you are such as seem necessary to my advisers for the welfare of the country, and for the prosecution of the war to the utmost of our strength.

That, without equivocation, is a confirmation of what the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services had said. As a matter of fact all this has materialized, and to the utmost extreme.

Coming back to the minister's statement, may I say that it shows a thorough upset in the external policy of the Liberal government. Why has there been such a reverse in the government's attitude? The following revelation by the Prime Minister will explain the whole matter. In his speech of January 26, 1942, as it is reported at page 46 of Hansard, this is what he taught us:

Every hon. member of this house knows that except for the assurance that, in the event of a European war, there would be no conscription for service overseas, this parliament would never have decided, in the immediate and unanimous manner in which it did, to stand at the side of Britain in the resistance of aggression, and the defence of freedom.

As we now have conscription, it is needless to say that it was a cheated parliament which accepted Canada's participation in the war. Continuing with this revelation the Prime Minister added:

[Mr. Roy.]

Hon. members are also aware that if, at the time when Canada's participation in the war was challenged in an election in the province of Quebec by a government professing a different political faith, a like assurance with respect to service overseas had not been given in the name of the present government by the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, by the Minister of Public Works, and other Liberal leaders and members of this House of Commons from the province of Quebec, the verdict of the people of that province might have been wholly different.

It was also, Mr. Speaker, a cheated population that had not rendered a different verdict from the one rendered.

Now that we have had five years of applied conscription, of tremendous war expenditures, of gifts—more than three billions of dollars—to the governments of the empire, of ridiculous propaganda and of solid colonial servilism, let us see how the cycle of the Liberal party's imperialist evolution was completed. Speaking in the House of Commons on March 28, 1945, the Prime Minister said, as reported at page 299 of Hansard:

Hon. gentlemen opposite will find out when the opportunity comes—and I am thankful to say it will be given fairly soon—for them as well as the government to appear before the people of this country, whether or not the people of Canada feel that I have done my duty by the British commonwealth of nations, by the British empire, through every hour of the time I have been serving as Prime Minister of this country.

By that emphatic declaration the Prime Minister branded himself as a true imperialist and a straight Tory. I have spoken of evolution and of contradictions, but I wonder if those appellations are the right ones. I must confess I am rather lost. Would not the words "betrayal" apply more adequately?

Moreover, I have another very serious reason for opposing the resolution. I am given to believe that the verdict rendered by the electors of Grey North indicates a true opposition to conscription. Notwithstanding what has been so often said by members on both sides of the house, here is what was published in the Owen Sound Daily Sun-Times of January 23, 1945 on page 6. You can see from your place, Mr. Chairman, that most of this page is devoted to the Liberal party and General McNaughton's propaganda. To the right you will see a picture of the Minister of National Defence. I shall not go over all this political propaganda; it would take too much time. I am not using this for any political purpose; I am using it simply to make my point. This reads:

And the same Garfield Case told you at Rocklyn, January 16, "I'm still opposed to conscription as such but am for total mobilization of man-power and resources."

Men and women of North Grey, do you find this kind of double-talk reassuring—when your men overseas want reinforcements? Where is that “clear and emphatic policy of reinforcements” he talks about?

Case says plainly he is opposed to conscription. That means that if Case had the say—those 8,300 draftees would not be overseas now.

Let's have a man of action—not words and wind.

You want reinforcements, for your men overseas. McNaughton is getting your reinforcements. This is proven fact—not double-talk.

My conclusion is that the people of Grey North, having defeated the Minister of National Defence who was a champion of conscription, having elected the other candidate who was opposing conscription, have indicated that they are against conscription. They defeated the Minister of National Defence who still continues to impose conscription in this country against the will of the population of Ontario as well as of Quebec.

Mr. POULIOT: Who published that advertisement?

Mr. ROY: It is published by authority of the North Grey Liberal Association.

Speaking about the participation of Canada in the war of the Pacific and of Asia the Prime Minister has outlined what was to be the importance of the proposed participation. He has said that conscription was not to be enforced, and so forth, and he concluded by saying that that was the government's intention if it were still in power after the election. There is an axiom that the past guarantees the future. If we can foresee the future through the past of the Liberal government we cannot depend upon those enunciations.

Canada has shed enough blood and has gone into debt sufficiently for a cause which brings about to-day conclusions far different from what we were told at the beginning of the war. That is, we have defended a cause and interests that we knew nothing about. We must not permit more Canadian blood to be shed in Asia or more debts to be imposed upon the Canadian people in order to make gifts to others. We must not permit more sacrifices to be made for the sake of interests which are not ours and which we do not understand. This is well proven by the hypocrisy which we have discovered in those international financial schemers from Basle who are responsible for this world-wide butchery out of which they are making commerce.

These are a few of the reasons I have for voting against the two billion dollar war appropriation. Rather I would suggest that the National Resources Mobilization Act of 1940 be repealed immediately and that all controls and rationing be done away with. I am opposed also to the maintenance by Canada of a force in Europe after the war and to the sending of troops to participate in the Pacific war. It is as clear as lime water that the people of Canada, who have already indicated a lack of confidence in the government in the last by-election, will not endorse its external policy at the coming general election. In the meantime let us keep this money for developing our country and doing all those good things outlined by the Prime Minister in his 1939 speech for the welfare of the Canadian people.

If Mr. Speaker had been in the Chair at this moment, and as I may not have the honour of addressing him again before the expiration of the nineteenth parliament, I would like to have congratulated him upon the distinguished manner in which he has occupied the Chair. I would like to have thanked him for the impartiality which has always characterized his decisions throughout the five years of this parliament. The dignity of his personality may very well be the only fine thing which will be left from this nineteenth parliament. I am sure that when future generations learn of all the incredible things that were done by this parliament they will be convinced that we have just gone through the most inauspicious and anti-Canadian episode in all Canada's history.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There are a number of questions I should like to ask the minister, who seems to be in an amiable mood. I am sure the questions I intend to ask will not arouse him in any way. In past years when some considerable time was taken up with the estimates of the Minister of Munitions and Supply he seemed rather to resent the questions that were asked. I had hoped that there would be an opportunity to discuss the white paper the minister placed before parliament during the present week, but time prevents discussion in detail.

I must say that the white paper is a most interesting and exceptionally well put together document. I have read it with a great deal of care and attention. The problem of the post-war and the period of reconstruction is one that is exercising the minds of men in all democratic countries to-day. It seems to me that this white paper combines the recommendations of Sir William Beveridge and of Lord Keynes, as well as incorporating in a large measure the recommendations of the national resources planning board of the United States, particularly those contained in its report for 1943 on the post-war plan and programme.

There seems to be very little with which we who believe in the principles of private enterprise can offer disagreement. The general idea and conception of this white paper seems to be founded in part upon the four year plan that was announced for Great Britain by the Prime Minister on March 22, 1943; also, in so far as employment is concerned, the employment policy of the United Kingdom as set forth in the documents put out by the Minister of Reconstruction in Great Britain in May, 1944.

Mr. BLACKMORE: When the hon. member for Lake Centre says that the Progressive Conservative party believe in private enterprise, would he be willing also to include Social Crediters?—because we believe in private enterprise too, although we certainly do not believe in that white paper.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I accept the suggestion of the hon. member, absolutely. As a matter of fact the whole foundation for the white paper and its ideas is pretty well epitomized in the speech delivered by the Right Hon. Winston Churchill on the 15th of March when, enunciating the government's plan for the post-war, he used these words:

At the head of our mainmast, we fly the flag of free enterprise. We are determined that native genius and the spirit of adventure, or risk-taking in peace, as in war, shall bear our fortunes forward, finding profitable work and trade for our people, and that good, thrifty house-keeping, both national and private, shall sustain our economy.

He goes on to point out that that does not mean that necessary controls are going to be removed immediately after the war. It is interesting to note that while there are those in Canada of the labour unions who say we must accept the socialistic concept in its entirety in the United States the American Federation of Labour and the C.I.O. accept the necessity, and in fact demand the continuance, of a system of private enterprise. At the expense of holding up the committee for a few moments, Mr. Chairman, I am going to refer to the proposed management-labour code that was enunciated as the new charter for labour and management on the 28th of March as a result of the consultations of President Eric Johnston of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States with president William Green of the American Federation of Labour and Philip Murray, president of the C.I.O. It is interesting to note that the leadership of the C.I.O. in the United States accepts the principle of private enterprise that is accepted by the American Federation of Labour and by the president of the Chamber of Commerce in the United States. I believe this is one of the major problems that face us not only in Canada but throughout democratic countries everywhere. I do not believe we are going back to the days of an uncontrolled private capitalism. Those days are past. I believe a great responsibility falls on private industry to-day. Private industry cannot continue during days of prosperity to employ men and then as soon as difficulties come and restrictions become necessary say to the government that the responsibility is now theirs. Unless private industry is prepared to accept the challenge that comes to it—and I believe that challenge is accepted in this charter which we of the Progressive Conservative party have accepted as applicable to our viewpoint, and as a matter of fact it representing the viewpoint which had been previously enunciated by our leader, Mr. John Bracken—something drastic will be the result.

Private industry must realize that in the post-war reconstruction period a responsibility rests upon the captains of industry that never heretofore rested upon them. Instead of outlining my ideas of what they should undertake to do and how they should do it, I am just going to quote a few excerpts from this new charter for labour and management; for I believe that everything that appears in the white paper that was laid on the table of parliament by the minister appears in this charter, and something more. This is what the charter says:

We in management and labour firmly believe that the end of this war will bring the unfolding of a new era based upon a vastly expanding economy and unlimited opportunities for every American.

This peacetime goal can only be attained through the united effort of all our people. To-day we are united in national defence. To-morrow we must be united equally in the national interest.

Management-labour unity, so effective in lifting war production to unprecedented heights, must be continued in the post-war period. To this end, we dedicate our joint efforts for a practical partnership within the framework of this code of principles.

Now I come to the code of principles, and I am going to refer to them briefly:

1. Increased prosperity for all involves the highest degree of production and employment at wages assuring a steadily advancing standard of living. Improved productive efficiency and technological advancement must, therefore, be constantly encouraged.

Then comes No. 2, and this is so important to-day, having regard to the different attitudes taken by the C.I.O. in our two countries. Here again I repeat that the head of the C.I.O. and the head of the American Federation of Labour agree that:

2. The rights of private property and free choice of action, under a system of private competitive capitalism, must continue to be the foundation of our nation's peaceful and prosperous expanding economy. Free competition and free men are the strength of our free society.

That to me, Mr. Chairman, represents one of the most unusual and pertinent declarations that have been made with the approach of the end of the war. Then comes No. 3:

3. The inherent right and responsibility of management to direct the operation of an enterprise shall be recognized and preserved. So that enterprise may develop and expand and earn a reasonable profit, management must be free as well from unnecessary governmental interference or burdensome restrictions.

Then it asks for certain rights for labour, and says that they must be accepted as they are being accepted to-day by the head of the chamber of commerce in the United States and by industry in general. Paragraph 4 says:

4. The fundamental rights of labour to organize and to engage in collective bargaining with management shall be recognized and preserved, free from legislative enactments which would interfere with or discourage these objectives. . . .

5. The independence and dignity of the individual and the enjoyment of his democratic rights are inherent in our free American society. . . .

6. An expanding economy at home will be stimulated by a vastly increased foreign trade.

Those principles, which as I see it are outlined in detail in the white paper, we of the Progressive Conservative party accept I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the government give consideration to the creation of a national committee composed of representatives of business and of labour organizations, which committee, just as is being done in the United States where a similar suggestion has been made as a result of the collaboration of the three groups I have named, shall seek to promote understanding and sympathy and the acceptance of these principles and assist in proposing to the government national policies to advance the best interests of this nation.

I have touched on only one or two phases of this vast question of post-war reconstruction in order to place before parliament the viewpoint of His Majesty's opposition. I regret very much that, since parliament did not meet earlier, the opportunity to discuss this white paper is denied members of this house.

Having referred in general to that, I come to certain questions which I wish to direct to the attention of the minister. To-day one hears strong criticism on every hand of the attitude of various controllers and the disregard which too often they show of the rights of the people. Too frequently their decisions seemed to be based upon caprice, not upon the needs or exigencies of the moment. The result is that, with the approach of the end of the war, people on every hand are asking what are the plans of the government with regard to the demobilization of the necessary controls and the liquidation of orders and regulations which too often, even during the war period, have been carried into effect and maintained having only as an excuse, war needs and war requirements. As to rubber and gasoline, motor cars and the like, these criticisms have not been levied against those in control. But the people of the country as a whole, I think, would like to have some information with regard to gasoline rationing. I know of no declaration which has been made by the minister in that regard since the beginning of this session. In the United States—and I speak now from recollection—Mr. Secretary Ickes—

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Ralph Davies, deputy oil controller.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: —and Mr. Ickes, as well, made reference to the matter and stated—I am merely epitomizing what he said—that as soon as the active warfare in Europe ended it was the intention of the United States government to increase the gasoline ration which has prevailed throughout the period of the war. I think that before this session ends, having regard to the magnificent advances which are being made on the continent of Europe, and the belief, from General Eisenhower down, that aggressive offensive operations on a large scale there will soon come to an end, we should have a declaration from the minister setting out in some detail the intentions of the government in this regard.

There is another matter, that of the supply of rubber tires. Would the minister, having regard to the production which is taking place to-day through the Polymer corporation, and the number of rubber tires in stock and in storage in Canada, inform us whether, with the conclusion of active hostilities in Europe, there will be any increase in the allotment of rubber tires?

Coming to the question of motor cars, this has been a subject of very great criticism. Cars have been stored in various parts of the country to be awarded on priorities. Of the decision which created that condition of affairs I have no criticism, but I should like to know this. Numbers of men are returning from overseas, among them commercial travellers who require motor cars in order to earn their livelihood and carry out the responsibilities of their occupation. Is it the intention of the government to grant priority in making available motor cars to soldiers serving overseas as soon as they return to take up occupations wherein cars are needed for them to earn their livelihood, when the first motor cars which are ready for distribution are available?

There remains one other matter, and I want to refer at once to all the questions having to do with War Assets corporation. In itself a discussion of War Assets corporation would have resulted in many matters being brought before the minister which ought to have been put before him, but which—again—is not possible because of the shortness of the session. Let me, however, mention one thing particularly. Everywhere in this country to-day civic bodies, in the main towns and villages adjacent to airports which have been closed up, would like to make use of facilities which apparently will not again be required for the purpose for which they were constructed. The fact that the British commonwealth air training scheme is no longer operative on a great scale, and that large numbers of these schools have been closed down, has created a demand on the part of civic authorities for the right to an immediate priority to utilize these buildings. I have in mind—and I mention it only because it is an example—Davidson, Saskatchewan, where the airfield is closed down. The town, or in any event a local service organization, is desirous of getting the use of some of these buildings. In one town it is the desire to use these structures for the purpose of hospitalization; in another, for the training of men coming back from overseas, in order to fit them for an occupation. When you approach the War Assets corporation the answer which is generally given—at least this is my experience—is that as yet no decision has been arrived at as to what will be done in this regard.

Mr. HOWE: I suggest that the answer usually given is that they have not been declared surplus to requirements of the armed forces. Isn't that it?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes. I was just going to point out, according to an answer I have here, that Mr. Carswell says that when this property is ready for disposal the municipality wanting buildings would enjoy a priority claim over a semi-public body in the matter of purchase. Now what I come to is this. Instead of tearing down these buildings which are adjacent to the various towns and villages, or making them available for sale to any municipality having a priority; instead of destroying these buildings by so tearing them down—which probably would be the result, the depreciation thus caused being some sixty-five to seventy per cent—is the government giving consideration to allowing the municipality adjacent to where those buildings are located to use them for public purposes so long as they are not utilized for the purpose of profits? I make the suggestion to the minister because unless a decision is arrived at very shortly these buildings will rapidly depreciate when they are left in a state of disuse. I know that all over the country public bodies are desirous of contributing to public welfare by utilizing facilities that are now available. I bring these matters to the attention of the minister because every one of them requires clarification at this time.

Mr. HOWE: With regard to gasoline, the purpose of oil control is to divide up such gasoline as we can get our hands on as fairly as possible. We keep no pool of gasoline, and we are not accumulating gasoline. The tankers that we own, and those that we can lease, are bringing in all the crude oil we can get, and whenever we can get sufficient gasoline ahead to warrant an increase in the ration it will be increased. I think there is every right to hope that at the end of the European war it will be possible to increase the gasoline ration. When we think of the enormous consumption of gasoline, of bombers in raids over Germany, and in moving huge armies on the continent by motor transport, and visualize this demand dropping down to a small fraction of the present, I think we can be optimistic about additional gasoline being diverted into domestic channels. I saw a statement of Ralph Davies, the deputy oil controller of the United States, and I said at that time that the circumstances which would warrant Mr. Davies' forecast would warrant a similar forecast in Canada. We are not as well equipped to make a forecast as are our friends in the United States, because the United States is self-contained in oil and we are dependent on outside sources. We also depend more heavily on ocean transport for our supplies of crude oil than does the United States; however, I think the prospects for additional gasoline are encouraging. The timing depends upon the termination of the European war.

The supply of tires is purely a matter of fabrication. Through the Polymer corporation, we are able to keep up with the demands for rubber. We are just about in balance on buna-S rubber used for treads, and we have a surplus production of butyl rubber which is used for inner tubes. We are short of fabricating capacity. Every capacity we have to fabricate tires is operating full out. We must first supply the needs of tires for military vehicles, and after that any surplus capacity is put into the production of passenger tires. I think it can reasonably be assumed that the demand for military vehicles and tires for military vehicles will decline with the end of the war in Europe, and there will be more capacity available for manufacturing domestic tires.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What has been the poundage of tires produced for military vehicles and for domestic use by the Polymer corporation during the present year?

Mr. HOWE: The Polymer corporation does not make tires; it simply makes rubber. In April I believe the Polymer corporation ran about twenty per cent over rated capacity, and the rated capacity of the plant is about forty thousand tons of crude rubber per annum. It is operating about twenty per cent over capacity so that if you divided fifty thousand tons by twelve you would get just about the capacity for April. I am sorry I have not the April figures here; they are very interesting, and a source of satisfaction to everyone associated with the problem. Production has been stepping up each month, but I think it is now pretty well stabilized at about twenty per cent over the rated capacity. It is turning out a very excellent product, a product that is improving as the months go by, and as experiment leads us to a modification of the process it gives us better rubber.

So far as motor cars are concerned, we are working on a dwindling pool. The manufacture of motor cars was first cut in 1941 and stopped entirely in 1942. At that time, we had a pool of cars that we believed would carry us through until the manufacture of motor cars could be resumed. But at that time no one contemplated that the war would go on as long as it has. Our pool of motor cars is down to a very slender number.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the number?

Mr. HOWE: It is under one thousand, anyway.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In the whole of Canada?

Mr. HOWE: In the whole of Canada, which, as my hon. friend will appreciate, is just about as thin a prospect as one would expect to take care of very urgent situations such as physicians' cars. They are being allotted to take care of situations of that kind.

Mr. HATFIELD: How many light and heavy trucks are available?

Mr. HOWE: Let us have one question at a time. I am busy answering the questions of the hon. member for Lake Centre at the moment. The manufacture of passenger cars will be resumed after the war, as rapidly as arrangements can be made, but it will take considerable re-tooling to change over from truck tooling to tooling for passenger cars. I am sure the hon. member will appreciate that. After the war ends in Europe, there will be an interval in which there will be no production. What will be done with the first cars from the first production is something we do not need to forecast now; the time is some distance away, but it will be a matter for the new government to look after and decide whether rationing should not be continued in the future, so that when production of passenger cars is resumed they are rationed into channels that will be most helpful to the life of Canada.

The position with respect to trucks is somewhat different. Some months ago we were able to start up two lines making domestic trucks. These lines are operating. The change-over from army trucks to domestic trucks is not nearly as difficult as the change-over to passenger cars. We are rationing the trucks as best we can; I think we are keeping essential transportation moving, as much as we can hope to do under present circumstances. Just as soon as the demand for war transportation eases off we can swing over very quickly to domestic truck production, and I believe the situation in that field can be remedied in a reasonably short time.

Mr. HATFIELD: How many heavy trucks are being produced per month?

Mr. HOWE: Canada does not manufacture heavy domestic trucks. All heavy trucks over three tons are imported. I think I gave the number for March of this year at the last sitting. I think there are about one thousand heavy trucks coming from our allotment from the United States. We keep a small supply in dealers' hands. We must do that to meet situations that are vital to our economy. Generally speaking, the trucks move quickly from the hands of the manufacturer into the hands of the user.

Mr. HATFIELD: Can the minister tell us how many two-ton trucks are being manufactured per month in Canada for domestic use?

Mr. HOWE: It is hard to keep the figures in mind. I believe I gave the figures at the last sitting; if my hon. friend will read Hansard I think he will find them. The production is about forty-five per cent of the number manufactured in the years 1936 to 1939.

In the matter of War Assets corporation, I think hon. gentlemen assume that, when a school is closed, the buildings immediately come into the hands of this corporation. That is not the fact. There is a storage problem involved, of fairly serious proportions. The air force have a great number of planes which they expect to use in due course, and those planes must be housed. Very often, after a school is closed, the buildings are utilized by the air force for storage purposes. When they finally come into the hands of War Assets corporation, the requirements of the province have first priority; the municipality comes second; then semi-public bodies, and finally the general public. It is the policy of War Assets corporation, a policy with which I think on reflection most hon. members will agree, not to give away property that it acquires. However, I have stated that as far as public bodies are concerned, we are prepared to sell buildings for which specific use can be named, at the price we would recover if the buildings were torn down and we attempted to salvage the material, which is a rather nominal price. It is not a matter of worrying about a large recovery; it is a matter of getting the buildings into good hands. The municipalities with which we have dealt to date have been quite satisfied with the terms we have offered them.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What would be a fair percentage of the actual cost you would recover by having the buildings torn down?

Mr. HOWE: It would be a very small percentage, perhaps a few hundred dollars. That is all you could get for the building as scrap, and that is the price at which we turn it over. There is nothing in the price situation to stand between either a province or a municipality acquiring any buildings it needs for local services. The buildings will be sold rather than leased, for the very good reason stated by my hon. friend, that the matter of maintenance is important. The government does not wish to have dilapidated buildings put back on its hands. If a community needs a building, we ask that it be bought. We would prefer them to move it to another site owned by the province or municipality, away from the airport, because generally speaking the airports will be used in post-war aviation.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Does the priority the minister mentioned for the province and the municipality apply also to personal property at the airports, equipment and the like?

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. HOWE: Our experience so far is that before declaring buildings surplus the air force removes the equipment and uses it in other activities. They are building and extending hospitals, for instance, and usually the hospital equipment is suitable for installation in other buildings. Should there be any surplus equipment in which the province or municipality is interested, the same priority would apply.

While I am on my feet, in his opening remarks my hon. friend reminded me that yesterday I had an argument with the hon. member for Waterloo South, and perhaps I might give the facts of the transaction. I have a memorandum from Mr. W. D. Low, one of our senior officers, in regard to "Cushion Pack 36 Inches" which is the description of the store:

As requested, I have investigated the purchase of the above noted packing in connection with which Mr. Karl Homuth, M.P., made some charges in the House of Commons yesterday.

The facts are as follows:

On June 23, 1944, the Department of Munitions and Supply awarded an order to Forest Products (Canada) Corporation, 264 Hospital street, Montreal, for a quantity of "cushion pack 36 inches" at $340 per ton, sales tax included, for delivery to the Department of National Defence (Army), Longue Pointe Ordnance Depot, Montreal. This material is used for the packing of delicate instruments for shipment overseas.

The statement has been made that Forest Products (Canada) Corporation is purchasing this material from another company at a price of nine cents a pound. Mr. Joseph Finestone, owner of Forest Products, emphatically denies that he obtains the material from Standard Felt Products Limited, Montreal, which is evidently the company to which Mr. Homuth referred.

After this order was awarded, investigations were carried out by the Department of National Defence (Army) and the signals production branch, Department of Munitions and Supply, to determine whether a suitable product was obtainable elsewhere. The Standard Felt Products Limited submitted samples for test and the material was found to be entirely unsuitable. The tests were conducted by the standardization division, signals production branch, Department of Munitions and Supply, and by Major R. H. Hall of the inspection board of the United Kingdom and Canada. In spite of the attractive price at which the material was offered, it was not suitable because of inflammability, lack of resiliency and for reasons of water absorption.

Investigations are still being carried on in order to obtain additional sources of supply of material equal to that supplied by Forest Products (Canada) Corporation.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am thoroughly in accord with the representations of the hon. member for Lake Centre in regard to unused buildings at our airfields. This very field of which the hon. member was speaking this afternoon was brought to my attention some time ago, and I may say I have had the most courteous treatment over the last few months by War Assets corporation and the air force in my endeavour to secure buildings for the town of Outlook in my constituency, where the public school and some other buildings were burned down last November, I believe largely as a result of the work of a firebug. My understanding with regard to Davidson is that the buildings have not yet been declared surplus, but that when they are, they will be made available to some of the municipalities.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Did you get any buildings yet?

Mr. COLDWELL: No. I believe the council and the school board recently went back to look at the airport buildings at Davidson, and at another airport, to see if they could get some of them, but as the hon. member has said it is a long process. While I am on this particular topic I have in mind that there is much other equipment, in the way of kitchen utensils, beds, hospital supplies and so on, that could be used in a good many of our small hospitals and even in our schools for cafeteria purposes, and so on. Instead of this equipment being turned over to some private organization for resale, I think public bodies who are interested should be appraised of the possibility of getting such equipment and encouraged to obtain it, because it would be of great use in many communities, in hospitals, schools and elsewhere. I hope this point will be given some attention by War Assets corporation. I do not think it is proper to turn any material or equipment over to business organizations, who will sell it again and make some profit out of it. We have paid for it; the nation owns it, and it should be made available for socially useful purposes. I hope a policy of that kind will be worked out.

May I just comment, too, on what the hon. member for Lake Centre said with regard to the agreement which was reached among the leaders of the trade unions in the United States and the chairman of the chamber of commerce. I am not going into that matter very fully this afternoon except to say that for a long time I have thought the United States might still become a sort of capitalist island in a world moving in an entirely different direction. If we have studied the history of modern social evolution we find that nearly all nations have gone through certain evolutionary processes. And this very statement illustrates that, I think, to a degree, because my recollection goes back to the early 1900's, when you found groups of miners, and so on, agreeing with certain organizations in Great Britain to do very much the same kind of thing as is now suggested by these people in the United States of America.

But what I was going to add was this, that the evolution of society goes on. It matters not how much an attempt may be made to hold back the progress of the world in any one community, ultimately what happens throughout the world will influence every part of the world. At the moment we find Great Britain, we find European countries, through statements by de Gaulle and other leaders over there, we find our sister nations of the British commonwealth moving, because of economic development, in the direction of greater public ownership and greater social control. It seems to me that in the United States at least, if I may put it in this way, they have not the political outlets for the common people's opinions and aspirations that we have built up—whether we are right or wrong—in countries like Canada, the other British nations, and in European countries.

The rigidity of the United States system is of such a nature that we may find in the course of the next ten, fifteen or twenty years a serious development, because of the brittle nature of the political machinery there. But I am not going into that this afternoon, because one has to develop the whole argument in order to place one's point of view comprehensively either before the house or before a public gathering. But I am convinced of this, that they may try once again, as they did in the thirties, as we did in this country when we pinned our faith to so-called private enterprise—which in modern times is monopoly enterprise; and we shall find that we have very much the same results in a few years' time as we had in the hungry thirties. If we dare risk that, or if they dare risk that in the United States—and apparently they are going to do it—then, whatever the consequences may be, when they have fifteen or twenty million men and women unemployed, perhaps with a depressed price level and no well-organized political instrument—well, let us hope that Canada may escape the consequences which will accrue within such an economic situation at that time.

I, too, was very much interested in the white paper, and that is the only reason I wanted to offer a word this afternoon. I believe that white paper, as was said by the hon. member for Lake Centre, from the point of view of those who wrote it is a very fine piece of work. I do not agree with that point of view. I believe it is written from the wrong point of view at the present time. But while I say that, I recognize it as a document worth studying, and I say we should have had it before us long ago. We should have had a longer session, and we should have gone into this white paper very thoroughly and fully in order that we may know what we are talking about.

I say that because, inevitably, it is an election document. It is going to be an election document, and it will be discussed. Those of us in the party to which I belong in this chamber are in the position that we are the only party which takes a view opposite to that expressed in the white paper. We do not believe in private enterprise in the sense in which my hon. friends use the term. I believe in private enterprise—but in another sense, a sense that is wider, probably, for many hundreds of thousands of young men and women in this country were, at least from 1930 to 1940, denied any chance of real private enterprise in the economic field. Their only initiative could be exercised in searching for the work they could not find from one end of the country to the other.

I was going to say this, that even this white paper, and even the speech of Mr. Winston Churchill, quoted by the hon. member, recognize that private enterprise, as it is defended in this country, has passed away. Thus this paper admits, as Winston Churchill says, that certain controls will have to be maintained. Let me add this, that you can have controls from two points of view. You can have a control which will help the people, and you can have a control which will help the corporations. Where you have a partnership between government and big business, there you have not democracy but you have fascism, if I may use the term now applied to that form of economic development and control.

But the white paper and Winston Churchill both admit that in the post-war period there must be a considerable control, at least for a considerable time. At page 20 the white paper says this:

In addition, the maintenance of certain controls will aid in meeting the more urgent requirements of reconstruction, including the first steps in industrial reconversion, the provision of more housing, and the development of export markets of a peace-time character.

That is a recognition that the controls, which we now have, and which have assisted during war, must be carried into the peace-time period—something which a few months ago was an anathema to the great corporations of this country.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Then the white paper says something which I hope our United States friends who believe in free enterprise will remember. We find this at page 6:

For its part, the government is prepared, as rapidly as circumstances permit, to facilitate, through its war-time controls and otherwise, the reestablishment of peace-time markets—

Then the sentence ends: "for Canadian exports".

May I just say this, that when we talk about improving our employment situation, when we talk about being able to make free enterprise work in this country, or in the United States, we must remember that it is not only exports in which we have to become interested. We have to become interested in imports, too.

As has often been said, and as I heard the appropriate United Kingdom minister, the president of the board of trade, say last September at the time of a conference I attended, after this war Great Britain will have to export from fifty to sixty per cent more than she exported before the war, in order to get the raw materials and foods she requires. This white paper says that we have to export in monetary terms, or in terms of goods and services, fifty or sixty, as the case may be, higher percentage than we exported before the war.

In other words we are all thinking of exports. And, in the world in which we are going to live, we cannot export unless we import; that is, unless we are prepared to continue indefinitely some forms of mutual aid. As I heard it stated last night by a commentator over the radio, I believe the whole policy in this white paper is a gamble, a real gamble on the ability of private enterprise to meet the needs of the Canadian people.

We do not believe that private enterprise, in the manner in which we speak about it in this house, can possibly do the job that is to be done. I say the government has no right to engage in a gamble with the living standards of the Canadian people, and with their employment—unless, of course, it is prepared at the same time to assume the obligation for the maintenance of either full employment or the kind of a standard of living the people would get if they were to be in full employment.

This white paper states clearly—and I might have some question about this figure, because I believe it to be low, although I am going to accept it now—that if 900,000 new jobs do not materialize the government will then resort to public enterprise and industrial controls in the same manner as it has during the war. Waiting for the event to determine what we shall do is a policy that is entirely wrong and likely to bring ill effects upon the whole Canadian economy and upon the common people of this country. The white paper is an expression of hope; it is an expression of intention, but it definitely is not any kind of blueprint for the sort of post-war economy of full employment and wide distribution of goods which the people of this country have a right to expect.

I contend that the white paper fails to take into account the necessity of maintaining imports in order to improve the standards of living. It relies upon the encouragement of exports, first by the continuance of mutual aid. That is good. We have to give aid to the suffering people of Europe and of the world, but we have to give nutrition and aid to the suffering people of our own country too. After that has been done there is a proposal for the extension of credits. Credit implies that some day it will be retired. I venture to say that the only way whereby that credit can be retired, unless we are prepared to write it off and call it mutual aid, is by importing goods or acquiring services from the countries to which we export.

There is a reference in this white paper I was surprised to see. There is an approval of the Bretton Woods agreement. I understood that parliament would have an opportunity to make an exhaustive study of the Bretton Woods agreement before any sort of endorsement was given. Since this white paper has been laid on the table, although it is a document of a government whose life expires in a day or two, it will be looked upon by a good many people in this country as an endorsement by the government, perhaps even by this parliament, of the Bretton Woods agreement.

I have read a great deal on the Bretton Woods agreement and I find that the opponents of that agreement are of two entirely opposite types or groups. You find the international bankers in New York are all for the international bank but are opposed to the stabilization fund. You find that the progressive groups in Great Britain, the Labour party and so on, are opposed to many ideas behind the establishment of the international bank but look with favour upon the stabilization fund. This country has had no opportunity to study this agreement, and neither the government nor this parliament nor this country should be committed to that agreement until we have really had an opportunity of studying it and making up our minds about it.

In my opinion there are certain weaknesses in this agreement. The principal one which I should like to place upon record is the separation of the financial problem from the economic and social aspects of the whole world problem. I think that is fallacious. Finance cannot be separated from production and distribution. When we attempt to consider finance apart from production and distribution we get into the clouds and begin to believe, as some people do believe, that money is all that matters. Money does not matter at all. Anything can be money. The main things are the goods and services that support money values.

In my opinion international agreements of this type cannot be efficient or effective so long as there are economic rivalries between nations. You must tackle these economic rivalries first and then you may be able to settle your financial problems. The Bretton Woods agreement attempts to do something with regard to finance but omits altogether the more important features, the economic rivalries and the economic problems of the distribution of raw materials and living standards.

No financial agreement can be successful unless a solution is found for the distribution of the real wealth of the world across the world, and for raising the standards of living everywhere in the world. This world cannot remain at peace; this world cannot remain free as we call it free if one-half of the world is underfed, underclothed, underhoused and, indeed, underprivileged in any respect.

So I say that the real task which we ought to be considering in this house before we give any endorsement to an agreement of this type is the economic problem of production and distribution. That problem should precede and, indeed, exceed the financial arrangements that may be made in almost any field or in any respect. The Bretton Woods agreement is too limited in scope. It fails to provide also for representation in the actual councils of the people who are primarily concerned; that is, the actual producers and consumers of wealth.

Apart from this the technical arrangements of the Bretton Woods agreement seem to me to be full of imperfections. The international bank seems to be imperfect in several respects. I should like to give the committee what in my opinion is the most imperfect part of the proposed international banking system. It proposes, once again, not altogether but to a very large extent, to tie the world down to a single and scarce commodity as a standard; that is, gold. I think we should go into that very carefully before we adopt such a proposal. We should remember what happened in the 1930's and the three or four years that preceded 1930 when Great Britain and this country went back to the gold standard.

This Bretton Woods agreement gives tremendous power to two or three of the large states, to one state in particular which controls the bulk of the gold in the world. Conversely, it places the devastated areas and the more impoverished areas in an inferior and difficult, if perhaps not a hopeless position.

What I have said in these few brief words regarding this agreement does not imply for one moment that I think the Bretton Woods agreement has no merit as a basis of discussion. I think it has. I believe it contains a good many features which could form a basis of discussion, but since approval of the agreement is given on page 7 of the white paper I wanted to place myself on record before this house rises. The government may know more about it than the rest of us, but certainly it should not be implied in any way that this house endorses the white paper's endorsement in that respect.

As I said at the outset with regard to the main proposals in this white paper, it seems to me that the government is wagering that private enterprise will be able to meet the demands of the post-war period. In my opinion the issue is far too grave to be the subject of what in effect is a huge bet. I do not believe that the white paper offers a winning policy at least for the Canadian people, whatever it may do for some powerful interests in Canada.

There are a number of other matters which I intended to discuss this afternoon but I shall refrain from doing so. There is no time to go into the multitude of things that one would like to discuss, and I shall leave them for the present. We shall have an opportunity not only on the hustings but when the new House of Commons meets—at least I hope that some of us will be here; I hope I shall be here myself, to be perfectly frank about it—to discuss these matters when the new parliament is assembled. But as we leave these problems to-day, now that we are approaching the time that we are to give approval to the appropriation bill, I must repeat what I said earlier this afternoon, that it is regrettable that the house should be placed in the position in which it finds itself of not having time to discuss matters which ought to have been discussed. The house should have been called earlier so that we were not rushed in this manner at the end. But that is the responsibility of the government, and the government must assume that responsibility.

And so, Mr. Chairman, I am going to leave these other problems that I should have liked to discuss had there been time, until a future occasion when I hope and believe that I shall have an opportunity of discussing them here.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Mr. Chairman, the sands of this session and of this parliament are running very low. Indeed, the leader of our party has given the undertaking that we shall not, unless some new matters are introduced, take up any more time after six o'clock, which is only fifteen minutes away.

The Department of Munitions and Supply and the Department of Reconstruction are two departments in which the people of my part of Canada are greatly interested. I believe, with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggan and many others who have spoken in this discussion, that we should have been given a much longer time to deal with these departments and many other matters that should come before this parliament.

Before making observations with respect to the Department of Munitions and Supply, I should like to pay my tribute to my fellow-townsmen, the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Ralston) whose intention, I understand, is to retire from public life. I do so from the point of view of his friends and admirers in his home town and county, Cumberland. Colonel Ralston has had a notable career in his profession, in the provincial legislature and in the federal parliament. He had an outstanding record in the last war, and he has never spared himself in this war. He was at the head of the Department of National Defence during the critical years when problems of administration and enlistments were being dealt with, and he never spared himself day or night. To-day he must feel like applying to himself the words of Cardinal Wolsey in Henry the VIII:

Had I but served my God with half the zeal
I served my king, he would not in mine age
Have left me naked to mine enemies.

Colonel Ralston might well feel that he has been left naked. But he has the admiration and the love, I believe, of everybody in the armed services who faces the enemy. He can be assured that when he goes back to his native county of Cumberland and his native province he will have the respect and esteem of his fellow townsmen and his fellow Nova Scotians.

The matters which are before the committee and which have been referred to by the Minister of Munitions and Supply are matters that require the serious consideration of all the members of the house. He reported that his department had spent $13,900,000,000 during the war, and that last year his department had expended $2,206,000,000. He also placed before the committee the expenditures for the current year, and only yesterday he placed before the house a "white paper" dealing with the postwar period. These are important matters, involving long term policies and enormous expenditures, affecting the welfare of our people for long years. But we have only a few hours in which to give them consideration.

The people in the town of Amherst are largely dependent upon industry. They have enlisted in as large a percentage for any theatre as have the people of any section of Canada. They have not been able to get all the work they would like to have had. They feel that they would have got more if there had been a fairer distribution of the war work to eastern Canada. But there has been little complaint. They have accepted the situation as it existed. They have sent delegations to Ottawa, representatives of labour and other citizens, to interview the Minister of Munitions and Supply and members of the government as well as the heads of industry in Montreal. The reception they received was different from the reception which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre described a delegation from his constituency as receiving. The committees were received by the minister, who explained the situation to them as it existed. It may not have been as favourable as they would have liked it to be, but they accepted it. There has been a curtailment of work in the Canadian Car and Foundry company's plant at Amherst from about three thousand to about twelve hundred workers at the present time, with prospects of a further curtailment. Quite a number of the employees have had to leave their home community and go to central Canada, to seek work. There will be some heart-burnings in the east when they read the statement which the minister made in presenting his estimates:

The latest figures at hand show a total of 675,000 men and women employed on the manufacture of war equipment as of January 1, 1945.

That is engaged on production under his department. He goes on:

There has been a substantial decrease since January 1, 1944, but, despite this, there is every indication that our greatest labour shortage will occur in the next six months.

We have to face a situation that is different from that portrayed by the minister the other day. The committees that interviewed the minister returned home and they carried out the minister's request. They explained the situation to their associates, the people of the town, and they set up what they call a "procurement committee" to work out plans for the remainder of the war years and to make preparations for the post-war years. They enlisted the wholehearted support of their members, the heads of the company, the mayor and town council, service organizations, patriotic and benevolent organizations, in order that there might be a definite and clear understanding of what they might expect during the war and in the post-war years. Only yesterday I had a telegram from Chignecto lodge No. 11, Knights of Pythias, stating that the lodge "joins with and supports all other organization in Amherst in connection with the brief submitted by the Amherst works procurement committee"—which was first instituted by the representatives of the labour organizations.

The town of Amherst has made over the years, what is perhaps the biggest sacrifice of any industrial community in Canada. They saw their industries submerged, absorbed by other industries, driven out of business, during the last forty or fifty years. They now want to know, and it is proper that they should know, what is to be expected in the post-war years. There is in the town of Amherst a rolling mill which is, since the closing of the plant at Trenton, the only rolling mill in Nova Scotia. The question arises whether that mill will be modernized. Although an expenditure of $1,000,000 or more is involved, the company is prepared to proceed, provided that there is reasonable encouragement and assistance from the federal and provincial governments and if they can get power at a competitive rate. The company which generates electric power has given them to understand that if there is a firm contract they will supply power on a competitive basis, provided that they are not taxed as private enterprise is taxed in comparison with tax-free publicly generated electrical energy. As I have said in this chamber before, the people of Cumberland are taxed in an amount of $150,000, which communities elsewhere in Canada are able to avoid, because their electric current is generated—provincially.

There is also the question of the wheel foundry and other industries which operate at a disadvantage. There should be special post-war industries. It is unfortunate that the opportunity was not taken of establishing them during the war, with prospects of post-war continuation. In order to keep operating rolling mills and wheel foundries it is necessary that special consideration be given to transportation costs, both of raw materials and of the finished products.

Nova Scotia and the town of Amherst made great contributions to Canada at the time of confederation and since. Amherst is the birth-place of four of the fathers of confederation. One of these, Sir Charles Tupper, was one of the fathers of the national policy, a policy under which industrial Canada developed. If this policy had not been put into effect in this country, it would not have been possible for the minister to have brought before this house the record of industrial accomplishments which he has been able to report. So that a tribute of gratitude is due from this parliament to the memory of Sir Charles Tupper and those associated with him, to the people of Nova Scotia, and to the citizens of Amherst, who built up their industries in confederation and have seen them fade away from causes over which they have no control. I say to the minister and to the members of this committee, if there is to be fairness, justice and contentment in this country, if we are to have a united Canada with equality of opportunity, something must be done to distribute, with some approach to equality, manufacturing and industrial opportunities. I am sorry we have not more time to discuss this matter, but it is my duty to put our position before the committee.

One other subject to which I wish to refer is a complaint which I have received from a labour organization in Amherst. That organization has given the minister and the company where its members are employed the very best service and cooperation, equal to any in Canada. The minister arranged for certain wartime housing in Amherst, for which our labourmen and citizens are grateful. In that wartime housing was included a staff house which is being closed. The executive of the labour organization in question, lodge No. 771, International Association of Machinists, wrote me through their secretary, Mr. R. C. Pettis, under date of March 28, enclosing copy of a letter from Wartime Housing Limited, signed by W. H. Nugent, manager administration department, dated March 26, addressed to the lodge, which reads in part as follows:

Attention: Mr. R. C. Pettis

Re: Closing of Amherst Staff House

Dear Sir:

We beg to acknowledge receipt of your night letter of March 23, relative to the closing of our men's staff house at Amherst.

We would point out that our tenants have every opportunity of registering their objections, if any, through their respective employers, or direct to this company. Any intermediary is unnecessary.

I will not read the rest of the letter.

I have a complaint from the executive of lodge No. 771, from whose letter of March 28 I will read one or two paragraphs only:

Enclosed you will find a copy of letter received from Mr. W. H. Nugent re staff house closing, which is self-explanatory.

[Mr. P. C. Black.]

We draw your attention particularly to the second paragraph, which questions the right of lodge 771 in taking up this matter for the workers.

We feel that a man in Mr. Nugent's position should be given to understand that labour organizations represent "workers" and have every right to intercede for their membership in any matters of this nature that affect their welfare.

I ask you, Mr. Chairman, how can this government expect cooperation from labour organizations when they are given rebuffs such as they received in this case? I brought this matter to the attention of Mr. John A. Marsh, special assistant to the minister; and he expressed regret that it had occurred and suggested that it would not occur again.

There is much more I could say, but it is six o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Having in mind what was said earlier in the afternoon—I do not wish to cut off any discussion—I should like to ask if it might not now be understood or agreed that the resolution be passed at this stage and have further discussion on the bills when they are introduced? This will not prevent any further discussion, but it might make possible our proceeding a little more rapidly toward a satisfactory wind-up.

Mr. CHURCH: The Minister of Veterans' Affairs was to make a statement in reference to the progress at Sunnybrook hospital.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I shall be very glad to do so either now or on the committee stage of the bill, whichever my hon. friend prefers.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Let us get it clear so that we may know exactly where we stand. If we allow the passing of the resolution the discussion will continue after eight o'clock. Anything an hon. member desires to say will be in order and he will be allowed to say it without interference whatsoever from anyone.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will it be possible to ask questions at that time?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When the bills are in committee.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilesley thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 3, for granting to His Majesty aid for national defence and security.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. ILSLEY moved the second reading of the bill.

Mr. GRAYDON: I take it that this is the time we rise?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let us get it into committee.

Mr. DORION: I understand there is a motion for second reading of the bill. Before the motion is carried I have a few remarks to make, and I would ask you, sir, to call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. FREDERIC DORION (Charlevoix-Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, as I said at six o'clock, I have just a few words to say on this motion for second reading of the bill, and at the end of my remarks I shall move an amendment.

According to the latest declarations made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott), on the eve of a general election the government is endeavouring to convince the people that there will not be compulsory service in the war against Japan. The hon. member for Westmount went on to say that after the war in Europe was over the mobilization act would be repealed. Such promises are not altogether new to the people of the province of Quebec. During the course of the last twenty-five years we have been told the same thing at every federal election, as well as at provincial and even municipal elections. We were called upon to give our support and confidence to the Liberal party. We were assured that by so doing we would be saved from going into any future war. Unfortunately for the Liberal party, however, when world war No. 2 was declared it was a Liberal government that was ruling Canada. Then all previous engagements taken and promises made to the province of Quebec suddenly vanished. They had gone with the wind. Now that we are about to venture upon another political campaign the Liberal party thinks the same old hackneyed story still stands. I am sure, and the by-elections held during these last few years have abundantly shown, that the Liberal party has lost the confidence of the old Liberal province of Quebec. The motto of Quebec is "Je me souviens" or "I remember." Hence, on the next polling day, before casting their votes citizens of Quebec will remember and tell themselves:

I remember 1917 when you told me, you Liberal members, that I must condemn those who, even if they have not made any promises, had declared war against Germany; those who imposed conscription; those who had chased my sons whether they were farmers or sons of farmers.

I remember 1921, when you Liberal members asked me to vote confidence in you because my sons had been gaoled by the Union government for failing to report to the military authorities during the war. You told me that, even if my sons were defaulters, they should not have been prosecuted.

I remember 1925 and 1926, when you came back to my province and told me that I should not forget the hardships of 1917 and 1918, as imposed by the Union government. I remember the cartoons which appeared at the time in le Soleil, the official Liberal newspaper in Quebec, showing the leader of the Union government with blood-stained hands offering Canada to the imperialists.

I remember 1930, when you came back to my province and advised me that if I voted for the Conservative party my sons would be dispatched at once to European battlefields. I remember the day preceding the 1930 election, when you published in le Soleil and la Presse a false telegram entitled "London, the Tories and the War," reading as follows:

In Great Britain it is hoped that the Conservatives shall triumph in Canada, so that war may be waged in Egypt and India.

I remember 1935, when you told me that Hitler was becoming dangerous in Europe and that I should vote for the Liberal party in order to prevent Canada from becoming engaged in a second world war.

I remember 1938, when the late minister of justice stated in Quebec city, as reported at the time in le Soleil:

Instead of going to war in foreign lands, we shall stay home to defend the Canada we love.

I remember 1939, when in the course of a provincial election you told me that even if you had declared war, nevertheless you stood as a bulwark against conscription and against every form of compulsion.

I remember 1940, when you told me that if the Liberal party was returned to power we should have a moderate, voluntary and free war effort.

Remembering all these things, how can I have any confidence in this party after what has been going on during these last five years? War was declared by the Liberal government. Mobilization of all the national resources was imposed by the Liberal government. Total conscription for service anywhere was forced upon us by the Liberal government, notwithstanding prior engagements taken or promises made. Our sons are conscripted and fighting on European battlefields, and now you have the courage to tell me that if any other party were to gain power, things would be worse. My answer is: they cannot be worse. Furthermore, if I have been misled by the Conservatives, I have been equally misled by the Liberals; and, having no confidence in the C.C.F. party, there is only one choice left. I must have representatives in the House of Commons who will not be tied up by party machinery or political partisanship, who will really represent my interests rather than be the tools of a political party.

In view of what I have just said and in order to give a chance to the Liberal government, particularly the Prime Minister and the hon. member for Westmount, to be believed by the population of the province of Quebec, I ask them to take, before the next election, a definite stand by voting for the following amendment. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), that all the words after the word "that" in the present motion be deleted and substituted by the following words:

this house is of the opinion that no money should be spent for the enforcement of the National Resources Mobilization Act, as well as order in council 8891, and that the above act chapter 13, IV, Geo. VI. and also the above order in council be repealed at once.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I have just a word to add to what has been said. This motion is clear; it speaks for itself. It is not at all in opposition to the bill. It simply gives a direction to the government, which is a committee of the house, in regard to the spending of money; and that direction comes from parliament. The meaning of this amendment is that no money shall be spent for conscription after the statements made by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence, and by other leading members of the government. I support this amendment on account of the statement made by the Prime Minister on the first day of March over the radio, when he used this one sentence at the end of the second paragraph:

The reinforcement pools overseas are more than amply filled to meet the needs anticipated by the field commanders.

This is the statement of the Prime Minister, and I am sure he does not speak through his high hat, as some of his colleagues do. He must be well informed, well acquainted with the war situation, and he could not make such a statement without being sure of his facts.

Taking it for granted that the Prime Minister informed himself before making that statement, and taking it for granted that the Prime Minister's statement is correct, I can do nothing but support the amendment of the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion). That is the only reason. I base my support upon the Prime Minister's statement, and I do not want anyone to say that we are opposed to the war effort. We are not opposed to the bill, but we members of parliament think members of the government need a secondary direction from parliament.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does anyone wish to speak on the amendment? I am of the opinion that the amendment is in order. Therefore the question is that bill No. 3, for granting to His Majesty aid for national defence and security, be read a second time, to which the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay has moved that—

All the words after the word "that" in the present motion be deleted and substituted by the following words: "this house is of the opinion that no money should be spent for the enforcement of the National Resources Mobilization Act, as well as order in council 8891, and that the above act, chapter 13, IV, Geo. VI, and also the above order in council be repealed at once.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE: (Minister of Veterans' Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether I am in order, but I wish to point out that if this amendment carries it means that the whole war effort of Canada is retarded and impaired. Under the circumstances it is a most serious amendment to contemplate.

I understand Your Honour has ruled it to be in order, but with all respect and deference to Your Honour's ruling, I have some doubts that it is in order. However, in view of your ruling, I have nothing further to say.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am willing to hear your argument regarding it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I humbly submit to Your Honour that the amendment to the motion, one which is for the voting of supply to carry on the war effort of Canada, where the amendment has reference to the National Resources Mobilization Act, or any other activity, and where it imposes a limitation upon the message received from His Excellency the Governor General by this house, is not in order. It would be limiting and impairing, and making really impossible the purpose of parliament, which is, I think, more or less unanimous in prosecuting the war to its conclusion.

On these grounds, grounds of high public policy, I humbly suggest to Your Honour that this amendment is not in order; and if it is out of order I would, of course, ask that it be ruled so. If it is in order may I again point out the seriousness of it to the house.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, not as to the point of order, but as to the effect of the amendment's carrying, may I point out that it does not mean that the amount voted by the house is somewhat reduced, as might be thought by a hasty reading of the amendment. It means that no money at all is voted by the house, and that we are left without the war's being financed at all. It is not a case of the war effort being impaired; it is a case of the war effort being completely frustrated and sabotaged.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I agree entirely with what my colleague the Minister of Finance has said. There is no specific amount mentioned in the amendment which would be a reduction of the vote. I suggest, therefore, that the whole thing is completely out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have listened with care to what has been said regarding the amendment before the house. When I looked at the amendment I came to the conclusion that it was in order. There was one doubt in my mind with regard to the last part of it, namely "and also the above order in council be repealed at once". I had some doubt in my mind regarding that; but the Clerk has now shown me an amendment moved on May 23, 1918, where—

Sir Wilfrid Laurier moved, in amendment thereto, seconded by Mr. Mackenzie, that all the words in the motion after "that" be left out, and the following substituted therefor: "In the opinion of this house the War-time Elections Act should be repealed".

The amendment was declared in order and a recorded vote was taken.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): With all due respect to Your Honour, it was entirely different.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no difference in the question now before us, because at the end the amendment says, "and also the above order in council be repealed at once".

So far as the merits of the amendment are concerned, it will be understood of course that the Chair cannot give any direction to the house. Hon. members know the effect of the amendment, without its being pointed out by the Chair. I can rule only as to whether the amendment is in order. I have so ruled. The question now before the house is that bill No. 3, for granting to His Majesty aid for national defence and security, be read a second time, to which the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay, seconded by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) has moved:

That all the words after the word "that" in the present motion be deleted and substituted by the following words: "this house is of the opinion that no money should be spent for the enforcement of the National Resources Mobilization Act, as well as the order in council 8891, and that the above act, chapter 13, IV, Geo. VI, and also the above order in council be repealed at once.

Perhaps I should have said, when some exception was taken by the Minister of Veterans' Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) to the effect that it would mean that no money was being granted, that there is in my judgment relevancy in reducing the resolution therein contained as sanctioned and authorized by the governor general. But if it had been to increase, it would have been different.

However, the amendment is that the house is "of the opinion that no money should be spent". The question is on the amendment.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Dorion) which was negated on the following division:

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is on the main motion. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. ROY: On division.

Main motion agreed to, on division, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Sections 1 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Chairman, I have not a copy of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN: It is exactly the same as the resolution. There is no change.

Mr. HOMUTH: But this is not the resolution, Mr. Chairman; this is the bill and it has not been distributed. My hon. friend has just received a copy now.

The CHAIRMAN: The bill is exactly the same as the resolution.

Mr. POWER: I do object, Mr. Chairman. I have sat in this house for a long time and I have some respect for the usages and privileges of parliament. This is the last evening, almost the last minute of a parliament and I object to our railroading this bill through when the members have not had a chance to look at it. That has not been the custom in the past and I hope that it will not be in the future.

[Mr. Speaker.]

The CHAIRMAN: The bill is the same as the resolution.

Mr. POWER: That has nothing to do with it, Mr. Chairman. This committee is required to pass on a certain bill and, with all deference, this committee should have the bill read section by section. I certainly would not consent to the passage of this bill as it is being attempted to be passed now.

Mr. GILLIS: I have no desire to pursue the discussion, but there were some questions on which I wish to have an answer from the Minister of Munitions and Supply before this bill is passed. I should like the minister to make a statement as to P.C. 1952, passed March 22, regarding steel subsidies. The minister also made a statement in Halifax recently regarding the strait of Canso causeway. Perhaps he would elaborate on these two matters.

Mr. HOWE: Regarding the subsidy agreement with Dosco, the previous agreement had to do with residual deficits. In other words, the company was to operate as efficiently as possible and the government would see that the company would not incur a loss on the year's operation. That was found to be unsatisfactory and a new subsidy form was drawn up based on incentive. That is to say, the company must operate better than it has in the past in order to break even, and if it can operate still better, they have a chance to make a profit. The plate mill has been engaged in rolling steel plates for government orders. The operation of that mill is dependent on the ship building programme, which in turn is dependent on export orders. Rolling plate is not a normal operation in the Sydney production. Therefore it was thought that it is not fair to make the tonnage depend upon an output which included plate; therefore the proviso that if the plate mill was operating on government orders, the subsidy would be one figure, and if it was not operating on government orders, the subsidy would be a higher figure. We were not putting a premium on not operating the plate mill, but simply recognizing the fact that the only plate ever rolled there was plate rolled for government orders, and we did not want to undertake that the mill will run to capacity with government orders.

Mr. GILLIS: I understand that there is no intention of continuing the operation of that mill.

Mr. HOWE: I would not say that.

Mr. GILLIS: Without government orders it does not operate; it does not fit into the private enterprise picture.

Mr. HOWE: The government should not order plate simply to order plate. We will order if we have a use for it. Otherwise the government can scarcely order plate from any mill.

Mr. GILLIS: That puts the mill out.

Mr. HOWE: If it does, it does.

As to the strait of Canso a preliminary report was obtained on the causeway, and it seemed to me that the economics justified further exploration. In fact I thought that the preliminary report was quite promising as to the economics of either a bridge or a causeway over the strait of Canso. The result is that a survey party is now in the field, and designs will be prepared so that a more accurate study can be made than has been made, with a view of including it in the post-war programme.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Under the preparations in the Department of Munitions and Supply there is, I understand, a scheme whereby the government enters into a certain oil field area and does some research work in drilling and finding out whether oil is obtainable. In some cases they themselves sink wells, and, I understand, if a well is found to be productive the government takes out sufficient oil to pay for the cost of the operation and hands the thing over. In the Kamsack area of Saskatchewan they have drilled some shallow wells and have obtained sufficient natural gas to heat the town; and there is every evidence of oil being available deeper down. The people of that area would like to know what the possibilities are that the government will investigate that field and take some action by way of drilling to see whether or not oil is there; and they would like to know what steps they should take if that plan is to be continued this year under these estimates.

Mr. HOWE: It was not a plan of general application. The situation was that in the Turner valley are certain marginal areas known to contain oil but of doubtful value as commercial propositions. In other words, it was a risky operation from a business viewpoint to get that oil. However, to the government, the obtaining of that additional oil was important; it was oil which we knew we had; we were subsidizing the importation of oil; and therefore the government itself undertook to drill out that particular area, which was, I believe, on the west flank of the Turner valley. The operation was confined to that district. The results were much as we expected. It would look as though the sales would just about reimburse the government for its investment. It was never the intention of the government to make that a rule of general application; the action was simply confined to that one area and one operation. We have no policy which calls for the government wild-catting in other areas.

Mr. FAIR: About twenty-six years ago we finished a war, we believed successfully, and in the very near future we hope to conclude successfully another war. During past sessions of this parliament quite a lot of legislation has been placed on the statute books for the rehabilitation of men and women who come back from this war, but we have at the present time a number who returned from the first great war who are not in very happy circumstances. I refer to the soldier settlers. On various occasions recently we have asked that clear titles to their land be issued to these old soldier settlers. To-night we have in the house three ministers from whom I should like to have a statement in connection with the matter. We have the Minister of Veterans' Affairs, who, I believe, is sympathetic to these men, and under whose administration they are now being placed. We have also the Minister of Mines and Resources, under whose department the soldier settlement board has been fixed for a number of years, although neither I nor anyone else can tell why. The minister, I believe, is opposed to the granting of clear titles. He is also a member of the treasury board. Then we have in the house the Minister of Finance, another member of the treasury board and one who has pretty close control of the national purse-strings. Not very many days ago I suggested that between seven and eight million dollars, which is no more than the cost of one half day of this war, be set aside to provide these old soldier settlers with clear titles, but the proposal was rejected. To-night, in the dying days of this parliament, and before many of our new veterans are settled on land, I should like to have the three ministers I have mentioned give statements and then that I might have an opportunity of answering the arguments they put up in favour of further persecuting these old veterans of world war one. I believe that the success of much of the legislation which is now being enacted for the younger veterans depends on the treatment of these old veterans, who have been subjected to persecution during the past twenty-five or twenty-six years.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The hon. member for Battle River has been consistent and strenuous in his advocacy of the case of these soldier settlers. The matter came up in committee or in the house some weeks ago; and I informed my hon. friend that on August 25 last year the government, after due consideration of the claim, had rejected them as such. Since then my hon. friend accompanied a delegation of western settlers to my office and, I believe, to other offices and made an able appeal with regard to these soldier settlers. The government considered the situation a second time, and the appeal which had been launched was again rejected. Since then, however, there have been brought to the attention of the administration alternative suggestions which have not yet been fully or finally considered.

May I tell the committee in a word or two some of the figures of the last year with regard to these fine old soldier settlers. The amount of current instalments due in the first eleven months of the fiscal year which began April 1, 1944, was $642,704. The amount actually paid upon current instalments and arrears was $785,662. The amount prepaid—I want the committee to appreciate this—during the year was $761,252. That is, Mr. Chairman, the instalments due were $642,000, and the amounts paid were $1,546,000. Or, expressed in another way: the number of settlers with payments due in the last year was 5,322. The number who, in the first eleven months had made payments, was 89.4 per cent of the total, and the number of settlers who made prepayments in advance of their obligation was 2,630. These soldier settlers are my comrades, and they have the consideration and good feeling of every man in this house. They made prepayments in advance of their obligation in 2,630 cases; that is, exactly one-half of the total number of soldier settlers made prepayments upon their holdings.

Representations have been made, and made in a spirit of deep sincerity, by the hon. member for Battle River for further assistance to these soldier settlers. He has been especially active in this matter, and I commend him for it because I know he is sincere. It is contended, quite justly, that the Veterans' Land Act, which is for the veterans of this war who are going to settle on land, is a better act than the old Soldier Settlement Act, and that veterans of the old war should be given equal consideration with the veterans of the new war. With that principle, I may tell my hon. friend, I am fully in accord. The Veterans' Land Act provides under certain conditions for a free grant of a portion of the cost of each settlement enterprise. The Soldier Settlement Act contained no such provision. It was found that the burden of debt placed upon the old settlers was too great and, by a series of measures enacted by this parliament from year to year, that burden was reduced.

When we were considering the New Veterans' Land Act in 1942 in an able committee of this parliament the government, as a result of the recommendations of that committee and of an able committee of departmental men with practical farming assistance and experience from outside this city, introduced into this house the present Veterans' Land Act. The free grant is an acceptance by the government in advance of the situation that developed under the Soldier Settlement Act, under which a part of the original liability had to be written off. Thus, Mr. Chairman, we sought to bring the two measures broadly into line with regard to the repayment obligations assumed by the settler.

The hon. member for Battle River—and I am not at all critical—has urged that the government should go still farther and wipe out all remaining indebtedness by issuing clear title to soldier settlers who have not yet completed their payments. Up to the present time the government has not found it possible to accede fully to this request, for reasons which the hon. member stated quite fairly in this house the other day, even though he did not agree with the conclusions we have reached.

There is one conspicuous difference between the Soldier Settlement Act and the Veterans' Land Act which the government had decided to remove and did remove. The Soldier Settlement Act called for the payment of interest at five per cent. The rate under the Veterans' Land Act is 3½ per cent. During the present session we decided that the rate of interest for all soldier settlers should be reduced from five per cent to 3½ per cent.

That briefly is the story. As I said a while ago, there is quite a lot of good sentiment behind the advocacy of the case advanced in this house by the hon. member for Battle River. Upon the facts as submitted to me and the prepayments made—which I think are in advance of any commercial enterprise in Canada—in the last year by the old soldier settlers of Canada, and reminding him that in the last few days alternative proposals have been submitted to the government but not yet decided upon in regard to the possible meeting of the situation. I say at the present time we have done everything we could have in regard to all the proposals submitted to us.

Mr. PERLEY: I am pleased to hear the statement of the minister, but he might give us a little more information. He said that 2,360 have made prepayments. How are they distributed throughout the dominion? I have associated myself with the hon. member for Battle River in his request since he first made it, but I should like to point out this further fact. In 1937 when the minister's estimates were before the committee I suggested that the debt be written off and that these settlers be given clear title to their land. At that time I gave figures to show that the cost of administering the act and collecting the money and so on was almost as great as the amount the government would eventually receive. I just wish to make clear that that was the position I took as early as 1937. Since that time we have had the hon. member for Battle River take up the case, and I have been pleased to support him. I think the minister's statement was an interesting one, but I should like to point out that in the last couple of years we have had two good crops in western Canada and that they have resulted in a lot of these prepayments being made. I should also like to say that many of these old veterans have been working under difficult circumstances. I know some in my district who have two sons in this war. They have carried on under great difficulties and made the payments. I am pleased, however, to know that the situation is clearing up and I certainly wish to associate myself with the hon. member for Battle River.

Mr. FAIR: Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the minister very sincerely for the statement he has made to-night in connection with the concessions that the government, through the minister, intends to make to these old soldier settlers.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): With deference may I correct that statement. I said that since we had considered the matter two or three weeks ago there have been given to the government alternative proposals which we have not yet been able to consider.

Mr. FAIR: I take it that it all means the same thing anyway. I thank the minister, and I think the government in its wisdom, possibly against the will of some of the powerful members, and perhaps in their own interest, decided to consider these questions favourably in the very near future.

It is more than twenty years since we thought we had won the old war successfully. I was not able to write as fast as the minister spoke and I did not get all his figures. I did get enough to convince me that several prepayments have been made during the eleven months of the last fiscal year. What I am concerned with, however, is the principle involved. I am a practical farmer, and I have gone through exactly the same hardships as those old soldier settlers with the exception that I did not have the bailiff at the door every time I could not make my payment. It was not my fault; as one of my hon. friends here suggested, I have better land than many of these old soldier settlers have; I knew a little more about land than they did and perhaps I had a little better break than they had. However, as I said, there is a principle involved, and it would seem to be the policy of the government or of the soldier settlement board to get money regardless of whence it comes. It is their intention to get it and clear up all these old debts. I think that is not good enough.

We have kept these old soldier settlers working and trying to pay off their debts on a quarter-section of land for twenty years, land that in many cases was not worth one thousand dollars if figured on a business basis. I do not think two per cent of the members of this house would ever try to go out and make these payments. These old soldier settlers are not asking anything from this or any other government, because after suffering all they have gone through they have paid for their land time and time again. When they bought the land wheat was close to $3 a bushel and in 1932 it went down to 19½ cents a bushel for the best wheat in the world. I know that to my sorrow, for I sold thousands of bushels that year for 12½ cents a bushel after paying eleven cents a bushel for threshing. Now we have a business administration, and I ask them to use some common sense in dealing with these old soldier settlers. A number of these old soldier settlers are making prepayments this year for very good reasons. Not very long ago, through a return to a question of mine, information was brought to me which showed that in the years from 1930 to 1943 inclusive, a fourteen-year period, we had almost three thousand of these soldier settlers either sign quit claim deeds or forced to get off the land on being served with a thirty day notice. That is one very good reason for these fellows paying up; because if you look at the record you will find that since the war broke out a particular drive has been put on either to get the soldier settler to pay up or get off. If you treat your new veterans in that way you may look for chaos, and plenty of it, in Canada because the new veterans will not take the treatment handed out to the old ones, and so far as I am concerned I hope to do my share to see that the new men receive better treatment.

The minister might have pointed out some other benefits that have been extended in connection with these lands, but I think we have successful answers to any arguments he may advance. I would point out that thirty-nine per cent of the credit extended to the new veterans will be given as a grant if for the first ten years they keep up their payments. At the end of March, 1944, the old settlers owed only twenty-nine per cent of their original average debt. Why in the world can we not square that off and give them a clear sheet? At the present time the average age of these settlers is close to sixty, and I have had letters from several who are over eighty. I have not pointed out that recently the government sent out to these people forms on which they might make application to have their loans renewed or the period of payment extended for up to another twenty years. Can one imagine a man eighty, eighty-five or eighty-eight years of age signing a contract which will oblige him to keep on paying for his quarter-section of land until he is over a hundred years old? Again I ask for a good business administration to take these matters into consideration.

As has been pointed out by the minister, under the Veterans' Land Act the rate of interest is  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. Let us not forget that under the old soldier settlement board the interest on the current debt was five per cent, and as soon as they went into arrears they paid seven per cent. I say again that if the reduction in interest had been made retro-active these old settlers would have been paid up years ago and would not have had to come to the government here, as they did last year, asking for clear title.

Some persons have an idea that they are asking for something for nothing. This is not a matter of my own interests. I am not a soldier settler; all the land I have I bought. In the interests of Canada; in the interests of the success of the Veterans' Land Act, and in the interests of our own veterans, the government still has time before dissolution to pass the necessary order in council—they have passed thousands already—to give these men clear title. If the Minister of Mines and Resources and the Minister of Finance will give us their arguments in opposition I think we can take care of them because I do not think they have a leg to stand on. They cannot get blood out of a stone. Let me point out to anyone opposed to the granting of these titles that we are taking money from these old settlers, while in many cases their wives and families need medical, hospital, dental or other care. Do not forget the malnutrition that has prevailed in many of these families, as in many others, during the years these men have been on this land. I know many of us in this house have never seen any hard times. When we go out around the country we live at the best hotels, at the expense of the country. The old soldier settler, however, is trying to make a living off the land, and for heaven's sake, before this parliament dissolves, give him the clear title for which he has been asking on so many occasions.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Since first entering this house this group has consistently supported this request. The minister's statement this evening proves quite conclusively the sincerity and good will of those people who are still on the land. They would have paid everything if the opportunity had been given them. They have been more than willing to fulfil their obligations, and the government should recognize that fact. During the three years from 1939 to 1941 the actions of this government worked a great hardship on these men and aroused a great deal of resentment. In view of the past contribution of these returned soldiers, who fought in the last war and who now face the declining years of their lives, surely this government, without loss to itself or to the people of Canada, could give them clear title to their land. I am sure this group would give full support to the action of the government in so doing.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Just before we leave that subject I should like to add a word to the discussion. I hope the minister will not think we are indulging in any loose sentiments, as he expressed it a while ago I do not intend to repeat the arguments which have been put forward by the hon. member for Battle River, who, I think, presented a sound case. However, it seems to me that the government should go a little farther in the new Veterans' Land Act. I quite agree with everything said by the hon. member for Battle River in regard to the old soldier settlers getting clear title to their land. Let us remember that Alberta has passed legislation to give the returned men of this war who had residence in that province a half-section of land, with clear title in ten years. When the province can go so far as to grant clear title in ten years, with no encumbrance whatever, not even taxes, surely this federal government can do a little better than it has promised to do for our veterans of this war, as well as the veterans of world war No. 1. The provincial government has not the money the federal government has, nor has it, thanks to this government, the ways of raising money that are open to the federal authority. Not only has Alberta agreed to give the returned men of that province who desire it a half-section of land, free of all taxes and other encumbrances at the end of ten years; it desires to go a little further than that. If the federal government will cooperate a little in the interests of the returned men Alberta is prepared to give each veteran forty acres of land broken and cleared. All the province asks is that the federal government pay half the cost. I do not think that is loose sentiment at all, but something to which these men are entitled. Surely, if Alberta can do that it is not being sentimental. Not at all; it is doing so because it is good business.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but has he had an opportunity of reading the order in council tabled this afternoon in regard to provincial crown lands?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I have not, but am I to understand that the federal government is agreeing with the province of Alberta—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The federal government had a conference with officials of the province of Alberta, among others, and as a result of careful consideration an order in council was prepared and tabled in this house this afternoon, dealing with this very question of provincial crown lands.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am very glad an order in council has been passed, but we have not had a chance to look at it. Would the minister tell us the contents of the order in council?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am sorry I have not the order in council before me at the moment, but we had a conference with representatives of the western provinces, and, I think, some of the eastern provinces as well. The discussion lasted for two or three days; certain principles were agreed upon, which were submitted to the government, and finally an order in council was drawn up providing for cooperation with the provincial authorities in order to make it easier to place soldier settlers upon crown land.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Does the order in council provide for the federal government sharing the cost of clearing and breaking forty acres?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I believe the federal government should give that suggestion a great deal of consideration. As I was pointing out, the government of Alberta is not doing this from a sentimental point of view.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I think my hon. friend will find that this order in council will be of great benefit to settlers in Alberta.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I hope it will be. Perhaps, as an hon. member suggests, this is a death-bed repentance on the part of the federal government.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No; it is the promise of the dawn.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): As I was pointing out a moment ago, the government of Alberta is not doing this from any sentimental point of view. I think experience has shown that if the federal government at the end of the last war had granted clear title to every one of the soldier settlers who wanted that land, it would have been dollars ahead, because of the tremendous overhead in administration. Even if they were to grant clear titles to those soldiers who got land under the soldier settlement board, I am quite positive the federal government would, in the long run, be dollars ahead.

The provincial government have gone into this matter carefully and have come to the conclusion that it is cheaper for them as a provincial government to give the soldiers one-half section of land, absolutely free at the end of ten years. It has been cheaper, they consider, to give the soldiers clear title, without one penny owing, than it would be to set up a tremendous administration to carry on the work of administration for years to come. That is not sentimentality; it is good logic and good business.

Surely, if one of the prairie provinces, one of the poorest provinces of the dominion, can be so generous to the soldiers, the federal government could loosen up a bit. There would be no great difficulty in the federal government's financing such a proposition, and saying to these soldiers—not only those of the first world war, but those of this war who desire to take up land—that once they have proven their intention of staying on the land, and have shown their good faith by staying there for ten years, that the federal government would give them clear title. I hope that the government will take a saner view, and do that very thing.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Would the Minister of Veterans' Affairs give us a statement as to the factors which determine the eligibility of a veteran to receive aid under this act for the purchase of small acreages adjoining a city or town? There appears to be some confusion in that regard.

I know of one man who applied and was refused aid on the ground that the job he held in the city was not permanent, and there was some doubt as to whether he would be able to keep up his payments. In another instance I got a letter from the minister saying the reason this man was refused was that he had not had any farming experience for about twenty years and, consequently, they did not think he could make a living on the acreage.

It was my understanding when the bill was before the house that the purpose of helping people to get acreages nearer cities was so that they could work in the city during those seasons when work was available, and also have some assistance from small acreages, such as those on which they would keep chickens or grow berries. What are the factors which determine eligibility?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Some time ago the hon. member for York South raised the same question. He asked what qualifications should be possessed by a veteran seeking to establish himself on a small holding under the provisions of the Veterans' Land Act.

Just now he mentioned the case of a Toronto workman whose application was refused when he asked for a small holding. The hon. member was good enough to furnish the name privately, and since then a report has been obtained by myself in regard to that particular case.

I have indicated that the director had to go slow in authorizing settlements up to the present time. It is not in the interests of any veteran that he be encouraged to enter into a contract involving the repayment of a loan unless and until the necessary home, farm buildings, tools and equipment are available, so that he has the means of earning the money to pay his instalments.

Knowing the limitations in this regard, the administration has sought to allocate available materials among applicants considered to have the greatest need. This, frankly speaking, is a discretionary process, and inevitably it gives rise to disappointment in some cases. The policy of the department is to study as many as possible of those cases; but the hard fact remains that until materials, equipment and labour are more easily available we shall probably not be able to settle all applicants on small holdings.

These are the reasons, I may tell my hon. friend, why the veterans referred to by him and by others have experienced delay. There are several aspects to the qualifications mentioned by my hon. friend. The applicant must have the service record laid down in the act. I understand there is no difficulty on that score, in the case of the veteran mentioned by the hon. member. Either in farming, or in the case of most small holdings, it is contemplated that the veteran has to make at least some part of his living by cultivating the soil, some part of his living through some branch of agriculture or horticulture. Whatever it is, the veteran has to show that he has some experience and background related to the project for which he applies, whether it be a full farming acreage, or the keeping of poultry, the growing of vegetables or bee-keeping.

In the case of small holdings there must also be some assurance that the veteran has reasonable prospects of some other means of livelihood—the condition referred to by my hon. friend. That is, he must have reasonable prospects of some personal livelihood—a job or a skill which will ensure him a reasonable prospect of getting a job in the vicinity of his home.

A directive recently issued to regional offices on January 2 shows that the policy is to take a reasonable view of those requirements, along practical lines. Another qualification which, of course, is necessary in every case, has to do with character and steadiness. With some men there is little prospect of reestablishment by tying them up, or trying to tie them up with a hard and fast contract for fifteen years.

Here again the policy is not to be too strict, and account is taken of reasonable probabilities. Decisions on those points are not made arbitrarily by civil servants. Qualification is a process requiring interview by an advisory board consisting of farmers, business men, and veterans from the applicant's locality, men who know local conditions, and who are good judges of the person in question. Great care has been taken in the selection of these advisory boards to see that they will have the confidence of the veteran, and of the community in which he dwells.

In the case of the veteran to whom the hon. member referred the other day, a report has been furnished, and it appears that the reasons for refusal were not quite as my hon. friend understands them to be. This veteran, who was about fifty years of age, proposed to make his living from an orchard, and the production of small fruits from one and a half acres of quite good land, equipped with a small three-roomed frame house. The applicant was found to have had little or no association with agriculture for the past twenty-four years. He is employed, as I understand, as a metal polisher in Toronto. The officers of the department, and the advisory board, seriously questioned this man's prospects of success in an occupation for which he lacked training and experience.

However, I may assure my hon. friend that one refusal is not final. The officers of the board are trying to find a type of reestablishment which will fit more closely with this man's present employment, and offer him greater prospects of success.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I understood the minister to say that a committee of local farmers and business men, and I presume legionnaires and ex-veterans, sit as a committee in respect of small holdings. If that is so, why is it not done in the Fraser Valley? I understood the minister to say, further, that he presumed a veteran would have a reasonable chance of making a partial living, or of gaining partial employment in some other line of farming. In my riding this is what has happened, particularly in the vicinity of Chilliwack. I should like to know if local people who know conditions will be consulted before these men are settled.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Definitely, yes. I understand that in the case referred to the advisory committee consisted of only two gentlemen. They were estimable gentlemen but they were not necessarily in touch with all the local conditions. There is no objection whatever to enlarging these local committees and giving representation to the Canadian Legion and local councils or to practical farmers. We want the advice of those who know local conditions and we are only too glad to have it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Will such a committee be consulted before any settlement is made?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Certainly

Mr. FAIR: I invited the Minister of Mines and Resources and the Minister of Finance to put up an argument to-night, but they have walked out without doing so. I had hoped that before going to the home for the aged the Minister of Mines and Resources would have cleared his conscience of at least some of the sins he has committed against these old soldier settlers. I do not want those sins to haunt him in the happier days that lie ahead.

Mr. GILLIS: When the national defence estimates were being considered I endeavoured to get a clarification of the status of the members of the voluntary nursing aid detachment serving with the Canadian Army, particularly in connection with gratuities. I did not get an answer and I was wondering if the Minister of Veterans' Affairs is in a position to give some information. Doubt was expressed before as to whether the members of the St. John ambulance corps were members of the army. I have in my hand several orders in council that definitely tie them in with the Canadian Army in connection with rations, discipline, orders and everything else.

There is an appendix to general order 156 of 1942. This is quite lengthy and all through it we find that these girls are definitely under the regulations pertaining to the army medical corps. During the last few weeks these girls were ordered to take off the service ribbons they had been wearing for the past fifteen months. Evidently since this discussion as to their eligibility for gratuity came up in the house there has been some action behind the scene to relegate them to a category where they will not be entitled to gratuities.

I am not going to read these orders and no doubt the minister can check them with the Department of National Defence. I think an injustice is being done to this particular service. They are prohibited from marrying; they get the same leave as officers; they get the same transportation rights and are under the same discipline as the nursing sisters. Has the minister any information?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am afraid I have not. My hon. friend was kind enough to approach me personally with reference to these cases, and several other people have done the same thing in the last week or two. I do not know whether they have a definite form of enlistment for service for the duration of the war, but I think there is a lot of merit in the contention of my hon. friend. Without committing myself I shall certainly be most happy—it does not come under my jurisdiction—to look into the situation. Perhaps my hon. friend will be kind enough to send me copies of the documents he showed me this afternoon and then I shall be happy to bring them to the attention of my colleagues.

War Appropriation

Mr. QUELCH: There is one further point I should like to refer to in connection with the matter raised by the hon. member for Battle River. The argument has often been used that the government would not be justified in giving clear title to these soldiers because the taxpayers' money was used in buying the land. Even if that were true I would not agree altogether with the argument, but it is not a true statement of fact. In many cases the land sold to the soldier settlers cost the government absolutely nothing and it was sold at fairly high prices. In other words, the soldier settlers were exploited and there was profiteering at their expense. I should like to read from a return made to the house last year in connection with the cost of some of these lands. This return was made May 23, 1944. I asked this question:

What was the cost to the dominion government of the following lands that were sold to soldier settlers in 1920: sections 6, 13, 14, 15, E $\frac{1}{2}$ , 16, 22, 23, 24, of range 18, township 33, west of 4 and sections 32, 30 NE  $\frac{1}{4}$  26, 23, 22, W $\frac{1}{2}$ , 19, 18, 17, 16, 15 and NE  $\frac{1}{4}$  13, of range 18, township 32, west of 4?

The reply was "nil". It did not cost the government a cent. Then my next question was:

What was the average price per acre?

The answer given was $16.38. In the same area civilians were buying South African scrip from the government for $3 an acre; yet the government were charging the soldier settlers $16.38 an acre for land that did not cost them a cent. I have continually contended that since it did not cost the government anything to obtain this land they should be prepared to sell it at the same price as they were selling South African scrip, $3 an acre. My next question was:

What is the total debt of soldier settlers or members of veterans guard still resident on these lands?

The answer was, "$35,448.30". I then asked:

How many soldiers originally settled on these lands?

The answer given was, 40. I then asked:

How many have paid for their land in full?

The answer was, 3. Out of a total of forty who settled in that area we find that at the end of twenty-five years only three have been able to pay for their land in full. This is owing to the fact that the price charged was exorbitant, and even with the prices that prevail to-day we find that land is being sold for far less than $16 an acre. I can say that because not long ago I bought some land in that area for a price away below $16 an acre. My next question was:

How many have abandoned their land?

The answer was, 17. Out of a total of forty, seventeen have had to abandon their land. The next questions and answers were:

8. How many are still resident? 13.

9. How many are in the veterans guard but still hold their land? 4.

It is all right for the minister to say that many soldier settlers are making their payments. The thing that interests me is not how many settlers are making their payments but how many are still down and out to-day. Unfortunately there are a great many in that position. I know of settlers who have had pressure put upon them to leave the land because it is claimed they are not farming in an efficient manner.

I know of one case of an old fellow who was refused an adjustment on his land upon the ground that he is not able to farm efficiently. He is getting too old and they are trying to put him off the land. He is an old Irishman and he told me that he would have to get a shot-gun if they bothered him any more. That is the kind of spirit I am glad to see in these soldier settlers who have suffered such hardship. The superintendent of soldier settlement knows very well the land to which I am referring and I urge the minister to give consideration to this matter.

Mr. KNOWLES: Included in the appropriation of $2,000,000,000 which is now before us there is a substantial amount for old age pensions and I should like to speak briefly on this matter. I refer the Minister of Finance in particular to the discussion that took place in the house last year early in June during the course of which a number of suggestions as to changes that might be made in the old age pension regulations were offered to the government from all sides of the house. The minister showed great interest in the suggestions that were made and acceded to our request to have them compiled and studied by the officials of his department in charge of the matter. Later in the session, on August 14, I had occasion to ask the minister whether any progress had yet been made in connection with the implementing of these suggestions. The minister replied that a study had been made and an excellent memorandum prepared, but that nothing further was possible at that stage.

The minister knows that this is a subject in which I am greatly interested, and there is a good deal I could say but I am going to refrain from any lengthy remarks under present circumstances. I should like however, to point out to him and to the government that the people who are on the old age pension and those in later years who ought to be receiving it but who are denied the pension for one reason or another find it difficult to understand the long delay that seems to have to take place before satisfactory amendments can be made to the Old Age Pension Act or to the regulations. They are not critical of the pieces of social legislation which have been introduced and passed, particularly during the session of last year, but they find it hard to understand how huge sums of money can be found for other desirable pieces of social legislation and yet for it not be possible to make any substantial increase in the amount of the old age pension. In particular they cannot understand why it has not been found possible to abolish what for the sake of brevity I shall refer to as the means test provisions in the act and in the regulations. It is because of that feeling on the part of old people that I would ask the Minister of Finance to make a brief statement on behalf of the government, and if he will do so there are two questions to which I should like him to direct his attention. The first is this. Has any progress been made in connection with implementing the suggestions made to the minister on June 2 and June 5 of last year? My second question is this. Now that the date of the election has been announced, has the government any announcement to make as to its intention with regard to old age pensions? That is giving the minister a golden opportunity. I do so because I speak not only for myself but, I am sure, for private members in all parts of this house when I say that we are keenly interested in something being done as quickly as possible to improve the lot of our old age pensioners.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not anticipate that this subject would come up to-night and I have not any documents or any officials with me. The hon. gentleman asks whether any progress has been made in procuring amendments to the present old age pension regulations and says that it is hard to understand why it takes so long to get these amendments made. If he were in the position of administering the Ottawa end of the Old Age Pension Act he would very soon find out what are the reasons for delay in having amendments made to these regulations.

I had a long list compiled of the suggestions that were made in the house last summer. I do not know that I would approve all of them myself; I never undertook to approve them or to try to have the suggested amendments made. But there was one—I cannot remember at the moment what it was—which I regarded as desirable, and in December or January we started in to try to have that amendment made. We have been corresponding with the provinces ever since and we have not yet reached agreements with the provinces. It is almost impossible to obtain amendments to the regulations because one has to get agreements with the nine provinces. What happens is that you write to a province, and the province comes back with a counter suggestion. You say: No; let us stick to the original suggestion; you have the same thing going on with one province after another, and that goes on and on ad infinitum. I do not think any effective step can be taken to deal with our old age pension system without a dominion-provincial conference.

The hon. gentleman says, why is not something done to raise the old age pension? I have repeatedly stated in this house that we regard that as a provincial responsibility. As the hon. gentleman knows, we have enormous demands upon the dominion treasury, in the fields which are our responsibility, and we are by no means niggardly in response to the requests of member after member of this house to loosen up. We loosen up sometimes more often than I approve. But I realize that in pleading the cause of the general taxpayer I am pleading an unpopular cause here when I listen to members of this house saying: Spend, spend, spend. I realize that this is probably the wish of the members of the house.

But in this matter of old age pensions I have made it quite clear that we regard it as primarily a provincial responsibility. The provinces all have heavy surpluses and are infinitely more prosperous, governmentally speaking, than the dominion, and there is nothing to prevent any province from raising the old age pension to thirty-five or forty or fifty dollars a month if they see fit to do so. Some provinces regard a higher rate as more appropriate than do other provinces. It depends on the feeling of the people of the particular section of the dominion affected.

All I can say about old age pensions is this. I have made the statement here in the house in the past. I said two or three years ago that if the provinces thought the rate ought to be higher and all made that request, we would give consideration to making the rate higher, and we finally did that. They requested that it be raised from twenty to twenty-five dollars. We did that. Later I suggested that if the provinces were of the view that we should lower the age to sixty-five, we would give consideration to that. But only a few provinces have made any such request.

The dominion is in this position, that we cannot get a good old age pension system in this country without a dominion-provincial conference and getting the pension on a contributory basis. I never heard of a system where the means test was abolished if the system was not a contributory one. I do not believe the people of this country would stand for our paying forty or fifty dollars a month to millionaires over sixty-five or seventy years of age unless they had done something to pay for that pension; in other words, unless it had been contributory. If you abolish the means test, you must have the contributory system. Otherwise it will strike the ordinary taxpayer or member of parliament, no matter how generous he is with the taxpayers' funds, as ridiculous.

Mr. KNOWLES: I appreciate the difficulties to which the minister has referred in connection with dealings between the federal government and the provinces. I know, for example, the difficulty that we have in my own province of Manitoba in persuading the provincial government there to take certain desirable steps that are long overdue. One that I will mention particularly is this. About a year ago the federal government, after we had asked some questions about the matter, advised the provinces that as from that date they could cease filing liens against the property of old age pensioners up to the value of $2,000. The change which the federal government made at that time was to make permissive rather than mandatory the filing of liens up to that figure. Since that time some of the provinces have taken advantage of that provision which the federal government made. In my own province strenuous efforts have been made by public bodies and by members of the legislature to persuade the provincial government to make that very minor change, but they have not seen fit to do so. I quote that in part to express regret that this has not been done and in part to support what the minister has said, that there are these problems in dealing with the provinces.

However, in connection with the statement that the responsibility for increasing the amount should be put on the provinces, I want not only to take strong exception to the minister's stand but to point out that the total amount of money which it would cost to take care of the present old age pensions entirely from the federal treasury is not very large compared with some other sums which are now being provided. Like the minister, I have no figures in front of me, but my recollection is that it is about thirty-eight to forty million dollars a year that it costs the federal government, and about twelve million dollars is borne by the provinces; I may be out a few millions, but that is fairly close.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a little high. I think the federal contribution is slightly over thirty million dollars.

Mr. KNOWLES: So much the worse, but it is in that region. In other words, the total cost of old age pensions to the federal government, the provincial governments and the municipalities—for in some provinces a portion of the obligation is passed on down—is in the region of fifty to fifty-five million dollars a year.

I wish to make a comparison, and in doing so I would make it clear that we of this group supported the family allowance measure which is to come into effect very soon. But if it is possible for us to find $200 million a year for that desirable provision, only fifty or fifty-five millions a year to assist those at the other end of life is not good enough. My colleague the hon. member for Cape Breton South who is sitting beside me frequently says, when we are dealing with these matters, that there are two groups of people for whom social legislation should make the first provision—the aged and the young. I am glad that the step has been taken with respect to the family allowance measure, even though it requires certain improvements. But I feel that progress should be made in connection with old age pensions without delay.

I mention the family allowance measure for another reason. When the government brought that measure in they did not suggest that it should be the responsibility of the provinces; they felt that the effort to assist children and family life in this country should be put on a national basis, that it should not be possible to have differences as between the various provinces. Accordingly I would say that, commendable as it is that a number of the provinces have made additions to the amount which the federal government is paying, one of the undesirable features which is developing at the present time is the variations in the old age benefits in the various parts of the country. I think it would contribute a great deal to the sense of national unity in this country if old age pensions were put on a dominion-wide national basis similar to that of the family allowance measure, and in doing so let us make the best possible provision for our old people throughout this dominion. I hope that the present government while it lasts and whatever government succeeds it will give further consideration to the case of our old people; and I urge particularly that we keep away from the thought that this matter is a provincial responsibility. We must recognize it as a national responsibility. I urge, too, that we look squarely at the total amount of money which old age pensions are costing us, and ask ourselves if the really small amount we are providing for this purpose is good enough for our old people, in the light of our present national economy.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few remarks with respect to the Department of Reconstruction. I had intended to speak briefly on this matter when the minister's portion of the appropriation was before the committee; but time interfered. Yesterday the minister tabled a pamphlet entitled "Employment and Income." I have read this pamphlet through. After the great amount of advance advertising which it and the work of the Department of Reconstruction received from the minister himself and from other ministers, I had been led to believe that in this pamphlet we were going to have something really epoch-making. I thought possibly we would really be given an idea as to how we could emerge from the old order into a new order. But I must say that reading this pamphlet through greatly disillusioned me. I was utterly disappointed. There is in this pamphlet no evidence whatsoever of any new heaven or any new earth. There is no indication of any real appreciation of the causes of the economic ills which afflict the world at the present time, and there is no sign of any knowledge how to remove those causes. That is an exceedingly serious matter.

I spoke on March 23 about the international conference at San Francisco, and I found the same fault with the general set-up there. They seem disposed to talk about everything but the causes of the trouble and how to remove those causes.

Now, the causes of the trouble which we face to-day are briefly these: that we have developed great machines of astonishing efficiency; we have perfected highly efficient technological skills, as a result of all of which we are able to produce abundantly and largely without the use of men, the result being that the purchasing power in the hands of the people as related to the amount of goods and services which are coming on the market is gradually decreasing, with the result that we have an inability on the part of those who produce to sell their product at a reasonable price, and an inability on the part of the people generally to buy the goods; the result being that we have poverty in the midst of plenty and general consternation and dismay, with the tendency for the producers to combine in greater combines and cartels, international organizations, and a tendency on the part of the labouring men to combine in a similar way to combat the power of money, with the result that there is an urge everywhere apparently to centralization of power and the destruction of democracy. Not only is this to be observed within the nation but it is a world phenomenon. We shall never overcome this difficulty; we shall never be able to protect democracy unless we discover the fundamental causes of the trend of our day and set about remedying those causes.

With respect to this white paper, the Social Credit group has not had time fully to study the government's employment and income scheme, but we are convinced from the study we have made that the white paper does not contain any effective cure for the economic disturbances which ended in the world catastrophe of 1939. Rather, controls are to be increased to make effective resistance by nations to economic ills more difficult, if not impossible. Further, it is clear that disarmament and similar proposals are not advanced in whole or even mainly in the interests of peace through international good will, but rather to prevent national resistance to economic conquest by means of an international gold standard. These are hard things to say about the minister's general proposal, but the mere fact that the whole plan centres around the Bretton Woods agreement indicates that what I have said is not an unjust criticism.

I have several suggestions to offer the minister in connection with the rehabilitation and reconstruction of Canada. As he will agree, we must increase production and consumption or distribution in Canada. Only by these two processes can the standard of living of the Canadian people be raised to where it should be and maintained there. The ordinary socialist takes the stand generally, I gather, that private enterprise will not produce abundance. That, I maintain, is the most flagrant nonsense because private enterprises are producing so much goods that we find it utterly impossible to sell them all. Therefore our difficulty is by no means production. We can produce if we could only enable private enterprise to sell. The problem is, therefore, to enable them to sell and at reasonable prices. I am not going to deal now with how that is to be done except to hint, but I intend to approach the problem of rehabilitation from the practical point of view in a general way, a thing which the minister will, I think, readily understand.

War Appropriation

I am going to refer to my own constituency. In my constituency there are several rather unusual possibilities for increasing production and consumption. One of those is coal. In Alberta we have extensive deposits of high quality bituminous coal and quite a large percentage of it is in the Lethbridge riding of Alberta. Up to the present time we have done very little in Canada by way of utilizing our coal for the production of desirable means toward improving our standard of living. For example, very little is done with respect to processing coal to obtain power for rural electrification and the like. There is a great need for rural electrification and consequently a great opening for the use of coal to produce power for that purpose. Almost nothing has been done in Canada with respect to processing our coal for petroleum. The minister pointed out this afternoon, and has pointed out previously in his speeches in this house, that Canada is dependent largely on outside sources for her petroleum, oils, gasoline and the like. With the tremendous deposits of coal which we have in Canada I maintain, that it is a reflection on our intelligence to have to be importing our oil from outside when nations such as Germany, Italy and Britain have been producing their oil needs in such large measure from coal. We have such tremendous quantities of coal. I am told that the amount of gasoline and oil products which we need in Canada could be produced from about twenty million tons a year. This would add greatly to the prosperity of the coal mining areas in our country and would add greatly to our own security and self-sufficiency in time of stress.

Much has been done in other countries in the way of processing coal to get certain chemicals. Very little is being done in Canada. Men process coal in order to get plastics, explosives and solvents of one kind and another. All of these are possibilities of the future; I submit to the minister that he should take into the most careful consideration the possibility of processing our coal deposits in order to produce those very desirable commodities in our country. I am told that in Britain and in Germany they have used coal to obtain coal tar for the building of highways. We need highways in Canada very, very badly. We have much difficulty in getting highways that will stand up to our weather. It ought to be a sound proposal to obtain coal tar from our coal deposits and with it to build highways.

I should like to refer the minister to a good brief which has recently been submitted to the royal commission on coal that has been sitting across Canada. This brief was submitted by the Lethbridge board of trade. It is called

[Mr. Blackmore.]

"A Fuller Utilization of Coal Deposits." If he will read that brief he will obtain some ideas which I think will help him to avoid too much study in the matter.

May I turn from our coal deposits to the possibilities of irrigation. Every gallon of water that runs down the slopes toward Hudson bay should be carefully stored and beneficially used on the thirsty soils of the west. We have all too little water in western Canada, and of that which we have a great amount, in fact by far the major portion, is being allowed to run to waste year after year with nothing being done about the matter. May I particularly draw the attention of the committee to the project for the utilization of water in my own constituency, called the Lethbridge southeast water conservation project, or the St. Mary's and Milk rivers conservation project. In this project it is proposed to take the waters that run in four rivers flowing through southwestern Alberta and store them in ten reservoirs, the combined capacities of which will be 738,700 acre feet; then to distribute that water over 345,000 acres of land in the federal ridings of Lethbridge and Medicine Hat, the total cost being $15,178,439. The land upon which it is proposed to put the water is choice soil. It has been semi-arid for centuries; consequently it is very rich. The climate there is unusually fine and the location with respect to transportation and markets is good. By utilizing the land and water we can add greatly to the stock raising capacity of Alberta and the west, the dairy producing capacity, the capacity to can goods and the capacity to produce sugar. Sugar beets particularly grow very well with high yields and a high percentage of sugar content. Up to the present time the people of Canada and particularly the present government of Canada have greatly neglected the possibilities of producing beet sugar in Canada. It is an amazing thing to me; nevertheless it is obviously true.

Beet sugar is one of the most important commodities which we can produce in Canada. During this war we have had to go short of sugar. During a future war—let us not forget that a future war is a possibility—we might not be able to get the meagre supplies that we have been able to get from abroad. It is only the part of ordinary common sense to put ourselves in a position where we can produce our own sugar, and we can do that successfully in Canada.

May I return to the water conservation project? I would suggest to the minister that he read the report of the committee which was appointed under the name of the St. Mary's and Milk rivers conservation committee to examine into the possibilities of the project about which I have been speaking. This committee submitted a report to the Minister of Mines and Resources in February, 1942. On page 12 of the report the committee pointed out that they believed this project was a desirable one for post-war rehabilitation in Canada; and in the report they pointed out the serious danger of Canada losing her share of the waters of the St. Mary's and Milk rivers because they are international streams, since that share was awarded by the treaty dated January 11, 1909, and stipulated by official order of the international joint commission dated October 4, 1921. I specially urge that the government proceed immediately with the St. Mary's dam of a capacity of 270,000 acre feet. This would cost roughly $4 million. It would provide plenty of water to make up for the shortage which now exists in the irrigation districts in the Lethbridge area comprising 120,000 acres, and it would provide water for 94,000 acres of new land. These are very important matters. Therefore I commend to the minister's most careful consideration the Lethbridge southeast water conservation project.

I referred a moment ago to the beet sugar industry. May I turn the attention of the committee to that again for a minute or two? Any nation that does not or cannot produce its own sugar needs cannot be really free. Sugar is likely to become more important as the generations pass. Canada could easily produce her own sugar. One beet sugar factory like the one at Raymond, Alberta, in my constituency, can produce one-twentieth of Canada's annual requirements of sugar. Canada could produce all the sugar she needs in southern Alberta, south of Calgary. The beet sugar industry should, I maintain, be encouraged. I urge upon the minister that he bring influence to bear upon his colleagues in the cabinet to the end that this may be done. As I said a moment ago, the present government has been unsympathetic to the beet sugar industry, and has hurt that industry in Canada.

May I now turn for a few moments to agriculture in Canada, as it is affected by the rehabilitation programme. If agriculture is to be rehabilitated in Canada three things must be done. First, the farmer must have parity prices. This means the bonusing or subsidizing upward of the prices the farmer gets, and the bonusing or subsidizing downward of the prices of the commodities he has to buy. The subsidizing process should be carried to the point at which every farm family would be able to have a modern home and a cultured, educated family free from financial worries. This should be the ideal. Anything short of that is unworthy of any government whatsoever that might have power in Canada. Second, the farmer needs full markets; markets in Canada to the limit of the capacity of Canadians to consume the goods, and markets abroad for all our surpluses, either through trade or through mutual aid so financed as to avoid increasing taxation or debt. The third need is generous credit facilities. If the minister will provide these three requisites to the farming population of Canada, he will have no need to worry about rehabilitating them, for they will take care of the rehabilitation themselves from there on.

I now turn to the question of housing. Some attention has been given to that matter up to the present during the debate. I maintain that the present housing programme of the government is altogether inadequate. The proposed assistance is not available to the very people who need housing assistance most. Money for housing must be made much more widely available so that the poor man, working for a low and uncertain income, may be able to possess his own home. Interest rates must be much lower than are now proposed, not more than perhaps two per cent. The repayment of the loan should be on the basis of the income of the householder. If he pays a moderate percentage of his income for a period of, say twenty years he should be guaranteed clear title to his home. Every family must have an opportunity of possessing its own home.

Canada exists for the sake of the people of Canada. Without plenty of patriotic, healthy and prosperous people, Canada will never grow. The people must come first. Measures must be taken to encourage an increase in the Canadian birthrate, and suitable housing provision would be one such measure.

Some people will say it sounds foolish to argue that if the householder has paid a certain percentage of his income for twenty years he should have possession of his home. May I just point out to hon. members that the administration in Alberta is proceeding on just such a basis. When they turn over, we will say a half-section of land to a returned man they say to him, "Now, if you give us a certain percentage of the produce of your land for a certain number of years, perhaps ten or fifteen years, you can have the land." I believe eight per cent is all that is called for.

War Appropriation

If the man has crop failures, all right; in that event he does not have to pay anything. So that when a man buys a house, or borrows money with which to build a house, if he does the very best he can, if he gives a percentage of his income every year, the state should be prepared to give him complete possession of that house. That may sound strange, but hon. members will have to become accustomed to hearing many strange things before they realize what is really meant by a new order in which human beings shall count more than material things. Living incomes must be guaranteed to all people willing to work.

I now turn to one or two other matters. First, I should like to say a word about old age pensions. I am not at all satisfied with the old age pension provisions of this country. An old age pension of at least $50 a month for all who have reached the age of sixty-five, although I prefer the age of sixty, and for those who have reached the age of unemployability, must be guaranteed; and that at an early date. There will be those who will say, "Well, we cannot afford it. Where are we to get the money?" I submit that the question should be: can we produce the milk and cream and butter and cheese and other foods? Can we produce the clothing; can we produce the housing; can we produce the medical care, the dental care, the hospital care? Can we produce the material things? The answer must be, yes. Well, then, if we can produce the material things, certainly we can find some way or another of producing the counters or the money tokens which represent the things we produce, and distribute those to the people who are to use the goods. Certainly we can. Just as soon as we begin to realize that what is physically possible can be made financially possible in peace as well as in war, we shall not hesitate at all to give the old people that to which they have a clear title.

A moment ago I mentioned finance, and I turn to that question again. The minister must find ways of changing our present debt-creating financial system into a non-debt-creating financial system. He must ascertain all the factors entering into the present debt-creating system and provide for the neutralizing or the liquidating of the debt resulting from that system. If the minister fails to accomplish the objectives I have indicated he will fail to rehabilitate the Canadian people. I may be asked how all this can be done. My reply is that very little can be done under the present financial system; and I make this remark in reference to the minister's whole set of proposals as envisaged by his white paper. I grant that in this pamphlet he says that this is only the first stage, but judging from the direction in which he is travelling I would say that all the other stages will be just as bad as this first one. After all, if you set out going directly east in the first steps you make, you are likely to continue going east all the way through. The minister simply will not be able to find the money to make good the promises which are implied in this pamphlet. He will be at a loss to know what to do in order to accomplish his aims.

I may be asked, "Well, what would you do?" Of course a good many hon. members will say they are familiar with the social credit ideas. Yes; and they must become more familiar with social credit ideas. In these last days of the session I am going to ask hon. members this question. How many times have they found that the Social Credit members have been right, since they came here in 1935? They will be surprised if they go back over the list to see how many times we have been right. We implied a forecast of war in 1936 and 1937. We stood in favour of preparation for war; and I could go right through the whole list. Why was that? It was because we have been doing a little studying with respect to these matters. It has not been any accident. I am prepared to say that in financial matters members of this house and the country at large will find the Social Crediters have been right. I hope hon. members do not have to go through another depression and another war before making that discovery.

The minister must see to it that fundamental changes are made in the present financial system. I suggest to him in all earnestness and sincerity that he must concentrate his attention upon the question of money. My socialist friends of course will begin to see red when we mention money; but we have already learned how to produce the goods, and now all we need to do is to find how to produce the money. I hope the minister will concentrate upon this question of money with the same singleness of purpose and the same determination he would bring to bear upon a great engineering project. If he does that he will discover the essential facts and will be able to devise the essential changes necessary. May I suggest to the minister that money is only a claim to goods. Consequently, where the goods are, the money can be. Undoubtedly Canada can produce the goods. Then certainly she can produce the money. This country can produce the goods in abundance; and the minister must learn how to produce the money free from debt and free from taxation. The minister will be able to save a great deal of time and energy, and avert a dangerous feeling of frustration throughout the country, if he will frankly adopt the monetary principles of social credit.

Before resuming my seat, I should like to spend just a moment on this general question of trends with respect to free enterprise which was discussed briefly this afternoon by the hon. member for Lake Centre and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggarr. Free enterprise, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggarr pointed out, is finding it difficult to survive nowadays because of certain trends. May I point out where the main difficulty for free enterprise lies. It is in the fact that free enterprise is unable to find markets; and because it is unable to find markets, combines of producers result, in an effort to cut down overhead. The combines get bigger and bigger until, first thing you know, they are vast trusts, and have become international cartels.

What is the cause of that trouble? Purely that they are unable to find markets, and purely that they are unable to have prices guaranteed. Now, if we can manage to provide these industries with markets at guaranteed fair prices it will be a simple matter to govern their activities beyond that, and free enterprise, large and small, will survive and flourish in a country, with freedom. If we fail to find markets for the goods they are able to produce, then I warn that there will be more and more development toward autocracy, more and more development toward totalitarianism and dictatorship until it bestrides the world, and you will find a titanic struggle going on between powerful business concerns organized into a monopoly on one side, and labour organizations organized into a monopoly on the other side. If the business organizations happen to win the contest which follows you will have a fascist dictatorship, and if the labour men, on the other side, win, you will find that you will have a communistic dictatorship, or a dictatorship of the proletariat. And there is no way in the world of escaping this, unless we adopt the method of guaranteeing prices and guaranteeing markets.

Unless we do that by some such technique as social credit—and I suggest that the social credit technique is admirably adapted to the problem to be solved—we are headed for disaster. And all the Bretton Woods and Dumbarton Oaks and San Francisco conferences that we can devise in the next fifteen years will not save us from dictatorship, and, finally war. I submit this, as a humble contribution which might be used by the government in its endeavour to solve the problem which confronts our country at this time.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL

Mr. ILSLEY moved:

Resolved that a sum not exceeding $148,845,000.59, being five-twelfths of the amount of each of the several items to be voted as set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1946, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, and in addition thereto the sum of $437,749.83, being one-twelfth of the amount of items 10, 23, 24, 27, 141, 146, 148, 151, 152, 171 and 267, and the sum of $862,958.33, being one-sixth of the amount of items 29, 133, 134, 142, 153, 158, 160, 161, 162, 269, 270, 271, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 282, 283, 286, 287, 289 and 290 as set forth in the several schedules to The Appropriation Act No. 1, 1945, be granted to His Majesty, on account, for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1946.

Mr. HAZEN: Would the minister explain what this proceeding is? What is the Chairman reading from?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): The Chairman has just read a resolution of the committee of supply providing the sum of $148,845,000.59—

Mr. HAZEN: Where is it found?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not found anywhere; it has just been read. This is the usual procedure in committee of supply, but I had better explain to the committee just what the government is asking it to do.

The resolution is passed by the committee of supply, and then a subsequent resolution by the committee of ways and means, preparatory to the introduction of a bill, which will be an appropriation bill. That appropriation bill is to provide (a) five-twelfths of all the items to be voted in the main estimates for the fiscal year 1945-46; (b) an additional one-twelfth for certain services detailed in schedule A to the bill; (c) an additional one-sixth for certain other services detailed in schedule B to the bill, and (d) borrowing power to raise sums required for redeeming loans or obligations maturing or callable during the new fiscal year.

The proportion of five-twelfths for all services is intended to provide for ordinary requirements to the end of August.

The additional proportions requested for certain special items are necessary on account of the seasonal nature of the services affected, such as certain agricultural services; surveys and other activities of the Department of Mines and Resources, and certain public works projects including dredging and completion of contracts already under way.

Interim Supply Bill

The proposed procedure is the same as that followed each year with respect to interim supply; the passing of the bill to be founded on the resolution will not in any way prejudice the rights and privileges of members to criticize and discuss any item in the estimates which will come up for discussion at the next session, and as far as this government is concerned, the usual undertaking is hereby given that such rights and privileges will be respected and will not be curtailed or restricted in any way as a result of the passing of this measure.

The form of the bill differs from that passed at the beginning of the last fiscal year. At that time, on account of the short period covered, it was not necessary to ask for additional proportions on special services. At this time we are asking for five months' supply, and this involves additional proportions for certain specified services which are covered in sections 3 and 4 and supported by the schedules to the bill. The form of the present bill in this respect is the same as that followed in the past where such additional proportions were necessary.

In fact, I think it is usual in interim supply bills to secure a somewhat larger proportion for certain special services than the proportion asked for respecting the main estimates as a whole. Very often the Minister of Finance has come into the house and asked for one month's supply or two month's supply applying to all the main estimates, and then he might ask for an additional two month's supply for a few services. That is the case here. We are asking for five-twelfths applicable to all, and for a few services we are asking for an additional one-twelfth and for a few other services an additional one-sixth. These special amounts are not large in amount. The five-twelfth amounts to $148,845,000.59; the additional one-twelfth amounts to $437,749.83 and the additional one-sixth amounts to $862,958.33.

Section 5 of the bill is new. It is to authorize the refunding of Dominion of Canada securities maturing or callable in the current year. At present the only authority available for refunding purposes is the Loan Act, 1944, of which only $10,298,387.45 remains unborrowed and negotiable.

Mr. STIRLING: Am I right in believing that the five-twelfths plus the one-sixth plus the one-twelfth, plus the items that have been passed already, bear a distinct relation to the total estimates of over $1,000,000,000? I should have thought that as we were proposing to vote five-twelfths of the amount required for the civil estimates there would be an exact relation between that sum and this total of $1,023,621,597.

Mr. ILSLEY: A large number of items are statutory and do not have to be voted by the house. They are included in the main estimates simply for purposes of record and to provide a complete picture.

Mr. STIRLING: That would be a proportion of $301,138,000?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is five-twelfths of the non-statutory items, which I presume is the figure the hon. gentleman has stated. Then the one-sixth and the one-twelfth would be in addition to that.

Mr. STIRLING: What about the items that were passed some weeks ago in committee of supply?

Mr. ILSLEY: Those were supplementary estimates for the fiscal year now passed, the fiscal year ended March 31, 1945.

Resolution reported and read the first time.

Mr. ILSLEY moved that the resolution be read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. POULIOT: Before this resolution is carried I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that it would have been impossible to reach this stage of the proceedings on the eighteenth day of this session if you had not shown a spirit of justice and fairness to all members of this house. In 1940 I said to you that you were honouring the Chair and five years afterward it is my duty to say the same thing. Your difficulties have been great at certain times but you have shown wisdom and fairness; at all times you have followed the true parliamentary traditions of Westminster. Being Speaker during five years of war is a most strenuous task but you have accomplished that in a marvellous way. I cannot congratulate you, but I can tell you of my admiration and gratitude.

Motion agreed to, resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Mr. ILSLEY moved:

Resolved that a sum not exceeding $148,845-000.59, being five-twelfths of the amount of each of the several items to be voted as set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1946, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, and in addition thereto the sum of $437,749.83, being one-twelfth of the amount of items 10, 23, 24, 27, 141, 146, 148, 151, 152, 171 and 267, and the sum of $862,958.33, being one-sixth of the amount of items 29, 133, 134, 142, 153, 158, 160, 161, 162, 269, 270, 271, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 282, 283, 286, 287, 289 and 290 as set forth in the several schedules to The Appropriation Act, No. 1, 1945, be granted to His Majesty, on account, for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1946.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 4, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the fiscal year ending the 31st of March, 1946.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Section 1 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

Schedules A and B agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. STIRLING: I just want to record the fact that while we give acquiescence readily to the passage of this bill we look upon it as interim supply and we do not thereby give acquiescence to either the policy or the amounts covered by this measure.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Monday, March 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Johnston (London) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Motion agreed to.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General by such members of this house as are of the honourable the privy council.

Motion agreed to.

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the bills have gone from this house to the other, and I assume they will be passed by the other house as they are supply bills. According to the announcement made this afternoon His Excellency will be prepared to have royal assent given to the measures on Monday afternoon at three o'clock. Word will come from His Excellency to that effect at any time and I think it might be well for the sitting to be suspended pending the receipt of that message. That does not mean that all hon. members will have to wait in their seats until that hour, but it would be well I think that the word should come from His Excellency this evening and be read by the Speaker so that hon. members will be prepared for royal assent on Monday afternoon at three o'clock. I accordingly move that the sitting of the house be now suspended during pleasure.

Motion agreed to.

At 10.35 p.m. the sitting was suspended during pleasure.

The house resumed at 10.50 p.m.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, April 13, 1945.

Dear Sir:—I have the honour to inform you that the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General will proceed to the Senate chamber on Monday, April 16, at three p.m., for the purpose of proroguing the present session of parliament.

I have the honour to be,

Sir,

Your obedient servant,

F. L. C. Pereira,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, April 16, 1945

The house met at three o'clock.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT

A message was delivered by Charles H. Larose, Esquire, Assistant Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy of the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

Governor General's Speech

In the Senate chamber the Honourable the Deputy of the Governor General was pleased to give, in His Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bill:

BILL ASSENTED TO

An Act for granting to His Majesty aid for national defence and security.

To this bill the royal assent was pronounced by the Clerk of the Senate in the following words:

In His Majesty's name the Honourable the Deputy of the Governor General doth assent to this bill.

Then the Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons addressed the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General as follows:

May it please Your Honour:

The Commons of Canada have voted supplies required to enable the government to defray certain expenses of the public service.

In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Honour the following bill:

An act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1946.

To which bill I humbly request Your Honour's assent.

To this bill the Clerk of the Senate, by command of the Deputy of the Governor General, did thereupon say:

In His Majesty's name, the Honourable the Deputy of the Governor General thanks his loyal subjects, accepts their benevolence, and assents to this bill.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

After which the Deputy of the Governor General was pleased to close the sixth session of the nineteenth parliament of the Dominion of Canada with the following speech:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

You will be deeply gratified that the close of the last session of this war parliament comes at a time when decisive battles against Germany have been fought and won, at sea, in the air, and on land; and when spectacular allied successes against Japan presage the defeat of our enemies in Asia, as well as in Europe.

All Canada has watched with ever increasing pride the contribution Canadian forces have made toward ultimate victory.

I am particularly pleased that my leave-taking of honourable members of the present parliament comes at a moment when both houses have endorsed the acceptance by the government of the invitation to Canada to send representatives to the united nations conference at San Francisco which opens on the 25th of this month.

It is indeed gratifying that the Canadian delegation has been assured of the strong support of both houses of parliament in a determined effort to further the creation of an international organization to maintain peace and security in the post-war world. Next to the winning of the war, the winning of the peace is the supreme end to be achieved.

As the promise of peace dawns, a shadow has been cast athwart the threshold of the San Francisco conference by the passing of Franklin Delano Roosevelt. In the general acceptance of a charter for an international security organization, the late President foresaw the realization of a great hope: an enduring peace through cooperative action on the part of all nations. His life and work helped to impart that vision to others. The deliberations of the conference will now be inspired by his indomitable spirit.

In the death of Franklin Roosevelt, Canada mourns the loss of a true friend and a good neighbour; the oppressed peoples of the earth, a valiant champion; and mankind, a mighty leader of the forces of freedom.

Members of the House of Commons:

My ministers have consistently taken the position that the people should be secured in their rights under the constitution to elect representatives to the House of Commons at least every five years, and that, subject to this limitation, any question as to the time of a general election should be viewed in the light of what Canada owes to her fighting men. My ministers have also felt that, once decisive battles had been fought, a general election should be held as soon as possible. They are deeply gratified that it is now possible to hold a general election at a time more favourable than any hitherto, to a careful consideration by members of the armed forces, as well as by citizens generally, of the problems which relate to Canada's future. The most ample provision has been made for the exercise of the franchise by members of the armed forces in all parts of the world.

The term of the present parliament will expire at midnight to-night. On the advice of the Prime Minister, I shall approve a recommendation to have parliament dissolved at the conclusion of this afternoon's proceedings. I shall also approve the issue, immediately thereafter, of a proclamation for the holding of a general election on June the 11th.

I thank you for having made the necessary financial provision for the effective conduct of the war, and for meeting the ordinary expenses of government required to bridge over the period between the beginning of the present fiscal year and the opening of a new parliament following the general election.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

The people of Canada as a nation welcome to-day the opportunity to express profound gratitude to Almighty God for the deliverance from evil forces which in His Providence we now see is being vouchsafed to peoples of our own and other countries which our enemies have sought to conquer and enslave. As this parliament ends, we join in humble and reverent thanksgiving to God for His Mercy thus revealed to our own and other freedom-loving lands.

This concluded the sixth session of the nineteenth parliament.
