DERRIANA: HISTORY OF THE SIEGE OF LONDONDERRY, AND DEFENCE OF ENNISKILLEN.

BY THE REV. JOHN GRAMM, M. A.

Two and twenty shells were thrown into Londonderry on the afternoon of the 28th, and the cutting mortar again broke down the breast-work of Butcher's-gate. In the meantime, a shot from the garrison killed Major-General, Engineer-General of the Irish army, shot of the left hand of Captain Bourke, and wounded a gunner and two soldiers who stood near Colonel Wemyss. A second discharge killed two private soldiers, and the wind of it passing across Major (Frederick) Wemyss's face, nearly blinded him. General Hamilton saw the loss of the garrison, and the state of the British army, and that the entire battalions in the besieging army did not exceed the number of five thousand men. He stated that the Duke of Devonshire had succeeded against the Enniskilleners, and had joined him with the army under his command. He had little doubt of being able to deal with any success that might arrive from England to the besieging city. On the next day, he corrected an error in the account he had given of the number of men in the garrison, and stated to have amounted to five thousand men. As the garrison there had been diminished by sickness and mortality, the besiegers had grown weaker from similar causes. He acknowledged he had exaggerated in his former letter the number of his own army, which he had stated to be 15,000 men, and that the English fleet was in the bay, and that the Duke of Devonshire was in the neighbourhood of the city, and that the Duke of Devonshire was in the neighbourhood of the city, and that the Duke of Devonshire was in the neighbourhood of the city.
