I desire now to examine in some detail the provisions of the supplementary agreement. Let us first look for a moment at paragraph 1. Last year my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) gave us, as I have already said, exhortations of the most earnest character not to wait, yet paragraph 1 of the supplementary agreement, declares that the time for the completion of the western division shall be extended to the first day of December, A.D., 1911, and the paragraph is amended accordingly. I would have supposed, although I do not profess to be a railway expert, that, at least so far as the line from Winnipeg to Edmonton is concerned, a distance of less than a thousand miles, construction might have been completed in two, certainly in three years. I am told on good authority that an average construction of a mile a day, particularly in a prairie country such as we have in the west, is not very great, and an average of one mile per day for three years would have extended that railway from Winnipeg to Edmonton. I know of course that you must take into consideration our winter season, but notwithstanding that I would have thought that the road might have been completed in a good deal less than eight years and that the government need not have extended and should not have extended the time so unduly as they have done. Does my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) remember his exhortations to us last year ? He said he was not with those who cried : To-morrow, and to-morrow and to-morrow, wait, wait wait. The flood-tide was upon us. Is not the flood-tide as much upon us to-day, as it was last year ? Is it not more upon us than last year ? The flood-tide has risen upon us, surely, in the year which has elapsed since he made the speech. Why is it that my right hon. friend's utterances now lack the earnestness which so characterized them last year ? He possibly may also remember that although the flood-tide was upon us last year, although time would not wait last year, not one single step has been taken by the government to survey this eastern division. If the flood-tide was then upon us, if there was a crisis, if time would not wait, why has the government paused during these six or seven months, and taken no steps to secure a survey of the country through which the eastern division is to pass ? Is it as has been whispered in some parts of the country where the eastern division is not popular, is it because the eastern division is to be dropped ? Is it because that division is to be dropped east of North Bay at least ? I do not know, but gentlemen who profess to know what they are talking about are certainly whispering this in Ontario at the present time, if I am correctly informed. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) I suppose derived his expression of to-morrow and to-morrow and to-morrow from a great poet. Might I paraphrase a little and say that the attitude of the government might be expressed in this way :

> To-morrow and to-morrow and to-morrow
> Creeps on this petty pace from day to day,
> And all our yesterdays have seen the route
> Unknown and unsurveyed.

They stand still. Not a step has been taken and the period for the western division has, as I have said, been unduly extended for eight years from last December. Unless the government is able to demonstrate the absolute necessity of this extension, I protest against it ; I protest against in at least so far as the prairie section of the western division is concerned. If the government had given a certain extension of time for the completion of the mountain section, possibly it might not be open to criticism, but they have not imposed upon the company the obligation of completing any portion of the road until December 1st, 1911. Railway facilities, as we know, are urgently demanded in the west at the present time, and yet the only stipulation we have in the contract is that the whole line shall be completed in eight years. I think it would have been wiser for the government to have made some stipulation, more stringent than that which they have imposed in respect of the line between Winnipeg and the point where the mountain section begins, and I regret very much that they have seen fit to make this concession to the Grand Trunk Railway without more consideration.

With respect to paragraph 2, I notice that it is couched in somewhat peculiar terms ; but as any observations I have to make with regard to it will be more suitably made in committee, I shall reserve them for that stage.

As to paragraph 3, it looks somewhat suspicious. It looks as if the intention were to drop the eastern section, with the exception of that part from Winnipeg to North Bay. It would be easy to do that under section 21 of the Act of last session, which provides for staying construction between sessions of parliament. This is the new provision :

> The company shall be entitled to lease from the commissioners to be appointed under the said Act, and to operate such portions of the said eastern division as may from time to time be completed.

Let us suppose that the eastern division is completed from some point at or near North Bay to Winnipeg and a lease is taken, and that the rest of the eastern division is not carried forward any more speedily than were the surveys during the last six months; what will be the result ? The Grand Trunk Railway will have its project exactly as that company proposed it to the government in the first instance. Something has been said, I think, about a portion of the line being probably premature. A whisper of that kind, it is said, is contained, in a circular which was passed among some of the Grand Trunk directors before the recent meeting, and probably further reference will be made to that before this debate is over. My remarks have extended so far that I shall not stop to consider it at present.

With regard to paragraph 4, that certainly is a most valuable concession to the Grand Trunk Railway ; and as we examine one after another all these paragraphs, we are met everywhere with the same situation—concessions to the corporation and none to the country. With wearisome monotony, we see that idea expressed all through the amended contract. Every concession is made to the corporation, but where does the country come in ? We have not so far seen any concession to the country, but perhaps we may strike one before we are through.

Mr. FIELDING. I did not catch something my hon. friend said about some circular distributed to the Grand Trunk meeting. Would the hon. gentleman be kind enough to repeat what he said ?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I say there had been mention of a certain circular or memorandum referred to by some of the Grand Trunk shareholders at their general meeting. I have seen a reference made by Mr. Allen, in his speech at that meeting, to a a circular which had been sent, I think, to the directors, and I think it was made known to some of the shareholders, and in that circular a certain portion of this line, amounting to some 500 miles or hereabouts, was spoken of as probably premature.

Mr. FIELDING. Of that line which the Grand Trunk Railway was to build ?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. No ; the line which the government are to build.

Mr. FIELDING. Does the hon. gentleman know from whom the circular came ?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I only know that I saw this reference to it.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend said somebody would produce it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I will give my hon. friend, before this debate is over, everything we have in our possession with regard to it. There was a reference made to it beyond doubt. I can assure my hon. friend of that, if the report we have of the meeting is correct, and I have every reason to believe it is. As to exactly what the circular was or its terms, I do not know, but the expression which caught my attention was the reference to a statement in it that a portion of the line was probably premature. We may have an opportunity of discussing that later on.

Mr. FIELDING. Will we have the circular ?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. We have not got the circular. I thought I made myself plain to my hon. friend. We have not the circular, but it can be produced by the Grand Trunk Railway. I am not in their confidence, my hon. friend is, and he can produce it if he sees fit.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend has referred to a circular. It was not I who referred to it, and if there is any obligation to produce it, it is on his part.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I stated what I believed to be the truth, because it is contained in a report which I have—a reliable report—of what took place at that meeting. I mentioned that one gentleman at that meeting referred to this circular. I did not say that I had seen it. I have not seen it, but I have seen that gentleman's reference to it, and what particularly caught my attention was his reference to that report as stating that a portion of the line, amounting to about 500 miles, was probably premature. That statement, this gentleman said, was in the circular. I do not know whether he spoke the truth or not. I was not there to hear him make the statement, but the report which came to me of that meeting attributed to him that observation.

This paragraph 4 is a very valuable concession to the Grand Trunk Railway. It commits the government to a guarantee of three-quarters of the cost of the mountain section, no matter what that may be, and it cuts down the Grand Trunk guarantee to a corresponding amount. So far as the country is concerned, it commits it to an indefinite liability. What is the reason for this ? If we are practically to provide all the credit, why not provide the remainder and own the road ? Were we not told in the first place, ad nauseam, that every detail in the contract was agreed to by the Grand Trunk Railway, and that no amendment could be accepted, because everything had been settled ? How then is it that the government have gone back on their professions and on the position they took, and have agreed to that very serious and indefinite liability contained in section 4 ? Let my right hon. friend remember that he is establishing a precedent which may not stop here. I pointed out to him in the House last session that when we were committing ourselves to certain aid to the Grand Trunk Pacific in the mountain section, we should remember that there is another transcontinental line, the Canadian Northern, and that by and by we may have these gentlemen knocking at our door demanding aid. Have we not established a precedent for them or any other transcontinental railway which may afterwards come to parliament for aid when we increase, without any adequate reason, the very generous aid granted the Grand Trunk Railway in respect of the mountain section? My right hon. friend has perhaps not fully considered how apt are these gentlemen, who come to parliament for aid, to cite these precedents. We were giving $30,000 a mile before, now we are giving $37,500 per mile, and the only reasons put forward by my right hon. friend is that there is a certain stringency in the money market, and money is not quite so easy to borrow now as it was some five or six months ago. I did not think that an adequate reason, especially in view of the opinion expressed by the Finance Minister himself, that this stringency is only temporary. That should not be a ground for establishing a precedent to be used afterwards for all time against us, and for imposing upon us permanent obligations, or at least obligations which continue during a period of some fifty years.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Mr. Speaker, shortly before six o'clock, I was referring to a remark made by one of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, in their recent meeting. In order that I may be strictly accurate, I will quote from a report of what he said. I do not wish it to be understood that it was a circular distributed among the shareholders at that meeting, and, if my words would bear that interpretation, I wish to explain that that is not what I meant. He said:

> In an official memorandum I read that the 500 miles—Quebec to North Bay—'is probably premature.'

I do not know what this gentleman intends to refer to by the expression 'official memorandum,' but I understand it to be memorandum of the Grand Trunk itself or of some official or officials of the railway. At all events, that is the statement contained in the report of that gentleman's speech.

Mr. FIELDING. In what paper?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. It is not from any paper. It is from a stenographic report of this gentleman's speech—

Mr. FIELDING. By whom?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I will endeavour to gratify the somewhat fastidious curiosity of my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding). He is described as Mr. James W. Mills, 13 Cheverton Road, Hornsey Lane, W.

Mr. FIELDING. Is it published in any newspaper?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. No. But I understand that this gentleman is a responsible man. I do not know that publishing it in any newspaper would add to its authenticity. But if my hon. friend thinks otherwise, it could be published in a newspaper during the week.

In the course of my remarks I have examined the provisions of this supplemental agreement as far as section 5. I come now to that section. It provides as follows:

> The government may and shall, preserving always the proportions in the said contract provided as between the prairie and mountain sections of the western division, implement for the purposes and subject otherwise to the provisions of the said contract, its guarantee of the bonds of the said company to be issued for the cost of construction of the said western division, in such manner as may be agreed upon, so as to make the proceeds of the said bonds so to be guaranteed a sum equal to seventy-five per centum of the cost of construction of the western division ascertained as provided in the said contract, but not exceeding in respect of the prairie section, thirteen thousand dollars ($13,000) per mile.

As I have already remarked, this obliges the government to increase the guarantee to a somewhat indefinite extent and it opens up means of manipulating the bonds so as to secure great profits. There does not seem to be any check on the commission to be charged for placing the bonds—the section does not contain any direct provision of that nature. Under this section, it seems to me, the road could be very largely constructed at the expense of the government, even as to that portion intended to be provided for out of the bonds of the Grand Trunk. The government, apparently, has no control over the rates at which the bonds shall be placed—there is no express provision in the contract to give them that control. Can they control the commissions to be charged for placing the bonds? This section seems to be enormously in favour of the corporation, and the checks, if any have been provided to control the placing of these bonds, are altogether insufficient.

Now, I come to sections 6, 7, and 8, which, I think, may be considered together. They have been quoted by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. They relate to the period of time which shall constitute a default on the part of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company in meeting the bonds guaranteed by the government, and they also deal with the remedy of the government if that default proceeds to such an extent as to justify the government in taking action. Last year, very great stress was laid by the members of the government, and particularly by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fitzpatrick) upon the provision that, if default was made in respect of these bonds the government could at once enter into possession. It could do more than that—it could foreclose:

it could have this property sold, could buy it in, I suppose, and operate the line itself. But what is the provision we have here? No action can be taken by the government unless the company is five years in default to the government in respect of the bonds which the government shall have guaranteed. But the company may be in default for four years and six months, and may so remain during the entire period for which the bonds were issued, and apparently, under the terms of this supplemental agreement, the government can not take any action at all. Therefore, it is open to the company to allow the government to provide interest for four years and six months on the bonds guaranteed; then the company can made the subsequent payments, leaving the government during the remaining years for which the bonds are to run without any remedy at all, and without receiving any interest upon the amount which it had advanced. If I am wrong in believing that to be the effect of the contract my hon. friend the Minister of Justice will be able to correct me when he comes to consider the question in committee. But if the company becomes in default for more than five years, what is the position of the government? Last year, great emphasis was laid on the fact that the government could foreclose. But that remedy is gone; the government cannot foreclose. It can require that a receiver be appointed. But during the continuation of the receivership, capital will be required for the maintenance of the road and for improvements. Who will be called upon to provide this capital? The government, of course. A road operated by a receiver or manager appointed under such circumstances is usually not so efficiently run as by a strong and financially capable corporation. Great emphasis was placed last year upon the fact that the government had a first mortgage. It is not a first mortgage now, because, if any surplus arises during the period of the receivership, that is not to be appropriated to the bonds guaranteed by the government, but 75 per cent only is to be appropriated to the bonds guaranteed by the government and 25 per cent to the bonds guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Railway Company. The government is placed in exactly the same position, it seems to me, as the Grand Trunk Railway Company in respect of the bonds guaranteed by it. The government does not get really a mortgage at all. For, you cannot foreclose it. It is simply an instrument creating a charge under which the government cannot foreclose, but can enter into possession and operate the road, using the surplus earnings of the road for the purpose of defraying interest upon the bonds guaranteed by the government and the interest upon the bonds guaranteed by the company, in the proportion of 75 per cent for the one and 25 per cent for the other. Now, what is the reason for this change? Is it not true, as was stated by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Justice last year that the conditions of the original agreement were thoroughly understood and assented to by the Grand Trunk Railway Company? Why should the country occupy a different position from that which was absolutely agreed to last year? For what purpose has this change been made? What pressure has been brought to bear upon the government to do away with that which, last year, was thought to be of importance and on which, in their official statements to the House and the country the government placed a great deal of reliance. It seems to me that this provision opens up a rather curious possibility. And it is this:

During a time of prosperity the interest upon the bonds guaranteed by the government may be paid by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, and that may go on during a period of commercial expansion, during a period when the country is prosperous. The company may even during that period remain in default for four years and six months. But when a time of depression comes, when it may not be convenient that that railway should continue to be operated by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, the government will be obliged to take hold of it if further default is made. Then for five, ten or fifteen years, this government will be allowed to keep that road in its possession, to advance any moneys necessary for its operation and maintenance during a period of depression; but when the time of expansion again comes, when back interest has been paid up, then the government will have to give up the road, and the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, which is only another name in that regard for the Grand Trunk Company, will take it again and earn all the profits that can be obtained out of the road during the further period of commercial expansion. It does not seem to me that there is any justification for a stipulation of that kind which was not in the contract as originally framed, a contract which had obtained the assent and approval of the gentlemen who are now asking for these modifications.

I come now to paragraph 9, and it does seem to me that in this paragraph the government has excelled itself. Paragraph 9 deals with a matter that was very much discussed in this House last year, the possibility of speculation by the Grand Trunk Railway Company in a very large amount of stock of this company which admittedly is to be handed over to the Grand Trunk Railway Company without any consideration except what is called their support of this scheme. Let me read the clause:

Notwithstanding anything in the 27th paragraph of the said contract contained, the Grand Trunk Railway Company shall not, after the acquisition of the twenty-five million dollars of common stock therein mentioned (less shares held by directors, not exceeding one thousand), be prevented from making any such disposition of such common stock as the said Grand Trunk Railway may deem expedient, provided however that the said Grand Trunk Railway Company shall, during the delay mentioned in the said paragraph, continue to hold a majority of the said stock by such title as shall enable the said Grand Trunk Railway Company to control the policy of the company.

The last words of that paragraph are very significant, and I will deal with them later on. Mr. Speaker, every hon. gentlemen in this House will remember the position that members of the government took with regard to this stock last year. Amendments were moved from this side of the House more than once, requiring that the Grand Trunk Company should pay for that stock at par, and arguments were advanced on this side of the House showing that if that stock should pass, as we apprehended it would pass, into the hands of the Grand Trunk Railway Company for a mere nominal consideration, or for no consideration, that stock being afterwards held by the Grand Trunk Railway Company would be used for the purpose of increasing the rates exacted from the people of this country for the purpose of paying dividends on that stock. Now there is no doubt as to the attitude which the government then took, because it was repeated over and over again in the strongest possible terms by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, and by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice at least once, and by other members of the government. I do not know whether the official declarations, the solemn declarations, which were then made are to be regarded by my right hon. friend as having been relegated to the limbo of scraps. But let me read to him a few of them, and if there ever was a more extraordinary change of front than that which is presented by the document now placed before parliament for ratification, I would like some hon. gentleman on the other side of the House to point it out. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance, in answer to objections made from this side of the House, used this language; at page 8570 of the 'Hansard':

We have provided that practically the common stock of this company, to the full extent of $25,000,000, shall be held, not by promoters, not even by the old Grand Trunk Railway promoters individually, but by the Grand Trunk Railway Company itself * * * * I want to know where there is a chance for promoters when they can only hold 1,000 shares against 249,000.

But the stock is now to be put upon the market, is now to be speculated with, and the reason which was put forward as a strong and cogent reason by the Minister of Finance last year absolutely disappears. But let me quote again from that hon. gentleman a little further on:

If the Grand Trunk Railway acquired that stock at a comparatively small sum and afterwards floated it on the market at a higher sum, that would be a proceeding which might be open to objection.

Well, we know from the declarations made at the Grand Trunk meeting, we know from the comment upon those declarations made in financial papers of the highest class in London, that the Grand Trunk Railway Company expects to receive that stock, the whole of the $25,000,000 of that stock, for the support which they are giving to this enterprise. I will deal with the amount of that support later on. But the Minister of Finance continued as follows:

But the Grand Trunk Company must not only take this stock, but hold it for all time; they cannot put a dollar of it on the market. It is absolutely impossible to buy a share of that stock; it must be held by the Grand Trunk Railway Company itself and no person can buy or sell a share. Where then comes in the chance of speculation?

That was my hon. friend's standard argument. Yet in face of that declaration by this government, we have a clause which puts more than $12,000,000 of that stock in the market for speculation. But we do not know for what reason the government is permitting this, because my right hon. friend this afternoon absolutely threw no light whatever upon that question. But that is not all. The Minister of Finance, if I may quote him again, and if I may be permitted to regard his official declarations in this House as not scrap, went on further:

I maintain that we are not at all concerned as to what these two companies do in reference to that. If it were stock that was to be placed in the market and sold I could at once recognize that we would have a great deal of interest in it.

That interest, Mr. Speaker, seems to have been absolutely lost when this supplementary agreement was entered into by this government. My hon. friend continued:

If this stock were to be put in the market, taken over by the Grand Trunk Railway Company at 5 cents on the dollar, and in later years it passed into the hands of other people at 100 cents on the dollar, if the question of freight rates comes to be adjusted at any time and it becomes a question whether we are to have such freight rates as will earn a fair dividend on the 100 cents that the present holder paid, or on the 25 cents that originally went into the treasury, there certainly is much to be said in favour of the man who purchased the stock and who says: I paid 100 cents on the dollar for it.

That is to say, when this Grand Trunk Company takes $12,000,000 of this stock which it receives for the support it gives to this enterprise, and puts that into the hands of bona fide purchasers, those men will be entitled, according to the admission of the Minister of Finance, to come by and by and say : We have paid 100 cents on the dollar, and we want you so to fix the rates upon these western lines that we shall receive fair and just dividends upon the money. But Sir, that is not all. Let me quote further from my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, because of all the Ministers of the Crown he was the most pronounced and the most emphatic on this subject. He said :

The strength of this enterprise is to be found in the fact that the Grand Trunk Railway Company are not only behind it but they are in it and of it. If the Grand Trunk Railway Company take over this new stock of 25 cents on the dollar, they cannot sell it to anybody at 26 cents on the dollar the next day, and they cannot sell it later on for 100 cents on the dollar. It must stay in the treasury of the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

But, in order that there may be no doubt about the position of the government in this regard, my hon. friend the Finance Minister was even more emphatic than that later on. Although he was assisted on one occasion by the hon. Minister of Justice, he apparently took charge of this matter on behalf of the government, because he put forward forcibly and cogently, as he always does, the best argument that could be made in support of the position which the government assumed at that time. He continued as follows :

The stock will not be allowed to go into the market and pass into the hands of other persons, and possibly at a later stage, be treated, in the fixing of freight rates, as capital at a fictitious value.

The stock will not be allowed to go into the market, he said. Well, under this provision, as I understand it, stock to the extent of $12,000,000 is to be allowed to go into the market, is to be allowed at a later stage to be treated, in the fixing of freight rates, as capital at a fictitious value. I would like to know the reasons, if there are any, which have induced the government to make this tremendous concession, fraught with so much importance to the people of this country with reference to freight rates. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance continued as follows :

We think it important, for several reasons, that the Grand Trunk should take and hold that stock and not dispose of it.....Therefore, we insist that they shall acquire, take and hold that stock.

When and why did they stop so insisting ? That was the position of the government at that time. They were insisting. If they were so insisting at that time, why did they afterwards assent to this provision of an exactly contrary import ? We are treated to-day to an entirely different position of affairs, to a new contract, a new stipulation, which permits every one of the evils against which my hon. friend the Minister of Finance last year said that the country was absolutely and entirely safeguarded. But, that is not all. I do not wish to weary the House with these quotations, but I think it is of importance to have these declarations—I might call them pledges—which were made to the country by so important a member of the government as my hon. friend the Minister of Finance placed at some length before parliament and the people for the purpose of eliciting an answer, if answer there be, as to why it is that in respect to this most important matter so extraordinary a change of attitude is presented by the government. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance went farther. He said :

We claim that we do get from the old Grand Trunk Company two things of importance to which I have referred--one that they should take and hold the stock and thus identify themselves closely with the undertaking, and the second that they should become the guarantors of the bonds to the extent of one quarter or possibly more of the balance required for the building of the western division. In these two things we have obligations on the part of the Grand Trunk which we think are of value ; and, if additional obligations on the part of the old Grand Trunk Company are asked, as in the amendment of my hon. friend, all we can say is that they are not in the contract, and we have no right to demand them.

Apparently the Grand Trunk Railway Company had the right to demand that this position taken by the government so strongly and so firmly through the mouth of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance should be absolutely departed from, and that speculation in the stock which is admitted to be so fraught with evil to the public should be permitted for some reason which has not been fully disclosed to the House. But let me give one or two more quotations from my hon. friend, because he has placed the evil, which he now permits, so strongly and forcibly before the country, that I cannot do better than let the country have the full benefit of the opinion which he was not slow to announce at that time. He said :

The Grand Trunk Company would be delighted to have that clause stricken out, so that they might be allowed to take that stock up and float it in the money market if they pleased, no doubt.

My hon. friend thoroughly realized the situation at that time, and he continued as follows :

That, I have no doubt, would be more gratifying to the promoters of this enterprise.

Well, the promoters of this enterprise have every reason to be gratified now, because they have exactly that which my hon. friend said they should not have, and by what means they got it he has not informed us. He has not been quite so eloquent as usual in explaining these matters, certainly not nearly so eloquent as he was in regard to this railway last year. Let me continue the quotation which I am reading :

We have put that limitation in, not to please the Grand Trunk Company but as an additional guarantee to the people that the stock is not going to be placed in the market and floated at a fictitious value.

They did not put it in to please the Grand Trunk Railway Company, but evidently they took it out to please the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and they took it out without any justification whatever, if the arguments so forcibly presented to the House and the ccuntry last year by the Finance Minister are of any value whatever. He continued :

I say, unhesitatingly, that it would be better to give it to the Grand Trunk, even without any other condition, than it would be to have it dealt out to be used by stock speculators in the market.

And now the company is presented with that clause. Does the country hail with joy a clause which permits that stock to be dealt out to be used by stock speculators in the market ? Is that what my right hon. friend calls an exceedingly reasonable and moderate provision in the light of the language used by his most important colleague in discussing this subject in the House last year ? Well, it would seem to me that a little more explanation is due to the House and the country than anything we have yet heard from the right hon. Prime Minister. But that is not all. I have one other little quotation from my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, with which I will trouble the House if I am not inflicting his views to too great an extent on the House and the country. He said :

But we are protecting the people against any such condition, because we are refusing the company the power to put a dollar's worth of that stock on the market and sell it to any one. It is not negotiable, it cannot get in the stock market, it cannot be the subject of speculation; no innocent third party will be able to come and say : I paid in good faith 100 cents on the dollar for that stock and am entitled to get a dividend on what I paid. We have stipulated that the stock cannot be put on the market. It must remain in the hands of the Grand Trunk Railway during the term of this lease.

Mr. Speaker, is it conceivable that declarations of that kind should be made by the government of this country in regard to so important a matter as this, that they should be made in the month of September or October, 1903, and that in the following month of February the government would deliberately execute and enter into a contract stultifying every one of its words which I have quoted ? Is it conceivable that the right hon. Prime Minister of this country would dare to come down to parliament without some better explanation than he has given to-night in regard to this most extraordinary change ? What is the meaning of it all ? Here is language of the most pronounced character, here are evils pointed out by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, here, in these quotations, he declaims upon the dangers of stock speculation. He says here that not one dollar of this shall be placed upon the stock market for the purpose of speculation ; he says that the Grand Trunk would be very glad to strike out the restriction, but the government will take good care that it shall be kept in—and yet, within four months after that, this stapulation is taken out, and more than $12,000,000 worth of this stock is handed over to be speculated in.

But my hon. friend the Minister of Finance was not the only member of the government who took that position. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fitzpatrick) took the same ground, and here is his argument :

My hon. friend's fear is that this stock, issued at a low figure, and falling into the hands of the public, will afterwards be taken into account, and the question of freight rates will be considered. My hon. friend has overlooked the fact that the $25,000,000 of common stock, under the contract, is to pass into the hands of the Grand Trunk Company and will not be dealt with on the same principle as it would be if it had passed into the hands of the general public. That company will have to take this stock and hold it, which would not be the case with the general public.

Let me say, that if the Minister of Justice overlooked something on that occasion, the government would seem to have overlooked something on this occasion, viz.: That all the evils that have been portrayed by these gentlemen are now before the country, that the country is face to face with them, and that the country will have to encounter them if parliament sees fit to ratify this contract which contains a stipulation wholly inconsistent with the declarations of the government last session, as to what is in the public interest.

But that is not all. There was a gentleman with us last session who is not with us now ; I refer to Mr. Blair, the Chairman of the Railway Commission. The judgment, the ability, and the integrity of Mr. Blair have been certified to by the government in every possible way. They have been certified to, not only by his appointment to the chairmanship of the Railway Commission, but by the declaration of the Prime Minister in this House during the present session. Let me quote what I believe to be the words of Mr. Blair, and which, if my information is correct, were communicated by him to his colleagues ; let me quote his views on the subject ; and if I am mistaken in any way as to the authenticity of this memorandum from which I am quoting, let me say that the words which I attribute to Mr.

Blair and which I believe were used by Mr. Blair in discussing this matter with his colleagues, are words which carry great weight of themselves whether they are uttered by Mr. Blair or by any one else. Mr. Blair said :

Any new transcontinental lines should be built under conditions which would make every dollar of bonds and every share of stock available in cash as near the face value as possible. If bonds may be disposed of by companies at a large discount, and stock distributed gratuitously, or on terms which produce little or no cash at all for construction and equipment purposes—which has been forbidden by law—the business such railways may do will for dividend purposes be always unduly burdened and will be a grave handicap for all time to the development of the interior. With capital shares and bonds ultimately coming into the hands of innocent buyers at prices increasing with the growth of the railway traffic, it will be impossible for either a Railway Commission or the government itself to reduce tolls below a dividend-paying basis.

That is the opinion of an expert who is certified as such, by the Prime Minister of Canada ; certified as the best man in Canada for filling the position of railway commissioner. That is the deliberate opinion of this gentleman, and it is absolutely at variance with the position which the government takes in asking that parliament shall amend this contract by inserting the stipulation now proposed. Mr. Blair continues :

An appeal from the holders of the company's bonds and shares, to fix tolls sufficiently high to ensure a moderate dividend, cannot easily be resisted, and as a consequence the country, through its business and traffic, is in effect as much charged, though indirectly, with the weight of these obligations as if the amount was covered by an issue of government bonds.

Moreover, the system is not sound. Why should a few people be allowed to make themselves millionaires in such a way ? No one nowadays puts his money into the capital shares of a railway company at the inception of the undertaking. It has been done hitherto, it is not done now, and why not ? Because with the government assistance supplementing the sale of bonds the railroad can be built. And yet capital shares are issued by the million and appear later, when the enterprise becomes a success, in the hands of the purchasers who clamor for dividends upon them.

This is the way in which the question will present itself to the very man whom the government have put at the head of that railway commission which has to regulate these rates. He says : They are not easily to be resisted ; issue that stock for nothing and place it in the hands of promoters who can put it upon the stock market, and afterwards it will come up in the hands of men who have paid one hundred cents on the dollar for it, and their demands for dividends, as Mr. Blair says, are not easily to be resisted. He continues :

The objection to this system applies with great force to railways in our western country, where the drawbacks of a long haul to reach the market must always make a moderate or reasonable railway toll a vital consideration. It may not be possible to repair the errors of the past. It is possible to prevent their repetition in the case of new railway undertakings in the future, and the remedy lies in the immediate adoption of a policy which will ensure the construction of railways running east and west and traversing over rich undeveloped regions in the west, under conditions which will limit the amount of dividends to be paid based upon the actual cost of these undertakings.

And, Mr. Speaker, if I understand the position of affairs aright, that is a position from which the government absolutely departs in proposing the amendment to parliament which is contained in this supplementary Bill.

But there are some insignificant words in the concluding portion of this paragraph, to which public attention should be directed, and they are these :

Provided, however, that the said Grand Trunk Railway Company shall during the delay mentioned in the said paragraph, continue to hold a majority of the said stock by such title as shall enable the Grand Trunk Railway Company to control the policy of the company.

I am not an expert in the dealings of railway promoters, nor do I profess to know thoroughly the means by which railway trusts in the United States have been organized and carried on ; but those who are more familiar with such matters than I am, have informed me that by means of what is called a voting trust, stock may be sold and the control of it retained by the persons who desire or are obliged to retain control of it ; so that twenty-five millions dollars of stock, let us say, might be put upon the stock market, and yet the Grand Trunk Railway Company might by a certain stipulation retain such power as to voting as to enable it to control the policy of the Grand Trunk Pacific. I understand that such arrangements are made in the United States ; I have been told so by persons who have bought stock upon which they have not a right to vote. Although they receive the dividends upon it, and although they are in every other respect the holders of such stock, nevertheless the right to vote on it is controlled by a trust ; and if that arrangement is contemplated—as it seems to be contemplated by the concluding words of that paragraph—then, Sir, it would enable the Grand Trunk Railway Company, to put not twelve millions, but twenty-five millions of this stock on the market in such a way. What are these gentlemen to give for this stock ? What does Sir Rivers-Wilson say about it in his speech delivered at the recent meeting of the shareholders. He said :

I must not forget to mention that in return for the support which we ask you to accord to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, the Grand Trunk Company will retain a controlling interest in that company, and will become the possessors of the whole of the common stock, amounting to $25,000,000, or £5,000,000.

The 'Financial Times' of London, an eminent financial authority, in its issue of March 9, 1904, says in reference to this:

In return for its assistance the Grand Trunk receives the whole of the common stock of the new company, amounting to 25 million dollars, which one may regard as waste paper or as an asset having enormous possibilities in the way of eventual appreciation—according to the view one happens to take of the prospects of the new line.

What does the Grand Trunk Railway Company give in the way of support to this new enterprise? It gives, in the first place, its financial assistance for the purpose of putting up a $5,000,000 deposit, which has been deposited during the past month of March by this company. Sir Rivers-Wilson, or some director of the company said, what is undoubtedly the fact, that every dollar of that $5,000,000 will be handed back eventually to the Grand Trunk Railway Company. It is contemplated to hand back that money eventually and Sir Rivers-Wilson said further that the putting up of that sum would not cost the Grand Trunk Railway Company one farthing. How that is to be arranged I do not know, but that is the statement made at the directors' meeting.

What else is it to do? It is to guarantee the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company to an amount of less than three million pounds, two million nine hundred and some odd thousand pounds sterling, a little more than fourteen and a half million of dollars. There are two partners in this enterprise, the government, which is to incur obligations of not less than $150,000,000, of which a considerable portion must be paid in cash, and the Grand Trunk Railway Company which is to pay no cash at all, at least not for many years, and is to guarantee bonds to an amount of less than $15,000,000. That is to say, the obligation which the Grand Trunk Railway Company undertakes are less than one tenth of the obligations which the country undertakes for the purpose of building this Grand Trunk Pacific line.

But when it comes to a question of compensation, the Grand Trunk Railway Company which has been in the back ground so far as support is concerned, comes to the front at once as soon as the question of compensation is mooted and it is to receive $25,000,000 of the common stock of the Grand Trunk Pacific for the support which it thus gives. May I be permitted to ask, Mr. Speaker, where the country comes in on that deal? The country gives ten times the support to that enterprise that the Grand Trunk Railway Company gives. The Grand Trunk besides taking over the western division as its own and obtaining the eastern division for nothing for ten years, with a lease at a low rental for forty years more, receives $25,000,000 worth of stock for its support and the country is to receive nothing. Why does not the government insist that this stock shall be held by the country instead of by the Grand Trunk Railway Company? Is there any objection to that? Ought there to be any objection to that? Would not that have some advantages? Would there be anything incongruous in it? Does not the government of Great Britain hold a controlling interest in the shares of the Suez Canal? Would not this country be in a better position if the government were to hold a controlling interest in the stock of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company? If the government held the stock they could forego dividends in order to give lower rates, and if dividends were paid they would go back to the people from whom they were received. The government would control the policy of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company and make the road a thoroughly Canadian road, and, last but not least, the government could prevent the diversion of traffic to the United States ports and centres. None of these results can be accomplished by giving to the Grand Trunk Railway Company common stock of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company to the extent of $25,000,000. I do not know any reason why in view of the conditions under which this road is to be built, in view of the support which the country on one hand and the Grand Trunk Railway on the other are to give to this enterprise, I do not know of any reason why $25,000,000 of common stock should be given to the Grand Trunk Railway Company while the country receives no corresponding or compensating advantage. It does seen to me that my hon. friend, in revising this contract, has taken a position which is not in the interests of this country. I know that the directors of the Grand Trunk Railway Company at a recent meeting declared to the shareholders that the interests of the Grand Trunk were thoroughly safeguarded, and I think they were very safe in making that statement, but I would like to have it demonstrated a little more to my satisfaction, that the interests of the country are thoroughly safeguarded. It is all very well to allay any apprehensions that the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway may have, but so far as we in this parliament are concerned, it behoves us to see that the interests of the country are safeguarded, with at least as strong provisions as those which protect the interests of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

Now I come to paragraph 10 and 11 of this agreement, which deal with the rights of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company at the end of 50 years. Paragraph 10 is as follows :

Paragraph twenty-one of the said contract is amended by adding thereto the following clause :—

'Provided, further, that, in the event of the government determining to undertake the operation of the said eastern division, the company shall be entitled for a further period of fifty years to such running powers and haulage rights as may be necessary to continuity of operation between the said western division and other portions of the company's system and the Grand Trunk Railway system upon such terms as may from time to time be agreed upon, or as may from time to time, in case of failure so to agree, be determined in the manner provided by paragraph 24 (2) hereof, which is hereby made applicable to cases arising under this paragraph.

Paragraph 11 of the agreement declares that :

In case, during the currency of the lease of the eastern division, the company shall have constructed a branch line or lines running from a point or points in the said eastern division, the government shall, if at the expiration of the said lease, it shall determine to undertake the operation of the said eastern division, take over such branch line or lines as the company may elect not to retain, at such value as may be agreed upon, or as may, in case of failure so to agree, be determined in the manner provided by paragraph 24 (2) of the said contract, which is hereby made applicable to cases arising under this paragraph. If any such branch line or lines shall have received any grant or grants under the provisions of any Act of the parliament of Canada, the amount of such grant or grants without interest, shall be deducted from such value and the difference only shall be payable by the government upon the taking over of such branch line or lines.

The company will build branches and during 50 years it will find out which of these branches are profitable and which unprofitable. At the end of 40 years it can simply say to the government : This branch and that branch and the other branch we have found to be unprofitable. We have made a mistake in building them, they have been of no use to us as feeders of our line, we elect not to retain them, and you must therefore take them over and pay for them. But all the valuable branches, those which control the trade of the country, without which the eastern division may be of very small value indeed—all these the Grand Trunk Pacific will retain. And by the erection of terminals at important junction points, the Grand Trunk Railway may also control the situation in another way ; so that at the end of the period of forty years, the government will find itself absolutely at the mercy of the Grand Trunk Pacific and be forced to accept such terms as may be dictated by the company.

Needless to say, the original agreement, as amended by this subsequent agreement, puts out of sight not only for fifty years, but possibly for a century, any possibility of extending the government system of railways throughout the length and breadth of this continent. That possibility is put entirely in the background. This government, I say, has no mandate at present to enter into any such agreement as will put the possibility of government ownership in this country absolutely out of sight. There is a feeling growing among the people in favour of government ownership. That feeling may or may not develop, but I do say that it is not wise or prudent for the government, and the government has no mandate to impose such a condition in this contract as will prevent the country at some future time, if it desires so to do, from extending the system of government railways across the continent.

Let me now say a few words with regard to the general subject. Our proposal last year was to extend the Intercolonial Railway to Georgian Bay. That is a proposal by which I for one am still prepared to stand. My right hon. friend said, I think, on one occasion, that Mr. Blair denounced our proposal as a mad scheme. But our proposal to extend the Intercolonial to Georgian Bay is one which has always commended itself to Mr. Blair, and as to which he has expressed himself publicly in very strong language. When my right hon. friend the Prime Minister suggests that Mr. Blair denounced the scheme we proposed as a mad one, I do not think he will find any warrant for that statement in any language used by Mr. Blair. Mr. Blair certainly did denounce the scheme of the government, not only as mad, but as an unjustifiable and wanton waste of public money, but he never made use of any such language with regard to the scheme we proposed. If he ever used any such language with regard to the extension of the Intercolonial to Georgian Bay, he would have expressed himself absolutely in contradiction to what he said in a carefully prepared memorandum. In that memorandum Mr. Blair said this :

The observations thus far made by the undersigned amply justify the conclusion that it is quite misleading to look for a fair test of the principle of government ownership in the experience of the Intercolonial, or to condemn that principle as inherently defective because in the comparison of net results the showing as between the corporation railways and the government railway is unfavourable to the latter. There is no good reason which can be suggested, or which in the opinion of the undersigned actually exists, why the government of Canada cannot apply and work out the principle of government ownership as successfully as it is being worked out in other British dependencies and in foreign lands.

That is the language, not of any ordinary individual, but of a man who is regarded by the government more capable than any other in Canada to deal with railway questions, and who, for that reason, has been placed by this government at the head of the Railway Commission. Further on Mr. Blair said :

There is one certain means of putting the Intercolonial upon an interest paying basis, and that is by the extension of its line.

Does that strike you, Sir, as characterizing the scheme which I proposed as a mad one. It strikes me rather as commending that scheme as wise and prudent.

The Montreal extension has done much ; but a further extension will do more. While the government railway has captured the larger part of the traffic originating in Montreal and destined for inland eastern and even export points, it has no connections west and is allowed to take only what traffic the two corporation railways do not care to retain themselves. All winter shipments from the west ordinarily reach the seaports of St. John or Portland via the Canadian Pacific and Grand Trunk respectively, and although the Intercolonial is fairly well placed to carry freight to Halifax and St. John, it must always remain excluded from that portion of the business arising west of Montreal, so long as present conditions continue.

That is an elaboration of what Mr. Blair had just said, and I commend it to the Prime Minister as the statement of a man who has received his highest approbation, not only by appointment to the Railway Commission, but also by my right hon. friend's eulogium of him during the present session. Mr. Blair continued as follows :

The undersigned has long held the opinion that a port on the Georgian Bay should be reached by the Intercolonial, and thus a connection had with the Canadian Northern by water transport, open and practicable for from four to six weeks longer than canal navigation. The Canadian Northern would gladly co-operate with the government railway, as it has no other railway connection nor any interest antagonistic to the government system. Duluth and Chicago would be in touch with the Intercolonial, and direct through rates could be arranged to Montreal or Lévis during the summer season, and to St. John and Halifax during the winter.

And the government has demonstrated, by the information it gave the House this session, the absolute feasibility of carrying grain from Georgian Bay to Halifax at a fairly good profit—a profit far better than that at which the Intercolonial carries a very large portion of its freight, I will venture to say. But Mr. Blair went on to say :

By the construction of storage elevators on a sufficient scale to hold grain in quantities not going forward until navigation closed, a large and ever-increasing traffic would find its way over Canadian territory and by government railway to the ocean through the gateways of Halifax and St. John.

Not only would it find its way in increasing volume, but at such fairly paying rates as would wipe out the deficit on the Intercolonial, of which we hear so much, and would place that road on a very good and paying basis. Mr. Blair then continued as follows :

The advantage of such extension to the Intercolonial can hardly be over-estimated. If the Canada Atlantic system were acquired a traffic-producing section of the country, with a growing local business already created, would be found on the western portion of the line ; while St. John, Halifax and Sydney at the other end would equalize the existing conditions and carry the intermediate section, a section which, it is only fair to say, has within the last few years shown signs of considerable progress and before the lapse of many years may be expected to be self-sustaining.

Let me state that argument in my own words, as I understand it. Mr. Blair says we have in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick a splendid paying portion of the Intercolonial, but that portion has been handicapped by the fact that the line from Moncton north to the province of Quebec has not been a paying portion. He says the Intercolonial is cut off from western connections. Acquire the Canada Atlantic, or expropriate it, and you will have these results. In the first place, you wil have in the east of Canada a splendid paying portion of the Intercolonial. In the second place you will have in the west the Canada Atlantic system, or some other system possibly constructed by the government itself, and that will be a paying road running, as it will be, through a country where there is no water competition.

And further than that, you have the possibility of an enormous through-traffic, by the Canada Atlantic, if acquired by the government, over the Intercolonial to Halifax and St. John. And, putting all these things together, he says there can be no doubt of the wisdom of acquiring that railway and thus completing the extension of the Intercolonial which was begun when it was extended from Lévis to Montreal. That is the view which I am commending to the government because it is the view of a man upon whose judgment they cannot pass any reflection. If Mr. Blair does not understand something about transportation in this country, surely he would not have been put in the position he now occupies. If he had not made a study of railway problems, he would not have received this mark of the government's confidence. But my right hon. friend was so impressed with his ability, that putting to one side the strong speech Mr. Blair had levelled at his project, putting aside even the reflections which Mr. Blair had cast upon the government, but looking only at the public interest he said : Here is the man of all men in Canada to deal with these questions. I give my right hon. friend this gentleman's opinion as to what ought to be done. Does this seem like calling the acquisition of the Canada Atlantic a mad scheme ? On the contrary, he says it will prove the salvation of the Intercolonial Railway? And why has not the government adopted this course ? The only reason that has ever been given to the House by my right hon. friend, I think, was that celebrated vision of his when he stood at Depot Harbour, and, looking out upon the wild waste of waters, came to the conclusion that the government could not engage agents to canvas for freight and could not have anything to do with steamships. These considerations do not seem to have impressed themselves upon Mr. Blair, who, of all other men in the country, according to the opinion of the government, has most closely studied and best understands the problems which attend the question of transportation. Mr. Blair continued :

If the Canada Atlantic system were taken over by the Intercolonial, the tolls now in force on that line could be maintained. No complaints have been made with respect to these tolls. That they are moderate and acceptable to the people who use the railway is shown by the entire absence of agitation, public or otherwise, against them. That these rates are also profitable is shown by the net results for the year 1902, which amounted to $618,000, or 4 per cent on $15,000,000 after paying all operating expenses for the year and making large outlay upon betterments.

Then, Sir, summing up the whole situation, Mr. Blair's view is this :

From the purely Canadian, national point of view, the Intercolonial would then have advantages over any other railway in Canada. Its traffic would find an outlet during the summer months at Montreal and Quebec, and during the winter at Halifax, and St. John, and there is good reason to believe that it would give the two Atlantic seaports (the Canadian Pacific also serving at St. John) all the business they could conveniently handle for some time to come ; and moreover, from the point of view of its paying prospects, the outlook is in the highest degree encouraging. At present there are 400 miles of good paying railway at the eastern end of the Intercolonial Railway. Extension to the Georgian Bay, by way of the Canada Atlantic Railway, would give 300 or 400 miles of profitable railway at the western end, and, as has already been pointed out, these two ends together would be able to carry financially the less productive and intervening section and afford a substantial surplus towards paying interest on the capital outlay.

Let me commend this view of the situation to my right hon. friend, and let me ask him whether, in view of these strong and forcible words of this man whose judgment he so much commends, there is not reason for drawing back from what the government are doing at the present time—reasons for seeking some better solution of the transportation problem than is afforded by this measure ? The government need not be afraid of drawing back. They have already receded from their position on a dozen or more different points, even from the most solemn declarations have been made by Ministers of the Crown. It would be impossible for them to depart further from their professions than they have already done. And, though they have ridiculed the idea of extending the Intercolonial to the Georgian Bay it is not too late for them to draw back. Let me commend this to my right hon. friend in the same spirit which prompted him to believe that we on this side would regard this agreement as eminently reasonable and satisfactory. There is time for repentance, even for this government, and the extension of the Intercolonial to Georgian Bay would be a bringing forth of fruit meet for repentance, at which I am sure, the country would greatly rejoice. The development of the Intercolonial Railway, the operation of the government system upon a larger basis than at present, would probably bring about a better management of that railway, and would tend to produce better results than we have hitherto had—not only for the reasons to which I have adverted and which have been put forcibly by Mr. Blair, but for the reason that if this system became a very great system, the fierce light of public opinion beating upon it in all parts of the country would necessitate better and more economical management and one less subject to political influences than has prevailed in the past. As I said last session, I would like to see the Intercolonial absolutely free, if possible, from party political interference. And, if it were extended to Georgian Bay I believe not only the province of Ontario, but the great west as well, would receive very great benefits. We should thus have better control of rates than we could obtain by any railway commission or any similar tribunal, however efficient. Every reason that has been advanced by the able men at the head of the Grand Trunk Railway Company for pushing that railway into the Northwest seems to me to be applicable of the Intercolonial Railway. These gentlemen of the Grand Trunk regard it as imperatively necessary that their road should reach the Northwest. Mr. Hays very plainly points out that if they do not extend it to the Northwest they may not in future, be able to pay dividends on stock which is now returning something to the shareholders. Well, if it is a good thing for the Grand Trunk Railway to extend into the Northwest, why is it not, for the same reason, a good thing for the Intercolonial Railway to extend to Georgian Bay ? The reasons which make it desirable for the Grand Trunk to go into the Northwest to get its share of traffic make it not only advisable but necessary for the Intercolonial, if it propose to secure a part of the western traffic, to have its line extended to the Georgian Bay.

Now, I suggested last session that it might be possible for the government to devise some means by which the line of railway now running north of Lake Superior could be utilized for the purposes of more than one railway system. I pointed out that that road is capable of handling, I believe, five or ten times the traffic it handles at present; and I made the suggestion—which I said was subject to first obtaining expert advice and expert opinion—that the government could come to an arrangement with the Canadian Pacific, the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk by which that road might be utilized for the purpose of the three railways without a dollar of expense to the country. Some unfair representations of what I proposed have been made. It has been suggested that I desired to put this country to an enormous expense for the benefit of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and it has been hinted, if not asserted, in this House that I, standing as a public man in parliament, made that suggestion at the instance of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Sir, I desire to repudiate, in the strongest possible language which the usages of parliament will permit, any such suggestion as that.

The Canadian Pacific Railway did not, nor did any one on their behalf, make any such suggestion. Whatever may be the merits or demerits of the proposal I then made, they are wholly my own. I suggested that these railway companies pay to the country such a rental as would meet the cost of acquiring the control of that road, and that they should also pay for the operation and maintenance of it upon a wheelage basis. If the argument of the Minister of Finance last session was worth anything, the utilization of that track for three roads instead of one would not cost the people of this country one cent. This policy would immediately have given the Grand Trunk access to the west and the Canadian Northern access to the east. I observe that while the government have been sleeping as to this matter, other railways have taken it up, and I quote from an article in the 'News' of Toronto. There is a report to the same effect in the Toronto 'Globe.' I observe that the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian Northern Railway are now entering into a similar arrangement to that which I have referred. The 'News' item is as follows:

It is understood that the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian Northern authorities have reached an understanding respecting the line from Toronto to Sudbury. The Canadian Pacific will have running rights over it, and the Canadian Northern will secure a haulage arrangement over the Lake Superior section of the Canadian Pacific. The latter road thus secures a direct line for passengers and freight between this city and the west.

Now, I have been speaking of the extension of the Intercolonial to the Georgian Bay, and let me say before I leave that question entirely, that while I understand how limited the season of navigation is after the crops have been harvested, nevertheless, as I pointed out to the government last year, I believe that by a system of ice-breakers the period during which grain can be shipped from Fort William and Port Arthur might be considerably extended. That subject does not seem to have been investigated by the government, at least I have heard no official utterance upon it. If it would be possible to accomplish that, and those who are familiar with these waters say it would be possible to accomplish it, then we have still another argument in favour of the extension of the Intercolonial to the Georgian Bay; because of course the longer you make that season of navigation the greater opportunities you create for traffic to pass from Thunder Bay over Lake Superior to the shores of the Georgian Bay and to be transmitted by the Intercolonial to Halifax and St. John.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not say that the Intercolonial ought to stop at the shores of the Georgian Bay. I believe that its extension should only be limited by the western confines of the Dominion. There is no good reason why it should not be extended to the city of Winnipeg, or why the people of that city should not have communication by means of the Intercolonial with Ontario, Quebec and the maritime provinces. I submit that by that means the Intercolonial would reach into the Northwest, and not only secure a considerable portion of the traffic which passes from the west to the east, but also a considerable portion of the traffic which passes from the east to the west of Canada in agricultural implements, merchandise and commodities of a hundred different kinds which must be sent from the east of Canada into the west for many years to come. I still advocate the extension of the Intercolonial to Winnipeg. It would be wise also, if necessary in order to overcome congestion, to aid in double tracking or otherwise improving the line between Fort William and Port Arthur and Winnipeg. I say, as I said last year, that in doing that we should only give reasonable public aid in return for the most absolute and thorough control of rates upon those lines, so that we might give to the people of the west every possible facility and the cheapest and most economical means of transportation that could be devised in this country.

But, Sir, I am prepared to go even further, and I say that rather than enter into the present contract, I believe it would be infinitely wiser and more in the interest of this country that the government should itself immediately construct a line from Winnipeg to the coast. What is the position at present? Let us examine it for a moment. We are committing this country to obligations to the extent of $150,000,000. If we consider the probability that the bonds must be sold at 90 cents we are committing this country to obligations to the extent of $170,000,000; and the Grand Trunk Railway Company, the other partner to the contract, is committing itself to obligations to the extent of only $14,500,000, or a little less than $15,000,000. What is the result of the contract at present ? The result is that 1,500 miles of railway built in the west of Canada as part of an enterprise to which the government contributes $150,000,000 or $170,000,000, and to which the Grand Trunk Company contributes only $14,500,000, is to become the absolute property of the Grand Trunk Pacific. If we are going to expend $150,000,000 or $170,000,000 for the construction of this line and hand over 1,000 miles of the most profitable portion of it to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company what is the objection to our incurring the other $14,500,000 of obligations and owning that whole stretch of road ? We are to build 1,875 miles from Moncton to Winnipeg, a portion of the line which is declared by the Grand Trunk to be infinitely less profitable than that portion which lies further west. We pay for the whole of that, we build the whole of that, we hand it over to the Grand Trunk for ten years for nothing, and we hand it over to them for forty years for a very small rental, a rental which, according to the opinion of Mr. Blair, will involve us during 40 years in a loss of $18,500,000. We build in the west 1,500 miles of railway, and we guarantee bonds to the extent of $13,000 a mile on 1,000 miles of that, and bonds to the extent of $37,500 on the remaining 500 miles ; we make provision that if the bonds are sold at a discount we shall increase our liability. After building 1,500 miles of railway in that splendid country, a country and a railway, with enormous possibilities, possibilities transcending those of the Canadian Pacific Railway which earned $15,000,000 of profits last year—I am quoting the opinion of the Minister of the Interior as to that—after building that railway we hand it over to a corporation without any control of rates, without any assurance of cheaper transportation, without any assurance even of the transport of our traffic over Canadian lines and to Canadian seaports. Is there any good business in accepting that position ? Is there any sound statesmanship in taking that position ? If we are to incur obligations to the extent of $150,000,000, why should we not go the whole figure and incur the other $14,500,000 of obligation and own that line in the west, which may at some future time bring a revenue to the people of this country of $15,000,000 a year, as the Minister of the Interior has pointed out.

If we are to incur all the obligations of this contract, why should we not take some part of the profit of this contract ? Why should we own only the eastern division of this railway ? Why stop at that ? Why is there to be no participation by the government in the profits of the 1,000 miles of splendidly paying property in the west ? What are the obligations of the Grand Trunk Pacific ? Let us take them as stated at the recent meeting of their shareholders.

Sir Rivers-Wilson stated the obligations of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, which we would be required to assume if we did what I propose. They are as follows :

If you have followed the figures which I have just mentioned, you will find that the result shows an amount of principal bonds guaranteed in respect of both sections of £2,968,000, and of annual interest of £118,720, but even this interest liability, comparatively small as it is, need not accrue until the expiration of eight years—the period allowed for construction—the interest on cost during construction being provided for out of capital. This, then, constitutes the responsibility of the Grand Trunk Company.

Well, if the guaranteeing of bonds to the extent of £2,968,000 is all the contribution of the Grand Trunk, why should we hand over this 1,000 miles of splendid profitable road in the west ? What is Mr. Hays' view of the situation ? His view is this :

The Grand Trunk Railway is not going to be called upon under its guarantees for one cent for eight years after this enterprise is started—after the construction of the line is commenced,—the cost of the line during construction being added to capital and provided out of capital, and the securities which the Grand Trunk will guarantee will not be issued for eight years, and then after that eight years have rolled by, you have seven years yet on the mountain section, a part on which there seems to be some doubt. There can be not the slightest doubt as to what the returns will be from the prairie section, but on the mountain section you have seven years without any claim at all, three years after that only a claim on what is earned, making, therefore, before the mountain section becomes anything of a burden on the railway, eighteen years.

That is the view which the Grand Trunk directors and their general manager take of the situation. It does not seem to me wise that after pledging our resources to the extent of $150,000,000 or $170,000,000 we should stop short of owning that which we have built, merely in order to avoid a further liability of fourteen and a half millions, which is to be assumed by the Grand Trunk. Can any reasonable man say that the ownership of that splendid western line, which has been so glowingly described by my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior and others, as well as by Grand Trunk directors, would not be worth the additional liability which we would incur by taking the place of the Grand Trunk ? Sir, if we adopted that policy, we would own a national transcontinental railway in the true sense of the term. We would absolutely enly control rates. We would absolutely ensure transportation of our own products through our own territory and from our own seaports. We would give our people the most economical means of transportation. We would fully accomplish the aims set forth in the Order in Council of May 19th, 1903, which was brought down to the House last year, and which is familiar to every hon. gentleman. In that Order in Council the government stated its principles, as I thought, wisely and well, although it has since departed from them in every possible respect. The government declared its policy in that Order in Council in these terms :

It is obvious that before any satisfactory conclusion can be reached upon these questions a thorough and comprehensive inquiry should be made.

Further on it said :

Forces operating against the attainment of all Canadian transport, namely :

Competition by United States railways ;

Competition by United States vessels from Lake Superior ports, diversion of Canadian products through eastern outlets to Boston, Portland and other United States ports, should be investigated, and the best and most economical methods used by our competitors should be carefully studied and reported upon.

If the government have investigated the question of diversion of Canadian products to Portland, why have they permitted this contract to be placed before the House in its present condition, without a single stipulation which would prevent the Grand Trunk Railway Company from taking the traffic at the shores of the Georgian Bay and carrying it to Portland exactly as it has done before ?

It seems to me, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that having regard to the obligations which the government propose to assume, it would be very much more in the interest of the country that they should not stop short, but go just a little farther, only one-tenth farther, and own and control for the people of this country that splendidly profitable portion of this railway which is to be built through our Northwest. Now, I have not forgotten the actuarial statement which my hon. friend the Minister of Finance gave us last year. He declared that a sum of $8,853,504 would provide for the construction of 1,875 miles of railway, costing, according to his estimate, $54,609,676. He made that declaration although he admitted that the government would receive no return for its outlay upon the road until seven years after its completion. I do not wish to misrepresent my hon. friend. He said that the government could take that sum and place it in the hands of a trust company and that it would provide for everything the government would have to pay in respect of interest until the Grand Trunk Railway began to make its payments of rental at the rate of 3 per cent on the cost of construction. If the sum, or a little more than the sum, of eight and three-quarters of millions of dollars would provide for the construction of 1,875 miles of railway under such conditions, how much would it take upon the same basis to provide for the construction of the western division of this railway ? The western division of this railway, according to the estimate of the directors of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, will cost, for the 1,000 miles of prairie section, $20,000 per mile, or $20,000,000, and, for the 500 miles of mountain section, $50,000 a mile, or $25,000,000. Add these together, and you have $45,000,000 as the cost of the western division of this railway. In respect to the prairie section, you are not to consider that you will receive no return until seven years after completion. Sir Rivers-Wilson, in his letter to the government, or in his address to the shareholders, has said that the prairie section would be immediately profitable, that it would be immediately a paying section, and he declares that the government have taken that view. So you do not have the same condition that you have as to the eastern division. Therefore, I say that, applying the argument which my hon. friend the Minister of Finance thought proper to present to the House and the country last year, you could take $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 and provide for everything that the government would have to pay in respect to the interest on the construction of the western division until that road became profitable. If that was a good argument last year in the mouth of the Minister of Finance, and it was hailed with acclaim by every member of the government and by every hon. gentleman on that side of the House, why can we not apply it to the western portion of this railway ?

My hon. friend spoke about a surplus. He said : We have a surplus of $15,000,000 and it will take only half of that surplus to provide for the construction of this eastern division. Does he realize that it will only take one-third of that alleged surplus for one year to provide for the construction of this western division. Can any better use be made of the excessive taxation wrung from the people of this country, than to provide the people of Canada with a thoroughly national system of railways extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific ? This was supposed to be an excellent argument last year for the eastern division ; I seek to apply it in all sincerity to the western division, and once more I ask my right hon. friend to retrace his steps, to consider what can be done with $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 in the construction of this western division and to keep for the people of Canada this magnificent asset in the shape of a great national railway in the Northwest Territories. I trust that I shall not appeal to my right hon. friend in vain. He himself has shown that it is not too late ; the government have gone back once, let them go back again, and this time let them go back to some purpose in the interest of the people of this country.

I did not take into consideration so far, the cost of equipping that road, and no doubt that will be referred to by hon. gentlemen in reply. The cost of the equipment of the whole road was placed at $20,000,000 ; it has been reduced temporarily by one of the clauses of this agreement to $15,000,000 ; but we will assume that $20,000,000 will be required. Well, I want to bring to the attention of the government, the method which the Grand Trunk Railway propose to adopt with regard to that. Last year when my hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Barker) urged that the security taken upon the rolling stock would not amount to very much because the rolling stock could be acquired by means of a lease, the Minister of Justice and the members of the government disputed that argument very earnestly. Let us see how the Grand Trunk directors regard it. Sir Rivers-Wilson says :

> As regards the five millions for rolling stock, it is not five millions—it is estimated at three millions. With that the Grand Trunk has nothing to do. That rolling stock will be provided by the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, and, as the general manager will tell you, they have laid their plans for providing that rolling stock by a trust fund. Therefore, you may wipe it out and call it four milions.

The 'Financial Times' of London, commenting on what took place at the meeting said :

> The rolling stock it appears is to be provided for by a separate trust.

Therefore the twenty million dollars of supposed preference stock is not to be used, according to the views of the Grand Trunk directors, for the purpose of providing rolling stock, but it is to be kept in the treasury, or placed in the stock market, we do not know which. It may be reserved for an opportune occasion, and then placed upon the stock market for speculative purposes. The government is surely as well able to provide the rolling stock for the equipment of a profitable line in the Northwest of Canada, as is either one or other of these corporations. Under the modus operandi of these gentlemen they will provide this rolling stock by means of a trust and the rental for the rolling stock will be paid out of earnings. They propose to deal with it in that manner, so that the obligation to provide this rolling stock will not impose one dollar of capitalization upon this company. It will be provided for out of earnings, it will be leased, a trust will be created which will provide the rolling stock and lease it to the Grand Trunk Pacific and then the rental will be paid out of earnings. The advantage of that operation to the company will be that the capital stock of the Grand Trunk Pacific can be reserved for some other purpose, can pass to promoters, can be used for speculative purposes, and the rolling stock will be provided for out of the earnings. The disadvantage to the country will be, that this supposed security which we were to have upon this rolling stock will probably not be worth five cents; and there will be further fictitious capitalization. That will be the advantage to the Grand Trunk Railway Company on the one hand, and the disadvantage to the country on the other hand.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not see any fair suggestion, any good reason against dealing as I proposed with railway development in the west. The only security for our guarantee is the road itself. Can any hon. gentleman here dispute that ? Then, if the road itself it not good security for our guarantee, is it not good security for the people's money invested in that road, so that it should be owned by the people of this country. That seems to me to be the common sense view of the situation ; it seems to me that is the way in which it will strike the average, ordinary business man of this country.

I say that the government itself should build this road ; it should build it promptly ; not within seven or eight years, but the prairie section at least should be built within a very much shorter time; and I say that it should build the mountain section as speedily as possible. Another important advantage which would be secured to this country by adopting that policy is this: it will put to one side any future application by any other transcontinental railway company for aid for a line from Edmonton to the Pacific coast. We will have another application before many years ; we will have it made on the basis upon which this aid is given to this company.

The government, building the line from Edmonton to the coast can give running powers, controlled by this country, to any other transcontinental railway—and let me say in passing lest I should forget it—that when I advocate the building by the government of this line into the Northwest of Canada, I desire to express my conviction that the government should by means of that national line, admit the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada into the Northwest ; but it should admit it under such practical restrictions as will not permit our traffic to be carried to a foreign seaport.

The Grand Trunk Railway has done a great work in Canada, and it is doing a great work in Canada to-day. I dismiss, with the little notice which they deserve, the slighting words which have been used by the gentleman who is at the head of that corporation, in reference to those who sit in the opposition here. These words will not influence any one of us; they pass by us as the idle wind which we regard not; we will not be influenced in our attitude towards the Grand Trunk by any indiscreet or ignorant remarks of Sir Rivers-Wilson. We say that we believe that the Grand Trunk should get into the northwest of Canada ; we believe that this country should give it access to the Northwest, by this line which the country should build. But, Sir, we should give the Grand Trunk Railway access to that territory under stipulations binding upon the Grand Trunk itself; not under stipulations which are binding only upon the Grand Trunk Pacific, and which do not at all bind the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, the important factor in that regard.

And now with regard to the northern part of Ontario and Quebec, I stand by the position which I took last year. I do not say that there is not a great country in the north; I believe that it may be found that there is a great country in the north; all I say about that is that we do not know at present all we should know about it before embarking upon this enterprise. I say that we should first thoroughly survey and explore that country, ascertain its resources and requirements, and give it such railway facilities as it demands for its development. I say that we should not build a railway through that territory for the purpose of exploring it any more than we should essay to find the north pole by building a railway to it. Let us find out about the country first—and the government has done nothing during the months which have elapsed since last session to survey or explore the country—let us find out about the country first, and be sure of our ground, and then let the country have that development which its resources demand. I have been told that there are many millions of acres of land south of the height of land in the province of Quebec, which are awaiting railway development and colonization. I have heard it placed as high as 100,000,000 acres. I have not investigated the subject myself and I do not know; my hon. friends from Quebec know more about it than I, but I am assured that an enormous tract of territory in Quebec south of the height of land and of the route of this railway awaits development and colonization. Why should we not do something for that country? Why do we wish to run away from the settlement that we have? Is there not something to be done at our doors before we undertake to go through that northern country especially when it has not been adequately surveyed and examined. I do not stand against railway development in this country but I do maintain that we should first, thoroughly survey and explore it, ascertain fully its resources and requirements, and then give it such railway facilities as they demand. Do not build a railway through it for the purpose of exploring it. Be sure of your ground. Be sure of the conditions, be sure of the resources and then consider the necessities and possibilities and count the cost.

And I adhere to my policy of last year with respect to the development of our inland waterways, our canal system, and the equipment of our national ports. We have the most magnificent inland navigation in the world. It is open in part to our neighbours of the south. If we do not use it, they will. The state of New York is spending $100,000,000 in deepening and widening the Erie canal. They expect to transport grain from Duluth to New York for 2½ cents per bushel. Their ports are thoroughly equipped. They are alive to the situation. We must be equally alive if we wish to hold our own.

My position as to the line from Moncton to Quebec, I adhere to as stated last year. I say survey that country, ascertain its possibilities and if you can find a shorter line, from Rivière du Loup, to Moncton I will support its construction, if it will give the maritime provinces a better fighting chance to secure their fair share of the great trade of the west. I will support the government in building a road of that character, but I will not support a policy which would transfer it, when constructed, to the Grand Trunk Pacific or to any other corporation. I say that the road when built should be maintained and operated as part of the Intercolonial, as part of the government system of railways, and I have heard no reason urged on the other side of the House during all the long debate of last session which would for one moment convince me that the policy I then propounded to the House on that point is not a wise and prudent policy. Let that line be owned and operated by the people of Canada; let it be operated as part of the Intercolonial Railway, as part of a great system of national railways extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific, affording to the people of this country, by thorough control of rates, cheap and effective transportation of their products and commodities—ensuring the upbuilding of their own seaports, and the development of Canadian routes, and giving to our producers and manufacturers the means of holding their own in friendly rivalry and competition with those of the great republic to the south of us.

I therefore beg to move—

That all the words after the word 'that' in the proposed motion be left out, and the following substituted therefor:

This House regrets that the government has committed itself to the granting of further concessions to the promoters of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway; and that such concessions remove many of the supposed safeguards upon which the government placed reliance in submitting to parliament the measure as originally proposed.

This House regrets that in attempting to determine the all important problems of transportation the government did not first seek the aid and advice of competent and independent experts, whose opinion might have been procured and laid before parliament, at the present session, if the government had acted with reasonable vigour and with due regard to the magnitude of the interests involved and to the urgency alleged by the Prime Minister.

This House is of opinion that in considering these problems and in initiating and developing any great national system of transportation it should be our aim to provide the best and cheapest carriage for our products and importations; to secure their transportation through Canadian channels and Canadian seaports and for that purpose to make the Canadian routes the most economical and serviceable ; to open up valuable territory for colonization and development ; to stimulate interprovincial trade ; and to bind more closely together the scattered communities of our country.

That in order to accomplish these results the following objects and considerations should be kept constantly in view :

(a) To develop and extend the government system of railways, and to free the management thereof from party political control or interference.

(b) To secure absolute and thorough control of rates and traffic facilities in return for reasonable public aid to railway construction or improvement.

(c) To improve and extend our canal system, to develop our lake and river routes, and to equip thoroughly our national ports on the great lakes, the St. Lawrence and the sea boards.

(d) To perfect a system of elevator warehousing and terminal facilities.

(e) To secure under government control and direction, or where expedient under government ownership, common haulage or running facilities where one railway can usefully accommodate several systems, and thus to ensure to the public more economical carriage and efficient service.

That the proposed contract does not subserve these objects but, on the contrary, seriously endangers their realization.

That under the proposed contract the government has, in effect, committed the country to a partnership with two railway corporations, upon terms by which the people virtually supply the capital and assume the risk, while the two corporations receive enormous benefits and concessions without compensating advantages to the country.

The proposed contract does not ensure transportation over Canadian routes and through Canadian seaports, but entrusts control thereof to a corporation whose policy and interests must favour diversion to United States ports.

It involves the country in a liability practically sufficient to construct the whole of the proposed railway while the more profitable portion of that railway is to become the property of the corporations.

It enables one of the corporations to acquire from the other without payment twenty-five million dollars of stock entitled to dividends which must be paid by the public.

While permitting dividends to be declared on the stock thus acquired, it has not safeguarded the public against the higher rates which such dividends shall involve.

It not only fails to provide for the extension of the Intercolonial Railway, but it commits the country to a project which is calculated to postpone for fifty years and probably for a century any attempt to establish and develop in Canada a national system of railways owned and controlled by the people.

It overlooks the economic advantage of transportation by water and ignores Canada's possession of the most magnificent inland navigation in the world, the splendid possibilities of which if neglected by us will be fully utilized by our neighbours to divert our products to their ports and our trade to their commercial centres.

It absolutely commits the country to the construction of many hundreds of miles of railway through a practically unexplored territory although the results of exploration and survey may demonstrate the improvidence of the undertaking.

It imposes on the country a rashly undertaken project involving obligations so enormous as to seriously imperil the possibility of improving and developing other lines of transportation more suited to the requirements of the whole Dominion.

It hands over to the promoters of the undertaking, without check or safeguard of any kind whatsoever, power to manipulate, dispose of and deal in enormous issues of bonds and stocks, although the extent of the country's obligations will depend upon such dealings, and the public interest in regard to traffic charges, will be prejudiced by any resulting increase of capital.

The House is of opinion that instead of ratifying the proposed amended contract it would be more in the public interest to initiate forthwith, and develop with all speed, a system of national transportation, which should include :

1. The immediate construction and control by the Dominion of such lines of railway in the west to the Pacific as the enormous importance and increasing development of the great western country require.

2. The extension of the Intercolonial Railway to the Georgian Bay and thence to Winnipeg, and the extension and improvement in the province of Quebec and in the maritime provinces of the government system of railways.

3. The development and improvement of our canals and inland waterways, and the thorough and efficient equipment of our national ports and terminals on the Atlantic and Pacific as well as on the St. Lawrence and on the great lakes.

4. The thorough examination, exploration and survey of the country between Quebec and Winnipeg, with a view to the future construction of such lines of railway as may be found in the public interest.

That for the purpose of accomplishing these results the government, in accordance with the policy laid down in the Order in Council of 19th May, 1903, should immediately avail itself of the best expert advice and assistance.

Hon. CLIFFORD SIFTON (Minister of the Interior). I hoped to be able to offer some remarks this evening, Mr. Speaker, but as we have reached the hour of ten o'clock, I beg to move that the debate be adjourned.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, House adjourned at 10 p.m.

QUESTIONS.

TRANSPORTATION OF FRESH MEAT.

Mr. McGOWAN—by Mr. Taylor—asked :

1. Have any of the steamships subsidized by the government, having cold storage chambers, been successful in transporting fresh meat across the Atlantic during the past season ?

2. If so, what were the names of the steamers ; the quantity carried ; and the ports and dates of sailing ?

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER (Minister of Agriculture). We have no record of any shipments of meat during the last season in any steamships sailing from Montreal.

CHARLOTTETOWN RAILWAY STATION.

Mr. LEFURGEY asked :

1. How many men and teams were employed on the brush-work for filling in hole near railway station at Charlottetown, P.E.I., between the 9th day of February and 16th day of February, inclusive ?

2. What were the wages paid for men per diem, and what for teams per diem ?

3. Out of what appropriation was this money taken and what expenditure has taken place on this work to date ?

4. When was this work commenced, and for what purpose is the work intended ?

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Minister of Railways and Canals) :

1. 148 men and 56 teams were employed on the bush-work for filling in hole near the railway station at Charlottetown, P.E.I., between the 9th day of February and 16th day of February, inclusive.

2. The men were paid $1 a day cutting brush, and the teams including drivers were paid 50 cents a load.

3. The money was taken out of the appropriation. 'To increased accommodation at Charlottetown,' and an expenditure of $1,363 has taken place on this work to date.

4. The work was commenced on the 11th of February and was for the purpose of making a fill on the property recently purchased on which it is proposed to extend sidings for increased accommodation required at Charlottetown.

EXPORT OF BUTTER AND CHEESE.

Mr. BRODER asked :

1. How many pounds of butter and cheese, respectively, were exported from Canada in each of the years from 1898 to 1903, both years inclusive ?

2. How many pounds of such butter and cheese, respectively, were exported in each of said years in cold storage ?

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER (Minister of Agriculture):

Year ended June 30.	Lbs. butter	Lbs. cheese.
1898	11,253,787	196,703,323
1899	20,139,195	189,827,839
1900	25,259,737	185,984,430
1901	16,335,528	195,926,397
1902	27,855,978	200,946,401
1903	34,128,944	229,099,925

2. The following statement gives the number of packages of butter carried in cold storage from the port of Montreal during the seasons of navigation in the years named :

Season of navigation.	Packages.
1899	429,734
1900	227,863
1901	410,893
1902	525,735
1903	335,395

The following statement gives the number of boxes of cheese carried in cold storage and in cooled air from the port of Montreal during the seasons of navigation in the years named :

Season of navigation.	In cold storage.	*In cooled air.
1898	5,514 boxes.
1900	.....
1901	56,500 "	23,269 boxes.
1902	7,127 "	80,337 "
1903	.....	43,800 "

* The 'cooled air' service did not go into operation until late in 1901.

It will be observed that the foregoing statements do not give the net weight of the butter and cheese carried in cold storage each year, but merely the number of packages. The department has no means of ascertaining the weight of the cold storage shipments. It is only from the port of Montreal that cold storage ships sail, as in the winter season cold storage is not required.

BINDER TWINE AND BARBED WIRE.

Mr. E. D. SMITH asked :

1. What amount of binder twine was made in Canada in the years 1891, 1896, and 1901 ?
2. What amount of barbed wire was made in Canada in 1891, 1896, and 1901 ?
3. What amount of each was imported in each of the years named ?

Hon. WM. PATERSON (Minister of Customs). I regret that I have not the answers to the first two questions.

3. The quantity of binder twine imported into Canada during the years named was as follows :

	Lbs.
Fiscal year 1891..	221,757
" 1896..	3,023,896
" 1901..	9,674,268

The quantity of barbed wire imported into Canada during the said three years was :

	Lbs.
Fiscal year 1891..	88,158
" 1896..	429,544
" 1901..	14,253,500

THE MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. TOLTON asked :

What benefit have the farmers of Canada received, financially or otherwise, for the following expenditure, as shown in the Auditor General's Report, on pages D—10 and D—22, for 1903 :—

Sundries.

Travelling expenses, Hon. S. A. Fisher..	$ 335 95
Cab-hire, Hon. S. A. Fisher..	32 00

Osaka, Japan, Exhibition.

Travelling expenses, Hon. S. A. Fisher..	1,514 57
Transport expense, per C. P. Ry. Co., to Japan and return, Hon. S. A. Fisher	475 92
	$2,358 44

Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister) :

The item $335.95 for travelling expenses is not correct. According to the Auditor General's Report, this sum should be $206.93. The sum $335.98 includes the travelling expenses of the deputy, $8.75 ; the private secretary, $109.95 ; and Mr. Jackson, $10.35.

The benefit which the farmers of Canada have received for the very moderate expenditure mentioned in the question, is that under the able administration of Mr. Fisher, the Department of Agriculture has been of more service to the farming community than at any time since its creation, and that by the active work of Mr. Fisher the farmers of Canada have had made available to them services of profit which they never had before.

MARCONI STATION AT GLACE BAY.

Mr. CLARKE asked :

1. Is the Marconi wireless telegraph station at Table Head, Glace Bay, N.S., in operation ?
2. If not, has any reason been furnished to the government why it is not in operation ?

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, 'that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, for the House to go into committee to consider a certain resolution concerning the ratification of the agreement between His Majesty the King and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, dated the 8th day of March, 1904 ; ' and the proposed motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

Hon. CLIFFORD SIFTON (Minister of the Interior). Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure that I shall express a sentiment in accordance with the views of both sides of the House when I say that at this stage of the discussion of the question which occupied so long a time during last session, and which is the main business outside of the ordinary routine of the present session, it will be well for us as far as possible to confine our attention to those points that are really in issue, and to leave aside those general features of the discussion which occupied so much time in the former debate. I shall not therefore follow my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition in the wealth of quotation with which he adorned his address. No one could listen to my hon. friend without being impressed with the ingenuity and the apparently great satisfaction with which he indulged in dialectical subtleties drawn from declarations by members on this side of the House, by Mr. Hays, by representatives of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and by others who have spoken on this question. One could not help either, feeling, that if my hon. friend had been deprived of the opportunity of quoting from those speeches, and from the confidential documents of our friend the chairman of the Railway Commission, that his address might have been very much shortened, and that the last half hour, which was devoted to the constructive part of the subject—to the work of informing us what his actual views were upon the important subject before us—would have been in fact all that he would have found necessary to place before us.

My hon. friend referred with some force to a remark made by the Minister of Finance at the early part of this session, in which he referred to the state of the money market; and this was one of the criticisms made by the hon. leader of the opposition as an effective reply to the position of the government, but which in fact did not prove what it was intended to prove, and did not show that the position of the government was in any way open to criticism in connection with the amendment which has been made to the contract providing that the government should have liberty to implement the guarantee of bonds. It had been explained by the Prime Minister that the reason of this was that there was a possibility that owing to the state of the money market the bonds might not sell at par; and my hon. friend the Minister of Finance's remark was quoted for the purpose of showing that he had stated that in his opinion the money market was getting better instead of worse. Now, the real facts are known, or can be known, to any person who takes the trouble to inform himself on the subject, if he has not already done so. The real fact is that at the time this contract was framed, at least at the time when we began to frame it, about the 1st of July last or thereabouts, it was our information and the general belief that Canadian government bonds bearing interest at 3 per cent would sell at par, or perhaps a little better than par, in the money markets of the world. I have no doubt that opinion was well founded at that time. But a combination of circumstances had been operating in the money markets of Great Britain and of the world, which culminated in the latter part of last year in a state of the money market which was described to me by a prominent financier in London as something altogether beyond the experience of any person acquainted with financial matters in London during the last forty years, so that for a time securities were almost unsaleable. That is the time to which my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) referred as the time when the money market was very unfavourable. At that time the Deputy Minister of Finance, Mr. Courtney, was in London upon financial business. Since that time the market has shown signs of recovery and a short time ago the three per cent guaranteed bonds of the Canadian Northern were, I believe disposed of at 90 cents on the dollar, and this was regarded on the money market as a fairly good sale. Thus, we are in the position at the present time of having our bonds not worth par at three per cent on the money market, but worth, as far as we can judge, about 90. But we may hope that this is not a permanent condition of affairs; we may hope that as the market has recovered, it will continue to recover and that at the end of six or seven years, when the permanent guaranteed bonds under this agreement come to be placed on the market we will have sufficiently recovered our position, so far as the sale of bonds is concerned, to be able to borrow money at three per cent in the markets of the world, as we could twelve months ago. Thus the provision that we may implement the guarantee of bonds is made not because there is any certainty that we shall have to do so, but simply as a precautionary measure asked for by the company on account of the possibility that we might not be able to secure the face value of these bonds. The provision, therefore, is simply one to cover a contingency. No fault is to be found with either the government or the company in that connection. The credit of Canada is just as good as it ever was but money throughout the world is dearer than it was a year ago, and we, in common with the rest of the world, must suffer to some extent from that fact. Then my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) quoted at some length and with great force to show that the members of the government claimed during the debate which took place last year, that the Grand Trunk Railway Company was a party to this contract. He said: If it was true, as these hon. gentlemen said last session, that the Grand Trunk Railway Company was a party to this contract, why have we the spectacle of parliament meeting here again to make amendments to the contract? Why are we meeting here for that purpose if what they said was true, and the Grand Trunk Railway Company was in reality a party to the contract? I shall make a reference to the implied sneer of parliament meeting to deal with this question. For my part I can see no reason for the suggestion that the subjet which we have before us is not worthy of the attention of this parliament. It seems to me that since the Canadian Pacific Railway was conceived no more important subject has been brought before the Canadian parliament than that which we are now discussing. It is a subject well worthy the attention of parliament. The necessity for our coming here does not, however, show that the arguments which we presented to the House were incorrect. What we then said was not that the Grand Trunk Railway Company had accepted this contract and was in a technical sense a party to it, but that this was a contract the carrying out of which required the action of the Grand Trunk Railway Company which was a necessary party to it; that the scheme was one which involved the action and co-operation of the Grand Trunk Railway Company and so, therefore, that the Grand Trunk Railway Company was a necessary party to this enterprise. And, Sir, the fact that the promoters could not go on with the enterprise, but that the enterprise had to stop until the Grand Trunk Railway Company was satisfied, is a conclusive proof that the attitude which we took was correct. Our meeting therefore is not the proof that the representations we made were incorrect, but it is a proof that they were absolutely correct. My hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) made another reference which I think I can hardly pass over without a word or two. He quoted from a statement said to be officially given out by the government to the press and I do not think I am going too far when I say that there was a distinct suggestion in the hon. gentleman's statement that there was a conspiracy of silence, a distinct suggestion that it was the intention of the government, contemplating an early appeal to the people, to deceive the people in regard to this contract. I am quite unable to see upon what my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) bases a suggestion of that kind. On the 17th of December, a deposit of the guaranteed bonds of the Grand Trunk Railway Company was made instead of the deposit of cash or government securities provided for by the contract. That deposit was made in London, England, and on the 15th day of December, two days before, Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson had written a letter to the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) which had not been received here, and which did not reach here until Mr. Hays returned, and of which the Prime Minister therefore knew nothing when the official announcement was given out. When Mr. Hays arrived here and the terms of the letter which Sir Rivers-Wilson had written communicating the views of the Grand Trunk board to the Prime Minister were known, the government took the matter into consideration, realizing that the whole question was again to be discussed. Between the time that the bonds were deposited in England and advice was sent to us to that effect and the time when Sir Rivers-Wilson's letter arrived, nothing was said by the government. Is it therefore to be inferred that there was a conspiracy of silence? There was nothing said, Mr. Speaker, because there was nothing to say. The bonds had been deposited in England while Mr. Hays was on his way back. The subject was to be discussed when he got here, and like any sensible men of business we kept silence until Mr. Hays arrived here and then the matter was discussed in the ordinary way. From that statement of fact how does my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) come to make the unreasonable proposition, or to commit himself to the unreasonable statement or suggestion that it was the intention of this government to dissolve parliament, to go to the country and to take a verdict practically on what would be a false representation of facts. I do not think the hon. gentleman (Mr. R. L. Borden), upon further reflection, would care to commit himself to the suggestion he has made, I do not think that any government we have ever had in Canada, whatever may have been their political sins, would be guilty of going to the Governor General, asking a dissolution of parliament and then going before the people with a distinctly false statement and a false platform on which to appeal for support. I understood my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden)—although upon this point, not having heard him very distinctly, I speak subject to correction,—to agree in the suggestion of his supporters in the country and in the press that it was a discreditable thing that we were bound to wait until the directors and stockholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company decided upon the proposition which was submitted to them. That has been argued at some length by certain classes of newspapers in Canada. It has been said that it was derogatory to the dignity of Canada and the Canadian people that we should have to wait until we found out whether the stockholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company would ratify the contract or not.

Well, I do not think that our dignity is in danger on that account. We can, without loss of dignity, act in the ordinary business way. And, desiring as we do, desiring at least as the members on this side of the House do, to really nationalize the Grand Trunk Railway, to really make it a Canadian railway and give it a connection with the wheat fields of the west, to engage it in the work of building up Canada as against the work of building up United States ports and United States connections, we do not think that our dignity suffers if we condescend to enter into negotiations with the gentlemen who own the railway and are, therefore, in a position to deal with us. So we are prepared, without any fear of loss of dignity, to deal with these gentlemen, to enter into a contract with them and to submit the results of our deliberations to parliament.

My hon. friend spoke briefly of the change in the contract respecting the removal of the limit of cost upon the mountain section of the railway and upon the alteration in the remedy which is provided in case of default. And he referred to the fact that members on this side of the House had spoken at great length for the purpose of showing that this railway was likely to be of a very profitable character, and said: If this railway is going to pay so well, why this difficulty in getting the Grand Trunk Railway shareholders to agree to the terms for its construction? Sir, we have nothing to take back of our statements respecting the prospects of profitable operation of the railway. We are prepared to admit to this House that the gentlemen who are proprietors of the Grand Trunk Railway are not in as good a position to form an opinion as to this enterprise as we are, that they do not know as much about the country as we do, that they probably have not as much faith in our country as we have. But, for ourselves, having gone into this enterprise with the profound conviction that it was going to be profitable in every sense of the word, including that of upbuilding Canada, and we are prepared to meet these gentlemen who, for their part, are afraid, and show our confidence by releasing the old provision and inserting provisions which can only come into effect in case of default which we do not anticipate. It will be found, if they are carefully examined, the principle on which they have been assented to is this—that, while it is true that the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company have been somewhat timid about meeting our propositions, have failed to entirely meet the propositions which were ratified by parliament last session, the concessions have been made for the purpose of meeting the views of those who fear that our anticipations of success might not be realized. And the fact that we have been willing to agree, the fact that we believe that parliament will be willing to agree, to these modifications will be taken as the measure of our confidence that the railway will be a profitable enterprise and will show that we fully believed everything we said during the last session of parliament. My hon. friend has made the statement more than once in the course of his remarks yesterday, if I understood him correctly, and it has been repeatedly stated by our friends of the Conservative party in their press, in speeches they have made here and elsewhere, that the control of rates which is provided for in connection with the carrying on of this enterprise is not effective. Many arguments have been presented to the House and the country upon the basis of that proposition. I should have thought that this contract was so drawn that we would have been spared the necessity of wasting any time in the discussion of that proposition. Section 39 of the contract says:

Mr. SIFTON.

The rates and tolls to be levied and taken by the company upon any part of the said railway shall be under the control of the Governor in Council, or of such authority, commission or tribunal as is designed or constituted under any Act of the parliament of Canada for the regulation or control of the business of railways.

Now, I hazard the assertion that all the lawyers of this House put together cannot now sit down and draw a clause which will be more effective in giving parliament complete control of the rates and of the traffic upon that road than this clause gives. Parliament controls, because parliament controls the government. If parliament is not satisfied with what the government does, the remedy is in the hands of parliament. If we choose to nominate or appoint a railway commission for the purpose of discharging these functions, we can do so; we have done so. If we are not satisfied with the way the railway commission acts or with the principles they adopt, we can embody new principles in the statutes, and compel the commissioners to observe them. There is no way by which government can be given more complete control than is given by this section. It has been suggested, in connection with the same subject that the power which the Manitoba government has under the contract they made with the Canadian Northern Railway, which came up here for action some two or three years ago, is a more effective control than that which we possess under this contract. I submit that the facts are the exact opposite of such a statement. The Manitoba government had a contract with the Canadian Northern Railway which, so far as it is effective, gives the Manitoba government the right to control the rates. But, in order to make that effective they had to come to this House and have legislation to ratify it. And now that they have it ratified, all that they have is the contract, they have no legislative power over the Canadian Northern Railway, but simply the power to enforce the contract by such measures as are open to them. But, in connection with the contract we are now discussing, we have a clause which, by contract between ourselves and the company, puts the company in such a position that it can never raise the question of a vested right. It is a consenting party of the exercise of the jurisdiction which we possess. We have a contract which binds them to consent to the exercise of the power, and we have the legislative power behind us which we can exercise at any time which we see fit. The arguments upon this question of control of rates are based upon the capitalization of the railway. Now, I say at once that the capitalization of a railway in so far as the bonds are concerned, must affect the traffic rates. I admit at once that, when you allow bonds to be issued under your express jurisdiction, and you give the company the right to borrow money upon these bonds, so long as the enterprise yields a revenue it will be difficult for you to say that these bondholders should not have some return for the money you have authorized the company to borrow. But the stock of a railway company is in a different position altogether. The stock of a railway company is the proprietary of the company; it is not a creditor in the ordinary sense of the word. The man who takes the stock at this rate takes it in face of the expressed provision in the contract that the freights shall be absolutely under the control of the government, and all the provisions of our legislation which place under legislative control every act and every operation of the railway company. So it seems to me that all the arguments which are attempted to be applied to this question from the capitalization, outside of the question of the bonds which are issued can have no material effect upon the conclusion which will be arrived at.

The main objections which are urged to the merits of this scheme, as they are put before us in the press and, to some extent, by our hon. friends on the other side of the House, are to the financial features of the scheme; and upon this question I will take the liberty at a little later stage, of referring to the position taken by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. Now, what is the position of this company? First of all, what are its obligations; and next, what are the resources which parliament proposes to put within the reach of this company for the purpose of discharging its obligations? In the first place, they are obliged to make a deposit of five million dollars. We put that to one side, because, as the leader of the opposition said, they get the money back some time, and it is only a question of financing, the money does not have to be ultimately provided. Their next obligation is to build the western section of the railway, and for the purpose of doing that they have, first, the government bonds for three-quarters, and one quarter of their own bonds. This will dispose of the original construction of the railway. Then they have the following obligations placed upon them: To lease and operate the eastern section and pay the rental; to equip the road with rolling stock to the value of twenty million dollars; to induce and to procure that the Grand Trunk Railway Company shall guarantee the second mortgage bonds and float the same; they enter into obligations to carry their freight by Canadian channels, and to give as good a rate as given to United States ports; they arrange to guarantee sufficient shipping facilities; they agree to provide the working capital to operate this great system of railway. And they are bound to do something else, which apparently is lost sight of by those who discuss this question, but which, when it comes actually to the business of operating the railway, is one of the most serious difficulties which railways have to meet. Railway men know that when you have built a railway, when you have built it according to the ordinary specifications provided, when you have a standard railway and begin to operate it, that is the time you begin to have to expend money upon your road. Why, let our hon. friends look at the estimates which we have passed from year to year for the Intercolonial Railway. The Intercolonial was built and equipped and finished long ago, but my hon. friends have had the pleasure of discussing several million dollars for the purpose of adding to the furnishing, the betterment and the improvement of facilities upon that road. Let them take the accounts of the Grand Trunk Railway, let them take the accounts of the Canadian Pacific Railway, let them take the accounts even of the Canadian Northern Railway, a new road which, within a year and a-half, after a certain portion of the line was constructed, was obliged to go upon the money market for the purpose of selling debenture stock to increase the facilities of the road, to increase the station accommodation, to increase the yard accommodation, and to build the hundred and one things that are required as soon as the business of a railway begins to develop. For the purpose of doing that this company is provided with certain resources, it has no other resources than the ones I am going to mention, and the moneys for this purpose have to be provided along with moneys for other purposes and for working capital. Now, what is this company getting over and above the first and second mortgage bonds provided for the original construction of the railway? What has it got in order to enable it to fulfil all these obligations that I have mentioned? It has twenty million dollars of preferred stock and twenty-five million dollars of common stock; that is, forty-five million dollars of stock altogether, which this company has for the purpose of enabling it to discharge the whole of its financial obligations.

Now, it is a delicate thing to begin to talk about what stock is worth. If we should say the stock is worth twenty-five cents on the dollar, when they came to do something with that stock our statements might be quoted as an illustration of what we thought the stock was worth. If we said it was worth more, giving any particular figure, we would be liable to the same misconstruction. But you have only to remember that here are forty-five million dollars of stock, of which the company has the right to sell, at the outside, about $32,500,000 worth; leaving aside the $12,500,000 or $13,000,000 which they are required to hold, there is only thirty-two million dollars' worth of stock which, under the most liberal construction of the charter, they are able to sell. If you take thirty-two millions of this stock on the one hand, and look at the obligations which they have to discharge on the other, how much is that stock going to realize?

What comes ahead of it? Before a dollar of interest can be paid upon that stock, you have to pay the working expenses, you have to pay interest on the first government guaranteed bonds, you have to pay interest upon the second bonds guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, you have to pay the rental of the eastern division, and then only comes in the interest upon this stock, which our hon. friend thinks is such a valuable asset. Well, I venture the statement, I think I am quite safe in saying that if the promoters of this company and the Grand Trunk Railway Company united could get 60 cents on the dollar for that $32,000,000 of stock, they would think they were doing pretty well, they would think it was a pretty good sale. The 3 per cent bonds of the Dominion of Canada sold the other day in the money market for 90 cents on the dollar, an absolutely indefeasible security. If these gentlemen could get 60 cents on the dollar for their $32,000,000 worth of stock, I fancy nobody would have an opportunity of offering the amount twice. That would produce about twenty million dollars, just enough to put upon the road the twenty million dollars' worth of rolling stock which is required by the contract. So you have the Grand Trunk Company, if they are fortunate enough to be able to finance to that extent and in that way the twenty million dollars of rolling stock, in this position, that having built the road and placed the rolling stock upon it, all their other obligations have to be discharged, the working capital have to be provided, betterments from time to time have to be provided, and various financial obligations have to be discharged for the purpose of protecting themselves; and for the purpose of securing themselves, of recompensing themselves for the discharge of these functions, they have in their treasury only thirteen million dollars of the common stock of this company. I think that is a fair statement of the position.

The suggestion is made that they would job that stock off, that they would give it away to somebody for nothing. Will anybody suggest a reason why they should do so? Will anybody suggest a reason why the Grand Trunk Company, owning thirteen million dollars of stock of this company and being under tremendous financial obligations, having pledged their entire financial existence upon the success of this company, would give away the stock for nothing? Would anybody suggest anything more ridiculous than that proposition? I venture to say that a more ridiculous proposition cannot be suggested than that this company with $13,000,000 of the stock of the Grand Trunk Pacific in the treasury, having pledged its existence financially to the success of this enterprise, should give away that stock practically for a nominal consideration to anybody. The possible increase in value of such stock is the only return they have beyond what their own road may get in the future for the expenditures and responsibilities which they may have to incur. For my part, I am quite prepared to take this position before the House, and as a practical financial proposition, I do not think there is anybody on the other side of the House who would dispute it, that the possession of that $13,000,000 of stock is not too great a security for the obligations the Grand Trunk Railway Company will undertake in connection with this enterprise.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Mr. Speaker, I know my hon. friend (Mr. Sifton) does not want to misrepresent me but he is not stating my argument correctly. What I said was that the Grand Trunk Railway Company would get $25,000,000 of the common stock of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company in consideration of their support of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. I did not suggest that the Grand Trunk Railway Company would give that away for nothing. I suggested that the Grand Trunk Railway Company would make an enormous sum of money out of the stock, or out of more than $12,000,000 of it by selling it for a very substantial sum.

Mr. SIFTON. I am very glad that my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) has made the statement he has, because it at once relieves us from any further discussion of those wild statements which have been made in the press of my hon. friend and which my hon. friend has now with great good sense repudiated. The suggestion that the Grand Trunk Railway Company are going to make an enormous sum of money is one that should have a moment's attention. There is $13,000,000 worth of common stock. I have pointed out the obligations that the company have incurred. The Grand Trunk Railway Company, in the first place, have guaranteed the second mortgage bonds. They have entered into a contract which we are all familiar with in regard to traffic. They are bound to see that the working capital is provided, that the necessary betterments from time to time are furnished, and as against that they have $13,000,000 of stock, which, at the time, has no value whatever. If the Grand Trunk Railway Company ever make a dollar out of that $13,000,000, what must be done first? This enterprise from end to end must be made a success. There cannot be one single copper of dividends paid upon that stock until every obligation of this company to the government of Canada has been discharged, and until these obligations have been discharged the calculation which was made by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) at the last session of parliament showing the total cost of this road and the amount necessary to discharge all these financial obligations at from $13,000,000 to $15,000,000 stands good. It cannot be disputed in any way whatever. Let my hon. friends take either horn of the dilemma they like. They cannot tell us on the one hand that somebody is going to make millions out of this stock and on the other hand tell us that the company are not going to discharge their obligations. The two things do not hang together. Until the obligation is discharged the stock is not worth a copper. The question as to what the stock is going to be worth rests with the people of Canada. As to what dividend is going to be paid on that stock the parliament of Canada and nobody else will decide. Preliminary to this contract we have absolute plenary power to decide the rates of freight and all traffic arrangements on the road.

I am going to travel for a moment out of the record to answer an argument that has appeared in the press and has been elaborated at great length but which my hon. friend the leader of the opposition has not put forward. I did not expect that he would put it forward because I was satisfied that upon careful examination he would not consider that it was a tenable argument and he would therefore not present it to the House. But, nevertheless, it may be by others of his party who are not so cautious and it deserves, therefore, a few moments of attention. It has appeared in very reputable newspapers and has been circulated to a considerable extent. The statement is made for the purpose of prejudicing the discussion of the financial features of this contract that the furnishing of the $20,000,000 worth of rolling stock can be eliminated, because, they say, this rolling stock, under devices known to financiers at the present time, may be provided by a rolling stock company and it may be covered up and charged to working expenses taken out of the earnings of the road. So, they say that inasmuch as a rolling stock company can be formed, and the company can get their $20,000,000 worth of rolling stock in that way which can be charged up against the running expenses of the road at a later date without reference to the financial resources of the company, it need not be considered in connection with the capital which will have to be borrowed or other financial resources that we furnish. Well, it is easy to carry on these financial operations in the newspaper. There is nothing easier than financing a railway in the newspaper, or even sometimes, Mr. Speaker, in a speech, but it is more difficult to do it when you come to actually raise the money. The rolling stock company is a rather well known institution amongst our railway affairs of later years. Rolling stock bonds are secured in two ways. They are secured, first, by a mortgage upon the rolling stock, or by a lien which amounts to a mortgage and they are secured in the second place, by a covenant for payment on the part of the railway company which provides for a rent payable from the railway company to the rolling stock company sufficient to pay the principal in a short time and so wipe out the total debt for the furnishing of the rolling stock. If that could be done under this contract the point would be very well and properly taken. If this company could, by the assistance of a rolling stock company, have all the rolling stock furnished and the company pay back the cost of the rolling stock out of working expenses in the next ten or fifteen years that would be an additional resource which we would have to take into account. But, there are two or three serious objections to that. In the first place, they cannot give a mortgage on the rolling stock because all of the rolling stock has two mortgages upon it already, mortgages which the terms of the original contract permit. All of the rolling stock has two mortgages upon it already which makes it absolutely useless for the purpose of being employed in that way. The original contract provides in certain clauses for certain first mortgages to be given, but if my hon. friends will follow through the provisions of that contract they will find that the rolling stock is subject to two mortgages. The mortgages are divided but the net result is that there are first and second mortgages on all of the rolling stock. Therefore, money cannot be raised by mortgage on the rolling stock. In the next place, if my hon. friends will look at the definition of 'working expenditure' they will find that the working expenditure, the payment of which the company are entitled to charge up and which includes certain payments in respect to rolling stock, will not permit the principal and interest to be charged up against working expenses. Therefore, the principal of the rolling stock bonds cannot be paid up and charged against working expenses, so that the two securities, one being the payment of the rolling stock company out of working expenditure and the other being a mortgage on the rolling stock, disappear.

Mr. HAGGART. My hon. friend talks of two securities on the rolling stock. Cannot the seller to the railway company make the conditions of sale and take a security on the rolling stock which will be prior to any other security ?

Mr. SIFTON. We had that up last year at considerable length, and if my hon. friend will look at section 35 (a) of the contract he will find :

> 35. (a) A mortgage which shall be a first charge upon the railway undertaking, equipment and property, tolls, rights and franchises of the company, including all equipment and property to be thereafter acquired by the company . . . . to secure the payment of the said issue of first mortgage bonds guaranteed by the government.

They have to put an equipment of twenty million dollars upon this road ; and this Act requires that they shall give the government a first mortgage. They cannot give the government a first mortgage if they only borrow the equipment, or only buy it under a lien note in which the property does not pass. If my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) will discuss the matter with lawyers upon his own side of the House, he will have no difficulty in convincing himself.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Does the Minister of the Interior say that they would not be satisfied by giving to the government a first charge upon their interest in the rolling stock ?

Mr. HAGGART. Hear, hear.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Not at all.

Mr. HAGGART. The Minister of Justice gave that opinion last year.

Mr. SIFTON. My hon. friend (Mr. Borden) puts that point in the form of a question and not in the form of an assertion, because I doubt that my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) would make the assertion as a lawyer ; that they could give us a first mortgage upon a leasehold property, upon a property which they did not have the ownership of. The Minister of Justice discussed the subject at length last session, and he cited at length the opinion of the counsel who prepared the contract for the government, and to whom this point was specifically and particularly referred ; and counsel gave the unqualified opinion that there could be no possible doubt upon the question, and that it could not be debated. Under these clauses of the contract there are two mortgages to be given upon the rolling stock. The government therefore, having two mortgages upon the rolling stock, a third mortgage would not be a very good security upon which to borrow money. Having therefore no power to charge up the payment of the principal to working expenditure, there is absolutely no security whatever for the borrowing of money upon which the rolling stock could be supplied.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that in so far as the question of the charging the principal of rolling stock bonds to working expense is concerned, that was a point that required very careful consideration. I do not make a statement on that point as a lawyer, because it is not my business in this House to act as legal adviser to the government ; but I make the statement after having referred that matter to the Minister of Justice, and after having referred it to Mr. Shepley and to Mr. Chrysler the counsel for the governmet in the preparation of the contract, and I hold the written opinions of Mr. Chrysler and Mr. Shepley, as well as the opinion of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice : that there is no possible doubt about the question ; that there is no possibility of this rolling stock being charged up to working expenditure under the provisions in this contract.

This point will probably be raised in the further discussion, and it may be worth while for me as a matter of record to give the words which Mr. Shepley uses in connection with this particular matter :

Re Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. My opinion asked on following hypothesis : bonds given by railway company for rolling stock equipment required by contract, to a company formed for purpose of furnishing such equipment. Such bonds payable in annual instalments based on consolidation of principal and interest. I assumed such bonds to be quite distinct from construction bonds to be guaranteed under contract. Question asked is whether, by this or any similar device the instalments when paid, so far as they represent principal of such bonds, can be charged to working expenditure as defined either in clause fourteen of contract or in section 2. C, C, of Railway Act, 1903, or under any other admissible definition and so obtained priority over construction bonds guaranteed by government and Grand Trunk in my opinion neither by the method suggested, nor by any similar device can the bond principal representing cost of equipment be taken out of earnings as working expenditure under either express definition or any other admissible definition of that term. Such principal is not (to use the words of the two express definitions) tolls, rents or annual sums paid in respect of the hire of rolling stock let to the company. The hypothesis seems to involve not hire, but sale. If so, think it extremely doubtful whether even interest on such bonds would fall within either express definition. Probably cost of maintenance and repair of such rolling stock would fall within any definition.

(Signed) GEORGE F. SHEPLEY.

Mr. HAGGART. I was not arguing that the amount should be charged out of the earnings of the road ; but that the parties who put the rolling stock upon the road could have it as security, independent of the government or any other security proposed by this Act.

Mr. SIFTON. I say in the most flat-footed and emphatic way, that they could do nothing of the kind. There are two mortgages provided for by the statute, which must be first mortgages. I am sure that my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) who is generally careful of what he says, is not desirous of misleading the House, or of taking a position which is absolutely and entirely untenable, according to the statement of reputable counsel to whom the question had been submitted.

Mr. HAGGART. You do not touch the point which I make at all.

Mr. SIFTON. I have only dealt with that point, because it was a point which has been raised in a certain section of the press for the purpose of confusing the issue, and creating the impression that there are financial resources given to this company, which as a matter of fact are not given. I need not refer to the other point as to the sale of the government bonds, which has been raised so often in the press.

for the last two days. The Prime Minister made clear what the position is in that respect. And, as to the charge which is made that the second mortgage bonds guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Company will be sacrificed upon the market, surely a word or two will settle that. The statement is made in that racy manner which is characteristic of some of our newspaper men when they are dealing with a subject of this kind; the statement is made that if the Grand Trunk Company does not get enough money the first time they issue the guarantee bonds, all they have to do is to issue more. And then we are told that, against the unfortunate patrons of this railway who have to pay the freight rates, you are piling up a tremendous charge which they will have to pay in the end.

Now, who guarantees these bonds, and who will have control of the sale of them? It is the Grand Trunk Railway Company. The Grand Trunk Company is a solvent corporation; it has forty thousand stock holders, many of whom have been waiting a long time for dividends and who take a very active interest in the affairs of that company. Is it conceivable that the stockholders of the Grand Trunk Company are going to allow the managers of that road to guarantee bonds to an unlimited extent, and sell them at a sacrifice price upon the market. Why, Mr. Speaker, the suggestion is absurd, it only needs to be stated in order that its absurdity may be apparent. You can rely upon it, if anything is done carefully in connection with this whole transaction from beginning to end, it will be the placing of the bonds by the Grand Trunk Railway Company so that they will not have to guarantee any more than they are absolutely compelled to. Therefore, what is apparently a concession in this contract is not in reality a serious one, but is one which has its compensation; that is to say, a provision whereby the government will share with the Grand Trunk Company to the extent of one-third of the loss, because by that means we increase the security of the second mortgage bonds, give them a better price, and lessen the charge on the road in the shape of bonded indebtedness. So that it is not a concession wholly without compensation.

We have been taunted with the statement that we had declared that the original contract was a good and binding contract, and yet we have to come back to parliament and ask parliament to change it. Well, as I said before, we are not seriously concerned about the loss of dignity involved in this transaction. But I repudiate entirely the suggestion that we had in any way misled parliament in regard to the actual position of affairs. We made a contract which was signed by Mr. Charles M. Hays, the general manager of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and by other leading men on the board of that company. We had a right to assume that these gentlemen would be able to implement their obligations to us, and bring with them into this enterprise the shareholders of their company. We do not impute to these gentlemen any bad faith. We know that they were desirous of accepting the contract as it stood, and of carrying it out; but with all their influence with the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, they found themselves unable to do so, and, as stated in Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson's letter, further concessions had to be made. But I think the House will agree with the statement of the Prime Minister, that the concessions that are made are not so serious or so important that they ought to deter this House from accepting them and going on with this great enterprise.

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition referred at length and with great force, as if it seriously affected the question, to the opinion expressed by Mr. Alfred Smithers, one of the directors of the Grand Trunk and a very capable business man, to the effect that the contract as modified by the agreement which we are now considering, was a better contract for the Grand Trunk than the original contract. I do not think it required a man of great ability to discover that fact. We are all prepared to admit that when the company asked us for concessions, and we gave them concessions which on both sides are admitted to be important, we made for them a better arrangement than the original contract provided. But notwithstanding that fact, let it not be forgotten that so serious did leading shareholders in the Grand Trunk Company consider the obligations which the company entered into by that contract, that some of them sold their stock and severed their connection with the enterprise. I am not going to burden the House with quotations; but there is a reference in the 'Canadian Gazette' of March 10, which shows conclusively the extremely serious view which leading stockholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company took of this transaction. It is as follows:

> The Grand Trunk Pacific scheme has attracted considerable attention and caused no small amount of comment. At the meeting of the company held yesterday the shareholders' sanction was obtained after a considerable amount of opposition; although the general feeling now seems to be that the Grand Trunk either had to consent to build the road or see some one else do it. After the publication of the special report on the scheme the opposition was much more pointed, and large sales of the company's stocks were made, especially from the provinces. As compared with a week ago the first preference stock is 6½ down at 102⅓, the second preference stock 4¼ at 88, the third preference ¼ at 37⅞, the guaranteed 1½ at 98¼, and the ordinary ¾ at 11⅞. Since the beginning of February the depreciation in the company's open stocks has been serious, the first preference being 9 per cent down, the second preference 8 per cent, the third preference 3½ per cent, the guaranteed 2¼ per cent, and the ordinary 2 per cent.

I quote this, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of showing that while our friends on the opposition side of the House apparently regard very lightly, as a matter of no concern, as a matter in fact almost to be joked at and jeered at, the idea that the Grand Trunk Company is incurring any serious obligation in connection with this enterprise, gentlemen who have been large stockholders in the company all their lives, have thought fit to sever their connection with it and to sell their stock at a considerable sacrifice. I do not regard these apprehensions as being justified; but they are natural in view of the obligations which the company had incurred, and the necessarily limited amount of information they could possibly have in regard to the real prospects of this enterprise in the future. We cannot expect gentlemen in England to have the same information in regard to our country that we have ourselves.

Just one word or two in regard to the arrangement which we have made with reference to the prairie section. It does not seem as if any effective criticism has been offered with regard to that. We assist the Grand Trunk Pacific by a guarantee similar to that which we gave to the Canadian Northern Railway. When the latter was before this House, practically no opposition was offered to it by hon. gentlemen opposite. There can be no reason why a similar guarantee in the case of the Grand Trunk Pacific should be any more subject to opposition. The plan is just as good in one case as in the other.

Then, when we come to the mountain section, the only thing we have to compare our proposition with is the proposition made by the hon. leader of the opposition at the last session of parliament. My hon. friend's idea, as explained by him at that time, was that we should endeavour to make an arrangement by guarantee. We have endeavoured to make an arrangement by a guarantee, and have made it. But if he could not make an arrangement by a guarantee that would suit him—and the one we have made did not suit him, although it was the best that could be made—he would adopt the plan of building the line through the mountains as a government line, and allow the Grand Trunk to use it. So that we have to compare our proposition of a guarantee on three-fourths of the cost of the road west of Winnipeg with the scheme propounded by the hon. leader of the opposition, of a guarantee on the prairie section and the construction of the mountain section by the government. What would be the result? The result would be that, as the guarantee would only apply to the prairie section, the government would probably be paying deficits for the mountain section, while the company would be earning dividends on the prairie section. But we put the two sections together under one guarantee, so that we are able to share up the losses with the profits, with the probability—nay the certainty—that the enterprise as a whole will pay.

Then we have the criticism with reference to the eastern section. And I am afraid that the fate which attacks a party determined to oppose a measure whether or no and determined to find some reason for opposing it, a fate which generally places them in a very uncomfortable position, is beginning to overtake our friends on the other side of the House. They have made a good many observations about traffic on the eastern section. I am not going at the present moment or in fact at any future time in this debate to go into a lengthy discussion as to the traffic which may be expected to go over the eastern section of the railway. My hon. friend from South Lanark (Mr. Haggart), who I understand is to follow me in this debate, has expressed himself in unmeasured terms in sneering at the idea that any considerable portion of western traffic would go over this eastern section. I am not able to agree with him. During the last session I gave figures in regard to this, and expressed my views at some length in regard to the wheat traffic on this section. At a later stage I was somewhat misrepresented and it was made to appear that in having given certain rates on certain lines at certain times, I had asserted that these would be the rates on this line. I made no such statement but expressly guarded myself in this matter. I said that I merely gave these as illustrations of what railways had done under certain circumstances, and of what railways under certain conceivable circumstances might do, but I expressly refrained from making any definite prediction or statement as to what my view was in respect to the probable amount of traffic which might go over this line. I gave the facts and circumstances as they appeared to me, but I left the House to draw the inference that they might see fit to draw from these facts. Let us take for one moment the question of this wheat traffic. My hon. friend says that the wheat traffic will go from the wheat fields of the west to Port Arthur and Fort William and from there will be routed. We all know perfectly well that so far as the summer traffic is concerned that is true. There will be at certain times in the summer, not very often, but occasionally, times when the railways will take some wheat out all-rail, but, speaking generally, the position will be that in summer time the wheat will go to Port Arthur and Fort William and from there will be routed eastwards. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden), says with great gusto, as if it were a fatal objection to the scheme, that when you get the wheat to Port Arthur and Fort William you have no control of the route and that the Grand Trunk does not undertake to convey it to Canadian ports. What I say is, that when the wheat gets to Port Arthur and Fort William it does not make any difference what the Grand Trunk Railway will or will not do. In summer time the wheat will go out by water to Montreal or Quebec or by the Erie canal to New York, so that the question of what the contract with the Grand Trunk is, in respect of summer traffic in wheat is absolutely immaterial; it has nothing to do with what will happen to the traffic. We expect that owing to the improvements that have been made to the waterways of this country, Montreal and Quebec will be able to compete successfully with the route to the south. It is now competing successfully. Wheat was hauled last season from Duluth to Quebec for 3½ cents a bushel and certainly a railway will not compete with this; that may be taken as evident. But during the winter months, during the four and a half or five months when rolling stock would otherwise be idle and when ships are coming to our ports and demanding cargoes, then the railways will and do haul wheat all-rail. My hon. friend knows that the Canadian Pacific Railway hauls millions of bushels all-rail to make cargoes for these ships and the Grand Trunk Pacific will have a certain portion of that traffic during that season of the year. Then the question of routing comes up. The hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fitzpatrick) said last session that all the people in the west would be patriotic enough to route by a Canadian port if they got the same rate. We will not even have to depend on their patriotism to secure that object. The people of the west have been trying for years to preserve the purity of their wheat. During the first two or three years I was in this House, one of the matters to which I had to give constant attention was the grading and inspection of wheat, and we had to change the Inspection Act so as to provide that the inspection should not be tampered with after the wheat left Port Arthur. Since that time, owing to the absence of eastern interference, the reputation of Manitoba wheat has been steadily rising and at the present time were it not for occasional unauthorized interference which cannot easily be traced, the price of Manitoba wheat would be absolutely and equitably fixed. What these people want is to have the wheat absolutely pure and to be sure that it cannot be regraded on the way and if you give the people of Manitoba and the west an opportunity of sending by a Canadian route at the same rate they will always take it; you will not have to depend on their patriotism for that. One of the things which the people of the west will regard as an advantage in connection with this road will be that the grain will be taken out by Canadian channels and that from the time it leaves the wheat field until it leaves the Canadian port, it will be under the jurisdiction of this parliament, so that we can penalize any attempt to interfere with the grading, thus securing for the growers the price to which they are entitled. The road will do more than that. We know that it will carry a large cattle traffic. If my hon. friend will take the trouble to inquire amongst the cattle men of the west, he will find that there is a distinct grievance amongst them at the present time owing to the lack of transportation facilities. A prominent supporter of my hon. friend who leads the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) said to me the other day that he was a supporter of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, because he was in the cattle trade, and the cattle trade of the west wanted the Grand Trunk Pacific, and wanted it at once. We know that this road will carry wheat, it will carry flour in large quantities from the Northwest to the European markets, and it will also carry, as my hon. friends know, a large proportion of the European imports to the towns and cities of the west, so that there is every prospect, from every possible business standpoint, of this road doing a large and profitable trade. Why are our friends so much opposed to this being done? Is it because, as the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) says, this is a country of granite ridges and muskegs, a country through which a road of decent grades cannot be constructed? Now, I think I am safe in saying that when we brought up this proposition last year, if there was one thing which was perfectly clear, it was that the hon. gentlemen opposite were anxious to make it plain that they were in favour of the Grand Trunk Railway Company having a western connection. They have been in favour of it, I think, from the start. They have asserted themselves in that way and their press has asserted itself in that way. I know that the party as a party could hardly refrain from endorsing the statement I make, that from the beginning they have been in favour of the Grand Trunk Railway Company getting a western connection. How is that connection to be given? Is the Grand Trunk to go over the same route as the Canadian Pacific Railway, with the result of making a railway of poor grades, with sharp curves and long distances? Or are gentlemen opposite in favour of them going further north and getting a road over a flat country with lighter grades, shorter distances and opening up a new country? Now, we suppose that our hon. friends are men of common sense, as we hope we are ourselves. There are sometimes disputes between us as to that. We give them credit for ordinary good judgment, and we think that in their heart of hearts they will agree with us that the line of short distance, low grades and easy curves and the line that opens up a new country is the line by which the Grand Trunk Railway ought to be given connection with the west ? It is to be regretted that the surveys which have been made were not returned from the Grand Trunk Railway Company to the government in such a way that they could be laid before the House. They were not sufficiently completed to allow of a report being made. But, a few days ago I sent the geographer of the Department of the Interior, who is himself a competent surveyor and a thoroughly qualified man, to the office of the Grand Trunk Railway, to go into the matter with their chief engineer and to prepare a short statement of the results of the investigations that have been made with regard to the eastern line. That gentleman went down and collected the information. And this is his report :—

Department of the Interior,
Office of the Geographer,
Ottawa, April 5th, 1904.

Memorandum.

During the summer of 1903 preliminary surveys were made of the line between North Bay and Winnipeg and location surveys were made of a large portion of the line between Winnipeg and White Earth lake, about 200 miles. The extraordinarily wet weather not only interfered with the work and movements of the survey parties but made the carriage of supplies extremely difficult and expensive. Enough work has been done, however, to show that it is possible to get a line from Winnipeg to the point at which the North Bay branch diverges from the main line, with grades not to exceed 0·4 per cent and curves of not more than 4°. Mr. Stephens is confident—— —that, on the final location he can reduce most of the 0·4 per cent to 0·3 per cent and he can shorten the line. All curves are compensated and the line is in every way a more favourable one than the Canadian Pacific through the corresponding sections. In general terms it follows the valley of the English river to Lac Seul ; thence to the Ogoki branch of the Albany river ; thence, in almost an air line, to Opazatika lake. From this point it will probably follow a little to the south of and parallel to a base line run by Messrs. Niven & Speight, in about latitude 49° 30', for the Ontario government. From the interprovincial boundary line it will probably run south-eastward to the head waters of the St. Maurice ; thence down the valley of the last named river ; thence across country to Quebec.

Mr. Stephens is the chief engineer of the Grand Trunk on these surveys.

First 100 miles from Winnipeg can be built for $25,000 per mile ; that, between the 100th and 350th miles, will cost $35,000 per mile, and between 350th and 530th miles, $30,000 per mile. From the 530th mile eastward to Quebec cannot be estimated with any degree of accuracy, till further surveys are made, but Mr. Stephens considers $30,000 per mile ample. He also stated that all these estimates were liberal estimates and that the road should easily be constructed at these figures. The $30,000 estimate for the line through the 'clay belt' may seem high, but it is largely due to the heavy cost of getting in supplies. For the reverse reason the cost of the Quebec-Moncton section—other costs being equal—should be correspondingly reduced.

It should be mentioned that, in Ontario and Quebec, the line has been located well to the north, that as much as possible of the timbered area shall be above the track. At the same time it has been kept above the edge of the upper plateau or 'fall line' where the streams plunge down in falls and rapids to the lower plateau.

That is so that the timber can be floated down. After the part I have read follow the details of the different parts of the line. I will lay a copy of the report upon the table for the information of the House.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. May I ask how many miles altogether this gentleman examined and what time he occupied in the examination ?

Mr. SIFTON. The report does not state that. It gives the particulars as to the whole of the line there. It is definite and full up to the point where it crosses the Interprovincial line. After that, it is estimated. I read the report for the purpose of pointing out that if we are at one with our opposition friends upon the fact that the Grand Trunk Railway ought to be given admission to the western country there can be absolutely no doubt that we are right as to the location we are choosing for the line. I will not labour that point at any length. But, if you are going to decide whether you are to have a good line or a poor line, you will surely take the good line ; if you are going to decide whether you are to have a shorter or a longer you will surely take the shorter ; and if you are going to choose between a line that will open up new country and one that will not open up a new country you will surely take the former. Now, I want to take a hypothetical case. Suppose that three or four years from now that line has been built, the Grand Trunk has its line from North Bay to Abitibi and the government says : Here is a great transcontinental line that stops five hundred and fifty miles from Quebec ; we will build a line to connect it with Quebec. Who on the other side of the House will say no ? Well, we tie the two schemes together and make one scheme. But, if both parts are meritorious, what is the matter with the whole ? Now, suppose this line of five hundred and fifty miles is built, and we have the Grand Trunk Pacific running from Port Simpson through to Quebec, gathering an enormous traffic all along that great line. But their winter traffic is all going to Portland, and their interest is to take it to Portland. Now, suppose that our friends from the maritime provinces say : You have to shorten that line and bring that traffic to maritime province ports. Is there anybody here who would say that we should not do so ? Not a man. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition will not say so. He has not said so once in the course of his remarks. He has said: If you can get the grades, do it. Well, we are going to get the grades, and we are going to do it.

He says—and it is the only objection he has been able to raise—that it should be built as part of the Intercolonial and not as part of the Grand Trunk Pacific line. Let us look at that. Suppose you have the Grand Trunk Pacific from Port Simpson to Quebec with branches gathering enormous business all across the continent to be carried to Quebec. Now, you are going to build a line which will carry that traffic to maritime province ports, and you have to decide whether it is to be as part of the Intercolonial or as part of the Grand Trunk. In favour of the Intercolonial line, what ? Profits on this line of three or four hundred miles of railway—problematical profits acording to our experience, with the Intercolonial, but possible profits. In favour of building it as part of the Grand Trunk Pacific line, what ? The getting of the whole of that business over that transcontinental line and taking it to maritime province ports, getting the whole of the business of the enormous freight from Port Simpson and taking it to the maritime ports. What inducement is he going to offer to the owners of that transcontinental railway line practically to abandon their Portland connections so far as winter business is concerned, and take it to the maritime provinces ? We would be disposed, all things considered perhaps, to agree with him, and let it go as an Intercolonial line, if we built it. But what we say is that you cannot do it that way, and we say further that if you wait, if you do not make it part and parcel of the Grand Trunk now, if you wait until the line to Quebec is built, they will be better situated to keep the Portland line.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have extended my remarks on these points much beyond what I intended. I am now going to say a few words in regard to the proposal of the leader of the opposition. He placed before this House last evening at the close of his long and very able address, an amendment embodying the views of himself as leader of His Majesty's loyal opposition, and of his party, on the important question which is now occupying our attention. My hon. friend will perhaps not take offence if I say that I think that within that document there was a surplus of verbiage, and that the hon. gentleman might condense his meaning into a smaller compass and perhaps with less risk of being misunderstood. But I propose to take what I conceive, after careful examination of it, to be the operative parts of that resolution and offer to you a few observations upon them. I find in subsection (a) that one of the demands which he makes is :

> To develop and extend the government system of railways, and to free the management thereof from party political control or interference.

Well, Mr. Speaker, so far as party political control is concerned, we have followed pretty much the same policy as the governments of the past. But in so far as the extension of the government system is concerned that has been the policy of only this government, though bitterly opposed at every stage by hon. gentlemen opposite. Notwithstanding the remarkable friendship which the hon. gentleman seems to display for the extension of the government system of railway, there never was a proposition brought down to the Canadian parliament of which I have any recollection, or of which I have read the record, which was more bitterly assailed, more determinedly contested at every stage, than the proposition to extend the Intercolonial to the city of Montreal. What more did they do ? When they had the Intercolonial, the government system of railways for which our friends profess so much admiration, what did they do ? They bound it by a contract and united it with the Canadian Pacific Railway so that it was not in a position to do business independently. We had to abrogate that contract, we had to change those conditions, we had to bring that railway to Montreal in order to make it a railway that the people of Canada had no cause to be ashamed of, and one which our friends opposite are now beginning to be proud of. My hon. friend goes on to say in section (b) :

> To secure absolute and thorough control of rates and traffic facilities in return for reasonable public aid to railway construction or improvements.

Mr. Speaker, that is a fine sentiment, but it does not come well from the Tory party. Why, Sir, year after year the Liberal party sat upon the other side of this House when railway charters were being passed, when subsidies were being granted, and begged, implored and besought, moved resolutions and fought for resolutions, to get some such principle as that into the legislation of Canada, and they utterly and entirely failed. In 1896, in the very first railway legislation we undertook, those principles were embodied. The first important railway matter we took up was the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, and we crystallized our idea in that charter and embodied the principles which we thought should obtain in railway legislation. We took control of the roadbed, we took the power of giving any other company running powers, we took control of the railway rates, we took control of traffic facilities, we did everything which the hon.

gentleman says we ought to do, and from that time to this, in our railway legislation from session to session, we have been making that control more and more effective, until this principle which the leader of the opposition declares ought to govern our legislation, is placed upon a basis so sound that it is beyond the possibility of being destroyed by the efforts of our hon. friends opposite. He goes on to say in section (c) :

To improve and extend our canal system, to develop our lake and river routes, and to equip thoroughly our national ports on the great lakes, the St. Lawrence and the sea-boards.

When we came into power we found nine feet of water in the St. Lawrence, it is now fourteen feet. My hon. hon. friend asked, as if he meant it to be a taunt to this government, if we knew that wheat was now being carried from Duluth to Quebec for 3¼ and 3½ cents a bushel. We do know it, and we know it is because of the vast improvements that we have made upon the lake ports, as at Port Colborne, upon the St. Lawrence canal and at the city of Montreal and in the St. Lawrence channel. As a result of the money that we have expended for the purpose of improving the waterways of Canada, as a direct result which could not have followed but for the expenditure of that money, we know that for the first time, during the last season, not only Canadian grain but American grain coming from American ports has been carried through those waterways to Canadian ports. So my hon. friend need not be alarmed, we shall attend to that. Then we are asked :

To perfect a system of elevator warehousing and terminal facilities.

We have a commission studying those very questions, and even our hon. friends are not able to find fault with their work. Next he asks us to give common haulage or running facilities upon railway lines. That is just what we have been doing in all our railway legislation, and the hon. gentleman never thought of it when they were in power. Last session our hon. friends started out with the idea that the Grand Trunk ought to have connections with the west. I think that at the beginning they were prepared to stand to that. But they found out that the national sentiment did not favour the idea of taking the Grand Trunk west for the purpose of getting that traffic and sending it out to American ports ; the national sentiment and the maritime provinces joined together were too strong for them, so that idea was dropped. Now the leader of the opposition is not a rash man, nobody will accuse him of that. He took time to think about his policy before inaugurating it and declaring it as a policy of the party, and after a thorough and careful deliberation he placed this policy before the House. As I understand it, it was to extend the Intercolonial by building connections and acquiring the Canada Atlantic, or building a new road to join the Canadian Pacific Railway, to acquire the Canadian Pacific Railway to Port Arthur, to go into partnership with the Canadian Northern Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway from the lakes to Winnipeg, to build a government line through the mountains, with a suggestion that possibly the Quebec and Moncton line might be built as part of the Canadian Pacific Railway, though I did not understand that was necessarily a part of the scheme. That was the proposition which was placed before parliament by my hon. friend. It was done with great care and deliberation. I had not the pleasure of being present and hearing my hon. friend, but I saw in the newspapers the morning after the speech was delivered that a new star had arisen upon the political firmament, that my hon. friend had electrified parliament and the country by producing the scheme which he had presented. How long did it live ? About three days. The hard common sense of the people, which after all can be depended upon more than the brains of any clever man, took hold of it, looked at it, turned it over, dropped it. I do not think it has been heard of since. The most unkindest cut of all was the fact that my hon. friend last night only gave seven and a half minutes by the clock to that policy. Now, that policy may be considered to be disposed of. It certainly has no possible consideration in the amendment which my hon. friend has placed before parliament. In no way can the amendment be held to be a reinstating or endorsement of the policy which the hon. gentleman presented last year. So, he comes now with a new policy in the shape of the amendment which we listened to last night.

Leaving out all extraneous matter and considering simply what it presents as a railway scheme alleged to be an alternative to what we are discussing, this is what the hon. gentleman suggests. He declares himself in favour of a system of national transportation, which should include :

1. The immediate construction and control by the Dominion of such lines of railway in the west to the Pacific as the enormous importance and increasing development of the great western country require.

2. The extension of the Intercolonial Railway to Georgian Bay and thence to Winnipeg, and the extension and improvement in the province of Quebec and in the maritime provinces of the government system of railways.

The rest does not affect the question of railways. So that you find that the third and last policy of our hon. friends on the other side of the House is this : Build government railways in the west wherever they are wanted. That is a very fine general proposition. Build them wherever they are wanted. Everybody will then expect to get one. You build government railways in the west wherever they are wanted, you extend the Intercolonial Railway to the lakes and ultimately, or at once, as fast as it can be done, to Winnipeg. That is the proposition which my hon. friend defines as an alternative to take the place of the proposition that we have before the House for the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific line over the prairies of the west, and a government line under lease to the Grand Trunk Railway from Moncton to Winnipeg. The hon. gentleman and his supporters last session, week after week, conclusively proved to their own satisfaction that the line of railway from Winnipeg to Moncton could not do any business, could not find any traffic. The other day my hon. friend from South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) tauntingly asked my right hon. friend the Prime Minister if he still was of the opinion that this mad scheme of a railway from Winnipeg to Moncton would carry out any portion of the traffic from the great west. How do they propose to carry it out now ?—by a line 327 miles longer. That is the proposition which my hon. friend places before us. We have been talking of the shortest route across the northern portion of the province of Ontario and Quebec, saving every possible mile, saving every possible degree of curve, saving every inch of grade and we have been told day after day and week after week that such a line could not haul any business, that it was too long, that an all-rail line could not possibly take any considerable portion of the business out of the great west, and after groping around for a year for a policy, the proposition which my hon. friend now launches upon the House is that a line 327 miles longer will do the business which our short line is designed to do. Why, Mr. Speaker, it was only necessary that this proposition, as a result of six or eight months groping around for a policy, should be launched on the House in order to show the complete muddle into which our hon. friends opposite have got in this question. What is going to be the result if they do it ? Understand me, I am not discussing here the abstract question of extending the Intercolonial Railway to the lakes. There may be arguments in favour of that. If it comes before the House, if the government think it a question worthy of being taken up for consideration it may be decided one way or the other ; I shall not offer any observations upon that subject at the present time. I am not saying that at some time the Intercolonial Railway should not be got to the prairies of the west, but I do say that if it does get to the prairies of the west it should get to them by a short line and not by a line 327 miles longer than that short line. This contract takes the Intercolonial Railway to the prairies of the west and gives it an opportunity of going over a line 300 miles at least shorter than the one which the hon. gentleman proposes. What are you going to do to carry out this proposition ? Let us look at the consequence for a minute, and I commend this to my hon. friend from South Lanark (Mr. Haggart). Accept the proposition of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition and you will have the Grand Trunk Railway Company with its great system in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec absolutely without a western connection of any kind whatever. You condemn the Grand Trunk Railway Company with its 4,000 miles of railway and all its great connections for ever to be an American road working for the prosperity of an American port. You leave the great northern portions of the province of Ontario and Quebec to the extent of 1,200 or 1,300 miles which we propose to open up by this system, absolutely unopened. You do not open up one single mile of new territory, you get a line 300 miles longer than the one we propose and a line that cannot make any possible pretense of carrying out the traffic from the Northwest. As far as the financial proposition is concerned, if the Intercolonial Railway should undertake by the system proposed by the hon. leader of the opposition, involving a route at least 300 miles longer than that which we propose to do the business of the west, you multiply the deficit of the Intercolonial Railway by ten or twenty. You humbug and delude the farmers of the Northwest with the idea that every man is going to get a government line. When the Grand Trunk Pacific builds its main line, what will it do ? We all know perfectly well what it will do. Supposing it gets its main line built it will look out in all directions for business, it will build branch lines down into the Territories which are settled, and it will provide additional facilities so that it can compete for the business with the other companies that are established there. I would like to ask my hon. friend if he thinks that if he built a government line across the prairie that he could take government money and build branch lines of railway down into a territory that is served at the present time by other railways. I would like to see him get his appropriation from parliament if he undertook to do it. It cannot be done. Every man of practical experience in parliament knows that you cannot carry any such proposition as that into effect. My hon. friend's intention might be perfectly good. His proposition would never come within the sight of parliament. It would die in caucus just as his other proposition has died. I know perfectly well, that putting it as a plain proposition, if you are going to build government lines of railway wherever they are wanted in the Northwest Territories, it is a pretty popular proposition. My hon. friend may say that it is foolish for me to stand up in the House and argue that this should not be done. They may say : You should not set yourself in opposition to it.

I never was elected to parliament, Mr. Speaker, by supporting a thing that I thought was humbug, and I do not desire to be. I know just as well as I know I am standing here that the proposition to take government money and build lines of railway all through the Northwest is an impracticable and absurd proposition, and that the hon gentleman (Mr. R. L. Borden), if he were in power to-morrow, could not carry it out; that we could not carry it out; that nobody could carry it out. Therefore, I do not propose to stand in this House and give countenance to an idea, simply because I think that with some people it might be temporarily popular.

I have extended my remarks, Sir, to a much greater length than I had intended. Last night the leader of the opposition, in making as strong a presentation of his case as possible, extended to us an invitation to draw back and to hesitate in the carrying out of this great enterprise to which we have put our hands. I have to give my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) his answer upon that point, and I have to say that, so far from drawing back, so far from hesitating in connection with this enterprise, this government desires it to be understood that the Liberal party of Canada pledges its political existence on the carrying out of this enterprise.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. SIFTON. Yes; and if we have any weak-kneed brethren in the Liberal party, let them understand that so far as the government is concerned, and I think so far as the gentlemen behind me are concerned, we have not any doubt upon the subject.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. SIFTON. We have inaugurated this enterprise. We have, we think, exercised all the care that we could in connection with the various difficult and embarrassing and troublesome questions that necessarily arise in such an enterprise; but we have no doubt of the necessity, and we have no doubt of the value, of this enterprise to the people of Canada.

Just one word in conclusion. If you will turn for one instant to the map and look at the position in which Canada finds herself; if you will think what is going on to the south of us; if you will consider that lines of railway are being run from the Gulf of Mexico north for nine hundred, and one thousand, and twelve hundred miles, for the purpose of carrying the products of the northwestern states down to the Gulf of Mexico and thence to the markets of Europe; if you will consider that the Erie canal is being deepened, and that every possible facility for transportation southward, not northward, is being given by the great resources of the people to the south of us: if you consider all this, surely it will be clear that every possible thing that the people of Canada can do should be done by them to maintain their position, and to prevent the life-blood from being sucked from them by the efforts which are being made to take the traffic to the south. It is true that we cannot change the geography of our country, but we can fight against its disadvantages, and to some extent we can overcome them. And, Sir, when we have an opportunity of carrying through an enterprise of this kind, which will practically revolutionize the conditions of transportation in Canada, so far as all-rail business is concerned; when we are in a position, not only to have the advantage of the water transportation which lies along the international boundary, but to have a system of national transportation away from the boundary at all times, and available under any and all circumstances; surely, in the presence of the unbounded prosperity of Canada, we cannot afford to say that we will not avail of this opportunity; surely we should push forward to accomplish the successful completion of this great national enterprise.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART (South Lanark). The Prime Minister, when he introduced this amendment to the Grand Trunk Pacific Act, stated that the question of transportation excited more interest in the country than any other question. In that I agree. He stated further that it was the duty of the government to introduce some measure which would satisfy the overwhelming opinion of the people of Canada in favour of a better system of transportation, and that after consideration he had adopted the plan which at present is proposed to parliament. Reduced to its simplest form, that plan is: The building of a railroad from Moncton to Quebec, from Quebec to North Bay, from North Bay to Winnipeg, and from Winnipeg to the Pacific Ocean. This means the building of 3,400 miles of railway, 1,900 miles of which is absolutely built by the government, and the remainder of which is built by them to the extent of three-fourths of its cost. As was stated by the leader of the opposition, the government of Canada is required to expend, under this scheme, at least $150,000,000; and according to the statement of the president of the Grand Trunk to his shareholders, the Grand Trunk will assume a liability of fourteen and a-half million dollars. The government of the country is therefore paying ten times the money that the Grand Trunk Company is to carry out this scheme. But the leader of the opposition, in making his calculation, left out two very important items which the government is pledged to. The president of the Grand Trunk stated that they were to have a connecting line to North Bay and a connecting line to Lake Superior, and that they had made arrangements for the usual subsidies from the Dominion and the provincial governments. Therefore, in addition to the government's liability of $150,000,000, you will have to add a further grant of money for the purpose of building the branches to Lake Superior and to North Bay.

When I discussed this question last year, I said that the government never intended to build the road from Quebec to Moncton, but I did not expect to find that the road from Quebec to North Bay was virtually dead, too. That appears to be the case, because if we look at the statement of the president of the Grand Trunk, we will find that he has made no provision at all for a connection to Montreal. He will let the people of Montreal take care of themselves, and in the confidential memorandum, circulated, I suppose, among the directors of the Grand Trunk Company, the road from North Bay to Quebec was looked upon as being a little premature. That is what the Grand Trunk people think about the scheme. They still hold to their old proposition to get into the Northwest by Winnipeg, if necessary over to the Pacific; and short connections with Winnipeg, Lake Superior and North Bay; securing connections with Montreal and Quebec by the Grand Trunk line as it at present exists. That is the plain intention of the Grand Trunk authorities. Mr. Hays, in his address to the shareholders, does not speak of the splendid advantages to be enjoyed by the people of Halifax and Quebec on account of carrying the western freight to the east. On the contrary, he says: We want a connection with Lake Superior for the purpose of carrying the freight by water, and then to connect with the Grand Trunk Railway and take it thence to the sea-board. Notwithstanding the argument of the Minister of the Interior to-day, the consensus of opinion is that the only possible way to carry the western freight to the east economically is to get it as quickly as possible to Lake Superior to avail of the water route, and in this way transport it to the centres of consumption.

The hon. Minister of the Interior mentioned a fact which is pregnant of the whole position. He stated that from Port Arthur to Quebec grain had been carried this year for 3½ cents a bushel and perhaps less. Any one who has followed railway statistics and is acquainted with railway matters knows that the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canada Atlantic doubt their ability from this time out to carry grain by water from Duluth and Port Arthur to Midland and other Georgian bay ports, and thence by rail to Montreal or other Atlantic ports, in competition with the all-water route. The general opinion is that the Canadian Pacific Railway intended to build a branch line with no gradients, so as to have a perfectly level road, from the Georgian Bay to Montreal; but I think they have abandoned that scheme. They have found that no railway even though subsidized by the government and carried at one-half the rates charged by any other railway in the world, can compete with our water routes from Lake Superior to the Atlantic. It is true, as my hon. friend says, that a great deal of the traffic from Europe to Canada may pass over this line; but for the carrying of heavy traffic from Manitoba or the Northwest to the sea-board, it is absurd to suppose that any railway can successfully compete with a route part rail and part water or a route altogether water. Every railway man in the country knows this perfectly well. Then, what is the necessity of building a road at present from North Bay to Quebec? None whatever, because it is against nature. Canada has been placed more favourably by nature than any other portion of the continent of North America in regard to transportation. The natural means for the transportation of the cereals and other products of the west is down our magnificent system of waterways. I showed, in a speech which I delivered a couple of years ago, how business was transferred from one port to another by the slightest difference in rates. I showed that a quarter of a cent a bushel was sufficient to divert trade from Baltimore to Philadelphia, or from New York to Portland or Boston. The grain is consumed in Germany, Holland, or France or Great Britain; and if you go into the exchange in Chicago or Milwaukee or any other place where grain is sold, you will find that a quarter of a cent a bushel will be sufficient to divert it from United States channels to Canadian channels. Sentiment does not enter into the question at all. The man in Winnipeg who is shipping grain to Europe does not care whether it goes by Portland or Halifax or St. John, so long as he can send it to the markets of the world at the cheapest possible rate. We have within our own country the means of providing the greatest transportation facilities on this continent. By expending a sum of money which would be only a moiety of what the government propose to expend on this railway, we would so improve those facilities as to direct not only the traffic of Manitoba and the Northwest, but the traffic of the western states, through our own country.

Now, let me look at the proposition of the right hon. leader of the government. He proposes to expend $150,000,000 at least for the purpose of building this road and virtually handing it over to the Grand Trunk Railway Company. With that $150,000,000 what could we do? We could extend the Intercolonial Railway from Montreal to the Pacific coast. The distance from Montreal to Winnipeg by the Canadian Pacific Railway is 1,426 miles; from Quebec to Winnipeg by the proposed railway it is 1,500 miles. We could shorten the distance from Montreal to Winnipeg by at least 90 miles, by avoiding the detour which the Canadian Pacific Railway makes to go to Port Arthur, which would make the distance 1,336 miles; and we would save the whole Moncton section, 150 miles, by building from Montreal to the Pacific. I am not in favour of government controlled railways ; but when the government contribute the whole cost of building a railway surely they have a right to own the railway, and make such conditions as they choose for the parties who propose to operate it ? But in this case we have a railway company forcing on the government of the country the terms and conditions on which they propose to operate the road.

Now let us look at the financial part of it. My hon. friend talks about the $25,000,000 of stock and the amount of rolling stock and so on, but let us see what the Grand Trunk Railway people assume their liabilities to be. The president of the Grand Trunk Railway stated to the directors and shareholders of his road that the liabilities which the Grand Trunk Railway Company undertake by this contract with the government is the sum of $14,500,000 or £118,000 per year. That is all the liability undertaken by the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway and nearly the whole of that is secured by a mortgage as good as those which the government of the country themselves have upon the undertaking. One quarter of the amount that is to be expended on the road from Winnipeg to Port Simpson represents the sum of $145,000 and the Grand Trunk Railway say : That is all our obligation and we have a mortgage for the securing of that $40,500,000, pari passu, with the mortgages of the government themselves. The government under the original contract had the right to foreclose under certain conditions but now they have no right of foreclosure whatever. They are in the position of a receiver ; if default is made by the western section of the road they collect the money and distribute it to themselves and to the Grand Trunk Railway according to the amount of the security they have in the undertaking. In reference to the rolling stock my hon. friend says : Oh, they have to provide rolling stock. Some of our friends here stated that the Grand Trunk could form a trust company for the purpose of providing that stock but my hon. friend says no. He mistook my question and did not answer it properly. I did not say that the interest on the cost of the rolling stock that was furnished to the road would be a first charge on the earnings of the road. I said that a trust company might put that rolling stock upon the road and have as security the rolling stock itself. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) shakes his head. Let me read just what the president of the Grand Trunk Railway says on that matter. I am sorry to say that he differs from the Minister of the Interior and Minister of Justice.

Mr. SIFTON. The government and parliament will be governed by the terms of the contract and not by what the president of the Grand Trunk Railway says.

Mr. HAGGART. Hon. gentlemen must remember what the president of the railway company said to the stockholders and shareholders of that company. He said : We have no other liability than this £118,000. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) deny it ? He does not. I questioned the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fitzpatrick) upon that particular point when it came up before the House last year. I asked him if a trust company could not put the rolling stock upon that road and if in that event the government could have any security upon that rolling stock except what they would have over and above the vendor's lien upon that rolling stock.

Mr. SIFTON. It would be quite impossible to do that under the contract.

Mr. HAGGART. That is what the president of the road says. He says :

> That rolling stock will be provided by the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, and as the general manager will tell you, they have laid their plans for providing rolling stock by means of a trust fund. Therefore, you can wipe it out and call it four millions.

Their intention is evident ; it is clear to any one who knows anything about railroading. Where would they get the money ? Where would they get $20,000,000 to put on rolling stock to be given as security to the government ?

Mr. SIFTON. That is their business ; they have to do it under the contract.

Mr. HAGGART. It is not in the contract.

Mr. OSLER. The government might alter the contract next year.

Mr. HAGGART. You may alter the contract but there is nothing in the contract which forces them to do it, and you have only a lien on the stock. As I understand, and I have inquired from lawyers—perhaps not equal to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fitzpatrick) and the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) but of sufficient ability to enable me to make the statement on what I call authority—that this does not cover their vendors' lien ; they can retain the rolling stock as security for any unpaid balance on the rolling stock independent of the government's claim.

Mr. SIFTON. I do not wish to interrupt the argument of my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) who has a perfect right to make the argument and to take the position which he has taken. The point he raised was before the government and was referred to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fitzpatrick) ; it was referred by him to the counsel of the government and the opinion of the Minister of Justice, the Deputy Minister of Justice, and the two counsel, upon the contract was that there was absolutely nothing in the point to which the hon. gentleman refers.

Mr. HAGGART. We have not that opinion here to criticise it. I am sorry to say that it differs from that of the other parties to the contract. As will be seen from what I have read they have an entirely different opinion on the subject. The Minister of Justice, to confirm his argument, stated that this point was referred to Mr. Shepley and others in Toronto, but when he read the statement of Mr. Shepley and others to the House it was seen that it contained not a particle of bearing upon the question at all. The question of the lien of the parties putting the rolling stock upon the road was never submitted to them at all; the only question that was submitted to these gentlemen in Toronto was the question whether the interest upon the rolling stock would be a first charge upon the earnings of the road. They said that perhaps the right of repairs on the rolling stock might be a first charge but in their opinion the other was not. There is the whole fact. The Grand Trunk Railway Company supplied $15,000,000 for the purpose of building the road. They build branches to Lake Superior or to North Bay; it does not say where. The remarkable part of the statement of the president of the road is that they do not intend to build a branch into Montreal. The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) as I understood him, said it was proposed to extend some railways and that arrangements for that connection would be a subject for the future consideration of the government. But no provision is made under that agreement with the Grand Trunk Railway Company that they will build any connection for their road to Montreal. Another suspicious part of the agreement is this. It is true that in the original agreement the government have built the eastern section of the road with a certain amount of expedition, but under the amended agreement there is a provision by which the commissioners who have control of the building of this road may enter into an arrangement with the Grand Trunk Railway for the leasing of any part or portion of it which may be completed at that time, although the whole of it is not completed.

Therefore, if the road is built from Winnipeg to North Bay the government can contract themselves out of any engagement for the building of the eastern section. At least, that is my reading of this supplementary agreement. I may be wrong. I made careful inquiries about it, and have come to the conclusion that the government can contract themselves out of the bargain they made with the Grand Trunk as to the building of that portion of the road from Quebec to Moncton. Then we shall have not a through road, but a road to Quebec, unless the government insist upon the other portion of it being built. I think it is a wise provision under the contract which allows delay in that regard, for I think there is no necessity for making an expense at present either upon the Moncton section or on the other. I have already spoken of the Moncton section and showed the absurdity of building it. That point was fully dealt with by Mr. Blair, the ex-Minister of Railways, who showed conclusively that the route over which the government propose to build had been surveyed before, that it was found to approach closely to the international boundary and had not as good gradients as the route that was selected. For these and other reasons this route was not chosen, for the road between Riyière du Loup and the point of junction—Moncton I believe it is. The Minister of Finance says this eastern section of the Grand Trunk Pacific will ultimately be extended from Moncton to St. John by a line which will parallel the Intercolonial; but we may look upon that as something in the future. I suppose it will be the last section of the road to be surveyed. The surveying of the route from Winnipeg to Quebec and Quebec to Moncton will take at least two years or two years and a half, and so the government will have plenty of time to consider their position on that matter. But I hope that under the contract which they have made with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company and the Grand Trunk Railway Company they are not bound to build the portion from Quebec to Moncton or from Quebec to North Bay. The Minister of the Interior talked about the gradients on the new line of road. He said that he had sent an officer of his department to Montreal for the purpose of learning what these gradients were, and that officer came back with the report that the section from Winnipeg to the interprovincial boundary is comparatively easy. We all know that, for it is practically a prairie section. And he said that from the interprovincial boundary to Lake Nipissing, the railway would cost $25,000, $30,000 or $35,000 a mile, and would have gradients of 4-10th per cent and curves of 4 degrees. And what cheers greeted the hon. gentleman when he made that announcement? Does not the Minister of the Interior know that these are the very gradients on the existing road from Winnipeg to Lake Superior? And, as to the road costing from $25,000 to $35,000 a mile, I saw another report, from the provincial government, that the extension of the road to Lake Temagami could be built for $20,000 a mile. As a matter of fact the expenditure is nearly $30,000 a mile——

Mr. TISDALE. That is without rolling stock.

Mr. HAGGART. No; in that there is an allowance of $3,000 per mile for rolling stock. But the gradients are, in many cases, 90 feet per mile going north and from 50 to 60 feet per mile going south. I venture to say that the cost of the road from the interprovincial boundary—that is, from the end of the prairie section—to Lake Nipissing will be as great as that of the Canadian Pacific from the interprovincial boundary toward Port Arthur. I have stated before that some parts of that road cost $60,000 per mile to grade. It is through a country just such as my hon. friend describes—he uses the very words I used—a country with knobs of granite interspersed here and there with immense muskegs. It is not a difficult country as regards gradients, yet it is one of the most difficult countries on earth for railway building—a lacustrine country with granite ridges.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HAGGART. At six o'clock I was dealing with the liabilities of the Grand Trunk Company under the proposed arrangement with the government. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition stated that the total liability would be in the neighbourhood of fifteen million dollars, or three million pounds sterling. In confirmation of that, I propose to read the remarks of the president of the Grand Trunk Company and of Mr. Hays. We want to know exactly in what position the Grand Trunk Company is in reference to the government. I think the statement of the president of the company is strictly correct, when he says that the whole amount of the liability of the company in this undertaking will be the guarantee of a quarter of the cost, or the difference between $13,000 a mile and 25 per cent on the mountain section, on an expenditure of 500 miles, and an expenditure of $7,000 per mile on that section of the road which is called the prairie section, for 1,000 miles. For this advance the Grand Trunk Company have received a pari passu mortgage for the amount they expend upon the line. Their security for the $15,000,000 will be a first mortgage on the prairie section and on the mountain section of this contemplated undertaking. Besides that they receive $25,000,000 of Grand Trunk Pacific stock.

As the leader of the opposition stated, last session the Minister of Finance and other members of the government dwelt upon the fact that the Grand Trunk Company are obliged to hold this stock until some dividend is paid, or some return is made on the common stock of the company. The Minister of the Interior, in criticising that statement, said that the bondholders were in a different position from the stockholders, that in any future calculations for the purpose of fixing the rates on the road the bondholders might be taken into consideration, but the stockholders need not be. I can see no reason for the distinction. Whether a man puts his money into bonds or stocks of the road, I do not see why he should not be considered afterwards in fixing the rates. I do not think there is any distinction. I do not know what the Grand Trunk Company intend to do with the 1,000 shares allotted to them and which they can dispose of in any manner they please. Perhaps it is offered as a partial security for the purchase of the rolling stock, together with the second-class mortgage on the road. My idea as to how the rolling stock is to be acquired is confirmed by the statement of Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson. He says the rolling stock to be put upon the road will amount in value to $15,000,000, but that will not be a charge in any respect, nor will one cent of it be paid by the Grand Trunk Railway Company. I think he is perfectly right. If his contention is right, and they can raise money for purchasing stock on the security of the rolling stock that is put on the road, they can give further security or a second mortgage, which they evidently intend to do, upon the undertaking. They can supplement it if necessary by giving stock of the road. But, speaking for the Grand Trunk Company and for the Grand Trunk Pacific Company also, he says that stock is security for a trust fund, and the government have no lien upon the rolling stock. The Minister of the Interior differs with me in respect to that; but the more closely I look into it the more I am convinced that, from a legal point of view, the vendor can make any conditions he likes in reference to the sale, and he may take as security that rolling stock independent of any agreement that is made between the other two parties. Then it amounts to this, that the building of this road from Moncton west will only involve the company in a liability of $15,000,000. Let me read the remarks on this subject of Mr. Hays and of Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson. Replying to Mr. Allen, a former director of the road, he stated that the liability of the Grand Trunk Company would be in the neighbourhood of £9,000,000 sterling, and we all know what a statement of Sir Charles before a board of shareholders in England amounts to, and what risks he ran in making a statement that might afterwards prove to be false. He says, in answer to Mr. Allen:

> He boldly states that the liability upon the Grand Trunk Railway will amount to £9,000,000 sterling and he divides that £9,000,000 sterling into £300,000,000 liability in respect of guarantees, £5,000,000 sterling in respect of rolling stock, and £1,000,000 in respect of the deposit. As regards the £3,000,000 of guarantee, that, as I stated to you, will undoubtedly be a liability, as I stated to you also, will swell the liability of the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

That is the only liability that he admits, the £5,000,000 of rolling stock.

> It is estimated at £3,000,000.

I do not clearly understand this agreement. I think it is only in the meantime that the rolling stock is to be furnished by the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, and is to be $15,000,000. I may be mistaken, but I understood that the $5,000,000 is to be subsequently added to it.

As regards the five millions for rolling stock, it is not five millions—it is estimated at three millions. With that the Grand Trunk has nothing to do. That rolling stock will be provided by the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, and, as the general manager will tell you, they have laid their plans for providing that rolling stock by a trust fund. Therefore, you may wipe it out and call it four millions. And as regards the one million deposit, that deposit will not cost you one single halfpenny. Therefore, the liability comes back to the sum which I have just mentioned—namely, about three millions.

That is strictly correct. In reference to the profit of the £1,000,000 sterling, there was a deposit made by the Grand Trunk Railway Company of this stock, or preference stock, or some security of the company to cover the $5,000,000 which was required in cash or government securities to be deposited. What a farce that deposit was. One of the conditions of the deposit was that it should receive the sanction of the Grand Trunk shareholders. It never received that sanction. Another condition was that the Grand Trunk authorities could not deposit the stock until they had authority to apply it, and they have no Act of parliament giving them authority to apply it for any such purpose as that.

Therefore, they were to come to the parliament of Canada after the Grand Trunk shareholders had authorized the deposit of the amount to obtain legislation to make the deposit of Mr. Hays a legal one. Then, my hon. friend the leader of the opposition quoted Mr. Hays as saying : Oh, the £1,000,000 sterling deposited in securities is better than cash and the Grand Trunk Railway Company intend to proceed with the construction of the road. The hon. the Minister of the Interior found fault with my hon. friend the leader of the opposition when he characterized this as being an election dodge. The probability was that an election was going to take place last fall and it would have been very uncomfortable for the hon. gentlemen opposite to have gone before the people with this big proposition, when there was no legal deposit made and no arrangement for the carrying out of the undertaking. What could Mr. Hays' statement have meant unless it was designed for election purposes ? Why was it stated that the deposit was made with the government and that the Grand Trunk Railway intended to proceed immediately with the construction of the road and the carrying out of the agreement made with the government ? There could have been no other object in view, because Mr. Hays knew that it would require the sanction of the shareholders and Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson stated that it not only required the sanction of the shareholders, but that an Act of Parliament was necessary to confirm and legalize the deposit. Therefore, my hon. friend the leader of the opposition was perfectly correct in placing the interpretation upon this proceeding that it could have no other meaning than that it was a sort of bogus arrangement made with the Grand Trunk Railway Company to carry out the arrangement. Mr. Hays, speaking upon the liability of the Grand Trunk Company, stated :

> The Grand Trunk Railway is not going to be called upon under its guarantees for one cent for eight years after this enterprise is started —after the construction of the line is commenced—the cost of the line during construction being added to capital and provided out of capital, and the securities which the Grand Trunk Railway will guarantee will not be issued for eight years——

Where are they to get the money in the meantime to proceed with the undertaking ? Is that to be furnished by the government ?

> —and then after that eight years have rolled by, you have seven years yet on the mountain section, a part on which there seems to be some doubt. There can be not the slightest doubt as to what the returns will be from the prairie section, but on the mountain section you have seven years without any claim at all, three years after that only a claim on what is earned, making, therefore, before the mountain section becomes anything of a burden on the railway, eighteen years.

That is the liability of the Grand Trunk Railway Company in reference to the matter. In criticising the amendment proposed by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, the hon. Minister of the Interior, referring to the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal, from Montreal to the Georgian Bay and if necessary to Winnipeg, and to the western section of the country, said that the evidence to be found in this House is that my hon. friend was bitterly opposed to the extension of the road to Montreal. My hon. friend never did anything of the kind. What he did oppose was a bad bargain which was made by the government with the Drummond County Railway Company and with the Grand Trunk Railway Company in order to get into the city of Montreal. He never opposed the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to Georgian Bay. The hon. minister stated also that my leader need not be opposed to the conditions made with the Grand Trunk Railway Company, because the General Railway Act makes provision in reference to the tolls and rates that are to be charged by all railways in the country, that the control of rates has been given to the railway commission and that it would be useless to embody such a provision in the agreement made with the Grand Trunk Railway Company. But in the same breath he said that this government had acted differently on another occasion, that when they had the opportunity they made a bargain in reference to the Crow's Nest Pass railway, fixing the freight rates. If it were a work of supererogation in reference to the Grand Trunk Pacific, why embody this provision in the bargain with the Crow's Nest Railway Company? It is true that we have control over freight rates. It is true that we have the right to expropriate railways. We have the general power of confiscation, of taking them absolutely without remuneration. The parliament of Canada is invested with these powers, but we have never exercised them except on reasonable grounds. We could not take into consideration the $150,000,000 given by the government of Canada for the purpose of building this road and fixing the freight rates, nor could the commission do it. This is a gift from the people of Canada under the conditions embodied in the contract, and the fixing of rates and tolls must take into consideration, not the gift of the people of Canada of $150,000,000, but the actual value of the undertaking itself. Therefore, the condition as proposed by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition was a perfectly proper one to be embodied in this Bill. What are we doing? We are giving $150,000,000 for the purpose of completing this line. The parties who are the beneficiaries only give $15,000,000. We make no conditions as to freight rates or anything else. The hon. Minister of the Interior says that there is no necessity for it, that the board of railway commissioners, presided over by the best railway authority in Canada, will fix the rates nolens volens on the line of the Grand Trunk Railway. No necessity for embodying it in the contract? There is just as much necessity for embodying it in this contract as there was for embodying it in the contract for the construction of the Crow's Nest Railway. Then it is proposed to alter our position as to our security for the money that we advance on the prairie and western sections of the road. The reason given by the hon. Minister of the Interior, is that we want to allay the apprehension of the stockholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company and show to the world the confidence of the people of this country in this undertaking. These are the reasons given by the hon. gentleman for changing the securities. They may be patent reasons. They may be reasons which influenced the government of this country, but fancy the parties to an arrangement of that kind, business men, asserting these as reasons for the purpose of modifying the security and giving to other securities an equality with them.

And we are told that this is done to allay the apprehension of the stockholders of the Grand Trunk Railway, and to show the confidence that the people of Canada have in the undertaking. Why, the $150,000,000 which the government is going to spend will complete this whole road, and if necessary, we can add the $15,000,000 which the Grand Trunk is going to put into it. Then, why should we not build the road ourselves and let the people of Canada become the owners? The Minister of the Interior has said: Oh, no; that won't do; our experience with the Intercolonial Railway is that we have to meet a deficit of $800,000 or $900,000 a year, and the deficit on a government-owned railway of the extent proposed here, would be perhaps ten times as great. Well, that is a reflection on his colleague's management of the Intercolonial Railway. I venture the statement here that if business men took hold of the Intercolonial Railway and charged the ordinary current rates charged by railways in other parts of the Dominion, there would be an annual surplus of a million and a quarter dollars from the Intercolonial Railway. I venture the opinion, and it is fortified by the results in European countries, that the government can manage the Intercolonial Railway as cheaply as a private corporation can, that employees could be got at as low rates because they have more confidence in a railway managed by the government; and, if the head of the department looks faithfully after his business, the supplies can be obtained even more cheaply than they can be obtained by a railway managed by a private corporation. Although I am perhaps not an advocate of government railways, yet I say that there is no reason whatever why the government should not build this road, and let it be owned by the people of the country, seeing that the people will have to pay practically the whole amount required for its construction. And, if in the course of a year or two the government find that they cannot manage the road successfully, then they can make arrangements with other companies who may manage it successfully. But why should we spend $150,000,000 without getting a single benefit in return, except what will accrue from the actual construction of the line? These are the plain, bald facts. You can build a railway cheaper from Montreal to Port Simpson than the amount you will expend on this road. From Montreal to Winnipeg it is 1,426 miles, and if you save 100 miles as you can, it will be 1,326 miles. Taking the estimate, which seems to be that decided upon by competent authority, of $165,000,000, which will be advanced by the people of the country, you can build the whole road from Montreal to the Pacific ocean, and then you will have it owned by the people of Canada. Let me point out that the leader of the opposition does not pledge himself to any expenditure, or to any undertaking at all; he only draws the attention of the country to the fact, that if this government is going to spend $150,000,000, it can be spent to far better advantage than the government proposes. There are a hundred ways in which it can be more profitably expended. For $75,000,000 we can have twenty-foot navigation from Lake Superior to Quebec, and that would give us the control of the territory bordering on Lake Michigan, and which is now tributary to Chicago, Milwaukee and Cleveland. In addition to that, we would have the control of the transportation of our own produce from Manitoba and the Northwest Territories. With the remaining $75,000,000 we could build a railway from Montreal to Winnipeg, and have money to spare. My own idea is that nature has given us in Canada the command of the transportation facilities. I believe that time is the essence of an undertaking to insure that we should control transportation on the northern part of this continent. I believe that we should not wait until to-morrow, to-morrow and to-morrow. But I believe too, that the solution of the problem lies in the development of our waterways, supplemented by railways connecting with our great west. Does the Grand Trunk propose to carry a pound of wheat by rail from Winnipeg to Quebec? Does not Mr. Hays state to his shareholders: That the picking up of the freight in the west is controlled by the Canadian Northern Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway, which take it to Port Arthur and direct it through channels foreign to the Grand Trunk? Does not he state further, that the Grand Trunk Railway want the gathering of this freight themselves so that they might carry it to Port Arthur, ship it to the Georgian Bay ports, and then carry it to the sea-board? Mr. Hays never contemplates such a wild scheme as the carrying of freight from Winnipeg to Quebec by rail, or what is worse still, from Winnipeg to Moncton and St. John. I do not believe that it can be done. Railroading has not arrived at such a state of perfection that even with the most favourable grades you can do it, and compete with the water routes. The Minister of the Interior has told us that during last summer wheat was carried from Port Arthur to Quebec for 3½ cents. What railroad can carry it at that rate? One quarter of a cent per ton is the minimum rate at which any railroad on this continent that earns anything can carry freight. The ordinary rate is half a cent per ton per mile. With these facts before you, think of carrying wheat from Winnipeg to Quebec for three and a half cents per bushel in competition with the water route, and you will see how ridiculous the idea is. It is well known that even in Germany and Russia, which are gridironed with railways, they are building canals for the purpose of cheapening freight rates. Think of the proposal to spend $100,000,000 to deepen the Erie canal, and you will have some idea of the importance that waterways play in the cheap transport of freight. Do you think that the Americans would spend $100,000,000 on the Erie canal if they could carry by rail as cheaply as they can by water? No. The solution of the transportation problem in this country is: railroads to the nearest point of the great water communication; larger canals; bigger ports; facilities at the ports; and a well-lighted channel from Montreal to Quebec. Perhaps I am dwelling too much on this question, but I have studied it all my life, as thoroughly as I could. If the present scheme is carried out as the right hon. leader of the government contemplates, with grades of 4-10 per cent form Winnipeg to Quebec, the expenditure will not be in the neighbourhood of $150,000,000, but will be nearer $200,000,000. I am taking the conservative estimate $150,000,000 as the expenditure of this country on the proposed undertaking; but I hope in the interests of my country that no such absurdity as the building of a road from Rivière du Loup to Moncton will ever be carried out. If that section of country requires a railroad, let it be built by the people of the province themselves, as is done in Ontario and elsewhere, supplemented by Dominion grants. If the country from Quebec to Winnipeg north of the height of land is such as it has been described by the right hon. gentleman and the missionaries who have travelled over it, as equal in fertility to the province of Quebec, let it be developed by colonization roads. If the country from Lake Nepigon to Winnipeg is, as the right hon. gentleman has described it, a beautiful fertile clay belt, which when opened up will be settled by a population equal in wealth and prosperity to the people of Ontario, the people of that province will open it up. I have had an opportunity of looking at the reports of the surveyors who were sent by the Ontario government to explore the country around Lake Nepigon, and to examine its agricultural, mineral and timber resources. There is a good deal of timber there, although it is not equal to the pine timber found near Lake Temiscamingue and Lake Temagami; minerals have also been found; but as for agricultural land, there is none at all. The country from Lake Nepigon to the prairies lying east of Winnipeg is exactly similar to the country lying between Port Arthur and Winnipeg. It is totally unfit for agricultural purposes. Providence sometimes provides that a country without agricultural land may have good timber or minerals or waterfalls or fisheries; but all these have to be developed. That section of country, as I described it before, in the words quoted by the Minister of Interior, consists of a mass of granite ridges separated from one another by muskegs. It is one of the most difficult countries in the world in which to build a railway. We have the experience of the Ontario government in building in that section ; we have also the experience of the Dominion government in building around the north shore of the Lake of the Woods. These examples may indicate to us the character of the country. It may be in the interest of Canada, as well as in the interest of the Grand Trunk Railway, that a separate road should be built from Winnipeg to Lake Superior, and that a connection should be made with North Bay ; but surely that should be supplemented by the beneficiaries in the undertaking to a greater extent than is done in the scheme before us. If it is an undertaking from which there is the prospect of any return, let the parties who engage in it contribute something towards it. I have nothing to say against the prairie section ; nor have I anything against the Grand Trunk Railway. The Grand Trunk is a road of which the people of Canada are proud ; it is an excellent road, in first-class order. The shareholders of the company have had very little or no return from the people of this country, unless the holders of the preferential securities. The people of Canada would be justified in doing something to assist the Grand Trunk Company in sharing in what we believe are the brilliant and immense possibilities of Manitoba and the Northwest. If any corporation in Canada is entitled to a share in the benefits of that country, it is the Grand Trunk Railway Company. But let it be in reason. The people of Canada are contributing nearly the whole cost of the present undertaking. Whatever money the Grand Trunk Company are contributing they have first-class security for. They will never contribute one copper out of the pockets of the shareholders of the company. They only undertake a probable liability after a number of years of £100,000 sterling a year. For the expenditure which the people of Canada are making, we should surely have some more benefit than is possible under the arrangement proposed by the government. As I said before, that money expended in a hundred different ways would be of far greater benefit to the country. At this time it is madness, it is suicidal folly, for us to pledge the credit of the country to the extent of $150,000,000 more than it is pledged at present. There is no necessity for it. The Grand Trunk Company never contemplated it. They came to this government for the purpose of getting the ordinary subsidies given to railways for the purpose of extending their railway from North Bay to the Pacific coast, and the present scheme was foisted upon them by the government. The government took this position : if you wish to undertake a commercial enterprise in your own interest, we will not let you do it, unless you build a road to Quebec, and from Quebec to Moncton. I prophesy that the road from Quebec to Moncton will never be built with the money contemplated under the agreement. The Grand Trunk Company did not contemplate either that road or the road from North Bay to Quebec. They do not contemplate any such thing under their agreement. If they had contemplated it under their agreement why do they make the statement to the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway that the only subsidiary lines they will build are connections with Lake Superior and with North Bay. They carefully guard themselves with a provision that if the government of the country at any time takes over the eastern section they will have to take it over at a valuation taking into consideration the subsidy given by the Dominion government. Under these circumstances I am fully in accord with my leader. I am not here pledging myself to the support of government railways, but I say this, that the money of the country could be expended as proposed by the leader of the opposition in a more economical and better way and in a way that will do more for the betterment of this country than by the scheme which the hon. gentleman proposed to this House.

Mr. E. B. OSLER (West Toronto). Mr. Speaker, it strikes one as being rather an extraordinary position that when a body of business men, as we will assume that the men who govern this country are, present to the country a scheme involving an amount almost equal to the present national debt, the Prime Minister introduces this measure in a speech of less than an hour's duration and that the Minister of Railways, who is mainly interested and should be mainly responsible for this Act is afraid to speak or is not put up by the government. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) is put up to make a speech in answer to that of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden), and I am bound to say that no member on either side of this House will venture to assert that the Minister of the Interior answered one single point made by the leader of the opposition. The Minister of the Interior spoke at fair length ; on him had fallen the mantle of the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister last year ascended to airy flights that carried away his followers so that they enthusiastically endorsed a scheme which should have been endorsed not from airy flight of imagination but from business facts which were wanting. On this occasion the Prime Minister was evidently not equal to the task of sustaining the airy flights of last year. He laboured most painfully in trying to put his case before this House and he assumed, Sir, that the changes and the alterations submitted to this House were so trifling that it was almost unnecessary for the Prime Minister of this country or for any of his colleagues to explain them ; they were so plainly set forth that he who ran might read. I have no doubt that the Prime Minister was quite honest in his statement of the view he took, because I venture to say that he did not at all understand the meaning of the alterations in this contract. The Minister of the Interior spoke at fair length ; he found that his platitudes in connection with the wonderful good that was to result to Canada from extending this line through an unknown country did not invoke enthusiasm from the back benches. He found, Sir, that he had to raise his voice, and the louder he raised his voice and the more vigorously he declaimed, with no refutation of the remarks of my leader, the greater became the applause on the benches behind him. No one can endorse this contract from a business point of view ; it can be endorsed only if the minister brings to it a sort of enthusiastic patriotism which sometimes leads people away into unknown regions, into quagmires and bogs, as the will-o-the-wisp leads those who follow it. My hon. friend the member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) apparently did not think it was worth while to answer some of the statements made by the Minister of the Interior. Perhaps he was right in ignoring them, but as I took notes of a few of the minister's statements I think I should not waste the energy I expended at that time. First he endeavoured to minimize the importance of the guarantee of the bonds by this government. He said that the Dominion bonds guaranteed to Mackenzie & Mann were sold at 90 cents on the dollar in London. I venture to dispute that statement, and to say it is not so. The bonds were not sold at 90 cents and cannot be sold at 90 cents to-day. I do not speak with authority but I have every reason to believe that it is a fact that a syndicate of bankers have advanced money on these bonds at 80 or 83 cents on the dollar and have a call on them for three years at 90 cents. Thus you see what idea the financial world has of the probable cheapening of money rates during the next three or four or five years during which Canada has committed herself to an obligation of fifty or sixty or seventy million dollars. Could Canada borrow $160,000,000 in five years in addition to the enormous borrowings that are going on in the world to-day. I venture to say that the rate of money in London and the money centres of the world will not fall below 4 per cent in the next five years. There is no indication of cheaper money. Mr. Speaker, if you had read the report of the commission which took over the great Water and Gas Works in the city of London which came in two or three months ago, you would have found that the money market was so bad that it would have caused a panic if that arrangement had been carried out, and that money had been raised by the corporation of the city of London whose credit I think even the Prime Minister will admit is equal to that of Canada. If the city of London had gone into the market to raise the money which they would have been obliged to do under the terms of the arbitration it would have demoralized the money markets of the world.

I say, therefore, we cannot, much as I regret it, look forward to having cheap money rates for the next five years, perhaps for a much longer period, and this government cannot look forward to financing a large transaction such as this at the rates that prevailed one, two or three years ago. The Minister of the Interior, seeking an excuse for the Grand Trunk Railway Company in backing out of this arrangement made the statement, if I understood him aright, that the Grand Trunk Pacific contract was a contract by a private company with this government, and, naturally they were not able to implement their contract because it depended upon the consent of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, thus intimating that the Grand Trunk Railway Company was not a party to the original transaction. If we turn to the speech of the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, what did we find ? Let me quote to you what that gentleman said to his shareholders at the meeting last month :

> Having arrived, then, at the conclusion that the best interests of the company necessitated some early measure in the direction that I have intimated,——

That is, getting into the Northwest.

> —we caused a Bill to be introduced into the Canadian parliament for securing a charter of incorporation for the creation of a company with an independent organization, but in close connection with and under the control of the Grand Trunk Company for the purpose of building a line of railway from a point of junction on the Grand Trunk line, passing through the most fertile districts of the Northwest and terminating at a port on the Pacific coast.

So, the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company tells his shareholders that his company caused the Grand Trunk Pacific Bill to be introduced into this House. He said he was in negotiation with the government for it eighteen months ago. The Grand Trunk were at the back of the Bill. Through a dummy, the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, they carried on negotiations with this government. That is the statement of the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company to his shareholders, and I presume that it is correct. He says also :

> When I addressed them——

The shareholders,

> —in the month of April last year, it might reasonably be expected that such a scheme might be carried through without engaging in any way the credit of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Company.

Now, Sir, I appeal to the Prime Minister, to the Minister of Finance and to every member of the government, if they did not, in the House last year, state that this scheme was backed by the Grand Trunk, and that this country was to be committed to it because the Grand Trunk Railway Company was behind it, a company that was so wealthy and of such excellent credit that it could get any money it wanted in the markets of the world. Did they not insist upon it that the government incurred no responsibility, because it was not dealing with ordinary railway promoters, but was dealing with the old, substantial Grand Trunk corporation? To-day we have the Minister of the Interior telling us that when the government last year closed this bargain with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, they were negotiating with and closed a bargain with a company that had no backing, with a lot of fakirs who proposed to get the Grand Trunk Railway Company to endorse their scheme if it was in the interest of that company to do so. And now we have the Grand Trunk Railway Company saying that they will not endorse it. And we have the melancholy spectacle of the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company telling his shareholders that he has caused to be called a special session of the Dominion parliament to ratify an agreement made, not by the government with a private company, but by a private company with the government of this Dominion. Is it not humiliating, Sir? And yet, the Prime Minister, in a speech of less than an hour, tells this House that the modifications in the agreement are so slight that it is hardly worth his while to make an explanation of them, and that the opposition must feel that these modifications are so much to the advantage of the country that he is quite sure no member of the opposition will object to them. But the Minister of the Interior made the most extraordinary statement, a statement that, I hope, will not be endorsed by his colleagues or by any section of the representatives of Canada. In dealing with the common stock of this company, which the government have now handed over to the tender mercies of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, to speculate in and to manipulate as they like, he stated that that had nothing to do with the obligations of this parliament. He said that if the government authorized a certain bond issue on a railway—and I suppose he means that the same would apply to any other company—the government are, in a measure, morally bound, in so far as in them lies, to see to it that that obligation is respected by the laws of the country. But, as regards the common stock of any company, though authorized by the government, and in this case forced upon the company that is going to control the road, as regards that common stock the government has no interest at all. The men who own it may hold it, and if things go wrong, why, the devil take the hindmost—this government will not help them. If the government authorizes the issue of $25,000,000 common stock, that common stock is an obligation on the undertaking. If it is honestly managed, if the company carries out its obligations properly, if it does not attempt to defraud the people, then, Sir, the common stock authorized to be issued by this parliament—in this case, I say, authorized wrongly without any value—but if the government authorizes this to be issued as water, then, I say, the government are responsible. And, when it comes to the point of controlling rates on the railway on which this government has authorized the issue of $25,000,000 of stock—water or gas—the people of this country are morally responsible to see that the men who buy that stock, so authorized to be issued by the government, are allowed to have a proper dividend in return. If that is not the case, let us have it published so that all the financial world may know it. Do not let us fake and fool people into investing in wild-cat securities. Let the government not make use of these people as a means of getting a capital from outside, but with the mental reservation that they will allow them to be wiped out if it suits the purposes of the manipulators. Don't do it, Mr. Speaker, it is going to discredit us. The speech of the Minister of the Interior on that point may do more to discredit Canadian enterprise than anything that has been done in this House for years.

The Minister of the Interior very skilfully avoided the eastern section of this road. That is the white elephant, that is the bogey that is to be suppressed. The Grand Trunk Railway Company have repudiated any obligation whatever in connection with the eastern section, they say they have nothing to do with it, and that they will have nothing to do with it. The president of the Grand Trunk, the general manager and all who spoke, avoided altogether any reference to the eastern section, barring a general reference to it in the president's speech. The Minister of the Interior very wisely said that after a road is built—and I am very glad he said it, because it simply backs up the statement I made last year, and which was jeered at by members of the government—that is only half the cost of it, that the next ten years afterwards it will require an expenditure equal to the original cost of the road. He applied that to the western section, and assumes that the Grand Trunk Railway Company will be obliged to spend a large sum of money on the western section after they acquire the road. That is right. But he did not apparently think at all of the eastern section, apparently that has gone out of the minds of all the ministers, because the same thing applies to the eastern section, and when the government have built the eastern section—if they ever do build it, and pray heaven they do not—if they ever build it, the original cost will be duplicated within ten years, and the government will undoubtedly have to pay interest on it. I say, therefore, that the Grand Trunk have no obligation in connection with the eastern section, and their president, in his speech, said directly that they have not.

Assuming that the eastern section is not built from North Bay to Quebec and Moncton, there is not a single clause or obligation in this agreement as to the Grand Trunk carrying freight except as they please. The original scheme of the Grand Trunk was to build their road from North Bay westward to Winnipeg, in order to get the business of the west—a good, sound business proposition. That was the scheme which they outlined, the president says it was their original scheme, and it was in a measure put aside by the government. Suppose the eastern section is not built for ten years, what will happen ? The whole of the trade of the Grand Trunk accumulated west of Winnipeg goes either to Port Arthur or to Duluth, goes across the lakes and comes down to Portland to increase and to enrich the harbour of our friends in the United States. I have read the reply of the Grand Trunk president made to Mr. Allen, one of the directors who resigned from the board because he said that the agreement appeared to him to force the Grand Trunk Company to send their freight over Canadian routes and to destroy the Portland terminals, upon which the Grand Trunk had spent so much money, which he thought would be a detriment to the Grand Trunk shareholders. The president, in reply to the letter of Mr. Allen, his late director, says in effect : I regret that Mr. Alllen is not here, because his letter was written in reference to the first agreement, but if he knew what the second agreement is that we have now got out of the government, he would know that his fears are vain, and that the Grand Trunk system, with all its expenditure in Portland, will not be affected by this agreement at all. Now, I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister or any of his colleagues are aware of what the Grand Trunk directors, their president and general manager, said at that meeting. The Minister of Finance, in reply to a quotation made by the leader of the opposition, wanted to know whether the quotation he made from a speech at that meeting had been printed. Well, I thought the Minister of Finance was not so simple as to suppose that everything printed was good and everything that was not printed was not good. Now, the Grand Trunk Company caused to be printed in the financial papers in London, in the 'Times,' and every other paper reporting their meeting, exactly what they wanted to be reported and what they thought would suit this country. They cut out every speech and every word that could be used against this contract, and the speeches which we have in the financial papers are garbled reports which do not give the true meaning of what was said there, and do not convey any correct impression of the results of that meeting.

The Minister of the Interior made a great point by saying that if this road was a success the government would be paid the interest. We are agreed on that point. Assume it will be a success, and let us all hope it will be. The government have gone into partnership with this company, and they are supplying the money. If there is a loss they pay for it, if it is a success they pay for that also, to a large extent. As the leader of the opposition said truly, if the government of this country are to put $150,000,000 or $160,000,000 into this enterprise, and it is a success, why should they hand it over to the partner, who only puts in $14,500,000, and let him get the whole profit, while, on the other hand, if it proves to be a failure, we bear all the loss. That is the position that has been taken.

The parliament of this country was summoned at the behest of the Grand Trunk Railway directorate, it was called at a date that would suit them, two days after it suited the Grand Trunk shareholders to have their meeting. The president and directors say in their speeches that the only serious business before the parliament of Canada at this session is the confirmation of the agreement which the Grand Trunk Railway Company has condescended to submit to the Canadian parliament for ratification. This country, represented as it is now, is no doubt going to confirm and ratify that agreement. The country is in the position of having put its destiny to this extent into the hands of—what shall we say ? I am afraid to say it, because the illustration that comes into my mind is one of those registering concerns in the bar-room. I do not like to use that illustration here, but this is simply a ratification which is to be registered by a certain number of ticks and keys which are to be applied on the board by the gentlemen behind at the instance of the hon. gentlemen in front.

Mr. BENNETT. No mouth organs.

Mr. OSLER. That is evident, because, as my hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), says, there are no mouth organs in this business. I commend and highly compliment the government upon the decision they have arrived at, that none of their supporters are to get up and attempt to justify this bargain.

Some hon. members. Oh, oh.

Mr. OSLER. We hope they will change their minds, because the more this contract is attempted to be justified, the more its hideous colour will be disclosed. Let us take the contrast between the speech delivered by the right hon. Prime Minister this session and the speech which he delivered last year. Why his speech last year carried us all off our feet ! There was one statement that the right hon gentleman made which was absolutely true. I would not like to say that there were any more that have so turned out in the light of subsequent events, but the right hon. Prime Minister stated with all the enthusiasm, fire and patriotism possible that time could not wait. Mr. Speaker, time has not waited, but this scheme has waited. It has waited six months, whereas, last year we were told that the whole fate of this nation hung upon whether we got, without any delay and without any regard to cost, this railway, to save us from the danger of bonding privileges being abrogated. To-day we have a statement from the hon. Prime Minister showing that from that day to this the only information which the government have as to the character of the road from North Bay to Quebec is a missionary report of 200 odd years ago. Could you get any contractor in this world to take a contract on the estimate of an enthusiastic explorer 200 years ago as to the character of the country? The hon. gentleman said that we have roses growing on the twenty something of June. We have roses growing almost to the Arctic circle the moment the sun comes out. You can go 400 miles north of where this railway is projected, and on the 21st of June, or the 1st of July, you will find roses growing. But, this is no argument to commit the country to an expenditure of $150,000,000 for a railway. I have a report which was given to me to-day by Professor Macoun on a part of the district which this railway is to run through. I am sorry as a Canadian that that report has to be what it is. I have also a report given to me by a man whom I sent up to that country twelve years ago, a man in whose judgment every hon. member who comes from the Northwest will repose the greatest confidence, whose opinion will be endorsed and whose conclusions will be accepted without hesitation. I refer to Mr. R. F. Dodds. He reported as Professor Macoun has reported in regard to that country. I do not want to belittle the country. We have a rich enough country to make us one of the greatest nations on the earth, but we do not want to throw away money experimenting with sections of the country about which we know nothing.

What is the history of the change in this contract? Last year the government fell in love with it. I wish I could describe the scene in the 'Midsummer Night's Dream' which aptly illustrates the course of the right hon. Prime Minister. The mischief Puck gets the distillation from the flower that is called 'Love lies bleeding' and he puts it into the eyes of the sleeping, romantic beauty, the effect of the drug being that she must fall desperately in love with the first creature, man or beast, which meets her gaze upon opening her eyes. We know what happened. By a mischance Bottom, the weaver, with his donkey's ears, lies down beside her to rest, and she, opening her eyes in the morning, falls desperately in love with Bottom the weaver. I have thought, that, Mr. Hays, in the guise of Puck, found our Canadian representative sleeping, dropped this distilled liquor from 'Love lies bleeding' into his eyes and put the Grand Trunk scheme beside him so that it should be the first thing he should see when waking; he awoke, saw this scheme and fell in love with it desperately. Let us pray heaven that before it is too late the antidote that Puck applied to the eyes of the love-sick maiden may be applied to the eyes of the right hon. Prime Minister before he dowers with the good gold money of this country this Grand Trunk Pacific scheme to the extent of $150,000,000.

It is interesting to see with what sympathetic words the president of the Grand Trunk Railway sent his greetings to the right hon. Prime Minister as to the cruel position that the opposition took against this pet scheme of his. He also had his troubles with his board of shareholders and could not get them into line. But, he got them into line, not on the old contract, bad as it was for this country and good as it was for the Grand Trunk Railway Company, but he got them into line by obliterating from the contract every obligation on the part of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. I can well understand with what pleasant cheerful little chuckles he sent his sympathy to the right hon. Prime Minister in his trouble with the opposition. I have referred to the fact that the government have made no attempt to get surveys of this line, no matter how important it is. It is important. The government are going to commit themselves to this enterprise. They are to be censured because for six months after parliament has confirmed this agreement they have taken no steps to obtain any information as to the character of the land from North Bay to the eastward. Let us give a little explanation of that. The hon. Minister of the Interior produced with great gusto, as if he were producing something that was absolutely convincing, a report from Mr. James White—I suppose an engineer—

Mr. BARKER. A geographer.

Mr. OSLER. A geographer is a poor man to send on a railway surveying expedition. I do not think it is worth referring to if it comes from a geographer. But anyway, that report refers to the country from North Bay to Winnipeg only. There is not a word in that report as to the country from North Bay to Quebec, and the section from North Bay to Quebec is the section that the Grand Trunk Railway Company repudiates absolutely. The section from North Bay to Winnipeg is the section that the Grand Trunk Railway Company had decided to build themselves under the ordinary subsidy which they would get from the government.

Now, I do not think that the government have any idea of what was done at the recent meeting of the Grand Trunk shareholders in London. We have had very strong statements made by the Minister of the Interior, to the effect that it is not what the Grand Trunk people said, but it is what the agreement will be that will govern. Let me tell the House what the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company stated to a meeting of his shareholders, and let me point out also that what the president and directors state to the meeting of their shareholders, is what the Grand Trunk Railway Company is committed to. If the directors should commit the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company to a single obligation other than is laid before the shareholders, they are liable not only civilly but criminally as well. Let me remind hon. gentlemen that the criminal law of England has lately been enforced in that respect in the Whitaker Wright case and in other cases in which company directors have been called to account. It is not a question of an ordinary action but it is a criminal action as well. If Sir Rivers-Wilson made a misleading statement to the shareholders of his company, as to the extent of the liability they assumed by this contract, then Sir Rivers-Wilson and every director of them is liable to criminal prosecution, and they would be prosecuted criminally and justice would be done. Therefore, it does not lie with the Minister of the Interior or any other minister, to say that the statement made officially at the Grand Trunk meeting is not to be accepted as the meaning which the Grand Trunk directors place on this contract. I do not believe that the government thought it worth while to obtain a verbatim report of the proceedings of the recent meeting of the Grand Trunk Company; if they did I do not think the Minister of the Interior would make the speech he made to-day. At that meeting Sir Rivers-Wilson said:

> This has occupied the continuous and most anxious attention of your directors for the last eighteen months.

And yet the Minister of the Interior told us to-day, that the Grand Trunk Company had nothing to do with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway charter; that that was obtained as an independent charter. But we see here that the terms and the conditions of it could not be carried out until it was submitted to the Grand Trunk Company. Contrast the speeches made last year by hon. gentlemen opposite, with the statement of Sir Rivers-Wilson, and look at what a humiliating position these gentlemen are in now. Sir Rivers-Wilson said:

> No time is to be lost if we are to avail ourselves of the present opportunity. We caused a Bill to be introduced——

That is the Grand Trunk Railway caused a Bill to be introduced.

> We caused a Bill to be introduced into the Canadian parliament for securing a charter of incorporation for the creation of a company with an independent organization, but in close connection with and under the control of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, for the purpose of building a line of railway from a point of junction at or on the Grand Trunk line, passing through the most fertile districts of the Northwest and terminating at a port on the Pacific coast. Under the natural impression that a scheme of this nature would commend itself to the approval, and would obtain the support and encouragement of the government and parliament of Canada, so liberally accorded to other railway enterprises. I ventured to suggest to the shareholders, when I addressed them in the month of April last year, that it might reasonably be expected that such a scheme must be carried through without in any way engaging the credit of the Grand Trunk Company shareholders.

Now, Mr. Prime Minister, what have you to say to the statement that I think was made by yourself and by every member of the government, that the Grand Trunk was behind your scheme body and bones.

Mr. BENNETT. Of it and in it.

Mr. OSLER. Yes, of it and in it. The president of the Grand Trunk Company in addressing the shareholders last month states, that that scheme which he negotiated with this government, according to his idea, did not commit the credit of the Grand Trunk shareholders to one dollar.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. That is not what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Osler) read. Sir Rivers-Wilson says that when he introduced it it was of that character.

Mr. OSLER. Exactly; he refers to the scheme that was carried through last year.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. No.

Mr. OSLER. Yes, I will read it again.

> When I addressed them in the month of April last year it must reasonably be expected that such a scheme must be carried through without engaging in any way——

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Yes.

Mr. OSLER. Surely 'in any way' means that it would not engage their credit to even the extent of one dollar.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Osler) draw any distinction between Sir Rivers-Wilson's statement of the case in the month of April, 1903, and the Act passed by this parliament towards the close of the year 1903, creating the contract?

Mr. OSLER. Let me read on.

> Such was my conviction at the time. (A voice: I hope it is so now). Such was my conviction at the time founded upon resonable data, and in view of the proceedings to which I have alluded, I must confess that when I made that suggestion I appear to have been somewhat over sanguine.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Hear, hear.

Mr. OSLER. That was after he had his negotiations with the government. He does not say that the governement objected to that at all ; he does not say that the government wanted to impose the obligation of a dollar on the Grand Trunk shareholders ; but he says :

I appear to have been somewhat sanguine, not sufficiently considering, perhaps, the weight of political opposition which the scheme was destined to encounter.

He was not considering that the opposition——

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Not 'the' opposition—political opposition.

Mr. OSLER. Political opposition is the opposition in this House, and if it had not been for the Conservative opposition, you might have opened the treasury doors to Mr. Hays and the president of the Grand Trunk, and every one of the ministers would have apparently gone down on their knees and said : Please gentlemen if there is anything more that you have not got, take it, and we will endorse your note for anything else you may require. But the Conservative opposition checkmated the Grand Trunk president's idea that he was going to get this big plum without one shilling of liability, and he had to go back to his shareholders and say :

It has been accordingly found impossible to carry the measure through the Canadian parliament without imposing some limited obligation on the Grand Trunk Company ; not by any means however as I think I shall satisfy you——

Mr. ALEXANDER JOHNSTON. Have you got any more of the books from which you are reading ?

Mr. OSLER. Yes, I shall be glad to supply the members of the government with a verbatim report of the meeting of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk, and I think it will do them good. They apparently are ignorant of the scheme they are endorsing and committing this country to.

Our original idea was to build from a point on the Grand Trunk Railway to the Pacific coast. The intention was that the point of junction should be at or in the neighbourhood of North Bay. It was made, however, by the government a condition of the grant of the charter of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company that the line should be extended eastward from North Bay to Quebec into the city of Moncton, in New Brunswick. . . . As a result, however, of the negotiations with the government, another Bill was introduced by the government itself for ensuring the construction of the contemplated line from New Brunswick to the Pacific in joint partnership between the government and the Grand Trunk Pacific Company.

Now, this is a fine kind of partnership The government say they are going into partnership with the Grand Trunk Company, and the Grand Trunk Company say they are going into partnership with the government. I remember when a boy being told of all sorts of people who wanted to go into partnership. A man comes to you and wants to go into partnership with you, he having the experience and you the money. In a short time you will have the experience and he the money. This is a scheme in which the man of experience has touched the man, simple as he is, with the money ; and if it is carried out, the man of experience will have the money, and God help us, the country will have the experience.

An agreement under which this line would be constructed and worked was embodied in the government Bill, and it is the first of the two agreements which are submitted to you to-day, so far as they affect the interests of the Grand Trunk Company.

Then comes the pathetic part of it :

I think it only due to Sir Wilfrid Laurier to express my appreciation of his patriotic and statesmanlike conduct of this great measure through parliament.

That was the claim put forward in this House for this scheme that it was patriotic, and it is said that it was by the right hon. gentleman's patriotism, patience and ability that he was able evxentually to carry the measure.

His leading object was to secure additional facilities for enabling the growing population of the Northwest to bring the products of the western prairies to the eastern sea-board.

By means of this partnership, supported not by the Grand Trunk, but by the Grand Trunk Pacific.

The directors had been in consultation, through their general manager——

This is rather a contradiction of the statement of the Minister of the Interior——

—with the government throughout the lengthened discussion of these measures, and we are bound to acknowledge the fairness with which we were met by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his colleagues in their endeavour to meet the views of the board so far as they could do so conformably with their own views, of which they were very tenacious, and having regard to the great pressure brought to bear upon them by the opposition. And here, I must say, that if these negotiations reach, as I think and as I hope you will agree with me in thinking, a most successful issue, it has been mainly owing to the efforts and great ability shown by our general manager, Mr. Hays.

Now, if you will only remember the attitude of Mr. Hays in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific Bill before the Railway Committee, you will recollect that he promised, definitely and absolutely, on behalf of the Grand Trunk Company, to carry out any scheme that was asked for by any member of the committee.

Negotiations were accordingly resumed, and the result is embodied in the second or supplemental agreement which is now in your hands, and which read together with the first agreement we now submit for your approval. Should it receive that approval—as I do not doubt will be the case—it will be brought before the parliament of Canada—which has been specially summoned to meet on the 10th March, the day after to-morrow—for consideration and, I hope, confirmation.

Now, is it not a humiliating thing, Mr. Speaker, that the president of a private corporation is able to state to his shareholders that the parliament of Canada has been specially summoned at the behest of that private corporation to approve of a Bill in its interest? Is it not humiliating that the first we heard of this Bill was from London through the directors of the Grand Trunk Railway Company?

I may here remark that the Act, in virtue of which the government construct the road as far west as Winnipeg, relieves the Grand Trunk Pacific Company from the necessity originally contemplated of building that portion of the line from North Bay to Winnipeg.

That is a nice concession. It relieves the Grand Trunk Company from the necessity of building the line which they had determined to build from North Bay to Winnipeg, a distance of 1,000 miles. With reference to the western division, the president says:

Passing as it will do through the most fertile and most promising belt of country in the whole of the Northwest Territories, there cannot be the slightest doubt that this portion of the road, built, as I have said, under such favourable and economical conditions, will immediately produce excellent results, and will by itself more than justify the adoption of the scheme in its entirety. . . . The financial conditions under which the mountain section will be constructed are that the Canadian government guarantee 3 per cent interest on the bonds to be issued to the extent of 75 per cent of the cost of construction. . . . Assuming that the western division should not be completed until the expiration of the full period of eight years allowed by the agreement, for a term of eighteen years from now, no claim will arise against the Grand Trunk Pacific Company in respect of three-fourths of the cost of construction. . . . As you will have gathered from my preceding remarks, neither in respect of the lease of the eastern division or any of the sections, nor in respect of the working of the mountain section of the western division will any charge for rent in the one case, or, in the other case, for interest on three-quarters of the cost of construction be imposed upon the Grand Trunk Pacific Company for a period of ten years after completion.

That is, eighteen years from the date of the agreement. The deposit the president thinks was a useless thing, and I think so too. He goes on to say—and this is a contradiction of the statement made by the government last year that this scheme was introduced in its entirety, full and complete, and that they had the Grand Trunk Company bound to carry it out. He says:

It must have been obvious that the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, which had not even been organized, was not in a position, within the limited period exacted, to make the deposit, and the Grand Trunk Company, of course, was unable to afford assistance without first obtaining the sanction of its shareholders, for which a certain time was required.

That can mean only one of two things, either that the government was absolutely and entirely in ignorance of what they were doing or else that they were deliberately humbugging this House. The Grand Trunk president says that it must be obvious to every one that the Grand Trunk Pacific Company having no credit, no capital, no organization, was unable to furnish the million pounds deposit required, in the time, and that the Grand Trunk would not supply it for them because they had not been authorized by the shareholders to do so. That was the position which the opposition took and is it not humiliating now to be told by the Grand Trunk president that he fooled this country through the present government. The president goes on to say:

The obligation proposed to be assumed by the Grand Trunk Company is, as I have explained, limited to a guarantee of bonds representing one fourth of the cost of constructing the western division, with the reservation that in respect to the prairie section—inasmuch as the government guarantee is limited to $13,000 per mile—the company's guarantee may somewhat exceed the one-fourth proportion. Assuming therefore the cost of construction on the prairie section, over a distance of one thousand miles, to be at the rate of $20,000 per mile, the amount to be guaranteed by the company will be of bonds at the rate of $7,000 per mile, and in the whole $7,000,000 or £1,400,000. Interest on this amount at 4 per cent during the period of construction may be taken at £168,000, making a total principal to be guaranteed of £1,568,000 representing an annual interest of £62,720. Assuming again the cost of building of 500 miles on the mountain section to be $50,000 a mile or $25,000,000, that is to say £5,000,000 in all the one-fourth amount of bonds to be guaranteed by the company will be £1,250,000 or adding interest during construction, say, £150,000, a total of £1,400,000 carrying interest at the rate of £56,000 a year. If you have followed the figures which I have just mentioned, you will find that the result shows an amount of principal bonds guaranteed in respect of both sections of £2,968,000, and of annual interest of £118,720, but even this interest liability, comparatively small as it is, need not accrue until the expiration of eight years—the period allowed for construction—the interest on cost during construction being provided for out of capital. This then constitutes the responsibility of the Grand Trunk Company.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company at the meeting of the Grand Trunk shareholders has pledged himself and his colleagues that the obligations he enters into with this government in connection with this railway shall not impose on the Grand Trunk Railway an obligation exceeding £118,720 a year. The government may think that the agreement reads differently but I tell them that if that is not what they understand and are willing to agree to, then the second agreement is waste paper and that the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company is not authorized to sign any agreement with this government which will impose upon the Grand Trunk Railway Company, directly or indirectly for any time an obligation greater than £118,720 a year.

I quite believe that the government did not understand this, in fact I believe they did not, but if they will read the statement of the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, whether it is that he is wrong in his estimate and has misunderstood the contract between the company and the government or not they will find that he has not taken a full idea of his responsibilities. Having made that statement and having had the shareholders of his company approve that agreement upon his assurance—and you must recollect, Sir, that it was against an enormously strong opposition of the Grand Trunk shareholders that it was passed—that the obligation of the company should not exceed £118,720, I say that the Grand Trunk president or directors will never sign an agreement which will commit them to a sum more than the amount that has been stated until a meeting of shareholders shall have approved of it. The president goes on :

> This then constitutes the responsibility of the Grand Trunk Company and I hope that this statement will allay the apprehensions which have been already expressed by a few critics who may not have sufficiently studied or accurately understood the provisions of the agreements.

He goes on to say that he considers this agreement a measure of necessity as affording an opportunity which if neglected will never occur again. Here is the president of the company saying that an opportunity is presented which is so vital to the interests of the company that it will never occur again, and yet he comes to the government and obtains modifications to the agreement so great as to relieve him practically from all responsibility. He apologizes for calling his shareholders together, but he does it so that he may accommodate this parliament. He goes on to say :

> The government of Canada has come to a provisional arrangement, subject to your approval, with the board. If you say 'no', there is very little doubt that there are many others ready to avail themselves of the opportunity.

That does not seem to say that the bargain, easy as it was last year, was so hard that they had to modify it to the extent they have done. He goes on to say in further discussion.

> We believe that so far as the prairie section is concerned, in laying this scheme before you, we are speaking of a certainty that, from the time the line is accomplished, from the earliest time, it will produce a very considerable revenue, and that with the rapid settlement of the country, which will follow the establishment of the line within a very few years, it will be a very profitable line.

Now that prairie section has been subsidized by this government to an extent originally of $13,000 a mile in bonds at 3 per cent which has been implemented by a bond guarantee which produces that amount in cash. I wonder if it ever entered into the minds of the government when they were giving away all these concessions that when they gave to a private corporation practically consisting of two men, Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, the same subsidy of $13,000 a mile of government bonds bearing 3 per cent interest and no more for 720 miles of railway through the prairie section, almost paralleling this line through a country neither more difficult nor more easy to build through than the route of the proposed road that they took as security from Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, a private corporation, a first mortgage on the 720 miles, and in addition they took a second mortgage upon the whole of the Mackenzie & Mann railway running from Winnipeg to Port Arthur, the most valuable connection, as security for this $13,000 a mile. These two private individuals mark you, Mr. Speaker, have been able in the face of the difficult money market that the Finance Minister pleads as an excuse, to go to London according to the statement of the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Sifton) and have been able to finance on this $13,000 a mile, at 3 per cent, the money to build that 720 miles of road which is just as difficult to build as the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway. And they have given a first mortgage on that section of the road and a second mortgage on all their lines from Winnipeg to Georgian Bay. Yet the government are giving to this great corporation the Grand Trunk Railway Company, not $13,000 a mile guaranteed at 3 per cent, but the value of the money at $13,000 a mile to carry out a similar work. If I represented the government, I would be ashamed to negotiate with men representing a big corporation who were not able to finance such a scheme on as favourable terms as those secured by a couple of Canadians in private life. I say that words cannot be found strong enough to condemn the government for their utter want of business capacity in the transaction with regard to this section over the prairies. The cost of this prairie section of Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, according to Mr. Blair, is to be $16,000 or $17,000 per mile. He says that the road is to be a first-class standard road in every respect, and further that Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann pay the interest on these bonds at three per cent from the date when they are endorsed by this government. The grade is to be 26 in the mile, and the quality is to be very superior in every respect. I do not know that I quite approve 'very superior' as applied to a railway, but these are the words of the ex-minister. Now, Lord Welby, a director of the Grand Trunk Railway Company says, 'We have driven'—mark the words—'We have driven the Canadian government into becoming absolute partners with us in the expenditure on that mountain section. That means that we have made their interests one with ours. We are, therefore, sure of hearty co-operation in any reasonable proposition.'

Now, let me commend to the consideration of the Prime Minister and his followers what the leader of the opposition suggested—that if this government are going into a partnership and supplying nine-tenths of the money to build these properties, the other partner supplying one-tenth, but the government taking the whole risk if it is a failure, while the party who supplies one-tenth of the money is to get the whole profit if it is a success, will not the country say: Let the government spend the other $14,500,000 and own the whole thing? Not a doubt of it. And it is not very nice wording that the director of the Grand Trunk uses when he says: 'We have driven the Canadian government into becoming absolute partners with us.' Now, let me commend to you the statement of Mr. Allen, the retiring director of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, read by his son at the meeting of the Grand Trunk shareholders. He gives his reasons why he believes that the Grand Trunk are committing themselves too far. He assumes that the company are committing themselves to pay the interest on the eastern section, which is his bugbear. He gives certain figures, and makes this statement:

Now, what is there to pay this? In an official memorandum, I read that the 500 miles—Quebec to North Bay—'is probably premature.'

Let us take that statement in connection with the memorandum from Mr. White, read by the Minister of the Interior, eulogizing the road from North Bay to Winnipeg. We see that the Grand Trunk Railway Company are absolutely convinced, whether rightly or wrongly that the section from North Bay eastward is not to be built. I think they are right in that. I have information which I had hoped to have with me to-night from official authority, information which I believe to be correct, that the difficulties of the hundred or two hundred miles east of North Bay are so great that there is almost no amount of money that this government would put up that would build a road with the grades and curvatures that would in any way serve what the government has in view. That, I think is borne out by the fact that the Grand Trunk have had surveyors all through the country. I met one of the surveyors in Fort William in December last. One man told me that he came out, because the country was so bad, it was an almost impossible country for railway construction. I believe that these surveyors have reports on that country and that the government have said: Do not give us these reports, they are so bad.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I deny it.

Mr. OSLER. I appeal to the Prime Minister, if it is not so how can he inform this House that he has allowed six months to go by and now comes here and tells us that the government have no more information with regard to that country than they had when we left here six months ago?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I deny the statement of the hon. gentleman absolutely in every particular.

Mr. OSLER. What statement?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The statement just made by the hon. gentleman that the Grand Trunk had reports of surveys so bad that we would not let them put those reports in. They have not had the section east of Abitibi surveyed yet and we have no reports from them.

Mr. OSLER. Of course, I accept the statement of the hon. gentleman. But as a business man I cannot understand how he can make such a statement. Last year we were assured that this was an all-important matter, a matter that could not wait, and now the Prime Minister tells us that they have not taken the first steps to ascertain whether the country is good or bad. That is not business. I think it quite justifies the opposition and the country in drawing the inference—in fact, it is the only possible inference—that the government have no intention of building that road. There is no excuse that can be valid as coming from a government that took the position this government did six months ago in regard to this railway. Instead of coming down with any new information, they say: We give you the account of that country by an enthusiastic missionary, two hundred years ago, and we are going to build a railway on his report.

I do not often talk long, but I have a text here that I could speak on for two or three days—but I am not going to. I want now to take up a question that was so eloquently handled by the Minister of the Interior, the question of the rolling stock. He made a statement here this evening in connection with the rolling stock, and the statement he made, with all earnestness and apparently in all sincerity, gives me a key to understand the reason of this scheme. It means that the men who have gone into this scheme are totally ignorant of what it involves. Now the Grand Trunk general manager states distinctly that the $15,000,000 of rolling stock contracted for is to be supplied by a rolling stock trust. The Minister of the Interior, and I think the Minister of Justice, scouted the idea that they could put in $15,000,000 worth of rolling stock and that it would not belong to the railway company. Now let me tell you that this Grand Trunk Pacific have arranged, or are arranging, to supply this $15,000,000 of rolling stock through a rolling stock trust company, which leases that rolling stock to the railway company. If they gave it to the railway company and it became their property, and the railway company gave their obligation for it, then the position taken by the Minister of the Interior and by the Minister of Justice would be correct. It would not be good security as against the bondholders. That rolling stock is leased, not sold but leased to the railway company, and on every car and on every engine so leased there is a plate: This car is the property of this or that rolling stock company, or of this or that trust company. The railway company as a rule pays 20 per cent down to the company that leases them that rolling stock. They buy it as a man buys property in instalments. The property remains the property of the men who built it and leased it to the company. Month by month as a rule, during periods running from five to fifteen years, the railway company pays those instalments to the owners, and at the end of the period when all is paid for, the rolling stock becomes the property of the railway company. But until that is paid the railway company does not own the stock, the bondholders of the company do not own it and have no lien upon it until it is paid, for the owners of that rolling stock—all earmarked, mind you, not to the Grand Trunk eastern division, but to the men who supply the rolling stock—lease it to the railway company, and when it is all paid, a deed is given on the last payment. Now let me tell you that the courts in the United States and the courts in England have held that the payments under a rolling stock lease, under those conditions, form a part of the working expenses of the railway, unless the railway has rolling stock in excess of the requirements of the operation of the road. That is quite right and proper, because if you take the rolling stock away from the road the road is able to earn so much less. It is like taking away the tools from a mechanic, he cannot make his living and pay his debts.

Mr. WADE. Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him in what case that was so decided ?

Mr. OSLER. I will leave that to my hon. friend in front of me to answer.

Mr. WADE. Just give me the case in which that decision was made.

Mr. OSLER. I have been connected with a rolling stock company for 25 years, a company that I formed in connection with the late Frederick W. Cumberland, the old manager of the Northern Railway, and some other friends. I found that he, along with those who were interested in the old Grey and Bruce Railway, borrowed money from an American rolling stock company, and from the Bristol Wagon Company, on terms which involved a payment of from 16 per cent to 20 per cent interest. Sir George Stephen, now Lord Mount Stephen, was interested in the Credit Valley Railway when it was taken over by the Grey and Bruce Railway. He looked into this business, as the clean business man that he was, and he said : This is rubbish, we are not going to pay 16 per cent. The result was that rolling stock was loaned at 6 per cent, and now it has gone down to 5 per cent. Every railway company in the States, the New York Central, the Pennsylvania Company, the Baltimore and Ohio, all of them have railway trust companies in connection with their roads, and quite properly so. A railway company that wants $5,000,000 of rolling stock to-day, may not be able to take it out of earnings, and they have no means of borrowing on their bonds, and so they issue rolling stock bonds, which have the highest credit, food for almost any security that is issued, selling at 4 per cent to-day on ordinary railways when their own bonds are worth less. I have looked into that. We have the opinion of the ablest lawyers, among them my hon. friend here who is a lawyer. The title to these bonds has been examined by almost every English insurance company in Canada. The English insurance companies are the holders of most of these rolling stock bonds issued by the rolling stock company which I represent, also those issued by the rolling stock company which the Canadian Northern Railway have organized in the same way, under which a portion of their rolling stock has been supplied, under the same terms as this Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company are arranging for these $15,000,000 of bonds. Every car that is put on to that road will be marked as the property of some trust company, it may be a private company. The trust company lending money here 30 years ago was what was called the Bristol Wagon Company, which was represented by a young Englishman who lived in New York in the 70's when I met him. He has now retired and is living in Toronto, and happens to be a friend of mine. My introduction to him in the late 60's or early 70's was the occasion of my becoming familiar with this class of stocks. There is no big insurance company in this country, no English company having an agency here that does not own these bonds, and you will find they will tell you that the payment by the railway company on a lease of that kind is a part of the working expenses of the railway company. Now that being the case, this $15,000,000 being a security, the payments to be made out of the earnings of the road for ten years, I think, will nearly absorb 3 per cent interest on the whole capital, postponing the interest paid to the government if it does not turn out properly. The president of the Grand Trunk Company, in answer to a charge made by one of his shareholders that the company were assuming responsibility that was very large, answered :

As regards the five millions for rolling stock, it is not five millions—it is estimated at three millions. With that the Grand Trunk has nothing to do. That rolling stock will be provided by the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, and, as the general manager will tell you, they have laid their plans for providing that rolling stock by a trust fund.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to imply that the government of this country controls that rolling stock, but I am going to say distinctly and positively, and it cannot be contradicted, that the Grand Trunk Railway Company are not in a position, under the authority of their shareholders, to come under obligation for one dollar in connection with that rolling stock. It may be that the government understanding is quite as distinct. But it may not be carried out by the Grand Trunk as the right hon. Prime Minister and his colleagues believe.

Therefore, you may wipe it out and call it four millions. And as regards the one million deposit, that deposit will not cost you one single halfpenny. Therefore, the liability comes back to the sum which I have just mentioned—namely, about three millions, and I have stated distinctly and clearly that that is what we estimate the liability of the Grand Trunk to be—eventually a possibility of three millions of capital and, under any circumstances——

These are not ambiguous words. These are absolute statements for the shareholders of the Grand Trunk and which the shareholders have approved of——

Not more than £118,000 of interest per year.

There is an absolute ignoring on the part of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of any liability, or any possibility of the road being built east of North Bay and from North Bay to Winnipeg which the Grand Trunk Railway were prepared to build off their own bat with the ordinary subsidy given by the government. Now, to show that this has not been a matter that has been sprung upon the Grand Trunk Railway, and that it has not been a matter that the government have not been in full knowledge of, he goes on to say :

The company have been in negotiations for 18 months in connection with this scheme.

He goes on to state that the grain is brought from ports on Lake Superior to ports of the Georgian Bay, such as Midland, where the Grand Trunk Railway Company have their elevator and that they got last year about 25,000,000 bushels of grain. This grain came to them in what way ?—not by railway over the north shore of Lake Superior, but by water. That is the trade they want to get delivered to them on the Port Arthur side of Lake Superior, carried across by water and then delivered to their railway in the province of Ontario. That is the object that they have in view in this scheme. Then, Mr. Hays goes on to reiterate :

The Grand Trunk Railway is not going to be called upon under its guarantees, for one cent for eight years after this enterprise is started—after the construction of the line is commenced, —the cost of the line during construction being added to capital and provided out of capital, and the securities which the Grand Trunk Railway will guarantee will not be issued for eight years, and then after that eight years have rolled by, you have seven years yet on the mountain section, a part on which there seems to be some doubt. There can not be the slightest doubt as to what the returns will be from the prairie section, but on the mountain section you have seven years without any claim at all, three years after that only a claim on what is earned, making, therefore, before the mountain section becomes anything of a burden on the railway, eighteen years.

Well, now, Mr. Speaker, eighteen years is a good long time to have a railway built free. Let us assume for the sake of argument that the government build the road as they propose from Winnipeg eastward to Quebec and Moncton. I will take the figures that are given by the president of the Grand Trunk Railway in his report to his shareholders and which are the lowest figures I have seen yet. He gives the cost of the section from Winnipeg to Moncton as $76,000,000, from Winnipeg to the mountains as $20,000,000 and from the mountains to the Pacific as $25,000,000. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), I think, will agree with me, that these figures are away below the actual liability of the country. Under the present agreement with the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company the interest on $76,000,000 at three and a half per cent—and that I think is a low rate to calculate upon—will be $4,245,000 a year. That is what the government would have to pay if the undertaking goes into default. If it is a success the Grand Trunk will have to pay £118,700 a year, or $577,000. That leaves the government to pay, if it is a success, $3,658,000 on interest expenses. If the bonds have to be issued at four per cent the total will be $4,840,000, of which the Grand Trunk proportion will be $577,000 and Canada's proportion $4,263,000. If it is a success for the risk of $577,000 the Grand Trunk Pacific get the whole profit of the enterprise which Canada is liable for to the extent of $4,200,000 odd a year. The partnership is a partnership all on one side, heads I win, tails you lose. Canada must pay the whole shot and never get a dollar of the profit. Let us take another point. Under the agreement the government undertake to build from Winnipeg to Quebec and to Moncton, and the lowest computation of the cost that I have seen is $76,000,000. The Grand Trunk Railway pay what? Three per cent interest on that money only. No matter what that money costs the government. Suppose the government have to borrow that money at three and a half per cent, a very low rate looking at it from a business point of view in carrying out the transaction five years from now, and assuming that the Grand Trunk Railway pays interest at three per cent, in fifty years the difference between the three per cent which the government receive and the three and a half per cent which the Grand Trunk pay will amount to $59,324,000. You cannot get over that by any juggling you may resort to. That is the actual difference between the rate of interest which the Grand Trunk Railway pay on the capital expended of $76,000,000, and I believe it will be more like $150,000,000 and the rate of interest which the government have to pay for the money. To-day, if the government went on the market to borrow that sum of money they could not get it for under four per cent. Assuming that the government have to pay four per cent for the money the difference between four per cent which the government would pay and the three per cent which the Grand Trunk Railway would pay would amount in fifty years to $118,648,000. Yet, Mr. Speaker, we almost hear the echo of the right hon. Prime Minister's statement in this Chamber that the total commitment of this country for this huge enterprise is about $13,000,000 half the surplus revenue of a year. Bonds on the mountain section are to be issued to the extent of $50,000 a mile on the Grand Trunk's estimate of total cost which is $25,000,000. Three per cent bonds, putting it at the outside price, would require an issue of $30,000,000 to realize the $25,000,000. The government portion would be $22,500,000. The Grand Trunk are to pay no interest on that for seven years after completion, and possibly for three years more, if it does not earn interest—I quote the statement of the president of the Grand Trunk—and as they have eight years to build, then for eighteen years they will have to pay no interest. We will assume that the average time for building the road will not be eight years but four years, and so we will take fourteen years as the average time of the expenditure of the $22,000,000. On that expenditure the government pays interest and charges, and the Grand Trunk pays nothing, and it amounts to $16,672,500. And yet, according to the Prime Minister, the whole of this grand scheme is to cost the country half a year's surplus, or $13,000,000.

Let me tell you why it is, I think the Grand Trunk Company, from a business point of view, have no intention of and never will have anything to do with operating the road east of North Bay. Their interest will be, as it is the interest of all railways, to get their traffic in summer from Winnipeg to Port Arthur or Duluth. From Winnipeg to Port Arthur the present length of the Canadian Pacific Railway is 426 miles, and the present length of the Canadian Northern is 438 miles. Duluth, is as good a port as Port Arthur for the shipment of wheat, because there is no objection to Canadian bottoms taking grain from Duluth to Sarnia, or Midland, or Collingwood, and it can be taken just as cheaply from Duluth as it can from Port Arthur. Now from Winnipeg to Duluth by the Great Northern Railway—the Grand Trunk are now their allies and are interested with them in all the western business—the distance is 431 miles, or five miles longer than by the Canadian Pacific Railway to Fort William, but seven miles shorter than by the Canadian Northern to Fort William. If the Grand Trunk build their own road from Winnipeg to Duluth to connect with the Northern Pacific they have only to build 68 miles—from Winnipeg to Pembina the distance is 68 miles; from Pembina to Winnipeg Junction the distance is 189 miles; from Winnipeg Junction to Staples 82 miles; from Staples to Duluth 148 miles, or by the Northern Pacific Railway, the Grand Trunk building a part of the line, the distance is 487 miles. From Winnipeg to Duluth on the line that is now surveyed (and it is probably being built by the Grand Trunk Railway Company) the distance is 370 miles, or 380 miles according to the divergence that will be caused by the conformation of the country. If the Grand Trunk build from Winnipeg to Duluth, and I believe they will, or some other road will build, because it will be a profitable business transaction, and it will be built without a bonus; if that line is built, the Grand Trunk owning the line from Winnipeg westward, will send their freight from Winnipeg to Duluth a distance of 380 miles at most, as against the Canadian Pacific Railway line of 426 miles to Fort William, the Canadian Northern 438 miles to Port Arthur. There will be a difference in favour of the Grand Trunk line to Duluth in one case of 46 miles and in the other case of 58 miles. The profit on all the grain that comes from the Northwest; the profit in connection with the running of the boats is all made in the summer time, and it is all lost in the winter. The Grand Trunk under this agreement are not obliged in any sense or way to build one mile east of Winnipeg. It may pay them, and it will pay them to take the line connecting with North Bay for winter use, but in summer they will take their traffic by Duluth; and they will send it over their own line from Midland to Portland. Every bushel of wheat that the Grand Trunk collects under this agreement will go via Duluth and Portland. There is not one word or tittle in this agreement to restrain them or impose a penalty on them, if they send it to Portland.

I have occupied more than twice the time I expected to and I have not yet said all I would have liked to, but before I conclude I would like to read one or two extracts from the writings of an editor whose admiration for the Prime Minister is second to that of no man in the Dominion. I refer to Mr. Willison of the Toronto 'News.' As far as it is possible for any man, he has advocated the principle of this scheme right and left, but he is forced to denounce the details in the strongest language he can command. Here is what he says :

Parliament should insist upon at least two amendments to the contract. A minimum price should be named for the common stock. The rate at which the first issue of bonds is floated should be subjected to some measure of control by the government. It is intolerable that any railway corporation or any body of private capitalists should be allowed to determine what is to be the extent of the public liability in relation to a private enterprise to which the government lends its support. It is intolerable that the government should pass over to outside parties a trust which can be safely vested only in the cabinet and in parliament. It is intolerable that private capitalists should be able to force ministers to make such a surrender of their own rights and duties in contempt of the final authority of parliament, and doubly intolerable that ministers should accept so weakly and complacently the humiliating position which upon careful investigation they are shown to occupy under the amended Grand Trunk Pacific contract.

That is written by Mr. Willison of the Toronto 'News,' the greatest admirer in Canada of the Prime Minister.

Mr. CLARKE. What is the date of that ?

Mr. OSLER. The 31st of March last. Mr. Willison further says :

A syndicate must be formed, strong enough to take up the Grand Trunk Pacific bond issue. There can be no possible hazard of ultimate loss. The security is all Canada for three-fourths of the amount—all the Grand Trunk Railway for one-fourth—plus the railway itself. The price of the bonds can be made to suit the financiers who are concerned. That should prove attractive enough. In addition, the Grand Trunk may 'dispose' of $12,000,000 common stock. No price is stipulated. This amount of stock may be used to induce capitalists to put their money, on terms already profitable, into an absolutely safe investment.

The plan is remarkable in its simplicity and completeness. The only interested parties who may not share to the full in the advantages of this model piece of railway financing are the people of Canada. They are deeply interested in the enterprise, and it is in the power of the financiers in control to make the annual fixed charges of the road much heavier than they need be. Heavy fixed charges mean high freight rates. Such charges must be met for all time by the Canadian people.

The same and ardent admirer of the Prime Minister says :

The new Grand Trunk Pacific contract bristles with innocent looking provisions, all for the benefit of the Grand Trunk Pacific. An excellent example of the unobtrusive, but effective, way in which the interests of the company are guarded is to be found in the eleventh clause. That clause deals with branch lines. During the fifty years of the company's lease a number of branches may be built to tap centres of industry adjacent to the great trunk line. The ownership of these branch lines will come up for adjustment when—or if—the government takes over the trunk route.

Mark on what terms the adjustment is to be made. The government is to 'take over such branch line or lines as the company may elect not to retain.' The choice is left entirely with the company. This means simply that the Grand Trunk Pacific may require the government to take over all its lame ducks, but will be able to keep the profitable lines. It promises to be a pleasant arrangement for the Grand Trunk Pacific. It will have a lease of the trunk route for half a century. When that period has expired, it will have another half century of running rights, will be able to force the government to relieve it of all branches which it has found by experience to be unprofitable, and will retain all its money-earning feeders.

The fact that the company will have the right to use the tracks for another fifty years may weigh heavily with the government of 1960 or thereabouts when it faces the question of taking over the line. The likelihood of being burdened with worthless branches and of being kept out of the dividend payers will give added weight to the arguments in favour of allowing the Grand Trunk Pacific to keep the trunk line. Practically, the Grand Trunk Pacific will own the eastern division. The cumulative effect of these carefully-devised provisions is to thrust government ownership not fifty years back, but off the stage altogether.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is proposed to expend an enormous amount of money on this line. The results are visionary. There is not one single argument that is solid, or that would affect a business man making a business contract, in favour of this contract as it now stands. We have not information to show us that there will be any result from this enormous commitment of the country. With what object are you doing it ? I was very much struck the other evening with the figures given by my hon. friend from Wentworth (Mr. E. D. Smith). I think they are the most interesting figures that have been presented to this House, not merely this session, but for many sessions. He showed conclusively that the extra freight rate on the shipment of four articles of the produce of Canada—on the amount shipped, mind you, not the amount that could be shipped—by the St. Lawrence route, was $800,000 more than the rate for shipping them by Boston or New York. Yet this government has appointed a commission to investigate the transportation question. That commission, so far as I can see, has done nothing except investigate how many barges the Tay canal will carry or how the Don can be straightened to let the sewage out of the city of Toronto in the best way. These are the only two things that commission has done yet, so far as I can see. Yet last year the farmers of Canada lost $800,000 on four articles of export, and the government have taken no step, in any shape or way, to remedy that evil and to provide that men who ship Canadian produce through Canadian channels shall get rates as low as can be got in shipping through foreign ports. But they are prepared to throw away $150,000,000 of this country's money to enable a railway company to increase the shipments of Canadian products, not through our own ports, but through the foreign port of Portland.

Mr. F. B. WADE moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, House adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, April 7, 1904.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

LABOUR UNION LABELS.

Mr. RALPH SMITH (Vancouver) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 35) respecting Labour Union Labels.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. RALPH SMITH. The simple object of this Bill is to provide for the registration by the government of union labels. At the present time union labels are being used in this country by certain labour organizations, in agreement with the men who produce the article, and it has been found by experience that these labels are counterfeit. The object of this Bill is to provide for the registration of these labels and, to this extent, to protect union labour.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND MAILS.

Mr. LEFURGEY asked :

1. How many times were Prince Edward Island mails conveyed by train to and from Sackville and Cape Tormentine, during the winter of 1904 and what were the exact dates ?
2. What amount was paid for each trip ?
3. What was the rate for carrying mails on the Intercolonial Railway in 1903, and is it the same now ?
4. What is the present rate for special trains carrying mails on the Intercolonial Railway, and was it the same in 1903 ?

6. What is the name, or names, of the parties conveying said mails by stage ?
7. Were tenders invited for this service ?

Hon. Sir WILLIAM MULOCK (Postmaster General) :

1. Twenty-eight times, as follows :—December 18; 19, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26 and 28; January 21, 22, 23, 25, 26, 28, 29 and 30; February 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 9, 24, 26 and 27; and March 2 and 3.

5. Mails were conveyed February 10th, 11th, 12th, 13th, 14th, 16th, 17th, 18th, 19th, 20th, 22nd and 23rd. Nothing has as yet been paid.
6. Mr. B. C. Rayworth.
7. No; the department had no time to call for tenders, as trains on the New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island Railway were blocked by snow, and arrangements had to be made without delay to have mails forwarded by stage.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked :

1. Has any Order in Council been passed in virtue of the Act 3 Edward VII., chapter 53, transferring the management, charge and direction of any public work, or any power, duty or function, with respect to any work or class of works which is assigned or vested by statute in the Minister of Public Works, to any other minister or department ?
2. If in the affirmative, what work or class of works or management, charge or direction, of any public work, has so been transferred, and to what minister or department ?
3. What is the date of said Order in Council ?
4. Is it the intention of the government to lay a copy of said Order in Council on the Table of the House, and when ?

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). The order referred to has been passed. I have not the date of the order at hand at this moment, but it will be laid on the table of the House.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Report of the Inland Revenue Department, part III.—Hon. L. P. Brodeur (Minister of Inland Revenue).

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

Mr. T. CHASE CASGRAIN (Montmorency). An order of the House was passed some weeks ago, that the accounts of Mr. P. V. Savard be laid on the table of the House. I would like the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to have this order complied with as soon as possible.

Hon. RAYMOND PREFONTAINE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). I will make the necessary inquiries and have the return brought down as soon as possible.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Two weeks ago I moved for two returns; one for the correspondence in connection with the dry dock at Vancouver, and the other with regard to contracts for the Atlantic mail service during the past three or four years. I should imagine that these papers would involve very little copying, and I trust they will be brought down at the earliest possible moment.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I will make inquiries.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, 'That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, for the House to go into committee to consider a certain resolution concerning the ratification of the agreement between His Majesty the King and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, dated the 8th day of March, 1904'; and the proposed motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

Mr. F. B. WADE (Annapolis). Mr. Speaker, the contract between the government of Canada and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company was so thoroughly discussed during the last session of parliament that I would suppose that the discussion upon the resolution now before the House would have been confined to that portion of the contract which is affected by the resolution. However, gentlemen upon the opposite side have thought fit to go far afield, to open up the whole scheme, and I am sure that we on this side have no fault to find with them for so doing. The effect of the discussion which took place here last year was to improve the position of the government from day to day as the debate went on, and the discussion which has taken place in the country from the day parliament prorogued until this moment has tended to cause this scheme to be more popular and more highly thought of by the people. I believe, therefore, that the government will be the winner in any further discussion that may take place upon the subject, and we on this side of the House may consequently feel under a measure of gratitude to these gentlemen opposite for having precipitated a debate ranging over the whole scope of this contract.

Most of the speakers from the opposition benches, both last session and this, have stated—and I believe the statement is correct—that the original scheme of the Grand Trunk Railway Company was to build a railroad from North Bay into the grain fields of the west. These gentlemen opposite say it was the government that forced upon the company the eastern section of the road. This I take to be correct, and I say that the government in doing so did their simple duty not only towards the province of Quebec and the maritime provinces, but towards the whole Dominion of Canada. They are entitled to the fullest credit for the stand they took in that respect, because I shall be able to prove from the lips of hon. gentlemen opposite themselves that had the Grand Trunk Company been able to carry out its original scheme of building from North Bay to the west, and making connections with its system to the south, the whole of the traffic which they moved from the Northwest to North Bay would have been diverted to American channels and American ports. Therefore I say that it was the duty of the government to see to it that no such arrangement should be entered into, and I believe they did not tolerate that project for a moment. The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company then decided that they would extend their line to the port of Quebec. That was all very well so far as it went; but it was not sufficient, and a strong contention arose that the road should be continued down to a maritime province port. I believe the members from the maritime provinces are to a certain extent responsible for supporting the hands of the government in that connection, and we are entitled to credit for it. The time has arrived, Sir, when it might as well be known that the maritime provinces are an important portion of this Dominion of Canada. We have been brought into this confederation, and we are here to stay. We have our aspirations as well as other parts of the Dominion. We hope to develop and improve; we hope to go forward in the march of progress equally with the balance of the Dominion; and no scheme having for its object the national advancement of Canada can be carried through this parliament successfully unless it takes into account the rights and interests of the maritime provinces. I do not mean this is any threat. I do not say that we of those small provinces would be able to carry that to accomplishment; but this I do say, that our influence, coupled with the sense of fair-play which exists amongst the hon. gentlemen on these benches, will always secure to us justice in the end. It is true, we of the maritime provinces did insist that this railway should be carried down to a port in those provinces. Had this been a scheme for carrying freight from the west down to Quebec in the summer season, that would have been one thing; but it is nothing of the sort. This is a grand transportation scheme, not only crossing the Dominion of Canada, but reaching from Europe across the Atlantic ocean, across the Dominion of Canada, and across the Pacific ocean to the Orient. If that be the scheme, Sir, I ask you and I ask hon. gentlemen opposite to explain to me how it would be possible to have a road terminating at Quebec or at North Bay. In order that we can complete the scheme as a whole it is necessary that it should extend to some of the magnificent seaports which we have in the maritime provinces. Do hon. gentlemen stop to consider the enormous value which these great seaports on the Atlantic coast have for this country? Do they stop to consider the enormous amounts of money which have been spent by other countries to construct artificial seaports when we have them naturally? When the maritime province members put forward their first fight for the extension of this road to those provinces, I am glad to say that we had the assistance of very many of the hon. gentlemen who sit on the opposite side of the House; but afterwards these hon. gentlemen turned completely on their tracks, and they have since opposed us with all their might and main. I understand that their object in supporting us in the first instance was this. They thought that if the government compelled the Grand Trunk Pacific to have its terminal point in the maritime provinces, it would kill the whole scheme. I say we of the maritime provinces had the right to expect, and we did expect to receive the full support of the representatives of the maritime provinces who sit on the other side of the House, and we were disappointed when we found them seceding from the position which they had taken. Especially had we the right to expect the hearty co-operation of the hon. leader of the opposition, who represents the city of Halifax, a constituency which is more interested than any other in the whole Dominion in the construction of this road. I was disappointed, Sir, that we did not receive that assistance. I was disappointed when he told this House the other day that he would go down to the province of New Brunswick and would have surveys made there, and that if a line of railway could be obtained, he was willing that it should be constructed. if thereby the maritime provinces could get a better 'fighting chance.' That is not sufficient for us, Mr. Speaker. We have a right to the same chances down there that the people have in other parts of the Dominion, and I am glad to bear testimony that from all the gentlemen on this side of the House. be they from British Columbia or the great west or Ontario or Quebec or the maritime provinces, we have received the full measure of support and recognition of our rights.

Now, Sir, when this contract was first brought down during the last session, there was a measure of disappointment visible upon the countenances of my hon. friends opposite. That disappointment was occasioned by the fact that the contract was so much more favourable to the Dominion than they had anticipated, that they could scarcely believe their ears when it was read to them.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. WADE. Well, I do not want to harrow the feelings of these hon. gentlemen, but I fear I cannot help it. It always troubles them to hear the truth, and they cannot keep still when they are affected. They show their feelings too plainly. When they are depressed, we see it; when they are galvanized into a little joyfulness, it beams and radiates from their countenances. But they were disappointed when this contract came down. because it was far better than they had anticipated; there was nothing in it which they could find fault with or complain of. Well, the debate dragged on, and after the contract was adopted by the House, parliament was prorogued. We then waited for some time for the deposit of the $5,000,000, and I must admit that the waiting was a little wearisome. When we grew weary our friends on the other side of the House grew exultant, and it was not long before they said: 'Where is your great railway scheme now? It has gone up spout; you will not hear anything more about it.' They continued in this strain until they heard that the scheme was likely to be a success; and when the news was cabled across that the $5,000,000 had been deposited, blank despair settled upon them, and they have not been happy since. They have pretended to be happy, once or twice, but they have not been. They supposed that the $5,000,000 would never be put up, and that was their only hope. But it has been, and that is an evidence of the good faith of the promoters of this scheme.

The position in which this matter was when it left the House last session was this. The promoters of the scheme undertook in their contract to secure from the Grand Trunk Railway two things. One was that the Grand Trunk Railway would subscribe for and hold during the life of the lease $25,000,000 of common stock, which was the entire amount of the issue of common stock authorized by the charter of the Grand Trunk Pacific. The other was that the Grand Trunk Railway would guarantee sufficient bonds to raise the money required (over and above the amount of the government guarantee), to construct the prairie and mountain sections. That is what the promoters undertook to do. But when that proposition was submitted to the Grand Trunk, the directors found that the shareholders were not willing to carry it through. At a meeting of the directors of the Grand Trunk Railway, it was found that certain provisions of the contract, to be submitted to the general meeting, were too onerous, and the shareholders would not be likely to agree to them. Under these circumstances, the promoters came back to the government and asked for a modification of that agreement. The government was in this position. Either the whole scheme would fall through or the concessions would have to be made which have been agreed to. With regard to these concessions, I wish to place myself upon record as saying that the agreement as amended will not cost the Dominion one extra dollar. It will relieve the situation so far as the railway company is concerned, it will enable the company to finance the project ; but will not impose an extra dollar on the people of Canada, as I propose to demonstrate.

Let me take this supplemental agreement to see what it was that was asked of the government. By the first paragraph, the government is asked to extend the time for the completion of the road until the 1st of December, 1911. In other words, we are giving the company seven full seasons in which to complete the road. Mr. Speaker, when the contract was first talked of, away in the spring of last year, if it had been agreed to at once, the company would have had the benefit of last season, but it was not agreed to until the 28th of October, so that last season was entirely lost ; and I did hear it remarked among railway men—and I believe the remark to be correct—that it was very unreasonable to expect that this road could be completed in a shorter period than seven years. There can be no objection, then, to the company having the extension proposed here, and I was a little surprised that my hon. friend the leader of the opposition should have made any point of this at all.

The next provision is a simple one. It has been perverted somewhat, though I do not believe intentionally. It is simply this. It provides that if the government should fail to complete the eastern section as soon as the company has completed the western division, the government shall not hold in its hands the $5,000,000, but shall pass the money over to the railway company, and I submit, that since the government will then be in default itself, that is right. It requires, however, that the company shall at that time have on the road $15,000,000 of rolling stock, $5,000,000 of which shall be marked for the eastern section. When that eastern section is completed, it will be necessary for the company to provide another $5,000,000 of rolling stock in order to comply with section 22 of the contract. Is there anything unfair in that ? This $5,000,000 is put up as a guarantee that the company will carry out its contract. But if it has carried out its contract, and if it is the government which is in default, why should this $5,000,000 be held by the government and not paid over to the company ? My hon. friends opposite—I think the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) and I think also the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden)—saw in that and in another clause to which I shall refer later—namely the clause which enables the government to rent the completed portion of the eastern section before the whole is completed—a dark deep-laid scheme on the part of the government to escape from the building of the eastern section altogether ; and upon the strength of this, my hon. friends from South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) and Toronto (Mr. Osler) both made the statement, as strongly as they could, that that eastern section would never be built. Now, Sir, what does the statement of these hon. gentlemen teach us ? It teaches us that they are anxious, that they are determined, that the eastern section shall not be built at all. It teaches us that if, through any unforeseen circumstances, they should come into power, they will put that into operation and kill the building of the eastern section. That being the case, Mr. Speaker, is it not our most imperative duty, is it not the duty of this whole Dominion, more especially of the province of Quebec and the provinces down by the sea, to take good care that these gentlemen do not get into power ? Is it not the duty of our people to take good care to keep in power these gentlemen who now occupy the treasury benches and in whom we have entire confidence ? It was not necessary for my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) to tell us the other day that the government was going to live up honestly to this contract. But while it was not necessary, I was glad that he made the statement. He said it would satisfy the weak-kneed. I want to assure him, and the government, and hon. gentlemen opposite that there are no weak knees over here. There is no uncertainty about our position. We stand here as one man behind our leader, and we will assist him in carrying through this scheme, and he can depend upon it we will never allow this contract to be tampered with by the gentlemen who sit on the other side of the House.

The next section I wish to refer to, and I shall be as brief as possible, is that which has regard to the operation of such portions of the eastern division as may be from time to time completed. I refer to paragraph 3. I submit that that is a wise provision. Suppose the government has that portion of the road completed from Winnipeg to North Bay, is there any reason, in the interest of the west, why that road should not be utilized pending the completion of the mountain section, and the piece down eastward ? If we were to take any different position, then I say that the hon. gentlemen who represent western constituencies should strongly condemn us. But we have never taken any other. We do not wish to play the dog in the manger. We want to give the west the earliest possible outlet they can have. We want to give the west the earliest benefit from this contract which they can receive. We will stand by the west in that regard, and I believe they will stand by us in the other. That is all there is in that provision.

The next provision spoken of was the fourth paragraph, which amends the 28th section of the contract. Well, the only difference between the fourth paragraph and the twenty-eighth section, is this, that under the contract, as it stands, the government is required to guarantee bonds to the amount of three-quarters of the cost of the prairie section, not to exceed $13,000 per mile, and three-quarters of the cost of the mountain section, not to exceed $30,000 per mile. The limit is removed from the latter. That is, if the mountain section costs more than $40,000 per mile then the government is obliged to guarantee more than that amount. I think that this is reasonable ; I think it is fair that the government should guarantee the full three-quarters of the cost, and it was scarcely necessary that any discrimination should be made in this connection. The next clause provides that the government may implement the amount of their guarantee to offset the uncertainty of the money market at the time the bonds are placed upon it. That is to say if when the bonds are placed on the market when they are worth only 90 cents on the dollar, the government undertakes to guarantee bonds to a sufficient amount to produce three-fourths of the cost of the road. That I submit is reasonable and fair.

There is a further concession here which should not cause very much trouble to any of us, that is the provision that the government will not take action in the way of foreclosing or taking possession of the road unless and until the company is in default in the payment of their interest, which is not provided for, for the period of five years. In other words we give the company just that much further time to get fully and completely upon their feet and to get their business into working order. I do not think that is unreasonable. We must remember that this company has not only to build its line of railway from Moncton to the Pacific ocean, before it can commence to do anything like a reasonable amount of business, but that it must also reach out with branches hither and yon, must complete its steamboat service and do very many other things. I do not think the time we are allowing them in which to get fully under headway is unreasonable, and when we withhold our hands for five years after this interest becomes due it is a reasonable provision. Closely connected with this company and with its future success as the government and people of Canada are, it would not be wise on the part of the government to exact any conditions which would have the effect of injuring the company or to refuse to give any concessions which would have the effect of benefiting them. Let them give every assistance to the company that they reasonably can without loss or injury to the country ; in doing that they will strengthen the hands of the company and in strengthening the hands of the company they will enable them to go forward and accomplish a greater amount of good for the Dominion of Canada, and make it more certain that the company will carry out their obligations. The hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) took very strong exception to the seventh paragraph of this agreement. The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) did not refer to it in his address. The effect of this provision is that when the company is in default, when the mortgage is ripe for foreclosure, notwithstanding anything in the previous agreement, the government will not enforce the foreclosure of that mortgage, but will, instead of foreclosing. cause possession to be taken of the road by a party to be nominated or agreed upon between the government and the company, or in case of disagreement to be selected by a majority of the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada. That party will take possession of the road, will operate it, and out of the net earnings of the road will pay over 75 per cent to the government and 25 per cent to the company. What is there objectionable about this ? This is really in effect the regular English trust deed or mortgage. I have yet to learn, and I do not believe that there can be found, a solitary instance in which a railway company in the United Kingdom was ever given any greater power in the way of mortgaging than is contained in this provision. English railway companies are simply given the power to mortgage the tolls, not to mortgage the property at all. The mortgaging of the tolls simply entitles the bondholders to have appointed a receiver, and probably in many instances a manager as well, to manage the road, to pay out the working expenses, and to divide the net earnings of the road amongst the bondholders to secure whom the mortgage or trustee was given. Therefore the government has simply agreed in this instance to put themselves in exactly the same position as though this were originally an English mortgage. There is a vast difference between an American mortgage, the style of mortgage used in America and Canada, and this English mortgage, because the American mortgage enables the company to mortgage not only its property but its tolls and its franchises, and the trustee may foreclose that mortgage and may sell every particle of property that the company possesses, and the franchise as well. There is usually a provision in the mortgage by which the purchaser under it, will still go on and operate the road. I look upon this clause as one of the greatest importance to the people of Canada, and I believe it is a fortunate thing that it has been introduced into this amendment for this reason. We do not want to see the western division sold at auction and it would not be in the interests of the country that that should be done. We do not know who would become the purchaser at such a sale, and we want that road continuously operated. If the company finds itself in a position where it cannot operate the road and the government is obliged to have a party step in and operate it, then we, the people of Canada, have a guarantee and assurance that it will be well and continuously operated.

The next clause to which objection is taken by hon. gentlemen opposite—and I am sorry that I have again to disagree with them—is that which deals with the $25,000,000 of common stock. It was strongly insisted upon, upon the part of the government during the last session, that in order to secure the full and hearty co-operation and the undivided interest of the Grand Trunk Railway Company the Grand Trunk Railway Company should be required to take and hold during the continuance of this lease the whole $25,000,000 of common stock. I submit, Sir, that that object is as fully and completely accomplished by compelling them to hold so much of it as will enable them, taking the words of the paragraph itself, to—> Continue to hold a majority of the said stock by such title as will enable the said Grand Trunk Railway Company to control the policy of the company.

This is just as great a security, so far as that phase of the question goes, as though they were compelled to hold the entire $25,000,000. But hon. gentlemen opposite say:—But they are going to take this $25,000,000 of stock and give it away; they are going to scatter it around for nothing, and in consequence the people of the west and the people of the east will have to pay greater rates upon the goods that are carried upon this road. The first answer to this—I was going to say ridiculous proposition, but I do not like to use words of this kind—is that these people have to carry on the work. They have to acquire $20,000,000 worth of rolling stock in the first instance, and that is but a beginning of what they will require. They have to build branch lines. They have got to make harbours, they have got to spend enormous amounts of money in carrying out this contract. Now where are they going to get the money from? They have got the preferred stock and have a majority of this stock, that is all they have got to work upon. Now why should they go and give it away? It is of value, the leader of the opposition says it is of value. Now why should they go and give away a thing which is of value?

Let me speak a moment of the contention that the rates will be increased. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that if you allow the company to overcapitalize and to sell their stock, as the freight rate is fixed upon capitalization, consequently the freight rate will be greater. I dispute entirely that proposition. It has been already discussed in this House. There never has been a decision, so far as my knowledge goes, upon any such basis. There was, I believe, in some of the American states a contention of that kind made before the Railway Commission, but there has been no decision to that effect. I submit the argument is entirely fallacious. I say the freight rate is fixed, not by the amount of stock that was issued, but by the cost of the road, on the money which went actually into the construction of the road, not on the stock that was bought, not on the stock that was stolen, not on the stock that was given away. And we have the most complete machinery for ascertaining exactly what that road did cost, and we have the most complete machinery for fixing the rates with that knowledge before us.

Now, another objection is taken on the ground that the government is pledged to buy out the branches. Hon. gentlemen opposite forget to qualify their statement in accordance with the provisions of this amended contract. It has not to buy out all the branches that may be constructed, but only those to be constructed from the eastern section. They go down there under a lease to operate this road. It is necessary for them to build certain branches in order to operate the eastern section. The government comes in at the end of 50 years and it says: This property is valuable now, we are not going to allow you to keep it any longer. Is it not fair that the company should say: 'If you are going to take this road from us, here is a branch which is valuable in connection with that road, which is valuable to you, but it is of no earthly use to us, therefore we ask you to take that also. But we don't ask you to take it at our valuation, we ask that the valuation be fixed by a board of arbitrators.' Is that not the best solution? What hardship is there about that? Is there any element of injustice in it? I submit there is not.

Now I do not see anything else in the contract which is under discussion which calls upon me to delay the House a moment longer in discussing. Before starting out with the next matter, I intend to deal with, I would like to make some comments upon statements that have been made on the other side with regard to what took place at the meeting of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. So far as I am concerned, it is a matter of very small moment to know what was said at that meeting, the only thing that concerns me is to know what was done at that meeting. What was done at that meeting was to pass a resolution authorizing the company to enter into this contract. I am going to ask the House to bear with me while I read the records of that meeting as published in the 'Economist' of the 12th of March. It is not very long, and I am going to challenge every statement made by the other side which is inconsistent with this account of what took place at that meeting. I observe that my hon. friend from South Lanark (Hon. Mr. Haggart) is amused.

Mr. HAGGART. Would you challenge a statement issued by the Grand Trunk authorities themselves?

Mr. WADE. A statement made by the Grand Trunk authorities themselves will certainly be accepted when I see it; when I see it I will accept it as evidence of what took place at that meeting. But it will not be accepted by me or by any other sensible member of this parliament as an interpretation of what appears before this parliament to-day in the form of this contract. It is only a few hours ago that an hon. gentleman opposite spoke of the board of directors in terms anything but flattering, he insinuated broadly that they had falsified what took place and were deserving of criminal prosecution. But these same men who are deserving of criminal prosecution are cited here by other hon. gentlemen as an authority for this House, and their statements are cited as an interpretation of a solemn Act of parliament which is now under discussion. It seems to me that these gentlemen are prepared to go to very great lengths indeed. Now here is what took place at that meeting. The chairman said:

Referring to the special report dealing with the proposed construction of a transcontinental line of railway, the chairman said that the question was of greater interest and of more far-reaching importance to the company than any which had ever been presented to the proprietors. Prosperity was flowing rapidly from the east to the west outside the boundary and beyond the territory covered by the Grand Trunk. Thus surrounded on all sides by elements of progress, the company must either continue to advance or they must recede and yield the offered advantages to more enterprising and far-seeing competitors. The board caused a Bill to be introduced into the Canadian parliament for securing a charter of incorporation for the creation of a company with an independent organization, but in close connection with and under the control of the Grand Trunk Company, for the purpose of building a railway from a point of junction at or on the Grand Trunk line, passing through the most fertile districts of the Northwest, and terminating at a port on the Pacific coast. Under the impression that such a scheme would obtain the support of the government and parliament of Canada, so liberally accorded to other railway enterprises, he ventured to suggest to the proprietors at their meeting last April, that it might reasonably be expected that such a scheme might be carried through without engaging in any way the credit of the proprietors of the Grand Trunk Company. That was his conviction at the time, but it had been found impossible to carry the measure through the Canadian parliament without imposing some limited obligations on the company. Their original idea was to build from a point on the Grand Trunk Railway to the Pacific coast, their intention being that a point of junction should be at or in the neighbourhood of North Bay. It was, however, made by the government a condition of the grant of the charter that the line should be extended eastward from North Bay to Quebec into the city of Moncton, N.B. As a result, however, of negotiations with the government, another Bill was introduced by the government itself for ensuring the construction of the contemplated line from New Brunswick to the Pacific in joint partnership between the government and the Grand Trunk Pacific Company. An agreement under which this line would be constructed and worked was embodied in the government Bill. The Bills and the agreement were discussed by parliament during the whole of an unusually prolonged session, and they met with strong opposition. He desired to express his great appreciation of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's patriotic conduct of this measure through parliament.

Our friends opposite the other day took exception to that expression. I do not see why they needed to have done so. Not only has the president of the Grand Trunk Railway expressed his appreciation and admiration of the manner in which the Premier of Canada has conducted this matter through the parliament of Canada, but the conduct of the Premier in that regard has been the subject of admiration, I may say, throughout the whole British empire. Let me continue:

A great and unfavourable change had meantime occurred in the financial position throughout the world, and the directors came to the conclusion that modifications in the agreement were imperative in order to safeguard the credit of the company, one important modificaton being that relating to the conditions imposed on the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway for making their deposit.

Negotiations were accordingly resumed, and the result was embodied in the second or supplemental agreement now in the hands of the proprietors. If the agreement were approved by the meeting, it would be brought before the parliament of Canada, which had been specially summoned to meet to-morrow for consideration, and, he hopes, confirmation. The whole distance covered by the road from Moncton to Port Simpson on the Pacific was about 3,400 miles. The directors considered the proposal alike as a measure of necessity and as affording an opportunity which, if neglected, would never occur again of assuring and improving the fortunes of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. In conclusion, the chairman moved the adoption of the report and accounts, and the payment of the dividends recommended.

This was seconded.

The chairman next moved a resolution approving the agreement dated July 29, 1903, between the government of Canada and the proprietors of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, as amended by a supplemental agreement thereto dated the 18th ult., and authorizing and empowering the directors to carry them into effect so far as they related to or affected this company; and in particular authorizing the directors to 'make such arrangements as they may think fit with the government and the Grand Trunk Pacific Company for providing or securing the deposit of $5,000,000 either in cash or securities, and are further empowered to guarantee the second mortgage bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company both for principal and interest to be issued pursuant to the provisions of the agreements, and to enter into any contract or contracts relating thereto.'

Mr. Allen, the son of a former member of the board, moved an amendment to this motion. That amendment was lost and the original resolution was submitted and agreed to with a very few dissentient voices. That is the position in regard to the Grand Trunk Railway Company. This is the record of their meeting. There is the resolution which they passed and it is on the authority of that resolution that we are doing business to-day. Although they had the power to give approved securities in place of cash, they did not ask the government to accept securities but they put down the hard cash to the amount of £1,000,000, or $5,000,000, which was deposited in the Bank of Montreal and stands there to-day to the credit of the Minister of Finance of the Dominion of Canada. It seems to me that when a body of men are prepared to come forward and back up their agreements to the extent of $5,000,000 they are entitled, at least, to a little more respect than was accorded to them by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler). In the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway, of which the hon. member for West Toronto is, fortunately, a director, what security did they give? The security they gave was $1,000,000 instead of $5,000,000. Was it cash or was it government securities which they put up? I say it was not and an examination of the securities which were put up at that time will show that some of them were scarcely gilt edged.

We are started on a new branch of this case by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden). He speaks to us for a matter of three and a half hours. A goodly portion of that time is consumed with the reading of extracts of the speeches of the members of this House, from the alleged speeches of members of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, from newspapers, &c. He took exception at the beginning of his speech to the fact that the right hon. Prime Minister had referred to some of his speeches as scrap-book oratory. I shall not refer to them as such. I think, if the opposition wish us to characterize an effort such as that of the hon. gentleman, we should describe it as a brilliant effort of constructive statesmanship and after this I trust that the right hon. Prime Minister when he is discussing matters of this kind will speak of them in this way. The first thing that was referred to by the hon. leader of the opposition was the opinion that was expressed by Mr. Blair. I wish to make a statement in regard to Mr. Blair. He was in this House at the time this contract was under discussion. He was before the railway committee when we were endeavouring to secure the Moncton extension. He took the strongest possible ground against that and he took the strongest possible ground against the contract itself. But, this House was not influenced by his judgment. We believe that he was wrong. We believe now that he was wrong. The right hon. Premier at that time believed that he was wrong and believed it so forcibly that it was necessary for Mr. Blair to leave his cabinet. Since then the right hon. Premier has appointed him to the position of chairman of the Railway Commission and he has expressed the opinion in this House that Mr. Blair is a gentleman eminently qualified to fill that position. Well, Sir, may he not be a gentleman eminently qualified to fill that position and yet a man whose judgment upon this contract we are not able to accept? There may be a man who is eminently qualified to be a judge and yet we would not like to take his views or judgment upon matters which are outside the purview of his duties. The administering of the Railway Act is one thing, and the carrying out of this great national project is another thing. Mr. Blair may be absolutely competent. Let us say that he is competent in every particular to fill the high and important position that he does fill; yet, this House has said that his judgment is not sound upon this question and if that is so is it not folly for hon. gentlemen opposite to talk about Mr. Blair's judgment in this matter? These hon. gentlemen did not always have such a high opinion of Mr. Blair. I have heard them say things that were not quite complimentary to him, or his judgment, or administrative ability and they know it. We saw the spectacle, when Mr. Blair had delivered his oration against this project, of the whole opposition, led by the hon. leader of the opposition, walking over, shaking hands with Mr. Blair and congratulating him. It was rather a sorry sight in view of what had taken place on the floor of this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no; take it back.

Mr. WADE. I say it was a sorry sight after what had taken place on the floor of this House. The relations did not continue long. They were quickly severed. Whose fault it was I do not know and shall not stop to inquire. Now, I hope we have heard the last of Mr. Blair. I would caution these hon. gentlemen. Three of their number have spoken already on this question and they have forgotten to mention that 'Cox won't wait.' Do not forget to mention that in the discussion. Let us have it and let us have it reiterated.

Now, the next position taken by the hon. leader of the opposition was that we have made a contract under which we cannot compel the shipping of the grain of the west through Canadian ports. I take issue with him and I take issue with every gentleman on the opposition side who makes such a statement. I say that we can compel the Grand Trunk to do this so far as it is humanly possible to do so, and I refer to paragraphs 42 and 45 of the contract. Paragraph 42 says:

It is hereby declared and agreed between the parties to this agreement that the aid herein provided for is granted by the government of Canada for the express purpose of encouraging the development of Canadian trade and the transportation of goods through Canadian channels. The company accepts the aid on these conditions, and agrees that all freight originating on the line of the railway, or its branches, not specifically routed otherwise by the shipper, shall, when destined for points in Canada be carried entirely upon Canadian territory, or between Canadian inland ports, and that the through rate on export traffic from the point of origin to the point of destination shall at no time be greater via Canadian ports than via United States ports, and that all such traffic, not specifically routed otherwise by the shipper, shall be carried to Canadian ocean ports.

Now, I make bold to say that no stronger provision could be framed by any parliament. There is only one class of freight that is not included in that, and that is the freight that is routed by the shipper. And, Sir, would any man undertake to ask this parliament to pass an Act which would say to the shipper: You must ship your products by a certain line. Why, it would be such an infringement upon the rights of the subject that it would not be tolerated for one moment, and would be execrated from one end of the Dominion to the other. This was one of the very points which was brought up in the railway committee in order to influence the western vote, and we said distinctly: We do not ask for any condition of this sort; we do not ask to put any limitations upon the right of the western shipper to ship his goods in any way he pleases; we want the company to take the goods, if they are unrouted, through Canadian ports, but the shipper in the west can do with his produce as he sees fit. And gentlemen on the other side of the House sneered because we suggested that we might trust somewhat to the patriotism of the people of the west. Well, Sir, I do not think that the people of the west are deserving of that sneer; I believe that the people of the west are as anxious to build up this Canada of ours as the people of any portion of Canada. I believe that, if anything, they are a little more patriotic than perhaps we in the older provinces are; and I ask you, Mr. Speaker, if you can imagine a Canadian so base at heart, and so inconsiderate of the interests of his country, that if he can ship his grain to Liverpool via St. John or Halifax for exactly the same cost to him that he can ship it via Portland, he will refuse to ship through a Canadian port? I have an entirely different opinion of the people of the west from the opinion which the gentlemen opposite entertain, and I believe that my opinion of them will be justified by the results.

In addition to that which I have already read, there is a clause by which the Grand Trunk agree that, so far as they possibly can influence the shipping of grain via a Canadian port, they will do so, and there is still another clause which compels the company to put on steamships, and which says:

The company shall arrange for and provide, either by purchase, charter or otherwise, shipping connections upon both the Atlantic and Pacific oceans sufficient in tonnage and in number of sailings to take care of and transport all its traffic both inward and outward, at such ocean ports within Canada, upon the said line of railway, and upon the line of the Intercolonial Railway, as may be agreed upon from time to time, and the company shall not divert, or, so far as it can lawfully prevent permit to be diverted, to ports outside of Canada any traffic which it can lawfully influence or control, upon the ground that there is not a sufficient amount of shipping to transport such traffic from or to such Canadian ocean ports.

That is what they undertake to do, and I hold that it cannot properly be suggested that further restrictions should be placed upon the railway company than are contained within the contract which we are discussing.

Another bug-a-boo which has been raised by the leader of the opposition, and by the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Osler), a director of the Canadian Pacific Railway, is that the railway company may lease the rolling stock and put it on the road, or that they may make a conditional purchase, under which it shall not be their property until it is paid for; and that, therefore, the mortgage given on it would be inoperative until such time as the money due upon the rolling stock had been paid. I wish to take issue with these gentlemen entirely upon that point. Paragraph 22 of the contract provides that the railway company shall fully equip the road, at least to the extent of $20,000,000, and paragraph 35 of the contract says:

> For the purposes hereinafter in this paragraph respectively defined, the company may and shall create mortgages to trustees, as follows:—
> (a.) A mortgage which shall be a first charge upon railway undertaking, equipment and property, tolls, rights and franchises of the company, including all equipment and property to be hereafter acquired by the company (but not including branch lines, &c.).

Now, in view of this, will any hon. gentleman undertake to say to this House that if the company offered a mortgage upon rolling stock which was not theirs, that that mortgage would be a first charge upon that rolling stock? If the rolling stock upon the road is leased, will any man say that the railway company could give a mortgage which would constitute a first charge upon that rolling stock? If the rolling stock were obtained from one of these rolling stock companies which have been spoken of, and which retain an interest in it until it is paid for, could the railway company give a mortgage upon that rolling stock which would be a first charge upon it? Surely there is no man who will undertake to say that. It does seem to me that the hon. gentlemen on the other side are driven to great straits when they attempt to advance an argument of that kind to an intelligent House of Commons. It does not require any legal knowledge to interpret that; any lay man can see what the law means. It means that, in order to carry out their agreement with the government, they have got to put upon this road $20,000,000 worth of rolling stock free and clear, so that they can give a mortgage which will be a first lien upon it. And that security not only extends to the rolling stock which goes upon the road in the first instance, and which is to amount to $20,000,000, but to all the rolling stock that comes upon the road afterwards. I do not think that it is necessary to pursue that argument further. I say that the very moment that rolling stock touches the line of this railway it becomes by destination real estate, a part of the property of the road, and cannot be touched for any other security.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Hear, hear. That is French law.

Mr. WADE. It is not only French law, but it is English law, too, as I shall show. It is certainly French law.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Yes.

Mr. WADE. Well, that is admitted. It is not very often that we get an admission from these gentlemen opposite, and it is refreshing to have one occasionally. Now, not only is it French law, but it is English law. We are quite familiar with these rolling stock companies. I am free to admit that it is not an uncommon practice with railway companies to lease their rolling stock, or to buy it on credit and to pay for it by instalments, and to give a lien upon it to the seller. But I want to say that when that is done, the seller of that rolling stock had better see to it that he has a lawyer to draw up the papers, and a lawyer who understands the position of affairs, or else he may wake up some morning to find that his lien has entirely vanished. And his lien would vanish in this case. Why? Because when he sells or leases that rolling stock to the company, he knows that the rolling stock is destined to come under the operation of the provisions of this Act, and, knowing that, I say that by destination—under the English law as well as under the French law—that rolling stock attaches to and forms part of the real estate of the railroad. It cannot be levied upon under an execution against the goods of the railway company.

That is the true position between the trustee for these bonds and the owner of the rolling stock. But it is not necessary for us to go to that extent. All we have to do is to say to the railway company: You perform your part of this contract, and we will perform ours. Our covenant to guarantee your bonds is a mutual covenant, with power to give us a first mortgage on $20,000,000 of rolling stock; and until you have performed your covenant, you cannot compel us to perform ours, and we will not do so. This is the true position. But some hon. gentleman says: Oh, yes, but in the meantime you are going to make progress payments. Surely we are; but do these hon. gentlemen suppose that when we make progress payments, we alter the position in the slightest degree? Do they suppose that this government are going to throw away any of their rights, or that they do not know how to guard their interests in this connection? Under this clause providing for progress payments (to be secured by mortgage), the government always have it in their power to make them or not as they see fit, or on such conditions as they may determine. That is entirely in their own hands. Yet we are seriously asked to believe that men occupying the positions of members of this government, with all their officers advising them, and with the railway construction commission behind them to advise them, will allow this railway company to force on them stock which is not their own, and will accept a mortgage on it which gives them no security at all. Surely these hon. gentlemen are driven to queer straits when they undertake to make an argument of that kind to an intelligent House and before an intelligent country.

The position which has been assumed by the hon. leader of the opposition, and which has been taken up by some of his supporters, is this. He stated on the floor of this House that the government has no control over the freight rates of this railway. I must conclude that in the heat of debate and argument the hon. leader of the opposition forgot himself and forgot what this contract contains; because I know he would not have made a wilful misrepresentation of what was in the contract itself. But he made the statement, and it shows that hon. gentlemen opposite are more or less excited over this matter, and are not as cautious in the statements they make as they should be. We have this provision in the contract, and after I have read it, I am going to ask any hon. gentleman to dispute that it gives full control over the rates of this railway. I refer to paragraph 39:

> The rates and tolls to be levied and taken by the company upon any part of the said railway shall be under the control of the Governor in Council, or of such authority, commission or tribunal as is designated or constituted under any Act of the parliament of Canada for the regulation or control of the business of railways.

Will any hon. gentleman say that that does not give the government full and absolute control of rates? There does not seem to be anybody who will say so, therefore I can pass from that part of the question.

Mr. SPROULE. Would it not be very much the same as the law is now, which provides that a railway company cannot put its schedule of rates into operation until it is approved by the government? Is it not thereby under the control of the government?

Mr. WADE. The only railway that I know of over whose rates either this parliament or the legislatures of the different provinces have not absolute and complete control, is the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. SPROULE. That is not an answer to the question I put.

Mr. WADE. Does this give complete control over the rates of the company, or does it not? Let us not have any foolishness about this thing. It either means that or it does not. If it means that, let us stop talking about it. If it does not mean that, let us take up the question and settle it.

Now, I am coming to another strong point made by hon. gentlemen opposite, according to their own judgment. They say, here is this government going into partnership with this corporation, and we have the humiliating fact of parliament being called here by the government at the instigation of a private corporation: and they tell us what a one-sided partnership this is. Now, let me make a few remarks on this point. When the late government undertook to construct the Canadian Pacific Railway, there was no partnership about the matter. The government did all; the company took all. The company had all the control; the government had none. In this case the government, for the purpose of controlling this road and seeing that it is operated in the interests of the Dominion, has seen fit to provide that it shall have a certain interest. Call it a partnership if you like the term; I care not what you call it. They have provided that, and it was an act of great wisdom on their part, to make that provision. But hon. gentlemen opposite say, the Grand Trunk Pacific Company is only putting up $14,500,000, while the government is putting up $150,000,000. How the figures vary in the course of a few months; some go up and some down. The hon. leader of the opposition has put up his figures about 25 per cent, and the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler), since he has been on his knees praying that the eastern section should not be built, has brought his down. I wonder if he received any inspiration from Heaven to make him retract them. Now, I wish to state what it is that the government puts into this partnership, if partnership you call it. The government does not give, as has been stated here, three-fourths of the cost of the western division. What the government does is to guarantee a sufficient number of the bonds to produce three-fourths of the cost. The government does agree to pay seven years interest upon these bonds so far as the mountain division is concerned; that is a clean gift to the company. With regard to the eastern division, the government pays out sufficient to construct it, and gives the company seven years rental of it free. That is a clean gift to the company, if gift you call it. These are the entire amounts the government gives. On the other hand, what does the company do? It gives one-fourth of the cost of the construction of the western division; it puts upon the railroad $20,000.000 worth of rolling stock in the first instance, and it will have to supplement that immediately and from time to time. It assumes the burden of operating the western division. It undertakes to operate the eastern division and pay the rentals for the same. It undertakes to purchase and to put on the eastern division $5,000,000 worth of rolling stock, which is to be subject to the mortgage I have spoken of. It undertakes to maintain the eastern division in a state of efficiency, equal to the times, as the times advance, and the standard of railway operation and maintenance increases. According as that standard is raised, the company must keep up to it. It must carry all unrouted freight, as I have said, and the routed freight it is to take to Canadian ports for exactly the same rates as are charged to American ports. It it to provide sufficient shipping both to Atlantic and Pacific ports to transport the traffic. It is to allow the government to fix the rates and to carry out its contract with the government in the manner indicated.

But we are asked, what does the government get out of this? Hon gentlemen opposite say; You are giving up everything, what are the people getting, why do you not give the government a part of the profits? Are these gentlemen serious? Would they like the government of Canada to go into a railway operation for the purpose of making profits? They are certainly not serious.

Mr. HAGGART. A campaign fund would suit them.

Mr. WADE. I did not understand the remark which the hon. member for South Lanark has just made, but I am told he asked me whether a campaign fund would result. Well, the hon. gentleman is an older and more experienced politician than I.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman asked what the government would get out of it, and I said, perhaps a campaign fund.

Mr. WADE. Would the hon. gentleman explain what he means? The hon. gentleman was a minister of railways in the late government, he was in parliament, I understand, when the Canadian Pacific Railway deal went through. Were the government which he then supported and himself satisfied with a campaign fund? Mark you, Sir, I am asking these questions for information. I have not been long a member of this House, and I do not know what the tactics of these hon. gentlemen opposite were when in office, but judging from the hon. gentleman's interruption I must conclude that there was something very wily about them. To these hon. gentlemen who ask what is the government getting out of this, I ask what part of the profits did the government receive from the Canadian Pacific Railway? Might I ask the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Osler)—a fortunate director of the Canadian Pacific Railway, who has made, I understand, thousands and tens of thousands of dollars out of that enterprise—what share of its profits did that company give the government? These are pertinent questions, which evidently hon. gentlemen opposite do not care to answer. This government, Sir, will get from this company what is asked for and what the country receives from every company subsidized and assisted. It will get the development of the country, and that is all the government is asking for, and it seems to me a waste of time for hon. gentlemen opposite to attempt to make an argument of that kind. Let me ask now, what does the company get out of it? The company cannot draw a dollar of profit, they cannot receive one dollar of the money they put into the enterprise, until their contract has been carried out. Before they can get one cent to put into their pockets, they must put the government in this position, that it will not be called on to pay more than seven years interest on the money invested on the mountain division, and more than seven years rent on the eastern section. That is a proposition which cannot be disputed, and it brings the whole matter back to where it started from when my hon. friend the Minister of Finance made his speech in this connection during last session. Let us not get away from the question. It is wisdom probably on the part of the opposition, in view of the sad mistake they made in ever opposing the project, to grasp at all these little things, to endeavour to draw a red herring across the trail and throw dust in the eyes of the electorate. But they cannot succeed. They must bear in mind that the country is to-day as completely and intelligently informed as to the condition of the contract and the amendments sought as we are. The people understand exactly what these things mean. They know that if this scheme should prove a failure, then the company will have to suffer largely for it, and the government will have to suffer proportionately, but should the scheme prove a success, then the government can never be out of pocket more than the seven years interest in respect to the mountain division and the seven years rent on the eastern section. But, Mr. Speaker, the scheme is going to be a success. Of that there can be no doubt. Men of intelligence, men who have great experience in matters of this kind, have staked huge sums on the faith of their judgment that it will be a success.

In this connection, may I be permitted to read one extract from a journal on the other side of the line, to show what opinion is there entertained concerning this project? I propose to give a citation from the 'Chicago Record and Herald,' which is reprinted in the 'Montreal Trade Review.' The article is as follows:

> For more than five hundred years British statesmen have dreamed of possessing the shortest possible route to the Orient, and the dream is now certain of realization through the efforts of Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson and C. M. Hays. The stockholders and directors of the Grand Trunk Railway have approved of the plans for constructing the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway to extend from North Bay or Gravenhurst, Ont.——

(The writer meant to say Moncton.)

> ——to either Butte Inlet or Port Simpson, a distance of 3,025 miles, and the Canadian government has agreed to construct a portion of the road and guarantee the bonds to be issued for the remaining portion. The total cost will be not less than $125,000,000, and the undertaking outranks in importance any single railway project in history, with the possible exception of the Transiberian Railway.
>
> Besides having the shortest route from Liverpool, from the large centres of Canada, from New York and the manufacturing centres of the east and practically an equal route from Chicago and the middle west to the Orient, the company will have the lowest grade mountain line on the continent and over 7,200 miles of continuous railway, with steamship connections, over which rates can be made to every part of the world without consultation with friendly or unfriendly connections. The New England states are reached by the Central Vermont of the Grand Trunk system and the gateways of Chicago, Detroit and Port Huron by the Grand Trunk Western, both roads making short connections with the proposed Transcontinental Railway. Some of the distances are significant. For example, from New York to Yokohama by the way of Montreal and the new line will be 418 miles shorter than by the Canadian Pacific, 555 miles shorter than by Chicago and San Francisco and 1,800 miles shorter than by Galveston and San Francisco. From Liverpool to Yokohama by the way of Quebec and the new route will be 528 miles shorter than by the Canadian Pacific, 1,313 miles shorter than by New York and San Francisco and 130 miles shorter than by Moscow and the Transiberian Railway. From Chicago and Milwaukee to Yokohama by the Grand Trunk will be 535 miles longer than by the short route by St. Paul and the Canadian Pacific, but shorter in time, and will be 365 miles shorter than by St. Paul and Winnipeg.
> An idea of the part this line will play in Oriental trade is gathered from the statement that the Canadian exports increased from $93,827,077 in 1890 to $211,640,286 in 1902, while from the United States the increase was from $151,100,000 to $433,850,000. Along the lines of the Grand Trunk system are located forty-five cities and towns of more than 4,000 population each and aggregating 1,000,940, which is 18·7 per cent of Canada's population. From these towns the bulk of manufactured articles are now shipped to the Northwest and exported.

One of the most important facts in connection with the project is the existence of approximately 500,000,000 acres of fertile and unoccupied land in Northwest Canada, or five-eighths of the total farm acreage of the United States. Of the 15,400,000 acres of occupied land there only 6,000,000 acres are under cultivation, and they produced 60,000,000 bushels of wheat in 1902. It is estimated that the unoccupied lands are capable of a wheat production amounting to between 2,500,000,000 to 3,000,000,000 bushels, or five times greater than the total United States crop of 1900. There are other factors which make the Grand Trunk Pacific project one of stupendous possibilities.

This is the view of this matter taken by the people on the other side of the line.

Mr. MONK. What is the date of that extract?

Mr. WADE. It is copied in the last number of the 'Trade Review' of Montreal, of March 24. That shows the idea that the people outside of Canada have of this project. Gentlemen who have read the press of the United States and the United Kingdom for the last few months and have observed the prominence given to this transaction, must conclude that it is their duty to do something else besides sitting here and endeavouring to pick small flaws in this magnificent contract and this mangnificent scheme. We are told by the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) that the proper scheme for the maritime provinces is the extension of the Intercolonial to Depot Harbour. In regard to the extension of the Intercolonial to the lakes, my mind is entirely open; I am not in a position to-day to form a judgment as to whether it will be a good thing in the interests of the Dominion or not. I do say, however, that this scheme has nothing whatever to do with such an extension and does not conflict with it in the slightest degree. There are one or two thoughts which I wish to place before parliament in connection with the extension of the Intercolonial to Depot Harbour. The leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) endeavoured to demonstrate in the House that grain had this winter been carried by the Intercolonial to the port of Halifax and the port of St. John at a profit. An attempt has been made during the past winter to induce the shipment of grain from these points which have been carried over the Intercolonial. It resulted in failure because although there was ample steamship accommodation, it was found that the Intercolonial Railway had not sufficient western connections to secure the wheat for transportation over its line. That is a fact that cannot be disputed. If that be the fact the question arises whether, if the Intercolonial is extended to the lakes, it will be able to secure the traffic that is necessary in order to make it possible to ship grain from Halifax and St. John. In this connection I wish to draw attention to one or two significant facts. One is that we find the United States to-day expending $100,000,000 in deepening and improving the Erie canal in addition to their water terminals. Another thing is that they are commencing the ferrying of their western cars down the great lakes. They had already successfully carried them from western ports to ports along the lake. I do not know if they have yet carried them to Buffalo, but they have demonstrated the feasibility of that system of transportation and this year they have been ferrying their loaded cars along the lakes. Now we have been taking the position that we are going to secure the traffic of our west to ourselves, and ship it through Canadian ports. Shall we be surprised then if our cousins south of the line take the same position with regard to their western traffic? Can we expect to find that they will sit down and allow us to consummate our scheme to carry our grain from the west to the east and ship it from our ports and at the same time allow us to carry a portion of their grain to the same destination and make no effort to stop us from doing that? What is the truth with regard to the Canada Atlantic Railway to-day? That railway is dependent on the grain brought down by their transit boats from Duluth, Chicago and Milwaukee. The success of that whole project is dependent on the possibility of their obtaining American grain to bring over their line, and in addition to that they are further dependent upon the carrying of package freight from the New England ports which is brought up to Swanton and is then taken over the lakes by the company's transit boats. We are undertaking to carry on our own business. We say to the Americans: We are not going to allow a bushel of our wheat to be shipped through your ports. Is it not natural that if we shut off the export of our wheat through their ports, they will wish to shut off the export of their wheat through ours and will endeavour to prevent us from carrying over the lakes the package freight going west, and also prevent us from evading their coasting laws by using American bottoms for that purpose? This must be taken into consideration when we talk of extending the Intercolonial Railway to the lakes. But as a representative of the maritime provinces. I want to say that we are not satisfied to be tied to the Intercolonial Railway; we will not agree to that. This is a great national work, it is not only a transcontinental scheme, but, as I said before, one which reaches from Europe to the Orient. Have we not a right to be a party to such a project? I say we have, and also a right to the benefits that will accrue from it and to the national expansion that may result from

it. It is a surprise to me that there can be found in this House one hon. gentleman representing a constituency in the lower provinces who is not ready to support the hand of the government to the fullest extent in this project. I realize that the maritime provinces are under obligations to the present government. I realize that when the present government undertook to insist upon the building of that eastern section they adopted an heroic course and took their political lives in their hands. We are grateful to them and will show our gratitude when we come to cast our votes at the next general election.

Mr. SPROULE. You did it admirably in St. John.

Mr. WADE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) need not worry about St. John. He had better worry about something nearer home.

Mr. BENNETT. Ontario was all right.

Mr. WADE. Ontario is all right, there is no doubt about that. Toronto is a little wrong although that has always been wrong. There is a very funny situation here which I may be pardoned for bringing to the notice of the House. I want to acknowledge my debt of gratitude to the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Osler) not only for the poetic, the beautifully poetic visions he gave us last night not only for admitting that we had brought him to his knees, not only for admitting that he had lost all faith in the power of his leader or of his party in the House to stop the building of the eastern section, and that he was compelled to go to a higher source, knowing the country would not put any stop to it when they had an opportunity to vote, but I am under a further obligation to him ; he told us the eastern section should not be built ; he told us he had prayed Heaven it should never be built. A little while afterwards when he was still under the influence of these poetic visions depicted by him, and of other things, what did he tell us ? He said if the eastern section is not constructed, all the grain in the Northwest will be sent down and shipped from American ports.

That is the ground upon which we have stood from the beginning, that is the ground the government stands upon, and in face of declarations of that sort by a director of the rival company, the Canadian Pacific Railway, the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Osler), does it not seem idle for these gentlemen to say that we have not protected Canadian ports ? What protection did they give to Canadian ports when they were in power ? What safeguards did they throw around our Canadian ports ? Will they tell us, will they mention any of them? Why, Sir, they simply accomplished nothing. The present government shows that they have the determination to accomplish everything within their power. Do our friends opposite suppose that the people of Canada will turn out these men in whom they have confidence, and who are doing all they can for the benefit of this country, and put in their places men whose record for eighteen long, weary and dreary years shows not one effort in that direction ?

Now here is another funny situation, Mr. Speaker. My genial and hon. friend from South Lanark tells us that the building of that road from North Bay westward is all right. The hon. member for Toronto says it is all wrong. Well, Mr. Speaker, you can take your choice. There are two opinions. If you want more opinions with regard to this project, go to the leader of the opposition ; if that does not satisfy you go to a dozen other hon. gentlemen I can point out opposite, and you will get a greater variety. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, what kind of a railway policy would emanate from the other side. Now, Sir, I must refer to a little remark that was made by the member for South Toronto, a director of this Canadian Pacific Railway Company, with regard to our respected and right hon. Premier. He said the Premier did not understand the contract. He has the impertinence to say that the right hon. gentleman who has originated this scheme, who has carried it through with such consummate skill that he has commanded the admiration of the whole empire, does not understand this contract. I would not like to say that the hon. member from Toronto himself does not understand the contract, but I am safe in saying that if we are to judge from the utterances he has made in regard to it, he certainly does not understand it and never will. He made some remarks about treating with fakirs. I did not just get the trend of those remarks. I would like to know who they were, it would be well to name them. I tried to get him to name the man who told him it was impossible to run a line of railway through to Quebec, but he was unwilling to give his name. It is a very easy thing to say that you met a man, and that man told you such and such a thing, but who is the man ? When a statement of that kind is made in parliament we have a right to know who the man is, otherwise no reference should be made to what he said. If we had his name then we would be able to judge as to whether any weight should be attached to what he said.

There was another very striking circumstance that occurred. The hon. member for Toronto was very solicitous for Mackenzie & Mann. It is something new indeed that he should want to look after Mackenzie & Mann. He worried because they were only getting a subsidy of $13,000 a mile. At the very time this subsidy was being granted, in the very same session, we find that hon. gentleman on his feet denouncing in the most forcible terms the giving of any more subsidies at all. Now he worries because Mackenzie & Mann did not get enough.

Mr. FIELDING. Except the Canadian Pacific Railway subsidy.

Mr. WADE. Yes, that is always excepted. He forgets that Mackenzie & Mann's road was built across the prairie section, the rich and productive section, while this road is to be built from the Pacific to the Atlantic, and the fat section is to help out the lean. Surely he should be able to see that. Now I do not know that there is any need for me to continue much longer.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. WADE. Well, I will try and please hon. gentlemen opposite. I will conclude my remarks by saying this, that if the opposition had their way they would stop this road at North Bay, they would allow the Grand Trunk to connect at that point, the effect of which would be to divert the whole traffic of the west down to the Grand Trunk to be shipped through American ports. That is what they would do if they had their way. We have been told that by two of them who have been upon their feet. We do not propose to allow that to be accomplished if we can help it. The people of Canada do not propose to allow that to be accomplished if they can help it. I want to assure hon. gentlemen opposite, and to assure them with all earnestness, that the time is not far distant when every man who has raised his voice in this House in opposition to this scheme as a whole will have cause to regret it. The time is not far distant when it will be made plain by the voice of the people at the polls that these gentlemen opposite have made the greatest mistake of their lives when they agreed to oppose this magnificent scheme brought down by the government. Had they taken hold of it honestly and said: We will assist the government in this scheme, we will help them through with this measure,—they would have got a share of the credit which will attach to this work, they would have facilitated the completion of the work by a year or two at least. I say it was their duty under the circumstances to have done so; that they have not done so is their misfortune. Let no one talk to us about bringing in a scheme here which would be acceptable to all parties. I will undertake to say that no scheme, no matter what, that might be promulgated by the government, would be acceptable to parties opposite. Sir, had the scheme promulgated by the leader of the opposition been presented to this parliament by the government, it would have been as soundly denounced by them as the scheme that they are denouncing at present. It is impossible to suit these gentlemen. They have a right to do what they will in these matters. But I trust that the time will come when they will be able to rise above party exigencies in relation to a great enterprise such as this, that they will be able to do as the opposition in England does upon occasions, and say to the government: This is a proper scheme, this is a measure which is for the good of the country, and we will give you cordial support. If there is anything in the project which is not technically correct and which needs amendments, we will consult with you and advise with you for the common good. That would have been the wise course for hon. gentlemen opposite to pursue. But they did not choose to take that course, it was their own affair. I think it is their misfortune that they did not do so, but it is also our good fortune, because we can carry the scheme not only through this parliament but in the country, and the result will be that our hon. friends opposite will be compelled to sit in opposition for fifteen or twenty years longer at least.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier). Mr. Speaker, if I had the rugged faith of my hon. friend (Mr. Wade) who has just taken his seat, I think I would become a missionary. My hon. friend needs have no fear, I think, of lion's dens or fiery furnaces. Men such as himself can face any danger. It is only in the church or on the battlefield that they can give vent properly to their deep convictions. My hon. friend stated that he had not weak knees. Is this a cabalistic expression? Last year in this House, Mr. Fraser of Guysboro' used these same words.

An hon MEMBER. Where is he now?

Mr. MONK. To-day he is on the bench—not on the treasury benches, but in a prominent position of emolument. There is another vacancy in the province of Nova Scotia, and I supposed that my hon. friend from Hants (Mr. Russell) had the refusal of the position. I think he had better look to his laurels, because, if coming events cast their shadows before them, the words used to-day by my hon. friend who has just taken his seat, lead me to believe that he is a rival of some importance to the hon. gentleman who sits beside him, but, that faith, Mr. Speaker, is not shared by everybody. It is not shared by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) and I observe from what I see in the House to-day, the feeling is not by any means so ardent amongst the members from the province of Quebec who represent interests analogous to those which my hon. friend has just been defending so earnestly. Where are they to-day? Last year, when the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) announced the scheme which is again under discussion in this House, they were all here. They applauded the right hon. Prime Minister. They took a lively interest in the eastern extension of which I desire to say a few words. Where are they to-day? They have not the faith of my hon. friend from Annapolis. Neither have I. Without wishing to go over once more the ground which has been so ably gone over by those who have spoken before me, and without going into all the details of the supplemental contract which is now under discussion the House will perhaps allow me, in order not to repeat what has been so well said, better said a great deal than I could say it, to lay before the House the view of one who comes from the province of Quebec and to give to the House a confirmation of the impression which I had in the first instance last year, and my impression still of the trend that this business has taken and how I view it as a man from the province of Quebec—not at all, Mr. Speaker, that I think so large a question as this should be looked at from a provincial standpoint. By no means. This is a national question, a question which must be looked at from the standpoint of the whole Dominion, and which interests the confederated provinces. It interests to a high degree the older provinces, those by whom—we must not forget it—this great enterprise is going to be carried out, because it will be carried out as projected no doubt, and I think it behooves us few from the province of Quebec, on this side of the House, considering the indifference which perhaps hides another feeling amongst my friends and colleagues from the province of Quebec, to lay before the House our views in regard to this scheme. My hon friend from Annapolis should not blame us, I think, if we go a little beyond the immediate contract. We follow the example of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. He was the first to give a wider range to the discussion, and I think all the members of this House will agree with me when I say that it is impossible to view the important changes which this supplemental contract lays before us, without, to a certain extent, going over the whole scheme. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister went back over 200 years. He referred to the travels of Father Albanel, and this was not the first time. Let me tell my right hon. friend that that reverend gentleman had the reputation, according to history, of keeping his promises even to the Indians, and my pretension is, giving another direction to the discussion perhaps to avoid repetitions, that although my right hon. friend sets great weight upon the explorations of Father Albanel, made 200 years before the invention of steam locomotion, my right hon. friend has not that characteristic of the great missionary. In this instance it seems to me, and I will await contradiction from my right hon. friend and his colleagues from the province of Quebec, that he handed us a gold brick in place of a reality. I had no faith in my right hon. friend's glowing description of last year in respect to the eastern division. Many hon. members of this House and many people in the province of Quebec, did not at any time place great faith in the extension to the east. My right hon. friend knows it, and hon. gentlemen who represent that province in this House know it as well. But, I do consider, from what I have seen in this supplemental arrangement and bearing in mind all the facts that have come to our knowledge since last session, that that scheme has been definitely abandoned for the present. Whatever may be the effect of that abandonment in regard to the province of Ontario, and I believe the effort is analogous to what it may be in the province of Quebec. I say it has been abandoned so far as the province of Quebec is concerned. I say, Sir, that very far from having developed into a national transcontinental railway, that feature of the scheme has disappeared and the first object of the Grand Trunk Company has been absolutely realized. The Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada have succeeded in securing their original proposition, and they will divert the traffic of the west; in which we in the older provinces have at least some interest. They will divert that traffic to the United States, as they always intended.

It was thought at one time that this Transcontinental Railway would be a very great benefit to the province of Quebec; at least the supporters of the government alleged that it would be a benefit and they sought to make capital out of it in view of the approaching elections. The fact is, however, that this scheme of the government is looked upon with indifference in the province of Quebec, and some of the gentlemen on the treasury benches know perfectly well the reasons why. One reason is that the people of the province of Quebec knew, that no matter what the Prime Minister intended, the Grand Trunk Company would have their way, and would in the end attain their original object. An attempt has been made to show that this railway would be of great advantage to colonization in our province. Every man in that province who pays any attention to the question knows, that the colonization of Quebec is in direct need of assistance; but every man knows too, that the eastern extension of the Grand Trunk Pacific will not commence to realize the needs of colonization in that province. As an all-rail transportation route, the scheme never commended itself to the people of Quebec. The Minister of the Interior, has very frankly stated that in the summer months the transportation of grain from the west would be by water, and that it was only in winter there was any probability of this traffic going over the eastern extension through the province of Quebec, across the Quebec bridge, and on to the maritime provinces. That being so, there is very little chance of any benefit from the scheme being derived by the province of Quebec. We know that the road avoids as far as possible the inhabited part of the province, the credit of which is being pledged along with the credit of the other provinces, for its construction. It reaches up to the north into a region of which we know very little. It avoids the great cities, except the city of Quebec, and if it is only going to be a transportation route in winter, of what avail will it be to that city. I have always advocated that there should be a bridge across the St. Lawrence at Quebec. I believe that as the two shores of the St. Lawrence were joined at Montreal, so they should be joined at Quebec ; but I never did advocate that the credit of the country should be pledged to the extent of $6,000,000, for a bridge which originally was to cost only $4,000,000. And if after all this expenditure, the statement of the Minister of the Interior is correct, that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway would only be a transportation route in winter, then the city of Quebec will not derive any extraordinary profit from it. Let me point out, that the Valley of Ottawa, the Valley of the Lièvre and the Valley of the Rouge, are not touched by this railway, although we know that they contain millions of acres of land awaiting development and settlement. And yet the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) is as indifferent as the other supporters of the government, to the sacrifice of the interests of his constituency involved in the fact that this railway does not develop the fertile and unsettled portions of his county. The fertile country to the north of Montreal which sadly lacks railway facilities, is not benefited by this railway, and the Valley of the St. Maurice is merely touched by it. In fact, outside of the city of Quebec, that portion of our province which is to be taxed for the construction of this railway, is not benefited by it as a transportation route, to any appreciable extent. Compare this project with a railroad connecting ocean to ocean, that would come down through the known and inhabited parts of the province of Ontario and would pass from end to end through the province of Quebec ; so that whilst it would serve the advantage which we all have in view, of a national transcontinental line, it would also serve the interests of the great centres of the province of Quebec and the inhabited districts which it would traverse.

It has been viewed also in our province as a method of colonization ; and as such, I would recall to the House the nature of the protest which I made last year, when we considered the agreement made by the government in the first place. What I stated last year is even truer this year. We in the province of Quebec at the present moment are anxious to develop the immense tracts of land which we have there, lands as to whose agricultural resources there is no doubt whatever, but which lack railway facilities. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fitzpatrick) and the other members who represent the province of Quebec, know perfectly well that in the eastern part of the province, in the county of my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Lemieux) we have a country as large as England itself. My hon. friend knows that we have there immense tracts of fertile land, and the only thing that prevents the development of those lands is the lack of railway communication.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I was opposed by my hon. friend when I introduced a Bill to get a railway there.

Mr. MONK. My hon. friend is mistaken. I do not remember opposing any bill of his for that purpose. I remember favouring the passage of many Bills for the construction of railways in that part of the country, but I do not remember opposing any. I may be mistaken, but I do not think so. At any rate, my hon. friend will not deny that railway communication is required there. I was told by the captain of a steamer on which I was a passenger in the Baie de Chaleur that there was room in the district to establish fifty parishes with a population of a million. What is wanted there are facilities for reaching those lands. Then, coming west, you have the well-known valley of Lake St. John, which the proposed railway does not touch and in that valley, according to the circular of my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, there are over twenty million acres of good arable land, of which only 500,000 acres are under cultivation. If opened up by railway facilities and properly developed, that known and rich country, which the promoters of the Trans-Canada Railway desired to develop, would furnish to the city of Quebec a back country such as probably no city in the world could boast of. Then, as you come up the valley of the St. Lawrence, there are still on both sides of the river large quantities of available lands sparsely settled, but requiring railway communication. We have a back country for the city of Montreal not beyond the height of land, where this projected railway is going to pass, but on this side of the height of land, which is surveyed, known, ready for occupation and fertile, which would be a source of immense income to the city of Montreal and to active business generally, if it had railway communication. Even in the older parts of the province, as is no doubt the case in the province of Ontario, there are large tracts of country whose productiveness would be doubled if they had railway facilities. In my own county and in the county of Two Mountains there are seven or eight parishes which have never been able to obtain railway communication with the city of Montreal, and which last year sent into that city over $1,200,000 worth of agricultural produce. That I have no hesitation in saying would be doubled if we had proper railway communication. There is great truth in what my hon. friend from South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) said in the House yesterday, that if we are going to spend over $50,000,000 in the province of Quebec for this part of the Transcontinental railway, we could spend it in other directions with much greater advantage to the country. That is the opinion of the great majority in the province of Quebec; and if my right hon. friend will take the trouble to question the men who for the last ten or fifteen years have devoted themselves almost exclusively to colonization, not to make money, but from the patriotic motive of settling up our country, he will find that there is not one who will not tell him that the spending of $50,000,000 in this way, so far as colonization is concerned, is a waste of money, and that what we require in the province of Quebec at the present time are roads of penetration into those regions, feeders that will put them into communication with the great centres. I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that my right hon. friend and the government have practically abandoned the eastern section. It is my belief that $10,000,000, not of money expended, but of guarantee for the construction of some of these lines, would not expose this country to one dollar of loss, and would produce, so far as colonization is concerned, infinitely better results than the expenditure of $50,000,000 in building a railway beyond the height of land through a country of which we practically know nothing. As a colonization road it cannot be of any use to the majority of us in the province of Quebec.

My hon. friend (Mr. Wade) has absolute confidence in the eastern extension. He stated that the hon. leader of the opposition would be severely called to account by the electorate of Halifax for having opposed this scheme, forgetting no doubt, as my hon. friend has done, that in the leader of the opposition's own proposition was contained, not a doubtful statement, but the certainty that we would have a national transcontinental scheme of a real character, with a railway under our absolute control, going from ocean to ocean, down through the province of Quebec and the maritime provinces. Is there anything very astonishing that we should have arrived at the position in which we are to-day? I do not think so. My hon. friend will remember that this scheme, which we are called upon now to complete, was matured during the busy session which took place last year. It was presented by my right hon. friend to the House as a very pressing matter, one which would brook no delay, and I remember very well my right hon. friend praying Heaven to grant that it should not be too late. What was the position taken by the Grand Trunk Railway at the very inception, and is it possible for any one to believe that that position had not the approval of the government? Is it possible for us to believe that the Grand Trunk Railway, beginning early in 1902 to mature this scheme, making calculations, going over the ground and finally applying to parliament for the incorporation of the Grand Trunk Pacific—is it possible to believe that that company did not have some intimation from the government that its project would receive the support of the government? It is not possible to believe that. The first notice given by the Grand Trunk Pacific was the notice that it intended applying for a charter from North Bay westerly. Sir Rivers-Wilson told the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway at their last meeting, that the intention of the company was to build a railway from North Bay into the west. We are familiar, however, with what took place. A few days before, or a few days after my hon. friend presented his Bill to the House, we had a very strong movement from Quebec. The promoters of the Trans-Canada Railway all came up here. Those who took an interest in the Quebec bridge came up here. The members from the province of Quebec brought the weight of their influence to bear, and the government gave way to the demands of the deputation. We know how later on the maritime province members, when the Grand Trunk Pacific Bill was passing through the committee stage, insisted against the government's own desire, that they too should have a share in this transcontinental project. What was the result of these representations and the influences brought to bear? We had, in the first instance, the tacking on to the original project of the Grand Trunk Railway this eastern extension to Quebec.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONK. Then to the eastern extension, as at first projected, my right hon. friend added the extension of the Grand Trunk Pacific as far as Moncton. All this was done in a hurry. We know to-day that the ex-Minster of Railways (Mr. Blair), was not consulted with regard to these changes. He said so last session when he gave his explanation to the House. He then said that the project had been matured, that the scheme had received its final sanction, without any previous consultation with him. Under these circumstances, it is not surprising that what the Minister of Railways of that day called a hybrid scheme, concocted to satisfy both the promoters of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the demands of politicians should have received, but an indifferent approval even from the provinces supposed to be benefited. With regard to the Grand Trunk Company itself, it is evident to-day that it never at any time looked upon the eastern section as anything else but a political burden, which it was most desirous to get rid of if possible. There is no doubt that in the province of Quebec grave doubts began to exist, and were even formulated, regarding the sincerity of the government in promising to build the easten section. In a paper which is not unfavourable to my hon. friends opposite, appeared not many months ago, an article which was significant, stating that if in spite of the arguments in favour of the eastern extension, the government should be influenced to abandon the eastern division, then those who favoured that extension of the province of Quebec would be likely to remember that abandonment.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Would my hon. friend name the paper ?

Mr. MONK. It is 'La Presse,' a paper which has a very large circulation in the province of Quebec, a paper which has always been in favour of the scheme, and which stated at the end of the article that if, as some people pretend, the government was not sincere and the eastern extension would be practically abandoned, then those who had held out this hope to the people and had favoured the project of the eastern extension would call the government to a strict account. Probably my hon. friend remembers that article.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I remember having read the article, but I would like to know the date.

Mr. MONK. I do not know the date.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Has the hon. gentleman changed his opinion since then ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I remember the article.

Mr. MONK. Another indication, which I think throws a great deal of light upon the disposition and the policy of the government in regard to the extension of the eastern section to Quebec and the maritime provinces, is their total lack of action since the last session. That has already been insisted upon. At the beginning of this session I asked whether any surveys had been proposed and whether anything whatever had been done in regard to the eastern section, and we found out that nothing had been done. Whereas, on the one hand, the promoters of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company and the government have been busy to the last degree in bringing the agreement to its finished form in regard to the western sections, nothing whatever has been done as far as the eastern extension is concerned. Sir Rivers-Wilson, president of the company, does not even refer to it in his speech to the shareholders of the company. He makes no reference whatever to the eastern extension, does not point it out as an advantage or a disadvantage in connection with the operation of the new railway which the Grand Trunk Company is promoting. There is very great significance in what was pointed out by the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden), that at the meeting of shareholders a memorandum, called an official memorandum, was circulated among the shareholders. Whether it came from the government or the directors of the company we do not know, but it referred to the eastern extension as a premature scheme. Members of the House must have noticed with what vivacity the Minister of Finance took up the reference to that memorandum, and desired to know from the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) who was the author of that memorandum, and how it had been circulated. It seemed to me that as the government has no doubt knowledge of all the proceedings at that meeting, it would be very important, and, I think, almost incumbent upon the members of the government to give us some explanation as to the character of that memorandum.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The government has no knowledge of such a memorandum, absolutely none.

Mr. MONK. Has my right hon. friend made any inquiries ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No ; but my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) says we are bound to give explanations. We cannot give an explanation of a thing of which we have no knowledge. We never heard of such a memorandum, and I do not believe in the existence of such a memorandum either.

Mr. MONK. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) need have no doubt as to that. It is referred to in the official report of the meeting of shareholders. One speaker stated that he held in his hand, if I mistake not, an official memorandum.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No ; what was stated was that there had been a memorandum.

Mr. MONK. No ; the official report of this shareholder's speech says :

> In the official memorandum I read that the 500 miles from Quebec to North Bay is probably premature.

Now, as a member from Quebec, it appears to me somewhat ominous that in the new agreement the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company has stipulated for the right to lease portions of the road before it is entirely finished. There can be no doubt that coupling that supplementary agreement made by the Grand Trunk Pacific with the applications made by the Grand Trunk Pacific to the Ontario government for subsidies and aid in support of a branch line through the extreme western part of the province of Ontario and down to the lakes, that there is a determination on the part of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, which the government has fostered, to avail itself, on favourable terms, of that portion of the eastern extension, the most costly and most difficult portion to build, which the government is going to construct from Winnipeg until it reaches a point where it will be easy for the Grand Trunk Pacific to get down to North Bay and to carry out its original design. This is one of the features that alarms us in Quebec as to the seriousness, the earnestness of the government in regard to the carrying out of this transportation route through our province.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend stated a moment ago that the people of Quebec were quite indifferent to that piece of road.

Mr. MONK. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) will understand that the vast mass of the people of Quebec, whom this road does not affect, because it passes beyond the bounds of any population whatever, are not as much interested in it as they would be in a road passing through the inhabited portions of the province. It seems to me that it behooves us who represent that province in this parliament to see to it that this scheme is a serious scheme, and that we in the province of Quebec should get our share of the immense expenditure which is proposed to be made in connection with this project.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONK. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) must not think that in speaking thus I have a desire to simply advocate the rights of the province. I view the Transcontinental Railway as a great national scheme, but, as far as the province of Quebec is concerned, we wish to see it carried out earnestly.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONK. My hon. friend says 'hear, hear.'

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am with my hon. friend (Mr. Monk).

Mr. MONK. Is my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux), as a member of the administration, prepared to give anything in the way of a guarantee that it is seriously intended to build the eastern extension?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Certainly.

Mr. MONK. I do not mean in the distant future, when we will all have been elected to another house than this one, but at the same time as the western portion of the road is to be built.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONK. Might I ask my hon. friend if that is the case, what has been done since the last session in the way of giving us, not only in the province of Quebec, but in all of Canada, some idea of where that line is going to pass?

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend (Mr. Monk) has just described the route. He said it is beyond the inhabited centres.

Mr. MONK. Does my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) consider that this is a satisfactory description, coming from a member of the government, passing through uninhabited regions.

Mr. LEMIEUX. That is the description given by my hon. friend.

Mr. MONK. Does my hon. friend assent to that description? Does he agree that it passes where it can be of no use to anybody? It seems to me that we have enough before us to show us as sensible men, with what took place at the meeting of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway in London, that the concessions which the promoters of this railway have demanded and have obtained, with the absolute inaction of the government since the last session, with no statement whatever from the right hon. gentleman as to what they intended to do at the present moment, when the time has arrived for tracing that line—it seems to me, I say, that we have before us enough to justify a grave suspicion as to what the real project of the government is, and what they intend to do as to that eastern extension. For my own part I entertain no doubt whatever that, apart from the extension to Winnipeg, which is over the most difficult, the most costly, the least remunerative part of that line, and which the government no doubt intend to build, the rest of the construction will be indefinitely postponed. I think we are entitled to have some authoritative declaration from the government on that point.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MONK. Mr. Speaker, I was very thankful to you for leaving the chair a few minutes before six o'clock because I had a great desire, when I took the floor of the House, to limit my observations to the view which I think most of us in the province of Quebec would take on this important question, and not to go over the ground which has been so ably covered already by those who have spoken before me. My hon. friend from Annapolis envied my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Osler) in so far as he was a director of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, probably for the same reason that I envy my hon. friend for West Toronto myself. We would all like to be in that position, but, there is another advantage which is that it permits a man of such great experience and knowledge of financial transactions to criticise more clearly than we ordinary laymen can an agreement of this kind. My hon. friend from West Toronto has done so with such great aptness that I am very desirous of not going over the ground that he has covered already. It has taken me a great deal of time to reach the conclusions which he probably reached in one quarter of that time. What I wish particularly to show to the House is that we have just cause for alarm in the older provinces at the aspect of this question as it is now submitted to the House, and I trust that my hon. friends from the province of Quebec on either side of the House, if not sharing that apprehension, will do something to reassure me. The advances made by the Grand Trunk in this second agreement must have struck everybody and I am bound to say, that, although I listened attentively to my hon. friend from Annapolis, I was not aware that he in any way shook the strong arguments which were put before the House last night by my hon. friend from West Toronto. To give an example, my hon. friend from Annapolis referred to the utter impossibility of the rolling stock scheme being carried out as outlined by my hon. friend from West Toronto. It seems to me beyond all doubt that the Grand Trunk Railway Company intend adopting that way of equipping the road. We have Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson's statement to that effect positively made at the meeting of the shareholders. The scheme is on foot. They intend purchasing the rolling stock in the manner which is usually adopted by all railway companies, they have begun doing so and I venture to say, without being a prophet, that they will carry out that scheme. We must not imagine that we will not be called upon again to legislate upon this question. I have no doubt that we will legislate on it every year for the next eight or ten years, and if there is any flaw in the agreement in regard to that it will be corrected at the next session. That is the way it is going to be carried out, and there is going to be no money spent by the Grand Trunk Railway Company or by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company in purchasing this equipment. I do not think there is any obstacle to a scheme of that kind being put into execution under the agreement. My hon. friend must have noticed that it is stipulated in one of the clauses of the agreement that the equipment is to be provided in the ordinary way of railroads. This is the ordinary way. It is by the organization of stock companies and stock trusts that equipments are provided on all railways on this continent and probably on the other. That is the manner adopted by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, in fact, by all railways and that the agreement itself contemplated that method of procuring the rolling stock cannot be doubted because it is specially provided in the agreement that among the working expenses defined by the agreement are precisely the amounts payable annually in extinction of the purchase price of the equipment. I see no objection, myself, as a lawyer, to a mortgage being given under these circumstances. The point I wish to make is that there will be no money spent and that the equipment will be paid out of working expenses.

There are other examples. My hon. friend from Annapolis stated that we had provided in the agreement for the control of rates. Well, it would be useless for me to say to the House, because hon. members are all aware of it, that it is impossible in an agreement of this kind to control rates. It is impossible to control the routing of freight. We cannot do it. The agreement goes as far as possible in that direction, no doubt, but, as a matter of fact, we will not be able to control the routing. We will not be able to prevent the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, instead of bringing the vast commerce of the west down to one of our own national ports, sending it to the port of Portland. That is what will be done. In regard to the rates themselves there is only one way in which we will be able to control that most important element in connection with this transcontinental route and that is by owning the route ourselves. Nothing is truer than what Mr. Blair said in the House last year that all control by the government over rates must necessarily vanish when the companies come before the government and represent that with a lower rate than that which they are imposing it will be impossible for them to go ahead. So that, I do not think that this argument of my hon. friend from Annapolis has very great force. The particular points which have attracted my attention as an eastern man, and I do not speak only as a member from the province of Quebec, have obliged me to give this contract still further consideration than I did last year and I find that the changes are very important. They have been pointed out by my hon. friend from West Toronto and also by preceding speakers and will no doubt be referred to by the many who desire to express themselves on this important question. What strikes me particularly is that our liability under the old contract was strictly limited. It is now unlimited. We are obliged on the prairie section to guarantee bonds to an amount beyond the $13,000 a mile mentioned as the limit in the previous agreement. We guarantee bonds to the amount which is necessary to produce $13,000 a mile which is a very different thing. In the mountain district we have assumed 75 per cent of the liabilities whatever these liabilities might be. We are not limited to $13,000. We must guarantee bonds to a sufficient amount to cover that 75 per cent and all the company has to do in the one case as in the other is to grind out bonds, so to speak, and get the government to guarantee them in order to procure a sufficient amount. So that, our liability is unlimited. Another point of very great importance is that we do not in any way control the issue of these bonds. It seems almost incredible that the company will be the sole judge of the time, place and amount at which these bonds will be sold. That is another point of extraordinary importance. Neither do we control in any way the fixed charges upon the railway and in regard to the balance required after we have furnished the $13,000 per mile on the prairie section and the 75 per cent of the cost, whatever that may be, of the mountain section, the company itself can issue unlimited bonds and possess under the guarantee of these bonds, equal rank pro rata with ourselves upon whatever the road will bring, if ever it comes into the hands of a receiver.

There is also a provision that no foreclosure can take place for five years, so that in reality the company is not only amply provided for during the time of construction, but for ten years afterwards, and it can go on for four years and eleven months more after that, without being in any way troubled as to the interest. There is a stipulation in regard to the rolling stock which under last year's bill was $20,000,000, and which is now brought down to $15,000,000. Under the old agreement the Grand Trunk Company was obliged to keep the $25,000,000 of stock, but no price was fixed upon that stock, or no condition as to how it should be paid for ; while under the new agreement that stock can be disposed of by the Grand Trunk Company to the extent of nearly one half of its value. There is also the right of leasing portions of the eastern division on the same conditions as to amount, as the company would have to pay for the whole of the eastern line, and there is a further significant clause in the agreement as to the right of the company at the end of the fifty years, to dispose of to the government, all the branch lines which the company does not require.

The conclusion at which I arrive, after reading this modified agreement, is, that all the modifications that have been made in it as compared with the old agreement, have been made to facilitate the carrying out of the original scheme which the Grand Trunk Company had in contemplation. It is a very significant thing, that notwithstanding all the facilities for raising the necessary money which have been afforded to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company by the new agreement, it will be possible for the Grand Trunk Railway Company to have its western extension carried out without the expenditure of any considerable sum of money on the part of the company ; because we have had it from the lips of the president of the Grand Trunk Company, that they are only liable for the sum of three million pounds, and for an annual sum of one hundred and eighteen pounds sterling. Under those circumstances, it seems to me that everything possible has been done to facilitate the carrying out of the original scheme of the Grand Trunk Company. My hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Wade) has laid great stress upon the deposit of $5,000,000 by the Grand Trunk Company. I do not in any way desire to reflect upon the Grand Trunk Company, but I think it would be of interest to us to know how that deposit has been made. Under the contract it should have been made in cash or approved securities with the government, and I would infer from the terms of the deposit receipt, that the receipt itself is not a satisfactory indication that this deposit has been made in cash. We are entitled to know from the government, if that deposit has been made in cash or approved securities, and if in approved securities, the government should tell us what they are.

Mr. FIELDING. I can give the answer at once—the deposit has been made in cash.

Mr. MONK. Does the receipt state that it is to be handed over to the government without interest after six months' notice ? Is the cash actually in the Bank of Montreal at Montreal ?

Mr. FIELDING. It is ; it is so certified by the manager of the Bank of Montreal.

Mr. MONK. My attention was attracted to this by what was said by the member for Annapolis, and by the fact that the deposit receipt is not in the usual form. Now, Mr. Speaker, we have been told that a national transcontinental line would pass through the province of Ontario, creating a new Ontario, and that it would create in our own province of Quebec, a new Quebec. From what has occurred since last session, I do not believe that that is going to be accomplished. I do not think that the eastern section is going to be built. It may be built in the distant future, but I do not infer that it is the intention of the government to build it simultaneously with the other section, and to make a really national transcontinental road. My hon. friend from Annapolis has spoken of the opposition which the original proposition to construct the Canadian Pacific Railway met with in this House. Well, it must be obvious to everybody that the opposition which is offered to this scheme is not the same kind of opposition in any sense. The Liberal party opposed the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, alleging that it was a wanton waste of money, and that the road was not necessary. At the present time none of us say that we should not open up the great west. We are agreed in principle that we must have a transcontinental road, but we differ as to the means. We are prepared to incur the expenditure, we are prepared to make every sacrifice necessary for the development of that important part of our national domain which we have in the west ; but in the province of Quebec, and in the older provinces, upon whose credit this scheme is to be carried out, we think we are entitled to say that we want a truly national road ; a national Canadian route, and not a route that will carry the vast trade of the west past our doors and down through the United States into Portland. It has been said on the other side of the House, that the Conservatives were opposed to the extension of the Intercolonial Railway from Levis to Montreal. I have no such recollection. We were always in favour of the extension of our own national railway exactly as we are to-day, but we differed at that time as to the means by which that end should be accomplished. I disapproved of the acquisition and of the mode of acquisition of the Drummond County Railway. I believed then and I believe to-day, particularly when the railway system along the south shore of the St. Lawrence is in such a deplorable condition, that we should have adopted that shorter and far less expensive route between Levis and Montreal. But as to the prolongation of the Intercolonial to Montreal, nobody on this side of the House, so far as I am aware, offered any objection to it.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the Liberal-Conservative party, as I understand it to-day, is pledged to a policy of prolongation of our great national highway; and had the government last year come down to us with a proposal to extend at once the government railway to that immense country in the west for the purpose of developing it, I for one would have heartily applauded that policy. If a proposal had been submitted to us having in view the building of an entirely government road, whose direction and whose traffic we were sure to control for all time, from the extreme west down to the shores of the great lakes, I have no doubt whatever that such a policy would have had the unanimous support of this House; and I believe to-day that would be the wisest course for us to adopt. We would then control absolutely the traffic of the west as far as the great lakes; we would develop that immense country, as it is our duty to develop it, and satisfy the very legitimate wants of the people of the west and of the large immigration which at present is flowing into that country. At any time, particularly now, if necessary later, I would be in favour of extending the Intercolonial Railway to the great lakes. At the present moment that would represent an expenditure of less than $20,000,000, and the result would be far better as regards the province of Quebec, and I have no doubt as regards the province of Ontario, and surely as regards the maritime provinces—it would be a far more certain and profitable expenditure—than this glamour, if I may call it so, of sending a line beyond the Laurentian range, beyond the height of land, and spending at least a hundred millions for that purpose. I say that, because I do not believe that line will ever be built through the province of Quebec, and still less do I believe that the Moncton extension, which was insisted on in the manner we all know last year, will be ever carried out. I agree cordially with what was said last year by the ex-Minister of Railways with regard to that extension, that it is not possible to believe that this country will ever commit itself to an expenditure of some $5,000,000 for the purpose of practically duplicating the Intercolonial Railway and gaining, between Lévis and Moncton, a distance of perhaps 25 or 30 miles, if we were to carry out the route suggested last year between Trois Pistoles or Rivière du Loup and Metapedia. What strikes me in all this, as a ratepayer in the province of Quebec, and as one who believes firmly in the absolute necessity of a great railway highway, controlled and owned by ourselves from one end of this Canada of ours to the other, is less the expenditure than the mistake in the policy of the hon. gentlemen who sit on the treasury benches. With regard to the filling of the gap between the great lakes on this side and that part of the government road which we would build on the other side through the western region, I fail to see what there was of an absurd or unreasonable character in the suggestion put forward last year, and repeated this year, by the leader of the opposition. We all know perfectly well that the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway north of Lake Superior could accommodate six times the traffic which it has now. It was built in great part by ourselves, and why should we not arrive at some arrangement by which, not only our own government road would use that piece of road traversing a country with little or no resources, but four or five other railways, if necessary. That would be pre-eminently logical, reasonable and economical.

Mr. Speaker, I would regret to think that anything I have said in the course of this discussion could be interpreted as hostile to the Grand Trunk Railway Company. I am glad to think that the Grand Trunk Railway Company will derive a part of the profit of the traffic to be had in the west. But when it comes to a choice between the interests of that corporation and what I believe to the clear, unmistakable good of this country, I do not hesitate; and if we were to carry out the idea now so widespread as necessary of execution, the nationalization of the railways of this country, I do not believe the Grand Trunk Railway Company would be deprived thereby of its share of traffic in the west. It could have it over our own national line, and could bring it where it judged proper. But we would have done our duty to this country by expending our money towards assuring an entirely Canadian line, to be built as soon as possible, from one end of this Dominion to the other. After all, Mr. Speaker, it must be evident to those who have looked into these agreements with some care—and we all know what use will be made of this agreement as soon as it is adopted by this House—that with the exception of the £62,700 sterling for which the Grand Trunk Railway Company is liable yearly on the bonds, or £118,000 sterling of annual interest, it is on our credit, and our credit alone, that this scheme is being carried out for the benefit of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. These are the facts, and, under these circumstances, it seems to me that it is a just and proper and patriotic position to take—fair, not only to the west, but also to the east—to the older provinces which are in reality the guarantors in this affair—that it would be better for ourselves to pledge our credit for ourselves and to give ourselves an entirely national line, controlling it from one end to the other, and making sure that our American neighbours will have no part whatever in the profits to be derived from that line.

After all we cannot fail to see that our American neighbours are getting a great deal of the profits which are to be had out of this country. That has been the case from the earliest days, and it is the boast of our American friends that they will eventually possess this country in its entirety. They began in 1792 by getting a slice comprising a considerable portion of territory, which everybody admits to-day really belonged to us. They have since then sliced off other portions of our territory in the east, centre and west. They have taken a very important slice of what, according to many, is our own territory in the north. They have a balance of trade against us of over $75,000,000 standing to their profit, and that balance will increase every year. They peacefully invade our country and take away vast quantities of raw material which we could with very much more profit utilize ourselves. And to-day, from a series of circumstances fresh in the minds of us all, a company, composed it is true of English capitalists, but after all under American management, is going to tap our great west, and instead of bringing the traffic of that region down to Montreal and down to the old city of Quebec, which is now ready to receive it by water or by rail, thanks to the bridge that is being constructed there,—instead of giving us the benefit of that traffic, the possibilities of which cannot be exaggerated, because it covers not only our own territory but the western states as well, it will, after obtaining everything from this government, take that traffic as quickly as it can outside the limits of Canada down to the American harbour of Portland. Is not the scheme we propose a more advantageous one from our point of view? It will not involve a greater expenditure of money of credit, and will secure to Canadian ports the Canadian traffic of the Northwest instead of bringing it to an American port. Is not such a scheme more patriotic and more advantageous in every respect to this Dominion than the one submitted to us? Our hon. friends opposite will no doubt say that the eastern extension as projected will be carried through. But why not achieve the same object by a cheaper method? The Grand Trunk Railway has already abandoned the city of Montreal for the port of Portland. Why should we play into the hands of that company and deprive our Canadian ports of the benefit of all the traffic which will accrue from the building of another transcontinental line, and not make this line pass beyond the height of land, where no people whatever in the province of Quebec can profit by it? Under the circumstances it seems to me right and fair that I should present to the House this view, which I know a very large number within the limits of my own province take of the projected scheme. It is my belief that the principle which has been so much discussed within the last ten or twenty years of the nationalization of all public utilities, and especially the nationalization of a great line like the one we are now discussing, is a principle which will ultimately triumph, but it will triumph, I believe, in this country too late for the advantages we might derive from it. It has been said, and I know is believed by some, that the construction by ourselves of this great national line would involve us in too much expense. It is said that political influences would interfere with the proper management and carrying out of this eminently national project. But after all, are we inferior to other people? Has not the government ownership of railways been a success in other countries, and why should it not be a success here? We are gradually emancipating ourselves from the evil influences which may have at one time or another interfered with the proper management of the Intercolonial Railway to a certain extent, but not to such an extent as has been stated, and there is nothing truer than what my hon. friend the leader of the opposition has said, that with a line of this magnitude and the growth and development it would give this country, surely as Canadians, as men who have the true interests of their country at stake rather than political interests, we would be able to do as well as other countries. They have nationalized railways in France and Germany. Russia has built a transcontinental railway, and political influences have not spoiled the construction of that road or interfered with its traffic. The principle has been carried out in other British dependencies than Canada with success, and at present the question is one of palpitating interest in the United States, where, no doubt under the industrial conditions which obtain there, before long it may become necessary for the people to carry into execution the principle of nationalization of their great roads. The Americans did not hesitate, nearly a century ago, when they found that the government of the mother country was too oppressive, to rebel. They founded a nation and built up a great country. We are arriving at national manhood under more favourable circumstances. We form a part of the British empire. We are satisfied with the constitution of this country as it is carried on. We are as free as possible. We have an immense territory, as large as that of the United States, which it is our duty to develop. It is our duty to keep for ourselves with the most jealous care all our resources and all our trade, and the only way in which we can do that effectively and with certainty is to build that transcontinental line from end to end, to have it under our control from end to end, to own and operate the railway ourselves.

We have splendid waterways, but side by side with those waterways we must have railway communication to co-operate with those waterways and in order to have really effective railway communication and to have a really strong control over the rates of freight throughout this country, in order that we may secure the fruits to which we are legitimately entitled for the sacrifices of credit and of money which we are making, we must have an absolute control of the road. What happened when this government gave $500,000 to the Grand Trunk Railway Company to improve the Victoria bridge at Montreal? That grant was almost contemporaneous with the establishment by the Grand Trunk of its port at Portland, and the Grand Trunk gave as a reason for the establishment of that port that there were not sufficient facilities in the port at Montreal. There are not sufficient facilities at Montreal nor at Quebec, St. John or Halifax. If we desire to keep our trade for ourselves we must provide our ports with the facilities which the Americans have provided for themselves and we must make it a certainty that all the trade of the west for which we are making such immense sacrifices will remain with ourselves exclusively. My hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Wade) has said that the people of the west would be patriotic enough to route their freight entirely through Canadian territory. My hon. friend knows as well as I do that the man who is routing freight will route it in the cheapest possible way, and if he has the certainty that sending it by Portland will be of more advantage to him he will not send it by Halifax. We have proof of that every day. Last year 9,000,000 bushels of our own Canadian wheat were shipped via Buffalo and over 1,300,000 bushels of American corn was routed by our American friends not through American channels but by way of Port Arthur because that was the cheaper route. We cannot count on that degree of patriotism from people who are obliged to pay freight but we can, by owning a railway, make it a certainty that the freight will go entirely by Canadian channels and benefit the eastern provinces as well as the west, so that we in the east will derive from the immense expenditures we have made that portion of benefit to which we are entitled.

There is another consideration which I think will appeal to the House. I believe that this link, of an entirely national character between the west and the east from end to end of the Dominion will help to create between the west and the east a great national spirit such as we require in this Dominion of Canada. Personally I have become more interested in the maritime provinces and more familiar with their wants and with the advantage to Canada of the possession of the maritime provinces, not so much by the visits I have made to those provinces as by the existence of a national railway from Halifax to Montreal, and the obligation imposed upon me as a member of this parliament to, every year, examine the results obtained upon that railway, its wants and the wants of the provinces which it traverses. I have no doubt whatever that in a similar manner, if we have a purely national railway running from one end of this Dominion to the other, we will become more closely bound to the western provinces, to those provinces of the future which are designed to play such an important role in the evolution of this great Dominion. I am perfectly sure that if the Intercolonial Railway is prolonged through the great province of Ontario it will be a link, and not an unnecessary link between that province and Quebec. Under all these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I do not by any means oppose the development of the west, but with an idea to which I would like to give further development if I had time, that Canada would benefit more by having a national line from one end of the Dominion to the other and by spending public money for the colonization and development of the older provinces, not for the development of unknown regions but for the development of regions which we now know and through which we can build feeders to this great national line, with the idea that this part of the policy of the government is a mistaken one and that it would have been more purely patriotic and national to spend our money in the creation of a great Canadian line from one end of the Dominion to the other, I find myself unable to approve of this second arrangement any more than I did of the first.

Mr. L. P. DEMERS (St. John and Iberville). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to take part in this debate, but a remark made by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) induces me to do so. He stated that last year the Liberal members from the province of Quebec were very enthusiastic over the scheme and that several of them were anxious to express their views concerning it, while to-day these same members remain silent.

Last year the principle itself of the scheme was being considered, and we would, of course, be expected to express an opinion regarding it. But to-day, the prinicple is no longer at stake. Mere matters of detail have to be looked into. The building of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway is a certainty, and all we have to consider has reference altogether to slight amendments to the agreement voted last year subject to ratification by the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada. Matters, therefore, are not in the same position, and our silence is thereby explained.

The hon. member for Jacques Cartier at the outset expressed his doubts as to the building of the eastern section of the transcontinental railway. In his opinion that part of the undertaking will not be carried out, and the effect will be to divert western traffic from Canadian ports towards Portland. The hon. members of the opposition, and particularly their leader, state that the country would be benefited by the extension of the Grand Trunk Railway into the west; they are anxious, so they say, that the railway referred to be pushed through to those magnificent western plains for the purpose of carrying the numberless bushels of wheat grown in that fertile region of the Peace river and elsewhere; but they object, they say, to that immense traffic being diverted from our ports and taken to Portland. There are no grounds for such apprehensions. By referring to sections 42 and 43 of the agreement passed last year, we will be convinced that the company are bound to favour our ports, since they are not at liberty to charge a higher freight rate on goods shipped to Canadian ports than on those shipped to Portland. Is not that a direct and positive encouragement to Canadian trade? What further security could the government exact from the Grand Trunk Railway?

Would the Canadian ports be more favoured by the carrying out of the rather indefinite scheme propounded by the leader of the opposition, and which, among other features, includes the extension of the Intercolonial to the great lakes? I do not think they would. Through the building of the Grand Trunk Pacific and by means of the provision which the government have laid down in the agreement the trade from the Pacific is secured to us.

The hon. member for Jacques Cartier claimed that the province of Quebec does not care for the undertaking, knowing that she will not reap any benefit from it. My hon. friend is mistaken, I think, as to the feelings of his fellow-citizens; and he may rest assured that the necessary influence has been brought to bear on the government to safeguard the interests of the province.

The hon. member for Jacques Cartier wished to put the House under the impression that this question has not been discussed in the province of Quebec. I think it is only doing justice to the hon. member to state that he has thoroughly dealt with that question in his speeches delivered before various public meetings, and I have the proof of this in the reports which appeared in 'La Presse' on February 8th and 11th. Those reports show that the hon. member took exception to the government scheme as being of no advantage to Montreal, considering that the proposed railway was to be built hundreds of miles away from it. True, that position has since been relinquished, the hon. member being no longer a leader of the Conservative party. I think the hon. member is right. The people are in need of an ideal, of some firm belief, to direct and support them; and the Conservative party has nothing of the kind to offer, having given up its old creed and replaced it by the belief in out and out protection, and ill-fated name which is to replace that under which the party has heretofore been known.

However, Mr. Speaker, in the electoral districts of St. James, Hochelaga, St. Hyacinthe and Montmagny, the Conservative candidates stood up against the Grand Trunk Pacific scheme, and especially against the building of the eastern section; whereupon, the Conservative party was repudiated by one of its old organs, a paper which is independent to-day but is the property of a Conservative legislative councillor and edited by a former editor of 'La Minerve.' I refer to 'La Presse,' of Montreal. On February 10 last, dealing with the eastern section, that paper said:

> However, we are unable to recognize in the candidates who are so strongly opposed to the new transcontinental a single one of our old time friends. Of course, they are quite free to sacrifice themselves for their party's sake. They will be sorry for it when it will be too late.
> It seems to us, nevertheless, that there cannot be any doubt as to the desirability of obtaining an expenditure of forty, fifty,—opponents say one hundred millions,—to develop that further slope of the Laurentian range.
>
> There is no more room on this side of the mountains. Our settlers are struggling among rocks and roughness of all kinds, and the granting of lots is giving rise to constant wrangling. The boldest, such as those who took up lands as far as St. Michel des Saints, at all risks, went beyond the mountains, but they suffer all the same from their isolation.
>
> Great sources of wealth are awaiting us on that further slope. Its virgin forests will easily give to the province of Quebec a million dollars or more per year; for everything, there, is as untouched as when Jacques Cartier discovered Canada.
> An ill-inspired notion compels high-minded patriots, such as our friends Messrs. Bergeron, Bernard and Taché, to fight that scheme, possibly in spite of their own good nature; nevertheless, the fact remains. On that point we must stand aloof from them. As regards the rest, they may take their chances, if any remain.

Then, Mr. Speaker, just before the election, on February 15, that same paper published an article to which the hon. member for Jacques Cartier has referred. He quoted the part relative to the government, but was very careful not to give that concerning his friends.

The paper stated among other things :

Politics have their exigencies ; but we are not disposed to bow to them. All these stories of lots, granted or not granted, applied for or vainly wished for, have not much practical bearing. And if they are so many difficulties, it is on account of the growing scarcity of lots available for settlement.

The province of Quebec is bounded toward the north by that terrible Laurentian range. Stalwart pioneers have been compelled to cross that appalling mountain barrier to reach fertile, though distant fields. We already mentioned the name of St. Michel des Saints, which, to all intents and purposes, is sixty miles away, or nearly so, from the nearest railway. Those stubborn settlers are on the margin of an endless plain, which practically extends to the shores of Hudson Bay ; but how difficult and wearisome to get there !

'La Presse' has no mistaken notion as to the task undertaken by the Grand Trunk Company, who, last year, agreed to open up those new territories and whose burden we have to intention to lighten. Let them carry out the work.

We deal with all alike. For some reason unknown to us, the Conservative party, through its present candidates, have repudiated that great policy of a second province of Quebec. In precise terms, Sir Wilfrid Laurier has just enunciated that policy, and his meaning seems to us very clear. We take each statement as it comes. Those who fight the scheme for the building of a new transcontinental railway appear to us to be ill-inspired. But woe, on the other hand, to those who dare forget to-morrow their promises of to-day.

Those, Sir, are patriotic sentiments, and they are those to which the electors gave their approval. The return of our candidates in the four ridings of the province of Quebec is thereby explained.

The hon. member for Jacques Cartier, last year, spoke against the building of that eastern section. He has again in his speech of this evening taken exception to it, or rather he did so at the outset of his remarks. In his opinion, the fault with the government scheme lies in the fact that the proposed railway will not tap the valleys of the Ottawa, the Lièvre, the St. Maurice, nor the regions of lake St. John and the Gaspé peninsula. The hon. member seems oblivious of one important point, and it is that the said railway is transcontinental : it will traverse Canada, and that should be enough for any good patriot.

The hon. member has approved of the building of the Quebec bridge, forgetting that the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden) in estimating the cost of building the eastern section, found that the bridge was to entail an excessive expenditure, which he included in the cost.

Well, Sir, in connection with the building of that bridge, the people of the city of Quebec are familiar with the record of the Conservative party. For how many years have they promised that bridge to the city of Quebec, without ever doing anything towards its construction ? It was only when the Liberal party came to power that energetic measures were taken to provide Quebec with a bridge which is of such necessity to its further progress. The hon. leader of the opposition would like the government to provide a number of branch railways extending northward. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier agrees with him on that point. But is it not known as a fact that those short lines of railway, even in the most densely populated districts of the province of Quebec, are not self-sustaining, on account of insufficient traffic. These short lines have to be linked to some main artery which feeds and supports them. A system of railways is somewhat like the human body. No limb can have life if it is not connected with an artery, so that the blood may circulate freely and regularly through it. Only in that way will it live. So it is with railways ; and the building of the main line, on the other hand, cannot fail to bring about the building of numerous branch railways which will greatly favour the development of the country traversed by them.

The hon. member for Jacques Cartier delivered this evening, as last year, a speech against the building of that part of the eastern section extending from Moncton to Quebec. After stating that the said section would cost $50,000,000, and that such an expenditure should not be made, he adds that what he fears above all, it is that the government should forego building that section. Here is a dilemma which the hon. member will have some difficulty in solving. If the expenditure is one that cannot be approved, how is it the hon. member is so fretful lest the government should forego making it ? If, on the other hand, that expenditure is to be of advantage to the province of Quebec, as well as to the remainder of the country, why is he opposed to it ? He blamed the government for delaying to proceed with the work along that section. The reason for the delay is easily understood : as we know, the House was prorogued on October 24 last. After the session was over, we had to wait until the Grand Trunk Company made the deposit required by the agreement. Once the deposit made, it was in order to have the agreement as voted by parliament ratified by the shareholders of the company. All this entailed negotiations and clearly explains the delay in the government's action. However, that delay does not warrant the hon. member for Jacques Cartier to state that the government will not build that section. If the hon. member is so much in favour of the building of that section, why does he remain in the company of those who are its most pronounced opponents ? His leader is against the building of the eastern section ; the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart) has declared himself opposed to it, and the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Osler) stated last evening that he hoped it would never be built. Does not the hon. member think that by remaining with men who are so strongly opposed to the scheme, he is helping to bring about the very result which he apprehends ?

The hon. leader of the opposition who is very positive when the provinces of Quebec and Ontario are concerned, is noticeably more dubious as regards the maritime provinces. He is not altogether opposed to the building of the railway from Moncton to Quebec. The hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) contends that it should not be built ; but the hon. leader of the opposition is not so trenchant; he apparently has not yet made up his mind. Here is what he says :

My position as to the line from Moncton to Quebec, I adhere to as stated last year. I say survey that country, ascertain its possibilities, and if you can find a shorter line from Rivière du Loup to Moncton, I will support its construction, if it will give the maritime provinces a better fighting chance to secure their fair share of the great trade of the west.

That is quite clear. Provided the line from Moncton to Quebec offers a short cut for traffic, he will favour its construction. In that case his own province is concerned. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier should take the same stand as regards the province of Quebec. Instead of favouring the extension of the Intercolonial by means of the purchase of the Canada Atlantic and the acquisition of the Canadian Pacific Railway along the north shore of Lake Superior as far as Winnipeg, whereby the province of Quebec is in no way benefited, the hon. member should vote for the government scheme and against that of his leader, who does not grant anything to the province of Quebec.

The hon. member stated that the line which they proposed building would pass through fertile districts. We are all familiar with the features of the country on the north shore of Lake Superior ; the traveller sees only mountains above and abysses below. There is no traffic possible ; it is a very expensive line, the most expensive section. Such is the paying section which these gentlemen on the other side are anxious to purchase for the greater happiness of the people.

But, Mr. Speaker, all these points have been discussed in the course of last session. That question has been decided by the House, and has there been put forward, this year, on behalf of the opposition, a single reason of a nature to induce the hon. members on this side to alter their views ? Has it been proven that in the province, of Quebec, or in any other province, public opinion has changed ? Certainly not ; on the contrary, the press of the province of Quebec, our public men, our business men, have taken a firm stand in favour of the scheme. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association, through its president, has congratulated the government on having undertaken the building of that road. So with the Board of Trade of Winnipeg, of Toronto, with those of Quebec, Halifax and elsewhere, which had urged the construction of the road and have not since found fault with its location. Now, I would like to know what has taken place since then that will warrant hon. members on the other side to condemn the government scheme and ask that it should be overhauled ? These gentlemen state : The country has rejected your scheme, since you now call upon the House to modify it. If complaints have been made, it was on their behalf solely. When we voted the Bill, last year, it contained section 7 which provided that the shareholders of the Grand Trunk, in general assembly, should approve of the agreement. The shareholders have approved of it, barring a few slight alterations. The government convene parliament, they propose that the few alterations made to an agreement with a third party be ratified. Those alterations are not of a nature to surprise us. By reading section 7 of the Act, it will be seen that what the Grand Trunk Company were asked to do, was to, (1) give security for the second issue of debentures ; (2) take 24,900,000 dollars' worth of ordinary stock ; (3) hold that stock for the whole duration of the lease.

True, that last condition is altered ; the company will not be obliged to control the greater part of the stock.

Another question which was discussed and settled in the course of the previous debate, was that relative to the rolling stock of the Grand Trunk. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier, taking the question up once more, stated that railway companies always used rolling stock which is leased to them. Whatever the practice may be, the agreement with the government requires that the company should give a mortgage on its rolling stock. Of course, the company could not grant a mortgage without being the owner of the stock, and it will be incumbent on the government to see that this clause of the agreement is carried out.

When it is laid down in a contract that a mortgage will be given, the first thing to do is to ascertain whether the person who grants that mortgage is the owner of the mortgaged property. Is it presumable that the government would have been blind enough to take a mortgage on some object which would not be the property of the Grand Trunk ? Evidently not.

The hon. member was mistaken in stating that the value of the rolling stock had been reduced to $15,000,000 by the new contract. That provision has not been altered. The rolling stock is still put down at $20,000,000 as in the first contract. The amendments introduced provide that as soon as there will be for 15,000,000 dollars' worth of rolling stock on the road, the company shall have the right to withdraw its deposit, but the nature and essence of the contract are in no way modified in that respect.

To include, as the supplementary agreement laid before the House does not alter materially the contract voted last year, it is our duty to adopt it. If the hon. member for Jacques Cartier had shown to the House that the securities in connection with the building of the eastern section are no longer the same, or that the nature of the contract voted last year has been radically changed, then, but only then, would we be justified in changing our minds. However, I do not think that has been shown either by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier or by his chief.

The resolution introduced by the hon. leader of the opposition is in itself a whole policy, but it has nothing to do with the question before the House. I detect in that programme many an idea which originated with the Liberal party. It makes for the extension of the Intercolonial westward by the purchase of the Canada Atlantic and the Canadian Pacific Railway along the north shore of Lake Superior, a plan which it was not thought prudent to submit to the electors of the province of Quebec and which was not taken up by the press of his party. It makes also for the development of our system of canals and waterways. But is not that also part and parcel of the policy of the Laurier government? Is there a government that has done more than the present one toward developing our waterways, building up our ports and dredging our rivers? Is it not that same government which has done away with canal tolls and provided for the western traffic that outlet to which the hon. member for Jacques Cartier referred? Is it not the present government which dredged the channel of the St. Lawrence? That is what the government have accomplished; they were not satisfied with high sounding words as is the fashion with the hon. leader of the opposition and the Conservative party; they acted.

The hon. member for Jacques Cartier stated that our country is immense, and that we should develop its resources. Indeed, we are in possession of a great extent of territory still unoccupied. The country was settled at the outset along the shores of the St. Lawrence and the great lakes. Why? because man is fond of the company of his fellowmen, and as stated by a writer, waterways are ways in motion. But waterways, which were sufficient in older times, when navigation was the only means of transportation, when life was not so active and so strenuous as it is now, and when men were not in such a hurry about doing things; waterways, I say, no longer answer the requirements of the day.

To-day we want to travel by steam, just as we want electricty to transmit instantaneously our thoughts. To-day we want railways. If we wish to open up to agriculture and civilization the vast regions of the Peace river, of northern Ontario and the tillable lands in the province of Quebec situated beyond the Laurentian range, we want a way; not a waterway, but a railway; a way along which may be carried those thousands of settlers who are coming to us just now from all parts of the world, and along which may be shipped as well the farm produce and animals required by them.

Such is the work which the government of Canada should accomplish, and when that is done, we will have a 'Greater Quebec,' a 'Greater Ontario,' and not only a 'Greater Northwest.'

In the course of the recent political contests, an endeavour was made to turn into a sectional question that really national issue. And I regret to say, the hon. member for Jacques Cartier himself complained that in the planning of that great scheme, the city of Montreal had been ignored. Well, Sir, the patriotism of the citizens of Montreal, as well as that of the electors of other divisions, is not restricted within the bounds of its territorial limits. Our patriotism is broader than that; above Montreal, there stands the country as a whole, and when the prosperity of the country is secured, Canada's metropolis will have its share of it, and will reap greater glory and profit for not having acted in a spirit of downright egotism.

Mr. W. B. NORTHRUP (East Hastings). Mr. Speaker, if I fail to attempt to reply to the eloquent speech of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Demers), I trust that he will not think for a moment that I am treating him with any disrespect or his argument with any contempt, or, on the other hand, that I have been converted to his views. A much more prosaic explanation I must give, and that is that in the province from which I happen to come we are unfortunately not able to speak both languages with the same facility and accuracy as hon. gentlemen who come from the province of Quebec. I hope I will not be considered as saying anything at all offensive to hon. gentlemen opposite if I say that we on this side of the House, when this measure was first brought before the House, were puzzled to understand on what conceivable grounds any gentleman representing the people of Canada could possibly support such a Bill, but after we had heard a number of the arguments advanced last year, after we had heard, not only the ministers from the head of the government, but their humblest supporters on this matter, we were compelled to come to the conclusion that hon. gentlemen opposite, even the ministers themselves, did not really understand the contract they were laying before the House. Now, Sir, it may seem preposterous, I might almost say impudent, for one standing on this side of the House to charge that hon. gentlemen opposite, even the ministers of the Crown, did not understand this important contract they had brought before the House; and yet one has but to refer to the pages of 'Hansard,' and to read the statements made by these hon. gentlemen to see that it is clear that they do not comprehend the terms of the contract, and in many cases they have failed to comprehend the obvious conditions existing at the time the contract was made. Take, for example, the speech made by the premier in introducing the measure last year. He called attention to the fact that Mr. Andrew Carnegie had said that the great trouble in Canada was that they could not compete with American ports, because our ports were ice-bound all winter, and the premier of Canada, speaking on the floor of this House, page 7933 of last year's 'Hansard,' said:

> Everybody knows except Mr. Andrew Carnegie and the bulk of American public opinion, that if we have used American ports and the bonding privilege, it was not because our harbours were ice-bound in winter, but simply because we have no railways to reach them.

Now, Sir, the premier of this country, coming down with so important a measure, gives as one of the reasons for it that we were dependent on the American harbours, because we had no railways to reach our own harbours. Surely, in view of such a statement, one can hardly be surprised that extraordinary conclusions are drawn by such a gentleman or by his supporters as to the necessity of this contract. Then the premier, to show that it was not a passing slip of the tongue, the other day in introducing the Bill, page 755 of the 'Hansard' of this year, speaking of the terms of this Bill, expressed himself to this effect:

> Suffice it to say, that one of the leading features, and perhaps the leading feature of that contract was that the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada would not only be a party to this enterprise, but that they would have a controlling interest in it, and would practically take the enterprise on their own shoulders.

In so saying he was but repeating what the Minister of Finance said last year, and what has been said again and again this year, that the Grand Trunk Company was not only in this, but of it, that it was behind it, and around about it, and all through it; whereas, as a matter of fact, if the Grand Trunk Railway Company is behind it—we do not dispute that—it is not so far behind it as to be out of sight, but it is so far behind as to be wholly out of reach; and if the time ever comes that the people of this country or the creditors of the Grand Trunk Pacific, dreaming that the Grand Trunk is behind this scheme and desiring to reach that railway, take any steps to attain that end they will find that, with the exception of the guarantee, they cannot reach them, because the Grand Trunk is not in it, is not behind it, nor anywhere in the neighbourhood of it.

Then the premier, among the reasons he gave for this contract being made, pointed out that it was a national necessity that such a road should be built at this time, and he illustrated the meaning of 'national necessity' by pointing out that on two previous occasions national necessities had arisen at the time the Intercolonial and the Canadian Pacific Railway were built, and he argued that now another national necessity had arisen for the present contract. Why, Sir, one has but to stop for a moment and consider the circumstances under which both the Intercolonial and the Canadian Pacific Railway were built to see how widely they differed from this, in that, while they were national necessities, this is anything but a national necessity. At the time the Intercolonial was built everybody knows it was a national necessity, in the sense that the country had to build the road whether it would or no. Confederation had been formed, a pledge had been given, and it was not a question whether the country could afford to build it, whether it desired to build it, whether other roads might not be more advantageous; but the simple fact was that we were bound to build the road and had to build it. That, I take it, is the meaning of the phrase 'national necessity.' So, too, when the Canadian Pacific Railway was built. Whatever may be said as to the terms of that contract, looked at from the standpoint of national interest, every one knows that when British Columbia came into the confederation, and all parties desired to have this great Dominion rounded out, one of the terms of the compact was that a road should be built to connect that province with the older provinces. There again we had a national necessity, in the sense that the road required to be built and we had to build it whether we would or no. Now, taking the words 'national necessity,' in the sense in which they were applied to the Intercolonial and the Canadian Pacific Railway, is there any gentleman on the other side of the House even who would venture to say that to-day there is the same national necessity for the Grand Trunk Pacific? For, Sir, if there is the same national necessity that there was for these other railways, heaven help Canada, and heaven help this government, if they deliberately delay the completion of this national necessity for another three years.

Without pointing out all the respects in which the premier has shown that he takes views of this contract which are not borne out by the contract itself, let me refer to a statement made by the Minister of the Interior, who so far this session seems to have been the mouthpiece of the government in making their defence of the contract and of the amendments thereto. The Minister of the Interior last year made a lengthy and elaborate and, from his standpoint, an excellent speech on the subject of this Bill; and he himself, in advocating this Bill, gave as one of the strongest reasons, see page 8954 of last year's 'Hansard,' on which he claimed the support of his followers, that the Grand Trunk Railway guaranteed to pay this country 3 per cent on the eastern division. He argued from that that the country was running no risk, that no matter what money we expended on it, it would be paid back with 3 per cent by the Grand Trunk Pacific Company. One does not require to waste time in arguing the point we have but to look at the contract to find that there is no more obligation in the contract that the Grand Trunk Railway shall pay 3 per cent on the eastern division than that it shall pay 3 per cent on the national debt.

Then the Minister of the Interior referred to the question of the equipment. I shall refer to that at greater length later on, but he and other ministers have taken occasion to point out the fact that $20,00,000, as it was originally, $15,000,000, as it will be now, is the amount of money the Grand Trunk Company will have to raise, inasmuch as the Grand Trunk Pacific has no means of raising the money. He pointed out that this $15,000,000 was not only, as it were, a guarantee of good faith, but it was an additional security which guaranteed to this country that the money to be spent on the eastern division will certainly be provided, or in default of it, we would fall back on that $15,000,000 for rolling stock and the $5,000,000 allotted to the directors. I venture to say there is no lawyer in the House, looking at this contract apart from political bias, who would give it as his opinion that the Grand Trunk Pacific is bound to spend $5,000,000, or even $5, in the purchase of equipment. I noticed last evening, when the Minister of the Interior was arguing this point, that he quoted the opinion of Mr. Shepley, of Toronto, a gentleman whose opinion must always carry weight. But it happens to be an opinion not at all touching the particular point that has been raised on this side of the House. Therefore, I conclude that when a man is found evading a fair charge, if he is found persistently answering some charge which is not made and escaping adroitly from the necessity of answering charges that are made, we must come to the conclusion that he is doing so because he cannot answer the charges that are made. Now, it is true that Mr. Shepley gave an opinion, and I am not here to question the accuracy of his opinion. He did give an opinion that if the Grand Trunk Pacific should buy, say, $20,000,000 worth of rolling stock and should give bonds on that rolling stock for interest and principal in installments as they fell due, the company would not have a right to charge up as a part of the working expenses the amount paid on those bonds for the principal. If that is so, the company could not buy their rolling stock and charge the purchase money of the stock up to the expenditure. Whether that be true or not, it is not the point that has been raised on this side of the House. But we on this side, when we find in the contract that the word 'acquired' is used again and again, but that when they come to speak of this particular equipment the word 'acquired' is not used at all, when we find that the government drops the only word that would make it clear that the company was bound to purchase this amount of stock, when we find that in the clause which provides that it can be charged back to working expenses the government and the company have agreed that the company can charge up as a part of working expenses, not merely the ordinary expenses of maintaining and operating the road, but all moneys that may be paid out in respect of hire of rolling stock to go as part of the equipment, when we do find charged to working expenses the rent paid for that equipment, the government has no right to expect, and the company do not expect to be compelled to purchase that stock. But if there was any doubt, let me call attention to the 35th clause, which is relied on, and which was quoted by the Minister of the Interior the other evening, which says that the equipment must be purchased by the company. Let us see what that clause says:

> A mortgage shall be given which shall be a first charge upon the railway undertaking equipment and property, tolls, rights and franchises of the company.

That is to say that the company, if it has acquired any rolling stock and becomes the owner of rolling stock, must put it under mortgage to the government. But, when we do not find in the contract a single word requiring the company to purchase this equipment, when we do find provision after provision in regard to purchasing this that and the other thing, when we find a clause stipulating that they can charge to working expenditure the rent to pay for this equipment, and when we come to the mortgage provisions and find that the language used is so clear as to prevent the possibility of a doubt we are surely justified in saying that there is no ground whatever for the contention of hon. gentlemen opposite that the equipment will be a security to this country. But, if there were any room for doubt let me put a witness into the box. We have one of the greatest firms in this or any other country, the firm of Wilson, Hays, Cox, Government & Co., which have entered into business to build a transcontinental line in this country and it happens that the senior member of the firm has spoken in the old country recently before those interested in the project. At page 29 of the notes of the meeting of the Grand Trunk shareholders I find reported by the shorthand reporter that this is the view which was held by the head of the firm as to the rolling stock:

As regards the five millions for rolling stock, it is not five millions—it is estimated at three millions. With that the Grand Trunk has nothing to do. The rolling stock will be provided by the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, and, as the general manager will tell you, they have laid their plans for providing that rolling stock by a trust fund.

Now, Sir, when we find the head of the firm agreeing with us as to that, surely we have the right to ask our hon. friends on the other side of the House to come over to our opinion rather than that they should have a right to ask us to accept theirs? Suppose it had been on a different point that the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company had spoken—suppose that he had said of his own knowledge as president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company : I know we can build a road with grades of twenty feet to the mile or whatever it may be, or that he had pledged his word as to the possibility of securing satisfactory grades all over the country, would not hon. gentlemen opposite have hurled this at us and said : We have the word of the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company? When we find the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company making the statement I have quoted at a meeting of the shareholders where nobody would accuse him of attempting to deceive the people who placed confidence in him, when we find him, in conference with the government, entering into one contract and agreeing to the terms of a second, surely, when he says that the rolling stock is to be furnished by a trust fund we are justified in accepting his statement? If we look at the amended contract, if we look at the terms that are brought before the House which we are asked to adopt by hon. gentlemen opposite we will find a significant confirmation of the views that I have expressed. Clause 2 provides for the reduction of the amount of rolling stock to be supplied from $20,000,000 to $15,000,000 worth and it stipulates that the company shall be entitled to the return of the deposit after a certain time. Then the clause proceeds :

And if it is shown to the satisfaction of the government that the western division will be completed and rolling stock to the said amount of fifteen million dollars ($15,000,000) supplied before the construction and completion of the eastern division and that the application of the said deposit will enable the company to so complete the western division and supply rolling stock to the said amount and that the same will be supplied, the said deposit shall be released by the government in such instalments as may from time to time be agreed upon.

Could you by any possibility have used a term that more accurately expresses the view of this contract held by the opposition or that would less adequately support the contention of the government than the word 'supplied', showing that the Grand Trunk Railway Company are entitled to receive back their deposit of $5,000,000 when they have supplied the equipment for the western division ? If one were to apply this term in accordance with the illustration which I gave last year in this House the matter would be put beyond all question. The case I presented was this : If an hon. gentleman coming to Ottawa were to rent a furnished house from the right hon. Prime Minister, the Prime Minister agreeing to equip the House with all the furniture that might be required, if he had supplied the house with all the furniture that might be required and then if the hon. gentleman had occupied it for a year and on rent being demanded had said : You did not own the furniture, you leased it and therefore I will not pay the rent, would anybody imagine that any court in the land would say that the right hon. gentleman ought to have bought it ? You have only to have the illustration presented to see the absurdity of any such contention. Then, Sir, the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Fitzpatrick), who certainly did know the terms of the contract if any person knew them, and who argued so strenuously and with so great an effect on his supporters in regard to this contract, said again and again and again : The Grand Trunk must pay cash for the stock. No hon. gentleman who heard the debate of last year can have forgotten the fact that one of the strongest and most persuasive statements made by that hon. gentleman was that the Grand Trunk Railway Company had to pay cash for this stock and that therefore there would be so much cash paid into the treasury until the contract was carried out. Hon. gentlemen on this side of the House said that the Grand Trunk would not pay cash ; we said that all that was necessary was for the Grand Trunk to claim this stock as their reward for guaranteeing these bonds and that the Grand Trunk Pacific could hand over to the Grand Trunk the whole of this stock for simply guaranteeing the bonds. Hon. gentlemen opposite laughed at that and the hon. Minister of Justice said that this stock had to be purchased. Again I put into the witness box the head of the firm, the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, to show what he thought was the proper view of the matter. I shall quote the statement upon which the shareholders agreed to accept the contract and they agreed to accept it on the straight pledge of their president that they incurred no liability whatever except the guaranteeing of their bonds for which they secured the stock. At page 13 of the printed notes the president spoke to this effect :

If you have followed the figures which I have just mentioned, you will find that the result shows an amount of principal bonds guaranteed in respect of both sections of £2,968,000, and of annual interest of £118,720, but even this interest liability, comparatively small as it is, need not accrue until the expiration of eight years—the period allowed for construction—the interest on cost during construction being provided out of capital. This, then, constitutes the responsibility of the Grand Trunk Company, and I hope this statement will allay the apprehensions which have been already expressed by a few critics, who may not have sufficiently studied or accurately understood the provisions of the agreements.

Then again on the same page he says :

I must not forget to mention that in return for the support which we ask you to accord to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, the Grand Trunk Company will retain a controlling interest in that company, and will become the possessors of the whole of the common stock, amounting to $25,000,000 or £5,000,000.

Again, Sir, I may ask, who understood this contract last year as it was before the House ? Was it hon. gentlemen opposite, who from the Minister of Justice down, contended that the Grand Trunk was compelled to purchase and pay cash for this stock, or was it hon. gentlemen on this side of the House who said that there was no such responsibility whatever ; that the Grand Trunk Pacific could hand over their stock to the Grand Trunk without a dollar being paid, and that therefore, when hon. gentlemen opposite said that the Grand Trunk would have in the treasury the proceeds of the $25,000,000 be it more or be it less, they did not understand the contract as we did, and the proof is that the president of the Grand Trunk road agrees with us ?

When the measure was going through parliament last year it may be remembered that the Minister of Justice contended that it was really absolutely necessary that the Grand Trunk should pay cash ; that the road could not go on unless that were done because there was no other way of raising money for the equipment of terminals, and telegraph lines. (Pages 11524 and 11565 Hansard.') The Minister of Justice distinctly pledged his word to this House that the money must be raised from the stock in order to acquire the terminals, to purchase the equipment, and to supply the telegraphs. But, at that time as many members of this House will remember, I had the honour to call attention to the fact that in the contruction clause there is an expressed condition that the terminals were part of the construction, and that therefore the necessity for these moneys did not arise at all, because the terminals would be paid for the same as the road itself, with the bond mortgage of three-fourths by the government, and one-fourth by the Grand Trunk. Although these illustrations must be multiplied indefinitely ; I think I have said enough to show, that hon. gentlemen opposite really did not understand the contract that was brought before the House last year ; and, Sir, I venture to say, that hon. gentlemen opposite who, in their hearts, intend to support the amendments to the contract this year, do not understand the effect of the amendments one whit better than they understood the contract itself last year.

Coming to the amendments which are now proposed, let us first see how they came before the House. Hon. gentlemen will remember that last year we thought we had done for ever and for all with this Bill when it passed this House. It was understood then that an arrangement had been made with the responsible heads of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and the Grand Trunk ; and we were assured on that point by the government again and again. And when we on this side pointed out that the business way would have been to have the Grand Trunk agree to the contract and bring it to us for confirmation ; and that we might spend the whole summer months here discussing a contract which we had no guarantee that the Grand Trunk would accept or ratify ; hon. gentlemen opposite laughed at that and we were told that the government were dealing with men of standing, men of reliability, men who had the great and glorious Grand Trunk at their backs, and that we need have no fear whatever that what we did in parliament would be done in vain. Well, whose predictions were verified ? Again hon. gentlemen opposite find that they were entirely wrong. We discover now, that although this House had done all that it could do, although we had given the proposed railway everything in sight and everything that could be found hidden out of sight anywhere in the land, on further consideration it was found that better treatment might be asked. Let me call attention for a few minutes ; I hope not in a discourteous or improper way, to the letter from the president of the Grand Trunk Company to the premier of this country, which I venture to characterize as one of the most extraordinary documents that ever appeared in the public press of any country. If the president of the Grand Trunk were a member of this House nothing would give me greater pleasure than to characterize this document in the terms which it deserves, but it may be considered cowardly to speak of it in the terms which it deserves behind his back, and therefore I shall say nothing about the language in which it is couched. I shall merely call attention to a few observations embodied in it, and I shall leave it to the members of this House to say what opinion they have of the language used, and the statements made by the president of the Grand Trunk Railway. In the first place Sir Rivers-Wilson calls the premier's attention to this.

I have fully appreciated the difficulties with which you have had to contend in the course of your most able conduct of the measure through parliament, and have shared your anxieties.

Now, what were the difficulties which the Prime Minister had to contend with ? It so happens that Sir Rivers-Wilson tells his shareholders what the difficulties were, and we will be able to find out from him who are to blame for their difficulties. At this meeting in London, the president of the Grand Trunk took his shareholders into his confidence, and he told them what had occurred between him and the government, and I am going to ask the House to consider the words uttered by the president of the Grand Trunk Railway himself, and to see who it was that the president blamed, when he got out of this country, when he was speaking to the shareholders and bound to tell the truth, when he was not liable to be influenced by political considerations, and when he did not imagine that shorthand reporters were taking down his words. Speaking of the inception of the Bill he described how they had spent 18 months in considering the question ; and he says :

Having arrived at the conclusion that the best interests of the company necessitated some early measure in the direction I have indicated, we caused a Bill to be introduced into the Canadian parliament.

That was the Bill which proposed to construct a line from North Bay west to the Pacific.

We caused a Bill——

That is, the Grand Trunk caused a Bill.

—we caused a Bill to be introduced into the Canadian parliament for securing a charter of incorporation for the creation of a company with an independent organization, but in close connection with, and under the control of the Grand Trunk Company, for the purpose of building a line of railway from a point of junction at or on the Grand Trunk line, passing through the most fertile districts of the North-west, and terminating at a port on the Pacific coast.

Surely, every member of this House knows that every word of that is true.

Under the natural impression that a scheme of this nature——

Which means the original proposition.

Under the natural impression that a scheme of this nature would commend itself to the approval, and would obtain the support and the encouragement of the government and parliament of Canada, so liberally accorded to other railway enterprises, I ventured to suggest to the shareholders when I addressed them in the month of April last year, that it might reasonably be expected that such a scheme might be carried through without engaging in any way the credit of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Company.

Such was my conviction at the time founded upon reasonable data, and in view of the precedents to which I have alluded, I must confess that when I made that suggestion, I appear to have been somewhat over-sanguine, not sufficiently considering, perhaps, the weight of political and interested opposition which the scheme was destined to encounter.

And encountered from whom ? Not from His Majesty's loyal opposition, for we always to a man have been in favour of the original proposition of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. All the difficulties, all the trouble of which he complains, and to which he refers the premier, and on the successful overcoming of which he congratulates him, every one of these troubles and difficulties came from the colleagues of the Prime Minister in his government, from his supporters in the caucus, from his followers in this House, and not from the members of the opposition. We never had a chance to express our views on this point, any further than to announce that we were in favour then, as we now are, of a Grand Trunk line from North Bay to the Pacific, as the Grand Trunk itself wished. When we find this document written to the premier congratulating him on overcoming the difficulties, it is well that we should know what these difficulties were, so that they may not be laid at the doors of the opposition in this parliament, for the opposition had nothing to do with this matter ; and so that the burden of the blame shall be laid upon the shoulders which should properly bear it.

Mr. McCREARY. Do I understand the hon. gentleman (Mr. Northrup) to say, speaking for the opposition, that they would have endorsed the application of the Grand Trunk Railway Company to build a railway from North Bay to the Pacific coast north of Lake Winnipeg ? That was the original proposition of the Grand Trunk. Does the hon. gentleman speak for the Conservative party when he says he endorses that policy ?

Mr. NORTHRUP. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McCreary) has asked a fair question and I will give an answer. I do not of course profess to speak authoritatively for the opposition, but from the views I have heard expressed by dozens of members of the opposition, and speaking my own views, I have no hesitation in saying that I believe that every member of the opposition was in favour then, and is in favour now, of assisting the Grand Trunk Railway Company to build west from North Bay ; let them put their line wherever they like providing only that it is a reasonable distance from other lines.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. NORTHRUP. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McCreary) will see from the expression of assent which has greeted my statement, that I have not altogether misvoiced the opinions of the gentlemen with whom I have the honour to sit. Then the president goes on in his letter to the premier :

It has always seemed to me that the government of Canada and the Grand Trunk Railway Company, being in point of fact partners in the enterprise—the former actuated by considerations of national policy, the latter by the necessity for securing its share in the growing prosperity of the Northwest—the burden of financial liability should be shared between the two in as equable proportions as possible, but I venture to think—and this view is strongly held by my board—that too large a portion of the burden has been imposed upon the Grand Trunk Company. I think I am correct in believing that this shifting of the balance was caused by the extreme, and I must say, in some respects unfair, opposition which the Bill met with in the House.

Again I would like to call attention to the fact that the government had a solid majority. I am not going to say a word against that majority or imply that it was improperly or dishonestly obtained ; but the fact is, as every member of this House knows, that the government had a solid majority last session, which voted down every amendment which we proposed with the object of casting additional burdens on the Grand Trunk Company. Two trifling amendments, I think, were accepted by the government, and to neither of these is exception taken by Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson in this letter. So that no burden was placed on the Grand Trunk Company by this side of the House, although we tried to place a number of them upon it and regretted that we did not succeed ; and any additional burden which was cast upon that company must have been cast by the colleagues or supporters of the premier. This is what led the public to believe that we on this side had imposed additional burdens on the Grand Trunk Company while hon. gentlemen on the other side had been friendly to the enterprise in its inception, and not as it was carried through with those burdens imposed. You will notice that the gentleman considers himself to be a partner with the government of Canada, not with the people of Canada. It seems never to have entered his mind that he was in partnership with the people of Canada. In his speech before the shareholders he again spoke of being in partnership with the government of Canada ; and Lord Welby also called attention to that fact. Perhaps the fact that these gentlemen are in partnership with the government of Canada may lead hon. gentlemen opposite to see how they can support even such amendments as those we have before us. An election has been held not long since in the province of Quebec, where the senior member of the firm did his duty by the junior member. If he had not done so, a different result might have followed in that election. Are we to understand that in all elections that are to be held in this country, the senior partner in the firm of Wilson, Hays, Cox, Government and Company, will help the junior member in the interests of the firm and the government ? Then, the gentleman goes on to say :

I hope that you will understand that the chief amendments which we will propose will in no way affect the principles of the Act or curtail the rights of the government.

I think he is correct. I do not think anything that is proposed will curtail the rights of the government or affect the principle of the Act. The principle of the Act was to give the Grand Trunk Company everything in sight, and that principle has been most faithfully lived up to in these amendments. The rights of the government were to give everything possible to the senior member of the firm, and those rights are not curtailed by these amendments. But the rights of the people of Canada are seriously curtailed by these amendments ; and knowing Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson to be an educated man, we can well understand the sarcastic smile with which he wrote these words.

Just consider what these amendments are. One clause relates to the rental of the eastern division. I do not suppose this could have gone through the House last session had it not been for the wonderful financial computation made by the Finance Minister, who showed that he had only to take some money out of one pocket and put it into another, and all the obligations of the government would cease ; yet here we have the Grand Trunk Company making the cool proposition that the rent payable for the eastern division should be only a charge on the net earnings. No covenant or liability to pay rent. If they made money, well and good ; if not, then worse ; there was to be no liability on the part of the company to the government. The government were to spend six or seven millions in building the line from Quebec to Moncton and hand it over to the Grand Trunk Company to use as they saw fit, and they would not be obliged to pay a dollar for the use of it unless they made the running expenses. Surely the height of impudence was reached in that suggestion ; and when the gentleman says that this proposal does not curtail the rights of the government, can we believe that he did not smile to himself when he contrasted the difference of meaning between the government of Canada and the people of Canada—because unfortunately in these days these are not always synonymous terms?

Then, with regard to the western division the government are to pay three-fourths of the cost, no matter what it is to be ; yet it is coolly proposed here that interest shall not be paid by the company on the bonds unless interest is earned—no liability on the part of the Grand Trunk Company or on any assets which it may have, and no possible source from which the holders of the bonds or the government can get any interest except from the surplus earnings of the company. So that if the senior partner of the firm could have induced the junior partner—or perhaps it would be more correct to say that if the junior partner had dared to give the senior partner what he wanted, no rent would have been payable on the eastern division, and no interest with respect to the western division, except so much as came out of the surplus earnings of the road ; and that, as the gentleman suggested, would not curtail the rights of the government, whatever effect it might have on the rights of the people of Canada.

When the gentleman spoke of a partnership and of the financial burden being shared between the partners in equable proportions, it seems to me that the junior partner might have plucked up courage for a moment and have said something on behalf of the people of Canada, who are bearing all the expense. When he suggested that the company should not pay any rental on the eastern division except out of the net earnings, would it not have been a good idea for the government to have said: We think you should pay four per cent instead of three per cent, when you are coming and asking for further concessions? Why did they not see that the same argument was applied to the eastern end that had been so successfully applied to the western end? But they did not seem to think of that. They simply assented to the amendments which we have before us.

Let us see what those amendments are. Several of them are of minor importance, and I will not occupy time in discussing them; but taking amendments 6, 7 and 8, let us see what the practical results of these is. One of the great arguments used last session to persuade members of this House to support the Bill was this: inasmuch as the government only guaranteed three-fourths of the bonds on the western end and the Grand Trunk Company guaranteed one-fourth, and the government was to have a first mortgage and the Grand Trunk a second, it was put forth forcibly by several ministers, including I think the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Justice, that the fact that the Grand Trunk Company had a second mortgage made that company in one sense a guarantor of the first mortgage, because in order to save themselves they had to see that the interest was paid on the first mortgage or the first mortgagee would step in and cut them out altogether. That, I admit, would be a very good argument in ordinary every day business. No doubt every time the first mortgagee can get a good substantial man to advance money on a second mortgage, his security is very considerably improved. But while that argument might be used last year, what is the state of affairs to-day? To-day we find these most extraordinary concessions brought down, by means of which the government mortgage practically becomes a second mortgage and the Grand Trunk mortgage practically takes priority. I do not wish to mince matters or to be misunderstood. I do not say that the government mortgage is in every sense made the second mortgage and the Grand Trunk mortgage the first, but I do say that practically the so-called first mortgage of the government ranks after the so-called second mortgage of the Grand Trunk Railway. Let me illustrate my point. Suppose any gentleman in this House were offered two mortgages—one a mortgage on a property, say for $12,000, taking first rank, and the other a mortgage for $4,000, coming second, which would correspond with the proportion existing between the government and the Grand Trunk mortgages. If the first mortgagee has his mortgage dated and registered first, everybody can see that it takes precedence, and that the other is entirely subject to it, just as last year the Grand Trunk mortgage was subject to that of the government. But suppose in the mortgage, which was first in point of time and registration, there was a clause providing that no step whatever could be taken by the mortgagee to collect principle or interest for a hundred years, can there be any doubt that, in such a case, the second mortgage practically became the first? Is there any one who would not prefer the second? Suppose that the terms of years in which the first mortgagee could not take any proceedings were 50 instead of 100 or 15 years instead of 50, would not the first mortgage take practically the second place to a corresponding extent? If the property were good for the $12,000, the amount of the first mortgage, and nothing more, the second mortgagee would undoubtedly, during the fifteen years in which the first mortgage was precluded from taking any action, take good care to collect his principle and interest before his predecessor could have any opportunity of cutting the ground from under him. Consequently, we find that although the Grand Trunk mortgage ranks second, the operation of the first is suspended for fifteen years, taking that and nothing more, the second mortgage practically becomes the first.

But that is not all. During the fifteen years the holders of the second mortgage have the exercise of all their rights. They can sue and distrain for interest, they can take all the remedies they are entitled to as mortgagees, while the first mortgagee is tied up. But even when the fifteen years come to an end and the first mortgagee is allowed to wake up from his Rip Van Winkle slumber, he cannot sue or foreclose. All he can do is, put a receiver in charge to operate the road and apply the surplus profits, after paying operating expenses, pari passu—heaven forgive us—between the two mortgagees, so that the so-called first mortgage becomes in no way superior to the second. If the receiver collect $100 net profits, $75 will go to the government and $25 to the Grand Trunk Railway. Both are in all respects on the same footing with regard to the moneys collected by the receiver. Let me consider this further. During the fifteen years, during which nothing has been paid on the first mortgage, there was of course a tremendous increase of debt. Suppose the interest were only three per cent, three per cent in fifteen years on $100,000,000 would give $45,000,000. So that in fifteen years, by simple interest alone, the amount due the first mortgagee would almost be fifty per cent above what it was originally, and his claim would be much greater. Whereas the second mortgagee would have either exactly the same claim as originally, because he would have collected the interest during the interval, or a lesser claim or possibly would have been paid in full. Therefore when the receiver steps in, the Grand Trunk Railway will have succeeded in having its liability reduced or wiped out altogether by getting its bonds paid in the interval and in any event it is on an equal footing with the government as regards the division of the net profits. Why is it, when the head of the firm asked for a change in the financial conditions, that the government, which has no pecuniary interests in the outcome of the road, should allow its position to be lowered to that of a second mortgagee, while the Grand Trunk Railway, which has so much to take out of the enterprise, should be given the position of first mortgagee ?

What is the Grand Trunk doing ? A great deal has been said of the desirability of carrying out the contract, because it is going to secure trade for Canadian ports. I know that this question of securing trade for Canadian ports, that this is a dangerous subject, for it is one on which one is apt to be misunderstood. Perhaps there was never a truer remark, or one more thoroughly misunderstood, than the famous remark of Dr. Johnson, that patriotism is the last refuge of a scoundrel. Although everybody knew that no more patriotic man ever lived than Dr. Johnson, those opposed to him chose to apply that remark in a different way altogether to that which he intended. The idea he intended to convey was that patriotism is so great a virtue, that a scoundrel, who had none in his composition, would try to cover up his rascalities by assuming the appearance of that virtue. In like manner there is a great assumption of virtue and a great deal of nonsense spoken about bringing traffic to Canadian ports, and many attempts are made to deceive the people in connection with that question. I am as anxious as any one to see the traffic of the country carried through Canadian ports, but that question like every other must be considered in connection with its surroundings. I am not so anxious to see wheat shipped to Halifax or St. John as to make our farmers in the west pay five cents or ten cents a bushel more to obtain that privilege. I think the true patriotic Canadian spirit is to apply our best energies to the task of so cheapening transportation that we can ship our western products through our Canadian ports at lower rates than, or at least at rates equally as low as those at which they can be shipped through foreign ports. But if it turns out that we cannot do either, our products will seek those other ports. But do not let us abandon the idea. Let us do all in our power to secure the transportation of the products of the northwest to Canadian ports in preference to foreign ports. The government has urged, as the great justification for its scheme, that that is the end it is seeking to attain. But, with all due respect to the government, we are compelled to say that the head of the firm has a good deal more to say on that point than the junior. On that subject Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson has put himself on record as to what the Grand Trunk propose to do. He has stated clearly that the reason the Grand Trunk Railway want to go into the northwest is that for years they have been carrying their west bound traffic—and they claim to carry many manufactured articles from the east to the west—200 miles, and then delivered it over to the Canadian Pacific Railway and never received in return any freight from the Canadian Pacific Railway. Here are Mr. Hays' words, to be found on pages 30 and 31 of the report of the general meeting of the Grand Trunk Railway shareholders :

> We are to-day handling from 15,000,000 to 20,000,000—last year it reached 24,000,000—bushels of grain, which came across the lake from Lake Superior down to our ports, feeding the whole Grand Trunk system locally throughout Ontario, and this gives us the whole of the way from Montreal, thus contributing a very large portion of our earnings. We cannot hold that system if we do not take some means of fastening it to us.

On page 31 he says :

> That traffic will be lost to us if we do not tie it up, so that to-day the question is not what your position is going to be if you do not embark on this enterprise, but what it will be if you do. That is the question that this meeting must decide to-day ; that is the question to which you must give serious consideration.

And so the whole argument to the Grand Trunk shareholders was that if they were willing to do all that was asked of them, that is, to guarantee the second mortgage bonds, then, instead of handing goods over to the Canadian Pacific Railway which would give them nothing in return, they would hand them over to a friendly line which would give them in return the traffic of the west which they would carry over their own system down to the east. Now if the real design of the government is to enable the farmers of the west to transport their products to the sea as cheaply as possible, can anybody believe that the farmers of the Northwest are going to be aided to this end by the expenditure of some fifty or seventy-five or one hundred million dollars, whatever the enormous sum may be, in building a road from Winnipeg to Quebec, when we find that last season, wheat was shipped from Port Arthur to Montreal or Quebec for about three cents a bushel, that the Grand Trunk and the Parry Sound roads are carrying grain from the lakes to Quebec at this very small cost? Surely it must be obvious to every one that if we really wish to assist the farmers of the west, it can be done much better along the line suggested by the hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden). I am not going to advocate that particular scheme, because I think this is a matter which ought to be threshed out before a transportation committee composed of experts, but I venture to say that if the matter were left to a transportation committee and they were to evolve the best possible scheme, no one would suggest the present as even a passably good scheme to secure transportation of the products of the west to the east more cheaply than they have been carried in the past.

Then, Sir, there is another provision, section 9, by which the Grand Trunk Railway is allowed to dispose of a portion of the $25,000,000 of stock. Here again if hon. gentlemen opposite would only bear in mind the arguments they and their leaders used last year, they would find that almost every argument, if not every argument, which they employed to justify their own consciences in voting for this agreement has been swept away by these amendments. I remember the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) with his usual eloquence and ability, but as I thought with less than his usual force, arguing that the Grand Trunk Railway having to keep this $25,000,000 of stock in their possession, the people of this country need not have the slightest anxiety that freight rates would be increased by the issue of that stock. He said that the Grand Trunk Railway could not have that stock unless they paid for it, and having paid for it would have to hold it, and if the day came when rates had to be fixed, the commissioners would only have to ascertain what was paid for that stock which would still be in the company's possession, as they could not sell it, and from that as a basis the rates might be fixed. Now all of that argument is swept away. If there is any force in that argument, and it is an argument that helped hon. gentlemen opposite to a conclusion last year, it is swept away now, because the Grand Trunk Railway, it is admitted, is allowed to obtain the $25,000,000 without paying a dollar, and having the stock, can sell as much of it as it likes providing it has a controlling voice in the policy of the Grand Trunk Pacific. I confess I do not know what these words mean. I understand that they mean that the Grand Trunk Railway can sell every dollars of their stock to Sir Rivers-Wilson or Mr. Hays or some one else in their interest who would secure to them the management of the road. It is a peculiarly worded contract and I am not sure if the Grand Trunk Railway chose to make a present of that stock to the various gentlemen who have been so successful in persuading the right hon. the premier (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to agree to the contract, there is nothing in the contract to prevent them selling it, or holding it and drawing dividends when the time comes. As to this clause I think we are fairly entitled to turn on the hon. gentlemen opposite the arguments they used last year, and instead of using our time and wasting our ability in debating the matter, we can simply say: If hon. gentlemen opposite were sincere last year and really believed that the ultimate advantages which they predicted would result from the Grand Trunk Railway holding the stock, they should leave the original contract as it is and not amend it.

The last clause to which I shall refer is the clause providing for the disposition of the road after the termination of the lease. Although this is dealing with a time fifty years from now, and although they may think what is done then is of little present importance, still it is a grave question in the case of a country which, unlike any individual, is sure to be here fifty years hence. It is a serious question whether we have the right to tie up this railway and the adjoining lines of railway fifty years hence, when we do not know what the conditions of the country will be then. Section 11 reads:

> In case, during the currency of the lease of the eastern division, the company shall have constructed a branch line or lines running from a point or points in the said eastern division, the government shall, if at the expiration of the said lease, it shall determine to undertake the operation of the said eastern division——

Do what?

> —take over such branch line or lines as the company may elect not to retain, at such value as may be agreed upon, or as may, in case of failure so to agree, be determined in the manner provided by paragraph 24 (2) of the said contract, which is hereby made applicable to cases arising under this paragraph.

That is to say, by arbitration. Just see the one-sidedness again! Where was the junior partner at that time, when the interests of the country were at stake? Here the Grand Trunk Railway is allowed, through the Grand Trunk Pacific, to operate the road for fifty years, and at the end of that time the partnership is dissolved and the senior partner is allowed to take what he likes, while the junior partner must buy the rest whether he likes it or not. Is it not quite conceivable that line after line of utterly unprofitable road may be constructed, built like some recently constructed, lines which have been authorized here for political reasons and for considerations which should not have induced their construction? Yet this unfortunate country, fifty years hence, will have to take them over, because the Grand Trunk will not want them. Why is it in regard to all of these lines, the leased line or the west line, wherever anything is to be done at the end of fifty years, the people are ignored and all the rights are given to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway ? Surely it is enough to make one feel, as I said before, that Sir Rivers-Wilson well understood with whom he was dealing, when he said it was a partnership between the company and the government of Canada.

And now, I shall only say one word in conclusion. The hon. the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), speaking a day or two ago, wound up his speech very eloquently by explaining the position of the Liberal party. These, Sir, are his closing words :

> I have to give my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) his answer upon that point, and I have to say that, so far from drawing back, so far from hesitating in connection with this enterprise, this government desires it to be understood that the Liberal party of Canada pledges its political existence on the carrying out of this enterprise.

That is as true as a great many statements that have been made. Is there a gentleman here who does not remember that last session we challenged the hon. gentlemen opposite to stake their political existence, and go to the people who supply the money for the construction of the railway, who will pay the freights upon it and who, of all people, have a right to be heard ? We challenged hon. gentlemen opposite to go before them, we submitted an amendment to the effect that no action should be taken until the people had an opportunity of speaking, and the solid majority voted us down, the contract of which they were so proud, and which was so absolutely final, was passed, but afterwards fell through, and the other party to it comes back with demands even more extraordinary than could have been dreamed of a year ago. Where was the government then, and where was the Liberal party ? The Liberal party could not make up its mind for some time whether it would dare to face the people or whether it would creep back to the House. Finally it decided not to face the people and crept back to the House. To-night I again challenge the government to dissolve this House as soon as they see fit ; not to pass this iniquitous measure, but to go to the people, who have never given a mandate for the passage of such legislation. The people of Canada were appealed to on a dozen different grounds. In voting they were influenced by free trade or protectionist sentiment, by religious or racial or other reasons. We again ask the government to appeal to the people of this country, who have never given them a mandate to pass such legislation. We challenge them to appeal to the people, and on behalf of the people we say that we are prepared to meet them before the electors, and if the people of Canada decide to pass such legislation, we will humbly bow and assist in the passage of that legislation and in making it as perfect as possible. But we will never consent to the passage of such legislation until the people whom we represent and who are so vitally interested in this legislation have a chance to speak.

Mr. BENJAMIN RUSSELL moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Fielding, House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, April 8, 1904.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, 'That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, for the House to go into committee to consider a certain resolution concerning the ratification of the agreement between His Majesty the King and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, dated the 8th day of March, 1904' ; and the proposed motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

Mr. BENJAMIN RUSSELL (Hants). Mr. Speaker, I occupied such an "unconscionable time" last session in discussing the main contract which is the subject of modification by the amendments now before the House, that I shall do all in my power to atone for the past by compressing what I have to say to-day within as narrow limits as possible ; and that will be partly my reason for not following my hon. friend from East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) in his microscopic analysis to which he subjected this modified contract in his remarks of last evening. The points which he brought forward were in the main not new. They were points which had been fully dealt with, over and over again, during the seven or eight months of the last session of this House; and if they have not been conclusively answered by the hon. Minister of Justice and the hon. Minister of the Interior and by the learned counsel whose opinions have been given to this House, I am afraid that even if one should rise from the dead, the hon. members on the other side of the House would not be convinced. I may be permitted, however, to refer to some fallacies in the hon. gentleman's method of dealing with those points. He holds up the modifications of the contract which have been introduced, and asks you to point out what is in them for the benefit of this country. Everything he discovers in them, he says, is for the benefit of the company ; there is nothing in them for the benefit of the country. Of course, that is precisely what we should expect ; because everybody knows that when the original contract was proposed to the company, they asked for concessions, and the very purpose of the modifications which have been presented to this House is to meet the difficulties and objections that have been raised by the company to the contract in its original form. You would not expect to find in these concessions anything in favour of the country, but you would expect to find in them various modifications in favour of the company. So that it is an extremely ingenious and plausible, but utterly fallacious and unfair mode of presenting the matter to the House, to hold up this modified contract and challenge us to find in it any points for the benefit of the country. The fair and proper method would be to take the main contract as adopted by this House last session and read into it these modified provisions, and then to say whether this contract in its entirety is or is not a fair contract for the acceptance of the people of this country. That is one of the fallacies which characterized my hon. friend's method of presenting this case to the House. It was ingenious and plausible, but it savored more of the 'sophistical rhetorician' than of the fair and honest critic.

Another fallacy which my hon. friend presented was this. He took Sir Rivers-Wilson's speech to the directors of the Grand Trunk Railway, in which Sir Rivers-Wilson said that the Grand Trunk Railway was a partner with the government in this great project, and then he exclaimed: You are therefore responsible, as a partner, for what Sir Rivers-Wilson presents to his company. My hon. friend picks out one statement from the many made by Sir Rivers-Wilson, and asks us to accept that as a fair interpretation of this modified contract. Of course, any one will see that that statement of Sir Rivers-Wilson was merely a rhetorical flourish. In the exuberance of his fancy, he used what every one will recognize as a metaphor, when he said: We are partners in this matter with the government of Canada. And, in a metaphorical sense, I suppose we might concede that they are partners with the government, but surely it is not fair to take a rhetorical flourish and gravely found upon a figure of speech a legal argument. Yet that is the method followed by the hon. member for Hastings. I will not say that my hon. friend was quite so strong in this direction as the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler). He did not go so far. He did not say that because of some recent change in the law of England governing companies, what had been said by Sir Rivers-Wilson and Mr. Hays, in presenting their case to the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway, was of such a character that it absolutely bound the government and prevented the government from insisting upon the rights which it might otherwise have insisted upon as contained in the terms of the contract between it and the Grand Trunk Pacific. Surely that is the most absurd contention ever offered to any parliament under heaven. If it were so easy as that to get rid of the obligations of a contract, nothing would be simpler than for the company to put up a director—and the more stupid the director they could find the better—to give his interpretation of the contract, and by that interpretation bind the other party, and discharge themselves from their obligations and liabilities under the contract. Surely the hon. gentleman could not have been serious in presenting such an argument, and I acquit him of any such imputation. Of course, when the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Northrup) quoted the statement of Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson and suggested that the government was bound by it, he was only speaking in a facetious way, and did not seriously mean to present that as a legal argument. It was only the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) who ever dreamed of presenting that statement as an argument to control the action of this House with reference to this contract.

There was one important admission made by the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Northrup) with reference to an argument which had been made by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice. Referring to the argument of the Minister of Justice last session, that the mortgage of the Grand Trunk Railway came after that of the government and was an additional guarantee therefore for the payment of the government mortgage, he admitted that that was a perfectly good and sound argument at the time, but that it had since been swept away by the provisions of this modified contract. Of course, it has to a certain extent, but what I want to call attention to is the fact that my hon. friend made the admission that the argument of the Minister of Justice last session was in this respect a sound one, and I would ask why did not the hon. gentleman make that admission last session? He was very careful not to do so then, nor would he make it now did he not think that the admission now could not hurt his case. I am reminded by the course taken by our hon. friends opposite of an incident said to have occurred when the commission was sitting in England to revise the new testament. One of the dignitaries was asked whether a certain disputed text should be retained or whether it was not spurious. He was so anxious about the matter that he sent a despatch to higher authorities asking for an opinion, and received the reply: Probably spurious, but it is not to be surrendered without a fight. That aptly represents the attitude taken by our hon. friends on the other side. They admit to each other that their contentions are probably spurious, but none the less they are not to be surrendered without a fight. And while the contentions of the Minister of Justice were probably correct, still they should be careful not to recognize their correctness until such recognition could do them no harm. I have no doubt that if it were conceivable that we should come back to this House next year with another modification of this contract——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. RUSSELL. Which is not conceivable, certainly there can be no further modifications, we would find our hon. friend from Hastings and his friends admitting that the arguments pressed by this side in favour of the modified contract were good, but that the changes since made had entirely altered the case and made these arguments no longer serviceable. We would have them admitting that the argument of my hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Wade) with regard to the substituted arrangement was perfectly correct, and that what is put into the contract now is simply the English method in lieu of the foreclosure of railway mortgages, and that the English method is the proper and most advantageous way of dealing with cases of that kind, and they would make that admission, as they have done in the case of the argument of the Minister of Justice, with perfect willingness, because another change had been made and it could do them no harm. At present, however, these hon. gentlemen contest the position taken by my hon. friend from Annapolis, and will make no admissions or concessions of any sort until it is too late for such admissions to do them any harm. But why not admit now what are the facts? Why not have admitted in 1903 that the argument of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice was perfectly fair with regard to the contract as it then stood? That would be a fair and candid way of dealing with the question, but I am sorry it is not the way in which we can expect it will be met by our hon. friends opposite.

There was one remark, perhaps the most important which the hon. gentleman made in the course of his speech, and one to which I wish to call special attention, because I think we are indebted to the hon. member for Hastings and the hon. member for West Toronto for having given us, in bold and salient outline, the strong point of distinction between the policy of the government and that of the opposition on this great question. I have no doubt that the hon. member for East Hastings agrees with his colleague from West Toronto regarding what would be the effect, if we had conceded to the Grand Trunk Pacific that which they asked, namely, the power to construct from North Bay to the Pacific coast. No doubt they would agree that the effect would be to send all the mighty commerce of that western and northwestern country through the United States and to United States seaports. The hon. member for Hastings told us last night most distinctly that there was no dispute, no controversy, no difference of opinion among the opposition regarding the original proposition of the Grand Trunk Railway, and that the opposition were prepared to accept it in its entirety and integrity, and, I might add, its nudity. 'From whom,' he asked, 'did Sir Rivers-Wilson encounter opposition in his first proposal?' And he replied: 'Not from His Majesty's loyal opposition, for they have always to a man been in favour of the original proposition of the Grand Trunk Railway.' My hon. friend from Selkirk (Mr. McCreary) could hardly trust his ears, but just after what I have read my hon. friend from Hastings had said still more emphatically:

> We never had a chance to express our views on this point any further than to announce that we were in favour then, as we are now, of a Grand Trunk line from North Bay to the Pacific coast just as much as the Grand Trunk itself was.

They were unanimously in favour, then, of a proposal which, according to the evidence, and according to the opinion of the hon. member for West Toronto, must have had the effect of carrying the traffic of this country through American channels and to United States ports. Was the hon. leader of the opposition, I wonder, in that frame of mind? Was he in favour of the original policy of the Grand Trunk Railway, which policy was to carry the traffic of all that great country through American territory and to United States ports? Because, if he was ready to accept that policy, I think it is time that his friends in the maritime provinces should know the sort of company he keeps when he gets away from the breezes of the sea. I do not wonder that the hon. member for East Hastings felt that he was on dangerous ground. He admitted he was on thin ice and had to skate warily over it. Speaking of patriotism, he said he had faith in this country and believed in the patriotism of the people. He gave us some fanciful interpretation of Dr. Johnson's well known aphorism to the effect that patriotism is the last refuge of a scoundrel—an absolutely correct interpretation, no doubt, but one not applicable to every case. But he said: I want to go only a certain distance in that direction. He told us that it was all very well to talk of the maritime ports and of the necessity of building up such ports at Halifax and St. John and of encouraging our own shipping and other industries; but he was not willing that the farmers of the Northwest should be taxed, in the form of an extra charge on the carriage of their grain, in order to build up the maritime ports of Canada. Well, Sir, neither would we wish to tax the farmers in order to build up our ports. No maritime province representative has ever asked that the farmers be required to pay a single cent more per bushel for the transportation of their grain to the old country because of our desire that our maritime ports should be built up. We entirely agree with the hon. gentleman up to that point; but at that point the accord absolutely ceases and determines. In order to avoid having the farmer pay too much for the transportation of his grain, the hon. gentleman would have that grain sent through American territory and out by American ports. We, on the other hand, would build up a company which, by an iron-clad agreement, would be called upon to carry the farmers' grain over Canadian territory and through Canadian ports at the same rates at which it would be carried by the American route. That is where our policy differs from his; that is where our patriotism differs from his; that is how the way by which we would remedy the condition of things contrasts with the hon. gentleman's way of dealing with the conditions of the Northwest farmer. The hon. leader of the opposition asked the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) how he was going to carry out this idea. The Minister of Finance said last year that we could rely, and must rely, upon the patriotism of the people of Canada to send the traffic by the Canadian route. The hon. leader of the opposition says: 'I admire the patriotism of the people of this country as much as the Minister of Finance admires it; no man could admire it more than I do.' That is perhaps perfectly true, I have no doubt; but, at the same time, no hon. gentleman in this House seems to trust the patriotism of the people of this country less than the leader of the opposition does. He has no faith whatever in what that patriotism can accomplish. He professes to want an agreement under which the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company will be obliged to carry grain, no matter whether routed or un-routed, over Canadian territory and through Canadian ports into the markets of the world. Did anybody ever hear a proposition like that seriously propounded? Did anybody ever hear of a proposition by which a party having grain to sell should be compelled to route that grain by any particular way, send it through any particular port or deal with it in any other way than his own business judgment told him would be desirable in his own interest? Surely not. That would be paternalism run mad. It would be worse than anything proposed in the empire of Germany. That was all admitted by the leader of the opposition last year, I think. It was admitted that we could not bring about a desirable condition of things in this country by mere legislative enactment, that we could not legislate that grain should be delivered at St. John or at Halifax, or that, it should be carried over any special route. It was conceded by everybody that the only thing we could do was so to legislate as to make it to the interest of the persons who had the conduct of the business in hand to send that business by a particular route, and through certain ports. We have endeavoured to make it to their interest to do so. The Bill before the House seeks, by every way in which it is conceivable that legislation can be made to operate, to make it to the interest of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company to have grain, if possible, routed over its own route, and to bring traffic to the line which it is to operate from Winnipeg to Moncton. But this was all elaborately argued last year, and I will not detain the House with an argument upon it now. Let me pass to what the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) has said with regard to the particular contract now before the House.

The hon. member for West Toronto described this contract as a contract by which, if the company fails, the government must lose, but if the company succeeds and is prosperous, the government does not win. As to the government gaining directly, of course, that is absolutely true. We do not look for dividends from this Grand Trunk Pacific Company. No government looks for dividends from the operation of any company that it incorporates. The government, the country, looks for its advantage in an entirely different direction. Every company we subsidize, or guarantee, or assist with a land grant, is to the advantage of the country by opening up facilities for trade and developing the country. Every such contract that has ever been made by this country, or any other country that I know of, has been of the character that the hon. member for West Toronto describes—a contract under which, if the company is prosperous, the government wins nothing, and, if the company becomes bankrupt, the government is called upon to implement its guarantee. If then, all our bargains for the assistance of companies are of such a character, where is the sense in singling out this particular case and finding fault with it on that account? I have said that every bargain made is of this character. Perhaps I should have said that there are exceptions. There have been companies incorporated by the parliament of this country and heavily subsidized in which the risk has all been against the government; it did not make any difference whether the company won or lost, the government was bound to lose and did lose in any event. One of these companies, the most conspicious of them all, the most prominent of them all, was one with which the hon. member for West Toronto is very familiar. The ex-member for Lisgar in this House (Mr. R. L. Richardson) presented in the form of very readable but not very profound articles, in the 'Canadian Magazine,' the cost to this country of that great railway. He estimated the cost as follows:—

25,000,000 acres of land of an estimated value of $3 an acre, making $75,000,000.

This gives a total of $135,000,000 given to the Canadian Pacific Railway for the building of a road the estimated cost of which he tells us was $91,500,000. That is a case where the government stood to lose and has lost all that money, no matter whether the company is brilliantly successful or hopelessly a failure. They have that money and we have no right of controlling the rates of that company; we have given concessions to it which we have given to no other company, and yet we stand to lose in any event no matter what might happen, all the magnificent sums given to that company by the government. Of course the heart of my hon. friend (Mr. Osler) was bleeding when that transaction was put through, but it bled in silence and in secrecy. He gave no vocal expression to the grief he experienced when that iniquitous transaction took place. We in this parliament have subsidized and guaranteed one enterprise after another, all parties agreeing, and the proposal to subsidize this railway from North Bay to the Pacific ocean would have been adopted unanimously in this House if the government had agreed to it. The opposition we are told by the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) was prepared to unanimously support such a subsidy if the government had made such a proposition. But the government said: No, we do not propose to accept your proposal in its nakedness; we do not propose to accept it and guarantee your bonds out and out without any conditions being attached for the construction of that road from North Bay to the Pacific coast; it is true that the old Grand Trunk Railway has done much for the development of Canada, but it has also received much from this country and is an old and established concern with power and connections in this country, with an established business here and you can well afford to undertake somewhat heavier responsibilities than those undertaken by other companies which we have guaranteed. We have here a great country to develop, we have a vast northern country which needs railway facilities, we have forest regions to be opened up and utilized, we have mines which must be exploited and developed, we have industries of all kinds that must be promoted. We have maritime ports struggling to secure some share in the prosperity that has come to the Dominion of Canada, especially in recent years. We will not allow you to take the guarantee and continue to send your freight by American ports. We will charge you and burden you with the operation of a road from Winnipeg to the Atlantic coast, for the benefit of Canadian ports. We will impose that burden on you in return for the large concessions we are making in the guarantees we are giving for the construction of the road from North Bay to the Pacific coast, although these concessions, it is true, are not larger than those which we have given to other similar companies. Therefore the company was loaded down with the operation of this road from Winnipeg to Moncton. We all remember the fallacious and trival argument, accepted for a considerable period by the hon. gentlemen opposite, which was presented to this House by the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals, the present chairman of the Railway Commission (Hon. A. G. Blair) when he said the country was keeping the lean end of this road for itself and handing over the fat end to the Grand Trunk Pacific. It was stated that the government had reserved for itself the road from Winnipeg to Moncton and given the fat road, from Winnipeg west, over the prairie and through the mountains to Port Simpson, to the Grand Trunk Pacific. The moment it was pointed out by the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart) that this road from Winnipeg to Moncton was not likely to be a paying section for some considerable time and was really a burden that was being imposed on this company in consideration of the large concessions we were making to the company we heard no more of that argument about the country reserving to itself the lean section and giving to the company the fat section, nor have we heard anything about that argument since the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) accidentally exposed its fallacy in his speech last year. But they still said that we had made an improvident contract with this company.

An hon. MEMBER. And still say so.

Mr. RUSSELL. They adhere to that still. They say this country has been gold-bricked by these fakirs of the Grand Trunk Company. They say: You have made a contract so improvident, unwise and unprofitable that it is going to make millionaires out of the promoters of the Grand Trunk Pacific; we are going to have a new crop of millionaires. This contract is so advantageous to the company, so entirely one-sided, leaves so little to the people of Canada and gives so much to the Grand Trunk Company that you are going to make millionaires out of the directors, perhaps even out of the stockholders, of the Grand Trunk Company. Well, if it was such a gold-brick for the government as that and such a bonanza for the company, how does it happen that when it was presented to the Grand Trunk shareholders they did not grasp it, and welcome it with open arms? Instead of accepting it as they would have done if it was such a bonanza as hon. gentlemen opposite profess to consider it was for these shrewd people—or rather I might say for these people who are not so very shrewd, and are ready to grab at anything in the nature of an investment and have invested their money on this side of the water, and at the far ends of the earth in all manner of wild-cat schemes—they fought shy of this Grand Trunk Pacific contract. Behold a mystery! Why is it, what is the explanation if the contract were such a contract as these hon. gentlemen have professed to believe it was? Surely this is something that needs to be explained, and surely the real truth is that when they saw it loaded down as it was, and saw how onerous upon the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Grand Trunk Railway the contract was, it was not grabbed at or snatched at; there was no zeal in regard to it at all. On the contrary there was the strongest and the most penetrating criticism of its various provisions. There can be no doubt that, onerous as it was, severe as it was upon the Grand Trunk Pacific and one-sided in favour of this country as its main provisions were, it would nevertheless have been accepted and ratified by the stockholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company if it had not been for the change which took place in the money market after the main lines of the agreement were settled by the promoters of the Grand Trunk Pacific and by the parliament of this country. The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) argued like a lawyer——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes, like a lawyer, he always argues like a lawyer; I would rather that occasionally he would assume the attitude of a statesman in this House. The hon. gentleman argued that it could not have been the change in the financial conditions of the world that affected the conduct of the Grand Trunk Railway Company in England, because there was no change whatever, or no substantial change from the time this contract was finally passed at the end of last session to the time when it was submitted to the shareholders of the Grand Trunk for ratification. But he read a statement made by Sir Rivers-Wilson to the effect that there had been a very serious change in the financial conditions of the world between the time that this contract was first placed before the parliament of Canada and the time when it came to be acted upon by the stockholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. What is the real truth? Do not let us quibble about things like this. Possibly it may be entirely true that between the time that this House was prorogued last year and the time that the contract went for ratification before the stockholders of the Grand Trunk there was no considerable change in the financial condition of the world, but what Sir Rivers-Wilson meant and what is the real truth, is, that between the time when the main features of the contract were settled early in the season and the time that it came up for ratification before the stockholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company there was a very serious change in the financial conditions of the world, a very great change in the conditions of the money market, and I say that there is no doubt whatever that that is the cause and the sole cause why this contract was not ratified. Onerous as it was in many respects and unfair as it was said to be to the stockholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company and of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company it nevertheless would have been ratified but for the change that had taken place in the money market of the world.

Mr. CLANCY. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) if that was the single reason for rejecting the original contract?

Mr. RUSSELL. I am sure that was the principal reason. I have no doubt whatever it was the principal reason for any change being made in the contract. In consequence of these conditions and in consequence of that change in the condition of affairs there have been modifications presented to this House for its ratification here to-day. One of these modifications goes to a question which I might as well refer to just now as at any other time, in respect to the compulsion originally laid upon the Grand Trunk Railway Company to retain the $25,000,000 of stock which it was to have under the terms of the original contract. I must confess that the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) was entirely successful in destroying the very strong and powerful argument which was made by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) in respect to that feature of the contract as originally introduced. He was entirely successful, I judge and agree, in destroying the effect of the argument which had been made by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance in respect to the stock which was to be held by the Grand Trunk Railway Company. But, let us just go back a stage and ask ourselves to what point it was that the argument was addressed. That argument, absolutely conclusive and convincing as it was, and entirely apposite to the terms of the contract as they then stood, was an argument addressed by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, to meet an absolutely fallacious and unfounded contention that was made from the other side of the House. Let me explain. What is the significance of the question in regard to the stock to be held by the company? As far as the public are concerned, as far as the people of this country have any interest in the matter at all, it is wholly connected with the question of the possible over-capitalization of the company and the effect which the possible over-capitalization of the company may be considered to have upon the rates which are charged on traffic carried over the road. Now, the importance of that question depends upon this further question: What relation is there between freight rates over the road and the capitalization of the company. My hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr.

Wade) has argued very strenuously, and I most entirely agree with him, that they have practically no relation one with the other at all, that the rates which a company can charge for the traffic which it carries are practically independent of its capitalization charges, and I might go so far as to say absolutely independent of the question of capitalization — prudent capitalization, or over-capitalization. In one sense it is just as absurd to speak of a railway charging excessive freight rates over its road because it has been over-capitalized as it is to say that a cabman could double his tariff because he has been swindled by the coachmaker in the furnishing of his cab. Where that analogy fails to be true, why is it? Under certain circumstances a railway company may have an actual or practical monopoly. It may be that the railway company has a monopoly of the traffic in a particular place and that because of that monopoly it can charge what it pleases to the people who are unfortunate enough to be dependent upon it. If it does enjoy a monopoly I do not think that it is going to stop at any charge that it can make upon its customers whether it has or has not over-capitalized its undertaking. I think, if a railway has been prudently capitalized and finds itself in the position of a monopolist where it can charge exactly what it pleases for the traffic that it carries, it will charge exactly as much as if it had been capitalized at two or three times the figures at which it has been capitalized. Railway companies, like all companies, are entities without souls. A railway company is an absolutely soulless corporation and charges the people who are compelled to avail themselves of its services exactly what the traffic will bear, save and except in so far as this factor is modified by the competition which it has to encounter from other carriers. I have quoted the expressions of a high authority in this House before in reference to this matter, and I take the opportunity of quoting them again to-day, because they are so entirely applicable to the question I am discussing. President Hadley, of Yale University, who is professor of political economy at this very moment in Yale, who has been commissioner of labour statistics of the State of Connecticut, and who is a man who has given more philosophic study to this particular subject than almost any other man in the world I know of, commenting upon this very question some twenty years ago, and by recent correspondence I ascertained that his views are practically the same to-day as then, says:

> In so far as stock-watering makes railroads pursue a short sighted policy, it tends to prevent general reductions of charge. It is only in this indirect way that it has very much effect upon rates. Its influence in this matter is very much exaggerated in the popular belief. A railroad, as we shall see when we come to consider the attempts to base rates on cost of service, does not take its fixed charges into account in making its rates.

That is to say it does not take its capitalization into account in making up its rates.

> It tries to arrange matters so that on each class of business it shall make as much money as it can above operating expenses. If it makes a mistake in one place it is so much loss to the stockholders. It is not a thing which it can try to make up at some other place; because, by supposition it would in any event try to make all it could at that other place, and to raise rates there would do more harm than good. To make the most at all points put together, it tries to make the most at each point.

No matter whether its capitalization has been normal, or whether it has been abnormal and excessive.

> They thus try to get all they can above operating expenses. If their fixed charges are but small, it leaves them a good profit. If the nominal amount of stock is small they can pay a good percentage in dividends. If the fixed charges are large, or the stock watered, the profit or the percentage will not seem so good. But if they attempt to raise their charges (or refuse to reduce them) on this account, the general effect would be to lower profits rather than increase them. The only thing is, that if a company is trying to pay a dividend which it has not really earned, it is more likely to pursue a short-sighted policy in regard to rates.

That is in the text, and then in the foot note he adds this, which is very important indeed and very significant.

> The railroads which have large capitalization on the whole do business at lower rates than the cheaply built ones. During the last twenty years, while rates have been falling so rapidly, the average capital account of railroads per mile has been increasing. The railroad men often try to make their capital correspond to their profits——

I suppose he means that when they have large profits, they very often try to water their stock.

> —but they do not try to make their rates correspond to their capital.

Now, Sir, that would be the condition of things in respect to this matter of over capitalization, and in respect to this question of stock, even if there had been no special legislation in this country applicable to this subject, even if it were dependent upon the unaided and uncontrolled laws of commerce, railroad operation. But we have legislation and laws of railroad finance, and laws of on this matter which controls the natural condition of things; we have made this company absolutely dependent upon this legislature for the rates it can charge. The section of the Act has been read so often that it would be wearisome to read it again. The Minister of the Interior read it the other night, and nobody on the other side of the House has made any answer to his contention on that point, and no answer can be made because it is an absolutely unanswerable contention.

The hon. leader of the opposition, and the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) and the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Northrup), have referred to the remarks made by the directors of the Grand Trunk Company at the meeting of their shareholders, and they have presented these remarks as if they were a fair means of coming at the facts and the truth, and the right of this question as between the government of this country and the opposition in this House of Commons. I submit to this House that that is a manifestly unfair proceeding. The directors of the company had their case to make out; they had their stockholders to persuade; they found it necessary to use whatever kind of legitimate argument would carry their case; their argument was a one sided argument; they presented this contract to their constituents in the most plausible light in favour of the company; they disguised every feature so far as they reasonably and plausibly could of that contract from their stockholders which told against them, and they undoubtedly gave this contract such a reading as would make it out to be as severe a contract as it possibly could be made to appear as against the people of Canada, and as favourable a contract as they could possibly make it appear to be, for the stockholders of the Grand Trunk Company. I say, that it is a manifestly unfair thing to take the statements of these directors, and hold them up to the people of this country as a fair and unbiased representation of the true condition of things, by which the people of this country should govern themselves in passing judgment. But if it be fair to consider the matter in the light presented by the directors of the company, it is equally fair for us to take the statement of some of the dissatisfied shareholders in reference to this matter. One of these criticisms I shall present to the House. It was partially read by the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Wade), but it will bear repetition.

In the statement submitted on July 24, Mr. Hays estimated that the amount to be guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Company to complete the western division would be £3,400,000, to which had to be added $25,000,000 for rolling stock, or £5,000,000, and a deposit with the Canadian government of $5,000,000, or £1,000,000, making a minimum total of £9,400,000. This sum would, he continued, have to be raised before the line could be opened, on a second mortgage of the western division. It could only be raised on a Grand Trunk guarantee on a high rate of interest. But even at 4 per cent the annual interest would be £376,000. He had not added anything for the very large expenses of carrying out the conditions of clause 45 of the agreement as to providing, by purchase, charter or otherwise, shipping connections upon both the Atlantic and Pacific oceans sufficient in tonnage for all purposes of the line. The line would be held by a most uncertain tenure, a lease for fifty years, without a proviso for reentry in case of breach as to part and subject to a heavy mortgage with a right of foreclosure on the remainder. What was almost worse than anything else, the line, which was to be built to a standard not inferior to the main line of the Grand Trunk, was to take all the traffic over the line entirely through Canadian territory to Halifax, leaving the Grand Trunk section to Portland, with its expensive lifts and miles of sidings, out in the cold. Added to this was the right of the government to allow running powers over the line to any company it pleased, to fix rate, and the fact to do practically what it liked.

This was the view taken by Mr. Allen, one of the shareholders, a very competent and astute lawyer, and the son of one of the directors of the company; this was the view he took of the obligations that were being placed upon the company. The hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Osler) told us—

Mr. CLANCY. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) permit me?

Mr. RUSSELL. Certainly.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) knows that the president of the Grand Trunk Railway and all the others declared that Mr. Allen had based his criticism entirely on the old contract and not on the new one.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am entirely aware of that, and I had partially referred to it before the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) opened his mouth.

Sir Rivers-Wilson or Mr. Hays pointed out that Mr. Allen had based his criticisms upon the contract of last year, without having reference to the modifications. I was proceeding to say, when I was interrupted, that the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Osler) told us that Sir Rivers-Wilson had pointed out that Mr. Allen's criticisms were based upon the original contract, and not upon the contract in its modified form. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Osler), in the exuberance of his feelings, and in the excitement of the moment, when he was speaking, offered to give us the draft of the shorthand notes of this meeting which he had in his possession. I was very anxious indeed to have a copy, but I have not yet succeeded in getting a copy, and so I do not know all that took place at that meeting except what I find in the 'London Times' and the 'Economist.' In the 'London Times' I do find a reference to the circumstance that Sir Rivers-Wilson called attention to the fact that the figures which had been given by Mr. Allen had been changed in the modified contract, but Sir Rivers-Wilson did not say—and if he did he would not have spoken the truth—that there was any change whatever made in that modified contract, in respect to these larger and more serious and exacting provisions of that contract, as Mr. Allen presented them to the meeting of the shareholders. I would be very much surprised indeed to learn that Sir Rivers-Wilson or Mr. Hays was able to give any answer at all to the criticism made by Mr. Allen, with reference to these very exacting conditions which have been imposed upon this company in respect to the operation of the eastern section; the providing of proper shipping facilities for carrying the goods to Canadian ports ; the regulation of the rates by the government ; the running powers that are to be given to other companies, and all the other onerous conditions which Mr. Allen refers to in this memorandum which I have just read.

Mr. Hays could not possibly have said anything in regard to these onerous conditions being modified, because they have not been modified. They are there in their integrity and entirety, just as they were in the contract which Mr. Allen was criticising before its terms were modified. It would have been a very fine thing, no doubt, if Mr. Hays had been enabled to say to the stockholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company : That is all moonshine ; there is nothing in it. The eastern section is not going to be built, and all that talk about Halifax and St. John is pure rubbish. Just listen to what the speakers of the opposition in the House of Commons say, and you will see that there is nothing in it. Pin your faith to them, stockholders ; do not be in the least alarmed by these onerous conditions about which Mr. Allen seeks to terrify you, because they are purely mythical and are only put in for effect, to gull the electorate of Canada and to hoodwink the people of that silly country. How delighted Mr. Hays would have been if he had been able to present anything of that sort to that meeting of stockholders. But he presented nothing of the kind, nothing of the kind has been read here to-day, and nothing of the kind, I undertake to say, will be read here ; because if anything of the kind had been in existence, our hon. friends on the other side of the House would have enjoyed only too much the luxury of reading it to the House amid such a pounding of desks and uplifting of hearts and exaltation of feelings as we did not see even during the triumphant acclaims that accompanied the speech of the hon. leader of the opposition.

Mr. SPROULE. Might I ask the hon. member one question ? If the Grand Trunk Pacific Company is responsible for putting on these steamship lines, would he be good enough to point where that is provided for, and what the penalty is if it does not choose to do so ?

Mr. RUSSELL. My hon. friend is trying to take me three or four miles away from the question I am discussing.

Mr. SPROULE. You are dealing with that part of the contract.

Mr. RUSSELL. The next point that has been alluded to in connection with this contract is the provision with reference to branch lines. The hon. member for East Hastings referred to it, and the hon. leader of the opposition also referred to it. Both of them, I suppose, have had the good fortune to read the articles of Mr. Willison in the Toronto 'News.' I have a very high admiration indeed for the editor of the Toronto 'News,' and a very considerable confidence in his ability as a journalist ; but when it comes to a question of the interpretation of a railroad contract and the operation of a railroad contract, I really think there are authorities which I would prefer to accept even before the very high authority of that gentleman.

Mr. OSLER. In reference to the hon. gentleman's remark about my promising to give him a copy of the report of the meeting of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, I would like to say that when I came to the House this morning I arranged to have a copy sent to the hon. gentleman and a copy to each of the ministers, and I have just been out of the chamber to see if that had been done.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am exceedingly obliged. I would like my hon. friend to understand that I was not making the slightest complaint or reflection.

Mr. OSLER. I am sorry the report did not reach the hon. gentleman in time for him to read it, because I quite intended that it should.

Mr. RUSSELL. What I would like the hon. gentleman to do, if he can, is to tell me if there are any such remarks as those which I have imagined as made by Mr. Hays contained in that report.

Mr. OSLER. I think the hon. gentleman will find, if he reads the report, that no statements have been made on this side of the House which have not been borne out.

Mr. RUSSELL. This provision, placing upon the government the obligation to take over such branch lines as the company may not be willing to retain, is, of course, to begin with, a provision which will not and cannot by any possibility come into operation inside of fifty years, if I am aright in my reading of the contract ; and the supposition that there could be anything of a detrimental character in regard to these branch lines, which the microscopic inspection of the editor of the Toronto 'News,' has discovered in this contract, pre-supposes two things. It pre-supposes that the Grand Trunk Pacific Company will want to build a lot of unprofitable and unremunerative branches, and it pre-supposes also that the government of the country at the end of fifty years will want to take over the operation of the road. Well, to begin with, it seems to me that both of these suppositions are exceedingly unlikely to be realized. I do not think the Grand Trunk Pacific Company is likely to build unremunerative branch lines. It certainly will not do so if it can help itself. Nor is it likely that the government of the country will be any more anxious to take over the operation of that road at the end of fifty years than it is to-day, unless the conditions of public sentiment are materially different at that time from what they are to-day, and unless democratic institutions work out to far more desirable issues fifty years hence than those to which they seem to be working at the present time. Assuming that fifty years hence there will be people as wise as the ex-Minister of Railways (Hon. Mr. Haggart) and the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler), with the horse sense of the one and the good business common sense of the other, I say it is not at all likely that we shall be any more anxious at that time to operate that road than we are to-day. But suppose that after fifty years' operation of this road by the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, after the sacrifices, the industry and the capacity of that company in making it a paying road, the government should be desirous of taking it over, then, surely, as my hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Wade) very admirably put it, it would be the most unfair thing in the world for the government—when, like the cuckoo, it was about to step into the nest which the other bird had made—to say that this very provision should not exist, and that we should not be obliged to take over whatever branch roads had been built in connection with the main road, and which the company did not want to retain. Surely it would be equally fair to say that if the company had built extensive and lucrative branches which they wished to operate, notwithstanding the taking over of that road by the government, they should be allowed to hold the property they themselves had created.

Now, my hon. friend the leader of the opposition made what seems to me a very fanciful suggestion as to what would happen in connection with this contract. He said, we cannot foreclose that mortgage, we cannot exercise our rights under it for five years from all delays previously provided for by the first contract, which is perfectly true. Well, he proceeded to argue, supposing there should be a series of unprosperous years, during which it did not pay to operate the road, what is there to hinder the company from saying; 'We will let the government take it over and handle it; we will not pay our interest or perform any of the duties devolving upon us under the agreement, but will let the government handle the road throughout this period of depression.' He says that the company will do that and compel the government to actually operate the road in spite of the obligation laid upon the company by the contract. Let me propose this dilemma to my hon. friend. The company either will or will not want to resume the possession of the road when times change and business is looking up and the traffic becomes more promising. If they desire to resume possession of the road in the good times, does anybody with any sense suppose that they will ever allow it to pass into the hands of the government and be operated by the government as receivers and managers, and be subjected to all the drawbacks of government management, resulting in all probability in the road being loaded down with charges and heavy expenditure? Heaven knows what government may be in power in those times to come. Even stranger things have happened than the advent of our hon. friends opposite to office. Does anybody suppose that a commercial corporation like the Grand Trunk Pacific, will allow the government to operate the road during a series of years and then take it back from the government, loaded down with a lot of unwise expenditures, burdened with all the extravagance which always accompanies government work in all countries, and all the heavy costs of law fees and everything of that kind which invariably have to be paid by a road in difficulties? Such a supposition is utterly preposterous. It is inconceivable that any business men could ever be induced to do anything of the kind. The only other assumption is this, that the company would want to abandon the railway altogether and say, as the hon. member for Dorchester told us the Yukon Railway people would say; 'To hell with the road'; throw it into the hands of the government altogether. If we accept that assumption, if that should take place, what would result? That would mean government ownership, and government ownership can have no terrors for my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden). Whatever it may have for the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler), and other hon. gentlemen in the House, it certainly should have no terrors for any hon. member who believes that the government should not only own, but operate all the railways in this country.

Mr. CLANCY. We would not own it.

Mr. RUSSELL. We would have all that government ownership can give. We would have the fixing of the rates and the running and management of the road and everything in the wide world which government ownership could give. What is there about the road that we would not own?

Mr. CLANCY. We would have to return it after the debts of the Grand Trunk Railway were paid.

Mr. RUSSELL. My hon. friend is proceeding on the assumption that the Grand Trunk Railway would desire to resume possession of the road. But I have dealt with that and have pointed out that in such a case they would never, under any circumstances, consent to part with it. And I am now arguing on the assumption that the company would desire to abandon the road.

There was another suggestion made, which provoked considerable cheering on the other side. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition said: if the government are going to build and own this eastern section from Winnipeg to Moncton, why not build, own and operate the section from Winnipeg west to the Pacific ocean, why not build, own and operate the whole thing? Well, Mr. Speaker, that would absolutely destroy the whole scheme, under which we expect to secure the operation of the eastern end of this road by the Grand Trunk Pacific in consideration for the benefits we are giving them. If the government were to own the whole road and the Grand Trunk Pacific were not in it at all what would become of the covenant of the Grand Trunk Pacific to continuously and effectively operate the road from Winnipeg to Moncton, which enures to the benefit of Halifax and St. John and the maritime provinces and the whole Dominion in general? The question of government ownership out and out is one which I do not now propose to discuss, as a few months ago I said all that I could possibly be expected to say on that question. That is a question no doubt of the highest importance, but I do not propose to discuss it over again. All I wish to do in that connection, is to refer simply to some observations that have been made on the subject of government ownership in reply to the considerations which I presented to this House a few months ago on that subject. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition said it was too late to raise now any question about government ownership, because we have already a government owned road and have consequently adopted the principle. True, Sir, we have the Intercolonial, which is owned and operated by the government. But the Intercolonial Railway is a political road pure and simple. It is a matter of history that it was built as a political and national necessity, in fulfilment of a political compact and for the furtherance of political purposes. But the question is, do hon. gentlemen opposite want that experiment repeated? Does the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart), want that experiment repeated and worked out on a larger scale? Does my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Osler) want it worked out to a still larger extent? Does the ex-member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) want that experiment again undertaken? We have kept that road because it was one of the conditions of confederation, because it was a political term in the union of the provinces, and in order to make that road pay, we tried the experiment, which has been so far very successful and promising, of endeavouring to equalize expenditure with receipts by extending it to Montreal. And if it be necessary to still further extend it to Georgian Bay, perhaps the country would be willing to continue the experiment in that direction. But when you are talking not merely with reference to the Intercolonial, but of extending the principle of government ownership and operation practically to all the railways of this country, that is a proposition upon which it would be well to pause before coming to a conclusion.

That is a policy, certainly, to which the hon. leader of the opposition was not prepared to commit himself twelve months ago, or even at the time the railway contract was brought down last year, which I think, was on the 18th of last August. On that occasion the hon. gentleman was careful to say that he did not declare himself absolutely in favour of government ownership of railways, although he darkly said, 'I know there is a strong sentiment in this country in favour of that idea.' I do think these words are significant. There is a considerable, misty, unformed popular sentiment in this country in favour of the government ownership of railways; that I believe. But, having that condition of public sentiment in mind, one would have thought that the hon. gentleman would sit down and soberly and seriously consider the question, using such help as he could gain from the authority of wise men who had spoken on the subject, and would come to a conclusion, if he could, upon this question of such vast importance to the people. But I am afraid that, instead of that, instead of sailing—

> By stars the elder seamen knew, —instead of considering what had been the policy of both parties in this country, instead of considering the opinion of great men who have had this country's affairs in charge, instead of carefully reading what even his own predecessors in the leadership of his party, such men as Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Charles Tupper had said, he put his ear to the ground to hear if he could, some murmur of opinion from various parts of the country out of which political capital could be made and political influence acquired. I am afraid that this was the source from which he got his direction and not from those permanent lights in the firmament that remain for all times for the guidance of wise mariners upon this political sea. There was a man once before who gained his political ideas by keeping his ear to the ground. There was a misty, wild, half-formed belief in the country to the south of us in favour of free silver. And there was a man, W. J. Bryan, who put his ear to the ground to learn what he could of the opinions of the people on that subject. He embraced these doctrines, these financial heresies. He became a demagogue, and preached these doctrines all over the country. Sober-minded statesmen, like Grover Cleveland and the late William E. Russell contested his position and destroyed the doctrine of free silver in the United States, probably for ever. Which of these two types of statesmen are we to hold in admiration? There is a right way and a wrong way to meet these questions of popular opinion when they emerge. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition well knows the dangers of the civium ardor prava jubentium. He knows that there is a right and a wrong way in which to meet these clamors. He knows that there is the statesman's way and there is the demagogue's way. He knows that the statesman's way was Mr. Cleveland's and the demagogue's way was Mr. Bryan's. And he knows what was the fate of these two men. I do not wish to make too close an application, for the analogy would be unfair, it would be unjust to the hon. gentleman. But it is not unfair that I should point to the facts. The contract was introduced on the 18th of August last. Three weeks afterwards the hon. gentleman propounded his views. He had had no opportunity to consider the question in all its bearings, and yet he gave his encouragement to the wild theory of government ownership and operation of the railways all over this country. Surely, that was the politician's way of meeting the question. The statesman's way was the way in which the question was met by the hon. Minister of the Interior on the floor of this House the other day.

All that can be said in reference to this matter—all that I desire to say at least—has been said by other speakers. I have occupied longer time than I intended, perhaps longer than I should. I have but an observation or two to make in closing. I say as my hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Wade) and the Minister of the Interior have already said—we are ready for this issue. We are certainly ready for it in the province of Nova Scotia. My hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) referred to the retirement of a member of this House who sat on this side and who now has taken an elevated position in the administration of justice in the province of Nova Scotia. We have lost him from this arena, but I am happy to say we have in his place—and elected by a larger majority—a gentleman who is certain to take a strong position in this House before many months are past. The province of New Brunswick, I believe, is equally ready for this issue.

An hon. MEMBER. Sure pop.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am surprised that some hon. members do not make reference to the city of St. John. I was in hopes that some would do so. The hon. member for the city of St. John (Mr. Daniel) has told us that the Grand Trunk Pacific issue was the great issue in determining the result of the appeal to the people in that city. I do not wish to say that the hon. gentleman is the enfant terrible of the other side of the House, but he certainly did give away a fact which it would have been better for his part to have kept as one of the party secrets, if such a thing were possible. But it had already become a matter of notoriety. That fact is that the people of St. John were in such a panic in reference to the position of their city in relation to this project; they were so terrified by the sectional and selfish appeals made to them as citizens, so terrified lest some of the advantages they now enjoy exclusively might be enjoyed by other cities in the maritime provinces, that they thought it better to return the hon. gentleman as their representative in this House. But, Mr. Speaker, they will recover from their panic; they will realize that they are not going to suffer through this measure. They will understand that we do not propose, by the operation of this measure to take anything away from them, that not only will they be left in the enjoyment of their present advantages through the Canadian Pacific Railway, but we shall double their advantages by giving them connection with another railway. They will see that what we desire to do is to give other cities in the maritime provinces the same advantages and opportunities for extension, and the same effective railway connections, that the city of St. John now enjoys. They will come to their reason and will fall in line with all the rest of the province of New Brunswick in support of this great measure. The same sectional appeals, I believe, were made to the city of Montreal, but they were rejected by that great city. And these same sectional appeals which were made with such entire absence of effect to the people of Montreal, if tried again in the case of the citizens of St. John will be met as they were met by Montreal. The people of Ontario are surely ready to support this measure. With the network of railroads they have in that great province of Ontario, with the enormous railway facilities they enjoy in every part of the province of Ontario I know they are not going to deny to the people of the maritime provinces the boon which the construction of this railway will accord to them. Therefore I say from the west and from the east, from Nova Scotia, from New Brunswick, from Quebec, from Ontario and from the provinces and territories of the west we shall have recorded, whenever the time comes for testing public opinion, the strongest expression of approval that has ever been given to any great measure that has been brought forward in this country.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Mr. Speaker, the closing remarks of the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Russell) reminded me of what I once read in the good book. When he endeavoured to indulge in prophecy I thought of the words that there would come a time in the history of the world when many false prophets would be present. I have no doubt that my hon. friend (Mr. Russell) fulfilled that statement to the letter in making the prophecy which he did in his closing remarks. The hon. member was good enough, at the outset, to tell us that there were times in the lives of members when it was desirable to rise to the dignity of statesmen, and to abandon the attitude of the pleading lawyer. He applied that to the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) and expressed regret that that gentleman had not, for once in his life, risen to the dignity of a statesman, and then the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Russell) drew himself up with an air of no doubt honest pride and ambition, inflated his lungs and gave us for the next hour and a half what he was pleased to call an example of the dignity of a statesman. I am content to leave it to this House and the country to make a comparison between the two gentlemen and draw their own conclusions. Dealing with the meeting of shareholders of the Grand Trunk in the old country, he said, with reference to a statement that was made by the president, Sir Rivers-Wilson : Would it be supposed for a moment that any company would be held down by what an insignificant member of their corporation said ? Is that the position which he assigns to the president of that great company, Sir Rivers-Wilson, 'an insignificant member of a corporation,' it seems to me that Sir Rivers-Wilson did not prove himself to be a very insignificant member when he was brought in contact with the friends of the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Russell) in the negotiations which he carried on so successfully during the eighteen months he said he was dealing with them. He went on to make some comparison about the opposition regarding their position as spurious but not to be given up without a fight. I may tell him that if I can judge public opinion, far from being spurious that position has taken a strong hold on the public sentiment of this country, neither to the advantage nor to the credit of hon. gentlemen opposite. I need not refer to the elections we have had recently which are unmistakeable evidence of the sentiments of the great province of Ontario. The hon. member for Hants (Mr. Russell) closing remarks were that last year he had spoken at great length on this subject and that he never expected to occupy that position in this House again. He intimated then that he was giving us his valedictory address. I have no doubt he performed his part of the contract all right but unfortunately his friends did not deliver the goods and the Chief Justiceship of the Supreme Court is awaiting him for the future. Now he has given us another valedictory.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am afraid my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) is drawing entirely on his imagination for his facts.

An hon. MEMBER. Take your medicine.

Mr. RUSSELL. Medicine is very good sometimes. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) is drawing entirely on his imagination for his facts. I made no such observations at any time.

Mr. SPROULE. I certainly drew that inference from the address of the hon. gentleman that it would be the last one he would ever give on that subject, but he is here again and was again obliged to come to the defence of the government. When he said : Those of us who will be so fortunate as to come back, he certainly intimated that he did not expect to return to this House again.

Mr. RUSSELL. I made no such observation. It is not at all right for a Christian gentleman to be making such statements altogether out of his own fancy, and presenting them to the House as facts. I made no such remark as the hon. gentleman attributes to me.

Mr. SPROULE. I am afraid I have touched a ticklish subject.

Mr. RUSSELL. Not at all.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) also said that the ponderous member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) dealt with the subject, and that although Mr. Fraser did not come back, Guysborough sent back a man with a larger majority. Did the hon. member intend to convey the idea that the hon. the ex-member for Guysborough had been more fortunate than himself when he gave his valedictory address last year, but that his own preferment was only postponed for a short time, and that after a little while he would realize the reward to which he was looking forward so anxiously last year ? He said that the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) talked very much like a lawyer, but that he would advise him to rise to the occasion and talk like a statesman. I have sometimes heard lawyers doing special pleading, pleading as lawyers, not as statesmen. I thought in listening to the hon. gentleman when he spoke that if I ever heard a case of special pleading it was from the hon. member for Hants. There seemed to be a total absence of the statesman in the argument or of any effort on his part to rise to the occasion and to speak as a statesman : it was special pleading from first to last. He went on to tell us, and he read from an authority to substantiate the statement, that the higher the capitalization of a road, the cheaper it could carry freight. When I ask him, if that be the case, why the government insisted on reducing the capital of this road from $75,000,000 to $45,000,000. Why did they do that ? If it would enable the company to carry freight cheaper, why did they not leave the capitalization at $75,000,000 ? Did he rise to the dignity of a statesman or was he arguing rather as a lawyer doing some special pleading.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. He was not arguing as a lawyer.

Mr. SPROULE. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) says he was not arguing as a lawyer. I know that he was not arguing as a common-sense man. Did I correctly understand the hon. gentleman to say that the obligation rested upon the company of taking all the traffic over the line to a Canadian ocean port ?

Mr. RUSSELL. I have lost track of the hon. gentleman's remarks. He has been saying so much that I could not follow him.

Mr. SPROULE. What does the hon. gentleman say ?

Mr. RUSSELL. The hon. gentleman has been making so many statements that I have entirely lost the trend of his remarks.

Mr. SPROULE. I am asking the hon. gentleman whether I am correct in stating that the hon. gentleman argued that an obligation compelled the company to take all the traffic they were enabled to secure to an ocean port on Canadian soil ?

Mr. RUSSELL. I merely stated what the contract said. I read the contract, and the hon. gentleman knows what the contract states. Surely he does not require any information upon that subject.

Mr. SPROULE. Am I right in contending that the hon. gentleman said that the contract contained that provision ?

Mr. RUSSELL. No.

Mr. SPROULE. It does not ?

Mr. RUSSELL. No.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the hon. gentleman argued upon that line, contending that there was an obligation compelling the company to take the traffic to a Canadian port and that therefore the maritime provinces would benefit by the policy of the government in contra-distinction to that of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition which would bring the trade to North Bay and prevent it from reaching the maritime provinces. That was the argument, and he endeavoured to convey the idea to the people of the maritime provinces that they would gain great and substantial advantages from this contract in comparison with what they would obtain by the adoption of the policy of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. His argument was that the trade would go through the maritime provinces to an ocean port, and that St. John, Halifax and Moncton would receive the benefit, whereas, if the policy laid down by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition were adopted, the trade would go by way of Portland. Now, I referred to another item of the contract, and I asked the hon. gentleman for an explanation, which he did not deign to give. Perhaps he regarded the question as insignificant. That was for himself to judge. He contended that Mr. Allen's argument in reference to the provision regarding steamships applied to the old contract, but that in reality the subjects to which Mr. Allen directed his attention were not changed by the new contract, and that one of the conditions of the contract was that which compelled the company to provide steamships to carry the produce out of the country. I asked the hon. gentleman if there was any binding obligation upon the company to provide these steamships. If there was a binding obligation on the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, I asked the hon. gentleman what penalty was to be imposed in the event of their neglecting or refusing to carry it out. The hon. gentleman did not deign to reply. That was a part of the contract that Mr. Allen was directing his attention to. I have read the contract over and over again, and I still think there is nothing binding on the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company to provide steamships.

Mr. RUSSELL. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that he take a copy of a speech which was made last year home with him and read it. There are ten pages which he can profitably read, and in which he can find that matter elaborately discussed.

Mr. WILSON. By whom ?

Mr. RUSSELL. My modesty prevents me from saying.

Mr. SPROULE. If such an obligation is contained in the contract, there are no penalties to enforce it, and a contract without penalties is no good. Where are the penalties ? The hon. gentleman, as a prominent lawyer, ought to be able to point out where the penalties are. I have not yet been able to find out where they are in the contract, and I have not heard a word either from Mr. Hays or Sir Rivers-Wilson regarding that obligation. It was incumbent upon them to explain that obligation when they gave to their shareholders a statement of the obligations which they were called upon to fulfil. I am therefore justified in assuming that there is no binding obligation resting upon them. In his closing remarks, the hon. gentleman said : We are ready for this issue. Yes, when he is leaving, of course, he is ready for the issue. But why did the government not submit this issue to the country before the die was cast ? They dared not do it. They were afraid to do it ; but when the country is bound hand and foot they may submit the question, after it is too late for the electorate to express their opinion, to tell the government what the public sentiment is regarding this important question.

Mr. Speaker, I was very much amused at and interested in the difference of tone and manner which characterized the introductory speech delivered by the right hon. Prime Minister last year and that which characterized his speech of this year. In his introductory speech of last year there was a tone of confidence, a volume that bespoke his opinion that this enterprise would be a great success; there was assurance, flowery eloquence and an air of statesmanship. Everything was going to turn out just as he predicted. We were told that it was one of the ablest speeches that had ever been delivered in this chamber, that it would inspire confidence, not only in his followers in this House, but in the country and amongst the electorate generally. Every thing was then rosy; everything was going to turn out all right. He went on to tell us what an admirable bargain they had made and how small the cost was which was going to be incurred to carry out this gigantic undertaking—$12,000,000 or $13,000,000, not as much as one year's surplus under this government. He went on to say that the opposition would be agreeably surprised that the government were able to accomplish so much with such a small outlay, that they were able to make such an admirable bargain, one so valuable for the country and one so creditable to business men. He said the opposition would be surprised, as no doubt they were. He drew himself up with an air of importance, as if the commonwealth owed him a pension, and he told the country what an admirable thing they had done. But in his speech this year he displayed a great deal of modesty and diffidence, but he went on to say that the opposition would be surprised that the amendments were so few and insignificant. In fact, he said, he had no doubt that they wished they had been very much greater than they were. He declared that the country would be surprised at the insignificance of these amendments, and that, in any event, notwithstanding the amendments, it was going to turn out a grand success as he told us last year it would. But he was very much quieter. He did not display the same confidence in his scheme this year as last. His speech was not characterized by the same bravado as that of last year. It reminded me of a story I once heard of a Scotchman. A Scotchman, of whom it was said that he sometimes travelled by devious paths, was found by his spiritual adviser reclining in a ditch with his head on his hand. The minister said: 'What is wrong with you Saundy? Where have you been, man?' 'Och, meenister, I'm no sure whether it was a weddin' or a funeral that I was attendin', but I'm sure it was a grand success.' When the right hon. gentleman made his last speech I thought that he felt like the poor Scotchman; he did not know whether it was a wedding or his political funeral, but it was to be a grand success. I am afraid it will be the latter.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend will be rejoiced if it be the latter.

Mr. SPROULE. I have no doubt. Now, we have before us to-day the second edition of the government's policy and contract. It is an undisputed fact that whatever changes have been made in the contract, are in the direction of making it worse for the country, and more beneficial for the Grand Trunk Company. The hon. member for Hants (Mr. Russell) was candid enough to admit that every change made was for the benefit of the Grand Trunk Company. The thought has occurred to me that the government have been giving away everything, without getting anything in return. Last session hon. gentlemen of this side of the House pointed out the defects that existed in the then contract, but the government declared then that it was impossible to re-open it or change its provisions. Since then, however, they have opened up the contract anew, to give further concessions to the railway company, and let me ask: why were there no amendments made in the contract for the benefit of the people of Canada.

Last session the Prime Minister assigned as a justification for this huge undertaking, in the first place, the urgent and immediate necessity of a road to carry out the products of the fast growing number of settlers in the west. He told us that the western grain would be carried by rail on this road instead as at present, partly by water and partly by rail. We know how he declared, that we could not wait, that we could not say, to-morrow, and to-morrow, and to-morrow, that the necessity for the railway was urgent, and we remember the right hon. gentleman's pathetic exclamation. Heaven grant, that it is not too late now. We know that this measure was sprung upon the House suddenly, and yet the president of the Grand Trunk tells us, that they had been hatching this egg for eighteen months and now we find that it turned out an addled egg after all. Under the old contract, the company had eight years to build this road, but under the new contract, the time has been extended to eleven. What about the Prime Minister's fears, that it would be too late? If last year there was urgent need of the immediate construction of the road, why has the government extended the time for three years longer? We remember that last year the Prime Minister told us, that this railway was absolutely necessary to carry out the grain from the west, and the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) backed up that statement by his eloquence and logic, and he declared that the road would be so constructed as to grades, that grain could be carried as cheap or cheaper than by the present route. But here is what the

It is provided that the western division from Winnipeg to the Pacific coast shall be completed within eight years. No special time is provided for the completion of the eastern division, but the work of construction on both divisions will, of course, be prosecuted with good judgment hastening or retarding its progress as financial conditions, price of material, labour conditions, and so forth, may make it desirable.

The president of the Grand Trunk declares that they will build this road gradually and slowly, just as they find the conditions favourable or unfavourable. Is that in conformity with the declaration of the Prime Minister that it was necessary to complete this gigantic contract immediately in the interest of the people of the west. Sir Rivers-Wilson dispels that delusion, and he verifies what we have all along believed, that there is no binding contract to build that road in the near future. Sir Rivers-Wilson says :

I may here remark that the Act, in virtue of which the government construct the road as far west as Winnipeg, relieves the Grand Trunk Pacific Company from the necessity originally contemplated of building that portion of the line from North Bay to Winnipeg.

Here we have a declaration from the president of the Grand Trunk that his company had been contemplating this project for eighteen months previous and they would build the road from Winnipeg to North Bay, even if the government did not spend a dollar to aid them. There is therefore no justification for this government undertaking to expend what will in the end amount to $150,000,000 of the money of the people to provide a railroad, most of which would have been provided without the expenditure of a dollar on the part of the government. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has told us that this road would be so constructed, that they could haul from 40 to 60 cars with one engine, and that grain would be carried as cheaply as by the waterways. But the other night, the Minister of the Interior flatly contradicted that statement, for he said (p. 854, Hansard') :

What I say is, that when the wheat goes to Port Arthur and Fort William it does not make any difference what the Grand Trunk Railway will or will not do. In the summer time the wheat will go out by water to Montreal or Quebec, or by the Erie canal to New York, so that the question of what the contract with the Grand Trunk is, in respect of summer traffic in wheat, is absolutely immaterial ; it has nothing to do with what will happen to the traffic.

Now, what was the whole contention last session ? That we wanted a short route for carrying grain, for the benefit of the farmer of the west. Yet now the Minister of the Interior tells us that the grain will not be carried by that route, except in the winter, when the railway will have a surplus of cars, and when navigation is closed. Three-fourths of the grain to-day goes down by the water route, or part water and part rail ; and three-fourths of it will continue to go by that route in the future, because even with the increased population which we expect in the west, I have no doubt that the same relative proportion of grain will be shipped then as now by water. Therefore there was not the urgent need of this road for the reasons given by the First Minister last year ; and if it were built to-morrow, it would not carry any considerable quantity of grain. Consequently the western farmer who was told that this government was doing so much to enable him to send his grain to market, will understand that that is only a myth, and that the grain will go out in the future in the same way as it has done in the past.

The next urgent reason given for this road was that it was necessary owing to the danger of the American government abrogating the bonding privilege ; and in support of that contention the First Minister quoted the sayings of men who had written and spoken fifteen or sixteen years ago, but he did not give us any recent utterance except a single letter from Carnegie in England about what the Americans could do. But we do not hear a word about that to-day, because there was not any danger then and there is not any danger now.

The right hon. First Minister also said we needed the road for colonization purposes in the great clay belt extending through northern Quebec and northern Ontario. I tell him in reply that we have to-day four or five colonization railways extending northward in his own province of Quebec, which have been subsidized both by us and by the local government as colonization roads ; and we have five or six more in the province of Ontario. As fast as settlement goes on, these railroads are carried northward, and they are sufficient for all the colonization needs of that country. Therefore there was no need of this road for that purpose. Was there any need of it for colonization purposes in the west ? I do not think so, I saw in a paper a few days ago the statement that the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian Northern Railway contemplate building about 1,400 miles of railway in Manitoba, the Northwest Territories and British Columbia, during the next two years. Surely that will be sufficient to supply all the railway requirements of that country, in addition to all the roads being built by the Northern Pacific and other companies. What would it mean ? It would mean, with four families on every square mile, that these railways would accommodate 1,120,000 people. Are more than that number likely to go into that country in the next two years ? I do not think so.

Why, it means that all of these people would be within five miles of a railway. But if we consider the population of the towns and villages that will spring up along the lines of these railways, I am within reasonable bounds when I say that they would accommodate twice the number I have given. Consequently there was no urgent need for this railway in the west for colonization purposes.

The favourable nature of the contract and the insignificant cost to the country were other reasons given as a justification for it. The right hon. First Minister told us that it would cost the country only $13,000,000 or $14,000,000. But able men, who figured it carefully, including the hon. ex-Minister of Railways (Hon. Mr. Blair), declare that it will cost over $139,000,000. I think we are near the mark if we say it will cost $150,000,000, and very likely it will extend to $175,000,000 before the contract is completed. I need not go into the calculation, because it has been gone into over and over again.

Now, what does the burden of this debt mean to Canada? It means more than the combined debts of all the provinces when they came into confederation, put upon the people of Canada at one stroke of what the government are pleased to call statesmanship, but what I am afraid the people outside of the House will characterize by another name. Will that debt ever be repaid? Not within the lifetime of the youngest member of this House or the youngest citizen of this country to-day. It will hang around the neck of the people of Canada like a millstone. Will it ever be paid by the Grand Trunk Company? The Grand Trunk borrowed money from us before to-day. They owe us $58,000,000 on which they have never paid one cent of either principal or interest. Add this to what they have received from the provinces and the municipalities; and it is about $78,000,000, and they have never paid back one cent to this day. Are they likely, then, to pay back this money? From our own experience of the past, I do not think we have a right to expect that they will. They know too much about managing governments and railways ever to pay back a dollar of this debt.

The manager of the Grand Trunk says this is a partnership transaction into which they have forced the government. If it is the country would like to know what the nature of the partnership is. The president in his address said: We have driven the Canadian government into becoming absolute partners with us in the construction of that mountain section; that is, we have joined their interest with ours, and are assured of their hearty co-operation and assent to any reasonable proposition. The interest of the government is such that they cannot back out; so that the company can demand more and more onerous conditions, and the government cannot refuse them.

Are we not justified in coming to that conclusion by the very amendments made? The bargain was not over three months old before the company demanded concessions and the government had to yield. These concessions we are considering now. In the future the company will make still further demands and the government will again have to grant what they ask. The fact is the government have bound themselves hand and foot, and that is why the president of the Grand Trunk Railway speaks of the government as a partner in the scheme. He has got them in such a position that they must support the Grand Trunk Railway even if they have to abandon every other railway in the country. Neither the Canadian Pacific Railway nor the Canadian Northern nor the Trans-Canada nor any other railway company will be of any interest to the government in the future, because the Grand Trunk Railway will have a monopoly of all its support. Whenever the interests of any of these corporations may happen to clash with those of the Grand Trunk Railway, these other companies will have to stand to one side, because the government is bound by its partnership. And what are the conditions of this partnership? The government is to put $150,000,000 into the undertaking while all the Grand Trunk Railway is bound to invest is $15,000,000. And what is to be the division of profits? All the profits are to go to the partner who has put in the $15,000,000, but should there be any loss, it will have to be borne by the country. I want the farmers of Canada and the business men of Canada to know what sort of a bargain has been consummated and to what a one-sided agreement the government has committed itself.

But there is another feature which must not be lost sight of. By this agreement the government is bound body and soul to this corporation. It has always been the conviction of the people that governments have ever been too susceptible to the influence of the great corporations, and to-day that condition of things becomes intensified to an unheard of degree. Whenever the interests of the Grand Trunk Railway will clash, as they are bound to do, with the interests of the farmers, the government will be bound to stand by the partnership they have made with this railway. And what will the people get out of this partnership, supposing the enterprise be successful? They will not get one cent because all the profits must go to the company. As the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) said last night, we shall have a repetition of that well known combination, in which one partner invested the capital and the other the experience, and out of which the man with the capital gained nothing but the experience.

whereas the man with the experience acquired all the capital. We will have this railway company getting all the profits and the country the experience.

It should not be forgotten that the government should stand as the medium between what the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was always pleased to call the grasping corporations and the public. But the government in allying itself to this grasping corporation, has practically given up the people to its tender mercies, because it will be bound by its partnership to consult the interests of the company in preference to those of the general public. The corporation will compel the government to work for it. How can the government be expected to look after the interests of the farmers, the mechanics and the labouring men when all its interests are allied with those of the Grand Trunk Pacific ?

According to this contract, there are 3,400 miles of railway to build, of which the government must build 3,000 and the other partner only 400. We put in $10 for every one the other party invests. We build 3,000 miles of railway and the other partner builds 400 ; but when it comes to sharing the profits the company gets them all. Is not this government, therefore, a government in the interests of this particular corporation ? I do not see how the people can fail to come to any other conclusion. Oh, but we control the rates, says the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton). Well, Mr. Speaker, I have the contract here, and here is what it says with regard to the rates :

The rates and tolls to be levied and taken by the company upon any part of the said railway shall be under the control of the Governor General in Council.

But to what extent ? What position will the Grand Trunk Pacific take should the government want the rates lowered ? They will say : If you compel us to lower the freight rates, we will not be able to pay your interest. If you compel us to lower the rates you must forego the interest. But if you want to enforce our obligation to pay interest, you must allow us to charge such freight rates as will enable us to do so. We all know that under the old law it was provided that the control of freight rates should be in the hands of the Governor General in Council. But did the Governor General in Council ever compel any company to reduce its rates ? Although a company could not legally charge a dollar unless the rates were assented to by the Governor General in Council, that control was practically of no benefit to the people, and that will be the case in this instance. The hon. Minister of Justice argued that it was an effective control of the rates. If so, why was it that when the government wanted to control the rates of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, they were obliged to put in these words :

The local rates and tolls on the railway and on any other railway used in connection therewith and now or hereafter owned or leased by or operated on account of the company south of the company's main line in British Columbia, as well the rates and tolls between any point or any such line or lines of railway and any point on the main line of the company throughout Canada, or by any other railway owned or leased by or operated on account of the company, including its lines of steamers in British Columbia, shall be first approved by the Governor in Council or by a railway commission, if and when such commission is established by law, and shall at all times thereafter and from time to time be subject to revision and control in the manner aforesaid.

That is the provision that was put in the Crow's Nest Pass Act, and that the government declared to be ample and sufficient. It was put there so that they could not evade it. Then, why is not such a provision put in this Act ? This contract does not say anything about local freight rates or about compelling the road to reduce their freight rates. It provides that the government can control the rates, but cannot revise them, as I understand it, or compel the company to lower rates once established. If the government were to attempt to do it, I am satisfied they would be met by the railway company with the plea that if the freight rates were lowered, the interest could not be paid. If the western farmer is deluded by this, he will realize some day that it is only a delusion—that this provision is one of no practical value.

By this Act, the government have welded another link in the chain which binds the millstone of corporation monopoly around their neck. There is a strong sentiment in this country and growing stronger, in favour of government ownership and operation of railways. But we are practically prevented by this contract, from giving effect to that opinion, not only for the next twenty-five or thirty years, but even for the next hundred years—and by that time the question will be but of little interest to people who are living to-day. This millstone is bound round the necks of the people and they must bend their necks to the burden whether they like it or not. In the classic language of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) they will be bled white to carry out the terms of this contract. This lease is given for fifty years, with the option of renewal under certain conditions, and for a hundred years the people will be deprived of the opportunity of free action in this matter. There will be no opportunity for the Intercolonial to be extended to the west. To do so would be to make the people competitors with themselves. We put a railway through there in which the country is a partner, and the Intercolonial cannot be extended along side of it. The people of this country had hoped that the day would come when the Intercolonial would be extended to the west. But the government have put their veto upon that and have made it impossible for that policy to be carried out in the future. I observe, by a return laid before us the other day, that the Intercolonial Railway, last season, carried grain 828 miles for the same money that the Canada Atlantic carried it for 346 miles—that is, the Intercolonial carried grain for less than half the money charged by the Canada Atlantic, or by the Grand Trunk, this company to which we are paying so much money to extend to the west. The Minister of the Interior says he is not discussing the question of the Intercolonial being extended to the west. He says; 'Understand me, I am not discussing here the abstract question of extending the Intercolonial Railway up to the lakes.' It certainly would be a waste of time to discuss it, for this contract which he and his colleagues have made, and which they desire parliament to accept, makes such an extension of the Intercolonial impossible. By the words I have just quoted, the hon. gentleman seeks to make it appear that he is in favour of extending the Intercolonial, but that that is not the question before us. It might be the question before us were it not for this contract which he has made. We were told last year that it was proposed to carry grain from Brandon to Fort William, a distance of about 600 miles, for 12 cents per 100 pounds, or something over 6 cents a bushel. But the Intercolonial is carrying grain more than 800 miles for 5 cents per bushel. If the Intercolonial were extended to the west what a lever it would be to compel the railways to come down to moderate freight rates. But it may be said that the Intercolonial carried this grain at a loss. On the contrary, the very report I refer to says that, having regard to the return cargoes, it was carried at a slight profit. If the Intercolonial can carry grain at a slight profit 800 miles for more than a cent a bushel less than other roads can carry it for 600 miles, surely it should be advantageous to have the Intercolonial extended to the west. But, as I have said, that extension is prevented for all time by the policy that the government is pressing upon the House.

Now, we are told that the amendments that have been made to the contract are all insignificant. Let us look at that statement for a moment. We were told last year that the contract was surrounded with safeguards of all kinds—a large deposit of money to be held; the power to take over the road if default occurred in the payment of interest; the power to seize the rolling stock; the $25,000,000 of common stock which the Grand Trunk Railway was to take and to hold;—all these were dwelt upon and extolled as safeguards to this contract. But every one of these is done away with—every safeguard is abandoned. The government cannot seize the road; they can only take it over and run it for the benefit of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. The deposit that is to be put up is to be given back in a little while, making this provision practically of no value.

Then we were going to have rolling stock on the road costing $20,000,000 of which $5,000,000 would be set aside as a guarantee that the eastern division of the road would be run permanently and continuously. What about that to-day? There is a dispute as to whether the mortgage would cover that or not. The government say it will cover it. If they had no doubt about that, why did they submit it to those two eminent lawyers in Toronto? These lawyers said that perhaps it would but they were not sure. The government either wanted to give these two lawyers a fee or they were not very sure of their position, but I believe that it will turn out that the mortgagee will not hold that rolling stock, but that the first claim will be that of the parties furnishing the stock and the earnings of the road will be taken to pay them. I believe that will be the position in the future, and that the government will wake up to find this to be the case notwithstanding the eminent opinion which they have obtained.

The time for building the western division from Winnipeg to the Pacific coast, is extended three years. But last year everything was in a hurry; it must be done immediately; we could not wait a day or an hour or a minute. If we did not take time at the flood tide it would not lead us on to fortune. The hon. gentleman took it at the flood, but it led on to misfortune and his contract has fallen through. Why the great urgency? They were going to put surveyors on the road at once, the work being under the superintendence of the Grand Trunk Railway. Nine months have elapsed but the other day they told us there was not a surveyor in the field. We find that the Grand Trunk Railway have put some surveyors on the road but the government have made no move whatever. They have done practically nothing but come back to parliament to amend the contract and remove the safe-guards which were the virtue of the contract last year. The construction of the eastern section may now be postponed indefinitely. The president of the road says: We will build it according to the condition of the money and labour markets. We will build fast or slow according as we find the conditions favourable or unfavourable. That is not what the government said last year and the government seems to have no power to prevent delay while there is no provision whatever that the eastern division will be built at any time one year hence or one hundred years hence, and many people believe it will never be built. It is true that the government will build the portion from Winnipeg to North Bay because the Grand Trunk Railway want that section, but the eastern part of the section, according to the president of the Grand Trunk Railway will be something for the future. He says it will be a little premature to discuss that, because it will not be built now.

The government have no power to foreclose the mortgage although that was the great safe-guard last year. The money which has been deposited is to be given up after a while and all that the Grand Trunk puts up is credit for $15,000,000 of money. For this they get all of these concessions and these important considerations.

Pending the completion of the eastern division the company may lease from the commissioners any portions of the road that are built. That is to enable the Grand Trunk to rent the portion of the road from North Bay to Winnipeg, and then they do not care about the building of the balance of the eastern section. They want this amendment because the old contract did not give them that advantage. Now they have it and have everything they want. As soon as that section from Winnipeg to North Bay is built with the people's money the Grand Trunk Pacific can lease it and can carry trade to the Grand Trunk who will take it over their old system to Portland or anywhere else they like. That is the interpretation I place on the amended contract.

The amount of money to be guaranteed by the government for the building of the mountain section is increased. Under the old contract it was to be three-quarters of $30,000 per mile. Now it is to be three-quarters of the whole expenditure, whether it be $60,000 or $80,000 or $100,000 per mile. Therefore they have increased the government's guarantee and put another obligation upon the country that will probably mean ten or twelve millions more. There is no doubt whatever that if the government take over the eastern division after the expiration of fifty years they must take over the branches that the Grand Trunk do not want. And how must they take them over? It is true that the government, in estimating the value of these branches can deduct the subsidy that has been given by the Dominion of Canada, but not the subsidies that are given by the provinces. The subsidies which the Grand Trunk say they expect from both Ontario and Quebec will inure to the benefit of the Grand Trunk because if the road is taken over for the benefit of Canada we will have to pay to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company these subsidies given by the provinces. That is the interpretation I place upon the contract and I think I am right. If the company constructs branch lines and the government takes over the road at the end of fifty years, it must take over such of those branch lines as the company desires to give up, and they will certainly give up the unprofitable ones, while they retain the profitable ones.

What does all this mean to Canada? I say it is an improvident, unwise and unbusinesslike bargain and was entered into unnecessarily, and is to-day unnecessary. It was an unwise and onerous bargain for the country and is placing an onerous burden of debt on the people of Canada which will hang like a millstone around their neck until the youngest resident of Canada to-day has passed away. The people must bear it and a part of their earnings in the future from year to year must go to pay off that mortgage. Not a farmer, a labourer, a mechanic or a professional man can avoid paying his share. It is going to destroy the chances of government ownership of railways in Canada for all time to come. There is no doubt about that whatever, although there is a growing feeling that government ownership would be the best solution of our transportation problems. This is a death stroke at our high standing credit to-day in the money markets of the world.

For my own satisfaction I looked over the public records to ascertain how much of our debt would fall due before the road would be completed, and I find that up to the end of the year 1911 or 1910, the year in which this must be arranged, there will fall due of our debts, $160,346,000. One hundred and sixty millions of our debt must be borrowed again and provided for. Add to that $150,000,000 and where will the credit of Canada stand? We must borrow that money to retire our obligations and must go into the money market of the world to do it, as we will not have surpluses that will enable us to discharge these liabilities. The following table shows the various items of the debt for which we must provide within the time I have mentioned. The first two items have been met by temporary loans but have not been discharged and therefore are in the same position as the loans which have not yet fallen due. The table is as follows:

October 1, 1903	$ 7,300,000
October 1, 1903	3,433,333
April 1, 1904	1,460,000
May 1, 1904	19,466,000
November 1, 1905	8,866,000
November 1, 1906	12,166,666
April 1, 1908	7,300,000
May 1, 1908	21,900,000
May 1, 1909	24,333,000
January 1, 1910	19,466,000
January 1, 1910	31,356,000
January 1, 1910	7,300,000
Total	$160,346,999

We must borrow money to provide for the payment of this debt as it falls due. Add to that $150,000,000 and where will the hon. Finance Minister be? Why, he is peddling our credit in England and he cannot get money, I am told, under 4 per cent, whereas, a few years ago we could get it at 2-½ per cent. What will be the percentage of interest that we will be obliged to pay in the future when these obligations fall due? This is going to strike a serious blow at our credit. There is no doubt in my mind whatever of this fact and hon. gentlemen will realize it at some time in the future, but it may be that they will not be obliged to trouble themselves with the question as to where the money will come from. This is placing a mortgage upon every farm in this country to the amount of $125. This has to be paid off by our farmers. The province of Ontario will have about one-third of the money to raise. I want the people to know where the burden will fall the heaviest. What benefit is the province of Ontario going to get from it? She will be side-tracked if this road is a success. Her cities and towns will be on the branch lines and sidings while the main line which is carrying the trade between the orient and Europe will go hundreds of miles to the north and east. The populous province of Ontario that will raise the largest share of the money will be side-tracked. I want the Ontario farmer to know that he has to raise this money. Every family consisting of five must pay $125 and the interest on that money until the indebtedness is liquidated. This comes out of their earnings, either directly or indirectly and they cannot evade that obligation in any way. The province of Ontario will feel the burden as it raises the largest amount of the money and I want the people of Ontario to know it. If built and successful as a grain and produce carrier, as indicated, it will dwarf and destroy our Georgian Bay ports and lake port towns and cities and our merchant marine on the lakes and thereby minimize the value of those western markets for our farmers, mechanics and labourers. It is side-tracking the populous and thickly settled portions of Ontario. It is putting us upon the branch lines and sidings. I would like to ask the people who are on the branch lines of the Grand Trunk Railway and who suffered great inconvenience last winter what they think of this proposition. I might ask Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Macdonald) and the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) who had to make a special effort owing to the imperfect service of the Grand Trunk Railway to get down to attend this session what they think of this proposition. Why do the government not dare to trust the people by inviting them to give their verdict on this question? We were told that they were going to appeal to the people last year but the water was so cold looking, the invitation was so chilly, that they backed out. They said: We will first cast the die, we will conclude the contract, we will bind the people so that they cannot help themselves and then we will appeal to them. They dare not risk an appeal to the people. When their offices of emolument are at stake they have no confidence in the people and they dare not risk an appeal to them. If they had believed that appealing to the people would give them a renewal of their places for five years more they would not have hesitated to have gone last fall. Rather than submit to the evils which I have enumerated I decidedly prefer to accept the wise, statesmanlike and business policy propounded by the hon. leader of the opposition. I am satisfied that it will commend itself to the people of Ontario as it will to the people of the west and the maritime provinces as well. I am decidedly in favour of the resolution moved by the hon. leader of the opposition and therefore I am bound to support it because I believe that in doing so I shall be carrying out the wish and desire of the electorate of Ontario and of the electorate of Canada from the Pacific to the Atlantic ocean.

Mr. ARCH. CAMPBELL (West York) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It is not usual to adjourn the House at six o'clock, but I am sorry to say that the attendance is so slim and that even the eloquence of my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) has not succeeded in filling the benches; therefore, I think we may consent to adjourn.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Before the motion is adopted I would like to say that I do not wonder that my right hon. friend, after the onslaught of my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) finds it necessary to adjourn the House so as to enable him to carefully consider what he will be able to say about this on Monday.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, House adjourned at 6 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, April 11, 1904.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF DEBATES.

Mr. CHAMPAGNE moved:

That the second report of the Select Committee appointed to supervise the official report of the debates, which recommends that the amanuenses of the official reporters be paid $3.50 per day for their services during this and future sessions, be adopted.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 36) respecting the Tobique Valley Railway Company.—Mr. Costigan.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT—AMENDMENT.

Hon. CHAS. FITZPATRICK (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 37) to amend the Exchequer Court Act. He said: This is merely to grant the right of appeal in all cases of the Exchequer Court to which the Crown is a party. At present the appeal is limited to cases in which the amount involved exceeds $500.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PETITION OF RIGHT ACT—AMENDMENT.

Mr. FITZPATRICK moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 38) to amend the Petition of Right Act. He said: This is to provide that when the fiat is granted, the petition, instead of being handed back to the solicitor of the suppliant, shall be filed by the Secretary of State himself in the Exchequer Court. This will prevent its remaining in the hands of a solicitor weeks and months without being filed.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

YUKON TERRITORY ACT—AMENDMENT.

Mr. FITZPATRICK moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 39) to amend the Yukon Territory Act. He said: This is for the purpose of conferring upon the commissioners authority to make ordinances providing for the division of the Territory with respect to elections to the council, and also to determine the qualification of voters.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Report of the Minister of Justice for the year ending June 30th, 1903.—Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick (Minister of Justice).

PRIVATE BILLS—FORM OF ORDER PAPER.

House went into Committee on Bill (No. 12) respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company.—Mr. Mackie.

Mr. SPROULE. I see there has been a change in the form of our order paper with respect to the note intimating that bills are reported from the Select Standing Committees to which they have been referred. It appears that some Bills are noted as 'reported,' while others are noted as 'amended.' I suppose this is to distinguish between those Bills that are reported with amendments and those that are reported without amendment. If that is the object, I think it would be better because clearer to adopt the form 'reported with amendments,' and 'reported without amendments.' All Bills must be reported from the committee to which they are referred, so that the note in the order paper, 'reported' is really unnecessary. I think it would be better to adopt the form that I suggest.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The practice has been that when a private Bill is reported with amendments, that fact is noted on the order paper. That practice should not be departed from.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) will find it so on the order paper. Take, for instance, item 6 and also item 7. They are both noted on the order paper as 'amended.' That means that they have been approved by the committee with amendments.

Mr. SPROULE. But the question I raise is whether it is well simply to use the word 'reported,' because all Bills must be reported. If the object is to distinguish between those that are reported with amendments, and those that are reported without amendments, it would be better to make that plain.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I suppose it is understood that when a Bill is noted as 'amended,' that means that it has been amended by the committee and is reported with those amendments. And that 'reported' means that it is reported without amendments.

Mr. SPROULE. Yes, but they must be reported in any case, so the word 'reported' is unnecessary.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

C. P. R.—NEW WESTMINSTER AND VANCOUVER—SHAWINIGAN FALLS AND GRAND MERE.

House went into Committee on Bill (No. 13) respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway.—Mr. A. T. Thompson.

On section 1,

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to me that in this case we are establishing a new precedent, which may be found an inconvenient one in some respects in the future. We propose here to amend two statutes within the compass of one small Bill, one of these statutes relating to a railway in the province of Quebec and the other to a railway in British Columbia. One desiring in future to ascertain whether an amendment has been made in either of these cases would naturally look for it in the index under the name of the railway. But when two are covered by one short Bill and the name of only one is given in the title, it may be a little difficult to find either in the future.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 9) to revive and amend the Acts respecting the St. Clair and Erie Ship Canal Company.—Mr. Tisdale.

QUESTIONS.

DONCASTER INDIAN RESERVE.

Mr. LEONARD—by Mr. Sproule—asked :

Is it the intention of the government to abolish the Indian reserve of Ste. Lucie or Doncaster, and to indemnify the said Indians ?

Hon. CLIFFORD SIFTON (Minister of the Interior) :

No Indian reserve can be sold, alienated or leased until it has been released or surrendered to the Crown.

The question of the surrender of the Doncaster reserve was submitted to the Indian owners but they decided to retain the lands for their own use.

Mr. LEONARD—by Mr. Taylor—asked :

1. Has the government spent the sums voted last session for the squatters settled on the reserve of the Iroquois Indians of Sault St. Louis and of the Lake of Two Mountains—a reserve established by the statute 14-15 Victoria, chapter 106 ?

2. If so, in favour of whom ?

3. Who paid out those sums ?

Hon. CLIFFORD SIFTON (Minister of the Interior). The sum voted by parliament to indemnify the squatters on the Doncaster reserve for their improvements has not been spent as the department is awaiting report of a survey made to define the southwest boundary of the reserve.

MESSRS. MACOUN.

Mr. DAVIS—by Mr. Calvert—asked :

By what department of the government is Mr. Macoun employed. What are his duties ; when was he appointed ; and what salary does he draw ?

Hon. CLIFFORD SIFTON (Minister of the Interior) :

There are two Messrs. Macoun, senior and junior, employed in the Geological Survey Department.

John Macoun.—Duties. Naturalist and botanist. Appointed to temporary staff 1st January, 1882, to parmanent staff 1st July, 1883. Present salary, $2,400.

James M. Macoun.—Duties. Assistant naturalist and botanist. Appointed to temporary staff May, 1882, to permanent staff 1st July, 1898. Present salary, $1,750.

BRITISH COLUMBIA IMMIGRATION ACT.

Mr. RALPH SMITH asked :

1. Has the Act entitled ' an Act to regulate immigration into British Columbia,' chapter 12, in the statutes of 1903, been disallowed ?

2. What were the reasons for such disallowance ?

Hon. CHAS. FITZPATRICK (Minister of Justice).

1. Yes.

2. The same as those which led to the disallowance of the same Act upon a former occasion. They appear upon the correspondence and papers.

BRITISH COLUMBIA MINES REGULATIONS.

Mr. RALPH SMITH asked :

1. Has the Bill, chapter 17, entitled ' an Act to amend the Coal Mines Regulations,' passed in the British Columbia Legislature, in 1903, been disallowed ?

2. What were the reasons for such disallowance, if the Act was disallowed ?

3. Was any discrimination against Japanese mentioned in the Bill ?

Hon. CHAS. FITZPATRICK (Minister of Justice).

1. Yes.

2. The same as those which led to the disallowance of the same Act upon a former occasion. They appear upon the correspondence and papers.

3. The answer to this question depends upon the construction of the disallowance Act.

CHINESE ACT, 1903.

Mr. RALPH SMITH asked :

1. Has the Act passed by the Dominion parliament in 1903, increasing the head tax on Chinese immigrants from $100 to $500 been literally enforced ?

2. Have any Chinese, restricted by such Act, entered Canada since the coming into force of such Act ?

Right Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT (Minister of Trade and Commence).

1. Yes.

2. No.

BRITISH COLUMBIA ACTS DISALLOWED.

Mr. RALPH SMITH asked :

What is the total number of Acts disallowed passed at the session of British Columbia Legislature, 1903 ?

Hon. CHAS. FITZPATRICK (Minister of Justice).

1. Three.

CHINESE EXCLUSION ACT.

Mr. RALPH SMITH asked :

1. Is the government aware of the following article, which appeared in the Nanaimo 'Free Press' some days ago ?

EXCLUSION ACT HAS FLAWS.

'The astute Chinaman seems to have discovered a way to get into Canada without paying the $500 tax. A considerable party passed through Sydney, N.S., in charge of a secret service man. They were on their way to St. John's Newfoundland. After a short stay there they can easily become British citizens, and can enter Canada free. A large number are expected by way of Vancouver during the summer.'

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, 'That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, for the House to go into committee to consider a certain resolution concerning the ratification of the agreement between His Majesty the King and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, dated the 8th day of March, 1904'; and the proposed motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto,

Mr. FISHER.

Mr. ARCH. CAMPBELL (West York). Mr. Speaker, I have listened with attention and considerable interest to the discussion which has been engaging the attention of the House for some days ; and, although much that has been said on both sides has been a repetition of what was said last year, yet considering the great importance of this question and of its bearing upon the future welfare of this Dominion, I do not think that the discussion has been unprofitable or that the time occupied in it has been wasted. Indeed, I think it is our duty to discuss these great questions very carefully, and to examine them critically from every point of view, with the object, if there be any omissions, of supplying them, or, if there be any weak points, of remedying them. The more carefully we consider the contract which has been submitted to the House, I believe the more we shall be pleased with the course which the government have pursued in connection with it, and the more convinced we shall be that it has been framed in the best interests of the people of this country.

On Friday last the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), in a very eloquent and instructive address, discussed this question, going over the ground which the opposition traversed pretty fully, and stating the objections which he had to this measure. I gather from the hon. gentleman's remarks that he has very little faith in this contract ; he evidently thinks it is a very bad one for the government to make ; but I do not think the hon. member for East Grey is a very impartial witness. During the last seven years, since this government have been in power, I do not know that one measure that they have brought down has met with his approval. He judges all measures, I think, too much from a party standpoint. I do not think the hon. member was as fair in his criticism of this contract as he might have been. He pronounces it a very improvident one ; he charges the government with placing a mortgage of $125 on every farm in the province of Ontario, and vastly increasing the public debt ; and yet in the same speech he commends the scheme advocated by his leader last year and again this year which would involve double the amount of expenditure that is likely to be incurred under the measure of the government. He also contends that, as no surveys and no locations have been made, we are proceeding with too much haste in pressing this measure upon the attention of the House ; and at the same time he turns round and blames the government for granting three years longer for the completion of the western division of the proposed railway. The hon. member also contends that the contract has not been properly drawn to protect the rights of the people of Canada. He holds that it does not give the government control of the rates of freight, that it does not bind them to provide steamships at both ends of the line, and that the security which they have taken does not cover the rolling stock to be placed on the road. I disagree very much with the hon. member in these respects. I think all these points have been carefully safeguarded by the government, and they have been explained so clearly and so fully by the members who have preceded me, that it is not necessary for me to go over them again.

The first question to which I would ask your attention is whether another transcontinental railway is required. I do not think there is very much difference of opinion on that point. The fact that the hon. leader of the opposition last session propounded a scheme for providing the country with another transcontinental line shows that in his opinion such a line is required. The great boards of trade and the leading public men throughout this Dominion have all pronounced in favour of another transcontinental line; and when we consider the present state of affairs in the Northwest—the congestion of freight which has existed during the last two or three years, the mighty stream of immigrants going in, the fact that 120,000 went in last year, and took up 30,000 homesteads and the fact that out of 250,000,000 or 300,000,000 acres of land in that vast country, only the small fraction of 3,250,000 acres are yet under cultivation—we can readily come to the conclusion that as the country improves other railways will be required.

It is therefore our bounden duty to remedy this state of things, and I commend the government for having brought forward this scheme. We have in our Northwest a great country, rich in agricultural wealth, into which immigrants are going by the thousand, and in which the acreage under cultivation is increasing by leaps and bounds. Last year the crop averaged 100,000,000 bushels of grain and yet only a fraction of that vast territory was under cultivation. In fact, it is difficult to exaggerate the stream of commerce which is bound to flow from that great Northwest in a few years. Our American neighbours are alive to the situation, and are endeavouring by every means to get access to that country and tap its bountiful resources, and the question with us to decide is whether we are going to stand still or take part in the race. If we stand still and allow the Americans to get their railways in there and divert that stream of commerce south to American ports, it will be almost impossible for us ever to bring that stream back again to our own country. The time, therefore, has come when we should proceed vigorously with the construction of another transcontinental line, and in my opinion the line proposed by the government is one that will meet all the demands of the situation.

Another reason why we should proceed with that line is the great demand which exists to-day for lower rates of freight. Our manufacturers all over the Dominion are complaining about the rates they have to pay. I have here a list of some forty articles, which are being shipped from the east to the Northwest, and I find that on every shipment from Toronto or Montreal to Vancouver or Victoria, the rate is from 15 to 20 cents higher per hundred pounds more than the rate from Boston and New York to these Pacific ports. More than that, if the same articles are shipped from Boston or New York to Seattle or Tacoma the railway companies charge a rate of freight 25 cents per hundred pounds less than the rates at which these goods can be shipped over our own Canadian railway to Vancouver or Victoria. And, Mr. Speaker, we can never expect to remove this anomaly so long as we are confined to the Canadian Pacific Railway, because, under the arrangement made with that company when its charter was granted, we have no control whatever over the rates of freight. The moment, however, that this Grand Trunk Pacific is built, we will be able to regulate the freights, and our merchants will be able to ship to the Northwest as cheaply as can the Americans.

Mr. TARTE. Will my hon. friend be good enough to give us a list of the articles and the points of shipment?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Take agricultural implements, the present rate from Montreal or Toronto to Vancouver or Victoria, is $1.38 per hundred pounds. From Boston and New York it is only $1.30, and from Buffalo, Pittsburg or Chicago it is also $1.30. Then take pianos and organs, the present rate is $2.43 per 100 pounds from Montreal or Toronto to Victoria or Vancouver, and from Boston and New York to these same ports it is only $2.25. And from Boston and New York to Seattle or Tacoma, the rate is still lower, $2.20 per 100 pounds, against $2.43 over our own Canadian road. On rubber boots and shoes, scales, sewing machines, stoves, furnaces, radiators, wagons, windmills, woodenware, &c., the freight is from 15 cents to 20 cents per 100 pounds more to Victoria and Vancouver from Montreal or Toronto than if they were shipped from Boston or New York over American roads. It is in fact a scandal and an outrage that railways built by Canadian money should be in a position to charge so much for carrying these goods. Take 20 cents per 100 pounds on 40,000 pounds, and that amounts to $80 per carload, which would go a long way towards paying the duty the Americans are charged on their goods. This state of things we cannot hope to remedy until we have our own transcontinental line. We will then be able to place our manufactures on the same plane as the Americans, which is an additional reason why we should proceed without delay in building this new line.

Having shown that this new line is a necessity, I wish to say a word or two on the route selected.

Mr. TARTE. Before the hon. gentleman passes from this point, would he be kind enough to give us the lines on which he says these cheaper rates are charged ?

Mr. CAMPBELL. The American lines running out to the coast and thence by water to Vancouver and Victoria.

Mr. TARTE. What lines are those ?

Mr. CAMPBELL. There are only two or three.

Mr. TARTE. We are discussing a very important point, and my information in the past was to the contrary. I therefore would like my hon. friend to name the lines and the points from which they start and to where they go.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The Northern Pacific Railroad is one, the Union Pacific and the Southern Pacific are two others. These roads carry the freight to the coast, whence it is carried by water to Vancouver and Victoria. I am not sure but that the Canadian Pacific Railway also carries from Boston and New York to these points at less rates than from Montreal and Toronto. I have it from a manufacturer of pianos that it is actually cheaper for him—if he wants to send his pianos to Calgary, for instance—to send them right to the coast and then bring them back 500 miles through the Rockies to Calgary.

Mr. BARKER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to put him a question ? From what points in the east to what points in the west are the rates that he has just spoken of quoted ?

Mr. CAMPBELL. The rates I quoted were from Montreal and Toronto.

Mr. BARKER. I mean the low rates.

Mr. CAMPBELL. From Boston and New York.

Mr. BARKER. Yes, from one sea point to another. That, of course, affects the rate.

Mr. CAMPBELL. As against that, I may say that the rates from Buffalo, Pittsburg and Chicago, which are not sea points are the same as from Boston and New York. The route selected to my mind, is a very proper one. It is the shortest line from Winnipeg to Quebec. It runs entirely through Canadian territory, traversing the northern part of Ontario and Quebec, and thus opening up a new country and enormously enhancing the value of the mineral, agricultural and timber wealth of that region. A few months ago we had a sale of timber limits in the province of Ontario, at which one limit sold for the enormous sum of $32,500 a mile. That was the price paid merely for the right to cut the timber. Why did that privilege bring such a large amount of money ? Because the Ontario government was building the Temiscamingue Railway into that country and because the Grand Trunk Pacific was proposed, and the purchasers knew that in a short time the railway would be built through this territory. Had it not been for these projected railways no such price would have been paid. So, I venture to say that the enhanced value of the timber. mineral and agricultural resources of the country opened up by this railway will pay for the road ten times over.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. May I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Campbell) a question ? Are we to infer from his remarks that the timber limit he refers to was anywhere near this proposed Grand Trunk Pacific Railway? Was it within a hundred miles of it ? I venture to say it was not within a hundred and fifty miles of it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I understand that it was within much less than one hundred miles of the Temiscamingue Railway and also of the Grand Trunk Pacific. Lumbermen will not go into that country and undertake manufacture of timber unless they can get some convenient way of taking in supplies and bringing out the timber. But the moment a road is projected there, the moment there is a prospect of getting access to that country, lumbering companies are ready to step in, and the value of timber limits goes up accordingly. The highest price ever paid in Ontario previous to this I believe, was $17,500 a mile. It is evident that in selecting a route that will open up and develop this new country, which, from all the reports we have of it is rich in agriculture and timber wealth, while its mineral wealth is unbounded, the government have taken a wise step. As I have said, that the enhanced value of that country's resources will pay for the road ten times over.

Having selected the route, the question naturally arises how the road is to be built. Shall this government do as the old Tory government did—build the road and hand it over to a company ? No, Sir ; the government decided that this road from Winnipeg to Moncton should be built, owned and controlled by the people of this Dominion. But they wisely provided that it should be built under the joint action of the government and of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. The contracts are to be approved by the Grand Trunk. This ensures the construction of the road at the lowest possible price. there will be no chance of fictitious values to be placed on the work. The Grand Trunk having to pay interest on the cost of the road, will naturally take every pains to provide that the contracts let for the construction work shall be let on such terms as to ensure full value for the money paid. And so I approve, highly approve, of the government building this road which will be the gateway to the great Northwest.

Then, the government having built the road, what are they to do with it? Are they to run the road themselves, or are they to lease it to the Grand Trunk? I believe the government were right in making a bargain with the Grand Trunk Railway Company to operate that road for a term of years. The Grand Trunk has three or four thousand miles of railway, penetrating every portion of the province of Ontario and covering also a great deal of the province of Quebec. They will be able to operate this new road to advantage, having the necessary connections and other facilities. They are, perhaps, better able to operate the road than any other company that could be selected. Certainly, the government, not having the feeders for the road, having no connections with the west, would not be able to operate that road as well as the Grand Trunk Railway Company can. And so the road is to be leased to the Grand Trunk on the payment of three per cent interest. Every dollar that the road costs will be figured up—and, as I have said, the company will see to it that no unnecessary expense is incurred in construction—and then the company will pay three per cent interest on the cost. The government have been careful to guard in every way the interest of the people. Though they lease the road to the Grand Trunk for fifty years, they reserve running power over it for our own Intercolonial or any other road that may be designated. Also the government reserve the control of rates for all time to come, not only freight rates but passenger rates as well. And not only that, but they make it certain that the traffic shall be sent over this road to Canadian ports. The railway company must provide shipping facilities on the Pacific and also on the Atlantic to handle all the freight that is received at the terminal ports. Therefore the Grand Trunk Railway will not be able to offer the excuse that there is no shipping and that it is therefore necessary for them to send the freight to American ports. At the end of the fifty years, when this bargain has been carried out, what shall we have? We shall have, not a road running through a wilderness or through an unknown country, but a road 1,825 miles long running from the city of Moncton to the city of Winnipeg through a country settled in every part with cities, towns and villages springing up everywhere and with feeders and branches to the main line,—a road that, I venture to say, the Grand Trunk or any other company will be glad to get at two or three times the price they pay at the present time. We shall have in this road one of the most valuable assets that the government of this country can possibly possess.

Now a word or two as to the estimated cost of this road. My hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) and other gentlemen who have spoken on this subject have put a very extravagant estimate on the cost, figuring it out at from $125,000,000 to $150,000,000. The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) in his speech last year, went up, I think, as high as $500,000,000 or $600,000,000 before he was done with it. But I notice that this year he considered the absurdity of his position of last year, and was much more moderate this year.

Now what would be the cost of this road? The length from Moncton to Winnipeg, 1,825 miles, I put at $30,000 a mile. We put no rolling stock whatever upon this road, and I think it would be a fair estimate to say that the road will cost about $54,750,000. If we reckon that it will take six years to construct that road, and reckoning the average rate of interest for three years at 3 per cent, that would make $4,927,500 more. So if we complete the road, counting interest during the construction, the cost will be, in round numbers, $60,000,000. But for that money we own the road, it is our road, and will remain the people's road for all time to come. We have a completed road that is going to open up and develop a vast stretch of country, and will be one of the best assets that this country ever had. Then we have leased it to the Grand Trunk Railway for seven years. Bear in mind that this road is running entirely through a new country, without a single settler, almost, along that line from Quebec to Winnipeg. It is only natural to suppose that for a number of years that road would hardly pay, and the government have agreed that for the seven years following construction, they will give a subsidy as it were, to the Grand Trunk Company, that is, they will pay the interest on the cost of construction for seven years, which will amount in round numbers to $12,500,000. Now then, we shall have 1,825 miles of constructed road, built in the very best possible manner, running through a country that we believe, from all the reports we have, will sustain millions of settlers, a country rich in agricultural and mineral wealth, upon which towns and cities and villages will spring up and greatly augment the wealth and resources of Canada. So I say that the cost of this road will not be such a burden upon the people as to make us shudder at it. In fact, as I said before, I believe that every single dollar this road will cost, will be paid back to the country ten times over in the added wealth along this line.

Then on the prairie section of about 1,000 miles, we guarantee three-fourths of the cost, not exceeding $13,000 per mile. If the road costs less than $17,000 a mile or thereabouts, we will have to pay less. But this is simply endorsing their notes, it will not cost the people of this country a dollar, we will never be called upon to pay a cent of that endorsement. Everybody admits that that portion of the road will pay well, and we simply endorse their notes, therefore we do not run any risk there. On the western or mountain section, for 450 miles, we guarantee three-quarters of the cost of the road, no matter what it may be. It may be $40,000 a mile, it may be more. I think $40,000 a mile would be a fair estimate of the cost. No doubt there are many miles on that road that will cost a great deal more, that will cost $50,000 or $60,000 a mile. But take the road as a whole, I venture to say that $40,000 a mile, without any rolling stock, would be a fair estimate of the cost. On that basis we guarantee $30,000 a mile. Our guarantee therefore would amount to $13,500,000; we endorse their notes to that extent, we assume a liability which we will never have to pay. We only have to pay interest on it for seven years, which would amount to $2,835,000. So that instead of its being a grievous burden, instead of its being an enormous mortgage that is going to be placed upon the farms of this country, instead of its being a weight hanging around our necks like a millstone, dragging us down to perdition and so forth, instead of its being the dreadful thing that was pictured to us by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr Sproule), it only amounts to a guarantee of $14,000,000 or $15,000,000 at the most. On the eastern section of the road that we build ourselves, that we own and control, we will receive a rental sufficient to pay interest on the cost of construction, and when the time is up we will be able to re-lease it at two or three times as much rent as we get from it at first. Now therefore, we have secured not only a road that we have constructed, but we have a first mortgage, as I take it upon the rolling stock, as I think no one can dispute that our mortgage will be a first mortgage, not only upon the road but upon the $20,000,000 of rolling stock. The clause in the original contract reads as follows:

> For the purpose hereinafter in this paragraph respectively defined, the company may and shall create mortgages to trustees, as follows:—
> (a) A mortgage which shall be a first charge upon railway undertaking, equipment and property, tolls, rights and franchises of the company, including all equipment and property to be hereafter acquired by the company.

To my mind, that makes it clear as a ray of light that our mortgage will not only cover the railway but the rolling stock as well. So that for the guarantee we give we have got the most ample security that can be desired. I have no hesitation in saying that so far as that guarantee is given on the prairie section and on the mountain section, this Dominion will never be called upon to pay one farthing. It surprises me Mr. Speaker, to hear the opposition that is offered by hon. gentlemen opposite to this proposition. Why, Sir, last year we guaranteed the bonds of the Canadian Northern for some 600 miles over the prairie section for $13,000 a mile, and there was not a word said about it, no objection was raised to it; but when a similar aid is proposed to the Grand Trunk Company, we see them higgling and haggling, twisting and turning, and condemning it in every way possible.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. What was the length of that prairie section that the hon. gentleman stated?

Mr. CAMPBELL. About 1,000 miles from Winnipeg to the Rocky Mountains, or pretty nearly that. Now, Sir, in giving these concessions to the Grand Trunk Company, what do we obtain? We obtain a railway running entirely through Canadian territory from ocean to ocean, we obtain this road completed and constructed from Winnipeg to the coast on the one side, and from Winnipeg to Moncton on the other, entirely through Canadian territory. We have control of the freight rates over this road. There are no exemptions to their property, there are no subsidies in land grants to be given them. One condition is that they must buy all material that is required in the construction of this road from Canadians, it must be made by Canadians and must be shipped over Canadian roads for this new line. Why, Sir, what did our friends opposite do? When they made a contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway, they did not stipulate that one dollar's worth of goods should be purchased from Canadians; on the contrary, they gave that company an inducement to buy from the Yankees, allowed them to bring in everything they wanted free of duty in the construction of that road. We do not relieve the Grand Trunk Company from one farthing of duty. If they buy in the United States or anywhere else, they must pay the full rate of duty, only they agree that the preference must be given to Canadians rather than to foreigners.

So I say I think the bargain is a splendid one for the people of this Dominion and one that will commend itself to them. We have some basis of comparison for this bargain. I wish first to compare it for a moment with the scheme brought forward by the hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) last year. He propounded a patch-work scheme. He was going to extend the Intercolonial Railway from Moncton to Coteau Junction; then he was going to buy the Canada Atlantic road; then he was going to build from the end of the Canada Atlantic Railway to Sudbury; then he was going to buy the Canada Pacific Railway from Sudbury to Port Arthur and then to buy or control the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian Northern Railway from Port Arthur to Winnipeg. That was his scheme, a scheme that would cost at the very least twice as much as the plan propounded by the government which is now before the House. It would lengthen the line by some three or four hundred miles, but it would not increase the outlet for the products of the great Northwest at all. The Canada Atlantic Railway can run their road and carry the produce of the west over it just as well as it could be carried if the government owned it; the Canadian Pacific Railway control and manage their road from Sudbury to Port Arthur as well as the government of Canada could do, and so, if we had simply bought up these roads and carried out the scheme proposed by the hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden)—of which by the way I think he is rather ashamed—then we would have had a road three or four hundred miles longer than that which the government proposes to build, a road that would not open up any new territory and as I said would not increase the outlet from the Northwest a particle. Thus comparing the two proposals there is no question as to which one should be built.

My hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) in his address on Friday last objected to this road because he said it side-tracked the great cities of the province of Ontario and put them on a branch line. I was figuring out what kind of a road the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) desired, and it occurred to me that in order to secure a road that would not side-track the cities of Ontario he would first have to bring the line from Port Arthur, skirting the shores of Georgian Bay to London and then bring it back through Paris, Brantford, Hamilton, Toronto, Belleville and so on to Montreal.

Mr. COWAN. How about Windsor?

Mr. CAMPBELL. You might go to Windsor; that would make it several hundred miles longer still. What kind of a road would it be then? It would be perfectly useless for the transportation of grain from the west to the sea-board. It would be useless on account of its length and its enormous cost. And so I say that the scheme propounded by the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) although it was not so absurd as that proposed by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) is a scheme that should not and will not commend itself to any intelligent man in this country. A road such as that would deviate from the straight line; it would be, as I said, 400 miles longer and would cost a good deal more; it would not open up any new territory; it would not afford facilities for our manufacturers or our merchants who supply that new country. It would be a road built with the money of the people of Canada. That money would simply come out of the people into the hands of these great corporations. It would not afford any new outlet and would not be practicable as a transcontinental line. But the worst feature of it all is that when it had brought grain down it would go to Portland. We could not control it after it reached the east, but by the scheme proposed by the government every bushel of grain shipped over the new road in the summer time will go to Quebec and the great city of Quebec will resume its old proportions. That ancient city, situated as it is, on the great highway of this Dominion, will again become the great shipping port of this Dominion. For eighteen years the old government sat like bumps on a log doing nothing to facilitate transportation in this country. See what the Americans have done in that time. The great city of Buffalo has spent $50,000,000 in improving its harbour, erecting elevators and improving its facilities for receiving grain, and as a consequence no less than 240,000,000 bushels of grain per year have come down the great lakes to Buffalo and thence to New York or other seaports, while the old government were sitting here without moving a hand or finger, doing nothing for eighteen long years, allowing this mighty stream of commerce to go away from us when it should have come down the great St. Lawrence river. The present government since coming into power have done a great deal to remedy that state of affairs. They have deepened the river St. Lawrence and the Welland canal; they have improved the harbour at Montreal; they have deepened the St. Lawrence between Montreal and Quebec; they have erected a great elevator at Montreal, they are now deepening the harbour at Port Colborne, so that this mighty stream of commerce will be diverted down the great St. Lawrence river to the coast. Besides opening up and developing this great northern country in Ontario and Quebec, we will have by the governments proposal, a road that will be able to carry the produce out from the great Northwest and deliver it at Quebec in the summer and St. John or Halifax in the winter. Thus I contend that this is a bargain that well may receive the commendation and support of the people of this country. I referred a short time ago—and it is the only fair way to arrive at a comparison—to the difference between what was done by this government and what was done by the late government. I referred to the contract made by the late government with the Canadian Pacific Railway for a transcontinental line. What did the old government do then? They gave the Canadian Pacific Railway some 643 miles of completed track. They built the railway from Lake Superior to Selkirk, 405 miles in length, and they also built the line from Port Moody to Kamloops, 248 miles, a total of 653 miles built by the government of Canada at a cost of $35,000,000. This they handed over to the Canadian Pacific Railway. They gave the Canadian Pacific Railway a cash bonus of $25,000,000, they gave them 25,000,000 acres of land which, at $3 an acre, means $75,000,000 more. In all they gave them $135,000,000, of property for building 1,906 miles of railway. In other words they gave a bonus of nearly $70,000 per mile. But that was not all. They provided that the railway stations, station grounds, workshops, buildings, yards and other property, rolling stock and capital stock, shall be free from taxes for ever. As long as the rain falls and the sun shines, that road will pay not one single cent of taxes on its rolling stock, station houses or workshops towards the support or building up of the great Northwest.

Not only that, but the twenty-five million acres of land was to be free from taxation for twenty long years, from the time they were sold or occupied. Not only that, but there was to be no control over the freight rates, so we see that to-day the Canadian Pacific Railway is charging, with the other roads, twenty cents per hundred pounds more to Canadian than to American points. We are powerless to regulate the freight rates on the Canadian Pacific Railway thanks to the contract the Conservatives made with them. This government, in the Grand Trunk contract, have stipulated that all the material necessary for its construction, all the bolts and nuts, and screws and fish plates, and all the structural material required for the railway and its telegraph lines, shall be bought from Canadians, if they can be bought in Canada at the same prices as elsewhere. But when the Conservatives were giving the syndicate power to construct the Canadian Pacific Railway, they made no such terms, and after giving them a bonus they allowed every single dollars' worth of the material to be bought in the United States, and brought in here free of duty. Therefore it is, that there is no comparison between what was done by this government in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific and what was done by the Conservative government in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway. The contract made by this government has carefully and wisely safeguarded the rights of the people of Canada, whereas the Canadian Pacific Railway contract disregarded the rights of the people in every respect.

This Grand Trunk Pacific road will be of enormous benefit to the people of Ontario. I marvel that the members from the city of Toronto, and the Conservative members from Ontario, can raise their voices against this scheme. Why, Sir, the manufacturers of Toronto and Montreal as well, and the manufacturers all over the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, will be able to supply the material required for the construction of this road, and when the road is completed, then by the aid of the Grand Trunk through North Bay, and the Temiscaming Railway connecting with the Grand Trunk Pacific, we will have immediate access to the great Northwest; the manufacturers and farmers of Ontario will be able to send their goods there, and the products which they require in their business will be brought over this road through the heart of the province of Ontario. Why you cannot speak to a single business man in the great city of Toronto, who will not hold up both hands in favour of the scheme. Let me remind hon. gentlemen, that last year 25,000 head of cattle were shipped from Ontario to the west. Can any one estimate the enormous number that will be required when that country develops, with settlers going in now at the rate of 140,000 a year, and from 35,000 to 40,000 homesteads being taken up annually. When we have this railway giving access to that country, that mighty stream of immigration will grow greater and greater as the resources of that country will be developed, and the Dominion of Canada will have breadth as well as length. That great northern part of Ontario which is to-day unknown; the great northern part of Quebec which is almost unknown; these vast territories will be developed by a multitude of settlers from all lands in the wide world. Then, Sir, when this comes to pass, our country will be built up, its resources developed, and Canada will be one of the most prosperous, the most contented and the best countries on the face of the globe.

Mr. JABEL ROBINSON (West Elgin). Mr. Speaker, I suppose it is only proper that I should folllow the member for West York (Mr. Campbell) because he poses as a representative of the farmers, and of the market gardeners also, I understand. I am not sure, however, that the farmers of Ontario will endorse the latter part of his speech. He is very anxious that the manufacturers should have an outlet from the city of Toronto over the Grand Trunk Pacific, but he has said nothing about what advantage the farmers will derive from it. I have an idea that the farmers in his constituency, and the market gardeners too, will want to know from him next election, why he did not say something in their interests, while he was discussing this question. Well, Mr. Speaker, there are two men in this House who ought to be proud of the latest phase of the discussion of this question, and these two men are the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Puttee) and myself, because last year we were the only two members of this House who dared to advocate government ownership. To-day, we find that nearly half the members of this House are in favour of such a policy. Indeed, I might say more than half of them are in favour of it, because members supporting the government have told me today that they are strongly in favour of government ownership. However, they are strong supporters of the government as well, and consequently they will do as the government tells them. Now, I do not profess to judge whether these gentlemen are right or wrong, I suppose they do what their constituents advise them to do, as I feel it is my duty to do as my constituents advise me. This is the third occasion on which I have spoken in this House in favour of government ownership, and I hesitated to speak on the subject to-day, because it is only a repetition of what I have said before. But, Sir, I feel that if what the hon. member for West York (Mr. Campbell) says in his glowing description of that great country, be true; if thousands of immigrants are going in there; and if the railways are charging exorbitant rates to carry in their supplies, then it is time that the government had a railway in that country to carry in the immigrants, and their effects. It is time, Sir, I repeat, that there should be a government-owned railway through that great western country, to afford competition, and to reduce rates to a reasonable sum. Let me point out, that everything which the hon. member (Mr. Campbell) said in the first part of his speech was in favour of government ownership, and as to that I commend him. Every argument he used and every conclusion he arrived at, tended to prove that the government should at once continue the Intercolonial Railway into the prairies, and thus make valuable the twelve hundred miles of road which we own in eastern Canada. The Intercolonial Railway cost us $70,000,000, and there is a deficit on it every year. Why is there a deficit on the Intercolonial Railway? It is because it has no branches, and because it has no feeders running through the Northwest. If it were extended to where it could get traffic, it would become a valuable asset to the Dominion, and would pay interest on the money we have expended on it.

Why, Sir, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway are our competitors; they tout for freight and passengers, and they beat us every time. We get nothing but a little government traffic, and we only run four trains a day on that road when we ought to be running a train every hour. All we require is a little more rolling stock and a little more energy to continue that road to the Pacific Ocean. We ought to do it, and do it at once. I have no quarrel with the government on this matter. No doubt they have acted according to their best light, but some people think the light was not very brilliant. Be that as it may, I am here to tell the government just what I think, I think they should abandon this scheme of theirs. They should instruct their secretary to write at once to Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson telling him that inasmuch as he refused to carry out his part of the contract, the people of Canada have been discussing this matter, and we will also refuse to carry out the contract. The government should at once put into the estimates $100,000 and appoint a staff of engineers to survey that road. Let those engineers be Canadians and Britishers—no Yankees among them, although I have nothing against the Yankees, only I want to treat them as they treat us. We have the road to Quebec, and the bridge there is partially built. Let them start at the bridge and take a bee-line to Port Simpson, deviating possibly to Winnipeg to get the trade there. That amount of money would pay for the surveying of the line. Let them come down with their plans next session and tell us what the road will cost. Then let the government extend the Intercolonial Railway to the Pacific coast, and I tell you the people of this country will heap blessings on their heads. But what will the people of Canada do if the government continue on their present course? They will cry anathema on them, as they have done to former governments for having given away the heritage of this country. It is time we turned right about face and started right in this railway business. We have never started right. In Australia, New Zealand, Switzerland and Germany, the people own the railroads; and in France, I am told, the people own them and lease them to corporations. Russia also, I am told, owns a road crossing nearly half the hemisphere, and reaching right up to Japan. If all these countries own their railroads, some of them young countries, surely an advanced country like Canada can do the same. Let the government accept my plan; they will lose no dignity by doing so. The country can wait a little longer for the road if necessary. You have given the Grand Trunk Pacific Company seven years in which to build it, and if it took the government ten years I think the country would be willing to wait. We are told a good deal about the condition of the money market. We have a surplus of $15,000,000 this year, and if we continue to have the same for the next ten years, you can build the road out of the surplusses without having to go abroad to borrow any money for the purpose; you can raise it out of our own people. Nearly one-half of the speech of the hon. member for West York was devoted to the mistakes that had been made by a former government. Well, we know that former governments did not perhaps do what was right. That is all the more reason why we should take care that this government does not do wrong. I do not believe in abusing governments, especially dead governments. These men who belong to the Conservative party to-day are not responsible for what governments did twenty or twenty-five years ago. They repudiate many things that happened then. You might as well accuse these men of having burned down the parliament buildings in Montreal. You might as well accuse the men on the other side of the House of having opposed the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. What is this government going to do for the good of this country? That is what we want to know. When they try to do something in earnest, there is not a man on this side of the House or on the cross benches, like me, but will be willing to support them to the bitter end.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not opposed to this road. I think it is right that a road should be built through there, a colonization road, and that we should develop all the resources we have in that country. We have heard a good deal about there being nothing there except jack pine. There must be something there, at any rate, and it is worth while to ascertain what is in it, and to get a straight road from Port Simpson to Quebec. We are told that the government are going into partnership with the Grand Trunk Pacific Company. I have always had an aversion to partnerships all my life-time. They are very necessary sometimes, and perhaps do a great deal of good; but a partnership, as a general thing, is a poor ship to sail in. I have heard of two men who went into a partnership on a hunting expedition, and when they got through at night the game bag contained only two birds. The one was a big fat turkey and the other was a crow. So when they came to divide the spoil they found it difficult to arrange it, but one sharp fellow said: 'I will tell you how we will do it; I will take the turkey and you take the crow, or else you take the crow and I will take the turkey.' That is just the way this railway contract is arranged between the Grand Trunk Pacific Company and our Canadian government; we are going to get the crow. It seems to me that we should see that we do not get the crow, but get the turkey, or have it fairly divided. As it is, we are going to give the Grand Trunk Pacific Company nine-tenths of what it costs to build the road, and they will give one-tenth. I do not think that is a fair division.

Mr. TAYLOR. And they get all the profits.

Mr. JABEL ROBINSON. They get all the profits for fifty years. Most of us will not be here to discuss what they will do after that time.

You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that early in the session I put a question on the order paper. That question was answered, no doubt to the best of the ability of the officials of the department concerned, but the answer did not come up to my expectations. I asked where the coal-measures of Canada were situated, and how much the government owned, and if any coal was being discovered along the route of the new transcontinental railway, and the reply was very unsatisfactory. That coal question I consider one of the burning questions to come before this country, because fuel is just as much an essential as food and clothing. If you give away the people's heritage of fuel and lock it up in the hands of speculators, you will be committing a most serious crime against posterity. We know that there are men who spend a good deal of their time in these lobbies looking after these things which the government have to give away, and the government, of course, cannot always resist very well some of the appeals made by these men, and so they grant them coal concessions and almost everything else. I am told that the larger portion of the coal-measures of the Crow's Nest Pass are in the hands of syndicates and rich corporations. If that be the case, it will prove a curse to the country. I want these coal-measures to be kept by the government for the coming generations. They have been placed where they are by a wise Providence for the use of the people, and I think that our government should see that they are kept for the people and not given away to a privileged few. Is not that right?

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. JABEL ROBINSON. I guess you must be all speculators, as you do not cheer. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Campbell) took some trouble to tell us about this Canadian Pacific Railway, but he did not tell half. Had the opposition in those days, when that company was granted its charter, been as watchful and careful of the resources of the country as they appear to be to-day, they would have taken good care to prevent the carrying out of such a bargain. I am told on good authority that the stock of the company cost most of its owners only 30 cents on the dollar, and I see by the newspaper quotations to-day that a dollar's worth of that stock is now selling for $1.17. Should not that be a warning to us against placing any other body of men in the position to reap a similar benefit at the expense of the people? I for my part am opposed to it. What I would like to see is the people of the country become stockholders of that new road and have the management of it, and manage it so that it will carry our farmers' produce for just what that carriage is worth, and not charge two prices as we are charged now. You will not then see the stock of the road enhanced in value from $30 to $117 per share. Of course, this kind of thing creates millionaires, and we are going to duplicate our millionaires. Not content with what we have, we are going to have another set. I am not in favour of millionaires. Perhaps if I were one, I might look on the question somewhat differently, but what I now believe in is a policy which will benefit the whole people and not a select few. I believe in giving every man the opportunity of getting some of the wealth of the country. I believe in every man getting what he works for and earns, and not in men getting money by scheming, by coming to the government and using a pull, as some of them boast they are able to do. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that when the great Norman, styled William the Conqueror, came over to England and defeated Harold at the battle of Hastings, he took away from the English people their lands and divided them among his followers. You will say that that was not right, that the people who did this were uncivilized, and living in barbarous times, but we see the same thing done in the present day, only done in much less risky and more cunning fashion. Do we not see the different governments of the day—I care not whether Liberal or Conservative—dividing up the public domain amongst their followers and creating millionaires and all that the rank and file get out of it is a five dollar bill when they vote straight.

What is this Grand Trunk Pacific scheme likely to result in? The chances are a hundred to one that at the next elections we will have another Pacific scandal. Some of you know what a Pacific scandal means. For Heaven's sake do not let us have another.

An hon. MEMBER. Turn to your own side.

Mr. JABEL ROBINSON. I have no side. I have no sins to answer for, and so far as I am concerned, I am not saying that the government have any sins to answer for except sins of omission. Hon. gentlemen opposite should, when they were in opposition, have seen that these things did not happen or let the country know it. What are these railway magnates doing? They are not in this business for fun. They are not asking a charter to build a transcontinental road simply for the good of their health. They are there to make millions out of it; and when this road is built, they will get into their palace car, starting at Quebec, and go through the country, looking out of the car windows to see what kind of crops the farmers are raising and how much they can take out of these crops, and they will charge their freight rates just as high as they think the farmers can be made to pay. So far no government has controlled what rates shall be paid, but that has been left entirely in the hands of the railway magnates. These men will not put the rates on too high, because in that case the farmers could not live and it would not pay them to raise produce, but they will do the next thing to it, and take as much as they can out of what the farmers grow, so that the children of the soil will have scarcely enough left to keep bodies and souls together. Of course, the present government has a fair precedent for taking this course, because former governments have done the same thing.

And in the summer, after the bees have been out gathering honey from the blossoms, the old farmer goes and looks in to see how much he can take from them. And he steals from them all they have except enough to keep them over the winter. And that is just what the magnates are doing with us. Are you going to allow them to do it? You are, if you do not own and control the railroads. I speak on behalf of the farmers, on behalf of the consumers and producers of that country. I hope the government will not take it amiss if I tell them, and tell them plainly, that it is time for them to see to it that we get justice. It is twenty years last winter since I had the honour of leading a deputation to wait upon the then Prime Minister of this country asking him to appoint a commission to control the railways so as to do away with the grievances from which the farmers suffered. We waited upon the Prime Minister and his colleagues in the tower room, if I remember well. The Prime Minister told us that they were aware of the facts of the case, and that they would appoint a commission. Sir, that government went out of power, without appointing that commission. But, something less than a year ago we had a commission appointed, and I am beginning to hope that that commission will remove some of the burdens and difficulties under which we labour.

We desire to build up this Dominion into a great and glorious part of the British empire, to bind the several provinces and territories together not with a rope of sand, but with bonds that can never be broken. In that work we can be greatly helped by a real national railway. We have such a railway running through two of the provinces and part of a third. But all the other provinces have no government railway but are obliged to submit to the roads that exist and pay whatever rates are demanded. If there was no other argument but this, there would be sufficient reason why we should extend the Intercolonial into the other provinces. I do not think there is a constituent of mine who will benefit to the amount of ten dollars if the transcontinental railway is built as proposed. At the same time we are willing and anxious to see this country developed. We want to make Canada something more than a fringe along the American border. There is not a man in my county who would say anything against the building of a national transcontinental railway; but they all want the government to own and control it. It is not too late yet. It may be too late in a week or two. But there is time now for the government to take a sound position in this matter. It won't cost them anything to do so. We have been told, by the way, that this road will not cost us anything, that all we have to do is to endorse the notes of the Grand Trunk. I would like the government, if it is going into the endorsing business, to endorse my notes. I do not think they will do it, because they know they would have to pay them. But if you endorse the notes of this company, you will have to pay them. And, if you are going to build the road you should own it. That is a plain proposition, and I do not ask any credit for advocating it.

Mr. A. T. THOMPSON (Haldimand). Mr. Speaker, after the very strong indictment which the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Robinson) has made against the policy of the opposition with regard to this transcontinental road, it seems almost unkind for me to follow in the same vein. But so strong is my sincere conviction of the efficacy of the government scheme, and so sincerely do I believe that the opposition scheme is entirely what we do not want, that that must be my excuse for continuing the debate in the same strain.

When, during the recess, news reached us that the contract which we had ratified during the last session as between the government of Canada and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company was not to be carried out in its entirety, I think, there was a feeling of disappointment in the hearts of every one of us. We felt that a bargain which was very much indeed in the interests of Canada was falling to the ground. It may be too, that we had a feeling that, after spending the longest session on record here in Ottawa and devoting a very large part of that session to the discussion of that question, the idea of having to embark once more on the same discussion was to be dreaded, and dreaded all the more because we could not but see that the debate last session covered the case and that new ideas would necessarily be few and far between. That, however, was merely a feeling of private disappointment. From the public standpoint, I for one was much gratified and much relieved when I found the very moderate nature indeed of the proposed changes. There were certain features of the scheme which, to us, seemed vital. I am glad to say that, from my reading of the proposed changes, all these essentials are still retained. We are still to have a railway from ocean to ocean every foot of which shall be upon Canadian territory. I for one regard that as of paramount importance. In spite of the assaults of the opposition, that section of the road from Quebec to Moncton is still a part of our scheme ; in spite of the assaults of the opposition, we are to build from Quebec to Winnipeg ; in spite of their opposition, and in spite of the new negotiations, we are not asked to alter the route of this proposed road one jot or one tittle. Then, as to the control of rates we find that still uninterfered with ; and as to the running rights for other companies, the clauses remain the same. Further, the guarantee of the shipment of freight to Canadian ports we find to be still in the contract, and we find what is to my mind a very important feature, the lease of the eastern section, still the same as when parliament rose last fall.

We do find, certainly, that changes have been made. And I would be the last to minimize their importance. But I do think the changes have not been unfair. First is the extension of time within which the company may complete its enterprise. What harm is there in that ? We know that it will be in the interest of the company to complete its line of railway as speedily as possible so that it may get a return from the capital invested and it may the sooner enter upon the exploitation of the new and rich regions which it is to serve. There are special terms in the agreement as to the rights of the company in case the government is in default in finishing its portion of the road. In other words, if the western section is completed before the eastern, the Grand Trunk Pacific is to have the right to withdraw its deposit on fair terms. Why should not this be the case? If we are behind in the construction of our part of the road, why should we hold on to the deposit of the company when our default is not caused by the company ? There is a clause which gives the right to lease portions of the road as they are built before the completion of the whole eastern section. That is exactly what we want. As soon as we have a section completed we want the company to take it over and operate it so that we may the sooner have a return upon our money and the sooner develop the portion of the country through which the completed line runs. Surely, that is a wise provision. We give an extension as to the guarantee on the mountain section, and this may possibly involve the expenditure of a larger amount of money by way of interest for the seven years during which we are to pay interest on the bonds for the mountain section which we guarantee. I say, 'may.' But, should it turn out that owing to easy grades and curves of the line, the railway through the Pine or Peace River Pass can be built for $40,000 a mile—and we must always remember that when we are speaking of the cost per mile we speak of it without an allowance for rolling stock—our share, seventy-five per cent, will be $30,000 a mile, which is exactly what we calculated last session ; and so, we shall not have to pay a cent more for interest. But, if the cost is more, if it runs to $50,000 per mile—even suppose that we accept the figures of the leader of the opposition and assume that it will cost so much—this change will mean that the expense to the country will be $600,000 or $700,000 more than was calculated on. This is not a certainty, but a possibility. We are to implement the bonds in order that the company may raise the full amount of money which it requires. We may have to do that or we may not. That will entirely depend upon the state of the money market when these bonds are offered to the public.

We grant further five years extension of time before we can take over that road from the Grand Trunk Pacific in case of default. Sir, this is a huge enterprise, it is an enterprise that may take many years to complete. Is there anything unreasonable in the proposition that we should give the company a longer period by five years in which to put their enterprise upon a paying basis ? And if they succeed in doing so in this further five years, as in all probability they will succeed, owing to the further development of the country, then I submit we are much further ahead than if we were going on under the old contract, when we entered into possession five years sooner and thereby had the management of this road upon our hands. I believe this amendment is in the interest of the country.

The English method of foreclosing, I understand, is introduced instead of the American method. The benefit of the change is a matter of argument between hon. gentlemen on your left and on your right. It has been carefully considered by eminent legal gentlemen on both sides of the House, by the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Russell), by the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Wade), by the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Sifton), and by the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden). All these lawyers have dealt with that point, and it would be presumptious on my part to take it up. I am content to let the people read what they may find in 'Hansard,' on that subject, and if they do so intelligently and with unbiased minds, I am satisfied they will come to the conclusion that the eminent legal gentlemen who I see facing me now on the government benches are entirely in the right in this matter.

Then we give them permission to sell part of the common stock. This is a new company, and it must have some means of raising money. They will probably have to supply ships on both the Atlantic and Pacific sea-boards, they may have to supply navies for us in each case. They will have to supply rolling stock, they will have to supply betterments. We are merely giving them the means for procuring the money, and it will still be in the power of the government to say what dividends that stock should bear, and in deciding that point I have no doubt the government will be governed by the amount that that stock brought in the open market when it was first placed thereupon. Then the terms as to the purchase of branches. There is nothing very unreasonable in that. If, by taking over the main line at the end of fifty years, we render unprofitable some of the branch lines which this company has built, if by our own act we render those lines unprofitable, why should we not take them over? Lastly, we find there is a clause for continuity of traffic by the G. T. P. in case the government does undertake the operation of this road at the end of fifty years.

So I repeat that the essence of the scheme has been retained, and that the new provisions, while undoutedly of importance to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, are not seriously detrimental to the best interests of Canada. It is true that these changes are not very serious, but the man on the street—we must consider him—the man on the street is putting the question: Why is it that, having made a bargain which they thought was a good one last summer, the company has come to parliament and asked for changes in that bargain? I think the explanation is a very simple one indeed. To implement that bargain we had to have a deposit of $5,000,000, and they had to get that $5,000,000 from somebody who had it, and the parties who had it were the Grand Trunk Railway Company. The Grand Trunk Pacific Company contracted with us to get this money from the Grand Trunk Railway Company. Has anybody in this House impeached the sincerity of Mr. Hays or of Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson when they made that promise? Not at all. They went to their shareholders and they said everything in their power to induce them to meet their views; they had to put up this money in order that that contract might be carried out as it was originally framed. But the shareholders point blank refused to do so. And why? Can you blame them? These shareholders of the Grand Trunk live thousands of miles away from our country, unacquainted with the actual conditions here. For years and years they had not had the pleasure of drawing a single dividend from certain classes of their shares, and but recently had enjoyed that privilege for the first time. Is it any wonder then, that these men should be more or less timid, especially when they read day after day in the newspapers, the talk coming from prominent gentlemen opposite, declaiming about the sub-Arctic regions, the muskegs, the jackpine, the granite ridges and the stunted poplar? Is it any wonder, I say, that these shareholders should have shown their timidity by refusing to follow their leaders, though these leaders were the eminent gentlemen who manage that great corporation, the president and the general manager?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Might I ask the hon. gentleman when this meeting of the shareholders took place to which he has referred?

Mr. A. T. THOMPSON. I have not got the exact date, but I can supply the hon. gentleman with it after I have finished my speech. Very well, then, the shareholders did not say: We will have none of this transcontinental project. They simply said. We will not sanction this contract under the terms of the original agreement, but we will sanction it if you will allow us to supplement it by these new terms, the new terms which I have briefly touched upon. Three courses then were open to the government—in the first place, to accept the new terms, in the second place, to build the road themselves, and in the third place, to give up the project of a national transcontinental railway. To accept the new terms—I have already shown very briefly what they are, I have shown the innocuous character of these new terms. As to building it ourselves, I for one am not prepared to see this government undertake the construction of a transcontinental railway by itself, or under its own supervision. This is a busy government. This project is not the only project with which our public men will have to deal in the near future. We have still to deal with the great question of immigration, we have still to deal with the great question of developing our agricultural resources and how to improve them, we have still to improve our waterways, we have public works from ocean to ocean to look after, and besides all that we have to attend to the usual functions of a government. There is not a single member of the cabinet to-day who is not worked to the limit of his endurance, and many of them far beyond it, and are we going to put upon these gentlemen the supervision of the building of another great transcontinental railway? I tell you that, great as their powers are, it would not be possible for them to build this railway as economically, yes and as free from corruption, as it would be for a private corporation to build it. As economically, I say. Why? Because I tell you the government is so busy, it could not look after the details as they will have to be looked after in the construction of a work of this magnitude. In this work, the Grand Trunk engineer takes part with the government engineer to keep the cost down as much as possible. As to freedom from corruption—I believe, Sir, that we have a pure government. I believe it and I think the facts prove it. For seven long years hon. gentlemen opposite have been unable to bring home to this government one single scandal or one single corrupt act. Let me say this of the hon. gentlemen opposite, that they are able men, there are able lawyers among them, and I believe if they could bring home any act of misdoing to this government, they would gladly do so, and I do not say that offensively, because any opposition would do so. They have the machinery ready to their hands that the Liberals had when in opposition, and when the Liberals brought home to the old government acts of misdoing which shook its popularity in the country, and which caused it eventually to totter to its fall. They have all that machinery ready to their hands, well oiled, but they have never found anything irregular with which to charge this government. I say therefore that their inability to do so is proof that we have an incorrupt government. No doubt if they were to undertake the building of this great railway some corruption might steal in on account of the inability of the government to supervise so enormous an undertaking in all its details as it should be supervised.

Well, now, there is still another course open to us—we could abandon the project of constructing this national transcontinental railway. That brings me to the question: Is it needed? There were three sets of opinions, it seems to me, as to whether this railway was needed; on second thought perhaps there was but one, and that was that it is needed, though opinions differed as to the methods of construction. Mr. Blair, from British Columbia to the maritime provinces, as reported in the press of Canada from coast to coast, said and said emphatically that a new road was needed, and the sooner we had it the better. The government by this present scheme has said that a new transcontinental road is necessary. The opposition, by their remarkable alternative scheme, a scheme to build a bit and then buy a bit, and then build a bit, and then buy a bit, then to improve two bits, then to aid a bit, then to aid still another bit, have propounded a scheme for which no adequate name has been found, but which might very well be called, in contradistinction to the G.T.P., the G.P.U., the Grand Patchwork Unlimited, and by this have pronounced it necessary. There can be no doubt that the people of Canada as a whole have said: Yes. After all then there is no hysteria, there is merely close attention and the application of cold logic to the facts, and what are some of these facts? We have had already serious difficulty in moving the harvest of the west to the east and in moving the merchandise of the eastern manufacturers to the west. If that be the case with the present sparse population of Manitoba and the Northwest Territories, how much will these difficulties be accentuated in the near future when we consider that from 100,000 to 150,000 men and women are going up each year to make their homes in that country and to increase its exports and imports. This brings me to political conditions in the broadest sense of the term. Who are the men who are going into that northwestern country? In the first place we have thousands of Americans, excellent settlers, but for all that men in whose hearts the love of Old Glory still is strong. We have thousands of men of European origin, each of whom is either hostile, or at the best indifferent to the British empire, and we have as against these men, excluding those who are moving from the older parts of Canada to the west, but one citizen of British origin against two of alien origin. It is necesssary, if we are to make these men staunch Canadian citizens that we should make them happy in their new homes. We must give them every facility and chief among these we must give them cheap and easy access for their products to the markets of the world. This is a most important political condition to face and I say that we cannot too rapidly give to these men the facilities they require. There are already a large number there who are producing grain, and that grain will find an outlet, if not through Canadian channels to the east, then through American channels to the south. We are told that trade follows the flag; we must have a care lest the converse of that be true and the flag follow trade to its effacement. These are matters of serious importance which we are bound to consider. We believe that these men will become as good Canadians, as good British citizens, as we are ourselves, but we must see that they become so by contentment, and by the happiness of their lot. That is the only way we shall ever bring them to good Canadian citizenship.

Another political condition—and I am surprised to think so little has been said by the leading public men of Canada on both sides in reference to it—is this. When the Intercolonial Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway were built, great attention was paid to the important aspect of these projects from the standpoint of military usefulness and to the immense benefits they would be to Canada in case of trouble. I take the risk of being called a jingo, I take the risk of being held up to ridicule, if for five minutes I discuss this aspect of the case. We all think that war with the United States is extremely improbable. I sincerely hope that this is so, but what has been may be. If, unfortunately at some future time we should find ourselves embroiled with our neighbours of what use would this new road be? I do not speak so much of the portion from Moncton to Quebec; part of that passes very close to the American boundary although even there the part of the state of Maine which it passes is a barren wilderness, an uninhabited waste, and therefore not the same menace it would be if it were a part of New York or Pennsylvania with thickly settled communities right up to the boundary line. But what position would we be in from Quebec to Fort Simpson? At Quebec we would have an impregnable fortress guarded by the warships of the British navy and at Fort Simpson, a terminus, also guarded by the British navy. Between the two we would have a line striking rapidly north and then west through inaccessible territory which I will guarantee the riflemen of Canada could defend against any power on earth. And what use would that be to us in the case of hostilities with our great neighbour to the south. Not only would we have a line of defence on which to fall back, a means of internal communication of inestimable benefit, but we would also have in it the means of shipping from the granary of the west to Great Britain those food supplies on which her safety would depend if she should be deprived of her supplies from the United States. On the other hand the policy of the opposition still leaves us open to attack from the south.

In addition to the view which I have tried to present to the House of what use from an imperial standpoint would this line be in case of conflict in the Orient, a very much more likely case? Would this not be the shortest line for the transportation of British men and British goods to the Orient? Undoubtedly it would, and the line is of great imperial importance from that standpoint. I for one feel that the open door in the Orient is of more importance to us in Canada than it is even to the people of Great Britain.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. A. T. THOMPSON. We are the people who will in future enjoy and control in the largest measure the trade of the Orient. We shall enjoy it because we are on the direct line between the Occident and the Orient. We shall enjoy it because we raise the commodities which they purchase in the Orient and will buy their products in return. So if we in Canada, by a great public work of this kind, can sustain the hands of Great Britain in demanding reasonable freedom of trade in the east we are doing nothing more than we should do in our own selfish interests, apart altogether from what we owe to the motherland for the protection of her army and navy and the use of her consular service. We are doing nothing more than we should do in our own selfish interests when we implement a power that will be used for our own good and our benefit in the east. It has struck me as passing strange that the party which for so many years proclaimed itself to be the custodian of Canadian loyalty to Britain, should have been so silent on this point; that the party which claimed to be the custodian of British loyalty should have been so short-sighted as to have opposed this scheme with all its great benefits to the empire, and to have suggested in lieu thereof a scheme which is almost useless, from a British standpoint. How have the mighty fallen. I was almost tempted to say: O tempora; O mores. The great old Conservative party, blind opponents to imperial interests and leaving to the Liberals, so long held up to suspicion from the standpoint of loyalty, the development of imperial interests! So much for the political aspect of this question. I may be pardoned for dealing, at the expense of a few moments, with the financial aspect of the case. The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) has spoken of the obligations about to be incurred by this country in the building of this new transcontinental line according to the government's plans. And here, Sir, it is well to note the difference between 'obligation' and 'cost.' I suppose that if a man backs the note of a millionaire for $100 he is assuming an obligation, but the chances are that the cost to him will be nothing at all. We must carefully distinguish between obligation and cost. I believe the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) did not wish in the slightest degree to confuse, although he succeeded to some extent in doing so as one can easily see by reading the subsequent part of his speech. He puts the total obligation to be assumed by the people at $171,000,000. I am going to see if I cannot whittle that down rapidly to something not quite so terrific in point of size.

First of all, I would suggest taking off $15,250,000 for the reason that the hon. gentleman suggested, the addition of that amount to our obligations, because he said that the chances were that our bonds will sell at 90 instead of 100. That is a just supposition. I am free to confess that if we went on the money market to-day, that no doubt would be the case. But what of the money market a year and a-half ago? That would not have been the case then. We do not want all this money right away; we will borrow as we go along, in three years, or in four years, or in five years, or in six years, or in seven years. I venture to say that the money market will be up and down two or three times during that period. We are asked to assume that we will lose $15,000,000, because at present the money market is bad; why not assume that the money market will get so good in the future that instead of borrowing at 3 per cent we will borrow at 2¾ per cent, and that the railway will cost us less than even the Minister of Finance estimated. I shall not attempt any argument so extravagant as that, but I have the right to ask my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) not to force the other contention.

And so we will have to deduct this $15,250,000 and that leaves us $155,750,000. Let us take $25,000,000 more off, because of the guarantee of the mountain section. That is simply a guarantee. We will never be called upon to pay it if this project is a success, and if we did not think it were going to be a success, do you think we would present it as our greatest public work? We do think that it is going to be a success, and so, for the purpose of argument, since this is a possible obligation, but not a likely expenditure, let us deduct this sum of $25,000,000, and we then have left $130,750,000. For the same reason, let us take another $13,000,000 off, which is the amount of our guarantee on the prairie section, and then we have left $117,750,000. Then let us take off $15,739,000 for the difference in the cost of the construction of the eastern section, as estimated by the hon. the leader of the opposition and the cost as estimated by the Minister of Finance. I shall give my reasons presently for thinking we are right in taking that amount off, but for the present I shall merely deduct it and pass on. That leaves $102,011,000. We will take $3,304,960 off for the difference in interest for seven years between the cost of the eastern section as stated by the leader of the opposition and the cost of the eastern section as estimated by the Minister of Finance. Now we are down to $98,706,040. Take off $4,978,200, because the leader of the opposition charged the whole cost of the Quebec bridge to this enterprise. And why did he do so? Were we not committed to the building of that Quebec bridge? Would we not go on with it whether this scheme went through or not? Undoubtedly we would. The Grand Trunk Pacific is not the only road that will use that bridge; three or four other very important roads will use it. Why try to make this project more serious in the matter of expense; why should we not charge up a reasonable proportion against the Quebec bridge; why not charge up, as the Minister of Finance did, the sum of $2,000,000 to the Quebec bridge, instead of $6,978,200, as the leader of the opposition did? That, Sir, makes a reduction of nearly $5,000,000, and now we are getting to much more comfortable figures; we are well under the $100,000,000 mark now; we are down to $93,727,840. Then let us take off, for the possible three years additional, during which we will have to pay the interest on the eastern section at the expiration of the seven years; let us take off for that $9,147,600. Let us take that off, because, in the first place, we do not expect to have to pay it, and, in the second place, even if we did have to pay it, it is that much more in the road itself; it is added in the cost of the road; it itself will bear interest in the end, and when the time of the lease is up I have no doubt that road will bring far more money than ever we will put into it. Let us take off that $9,000,000, and then we are down to the very comfortable total of $84,580,240.

But the hon. the leader of the opposition makes a further suggestion. He says: Mr. Blair said that we would probably be called upon to pay $18,850,000 more, because we would likely have to pay the difference between the 3 per cent we are getting by way of rental from the Grand Trunk Pacific on the eastern section and the 3½ per cent, which he thought, for forty years we would have to pay on the money we borrowed. Mr. Speaker, do you not see that the leader of the opposition is cutting us at both ends? First of all, he charges us $15,000,000 odd because our 3 per cent bonds will only bring us 90, and then he throws into the other side $18,850,000 more because we will have to pay 3½ per cent on our bonds. That is a very poor financial argument, and I should perhaps apologize for calling the attention of the House to anything so obvious; but, Sir, for all that, it is my duty to call attention to it, for it cannot be altogether a slip on the part of the hon. gentleman, inasmuch as I find reference made twice more to it during the continuance of his remarks.

Why, Sir, there is still this point to be considered, too. If we only get 90 per cent on our bonds, how much more will the leader of the opposition get for his bonds when he goes to the market to finance his rail road that he has proposed to us? The money market does not care whether it be a Liberal or a Conservative government that goes to borrow on it. Politics has nothing to do with the rate on interest on the British money market. Even if we did have to sell under 100 at 3 per cent, the leader of the opposition, in that very expensive scheme of his—and which I believe in my heart will cost one-half as much again as ours—he would have to borrow for his scheme on the same unfavourable conditions.

But, Sir, there is still another point in connection with that $18,850,000 which I would like to draw the attention of the House to. The distinction which I have pointed out is very obvious, and it seems to me that the leader of the opposition has two choices. Either he must stand before this House as being a very bad financial critic, in which case we must treat lightly all his other financial calculations; or he must stand before this House convicted of having thrown out a suggestion for which there is no foundation—convicted of being an Israelite with very considerable quantities of quill.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. A. T. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock, I was just finishing my discussion of the financial statement of the hon. leader of the opposition with regard to the expense of building the eastern section according to the government plan, and in order to finish that particular portion of my remarks at six o'clock, I had somewhat to hurry my argument. I would, therefore, like to repeat very briefly the last point I was endeavouring to make. I had pointed out that the hon. leader of the opposition had charged the government plan with the sum of $15,250,000 on the supposition that the bonds bearing 3 per cent which the government would have to sell, would bring but 90 per cent on the market. I went on to point out that after he had completed his total, which he had brought to the amount of $171,000,000, he threw out the suggestion that this was quite exclusive of the $18.850,000 which Mr. Blair had said would be the additional cost by reason of the difference between the 3 per cent which we would receive by way of rental on the cost of the eastern division, and the 3½ per cent which we would in all probability be forced to pay on the money market. I drew the attention of the House to the fact that in so doing the hon. gentleman was charging us at both ends of the contract, so to speak; he was charging us with $15,000,000 odd because our bonds, as he supposed, would sell only at 90, and he was also charging us with $18,250,000 because our bonds at 3½ per cent would not be made up by the 3 per cent that we would receive by way of rental. I pointed out that that placed the hon. leader of the opposition in a very embarrassing position indeed, because his mistake was so egregious, so palpable, so evident to any man who would read it carefully, that we are bound to find the hon. gentleman placed in one of two positions: Either he is a very bad financial critic, in which case his financial criticism throughout his whole speech must be read with the greatest possible reserve, or else he is an uncandid debater. I have always had great respect for the hon. leader of the opposition; I do not think he is an uncandid debater; and therefore I am forced to the conclusion that the leader of the great Conservative party in the House of Commons is quite unable to deal with a large financial question. So that it is no wonder that he brought the total cost up to $171,000,000.

Now, Sir, I am about to pass on to the consideration of the cost of the railway, according to the estimate of the hon. Minister of Finance. I will pass over these figures as rapidly as possible; but it is necessary to deal with them in order to make our comparison with the figures of the leader of the opposition. The hon. Minister of Finance estimated the cost of the 400 miles from Moncton to Quebec at $31,250 per mile, or a total of $12,500,000; and these figures are given on the basis of a grade of 4-10 of 1 per cent, which is the grade the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) convinced this House pretty thoroughly was necessary to the effectual management of this road. The hon. Minister of Finance quoted a lower figure, but after having quoted it he added 25 per cent in order to allow for the procuring of the grade which according to the hon. member for North Norfolk was necessary. According to his estimate, the cost of the 1,475 miles from Quebec to Winnipeg, at $35,000 per mile, would be $51,625,000. Add interest on the money expended during construction, $4,137,095, and you have a total of $68,262,095 as the cost of the road from Moncton to Winnipeg.

What we have to ask is: Is this a reasonable estimate, and is the Minister of Finance likely to be right in making it? Great as is his reputation in the House and in the country, we must take no man's statement without question. We must know the foundation on which it rests. Therefore, I propose to consider whether or not the hon. Minister of Finance was right in making that statement. In a recent speech, delivered with force and eloquence by the hon. Minister of the Interior, that hon. gentleman gives the estimate of Mr. Stephens, the chief engineer of the Grand Trunk Railway so far as their survey went of the cost of the first 530 miles of the line running eastward from Winnipeg, divided into three parts; and it made the average estimate $31,415 per mile. The estimate of the Minister of Finance was $35,000 per mile for this section, a very much larger sum. More than that, the hon. Minister of Finance's estimate on the basis of $35,000 per mile was for the whole distance from Quebec to Winnipeg, whereas Mr. Stephens' was for a portion running from Winnipeg eastward, where he said the cost of building would be greatly enhanced because of the great distance materials and supplies would have to be carried, and he went on to say that the cost of construction further east would very probably be less. Therefore I come to the conclusion that the Minister of Finance was not only reasonable in his estimate, but that as usual he was basing it on the worst phase of the situation. He is a man of such caution, as we know from our experience of his budget speeches, that rather than over-state his case, he is disposed to err on the other side, and we are always glad to find that his figures are not only borne out but more than borne out.

Now, what does the hon. leader of the opposition figure the cost to be? You remember that I said that there was a difference of $15,739,000 between his estimate of the cost of the eastern division and the estimate of the Minister of Finance. Why did the hon. leader of the opposition put the cost at $40,000 per mile if he wished to make a candid and reasonable estimate, unless his idea was so to inflate the figures as to produce a total that would frighten the electorate of Canada and make them unwilling to embark in this enterprise? Why did the hon. gentleman put the total cost at $40,000 a mile when Mr. Blair, who was making the strongest case possible against the government, estimated the cost at $35,000 a mile for the same distance? Nay, more: why does he put the cost at $40,000 a mile all the way from Moncton to Winnipeg when he accepts as the cost of construction in the mountain section the estimate of $50,000 a mile? Have we a sea of mountains extending from Moncton to Winnipeg? Is that the argument of the hon. gentleman? He must at least think something of that kind, or he never would have put his estimate of the cost throughout the entire length within $10,000 a mile of what it is going to cost to build the railway across the Rocky Mountains. Therefore, I maintain that his estimate was not a fair one, while that of the Minister of Finance was eminently fair and just.

But the cost of the road depends on the kind of grades we are to get. No doubt we can construct it for Mr. Stephens' estimate of $31,415 per mile; but would we have the grades which the hon. member for North Norfolk insisted were necessary to the success of the enterprise—grades not exceeding 4-10 of 1 per cent, which is equivalent to about 20 4-5 feet to the mile? The estimate of the hon. Minister of Finance was based on these excellent grades. What does Mr. Stephens say with regard to these very grades? He says the grade will be not more than 4-10 of 1 per cent; but he goes on to say that in his opinion for a considerable portion of the distance the grade may be reduced to 3-10 of 1 per cent, which is under 16 feet to the mile. We have a railway in my part of the country, running past the town in which I live, the Michigan Central, which from Buffalo to Detroit has a maximum grade of 19 feet to the mile; and that railway is accustomed to haul trains of from 60 to 70 loaded freight cars, and to haul them with ease. It is no unusual thing to see a train half a mile long being operated on that section. And yet in this northern land, which is described by one of the hon. gentlemen opposite as broken into granite ridges, we find an engineer of the Grand Trunk Railway, who has no interest except to serve his employers and do his duty, expressing his belief that we can improve on the easy grades of that flat part of Ontario by four feet to the mile. If we succeed in obtaining that, I think we may feel assured of the success of the enterprise.

The hon. Minister of Finance estimated the cost of the eastern division at $68,262,095. To that we have to add $2,000,000 as a fair estimate of the cost of the construction of the Quebec bridge. That brings his total up to $70,262,095. The calculation of the hon. Minister of Finance will be exactly the same this year as it was last year, with the one possible exception of the interest which we shall have to pay upon the bonds that we guarantee for the construction of the mountain section. Last year we were to guarantee three-quarters of the cost of the mountain section, not to exceed $30,000 a mile. This year we are to guarantee three-quarters of the cost whatever that cost may be. Let us, for the sake of argument, and because I do not wish to be cheese-paring, accept the figures of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, who put the cost of that construction at $50,000 a mile. That would increase the estimate of the hon. the Minister of Finance for the cost of interest to $3,780,000, as compared with a trifle over $3,000,000 estimated by him last year. This brings the total interest charge to $18,535,040. But, as my hon. friend the Minister of Finance pointed out last year, this money will not be all required at once. We can put a certain sum in the hands of a trustee to meet the interest as it falls due, and, of course, the amount to be invested will be smaller than the total amount of interest to be paid in the aggregate. And making due allowance for the increased expense of the mountain section, we still need invest but $14,325,706 to-day to meet the interest charge as it falls due; and as our surplus last year amounted to $14,345,166, we are still within the limit of last year's surplus, after allowing for the change we have made in the contract.

The hon. the leader of the opposition accused the right hon. the First Minister of trying to raise a bogey to frighten the electors when he spoke of the possible abrogation of the bonding privilege. Well, without entering into any particulars, it seems to me self-evident that when the congress of the United States passed legislation enabling the President to abrogate that privilege, as they call it, at any moment, you can hardly describe the possibility of that abrogation as a bogey. Surely, when a legislative body representing 80,000,000 people takes action on a certain question, you can hardly dismiss that question by treating it as a bogey.

But I am bound to accuse my hon. friend the leader of the opposition of conjuring up a great financial bogey with which to frighten the electors of Canada. After all, what is the use of going into these abstruse financial calculations? How many men in Canada are going to follow the sinuosities of a financial argument? You will find that the man on the street has a rough and ready way of putting things. And what will he say under the circumstances? He will say: The whole thing comes to this, is the project going to be a success? Should it prove a success, we will have nothing to pay for the guarantee, because we will then never be called on to implement our guarantee, as the thing itself will be able to meet all the charges on it. He will say further: If this should be a success, there will be nothing to pay on the eastern section, because the Grand Trunk Pacific will retain it and operate it for fifty years from the date of completion, and during forty-three of these years it will give sufficient return to meet the interest on the money borrowed to pay for its construction. Then, at the end of the fifty years, it is certain that the road will fall back into our hands if we choose to resume it, and it will then have a greatly enhanced value. But he will ask: What evidence have we that it will be a success? You may say there is the faith of the government and the pledge of the government, but, of course. what else could the government say of the greatest scheme it has ever yet launched in Canada? Of course, the government is bound to declare that it will prove a success. On the other hand, the opposition say that the issue is very doubtful, that the country is running a fearful risk, that it is unwise to commit ourselves to so great an undertaking without further knowledge, and that there is every reason to fear that the enterprise will not prove successful. But again with a shrug of his shoulders, he will say What else could the opposition say of a scheme which is the main plank in the platform of the government it is seeking to displace? Their very hunger for office would compel the opposition to condemn it. Is there no man, he will ask, outside the political arena on whose judgment I can place reliance? In reply, I would point to the expert witnesses, Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson and Mr. Hays He will probably reply: While I have every confidence in the judgment of these men. what evidence have we of their sincerity? To that, it seems to me, there is the unanswerable retort: When these men are backing their opinion by the money of the Grand Trunk Railway, of which they are respectively president and general manager, when they are putting the money of the Grand Trunk Railway to the extent of $15,000,000 into the enterprise, they are giving about as good evidence of their sincerity as one could desire. They are 'proving their right to their heritage, by more than the word of mouth.' And I have no doubt that the man in the street will accept such action as the best proof of their sincerity. I am speaking of the average man who is neither a hide-bound Grit, bound to vote for the government scheme, whether right or wrong. simply because his ancestors for three or four generations were Liberals, nor an inveterate Tory, bound to vote against the scheme because he comes from a Tory line for generations back, but of the man who is anxious to get at the facts of the case and to cast his vote according to the facts, and I say that when such a man finds that two of the greatest railway authorities in the British empire, who for months and months, from the initiation of the scheme up to the present, have been giving their time and their money and other resources in having the whole thing gone into with the aid of all the expert assistance they could get, have come to the conclusion that the scheme is bound to be a success, and are willing to risk in it $15,000,000 and far more than that, if we take into consideration the $20,000,000 they have to put into rolling stock and the other millions into betterments—when he sees all that, he will say: I am not going to lie awake at night worrying over the obligation which the leader of the opposition says the country is burdening itself with, but am quite prepared to put my faith in the predictions of these non-political railway experts who have shown their confidence in the enterprise by investing their multi-millions in it.

Somebody has asked: What do we get for all this heavy expenditure? Let us see. In the first place, we get 1,875 miles of road, the property in which we retain, and which at the end of the lease will be worth all we put into it and considerably more. That is what we get for the principal invested, but what do we get for the $14,325,706 which, invested now, would be needed to pay the interest charges we have assumed? What do we get for that outside of the development of the country? My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), a man accustomed to say what he means and to speak sensibly, told us last session that, owing to the building of that road through the Territories, there would come into the financial market 20,000,000 acres of land which at present are absolutely valueless, because of their inaccessibility, apart altogether from what the government will reserve for homesteads. At the end of ten years from the completion of the road, the hon. gentleman was satisfied—and the history of the Northwest bears out his prediction—that this land would bring in $3 an acre, so that there you would have $60,000,000 hard cash which you would get back for the $14,000,000 paid in interest. And that is not all. My hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) said that no doubt we would be unable to manufacture in this country all the rolling stock required, $20,000,000 in round numbers. Suppose we were to import one-half of that amount, or $10,000,000 worth, that would give us in duties $3,500,000 more. I might carry the argument further, and show that, not only will we import this rolling stock, but also large quantities of other material for the construction of the road, and the thousands who will be employed in its construction will no doubt use a large quantity of imported goods. Taking $1,500,000 as a modest estimate of the amount of duties to be paid into the treasury on these imports, you would have altogether, from the sales of land and customs revenue, an amount of $65,000,000 hard cash in return for an expenditure of $14,325,706. What else do we get? Is there any reason to doubt that in twenty years we will have a million immigrants living in parts now a wilderness? Last year we received $8 per head of the population in duties and excise.

We will have a million more people to pay that $8 each and so help to bear the expense of this railway. And what else? We will get the employment of thousands of men in actual construction, and the employment of tens of thousands more in the workshops turning out supplies for the men on the line and for the line itself. And we will get increased markets for our farmers of the country, the men whose interests I am always glad to consider, representing, as I do, an agricultural community. These men will have a greater market for their farm products during construction, not only because of the men on the road itself, but because of the increased consumption of the men employed in larger numbers in the factories turning out materials and supplies for the road. And so we see that this is a scheme that benefits every class in the community.

I was astonished to hear my hon. friend from West Elgin say that the people in his county would not benefit from the road. Why? Because it does not pass through his county? It does not go within hundreds of miles of my county. But there are manufacturers there who will be obliged to increase their plants to meet the demand that will be created by the road, and farmers who will have larger markets for their products. Directly and indirectly my own county of Haldimand will be a great financial gainer by the building of the road. And so we might go on.

But we get something greatly more than all this. Owing to the expenditure of all this money, owing to the increased employment of labour and the facility with which the products of labour will be sold, we shall have a flood of prosperity, as a result of the building of this road, that will keep hard times away from Canada in spite of the commercial conditions in any other part of the civilized world. We shall get in addition to that, fleets on the Atlantic and on the Pacific, for this company has contracted to take care of the hugh commerce which it is bound to have on either ocean. And what more is to flow from this national horn of plenty? There will be something for every province. There will be something for Prince Edward Island, because the supplies grown in that garden will be sold in the improved markets which Canada will then have and to the steamships that will seek the ports of Canada as never before. In Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, we shall have an increase in manufacturers, as well as fleets for their magnificent harbours, now so much neglected. For New Brunswick we shall get something more—the development of the middle section of that province, which will give it breadth and depth and make it such a province as one so splendidly endowed ought to be, and will be, if it long continues under the rule of the Liberal party. And for Quebec, what? We shall get the development of five counties on the south shore. Further than that, the grand old city of Quebec will become the great harbour which nature intended it to be, a seaport, I hope, unsurpassed on this continent. They have the facilities there, and I do not see why they should not have the commerce when this road is completed. And for Manitoba and the Northwest Territories we get a lowering of freight rates, an end put to blockades and monopoly and the development of their unused areas. For British Columbia we get not only railway facilities, but the development of new country rich in mine, forest and agriculture. And more than that we get the establishment of a Pacific port that is bound, in time, to take the premier place of all ports on that ocean, bar none. There can be no doubt about that, because of its proximity to the Orient, for the immense trade of which it will become the leading American city.

And now, Sir, we turn to Ontario, purposely left to the last. What is Ontario to get? My hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) put that very pertinent question to the House—what will Ontario get? And some hon. gentleman said that was a narrow-minded question to ask. I believe that it was no such thing. I believe that it is a proper question for a man from Ontario to put. We have in Ontario not merely a province but an empire in extent, an area as great as Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York and Pennsylvania and twenty million acres over. And of that, less than 20,000,000 acres is under the plough—under assessment even. The trouble may be that my hon. friend from East Grey has such a restricted vision that Ontario means to him only Grey, or East Grey—and, I hope, the county of Haldimand, for I hate to leave it out in any consideration of Ontario. The hon. gentleman asks what Ontario will get. Ontario will get this magnificent line of railway, and that through its middle stretches. Now, I would once more come to the rescue of my hon. friend from East Grey when he is attacked for narrow views, and I would say, speaking for the people of Ontario—and say in all sincerity—that I believe that Ontarians are good, broad-minded Canadians, every single man of them. We have made what we think are sacrifices for the rest of Canada, and are ready and willing to do the same again. Still, we recognize Ontario as part of Canada, and we feel that in the progress of Ontario, Canada progresses also, and that, dear as every bit of Canadian soil from the Atlantic to the Pacific is to all who live in Ontario, our own province is of necessity the dearest. We, Sir, are willing to develop your wheat fields in the Northwest, but we also want developed our spruce fields in the north. We are willing to develop your mines in British Columbia but we want also to develop our mines in the north. We are willing to develop your country for homes in the middle reaches of New Brunswick and in Quebec south and north, but we also want opportunities for the people to make homes in our northern land. We are willing to develop your fisheries on the Atlantic and on the Pacific, but we want our own fisheries developed on that great inland sea which Ontario touches on its northern boundary. It is a pertinent question to ask, what will this road do for Ontario.

Well, Sir, we get in the first place, from the governments scheme not less than 800 miles of railway through this north land of promise to develop the riches of which I have spoken. This is for new Ontario. What for the older parts of the province? We get direct connection by a shorter route for the vast majority of our towns and hamlets to what is bound to be, for years, our great market in the Northwest. What does that mean? In Ontario we have large manufacturing interests. We expect them to continue and develop indefinitely. We have in Ontario one serious drawback to manufacturing—the expense of fuel. But, in the onward march of science, electricity has been found and developed, and we are now engaged in harnessing our immense water powers for the production of electrical energy. At Niagara, where, Lord Kelvin said, it was possible to develop 7,000,000 horse-power—an almost unthinkable amount—there are three large companies at work. The most recent of them, the Ontario Electrical Development Company, will develop 125,000 horse-power. They are sending some of the power to the city of Toronto, and, in that great manufacturing centre it is found that it will require only 35,000 horse-power to turn every wheel in the city, including the tramway and the electric light, which may not be classed as manufacturing industry. Already in Quebec they are sending electrical energy from Shawinigan Falls to Montreal. The loss in transmission is becoming less and less. We know that companies at the Falls are developing great power; and we know that they can transmit it indefinitely. And so, we in my part of Ontario, look forward to the time when we shall have power in every village and hamlet throughout the Niagara peninsula and for over fifty miles beyond it, and power so cheaply developed that we shall run our factories as cheaply as they can with coal in other provinces, even though those factories stand at the pit's mouth. We are going to have immense developments in Ontario. Do you think we want to lose the direct connection which this scheme will give us to the markets in which our manufactures are to be sold? No; I say the scheme is vitally necessary to Ontario, and in its present form at that.

Well, the member for East Grey went so far as to say that this scheme would side-track Ontario. I wonder if he has ever taken a look at the map where he will find roughly sketched the proposed route of this great railway. If he has done so, he will find nearly half of Ontario lying to the north of the proposed line, and though the timber north of that line may extend for only a few hundred miles, we have there deposits of ore as rich as those of the Klondike though not perhaps in the same precious metal. But the hon. member for East Grey would still have but one transcontinental line running along side the lakes. It is the scheme of the opposition that would side-track Ontario, whereas our scheme will main-track Ontario. It will put us on the track of the line of communication between the Orient and the great centres of commerce in Europe. It will give us a line of railway nearer to Liverpool, making the distance from Liverpool to Yokohama over 100 miles shorter than by the Trans-Siberian Railway. It will put us on the front street of commercial development so far as the carrying trade goes, besides giving us all the enormous development to which I have referred.

Now, Sir, it is all very well to talk of our scheme, but somebody might say: Is not the opposition scheme just as good for the province of Ontario? In my opinion, very far from it. What is the opposition scheme? In the first place to extend the Intercolonial to Georgian Bay. By what? By the purchase of the Canada Atlantic Railway. It is true, they say, they might build another line, but since they are so opposed to paralleling lines already existing, we cannot believe they would do anything like that. We must imagine that they would buy the Canada Atlantic Railway to reach the Georgian Bay ports. But we have that already. What improvement is there going to be for Ontario by that scheme? Millions of money poured out, $15,000,000 or $20,000,000, and not a spade put into the ground, no labour for our people, no increased markets for our farmers, no increased markets for our manufacturers who have to supply that line, nothing so far, but some millions spent. They will perhaps build a spur line up to Sudbury, 100 miles or so, but what is that going to do to open up the country? A mere bagatelle. What expenditure are they going to make in the way of employing labour? A mere bagatelle. Then they proposed to buy last year—I have heard less of that scheme this session, I fear it is on its way to that scrap heap of which the leader of the opposition has spoken so frequently—they proposed to buy the very worst section of the Canadian Pacific Railway at an expenditure of millions upon millions of dollars. Not one bit of labour in that for Ontario, not one bit of extra money in that scheme for our people. What a grand thing for Ontario! Not another acre of land opened up, not a single tree more available for the use of commerce, not a mine a single mile nearer to the centres of commerce. That is their scheme so far as Fort William. Then they proposed to improve the grades on one or both the existing railways, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian Northern. Well, that will scatter a little bit of money, but what further development is it going to make? How is it going to broaden that link between the fertile west of Canada and the fertile east? These gentlemen wish to condemn Canada for ever to retain the attenuated waist of a wasp. Sir, I will be no party to any such proposition as that. As the Minister of Customs said last year, we have a line there now, a steel belt which is almost dropping over the cliffs of Lake Superior.

I might also consider this railway from the military point of view. The scheme of the opposition would leave us with a line easily pierced and broken at many places, whereas our line will be well into the interior and not open to attack. So, Mr. Speaker, the opposition are offering us—well, I had almost said, to use a slang phrase, a gold brick. This is what they are offering to the great province of Ontario with its 126,000,000 acres of land and its two and a quarter millions of people. Sir, I can well forgive the leader of the opposition for making a proposition of that kind. He is a new comer to this part of the country. But it is a wonder to me he can control gentlemen sitting at his back, strong in number but weak in heart, who decline to rise and say a word for their province. They must see the point I am making, for my intelligence is not greater than theirs, perhaps not as great. Yet because of party exigencies they sit there dumb as oysters, never raising their voice against the scheme of the leader of the opposition which means little or nothing at all to the province of Ontario as compared with the scheme that we propose.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is after all some little hope for the province of Ontario—I would not be unfair with hon. gentlemen opposite—there is some hope for us. The leader of the opposition says: After I have spent all these other millions, after I have bought a fleet on the great lakes, after I have fixed up the terminals, after I have built elevators for the farmers in the Northwest, after I have done all this at the expense of perhaps $200,000,000, then I will send out some exploring parties, and if they find that there is a lot of good territory there I will give you a colonization road by which you can bring tan bark down to the older settled sections of the province. Mr. Speaker, no tan bark line for me. We do not believe a line of that character could be a success standing by itself. We want to add local traffic to the through traffic to make a success of the line. Divorce the one from the other and the chances are that you will fall between the two stools, and make a success of neither one project or the other. We are not content to accept that offer, speaking for the province of Ontario. After our treasury is depleted, after our debt has grown mountains high, when the people are frightened at the obligations Canada has incurred because of his scheme, why, then we will spend a few millions he says. But when? To-morrow, to-morrow, to-morrow, not at present but in the dim future, years and years hence. It would take years to complete this transcontinental scheme, and at the end of that time we will get this cheap road running through the north part of Ontario. My remarks with regard to the province of Ontario have just the same application with regard to the province of Quebec. So much for that.

I have just a few words more to say, and they will be in criticism of that delightful omnibus proposition yclept resolution with which the leader of the opposition wound up, what I freely admit was a very able speech. It reminds me of a placard in a restaurant: 'If there is anything you want which you do not see, ask for it.' I really believe that the hon. gentleman intended to leave nothing out, and so he has made a general invitation to the boys, and says to them, 'If there is anything in your section of the country that you want, why, read my resolution and you will find it. It will help you through the elections. Now what are some of these resolutions? They are very amusing. Here is subsection (a):

To develop and extend the government system of railways, and to free the management thereof from party political control or interference.

The Minister of the Interior dealt ably with that clause. We can point out that these gentlemen opposed tooth and nail the extension of the Intercolonial to Montreal which was the first step towards the extension of the government railway. I do think that their demand for freedom from political control is one of the richest things that I have heard of. Why, Sir, when we call to mind the way in which the hon. gentlemen opposite handled the Intercolonial in the days when they had political control of it, when we remember the extreme earnestness with which they hauled the Conservative voters to the polls for nothing, and the laxity which they displayed in hauling the commerce of the country for something, when we remember these things, we cannot but believe that this resolution is a Tory wolf masquerading in sheep's clothing. We are irresistibly reminded of the old saying :

'When the Devil was sick the Devil a Saint would be
When the Devil was well, the Devil a Saint was he.'

To secure absolute and thorough control of rates and traffic facilities in return for reasonable public aid to railway construction or improvement.

We are securing that control of rates in our plan and I shall not discuss that further.

To improve and extend our canal system, to develop our lake and river routes, and to equip thoroughly our national ports on the great lakes, the St. Lawrence and the sea-boards.

This is an extension of the language that was used last year. Then it was to be a development of our ports on the Atlantic but there are several more constituencies on the Pacific coast now and this is extended to both our sea-boards. We have been developing the ports of Canada, both coast and inland, we have been developing the lake and river system in this country of late years. The government has spent $40,000,000 for the extension of our system of water transportation. There is nothing new in this plank of the resolution at all. Then we are—

To perfect a system of elevator warehousing and terminal facilities.

Are we not spending large sums of money on terminal facilities and improving the harbours on both the inland and coast waters ? If you look at the public accounts you will see whether we are or are not developing the waterways and when we do try to develop and improve the avenues of commerce we are met with cries of : Behold the Ottawa prodigals, spending the people's money in millions. That is the kind of talk we hear from hon. gentlemen opposite, but they say that when they get a chance they are going to develop our national avenues of trade. We are—

To secure under government control and direction, or where expedient under government ownership, common haulage or running facilities where one railway can usefully accommodate several systems, and thus to ensure to the public service more economical carriage and efficient service.

'Where one railway can usefully accommodate several systems ?' We were the very men who initiated that policy during the last session ; we were going to make a common avenue of commerce over the eastern section and hon. gentlemen opposite and the hon. the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. A. G. Blair) laughed about the whole thing and said : 'How impossible that is,' until the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) and the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals who represents South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) were informed by two different members of this House that that system was already in operation in one portion of Ontario over 200 miles, with a terminal point and change of engines at St. Thomas, and also in the maritime provinces between St. John and Halifax. The hon. gentlemen are quite too late to introduce a system that would give haulage rights over one of our railways; the introduction of that system to this country has already taken place.

Then we find four resolutions just towards the end.

1. The immediate construction and control by the Dominion of such lines of railway in the west to the Pacific as the enormous importance and increasing development of the great western country require.

The hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), dealt ably with that, and more than ably, he dealt with it honestly as well. He nailed his colours to the mast and said : I am not going to be a party to any provision that binds us to build practically untold railways in this country. He said in effect : This is extremely good political bait, but I have never yet been elected by cajoling the people and I shall not attempt to do so now. That clause about the construction of such lines of railway in the west as the increasing development of the western country requires is very sweeping. We know what a man thinks who lives a few miles from a railway, as to the necessity of railway construction in his neighbourhood. Imagine the political wire pulling that will produce and also its extremely good service for election purposes. Then we are to have—

2. The extension of the Intercolonial Railway to the Georgian Bay and thence to Winnipeg, and the extension and improvement in the province of Quebec and in the maritime provinces of the government system of railways.

These provinces must be compensated for the change in our plan by the opposition. A great deal has been taken away from them and so it is, as in the case of the new road in Ontario, that there is to be an extension down there of everything they may require

Then there is to be—

3. The development and improvement of our canals and inland waterways, and the thorough and efficient equipment of our national ports and terminals on the Atlantic and Pacific as well as on the St. Lawrence and on the great lakes.

We are also to have—

With that I have already dealt. I have laid particular stress in my remarks on what this scheme means to Ontario, speaking as a representative of that province. I have also tried to lay particular stress on what the alternative system of the opposition means to this great province of Ontario. I have expressed surprise, which is honest surprise, that Ontario is to get so little under the scheme proposed by hon. gentlemen opposite, and so much under ours. I wish, in conclusion, to say in all sincerity, that I thank Heaven that hon. gentlemen opposite have not that political control which would enable them to implement their folly.

Mr. M. K. RICHARDSON (South Grey). Mr. Speaker, I shall not be able to take the same flights of fancy as the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat (Mr. A. T. Thompson) has taken. My imagination does not lend me wings for such high flights as those in which he has indulged to-night. Listening to him we might imagine that all the great works that have been initiated and carried on in this country have been the work of the party to which he belongs. But when we come to look into them, the hon, gentleman cannot name any one great policy or great national work that has been initiated and carried into effect by his party. It is true that they have to some extent carried out some of the works initiated by the late government. They point to the deepening of the canals, the building of other canals and other large works and then they come and tell us: See what we have done; see the wonders we have achieved in this country. It was only the other day that the right hon. leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) expressed himself as being somewhat ashamed of some of the pessimists among our public men who talked about the future of the great west, when our party projected the great national work of building the Canadian Pacific Railway. They denounced it and said everything they could to discredit the enterprise, but now to-day they would like to claim it as one of their own great works. I shall not then be able to take such airy flights of eloquence as the late speaker has done. We might suppose in listening to him that he had discovered the great and wonderful secret of national success. It only means the we should plunge recklessly into debt, into a great enterprise involving $150,000,000 or $170,000,000, without any hope of return, possibly in a lifetime, in order to secure ten years of prosperity to this country. If this is to bring such untold prosperity to every part of this country and to the people in every rank of life, why should we not initiate half a dozen such enterprises and be as wealthy as we possibly can. The hon. gentleman (Mr. A. T. Thompson) in opening his speech, claimed that the preceding speaker, (Mr. Jabel Robinson) had denounced the policy of the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden). This was an injustice to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jabel Robinson). The hon. member for West Elgin, when speaking, certainly did not denounce the policy advocated by the leader of the opposition, but the policy of the government which he denounced as being discreditable to them, and one which placed them in a position that was very unenviable.

I would remark that the general tone of the present discussion on the other side of the House is very different to what it was when this matter was before the House a few months ago. There was in the speech of the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat (Mr. A. T. Thompson) a somewhat happy and optimistic spirit. He has brought to his service that martial spirit that would make him do and dare everything. No other speaker has dared to drag out the old bugaboo, the removal of the bonding privileges except himself.

The Prime Minister presented his amended Bill this session, in a very different tone from that which characterized him when he introduced the Bill last session. Last session he was buoyant, hopeful and jaunty; we could almost fancy that he believed himself that we were going to have a great transcontinental railroad running from tidal water to tidal water, and from dizzy heights we could almost see a wonderful transformation coming over Canada as a result of the building of this railway. Then, he told us that the great redeeming feature of it was, that it would be so cheap; it was only to cost us $13,000,000 according to his statement (Hansard 1903, p. 7695). How does that agree with the statement of the hon. member from Haldimand to-night, when after clipping off all he possibly could, and allowing his imagination to take flight in this respect as in others, his lowest possible estimate was that this railroad would cost the country $84,944,000. Imagine that, as compared with the Prime Minister's estimate of $13,000,000. But the Minister of Finance is determined to go the Prime Minister one better, and by some legerdemain of figures, he found that the cost would be reduced to $8,000,000 or $9,000,000. I should not go into any estimate to-night on my own account, as to what that railroad will cost us. I shall simply take the calculation of a man who is accredited by the Prime Minister himself as one supposed to speak authoritatively on a question of that sort: a man whom the Prime Minister has placed at the head of the railway commission of Canada. But first, let me point out when the Prime Minister introduced this amendment the other day, there was a tone of sadness in his speech; the buoyancy which marked him last session was absent. The countenances of the ministers surrounding him were an interesting study, as the Prime Minister made his great apology for the wonderful back down which his government were forced to confess. The face of his lieutenant, the Minister of Finance, was a picture of dejection and sorrow; the expression on the countenance of the Minister of Customs seemed more befitting a funeral than anything else; the always smiling features of the Minister of Justice, who seems always ready for a joke, were invisible, because they were hidden under his hat. The benign face of the Minister of Agriculture lost its usual expression of benignity and was sicklied oer with the pale cast of thought. You would expect to find in the faces of men like my friend Colonel Thompson and the Minister of Militia, an expression of bravery, but they looked like military men who were surrendering their colours in a capitulation. And Mr. Speaker, the government might have had a very different presentation of their case to make, had they conducted their negotiations with the Grand Trunk Company in the interests of the country. Had the Prime Minister made a statement something to this effect: Last year we made an agreement with the accredited representatives of the Grand Trunk Company for the building of a transcontinental railroad, and we stood by our agreement and we refused to accept any amendments whether good or bad, because that agreement was final; we passed a Bill through parliament and sent it to the Grand Trunk Company to finally close the deal, but they deliberately opened up the question, and they were ready to reject our contract, or such portions of it as did not suit them; they said that they wanted this change and that change made in it, but we rejected all these changes and told them they must accept it as it is, or not at all; we were not dependent upon the Grand Trunk or any other company to build a transcontinental road for Canada; we were able to build that road ourselves, and if the road has to be financed upon Canadian cash and Canadian credit, there is no reason why we should not build and own and operate the road, and we were prepared to do so; we told the Grand Trunk that we had made them an excellent proposition, and if they did not agree to it they need not, for we could easily find another company to take the contract, or if necessary we could build and operate the road ourselves—had the Prime Minister made such a statement to this House; hed he been able to stand upon such a pedestal of dignity, one which the personality of the Prime Minister would certainly have graced, the applause from both sides of this House would have raised the rafters, and be re-echoed in every hut and hall throughout the country. But unfortunately the Prime Minister appeared before us this session in a decidedly apologetic manner which produced the sad feelings in the ministers and their supporters, which I have referred to. I believe that the government lost a great opportunity; an opportunity greater than which rarely presents itself to any political party. Had the Prime Minister and his government conducted their negotiations in the true spirit of Canadian national sentiment, it would have evoked the feelings in our young people, that we have the ability and power and force to carry out any enterprise of this kind ourselves.

The Prime Minister opened his speech with some remarks about the great importance of the transportation problem.

We are all agreed as to its importance and in acknowledging the difficulties and complexities of this work. We agree that it is one of the most important problems which can be brought under the consideration of this House. The statement that the construction of a transcontinental railroad is one of the most paramount importance is open to question. But there are other matters connected with the transportation question which perhaps more urgently demand the immediate action of the government than the building of a transcontinental railway. Among these is the improvement of our harbours and outlets to the ocean, thus reducing the dangers of navigation to the lowest possible limits, and in that way bringing about a reduction in the cost of insurance to our shippers. This is a matter to which I presume the government are giving some attention; and then, if we cannot get better rates of insurance in Great Britain, we would be warranted in divising some means of carrying our own insurance—if necessary, establishing a Canadian Lloyds—and thus ensuring to the shippers and producers of this country of a fair competitive rate with that given to vessels sailing from ports in the United States. Then, there is the question of enlarging and deepening our canals, which is another important element in the transportation problem.

The idea of a transcontinental railway, if there is any merit in it, is not one which the government can claim the credit of initiating. The building of this railway was proposed to the government by the Grand Trunk Railway Company themselves. The idea is not one that sprang out of our necessities. It did not arise from the lack of railroad communications either east or west. Neither was it a political and national necessity, like the construction of the Intercolonial or the Canadian Pacific Railway. A comparison of the Grand Trunk Pacific with either of these railroads would be altogether unfair, in the light of the conditions as they exist to-day. The building of the Canadian Pacific Railway was a magnificent enterprise, caused by the necessity of bringing into the confederation the province of British Columbia. In that case we had to face some comparatively unknown difficulties, and we were perhaps warranted in doing so. But, we had some courageous men who were willing to risk all they had to carry that project through, and everything the government did in that direction has been fully warranted by the results. The building of the Intercolonial Railway, too, was one of the political necessities which arose out of confederation. So that the construction of neither of these roads is at all on a parity with the construction of a transcontinental railroad to-day.

The danger of the abrogation of the bonding privilege, of which so much was made last year, is not mentioned to-day. No one has dared to bring it out of the dark except the gallant colonel from Haldimand, in the speech which he has just delivered. There was never any real danger in that direction; it was not a real factor in the problem, but was merely a bugaboo which we thought had disappeared, and disappeared for ever. It was generally expected that the Grand Trunk Railway Company would want access to our great west. The development of the great wheat-growing belt in our western territory has been a revelation, not only to ourselves but to the world. We have one of the grandest and richest territories of that character which is perhaps to be found in the known world to-day. But it is not being neglected in the matter of railroad accommodation. The complaints of congestion last year were not due to any lack in that respect. Only last session we subsidized over 700 miles of railroad in the great Northwest, and there are at present under construction or under contract, I believe, double that extent of railway in the west. The trouble was not the lack of railroad accommodation, but the lack of sufficient equipment of the railways that do exist for an abnormally large harvest. But these difficulties are being got over every day, the large demand for rolling stock increased the facilities for supply.

But let us look for a moment at the proposition of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. They asked for a charter to build a railway from their own system at North Bay into the west, and possibly through the Rocky Mountains to the coast. What would that have involved in cost under ordinary circumstances if a charter had been granted ? For a distance of say 2,400 miles, with the usual grant of $6,400 per mile which is given to railroads, it would have involved a cost to this country of possibly $15,000,000. But with the provision which has been made for the Grand Trunk or other railroads wanting access to the west to obtain it over the railroads that already exist or have been chartered, there would have been no need of subsidizing that railroad into prairie country to the extent of one dollar ; because railroads are so easily and cheaply built there, that they at once become remunerative from the traffic which they themselves create. It would have been necessary only to provide a subsidy for that portion of the railway through the mountains of the coast. That subsidy would only have amounted to something less than $10,000,000—between $9,000,000 and $10,000,000—so that we would have practically another transcontinental line for less than one-tenth, perhaps only one-fifteenth, of what the present system is likely to cost if carried through on the present basis.

We were told that there was another proposition made by Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson, but that the government would not entertain it. We were told that the government positively refused to give a charter, unless the Grand Trunk Railway would agree to build from tidal water to tidal water. But where was the need for an expensive enterprise of that character. It would appear as if the government had got into a maelstrom of opposing influences, and that, strong as it may be in its numerical majority in this House, it was unable to grapple with the conflicting influences brought to bear upon it. Of that there is abundant evidence, and the result is this scheme, which becomes more monstrous in the public opinion the more it comes under the appreciation of thinking men. The government have allowed a scheme to be forced upon them, which is likely to load the country up with obligations amounting to from $150,000,000 to $170,000,000, when they might have brought down a scheme which would not have cost the country more than nine and a half millions dollars. Perhaps not the least embarrassing feature in the position of the government is the defection of some of its leading members, particularly the hon. Mr. Blair, whom the right hon. leader of the House considers the best railway authority in the country and whom he has placed at the head of the Railway Commission. As I shall have to quote the opinions of Mr. Blair, I should like first to cite what the right hon. leader of the House has said with regard to him, so that we may know what weight we should attach to his opinions. The right hon. gentleman said :

> There is no man in Canada better qualified and more competent to discharge the duties of the office to which we have called him. I recognize him as a man of great ability, of great talent, and I have no hesitation in saying that you cannot find in Canada any one better endowed than Mr. Blair to be the chairman of the Railway Commission.

Let us now see what is Mr. Blair's opinion on this scheme as submitted last session and which has not been at all improved by the changes submitted to us. Speaking of the construction of the eastern portion of this railway, Mr. Blair said :

So far as the construction of the Quebec portion is concerned, I would heartily favour its construction by the government, I would heartily favour its operation by the government, provided they had taken these proper precautionary steps, which, however, they have not taken. My quarrel with the government so far as this portion of the undertaking is concerned, rests almost entirely upon the consideration that they are plunging headlong into this thing, in a most unwise, injudicious, and unbusinesslike way, when by a little pause, by a year or two of delay to get information, we might be put in possession of facts which would justify us in proceeding.

When last year the absence of accurate knowledge of the country, through which it is proposed to build the eastern section, was pointed out, the right hon. gentleman said that he had mountains of information on the matter. Well, not a fraction of all this information has been brought to the notice of the House. The only thing we have had is an opinion cited by the right hon. gentleman the other day, given 200 years ago by a Jesuit missionary, who travelled through a small portion of the country, and gave a somewhat highly coloured picture of it. In using the expression 'highly coloured,' I do not mean to imply that the missionary stated anything which he did not believe to be absolutely correct, but it is evident that he did not go through that country with the critical eye of an engineer, and with the view of ascertaining whether it was suitable for railway construction. In fact, no one can seriously say that it is not practically an unknown country to-day, and it certainly would have been the part of common sense for the government, in the first place, before submitting their proposition, to have had accurate surveys made, so that they could lay something before the House on which we could reasonably rely. But instead of this, they are asking us to go blindly into this scheme, which will involve the country in an enormous expenditure and possibly turn out an utter failure. I shall ask permission of the House to quote again from Mr. Blair. On page 8425 of last year's 'Hansard,' I find him reported as having said :

But as you are going now, as you are plunging into it, you may possibly plunge into what is going to be a disaster. I cannot say ; no man can say that that country is not of abounding fertility. No man can say that that country will not afford the amplest amount of traffic. No man can say that it is not rich in all the varied resources which distinguish other portions of Canada. No man can say that there would not be a mint of money made by any company that would operate a railway through that country. But the fact of the matter is, that we know nothing about it. We have no information about it. The government is not in possession of any information about it, or at all events if they are I have never known of it and they have not put this House in possession of it. And if it be that this country is not a fertile country. If it be that there is no local support for a railway ; if it be that settlement cannot be successfully invited into the country ; if it be that the rest of Canada will fill up with settlement before settlement will go into it ; if there is nothing but pulp wood in that country which will not be hauled out until after all the pulp wood which is handier to the market is taken away from the other vast areas of Canada in which it is to be found ; if there is no lumber there except the lumber that would enter into competition with the lumber of British Columbia which is much handier to get and better in quality ; if that is all the business that a railway can take out of that country, what a calamitous plunge this government and this parliament would be taking in lending support to this scheme.

This is the opinion of a gentleman whom the right hon. the First Minister describes as the greatest railway expert in the country. Let us see further Mr. Blair's opinion on the government scheme. At page 8431 of last year's 'Hansard,' I find he spoke as follows :

Therefore, I feel as though I am bound to say that it is perfect moonshine, it is misleading the people of this country, to try to make them suppose that they are to have a grand transcontinental highway at their disposal, to be used in common in the way this Bill declares and this contract contemplates.

This is in criticism of the government's proposition for a great transcontinental highway, the running of which is based upon the theory that a railway train can start its journey at Halifax and continue right across the continent until it reaches the tidal waters of the Pacific, manned by the same crew, hauled by the same engine and under the same management and control. Mr. Blair pricks that bubble when he asks : Where are they to stop at night ? Where are they to find provisions ? Where are they to find supplies for their engines and to have repairs made, if necessary. He said the proposition was simply moonshine. Yet this government comes before us—and it is heralded as a business government—and makes a proposition involving such manifest blunders that even a tyro in railroad management would not fall into them. I shall quote a little further from Mr. Blair, because he is the accredited expert of the government, and no man in Canada, according to the Prime Minister, is better qualified to give an opinion on matters of this kind :

I want to ask is there any dark cloud overshadowing us that the ratification of this contract will immediately lift. If there is, I do not know it. Is there a well-grounded fear that the Grand Trunk Railway Company will not allow us, two or three years hence, to build and make them a present of this line, that they will not accept it ? Is there any well-grounded justification for that fear ? I think not. I think we will find them in just as receptive a frame of mind two or three years hence as that in which they are to-day. Is there any congestion away up in this country which requires a railway to be built ? Is there any depression in business ? We hear about the employment of the toiling thousands in the workshops and fields of Canada. They are, happily, now all employed, but is that a reason why we should start now to build another railway ? I think not.

Mr. Blair makes it clear that there is no well-grounded justification for any such fear as there seems to have been an attempt to impress upon the country. It has been said that this road will only cost a small amount of money. But as the discussion has gone on the amount has grown from $8,000,000 to $9,000,000, to $10,000,000 to $13,000,000—the premier's estimate—and so on until we have the estimate by the last speaker at $84,900,000. There is a great difference between the estimate put upon the cost of this enterprise by previous speakers, including the Prime Minister and that of the government's accredited railway expert, the man best qualified, as they say, to give an opinion on matters of this kind. We all remember that Mr. Blair estimated the cost of the road at over $139,000,000. Compare that with the estimate of the Prime Minister, which was $13,000,000. And, with the changes that are now proposed, made at the instance of the Grand Trunk Railway, it is quite clear that the cost will not be less to the country, but greater. So that we may reasonably infer that if Mr. Blair were to estimate the cost to the country of this road under the contract now proposed, he would place it at not less than $150,000,000 to $155,000,000. When we consider this in contrast with the $8,000,000 or $9,000,000 first spoken of, we see that these former estimates are simply absurd and ridiculous. Now, at page 8441 of 'Hansard' Mr. Blair says :

> My hon. friend the leader of the opposition said the other night that we were reversing the policy which we had pursued during all these years. I go further ; I say we are doing more ; we are condemning that policy. We are not only condemning it, but we are writing our own condemnation in letters which will never be obliterated. We are saying that we did not know what we were doing—that we did not care what we were doing. It suits our purpose now to destroy entirely what we have done, and to belittle all that has been the result of our past policy. That is what is being proposed in this policy to-day. I protest against it. I think I can show this House that a little thought and consideration would have led to the staying of the hands of my colleagues who were determined that this thing should be carried out.

Mark his words, 'we are writing our own condemnation.' Is it not plain that the government to-day, in endorsing Mr. Blair and accrediting him as being better fitted than any other man in Canada to express a judgment in matters of this kind, condemns its own policy on this question. And if the scheme was to be condemned last year, much more is it to be condemned this year with the changes that have been made, which make it far worse for the country. I have only another quotation from the Hon. Mr. Blair. At page 8445 of 'Hansard' we find the following :

> This proposal is absolutely unjustifiable, and the people of this country will not stand it. Not all the influence which the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway can bring to bear upon the electorate will justify the outrage proposed to be perpetrated. The new line will have heavy grades and besides will go through an unsettled country and we know how important an element local traffic is to a railway.

Mr. Blair has not expressed any different opinion on this subject up to the present. It is true that he has accepted a lucrative position from the government, and his mouth is shut ; but so far as we know he has not gone back on his record of last year. In his judgment this scheme was foolish and vicious last year, and it must be so still. I notice that last year there was a marked tone of confidence on the part of the ministers when discussing this question, which is absent to-day. I recollect that when a proposition was made on this side of the House in the way of an amendment, which should have obtained fair consideration from the government side, the Minister of Finance, referring to the agreement, said :

> We are not much concerned as to what price the Grand Trunk Railway pays for the stock. That has been a subject of discussion, but I do not attach great importance to it. If the Grand Trunk Railway acquired that stock at a comparatively small sum and afterwards floated it on the market at a higher sum, that would be a proceeding which might be open to objection. But the Grand Trunk Company must not only take this stock, but hold it for all time ; they cannot put a dollar of it in the market. It is absolutely impossible to buy a share of that stock ; it must be held by the Grand Trunk Railway Company itself and no person can buy or sell a share.

What is their position on that subject to-day ? They have abandoned that ground entirely. The Grand Trunk can take that stock which has been allotted to them some $25,000,000, and dispose of the whole of it so long as they retain the voting power upon the shares sold. They only have to hold enough to guarantee them a controlling interest, a voting interest in the road. So long as it had no market value as a purchaseable commodity which they can turn into money, there was no danger of holding it. But now the government proposes absolutely to release $12,000,000 to the railway company to do what they like with it, to release the whole of it except that the Grand Trunk shall hold the voting power on at least $13,000,000 of that stock. By this means they can convert it all into money, they can sell $25,000,000 of stock and use the proceeds as they like. The government wishes to create a few more millionaires, and to widen the gulf that exists in Canada to-day between the privileged few and the toiling many. The few become wealthy not by their own labour, but out of the advantages which they get from the government grafts of this kind. Another point they have abandoned. Let me quote again from the Finance Minister. Speaking of the western end of this road he said :

We do not guarantee the cost of that road. We do not pay for that road, as some seem to imply ; we do not guarantee the cost of that road. We do not even guarantee a portion without limit. With respect to the western division, we guarantee three-quarters of the cost, not exceeding a certain sum. Our guarantee, not the cost of the road but our guarantee—is limited to $13,000 per mile on the prairie section and $30,000 per mile on the mountain section.

How does that agreement stand to-day ? All gone to the winds, no limitation to the cost at all in the mountain section. They may spend $30,000, $40,000 or $50,000 per mile, and the country has to pay three-quarters of the cost, whatever it may be. He goes on to say :

If the road costs less than the figures on which these guarantees are based, we only guarantee three-quarters of that cost, but if the road cost more—and some hon. gentlemen argue that it will be very expensive—we do not increase our proportion, but the company must provide the increased cost without limit so that the road may be finished. The Grand Trunk Pacific agrees to do these things.

The question was raised last year, What if the Grand Trunk should not carry out this provision ? The Finance Minister says in so many words : We have them bound hard and fast, and we will find means to compel them to carry out their agreement. That is not their position to-day. When amendments were proposed from this side of the House, the Finance Minister assumed the attitude of a great financier pictured by Shakespeare, in the Merchant of Venice, who asked : 'Is it so nominated in the bond ? I cannot find it.' Not being in the bond, there can be no alteration, we cannot admit the amendment, whether it has any merit or not. That was the position taken last year. They come before this parliament to-day, forced by a company of British capitalists, because we find that the president of that company, in discussing this matter, said that they had 'driven the government of Canada. There may be nothing in that expression, or their may be much in it. If any member of Congress of the United States had made use of that expression, that they had driven the Canadian government into any position, why this country would resent the language, and we would hear it throughout the length and breadth of the land. But here is a small company of British capitalists whose presidents says that they have forced the government of Canada Fortunately, Mr. Speaker, they have not forced the people of Canada into any position of this kind. I think it is not a very dignified position for the government to take. The needs of the western territory are being well and generously met. Over 700 miles of railway were subsidized by this parliament last year, and I believe double that length of road is under contract or under construction. The plea, therefore that this road was necessary to relieve existing congestion, which was put forward last year, falls to the ground.

Now, we may note, in passing, that there is such a thing as going too fast in building railroads, even in good territory, if that territory is unsettled and is liable to remain so for years. We have railroads subsidized by this country throughout that Northwest Territory, in districts which are so far unsettled, but which are capable of maintaining four or five millions of people. I do not think it is wise to plant scattered settlements hundreds of miles apart. It is a wasteful policy, it is one which does not innure to the well-being of the people who are so settled. They are at a disadvantage in their municipal government, in the construction of roads, in building schools and churches, and in providing for social requirements. I think it would be far wiser to build railroads only in regions which are already at least partially settled.

But whatever objection there may be to building more railroads in the west, we may fairly say that there is no need of subsidizing railroads into the most fertile wheat belt in the world.

Another Pacific port may be necessary in the future, but it is not an immediate necessity. We are now building up one or two ports on the Pacific ; Vancouver is but a city of yesterday, rapidly building up and there is no immediate need for another Pacific port. Ten, fifteen, twenty, or twenty-five years hence will be time enough to enter upon the consideration of that question so far as the necessity is concerned. Looking for a moment at the construction of the eastern end of the road, there are many objections, but the chief is the undertaking to build a railway through a territory that is entirely unexplored, without the necessary surveys, and without the knowledge which is so absolutely necessary regarding the climate, temperature and productions of the country, or the knowledge of weather, in the case of the railway being built, there will ever be any local traffic to support it. The mountains of information about which we heard last session apparently do not apply to this section and we know very little about it beyond the little item of information to which I have referred, given in the memoirs of a missionary who was there some 200 years ago. It would seem that the Grand Trunk Railway Company have found the government of Canada a very easy combination to work, that having met them in the first place the government wished to have their say as to the character of the road, but that the Grand Trunk undertook to demand everything and apparently got everything they wanted. The Grand Trunk would seem to be very much in the position of the disappointed Jew trader who having got all he asked for an article, soliloquized: I was a big fool; I got all I asked, I might just as well have got more. So they ask for more and this blind government, having given them all they asked, apparently came to them and said: Is there anything more you want? Apparently they were ready to give the country away. How is it that a company has got such influence over the government? It is humiliating to this country. I have nothing against the Grand Trunk as a company, I know it has been said that they have not done a great deal for this country and have made some very great losses in Canada in connection with the expenditure of their money, but Canada is not responsible for the losses which they have made in the early building of their road. There are men living to-day who can testify that more extravagant methods were never employed in the building of a railway in any country in the world than by the Grand Trunk Railway Company. It was no wonder they lost money; it was no wonder that they did not for years pay any dividend, and it may be that even up to the present they would not have been able to pay any more dividends than they did in their earlier years if it had not been that they were compelled to abandon their old methods to get over their old insular belief that they knew everything about railways, and to adopt western methods and employ the skill of western men. They are now in a better position, but they have attained it only by abandoning the old methods by which they lost money in this country.

We hear a whisper going through this country; it is more than a whisper now, in favour of the government ownership of the great franchises of this country, of government ownership of our railways, telegraph system, telephone system and of municipal ownership of the various franchises under the control of the municipal governments. It is more than a murmur, it is now loud enough to be heard by every ear, and is growing so continuously that it may soon speak to the people of this country in tones of thunder. We have already had enough of government by corporations and trusts, which minister to the aggregation of wealth in the hands of a few and tend to widen the great gulf between the privileged few and the struggling toiling many. We want these franchises operated for the benefit of the people. We want every cent of profit above the cost of operating to go to the cheapening of transportation. Why should we allow our country to be exploited in order to swell the coffers of either British or American millionaires or of the wealthy few in our own country? More than that, by bringing in foreign companies to operate these franchises we put out of reach of the young men of this country positions of trust and responsibility which they might fill. We find that Canada has produced men and women who have forged their way into the foremost rank in other countries in science, in art, in enterprises of every kind. When a British general wanted to overcome the difficulties incident to ascending the Nile where did he apply for men who would be able to overcome these difficulties, but to Canada? And he got the kind of men required and they overcame the obstacles. When Lord Kitchener wanted a railway to carry his army into the Soudan, where did he find an engineer able to handle an enterprise of that kind so that it would be carried on coincidently with the march of his army? It was a Canadian whom he employed. We find Canadians in every walk of life, in every civilized country to-day, who are forging their way to the front rank of progress and of enterprise. Why should we, in placing our great franchises in the hands of foreign capitalists, throw obstacles in the way of the ambition and hopes of the enterprise of the youth of this country. Why should we not have Canadians filling those positions which they can fill with credit to themselves? There is nothing to prevent Mr. Hays, capable manager as he is, from bringing every trusted employee he wants on this great transcontinental railway from the United States and leaving our own capable men, in the background. This is what we would expect from a man who has some love for his country, that he would give his countrymen a preference. We should give opening for the ambitions and aspirations of the young men of our country.

Let me say in conclusion that I favour the government ownership of the great franchises of this country. It is coming, it is in the air, it is something that we hear every week. Only the other day the great city of Chicago undertook municipal ownership of the great franchises of that city believing that whatever it may cost in the meantime, it will be in the ultimate interest of the city to own their own franchises. I believe that the sooner we take a forward step the better for the progress and happiness of the country at large. Whatever may be the outcome of this enterprise, whether the government will still persist in carrying it through, whether in this humiliating position they will still be determined to carry out the enterprise, let it cost what it may to Canada, I believe that if it is carried out, the cost will be greater than any of those the estimates which have been made. The maximum cost has not yet been reached; it may be and is likely to be not less than $200,000,000 and possibly more than that.

I referred just now to the funeral aspect of the countenances of the ministers when the Prime Minister introduced the measure this session. The face of the Postmaster General (Sir William Mulock) seemed to bear a more puzzled expression than that of the others. He appeared to be in a soliloquy as to whether it would not be necessary to issue a new postage stamp to commemorate this great event in the history of Canada. If he should decide to do so I would suggest to him that he should print a map of Canada on the stamp with a blue stroke across it indicating the line of railway and the motto: The greatest debt there has been. Or, perhaps a more appropriate motto would be: A vaster blunder than has ever been.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. I wish to say a few words on this question, but I was up nearly all night getting here, and I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Fielding, House adjourned at 10 p.m.

REPORT ON THE YUKON CONCESSIONS.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the government whether any report has been received from the commissioners who were appointed to investigate certain concessions in the Yukon. If the report has not been received and is not likely to be received in the near future, I would suggest that the government might at least print the evidence that has been taken and submit it to the House, as that is something upon which the House will probably like to pass judgment, and possibly express an opinion, even in the absence of a report.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). I will be able to answer my hon. friend to-morrow.

REPORT ON LABOUR TROUBLES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to inquire at what date the report of the commission and the evidence taken before the commission appointed last session to inquire into certain labour difficulties in British Columbia, will be printed and placed before the House. I understand that this report and the accompanying evidence were received during the past session, and I would suppose that they might have been printed and placed upon the table of the House at the commencement of the present session. My hon. friend the Postmaster General said that they would be placed before the House some time during the present session. That is not a very satisfactory statement. They should have been placed on the table of the House and been in the possession of members from the beginning of the present session, certainly they should not be delayed any further. I do not know any possible reason why they have not been placed on the table or why they have not been printed.

Hon. Sir WILLIAM MULOCK (Postmaster General). The leader of the opposition misunderstood my answer yesterday. There was a question upon the order paper inquiring when the evidence would be laid upon the table. The report itself was printed and distributed last session. The evidence was very voluminous and could not be printed during last session, but it was forwarded to the Printing Bureau many months ago, and we have not yet received it from the Printing Bureau. The delay is at the Printing Bureau. We have pressed for it, and the answer that I gave yesterday was given after the Department of Labour had made inquiry at the Printing Bureau.

COASTING TRADE ON THE PACIFIC.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). I would also inquire from the government whether it has, during the past few months, rescinded an Order in Council issued some time ago with respect to the free entry of Canadian goods carried by foreign vessels from ports in British Columbia to the Yukon, and whether, since the 1st of March, the original Order in Council has been restored. I am led to make this inquiry by reason of a report which I have seen in the 'Colonist' newspaper, under date of April 1st, 1904. If there has been any such Order in Council issued as I have referred to, may I ask that the government place both the rescinding Order in Council and that which restores the original order, upon the table of the House at the earliest convenient moment. If there has been any correspondence with regard to the rescinding of the original Order in Council or with regard to its restoration, I would think that also ought to be placed upon the table of the House, along with the two orders to which I have referrred.

Hon. WILLIAM PATERSON (Minister of Customs). I may say with reference to that matter that there was an Order in Council passed a few years ago which waived in a measure on the Pacific coast, our coasting arrangements, and American vessels were allowed to convey goods from one British port to another. Concessions were granted to us by the United States, and for that reason a concession was made to them. The port of Skagway was opened as a sub-port by the United States at our request. That arrangement has been in force, and there has been no question with reference to the right of American vessels to carry goods from a Canadian port via Skagway designed for Dawson. That arrangement also applied to goods carried by Skagway to Dawson by way of St. Michael. The practice has been, so far as the route by St. Michael is concerned, that the Department of Customs have renewed by instructions to officers from year to year the privilege granted to American vessels to carry freight between say, Vancouver or Victoria and Dawson by that route. These instructions were not issued until applied for in previous years, and when brought to the attention of the government, and a request made. The instructions renewing the privilege had not been issued, but when a request was made and the subject was considered, the privilege has been renewed, for the time being, by St. Michael as well as by Skagway. The privilege by way of Skagway has always been permitted and has not been interfered with in any way.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am not at all familiar with the details or the merits of the question. All I would desire is that the recent Order in Council that has been issued should be laid upon the table of the House, along with any correspondence relating to it. I presume the Minister of Customs would have no objection to do that at an early date.

Mr. PATERSON. I have no objection.

FLOODS AT VERDUN.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier). Mr. Speaker before we proceed with the government orders I would like to call the attention of the government to the disastrous floods which recently ruined a portion of the district around Montreal, more particularly the town of Verdun, in the county of Jacques Cartier, which I represent. The House is no doubt aware of the extensive floods which have taken place in the Montreal district but the inundation of the town of Verdun has taken place under peculiar circumstances. Ordinarily the town would not have been flooded at all, but the inundation was caused by the overflowing of the tail-race of the Montreal waterworks which flows to the north of the town of Verdun into the St. Lawrence over a territory which is under the control of the Montreal Harbour Board. No doubt at the time of the construction of this tail-race the harbour board, having complete control of that territory, permitted the city of Montreal to construct the tail-race and that construction was no doubt subject to certain conditions. In reality the tail-race was ill-constructed and the embankment on the Montreal side was nearly three feet higher than that on the south or Verdun side. The consequence was that when the river rose it backed up into the tail-race constructed over the territory of the Montreal Harbour Board and flowed entirely over the lower embankment inundating the town of Verdun to a depth of from six to twelve feet. Even at the present moment the water has receded very slightly on account of that embankment. It seems to me that under these circumstances the harbour board, which is under the control of the Dominion government, must to a certain extent be at fault. It was the duty, I deem it, of the harbour board, permission having been granted the city of Montreal to construct this tail-race to see that it was constructed with embankments suitable to protect the surrounding territory from floods. In this instance the damage has been very considerable; it is impossible to estimate it as the district is still flooded, but I venture to say that it will considerably exceed the sum of $200,000. Under these circumstances I appeal to the government. It seems to me to be their duty to see to it that the harbour board, which is under its control so far as its works and its finances are concerned, insists upon the complete fulfilment of the terms and conditions upon which the city of Montreal was permitted to construct this tail-race, and that if these conditions have not been carried out they should be. If the accident is due to failure, on the part of those who constructed that tail-race, to construct it in a manner, which would have prevented the dreadful accident that has happened to the town of Verdun, then, by bringing pressure to bear on the harbour board it is possible for the government even now to remedy to a large extent the evil which has been done, because attention given to-day to this embankment by the proper authorities would cause the water to flow back into the river and the town of Verdun to be relieved from the present inundation.

One word more. The calamity is a very considerable one as the right hon. the Premier (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) is probably aware. Verdun is a suburb of Montreal which has been built up largely by the labouring classes, who have bought small pieces of land and built residences. The damage done to their small residences is very great indeed, and I think it would be the duty of the government if that inundation is not the result of purely natural causes, but is due to defective carrying out of works in the harbour of Montreal for which to a certain extent the harbour commissioners may be held responsible, that damage being so extensive, to consider the propriety of giving some assistance to the town of Verdun. We are told that the government had a very large surplus last year and will probably have one this year. A small proportion of that surplus might very well be applied to the relief of the people who have suffered from this sudden and great calamity.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister. I do not think my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) has rightly apprehended the position of the harbour commissioners of Montreal. It is not exactly in accordance with the facts to state that they are under the control of the government. The harbour commissioners of the city of Montreal are an absolutely independent body, composed, it is true, of certain nominees of the government but also of members elected by certain public bodies in that city. We have control over the harbour commissioners to this extent, that if we advance them money for public works we then retain the right of approving the plans. I do not think that the public works to which my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) referred, particularly to the embankment built some years ago, by the city of Montreal I believe, not by the harbour commissioners, but with their permission, are in that category. If I am correctly informed, this embankment was built before the time of the present government, some twelve or fifteen years ago. If I correctly apprehended what my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) said, the embankment was constructed by the city of Montreal with the approval of the harbour commissioners in order to protect the city of Montreal from the floods. I have always understood up to this year that this embankment had been very effective in securing this result, because for many years the city of Montreal has been free from the inundations which had been of almost annual occurrence before the construction of this embankment. This year, however, the inundation unfortunately seems to have been of a more heavy character than previously and the flood has overstepped the top of the bank and the embankment has prevented the water flowing back into the river, so that instead of being a protection, the embankment has become an obstacle to the natural flow of the water. I do not think that any liability rests upon the government in this matter. I do not think either that there is any liability upon the harbour commissioners, but as to that I will not express an opinion. If there is any liability at all it must be against the city of Montreal. But my hon. friend put the matter before us on another consideration. He has represented, and represented very truly, that the village of Verdun is composed of poor people, labourers and mechanics, chiefly, who have put all their savings in their houses. The damage which to a man in other circumstances would not be very material, is no doubt oppressive to them, and my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) rather appealed to the sympathy of the House for assistance. My hon. friend (Mr. Monk) knows that in doing this he raises a question which is not free from difficulties. Time and again we have been appealed to in this House to contribute to the assistance of men who had lost property not by water but by fire. Only in exceptional circumstances has parliament seen fit to come to the relief of sufferers in such cases. It was done when the disastrous fire took place in Ottawa in 1900. Although there was another fire later on and serious fires in different places last year, the government did not think it desirable to ask parliament for contributions because it was thought and rightly thought I believe, that the immediate help and relief which the parties needed could be secured from their own neighbourhood. However, my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) may rest assured that the government will give this matter the best consideration they can. More than this I do not think they would be justified in saying at this moment.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, 'That Mr. Speaker no now leave the Chair, for the House to go into committee to consider a certain resolution concerning the ratification of the agreement between His Majesty the King and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, dated the 8th day of March, 1904;' and the proposed motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR (South Leeds). Mr. Speaker; representing as I do one of the largest tax paying constituencies in the province of Ontario, I feel it my duty to protest, both by voice and vote, against the iniquitous proposition to build a transcontinental railway in partnership with the Grand Trunk Railway Company. This is a measure which if carried out—and I believe it will not be carried out, because before the government proceed very far they will be forced by the electorate of Canada to call a halt—but if it be carried out, it will increase the liability of the people of Canada to an amount equal to more than half the present national debt. The net debt of Canada is to-day about $268,000,000, and according to the most reliable figures that could be given to this House both by the late Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) and by the leader of the opposition—and no one has attempted to controvert these figures—the building of this railway will impose upon Canada a liability amounting to somewhere between $150,000,000 and $170,000,000. Let me point out to the people of this country that this will involve a liability of $25 taxation upon every man, woman and child in the Dominion to-day; it will involve a tax of abount $125 on every family of five in the Dominion; it will involve a tax of about $150 on every voter in the Dominion; it will involve a liability of $800,000 for every rural constituency in the Dominion; it will involve a liability equal to about $100,000 on every township in the province of Ontario and the other provinces of the Dominion. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that I would not be fit to represent the taxpayers of the county of Leeds, if I allow this measure to pass without raising a protest on their behalf; a protest against this government placing such a liability of taxation on every inhabitant in this Dominion.

Let me ask each elector in Canada: how he would like to be called upon by this government to endorse the Grand Trunk Railway Company's note for $150, and that is practically what this measure means to every voter in the Dominion. Let me ask the head of every family in the Dominion how he would like to be called upon to endorse the Grand Trunk Railway Company's note for $125; let me ask the people of every township in Ontario, how they would like to have this government mortgage their municipality for $100,000 for the purpose of carrying out this scheme? And yet, Sir, that is what it means. It is true that the electors of these municipalities may never be called upon to pay this money. It is like the national debt, the principal will never be paid off, but every man in Canada will in future years have to reckon that he will pay a pretty stiff sum annually to meet the interest. The Prime Minister and his followers have stated that this measure was fully threshed out last session, and that there was no need to discuss it again. Why, Sir, the Bill that we discussed last session became law, and if it has not been carried out it is the fault of the Grand Trunk, and if the government did their duty, the fact that the Grand Trunk Company broke the agreement would impel them to relieve the country from the grievous burden which this contract casts upon it. The resolution now in your hands, Mr. Speaker, is a different matter entirely from the Bill we discussed here last year. This resolution not only revives the Act that was passed last session, but it modifies it, and modifies it very materially. The right hon. the Prime Minister has told us that the modifications are so trivial that they are hardly worth discussing. But what do the people representing the Grand Trunk say as to that? Let us look at what was said by the directors of the Grand Trunk Company to their shareholders in London, England, a few days ago. When the first agreement was entered into between the government and the Grand Trunk Railway, one of the directors, a Mr. Allen, tendered his resignation, and his action was discussed at the recent meeting of the Grand Trunk shareholders. It is true that we have seen in the newspapers, report of that meeting, but I hold in my hand a verbatim report of every word that was said there by the president of the Grand Trunk Railway, and by his directors. Some extracts have been read to the House already, but I feel it necessary to again quote from this lengthy report. Mr. Smithers, one of the directors, speaking in the presence of Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson, said:

> I wish to say, with all respect to Mr. Allen, that the statement which he puts forward to-day really relates to the agreement, or what he thought was the agreement when he left the board; but it does not relate to that agreement which we present to you to-day; that which we present to you to-day is a much more modified and a much more favourable agreement.

Here is the statement of the Grand Trunk authorities, that the present agreement is not the agreement of a year ago, but that it is a much more favourable one for the company, and a greatly modified agreement, and yet, the Prime Minister says that the modifications are so trivial that we should not waste time discussing them. Which do you think the people of Canada will believe—the statement of the Prime Minister, or the statement of the directors of the Grand Trunk Railway to their shareholders.

I do not propose to discuss the legal or the financial questions involved in this measure. The leader of the opposition has ably discussed this phase of the case, and not one man on the other side of the House has yet attempted to reply to a single argument that our leader has made in that connection. But, Sir, while I shall not discuss the legal or the financial aspect of the measure, I purpose discussing features of the Bill for a few moments from the point of view of a practical common sense business man. The right hon. the Prime Minister says that this is a business government. Well, look at what this business government has done right out here in front of the parliament buildings. The ministers cannot shift responsibility for the matter to which I am about to refer, because it has been done right under the eyes of every member of the Cabinet.

We have a number of walks around these buildings, and we have had a heavy fall of snow this winter. Would any business man, in order to move the snow from these walks, do as this government has done—hire an army of men with teams and sleds, to haul it on the grounds and pile it mountains high? The right hon. Prime Minister promised to furnish us with mountains of information. He had to furnish mountains of some kind, and therefore he hired an army of men and teams to haul the snow and pile it up in mountains twenty or thirty feet high; and then we had photographers coming and taking photographs of it. Now he has to hire more men to come with pick-axes and shovels to cut down the mountains of snow and scatter it over the lawn. If the snow had to be hauled away from the walks, why was it not hauled to the hillside and thrown down into the river, as any business man would have done? This is an illustration of the way in which this businesslike government manages everything it touches. Where did the business capacity of this government come in when it granted the Crow's Nest Pass Railway Company an increased subsidy? We know they had a troublesome question to deal with at that time. They had to remove Joe Martin from the city of Winnipeg, where he was a disturbing element, and they went to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and said: 'We want to move Joe Martin; give him $10,000 for five or six years, and take him away.' They said: 'Yes, but we have to be recouped; you increase the Crow's Nest Pass Railway subsidy, and we will.' Martin was removed, and the subsidy was increased to more than half as much again as the Conservative government had offered. How is the business capacity of this government illustrated in the case of the Yukon Railway? When the government introduced the Yukon Railway Bill, we heard an apppeal on its behalf as strong as the one the Prime Minister made last session on behalf of the Grand Trunk Pacific. We were told that if the Yukon Railway were not built, we would lose that country. The government entered into a contract, and their supporters helped to carry it through the House; but as soon as they did that, they ran over to the Senate and asked them for God's sake to kill the Bill. The Senate did kill the Bill; for, thank God, we had a Senate then that would not allow such an iniquitous Bill to pass. Let me ask where the business capacity of this government came in when they were dealing with the Grand Trunk Railway Company for terminal facilities in connection with the extension of the Intercolonial to Montreal when they paid two or three times their value for the favours they got from them?

Then, let me ask the right hon. the Prime Minister: when the people of this country were liberated from the bargain, the unbusinesslike bargain, which he had made with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company last session, by that company having voided the agreement by their own act, why did he not say, let the matter rest there? Or why did he not take the other course, and ask the people of this country whether they wanted to go into this scheme or not? He was ready to appeal to the country; the 'Globe' had made the announcement, 'Get ready for battle, the elections are on;' but he was afraid to trust the electors—he wanted to carry out the scheme independently of them. He knew the question that would come up before them in every constituency. The electors would say, we do not want our constituency to be mortgaged for $800,000; therefore if you want to go on with this scheme, we will have to put a government in that will not carry it out. But the right hon. gentleman was afraid to trust the electors. The only reason he did not go before them was because he could not collect the tolls to carry on the campaign with. If he had got the necessary funds from the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, we would have had an election; but failing in that, he goes to the company and makes a new bargain, knowing that he had a majority behind him who would vote it through, and called a special session for that purpose. As soon as this Bill is carried through, if rumour be true, he is going to appoint his left hand to look after the work. It is said that Premier Ross, of Ontario, is his right hand and Premier Parent, of Quebec, is his left hand; and it is said that he intends to appoint the Prime Minister of Quebec as his commissioner to expend all these millions of dollars and to let all these contracts. In this way he hopes to get a campaign fund to help him to carry the elections with the aid of the Prime Minister of Ontario, his right hand. That right hand is tied up in a sling at present. He hopes, with the help of that right hand and this large campaign fund which the Hon. Mr. Parent expects to collect, that he will be able to bid defiance to the people of Canada and come back here with a majority. But I do not think the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company can furnish enough money to buy the government into power again at the next election. It is true, the government made a contract with the Yukon Railway people, which was cancelled, and the country had to pay $328,000 of damages as the result to the parties with whom they had made the contract. We do not know what work they did ; but somebody got that sum of money in connection with that Yukon Railway contract. If they did, it was a grand thing for the country that that contract was cancelled, as this contract will be cancelled just as soon as an appeal is made to the country, and the Conservative party are returned to power, as they will be. This iniquitous contract will be cancelled, and if some damages have to be paid, it will be money well spent in the interest of the country rather than carry out the present scheme as proposed by the government.

Let me ask the right hon. the Prime Minister when he received a mandate from the people of this country to go into partnership with the Grand Trunk Railway Company. The Grand Trunk Railway people say they have gone into partnership with the government of Canada. The Prime Minister does not admit the corn ; but it is a fact nevertheless, as is proven by the statements made at the annual meeting of the shareholders of the company, as reported in this document which I hold in my hand. If the government have gone into partnership with the Gand Trunk Railway, why not with the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Canadian Northern Railway, the Canada Atlantic, and all the other railways that we have in Canada ? If it is a good thing to go into partnership with one railway, why not with all of them ? The president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, at the annual meeting of the shareholders the other day, said :

> Having arrived then at the conclusion that the best interests of the company necessitated some early measure in the direction I have indicated, we caused a Bill to be introduced into the Canadian parliament for securing a charter of incorporation for the creation of a company, with an independent organization, but in close connection with and under the control of the Grand Trunk Company, for the purpose of building a line of railway from a point of junction at or on the Grand Trunk line, passing through the most fertile districts of the Northwest, and terminating at a port on the Pacific coast.

These are the words of Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson in addressing the directors and shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway, and he went on to say :

Mr. TAYLOR.

Without engaging in any way the credit of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Company. (Hear, hear.) Such was my conviction at that time—(A voice, 'I hope it is now')—founded upon reasonable data, and in view of the precedents to which I have alluded, I must confess that when I made that suggestion I appear to have been somewhat over-sanguine, not sufficiently considering, perhaps, the weight of political and interested opposition which the scheme was destined to encounter.

We find two kinds of opposition described there, the political opposition and the interested opposition. Where does the interested opposition come in? The Grand Trunk Railway came down with their scheme to build from North Bay west, but the interested opposition put their foot down and said : this road must run to Quebec and Moncton, or we will turn the government out. And rather than face the opposition in its own ranks, the government tacked on to the Grand Trunk Railway scheme the eastern section from Winnipeg to Quebec and thence on to Moncton. Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson wound up as follows :

> As a result, however, of the negotiations with the government, another Bill was introduced by the government itself for ensuring the construction of the contemplated line from New Brunswick to the Pacific in joint partnership between the government and the Grand Trunk Pacific Company.

On page 8 he is reported as having said :

> The result, therefore, of the agreement was a combination of these two interests for the construction of the proposed road which would thus be carried out, as I have said, by means of a partnership between the government and the Grand Trunk Pacific Company.

Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson plainly says that his company has gone into partnership with the government to build this line of railway from Moncton to the Pacific coast. But further on he adds that the partnership only involved an expenditure by the Grand Trunk Railway of $14,500,000, while the government agreed to put from $150,000,000 to $170,000,000 into the scheme. The government put in ten times as much as the Grand Trunk Railway, but whenever the profits come to be divided, not a dollar will go to the government. They all go into the pockets of the Grand Trunk Railway. And what do we get in exchange ? Does this businesslike government even secure to our farmers and manufacturers a control of freight rates ? Not a bit of it. The country furnishes the great bulk of the capital, and the company runs the thing to suit itself and takes all the profits. That is the kind of partnership into which this businesslike government has entered. Do you think, Sir, that the farmers and taxpayers of this country will approve of such a bargain when they come to cast their votes at the next election? Would it not be better, since we are to be committed to an expenditure of from $150,000,000 to $170,000,000, to spend another $14,000,000 or $15,000,000 and own and operate the road ourselves ? Then we would give to our farmers and business men control of the rates. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that this road is required in order to give railway competition in our Northwest, so that we may get cheaper freight rates, but experience shows that this will not be the case. Why, we have got the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway running into almost every town in Canada to-day. Is there any competition between them ? I challenge any hon. gentleman on that side, any farmer, any business man of the country to say, if they have a quantity of freight which they want to send from Montreal to Toronto, Guelph or London, that they will get a cheaper rate because the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway are in competition at those points. You will find, Sir, that the rates charged by each company are the same. There is not a business man who will say that the rate he will get on the Canadian Pacific Railway is not the same as that which he will get from the Grand Trunk Railway. There is no competition, and rates are equal, and the same thing will occur when the Grand Trunk Pacific builds its line to the Northwest. They will charge the same rates as other railways, and the government will not have any control. But let the government put another $15,000,000 into the road, and extend it on the plan suggested by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, and our farmers will own the road and control the rates and the other railways will have to meet the government rate, whatever it may be. My hon. friend from Elgin (Mr. Jabel Robinson), gave a very good illustration yesterday of the kind of partnership into which the government has entered with the Grand Trunk Railway. The government is to get all the crow and the Grand Trunk Railway all the turkey. I once heard of a farmer who had accumulated quite a small fortune, and he made up his mind that he would retire from farming. He had a sum of $20,000, and said : if I could get a business man who understands business, I will put the money into some business and let the other man put in the experience. He met a business man and the business man said to him, I will put in my experience against your capital, and they drew up an agreement. They were to continue in business ten years ; each one was to draw out a thousand dollars for living expenses ; and then at the end of ten years, the assets were to be equally divided. Each drew his thousand dollars a year for living expenses, and when the ten years were up and stock was taken they found that out of the $20,000 capital with which they started, they had assets left amounting to $10,000, of which the business man claimed half as his share. The farmer, in explaining the result, said, I have the experience, but my partner has the money. So it will be in this case. The Grand Trunk Railway will have the money and Canada will have the experience, and future generations will be loaded down with a heavy debt.

My hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Thompson) asked last night what the farmers and manufacturers were going to get out of this deal, and he went on to predict that when this road was completed the farmers will get their grain carried at a much less rate down to the sea-board, and the manufacturers would get cheaper rates to the west on their return cargoes. But, judging by the past, when the government has no control over the rates, the rates will be the same as they are now. Will any practical business man, who has been in business twenty-five years in Ontario, where we have competition between the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway, will any grain buyer say that he takes advantage of the competing rates between these railways during the winter to ship his grain to Montreal or any other part of Canada ? Not a bit of it. I have been in the grain business for twenty-five years. After the close of navigation in the fall, I store every bushel of grain that comes in from the farmers through the winter. They do the same at Kingston and at all the lake ports. And at other places they buy and ship by car to lake ports, where the grain is held in elevators until the opening of navigation, when it is sent to Montreal, and so to the old country. Hardly a bushel of wheat is transported from Ontario during the winter, but it is all held in elevators until the opening of navigation and then shipped by water. And so it will be with the Northwest, even if you have the Grand Trunk Pacific. From the close of navigation to the opening of it again, not a bushel of grain will be carried over the road. It will be handled as it is handled to-day—taken to Port Arthur and there stored in elevators until it can be sent out by water. Any that is not so handled will be retained in the farmers' hands or in local elevators until navigation opens. So, even if this road were built and if such grades could be found as the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) told us last session must be found, it could not be used as an outlet for the grain of the Northwest. And we do not know that such grades can be found or that any grades can be found. Judging by the information that the Prime Minister gives us, he does not know whether there is a country there at all or not. When he desired to tell us something about the country, he read the story of a Jesuit missionary who went through there some two hundred years ago. And that is all the information we have about that country and the only thing to help us in judging whether we can build a road there.

A rumour is current that the cabinet are not agreed on this scheme. Leading politicians throughout the country have told the members of the cabinet that this scheme is going to kill them when they get before the electors. But the ministers, one after another, shrug their shouders and say; It is not my baby: I have nothing to do with it: The Prime Minister will have to father this child. I would like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) and the Postmaster General (Sir Wm. Mulock) if these rumours are true, and if it is a fact that they are trying to throw the whole responsibility for this scheme on the Prime Minister in order that they may escape scot free. It is notable that these gentlemen have not risen to their feet to defend this scheme; and I do not think they will. But I will say this, in concluding my remarks, that if the members of the cabinet are agreed, and if they will undertake, as soon as this session is over to go to the country, to appeal to the jury, to ask the taxpayers to say whether this bargain which the government has made is a wise one or not, the electors of Canada will not send a corporal's guard back here to support the Prime Minister who is attempting to rush this scheme through the House.

Mr. T. CHASE CASGRAIN (Montmorency). Mr. Speaker, in the introduction last year of the measure concerning the National Transcontinental Railway and in the introduction of the resolutions we are now discussing, a peculiar spectacle, it seems to me, is presented. Last year the measure was not introduced by the gentleman who, according to the ordinary course of business, should have introduced it—the Minister of Railways. The measure was introduced by the Prime Minister. In fact, as we all know, the Minister of Railways not only did not introduce the measure, but actually saw fit to resign his seat as a protest against the policy of the government. Here was a man who had been brought here as a railway expert, who was not in the House in 1896 when this government was formed, but who was chosen specially by the Prime Minister to administer that important department. And this gentleman thought fit, instead of shouldering the responsibility of that important measure, to retire from the government. This year we have this peculiar spectacle—that the amendments to the contract which was approved by the House last year, instead of being introduced by the Minister of Railways, are also introduced by the Prime Minister. And, when the necessity arises for the support of this measure by gentlemen on the other side, we find that the member of the cabinet to speak in support of it is not the Minister of Railways, but the Minister of the Interior. I say that that is a peculiar circumstance and one which may well be commented upon. Is it true that the measure now before the House does not receive the support or endorsation of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Emmerson)? Is that the reason why he has nothing to say in support of this important measure which has been discussed by the House for almost a week? Is it true that, instead of supporting it he also is thinking of resigning from the cabinet, following the example of his illustrious predecessor? Sir, it is an important question. Two ministers have spoken upon the measure. Though at the outset it had been decided, I believe, that nobody on the other side was to speak, the arguments put before this House by hon. members on this side have been so potent and so forceful that man after man on the other side has felt obliged to rise in his place and defend the course which ministers of the Crown themselves will not defend.

From what the right hon. leader of the House said the other day, the object of the government in introducing the measure last year and also in introducing the changes made by this supplemental contract, is a two-fold object: First that the traffic of the west shall be brought through Canadian channels down to the eastern seaports of Canada, and, second that, by running this line from west to east all through the Dominion of Canada, we shall open up, develop and help in colonizing the vast regions of country now undeveloped, but fit for cultivation and colonization. I propose, very briefly to review the policy of the government on these two points and to contrast with the policy of the government the policy of the opposition.

It seems to me that it is absolutely necessary now to discuss the first proposition—that by building this railway and especially by building the eastern portion from Winnipeg to Quebec and Moncton, we hope to bring the enormous traffic of the west through Canadian channels to our seaports on the Atlantic and our ports in the province of Quebec, especially Montreal and Quebec. This question has been threshed out; it has been discussed not only in the House and in the press, but by the most competent men in the country; and it seems to me that there is not a man in this House and not a man in this country who to-day believes that the National Transcontinental line, more particularly that portion from Winnipeg to Moncton, is going to be a competitor of our national waterways. We have to look to the experience of the past, we have to consider what has been done upon this continent to understand whether, under the same circumstances in Canada we can compete by railway with the waterways which have been given us by Providence. What has been done in the United States? What is being done in the United States to-day? Does anybody believe that it has been possible in the past or that it is possible now for the railways to compete with the waterways? Why, Sir, we have been told, and it is true, that the enterprising Americans are about to spend $101,000,000 in improving the Erie canal. What is that for ? Simply because the railways in the United States cannot compete with the waterways, and that is the way by which our enterprising neighbours wish to bring the great traffic of their western country and of the Canadian Northwest through their own channels into their own ports. Does the House believe, does anybody believe, that if this were not so, such an enormous sum of money would be spent in improving waterways in the United States ?

Now it seems to me that a very good argument was given to us the other day by the Minister of the Interior when he told the House that, having deepened the canals from nine to fourteen feet, the result had been to bring not only a large portion of the Canadian traffic from the Northwest through Canadian channels down to our sea-ports, but a large portion of the American traffic as well. Now if that is so, it seems to me the argument is in our favour, and it is a conclusive argument as coming from the other side ; it shows that it will be impossible for this line of railway from Winnipeg to Quebec and Moncton to compete during the summer months with the waterways. But the hon. gentleman went further, and everybody who was present at the time heard him say that it is impossible for us to believe that the railways will compete during the summer with the waterways which exist now. Therefore it seems to me that this feature of the government's policy is a mistaken one so far as the eastern division of the line is concerned. If it is true that during the summer months, with the improvements which we are now making in our waterways, with the improvements that have already been made, we cannot bring the traffic of the west down to our ports, then one of the principal arguments in favour of this policy of the government falls to the ground, one of the principal arguments which would appeal to those who are specially interested in the province of Quebec, disappears.

Now, Sir, last year, so far back as the 19th of May a commission was appointed to inquire into this question which my right hon. friend the leader of the House has called a complicated and involved question, the transportation question. If this commission had been appointed when it should have been appointed, if it had been organized when it should have been organized, it would already have done a great deal of work, and probably we would now have its report before this House to aid us in discussing in an intelligent manner this question which is so complicated and involved, to use the words of my right hon. friend. Now suppose this commission gets to work, that this commission composed of competent men studies the question, studies the circumstances, to ascertain what is the best for this country, and comes to the conclusion, as almost everybody has already come to the conclusion, that this railway cannot compete with the waterways, in what position will the government be ? The government will be in the position in which it deserves to be, it will have before its eyes the evidence given by its own nominees on this commission, that the traffic from the west down to the seaports on the Atlantic, will never come by this railway.

Now, Sir, what is the policy of the opposition upon this point ? We propose to take a leaf out of the policy which was followed by the United States of America. What has happened there ? I am not an admirer of everything that is done in the United States. I am not so fervent an admirer of that country as my right hon. friend once was, still I say that in matters of this kind, in matters of trade and transportation, they certainly have given us an example that we may follow. What have they done ? Why, Sir, they have aided nature in every possible way. See what they have done on Lake Superior, see what they have done at Duluth, see what they have done at Lake Erie, see what they have done at Buffalo. They have erected elevators, they have, as I said, aided nature at every step, and the consequence is that their ports of New York, Boston, Philadelphia and Baltimore have been built up until they take rank amongst the greatest of the world. If the same policy were followed here, if instead of spending this enormous sum of money upon building a railway, which according to hon. gentlemen opposite, will never carry a fair proportion of the grain of the west, if instead of building that railway they had followed the policy which has been followed in the United States, we would see in the not distant future the ports of Montreal, Quebec, St. John and Halifax rivalling probably the great ports in the United States. Our policy is embodied in the amendment proposed by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, it is found in the third paragraph :

> The development and improvement of our canals and inland waterways, and the thorough and efficient equipment of our national ports and terminals on the Atlantic and Pacific as well as on the St. Lawrence and on the great lakes.

Now, Sir, it is true, and I give my hon. friends credit for it, that since they have come into power they have continued the work which was commenced by their predecessors, they have done a great deal towards improving the St. Lawrence route and the canals ; especially while the hon. member for St. Mary's (Mr. Tarte) was a member of the government, they did a great deal to improve the facilities in the port of Montreal. But I say that if we are to get any advantage from the traffic of our Northwest we should not stay our hand now, we should not content ourselves with what we have been doing in the past, instead of spending money uselessly on this railway between Winnipeg and Moncton, we should spend it upon our ports of Montreal, Quebec, St. John and Halifax, and upon our waterways, so as to give us all the advantages which may be derived from the carriage of this immense traffic from the west to the Atlantic.

Now I come to the second argument which is used by our hon. friends opposite to induce the people of the country to support their scheme. They say that this line of railway, if it does not bring down a fair proportion of the traffic of the west through Canadian channels to our seaport towns, it will at all events develop the undeveloped regions of Quebec and Ontario. However, before dealing with that point, let me give the House what I think to be the opinion of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company itself upon the question as to whether this line from Winnipeg to Quebec and Moncton is going to be anything like as successful as our hon. friends pretend. Let me recall for a moment what took place in the Railway Committee of this House last session. We all know that by the notice which was first given by the Grand Trunk Pacific, their intention was to build a line from North Bay westward ; the first notice given in the official 'Gazette' on the 10th of January, 1903, was to that effect, the railway was to start from some point near North Bay or Gravenhurst in the province of Ontario, and to be carried west. Well, Sir, the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Wade) when he addressed the House the other day, told us that this plan had been adopted by the Grand Trunk Pacific. The minutes of the meeting of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company were read before the House the other day, in which we saw that Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson said in unmistakable terms that the policy of this company was to build a line from some point near North Bay westward towards the Pacific Ocean. So there can be no doubt on that question. Afterwards, however, it is in the memory of everybody that the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, through Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson and Mr. Hays as their spokesmen, told the committee that they had decided to change their plans and extend their line from North Bay or Gravenhurst or, at all events, from some point near there, eastward as far as Quebec. Afterwards, if I am to believe the hon. member for Annapolis, such pressure was brought to bear upon the government that the line was not only to be extended from North Bay to Quebec but from Quebec to Moncton. I do not know what the reasons were. I do not know whether this was a condition imposed upon the government to carry out this scheme of aiding the Railway. I do not know whether members from Quebec or the maritime provinces went to the government and said : If you propose to give subsidies to the Grand Trunk Pacific on its line from North Bay westward, we will not support you unless you extend the line into Quebec and the maritime provinces. I do not know whether that condition was imposed by these members on the government, but, be that as it may, the policy of the Grand Trunk Pacific was changed ; the officials of the Grand Trunk Pacific itself say that this was imposed on them, they had to change their policy and say they were going to build their line from North Bay to Quebec and thence to Moncton. Nobody ever believed for an instant that these gentlemen were going to build that line. I for one never for an instant thought that when Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson or Mr. Hays told us they were going to embody, and later did embody, in the Bill a proviso by which they were enabled to build this line eastward, that they were going to do it, and that that was the policy of their company. To test their sincerity, I one morning put the question to Mr. Hays in the Railway Committee whether he would consent to put a proviso in the Bill declaring that he would begin building the eastern division of his line before beginning to build the western division, and I took down his words as he gave them in answering that question on the 7th of May, 1903. My memorandum reads :

> Mr. Hays states that he has no objection to incorporate in the Bill a provision by which the company would undertake to build the section from Winnipeg to Moncton first.

From that very moment I, in common with a number of other members of the committee, saw that Mr. Hays and the Grand Trunk Pacific Company never had any intention of building the line from Winnipeg to Quebec. Mr. Hays at that particular time was ready to promise anything, and if I had asked him for a special car and a nigger porter to take me from the east to the west for ever on this new line, he would have promised it to me. We saw from the very first, especially from the willingness with which Mr. Hays and those with him promised everything that this was simply an effort to throw sand in our eyes in order to get the Bill through, particularly the part of it which dealt with the rich western part of the country through which they desire their line to run. If this had been a business proposition to build this line from Winnipeg east to Quebec and Moncton, does any one think that the promoters of the Grand Trunk Pacific, who are business men and who were trying to get enabling powers to build this line so as to increase and improve their traffic, they would not have built this eastern line themselves ? Only two or three days after I had put this question to Mr. Hays, the hon. member for St. Mary's division (Mr. Tarte) put the same question to him, but he changed his mind and, instead of giving a direct answer, as he had given to me—probably he did not think I was as important a man as the hon. member for St. Mary's division (Mr. Tarte) and that I was a little more easily fooled, to use an expression which is perhaps not quite correct—he gave an evasive answer. He would not answer my hon. friend (Mr. Tarte), and only two or three days after that it was announced that the government was going to build this line. Why? Because the promoters of the Grand Trunk Pacific saw themselves tied up and saw that they could not get around some of us in the Railway Committee, and that they would be bound to do some things which they never contemplated doing. It was then that the government came to their assistance, and for the purpose of carrying this scheme through undertook to build the eastern part of the line from Winnipeg to Quebec and from Quebec to Moncton. I say again that this is probably the best evidence we can get that this is not a business line, and is not at all calculated to carry any of the products of the west; that if it had been a business line certainly these business men would have taken it up and, instead of shouldering it upon the government of the country and forcing the government to build it, would have built it themselves. I shall revert to this later on, when I come to the changes made by the supplementary agreement, because the policy of the Grand Trunk Pacific has been carried out from the very inception of this measure through the original agreement down to the supplemental agreement which is now before this House for its approval.

Let me now return to the colonization part of the scheme. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that if this line is not calculated to bring down the products of the west towards the east and to our sea-board cities, if it is not calculated to give Quebec and Montreal their fair share of that enormous traffic, at all events—and this is the argument which is used in the province of Quebec—it will open up and develop and help to colonize vast regions of Quebec which have hitherto been unknown, unexplored and undeveloped. It seems strange to me that we should go into these unexplored regions to find lands fit for cultivation. I would like some one to gather from the mountains of information put before this House last year by the government some information upon this undeveloped region which will show the House that it is important for us to vote such an enormous amount of money towards developing these undeveloped regions. If it is true that there are mountains of information upon this subject, and that the little book which was put before this House last session contains such information as will furnish a good argument to this House and to the country to convince them that this line should be built and these lands developed, why is it that no one on the other side of the House has even referred to this book to show that there are regions there fit for cultivation and colonization? My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) the other day when he gave us some reasons why we should develop these undeveloped regions cited Father Albanel and he spoke of the roses which grow in June in these distant regions. That was very good poetry, and it reminded me very much of the song of the wandering minstrel in the Mikado, when he sang of the 'The Flowers that Bloom in the Spring.'

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. They had nothing to do with the case.

Mr. CASGRAIN. There was a good deal of poetry in that, but very little business. I believe it is true that this part of the line will cost at least $50,000,000, and when I say that I am putting a low estimate upon the line 900 miles long in the province of Quebec alone, through a territory about which no one knows anything.

I ask my hon. friends if they cannot find, from the standpoint of colonization, better lands on which to spend $50,000,000 than these wild lands, which are further north than the Laurentide hills. What is the policy of the opposition upon this point? I am speaking now more especially for the province of Quebec, although this is not a provincial question. I say that if we had in view the colonization and development of the province of Quebec by the building of railways, we can find enormous tracts of land in the developed portions of the province where we can more usefully spend this $50,000,000.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. And build railways.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Yes, and build railways. Let me point out that in the province of Quebec we have millions and millions of vacant land, awaiting settlement and cultivation. The 'Guide du Colon' for 1903, speaking only of a very small portion of the province of Quebec, says:

> In the higher valleys of the Rouge, the Lièvre, of the Little Nation and the Gatineau alone, there are 250,000 acres of arable land of the best quality.

That statement is to be found in a book published under the authority of the Quebec government. It speaks of the northwestern region of Montreal and the St. Lawrence valley, and it goes on to say:

> The extent of land surveyed and actually offered for sale in the agencies of the Lake St. John district amount to more than 2,000,000 acres.

In addition to that we have the Lake Temiscouata valley, the Metapedia valley, and the Gaspé peninsula in which my hon. friend the Solicitor General is so interested. If we have money to burn; if we have $50,000,000 to spend on a railway which will not develop the province of Quebec nor bring the trade of the Northwest to our ports of Quebec and Montreal; why not spend $10,000,000, or $20,000,000, or $30,000,000, to develop these regions which are now awaiting settlement, and the establishment of railway communication? It is estimated by competent authority, that in the province of Quebec we have land actually available for settlement, the climate and possibilities of which we know of, that will provide room for two hundred new parishes, and for at least 2,000,000 inhabitants, and that land is not north of the Laurentian range either. Why is not some of this money spent to benefit the known and settled parts of the province, and to help bring in these two million more inhabitants for which we have ample accommodation. My hon. friend from Jacques-Cartier (Mr. Monk) has pointed out the necessities of the province of Quebec from a colonization point of view, and my hon. friend from St. John's and Iberville (Mr. Demers) who followed him, did not attempt to answer his argument. The hon. member (Mr. Demers) did not answer that part of the argument of my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) which referred to the development and colonization of certain portions of the province of Quebec; and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Demers) said nothing, or almost nothing, about the railways that should be built in that province if we have so much money to spend. I understand that the Solicitor General is to follow me, if I am to be favoured with a reply, and we know that he is very much interested in the question of increasing the federal subsidy to the provinces.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Hear, hear.

Mr. CASGRAIN. The Solicitor General made a very eloquent and elaborate address upon that question last year, and he announced his belief that the subsidy from the federal government to the provincial governments should be very materially increased. This is the time for him to act. If it is not the policy of the present government to increase the provincial subsidy, let him insist that they should do something for the province of Quebec on the lines he laid down laid last session. If we can spend $50,000,000 on this transcontinental railway, which will be useless to develop the province of Quebec, why does not the Solicitor General insist that the government shall aid the construction of railways which will develop those portions of the province of Quebec which are to-day settled, and which will afford communication between the great commercial centres and the rural districts of that province? We know that there are many railways which can be constructed in Quebec, to the great advantage of the people of that province. Take the south shore of the St. Lawrence. Session after session demands have been made upon the government to build a railway in that section of the province. To-day there is a railway from Montreal to Sorel, which sometimes runs and sometimes does not run; but between Sorel and Lévis, through these rich parishes, there is no railway communication whatever, and the people have to travel for miles to use either the Intercolonial Railway or the Grand Trunk. Why should not a part of this $50,000,000 be devoted to building a railway on the south shore, so that the long settled parishes in that district should have proper railway facilities? Take the region north of Montreal and Nominingue; take the much desired railway connection between the Intercolonial Railway and the Matane peninsula. Every one knows that the people of Matane have been clamouring for railway facilities. The soil of that district is fertile; there is a rich lumbering country there; and the farmers would be well to do if they had the railway facilities which are denied them, and which could be amply provided for with a portion of this $50,000,000 How long have the people of the Gaspé peninsula been asking for railway communication? The railway extends now from Metapedia to New Carlisle and the people have been petitioning again and again that it shall be extended to Gaspé basin. The Solicitor General has before parliament a scheme for a railway from New Carlisle to Gaspé basin, and through the interior of the peninsula, but if this vast sum of money is to be spent on a so-called National Transcontinental Railway, does the Solicitor General think, that there will be any money left with which to subsidize this railway in which he is so interested? I again repeat, that instead of putting $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 into the eastern extension of this road, the policy of the government should be—as it is the policy of this side of the House—to give railway facilities to the people of Quebec who are already established on their farms, and who for years and years have been suffering for the lack of railway accommodation.

Now, Sir, I come to the changes which are proposed in this contract. My theory is, that from the very inception the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company looked upon the eastern extension as useless, and that they looked upon the expenditure of money upon it as wasteful. What are the changes which this supplementary contract makes in the original contract with the Grand Trunk? I do not intend to go into all the facts; I frankly admit that I do not consider myself a competent critic on the purely financial changes which are proposed; but, Sir, some of the changes are very interesting and I shall refer to them. In the original contract the railroad was to be completed in 1908, but that is extended for three years, and the completion is now fixed for the year 1911. This change has an important bearing on the two following clauses of the supplemental contract. The original contract provided that the equipment should be worth $20,000,000 and out of this $20,000,000 worth of rolling stock, $5,000,000 worth was to be marked as belonging to, or as serving to equip the eastern division. We find now in the second paragraph of the supplemental contract, that this $20,000,000 worth of rolling stock is reduced to $15,000,000.

I will not go into the question whether this second paragraph repeals the clause in the original contract which provides that the line shall be equipped with $20,000,000 worth of rolling stock. But what I say is this. It was considered necessary for the equipment of the whole line that $20,000,000 worth of rolling stock should be provided; but under the new agreement only $15,000,000 worth is to be provided, and $5,000,000 worth is to be used when the eastern section is ready. So I take it that the Grand Trunk Pacific Company said to themselves: The $20,000,000 worth of rolling stock was to be provided for the whole line, both the western and the eastern sections; but we know that the eastern section will never be built; we are convinced that it is only a fake; therefore we will take the original amount, $15,000,000, which we were to provide for the western section, and apply it to the whole line, and will simply mark $5,000,000 off, to be used when the eastern section is ready to be operated. I take it that the reason that was done was that the company were convinced that $20,000,000 worth of rolling stock would never be required, because the eastern section would never be built, and therefore it would not be necessary to take the $5,000,000 worth of rolling stock for the eastern division, but it would simply be necessary to put $15,000,000 worth on the whole line, that is, on the western division, the only division which they contemplated would ever be built. What does the third clause say:

> Pending the completion of the eastern division by the government, the company shall be entitled to lease from the commissioners, to be appointed under the said Act, and to operate such portions of the said eastern division as may from time to time be completed.

What does that mean? It means that probably the Grand Trunk Pacific Company will force the government to build the line from Winnipeg to North Bay, following out their original plan, and will be able to lease that portion of the line. The consequence will be that we shall have the original policy of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company carried out, and where does that let the traffic go? The reason my hon. friends were so averse to the original scheme of the Grand Trunk, if I am not mistaken, was that they were afraid that if the line was ever built as far as North Bay, the traffic of the west would be diverted to the Grand Trunk system, and, instead of being taken to Quebec or Montreal or Halifax or St. John, would be taken as usual to Portland, the American terminus of the railway. We had then, as we have now, the Grand Trunk system in the east as a competitor, and why should circumstances be so changed that if the railway is ever built as far as North Bay, the traffic will not be diverted from Canadian channels and Canadian ports to that American port of the Grand Trunk Railway? Further evidence of this is to be found in the way Sir Rivers-Wilson addressed his shareholders. This portion of his address has already been read to the House, but it seems to me that it is necessary that I should remind hon. gentlemen of what Sir Rivers-Wilson said. These are his words:

> The distance of 3,400 miles, which I mentioned just now, is split up as follows:—The distance from Moncton to Quebec, about 400 miles; from Quebec to North Bay, from the point of junction in connection with North Bay, about 500 miles—that makes 900 miles—and then to Winnipeg, another 1,000 miles. . . . The line will pass, as you will observe, from 100 to 150 miles north of North Bay, whence a branch line will connect it with the Grand Trunk system, and another branch line will be constructed from some point between Winnipeg and North Bay to a point on Lake Superior. The Grand Trunk Pacific Company will, undoubtedly, receive the usual subsidies per mile from the Dominion and Ontario governments in aid of the construction of these two branches.

So that the intention of Sir Rivers-Wilson and the other officials of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company and the Grand Trunk Company has not been changed. Their intention always has been to bring the line of railway down to North Bay, and thence send the traffic over their own system down to Portland. I will not refer to that part of the report which has been alluded to already, in which one of the shareholders at the meeting said in unmistakable terms that he gathered from an unofficial memorandum which had been handed around that the 500 miles from Quebec to North Bay were premature. So that, if all the arrangements entered into between the Grand Trunk Pacific company and the government in the supplemental contract are carried out, this one conclusion seems to be irresistible, that the eastern division will never be built, and that all the Grand Trunk Pacific Company will do will be to bring its line to North Bay to connect with its system in Canada and the United States.

Now, I have the presumption to believe that I have convinced some of my hon. friends on the other side of the House, and perhaps my right hon. friend the leader of the House, that this is a political scheme and nothing else. It is not a business scheme. This eastern division of the line cannot be used as a conveyor of the traffic from the Northwest down through Canadian channels. We have it from the lips of the hon. gentlemen opposite that it cannot be a competitor in bringing down western grain through Canadian channels to Canadian seaports. Therefore, it seems to me that instead of spending this money on unexplored regions as to whose climate or resources we know nothing, it would be far more businesslike and patriotic to spend this money in the known regions of the province of Quebec and Ontario.

Before sitting down, I desire to allude for a very short time to another question which has been discussed rather fully by my hon. friend from Hastings (Mr. Northrup) and my hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Wade); that is, the question as to the security which has been impaired by the supplemental contract. I allude to the question of the prior lien of the government; and it is one which will interest my hon. and learned friend the Solicitor General. The contract gives the government a prior mortgage on the railway itself and on the equipment. By the supplemental contract and the law the government will not have a prior lien on the equipment. Let me first recall what my hon. friend from East Hastings said the other day—that in the original contract it is nowhere said that the company shall acquire rolling stock to equip the western and eastern divisions; it is nowhere said that this equipment shall belong to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. We have the experience of all the railways on this continent that equipment and rolling stock are provided by companies which do that kind of business, and we have the declaration made by Sir Rivers-Wilson before his shareholders, that what has been done in the past by other railways is going to be done in connection with this particular railway, that is, that the rolling stock and equipment are to be provided by a trust. What does clause 7 of this supplemental contract say? According to the original contract, the mortgage upon the whole line, its equipment and all its appurtenances, was to be a first lien. Read the section itself of the original agreement, section 35:

> (a) A mortgage which shall be a first charge upon the railway undertaking, equipment and property, tolls, rights and franchises of the company, including all equipment and property to be thereafter acquired by the company but not including branch lines exceeding six miles in length, &c.

If that mortgage should be foreclosed, the usual consequences would follow. The road could be sold, admitting, for the sake of argument, that the government would have had, under that clause of the contract, a first mortgage. But what does clause 7 of the supplemental contract say? It says that in case of such default being made by the company in respect to the interest on the said bonds so guaranteed by the government as would entitle the government to foreclose, the mortgage is not to be foreclosed, but a receiver is to be appointed who is to manage the said western division, and who will receive all the tolls and revenues thereof, and pay the working expenses thereon, as defined by the Railway Act, 1903, including the expenses of such management or agency and will distribute the surplus tolls and revenue.

The House will notice that what the receiver or manager is to do is to pay out, first, the working expenses as defined by the Railway Act of last session, and if my hon. friend will refer to the Railway Act, section 2, subsection cc., he will see that working expenditure is defined as follows.

> The expression 'working expenditure' means and includes all expenses of maintenances of that railway and all such tolls, rents or annual sums as are paid in respect of property leased to or held by the company, apart from the rent of any leased line, or in respect of the hire of rolling stock to the company.

So that the manager and receiver, under the 7th clause of the supplemental contract, will pay out, first, before he distributes anything to the bondholders and mortgagees, all tolls, rents, or annual sums, in respect of property leased to or held by the company or in respect of the hire of rolling stock let to the company. It seems to me there can be nothing plainer than that. But this question has come up several times before the courts both in this country and the United States, and what has been decided Let me first of all refer to a case which came before the Supreme Court of Canada, in which the question was not decided, it is true, but in which a very important opinion was expressed upon it, by the late Chief Justice Sir Henry Strong. I refer to the case of Walbridge vs. Farwell, and the Ontario Car and Foundry Company vs. Farwell, 18th volume of the Supreme Court Reports, pages 1 and following. In that case these were the circumstances, so far as the Ontario Car and Foundry Company was concerned. The Southeastern Railway Company, having got into difficulties, executed a deed of trust in favour of certain parties, and the difficulties culminated in the mortgage being foreclosed, suit was taken out against the railway company, and judgment rendered against it. Then the Ontario Car and Foundry Company contended that, as it had furnished the rolling stock, that rolling stock was not subject to the lien which had been created by the trust deed. It was decided, under the authority of the Quebec law, that the mortgage covered everything, that it was a hypothec given upon the road, its appurtenances, and equipment. That is why I remarked to my hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Wade) the other day, when he was discussing this point, that the doctrine he was laying down was French law. Under the French law of the province of Quebec, the moment rolling stock goes upon a railway, it becomes what is called an immovable, and therefore is effected by the prior mortgage created by the bondholders. That is Quebec law, and that is what is stated in this judgment by the Supreme Court. But what did Chief Justice Strong say? On page 4, you will find what he said:

What I desire to explain, however, is this. In assenting to the judgment of the court dismissing these appeals, I do not by any means intend to preclude myself in future, should the question be raised in proper form and in an appropriate case, from considering whether the principle which is now universally recognized in the United States as to the applicability of current earnings to current expenses, incurred either whilst or before railway property comes under the control of the courts by being placed at the instance of mortgagees in the hands of a receiver, in preference to mortgage creditors, whose security has priority of date over the obligation thus incurred for working expenses, should be adopted by our courts. This doctrine is now firmly settled in the United States, where railway mortgages exactly resemble those in use with us, and which do not at all resemble the securities of debenture holders under the English system of securities for borrowed capital; and the practice referred to is so pregnant with justice, good faith and equity, that there may be found strong reasons for applying it here when the question arises.

The only reason why my hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Wade) could give the other day for saying that the prior mortgage of the government would hold good against the parties who leased this rolling stock to the company was that he adopted the French law on the subject, and that the English law was to the effect that, as soon as the rolling stock touched the rails, it became part of the realty. He laid that down as a proposition of law which could not be controverted. While I have a great deal of respect for my hon. friend's opinion, I have also considerable respect for that of the Supreme Court of the United States, and the law which is applied here is exactly the same as that which is applied in the United States. What does the Supreme Court of the United States say?

It is well settled that the title of a vendor of rolling stock, sold under a contract which provides that, although delivered to the company, it is to remain his property until the price is paid, will prevail against the lien created by the after-acquired property clause of a prior mortgage.

That was decided by the United States Supreme Court in the case of Fosdick vs. Schall, 99th volume, United States Reports, page 345. Again, on the same page, this principle is laid down:

The rights of the vendor are the same as under a conditional sale, where, instead of reserving the ownership of the rolling stock, he fixes a lien upon it for the payment of the price. Cars being 'loose property susceptible of separate ownership and separate liens,' any liens which are binding upon a railroad company itself are unaffected by a prior general mortgage given by the company, and are paramount thereto.

This is the principle of the English law and the American law. The Supreme Court of the United States also held that:

The paramount rights of the vendor may be recognized either by a return of the rolling stock in specie, or by the payment of the price outside of the proceeds of the sale.

This is what the late Chief Justice Strong had in view when he said that if the question ever came up under the law of Canada, outside of the law of Quebec, this is what he would decide, and his opinion is borne out by the decisions of the United States Supreme Court, and to-day a doctrine which is not even questioned in the United States. And, even if I am wrong in my interpretation of the general law, how can it be questioned here when, in the seventh clause of this supplemental contract it is stated in so many words that the working expenditure that is mentioned in this supplemental contract is working expenditure as defined by the Railway Act, and the Railway Act says that in working expenditure shall be included the lease, hire and rental of the equipment which you put upon the road? It seems to me that this is as clear as anything can be. And I will ask my hon. and learned friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Lemieux), if he replies to me, to direct his particular attention to this point.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Solicitor General). Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to detain the House at any length on this very important question. Last year, it was my good fortune to address the House when this subject was first brought up. This year, after the many speeches we have heard, I do not think I shall be warranted in adding much to what has been said. If the speech of my hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain), were accepted as being the opinion of the majority of the electors of Quebec, one would believe that there are many dark clouds over that province to-day. But, with the indulgence of the House I will try to point out to that gentleman the silver lining that one can see spreading out on the fringe of every cloud.

But, before answering the very able and I hope, very earnest argument, that has been adduced by my hon. friend, let me at once answer the remark made the other day by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden). He referred to a speech I made in Montreal before parliament was called for the present session, in which, he states, I predicted that the general elections were near at hand. He stated also that there had been on the part of the government what he called a conspiracy of silence. He said that negotiations were going on between the Grand Trunk Pacific Company and the government, yet the electors were not to be aware of the changes made in the contract before a general election was held. The hon. gentleman said: 'Here is the Solicitor General, who is in the confidence of the government and who told the electors of Montreal that the general elections were impending.' I beg to tell my hon. friend that he is misinformed. In that speech, I stated that perhaps the general elections would be held. I was not then in the confidence of the government, although I claim to have been a sincere friend, and a very consistent friend of this government. I was only the member for Gaspé, and that was quite enough for me, and would be quite enough for me to-morrow. I did not state then that we would have a general election. What I said was that, judging from the many campaign speeches of the leader of the opposition and his friends in the several provinces, judging from the agitation which the members of the opposition were carrying on, the general elections would soon be on, the general elections would soon be at hand. I said the government would be warranted in making an appeal to the people, seeing that ten new counties established by the Redistribution Bill, were without representatives in this House. I said that perhaps general elections would take place, but I never stated it on the authority of the government. I added that if there was a dissolution, this contract made by the Dominion government with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company would then be ratified not only by the representatives of the people, but by the people also, and by an overwhelming majority. The hon. leader of the opposition says there was a conspiracy of silence. Surely he was not a party to that conspiracy. We followed his campaign and that of his friends in Quebec and Ontario, and I say it again, he could hardly be accused of being a party to a conspiracy of silence. The people had their ears wide open and they heard many violent denunciations of the government's policy on the Grand Trunk Pacific. There was no conspiracy of silence at all, Sir; but I think there was, on the part of my hon. friend, a regular conspiracy of fear—fear of the electorate, fear of the government, fear of the contract made by the Dominion government with the Grand Trunk Pacific Company.

Now, Sir, I will answer to my hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain). He said, in opening his remarks that he was surprised indeed at not hearing from the present Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Emmerson). 'Does he disapprove,' said the hon. gentleman, 'of the contract that is now under debate? Does he stand in the same position as the Minister of Railways and Canals of last year? Is there any trouble; is there a rift in the cabinet?' I might answer my hon. friend by saying that, though the Minister of Railways and Canals has not yet spoken he may yet be heard from. And if he suspects that there is a rift on this side of the House, what must he think of what exists presently on the other side? Last year the gentleman who assailed the government most vigorously on this Grand Trunk Pacific question was my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). This year we heard that hon. gentleman in a speech which occupied about half an hour, a very able speech indeed. But who stands at the front of his party to-day, if not my hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain)? What a change has taken place! How the Gods have fallen! Why do we not hear the hon. member for Jacques Cartier to-day with his usual vigour? And how is it that we do not see our friend, our very able friend, our distant friend, the hon. member for St. Mary's (Mr. Tarte) leading the Conservative forces in the province of Quebec?

It was very surprising indeed to hear the hon. member for Montmorency assailing the government on this question of the eastern division of the Grand Trunk Pacific. He tells us that it passes through a country with great unsettled stretches on either side of the route. He tells us that it is an unsurveyed country, that it is a poor country that the government should not commit the blunder—nay, the crime—of constructing the eastern division. My hon. friend has modified his opinions since he spoke before the Railway Committee of this House last year.

I have here a copy of 'Hansard' of last session. Every year, Sir, some hon. member is anxious to have 'Hansard' abolished. I stand up for 'Hansard' I say it is the book of books for this House. Perhaps my hon. friend will allow me to refer to some of the remarks he made and the amendment he submitted to the Railway Committee last year. The hon. gentleman has just told us that when Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson and Mr. Hays, the manager of the Grand Trunk appeared before the Railway Committee last year it was their evident intention to procure a charter for a line of railway from North Bay, or Gravenhurst, in Ontario, westward. I agree with the hon. gentleman. Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson and Mr. Hays wanted to get a charter which would enable them to secure for the present Grand Trunk Railway system an entrance to the Northwest and a westward extension to the Pacific. But my hon. friend was there. He felt that he knew more than other members from Quebec did and was a better judge of what should be done in the interest of that province. My hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Wade) after reading the Bill moved in committee the following amendment:—

Provided, however, that the work of construction on the Quebec section and east of Quebec be commenced at or near Quebec, and carried on simultaneously east and west, and that said sections be operated at the same time, and no such section shall be operated without the other.

This was the amendment moved by the hon. member for Annapolis. Our friends from the maritime provinces, sitting on both sides of the House, stood up like men for their provinces, they stood up like men for the eastern section of Canada, and I praise them for it; to their efforts and to those of the members from Quebec we owe the fact that the government has imposed on the Grand Trunk Company the obligation of operating and equipping the eastern division. But when the member for Annapolis moved that amendment the Minister of Finance was present, and he informed the member for Annapolis that this amendment was unnecessary because the Grand Trunk intended to implement that Bill with a request for subsidies in order to insure the construction of the western section and then new clauses could be added, and that then it would be time enough to impose new obligations. The hon. member for Annapolis accepted the word of the Minister of Finance, but my hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) was not satisfied. He was about to leave in a few days for Europe in order to appear before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and he was therefore very anxious to let the province of Quebec know that he was standing up for the interests of his province. He rose in the committee and moved :

Provided that in the event of the company receiving from the government of Canada any assistance either by way of subsidies, moneys, land grants, guarantees. loans, or in any other manner whatever, the work of construction of the Quebec section be commenced simultaneously with the work of the woodland and prairie sections, and be completed and put in operation simultaneously therewith, and before the company exercise any of the powers conferred upon it by section 33 of the present Act in respect to 'lease and running powers over other railways.'

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend was so anxious to secure for the province of Quebec and the eastern provinces the extension of the Grand Trunk Pacific that he would not accept the word given by the Minister of Finance that they would exact guarantees as to the operation of the eastern section. My. hon. friend was not satisfied with that promise. He was very anxious to have a declaration from Mr. Hays. He read that declaration a moment ago. I was surprised that he should read such a declaration, because in it Mr. Hays declares that the Grand Trunk Pacific, if it were aided and assisted by the Dominion government, would surely operate and equip the eastern division. I am at a loss to understand why my hon. friend quoted that answer.

Mr. CASGRAIN. The answer given to me by Mr. Hays was long prior to the moving of that amendment; and it was because Mr. Hays would not afterwards accept either that amendment or any amendment to a like effect that we knew well that they would abandon that section of the road, as they did.

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend I think is not serious in that.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Oh, yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX. He knows very well that if the Grand Trunk Company acceded to the wishes of the deputation from the eastern provinces, it was not due to his amendment, which was defeated in the committee, because we relied upon the promise made at the time by the Minister of Finance, by Mr. Hays and by Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson himself. But, Sir, what are we to think of the hon. gentlemen who sit on our left? Here we see the leader of the opposition who is opposed to the extension of the Grand Trunk Pacific to the east; here we see the chief whip of the Conservative party who says that it will be a wild expenditure, and emphasises the fact that the government has money to burn; and on the other hand the hon. member for Montmorency says that the eastern line should be built and should be run simultaneously with the western. It is eivdent. Sir, that for party purposes, he has joined his forces with those of his other friends opposite. Sir, he changed his opinion, and if I were to read from the organs of the Conservative party in the province of Quebec, I could show that they have acted as the hon. gentleman. Last year 'L'Evenement,' which, I think, had something to do with the leadership of my hon. friend, 'L'Evenement,' which is the chief organ of the Conservative party in the city of Quebec—for there are Conservatives in the province of Quebec, if there is no Conservative party—had this to say :

We urgently draw the attention of our readers to the report of yesterday's meeting of the Railway Committee.

That was when my hon. friend asked the question of Mr. Hays.

Where are our representatives ?

Once more, where are they ?

Mr. Casgrain fought valiantly, but who supported him ? No other name is mentioned from Quebec.

It is obvious that the Grand Trunk Pacific intends to deceive us.

Why should they reject amendments intended to protect Canadian ports, if they really wish to build a national line ?

Sir Wilfrid Laurier said the other day that great corporations easily evade legislative enactments.

That is a further reason for making these stronger, and requiring additional security.

Quebec will be left aside once more, if the company is not bound to carry on the work simultaneously eastward and westward from the city.

That is the object of the Wade amendment, and we are thankful to Mr. Casgrain for energetically upholding our claims. The member for Montmorency stated that should the committee reject that amendment, he would submit it once more to the House.

We notice with pleasure the courageous stand taken by the representatives of the maritime provinces, who, heedless of party allegiance, insist on their rights being recognized. Their interest is the same as ours. What force could they not have altogether if the members from the Quebec district joined them. We have twenty representatives, and Mr. Casgrain is the only one to fight our battles.

Sir, this was the opinion of the Conservative press in the province of Quebec. A short time ago we had some by-elections in that province, and fortune was very kind to the Liberal party. We met the hon. gentlemen on the platform, and what did they say to the electors ? They advised the electors not to vote for the Liberal candidates because the government would never build the Quebec section, but that the Conservative party would. That was the statement made by these gentlemen in the province of Quebec. My hon. friend says that there are many other railroads which could be subsidized in our province, and I admit that frankly. He mentioned the South Shore Railway. When the Liberal party came to power in 1896, the South Shore Railway Company was on the verge of bankruptcy. After many efforts on the part of the bondholders and of the interested financial institutions, the government at last succeeded in getting a sequestrator appointed, and one of the first acts of the Liberal government was to grant a substantial aid to the South Shore Railway Company. He also mentions the railway in the county of Gaspé. Sir, I must tell my hon. friend that he is not aware of what took place last year, probably at a time when he was away in Europe. Last year the Dominion government acceded to the numerous petitions received from the county of Gaspé, petitions sent ever since 1896, indeed I may say since confederation. In the last days of the session, a very substantial subsidy was voted by parliament, and I think my hon. friends on the other side, especially the ex-Minister of Railways, rose and upheld my contention in this House that Gaspé was entitled to receive assistance.

We have received a subsidy of nearly $2,500,000 from the Dominion government to help railway construction in the County of Gaspé. The other day, my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) said that my county was quite as large as England; It is true and for the first time since confederation, a Liberal government has voted a substantial subsidy to develop its resources. If my hon. friend will look at the statute-book of last year they will see that all reasonable requests made from the province of Quebec were favourably received by this government and that subsidies were voted, ranging from $200,000 to $2,000,000 or $3,000,000. My hon. friend (Mr. Casgrain) seems to think that we in the province of Quebec are adverse to the construction of the Transcontinental. My hon. friend (Mr. Casgrain) ought to know better than that, because he comes from a city where the Trans-Canada Railway originated. We are all aware, Mr. Speaker, that two years ago, the gentlemen who promoted the Trans-Canada came before this parliament. Their scheme was quite similar to the one which we have before us to-day.

Mr. GOURLEY. No, no.

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend (Mr. Gourley) would like to have no reference made to that scheme because he came up to Quebec and supported it. He came from Truro and before the Chamber of Commerce in Quebec, extolled that scheme to the seventh heaven and said that the maritime provinces would join hands with us in securing its construction because if we could get another transcontinental railway the great city of Truro and the great city of Pictou would benefit by it. But of course my hon. friend probably did not believe that scheme would come up before the House in another form and he has had time to change his mind. My hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) knows that this Trans-Canada scheme was first proposed by Quebec people, and chief amongst these were the leading Conservatives of Quebec, gentlemen whose names I could give and did give when I delivered a speech on a similar occasion last year, before the House. The 'Evenement' and the Conservative press of Quebec branded the premier of this country and the premier of Quebec as two traitors because they would not subsidize the Trans-Canada line. Sir, there was a feeling of relief in the minds of the people of Quebec when it was learned that the eastern section was not abandoned. A railway is necessary to the northern section of the province of Quebec as it is necessary to the northern section of the province of Ontario in order to develop our timber and mineral resources. We all know that the rivers in the basin of Hudson Bay flow towards James and Hudson Bay, and in order to haul the immense quantity of lumber a railway must be built. My hon. friends say that the local government should help any such enterprise and that the burden should fall upon the shoulders of the provinces. My hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) said this the other day, and my hon. friend from Montmorency to-day states that colonization roads should be built and subsidized by the Quebec government. The local government of Quebec has done its share towards the construction of railways in that province. I hold in my hand the report of the Public Works and Railways departments of Quebec for the last year, and I see that since confederation no less than thirty-eight local railways have been subsidized by our province to the extent of many millions of dollars. Nearly all of the points which have been mentioned by my hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) and my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) in their respective speeches have been fully subsidized by the public exchequer of the province of Quebec. I say that to-day for a scheme of this magnitude it would be criminal to ask any of the provincial governments to vote subsidies. The burden would be all too heavy for the local governments, and I say, as I said last year when I advocated the readjustment of the federal subsidies, that the time is not distant when the provinces will come before this parliament in order to obtain a redress to their grievances. The subsidies paid to them are not large enough in view of the increase of their population, and the heavy expenditure incurred by our local governments for the last 10 or 15 years. But, Sir, it is said that we will share in the expenditure which will entail the construction of this railway. It is said that the railway from Moncton to Winnipeg will cost $50,000,000; that Quebec—and that is what is used on the hustings and in the Conservative press of that province—will have to bear its share of that cost. The province of Quebec is quite willing to share in the cost of construction of the eastern division. That province has already paid nearly $75,000,000 towards the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, although the Canadian Pacific Railway was intended to run outside of the province of Quebec, from Callendar to the Pacific coast. In those days Quebec was bled white to help towards the construction of a railway which did not even run in that province. We are ready to pay our share towards the construction of the new railway, which will run 700 or 800 miles within the province of Quebec.

Mr. HAGGART. How much does the hon. gentleman say Quebec had to pay for the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I say that the proportion of the province of Quebec, if you come to adjust it, amounted to at least $75,000,000.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes, considering the amount which was paid by the several provinces and the amount of taxation which it entailed. My hon. friend the member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) said that we in Montreal will not enjoy the benefits which would accrue from the construction of the railway; that it would benefit only the city of Quebec. Sir, that is a narrow-minded sentiment. Why! because the railway will not run across the streets of Montreal, we will vote against it! The city of Montreal has not been neglected by the federal government. I was born in Montreal; it is true I represent one of the Quebec counties, but Sir, as a citizen of Montreal, I must admit, that my city has been very well treated by the federal government. Millions have been spent for the improvement of the harbour of Montreal while Quebec has lost the terminus of the Intercolonial Railway. Quebec is taxed as are other sections of the Dominion for our canal system which benefits chiefly the city of Montreal. The city of Montreal will lose nothing but will be the gainer by the construction of a great transcontinental railway. The view expressed by hon. gentlemen opposite, however, does not prevail in the city of Montreal. The cry was raised during the last by-elections and the electors gave the answer which was to be expected from intelligent electors.

We have in Montreal, men of energy and men of financial ability, and I am sure that when the transcontinental road is built there will be found amongst our railway magnates, capitalists who will build branch lines to tap that railway to the north. We already have a railway built from Montreal to Joliette, the Chateauguay and Northern, which will be extended as far as Rawdon, or about forty miles from where the transcontinental line will pass. I believe that the energetic men who are at the head of the Chateauguay and Northern, will not lose their opportunity, and that they will gladly avail of it and extend their line north to connect with this great national highway. We are told by gentlemen opposite, and it is so stated in the Conservative press, that the Grand Trunk Pacific will pass through a frozen and an unknown region in the province of Quebec. If that be so, it is somewhat surprising that British capitalists who lack neither brains nor judgment, should invest such a large amount of money in this enterprise, and should undertake to pay 3 per cent on its cost. But, Sir, I prefer the opinion of such a man as Mr. Ellis, the president of the Toronto Board of Trade, and the opinion of a man of imperial reputation like Sir Sandford Fleming—

Mr. GOURLEY. He is opposed to your scheme.

Mr. LEMIEUX. He is not.

Mr. GOURLEY. He is opposed to it, as I am opposed to it.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I think I will be able to show from the words of Sir Sanford Fleming himself, that he is in favour of this scheme. Speaking before the Canadian Club at Toronto, Sir Sandford Fleming said:

> The railway development in and beyond Manitoba is an indication of the rapid settlement of that portion of the Dominion. Looking forward into the future, it is easy to be seen that the population of the west will be rapidly increased. It may be regarded as a certainty that the time is not remote, when there will be as many inhabitants west of Lake Winnipeg as east of Lake Superior. What then will follow if meanwhile no sufficient effort be made to reclaim the vast intervening territory. Obviously, our people would be geographically divided within the limits of the Dominion. There will be two great groups distinctly separated by a vast unpopulated wilderness, constituting a dangerous area of cleavage. It is impossible to forecast the outcome of this separation of the Canadian people. We are unwilling to think that political separation will follow, but we must not hide our heads in the sand and remain in a fool's paradise.

Again he says:

I have indicated in a few words that there is a vital problem presented for solution; a problem which cannot with safety be neglected. Ordinary foresight points out to us a real and a double danger. First, under certain circumstances, the unity of the Dominion it may be said, will practically hang on a thread. If the unity of the Dominion be left insecure, the integrity of the empire will be imperilled. I would ask by way of illustration: how could the globe girdling British telegraph be maintained if disjointed at Lake Superior.

Sir Sandford Fleming goes on to approve of the scheme, and he says it is the duty of the Canadian government to build that road as soon as possible. I shall later on refer to that part of his speech, in which he compares the water route with the all rail route. As I said, Sir, I prefer to accept the opinion of Sir Sandford Fleming, a man of imperial fame and prestige, to the opinion expressed by some gentlemen on the other side of the House, who claim to be strong imperialists, but who are ready to defeat the government on such a national measure as is now before the country. I prefer also to accept the words of Dr. Bell, of the Geological Survey, who speaking in Quebec last February, gave my hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) all the information he is seeking about the northern district of the province of Quebec. I should not quote this speech of Dr. Bell, but I refer my hon. friend (Mr. Casgrain) to the Quebec 'Chronicle' of February the 26th, where he can read Dr. Bell's lecture on the northern region of Quebec.

We are asked by gentlemen opposite: why is this question again brought before parliament; was it not settled last year; and the government is accused of ill-matured judgment in having to submit this modified agreement. Well, Sir, the reason for that is very obvious. Last year the contract entered into between the government and the Grand Trunk Railway Company did not bear the name of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada. The contract was passed between the Dominion government and certain gentlemen representing the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, but the government exacted in the contract the condition, that the Grand Trunk Pacific Company would undertake to get the guarantee and endorsation of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada. In the agreement passed on the 29th of July, 1903, clause 27 provides, that the Grand Trunk Pacific Company shall undertake to get the endorsation and guarantee of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and clause 7, of the Act under the heading 'Specified Conditions,' says:

The Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada may, subject to the provisions of the agreement, acquire, hold, guarantee, pledge and dispose of stock, bonds, debentures or other securities of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, upon such terms as are specified in a resolution to that effect, passed by the directors of the company, and sanctioned by the majority of the votes, after due notice has been given.

Therefore, it will be seen that a resolution was to be passed by the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and the Grand Trunk Pacific Company comes back to this House with the modifications which the Grand Trunk shareholders have attached to the former agreement. That is the reason why the contract comes back with modifications. Some people would seem to think that in an agreement of this nature, all the conditions should be one sided, that is to say, in favour of the government of Canada, while some other people seem to believe—the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, for example—that all the advantages should be on their side. Thus, we sometimes find that extremes meet. Last year the Hon. Mr. Blair thought that all the advantages were in favour of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, and he saw fit to resign his portfolio, but now we see on the other hand, that amongst the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Co pany a very different view prevails.

One of the directors of the Grand Trunk Railway Company feels obliged to resign because, forsooth, the advantages are all on the government side. So it is hard to meet such extreme views. I believe that those who signed this agreement and undertook the obligations contained in this contract, take the very sensible view that the advantages should be for both sides—that there should be fair clauses for the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, and also fair clauses for the Dominion government. The old maxim of Roman law always stands good: 'Do ut des, facio ut facias.' In every agreement there should be mutual advantages. Now, Sir, is it a gift that the government is making to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company? Sir, we have heard the wildest statements and the grossest misrepresentations on this question. Some people have gone so far as to say that we are building the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway and handing it over to the Grand Trunk Railway Company. Fortunately we have the report of the meeting of the Grand Trunk shareholders; we have the speech of Mr. Merlin, the speech of Mr. Allen, the resignation of Mr. Allen, and the vote which was taken at that meeting, as answers to such an argument. Now, what are the principal modifications made in the agreement ?

At six o'clock House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Mr. Speaker, when the House took recess, I was about to examine the modifications which have been made in the original agreement. I shall not dwell at any length on this question, for I believe that it has been pretty well threshed out since the beginning of the debate. My learned friend the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) objected to the extension of time granted to the company. Well, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend objects to what has been the common practice in this parliament, at least since I have had the honour of sitting here. Not later than yesterday this House gave third readings to several Bills authorizing extensions of time to several companies which have been incorporated during the past six or seven years. Extensions of time have been granted to companies which had already begun to build their lines as well as companies which had not built one mile.

Mr. CLANCY. Will the hon. gentleman permit me ? Does that apply to variations of contracts, or merely to extensions of time to commence construction ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend knows that the House has not only granted extensions of time, but has varied the clauses in the Bills.

Mr. CLANCY. In contracts ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. It has been done several times in this House, to my knowledge and to the knowledge of my fellow members. In this case there is a provision by which the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company is to deposit $5,000,000. Is that not a safeguard that if the time granted last year is not sufficient, it should be extended by three or four years ; for if the time remained as it was in the former agreement, the company would perhaps see the deposit forfeited. I think it is a reasonable safeguard. My hon. friend also said a few words in regard to the guarantee on the mountain section, given by the government, which he thinks is rather wide. It is true that the mountain section would be guaranteed by the government to the extent of 75 per cent of its cost, but we must not forget that there will not be the untold millions spent on this section as it has been represented by the Conservative press. I have read in the papers that the Grand Trunk Pacific Company would spend on that section something like $85,000 per mile. We must not forget that in the charter incorporating the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company there is a clause which limits the amount of the bonds to be issued. Clause 13 of that charter reads as follows:

> The company may issue bonds, debentures or other securities to the extent of thirty thousand dollars per mile upon the 'eastern section,' thirty thousand dollars per mile upon the 'Quebec section,' thirty thousand dollars per mile upon the 'woodland section,' twenty thousand dollars per mile upon the 'prairie section,' and fifty thousand dollars per mile upon the 'mountain section.'

So that if the company wished to exceed the amount of the bonds fixed by the statute of last session, it would have to come before parliament to obtain the necessary authority. The guarantee of the government would not, therefore, exceed 75 per cent of $50,000 per mile, that is to say, $37,500 per mile. Now, if we compare the amount which was spent by the country on the mountain section of the Canadian Pacific Railway with the amount which is guaranteed by this government for the Grand Trunk Pacific, I think it will be seen that the present bargain is a good one. The cost of the mountain section of the Canadian Pacific Railway between Kamloops and Port Moody, a distance of 238 miles, was $20,000,000, that is to say, an average of $75,000 per mile in round figures, whereas our guarantee on the Grand Trunk Pacific is limited to $37,500 per mile.

My hon. friend spoke of the rolling stock, and sought to make a point by arguing that it constituted no security for the government. He suggested that the rolling stock equipment amounting to $20,000,000 might be leased, and in that case would not be available as security for the government at all. My hon. friend is one of the leaders of the bar of the province of Quebec, but I venture to say that he would not risk his high reputation as a jurist on the opinion he gave this afternoon. It was a political and not a legal opinion which he gave us, but if my hon. friend, when addressing the electors of the province of Quebec, will only cite to them sections 11, 12, 14, 22, 35a, and b and 37 of the agreement ratified last session, he will find that the Grand Trunk Pacific is not only obliged to construct the road but also to purchase the rolling stock. Section 37 reads as follows :

> The company shall purchase all material and supplies required for the construction of the western division and the equipment of the whole of the said line of railway from Canadian producers.

If the company is bound to purchase its equipment from Canadian producers, it follows that the rolling stock must be purchased and cannot be hired or leased. I am surprised that my hon. friend should have given the opinion he did this afternoon. Referring to the argument of the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Wade), who said that the very moment the rolling stock touched the line of railway, it became by destination real estate and part of the road and could not be touched, my hon. friend interjected the remark: That is French law! Well, the hon. member for Annapolis established beyond doubt that it was not only French law, but English law as well, and I undertake to say that the very authority cited by my hon. friend this afternoon shows that it is not only French law and English law, but also Canadian law. My hon. friend quoted a decision well known in the province of Quebec and the Dominion. The case was one of the last argued before the Supreme Court of Canada by that great advocate and ex-Minister of Justice, the Hon. Rodolphe Laflamme. I refer to the well known case of Wallbridge vs. Farwell. Let me now quote from the considerants of the judgment:

> In virtue of the provision of a trust conveyance, granting a first lien, privilege and mortgage upon the railway property franchise and all addition thereto of the Southeastern Railway Company and executed under the authority of 43 and 44 Vic. (P.Q.), chap. 49, and 44 and 45 Vic. (P.Q.), chap. 43, the trustees of the bondholders took possession of the railway. In actions brought against the trustees after they took possession for the appellants for the purchase price of certain cars and other rolling stock used for operating the road, and for work done for and material delivered to the company after the execution of the deed in trust, but before the trustees took possession of the railway.
> It was held—and this is the law of the land; it is not only the obiter dictum of Sir Henry Strong, who was the only dissentient in the case, and against whose opinion we have that of the other judges.

Mr. CASGRAIN. The ex-Chief Justice Strong was not a dissenting voice in that case.

Mr. LEMIEUX. He dissented on that particular point from the other judges, although he concurred with them in the judgment——

Mr. CASGRAIN. No——

Mr. LEMIEUX—Which makes my point all the stronger. It was held, affirming the judgments of the court below, that the trustees were not liable, and

> That the appellants lost their privilege of unpaid vendors of the cars and rolling stock as against the trustees, because such privilege cannot be exercised when movables become immovable by destination (as was the result with regard to the cars and rolling stock in this case), and the immovable to which the movables are attached is in the possession of a third party or is hypothecated.

The court did not say it was simply French law. But here is the most important point, and the one which bears on the question at issue:

> But even considered as movables such cars and rolling stock became affected and charged by virtue of the statute and mortgage made thereunder, as security to the bondholders, with right of priority over all other creditors, including the privileged unpaid vendors.

Mr. CASGRAIN. By a statute of Quebec.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Cannot a statute of Canada be passed having the same effect?

Mr. CASGRAIN. There is not one passed.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes, look at section 35, paragraphs 'a' and 'b.' That creates a lien and if any trust company should lease equipment to the Grand Trunk Pacific, their equipment will be subject to the first mortgage held by the government of Canada.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Not at all.

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Taylor) said that we were imposing a heavy taxation upon future generations. We are told that $15,000,000 will be spent on the Moncton and Quebec section and untold millions on the Quebec and Winnipeg section. But my hon. friend forgets that it is simply a question of lease to the great Grand Trunk Pacific and that the Grand Trunk Pacific will pay interest on the cost of the line. What is our liability in the present instance? 1st. Seven years' interest on the eastern section; 2nd. A guarantee on an avowedly self-sustaining section, i.e., the western section. But the eastern section will revert to us in fifty years, when the property will be worth much more than it cost. We will have an asset of ever-increasing value in the transcontinental line, so that the money spent on it will be a judicious investment.

The hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Osler) affected such supreme contempt for the bargain made between the Grand Trunk Pacific, that I cannot refrain from referring to the generous subsidies which were paid by the Dominion government to the Canadian Pacific Railway. That company, of which the hon. gentleman is a director, received in cash a bonus of $25,000,000. It further received, on the cost of a portion of the road and surveys handed over to it, $35,000,000. It was further given 25,000,000 acres of land valued at $3 an acre, equal to $75,000,000. This makes a total subsidy applicable to the 1,906 miles built of $135,000,000. And yet these gentlemen who advocated that scheme denounce ours as reckless and extravagant! The Canadian Pacific besides, received exemption from taxation under section 16 of their contract. There was also a remarkable clause in their contract which caused the people from Manitoba to rise in arms against it and force its abolition. I refer to the monopoly clause, section 15.

There was an exemption from duty on the material imported, as provided by section

10. Their deposit amounted to only $1,000,000, whilst in the case of this Grand Trunk Pacific contract the deposit is $5,000,000. Advances on the cost of rails was paid three quarters of their value by subsection C of section 9. And, when the Canadian Pacific Railway was completed, the government found they had no control over the line. And the people found also that barons and millionaires had been made of some of those who invested their money in that railway enterprise. Sir, we are told that in spite of clause 43, this company will discriminate against Canadian ports and in favour of American ports. My hon. friend from East Grey said that, in clause 43—which has been read over and over again in this House, so that I need not repeat it—he found no penalty to enforce the fulfilment of the obligation it imposed. The answer is very obvious. The whole thing is not ended when this Bill is passed and this agreement ratified by parliament. There will be a lease. And what will this lease contain? If you look at section 25 of the agreement you will read the following:

> The said lease shall also contain such other covenants and provisions, including the proper indemnity to the government with respect to the working of the railway, as may be deemed necessary by the government to secure the proper carrying out of this agreement.

So, though there is no penalty in clause 43, still the government provides for the proper carrying out of the agreement, and thus the company cannot but discriminate in favour of Canadian ports as against American ports.

Now, the hon. gentleman who leads the opposition, contrary to what he said last year, seems to be in favour of government ownership. That policy appeals to the imagination, and, indeed, it is a very seductive idea in appearance. But there are conditions required in order to make government ownership feasible. The first is to secure freedom from political influence in the management of the road. Another is honesty in construction. Another is honesty and efficiency in the management of the road. The government, in the present instance, will not own the western section of the road. But the government have made a compromise. The government will hold the eastern section of the railway from Winnipeg to Quebec. Why? Because Winnipeg will be for all future time the great converging point of the west. a converging point of the main arteries where all the shipments will pass. And, by owning the eastern section from Winnipeg to maritime ports the government will secure trade for our ports and will make it certain that Canadian trade will go to Canadian ports. If the government had decided to help towards the construction of this road in the old fashion they would have granted subsidies in land and cash, and, after all had been given and spent the government would have had no control over the line. But, Sir, the government has adopted the wise course of refusing a land grant. We are often told by hon. gentlemen on the other side that the Liberal party is a party of broken pledges. Well, here is a pledge which was taken by the Liberal party in 1893, a pledge which was taken by the Liberal party in the House of Commons from 1878 to 1896 that in future, no land grants should be given to railway companies, especially in the Northwest. Well, in the present instance, the government has kept their pledge and I am surprised to see that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House do not applaud, do not encourage the government to keep on—

Mr. INGRAM. Do I understand the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux) to say that the government have kept their pledge with respect to land grants?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Certainly.

Mr. INGRAM. Let me remind the hon. gentleman that the Calgary Railway, by Order in Council passed since 1896 had its land grant renewed.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The answer is in the very words of my hon. friend (Mr. Ingram) —the land grant was only renewed.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. How about the Yukon?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Oh, according to hon. gentlemen opposite we were going to make Mr. Mackenzie and Mr. Mann rich by the Yukon Railway. When I read the predictions of these hon. gentlemen of what will be the outcome of the present railway contract, and consider how the predictions they made with regard to the Yukon Railway were so completely falsified by events, they can hardly wonder that I am not ready to admit at once the accuracy of their statements.

My hon. friend (Mr. Casgrain) stated this afternoon that this route could not compete with a water route. I am not an expert in transportation. But others who may fairly claim to have some acquaintance with the subject have given their views. We have been told that if this road is first class in points of grades, weight of rails and general construction, it will easily compete with the water route. All first-class railways in America have been spending money during the last ten or fifteen years, correcting mistakes made in their original construction. They have been reducing grades, correcting alignments, taking out curves and so on. The Grand Trunk Railway has done it, and so has the Canadian Pacific. The Grand Trunk Pacific road will be built for the specific purpose of transporting the products of the west to our seaports and therefore we are bound to build it in such a way as to secure that trade. But, Sir, while I cannot set up my own opinion against those of hon. gentlemen opposite as to the superiority of the water route over the all-rail route it is well to bear in mind that people who know something of transportation have expressed their opinions. I quoted this afternoon from a lecture recently delivered by Sir Sandford Fleming. Comparing the water route and the all-rail route, Sir Sandford Fleming said :

By establishing on the northern route a modern first-class railway, devoid of gradients and every other hindrance to cheap transportation, we would possess the means of carrying the products of the northern half of the prairie region to Canadian tidal ports at all seasons of the year at less cost than any other route whatever. The advantages of the lake route have been much extolled. Transportation by water certainly has advantages under certain circumstances, but it also has limitations due to climatic and geographical conditions. In all probability, the country west of Winnipeg, and Winnipeg itself, will continue to enjoy during summer all the advantages which the lakes can yield. But there is a vast cultivable country further north and west from which, it is believed, freight may be carried to Quebec by railway on the northern route at less cost than by the lake route. Of course, it will be understood that this is conditional upon the line to be constructed being free from such gradients as we find on ordinary Canadian railways, a condition which can only be definitely determined by adequate surveys. Should such a favourable line be established as is believed possible, I venture to state that, owing to the reduced total mileage, and, still, more, owing to the reduced gradients on the new line, grain may be carried to Quebec by the direct route at less cost than by the southern route, even if carried almost free of charge across the lakes from Fort William to Depot Harbour, Owen Sound or Sarnia. This, of course, only applies to the half year of open navigation. During the other half year, the northern route would be without a rival worthy of the name.

Well, Sir, I set the opinion of Sir Sandford Fleming over against and above the opinion expressed by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, even above the opinion of the hon. member for Toronto West (Mr. Osler). I would ask the hon. member for Toronto West, who was so severe the other night in condemnation of this scheme, how it is, if this all-rail route is all nonsense for the purpose of carrying grain, that he, a director of the Canadian Pacific Railway, has thought proper to invest eight or ten millions in the purchase of a fleet of steamers to carry grain from the maritime ports to Europe and other parts of the world, and that by the all-rail route of the C.P.R.

Sir, if I am well informed we shipped, between December 1, 1902 and May 1, 1903, 3,137,000 bushels of Manitoba wheat to St. John, N.B. Was this carried to Europe by the fleet of the Canadian Pacific Railway? Is not the position of my hon. friend based on the fact that the company he represents, not in this House but outside this House, is seeking to capture for itself alone the carrying trade of grain from the west to the maritime ports ?

I say, Sir, that this road is imperatively called for. The government has not acted with undue haste, the government is not proceeding with an immature scheme. The future of the Northwest depends chiefly, I might say exclusively, on the rail communication between it and the east; railroads are absolutely essential to its prosperity. Besides opening up new Ontario and new Quebec, this line will give an outlet to the North Saskatchewan valley, to the Athabasca valley, to the Peace River valley and to northern British Columbia. We are not building for to-day or to-morrow only, but we are building for the future. We are looking forward to the time when the resources and the population of this country will be at least three times as great as they are to-day. The government could have done something else to please my hon. friends opposite. The government could have stood with folded arms and let Mr. Jim Hill's road and other American roads come into our west without let or hindrance, without bonus or aid, and they would have found an outlet for our western produce. Mr. Hill could have found outlets without any bonus from this government, but the outlets would have been Duluth, Minneapolis, Chicago and other American cities, from which the grain would have been carried to the ocean by American roads. Would this course have been patriotic ? Could we have justified ourselves in allowing our trade to be diverted in this way to the great and lasting detriment of this Dominion ?

Sir, I claim that the undertaking of this scheme by the Grand Trunk Railway Company will be the greatest advertisement that this country can receive in the old world. We have been told that there are 40,000 shareholders in the Grand Trunk Railway Company. I claim that the Grand Trunk Railway Company and its 40,000 shareholders will be so many agents, so many educators of British opinion on our Canadian resources. They will advertise our country, they will have an interest in doing so. Mr. Hays, at the shareholders' meeting, informed them that if the Grand Trunk Company did not accept this scheme perhaps the dividends they were drawing at the present time would not continue. Well, Sir, it will be to the interest of every shareholder to keep these dividends going, and it will be to the interest of the 40,000 shareholders to advertise this country, to send immigrants hither, to make the resources of this country well known all over Europe.

Speaking of immigration, I may say that one of the greatest objections the European immigrant has found to coming over to Canada is our climatic conditions. On this point let me quote from a paper friendly to my hon. friend from Montmorency :—

It is a matter of public notoriety that, since its establishment, the Lake St. John Railway, running for 240 miles right through the heart of the great Laurentian barrier, through one of the very worst parts of our northern region because of its mountainous character and its exposure to the storms and climatic influences generally of the St. Lawrence valley, has never had its traffic seriously interrupted in any winter. While all the other roads in the more settled parts of Canada and in the United States have suffered winter after winter from snow blockades, which have delayed traffic for days and days and sometimes suspended it altogether, the Lake St. John trains have continued to run uninterruptedly and well on time. And the most remarkable fact is that this has been the case especially during the present exceptionally severe and stormy winter, which has so seriously interfered with the traffic of the other lines and so terribly strained their resources.

The doubting Thomases who speak of the Arctic character of our north land have evidently overlooked the fact that the published statistics of Mr. Stupart, of the Toronto Observatory, prove that the average annual snowfall at Moose Factory on James Bay is half that of Montreal, showing that the precipitation in the St. Lawrence valley is very much greater than it is north of the height of land. I say that the taking over of this scheme by the Grand Trunk Company will tend to remove the prejudice created against Canada abroad by foreign agents who exaggerate our climatic conditions.

But there are some other advantages to be gained by the adoption of this scheme by the parliament of Canada. I think that in the near future Canada is bound to capture the trade of China and Japan. Canada will also capture the trade of the Yukon Territory and of the vast area between Lake Superior and James Bay, which is at present practically useless for commercial purposes, and the value of that region will be greatly enhanced by the construction of this road. I claim that this particular section of our country is the weak link in the chain of our provinces. Is it not our duty as Canadians to strengthen that link? Is it not our duty to build there a railway which will bring the east and the west still nearer together, and thus consolidate our Dominion? Sir, as a young Canadian, I believe that this great national transcontinental road will bind more closely together the east and the west. It will bridge over the gap caused by the lack of a strong population north of Lake Superior. It will broaden the Dominion by serving as a colonization railway. It will strengthen the provinces, especially the eastern provinces. It will have the name and the prestige of one of the large railway systems in America. It will have the advantage of the business relations and connections, rolling stock and appliances of the Grand Trunk Railway. It will establish many new centres of industry. It will, as I said a moment ago, populate and consolidate the country. It will be a national highway in every sense of the word. But we are told by hon. gentlemen opposite that it will be a failure, and that the country will have to pay for that failure. Well, Sir, I am reminded of the royalists of old, those royalists who had forgotten that there had been a French revolution and who came back at the restoration, of whom a great writer has said: 'Les Bourbons n'ont rien appris, et rien oublié', 'the Bourbons have learned nothing and have forgotten nothing.' We know these Cassandra-like forebodings. The Liberal party has paid dearly for such predictions in the past and our friends opposite should have learned from our own misfortunes. We to-day have faith in the future of Canada. This is not a party question and on such a national issue we should all rally. When the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) referred the other day to the report made by a missionary some 200 years ago, on the fertility of the soil of the great north land, I heard some one whispering from the other side that this was not business, that this was only sentiment. Sir, sentiment in life, sentiment in the hearts of statesmen must not be despised. Sentiment and faith are necessary even in our modern world. Nations and nation builders must be actuated by sentiment. The early explorers, the missionaries, the voyageurs, who opened up this country to civilization were no doubt actuated by sentiment. Cavelier de la Salle, Jolliet, Father Marquette, who were seeking the passage from Europe to Asia, were all imbued with sentiment. In those days there were probably matter of fact people—perhaps directors of rival companies—who sneered at their daring and adventurous exploits—but their memory will live as long as this fair Canada—nay as long as this northern continent—has not sunk into the abyss of nature, from whence it was commanded into existence by the great Author of it. The monument of Cavelier de la Salle can be seen at Rouen in France. The monument of Marquette can be seen at the Capitol of Washington. We also, when this great continental road is completed, shall erect a statue—that of Canada, hewn from the granite mass of a peak of the rocky mountains—the mountain itself the pedestal—and the statue a part of the mountain, pointing with outstretched arms to the western horizon and saying to the flying passengers: This is Asia!

Mr. JOHN W. DANIEL (St. John City). Mr. Speaker, I feel some embarrassment, following as I do the learned and hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Lemieux), because a very large part of his argument has been a legal argument and consequently I do not find myself at all in a position to answer it. But I have no doubt that those who follow me will be able to take up such matters as I am obliged to pass over and will pay some attention to them. I must say in passing, that the hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. Lemieux), has referred to the equipment which is to be mortgaged under this agreement and has been opposing the arguments advanced by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) and the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain). Without being a lawyer, it would seem to me that the statements made by these hon. gentlemen were correct, especially after reading the statement made by the president of the Grand Trunk in London a short time ago. He said :

As regards the $5,000,000 for rolling stock it is not £5,000,000, it is estimated at £3,000,000. With that the Grand Trunk Railway Company has nothing to do. That rolling stock will be provided by the Grand Trunk Pacific Company and, as the general manager will tell you, they have laid their plans for providing that rolling stock by a trust fund.

Now, Sir, without being a lawyer, without being a professional man in that respect but being just a plain every day citizen of this Dominion, I cannot see, with all due deference to the ability and learning of the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Lemieux), how it is possible for a man to mortgage what he does not own, nor do I believe that it is at all within the bounds of reason that any one could place any value on a mortgage given on property over which the person who gives the mortgage has no control whatever. I think that that statement will appeal to the judgment at least of those hon. members who are not lawyers.

The hon. gentleman has referred also to the very large amount of subsidy which was given to the Canadian Pacific Railway at its inception as an inducement for its construction. Those of us who are old enough to be able to look back to that time, will remember how very difficult it was for the government of the day, the government of the late Sir John A. Macdonald, to get anybody whatever to take hold of that transcontinental scheme. The very greatest difficulty in the world was experienced, and it was only by offering very large inducements indeed that the government was able to get anybody to take hold of that great undertaking and after they had taken hold of it, and notwithstanding the very large subsidies in both lands and money given to that undertaking, we all remember that there was a very critical time in that undertaking, when it was just touch and go as to whether it would go on or entirely fall through. Therefore, I take it, that when we remember that circumstance, we must know and must understand that the assistance offered to that great undertaking was not greater than it should have been. And what has been the result of that ?

It is the Canadian Pacific Railway that has made our country, for without it we would have no Northwest at all, and we would not be here to-night discussing the assistance which we should give to a second, or to a third transcontinental railway. Therefore it is, that the Conservative government and the Conservative party have no apology to offer to anybody for the assistance which they gave to the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Solicitor General spoke at great length on the question of water-routes for transportation, and he told us that the Canadian Pacific Railway carried a large quantity of grain over their all-rail route. It is strange that the hon. and learned Solicitor General should be so mistaken in his ideas about this matter, because if he had made the slightest inquiry he would have discovered, that by far the greatest quantity of grain which the Canadian Pacific Railway carries, is carried by the rail and water route, and not by the all-rail route. The 'Financial News' of London England, makes this point clear, when in writing of the meeting of the Grand Trunk shareholders it says :

A glance at the map issued to the shareholders should suffice to point Mr. Havs' moral. Wheat will not be carried all the way east by rail. The Canadian Pacific Railway, the Great Northern and the Northern Pacific take wheat to Port Arthur and Duluth and use water carriage on the great lakes. Similarly, the wheat gathered by the Grand Trunk Pacific will be carried to Port Arthur, and if there is to be any land carriage eastward on the lakes, the Grand Trunk will have it.

With all due deference to the Solicitor General, I think he has failed to establish the contention, which he tried to make out. I have listened for the last few days with a good deal of attention to this debate, and to my mind the resolution which we are now discussing deals with a matter of transcendant importance. It is of transcendant importance, not alone because of the immense financial responsibility which it places on the shoulders of the people of this country ; not alone because for the first time in our history, the government of Canada is taken into partnership by a transportation company ; not alone because in that partnership the government of Canada is but the junior partner ; but most important of all, is the fact that this agreement will place in the hands of a foreign corporation the great transportation interests of Canada. I say, Sir, that this agreement, if it be ratified by the parliament of Canada, will relegate to this foreign corporation, for it may be one hundred years, the control of the transportation interests of this country. Under such circumstances, we would be derelict in our duty, if we should cast a silent vote, and fail to place before the people of this Dominion, the salient features of this contract and show them what effect it will have on the future of our transportation system. It would appear from the statement of the Grand Trunk directors to their shareholders in London, that this great scheme did not originate with the members of the Canadian government, but that it had its inception with the Grand Trunk directors. They applied to parliament for a charter to construct a railway from North Bay across the continent to the Pacific Ocean, so that they might be able to tap the great wheat fields of the west. We know, Sir, that our great Northwest in recent years has attracted the attention of the world and that it is to-day the land of promise to which thousands are looking to obtain that competence which they cannot expect to achieve in the land of their birth. As I have said, there appears to be no disputing the fact now, that this scheme started with the Grand Trunk people. It is true that the members of the government claimed credit for conceiving the idea, and they declared that this transcontinental line was absolutely necessary to relieve the traffic congestion in the west. But, when that statement came to be dissected it was found that this Grand Trunk Pacific Railway must absolutely fail in that object, because it is going to follow an entirely new route for itself. When I read the remarks of Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson on that point, I thought it a little cruel of him to speak in that way of this agreement which we were led to understand had originated with the Canadian government. More especially did I think it cruel of him, when I remember how handsomely his company was treated by the members of the government, who had not only given them all they asked but a good deal more. If you will remember, the Grand Trunk people were willing themselves to build this railway from North Bay to the Pacific coast, but the Canadian government was not content with that and they insisted on giving them a present, in addition to their charter, of that portion of the road between North Bay and Winnipeg. I think the government were extremely kind to them, and it was a little cruel on the part of Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson to attempt to deprive these gentlemen of the fame or the credit which they thought they ought to have.

What is the object of this Grand Trunk Pacific scheme? Its object, as stated in the preamble of the measure, is as follows:

Whereas, by reason of the growth in population and the rapid development in the productiveness and trade of Canada and especially of the western part thereof, and with a view to the opening up of new territory available for settlement, both in the eastern provinces and in the west, and the affording of transportation facilities for such territory, and for other reasons, the necessity has arisen for the construction of a National Transcontinental Railway, to be operated as a common railway highway across the Dominion of Canada, from ocean to ocean and wholly within Canadian territory.

In other words, it sets out to build and operate, by the shortest and most economical route from ocean to ocean, a great all-Canadian railway line. I am free to confess that the Ashburton treaty, which gave to the United States a great deal of territory which really belonged to us, has made it increasingly difficult for this Dominion to build on all-Canadian territory, a line which would be a short commercial line and able to compete with other lines built across the continent to the south of us. But I believe it has not made it impossible. I believe that the Intercolonial Railway, under proper management, and extended sufficiently far into the heart of the country to get its freight very much nearer the source of production than it does at present, so that it would get its full payment for the haul it makes, could be made a good commercial and paying road. If it were taken hold of and dealt with in this way, it would be able to do its part and have its share in building up the great interests of this country. The hon. Minister of Public Works has given us during this session a statement, showing the results of an experiment which was tried of carrying wheat by the Intercolonial Railway from Depot Harbour to Halifax. The wheat was carried 1,208 miles. The Canada Atlantic Railway carried it 346 miles, the Grand Trunk 34 miles, and the Intercolonial 828 miles. How was the freight rate divided? The Canada Atlantic Railway got 2·27½ cents per bushel, and the Intercolonial got the same amount, while the Grand Trunk, which had only to haul the wheat 34 miles, got 6-10 cents per bushel. If the Intercolonial Railway had received a rate according to the number of miles it hauled the wheat, it would have had 3·82 cents per bushel, an amount which the government itself has already stated would be quite sufficient to pay the railway for hauling wheat that distance. The hon. leader of the opposition has already referred to this matter; and I wish, in connection with what I desire to point out, to quote what that hon. gentleman has said. It is as follows:

Moreover, if as stated by the government, 2·27 cents per bushel is the cost of carriage for 828 miles, then 3·31 cents per bushel would be the cost of carriage per bushel for the whole 1,208 miles. Therefore, you have this position. According to the statement of the government you can carry grain from a Georgian Bay port to Halifax at a cost of 3·31 cents per bushel, and the average rate obtained for that carriage in these shipments was 5 cents, leaving to the Intercolonial Railway a profit of 1¾ cents if they owned the whole line from Halifax to the Georgian Bay.

How can the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fitzpatrick) or any other hon. gentleman opposite say that you could not do a profitable business in carrying grain from Georgian Bay ports to Halifax or St. John if you had the Intercolonial extended to the Georgian Bay? There is no answer to the proposition ; if the statement of the government is correct, and if the Intercolonial Railway were extended to Georgian Bay you could do a splendidly profitable business.

That is what I want to say with regard to giving the Intercolonial Railway a chance, which it has never yet had. I have heard one hon. gentleman in this House say—and I believe there are others who take the same view—that he is not in favour of the political control of railways. The hon. member for Hants (Mr. Russell) objected to government ownership and control, because he said it tended to degenerate and debase the whole business and make a political machine of the railway. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman in pointing to the present management of the Intercolonial Railway as an instance of this political demoralization of a great public institution. I am sure we shall all agree that that is the character of a management that would, for instance, discharge a poor unfortunate man who had been almost thirty years in the employ of the railway, without giving him any reason whatever or the slightest warning beforehand. As far as I can find out, that employee had to be away from the constituency in which he lived on the day of the election. He had to go out of town on that day to attend the funeral of his sister and consequently could not be on hand to vote either for the government candidate or any other candidate. Were a man, under similar circumstances, summarily dismissed by a private employer, what would the public say ? I think I am quite within the mark when I say that the public would look upon any such action by a private employer as a mean use of an arbitrary power. I would not care to characterize the course of the government in cases of that kind as I think it deserves, because I could not do so without using unparliamentary language. I am quite in accord with the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Russell) when he declaims against any such government ownership or control. I think he was quite right in bringing this matter to the attention of the House, because I believe it is quite possible even on the Intercolonial, to have such a government system of control as will give the government control of the policy of the road, of the rates and of everything important in connection with the running of that railway and at the same time take out of the hands of responsible ministers the mean, petty business of hiring a man here and discharging another there and things of that kind. If it be necessary to have some one to do that kind of work, surely we do not want to make him a Minister of the Crown. Let it be done by somebody a little lower down. In this country a proper system of government ownership would be popular. Such a system would be endorsed by the people, and such a system would be free from the evils which I have shown exist to-day over the Intercolonial.

Some gentleman may say, well, if the Intercolonial, with its present mileage, can do what you say it can, what is the matter with this new transcontinental line ? Will it not be very much better, because, according to the agreement, it is going to be shorter ? That is just the point I have to make. We do not know whether it is going to be shorter or not. Nobody can tell. This scheme has been undertaken in a very haphazard manner. We have had no surveys, nobody knows anything about it, and from what little information we have been able to gather it is very problematical whether the projected line across New Brunswick will be any shorter than the one now in operation. In my opinion it is very problematical whether you will be able to get any better or easier grades, on the projected line than you have on the Intercolonial. That being the case, and considering the fact that this extension from Quebec to Moncton will cost some $13,000,000, we ought to think this matter over before deciding on spending that money. There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker —I come to this point with some difidence because people might think that I was trying to boom my own constituency a little too much—but I must say that so far as this extreme eastern section is concerned, there is no doubt that the business and commercial solution of the matter would be to build from Edmundston, or some practical point near Edmundston, right down the valley of the River St. John to the port of St. John. In that way you would get the shortest line and if there is any possibility of doing business on the line after it is built, you would have an opportunity of doing that business and getting some satisfactory results. But I can quite understand the position of the government in this matter. This is a political road, and political exigencies must be attended to before business and commercial exigencies. The line I suggest would certainly shorten the distance to tide water in a most appreciable degree, whereas this extension to Moncton, which will cost something like $13,000,000, cannot possibly carry out the preamble of the agreement, which provides for a line from ocean to ocean by the shortest and most economical route. Why, Sir, Moncton is an inland town. It is not a seaport in any sense of the term, and I think we might readily ask ourselves, would it not be possible, if the maritime provinces must have something out of this deal, to expend the money in such a way that we shall reap the most benefit from it. We can expend it in a manner from which the maritime provinces will reap very much more benefit than by building the line to Moncton as projected. I am not appealing any more to my own constituency than to every constituency in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, because I believe that it would be better to take this $13,000,000, or as much of it as may be necessary, and straighten out and improve the Intercolonial in every possible way, as regards curves and grades and everything else important, and then take some of the rest of that money and build up your terminals at the two ends of the line. In other words, use some of that money for nationalizing the ports of Halifax and St. John, because, if you want to get the best transportation facilities you must lessen the cost on every part concerned. Especially you must lessen the cost of the terminals, where the railways seek tidewater, and where freight is changed from car to steamer and vice versa. I therefore believe it would be good policy and good politics, as well as good commercial business, to utilize that money in the way I have suggested rather than in attempting to build a line through an unknown region, through a region, which, so far as we can learn, has a very limited prospect of being so improved that it can be utilized for settlement.

That is not an agricultural country. There is nothing there to make a local traffic for the railway. It is a line that, I think, the maritime province members are foolish to insist upon having. I think it would be better for us all to spend the money in the way I suggest; I believe it would have a better effect on my own province as well as on the province of the hon. member for Annapolis. Regarding this scheme from a maritime province point of view and not alone from the point of view of my constituency, I object to this scheme because I believe it will result in shutting us off from participation in any benefit that would otherwise accrue to us through the handling of the business at maritime terminals. Sir, up to this time, I have been arguing this matter as though all these things were going through swimmingly, rapidly and pari passu one with another. But I am sorry to say that I do not anticipate anything of that kind. I do not believe that, in its practical effect it will be any advantage to us at all. We all know where the terminals of the Grand Trunk Railway are situated and we all know where the interests of the great corporation lie. We know that those terminals and those interests do not lie in the maritime provinces. I do not think it is the duty of the people of this country to furnish money to the Grand Trunk Railway or any other corporation to build up some place in Maine or any other state of the Union at the expense of our own ports which we would much prefer to see prosper and increase. I thing that any one, especially one coming from the maritime provinces, is very foolish indeed to vote for any such a scheme as must certainly result in the building up of Portland, Maine, at the expense of Halifax and St. John. It is useless to say that this agreement does not do that. So long as the government refuse to put into this agreement a clause which compels this company to carry the trade through Canadian channels and Canadian ports, so long as that compelling clause is not inserted so long will this railway carry this trade to its present terminals in Portland. I do not believe there are two opinions about that, even in this House, if we can only get at the true inwardness of what hon. members think. If we could get a dissecting knife into the innermost thoughts of hon, gentlemen, I believe we should find that opinion in places where we would least suspect its existence. Some of the changes made by this supplementary agreement seem to be made for the very purpose of facilitating this action of the Grand Trunk Railway and helping them to take their freight out of this country entirely to the port of Portland, Maine. If not, why should the government ask parliament to release this deposit of $5,000,000 as soon as the western section is completed? If the government intend to carry on the building of the eastern section pari passu with the western section, why should we be asked to put this clause in? Because, if they really intend to build in that way, the eastern section would be built as rapidly as the western section, and there is no reason whatever for asking parliament to release that deposit as soon as the western section is built. To my mind this change can bear in only one direction, the direction to which I have alluded —that the eastern section will not be built so rapidly as we have been led to suppose. But here comes in another change which also has a very suspicious look in my eyes. I refer to the clause which allows the company to lease and operate any portion of the eastern division as it may be built. What does that point to? To my mind it points to this—that portion of the eastern section which will be first built in that portion running eastward from Winnipeg to North Bay. When that is built and the western portion built, then, with this clause passed by the parliament of Canada, the Grand Trunk Company, or the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, whichever you choose to call it will have obtained everything they originally asked parliament to give them. In the first place, they applied for a charter to build a line from North Bay to the Pacific coast. So, under this arrangement they will have their charter and they will have their line, just as they asked for them in the first place,—with this great and notable exception that, while they came to parliament or to the government—(or to certain members of the government, because I believe that Hon. Mr. Blair, then Minister of Railways and Canals was not taken into the confidence of the negotiating parties of that time) to ask for leave to construct this line—the government in its kind heartedness will have helped them more even than they asked to be helped by building for them that portion of the line from North Bay to Winnipeg.

I do not propose to go over the financial portions of this agreement, as that has already been done by some hon. members on this side. I do not profess to be sufficiently a financial critic to carry on such a discussion as that, and do not wish to attempt it. But I must say this, that after listening to these gentlemen who are able to discuss this phase of the question, after listening to the speech of the hon. leader of the opposition, and, more especially to the speech of the hon member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler), I have heard many replies to these speeches, but I think I can safely say that, so far, I have heard no answer whatever. Therefore I have come to the conclusion that this scheme may be summed up by saying that the country pays nine-tenths of the cost of it from the Atlantic to the Pacific and then gives away half of it, that half which the promoters themselves concede will pay from the very beginning, as soon as the rails are laid upon it. That to my mind is a short statement of the scheme we are asked to support. I do not think that the country is making a very good bargain, I do not think it is making as good a bargain as it might make, even with this company, and I do not think such an agreement should be adopted by the House.

Now, Sir, the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Wade) made a very fervid appeal to the House, and especially to his maritime colleagues, to support the contract because it provided for the carriage of our products through Canadian channels, and that the Grand Trunk Pacific were practically bound to use our own ports. Well, Sir, I think that is exactly what it does not do. There is no clause in this agreement which compels the Grand Trunk Pacific to do anything of the kind. In fact, there is every inducement for them not to do it, because the rate of freight is made the same to all ocean ports, that is, they get just as much for making the short haul to Portland as they would get by taking their goods to St. John or Halifax. I think it must be evident to every member of this House that under these circumstances the only thing we can expect this company to do, unless there is a compelling clause and a penalty attached to it, is to carry their goods in future as they have been carrying them in the past, where they will make the most money out of them, and that is by taking them to Portland. The hon. member went further and said that he and his maritime colleagues had put pressure on the government and forced them to put in the Bill a clause to extend this railway through the northern part of New Brunswick to Moncton, in that way making as we supposed, a shorter route to New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. Now I would like the hon. member for Annapolis to continue to use his influence, not only with his maritime colleagues but with the government, and to put such pressure on the government as to induce them to introduce a compelling clause into this contract, so that there can be no doubt whatever that the Grand Trunk Pacific will be obliged to utilize the maritime province ports and to carry their goods through Canadian channels. If the hon. member wishes to do a service to the people of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and he finds that he has this influence with the government, I say that neither he nor his colleagues could exert that influence to better purpose than by inducing the government to put such compelling clause in this agreement. However, I thought as the hon. member drew towards the end of his speech that he weakened a little even in his own mind, and was not quite so sure that the Grand Trunk Pacific was going to use Canadian ports. I noticed that he turned around with a fine show of virtuous indignation and asked, When did the Conservatives in power ever look after a Canadian port? Well, I have noticed since I have been in this House that when the government are asked as to whether they have left undone something which they ought to have done, or have done something which they ought not to have done and verily have no health in them, that they are very apt to turn around and say Oh, well, the Conservatives didn't do this, or the Conservatives did do that, and therefore if we do as well as they did or no worse than they did, why, we are doing all right. Well, I commend them for keeping before their minds such high ideals, for I think they could not adopt a higher standard of excellence than the conduct and policy of the Conservative party. But I must say that it is about time an excuse of that kind should cease to be given. When they were in opposition they did not talk in any such way, they were not only to do as well as the Conservatives but a great deal better. I think that the people are becoming weary of hearing them continually trying to excuse themselves by pleading the example of the Conservative government, and such an excuse cannot at the present time be taken as reasonable or satisfactory.

Now I will give the hon. gentleman the answer he asked for, and I will show him where the Conservatives have looked after Canadian ports. When the Canadian Pacific Railway was finished to Montreal, that great and wise statesman, the late Sir John A. Macdonald, saw that although our Canadian ports were well utilized in summer, there was no Canadian port utilized in winter; and with that patriotism which always distinguished him, he forced the Canadian Pacific Railway to build a line by the shortest possible route to the nearest available Canadian port, hence we get the Canadian Pacific Railway short line to the port of St. John. That, let me tell the hon. gentleman, is what the Conservative party did. I would also draw his attention to the fact that the Conservative government compelled the Canadian Pacific Railway to build by the shortest possible route to the nearest available port, because the line was not built for political purposes but for commercial purposes. Now what has been the result? I find in looking over the Trade and Navigation Returns that the exports from the port of St. John last year amounted in value to $15,364,735.

I may say that only two other places in the whole Dominion last year exported goods to a greater value than did the port of St. John. Those two places were the port of Montreal and the port of Niagara Falls, Montreal exporting sixty-five million dollars odd, and the port of Niagara Falls eighteen million dollars odd. I commend these facts and figures to hon. gentlemen opposite Especially do I recommend them to take to heart the fact that this road was not a political road; it was built for commercial purposes and consequently it was built on right lines, by the shortest possible route to the nearest available port. I do not believe you will ever succeed in carrying to a successful issue an all-Canadian line which does not take these facts into consideration. I must make one more allusion to a remark made by the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Russell). I listened to his remarks with the greatest pleasure; he is a very pleasing speaker. He referred to the constituency which at the present time I have the honour to represent, and he said that on a recent memorable occasion, the people of that constituency had become panic stricken and voted against the government while in an hysterical condition. I may say if I may be allowed to speak for the people of my own constituency, and to know at least as much about them and their characteristics as the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Russell) that I have found no evidence of their being panic stricken. I think from my knowledge of them that they are a people who are not given to panics. The very subject that we are now discussing was before them and was argued by able advocates on both sides, and after hearing these advocates they came to the conclusion which they expressed by their vote. I would like to remind you Sir, and the hon. members present, that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Emmerson) was one of the great advocates of this railway on the government side. Would the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Russell) have this House understand that the very appearance of the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals on a platform was enough to drive people into a panic? If so, I think the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Emmerson) will hardly thank him for such a suggestion. I might say to the hon. member (Mr. Russell) I believe that in the near future when these constituencies will all be opened up and will all have this matter brought closely to their attention; when they find that there is no limit to the time which may be taken for the building of the eastern section while there is a time limit for the building of the western section; when they find that the government itself is so dubious about it that they have agreed to release the deposit of $5,000,000 as soon as the western section is built, and that the company can make use of any portion of the eastern section as soon as it is built, which of course means the part from Winnipeg east to the North Bay connection, a part which the company was willing to build for itself, but which the government now builds and practically presents to them, certainly for a large number of years, and after that leases to them at a very cheap rate; when they find that there is absolutely nothing in the agreement to compel this company to carry its freight to Canadian ports, except, as one hon. gentlemen has stated, the patriotic impulse of the people of the west which is to cause them to route their freight our way; when they know that a great company like the Grand Trunk Pacific will practically control the routing of freight, and that they will naturally route it in any direction and to any port by which they can make the most money out of it, and when they know as they do that that nearest port is not any port in the maritime provinces—I say that when these and other considerations of a like nature are brought to the notice of the electors, hon. gentlemen opposite, representing constituencies in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick will find that that panic, if it is a panic, will spread and that the people will brush aside as so many cobwebs the gentlemen who are trying to deceive them in this matter, and to induce them to believe that there is anything whatever in this agreement compelling the company to use Canadian ports for the export of freight passing over its line.

Mr. SEYMOUR E. GOURLEY (Colchester). Mr. Speaker, I have not been present and have not had the advantage of hearing the debate up to this time. I regret that, for I have not the opinion held by some people that the debates in this House are not instructive. I am always instructed by the debates in this parliament and I always have pleasure in hearing the opinions of our friends supporting the government. I listen to those opinions with deference, because nobody can be an intelligent Canadian who is not broad enough to listen to opinions uttered on all sides of every question. I have listened with great pleasure to the argument of my colleague, the hon. the junior member for St. John (Mr. Daniel). I have listened with pleasure to his arguments in this debate. He seems to think that the legal men in this House have some advantage over laymen. I do not think that the want of practice at the bar has been any disadvantage to him if we may judge by his speech. I congratulate the Conservative party on his acquisition, and I think that the panic to which my hon. friend from Hants (Mr. Russell) referred is largely due to the appearance of such a strong man in this House as a member of the Liberal Conservative party. Before I conclude I shall again refer to my hon. friend from Hants (Mr. Russell) and I think if he visits his county which marches for forty miles with my own, he will find much reason for thought. I find that the plain people, the common people, are the people who have the intelligence of this country, and not the lawyers or the manufacturers, or the cabinet ministers. The plain people, I find, give me true wisdom on all questions. I have been looking through the county of Colchester and mingling with these men who come to the fences with their forks in their hands and leaning on their forks give me more instruction in five minutes than any cabinet minister can give me in an hour. I have been over the county of Colchester listening to the remarks of Liberals and Conservatives alike.

In these journeyings, I met many constituents of my hon. friend from Hants (Mr. Russell), and I can tell him, that it would be better for him to visit his county, than to be talking here about the city of St. John, for if he visits Hants, he will find a panic in that county that menaces his future political life.

Hon. WM. ROSS (N. S.) A little louder please.

Mr. GOURLEY. If it is noise you want I can give you some.

I delight in the amenities of debate. I think nothing is gained by roughness of expression in this House, and therefore, I want to congratulate the Solicitor General on the splendid way in which he uses the English language. He uses it with precision, and as I am a little bit of a student of that language, I tell him, he uses the language with great grace and force, and I wish to commend his example to the English speaking people on his side of the House. They can improve their speech making by copying the English language, which the Solicitor General, though it is not his mother tongue, uses. I made my argument on the Grand Trunk question last year, and I do not intend to repeat it. I abide by that argument. It may not have been on all fours with the argument made by many members of this House, but I am persuaded that it will be the argument that ultimately (when the people thoroughly understand this whole matter) will defeat this government at the polls. I am a railway man; I believe in the development of this country by railways, and I believe that Canada, when she reaches her full development, will have railways almost as plentiful as highways, for the railway is the modern highway, and as the old highways were thought to be necessary crossing lots ten or fifteen miles apart, so I trust the railways will come to be as necessary to accommodate the traffic of our country. I do not attack this railway because I do not wish to see railways built. I hope not only to see this transcontinental railway built, but I hope in my lifetime to see one or two other transcontinental lines built north of it. Consequently, if I oppose the building of this railway, what in the world will men do who do not believe that Canada at the present time needs further railway development? I made my argument last year against the Grand Trunk Pacific scheme on two principle grounds. I argued that this line was fatally mislocated to answer the purpose of a national transcontinental road. I am glad to say that upon mature reflection the students of transportation in this country are universally coming to that conclusion. In that speech made by Sir Sandford Fleming in Toronto, which was quoted by the Solicitor General, it is clear that he makes the crushing criticism on this line, that it does not go north of Lake Winnipeg. Sir Sandford Fleming says, that it is fatally weak, because it goes south of Lake Winnipeg and crowds itself into that narrow strip of 45 miles of territory, which intervenes between the south of Lake Winnipeg and the United States border. I find, Sir, that all over the country our people are studying the geography of Canada. It is only recently that Canadians have come to know the geography of their country. They thought that the little strip of territory in which the civilization of Canada is located to-day; the little strip from the maritime provinces to Lake Superior about 40 miles broad; the narrow strip of country hugging the Intercolonial Railway, hugging the St. Lawrence, hugging the lakes, and hugging the Canadian Pacific Railway across the prairies; they thought that was Canada. Why, Sir, we are but at the threshold of the development of Canada, and therefore we must approach this question in the light of the future of our country.

The first criticism I made last year, was that this line of railway, if it were to be a line for the highest development of the great national interests of the country, was fatally located in every part. My second objection was the argument, made by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Daniel), who is a maritime man, and who, although I had no conversation with him, has expressed again and again my idea of last year: that the next fatal objection to this line of railway was its union with the old Grand Trunk. The old Grand Trunk sends its commerce to Portland, and it is utterly impossible to divert the course of its business which it has been following for years and years. Therefore it is that the government was fatally wrong in mixing this railway up with the old Grand Trunk Railway, that for forty years has been the enemy of Canada. I sometimes am forced to criticise my friends and colleagues from Ontario for being narrow and I think perhaps that criticism is just. But, Sir, in no particular have they sinned so badly, as when in the early days the history of their province, they permitted that Portland should have been selected as the Atlantic terminus of the Grand Trunk Railway. Had they sent their public men down to the maritime provinces at that time, and said: We are threatened with a great difficulty, we have no Atlantic seaport and therefore we must go to Portland, unless you give us a port;—had they done that, confederation would have come forty years before it did, and this country, instead of being on the near verge of national development, would have been well on the highway of progress, and we would be able to challenge successfully, the power and the might of the United States. But, Sir, that is past, and we can only make the best of what remains. If a mistake was made in the early days in permitting the Grand Trunk to go to Portland, and build up a great city there, that mistake should not be repeated. We were told last year by the Minister of the Interior, that he had it from a high official of the Grand Trunk Company, that they had spent $25,000,000 in creating enormous terminals and facilities for trade in that United States city.

How can we expect a company like that to make immense investments in terminal preparations for the exportation of the great products of this country across the ocean? I said: Your mistake is not to have chartered a new company. If you are bound to build this railway, make the interests of the whole line one from the Pacific ocean to Halifax, so that when your company gets a pound of freight in British Columbia, it will be bound to take it to Halifax or St. John. But you did not do that. You have instead amalgamated this project with a railway whose interest is to take the freight to Portland; and you seek to cover up that fatal error by putting into the contract a little section which says that the company must take the freight to Halifax unless it is otherwise routed. That clause would have been altogether unnecessary if you had made a new company, because its interest would have been the same over the whole line. I attacked the proposition on these two grounds. I attacked it also on the third ground which the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Daniel) has put so strongly, that is, that in this arrangement the maritime provinces have been side-tracked from beginning to end. The hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Wade), whose great ability in many ways I respect, has prostituted that great ability in this instance; and when he goes to Annapolis, he will find that the people there know this question better than he does, if he has been speaking his true sentiments, and they will teach him a lesson for not having stood by the interests of the maritime provinces in this matter, but for having sacrificed them to party exigencies. I am a party man, but when it comes to the question of Canada and the maritime provinces, I throw party to the winds and stand by my country. It would have been better for the hon. gentleman to have done the same, and to have written a new chapter of the history of Canada. I would say the same with reference to the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Russell). Perhaps he is under an uncontrollable necessity—I mean an uncontrollable intellectual or moral necessity—to support this government. I know that gentleman, and would not say an unkind word of him; but I am sorry that there are uncontrollable party exigencies to compel a man to give up his independence of speech in this parliament. I thank God I am not a place-hunter; I am not seeking a judgeship; I would not take a judgeship for the sacrifice of my independence. A position in this parliament is worth more than a judgeship fifty times over. I cannot understand a man forfeiting his right of independent speech in this parliament, where he can assist in building a nation—the noblest occupation in which any man can engage; I cannot understand how a man can throw all this away for a little tu'penny-ha'penny salary. The man who is fitted to be in this parliament ought to be able to earn the salary of a judge in six months and have the other six months for a holiday. If he cannot do that, he is not fit to be a judge or a member of this parliament either. I am glad to say that I am fortified in my position on this question by my contact with the people. The Minister of Finance sometimes visits the county of Colchester, and when he does you can scarcely drive him away. No matter how important his other engagements may be, he will always stop there five or six hours to breathe in the intelligence and general strength of thought that exists in the town of Truro and everywhere else throughout the county of Colchester. That county is peopled by descendants of Irishmen, Scotchmen and Englishmen of the highest type, and they have preserved their traditions for intelligence, education and contemplation. In my county the people are philosophers from one end of the county to the other; and after associating with the gentlemen of his own party all winter, and perhaps feeling a little impoverished in thought in consequence, the hon. Minister of Finance, when he comes to Colchester, stops to breathe its invigorating atmosphere, and you cannot drive him away. I have been over the county again and again, and I have found Liberals and Tories alike unanimously supporting me in the position I took with reference to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway. When that measure was introduced last session, I was inclined to support it; I wanted to support it, because I was in favour of railways in every part of the country, and I wanted to see two or three transcontinental lines built. But when I investigated the miserable thing day by day, I got so sick of it that I could not support it; it was bad from beginning to end. That is the universal feeling that exists to-day in my county, not only among Conservatives, but among Liberals, barring a few party hacks. Fortunately there are in Canada liberal-minded men of all parties who at this time of day are able to look at these questions with an unbiased judgment; and I tell the hon. member for Annapolis, the hon. member for Hants and the hon. member for Queen's and Shelburne, that when they say that this measure has the endorsation of the people of Nova Scotia, they are misinformed—absolutely and utterly misinformed. Last year, when this measure was introduced, gentlemen like the Minister of Militia (Sir Frederick Borden)—I am not personally conversant of this, but I am informed that he and his friends boasted in Halifax that neither Gourley nor Kaulbach nor Borden would dare to oppose it. I venture to say that there never was any measure more unpopular in Nova Scotia than this one, because it offends against the very idea of a proper development of the maritime provinces. I said I was anxious to support it. I want to see two thousand miles of railway built in Nova Scotia in the next ten years; and I do not ask for Nova Scotia more than I am willing to concede to other parts of Canada. I supported the assistance given to the Mackenzie & Mann railway, and I support willingly every measure for building railways in any part of Canada. I want 145 miles of railway built in the county of Colchester and 2,000 miles built in Nova Scotia; and if you give us these railways, we will give you within twenty years one of the richest and best developed provinces on earth, to add strength and power to Canada in every direction. We want railways to open up our gold mines and our coal mines. It would not take over $4,000,000 to subsidize enough railways in Nova Scotia to make it one of the wealthiest and most productive provinces in the world.

I am going to appeal to this House, and ask the government to give to 143 miles of railway in my county a double subsidy, for the railways in Nova Scotia do not pay for the first five years and you must therefore offer to capitalize some inducement to build them. After five years, however, they will pay handsomely, and return to the treasury of the Dominion 25 to 30 per cent annually on the outlay. I could demonstrate that by giving a subsidy, you will be aiding the treasury four to one. I mention this to show that I am a railway man out and out and that therefore when I oppose this transcontinental scheme it is because no man on earth who studies it can support it truthfully or honestly. If this were a railway to develop the province of Quebec locally or the northern Ontario or Manitoba or New Brunswick or the North-west Territories—if it were going to develop any portion of this Dominion locally, I would hold up both hands in its support. But it is of another character. It is announced to us as a great transcontinental and national line; but if you want that kind of a line and are going to indulge in the enormous expenditure of building one, you want it to answer the highest purposes of such a means of communication. We want it to develop every province, not locally, but to give it every opportunity of playing its part in the transcontinental business of the country. That is the test of a railway of this description. If there is a man on either side who criticises this country unjustly, I am not of his class. I have faith in this country and in every acre of it. You cannot measure the value of a country by its gardens and its valleys. They are its fairest portions and bring forth its luxuries, but I can show rocky acres in Nova Scotia that are worth ten times over the richest valleys we have in the whole Dominion. You cannot measure the worth of a country by merely looking at its green valleys and fertile spots. You must take in its rocks and boulders, for they may give the greatest power to the country. I am not one of those who would ever in any way underrate his native land. If any one were to show me that this whole country from Quebec to Lake Manitoba was full of rocks, I would not for one moment despair, but would think that it might turn to be one of the wealthiest portions of Canada. The fact that it was full of rocks would be no argument to deter me from building a railway through it, and consequently when you find me opposing this railway, you will get no sensible man in the country to support it.

As regards the Hudson Bay country, I have read everything connected with it for the last fifteen years. While the hon. the Finance Minister was preaching desolation and destruction down in Nova Scotia, I as a young boy, was endeavouring to stem the tide he was stirring up against faith in Canada. I was preaching faith in Canada amid the jeers of the Liberals. When I declared that this country had unlimited possibilities, the Liberals jeered, and said it was no good, that we would drift into the United States, and that we could never be worth much of ourselves. This was the opinion of a good many down there and I am sorry to say that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) had a good deal to do in giving force and colour to that view. I have always believed in Canada from my youth up. In my home I was taught that Canada is superior to the United States, that our people are superior, that the institutions and morality and homes of our country are superior to anything elsewhere on this continent. When I gave expression to that faith, I was greeted by the jeers of the Liberal party in the province of Ontario, but I am glad to say that the more independent spirit has grown up in that province and that now when you speak proudly of Canada they will cheer you heartily I believe that there is a great alluvial valley between the height of land and Hudson Bay, which will turn out to be more fertile and richer even than your boasted Ontario peninsula. The climate is infinitely superior to that of Montreal and Quebec, and I would be willing to build a line to that country, but this projected line will not touch that great alluvial basin. It will just crawl up the height of land, from which every vestige of soil has been swept by the water down to this rich alluvial basin. From the Saguenay, along the south of James Bay, through that alluvial basin, to Lake Winnipeg and thence to Port Simpson, you will find a territory as rich as anything ever developed in the whole history of Canada. If this projected line had pursued that course, I would have supported it, believing that it would bring about a great national development, and especially because such a line would give us a route from Yokohama to London shorter by 1,400 miles than any we have at present. I believe that a line could be laid down from Port Simpson, north of Winnipeg and south of James Bay, to the Saguenay, which would shorten the distance by land and sea from Yokohama to London by the extent I have mentioned. That would give us such an overwhelming advantage that it would practically destroy all competition, and in five years you would get the whole trade of the east, that trade which has enriched every nation that has ever enjoyed it, from the earliest times down to the present. Any expenditure by Canada would be justifiable which would secure to us that trade; and any railways we would need to locally develop any of our provinces, we could build out of the enormous revenues that would flow to us from the Orient. Had such a policy been pursued, I would have supported it with heart and hand, no matter what might happen to me politically, but that course not having been taken, I am compelled to oppose this enormous expenditure to which we are asked to commit ourselves. And for this expenditure, which could give us the great transcontinental line I have indicated you will get, under the present scheme, only a little tu'penny ha'penny line over the height of land, where there is nothing of any importance unless the country should turn out to be rich in minerals—where there is nothing to attract the immigrant, nothing to attract those great people from Scotch, Irish and English homes, who give us such strength and ability when they settle among us. What we want is depth. We can never have a country developed as it should be, when we have only a little fringe of population on its outskirts. We must have depth, and we should go north some 500 miles to locate our road, and once we have our road located some 500 miles to the north through that rich territory, the star of destiny will rise in Canada and the star to the south, which has so long been in the ascendent, will sink for ever and somebody perhaps living now will sit down and write the decline and fall of the United States. I desire to put myself on record here as a student, when I express the hope that some day there will be a city on the Hudson Bay which perhaps will be the capital of the British empire. No doubt my prediction to-day will be received as was that of twenty years ago, when I predicted that we would have a nation in Canada, as we had all the material and resources with which to build up a nation. This prediction which I made to-day may be received with jeers, but I know whereof I speak and I believe that some day we will be the centre of the British empire.

And on that account I am a strong supporter of the perferential ideas of Mr. Chamberlain. For I believe that Canada has more to gain by federation of the empire and the keeping of the empire together than any other portion of the empire. In a few years we shall be a great manufacturing country, and we shall need these other British possessions all over the world for the carrying on of Canadian trade. If we have not these it will be necessary for us to do what the United States have done, —take sword in hand and conquer countries like the Philippines and Cuba in order to afford outlets for our trade. But, having such outlets, for God's sake let us keep them and give Canada the opportunity to exploit them for her own purposes.

I have spoken of the expenditure involved in this scheme. I would not be deterred by an expenditure of $200,000,000 or $300,000,000 if by spending the money we got a national line. Do not let any hon. gentleman think that I would be deterred by any such consideration. Show me that we can get the national line, and I will respond that no expense that we can bear would be too great to be justified by such a result. I would support such an expenditure gladly. But to spend these enormous sums of money and not get the national line stirs the blood in my heart and makes me opposed to this scheme from beginning to end.

I wish to emphasize the location of this road. There has been but little knowledge of the geography of Canada, and perhaps people do not understand the dominating influence of Lake Winnipeg in this problem. That lake is 256 miles in length and lies north and south directly across the lines to connect the east and the west. We must go either north or south of that lake. There is a distance of only 56 miles between the United States border and the southern end of Lake Winnipeg. We must put all our railways through that 56-mile strip or we must go north of the lake with some of them. This is a question of enormous difficulty. If the country north of Lake Winnipeg is impossible of development, we cannot build a line of railway through it successfully and settle in that country a population sufficient to support the railway and defend it, why, we must face the fact. As a Canadian, I have great faith in this country and would give anything to see it succeed. But, at the same time I am a practical man. I realize that you would never make one nation of territory that is joined by a strip only 56 miles in width and contiguous to the American border. Because, in case of trouble, the United States in twenty-four hours could break that railway, thus separating the two ends of our country and defeat us in sections. Consequently, it becomes a matter of supreme importance to know the character of the country north of Lake Winnipeg, and, if possible, to locate a line of railway there which will make us impregnable and make Canada really a nation. Canada is only a little aggregation of provinces to-day. But what we want is to show that we have a good territory four or five hundred miles north of the present line of settlement. Then we shall know that we have a country capable of supporting hundreds of millions of people and shall feel assured that we shall be the dominating power on this continent in fifty years from now. So, this is the crucial question for Canadians—to ascertain whether we can locate that railway, and, if so to locate it and settle this question for ever. After the settlement of the boundary at the 49th parallel the Americans went home and told their people that they had secured everything worth while and that we had nothing but a little fringe of territory. The repetition of that idea has done Canada incalculable harm. Even in my own home, where I hear nothing but imperialism, I have heard the fear expressed lest this prediction should prove true, and that we have no territory to the north where we can settle millions of people. We want to explode that theory. If we can do so the whole question is settled in our favour, and this will be the dominating nation on the continent. In this connection I desire to quote authority. As a rule, I do not pin my faith absolutely to the opinion of any man. I believe that any man who will sit down and honestly and diligently study a question is likely to reach a reasonable opinion on that question. I desire to quote Sir Sandford Fleming, and I do so because from his earliest youth that gentleman has devoted himself to the study of the physical character of Canada and to its railway and transportation possibilities. Last year, you will remember, Sir, the attempt was made by the supporters of the government again and again to prove that Sir Sandford Fleming approved of the route of this railway. If he had approved it, I am bound to say I would have accepted his opinion with respect. We in Nova Scotia know Sir Sandford Fleming as the man who located our line of railway and did it well, and we respect his judgment in such matters. I am bound to say that, if Sir Sandford Fleming supported the location of this railway last year, the experience of a year has taught him, as it has taught many people including supporters of the government, that he made a grievous mistake. I shall quote from the same pamphlet that the Solicitor General quoted from. I complimented that hon. gentleman on his use of English. I would not mislead this honourable House. While the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux) seems to be able to speak English exceedingly well, he does not appear to comprehend it through reading. If he could, he surely would not have misapprehended so greatly the meaning of Sir Sandford Fleming's speech before the Canadian Club at Toronto, which he quoted this afternoon. I attribute that not to intentional misrepresentation, but to misapprehension on the hon. gentleman's part of the English language which is not his mother tongue. Sir Sandford Fleming distinctly repudiated this location as the most unwise that could be made in Canada for a national transcontinental line. And he gives a map which, beyond all doubt is a fair representation of Canada. The route he traces starts from Quebec. The only difference between the route he advocates and that which I advocated last year, the one known as the Trans-Canada is that he makes his terminus at Quebec, whereas the Trans-Canada people had a line further east and made their terminal on the River Saguenay, about sixty miles below Quebec. In his lecture Sir Sandford Fleming divides Canada practically into three parts. He starts at Quebec, which he calls A; then goes to the north of Lake Winnipeg, having a point which he calls B, then to Port Simpson which he calls C. He says that any line to be of service to Canada must start at Port Simpson go north to B and then eastward to a city on the Atlantic. Therefore, he repudiates entirely the location of this line. As I understand it, the government propose to start at Quebec, then curve up and cross the height of land north of Lake Superior—they must cross the height of land north of Lake Superior in order to get down to the valley to Winnipeg. This line, according to Sir Sandford Fleming, is weak in a military sense, in a commercial sense, and because of the length of line. It destroys all possibility of making this the national line to carry oriental trade. I want it to be distinctly understood that Sir Sandford Fleming, whatever he stands for in the matter of railway knowledge in this country, is opposed, as I am opposed, to the location of this national highway on the line proposed. This is what he says :

Such a railway constructed between Quebec and the western prairies on the northern route would be a national highway in every sense. Its immediate effect would be to broaden the Dominion, to add strength where strength is so much needed, to establish many new centres of industry, and thus the country would steadily become populated and consolidated. What is now a wide-spread wilderness would be converted into one of the most important divisions of the Dominion.

I have not touched on the military reasons for establishing a railway far to the rear of Lake Superior. I leave that branch of the subject for others to deal with. I merely submit some reasons in favour of a policy of establishing the proposed new national railway by the shortest route. I shall conclude in the words of the Prime Minister in addressing the people of Montreal two or three weeks back.

Then he quotes Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and it is funny how the Prime Minister can be quoted either to support his scheme or to oppose it. His language is so flexible and elastic that he can be quoted on either side. Sir Sandford says :

And he locates it north of Lake Winnipeg, and describes the whole line so clearly that there can be no doubt about it. So any gentleman who now quotes Sir Sandford Fleming as supporting this railway scheme must do so deliberately, because he in fact repudiated the route, and supports the view of the opposition in this matter. Now I have said that last year I opposed it, and I am glad to see that the junior member for St. John (Mr. Daniel), who comes fresh from the people and can speak from the maritime standpoint, is also opposing it, even apart from its location. It has this fatal defect, that it is a part of the old Grand Trunk Railway that has been for so long the enemy of Canada in a transportation sense. Now this new agreement accentuates that defect, and this new agreement makes Portland absolutely the great entrepot, the great exporting centre for the trade of the west—not Halifax, or St. John, or Country Harbour, or Quebec. I have no doubt, however, that the city of Quebec and the surrounding country will be benefited, but only as a summer port, because I believe that railways do not extend their beneficial influence much beyond ten or fifteen miles from their point of location. Therefore, I come to the conclusion that if you want to benefit a country by railways you must not build them fifty miles apart, but ten or twelve miles apart, and then you will find the whole country thrilled with the impulses of trade and commerce. A year or two ago I mentioned Ohio and Illinois as examples of the benefits of railways. The little state of Ohio with 60,000 square miles, about three times the size of Nova Scotia, has got more railways than the whole Dominion of Canada, so has Illinois. Ohio has a population of four or five millions. We find that wherever railways are plentiful population is plentiful, wealth is plentiful, and just as you get away from these railways population begins to get thin, wealth begins to get thin ; and if you go into a country where there are no railways then you find poverty and uninhabited wastes. Just in proportion as you have railways you have development. Therefore, I have been converted to the idea that the great object to which we should bend our attention in Canada is the building of twenty or thirty thousand miles of railway in the next twenty years. How can we compete with a nation that has 207,000 miles of railway, when we have only 18,000 ? We have 50,000 or 60,000 square miles more territory than they have, including Alaska, and yet we have courage enough to ask the people of Canada to enter into competition with a people of their resources and their means of transportation, the most highly developed country in the world. Let us be sensible, and let us set ourselves to the task of developing our own country, and then I have no doubt that the capacity of this northern race can beat the people of the United States out of their boots. But you must not ask the people of Canada, bright as they are and full of courage, to undertake the hopeless task, handicapped as they are, with their paucity of railways.

Now let me say this, I do not wish to be misunderstood, I do not want my Quebec friends to think that I am opposed to their having railways. I believe this proposed railway will enrich and enlarge the city of Quebec and the surrounding country. I believe that was the object of this whole scheme. I believe the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister, both representing the city of Quebec, are driven to build this railway and to clothe it with the character of a transcontinental line for the mere purpose of aggrandizing the constituency from which they come. That is the whole genesis of this transcontinental system. The Prime Minister, with that grace of his mother tongue, mixed up with the finesse of the Saxon, is able to captivate a great many people, as he is able to captivate his party followers. If he is not able to captivate them with the grace of his language, he has other beautiful things in his pocket which he uses very well to captivate the more hardened sinners of his party. Now the Grand Trunk Pacific will benefit the city of Quebec as the Canadian Pacific Railway has benefited Montreal. I believe that the whole genesis of this railway lay in the fact that the people of Quebec said to the Prime Minister and Minister of Justice :

See how the Canadian Pacific Railway has built up Montreal, why don't you give us a railway that will build up Quebec in the same way. Why don't you make Quebec the terminus of a great railway and build it up as Montreal was built up by the Canadian Pacific Railway. Therefore, Sir, I think the whole people of Canada are saddled with a most onerous transcontinental system for the purpose of enabling the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice to come back to this parliament with very little trouble. However, I hail with pleasure the fact that the people of Quebec have strength enough to dominate this whole country. If I had the power perhaps I would work the same scheme on behalf of the province of Nova Scotia, or the county of Colchester. I congratulate the people of Quebec on the power they possess over this government and of the success they have had in working this scheme through the influence and ability of the men that they send to parliament. Long may that state of affairs continue, and may the other provinces learn to emulate them.

That is all very well for the province of Quebec, but how do we stand in the lower provinces? Why, my hon. friends from Hants (Mr. Russell), from Annapolis (Mr. Wade) and from Queen's and Shelburne (Mr. Fielding) take to themselves credit for getting this little string attached to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway. The whole scheme as mapped out by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice was that this transcontinental railway should have its terminus at Quebec city. Having done that they accomplished everything that far. But of course they had the other provinces to fool, and they said to the maritime province people: Of course the scheme is to make Quebec a great terminal city, and of course we have to fool you fellows by giving another line down to Moncton. So you tell the people that Moncton is going to be the terminus. Then if the member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) is strong enough, he will have it taken to Amherst; and when I am running in Colchester I will say that Truro is going to be the terminus. Then when the elections come on and it is found expedient, the candidate who is running for Guysborough will say that the terminus is going to be at Country Harbour. Now then I am bound to say to the hon. gentlemen opposite coming from the maritime provinces: you have not fooled a soul in the maritime provinces but yourselves. You are the ones who are fooled by this scheme, and you are the only ones.

I glory in the ingenuity by which the members for New Brunswick secured the building of this line through New Brunswick, because as a local line it will help that province. But I am speaking of it in the larger sense of a transcontinental line. I would not oppose this line, and I hope it will be built, but if it is to be built at all, if a foot of it is to be built from Winnipeg to Port Simpson, then the other section from Winnipeg to Moncton must be built pari passu. I have no sympathy with the humbug which says that the road must be built through the western country, but must not be built through the maritime provinces. If this scheme is going through at all, the maritime provinces are entitled to their share of the humbug as well as the other provinces. I stand for every foot of the line being built, and the maritime province part of it must be built if any is built. Some people think that because the line is to go to Quebec it will be of more advantage to the maritime provinces than if it went to Montreal. I undertake to tell you that the people of the maritime provinces know better than to be fooled by this matter of transcontinental termini. In the old days we actually believed that the Canadian Pacific Railway would bring through-freight to Halifax. We were absolutely fooled in the matter, because we knew so little about the geography of the country and the conditions of transportation. We do not believe it now, for we know that every pound of freight which is placed on the cars at Winnipeg is in danger until it gets past the lines running to Buffalo and New York; when it has passed Buffalo and New York it is in danger of Boston; when it gets to Montreal it is in danger of Portland, and even at Quebec it is still in danger of Portland. Therefore, we in the maritime provinces have come to the conclusion that any line of railway that goes to Montreal or Quebec will not bring a pound of freight to Halifax or St. John; the physical conditions are against it. Thus, when you tell me that the line goes to Quebec, I reply that that is no better for us than if it went to Montreal, because at Quebec it is only 19 miles farther away from Portland than it is when it is at Montreal, and by cutting off a loop the distance may be made the same. So that when freight is brought to Quebec by this line it is, as I have said, no better for the maritime provinces than when it is at Montreal, and we know that freight from Montreal will never reach the maritime provinces, except an occasional stray shipment. Therefore, the people of the maritime provinces are unalterably opposed to it, and all the speeches of a dozen gentlemen from Annapolis or Hants cannot change the settled conviction of this country. Rhetoric will not work; we want something practical, and we know that a line of railway that hauls the freight from the Peace river country away south down to Winnipeg and then takes it away around by the north to Nova Scotia is an utter impossibility. You cannot keep the freight north, but if you take it down to the Saguenay we know that when it gets below Quebec it must find its exit through the maritime provinces. Therefore, last year I supported the Trans-Canada Railway, and I regret that the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Lemieux) should have attempted to make a point against me. Of course. I glory in my support of the Trans-Canada Railway. I went to the Chamber of Commerce at Quebec and supported it, and did the same thing here. If I remember rightly, the Solicitor General (Mr. Lemieux) was there and supported it, too. What courage these gentlemen have! I am still supporting the Trans-Canada line, but he reviles me now for supporting in parliament what I supported in the Chamber of Commerce. He takes the position that because he supported it in the Chamber of Commerce, therefore, he must oppose it here, and he asks me why I do not follow his example, and holds me up to ridicule, because I do in this House what I did in Quebec. Sir, I have only one voice for Canada; I use it in Nova Scotia, in Quebec, and in the west. But these gentlemen say: That is all wrong, you should follow our examples, and have a voice for Quebec, another for Nova Scotia, and another for every part of the Dominion of Canada in which you happen to be. So surely do they carry out that system that they go down to Quebec and raise a racial and religious cry when there is an election there, and then come into this House and look over here and say: Oh, you fellows are always raising this racial and religious cry. Sir, they have the courage of the fallen angel, and they have many other of his habits and practices. The Conservative party does not fear to strike above the belt, but we must be careful when fighting these gentlemen, because they hit us below the belt when they get a chance, and then, after striking us below the belt, they say: Why don't you fight fair?

Mr. MORIN. That is so; you are right.

Mr. GOURLEY. I have said that the Quebec-Moncton section must be built, and I wish to put myself thoroughly on record on that score. I am for that section from beginning to end. If a mile of this crooked, bottled-up railway is to be built, then build the Moncton section, because if Quebec is to be benefited at the expense of the whole Dominion, we should have a little of the overflow down in the maritime provinces. The people of Quebec are being dealt with splendidly, their coffers are overflowing with the gold of Canada, and they will not object to some of the milk coming down to us so long as they have all the cream. I stand for the Trans-Canada Railway, and I do not think the Solicitor General should have complained about my standing by it in this parliament when he supported it in the Chamber of Commerce and should stand by it here. I believe that in his maturer moments, when he is unbiased by any considerations of office or influence, he will think as I do and will agree with me.

I wish to say one word about my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden). I see that the 'Morning Chronicle,' and a certain element of the people of Halifax, are trying to hold that gentleman up as an opponent of the maritime provinces. They might as well hold up the hon. the junior member for St. John as an opponent of the maritime provinces, although he has been acclaimed by the people in a panic. I do not object to the use of that word; it is time there should be a panic in Canada. By Jove, if there ever was a time when there should be a panic, this is the time and I thank the hon. gentleman for that word 'panic.' Panic! A panic is starting, and my hon. friends will find that there is a panic in the county of Colchester, in the county of Annapolis, in the county of Hants, and when we arrive at the general election, which I hope is not far off, we will find that these gentlemen would have done better to stand by the interests of the maritime provinces and not by mere party interests. The hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) has been attacked in the press of Halifax because he is opposing this scheme. He says that it aggrandizes Portland and, in opposing it, I say he is fighting the battle of the maritime provinces. I desire to tell these gentlemen that when the whole facts are known it will be found that the day of misrepresentation is past. I tell them also that, notwithstanding this scheme is put through, the Trans-Canada will be built in five or ten years. There will be such a consensus of public opinion in favour of the route of the Trans-Canada as a national route that, although we have been led into this extraordinary extravagance, the people will say: Let it go; it was a blunder; it was built as a party expedient; let us undertake now to build the Trans-Canada, and lay down a true national line for the development of our country.

I will not hesitate to say on behalf of the maritime provinces, that no line that does not go below Quebec can ever benefit us. Once locate a line below Quebec, and then there is a straight course across the continent to Halifax, or to Country Harbour, or to St. John and once the products of the great west are put upon this line and sent down there they cannot go to Boston or to Portland, but must go out on the Atlantic from Canadian harbours to the great markets of the old country. That is my ambition, and I believe it is the ambition of some of the gentlemen opposite, if they could only throw away their narrow party trammels, and stand up like men, and proclaim what they really believe. I charge it against the gentlemen who are supporting the government, that they are conspiring to crush out the hopes, and the ambitions of the provinces by the sea, and to keep them shackled for 25 years longer. Of course, the Canadian Pacific Railway had to be built where it was, but we were deluded by the idea that we would get trade from that source. An attempt is made to delude us again, but we know now that a line making its terminus at Quebec will never benefit the maritime provinces. Therefore, I am not concerned by any statement of the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Russell) or the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Wade) because I know that this scheme is bound to be unpopular in the maritime provinces.

And now, with reference to the terms. Most generous terms were given last year to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, but I do not blame these gentlemen for coming back to get more generous treatment. They knew that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice would not go to Quebec province for an election, until the agreement was completed. They knew it was for the purpose of pulling the province of Quebec politically, that this whole scheme of the Grand Trunk Pacific was conceived. I was at the Windsor Hotel in December last, and the Prime Minister was there looking radiant some days and dejected other days. He is always pleasant to meet, and I am glad his health is restored, because I want to beat him when he is well ; I don't want to beat him when he is sick. I am glad that the Prime Minister is well, because I like to fight an opponent in the full possession of his powers, and I congratulated hon. gentlemen opposite, upon their leader having recovered his health. When I met him at the Windsor at Montreal, he was looking peculiarly happy, because he was daily expecting a cable that the Grand Trunk deposit had been made, and the government printers had instructions to have all the material ready for a general election, and he was going to the country thinking he would get a verdict from the maritime provinces, and from the provinces of Quebec before the people understood the question. But the Grand Trunk people knew the position of the Prime Minister exactly. I have no doubt they could have put up this money in five minutes, but these shrewd fellows over in London, said : We will keep our money in our pockets, and we will cable that we cannot put it up, and the Prime Minister of Canada, will have to meet parliament, and we will insist on better terms. They had the government of Canada like a lemon or a cut orange, and they could squeeze the juice out of it as they liked. They said : We will force the Prime Minister to call parliament, and then we will dictate our terms, because if he does not complete his contract he will have to go to Quebec and be beaten out of his boots. I therefore think that the Grand Trunk people have acted most generously to the government. I wonder that they did not demand half the possessions of Canada. I can understand the supporters of the government lauding this scheme because they knew that the Grand Trunk might have had $10, for the $1 it asked and received. The Grand Trunk people have only asked for $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 extra; why could they not have $100,000,000? This government would never have consented to have been defeated in the province of Quebec for $100,000,000. What is $100,000,000 weighed in the balance with the maintainance of their prestige and their power ? Therefore, if the Grand Trunk let the government off with $45,000,000 more, it is the only instance on record in which the Grand Trunk was ever generous. I think I have said now all the kind things I can, about this railway scheme. I abide by my utterances of last year, and I simply say to-night, that the Prime Minister has had my constant sympathy ever since that deposit was not put up, and he was compelled to meet parliament ; because I really expected, that when it came to new terms, the poor Prime Minister would have been driven much further. Probably, owing to his weakened state of health, even those hard, cruel monsters of the Grand Trunk, relented, and so the people of Canada, and the supporters of the government too, have to be thankful for the fact, that the Prime Minister was ill, and that the Grand Trunk people were not as obdurate as they might have been. So far as I am concerned, instead of being too critical with the Prime Minister, instead of being too harsh upon the government, I am inclined to sympathize with them in the cruel position in which they are placed ; and that while they have only sacrificed $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 of the money of Canada, in the very largeness of their heart, they might have been compelled to sacrifice $100,000,000 or $150,000,000 more. I thank the House for listening to me so courteously, but I want to warn gentlemen from the maritime provinces, and especially the Minister of Railways (Mr. Emmerson), that he had better alter his course in connection with this scheme.

Mr. W. S. CALVERT. At the request of the hon. gentleman from Montmorency (Mr. A. Lavergne) I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Fielding the House adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

Mr. H. LENNOX (South Simcoe) moved for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 56) to amend the Criminal Code, 1892.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). Explain.

Mr. LENNOX. This Bill is for the purpose of correcting a difficulty that is found in the operation of the Criminal Code. Under an Act of the Ontario legislature with reference to the action of certain magistrates, there is a provision, which also exists in the Dominion statutes, that if a magistrate, in a case where he is entitled to take fees, takes more fees than he is entitled to, he is liable to a penalty of $80, together with the costs of the action in which it is recovered. But it has been decided recently that although he is liable to that penalty, in a case where he has summary jurisdiction and therefore is entitled to some fees, he is not liable to a penalty if he exacts fees in a case which is of a purely criminal character and where he is only investigating a case to ascertain if it shall be sent to trial. If in that case he exacts fees where not entitled to any fees at all, he is not liable to the penalty which is provided by this section of the Code, 1892, and the corresponding section of the Ontario Act. It is manifestly fair, necessary, that in a case where a magistrate exacts fees and is not entitled to any fees he should be liable to as great a penalty as he would be where he is entitled to some fees and takes more than he is entitled to.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

MESSAGE FROM THE GOVERNOR GENERAL.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister) delivered a message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the message as follows :

MINTO.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

I have received with much satisfaction the address which you have adopted expressing your thanks for the speech with which I opened the session of parliament.

Government House,
Ottawa, 12th April, 1904.

YUKON COMMISSION.

Hon. CLIFFORD SIFTON (Minister of the Interior). When the Orders of the Day were called yesterday the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) asked a question about the position of the commission appointed to inquire into affairs in the Yukon Territory. The position is this : Shortly before the opening of the present session of parliament, an unfortunate accident resulted in the death of Mr. Bell, one of the commissioners. A couple of weeks afterwards Mr. Justice Britton wrote to the Secretary of State calling attention to this fact and asking to be advised of the view of the government as to what course should be pursued. The matter was referred to the Justice Department and the Minister of Justice (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick) has reported that the death of one of the commissioners results in the commission not being so constituted that the remaining commissioner can legally make a report. Instructions have been issued to the Justice Department to have another commission made out to Mr. Justice Britton and he will be asked to expedite his report. As soon as it is received it will be laid before the House.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would suggest that the evidence might be printed in the meantime so that there would be no delay after the receipt of the report in placing it before the members of the House.

Mr. SIFTON. The evidence has not yet been returned to us by the commissioners. My hon. friends will, of course, understand that in the ordinary course it would not be returned until it came with the report, but we shall consider the suggestion of my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) as to communicating with the commissioner and asking to have the evidence sent to us at an early date.

FLOODS AT LAPRAIRIE.

Mr. D. MONET (Laprairie and Napierville). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, before we proceed with the order of the day, I wish to call your attention and that of the government to the extremely painful conditions under which the people of Laprairie are labouring just now, owing to the ice floe and damages consequent thereon, through the flood, which occurred during the night of Saturday last. In order to conform to the rules of the House, I shall, if necessary, move the adjournment.

Every year, the village, and even the parish of Laprairie, are threatened with damages on account of more or less serious floods ; and I believe that it is with cause that for fifteen years, and under the conservative rule, the government had improvements made with a view to protecting the property and lives of the villagers. Those improvements consist in a wooden pier or rampart built along the shore so as to protect private property ; besides, ice-breakers have been constructed with a view to protecting the pier itself. Uufortunately, those structures are made of wood, and owing to the yearly floods and to age, the woodwork is altogether decayed. So, it has been decided to replace those structures by others of more durable material. At my suggestion the government have acted on the report of one of their engineers, and, last year, the minister of Public Works ordered that those wooden structures, which has become altogether inefficient should be replaced by others in concrete.

I may say at once that for a number of years, this House has voted subsidies aggregating altogether $75,000 or $100,000, to protect the village of Laprairie. The liberal government, on that point, followed the precedent originating with the conservative government, some fifteen years ago, and have applied the principle laid down by their predecessors.

As a matter of fact, since 1897, a considerable amount, aggregating about $30,000, has been applied, at my request to these protection works, and last year again a large amount was voted for that purpose. Unfortunately, that amount was not voted until late last autumn, on account of the protracted session; and there was not enough time left to carry through the necessary improvements for the protection of the village of Laprairie. As the rampart or guard pier could not be completed, a gap was left, through which the ice forced its way a few days ago, causing the damage to which I have just referred. For the time being, Laprairie is not to be recognized; houses have been cut in two and carried from one side of the road to the other; all, with the exception of five or six are submerged as high up as the second story; clothing, furniture have suffered from water. If no deaths have occurred, some narrow escapes are recorded. Women had to flee in the darkness of night, carrying away their children in spite of many difficulties, and one of them having let her infant slip into the water, it was only through a miracle that it was rescued and restored to life.

I suppose there is no necessity for me to appeal to anything else but the government's equal force to their sense of justice. If the breaking of the ice had such terrible results at Laprairie, this year, it is due, as I have just stated, first to the ineffectiveness of the guard pier,—in respect of which no fault can be found with the government, but also to the building up of that million dollar island, in other words that long dike which starts at Victoria bridge and extends into the river. That dike or pier was built by order of the harbour commissioners, and by narrowing the bed of the St. Lawrence has always given rise to inundations of a more disastrous character than formerly.

When its construction was begun, protests came from Laprairie, St. Lambert and a great many citizens on the south shore. It was urged that the construction of that dike should not be proceeded with, as disasters were apprehended; and what was the result? In winter time, there, water does not freeze any longer for a month or a month and a half; so we have no more that ice bridge over which farmers used formerly to cross when taking their products to Montreal. The water no longer freezes, and instead of driving in direct line towards Bonsecours market, as formerly, they cross to Point St. Charles and have to reach the market through the streets of Montreal, thus undergoing all the inconveniences which arise from circulating along thoroughfares cut up by double tracks of electric railways.

I refer to that inconvenience in passing; but perhaps I may be permitted at the same time to request the government to grant adequate protection,—if I may use that term,—to the people on the south shore of the St. Lawrence, a great number of whom are among my electors. The remedy is an easy one to apply. Instead of building the pier, which is in course of construction only to the height determined by their officials, the government should build it two or three feet higher. In that way, the village of Laprairie would be effectively protected against all floods.

As to protection against damage caused by ice, there should certainly be two new ice-breakers added to those already built. Those new ice-breakers should be built in concrete so as to be able to withstand the awful pressure of the moving ice.

Laprairie is situated on a strip of land which juts out into the St. Lawrence, and to the southwest of the village there is a wide bay. The ice first enters the bay, and by eddying causes the trouble referred to. Ice-breakers are not numerous enough at present; it would be necessary to construct new ones exactly at the place where the ice in coming out of the bay, strikes in flank the western part of Laprairie. If an engineer should now visit Laprairie and witness the deplorable condition of our town, usually so neat and pretty, he would at once find out what improvements are necessary to correct the evil which I now bring to the notice of the government.

As I stated a moment ago, both in the name of humanity and in the name of justice, I request that the government assist us: an engineer should be sent on the spot, in order to ascertain what is the damage and what remedy should be applied. I rest assured that the government will do all in its power to bring about a more satisfactory condition of affairs.

With these few remarks, Mr. Speaker, I beg to move the adjournment of the House, seconded by the hon. member for Chambly-Verchères.

Mr. V. GEOFFRION (Chambly-Verchères). (Translation.) I am very glad that my hon. friend from Laprairie-Napierville (Mr. Monet) should have brought this question before the House. It is an exceedingly important one for the people living on the south shore of the St. Lawrence. Year on and year after those localities are threatened with serious losses through the ice floe; and I think it is incumbent on the government to seriously study the question in order to ascertain who is responsible for that state of things, I mean, whether it is the harbour commissioners of Montreal who are responsible for it, or the government. The proposal or suggestion just made by my hon. friend from Laprairie, for the appointment of qualified engineers to inquire into the means whereby this condition of affairs may be altered, meets with my full approval. Those losses occur almost annually, and I think the government, anxious as ever to secure the welfare of the people, will consider it a pleasure, as well as its duty, to take all necessary means for the protection of the people inhabiting the localities so threatened every spring.

I am not ready to say that those damages are consequent on the construction of the guard pier, commonly called the million dollar island, opposite Montreal, a guard pier built to protect that city against inundations. It may be, however, that such is the cause; and if qualified engineers were of that opinion, I think the government should call on the Harbour Commissioners to remedy the evil. In any case, the people of the south shore should be heard when they insist on the question being taken up and studied with care, and a remedy applied to this existing evil. Already structures have been put up for the protection of the people of St. Lambert and Laprairie. While those structures have been of some protection to those municipalities and guarded them to some extent against damage from the ice floe, they are not sufficient, as experience shows too clearly just now. It is, therefore, necessary to provide more effective means. I willingly, then, second the motion of my hon. friend from Laprairie to the effect that the government should appoint a commission comprising two or three qualified engineers who will study that question carefully and report on the best means to protect those localities against those floods which, nearly every year, or at any rate, at intervals, bring about losses such as those suffered a few days ago.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I very much regret that the hon. Minister of Public Works should be away just now, on account of ill-health, and should not have had the opportunity of listening to the remarks made by the hon. members for Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Monet), and Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion). I am not ready to agree with my hon. friend from Chambly and Verchères that the improvements carried on by the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal are the cause of the floods which have occurred on the island of Montreal and elsewhere. But whatever the cause, the suggestion which is made is an extremely reasonable one. The government is requested to have the condition of affairs looked into and the proper remedy applied.

I shall call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the suggestions which have been made, and I hope that he will give the matter immediate attention.

Hon. RAYMOND PREFONTAINE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). (Translation.) In 1886, when great floods occurred along the St. Lawrence, the corporation of Montreal had that matter looked into with a view to finding out the cause of these disasters and efficiently preventing their recurrence. It may be added that during the season of 1885-86, two inundations took place, one during the autumn, in December, the other during spring, at the time of the ice floe. Following on the appointment of a committee of inquiry, considerable improvements were carried on by the city to protect it against floods. Those improvements were endorsed by qualified engineers. They were also approved of by parliament and a considerable amount was expended for that purpose. Since 1890 or 1891, when those improvements were completed, Montreal has not had any serious inundation. The damages suffered by the localities on the south shore have a natural cause: the freshets. This year, unfortunately, those damages have occurred in many localities and have been very serious. It is not only on the river St. Lawrence that ice floe has caused great losses; the same thing has occurred along the banks of the Richelieu. The ice being very thick, and, of course, unyielding, caused the devastation referred to. It goes without saying that I entirely approve of any proposal that will tend to bring about a better state of things.

As regards the opinion expressed that the building of the dike opposite Montreal may have caused a more frequent recurrence of inundations and given them a more disastrous character than formerly, I cannot agree with that. Qualified engineers have looked into the question from that point of view, and the great majority of them have stated that the carrying out of these improvements could not bring about more serious losses than in the past.

The city of Montreal had the right to protect itself over the whole breadth of its territory. Nobody would deny here that right. As a rule, the ice which accumulates between Montreal and the milion dollar island, begins to move only when the rest of the ice bridge has broken up. This year, for reasons which cannot be readily ascertained, the waters of the St. Lawrence do not evidently follow their usual course. Instead of flowing down, the ice has backed up, filling the space between milion dollar island and the wharfs of Montreal.

How can occurrences of that kind be avoided? The question of breaking up the ice bridge and ridding the river of it between autumn and spring time, was taken up by the Minister of Public Works, some ten years ago. I understand that even boats had been equipped at Sorel for the purpose of breaking the ice, and freeing the channel. Unfortunately, when the boats were ready for the work, the ice was all gone and no further experiment has been attempted since. I am well satisfied, from information collected several years back—as I have had to do with this matter from 1896 to 1897, and my opinion is based on that of competent engineers—that there is only one means of putting a stop to floods, not only at Montreal, but all along the river to Three Rivers, and that means, suggested by our engineers and which will be the subject of a special report to be laid before the House, is the building of an ice-boat which would break up the ice bridge over the St. Lawrence every spring. It would be an easy matter to my mind, to start in a craft of that kind from Quebec—where winter navigation is a fact—about the first of March and to ascend the St. Lawrence, breaking the ice as high up as Montreal, and keeping an open channel for the ice and water to flow down freely. I believe that, by that means, the river would keep its level and floods would be avoided. Another advantage would result from that: the opening of navigation would be hastened by two or three weeks, and might without difficulty, take place about the first of April, for the benefit not only of the port of Montreal, but of the whole country. For instance, if it were a recognized fact that by the first of April every year, the port of Montreal or the St. Lawrence route were open, that would be a distinct gain for us.

As far as the Department of Marine is concerned, I may say right here that I am collecting the necessary data to enable me to lay before the House a report from which we may ascertain whether the present state of things could not be remedied. I think that is the most practical way to reach good results.

Hon. J. ISRAEL TARTE (St. Mary's). (Translation.) While I was Minister of Public Works, I gave some attention to this question, as regards, at all events, the opening of navigation on the St. Lawrence in early spring. Of course, I looked into the reports of engineers on that subject. The claim is made that it is possible to hasten the opening of navigation. Having had more leisure of late, I gave somewhat more time than formerly to the study of that question. Russia has provided on lake Baikal a service of steam ferry boats. The English firm of Armstrong built for the Russian government those boats, on which three railway trains can be carried at one time. Of course, they have cost large sums of money. A few days ago, I was reading that those boats were powerful enough to cut through fifty or sixty inches of ice; and it is no play to cross that lake, which is thirty miles long.

I call the attention of the hon. minister of Marine and Fisheries to that undertaking of the Russian government. The hon. minister will find in Henry Norman's excellent book: 'All the Russias', information which may be of use to him.

As regards floods, it is a difficult matter to try and prevent them. My attention as minister was called to the damage caused, on both shores of the St. Lawrence, by those inundations, and almost in every case I requested officers of the department to carry on investigations regarding the causes of these disasters. Their reports have always been to the effect that Providence was stronger than men. As I spend my holidays at Boucherville, I am familier with the place and know whereof I speak. The ice is piled up on the road to a height of fifty feet; the village is flooded. Nothing can be done to prevent that state of things.

I endorse the proposal of the minister of Marine and Fisheries to try and open up a channel along the St. Lawrence, previous to the rise of the water; that might have the effect of preventing the losses which result too frequently from the breaking up of the ice-bridge.

Mr. MONET (Translation.) I am quite satisfied with the explanation offered by the government and I beg to be allowed to withdraw my motion for the adjournment of the House.

Mr. E. LEONARD (Laval). (Translation). Mr. Speaker, as a representative of a country adjoining those of my hon. friends of Chambly-Verchères and Laprairie-Napierville, I wish to say a few words on the question under discussion.

For once, my hon. friends will find that I agree with them. I believe the counties they represent require the protection of the government, especially on the eve of a general election. I am personally familiar with the floods through which localities bordering on the St. Lawrence have suffered this year; and I think the government should take the necessary means to, if not entirely put a stop to at least prevent to a certain extent, these calamities. I may assure my hon. friends on the other side that the conservatives of the district of Montreal will never find fault with the government for protecting against floods the people of Chambly-Verchères and Laprairie-Napierville.

I may say that this should not remain as a mere suggestion submited to the government for the purpose of securing to these hon. members the good will of their electors; the question should seriously engage the attention of the government and should, at this very session be the subject of a genuine report. I hope that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, before the session closes, will report to the House on the best means to be adopted to protect that important part of the vicinity of Montreal. Besides, if the hon. minister could satisfy the House that it is possible to open navigation on the St. Lawrence as far up as Montreal, by the beginning of March, it would be of great interest to the country as a whole and might have the effect of preventing the construction of that famous Grand Trunk Pacific, by proving that we are in a position to use, as early as the beginning of March, our great national route for the transportation of grain and other western products.

So that, Mr. Speaker, the unanimous opinion of all citizens, Conservative as well as Liberal, is that the government should take the necessary means to do away with the inconveniences and at times disasters under which the electors of our hon. friends from Chambly-Verchères and Laprairie-Napierville labour at times.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier). (Translation.) I referred yesterday to these damages, when laying the case of the town of Verdun before the government. Of course, we shall be glad to vote the amount deemed necessary to investigate the question and put a stop to the heavy losses inflicted on the towns in the vicinity of Montreal. I think the government might have obviated these losess by using, for instance, dynamite to prevent the ice from accumulating.

The plan of building an ice-boat might be carried out. Russia has provided such a service on the Baltic sea, where boats of that description have been operated with success for some years past. I have no doubt that, in the vicinity of Montreal, a boat such as those constructed in Russia would give excellent results.

I request my right hon. friend the Prime Minister to bear in mind that the case I brought before him is quite an exceptional one. I have no doubt but that the damages incurred were brought about by the defective construction of a certain dike which the city of Montreal has built with the consent of the Harbour Commissioners within the limits of the territory placed under their jurisdiction. If the government are to a certain extent responsible in the cases just submitted, they are the more so in the case of the improvements to which I referred yesterday and carried out by the Harbour Commissioners.

In conclusion, I recomemnd particularly the case of Verdun to the kind attention of the government.

DAMAGE TO RIDEAU CANAL WORKS.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR (South Leeds). Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct the attention of the government to a serious state of affairs which exists in the northern part of the county I represent. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) brought a similar matter before the House yesterday, and claimed that the damage to which he referred was caused by the harbour commissioners of Montreal diverting the flow of the water. The Prime Minister stated that he did not think the government were responsible. I want to bring this matter to the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Emmerson). I regret that he is not in his place at present. I understand that he has had a speech ready to deliver for the past three or four weeks, and he is so nervous about it that he can not remain in his seat more than three or four minutes at a time. I hope the Prime Minister will bring this matter to his attention. A few days ago a section of the government dam at Poonahmalee was torn away, and a good deal of injury was done to property at the town of Smith's Falls and at Merrickville. I understand that last night the entire dam was carried away, so that a new dam will have to be erected. It is not expected that there will be any navigation on the Rideau canal east of Newboro, perhaps during the entire summer, unless immediate action is taken by the government to retain the water now flowing. In any case the government should take immediate steps to protect the property of persons whose property is being damaged. There can be no question of the responsibility of the government in this case, because it is government property that is carried away. The property of many people is affected, at Smith's Falls, at Merrickville, in one of the townships in the constituency which I have the honour to represent, and in the constituency represented by the hon. ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart). I ask the government to take immediate steps to protect the property of these people in all these constituencies, and also to protect the navigation of the canal.

Motion for adjournment of the House withdrawn.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Before the orders of the day are called, I would like to draw the attention of the government, and particularly my right hon. friend who leads the government, to a question which was put by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) on Monday last. As the question is a somewhat long one, I will not read it; but my right hon. frdiend will remember it. The question to which I refer is one inquiring of the government whether or not certain persons whose names are set forth in the question, have been appointed to positions at certain salaries since July, 1896. The second portion of the question was this :

Were the said persons, at the time they were appointed, members of the House of Commons of Canada ?

A further branch of the question was this :

If the foregoing list is not correct; in what particular is it incorrect ?

My right hon. friend, in reply, said :

All the information sought for in this question is already to be found in public documents.

I would like to suggest to my right hon. friend that that is not the mode of dealing with questions which has been pursued in this House in the past. I suppose you could find fifty or a hundred questions put and answered last session, the answers to which might be found in public documents; but there was no such reply in any of those cases as that which was given by my right hon. friend. Indeed, in looking over the proceedings of the present session, I find that questions were put and answered by the government, the answers to which might be found in public documents; but none of these questions were evaded as this one has been. I understand the practice to be this. If a question is put in proper form, it is the duty of the government to answer it. If it is not put in proper form, it is the duty of the Speaker to bring that fact to the attention of the member who puts it. Usually that is done through the clerk. If the member cannot be communicated with, the Speaker may of his own motion, direct the clerk to put the question in the proper form in order that it may not transgress the rules of the House. I have looked both in Sir John Bourinot's and Mr. May's works on parliamentary practice, and I can find no precedent for a refusal to answer this question. The grounds on which questions have not been answered, are altogether different, as I think my right hon. friend knows very well. The government may refuse to answer on the ground that a question involves some matter which it is not in the interests of the public to disclose. It may refuse, possibly on one or two other grounds; but there was certainly no ground for refusing to answer the question of the hon. member for Montmorency. Now, it does not seem to me that this is a wise course for the government to take. I do not know any reason why a precedent of this kind should be introduced in connection with such a question as that to which I refer. The question is couched in respectful terms, and complies in every way with the rules and usages of the House. I would suggest to my right hon. friend that it is not likely to expedite the work of the session if information of the kind sought for by this question is refused by the government. It relates to a very important public matter, namely, the independence of parliament, and I must protest against the refusal of the government to give any member of this House such information as he asks for on that subject.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). My hon. friend is aware that the rules of the House are not always strictly adhered to, but that departures from them are sometimes allowed. We have just had an instance of that in the remarks which my hon. friend has made. It is not allowable, when the orders of the day are called, for any member to enter into a matter which may lead to a debate. An hon. member may ask for information, but he is not allowed, except by the tolerance of the House to enter into a discussion. In this case we did not apply this rule to my hon. friend, but allowed him some latitude. In the same way some latitude is permitted in regard to the answers to questions. If an hon. member asks for information which is in the possession of the government, and not in possession of the public, I think it is the bounden duty of the government to bring that information; if the government refused to do so, it would be derelict in its duty. But when an hon. member asks for information which is current, which is within the knowledge of everybody, and which he knows as well as the government, I do not think any good purpose can be served by giving him any other answer than the answer which was given to the question referred to by my hon. friend. Some of the appointments alluded to in that question have been mentioned, not once, but several times in the House. I dare say that if I were to have 'Hansard' searched, I would find that many of the names have been mentioned in the House in previous sessions.

Mr. TAYLOR. Nothing to be ashamed of, I hope.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Nothing to be ashamed of, but I do not see that any good purpose is to be served by repeating the same matter over and over again. For my part, I shall always be ready to give information to which the House is entitled; but when an hon. member asks for information which everybody knows, both inside and outside the House, I do not think he can suffer much if he is given the answer which the hon. member for Montmorency was given on that occasion.

Mr. SPROULE. I think that the hon. gentleman does not fully appreciate the right of hon. members to ask questions and the object they have in view.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If my hon. friend only speaks of the rights of members of this House, I must tell him that he has not the right at this moment to speak on this question.

Mr. SPROULE. I wish merely to say—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. There is no question really before the chair. There was a motion to adjourn, but that has been disposed of, and I hardly think that another motion to adjourn will be now in order.

Mr. HAGGART. Certainly it would. Any number of motions to adjourn may be moved.

Mr. SPROULE. I only ask—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Do you rule, Mr. Speaker, that when a motion has been withdrawn, another cannot be made?

Mr. SPEAKER. No, but there is absolutely no question now before the chair.

Mr. MACLEAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Such a motion is out of order. You cannot move the adjournment of the House twice unless another proceeding has intervened.

Mr. MACLEAN. I wish to point out, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am prepared to give a ruling, though I have not the text of the rule before me.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Before you give your ruling, Sir, the hon. member has a right to speak to the point of order raised.

Mr. SPEAKER. The ruling of the chair is that inasmuch as the motion to adjourn the House, which was moved by the hon. member for Napierville (Mr. Monet) has been disposed of, and no proceeding has since taken place, the subsequent motion to adjourn is out of order.

Mr. MACLEAN. I merely rise, Mr. Speaker, to a question of order. I hold that something new has come before the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would remind the hon. gentleman that the chair has given its ruling, and he is quite out of order in speaking on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. SPROULE. Then I rise to a point of order. My point is that any hon. member has the right to debate any point of order raised before the chair decides it, and that right was denied the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean).

Mr. SPEAKER. As I understood the matter there was no point of order before the House. I was merely asked to rule whether the motion to adjourn was in order or not, and I ruled, that such a motion was not in order, unless the House had devoted its attention to another subject after the previous motion to adjourn had been disposed of. Nothing having come before the House after the motion to adjourn made by the hon. member for Napierville was disposed of, the hon. member for East York was clearly out of order. There is nothing now before the chair, and I would ask the hon. gentleman to respect my ruling, and proceed with the next order of business.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE (Marquette). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to draw the attention of the right hon. the Prime Minister to a motion I made on the 1st of June, 1903, for a return which has not yet been brought down. The return had reference to the names of all parties appointed to positions of emolument under the Crown since 1896. I first asked the question, and was told to move for a return, which I did, but the names have not yet been brought down.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend will have them promptly. I will send orders at six o'clock to have the returns laid on the table.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, 'That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, for the House to go into committee to consider a certain resolution concerning the ratification of the agreement between His Majesty the King and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, dated the 8th day of March, 1904;' and the proposed motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

Mr. ARMAND LAVERGNE (Montmagny). In rising, Mr. Speaker, to speak on this question, I do not think it necessary, as most of the members of the opposition seem to do, to review every detail of the contract which was adopted last year. I only intend making a few remarks, as a representative from the province of Quebec, to answer the call advanced by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). As has been said already, there is no use for our friends who sit on your left, Mr. Speaker, trying to conceal their disappointment over the amendments made to the Transcontinental Act this session. They seemed to expect that the concessions made would be so intolerable to the country as to render the construction of the railway impossible. Finding that this is not the case, finding that the amendments do not change the nature of the contract but merely some of its accidents, they have resorted to the tactics of emptying all the vials of their wrath on the eastern section. They seem to think, most of them with great joy, that in these new amendments lies the capital condemnation of that part of the railway which the government is to construct. Well, Mr. Speaker, I cannot say that I share that view. On the contrary I am of the opinion that these amendments will assure in the near future the construction of that part of the railway. I will surprise, no doubt, many on the other side in stating that I am a believer in the theory that the eastern division of the road is as necessary to the country as the western part of it, and, Sir, I have strengthened that conviction from speeches I have heard on the other side of the House. Let us take for instance the declaration of the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Osler) who, after having praised heaven that the government would not build that part of the railway made the following statement, which, coupled with the other, has a singularly unpatriotic flavour :

Assuming that the eastern section is not built from North Bay to Quebec and Moncton, there is not a single clause or obligation in this agreement as to the Grand Trunk carrying freight except as they please.

Suppose the eastern section is not built for ten years, what will happen ? The whole of the trade of the Grand Trunk accumulated west of Winnipeg, goes either to Port Arthur or to Duluth, goes across the lakes and comes down to Portland to increase and enrich the harbours of our friends in the United States.

Well, sir, if the hon. gentleman really believes this as strongly as I do, or as strongly as he would have us suppose, how is that we see him fighting so bitterly against that very part of the railway which is to protect our trade from the Americans ? Is it from the loyal city of Toronto that the people of Quebec should get so bad an example ? What more could be asked in order to prove the necessity of a Canadian railway from ocean to ocean than this candid confession of the Conservatives ? To comfort the hon. gentleman from West Toronto, I would advise him to read sections 42 and 43 of the contract. But, before I leave the hon. member for West Toronto, let me quote a few words further from his speech :—

I have read the reply of the Grand Trunk president made to Mr. Allen, one of the directors who resigned from the board because he said that that agreement appeared to him to force the Grand Trunk Company to send their freight over Canadian routes and destroy the Portland terminals, upon which the Grand Trunk has spent so much money.

I do not think that anything stronger than this has been said even by any hon. member on this side, in favour of the policy of the government.

We have a strange example of the good faith of the opposition. While the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) is expressing fears, and very strong fears, that this eastern section will never be constructed, on the other hand we have the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) stating in the name of his colleagues that the whole of the opposition would have been in favour of any road built by the Grand Trunk west of North Bay. One glance at the map will convince any one that the road via Quebec is shorter than the road via North Bay and Toronto. Then, Mr. Speaker, it is only the province of Quebec and the provinces near the sea that are to be deprived of their share of this great project. Have we in these old provinces no right to any help from the government towards the development of our part of the country ? The man who goes into the forest with his axe on his shoulder, to win new lands for this country and civilization, is he not entitled, even more than others, to the protection of this government and to his share of benefit from public expenditure ? Is this great transcontinental railway intended to be only a wheat carrier and not a benefactor to the whole community ? Have we not the right to expect that on the slopes of the height of land over which this eastern section of the railway will run, we shall find timber, minerals and a beautiful country for agriculture and colonization, and, more than that the greatest of all forms of natural wealth, water powers—'la bouille blanche,' as they have been rightly called in Europe ? This is what may reasonably be expected of that country of which, according to the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) we know only through the sayings of a 'visionary missionary of two hundred years ago.' Mr. Speaker, let me remind the hon. gentleman that those so-called visionary missionaries were the first explorers of this country. And, wherever Longfellow would have sung—

This is the forest primeval, the murmuring pines and the hemlocks.

—the black robes were to be found, with the cross of the Saviour in hand, planting the standard of civilization. These men should have known thoroughly that land for which so many of them died martyrs of their self-abnegation and their faith. The oldest scientific institution in America we owe to a body of these 'visionary missionaries,' and the records they have left us, the relations that have come from them, can be relied upon. They furnished the discoverer of the Mississippi, Father Marquette, and our first national historian Charlevoix. And when Father Albanel speaks of this country, his words, though written two hundred years ago, are as true to-day and as fresh as those wild roses he speaks of which are still growing undisturbed in the land he discovered. And, Sir, let me add that they established on many points of the now proposed railway settlements which proved to be greatly successful, and some of which are still flourishing.

But, have the Conservatives any better policy to oppose to this project of the government ? Have they any policy at all ? Of the project of the leader of the opposition I shall say nothing except that it is a queer mosaic. In the long amendment proposed by that hon. gentleman the only good point I can detect are the very ideas the government is putting into practice. For instance, let me read one portion of that resolution.

This House is of opinion that in considering these problems and in initiating and developing any great national system of transportation it should be our aim to provide the best and cheapest carriage for our products and importations ; to secure their transportation through Canadian channels and Canadian seaports, and for that purpose to make the Canadian routes the most economical and serviceable ; to open up valuable territory for colonization and development ; to stimulate interprovincial trade ; and to bind more closely together the scattered communities of our country.

Why, Sir, this is the policy the government is presenting to-day put in a few words.

In the last elections—in which a few Liberals were returned—we heard the Conservatives talk a great deal in Ontario of the waste involved in building a line from Winnipeg to Moncton. But, in Quebec the Conservative orators talked about that worthless country out west in which the Liberals wanted to build a railway. Why in my own riding, the Conservative candidate called it a country 'inhabited only by wild beasts and ferocious animals.' It was the same old Tory trick—one word and one creed for the province of Ontario, and a different word and different creed for the province of Quebec. For my part I do not believe the west to be as bad as it is painted by the protectionist—pardon me, Conservative—candidate in Montmagny. And I know that in the east the land is worth developing. But more than that, after the election, the 'Chronicle' of Quebec, and, not long ago 'Le Rappel,' of Montreal, two staunch Conservative organs, said that the Liberal victory was due to the popularity of the Grand Trunk Pacific project. But, as for the election in St. John, the Conservatives said that their own success there was due to the unpopularity of the Grand Trunk Pacific scheme. Had we lost the election in Quebec they would have given the same reason. And what do we hear now from hon. gentlemen opposite? The hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) is opposed to the eastern section. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) expresses fear that the eastern section will not be constructed. The hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) whom I am sorry not to see in his place who, last year fought bitterly, as his paper 'L'Evenement' did in favour of the eastern section. And we have the hon. member for St. Mary's (Mr. Tarte) whom we expected to hear on this question. But, though that hon. gentleman has not spoken in the House, he writes a great deal in his paper. And what do we see in that paper, 'La Patrie'? In the issue of last Saturday we see it stated that there was not a business man to be met who was in favour of the eastern section, or who did not say that it was a very risky enterprise. How was it that that hon. gentleman when he was a minister made a great deal of the sentiment of Quebec and declared that there was nothing too good for that province, while this year we see him in his newspaper expressing great doubt of this project which is in favour of the province of Quebec? That is the situation among the opposition to-day. We might reasonably advise these gentlemen, as we say in French—Accordez vos violons—let the hon. gentlemen get their fiddles in tune. The fears expressed by the hon. members of the opposition about the region between North Bay and Quebec takes us back to the eighteenth century, about the time of the conquest of Canada by the British army, when the French philosophers, with Voltaire at their head, were asking: 'Why trouble about a few arpents of ice and snow?' The words of hon. gentlemen opposite carry us back even further—to the middle ages, to the time when Columbus made his first voyage across the western sea. We read that his sailors thought that after some time they would meet an immense and terrible hole in which their ship would be lost completely. And we know the answer of the chief of the expedition—'Wait three days and I will give you a new world.' We have the same confidence in our chief, the distinguished leader of this House, when he says to those who express fears of the future: 'Wait a few years and we will give Canada a new world.' It may be truly said that when the settlers, that the Transcontinental Railway will bring in to that region, will have fought the forest which is the greatest keeper of cold and frost, we shall have a new province of Quebec, a new province of Ontario, a new province of New Brunswick, as the western section will give to the westerners a new great west. Some years ago we had as Minister of Colonization in Quebec a humble priest, Father Labelle. His motto was: Emparons-nous du Nord. 'Let us master the north.' He fulfilled his motto in Labelle, in Nominingue, in Lake St. John, and in many other places. Allow me to-day to repeat his prophetic words, 'Let us master the north.' As to the future of that northern part of our province, let me give you the opinion of the Toronto 'Globe.' Speaking of the Lake St. John Railway during the very severe winter that has just passed, it says that it was the only railway which was not snow blockaded:

> The following editorial from the Toronto 'Globe' of 3rd March, 1904, shows that northern Quebec, usually looked upon as the region of snow blockades, is not so white as it is painted, the most northern railway in the province not having cancelled a single train-freight or passenger during this exceptional winter, and its tonnage haul showing increases every week since December last.
> 'It is now about ten years since the Quebec and Lake St. John Railway was completed from Quebec to Roberval to Chicoutimi, a distance of 240 miles, traversing a portion of the same country, northwest of Quebec through which the government Pacific road is to pass. During all these years this road has been operated without any interruption whatever from snow. The Quebec papers tell us that during this exceptional winter and through all the storms of this northern country, the Lake St. John passenger trains have been running sharp on time, there has been no delay in the freight service, and the earnings show satisfactory increases over last winter.'

This is quite a different picture from that which was painted for us by the visionaries of 200 years ago. As for the section between Quebec and Moncton, the work there is already well begun. There are many parishes of hardy men settled in the beautiful forest many years ago, who are now awaiting with anxiety our decision to build this great transcontinental railway which will bring them once more into relations with the advanced civilization they have left behind for the welfare of this Canada of ours. The line proposed there was recommended in 1864 for the building of the Intercolonial Railway. Some one has complained that it would parallel the Intercolonial. Well, I say that the proposed railway between Quebec and Moncton will no more parallel the Intercolonial than the Intercolonial at the time of its construction paralleled the St. Lawrence, or than the Canadian Pacific Railway to Ottawa now parallels the Canada Atlantic Railway. This project is a great thing for Quebec and the maritime provinces, and I think this was admitted last year by the hon. member for South Lanark (Hon. Mr. Haggart), as it was this year by the leader of the opposition. Last night again it was admitted by the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. Gourley). He said, speaking in that energetic manner of his :

> I have said that the Quebec-Moncton section must be built, and I wish to put myself thoroughly on record on that score. I am for that section from beginning to end.

I maintain that what is good for Quebec and the maritime provinces is good for the Dominion, because what helps the west will help the general prosperity of Canada. The United States have taken for their device 'E pluribus unum.' That motto may rightly be applied to the policy of this government, for they are endeavouring to bring the scattered units of British North America nearer together and to consolidate the confederation.

As for the amendments presented to the House modifying the contract of last year, they have been so thoroughly and so well explained by the members on the government side of the House that I shall not speak at any length in regard to them. Let me however quote from 'La Presse,' a Conservative paper of Montreal, which has taken a very frank view of the situation, in a long article of which I will read only a few lines :

> Sometimes the part of the opposition is an ungrateful one, because those whom it is entrusted to do not seem to have a clear sense of it. It is unreasonable to believe that thirteen or fourteen members of a committee, the pick and choice of the people's representatives, kept in power by the will of the people, must constantly err in every way. There is a certain measure of common sense with which every human being is endowed. Would fate blind those whom Providence has entrusted for a while with the administration of public affairs in which it has a direct interest since it is admitted that : 'All powers proceed from God.'
> This year, it is the Grand Trunk which steps in and binds itself ; and Mr. Borden thinks that this new contract does away 'with many of the guarantees relied upon by the government.'
> Mr. Borden's amendment, without denying that the railway is necessary, asks the country to meet the whole expenditure in connection with the building of the road and to run all the risks. It is an emphatic plea in favour of government ownership. Heretofore, every country——

That is the position taken by the business men conducting the most important paper in the province of Quebec to-day, and that is the position taken by the members of the province of Quebec and of the eastern provinces.

In conclusion, Sir, let me say this, that as long as the opposition does not give us one good argument against this contract, as long as it has no definite policy and goes on contradicting itself so flatly, we shall stand behind our chief in support of this great project for the good of our constituencies, of our provinces and of our country. I believe in the future of the eastern section as I believe in its construction, and I must say that those who express fears that it will not be built are precisely those who are most opposed to it, and who logically should rejoice if they felt so sure of what they say. When we consider, Mr. Speaker, the progress made by our country during the last seven years of Liberal administration, when we consider that trade during that period has made the enormous increase of 107 per cent in this age of railways, one can but wonder what will be the traffic on the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway five or ten years after it has been constructed.

Mr. JAMES CLANCY (Bothwell). Mr. Speaker, this question has been pretty fully discussed during the last session of parliament. I consider it one of the most important questions that has ever engaged the attention of the parliament of Canada, and I think therefore that if it requires a good deal of time to consider it, that time will be spent to good purpose. But, we have now, Mr. Speaker, a new state of things.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, surely we can get order on the other side of the House. With half a dozen hon. gentlemen standing up and talking, we cannot hear the hon. member who is speaking.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. CLANCY. Perhaps I can make myself heard for a moment. I have witnessed with pain the conduct of hon. gentlemen opposite, and particularly to-day when my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) was calling the attention of the House to a very important question, namely, the rights and privileges of the members of this House. I say that it is an unfortunate thing for Canada that, whatever hon. gentlemen opposite may be in private life, they show an example of ill-breeding in parliament that does not become any deliberative assembly. When hon. members on this side of the House discuss public questions hon. gentlemen opposite need not show their resentment by speaking at the top of their voices, or even standing up and walking about, because they have the privilege, which is open to myself or any other member of this House, of withdrawing from the chamber, which I should say would be the more decent and becoming course. To return to the question, I do not think I need offer any apology for continuing the discussion of this question in view of the fact that the events which have transpired have placed an entirely new question before the people of this country. There is one novel feature about it, and that is that while hon. gentlemen opposite were either persuaded or dragooned into giving the scheme their support last year, some of them are now showing signs of resentment. Another very strange feature is that after months have been spent in discussing the question, after parliament has sanctioned the contract, after the whole matter has been reversed practically by a new contract, after the right hon. Prime Minister (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has spoken, one single minister of the Crown has had the courage to get up and defend that measure in the House outside of the right hon. Prime Minister. Where is the army of intellectual gladiators—giants, my hon. friend (Mr. Clarke) says—who stood up in defence of this measure last year? Where is the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright)? I believe he has even withdrawn from the chamber. Where is the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), who assured the country that it would only cost $13,000,000 to construct this road? That hon. gentleman sits in sullen silence. Where is the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson)? He is not even in his place in the House. Where is the hon. Postmaster General (Sir William Mulock)? I believe he is in his place, but he is not heard, and I venture the opinion that that hon. gentleman will not get up in defence of this scheme. Where is the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Fitzpatrick)? Where is the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) We do not find him here. It is the strangest thing that one can contemplate, that, after these hon. gentlemen have brought forward a new measure, only two of them have had the courage to get up and defend that measure. The hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Lemieux), who is a member of the government without being a member of the cabinet, did offer us last night a very eloquent speech, as he always does, but I know of no occasion when the hon. gentleman appeared to less advantage than he did last night. He gave us a neat essay. He always entertains the House; we are always delighted to listen to him, he is moderate in his views, courteous in his expressions, and, if he convinced no person last night, he at least amused the House and gave it an intellectual treat. Now, I would like to ask the hon. Postmaster General, because the right hon. Prime Minister is not in his place, where the mountain of information is that was promised last year, that was dumped in upon the table of the House, but which has entirely disappeared this year? We hear nothing about mountains of information now. That has become a thing of the past. But we have a substitute. What did the House and the country expect? They expected that during the recess of some months some useful information would have been gathered and presented to the House. When we are entering upon a scheme involving probably an expenditure of $150,000,000, and when we ask for information, we have the whole matter dismissed with a mere wave of the hand on the part of hon. gentlemen in this House. The right hon. Prime Minister offered one single reason for going on without delay, and in response to the demand for full information, confined himself to a report made by one of the Jesuit Fathers some 240 or 250 years ago, in which he declared that about the 24th of June roses were found blooming, and that the sun had hardly set in the west until it had commenced to rise in the east. This is all that the right hon. gentleman thought proper to give to the House as full and ample information upon which we should proceed with a matter of this kind. Then we have the hon. Minister of the Interior doing what? Why, Mr. Speaker, he sends one of his clerks to the office of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, who discusses the question with some of the engineers of the company for a few hours. Although these engineers have made an imperfect examination of the country and have not been able to locate a single mile of road, this official comes back and tells his minister that he sees no difficulty in the way, that the road can be built with easy grades and at a very low cost. This is the information that is given to this House upon this very important question to guide the House in passing judgment upon it One of the objects of this project, to the accomplishment of which the people look forward with great earnestness, was emphasized somewhat strongly by the hon. Solicitor General last evening. He told the House that the road should be a national transcontinental road, equipped in such a way as to compete for business and to carry the products of the west at the least possible cost. I hope I have not misunderstood or misquoted the hon. gentleman.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Hear, hear.

Mr. CLANCY. I assume that, naturally, that would be the view of the hon. gentleman, but I regret to say that he is seriously at variance with his leader. I regret to say that that is not at all the view which his leader took upon introducing this measure to the House in the first instance, and I regret to say that since then he has not retracted one single word that he uttered on that occasion. I fully agree, I think Canada generally agrees, and I think the members of the House, when they are in their sober senses, will agree with hon. gentlemen on this side of the House that we cannot afford to spend a dollar on what is known as a national transcontinental railway that would be weakened by any consideration, locally or otherwise, that would take away one particle from the strength or usefulness of that railway. But has that been the case ? The hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux) knows perfectly well that while he made a valuable statement to the House he could not resist the temptation to go to the different localities and say that these particular localities had not been served, to say, for instance, that the city of Montreal was getting more than its share as compared with the city of Quebec, and that the terminus of the Intercolonial Railway had been shifted from Quebec to Montreal. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux) advanced these as reasons why the city of Quebec should have special consideration, in order to atone for the sins that had been committed against it in the past, and the atonement was to be the building of this railway to the city of Quebec. I hope that I have not misunderstood or misrepresented the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux).

Mr. LEMIEUX. Would my hon. friend (Mr. Clancy) permit me to explain something which perhaps he did not catch the other day ? When my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) was speaking he alluded to the fact that this railway would not go to Montreal, and added that everything was for the city of Quebec. Yesterday, I answered that statement. I said that I was myself a citizen of Montreal, although I represented in this House one of the counties of Quebec, but that as a citizen of Montreal I could not complain on behalf of my native city ; that Montreal had been well treated by the government and that if, in order to make of this route a short route it must pass by way of Quebec, and Montreal must not complain. That was the thread of my argument.

Mr. CLANCY. I accept the explanation of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux). The hon. gentleman stated more than he has just mentioned. He not only stated the case but he reasoned the case, and the reasons he advanced were those which I have given. I wish to console the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux) by saying that he is not alone in this position. I would call his attention to the speech made last year by his predecessor, the present Minister of Justice in which that hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) made the same plea, and said that Quebec had been overlooked ; that the Intercolonial terminus had been shifted from Quebec to Montreal and that Quebec had suffered by that shifting, and my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) stated last night that Quebec had suffered by reason of the Intercolonial Railway being extended to Montreal. Therefore, I think I am quite right in saying that hon. gentlemen from first to last, including the hon. gentleman who spoke so eloquently last night (Mr. Lemieux) have not been able to avoid the temptation of sacrificing the road whenever a sectional interest arose in order to serve that sectional interest. What did the right hon. the First Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) say with regard to this last year ? That hon. gentleman said :

> Before I proceed any further, let me say that the conception I have of this work which we are now contemplating, is very different from the conception entertained of it by some of our critics. Most of our critics look upon this scheme simply as a commercial venture to be judged by the only rule of profit and loss.

Is that the rule that the hon. the Solicitor General (Mr. Lemieux) had in view last night when he told us that it must be a strong national link ? According to the Premier it was to be a road that was not to rise above parish politics ; it was to serve every locality in turn. The hon. gentleman who has just closed his speech (Mr. Lavergne) has said that it is to be a road to serve the localities. We are told we must open up the north. I agree that we must open up the north ; I am one of those who believe that it is worthy of being opened up when the time comes, but I say that we cannot afford to sacrifice the national scheme of transportation in order to open that country. Hon. gentlemen will say : Well, we will have colonization. The people should dismiss every consideration of colonization in building a transcontinental railway to the west, and I wish to again emphasize the statement that we cannot afford to sacrifice one single feature of the transcontinental line, to lengthen it one mile or to shorten it one mile or to weaken it in any way with a view to serving any particular locality. Colonization has progressed well in Ontario. We subsidized last year five or six railways penetrating from the south to the north, and the same thing has been done by the province of Ontario. The railways are being built on the lines of least resistance, following the streams and affording the best means of taking out the products of that country which I believe to be mainly pulp wood, at least so far as the district north of the height of land is concerned.

The hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) went further in parish politics in regard to this railway scheme. He was not going to seek the shortest line ; not at all. The longest line, or a long line if it served the purpose of holding out inducements to particular localities, seemed to be the whole aim and object of that hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) and to be his conception of a national transcontinental railway. He said, as reported in 'Hansard' of last year, at page 8555 :

My hon. friend from Charlotte (Mr. Ganong) will endorse this because the shortest line from the waters of the St. Lawrenec to the Atlantic is the port of St. Andrew's. The shortest line to the ocean is an important consideration, but it is not the only question involved. Other interests are entitled to receive consideration and they did receive consideration in making this arrangement.

What is the natural interpretation of that, Mr. Speaker ? That the different points in the maritime provinces were to be considered, and considered at the expense of the construction of a line of the importance of this one. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) went further and said :

The policy of the government is not to select one port, but to select a central point from which access may be had to all the harbours in the lower provinces. We do not think it wise to single out one port and give it a monopoly.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) brought forward the claims of the following places : St. John, Halifax, Sydney, Louisburg, Country Harbour, White Haven, all of which were to receive consideration. I have no hesitation in saying that a policy of that kind is one unworthy of the government of Canada, and of any hon. gentleman professing to offer to the people a solution to the great question of transportation. Can it be wondered that we have seen so many hon. gentlemen sit silent in the House ? Two ministers only have spoken ; the others sit silent and the last gentleman who has come to the defence of the scheme has been what I may call, without any offence to the hon. gentleman, the baby of the House. The hon. gentleman is not in his seat, but if he were, I would desire to offer him my congratulation on the clearness of his speech. It was just as clear as those of hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches, and was just as good a defence as is generally made by those hon. gentlemen. But I fear that the country will not take it as a defence, or regard these hon. gentlemen as having taken the question very seriously. I think the people will give as much attention to the few minutes devoted to this question by the baby of the House as they will to the utterances of other hon. gentlemen opposite, not excluding the eloquent address of my hon. friend from Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) who scarcely did himself justice last night.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in order that we may make an intelligent comparison between the two schemes that are practically before the country, we must bear one thing in mind—that we must provide for both winter traffic and summer traffic. Nobody will dispute that during the season of navigation at least 90 per cent of the whole traffic from the west to the east will go by the great lakes from Fort William and Port Arthur. I do not believe there is an hon. gentleman on either side of the House, who will take exception to that statement. What are the objective points to be reached during the season of navigation, particularly for our export trade ? They are Montreal and Quebec. What are the relative distances to these points ? Suppose we have two railways leaving the city of Winnipeg—one I will call for the moment the Intercolonial, if it were extended to that city, and the other the Grand Trunk Pacific. The all-rail route from Winnipeg to the city of Montreal is 61 miles shorter than to the city of Quebec ; but if we used the rail and water route, the distance from Winnipeg to Montreal would be 226 miles shorter than the distance to Quebec. Now, nobody would for a moment argue that in either case it would be advantageous, on all grounds on which men are governed—cheap rates and quick transit—to attempt to send anything by way of a transcontinental railway to the city of Quebec, in preference to the route by water. I am glad to see that I have the assent of the hon. member for Gaspé.

Mr. LEMIEUX. But in winter.

Mr. CLANCY. I am coming to that point, which is a very important one. My hon. friend has conceded that that is a fair proposition, so far as freight during the season of navigation is concerned.

Mr. LEMIEUX. It is admitted by Sir Sandford Fleming.

Mr. CLANCY. My hon. friend refers to Sir Sandford Fleming. That man occupies a very distinguished position in this country. Forty years ago he was considered a very efficient engineer ; he is perhaps a very efficient engiher now. As such, his opinion is entitled to great weight in this country, and he may well be looked upon as an authority. But I fail to find that up to this moment Sir Sandford Fleming has mastered the first letter of the alphabet of transportation ; I am not aware that he has had any training or experience on that question. Therefore when the hon. gentleman quotes his opinion as an engineer, it will be listened to with respect and will carry weight ; but I for one must be pardoned if I absolutely refuse to take the views of that gentleman as authoritative or weighty on questions about which he perhaps knows no more than the average member of this House.

Now, I will deal solely with the question of the utility of this transcontinental railway, and for the present I will confine my remarks to the eastern portion, extending from Winnipeg to St. John or Halifax, either of which ports must be taken to be the objective point for winter traffic. They are the only Atlantic ports which we have equipped. At both points we have constructed terminals and erected elevators at considerable cost, with the expectation of having at least a good winter service there. Quebec and Montreal are out of the question as winter ports. As I have said, we have practically only 10 per cent of the traffic from the west to deal with as winter traffic. Let us make a comparison of the all-rail distances from Winnipeg to St. John. By the Canadian Pacific Railway the distance is 59 miles shorter than the Grand Trunk Pacific, it would be 189 miles longer by the Intercolonial than by the proposed eastern section of the Grand Trunk Pacific. I do not believe that any hon. member of this House would consider these differences in distance to be important factors. I do not imagine my hon. friend from Gaspé would do so. I have no doubt he has in his mind the consideration of securing the carriage of Canadian products to Canadian seaports. The difference of distance between the Intercolonial and the Grand Trunk Pacific, is put by Mr. Blair at very much less than 189 miles ; but I am taking the figures given by hon. gentlemen themselves. In order that I may have some proof as to that, I desire to repeat what Mr. Blair says. Mr. Blair is not an unimportant person in this country. He has been selected on the certificate of the premier for one of the highest positions in Canada. He fills a position which is probably more important to the people of Canada than any other in Canada. The duties devolving upon him are of a more serious and important character than those of any other single man in Canada. Therefore his views must be taken as pretty well settled, and as coming from a gentleman entitled from his experience and his position to great weight on questions of this kind. Mr. Blair, in speaking last year of the ability of the Intercolonial to enter into competition with other lines, has this to say : (See 'Hansard,' p. 9699) :—

> It must not be forgotten—and I wish to emphasize this fact—that the Intercolonial Railway has such exceptionally favourable grades, is so well laid, and is such an exceptionally favourable road for traffic, running along the coast line, that it can haul heavier traffic 259 miles further—than the Canadian Pacific Railway in shorter time. You can therefore see how small a figure 77 miles would cut under these circumstances.

I do not believe that my hon. friend from Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) will question the weight of that statement, especially coming from a gentleman so competent to give an opinion. But we have other witnesses. We have the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), who was the only gentleman selected on that side of the House to make an effort to reply to the able and comprehensive speech of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. He was the only one chosen to make some show of defence to one of the greatest indictments ever made against the government in this House. Surely the opinion of such a gentleman would have weight and importance with hon. gentlemen opposite. At page 9699 of the 'Hansard' of 1903, the hon. the Minister of the Interior had this to say :—

> The figures that I have given prove that the Intercolonial Railway was able to do a substantial amount of business and that the Intercolonial was able to do it in competition with the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway ; both lines much shorter than the Intercolonial Railway ; both lines—and this is the point I wish to emphasize—both lines shorter than the new Grand Trunk Pacific Railway line will be. Then, Mr. Speaker, if the Intercolonial Railway under its traffic agreement can compete with the short line to Portland and with the shorter line to St. John, why in the name of common sense cannot it compete with the new line by way of the Chaudière Junction ?

We have there the most emphatic declaration from the Minister of the Interior that the Intercolonial has been able to complete with the Canadian Pacific Railway to St. John, which has a difference of 259 miles in its favour, and with the Grand Trunk Railway to Portland which has 442 miles in its favour. Surely if that be the case, hon. gentlemen opposite will not say that a difference of 189 miles will be any factor in the matter. I am now going to ask my hon. friend from Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) whether, after the statement made by Mr. Blair and the emphatic declaration of the Minister of the Interior that the Intercolonial had successfully competed against these two roads, the one with a distance of 259 miles in its favour and the other with 442 miles in its favour, he will say that a difference of 189 miles will be a factor one way or the other ? I am sure he will admit that these statements put an end to the contention that the Grand Trunk Pacific from Winnipeg to St. John will have one fraction of advantage as a competing line against the other two roads going in there, the Intercolonial and the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Intercolonial Railway will be only 189 miles longer, according to hon. gentlemen opposite and has splendid grades and hitherto has competed successfully against its rivals, and the Canadian Pacific Railway will be 59 miles shorter. Are hon. gentlemen opposite now prepared to say that we should spend on that eastern section in the neighbourhood of $85,000,000 to build 1,875 miles of railway, in order that it may compete, under conditions of that kind, for ten per cent of the freight, because hon. gentlemen opposite admit that ninety per cent is carried the other way ? I hope I have succeeded in convincing my hon. friend from Gaspé that, with regard to the eastern section, there is absolutely no doubt that the Intercolonial, extended to the city of Winnipeg, would be a competing factor against any railway in Canada for the winter trade to St. John or Halifax.

But what assurance have we that Canadian products will be carried to Canadian seaports. That is an important fact and it is one on which my hon. friend from Gaspé dwelt at considerable length. Willing as I am to be convinced by my hon. friend, and convincing as the hon. gentleman usually is, he failed deplorably last night. But the Minister of the Interior thought he gave an answer to the leader of the opposition when he said a few days ago in his speech—a very able speech from his standpoint—that there were not able lawyers enough in this House to frame a section which would ensure the carrying of freight from the west to Canadian seaports. The hon. gentleman then gave his own remedy. He declared—see page 8864 of the 'Hansard' of 1903 :—

> We declined to assist the Grand Trunk Railway to go westward and build up its business in such way that in so far as the winter business is concerned over its line, it would necessarily go to Portland.

Well suppose that this line is built from Winnipeg to the city of Quebec and thence down to the city of St. John, will that ensure the carrying of Canadian products to Canadian ports ? Is that any security unless you have swept away that danger point, namely, that it might pay the shippers to go to Portland rather than to St. John or Halifax ? Let me give that distance. The hon. the Minister of the Interior said they refused to assist the construction of a line from Fort William or Port Arthur because the freight would go by way of water, until it reached the Grand Trunk Railway system, and then go to the city of Montreal and thence on to Portland. That was the argument of the hon. minister and it is the argument of hon. gentlemen opposite now. Well, when the railway reaches Quebec, how much further will it be away from Portland ? Just eighteen miles. Do hon. gentlemen take that as security ? If that is all that is offered, eighteen miles of difference between landing freight from the Grand Trunk Pacific at the city of Quebec and landing it from the Grand Trunk Railway at the city of Montreal—if that eighteen miles is the only security that it shall go to Canadian ports rather than Portland. can it be said to be worth anything ? It seems to me that the whole thing is the greatest fiction that was ever presented to the House. I doubt that any hon. gentleman would so far risk his reputation as to say that by this shortening of distance of eighteen miles we shall prevent Canadian products being sent by the American port of Portland.

Now, the government, in carrying out this scheme, are entering into a partnership. Some hon. gentlemen object to that word 'partnership' in this connection. One hon. gentleman, on the other side, I think, said it was a technical partnership. Whether technical or otherwise, it is a partnership in the full sense of the term, between a great railway company and the government of Canada. The government enter upon this partnership knowing perfectly well that it will be impossible for them to have Canadian produce carried over this railway to Canadian ports. And why ? For the simple reason that it is to the advantage of the company to advance the interests of the Grand Trunk and to earn a return upon the large sums of money that the Grand Trunk has invested in the United States. According to the Minister of the Interior, the Grand Trunk has terminals at Portland that cost from $20,000,000 to $25,000,000. Where are the terminals to be at Canadian ports that will replace these expensive works at Portland ? Are they to be at St. John ? If so, by whom are they to be constructed ? Are they to be at Halifax ? If so, who is to provide them ? The fact of the matter is, Mr. Speaker, that hon. gentlemen opposite prevented the possibility of having Canadian products carried to Canadian seaports by the mere fact of entering into this bargain. There is only one way to secure the end that these hon. gentlemen say they desire, and that is the extension of the Intercolonial to Winnipeg and the Pacific coast. If the goods are carried by a truly national transcontinental railway, we need not fear that they will be carried to a foreign port for ocean shipment. On a railway owned and managed by the people of Canada, goods will be carried to Canadian ports, because they will be carried at such rates as to induce shippers to send them by that route. We are told that it is important that the Grand Trunk Railway should have access to the western country. Is it not quite as important and as desirable that the Intercolonial should reach that country ? Why the whole future of the Intercolonial, as of the Grand Trunk, must depend on having an entry into the west. If the Intercolonial is extended to Winnipeg and thence to the Pacific coast, we shall have no more deficits on that road, but Canada will be able to profit by the immense expenditures that have been made upon that great work. At present, however, it is at the mercy of every road in Canada, and cannot do the work that a truly national road should do. The traffic must be carried by the great transcontinental lines, not only those in existence, but those that are to come into existence as Canada grows. They will induce shippers to send by other lines than the Intercolonial. For we know that great railway companies exercise a strong influence over shippers. They have their expert agents all over the country who advise shippers how the traffic should be sent. Of course, no railway will make itself liable under any contract in such a matter, but in practice they can to suit themselves control the traffic that comes to their lines. If we have the Intercolonial extended to Winnipeg and the Pacific coast, giving us a great transcontinental railway owned by the people and operated in the people's interest, the days of deficits on the Intercolonial will be over, and that great work, of little value to-day, except as a local road, will be extended to national proportions. To show what this scheme of the government means from a practical commercial standpoint, I need call attention to only one fact. It is proposed under this agreement to take this 1,875 miles of road, which will cost from $80,000,000 to $85,000,000, and to hand it over to the control of the Grand Trunk, and, for this privilege, that company, for ten years, will pay nothing at all. Is there a man in this House or out of it who would suggest such an outrage as to compel the Canadian Pacific Railway to hand over the road they have now between Winnipeg and Montreal and to Quebec, either to the government or to any other railway company for ten years without compensation and without rent? Why, then, are we asked to hand over to the Grand Trunk, this road which the government is to build between these points, free of all cost to that company for ten years? Does it mean that, owing to the nature of the route, this must be a non-paying road, and so a road of no commercial value? Or does it mean that millions are to be thrown into the lap of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company? It must be one or the other. Would any man in his senses say that the Canadian Pacific road from Winnipeg to Montreal, —or, let us say to Quebec, because that is the objective point in both these cases, as the Canadian Pacific road runs through to that city—is not a paying road and that the Canadian Pacific would hand it over to another company without charge and without rent? No one would say that. So, hon. gentlemen can take their choice. They can admit that the route by which they propose to build from Winnipeg to Quebec is so bad that the road built will not yield a dollar of rental for ten years, or else that, by leaving the Grand Trunk free of the payment of interest for ten years, they are making the company a present of millions.

I think that hon. members on both sides will concede that generous support should be given to the Grand Trunk Railway. I want to say here, Mr. Speaker, that the Grand Trunk Railway is the pioneer road of Canada, it has rendered great service to Canada during the past. But like all other corportations, its object is to serve its own interests. I think the Grand Trunk Railway ought to have fair play from the people of Canada, both political parties I think will agree that the interests of this as well as other great railway corporations are closely connected with the interests of Canada. I repeat that the Grand Trunk Railway now and in the future, I hope, should receive fair play and fair consideration, but no more.

Now, Sir, we are giving this company very substantial aid, and just here I want to congratulate hon. gentlemen opposite on the ingenuity they have displayed in concealing that aid. We had a platform laid down by hon. gentlemen opposite, there was to be no more land grants. I think the member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) told us last night of the single instance which he was able to point out where the Liberals had fulfilled their pledges, and he said that they had ceased to give land grants to railway companies in this country. An hon. gentleman on this side, I think the member for East Elgin (Mr. Ingram), said, 'What about the Calgary and Edmonton Railway? An Order in Council was passed renewing the former land grant—time and again my hon. friend says. The answer given by the member for Gaspé was, 'We were only carrying out the policy that had been established before.' Sir, the duty of the hon. gentleman was not to follow a bad example, if it was a bad example, but to allow it to lapse.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Vested rights, renewals.

Mr. CLANCY. Well, I will take my hon. friend at his word, he says there were vested rights. What about the Yukon Railway? Where were the vested rights there? There were no vested rights there, as my hon. friend knows, and yet it was one of the greatest schemes that was ever proposed in this parliament, brought down within a few weeks of the opening of parliament, not waiting for the consent or the opinion of parliament upon it, but giving an immense land grant, measured by values in that country. But the hon. gentleman, in order to retain the confidence of those who so implicitly believe in the pledges of the Liberal party is not able to single out one that they have kept. I say a most insidious course has been pursued in this case to conceal from the public grants that have been given to the Grand Trunk Railway. We are told that no subsidies are given to railways in modern days.

Now, I believe nothing is more idle than for hon. gentlemen to compare what we gave in former years to the Canadian Pacific Railway or to any other railway in Canada, and to urge it as a precedent for giving aid to this railway. We may have given too much to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Conditions were different then, under the conditions we may have given too much. I am not going to argue whether we gave as much as the hon. gentleman promised, I say that we are here to-day to deal with questions under conditions in which we are living and moving, and for which we are responsible. We do not pretend that the conditions of to-day are those of many years ago, nor to compare the grants given formerly to those given now. But whether they were too great or too small, we are not called upon now to inquire. Our duty at present is very simple, we must not make the mistake that the hon. gentleman pointed out was made in the past. I do not say a mistake was made, but I go as far as to say that we may or may not, under the different conditions, have given too much. Therefore, I say, without desiring to be offensive, that it is absolutely idle for hon. gentlemen to bring forward those subsidies as witnesses or elements in an argument on this question. Both sides of politics, within the last ten years have been assenting parties to giving reasonable assistance to encourage railways in Canada, especially to trunk lines, to lines of railways that build branches and feeders to the main lines, without which many people would be deprived of railway communication for many years. Under these circumstances we have given encouragement and help to railways. But I say there is no instance where so much has been given by way of subsidies as is now proposed to be given to the Grand Trunk Pacific for that western division. I said a moment ago that this government had followed a policy of concealment. I repeat that there has been a policy of concealment, a policy of deception, in order to carry out this bargain behind the backs of the people, without their being made acquainted with the facts, and I hope to be able to make that clear before I conclude my remarks.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 36) respecting the Tobique Valley Railway.—Mr. Costigan.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY.

House resumed debate on the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock, I was dealing with the manner in which the largest subsidies that have ever been given in aid of railways, at least in the modern history of Canada, have been given to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. I hope to be able, at least, to make it clear, if I am unable to convince hon. gentlemen opposite, that the statement I have made is absolutely true in every detail. I said that there had been a policy of concealment followed in this in order that the hon. gentlemen might go to the country and make it appear that, substantially, they had kept their pledges, that such had been kept for the first time since they came into power, by aiding a railway without either land grants or subsidies. What is the nature of the subsidies given to this railway? I say that every one of these aids and encouragements granted to this road is a subsidy and that it is a subsidy concealed. We are paying, first a subsidy by the way of payment of interest for the first seven years for the company on the bonds guaranteed on the mountain section of $952,000 a year, or $6,667,500 in all. This is a sum of money that is paid in cash out of the pockets of the people and is a tax upon them. It is, I repeat, a sum of money that is paid in cash just as directly as if it were paid over to the company. The next is a subsidy by way of rebate to the company of seven years rent on the eastern section amounting to $2,490,000 a year, or to a total of $17,430,000. That sum also must be paid by the people as interest on construction for the first seven years. Not one dollar of it goes to the eastern section; every dollar of it goes by way of encouragement to the western section and to the Grand Trunk Railway. Therefore, it is a subsidy, concealed as it is, in the most direct sense. I wish to say here that I have carefully avoided making any estimate that has not been based upon statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite in the past. The statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite during last session, and the statements made by the Grand Trunk Railway shareholders perfectly agree that the 1,000 miles of prairie section will cost $20,000 a mile, and that the mountain section will cost $50,000 a mile. We find that the average cost of the 1,500 miles of the western section, 1,000 miles of the prairie section, and 500 miles of the mountain section, from Winnipeg to the Pacific coast is $30,000 a mile. We have, therefore, contributed by way of the subsidy I have referred to, $16,000 a mile for the whole 1,500 miles. The maximum that we can give under the present law to any railway is $6,400 a mile. Therefore, instead of giving the usual aid to railways we are giving the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company $16,000 a mile for the western section as against $6,400 a mile that we give to other railways. But that is not all of the encouragement we give them. We have given them $16,000 a mile in the way of subsidy. We are giving them a rebate of three years rent on the eastern section on condition of the company paying interest on the same at 3 per cent for forty years. That sum of money is paid by the people. It does not become a debt of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. It does not go into the road any more than the subsidy I have already mentioned does, and at the end of forty years, or when the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company give up that railway, it goes back to the people of Canada, and this sum of money which amounts to $7,470,000 is paid so far as the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway is concerned. That is a further encouragement we have given. Then we give a loan to the company for forty years at 3 per cent, being three years interest paid by the government for the company on the bonds guaranteed amounting to $2,857,500. Let me state that again to make it perfectly clear. For the first seven years of the ten on the western section the government of Canada pay the interest on the bonds which is a subsidy to the company. For the next three years the company are not required to pay the interest, but it may be capitalized and they pay it at the end of forty years as an option. Therefore, it is a loan to the company for forty years at 3 per cent. I will now come to the guarantees. In addition to that we guarantee on the 500 miles of the mountain section a sum equal to $37,500 a mile. Thirty-seven thousand five hundred dollars a mile is three quarters of the estimate of the cost of mountain section made by the hon. gentlemen opposite and by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. The sum guaranteed on the western section is $18,570,000. On the prairie section for 1,000 miles we guarantee $13,000 a mile or $13,000,000 upon the whole. But we have another undertaking in addition to that. We must make good on the prairie section now, as well as upon the mountain section, a sum of money guaranteed to be equal to that in cash; namely, if the bonds sell at ninety cents on the dollar we are to guarantee for the loss on the bonds as well as the original construction which amounts on the same guarantee to $3,175,000. These sums make a total of guarantee of $34,925,000. The guarantee per mile is $23,283. We have, as I have already stated, given a subsidy of $16,000 a mile, we have made a loan to them, and we have guaranteed their bonds for $23,283 a mile on the road that will only cost $30,000 a mile.

Now, let me recapitulate what we have given. We have given a subsidy of $16,000 a mile, amounting in all to $24,097,500. We have given a rebate of three years rent on the eastern division equal to $7,470,000. We have loaned to the company for forty years at 3 per cent, $2,857,500. We have guaranteed bonds at an average of $23,283 per mile equal to $34,925,000 in all. We guarantee interim bonds to assist the company during the period of construction. We procure for the company the right of way for the road as well as land for all stations, station grounds, workshops, buildings and yards for the western section. We also procure such lands fronting upon or covered by navigable waters as may be necessary for the use of the company. We construct a line of 1,875 miles in length at a cost, at least, of $85,000,000, and we hand it over to them for ten years for nothing.

We construct the eastern section, a portion of that, for the Grand Trunk, in order to enable them to reach North Bay or Fort William. Is it any wonder that the stockholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company should have been timid and appalled at the prospect of entering upon a scheme of that kind? No railway in Canada has been granted such assistance, under such conditions, as it is proposed to accord the Grand Trunk Pacific, conditions such as to be, not a benefit, but a menace to the interests of this country. The reasons for the granting of this aid are given by the leading officials of the Grand Trunk, who have stated that the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific combined are partners with the government. Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson, president of the Grand Trunk Railway, said:

As the result, however, of the negotiations with the government another Bill was introduced by the government itself for insuring the construction of the contemplated line from New Brunswick to the Pacific in joint partnership between the government and the Grand Trunk Pacific Company.

Again he said:

While then the objects of the premier were of this large and essentially national character, your directors on their part saw in the accomplishment of such an undertaking great benefits to be obtained for their own company by securing a permanent connection with the Northwest, which would otherwise pass under other control.

The Grand Trunk Company were alive to the possibility of other companies coming and taking up this enterprise. This was no offer to be passed over; it was one which, in the mind of the Grand Trunk, must be secured as quickly as possible or some other company would take it up.

And by enabling the company to participate in the prospective advantages offered by that vast and fertile territory. The result therefore, of the agreement was a combination of these two interests for the construction of the proposed road which would thus be carried out, as I have said, by means of a partnership between the government and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, supported as that company would be by the influence and connections of the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

Mr. Alfred W. Smithers, vice-president of the Grand Trunk Railway, also said:

As the president has told you—and as I was in Winnipeg last year with him, I am able to confirm what he says—as the president has told you, we are wanted in the Northwest; the government have entered into a partnership to take us to the Northwest——

Again Lord Welby says:

We have driven, I may say, the Canadian government into becoming absolute partners with us in the expenditure on that mountain section; that means that we have made their interests one with ours, and we are, therefore, assured of their hearty co-operation and assent to any reasonable proposition on their part.

Could any words make it more perfectly plain, Mr. Speaker, why the Grand Trunk Pacific has been dealt with so liberally, more liberally than any other railway in Canada? Is it not clear that the Grand Trunk Railway is in essence a partner with the government of the day? This, as you know, is an innovation in Canada, it is the first instance in which any government has become a partner with a great railway corporation. I know of nothing more destructive to the existence of a healthy transportation system in this country than that the fortunes of the people of Canada should be linked with any great corporation. Just to the extent that they are partners the government will desire its partner to fulfil their engagements, and just so long as that condition prevails will the interests of this country suffer. Let us consider, for example, the case of default on any part of that contract. The government would scarcely dare to meet parliament and to say that the conditions of the contract had not been fulfilled. They would exert every means to benefit their partner as against railway companies who have the same rights and interests, and should receive the same treatment. Who must bear this great burden of debt which is to be incurred but the people of Canada? The total expenditure, as has been stated by the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden), will be something like $150,000,000, which will be added to the public debt of this country, upon which the people of Canada must pay interest from year to year. Do the people get better rates or any special advantage or favour from the Grand Trunk Pacific in return for this? Absolutely nothing, beyond what will be given by any other railway company in Canada. Therefore, I say that the result of the partnership is that we have mortgaged the fortunes of Canada for the benefit of a great railway corporation, and we must carry them as a bank must carry a customer of the bank for fear that he may be some day unable to meet his obligations. That must be the relation existing between the government and any railway company with which they become partners. I venture to say that this is one of the most dangerous departures ever made in Canada, and it is a thing unheard of in other countries. In the states to the south of us, states have been known to take stock in a railway company, but I am unable to recall a single instance where a state has linked its fortunes with those of a great railway corporation. We should give full justice to railway enterprises in this country, and give them all an equal chance to earn money. But the step taken by the government will preclude the existence of such equal treatment in this country. The people of this country, who are fully alive to the importance of this question, are asking why, if we are giving such enormous subventions to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, that we are practically undertaking to carry the burdens of that road, why should we not extend the Intercolonial to the west, construct our own railway and own it? As it is, we are going to construct a portion of railway and hand that portion over to a railway corporation, first on a lease of 50 years, to all intents and purposes ownership for 50 years. It is all very well to say that we have inserted a provision in the contract by which we have retained running powers for both the Intercolonial Railway and other railways. Every member of the House knows how absolutely worthless that is. No running powers may be obtained under the contract that will not have to be referred to arbitration in case of disagreement. If there was no agreement, the sovereign would still have the power to exercise the right of eminent domain, and in such case it would be referred to arbitration.

We could to-morrow take possession of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and, after compensating the company fairly for their loss, we would be in just as good a position as we are under this contract, which says that we shall have running power over the road. These are the mere incidents that will attach to the scheme, and they give us no more powers than we would have a right to exercise if there were no such agreement at all. Suppose we were to extend the Intercolonial Railway to the Pacific coast. The eastern section of 1,875 miles from Winnipeg to Moncton, at an average cost of $45,000 per mile, would cost a total of $84,000,000. Putting the cost of extending the Intercolonial from Montreal to Winnipeg at the same figures per mile, it would cost for the 1,414 miles, $63,000,000, or a saving on the eastern section of $21,000,000. Then, the western section, from Winnipeg to the Pacific coast, 1,500 miles, at an average cost of $30,000 a mile, would cost a total of $45,000,000. The cost for that would be the same in both cases; but what would be saved by building the Intercolonial? We would save the subsidy of $24,097,000 which we are now handing over to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company; and we would save three years' rent abandoned to the company, amounting to $7,470,000; or a total saving on the western section of $31,567,000. If we constructed the Intercolonial Railway from the city of Montreal to Fort Simpson, we would thus save on the whole no less a sum than $52,657,000.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK (Postmaster General). Would the hon. gentleman allow me to put a question to him? If he has the figures available, since he has given the financial basis of the scheme of the hon. leader of the opposition, would he tell us the estimated cost of extending the Intercolonial Railway from Montreal to the Pacific?

Mr. CLANCY. I have endeavoured to be perfectly fair. I am glad the hon. Postmaster General has asked me that question.

I think it will enable me to make the matter much clearer than I would have been able to do without this interruption. I would apply the same rule to both cases. As I have said, the average cost of constructing 1,875 miles from Moncton to Winnipeg, as was shown by the hon. leader of the opposition, including the loss of interest during the period of construction, is $45,000 a mile. We have to extend the Intercolonial from Montreal to Winnipeg, not 1,875 miles—because there is a portion of that railway on its way to Winnipeg—but 1,414 miles. I applied precisely the same rule to that—I said the cost would be $45,000 a mile. Therefore my hon. friend will see that I am perfectly fair in the calculation.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. What is the total from Montreal to the Pacific ?

Mr. CLANCY. The cost of 1,414 miles, at $45,000 a mile, is $63,000,000, or a saving, as I have stated, of $21,000,000.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. What is the total from Montreal to the Pacific ?

Mr. CLANCY. I will give the hon. gentleman the figures. The rate of cost which the hon, gentlemen have laid down for themselves for constructing a road from Winnipeg to the Pacific coast, was $20,000 a mile for the prairie section, and $50,000 a mile for the mountain section. I assume that would be the cost to the government of extending the Intercolonial Railway from Winnipeg to the Pacific coast, which would be an average of $30,000 a mile for the whole distance.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. What are the totals?

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman can figure them out for himself.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I am asking the hon. gentleman to give us the figures.

Mr. CLANCY. I will be glad to gratify the hon. gentleman later on.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Do not be afraid, tell us the cost.

Mr. CLANCY. I am taking the hon. gentleman as my authority for the cost.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Give us the figures.

Mr. CLANCY. I have given the hon. gentleman the figures. I have given the cost in both cases. I have given the cost both of the eastern and the western section. As regards the western section, both schemes stand upon common ground, and if hon. gentlemen opposite know what their own scheme will cost, they know exactly what will be the cost of the scheme of my hon. friend. I do not think that the financial outlay should deter us, because we will be able to save, as I have shown, some $50,000,000 by the scheme of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. We would do this in the first place by not building an unnecessary section of road, the line from Moncton to Quebec, which is not at all required for a transcontinental railway. Then, we would have the advantage of extending the Intercolonial Railway in the direction of Winnipeg, and we would be saving in railway building the difference between 1,875 miles and 1,414 miles. But by the scheme of the government, we will incur an unwise expenditure by paralleling the Intercolonial Railway from Moncton to the city of Montreal, and paralleling it to no purpose.

Under the circumstances there is no reason why we should hesitate to undertake the construction of the railway ourselves. If the possibilities of the future are such as had been depicted by hon. gentlemen opposite, if they are even half what these hon. gentlemen have pictured them to be, then it is the bounden duty of the government to construct that road themselves, and thus save money to the people and have the people own the road and get every advantage possible out of it. Let me quote hon. gentlemen opposite regarding the future possibilities of this railway project, and I will take each in turn. The hon. the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) dwelt on the immediate necessity for an additional railway owing to the pressure of traffic. He pointed out that freight was being piled up at the other end, and if facilities to carry it were not provided, it would go over American railways to American ports and be lost to this country. Here is what he said :—

> No person who has any knowledge of the situation will for an instant throw any doubt on this statement, that if arrangements are not made for relieving the congestion of traffic, not only in wheat but in cattle and produce of all kinds for shipment outwards and in general for shipment inwards. If these arrangements are not made soon, as surely as the sun shines, the greater portion of that trade will go south to the United States. It is going now.

Then we had the hon. gentleman going still further. He said :—

> The net profits of the Canadian Pacific Railway during the year ending the 30th of June, 1902, were $14,085,000. Last year (1903) its net profits were $15,000,000. The company have made their railway enterprise a magnificent success. If they were called upon to-morrow to incur the liability to pay back every cent of public subvention which they have received and all the money which they have received for lands, notwithstanding that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company would be a good, sound and solvent concern. Compared with that enterprise, the route from Quebec to Winnipeg by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway is a better route.

Let me now give the opinion of the First Minister's railway expert, I refer to the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) who, I regret, is not in his place. This is what that hon. gentleman, the railway expert of the right hon. the First Minister, had to say regarding what the Canadian Pacific Railway would have to restore, if it were to return all that had been given it by way of cash and land subsidies. At page 8514 of the 'Hansard' of 1903, the hon. gentleman had this to say on that subject:

In 1886 I had a letter from the now Lord Mount Stephen, complimenting me, thanking me, for a speech I made in that year attacking the policy of the government and showing what vast franchises the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had obtained, what an enormous bargain they had from the government. This letter complimented me for having tried to act justly, and I was informed that it had been used quite efficiently in promoting the credit of the company.

Then the hon. gentleman proceeded to give what was contributed, according to his standpoint, out of the funds of Canada for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. He said:—

They got a cash bonus of $25,000,000; they got the 643 miles of completed road which cost, with the surveys, in round numbers, $35,000,000; they got 25,000,000 acres of land worth at the least calculation $3 an acre, or $75,000,000. Total, $135,000,000.

That was the amount which the Canadian Pacific Railway, according to the hon. member for North Norfolk, could hand back to the people of Canada and still be a solvent company. Why should these hon. gentlemen repeat to-day what they so strongly condemned in the past? If they were honest in their attacks on the policy followed in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, they should support to-day the position taken by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. We are now in a position, as the hon. leader of the opposition told us, not to hand that over to a railway corporation, but to keep it for the benefit of the people of Canada. There are others who have testified as to the possibilities of a road to the west. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) stated in a speech last year that, in 1901, the wheat product of the west amounted to 63,310,000 bushels. He predicted that in 1911, when this road would be built, it will be 117,800,000 bushels. Of barley, the product of 1901 was, 7,331,000 bushels, and he predicted that in 1911 it would amount to 13,824,000 bushels. The product of oats he gives as 38,909,000 bushels to be increased by 1911 to 83,400,000 bushels. The total product of grain of that country was, 109,550,909 bushels of grain in 1901, and he expressed the confident belief that in 1911 when the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway to the coast is expected to be finished, the grain product will be no less than 211,000,000 bushels. Are such figures likely to encourage or discourage the people in undertaking the construction of a road through the west instead of handing it over to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company? I think that the evidence is most conclusive in favour of the government building the line. But there is another witness that I desire to call. Mr. Charles M. Hays, speaking before the shareholders of the Grand Trunk at their meeting in London, in March last, had this to say:

Now, gentlemen, the Grand Trunk Pacific is going to be in quite a different position from that of an ordinary new enterprise stretching across the territory I have explained to you. Here is the Grand Trunk, the parent company, standing with a large traffic ready to deliver it westbound. This traffic is now given to a competitor. It does not have to wait five, ten, or fifteen years to build up a traffic; it starts with a traffic right from the beginning, and it is of a most remunerative character.

Surely, we ought to preserve that for the people, rather than hand it over to the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and with it a fortune of the people's money. Mr. Hays has something more to say as to the possibilities of the railway. On the same occasion he said:

There are many of you here to-day who will live to see the Grand Trunk Pacific hauling as much of its grain towards the Pacific for consumption in China, Japan and that territory as will be hauled in this eastern direction.

How can the people of Canada hesitate for a moment to make the choice? In view of what they have been told, as I have just quoted, by such men as the Minister of the Interior, the Minister of Agriculture and the hon. member for North Norfolk, what doubt can remain that should cause them to hesitate in entering upon an enterprise of this kind? Should we not be guilty of criminal folly if we lost the opportunity to direct these profits into the pockets of the Canadian people rather than into the coffers of a private corporation?

Hon. gentlemen opposite ask what is to be done about the question of government ownership with all its difficulties. I am very sorry that the Hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Emmerson) is not in his place this evening. Let me say that one very strange thing in connection with this scheme, is the position of the Minister of Railways. When the Bill was originally introduced last year, it was introduced by the Prime Minister instead of, as we might have expected, by the Minister of Railways and Canals. But the reason was made plain by the Minister of Railways and Canals of that day, Hon. Mr. Blair. He showed that he would have nothing to do with the scheme, and gave his reasons on the floor of this House. Rather than favour the measure, he resigned his place in the cabinet. It is easy to understand why, under such circumstances, the Bill was introduced not by the Minister of Railways and Canals, but by the Prime Minister. But the House and country will now be somewhat anxious to know why the present Minister of Railways and Canals did not introduce the amendments here proposed. Later on, that hon. gentleman may give his reasons. It may be that his sullen silence up to this time indicates the spirit in which he signed this contract. He must have signed it with a trembling hand. Up to this time, he has not had the courage even to remain in the House for any considerable time during the debate. Much less has he attempted to explain why the Minister of the Interior was put over his head to reply to the leader of the opposition. Possibly I may be able to make it plain why the Minister of Railways and Canals did not introduce this amendment, why he has absented himself from the House, and why he has been silent from first to last with regard to this matter. The Intercolonial now runs from Sydney on the Atlantic coast to Montreal. If we are to have a line from ocean to ocean, the question of government ownership must be squarely faced so far as that part of the road is concerned between the terminal points of the present Intercolonial. Now, last session, the present Minister of Railways and Canals favoured the extension of the Intercolonial to Georgian Bay. Perhaps I had better read to the House just what he said on that occasion. At page 8741 of 'Hansard' of last year, the present Minister of Railways and Canals said :

> But there is one thing I do wish to say, and that is connected with the proposition made by the hon. ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Blair) in regard to the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to Georgian Bay, in order that that railway might participate in the traffic which comes over the lakes. I have strong sympathy with that idea.

The hon. gentleman who said that is now but little seen within the walls of this chamber. But he was prepared to go further than the remark I have just quoted would indicate. He was prepared not only to extend the Intercolonial to Georgian Bay, but to adopt government ownership without any reservation mental or otherwise. That was the position of the present Minister of Railways and Canals. Let us see what he had to say upon that subject. Speaking last year, page 8733 of the 'Hansard,' this is what the hon. gentleman had to say :

> Those who have paid any attention to the course which I have pursued in relation to this railway project, if any have done me the honour to observe that course, will know that I have advocated, not merely in this House, but in the Railway Committee, the extension of the Intercolonial Railway into the west, and the operation of railways by the government.

No one can doubt the position then taken by the Minister of Railways and Canals. He goes further, and he points out the advantages that would arise to Canada by such a course :

> The government owning and operating the road to-day could assemble the western traffic—bring it to the city of Quebec, pass it along over their Intercolonial Railway, even at the longer haul, assuring to our eastern ports that traffic, even though this were done at a loss.

That was from the present Minister of Railways and Canals. Then the hon. gentleman goes further. He discusses the difficulties of government ownership. After having given the matter mature consideration, he came to the conclusion that there were no obstacles in the way of government ownership. He became thoroughly convinced that that was the course to pursue, and at page 8778 of the 'Hansard' of last year, discussing the difficulties in the way of government ownership and operation, he says :

> The danger of party control is not, in my judgment, so serious after all. It certainly is not sufficiently serious to enable it to decide the question on that consideration alone, and especially when we take into consideration the fact that we must all recognize, that large railway corporations have a great political influence.

They have political influence with the government of the day, and the Grand Trunk Railway has the pull. Now, Sir, that speech completely favouring, first, the extension of the Intercolonial to Georgian Bay ; next, adopting, without any reserve, the principle of government ownership, goes on to show the benefits that would inure to the people by government ownership and operation. He saw no difficulty in the way, and in his concluding sentence—which I wish the House and you, Mr. Speaker, to mark—he says :

> I was honest in my conviction, and I am strongly in favour of the ownership and operation of railways by the government.

Is it any wonder that the Minister of Railways and Canals has been cited ? Is it any wonder that that hon. gentleman has refused to rise in his place and defend this scheme ? Is it any wonder that, under such conditions, the hon. gentleman would be ashamed to rise now and make a defence of the position he now occupies ? The hon. gentleman said then he was honest, and I believe he was honest. What will be his position now ? If he were honest then, what should be his position now ? Will he rise in his place and stultify himself ? Will he swallow every word he said last year? Will he say he was merely acting last session when this measure was before the House ? Or will he do the respectable thing, and resign his position in the cabinet, and make the protest that the former Minister of Railways and Canals made in this House ?

An hon. MEMBER. The salary.

Mr. CLANCY. I shall not say anything about the salary. That would be a small consideration in so great a matter as this. I am going to give the Minister of Railways and Canals credit for considering more than his salary. I believe he values his reputation at this moment infinitely more than the salary attached to his position, as becomes an honest man in the discharge of his duties. In such case, he will refuse to give his support to any scheme of this kind. He has made a pledge to the House and to the people on this question that utterly forbids the hon. gentleman retracing his course.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is one thing that is rather sad, and that is the surrender that has been made here, and the complacency of the hon. gentlemen in regard to it. True, they are acting a part ; true, in giving their explanations, nothing has been said that had even the semblance of a defence of their position. Have the ministers ventured to come forward and defend this scheme ? What was the position of their followers who honestly followed them for party purposes ? I do not know an hon. gentleman sitting on that side of the House who did not protest, if he dared protest, without injuring the chances of success of his party to hold office in this country—who did not protest, and would protest, against undertaking a scheme of this kind. It was not a matter that could be concealed. Last session when this project was launched, the members supporting the government could be found in the corridors, could be found in the streets, could be found everywhere within reach in the city of Ottawa, telling you, not privately, but publicly, that this was a scheme that should not be supported, and they would not support it. True, the exigencies of party have driven the hon. gentlemen to do it, and to act a different part. Quite true, but they had certain assurances from their leaders at the time which they considered as a salve to their conscience, as an apology for supporting this measure. What were they ? We had the assurance of the Minister of the Interior, the first assurance upon which they gave their vote, that is as to the maximum liability in this scheme. The Minister of the Interior assured the House and his followers, in order to get their support, that the maximum liability to the people would be —as I will read on page 8642 of the 'Hansard' :

> Therefore when we guarantee interest upon a maximum of $30,000 per mile in the mountain section of this railway, the interest on the cost of construction as it goes on for the five years is included in that $30,000 per mile on the mountain section of this railway, the interest on the cost of construction as it goes on for the five years is included in that $30,000 per mile, and that is the maximum of our liability.

Is that statement true yet ? The hon. gentleman knows it is not true. We have no maximum of $30,000 per mile. They have, without the consent of their followers, raised that to $37,500 a mile. That was the assurance they had for giving the government their support. Then we have the condition with regard to default. We have the assurance of some other hon. gentlemen in this House, we have the assurance of the Minister of Justice, which is somewhat important, on that point. The Minister of Justice says :

> Then suppose there should be a default in the payment of interest on the bonds guaranteed by us. We will take the road and the equipment, and the holders of the second issue of bonds will be obliged to apply for payment to the Grand Trunk Railway. Hence it can easily be seen that the Grand Trunk Railway will not be in a position to afford to allow any default to be made.

That was the assurance that the Minister of Justice gave to the House upon that occasion. Is that the case now ? Can we take possession of the road in case of default. We have no longer the mortgages as has been pointed out by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. We have a mere instrument, not a mortgage. In case of failure and in case they are permitted to be in default in the payment of interest for the first five years we will not foreclose and we have no power to foreclose. But we agree that we will take over the road, pay the debts of the Grand Trunk Railway people and when they are paid we will hand the road back to the Grand Trunk Railway people. Let me give a parallel case and I will give it to my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Sir William Mulock). Suppose he sold to his next neighbour a horse and he made an arrangement with the purchaser to pay for the horse in a certain time. Suppose he made a further arrangement that he might let it go for a certain time longer and that he made a still further arrangement that if the purchaser refused or neglected to pay for the horse he would take the horse back, work it until it paid the debt and then he would give the horse back to the man to whom he sold it. That is precisely the case in regard to this transaction. But, we have the assurance of another hon. gentleman, the eloquent member for Gaspé, the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Lemieux). The hon. Solicitor General held up 'Hansard' last evening, with some theatrical effect quite becoming to so clever an actor and he said : This is the book of books. How fortunate it is to have a record of the speeches of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House. It is an indispensable condition in this House that we should know what is being done and he said : This is for the people the book of books. Let me read from the book of books what the hon. gentleman had to say as an assurance to those who support the government of which he is now a member. This is what the hon. gentleman had to say, as it appears at page 8787 of 'Hansard' of 1903 as an assurance to the supporters of the Liberal party who sit upon the other side of the House, and as an evidence that the bargain they were making was a sound one, that they took no chances, that they had their remedies and that it would be their duty to exercise their remedies.

> The security for the bond guarantee is to be found in mortgages which may be foreclosed by the government in case of default.

Is the hon. gentleman now prepared as a member of this government and probably soon to be a member of the cabinet to repeat that statement? I think it is his duty now, and I should like to give him an opportunity of doing so, to repudiate his utterance or say: I deceived the people on that occasion. He should say: I believed it then, and I believe it now; I was not a member of the government then, I am a member of the government now. Then, there are some other hon. gentlemen who gave assurances to the people on that occasion. We have the hon. Minister of Finance. I greatly regret that that hon. gentleman is not in the House. I am disposed to pay that hon. gentleman the compliment of saying that in debate while always lucid he is not always logical, but he has the power of presenting his case with a good deal of force. My hon. friend beside me (Mr. W. J. Roche) says that this seems to be a season of bouquets. I want to pay a just tribute to those hon. gentlemen whose utterances are of great consequence at this moment. Let us see what the hon. Minister of Finance gave as an assurance to the people who supported that scheme. The chief reason given to the people to induce them on that occasion to support the scheme was that the Grand Trunk Railway Company held as security $25,000,000 of the common stock. This is what the hon. Minister of Finance had to say upon that occasion:

> We have provided that practically the common stock of this company to the full extent of $25,000,000 shall be held, not by promoters, not even by the old Grand Trunk Railway officials individually, but by the old Grand Trunk Railway of Canada itself.

Is that the case now? Where is the hon. Minister of Finance to withdraw that statement, to repudiate it, to make amends to the people by saying: We have taken upon ourselves to change this? What I said upon that occasion will not do. We must act differently now and why must we act differently?—because the Grand Trunk Railway Company have asked us to act differently and there is no better reason. Again the hon. Minister of the Interior had something to say in regard to the Grand Trunk Railway Company making, in the first instance, a proposition to construct a road from North Bay to Winnipeg and the Pacific coast, coming to the government and having in view subsidies for the purpose of constructing that line. The hon. Minister of the Interior tells us that he did not assent to that, that it was not in the interest of the country to take a course of that kind, that they were not prepared to do it on that occasion. Then, what does he say?

> I have no doubt that the Grand Trunk Railway would have preferred to get a good liberal bonus, pretty nearly enough to build the line from North Bay to Winnipeg, without any harassing or embarrassing stipulations as to what they shall do with their traffic.

Have the Grand Trunk Railway Company not secured the construction of the division from North Bay practically to Winnipeg? Have they not unloaded that now upon the people. Are we not constructing that eastern section? Is that not a portion of it? Under the changed conditions of the contract do they not get that to operate before the other may be constructed? Have they not secured in the fullest sense everything they asked for in that direction? Now, Sir, my own impression is and I think it is the impression of hon. members on both sides of the House, that there has not been one request made by the Grand Trunk Railway Company that has not been granted. I defy hon. gentlemen to say that there has been a single demand made upon the government that has not been surrendered in substance and in essence to the Grand Trunk Railway Company?

What reason or excuse has the government given for this departure? Absolutely no reason but the one that the Grand Trunk people said: Our shareholders will not assent to this. Yet, at the same time, Mr. Hays was telling the Grand Trunk shareholders in England: We had better avail ourselves of this proposition or other promoters will take it up; we have no time to lose. Then the government comes back with the pitiable excuse I have mentioned, thereby placing their friends who supported the agreement of last year in a very awkward position. Is the fact that the Grand Trunk Railway people were timid and did not care to undertake a part of the bargain a sufficient reason for abandoning every safeguard, so far as there were safeguards, in the old agreement? The real objection raised by the Grand Trunk shareholders at the meeting was that the money to be expended was the money of the Grand Trunk Railway shareholders, but that it was to be expended by a board composed of Canadian and English shareholders rather than by the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway. I know of no greater challenge that could be made to the honest electors of Canada than that now thrown down to them in asking them to support the Bill before the House, from which every safeguard has been omitted, and when the time comes the people will not be slow to avail themselves of the opportunity of expressing their displeasure.

Now, one word more, and I shall conclude.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CLANCY. I hear marks of approval from hon. gentlemen opposite. I have no doubt it will be quite a relief to hon. gentlemen, who are under the necessity of making a choice between public duty and the obligation to follow a party leader, to have any person, either inside or outside of this House, cease to discuss so unpleasant a question. I am gratified at the general assent which hon. gentlemen have given to the conclusion of my attempt, in my humble way, to point out the position in which hon. gentlemen stand to-day. Some hon. gentlemen have said that the hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) has abandoned the scheme proposed last year. I challenge hon. gentlemen to point out one single instance where he has in substance departed in the slightest degree from the proposal which he made to this House last year. The deplorable surrender of the interests of Canada which the hon. gentlemen have made makes it more imperative than ever that the scheme laid down by the leader of the opposition last year should be pressed to a conclusion. We could avert great evils to Canada if we were in a position to act on his suggestions, and it would be a duty, if he came into power, to lose no time in giving effect to a scheme that would avert one of the greatest evils impending over the heads of the people of Canada. We intend no injustice to the Grand Trunk ; we desire to give the Grand Trunk Railway full scope, as we desire to give full scope to every other railway enterprise in Canada. If we came into power, it would be the duty of our government, as of any government, to encourage railway development, and hon. gentlemen opposite cannot make it appear, from any utterances from this side of the House, that any member has taken a position which can be interpreted as opposing the encouragement of railways. The question that must strike you now is : Will the government of the day, after having so departed from the pledges which they induced their followers to endorse last session, have the courage to allow the people to speak on this question before the final consummation of such an outrage ? They will not dare to do that, because they know that their answer would be a notice to quit. Not a member in this House has a mandate to vote for this agreement in its changed form. No greater outrage on the people could be committed than, upon the scanty information at hand, the evidence of a clerk in the Department of the Interior, who has had a half hour's pleasant conversation with one or two of the Grand Trunk Railway engineers, and a little essay read, I suppose, somewhat as a literary production by one of the Jesuit Fathers 250 years ago, discussing the length of the days and nights and the time at which roses came and went in that country, to enter upon this gigantic scheme. This is a paramount occasion in the history of the parliament of Canada, and there has never been an occasion on which members of the opposition might feel more absolutely sure of being right and of defending the interests of the people than upon this measure. No greater evils have ever threatened the people, and I know of no greater opportunity for averting those evils. It is the duty of every patriotic Canadian to act, not as Sir Rivers-Wilson said the right hon. the premier (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has acted, as a patriot in the interests of the Grand Trunk Railway, but as a patriot devoted to the interests of Canada.

Mr. E. A. LANCASTER (Lincoln and Niagara). Mr. Speaker, in a day or two every member of this House will be called upon to vote on the resolution brought forward by the right hon. the Prime Minister and the amendment to it proposed by the hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden). This is a time in the history of Canada when one has to ask himself what are the duties and responsibilities devolving upon a member of this House upon political questions involving the welfare of the whole Dominion. During the past six or seven years there has been a growing disposition, at least in the part of the country I have the honour to represent, to wonder how far this government, in dealing with matters of national importance, will go in ignoring all business rules and all the reasons that would guide parties in business transactions in private life. If we wanted to select an example of the extent to which the government would dare to go in violating and disregarding all business rules, we have it in the proposition put forward by the government last year and the still worse proposition now before us in regard to the so-called transcontinental railway scheme. We find that members of parliament are called upon to vote for an expenditure which has been estimated by several gentlemen sitting on your left, Mr. Speaker, to amount to nine-tenths of the total cost of the largest work ever undertaken by the Dominion of Canada. And it has been demonstrated that the other party in this enterprise, who is called upon to pay only one-tenth of the cost, is to have the whole benefit for fifty years, while the other partner, who puts in nine-tenths of the cost, is to have no benefit whatever for fifty years. At the end of that time, if they are alive, or if their descendants are not all in the asylum for having voted for such a scheme, they will be allowed to make an arrangement for dividing up what is left.

This scheme was debated fully at the last session of this House, and I do not propose to weary the House by going into the details of it. But I have a little hope that if I say a few words on the question, some of the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House may begin to feel that they will not be doing their duty to the country, or to those parts of the country which they represent, if they do not insist on the government withdrawing the scheme, and getting a mandate from the people before they plunge the country into an enormous expenditure for which the country gets practically nothing in return.

The effect of the House voting for this scheme is that you deprive the country of all chance for fifty years at least, of having a government-owned railroad from the Atlantic to the Pacific. It is not disputed that that is the effect; but this fact seems to be forgotten by hon. gentlemen opposite, who are so anxious to vote for everything proposed by the government. Whether we are or are not at this moment prepared to say that we want the government to own all the railroads in Canada, is another question entirely. An hon. member might not be impressed in favour of a proposition of that kind; and yet, looking at the present scheme as a business proposition, he would say, if he consulted the interests of his constituents: I cannot vote for this scheme, because it is a bad bargain, being altogether in favour of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, and preventing government ownership for 50 years.

What is the resolution before the House, on which I must vote one way or the other? And in doing so, I am not voting for myself, only but for 33,000 people and nearly 8,000 voters who trust me to vote as they would vote if they were here. I am voting on behalf of children who ten or fifteen years hence will have the right to vote for themselves, but who will not be able to undo the results of the vote which we cast here, and will be old men before they have the first chance of saying what they will do when the fifty years during which the country is tied up are at an end. The resolution is that the contract which was made last year shall be amended in several particulars; and the amendment proposed by the hon. leader of the opposition in effect is that because that contract was bad in itself, and because the government will make a still worse bargain for the people of Canada by the proposed amendments, therefore we should take advantage of the present opportunity to withdraw from this contract—that we should say to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, in effect: As you are not satisfied with the bargain which we made with you last year, which on consideration we find was entirely too good a one for you and too bad a one for us, we are glad to take advantage of this opportunity which you give us to get out of it, and we will go on and do business for ourselves by spending the people's money for the benefit of the people instead of for your benefit. That is the position of the matter in a few words. The hon. leader of the opposition puts in black and white just how, as a business man he proposes to carry that out. His proposition, in a few words, is this, that if the people pay the money for the road, the people ought to get the road they pay for. What is the objection to the scheme of the hon. leader of the opposition? It has been before the House for several days; it has been, I was going to say debated, but I can hardly pay hon. gentlemen opposite that compliment. It has been attacked, but has not been answered in any particular; but simply because it comes from the hon. leader of the opposition and because the premier will not accept it, hon. gentlemen opposite are prepared to vote against it. What are the principal differences between the scheme of the opposition and the scheme of the government? The government scheme ignores all the waterways. It practically says that our waterways, canals and harbours, on which we have spent so much money, are no good for transportation, but that we are going to rely entirely upon a railroad that runs far north of where all existing railways run, and far north of most of our waterways and canals. It is true, we have some waterways, by which we shall be able to ship grain for a certain distance, but that is only in order that we may transhipit on to this Grand Trunk Pacific Railway. The policy of the opposition is to use the waterways and the railways together—to have a partnership between the canals and the railways. We would have for transportation a double team, and not a single team. We would have the transportation by water work in harmony with the transportation by railway, and the same people owning both. Therefore, we would not need to rely upon the patriotism of the people to decide which way they would send their grain; because if the agent of the railroad happened not to know that they insisted on it being transhipped by a certain route, still they would be sure of its going over the people's highway, whether it went by water or rail, and getting to Canadian ports.

One would suppose that by any business rule, since it is Canada which is furnishing the money, it ought to get the benefit. But the reverse is the case. The government say it is conceded on all hands that we require more transportation facilities, and, as the Grand Trunk Railway is willing to provide those facilities, if we will pay nine-tenths of the cost, we should not hesitate. Here is a great opportunity which we will not have again, and although by paying ten per cent more we could have the whole thing ourselves, we will pay nine-tenths of the cost to the Grand Trunk Railway and allow that company to build and own the railway and operate it, not to our profit, but to theirs. Greater transportation facilities, these hon. gentlemen opposite argue, are what we want, and it does not matter much what particular scheme we adopt, the country can stand the expense, and the people are simple and gullible enough to be deluded into the belief that the particular scheme we submit to them is the best that could be devised.

The next great difference between the government scheme and that proposed by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition is this. Under the latter, the country will own the road, but under the scheme of the government, the road will be owned and run by a private corporation, and that private corporation may refuse to so operate their road as to benefit our canals for which our people have paid so much. It is all very well for hon. gentlemen opposite to say that the Grand Trunk Pacific will in all probability do this thing and the other. But why take any chances at all ? Would any business man be content to take chances when he can get a certainty ? Under the government scheme, the Grand Trunk Pacific can so operate their road that the canals will not get the traffic when they otherwise would. The canals and the railways not being under the same control, there will be no community of interest between them. The Grand Trunk Pacific will have a franchise to do as they like for the benefit of their stockholders and will not do anything for the benefit of the people. They will not take any interest in our canals unless there are some dollars and cents to be gained thereby for the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Pacific. But what the policy of the opposition would bring about is this. The railways and the canals would be both owned by the people and be worked together in the same interest and the people would get the benefit. We have been spending vast sums of money on canals and harbours. For instance, the government have spent a considerable sum in Port Colborne, which is near my constituency. Why did the government incur this expenditure ? In order to accommodate the largely laden vessels which come through Lake Erie to Port Colborne, and whose cargoes are transhipped into smaller vessels and carried through the Welland canal. But under this Grand Trunk Pacific scheme, what benefit is the country going to get from this expenditure ? If the Grand Trunk Pacific is going to do the business, which hon. gentlemen opposite say it will, then it will minimize the traffic which now goes through the government canals. Whereas, if the country owned and operated the transcontinental railway, it would be worked in community of interest with the canals and the country would get the benefit. But that is not all. Not only will the people have to pay nine-tenths of the cost of this new transcontinental line for the benefit of a private corporation, but by this new line the government evidently intend to put out of business the road which the country owns already and which runs from Montreal to Halifax. That road will be given a powerful competitor, and in order to strengthen as much as possible the position of this private corporation, which is thus going to compete with our own government line, the government have come back this session and asked us to relieve the Grand Trunk Pacific from certain conditions in the contract and make it more advantageous still to the railway company. Why, during the recess dozens of gentlemen who have hitherto supported the Reform party told me that they did not intend doing so any longer. They would say to me : surely you do not believe for a moment that the government intend going on with that line to Moncton. Well, I would reply, I can only say that the government have insisted on this contract going through the House. They have a signed and sealed contract with the Grand Trunk Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway could sue for damages if it should not be carried out. Oh, but they would reply, that is merely a ruse to keep in power. The government are not serious. Well, Mr. Speaker, those gentlemen belong to the Reform party and probably know their leaders better than I do. I cannot tell whether what they say is true or not, but I do say that if the people in Ontario really believed that this was a serious scheme, and that it was really intended this thing should be carried out in the way contemplated within the four walls of the contract ; if they really believed it was going through to the end, they would come down here in their might, and Coxey's army would not be in it with the demonstration they would make.

We had during the recess a chance to find out what the people think about this. I am glad to see that there is at least one cabinet minister in his place to-night and speaking to the Prime Minister through him, let me tell him that the people are more in touch with the Conservative party than with the opposite party, and if the government had done what the people expected, they would not have amended the contract, but would have said to the Grand Trunk Railway, thank goodness you have repudiated it ; we were hoping that something would turn up to make you back out, you have refused the contract in its present shape and we are well out of the trouble. They would have then been doing what the people of Ontario expected and hoped they would do.

What is the cost of this ? My hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Taylor) the other night gave his estimate, which I think is substantially correct. Let me point out to the government and the Postmaster General what it is going to cost per head. It is going to cost every voter at least $25 and probably $30. To every man, woman and child not a voter, the same thing. To every head of a family $125 at least and probably $150. And the cost to the Grand Trunk Pacific would amount to an additional tax of $2.50 per voter, and $12.50 per head of the family.

Now, I think that the head of a family will say to me, if I vote for this resolution and against the amendment : Why did not you spend $12.50 more and secure that road for me instead of throwing away $125 of my money and leaving me with nothing to show for it ? This government, perhaps, does not care how much the head of a family pays, does not care a cent, perhaps, how much the voter pays. They take the position that does not amount to anything; Canada is prosperous; they are in power and everything has gone well with them. Everything has gone well with them, except, as I have said, they are not in touch with the people. But no doubt they think the people are good natured and will stand anything so long as times continue good. But, whether the people are careless enough or good natured enough to condone these things or not makes no difference. The fact is, that we are trustees for the people, and it is our bounden duty to handle the people's money just as though we were the executors of an estate and they were the beneficiaries. If we do anything here that would not be justifiable in the case of a private individual who is trustee of an estate, the people ought to blame us. Whatever the people say, it is our duty to try to protect the interests committed to our charge. A good many of the hon. members on this side have referred to this as a partnership. They have spoken of a partner who puts in experience as against the partner who puts in money. It seems to me there is another aspect in which we can look at it. This seems to be the case of a senior partner and a junior partner—the senior partner puts in ten per cent and gets everything and the junior partner Canada, puts in ninety per cent and gets nothing. And there is a quasi sleeping partner besides. The government, the cabinet ministers who are, in a special sense, trustees and who ought to be awake and looking after the interests of the people, which interests they have in trust, go to sleep and let the Grand Trunk do what they like. I think it is only reasonable to call these gentlemen, the sleeping partners in the concern. We have ocular demonstration here of their sleeping, and I do not think we are to blame if we call them sleeping partners in the affairs of Canada. We see them sleeping at their desks in this House, session after session and night after night. And, when they do that, I suppose they expect us to notice it and to mention it in the hope of waking them up. But, even if we do not succeed in waking them up, the people of Canada will do that, when they get a chance, at the polls.

Now, I do not intend to read these amendments or to discuss them all. They have been very ably discussed by gentlemen on this side. But I have a word or two to say in my humble way about one or two of these provisions. The first that strikes me is a feature which is absolutely harsh, hard and unfair to the people of Canada, is in paragraph No. 6 of the agreement:

> 6. Notwithstanding anything in the said contract contained, the government shall not exercise any rights in respect of possession, foreclosure or sale, by reason of non-payment of interest by the company under the thirty-first, thirty-second or thirty-third paragraphs of the said contract, or under all or any of them, unless and until there shall be such default to the extent in the whole of a sum equal to five years of such interest, as the company is not relieved from payment of or permitted to defer or capitalize by the provinces of the said paragraphs.

In the original contract there were plenty of things which, though actually constituting default, were not to be so regarded under law, but there were other things that the government, with an attempt to make it appear that they were going to try to protect the interests of the people, stipulated should be regarded as default, allowing them to exercise the right of foreclosure. And now we are coolly asked to agree that this Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, which, we are told, is going to make so much money that there is no danger to us in endorsing their notes may be in default for five years and we must look on and do nothing. Why should they be five years in default? Why should they be three months, or even three days in default? Nobody who deals with a railway company is allowed to be three minutes in default without a writ being issued or a seizure made. But here is this great Grand Trunk Pacific, which, we are told, is to be such a credit to Canada, which, I believe, the present Prime Minister pretends he is going to hand down as a great work he accomplished—though I feel sure it will prove a white elephant on his hands, and a very lively one, before he gets through with it—this concern which is going to do such wonderful things, asks the people of Canada to allow them to be five years in default before anything can be done to bring them to time. As a humble member of this House this would be reason enough for me to vote against these amendments, if there were nothing else.

Then, what is clause 7? It was discussed pretty fully by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Lemieux) yesterday. Let me, in a word or two, point out my objection to this clause. Under the contract of last year, the government would have the right, under certain terms, to take possession of the property as mortgagee and try to make something out of the venture. Under this amended clause the government is not allowed to do that, but, in case of default on the part of the company, a receiver is to be appointed, and many other chances are to be given to the railway company. Hon. gentlemen opposite give, as one of their reasons why we need not worry what this is going to cost, or about any danger of endorsing the notes of this concern, that this company is sure to make money. The amendment that is asked by the Grand Trunk Railway Pacific does not look as if they intended to do what they say they will do for the people of Canada. They insist that the government shall ask parliament to agree that the company shall be allowed to evade the natural results of default, even if they do not do what they agree to do and what hon. gentlemen opposite, who ought to be protecting the people's rights, make themselves believe they are going to do. They give the company far greater chances by reason of appointing the receiver and providing that the company shall not lose its rights, as it ought to lose them if it breaks its contract.

Clause 9 is another one to which I particularly object. It says:

9. Notwithstanding anything in the twenty-seventh paragraph of the said contract contained, the Grand Trunk Railway Company shall not, after the acquisition of the twenty-five million dollars ($25,000,000) of common stock therein mentioned (less shares held by directors, not exceeding one thousand), be prevented from making any such disposition of such common stock as the said Grand Trunk Railway may deem expedient, provided, however, that the said Grand Trunk Railway Company shall, during the delay mentioned in the said paragraph, continue to hold a majority of the said stock by such title as shall enable the said Grand Trunk Railway Company to control the policy of the company.

'As shall enable the said Grand Trunk Railway Company to control the policy of the company.' To hear hon. gentlemen opposite talk, you would think that there was no doubt that the people of Canada were going to control the policy of this company that they were going to do it by virtue of the hundred and one things we are going to do, more or less imaginary, but that the hon. gentlemen have so much faith in; they are going to be able to get the Grand Trunk Railway to do anything they want over this line. They have running rights, but they take good care not to show any disposition to use those running rights. They cannot read that section without bringing in the argument that the whole object of that amendment is that the Grand Trunk Railway is to control the policy of the company. Now this contract is not made with the Grand Trunk Railway, it is made with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, and it is putting up a man of straw with which to deceive the people. They give the money to that company, and attempt to guard our interest as to the default. We who are to the extent of nine-tenths, contributors to the capital required —and not even our debtors, the Grand Trunk Pacific Company—we are not to control the policy of this new company, but the foreign Grand Trunk company. I never before heard of a partner who puts nothing into a concern, who becomes liable for nothing, and who yet controls the policy of the concern. They say, we will not be liable for anything, but you must make your contract for our benefit, and during the whole time we are to control the policy of the concern. Now we know the Grand Trunk is not the Grand Trunk Pacific, we know it is a railway with opposition lines, we know that in one sense it is antagonistic to the Intercolonial, and instead of protecting the Intercolonial, they take good care that the Grand Trunk which runs to Portland shall antagonize the Intercolonial with the Grand Trunk Pacific whose policy it is to control. We are not satified to put the Intercolonial out of business, but we must create another railway in opposition to the Intercolonial and then expect to make money out of that part of it going through the northern part of Quebec. Mr. Speaker, I do not know what you would do if you had the casting vote upon this question. If we had a few more members on this side and they had a few less, I think you would vote with us, when we remember your record when in opposition in this House. I am satisfied you would vote with us, and this government would have to resign. Now paragraph 10 reads:—

Paragraph 21 of the said contract is amended by adding thereto the following clause:—

'Provided further that in the event of the government determining to undertake the operation of the said eastern division, the company shall be entitled for a further period of 50 years to such running powers and haulage rights as may be necessary to continuity of operation——

They are careful to extend the running powers to a period of 50 years. They might as well make it 100 years. The Conservatives are going to live a long while. They seem to get along better and to live longer, I do not know why, but they don't have so much to worry about. I suppose having clear consciences they sleep better, at any rate they are going to be longer lived than they used to be, and apparently there is some danger in the minds of the Grand Trunk that somebody fifty years from now might remember this contract and something might happen, so they give running powers for fifty years.

—for continuity of operation between the said western division and other portions of the company's system and the Grand Trunk Railway system upon such terms as may from time to time be agreed upon, or as may from time to time, in case of failure so to agree, be determined in the manner provided by paragraph 24 hereof.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Grand Trunk is not satisfied with the first fifty years, and this government is not satisfied with protecting them that time. They are contemplating that the Grand Trunk will live on, and will have a right to insist upon certain connections with the Grand Trunk Pacific. Did it never occur to them that applying the same rule they should bind it to give the same connections at once to the Intercolonial, which the people own, and whom the government are supposed to be protecting in this contract? But fifty years from now we find the Grand Trunk Railway is to have all these facilities, and there is not a word about the Intercolonial being given any protection either now or then. It is to go along, I suppose, by virtue of the special taxes to be contributed by the loyal people of Canada in order to keep it going.

Now, Sir, the question has been asked to-night by the hon. gentleman who preceded me (Mr. Clancy), where is the Minister of Railways and Canals? Well, I do not wish to emphasize any more than my hon. friend has done the significance of the absence of that hon. minister, but I, as a humble member of this House, feel that the Minister of Railways and Canals ought not to have signed this contract if he was not going to come into the House and explain to us why he signed it. I feel that the Minister of Railways and Canals is not doing justice to himself if he is not prepared to come in here and explain and defend this contract, and to listen to the arguments that are used pro and con in regard to this railway. Does the Minister of Railways and Canals know all about it? Has he considered carefully what the effect of it is? He went down to St. John not long ago and received a strong hint that the people did not want it. He went down there and did his best to bring a supporter back here on the strength of this scheme, and he came back empty, but the leader of the opposition got a supporter instead of the Minister of Railways and Canals. I should think the Minister of Railways and Canals would begin to learn something from his intercourse with the people in regard to this matter. If he kept in closer touch with the people he might come to the conclusion that they are not in favour of this scheme. Perhaps the minister has not yet made up his mind to do like his predecessor and resign but he is waiting to see whether the government will not undertake to withdraw this contract. Perhaps they will, perhaps they will not. But I think the Minister of Railways and Canals ought not to remain out of the House as he does day after day, and night after night during this discussion, because the people will take the meaning to be that he is not in favour of this scheme, and I am satisfied that they will be nearer right than wrong, particularly after they read what he said last session, as it has been quoted by my hon. friend from Bothwell.

Now the government supporters do make an attempt to say that this scheme ought to go through. I want to be quite fair with them. I am willing to concede them everything they can get out of this argument. And they do make an attempt to show that this road should go through. Their chief argument is that the road is needed. Now I may say that there is no dispute between us on that point. We do not say that a road of some kind is not needed, but these gentlemen seem to think that as long as they say to the people, you need a road, then we are justified in paying nine-tenths of the cost of the road ourselves while the other party pays only one-tenth of the cost, and we hand it over to him to control. Because the road is needed is not a sufficient reason for handing it over to the party who only pays one-tenth of the cost. But that is the whole sum and substance of the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite. They say the road is needed, and that the opposition are to blame because we do not consent to put our hands into the pockets of the people and make them pay $150,000,000 for something that we think the Grand Trunk is going to own and not the people themselves. They do not seem to know that Canada can raise the money to build this road herself, and own the whole thing afterwards. They seem to realize that Canada's credit is good, and if Canada guarantees this money and lets the Grand Trunk Pacific build the road, that is all right. Canada, in their view, is a charitable institution for the benefit of any railroad company that wants public money to build a road with. They realize that Canada has got the money and can go into the money markets of the world with paper easily purchaseable at a very small discount, if any discount at all, if they keep on with this sort of scheme I am afraid the discount will be greater a few years hence than it is now. They quite realize that Canada is good for it, and they seem to be quite satisfied that the money should be paid over. They say that we ought not to speak of the company which is going to get all the benefit of the money when it is paid, and that it does not make any difference whether the Grand Trunk Pacific or the people of the Dominion get the benefit. They also say, which is not quite correct, that those of us on this side of the House who oppose the scheme, oppose it for the sake of opposing it, and that they think they are making a very strong reply to our argument when they say that we oppose it for the sake of opposing it. We do not oppose it for the sake of opposing it. We do not oppose any expenditure in this House for the sake of opposing it, because there are a great many expenditures that are put through that we could block if we chose to do so. But we are opposing it because we believe it is against the interests of the people, and because we believe we are sent here to raise our voices in the interests of the people when the government try to make a bad bargain. We do not agree that it matters not whether the people are treated properly or improperly, but when the issue is presented we are prepared to meet it. We still think that, although we sit upon your left, Mr. Speaker, although we are in the minority politically, we are bound to protect the people by our voices and our arguments, and to point out to the government the reasons for what we think and do while we are here. Now, the government oppose this scheme themselves more than the opposition oppose it. Six months ago this proposition was put before us as a perfect scheme. It was said that the Grand Trunk Railway Company had agreed to it, that they had them hard and fast, that there was no getting out of it, that it was a scheme that must go through; and now they come forward and say that it was not a proper scheme, that it would have been better if these amendments had been made to it, and the Grand Trunk Railway Company, or the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, have convinced them that the scheme was not as it ought to be, and that it ought to be changed to the form in which it is now presented. So, I say, they are getting very expert in the operation of swallowing themselves. We used to find them making pledges in 1893 or 1894 at an Ottawa convention, and in three or four years after breaking them; we used to find them swallowing themselves in a series of gulps and with difficulty, but now we find them swallowing themselves in six months in a single gulp, wholly, body and bones, and not having any nightmare, or sleeplessness, or indigestion, as a result of the operation. Inside of six months they are able to swallow the whole story. They say: What we said six months ago was wrong, and we are now prepared to say something else. They have become so expert now that I do not know what the people will expect from them next. I have no doubt the people will say: We did not send you to Ottawa to run a dime museum; we send members of parliament to Ottawa to do the business of the country, and we will send down a government led by the hon. leader of the opposition, who will do business at the old stand and in the good old honest way. It was good enough for our fathers, and it is good enough for us. These hon. gentlemen say that this contract is all right, and that we should not refuse to sanction it. They say: You are not loyal, you are not patriotic, if you refuse this contract. They cannot realize that the people send us here to protect them to see that if they do not get one hundred cents on the dollar, that they at least get ten cents on the dollar, for the money that is expended.

It looks here as if there were a sort of organization on the other side of the House to disguise the real issue before us. We have hon. gentlemen opposite putting up men of straw and then knocking them down, trying to put on pages of 'Hansard' arguments attributed to the opposition which the opposition never made use of. We had the hon. member for West York (Mr. Campbell), in a long argument, trying to show the benefit of transportation and cheap railway freight rates, saying, amongst other things, that the difference between Canadian and American railway rates would pay the duty. He tried to make it appear that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House had been saying that we did not want cheap freight rates, and did not want transportation. There has never been any hon. gentleman on this side of the House so absolutely forgetful of his duty to the country as to say anything of the kind. As we have said, and as we must apparently say, over and over again, in order to get it hammered into the heads of hon. gentlemen opposite, transportation and cheap freight rates are better controlled with a road owned by the people, so that they need not have to ask a railway company for any favours or go to law with them. Then the hon. member for West York gave us an instance of the duties that were going to be saved upon various commodities. He said that the freight rates charged by American roads were so much lower than those charged by Canadian roads that the difference in freight rates would pay the duty at the American frontier when shipping it over these roads. He did not tell us what duty on American garden stuff would be saved. He did not tell us how much the freight is on produce of that character which they bring in here. He did not tell us for instance, that if he were going to build a hothouse in West York, he would pay nine-tenths of the cost and I would pay one-tenth of the cost, and that he would then hand it over to me for fifty years for nothing. But he is probably going to vote for the amendment of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition or, at least, support it in the country. He got elected two or three years ago as an advocate of a duty on American garden stuff, and he told the people of West York, as we all know that they had better elect him rather than a member of the opposition, because he would be on the government side and have influence which would enable him to secure the imposition of a duty on American garden stuff. Then, when the hon. gentleman got into the House, he voted against such a proposition, and he is going to vote against this resolution, I have no doubt, but, judging from his political rule of doing business, he is going to support it in the country. I think we can count on him before the next general election in the country saying: Of course, although I voted against the amendment in the House, I am really in favour of it. Now, he also said that there was a great advantage in the scheme which the government have placed before the House. Perhaps I had better use his own language at the risk of wearying the House for a minute. It is to be found in 'Hansard,' and I want to read it because it is unique, and because I do not want to make any misquotation. I want to be very careful to quote the exact language that he used. The hon. gentleman, speaking in support of this proposition, said:

> So if we complete the road, counting interest during the construction, the cost will be, in round numbers, $60,000,000.

That is the road from Moncton to Winnipeg.

But for that money we own the road, it is our road, and will remain the people's road for all time to come.

That is one of the advantages which he said would result from the expenditure of this large sum of money. We would own that part of the road for all the years to come. He could not see apparently that that very feature he thought an advantage, that great reason for expending $60,000,000, was the very reason that led my hon. friend the leader of the opposition to say: You should apply that principle to the whole $150,000,000, and you should not undertake to build a road unless you do own it. The difference is that the hon. member for West York and the hon. Solicitor General are both content with nominal ownership, with the name of being the owners while the company may operate the line for fifty years, while my hon. friend the leader of the opposition says: We want to actually and practically own the road and get the benefit from it, and not tie it up for fifty years in the possession of the company, who get the benefit of it instead of the people of Canada. The hon. member for West York says also in his speech, and I will read again from 'Hansard':

Then on the prairie section of about 1,000 miles, we guarantee three-fourths of the cost, not exceeding $13,000 per mile. If the road costs less than $17,000 a mile or thereabouts, we will have to pay less. But this is simply endorsing their notes, it will not cost the people of this country a dollar, we will never be called upon to pay a cent of that endorsement. Everybody admits that that portion of the road will pay well, and we simply endorse their notes, therefore we do not run any risk there.

No risk in endorsing notes: I wish that the hon. member for West York (Mr. Campbell) would come to St. Catharines and explain to the bank manager there that when I am asked to endorse the notes of constituents, I run no risk, and guarantee that the bank will never call upon me to pay the notes which I endorse. Here is a business man, dealing with an important business transaction in this House in which, not his own money, but the money of the country is involved, and he states that there is no risk in endorsing a note, and he expects the people of Canada to believe that, and to think that he voted properly when he voted on that phase of the question. I wish to point out that the argument of the hon. gentleman has nothing to do with the case, when he says that the building of this road or of any other road will increase the population and increase land values along the route. This is put forward in all seriousness as a reason for the building of this road that we are not businesslike if we do not allow it to go through, because if it is built, we will get back in actual value and in the increase in the value of land along the route more than the cost of construction. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Campbell) spoke of that as follows:—

So I say that the cost of this road will not be such a burden upon the people as to make us shudder at it. In fact, as I said before, I believe that every single dollar this road will cost, will be paid back to the country ten times over in the added wealth along this line.

There is the business proposition. You should vote for this because, although it will cost all these millions, you will get a benefit that will make it up to you. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Campbell) does not stop to think that you would get just the same benefit if the government built the road and owned it instead of making a present of it to the Grand Trunk Pacific. Then we are told that we need not be alarmed in regard to the long haul as against the short haul, that the patriotism of the people of the west will ensure their routing their grain by the long haul to Halifax, and not by the short haul to Portland. I have no doubt that the people of the west will do that so far as they can, but they are not the engineers, conductors, train despatchers and traffic superintendents of the Grand Trunk Pacific. They ask that grain be routed by Canadian ports, but if they forget to ask it or if the agent disputes as to whether they did ask to have it routed a certain way, is that a good answer to the proposition of a business man that you should own the road yourself, in order that you would be able to insist that the grain went over your own line to your own ports. How much better and more practicable that arrangement would be and how much easier of operation. The Grand Trunk Pacific will apparently be required to preserve evidence in connection with every shipment in case of dispute in the courts as to how every individual in the Northwest routed his freight. They will apparently be liable at any time to have fault found with them for taking grain to Portland. But of course a western shipper of grain or cattle cannot be expected to go to law with the Grand Trunk Pacific in regard to any shipment of that kind. Why should not the government own the road so that they can ensure the shipment of western produce by Canadian ports. The hon. the Solicitor General (Mr. Lemieux) enlightened us last night in regard to these matters, and I wish to show the House and the people that that hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux) is really in favour of our scheme although he has not made up his mind to say so. He said yesterday:

The government will hold the eastern section of the railway from Winnipeg to Quebec. Why? Because Winnipeg will be for all future time the great converging point of the west, a converging point of the main arteries where all the shipments will pass. And, by owning the eastern section from Winnipeg to maritime ports the government will secure trade for our ports and will make it certain that Canadian trade will go to Canadian ports. If the government had decided to help towards the construction of this road in the old fashion they would have granted subsidies in land and cash, and, after all had been given and spent the government would have no control over the line.

I would like to ask the Solicitor General (Mr. Lemieux) how much control they have over this line under the recent agreement for the next 50 years. Is that not the strongest argument in the world for actual, practical government ownership ? That is something for which there is immediate need ; time will not wait, we cannot afford to delay this matter. The people of Canada are suffering and because they are suffering, the Grand Trunk is apparently to have the benefit. But the hon. the Solicitor General (Mr. Lemieux), although he pointed out that it would be a great advantage to own the eastern section, did not apparently realize how much greater an advantage it would be to own the whole line and to own it now, not at the end of 50 years. This is the argument the Solicitor General (Mr. Lemieux) advanced in regard to the eastern line, but if he applies that doctrine to the whole scheme he will find that he has done his duty to his constituents, and to the government, as a young member of the government in close touch with the people, and consequently in a position to report to them that this amendment of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) is the right one, and make the government adopt it, and that politics should be left out of this matter in order that the greatest benefit may be secured to the people of Canada.

The hon. the Solicitor General (Mr. Lemieux) says later on that they made a compromise. Now, if I was in favour of government ownership, I would not want to make a compromise particularly where the other fellow gets all the benefit. He continued :

> But, Sir, the government has adopted the wise course of refusing a land grant. We are often told by hon. gentlemen on the other side that the Liberal party is a party of broken pledges. Well, here is a pledge which was taken by the Liberal party in 1893, a pledge which was taken by the Liberal party in the House of Commons from 1878 to 1896 that in future, no land grants should be given to railway companies, especially in the Northwest. Well, in the present instance, the government has kept the pledge and I am surprised to see that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House do not applaud, do not encourage the government to keep on——

I congratulate him on finding a pledge which the government has kept. It is difficult hunting to find such a pledge but he has discovered this one ; the Liberal party made a pledge in 1893, and they have kept it. Let us see how much credit they are entitled to for the keeping of that pledge. They pledged themselves that they would not give land grants for railways, and now they give $150,000,000 of the people's money instead. That is about as good a way to keep a pledge, as you can expect from this government. They did not give a land grant, which might be worth at the outside $40,000,000 or $50,000,000, but they gave three times as much of the people's money, perhaps not in cash, but by incurring liabilities which they will some day have to pay. That seems to be satisfactory to the Solicitor General, and it makes his outlook apparently very bright that he is able to claim that in that way the government have got out of the rut of being always accused of breaking their pledges. He has also told us what I was sorry to hear him say, as a member of the legal profession, and able and eloquent as he is, that there was no Conservative party in the province of Quebec. Well, I would like to point out to the hon. gentleman that people in glass houses should not throw stones, for I do not think there has been a Liberal party in the Dominion of Canada since 1896.

Mr. CLARKE. Part of it is in the Senate.

Mr. LANCASTER. There may be a part of it there, and perhaps the most active part of it. But we ought not to be troubled about Quebec, Ontario, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Manitoba, the Northwest Territories or British Columbia in this parliament. We are working for the people of Canada from Halifax to Vancouver. This is the way the hon. leader of the opposition deals with the fiscal question, as with every other question ; he says the same thing in one part of the country as he does in another. I want to tell the Solicitor General that there is a Conservative party in Canada, and there always will be. From what I can see, there is a very large and active Conservative party in the province of Quebec, and I have no doubt that he will find it more active than he wants it to be as soon as the government give the people a chance to say what they think of this matter.

Now, I have just one word more to say. I am going to do what I have done before, hopelessly perhaps, but still I think it my duty to keep on doing it. I am going to appeal to this government, humble member as I am—for I know a little about the feeling of my own constituency, and I have no doubt that it is the same in the rest of this Dominion—I am going to appeal to them to do something in the interest of Canada, and not to be troubled about party exigencies. I am going to ask them if they do not think that the cost of this scheme of theirs to the people of Canada will not have the effect of dismissing them from office. I am going to ask them not to put upon the people of Canada the necessity of being defendants in a suit for breach of contract in the Exchequer Court. The Grand Trunk Pacific Company said to them : We are not satisfied with the contract which was made last year ; now give us a better one ; true, it is against the interests of the people of Canada ; but give it before you go to the country, because if you do not, you cannot give it afterwards. I appeal to this government not to put the people of Canada in the position of being defendants in an action for breach of contract, because I tell them that if they pass this measure, then after the next election when the leader of the opposition comes back and forms a cabinet, the first thing he will do will be to repudiate that contract, because the people will have put him in power to do so; and as soon as that is done, we may have to pay $50,000 or $100,000 of damages to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company for breaking that contract. I am quite sure that the people of this country would much rather have to pay out of the exchequer the damages which the Grand Trunk Pacific Company could prove they had sustained by making surveys and by the disappointment they had suffered, than the greater evil of this bad bargain which the government are attempting to put upon them. Because as soon as the people get the chance to show what their mandate is, there is no doubt that their mandate will be to cancel the contract, even if they have to pay $50,000 or $100,000 to do it rather than $150,000,000 in return for which they get nothing. I do not think it is necessary or wise that I should detain the House any longer. I have said in a hurried way what I have had to say on this matter. I think we have calmly to consider this question as a business proposition; not voting for it because the Grand Trunk Company want it or because the premier happens to have asked us to do so—because the premier of this country may make mistakes, and the people are not going to let their representatives support him in those mistakes. The people of the Dominion of Canada expect the premier, no matter whether he be Liberal or Conservative in politics, to serve the interests of the people and to see that the assets and property of this Dominion are not wasted, as this resolution would waste them.

Mr. H. J. LOGAN. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Cowan), I desire to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Fielding, House adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

QUESTIONS.

HAY LAKE CHANNEL.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES—by Mr. Taylor—asked :

Mr. LANCASTER.

1. Is the government aware that the main navigable channel between St. Joseph island and Sault Ste. Marie is now through United States territory, via the Hay lake channel ?

2. What is the lowest draught of water via the Hay lake boundary channel ?

3. What is the lowest draught of water via the Hay lake channel ?

4. Is the government aware that by the dredging of the Hay lake channel the water has been lowered two feet at the foot of the locks at Sault Ste. Marie ?

5. Is the government aware that the international boundary channel is lowered by two feet in depth by the same cause ?

6. Has the government arranged, through the British government, with the United States for the right of navigation of the Hay lake channel for Canadian or British vessels, carrying contraband of war in time of war ?

7. Has the government an estimate of the cost of deepening the international channel to the depth of twenty-one feet ?

8. Will the government endeavour to secure by treaty right the free navigation of the Hay lake channel for vessels carrying contraband of war in time of war ?

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Minister of Railways and Canals). In answer to the inquiry I would say that the government does not deem it in the public interest to answer questions Nos. 1, 2, 6 and 8. As to question No. 3 the answer is 15 feet ; 4. No ; 5. No ; 7. No.

Mr. HACKETT asked :

1. What is the date of the latest report of the engineer with regard to closing the inlet at Cascumpec harbour, Prince county, Prince Edward Island ?

2. Has any correspondence taken place between James S. Gordon, Alberton, P.E.I., and the Department of Public Works, in connection with this work ?

3. If any corespondence has taken place, what is the purport of it, and will it be laid on the table of this House ?

4. What amount of money has been expended on this work to date ?

5. What is the name of the foreman, or foremen, employed on the work since it commenced; and the amounts paid to each respectively ?

6. What were the wages paid per diem to the foreman and labourers ?

7. How much has been paid for brush, and the price per load for same ?

8. Has the work so far proved satisfactory ; and is it the intention of the government to proceed with it ?

9. Has any engineer reported that the closing of this inlet would increase the depth of water on the bar at Cascumpec harbour ?

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister) :

1. 1st September, 1903.
2. None on file in department.
3. See above.
4. $1,904.76.
5. Conductor of work, John Kinch ; paid to date, $222.
6. Conductor, $2.50 per day ; carpenter, $1.25 per day ; teamsters, $1.50 per day ; labourers (in summer), $1.50 per day; labourers (in winter), $1 per day.

7. 708 loads (cut) at 60 cents, $424.80; 76 loads (standing) at 15 cents, $11.40; 121 loads (standing) at 12 cents, $14.52; total, $450.72.

8. Yes. The continuation of the work is under consideration.

9. The engineer reported that work was necessary to prevent decrease of depth in main entrance.

WINTER NAVIGATION OF LAKE SUPERIOR AND GEORGIAN BAY.

Mr. SPROULE asked:

1. Is it the intention of the government to engage or build an ice-breaker to test the winter navigability of Lake Superior and Georgian Bay? If so, when?

2. Will any effort be made this spring to break the ice in these harbours, and at Sault Ste. Marie, so as to prepare for navigating those waters at the earliest possible date?

Hon. R. PREFONTAINE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries):

1. This matter is at present under consideration.

2. No, because the government has no vessel available.

CENSUS—PRODUCTION BY INDUSTRIES.

Mr. SPROULE asked:

When will the census bulletin, containing the statistics of the manufacturing industries of the country, be ready for distribution?

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER (Minister of Agriculture). No bulletin on manufactures has been issued by the census office, but a statement of production by industries was given to the press on the 25th January, 1904. All the compilations and tables were completed in December, 1903, and the King's Printer has promised to have the statistics ready for distribution by the 1st of July next.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC—APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSION.

Mr. SPROULE asked:

1. Has the commission which the government announced last year was to be appointed to build the eastern division of the Transcontinental Railway, been appointed?

2. If so, who compose it, and when will they commence their duties?

3. If not appointed, who are to be the members of it, and when will the appointments be made?

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). The commissioners have not been appointed. They will be appointed probably at some early date after the question now before the House has been disposed of. As to question No. 3. I am afraid I cannot satisfy the curiosity of my hon. friend today.

Mr. SPROULE. There does not seem to be as much urgency now as there was last year.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILWAY. STRAIGHTENING LINE AT CURTIS CREEK.

Mr. LEFURGEY asked:

1. Were tenders received for straightening the railway at Curtis Creek, Prince Edward Island?

2. If so, who were the tenderers, and what was the amount of each tender?

3. On what date were tenders to be in, and were all tenders in on the appointed date; and if not, who were the tenderers after, and what were the dates on which these tenders were received?

4. Has the contract been awarded? If so, to whom, and what was the amount of the contract?

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Minister of Railways and Canals):

1. Yes.

2. Jas. W. McDonald, Willard Kitchen, Robt. P. P. Fraser, and Thos. Campbell were the tenderers. The tenders are on schedule rates and the amount of contract depends on the amount of each class of work executed.

3. The tenders were received up to March 15, 1904. All the tenders were in on that date, and no tenders were received after that date.

4. Yes, Mr. Willard Kitchen being the lowest tenderer according to schedule, was awarded the contract.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILWAY—MURRAY HARBOUR BRANCH.

Mr. LEFURGEY asked:

1. What was the estimated cost of the first eleven miles of the Murray Harbour branch of the Prince Edward Island Railway from Southport east?

2. (a) Were tenders received for same; (b) what were the names of tenderers, and the amount of each; (c) what was the name of the tenderer whose tender was accepted, and the amount of same?

3. (a) Is this first eleven miles completed; (b) if so, what was the cost of same; (c) if not, why not, and what is the cost of same to date?

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Minister of Railways and Canals):

1. The estimated cost of the first 11 miles of Murray Harbour Branch of the Prince Edward Island Railway from Southport east was $45,628.93.

2 (a). Yes, tenders were received.

(b). Geo. E. Full, Willard Kitchen, John W. McManus, J. B. McManus and Thos. Campbell were the tenderers. The tenders are on schedule rates and the amount of contract depends on the amount of each class of work executed.

(c). John W. McManus, being the lowest tenderer according to schedule, was awarded the contract, but on account of ill-health and inability to give the work his personal attention, and on that account only, he made application to the department to be relieved of his contract. His application was granted, and the contract was awarded to the next lowest tenderer according to schedule, viz. : —Mr. Williard Kitchen.

3. (a). No, it is not yet completed.

(b). Answered by question in subsection a.

(c). Track laying was commenced and carried on from Murray River and was only completed to Southport late in the season of 1903, therefore, work depending on track such as ballasting and widening dumps, &c., yet remains to be done. The account of cost of these 11 miles was not kept separate from the rest of the branch.

SWINDLING OF IMMIGRANTS.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES—by Mr. Taylor—asked :

1. Has the government any data showing that immigrants to Canada have been swindled by 'confidence men' and 'sharpers' ?

2. What precautions are taken by the government to ensure that immigrants en route to Canada, and passing through to their destination, are protected from such 'confidence men' ?

3. Are Canadian government officers in uniform upon all steamers and trains, to assist, instruct and direct immigrants?

4. Are government detectives in civilian clothes upon the steamers and trains, to arrest those swindling, or attempting to swindle, the immigrants ?

5. Do government officials permit persons to pass among the immigrants en route, making contracts with them, taking deposits for the carrying out of the said contracts ; and in general diverting them from taking up homesteads, as originally intended ?

Hon. CLIFFORD SIFTON (Minister of the Interior) :

1. The government has record of only one such case. This occurred in Montreal in 1901, and the swindler, one Emile Desjardins, was promptly arrested and punished for his crime.

2. The officials of the Immigration Department are specially alert to protect immigrants from 'confidence men,' and they are aided in this also by the police. Official money changers are employed at the seaports, and the values of foreign moneys are posted up conspicuously in the immigration halls, printed in varions foreign languages.

3. Canadian government officers in uniform are at the ports of landing and upon all immigration trains, as well as at the important receiving points in the west, to assist, instruct and direct immigrants, but such officers are not regularly employed on ocean steamers.

4. No.

5. No.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called I would like to say a few words in regard to your ruling yesterday upon the point of order which was raised and if necessary I will conclude my remarks with a motion. Let me say at once, that if the view that I entertain on the subject be correct, I do not at all impute any error into which you may have fallen, Sir, by way of reproach to you ; because I know that even the courts of our land after long consideration of points of law, sometimes are found to be incorrect by a higher tribunal. To expect that the Speaker of this House should always be right when he is called upon, as he was yesterday, to decide a question of order on the spur of the moment, is to expect too much ; and I am only bringing the matter to the attention of the House in order that we may follow what I believe to be the correct practice.

The point of order which was raised yesterday, was, whether or not after a motion to adjourn has been withdrawn, another motion to the same effect could be put to the House without any intervening business having occurred. The business which must intervene, is of course some business which is entered upon the journals ; the journals being the record of the actual business which is transacted by the House. Although there may have been a debate, and although there may have been questions asked after a motion to adjourn, if that motion has been negatived it is not competent to submit another motion to adjourn unless in the meantime something has transpired which is entered on the journals of the House. That is what I understand the practice to be. There is no difference of opinion on that, but the point that I desire to raise is : That when a motion to adjourn has been withdrawn, the situation before the House is exactly the same as if the motion has not been made. I will put an analogy for the purpose of explaining my position with regard to that. There is a well-known rule of the House, that if any resolution has been proposed to the House and has been negatived, it cannot be proposed to the House again during the same session; but it is an equally well-known rule of the House, that if a motion of that kind is withdrawn, it can be reintroduced during the same session. It seems to me that the same rule would prevail with regard to a motion to adjourn. You can submit again a resolution which has been once negatived, during that session, but you must do it at another session when something has intervened; namely, prorogation. If you put your motion to adjourn you cannot put another until some intervening business has occurred. The House having once pronounced its judgment on a motion to adjourn, it must transact some other business, because if it did not, the only question which could be put to the House is one which has been already decided. But it seems to me, that when a motion proposed to the House has been withdrawn with the consent of the House, the situation is entirely different, for the very simple reason that in such case the judgment of the House has never been pronounced upon the motion, and therefore it may be renewed. I submit, in support of what I conceive to be the correct rule, the authority to be found in May's Parliamentary Practice at page 268 which says :

When a motion for adjournment has been negatived it may not be proposed again without some new proceeding. Hence arises the practice of moving alternatively : That this House do now adjourn ; and, 'That the debate be now adjourned.'

It will be observed that May distinctly says this rule prevails when a motion for adjournment has been negatived and he confines it to that. I, of course, am aware of the formal rule of our own House which was referred to by my right hon. friend yesterday, and which is number 30:

A motion to adjourn shall be always in order, but no second motion to the same effect shall be made until after some intermediate proceeding shall have been had.

In support of my proposition that when a motion has been made and has been withdrawn the situation is the same as if the motion had not been made, I will ask you Mr. Speaker to refer to page 289 of May's Parliamentary Practice.

As a motion which has been withdrawn or has not been seconded has not been submitted to the judgment of the House, the motion may therefore be repeated.

That is precisely what occurred yesterday, and that was the point of order which you, Sir, ruled upon. It seems to be perfectly clear, that if a motion to adjourn were made and not seconded, it would have no effect. And, if a motion to adjourn is made and seconded but is withdrawn, it is in the same category. It has not been submitted to the judgment of the House, and therefore it seems to me it is within the rule which is laid down by May on page 289. I trust, that you, Mr. Speaker, will fully understand that I am bringing this to the attention of the House, not with any desire to criticise your judgment at all, but simply for the purpose of having you take the matter into consideration, and if you think it desirable, to let us know whether or not the rule, which I have supported by the authorities I have referred to, is the practice which should be followed in this House.

I desire now, before sitting down, to say a word about the matter to which I referred yesterday, namely, as to the propriety of the government declining to answer the question which was put by my hon. friend (Mr. Casgrain) on Monday last. The question, as I said, related to the appointment of members of this House to positions of emolument under the Crown. In answer to this the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) said simply that all the information sought for in this question is already to be found in the public documents. Let me repeat what I said yesterday that the government could evade answering at least 50 per cent of the questions asked in this House if that course could be adopted on all occasions. It may not be convenient for the government to answer the questions in the way proposed by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain), but that affords no excuse for the treatment which this question received at the hands of the government. Members of the House are entitled to receive information which is contained in public documents and to have that information presented to them in tabulated form. The information may be scattered over 30 or 40 documents and it is proper that it should be collected by officers of the government and placed before this House either by bringing down copies of documents moved for in a motion for a return or by answering a question. I once more submit to my hon. friend that this mode of dealing with this question is not a fair one and not a respectful one to this House, or one that should be persevered in in the future. I have not had time to go over the questions asked in this House during the past session, but I have had some of them brought to my attention. One question that was answered this session by the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) might have received precisely the same answer as has been given by my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), if this was a proper course for the government to adopt. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) says that the government must have some discretion. The government must have discretion along certain lines. The Minister of Railways and Canals gave an illustration of that to-day when he said a certain question would not be answered because it was not in the public interest to answer it. No one disputes the right of the government to take that position and in taking it the government are responsible, but it is not on grounds of that character or on the basis of any authority vested in the government that my right hon. friend refused to answer the question under discussion. He refused to answer it simply because he thought that the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) knew everything referred to in the question. My right hon. friend has no right to assume that Mr. Casgrain possesses that information. It is the duty of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to treat any question couched in proper terms by any hon. member of this House as a bona fide question. This question was couched in respectful terms and conformed in every way with the procedure of the House. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) says that the answer could be found in public documents. That is no answer as I have shown. He contends in the next place that the question is not a bona fide one. I say that is not a proper attitude for my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to take because it is his duty to assume that my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Casgrain) was acting bona fide in asking this question, and in that view he was entitled to an answer. I therefore beg to move that the House do now adjourn.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). Mr. Speaker, with reference to the first question which my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) has brought to your attention, that is the point of procedure involved in the ruling we had yesterday upon the question whether a second motion to adjourn can be made after a motion to adjourn has been made and withdrawn, I submit to my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) and to you, Sir, that my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) has not rightly apprehended the spirit of the rule, which is the reason for its establishment. When the Orders of the Day are called it is the privilege of any member to call the attention of the House to some question to which an immediate answer may be required. This is done without moving the adjournment of the House at all, but if the subject is one which is likely to lead to debate, if it is more than a question, and if the member who raises it wishes to make remarks upon it, then he has the privilege of moving the adjournment for the very purpose of eliciting the information which he desires. The spirit of the rule is that such a motion should not be made except in cases of emergency in which celerity is essential. I have not the authority under my hand but I am satisfied that if May is searched it will be found that in England it was considered an abuse of the privilege of the House to resort to a motion of adjournment unless the matter was one which required celerity, and could not be reached on the order paper. The rule of the House in England in that respect has been altered and now no motion to adjourn for the purpose of getting information from the government can be moved unless the member who intends to put it gets the support of a certain number of members—I think 40—and has previously notified the Speaker—that he intends to bring up such a question. We have not adopted that rule; we still hold to the old English rule that any member, when the Orders of the Day are called, may move the adjournment to start a debate which, but for that motion, could not be reached on the order paper. But this privilege has been abridged by another rule, which is that when such motion has been made and disposed of, another motion to the same effect cannot be made. The reason for that is obvious. If it were permitted to any member of the House to move the adjournment and then after the disposal of that motion to move it again, and so on, the business of the House could be so interrupted as to prevent it being carried on.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Does my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) say that our rule is an abridgment of the former British practice?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It is the former English practice.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I agree in that.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Then I call my hon. friend's attention to the rule which prevailed in England before the adoption of the last rule. It is to this effect:

A motion to adjourn shall be always in order.

That is the old English rule which prevails with us.

A motion to adjourn shall be always in order, but no second motion to the same effect shall be made until after some intermediate proceedings shall have been had.

'Shall be made' it does not say until it is negatived or confirmed, but shall be made and disposed of. There is more than one way of disposing of a motion. It can be affirmed or negatived or it can be withdrawn but whether it be withdrawn by the voluntary consent of the House—any member can oppose the withdrawal—or whether it be affirmed or negatived what difference does it make in the name of common sense, as to the rule itself? The object of the rule is simply to permit a member to bring up a question that otherwise he could not bring up. Yesterday the member, after obtaining the information, withdrew his motion and I submit that this disposal of it is as effective for all practical purposes as if it had been negatived, and where it has been done in this way it certainly is not open to any other member to move another motion to adjourn because if this were allowed it could be done ad infinitum and the business of the House would be prevented.

A motion to adjourn shall be always in order, but no second motion to the same effect shall be made.

Now here is what I read in the journals of this House in regard to what took place yesterday.

Mr. Monet moved, that the House do now adjourn; which motion was, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

Does that not dispose of that motion just as if it were negatived? What difference does it make, after the information which the hon. gentleman desires has been obtained, whether the division of the House was taken or whether the motion was withdrawn after the information was obtained. He has obtained his point and that ends the matter. Under the circumstances which occurred yesterday, would not the spirit of the rule have been infringed had you permitted a motion to adjourn to be moved, when no proceeding of the House had intervened? The motion to adjourn had been effectively disposed of, no other business had been taken up, and consequently your ruling, Mr. Speaker, I submit, was quite correct. I have not had an opportunity of going over the precedents, and I do not know that you could find one exactly in line, but it seems to me that your decision was a perfectly reasonable interpretation of the rule.

I come now to another point brought to our attention by my hon. friend, and that is with regard to the character of the answer which I gave to a question put by my hon. friend from Montmorency a few days ago. I quite agree that the government should give all information sought for by members of the House, which they cannot obtain effectively or expeditiously except by means of a question or motion. Every day we give information to the hon. members which they might find out for themselves by consulting the blue-books, but we do this for the sake of convenience, and not because we are bound to do it. We do it to expedite the business of the House, and save hon. members the labour of making researches themselves. Sometimes we find a motion made for some such reason, certainly not with the view of obtaining information, because everybody is familiar with the facts on which the information is apparently sought. I think then that the answer we gave was given exactly in the spirit in which my hon. friend's motion was conceived. We paid my hon. friend the compliment of following the example he set us, but it is one which I cannot say I will always be prepared to pay him. I thought that I was extremely courteous to my hon. friend in answering as I did. If I had thought that my hon. friend was in the darkness of ignorance on the subject concerning which he put his question, I would have given him the information he required, but I must say that I was under the impression that he was thoroughly in the light on that subject. I thought that he had been a student of past events sufficiently to know whether the gentlemen he named had been appointed to office or not, or whether they had been members of parliament or not. But if my hon. friend was ignorant on these points, I must apologize to him.

Mr. T. CHASE CASGRAIN (Montmorency). On March the 17th I put the following question to the government:

How many members of the House of Commons of Canada have been named to the position of lieutenant governor of any of the provinces of the Dominion since the 1st of August, 1896?

This question was followed by another, asking how many members of the House of Commons had been appointed to judgeships and senatorships and other positions of emolument under the Crown. My hon. friend then said:

I would ask my hon. friend, so far as this question, and also questions 4, 5 and 6 are concerned, to move for a return.

When my right hon. friend asked me to move for a return, I thought it more convenient to go to the records myself and make a list. I did this and then put the following question on April the 11th:

1. Have the following persons been appointed to positions, at the salaries named, since July, 1896, as follows:—Francis G. Forbes, sub-collector of customs, $120; Joseph Lavergne, judge, Superior Court, Quebec, $5,000; C. R. Devlin, emigration agent to Ireland, $2,000; François Langelier, judge, Superior Court, Quebec, $5,000; M. C. Cameron, lieutenant governor, $7,000; J. F. Lister, judge, Court of Appeals, Ontario, $5,000; P. A. Choquette, judge, Superior Court, Quebec, $4,000; C. I. Rinfret, district inspector of inland revenue, Quebec, $2,500; C. A. Beausoleil, postmaster, Montreal, $4,000; M. E. Bernier, member of the board of railway commissioners, $8,000; A. G. Blair, chairman of the board of railway commissioners, $10,000; B. M. Britton, judge of the High Court of Judicature, Ontario, $5,000; H. G. Carroll, judge of the Superior Court, Quebec, $3,500; Sir Louis Davies, judge, Supreme Court, Canada, $7,000; O. Desmarais, judge, Superior Court, Quebec, $4,000; T. B. Flint, Clerk of the House of Commons, $3,400; T. Fortin, judge of the Superior Court, Quebec, $4,000; D. C. Fraser, judge of the Supreme Court, Nova Scotia, $4,000; J. A. C. Madore, judge of the Superior Court, Quebec, $4,000; E. C. King, Senate; B. R. Fiset, Senate; John Yeo, Senate; A. M. Dechêne, Senate; W. C. Edwards, Senate; J. Godbout, Senate; J. H. Legris, Senate?

This list is not complete, and that is one of the reasons why I put the question. Of course, I had a perfect right, and it was probably my duty, to look through the public records and find out for myself what members of the House had been appointed to positions of emolument under the Crown, but I desired to obtain authentic information from the government on that point, and the fact that I made a mistake and gave an incomplete list in my question shows that in asking the government for the information, I was doing what in the public interest I was entitled to do. I have just named 26 gentlemen who were appointed, but I find that there were more than 26, I find that there were 29, and probably 30. For instance, Mr. Bechard and Mr. Edwards were appointed to the Senate, Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière was appointed Lieutenant-Governor at a salary of $7,000, and I believe there were two other appointments of a similar character made. This shows that I was perfectly within my right as a member of the House in asking from the government authentic information on this point. This is a serious question. It is all the more serious when one goes back to the records of the House, to find what were the principles expounded by these hon. gentlemen opposite when in opposition. We all know that time and again they attacked the administration of the day for having appointed members of parliament to positions of emolument under the Crown. Not only did they attack the government of the day for this, but one of the hon. gentlemen now sitting on the treasury benches went so far as to introduce a Bill dealing with this abuse. On referring to the debates of the House for 1895, I find it recorded that Mr. Mulock moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 111 to better secure the independence of parliament. Mr. Foster asked from the government benches, what were the principles of the Bill, and I shall read what my hon friend said when he introduced that measure, and his reply will show that the question I put on the order paper was not only a proper question, but one which should be put, when we consider the principles which were laid down by my hon. friends on the other side. Mr. Mulock thus explained his Bill, and I believe that the Mr. Mulock, whose remarks I am about to quote, is the hon. gentleman who now sits on the treasury benches as Postmaster General. I believe that he is the same person, although you would not think so if you contrast his record since he has been a member of this government with what he said on this occasion, the 7th of June, 1895. He then said :

> The object of the Bill is to accomplish what its title indicates—further to secure the independence of parliament.
> It has been the constant effort of parliamentarians in Canada to secure on the floor of parliament the free unbiassed expression of the will of the people and from time to time legislators have directed their attention to the removal of all obstacles in the way of the accomplishment of so desirable an end. Our predecessors have from time to time, provided against biassing influences, as, for example, the presence of place-men in parliament. That is recognized now as a condition of affairs which would not be tolerated in a free parliament. There are a few exceptions to the Act respecting this House, but the general principle has been affirmed long years since, that members of parliament should not owe any divided allegiance ; the members of parliament should represent freely and fully the will of the people who sent him here and to speak inoffensively and yet, perhaps in an apt way to describe my view, he should not accept the shilling from any side of the House to the extent of being in any way hampered in the discharge of his duties or rendered at all otherwise than free to act as his best judgment dictates in dealing with all questions before the House. Now, it is impossible for one to shut his eyes to an abuse which has sprung up in the Canadian parliament more particularly in the House of Commons, an abuse that is far-reaching and is attended by more evils even than the one to which I particularly allude, but none equal in magnitude to the evil of menacing the independence of parliament itself. What I refer to is members of parliament and members of this House applying to the government of the day for positions in the gift of the Crown, positions of emolument, which if they were to accept would at once disqualify them from remaining members of this House. Why ? Because the moment they have entered the public service as civil servants, they would cease to be free, they would be servants of the government of the day, and, therefore, to that extent not untrammelled to represent their constituencies. Well, Sir, I would like to know if a man is more free who is an applicant for a position, or who has received the promise of a position from the government of the day as soon as it may suit them to appoint him. How many members are there in this House to-day in that position? There are a considerable number.

The PRIME MINISTER. Will my hon. friend (Mr. Casgrain) say who voted for and who voted against that bill ?

Mr. CASGRAIN. I am not speaking about that now.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh ! oh !

Mr. CASGRAIN. I will answer my right hon. friend. Hon. gentlemen opposite are not in power to do what we did; they were elected under the distinct pledge that they would do better than we did. They declared that this side of the House was doing wrong, that this side of the House was corrupt, that this side of the House was interfering with the independence of parliament, and that they would not do these things. And, what is their record in power ? The very things that they condemned in us in unmeasured terms, they themselves are doing, and worse than even they said we ever did. I say that my question was in order; it was an inoffensive question ; it was a question as to the policy of the government, as to what the government had done in the past, and what it intended to do in the future. My question was one that should have been answered by the government. What is the practice of this House on the subject ? It is explained in Bourinot's book in these words :

> A practice, however, has long prevailed in parliament, and is now established in the Senate and the House of Commons, of putting questions to the ministers of the Crown, concerning any measure pending in parliament, or other public matter, and of receiving the answers and explanations of the persons so interrogated.

This was a question upon a public matter, so much so that it formed the subject of debate in the House again and again, and was even made the subject of a Bill by the present Postmaster General (Sir William Mulock). Here is the formal rule of the House on the subject :

Questions may be put to ministers of the Crown relating to public affairs, and to other members relating to any Bill, motion, or other public matter connected with the business of the House, in which such members may be concerned ; but in putting any such question, no argument or opinion is to be offered, nor any facts stated, except so far as may be necessary to explain the same.

Was my question in order—yes, or no ?—under that rule ? Did the question contain argument or any expression of opinion ? Not at all. It was simply such a question as has been put in this House according to the rules time and again. The rule goes on :

And in answering any such question, a member is not to debate the matter to which the same refers.

If our rules allow a member to put such questions to the government, it is the bounden duty of the government to answer such questions. One is the corollary of the other. It would be absurd to say that questions might be put unless you say at the same time that those questions, when put, shall be answered.

Hon. L. P. BRODEUR (Minister of Inland Revenue). Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casgrain) say that a question could be renewed at the same session ?

Mr. CASGRAIN. No, Sir ; I do not say that, nor do I hold that opinion. I did not renew a question. But, if that is the reason for refusing to answer, why did not hon. gentlemen opposite raise that objection before ? That objection was not raised. These hon. gentlemen are trying to get out of the hole in which they find themselves, but they cannot do it. If there is anything in that objection, why did not my hon. friend (Mr. Brodeur), who was the distinguished Speaker of the House, raise that objection before ? That was not the reason. The reason was that which I have alleged—that the present Postmaster General had introduced this Bill, that hon. gentlemen opposite had made these declarations to which I have referred against interference by the government with the independence of parliament by appointing members of the House to offices of emolument under the Crown. Let me repeat the closing words of the passage of the speech I have just quoted. The present Postmaster General said :

How many members are there in this House to-day in that position ? There are a considerable number.

It is common talk to-day that there are members of this House who are expecting to be appointed Chief Justice of Nova Scotia. There are members of this House—and it is common talk, not only here, but everywhere in the province of Quebec—who are expecting to be appointed judge in the new district of Pontiac. So my question was a proper one. I wanted to put before the country the contradiction between the conduct of hon. gentlemen in opposition and their conduct now that they are on the government benches. And I wanted to warn them that it was clearly against the independence of parliament to have twenty-six or thirty members expecting positions of emolument under the Crown, to hold those offices dangling before the eyes of supporters of the government in this House while important questions were under discussion, in order to induce them to vote right upon these important questions. Sir, the question I put was a proper one, it is a question quite regular under the rules ; and the only reason why the hon. gentlemen did not answer it was because they were ashamed to answer it in view of their own conduct in interfering in this way with the independence of parliament.

Hon. Sir WM. MULOCK (Postmaster General). Mr. Speaker, I have to thank my hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) for the importance which he attributes to me in the councils of the Liberal party. I am not aware that the individual views of a member of the great Liberal party of Canada, until adopted by that party, are to be considered as the views of the party as a whole. It is true that, at a certain period of my political life, I occupied a seat on the opposition side. For many years I had seen certain abuses growing in this House. I had seen members of parliament notoriously chosen to fill positions of emolument under the Crown when their period of usefulness in this chamber was at an end, men who were hostile to the government on many measures, and yet whose views were stifled by the promise of place.

Mr. COCHRANE. Where is Blair ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane) asks me where Hon. Mr. Blair is. He is where I am perfectly sure my hon. friend from East Northumberland would extremely like to be. I say that for many years we had witnessed in this House the spectacle of half a dozen or, perhaps, a dozen members then supporting the government who had been chosen for appointment to office as soon as it suited the convenience of the government and the constituencies these gentlemen represented. If it had been the case of men appointed promptly from the ranks of supporters of the government, without their appointment being promised or dangled before their eyes, then the independence of parliament, perhaps, would not have been assailed. But such was very far from being the case. And during the session in which the Bill to which my hon. friend has referred was introduced there were—I hesitate to say how many members were known to be chosen for public office. All this was notorious in that year 1895, when the government had lost the confidence of the country, when it was known in their ranks that they could not survive another election, but would be left in opposition, to remain there for many a long year, as they will. At that time, Mr. Speaker, many of these gentlemen, now so virtuous, sought cover by looking for government appointment.

It was so notorious that no matter what dishonest, rotten measures the government of that day proposed, these men with offices in their pockets were the first to rise and support those measures, and they had agents going through the rank and file of the prominent men of the Conservative party of that day who were still without these promises, and whipping them into line. Sir, we have seen these men, like trick elephants going out to bring others into the same bondage; we have seen these men going out into the corridors, and lobbies, and elsewhere, to bring up to the scratch of voting through an unpopular measure, many members of the Conservative party who otherwise would not have been willing to face the music. The independence of parliament of Canada in 1895 was destroyed. There was no public opinion in 1895 in this House, the people of Canada were not represented by the majority in this House. Under these circumstances I introduced my measure. Mr. Speaker, what was the attitude of the Conservative party on that occasion? Not a single man of them supported that measure. I am sorry to say, Mr. Speaker, that it received no support from any part of the House, it did not appear to commend itself to the judgment of either the government of that day or of the opposition. Under these circumstances, seeing that there was no public opinion at the back of it that session, I abandoned it, nor did I renew it, either in 1896 or since. It was not a measure that seemed to commend itself to the judgment of the people of Canada. But, Sir, I would endorse any motion from the other side of the House declaring the impropriety of members of the House occupying seats in this House after they had been appointed to public positions. It is one thing for a member to ask for a position, and another thing for the government to promise it. Each member is responsible to himself in making the application, and the government is responsible for its conduct in making the appointment. Nothing can prevent a member asking, but the government can refuse. I say it is in my opinion most objectionable that any person should occupy a seat in parliament after he has received an appointment, or after there has been any understanding whatever that he shall be appointed to a position of emolument under the Crown. But the present government of which I am a member has never endorsed the view, or the principle set forth in the Bill which I had the honour to introduce under those unfortunate circumstances that disgraced Canada before 1895. For example, it is not the platform of the Liberal party any more than it is the platform of the Conservative party to-day, that the government should assume the ownership of railways. Why, Sir, we have the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) sitting next to the leader of the opposition and taking a diametrically opposite position to that of his leader on this great public question. The ex-Minister of Railways declared himself most emphatically opposed to the principle of government ownership. Is he to be written out of the Tory party? Where is his leader? His leader pretends to be in favour of government ownership as a principle of the Liberal-Conservative party throughout Canada.

Mr. COCHRANE. Don't try to draw a red herring across the trail.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. No, I am merely drawing an illustration. But as one swallow does not make a summer, so the views of one member of the government do not constitute the policy of a political party. I have presented my views, they did not commend themselves to parliament or to public opinion, and I no longer express these views. At the same time, I retain substantially the opinion that if a member desires an appointment, and if the government intimates to him that he is to get the appointment, that moment his position as a member of this House should cease.

Mr. COCHRANE. You have that opinion up your sleeve now.

Sir WILLAM MULOCK. I am merely giving my opinion. But I have this to say, that should it ever come to pass that the record of this government would be so bad as that of our predecessors, should it ever come to pass that the Liberal party supporting the government in this House should follow the bad example of their predecessors of 1895—

An hon. MEMBER. Impossible.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I know it is impossible; but suppose that such a condition of affairs should ever come to pass, then we could not but consent, I think, to pass legislation to check such an evil. The interests of this country have not suffered from any of these appointments. These appointments were those of worthy men, men deserving the confidence of the country, men deserving the high positions to which they have been raised, men who are adorning those positions, whose appointments were in the public interest, men eminently fit and proper for the positions; and none of those appointees, so far as I know, when in this House, had either been appointed or had the promises of appointment.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh! oh!

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I am not aware, Mr. Speaker, that any of them continued to occupy a seat in this House after they had received an assurance of appointment; and if that is the case, they were free and independent members of this House. It is the true independence of parliament that we seek, not to prevent worthy public men, who have served their country well in this House, from retiring to other positions, when perhaps they do not feel able to serve any longer in the political ranks, and perhaps are better qualified to serve the country in some other sphere. Meantime, Mr. Speaker, I will say that whatever my views are they have not received the endorsement of either the government side or the opposition side of this House, they are not the principles of any political party in Canada. Individuals may hold opinions not shared by their party; but I must submit that in the organization of political parties, at all events so far as the Liberal party is concerned, we have not yet reached that stage where the opinion of any one man dominates the minds of his colleagues; we have not reached that intolerant stage when our principles are not liberal and broad enough to allow divergence on large questions. I leave it to my hon. friends opposite to dispense with conferences, I leave it to them to dispense with caucuses, I leave it to them to dispense with interchanges of opinion, I leave it to them to abandon to their leader the right of choosing a policy for the party, whether they are consulted or not. We will see, when it comes to a vote on this railway question, men who have represented the most diverse views on the floor of this House, standing up one after another and voting for the crazy, patchwork scheme that the leader of the opposition has submitted, and which he calls the extension of the Intercolonial to British Columbia.

Mr. COCHRANE. Are you going to speak on that question ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Well, if I wished to kill time in this House I think I could speak on it. But I say, Mr. Speaker, that when it comes to voting on that question we will see hon. gentlemen on the other side who have expressed the most conflicting views upon it, stand up and record their votes in favour of the amendment of the leader of the opposition. Just to anticipate the future. I expect to see my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Railways voting for the amendment of the leader of the opposition, and sanctioning the interpretation of that amendment, which was made by the leader of the opposition, declaring in favour of government ownership of railways, although the ex-Minister of Railways has emphatically declared himself against it. But, Sir, on the government side we do not exact such blind concurrence in the government policy. We have received the sanction of the party for certain principles, those principles, or the most of them, have now been embalmed upon the statute-books of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

An hon. MEMBER. Cremated.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I will refer my hon. friends to the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) upon this subject. It is one more in his professional line than mine, but, so far as any of our uncompleted principles are concerned, we are here doing business at the old stand and prepared to give effect to them as soon as the circumstances make it wise to do so.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE. (East Grey). Mr. Speaker, the hon. Postmaster General (Sir William Mulock), on taking his seat, referred a certain question to the hon. member for East Grey and therefore I consider it in order to reply. In the first place the hon. gentleman says that the individual opinion of a single member of a party cannot be taken as the policy or principles of the party. He followed that up by admitting that although the motion was made by himself, he was not supported very strongly by his own friends in the House. He said that a motion might be made by an insignificant member of his party. Did he regard himself then as an insignificant member of his party ? Did he wish to make the country believe that he was an insignificant member of his party, and that he had enunciated a principle that was not accepted by his party or held to be a correct one ? As an argument to the contrary, I might mention that the same motion which the hon. member for North York then made and embalmed, as he said, in 'Hansard' as an expression of the principles of his party was read and quoted and commented all through the country as one of the burning principles of his party that would be lived up to and not departed from when they came to power. Have they lived up to it ?

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. SPROULE. Have they departed from it ? The hon. Postmaster General said, very truly, that it is embalmed. Yes, it is cremated like many of their other principles. The hon. gentleman said that the motion was made when the party in power had not the confidence of the country. It was during the session of 1895 that the motion was made. During that session several votes took place in this House, and while speaking from memory, I think I am correct in saying that the government of that day had the confidence of the House to the extent of a majority of 53 or 54. They had not lost the confidence of the House or of the country. I do not think the hon. gentleman could have spoken with deliberation upon that point. The hon. gentleman said: We are not following the bad principles of the Conservative party. What is the difference? My hon. friend beside me (Mr. Casgrain) read out the names of a number of members of parliament who have been appointed to positions of emolument under the Crown directly from this House. What was the complaint of the hon. member for North York in 1895? that it was a bad and pernicious principle and that it should not be tolerated and he embodied the principle which he set forth in a resolution which was submitted to this House in the shape of a Bill.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. Postmaster General says: We are not following the bad principle of our predecessors. Where is the difference between what the present government have done and what their predecessors did? It is only a matter of degree. It is exactly the same thing. What was the original complaint?—that members of parliament were being appointed by the government of the day to positions of emolument under the Crown. What is the complaint to-day?—that the same thing is being done. Where is the difference between the course of the previous government and that of the present government?—none at all except, that, whereas the previous government appointed a number of members of parliament to offices of emolument, the present government have appointed nearly three times the number; therefore, it is only a question of degree and to that extent the offence of the present government is very much greater than that of their predecessors. I think the hon. Postmaster General should be at least one in this House to mention that question, because, if there is anything embalmed in the records of 'Hansard' that is discreditable to both him and his party, it is their failure to adhere to the principles which they have enunciated. The hon. Postmaster General made another statement to the effect that no member of this House, after he had received an intimation from the government that he was about to be appointed to a position, sat in this House or voted. What did he think of Mr. Langelier who sat in the House after having written a letter to the Montreal 'Witness' declaring that he had been promised the office of Lieutenant Governor of Quebec by the right hon. Prime Minister, and that the promise was not carried out? Was that not a violation of this principle? That circumstance is in direct contradiction to the assertion of the hon. Postmaster General that there was no violation of the principle by any member of this House. I have only given one instance. I think I could name several others. It has become a burning scandal in public life, that so many members of parliament should be taken from the House and placed in positions of emolument under the Crown so recently after very acriminous debates have taken place in which they have taken part. For instance, the judge who is now a commissioner appointed to inquire into the the condition of affairs in the Yukon, took part in the discussion of the question and was afterwards appointed a judge. I say it is a scandal. As far as we know, he had an intimation that he would be appointed very shortly after the transaction took place which I have referred to.

But I want to refer to the question which is engaging our attention, and it is the latitude allowed to members of parliament to ask questions and the duty of the government to answer these questions. Why do we ask questions? We have the authority of Bourinot and of May for the statement that it is right and proper that we should ask questions and also that it is the duty of the government to answer them. We may ask questions about any public business, but we may go further than that and may ask for information regarding things that may be in public documents, but which may not be available at our hands at the time being for our needs and purposes. We ask these questions to get information in the possession of the government, and which may not be in our possession. This is one of the reasons why we ask them, we are justified in doing so and it is right and proper for the government to answer these questions. We ask questions so as to have certain information collated. Although it may be in the public documents and various other places if we took the time to hunt it up, we ask to have the information collated from the public documents and submitted, so that we may know it is official and that we have it correctly given. We ask these questions again, because, very often when we quote this information outside of this House, it is disputed by parties, it is said that it is not correct and we desire to have it with the imprimatur of the government upon it. We give it as my hon. friend (Mr. Casgrain) gave these names and we ask this question to ascertain as a matter of fact whether these parties have been appointed to positions of emolument under the Crown. Why? So that the government may say 'yes' or 'no,' and so that, if we use this information afterwards on the hustings, some reformer cannot get up and say it is not so. You come down to the fact that it is the answer given by the government. It is not only an allegation which was quoted, but it is a fact as far as it is stamped with the imprimatur of the government. Therefore, it cannot be denied.

The next point I want to refer to is this: How should these questions be answered? Bourinot says:

Such questions are printed among the notices and appear on the order paper in the place allotted to them under rule 19.

Further he says :

It is the duty of the clerk to point out any irregularity to the Speaker, and if the latter is of the same opinion he will order the clerk to communicate with the member, so that he may have an opportunity of amending his notice.

As no objection was taken to this question it was assumed that the question was correct. The rule says :

The answer to a question should be brief and distinct, and limited to such explanations as are absolutely necessary to make the reply intelligible.

That rule was not complied with by the Prime Minister. A question of fact was put by my hon. friend (Mr. Casgrain) to which the Prime Minister should have replied 'yea' or 'nay,' and given a straight answer. He chose not to do so ; he gave an indirect answer and one which contained no information whether succinct or otherwise. It would appear to me from what the Prime Minister said yesterday, that he does not understand the right of members of this House to get information. We ask questions for various reasons ; it is our duty to do so, and it is the duty of the government to give that information in a courteous manner. If there was any irregularity in the question put, attention should be called to it by the Speaker, but in this case Mr. Speaker apparently held that the question was regular, and so the government should have answered it. As to the question that when a motion for adjournment is withdrawn, the same motion cannot be made without intervening business ; the leader of the opposition has dealt fully with that question. The Prime Minister said that if that motion was not finally disposed of, you could repeat it ad infinitum ; but he must know that all that any member has to do is to dissent to the withdrawal of the motion, and then the Speaker must put it and declare whether it is carried or lost. That is what should be done, and so there is no point in the contention of the Prime Minister. The rule, that when a point of order is raised, any member has the right to debate it before the Speaker gives his ruling, is so common and so well understood, that I am sure, Mr. Speaker, on reflection you will recognize it. When I rose to speak to a point of order yesterday, I was interrupted several times ; but it must be understood in future that the rule is, that when an hon. member of this House addresses himself courteously to the chair, he has the right to the reasonable attention of the members of the House. I shall not speak further on that point.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART (South Lanark). I would not have spoken in this debate were it not for the reply which the Postmaster General was goaded into making by my hon. friend (Mr. Casgrain). In 1895, the Postmaster General introduced a measure into this House setting out the duties of a member of the government, and the duty of a member of parliament when he enters the cabinet, and as to what should bind his conscience. The Postmaster General that told us that it was imperative that when a member received a mandate from the people, place and position dangled before him should not act as a corrupt motive for his failing to carry out that mandate. It seems to me that the Postmaster General then held the view that if a man entered the cabinet he should take his publicly expressed views on questions of policy in with him, and he should convince his fellow ministers of them, or resign his portfolio. The Postmaster General states now, that there is no master mind dominating the members of the Liberal party, that they are able to follow the dictates of their conscience, and that in that respect they differ from the members of the opposition. Well, perhaps that is true as regards the Liberal members and ministers. It would appear that the ministers in this government can entertain any views they like, and modify them so as to suit the different parts of the country. The Postmaster General referred to me, and he asked how could I vote for the motion of the leader of the opposition which favoured government ownership of railways, when I was opposed to government ownership. Where did the Postmaster General get the idea that I was opposed to government ownership of railways ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. You said so.

Mr. HAGGART. The Postmaster General said that I made that statement in a speech in this House.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Yes.

Mr. HAGGART. I would like the Postmaster General to show me his authority.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I will get it for you.

Mr. HAGGART. If I remember aright, I was very careful and very guarded in any remarks I made in reference to that question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. What are your views now ?

Mr. HAGGART. I stated, that without committing myself to the support of government ownership, yet I believe that government ownership was preferable to the scheme proposed by the Prime Minister. I advocated that contention, but the Postmaster General cannot find in any speech I delivered this session, or prior to it, any statement that I was opposed to government ownership of railways. What I said was, that government ownership was preferable to the scheme of the Prime Minister, and I still believe that the plan proposed by my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) is preferable to the plan proposed by the Prime Minister. I stated that, but at the same time I did not commit myself as to government ownership as a general principle. I stated that in Germany government ownership was a success, and that in Belgium it was a success as far as it went. I do not believe, that if government railways were under the control of the Prime Minister and the men he has had as Minister of Railways, government ownership would be a benefit to this country; but it is possible that conditions may arise which would make government ownership of railways an advantage. I have not made up my mind on the question as to this country. I do not advocate one or the other.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. HAGGART. What I said was, that if this road is to be built by the money of the people of Canada, then a trial should be made of government ownership, and if it is not a success then the railway might be handed over to some corporation who might make a success of it.

Enough as to that, and now as to the point of order. When the orders of the day are called, questions of urgency or emergency can be brought before the House, and above all things at all times, it is in order to bring up any question which affects the privileges and the rights of members of the House. The motion made by my hon. friend (Mr. Casgrain) was within that category. He was perfectly right in calling the attention of the House to the answer which was given to his question by the Prime Minister, but as the right hon. gentleman admits that the answer is not one he should have given, and as he excuses himself out of it as well as he can, and promises never to do the like again, I think perhaps we had better let it go at that.

My hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) has said that when a motion to adjourn is made and withdrawn, it is in the same position as if it had never been before the House at all. The right hon. the premier (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) says: Oh, but it may be brought up again and again. There is an easy way of preventing that. As my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) says, the question may be declared lost, and if it is not desired to have the motion for adjournment come up again, any member of the House can dissent from a withdrawal of the motion and the Speaker must declare the motion lost on division. Then the rule would come into force, but my argument is that when the motion to adjourn has been withdrawn, there is no motion before the House and the House is left in the same position as if no motion had been before it. Therefore, I contend that the motion to adjourn made yesterday by my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) was perfectly in order.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would like to say one or two words before this matter is decided. My right hon. friend Sir Wilfrid Laurier, seemed to give the whole case away when he said that our practice is the same as the former English practice. I absolutely concur in that view, and cite from the highest authority, Mr. May, who says:

> When a motion for adjournment has been negatived, it may not be proposed again without some intermediate proceedings. Hence arises the practice of moving alternately that this House do now adjourn, and that the debate be adjourned.
> What is important is not the making of a motion to adjourn, but the negativing of a motion to adjourn.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The rule itself is when a motion to adjourn has been made.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I asked my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) a moment ago, if he argued that our practice differed from the former English practice. He said that our rules did not alter the former English practice. If he desires to recede from that position, well and good.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Not at all.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. If he does not recede I shall again quote to him May's words.

> When a motion to adjourn has been negatived, it may not be proposed again without some intermediate proceedings. Hence arises the practice of moving alternatively—— —the two motions to which I have referred. If anything were desired to make the matter perfectly plain, it is the other reference which I gave in making my remarks in the first instance. That reference is to be found in page 289 of May.

> As a motion which has been withdrawn, or has not been seconded, has not been submitted to the judgment of the House, the motion may, therefore, be repeated.

He puts these two cases absolutely in the same category, the case of a motion which has been seconded and of one which has been withdrawn. Would my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) argue that a motion to adjourn which has not been seconded, would prevent another motion to adjourn from being moved by some other member? I do not think my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) would go that far. But the cases are put in the same category by so eminent an authority as Mr. May. With all due deference to the opinion of the right hon. the premier (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who has had much more experience in parliamentary matters than I have, and of his hon. the Speaker which, under the circumstances had to be given without much consideration, I am bound to state that the authorities do not bear out the opinion stated by these gentlemen.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If a motion is made and not seconded it would not be a completed motion for the adjournment of the House, but if a motion is made and seconded, then some intermediate proceedings are required before another motion to adjourn can be made, no matter what disposition is made of the first motion.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That does not affect the question so far as renewing the motion is concerned, because the unseconded motion and withdrawn motion are put in exactly the same category by May. For instance, May cites a motion in the English House on railway bills which was made in that House, withdrawn and afterwards renewed, in the same session because it had not been submitted to the judgement of the House, so this motion, having been made and having been withdrawn stands exactly as if it never had been made. As my hon. friend from South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) has pointed out, the only argument of the premier, (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was that you might go on perpetually making motions to adjourn and withdrawing them, absolutely overlooking the rule, to be found on page 418 of Bourinot, that you cannot withdraw a motion except with the leave of the House, such leave being granted without any negative vote. Any member can prevent a withdrawal, and therefore the difficulty suggested by the right hon. the premier (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) cannot arise under the practice which I hold to be correct.

The hon. the Postmaster General (Sir William Mulock) has been good enough to make reference to myself in the course of his remarks, although I did not deal with the subject with which his speech was concerned. Let me say that the language of the hon. Postmaster General (Sir William Mulock) is a most severe condemnation of this government. He declares that the appointment of some 15 men from the House between the years 1878 and 1896, by the late Conservative administration was a disgraceful condition of affairs.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I made no such statement.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. If the hon. gentleman (Sir William Mulock) did not say that I would like to know what he did say.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. My statement was that I thought it was improper for members of this House who had promises of appointments to occupy seats in this House. I said that in 1895 that condition of affairs had become a gross scandal.

Mr. HAGGART. Mention one.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I could name them if I had them before me.

Mr. HAGGART. Name one.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I will look over the appointments. I cannot carry them all in my mind.

Mr. COCHRANE. How do you know what promises were made?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. It was notorious and they were appointed.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am very much obliged to the hon. Postmaster General (Sir William Mulock) for his interruption. It was very kind of him indeed to give me an opportunity to illustrate his position with a case which is well known. Is it not a fact that a gentleman now occupying a judicial position in Quebec, sat here a whole session with a written promise in his pocket that he would be appointed to the lieutenant governorship of that province? My hon. friend (Sir William Mulock) cannot get out of that. He says it is a disgraceful position of affairs, and yet he was prepared to support it and did support it as a member of this cabinet. I understood him to say this afternoon that the appointments made by the Conservatives between 1878 and 1896 constituted a disgrace to the administration of the public affairs of this country. He says that I misunderstood his language. If I did so, what has he to say to the fact that from 1896 to 1904, he has sat as a member of this cabinet and as a public man has consented to the appointment of no less that 30 gentlemen from the House of Commons to positions of emolument under the Crown. When he is face to face, as he is to-day, with that position of affairs, he had better talk about something else than my railway policy, and at least attempt to put himself right with the people of this country. He, as a member of this government, is carrying out a policy which he denounced in the most violent terms as a violation of the independence of parliament. When he is challenged with this, he talks about the railway policy of the opposition. While the electors of this province were voting in favour of this railway policy he was enjoying himself in the Republic of Mexico. When the hon. the Deputy Speaker, (Mr. Macdonald) was bitterly complaining that no members of the government would come to his assistance in East Bruce—a very good fight he made on that occasion, I am told, although I had not an opportunity of hearing him—he did not get any assistance from the Postmaster General (Sir William Mulock) who was enjoying himself far away in a foreign land. He talks about that railway policy in scathing and withering terms. Let him remember that that policy was put before the electorate in the county of East Bruce, and the county of Lambton, with the result that in Lambton the majority was increased from 200 to 600 and in Bruce it was also considerably increased.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Was that policy put before the electors of Guysboro ?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I do not know whether it was or not, but it was put before the people of St. John, and it was put before the people of the province of Quebec in various constituencies, with the result that the majorities in the province of Quebec were cut down to the extent of about 4,000. My hon. friend the Postmaster General may rest assured that whenever he is willing to come and discuss that policy, to which he refers in such contemptuous terms, on any public platform, there is not one man on this side of the House who will not be ready to go and meet him. But I am inclined to think that when the opportunity offers, my hon. friend will again seek refuge in a foreign clime instead of coming out and assisting gentlemen who, like the Deputy Speaker, are ever ready to come forward and face their political opponents on the public platform. I would not have made any reference to this had not the Postmaster General, without any cause that I can see, seen fit to introduce into this debate—I suppose he had no other answer—improper references to another debate of this House as to which we might have called him to order, but as to which we did not think it worth while to raise the point of order. I submit again that the matter which I have brought to your attention, Mr. Speaker—I trust in a respectful and courteous manner—is one on which possibly we may on some future occasion have from you a matured decision.

Hon. L. P. BRODEUR (Minister of Inland Revenue). I am very glad indeed that this question, which has been brought up also by my hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain), is going to be considered by this House. To what extent members of this House have the right to put questions to members of the government concerning public matters, has always been a disputed point. On the first day of this session, I think, the hon. member for Montmorency gave notice of a question asking how many members of this House had been appointed to offices of emolument under the Crown since 1896. I was sorry to see my hon. friend put such a question, and I suppose that if he had been here at the end of last session, he would certainly not have put it.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I am not surprised that you are sorry I put the question.

Mr. BRODEUR. The hon. gentleman should know that last session the same question was put.

Mr. TAYLOR. And not answered.

Mr. BRODEUR. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. A motion was made for the production of a report, and a report was brought down, because my hon. friend has referred to it.

Mr. CASGRAIN. No.

Mr. BRODEUR. At the opening of this session he gave notice of the same question, and received an answer, and having received a reply, he had no right to renew the question. That, I am sure will not be disputed by my hon. friend. But should there be any doubt on the point, let me quote a decision rendered in England not very long ago, in 1882. The decision was to the effect that when an hon. member has put a question and received such an answer as a minister of the Crown, who on his responsibility, thinks proper to give, he cannot renew the question.

Mr. HAGGART. When was the question renewed ? When was the same question put twice ?

Mr. BRODEUR. At the beginning of the session the hon. member for Montmorency asked the government how many members of this House had been appointed.

Mr. HAGGART. I know that.

Mr. BRODEUR. He received a reply, and two days ago he came back with the same question.

Mr. HAGGART. No, an entirely different question.

Mr. BRODEUR. I think it will be admitted that the question put two or three days ago by my hon. friend from Montmorency was, in all respects, the same as the one he put at the beginning of the session.

Mr. HAGGART. When was that point or order raised, any way ? What are you battering with the wind about ? That is not the point of order at all.

Mr. BRODEUR. I was simply calling attention to the fact that when my hon. friend from Montmorency renewed his question the other day, he was absolutely out of order.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Why then did not my hon. friend raise the point of order ?

Mr. BRODEUR. The hon. gentleman knows that sometimes very irregular proceedings are made. If I were to refer to what has been said in this House to-day during this debate, I might point to many irregularities, but on this side we do not want to curtail discussion or prevent hon.

members opposite from stating all the grievances they may have against the government, because we are in a position to answer them. My hon. friend should not complain if the other day we did not raise the point that his question was irregular and should not have been answered. Having got a reply, he should have accepted the suggestion of the government and made a motion for a return. I will go further and say that the government would have given a proper reply the other day had it simply answered no, because there were many things not correct mentioned in his question.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Which were they ?

Mr. BRODEUR. My hon. friend knows very well.

Mr. CASGRAIN. No, I do not.

Mr. BRODEUR. The government could very well have given that answer, but preferred to suggest to the hon. gentleman that he should move for a return.

As to the point whether a motion to adjourn, having been disposed of, can be renewed, I think that the doctrine stated by the right hon. the First Minister is perfectly correct. Our rule does not seem to be absolutely the same as the English one, because in England the rule is, as stated by May, that when a motion to adjourn is negatived, no other motion to adjourn can be made. Under our Rule 30, however, there is a difference. It declares that a motion to adjourn cannot be renewed unless some proceedings have intervened. In this case a motion to adjourn was made after a previous similar motion had been disposed of, and no intermediate proceedings had taken place. No intermediate proceedings seem to have been had. I have not the reference under my hand and so speak subject to correction, but, if I remember well, this question arose some years ago under Speaker White, and it was decided that a second motion to adjourn was not in order because there had been no proceedings after the first. Now, with regard to the other question whether members of this House should be appointed to office, I venture to say that that is a question not absolutely germane to the one raised by the hon. leader of the opposition. I am very sorry that the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain)—according to me—violated the rules and has been guilty of an irregularity of the most serious character under the circumstances. I think he should not have raised that question, because it was not germane to the question brought forward by the leader of the opposition. And, as that question is not regularly before us, I do not wish to discuss it under the circumstances. For my part I desire to see the rules strictly observed, and have always done my best to that end.

Mr. SPEAKER. I fully appreciate the importance of the question raised by the hon. gentleman (Mr. R. L. Borden) who leads the opposition. I also fully appreciate the necessity of determining what is the meaning of the rule in question as to motions to adjourn. I think the leader of the opposition has been led into error by confounding the rule which is applicable to motions in general with the rule which is applicable to motions to adjourn in particular. I may explain that I have had no opportunity to look at the English rule. The authority quoted by the hon. gentleman is May which is based, I take it—must be based—upon the British rule, whatever it may be. I am not called upon now to say whether the English rule is the same as the Canadian rule, nor am I called upon in any way to interpret the English rule. I am not called upon to say whether the authority quoted by the hon gentleman—May—is applicable to the point. I have listened attentively to what has been said on both sides. My opinion is that the argument advanced by the leader of the opposition is an argument which might be well advanced in the case of motions in general. At page 453 of Bourinot, we find :—

> If a motion has been negatived, it cannot afterwards be proposed in the shape of an amendment. In case a motion has been withdrawn,——

And I call particular attention to the word ' withdrawn.'

> —it may be again proposed, as the House has not previously determined the question, and it is only in the latter event that the same question may not be revived.

That is the rule applicable to motions in general. When we come to deal with motions to adjourn, we find the rule an entirely different one, and one that leaves, it seems to me, no room for doubt. It is as plain as the English language can make it so far as I can understand that language :—

> A motion to adjourn shall always be in order; but no second motion to the same effect shall be made until after some intermediate proceeding shall have been had.

That rule does not make any distinction between a motion to adjourn that has been withdrawn and a similar motion that has been negatived ; it simply speaks of a motion and a second motion. The first motion to adjourn yesterday was made by the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Monet) and seconded by the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion). That motion was withdrawn. According to my humble judgment, it makes no difference whatever that the motion was withdrawn instead of having been negatived. The Canadian rule makes no distinction whatever, though possibly the English rule is different in that respect. The Canadian rule simply provides that when a motion to adjourn has been disposed of, has been dealt with by the House—and it does not say in what way—no second motion to adjourn can be made. What are the facts? The hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville made the motion to adjourn. That motion was properly seconded, and was afterwards withdrawn with the consent of the House. It was disposed of by the House, and, according to the rule, no second motion to adjourn could be made until after some intermediate proceeding.

Motion (Mr. R. L. Borden) negatived.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That does not indicate great confidence, in your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, 'That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, for the House to go into committee to consider a certain resolution concerning the ratification of the agreement between His Majesty the King and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, dated the 8th day of March, 1904'; and the proposed motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

Mr. MAHLON K. COWAN (South Essex). Mr. Speaker, even if I had not intended to say anything on the question now before the House, I think the speeches made this afternoon by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain), the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) and the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) would impel any ordinary representative of the people in this country to at least draw attention to the position of the various leaders of the opposition upon what I consider the most important question that has, for many years, engaged the attention of this House. We have had this afternoon the delightful spectacle of the hon. member for South Lanark—one of the oldest members of this House, an ex-Minister of Railways and Canals, and certainly one of the leaders, or the leader, from the great province of Ontario—we have this hon. gentleman standing up after his twenty-two years of experience in public life, and, when a project involving the national credit, the national honour, the national prosperity of Canada is before this House, making the candid admission that he does not know whether he is in favour of government ownership or not. And yet the hon. gentleman on two occasions has voted on that question, and during this session has spoken both for and against it. Why, Sir, I remember, when trumpet-tongued and clarion-toned, the hon. member for South Lanark last year spoke against government ownership. I remember when the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Puttee) moved a resolution on the floor of this House in favour of government ownership, and as the eye of the clerk, in telling off the votes, ranged along the front benches of the opposition, the third man to rise in his place was the hon. member for Lanark—and his vote was registered against government ownership. I want to ask the hon. gentleman, I want the ordinary common sense Conservative throughout the province of Ontario if——

Mr. POPE. Why not take the whole Dominion?

Mr. COWAN. Yes, one and all. I would like to ask them all if they understand that, for the past twenty-two years, they have been following a man who has held the high and responsible position of Minister of Railways and Canals, and yet who to-day stands up and makes the candid admission that he does not know whether he is for or against government ownership. I propose later on to refer briefly to the attitude of the hon. leader of the opposition. It is well known in this House that last year the leader of the opposition moved for government ownership as far west as Fort William. The leader of the Ontario Conservatives, the member for South Lanark, who ought to know what his own mind is upon a railway matter, who sets himself up as the railway critic in this House from the opposition point of view, and who follows his distinguished leader, voted in favour of that proposition and voted against the motion moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Puttee). Several months have come and gone, discussions in the newspapers have taken place, and the hon. member for South Lanark has had the benefit of them, and yet he stood up in the House of Commons on April 6th and, after vacillating backwards and forwards until everybody wondered upon which side of the fence he would light, he came down with the candid expression: 'Perhaps, perhaps I am against government ownership.' You will find that on page 877 of the unrevised 'Hansard.' So I tell the hon. member for South Lanark that then and to-day he stands up and says: Well, I do not just know where I am on this question. I will leave the hon. member for South Lanark to make a graceful bow to his distinguished leader, who must have looked at him with wondering eyes when he made that statement, and proposed holus-bolus to swallow the impossible proposition laid down by that distinguished gentleman.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it was left for the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Northrup) to make the statement that if the Grand Trunk Pacific stopped at North Bay, then the Conservative party was prepared to support it. I want to appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite, I want to ask them if they think that people are losing their memories, that the public records of this country have ceased to exist. How they made the welkin ring in telling the people of the Dominion of Canada, through their press and by their speeches, that we never intended, no matter what we said, to build one mile of the road east of North Bay. And for what purpose? Because we are going to assist the Grand Trunk Railway in building up the American ports of Buffalo, Chicago and Duluth. But when they saw the grim determination of this government that, wherever government money was spent, wherever the credit of the Dominion of Canada was pledged, wherever the favour of the Dominion parliament was asked, that favour, that pledge and that wealth should go to build up Canadian instead of American ports, then they changed their tune to make it fit to the altered circumstances; and now they say: Oh, don't go east of North Bay.

The leader of the opposition stated this afternoon that he had promulgated his policy in East Bruce and in East Lambton. I have had the pleasure myself of reading some of the speeches made by the leader of the opposition in East Lambton, and I ask him, I ask any friends he has in this House, I ask every supporter behind him: What is the policy of the leader of the opposition upon this question to-day? I knew what his policy was one year ago. It stood for the eight broken links that have been referred to by the Postmaster General as the crazy quilt proposition in connection with railway transportation in this country. What was his proposition? His proposition was, first, to build from Montreal, or Jacques Cartier junction, to Côteau—link number 1; by the Canada Atlantic through to Depot Harbour—link number 2; then going into the stock markets and buying the shares of the Canada Transit Company through to Fort William—link number 3; help the Canadian Pacific Railway from Fort William on to Winnipeg—link number 4; build the Grand Trunk from Winnipeg to Edmonton—link number 5; then go into a partnership arrangement with the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk and help them through to the Pacific coast—link number 6; then he had a summer line; in order to make it compete for winter traffic he had to build from the Canada Atlantic Railway to the Canadian Pacific Railway, from Scotia junction across to Sudbury—link number 7; and finally and lastly, to buy the lean section of the Canadian Pacific Railway, 634 miles, from North Bay through to Fort William, and unload it on to the taxpayers of Canada. This year not one word has fallen from the lips of the leader of the opposition concerning his project west of the city of Winnipeg. He has apparently abandoned the idea of bracing up the Canadian Pacific Railway to Winnipeg; if not, he has abandoned the Grand Trunk from Winnipeg to Edmonton, and the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk from Edmonton to the coast. In view of these facts, Sir, I ask the leader of the opposition what policy it was that he propounded to the electors of East Lambton; I ask him what policy it was that he propounded to the electors of East Bruce? If he says it is the same policy that he has propounded from one end of Canada to the other, I want to tell him that he changes it so quick that he doesn't give it time to travel from one end of this Dominion to the other. To-day he has abandoned the line west of Winnipeg, but he does substitute one other provision; he wants to inaugurate ice-breaking boats on Lake Superior in order to keep navigation open, with its winds and storms, one or two weeks longer.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there must be a reason apparent to every member of this House why this Grand Trunk Pacific scheme did not go through as it was proposed last year. There must be something at the bottom of it, there must be interested parties who are trying to discredit it. I will refer later on to the remarks of the leader of the opposition when he made the humble apology, that his scheme was never suggested to him by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. But he knows, and knows full well—and I am sorry the hon. member for Toronto West (Mr Osler), his co-partner in this matter, is not in the House at this moment—the leader of the opposition knows full well that the 'Canadian Gazette,' published in London, England, is edited by no less an individual than Mr. Thomas Skinner, a director of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

He knows, no one better, that this new territory, of which the people of the Dominion of Canada have such high hopes, has been slandered in that journal as a country of muskegs, as a country of rocks, as a country of stunted pine, as a country unfit for agriculture and unfit for the settler. It has been said by that journal that no man should put one dollar's worth of money into the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway running through that new district, that it is pouring it into a sink hole; and these things have been said to discourage financial investors from investing one single dollar in this enterprise for the development of this country. I make the statement here and I make it boldly that that paper is controlled and owned by the Canadian Pacific Railway and is edited by Mr. Thos. Skinner one of the directors of the Canadian Pacific Railway. But, Mr. Speaker, there never has been any great enterprise in the country, there never has been any enterprise in the world that has ever been promulgated by any individual but what has been met by opposition and this is no exception to the rule. I am sorry that the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) who held up both hands, appealed to the high heaven and said 'God save us' is not in his place because I want to give him biblical authority. While these hon. gentlemen opposite are stating that this territory is an irreclaimable desert, I want to tell them, and I quote from the good book, that when certain Israelites were sent to spy out the promised land a number came back and reported it to be a bad country saying that it 'eateth up the inhabitants thereof.' The hon. member for West Toronto and his friends following the example of these men of early days as given to us in biblical history, partaking of their feelings and emulating their policy, desire to discredit this enterprise because they feel it a duty of the opposition to speak ill of any enterprise emanating from a Liberal government. The opposition in this House differ, however, from the Israelite spies in one rather important particular--the latter really did visit the borders of the Promised Land, whereas the former condemn our New Canada out of hand without knowing anything about it. I repeat that I regret that the hon. member for West Toronto is not in his place, because I remember that last year the hon. gentleman was making a speech in opposition to the Grand Trunk Pacific Bill and telling his friends, while they were applauding to the echo, that the great American republic had ceased to bonus railways, that there was no state in the American union that was to-day granting a bonus to a railway. I rose in my place and asked that hon. gentleman what the population of the United States was when they ceased to bonus railways and what was the population of the various states when they had as states refused to grant further state aid. The hon. member for West Toronto crept into his shell and refused to answer the question. To-day I want to tell that hon. gentleman and I want to tell the hon. leader of the opposition and his followers behind him that when the second transcontinental railway, the Northern Pacific, was first projected across the American continent it met with just such opposition as that which this Bill has encountered. Not only that, Sir, but when Mr. Whitney, an enterprising American citizen, had succeeded in addressing an audience in the great city of Philadelphia pointing out the immense capabilities and possibilities of that western and northern portion of the United States, the immense results to be obtained, the immense profits that would accrue and the immense wealth that would flow to the eastern states and down to the manufacturers of the east, if a transcontinental line across the northern half of the United States were built from Lake Superior to the Pacific coast, thus giving the manufacturers and merchants of the eastern states an opportunity of getting their products into the western states, the reception given him was not good. He afterwards succeeded in addressing an audience in the Tabernacle in the city of New York. I shall quote from a statement of the Hon. Wm. D. Kelley who, speaking of Mr. Whitney's reception, subsequently said:

His remarks were listened to, but at their close a mob took possession of the hall and denounced the project as a swindle, declaring that it was an attempt on the part of a band of conspirators to defraud the people by inducing the government to make an immense grant of land for an impracticable project. This was the initial movement of a powerful and organized opposition, before which Mr. Whitney retired, silenced in his effort to promote one of the grandest works ever conceived by an American citizen.

That was the attitude of some of the American people towards the second transcontinental line built through the United States of America. Subsequently the whole people of the United States grasped the opportunity and built the second transcontinental line across the United States. I will give to the House the figures now in order to answer the speech of the hon. member for West Toronto who talked about the American republic having ceased to bonus railways. They gave the Northern Pacific Railway 50,000,000 acres of land. What does 50,000,000 acres of land mean? It is a tract three and a half times as large as Holland, it is seven times as large as Belgium, it is 10,000 square miles greater than the six New England states and it is more than twice the size of the present populated portion of Ontario. That is what was given by the American republic to the second transcontinental line going through the United States, not at a time when they had, as we have, scarce six millions of people, but when they had a population of over thirty millions of people. They granted to these gentlemen that immense area of territory in addition to which they gave them an absolutely free right of way from Lake Superior to the Pacific coast. They arranged with the different states for a free right of way and they gave them a free right of way for their telegraph lines and for their station buildings. At that time the denunciation of the opponents of that scheme was the same as the denunciation that is offered by the opponents of this scheme to-day—a barren wilderness covered for six months of the year with snow, rocks, swindle, absolutely unable to run a railway through and absolutely unable for human existence upon its northern borders. What is the result? The same dire predictions which have been made by hon. gentlemen opposite were made at that time. To-day we have the great states of Minnesota, Dakota, Montana and Oregon, Idaho and Washington, all immense and populous states with millions of inhabitants and many opulent cities. To-day the western states is the most important part of the American republic. And, Sir, I have every confidence and every belief that if this project is carried out on the northern half of British North America through which this Grand Trunk Pacific Railway will run, there will be built up great provinces in the Dominion of Canada equalling those which have been built up on the line of the Northern Pacific.

While we have heard much concerning the small aid which this government proposes to give to the Grand Trunk Pacific, we have not heard one single word from these gentlemen on the other side of the House, about the aid which they gave to the Canadian Pacific Railway. There is no doubt that the Grand Trunk Pacific will be a colonization railway. It is beyond dispute that it is a new road opening up new territory. It runs through the unorganized territory of British Columbia; it runs through the new territory of the Northwest and Manitoba; it runs through the new territory of northern Ontario and Quebec; it runs far north of any other railroad in existence to-day. Will any one tell me that it is not a colonization railway, opening up new territory? And, Sir, if it be, why should gentlemen on the other side of the House object to giving aid to this enterprise, when they themselves aided the Canadian Pacific Railway, when it was first built through a new country? And if these gentlemen opposite think that too much aid was given by them to the Canadian Pacific Railway, then why have they not the courage and the manliness to stand up and say so?

Although the matter has already been dealt with, I wish briefly to lay side by side, the grants, to the Canadian Pacific Railway which they gave; the grants which their predecessors on the Conservative benches voted for, and supported. The Canadian Pacific Railway got among other things from the Conservative government, a grant of 25,000,000 acres of land; and the Grand Trunk Pacific gets no land grant from this Liberal government. The Canadian Pacific Railway got a cash subsidy of $25,000,000; they got lines of road already built which cost $37,700,000; they therefore got in cold cash or its equivalent in built roads $62,700,000. What does the Grand Trunk Pacific get? It gets not a dollar in cash subsidies. The section between Moncton and Winnipeg is to be leased to it at three per cent, and then at the end of fifty years that line reverts to the government. There is a government guarantee on the remainder of the road, and running rights are to be afforded to all other companies that may possibly want to use any part of the government section. But what else in addition to what I have already stated, did the Canadian Pacific Railway get from the Conservative government? They got a monopoly for twenty years, so that no other line south of the main line should be built in order to prevent competition by American roads. For twenty long years that monopoly was to keep the young and lusty province of Manitoba in the grip of this benevolent corporation now fathered in the House by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler). And on the other hand, what monopoly is created for the Grand Trunk Pacific? No monopoly at all. And look at what the Conservative government gave to the Canadian Pacific Railway by way of exemption from customs duties. That good old Conservative party, which it is supposed wants to build up the industries of this country; did they say to the Canadian Pacific Railway: every dollar's worth of goods you can purchase in Canada should be purchased here, and shall be the product of Canadian labour. Oh, no, the Conservatives did not say that to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Did the Conservative government say: that the Canadian manufacturer, for whom they appear to be so solicitous now, should have the benefit of supplying the product of his industry to the Canadian Pacific Railway? Oh, dear no. They actually gave the Canadian Pacific Railway the right to import free of duty from the United States, any material to be used in that road that they saw fit. But that is not all. In addition to that, it was provided that if the Canadian Pacific Railway bought any bridge material, for instance, in Canada from a Canadian firm, they should receive from the taxpayers of this country an amount equal to what the duty would have been if they had imported it from the United States. Thus it was that the Canadian Pacific Railway were to receive from the taxpayers of this country what is euphoniously called a drawback.

But what has the Grand Trunk Pacific to do in that respect? The Grand Trunk Pacific must employ Canadian labour, and must use the product of Canadian factories, made by the Canadian artisan to the exclusion of our good friend the American artisan.

And then the Conservative government gave the Canadian Pacific exemption from taxation for all their property together with the capital stock of the company, for twenty years; and the land grants in the Territories were to be exempt from taxation for a like period of 20 years. Is there any exemption from taxation for the Grand Trunk Pacific? No, Mr. Speaker, there is not. The Conservative government gave up the control of rates on the Canadian Pacific Railway, and until that line paid 10 per cent on the cost of its construction, the Canadian Pacific Railway was free to do as it pleased in charging exorbitant rates to the settlers of the west. And do you know that these wily gentlemen of the Canadian Pacific Railway immediately formed themselves into a construction company, charged the Canadian Pacific Railway what they saw fit, pocketed the difference between the legitimate cost of construction and what their contract amounted to, and then put the whole cost upon the Canadian Pacific Railway, as cost of construction. And so it is that when they make ten per cent on that watered stock, then and not till then have the government control over their rates. The Canadian Pacific Railway opened up from North Bay, a new country 2,250 miles in extent; the Grand Trunk Pacific opens up 3,300 miles of a territory equally as fertile and as fit for colonization as was the territory of the Canadian Pacific Railway eighteen years ago. I shall not go into the details of the value of the land grants which the Canadian Pacific Railway got. They got $62,700,000 in spot cash and road constructed, and to-day they have over ten million acres of their land left, and you cannot buy it for five dollars an acre; indeed one of my partners paid seven dollars an acre the other day for 640 acres in the Northwest. Therefore, the Canadian Pacific Railway have to-day at least $50,000,000 worth of land that was given them by the Conservatives and it is not subject to taxes yet. Yet to-day, we see the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) and the hon. leader of the opposition, posing as the friends of the western settler. It is amusing to see the crocodile tears of the member for West Toronto, the Canadian Pacific Railway director, shed for the bleeding farmers of the west, when his company is putting up their money for lawyers fees, to try to get out of the payment of taxes to the province of Manitoba and the Northwest Territories.

There must be some reason for the determined opposition of the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) to this enterprise. When you find men, especially a railway corporation like the Canadian Pacific Railway, through the press which they own, opposing a scheme, you may depend upon it that there is more than sentiment behind it all. I read with surprise the articles in the 'Canadian Gazette' published in London I was not aware that it was owned by the Canadian Pacific Railway and that a director of the Canadian Pacific Railway was its editor. I was suspicious last year when I saw the hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) trying to unload on the overburdened taxpayers of this country 634 miles of railway running through a territory that is as barren of agriculture and local freight as the Sahara desert of roses. I was surprised at the attitude of the 'Canadian Gazette,' but the cloven hoof was shown when the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) seemed so anxious to back it up, and I then for the first time proceeded to make inquiries. It struck me that if the government were compelled to purchase the lean section of the Canadian Pacific Railway from North Bay to Fort William or Winnipeg the Canadian Pacific Railway would have to use it, and that, therefore, this government could impose on them such rates as they saw fit and right in order to pay interest on the investment. I was foolish enough to be taken in with that idea, but when I started to investigate I found that the Canadian Pacific Railway owned the Soo line, which starts at Sudbury, goes to Sault Ste. Marie, where it crosses into Michigan, traverses the corner of Michigan and the entire state of Minnesota into the state of Dakota, crossing the northern boundary of Dakota, and reaching the Canadian Pacific Railway at Moosejaw. Thus, having unloaded the lean and unprofitable section of their road on the Canadian taxpayer, they could send every dollar's worth of freight originating in the neighbourhood of Moosejaw or west clean through to British Columbia over their Soo line to Sudbury without paying one dollar of tribute to the government on the heavy grades of the bleak north line along Lake Superior. I still thought that they would have to use the north shore line on all freight originating east of Moosejaw, but Sir, I found that this same Canadian Pacific Railway owned another line of railway called the Duluth, South Shore and Atlantic road, which runs from Duluth to Sault Ste. Marie. It will be remembered that the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Sault Ste. Marie, runs through Sault Ste. Marie to Sudbury. They already own and control the road running from Duluth to Sault Ste. Marie. The hon. member from West Toronto (Mr. Osler) put his foot in it the other night when he said that a line could be constructed from Winnipeg to Duluth of a length of only 380 miles, while the Canadian Pacific Railway line from Winnipeg to Fort William is 426 miles long; in other words that he could construct a road from Winnipeg to Duluth 46 miles shorter than the Canadian Pacific Railway line from Winnipeg to Fort William.

I shall now return to the remarks of the hon. member from South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) and I am glad to see he has returned to the House as one of the leaders of the opposition. That hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) the other day said that certain portions of the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway on the north shore of Lake Superior cost $60,000 a mile, and I have no doubt that is correct. If it cost $60,000 a mile I want to ask the House what they suppose the government of this country could purchase this for per mile, if the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) and the hon. member for South Lanark (the minister of railways in the old government) were members of a Conservative cabinet. But, Sir, I am willing to be generous; we will say that it cost $60,000 a mile to construct that road, and after they have operated it for 18 years and have got it ballasted up we could not very well expect to purchase it for less than it cost. But for the sake of the argument let us assume that we cut the cost in two and can purchase the railway for $30,000 per mile. That would be a modest estimate. Then for the 634 miles from North Bay to Fort William which the hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) proposed to purchase we would have to pay $19,000,000. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) also estimated that the cost of the prairie section would not exceed $20,000 a mile. The line from Winnipeg south to Duluth is practically through a prairie country and if that can be constructed for $20,000 a mile, it would cost the Canadian Pacific Railway only $7,600,000. Now I want to point out the infamy in the suggestion that we should take over the worthless north shore section, 634 miles long, at a cost of $19,000,000 and hand that money over to the Canadian Pacific Railway who would then construct 380 miles of railway from Winnipeg to Duluth at a cost of $7,500,000 and thereby pocket $11,000,000 in cold cash and have a road over which they could ship their own freight and never ship one pound over the government road which they had unloaded on the taxpayers.

If the hon. member for West Toronto wants to figure interest, let him figure what the interest at three per cent for the next fifty years will amount to on $11,000,000. We would then know what would go into the pockets of the Canadian Pacific Railway besides giving that company at the expense of the country another road with easier grades and a shorter distance through to the east. And, Sir, if this scheme went through and the government purchased the Canadian Pacific Railway line from North Bay to Fort William, what prospect would there be of getting any traffic? Why, it would not even get any freight from the Canadian Northern, which is the only line that could be a feeder to it. At first sight it would appear as if the Canadian Northern would have to ship over that road, but everybody knows, and nobody knows it better than the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler), who is in the councils of the Canadian Pacific Railway, that when the Canadian Pacific Railway was informed that the Canadian Northern had received aid from the Ontario government to build a line from Toronto to Sudbury, which is the end of the Soo Canadian Pacific Railway line, the Canadian Northern and the Canadian Pacific Railway did, in railway parlance, get to bed together and agree to interchange running rights, so that the Canadian Pacific Railway has the use to the city of Toronto of the Canadian Northern line from Sudbury to Toronto and the Canadian Northern has the use of the Canadian Pacific Railway line from Sudbury west to Port Arthur. The result would be, therefore, that once the Canadian Pacific Railway had unloaded this north shore line on the government, all the Canadian Pacific Railway would have to do would be to construct as they are doing to-day, from St. Paul north —from a point on the Soo line near St. Paul to their line at Emerson, 60 miles south of Winnipeg, less than 400 miles. What then will be the result? The moment that connection is made, the moment the Duluth, South Shore and Atlantic Railway and the Minneapolis, St. Paul and Sault Ste. Marie Railway are connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway system in Manitoba—and they can construct that connection and still pocket three and a half millions in cold cash, then they will have two lines, the one a little longer and the other four miles shorter than the line from Winnipeg through to the city of Montreal. I think it is only fair to say, for I do not want to misrepresent this matter, that a few miles in an immense distance, either one way or the other, does not amount to very much. The question is, what business will that road around the north shore of Lake Superior do to help out the through-freight on the Intercolonial? There are three fixed charges against every railway in the world. First, the interest on the cost of construction; second, maintenance of right of way; third, cost of operation, and every railway man knows—my hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Barker) will not dispute that—that railway companies depend largely upon local freight for the purpose of paying these fixed charges. Ask any hon. member of this House to compare that fertile prairie belt from Winnipeg to the great shipping port of Duluth with the barren waste from Fort William to Winnipeg. I want to know from my hon. friend the leader of the opposition—and I appeal to the hon. member who is going to follow me to tell this House how much local freight the country would draw into its coffers by reason of the operation of the road from North Bay to Fort William. One eloquent writer described this section of country as one over which a crow dare not take flight without carrying a knapsack, because there is not enough in it to feed him on his passage. Compare that with the fertile belt of southern Manitoba and northern Minnesota, every mile of which will give sufficient local freight to pay the fixed charges. Let these hon. gentlemen compare this north shore section with the Soo line to St. Paul, Minneapolis, Sault Ste. Marie and Sudbury. Why, these gentlemen know that northern Minnesota is one of the most fertile belts in the country, that the freight upon the Minnesota lines is almost better than that on any transcontinental line through any of the northern portions of the United States, and that every mile of these lines is capable of sustaining the fixed charges. From Fort William to North Bay, the distance is 634 miles, and the hon. the leader of the opposition asks the Canadian public to pay through the nose for a project upon which scarcely a dollar's worth of freight can possibly originate to help out the Intercolonial Railway with through-freight. From Sudbury, the end of the Soo line, through to Fort William is 555 miles. The best evidence of the poverty of that section is that though it has been completed for nearly eighteen years, I defy hon. gentlemen opposite to point to 555 bona fide settlers along its line which are not now employed by the Canadian Pacific Railway or Hudson Bay Company or incidentally to these companies. That is the section of road which the hon. gentlemen wanted to unload on to the Canadian taxpayer. That is the kind of government ownership which the leader of the opposition wants us to take. And the hon. gentleman himself (Mr. R. L. Borden) was so conscious of the one-sided character of the bargain he proposed, that he felt called upon to say that nobody in the Canadian Pacific Railway had ever suggested it to him. Why did the hon. gentleman feel called upon to say that the Canadian Pacific Railway had not suggested that enterprise to him ? It was because he knew full well that with less money than the figures I have given this House, the two connecting lines could be built, one costing seven and a half million dollars and the other eight million dollars, and the company would not only have a surplus of $2,500,000 in cold cash in their pockets but would have unloaded this white elephant on to the taxpayers of the Dominion.

Then I find that the hon. member for West Toronto spoke about the 'Midsummer Night's Dream,' and at page 893 of 'Hansard' exclaimed 'God help us.' Then at page 885 he exclaimed : 'I pray Heaven the Liberal party do not built it.' I can very readily understand the midsummer night's dream of the hon. gentleman.

I can readily understand Miss Canada lying prostrate, as he described her. I can readily understand her awakening to the proposition of the leader of the opposition, and her friends raising the cry, 'God help us,' as they heard it suggested that this political crime should be perpetrated upon the people. I can understand the attitude of the hon. leader of the opposition with his not overabundant knowledge of railway subjects; I can understand and appreciate the help given him by the hon. member for West Toronto, who would like to be Finance Minister in the Conservative government, if they come into power in the year 1905. I can understand him saying, 'Heaven help us ; I hope they will not build it, in order that we may palm the elephant off on the people of this country.' I dislike making, in the absence of the hon. member for West Toronto, the references that, it seems to me, should be made to him. Apparently the hon. gentleman forgot himself. My mind goes back to a time shortly after the hon. gentleman became a member of this House. Mr. McMullen, now Senator McMullen, and Mr. Wood, afterwards Senator Wood, and now gone to his long home, were members of the House at that time. There was a project before the House for the building of a road from Collingwood to Lake Ontario. Hon. gentlemen on the other side rose in their places, shook their fists across the floor of the House and declared that these two gentlemen, though they had not a dollar of interest in the road, yet, because their names appeared as provisional directors, had no right even to discuss the question in this House, to say nothing of voting on it, for the principle of the independence of parliament demanded that men should not speak upon schemes with which their names were coupled, or in which they were interested, because their opinions might be unduly influenced. And the hon. member for West Toronto was as dumb as an oyster while all this was said. And this hon. gentleman, though a director of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and not only a director, but one of an executive committee of three or four who control that company, a member of its inner cabinet—this hon. gentleman stands up and opposes a scheme that will give competition to the concern in which he is interested, and fathers the scheme of the leader of the opposition to foist upon the people of the Dominion what I say would make, if carried out, the blackest page of Canadian history, so far as railway enterprises are concerned. I should have thought, Sir, that a man of his refined tastes and his perceptions of right and wrong in ordinary matters, would have hesitated to take such a position. And this year the hon. gentleman uses strong language, nor does he hesitate to use it against men of standing and repute. He said that the parties to the agreement of last year were fakirs. That was his own expression. He said they were fakirs who hoped to unload the Grand Trunk Pacific on the Grand Trunk Railway. That is pretty strong language for a man who has sat in this House for eight years, and whose voice has never yet been raised against any favour to the Canadian Pacific Railway that this government, in its wisdom, thought it to the interest of this country to grant, but was ever ready to vote and speak against any project, however meritorious that would interfere with the great corporation of which he is a stockholder and a bondholder, a member of its directorate and of the inner cabinet that controls its policy. It seems to me the hon. member might well have spared us the use of that word 'fake' as applied to men who had entered into an agreement last year on behalf of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway. Let me remind hon. members who these gentlemen are to whom the hon. member for West Toronto refers as fakirs. In England, there is Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson, Lord Welby, Mr. Price and Mr. Smithers. In this country there is Mr. Charles M. Hays, Mr. William Wainwright and Mr. John Bell, solicitor of the Grand Trunk Railway at Belleville. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he knows what the meaning of the word 'fakir' is, which he so lightly applies to men of standing in this country and in England? The word 'fakir' is defined by the latest dictionary as 'an Oriental, religious, ascetic begging monk.' And this is the word the hon. member for West Toronto applies to men in England and in Canada whose standing is of the best. William Wainwright has been connected with the Grand Trunk Railway in this country for over a quarter of a century. He is a man whose name is widely known, a man who stands above reproach, a man of whom it can be said that no institution with which he has ever been connected possesses any record that is otherwise than creditable to him. The name of William Wainwright is so well known in Canada that it is not necessary for me to defend him; any defence that I might attempt would be, I am sure, entirely superfluous and unnecessary. The hon. gentleman applies this word to Mr. Morse, whose name, by the way, I had omitted. Mr. Morse has been for many years connected with railway enterprises in Canada. He is a gentleman with whom I have no personal acquaintance, but one of whom everybody who knows him speaks in terms of praise. Mr. Charles M. Hays is an American citizen who was brought to this country to take a position of great influence. He is a man of ability, and has used that ability so well that he has risen from the poor boy of St. Louis to be the greatest railway manager in Canada, if not the greatest on the American continent. And yet the hon. member for West Toronto thinks it not beneath him to rise in this House, with the bonds of the Canadian Pacific Railway, as it were, in one pocket and the stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway in the other pocket, and refer to men of this character as fakirs, though he himself tried to unload the only fake scheme in the shape of a railroad enterprise that I have seen in this House in the eight years of my public life. I hope such a spectacle will not be repeated. When he uses such expressions as 'heaven help us,' 'God help us,' he does not raise himself in public estimate, nor does he edify a suffering and indulgent humanity who listen to him. But he may well be called to account when he uses his privilege as a member of parliament to apply unpleasant names to men of the character of those to whom I have referred, names which, if used outside of this House, would probably result in his learning a lesson in the meaning and effect of the Ontario law of libel.

Now, Sir, I will not refer to the hon. member for West Toronto as a fakir, but if the word 'fakir' can be applied to anybody in connection with these two schemes, the one projected by the leader of the opposition aided by the member for West Toronto, the other the Grand Trunk Pacific scheme, aided by honest men, projected by an honest government in an honest attempt to build up this great Dominion of Canada whereof we are all proud, and glad to see it lifting up it its head among the nations of the earth—I say I leave it to the members of this House to say whether it should be applied to Wm. Wainwright, with his reputation in railroad construction and railroad finance, or to the hon. member for West Toronto, with his reputation in the Calgary, Edmonton, and Qu'Appelle Railway, the Long Lake and Saskatchewan Railway, where they got over $3,200,000 in cash guarantee and 3,507,200 acres of land that were worth over $12,000,000, or a total of over $15,000,000 while it only cost $6,000,000, giving them a margin of $9,000,000. Yet he left it $10,000,000 in debt, after receiving $12,000,000 in land value and over $3,000,000 in cash, $25,000,000 to finance an institution that only cost $6,000,000. I leave the members of this House and the people of this country to choose whether the term 'fakir' should be applied to Wm. Wainwright, Charles M. Hays, Lord Welby, Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson, Mr. Morse, Mr. Bell, Mr. Price or Mr. Smithers on the one hand, or to the hon. member for West Toronto on the other.

Now, the hon. member for West Toronto, as quoted by some hon. gentlemen opposite, has said that we could not carry wheat to St. John and ship it at a profit. If this is the case, will the hon. gentleman tell me why his company paid $10,000,000 for the Elder-Dempster line to run to Quebec in summer and to carry wheat from St. John in winter. The Canadian Pacific Railway that is behind the opposition to this scheme, both in the press and in this House, paid $10,000,000 for a line of boats to carry ocean freight from the city of Quebec to Liverpool in summer and from the city of St. John in winter. Why in the world did they do that? If they can carry grain over their road, will anybody tell me, in the name of all that is good and great, why the Grand Trunk Pacific, with the local freight it will get from the productive section that it will traverse with its easy grades, and its connection with the Intercolonial at Moncton—why they cannot carry freight not only to Halifax, not only to St. John, but even on to Sydney, Louisbourg, or Country Harbour? Surely what is sauce for the goose must be sauce for the gander. Surely what we can do with a hundred impediments in the way, we must be able to do under more favourable circumstances. Now, Mr. Speaker, there is another point I desire to touch, and I hope the House will bear with me and allow me to close before taking recess.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Six o'clock.

Mr. COWAN. I want to close.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Ten minutes past six now.

Mr. COWAN. Well, the hon. gentleman may go.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I call your attention Mr. Speaker, that it is six o'clock.

Mr COWAN. I hope that the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) will not take that ground. I want to catch the train at seven o'clock, and I will be able to close in a few minutes. But if the hon. member for Montmorency insists, I shall sit down and remain.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Douglas). I suppose that by leave of the House the hon. gentleman may be allowed to finish.

Mr. CASGRAIN. The hon. gentleman might be more polite about it.

Mr. COWAN. I am not going to take a leaf out of the book of the hon. member when he addresses the House himself. I tell the member for Montmorency that if he charges me with impoliteness it is like Satan rebuking sin.

Mr. TAYLOR. It is six o'clock.

Mr. COWAN. Well, I will remain.

At 6.10 p.m., House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I was just closing my remarks, which had been directed towards the elucidation of the same expressions concerning the Grand Trunk Pacific directors, to whom the hon. member for West Toronto had been referring as fakirs. In order that there cannot be any misunderstanding in regard to this matter, I desire to refer exactly to what the hon. member for West Toronto said. I have, in the few remarks which I have made, referred strictly to the names mentioned in the agreement. My reason for doing so was because the hon. member for West Toronto had referred to the people who were parties to the agreement. At page 884 of the unrevised 'Hansard,' I quote from the speech delivered on April 6 by the hon. member for West Toronto :

> The government last year closed this bargain with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, they were negotiating with and closed a bargain with a company that had no backing, with a lot of fakirs who proposed to get the Grand Trunk Railway Company to endorse their scheme.

In order that the House may know exactly to whom he refers as being fakirs, I quote from chapter 71 of the statutes of Canada, 1903, page 463. This is the agreement and these are the people with whom the bargain was made and with whom the bargain was closed. He makes no distinction between those who conducted the negotiations and others, but he refers substantially to the one set of men, and they are as follows :

> This agreement made the twenty-ninth day of July, 1903, between His Majesty the King, acting in respect of the Dominion of Canada, and herein represented and acting by the Honourable William S. Fielding, Acting Minister of Railways and Canals, of the first part ; and Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson, C.B., G.C.M.G.; the Right Hon. Lord Welby, G.C.B.; John A. Clutton-Brock ; Joseph Price, Alfred W. Smithers, all of the city of London, England ; Charles M. Hays, Frank W. Morse and William Wainwright, all of the city of Montreal, in the Dominion of Canada, and John Bell, of the city of Belleville, in the said Dominion, representing herein and acting on behalf of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, a company to be incorporated by Act of the parliament of Canada at the present session thereof, of the second part.

He may say that no person outside of those whose names I have mentioned in the language he used was referred to. But there is not a man on this side of the House, there is not a man on the other side of the House, but knows and knows full well that the reference which the hon. gentleman made—yes, I venture to say the cowardly reference—was to two men. These men were formerly members of the House of Commons and they are now members of that respected and honoured body, the Senate of Canada. The hon. member for West Toronto referred to Senator William Gibson and to Senator George A. Cox. Senator Gibson occupied for years a respected position in this House. He represented the constituency of Lincoln and wrested it from the enemy. He not only did that, but he was the assistant whip when I first became a member of this House in 1896, and afterwards was the chief whip of the Liberal party. Senator Gibson was one of the foremost contractors in the entire Dominion of Canada. The largest public works in the way of railway construction in the Dominion of Canada stand to-day as monuments to his industry and financial standing. Not only that, but he is president of the Bank of Hamilton, one of the largest financial institutions in the Dominion of Canada, and I wish to say to the hon. member for West Toronto that his name is without a stain, that his record is without a suggestion of fakirism, either in public or private life. I come to the other gentleman, Senator George A. Cox. His name has been bandied from the other side of the House, and I propose to mention his name, because this side of the House has nothing to conceal. We never hobnobbed with, we never endorsed, we never appointed anybody to that honourable body, the Senate of Canada, of whom we had reason to be ashamed. Neither we, nor the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company nor the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, were ever associated with any men but those whose name and record were upright and spotless. Senator George A. Cox stands to-day as president of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, one of the best and most respected financial institutions in the Dominion of Canada or on the continent of America, an institution whose branches have extended to the metropolis of the west, whose branches are found in New York city and the other large cities of the American republic. In London England, across the Atlantic, you will find the Canadian Bank of Commerce, and I say that the directors and shareholders of the Bank of Commerce are quite as respectable in their standing in this country, and have under their direction an institution quite as prominent and whose position is as well assured as that of any institution with which the hon. member for West Toronto has ever been identified. Towards men of that standing and of that financial ability, who have worked themselves up from poor men to be the financial kings of the Dominion of Canada, it ill-becomes the hon. member for West Toronto to use such language, if these are the men to whom he refers as fakirs. Not only is Senator George A. Cox president of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, but also of the Canada Life Insurance Company, an institution in life insurance of which every man in Canada to-day is proud. He is also connected with the Western Assurance Company. In point of fact, there is not a single man in the Dominion of Canada, from one end of it to the other, whose record as a financier is higher than that of Mr. Cox, at whom the hon. member for West Toronto, tinged with an after-dinner glow, in the exuberance of his spirit, sought to throw mud at by calling him a fakir. In this whole debate there seems to have been a desire, starting with the leader of the opposition down to the hon. member for West Toronto, to throw stones at reputable men and to indulge in a style of debate that has been hitherto unknown in this House. I turn to the 'Hansard' of April 5, and I find this statement made by the hon. leader of the opposition :

> If he ever used any language with regard to the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to the Georgian Bay——

That was the Hon. A. G. Blair to whom he referred——

> —he would have expressed himself absolutely in contradiction to what he said in a carefully prepared memo. In a memo. which he published, Mr. Blair said this——

I want you to note, Mr. Speaker, 'in a memo which he published.' That statement is made on April the 5th. That memo was never published until it was published last night in the Montreal 'Star'—on April 12th. I defy any hon. member sitting on that side of the House to state where it was published. Let us come up to it and meet it fairly and honestly. Let us know what kind of politics we have in this country ; let us know how far the political honour of men is sacred in this House ; let us know what is the duty, so far as that honour is concerned, of the leader of a great party. Mr. Speaker, that was an absolutely private memorandum from which the leader of the opposition quoted. It was marked 'confidential' on the top ; it was printed for the fellow ministers of a cabinet minister, and for their use only, and it was stolen by some civil servant, the political ally of the hon. gentleman opposite. And on the 5th day of April, the leader of the opposition, having gained possession of that privileged communication ; of that confidential memorandum, of that memorandum marked 'confidential' as between cabinet ministers, reads it in this House, and in order to cover up his tracks and in order to save himself from being charged with one of the grossest breaches of professional conduct and etiquette—not to say anything of political etiquette—that was ever ventured in any parliament wherein the English language was spoken ; he said it was published. The leader of the opposition knew very well that whether he found it or acquired it—and he did not find it ; he got it and he got it wrongfully, and he knew when he he got it that he had no business with that memorandum, and he knew it was got by reason of being stolen by some person in the employ of this government and to whom the kind hand of charity and forbearance has been extended by this government—the leader of the opposition knew that he might just as well find a private letter belonging to any man or any woman in the street, a letter marked 'private' and 'confidential' and bring it into this House and read it ; and then in order to cover up his conduct, make the misstatement that the matter was published. I say, Mr. Speaker, if political morality in this country; if political honour, if political etiquette has got to that low ebb in which such things are not sacred ; and that this can be done in order to score a point against the Grand Trunk Pacific and to help his ally, the member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) and the Canadian Pacific Railway to bleed further and for some years to come, the farmers of the Northwest Territories ; then it is time the people of this country should know it.

Then, Sir, I have another precious document in my hands. I have here a document headed 'The Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada. Minutes of proceedings at the ordinary general, half yearly meeting of shareholders, held at the Terminus Hotel, Cannon Street, E.C., on Tuesday, March 8th, 1904, Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson G.C.M.G., C.B., in the chair.' I listened to the hon. member for West Toronto reading statements alleged to have been made by Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson at a meeting of the Grand Trunk shareholders held in London. I thought it was more than passing strange that we had not heard this before, and I therefore set out to see what the minutes of that meeting were. I searched and searched the London 'Economist' I searched the 'Financial News' and I searched 'Herapath's Railway Journal,' all printed and published in London, England. It struck me that a great enterprise involving the construction of over three thousand miles of railway in Canada, and with a great railway company behind it, having 40,000 shareholders in England, Ireland and Scotland, with about $200,000,000 of invested money in this country; it struck me that the great London newspapers would have taken sufficient cognizance of the fact to report all the important references and all the important utterances which were made. But, Sir, I found in none of these papers any such stuff quoted as that which was printed to be quoted by the hon. member for West Toronto. I knew that the financial men of Edinburgh and Glasgow, and the financial institutions of Scotland were heavily interested, but in none of the Glasgow or Edinburgh papers could I find any such statements reported. I wondered where it came from. And where do you suppose it came from? It came from the hand of the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler), who says he hired a stenographer, or that a stenographer was hired, to go into that meeting for the purpose of taking down the actual statements, word for word, as they were uttered. Now who do you think was interested in having those words taken down? Why it is the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Osler) who was so interested. The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) is so generous and so anxious that the people of this country should not be imposed on, that he had it printed at his own expense. And here it is; I hold it in my hand as a monument of the generosity of the hon. member for West Toronto. Is there a man in Canada who believes any such report as that? What was it got up for? Is there a man who believes that these great financial journals would not have contained a record of that meeting which was so important to the financial men of England, and to the financial men of Scotland? Why the whole thing is put up for the purpose of trying to show that Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson either misrepresented the facts to his shareholders, or that this government is disagreeing with his views, and in order to bolster that up they pretended to have smuggled a shorthand reporter into the meeting, and this is the product of his labours. The hon. member for West Toronto, went to considerable expense; he went to considerable trouble. I suppose he thinks he did it in the interests of the bleeding and suffering humanity whom he did not wish to see the Grand Trunk Pacific imposed upon; but out of whom he hoped for years to come to be able to get undiminished dividends for the Canadian Pacific Railway; of which he is the mouth-piece in this House, the director, and the inner cabinet minister.

I listened with interest to the hon. member for West York (Mr. Campbell) and he pointed out another reason why gentlemen on the other side of this House are opposed to this enterprise. He pointed out that the Canadian Pacific Railway were carrying at a lower rate the merchandise from American ports to the west than they are charging from Canadian ports. I am within the judgment of every man in Canada when I make the statement, that wherever there is competition in transportation, either by rail or water, or mule-pack train if you like, you find lower rates than you find where competition does not exist. There is not one particle of bona fide railway competition today in the Northwest or in Manitoba. You have got there the Canadian Northern and the Canadian Pacific Railway, and they have made their amalgamation to use each others lines, and they have come and gone to bed together. The result is, that the farmer of the west has to pay the combine rates of freight and he will have to pay them until the Grand Trunk Pacific gets into the country, to relieve him from the incubus under which he is groaning. To-day, the American railways are carrying the product of the American manufacturer to the Canadian cities in the Northwest Territories, at a lower rate than the Canadian Pacific is carrying the factory goods of the Canadian manufacturer to the same points. That is the kind of thing that the Conservatives in this House stand up and defend. The Canadian manufacturer is at a disadvantage to the extent of the difference in the freights from the American factory towns in the Northwest, as compared with the rates from Canadian factory towns to the Northwest, and yet, gentlemen opposite are in favour of that. The hon. the leader of the opposition and his supporters pose as the friends of the Canadian manufacturer, and yet they stand up in this House and oppose a policy which will give him railway competition that will reduce his freight rates, in order that the product of his factory can reach Winnipeg, Brandon, Moosejaw, Regina and the other points west at the same rates of freight, or lower rates of freight than his rival American manufacturer now enjoys. The leader of the opposition says: increase the duty. Well, it must be self evident to every man that if the duty is increased to help the manufacturer out, the western ranchman, and the western consumer, must pay the increase in price. That is the kind of policy that the leader of the opposition, assisted by the disinterested gentleman from West Toronto wants to perpetuate.

I come now to the last plank in the platform of the hon. leader of the opposition, and that is government ownership. That is a new found child ; that has not had birth very long upon that side of the House. Sir John Macdonald never favoured it ; Sir John Macdonald the distinguished leader of their party spoke against it ; Sir John Macdonald said that no railroad could be run as economically by a government as it could by a company. There was a commission in 1892, and I will read now what the Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals, Mr. Collingwood Schreiber, had to say about it. Mr. Schreiber is not our appointment. He is not a man who can be accused of being a Grit partisan; I do not say that he is a Conservative one, but he is not a Grit partisan at all events. Here is question No. 3,223 which was put to him and here is his answer :

When you come to go through farm lands or wild lands, do you have much trouble? We generally have very little trouble with farm lands. But there is an instance of a piece of land that was taken for the Intercolonial Railway for a gravel pit in the wild woods near Gloucester Junction for which the government offered $5, I think. Afterwards they increased the offer somewhat, hoping thus to settle the matter. The owner is now claiming $70,000 for the land.

And I may add, for the benefit of gentlemen opposite, that the government, the Conservative government, paid the modest sum of $16,000, for that gravel in the bush near Gloucester, New Brunswick. That is a sample of what you run up against with government ownership. Sir John Macdonald realized it ; the leaders on the Conservative benches in the past realized it ; they were against government ownership ; even the leader of the opposition voted against it last year. The Conservative Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart), although he voted twice against it, and made a speech this session on both sides of the fence, says that perhaps he is against it, but to-day he don't know. Now what does government ownership mean ? The western man believes, and is not far wrong, that with government ownership he would get lower rates by the easy process of squeezing the politicians, than he could obtain from a company line. The annual deficits arising from the unprofitable rates would have to be met, not by him alone, but largely by the people of the old settled parts of Ontario and Quebec, who are served by company lines ; in other words, the latter would not only have to pay company rates for the hauling of their own products, but to submit to be taxed for the transportation of those from the west, which to some extent enter into competition with theirs—a state of affairs they would hardly appreciate. The leader of the opposition must see that the equities of the case call for one of two things—either all the lines in the country should be purchased and operated by the state, or existing state lines like the Intercolonial should be turned over to company control. In no other way can even-handed justice prevail throughout Canada in the important matter of rates.

There is a point, however, which the western settler is apt to overlook. Suppose we did extend the Intercolonial to Winnipeg, Edmonton or Port Simpson, what would it do for branch lines ? Does any one imagine that the government could build such lines paralleling or in direct opposition to those of the Canadian Pacific and Canadian Northern, which have been bonused by the people and in which a great amount of private capital has been invested without imperilling the public credit ? To put it more strongly, can any one suppose that any government, Liberal or Tory, could do so without incurring the stern opposition of those two companies and having to face it in the cabinet chamber, and above all, in the party caucus ? And what, in all likelihood, would be the attitude of the members from the older provinces, who, it is well to remember, still control parliament ? In the case of the proposed Grand Trunk Pacific, Ontario and Quebec set much store on the fact that, as a child of the Grand Trunk, it will have the advantage of direct connection with the network of Grand Trunk lines and branches in those provinces ; will be able, that is, to collect merchandise going west and distribute products coming east at minimum cost. Such an alliance is manifestly of just as much importance to the western settler. But if we had to depend on an extension of the Intercolonial, as the leader of the opposition suggests, it would either have to do without feeders in Ontario and Quebec or build them in opposition to existing lines, which would create the same difficulty as before.

But supposing the scheme of the hon. gentlemen opposite should be carried out, and the road should be extended as far west as Winnipeg or Edmonton, where are they going to get branch lines to it ? Do you suppose, Sir, that when the hon. gentlemen come into power in 2005,

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. COWAN. I use the 2000 advisedly, but I will take off the five—suppose that in the year of grace 2000, the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) should happen to be a member of the government, being still Canadian Pacific Railway director and member of its executive, bondholder and stockholder, and that there should be a combined arrangement for running powers between the Canadian Northern and Canadian Pacific Railway ; suppose that the member for West Toronto, the financial critic, should be the Minister of Finance in this country, would not that government road have a sweet time getting branch lines against the Canadian Pacific Railway? Supposing that I throw off 75 years and assume that the opposition should chance to come into power in 1925, and that the Intercolonial should be extended to Winnipeg, I wish to ask the members of this House in all seriousness what freight would be turned over to the Intercolonial by the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian Northern if it lay in their power to divert it from the government road? Are they going to hand over to the Intercolonial the freight which they can carry by the Soo line or by the other line of which I spoke this afternoon on a shorter haul, with better grades and through a better country. Is the philanthropy of the Canadian Pacific Railway going to rise up in the interests of the taxpayers of Canada and hand over to the government road freight which they could themselves carry, and deprive themselves of the advantages they would obtain by hauling it down to the seaboard over their own line? No dreamer on the opposition side of the House would suppose that, not even the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler), not even the maiden who was asleep in the Midsummer Night's Dream, when he soared into the fairyland of poetry. But, Sir, it may be said that the hon. member for West Toronto would be outvoted or outinfluenced by the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart), who might be back at his old post. We have not had much experience of the construction of railways under the direction of the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart), but I presume that we would have the same sort of economy and care as he exercised in the construction of the Curran Bridge and the Tay Canal. I was very much amazed to find that on page 877 of the unrevised 'Hansard,' the hon. member for South Lanark said that the Intercolonial could be run and have a profit of from $1,000,000 to $1,500,000. Did the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) believe that? If he did, I call his attention to the fact that when he was running the Intercolonial he had a deficit in every year but one of from $500,000 to $1,000,000. When this government came into power—and here again we see the association and that spirit of camaraderie between the leader of the opposition and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company—when we came into power in 1896, we found an agreement in existence between the Intercolonial Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway, such as never existed between any other two railways. By this agreement the Canadian Pacific Railway ran over the Intercolonial Railway from St. John to Halifax. The Canadian Pacific Railway ran a passenger train one-half hour ahead of the Intercolonial Railway. The Canadian Pacific Railway train was filled and the Intercolonial Railway train came thundering along half an hour afterwards, empty. The Canadian Pacific Railway train I think was drawn by an Intercolonial railway engine without expense to the Canadian Pacific Railway, just for the accommodation of the public, and the philanthropic Canadian Pacific Railway pocketed the proceeds and the fares. That is a sample of government ownership under the hon. gentlemen opposite. Not only that Mr. Speaker, but Intercolonial freight clerks and Intercolonial Railway ticket agents could not suggest to any man who wanted to travel or to ship a pound of freight that he should travel over or ship his freight by the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. Blair, who has been quoted so often by hon. gentlemen opposite in this debate, repudiated that contract and cancelled it. All the bouquets which they then showered on that hon. gentleman did not grow in hot-houses, and the language they used in describing his conduct is not to be found in John Wesley's hymns. That was a contract, Sir, detrimental to every man, woman and child in Canada except the Canadian Pacific Railway stockholders. Where then was the hon. the leader of the opposition? Was he then asking for a government ownership, for cheaper rates, for reduction of burdens? No, Mr. Speaker, the oracle of to-day was then silent as the mermaid by the sounding sea. He did not then exclaim to the people of the Dominion: that is a contract which is not in your interest, but in the interests of the Canadian Pacific Railway. No, he opened not his mouth, except to abuse the ex-Minister of Railways, Mr. Blair, for having cancelled that agreement. Hon. gentlemen on that side exhausted all their energies, eloquence and argument in abusing us because we dared cancel that contract. They poured out on us all the vials of their wrath, and all for what? Simply because their ally the Canadian Pacific Railway was being hurt. I say, that if that is the way the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) is going to save to the country a million and a quarter dollars, he reminds me of that old, old story of the boy who was asked if his father was a Christian, and who replied: yes, but he has not been working at it lately. This streak of prudence, this streak of economy, this sudden zeal to husband the resources of Canada and make them yield a profit instead of a loss—all this depends upon where the profit or the loss is going. Take the record of these hon. gentlemen from the beginning, and you will find that, wherever the interests of the Canadian Pacific Railway clashed with those of the Dominion, these hon. gentlemen have always been ready to rise and defend that great corporation. Only one man among them all has ever manifested a spirit of independence and said a word against the Canadian Pacific Railway in favour of the interests of Canada, and that man was a former member for Toronto, the editor of a great newspaper, Mr. John Ross Robertson. I ask you, Sir, if there is a man in this country who, when he considers the facts, when he considers how these hon. gentlemen abused us for having cancelled that contract and when he considers their readiness to have this government purchase the lean section of the Canadian Pacific Railway around the north shore of Lake Superior and thus enable that company to unload it on to the suffering, generous and unsuspecting public of this country—will any man who considers all these things believe that there is not some all-compelling influence behind these hon. gentlemen? Is it any wonder, that when the hon. the leader of the opposition finds himself confronted with so remarkable a record, he should feel bound to excuse himself by saying that the scheme he proposes was not suggested to him by the hon. member for West Toronto or the Canadian Pacific Railway? Well, I do not suppose that the Canadian Pacific Railway magnates made a personal suggestion to the hon. gentleman. There are always more ways than one of doing a thing, but does anybody believe that this scheme, propounded by the opposition, did not emanate from the Canadian Pacific Railway? Is there a man, woman or child who does not believe that the Canadian Pacific Railway were behind it, lock, stock and barrel, and that the hon. member for West Toronto was loading the gun, poor though the ammunition may be, ready to fire it in favour of an enterprise that would swell the coffers of this company and milk the Canadian people? Mr. Speaker, there cannot be any other conclusion arrived at; but if this scheme was never suggested by the Canadian Pacific Railway to the leader of the opposition, then did you ever in all your life see a man so under the influence of this immense corporation that he does its bidding and tries to pull chesnuts out of the fire for it without being asked to do so? So my hon. friend can hang himself up just on whichever horn of the dilemma he pleases. A few moments ago I made the statement that the late Sir John Macdonald was opposed to government ownership, and if the House will bear with me, I shall give it convincing proof of my statement.

Sir John Macdonald had a great deal to do with launching the Intercolonial and had to keep himself informed regarding its management both by the commission which he had appointed and by the government directly. He justified its construction by government chiefly on the ground that it had to be built in a hurry in order to obtain an imperial guarantee of bonds, to which a time-limit had been attached. Reading his speeches, however, one can see that he grew tired of the incessant clamour in parliament and the press about frauds and shortages, bankrupt contractors and contractors and employees who had made fortunes with suspicious ease. All this taxed his patience, for he had to defend it in the House, and so, after a while, we find him desirous of turning over the operation of the line to a company. (Commons reports, April 12, 1870). 'The construction of the road,' he said, 'was one thing, the working of it another; and after construction the government might lease to the Grand Trunk or to the company spoken of by the hon. member (Mr. Connell, of Carleton, N.B.)'; and he went on to confess that 'if the railway were worked by the government, it would be subject to the evil of having political friends appointed to positions for which they were not well fitted.' At a later day, when the Canadian Pacific project was up, the recollection of the Intercolonial led him to pronounce emphatically against both government construction and government operation, ('Hansard,' January, 17, 1881):

> The government has every right to use all their exertions in order to relieve themselves and the country of the obligation of building this road (the Canadian Pacific) and of the still greater obligation of running it. We see this in the Intercolonial and in every public work. Why, Sir, it is actually impossible for the government to run that railroad satisfactorily. The men we put on the road from the porter upwards become civil servants. If one is put on from any cause whatever, he is said to be a political hack If he is removed, it is said his removal was on account of his political opinions. If a cow is killed on the road a motion is made in respect to it by the member of the House who has the owner's vote as support. The responsibility, the expense, the worry and annoyance of a government having charge of such a work, are such that, for these causes alone, it was considered advisable to get rid of the responsibility.

Sir John Macdonald was a great statesman, a man of whom every Canadian, irrespective of his political opinions, may be justly proud. Hon. gentlemen from that side of the House show their respect each year on the anniversary of his death by making speeches at the monument erected in honour of his memory and placing flowers on his tomb. I would then commend to these hon. gentlemen the utterance of their own leader, given in 1881. If the reasons he then advanced were good as regards the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, they stand good to-day. When the hon. leader of the opposition desires to quote any authority, I ask him to quote authority that is respected on his own side, and that carries weight with us all.

Mr. Speaker, I have already detained the House too long. I need scarcely say, in conclusion, that it is my intention to vote for the project before the House as being one well calculated to promote the best interests of the people of the Dominion. And I shall give a more than willing vote against the amendment, which I believe would result, if carried into effect, in placing, not only the farmers of the west, but the manufacturers of the east and the fruit-growers of my own constituency more than ever in the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The interests of my constituents are identical in principle with the interests of the rest of Canada. To-day, owing to the high rates that are charged by the Canadian Pacific, American fruits are carried from the other side of the Detroit river to the Northwest, to the exclusion of a better article grown by our own people, backed by Canadian capital--the product of our perfect Canadian climate and of skilful and intelligent Canadian labour.

Mr. E. GUSS PORTER (West Hastings). Mr. Speaker, if it would not bring the blush of shame to my face or provoke a feeling of disgust in this House, I should feel like offering my congratulations to the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Cowan) on the manner in which he has apparently rehashed some of the back-country speeches that he is accustomed to deliver in the riding from which he comes. While we must admire, in a certain sense, the hon. gentleman's performance, we must admire also the evident pleasure with which the hon. gentleman listens to his own voice, as well as the air of confidence with which he presents what, to his mind, evidently is an excuse for the project offered by the government, known as the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway deal. But I have noticed, during the short time I have been privileged to occupy a seat in this House, that the hon. gentleman presents with the same air of confidence, and in the same musical voice, whatever case he may have to offer, whether that case be good or bad. These things do not, therefore, inspire me with confidence in the ideas the hon. gentleman expresses. Any one who listened to the hon. gentleman can hardly have failed to observe that during the greater part of the two hours and some minutes which he occupied with his speech, he addressed himself to matters wholly foreign to the question under discussion. He took pains to point out with a great deal of particularity what he deemed to be errors of the Conservative party in regard to the C.P.R. project, but it is to be observed that he carefully avoided any defence of the scheme proposed by the government. He talked at great length of the good qualities of the United States of America, and of what the people there had done in constructing transcontinental roads, as well as of the advantages which that country had reaped from those enterprises. But he carefully avoided any discussion of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway which is now engaging the attention of this House. Very much to his discredit, as it seems to me, he alluded to the remarks of the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) in a manner not becoming to any hon. member of this House. But, while he spoke in this way of a fellow-member, he saw fit to eulogize the officials of the Grand Trunk Railway. For these reasons, and on account of the way the hon. gentleman has approached this question, I will refuse to follow the course he has adopted; and I refuse, as I believe every hon. member on this side will refuse, to enter upon the line of discussion pursued by the hon. gentleman.

It has been well said that truth is stranger than fiction. That that statement is true one would not require any better evidence than would be afforded by a perusal of the contract and the supplementary agreement entered into between this government and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. If the first knowledge one had of this remarkable contract were gained from reading it in some book, one could easily believe it to be the production of an imaginative genius like Edward Bellamy, and a fitting sequel to his celebrated story 'Looking Backward'; unless one might confound it with the popular nursery story by Rudyard Kipling, which tells us how the elephant got his trunk. For, Sir, I think it would require the vivid imagination displayed in the one, or the sublime innocence exhibited in the other, for one to believe that such a story as we read in the pages of this Grand Trunk Pacific contract could possibly be told in the cold world of fact. The story by Rudyard Kipling, to which I have made reference, being a nursery story, may not be familiar to members of this House. But, to my mind, it is a very apt illustration of the progress of events in this contract between the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway and the government. It is related by Kipling in that story that formerly the elephant was possessed of a short, stubby nose as big as a boot. But the elephant was filled with what the author calls 'satiable curtiosity.' He asked many questions and found out many things. One day the elephant conceived the idea that he would try to find out what the crocodile had for dinner. So he visited the marsh where the crocodile is well known to inhabit, and when he approached and asked the question, he found the crocodile a most obliging companion. He was induced by the smiles and wiles of the crocodile to approach closer and closer, until, arriving near enough, the crocodile grabbed him by his short nose, and then the tug of war began. The crocodile pulled in one direction and the elephant pulled in the other, and it was only when the crocodile had succeeded in stretching that short nose to the length of five or six feet, that the elephant was enabled to shake him off. The elephant, with its long trunk before him, thought it would be an encumbrance, and that it would continue with him through life. But he soon discovered that instead of its being an incumbrance, it was a very useful appendage, for he found that he could reach up and pluck bananas from the trees instead of waiting until they fell to the ground, as he had to do before. If he wanted to eat grass, he could pluck it from the ground with his trunk instead of getting down on his knees as before. He found it to be a useful weapon of defence, so much so, that he became the terror of the whole neighbourhood in which he roamed. I think, Mr.

Speaker, that fairly illustrates the relative position of the Grand Trunk Pacific and this government. Originally the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway nose only reached as far as North Bay. When it reached that far they approached this government and were anxious to find what they had that the Grand Trunk Pacific might possibly want. They found this government a most obliging companion, as the elephant found the crocodile, and they were coaxed along by degrees until such time as this government grabbed the nose of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and then the tug of war began. At first the nose was stretched out as far as Quebec, and finally it was stretched as far as Moncton before the Grand Trunk Pacific could shake this government off. And, Sir, the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway at that time were inclined to kick. They thought this stretch had been too great, that this unusual appendage would be an incumbrance to them. But they soon found, like the elephant, that it was a very useful thing to have. They found that by the agreement entered into by this government and themselves they were able to pluck the bananas in the way of profits arising out of this road, that they were able to free themselves from the obligations and responsibilities that would otherwise be imposed upon them. And so they found it a most valuable assistance in defending themselves, both against this government and against this country, until they have grown to be not only a terror to the government but a terror to this country in which they are to obtain a foothold.

Last session, Sir, I took occasion, when this Grand Trunk Pacific Bill was under discussion, to express at some length, my views upon the measure generally, and to give some of the many reasons that justified me in my opposition to that enterprise as set forth in the agreement accompanying it. I would not now make any further remarks upon the question, but for the fact that this government has seen fit, during the recess between last session and this session, to alter, modify and change that agreement and the terms under which that road was to be constructed according to the original agreement brought down to this parliament. Now, it might be supposed by my constituents, or by those who have any interest in my conduct in this parliament, if I kept silent, that these changes and alterations had wrought a change in my opinion, and that I had become converted to the policy that is now advocated by the government in regard to building this road. I may say, Sir, as I took occasion before to say, that with the original proposition of the Grand Trunk Pacific to build a line from North Bay westward, I was in hearty accord, and am now in hearty accord with that proposition if it be surrounded with proper safeguards and restrictions. I believed the original proposition to be not only advantageous to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, but also beneficial to Canada in assisting to solve the transportation question, so seriously menacing the western part of this country. But, Sir, I as strenuously opposed the construction of the eastern division that has been tacked on to the original proposition of the Grand Trunk Railway as I enthusiastically supported the western division, because I could not, after carefully considering the whole question, bring myself to the conclusion, either that it was a good business proposition for the Grand Trunk Railway, or one that could possibly be for the general advantage of this country. On the contrary, I was convinced that the proposition was one that was detrimental to the general interests of Canada, and that the late Minister of Railways and Canals has properly characterized it when he said in this House that it was a wholly unjustifiable waste of public funds.

In arriving at that conclusion, I did not do so obstinately, I was not influenced merely by the fact that, as a member of the opposition, I might be expected upon general principles to oppose a measure that had been brought down by the government; but I did so only after giving this matter as full, careful and honest consideration as I was capable of, and as the subject deserved. During the days and weeks that this matter was under discussion at the last session of parliament, I listened attentively to the arguments advanced by hon. members on the government side of the House, in support of the proposition, and the general principles advocated by them as reasons why we should support that scheme. I also listened as attentively to the criticisms offered by this side of the House, to the scheme, and I carefully considered the amendment that was offered by the leader of the opposition. Upon the case as then presented, I came to the conclusion that I then expressed and now repeat. During the recess, I have taken occasion, as it presented itself to me in my travels about the country, and in my associations with all classes of people, to endeavour by inquiry, and by conversation with them, to ascertain if possible the condition of the public pulse and to ascertain what the popular feeling was in regard to this matter. Well, Sir, instead of having my opinions changed or my convictions in regard to the original scheme removed. I may say that my opinions on that matter have been very much intensified, and I am firmly convinced that outside the circles of contractors, grafters and parasites who expect to enrich themselves and to enrich their friends at the expense of this country, public opinion of this country is very strongly opposed to this proposition.

But, Sir, notwithstanding the very cogent reasons urged against this scheme from this side of the House last session, the modifications, alterations and improvements suggested, yea, pressed upon this government, whereby the interests of this country might have been safeguarded and obligations placed upon this railway company commensurate with the great advantages it was receiving from the country, bad as was the whole scheme, what do we find now? Do we find this business government coming down to this parliament with a supplementary agreement wherein the weakness of the old agreement as far as this country's interests are concerned are removed, or whereby any modifications, alterations or improvements formerly pointed out by this side of the House to be to the advantage and in the interests of the people are embodied? Do we see any of these objectionable features removed and any provisions substituted that would recommend the scheme to the favourable consideration of the people? Do we see any of these things? No, to the shame of this government, be it said, we have not any such programme as this presented to us. On the contrary, bad as the original agreement was, loudly as it was condemned by the people and the independent press, notwithstanding that it involves, as the late Minister of Railways and Canals said, a useless and extravagant expenditure and waste of public money, notwithstanding its detrimental effect on vested rights in the Intercolonial Railway, the assumption of obligations by this government which must prove to be a heavy burden for many years to come even upon this young and prosperous country, notwithstanding the detrimental effect it will necessarily have upon the development of the magnificent waterways of the country upon which this and former governments have already expended many millions of dollars and which are to-day calling out for a supreme effort on the part of the government for their completion and for the solution of the all important question of transportation. What is the nature of the programme that we have presented to us to-day? Instead of this government doing anything for the advantage of Canada, not satisfied with the neglect they have already been guilty of, we actually find this government presenting to this parliament for ratification a supplementary contract or agreement granting still further benefits to this Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company by removing the few safeguards with which the original contract appeared to be surrounded and imposing additional obligations upon the Canadian people, imposing obligations, which, to my mind, can be characterized as nothing less than a crying shame. If the Canadian people had the right to complain of the terms of the first contract, and I submit they were amply justified in so doing, they have a still greater right to feel aggrieved at the terms of the modified contract as now submitted which is nothing less than an outrage upon the rights of a free people. The very best evidence, perhaps, that could be offered that this scheme, as far as the eastern division of it is concerned, is conceived in dishonesty and born in fraud is the fact that there is an eastern division at all. Who asked for this eastern division? What necessity has been shown for it? What certain benefits or advantages are the promoters able to show will be derived from it? The strongest possible case they have been able to make out is only problematical, with the probabilities very strongly against the proposition. What have the Grand Trunk Pacific to do with this eastern division? Are they to finance it? No, the government have to do that. Are they to build it? No, the government have to do that. Are they to operate it? That is optional. Are they to pay interest on the cost by way of rental? Only in case they operate it and then only if they are able to do so from the earnings and then only after a period of ten years. Sir, this government have to expend $70,000,000 odd of the money of the people in the construction of this portion of the railway and then hand it over to the Grand Trunk Pacific to make what profit can be made out of it free of charge. If it is to be a money maker why do not the government who will build, who will pay for it and who will own it, control it as well and make a profit out of it or use it to the advantage of the Canadian people both as to the profits to be earned and as to the rates to be charged upon it? The Canadian people who are paying for it are at least entitled to this, but they are in this matter denied the ordinary rights of an owner. They are told: you shall not have the profits to be derived from this road. It is enough for you to have the privilege of building and paying for this road and we prefer to give to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company for nothing these profits rather than give them to the Canadian people in return for their $76,000,000 odd. That may be putting it in strong language, but nevertheless, that is practically what the government are saying to the people. And saying this they ask: Why should not the people of Canada be thankful and express their gratitude by retaining this government in power for having treated them with such generosity? Under certain circumstances it is just, it is humane, to put to death the fallen victim, rather than he should suffer the pains and agonies inflicted by the foe that struck him down, but in this case, as badly as the government have wounded this country by this Grand Trunk contract, they are not able to cause its death. It is bound to live in spite of the injustice done to it by the government, it is bound to prosper and I can only conceive that this government have in this matter permitted it to live apparently in order that it may be subjected to still greater humiliation, degradation and spoliation at the hands of a party whose extravagance knows no bounds and whose desire to plunder this country is evidently insatiable. On the other hand, if this eastern division is not to be a money maker, if there are to be no profits, and if therefore the government in giving it to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company for fifty years are giving away nothing, then how in the name of common sense can this government justify its construction at all or the expenditure of this enormous sum of the people's money on this useless project? If there are to be no profits from this eastern division of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway do the government expect, or will the people believe that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company are going to operate and run this road for fifty years simply for the fun of it. Or do this government expect or will the people believe that in order to make it profitable the Grand Trunk Railway Company will ruin their own lines by diverting the trade that legitimately belongs to them from their many auxiliary lines already existing and upon which they have expended many millions of dollars and build up a traffic upon the eastern division of this road in which they have not one dollar of interest, in which they have no interest of any kind or description unless it be the interest mentioned by the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Fitzpatrick) when he said that the patriotism of the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the people of the west would furnish traffic for this Grand Trunk Pacific road?

Sir, I venture to assert that the patriotism of the Grand Trunk Pacific can be well measured by the number of dollars that will be flowing into its pocket, and if any such hope lurks in the mind of any member of this house, or of any man in this country, I would advise him to banish any such idea because as surely as the sun shines in the heavens, that man will be doomed to disappointment. Will it be said then, that the government are building the eastern division of this road, and under the contract they have with the Grand Trunk Pacific, they are going to compel them to operate that road for the next fifty years, win or lose? In other words, if it were a losing venture, will this government put into bankruptcy, and ruin the Grand Trunk Railway Company which has done so much to assist in developing this country? The Minister of Justice speaks of the patriotism of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, and of the people of the west. Dare he entertain such an idea, much less give expression to it with such a gag, as I have already mentioned, in the mouths of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company? Will the government take such a position: that having the power in their hand, having the thumb screw so as to speak within their grasp, they will turn it down and squeeze the patriotism out of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company? I venture to say that the government would not dare to take such a position, nor do I believe that the Grand Trunk Pacific Company are such idiots as to enter into such a contract as that. And as the best evidence of that, we see that in the altered contract that is brought down to the House now, the few threads that were left upon the thumb screw by which this government might have used some power, or exercised some influence to see that the Grand Trunk Pacific Company were carrying out their contract in the interests of this country; these few threads are removed, and in their stead we see new obligations assumed by the government, and the Grand Trunk Pacific Company relieved from other obligations. And, instead of the government being possessed of the thumb screw, we find under this altered contract that the Grand Trunk Pacific Company have not only the thumb screw upon this government, but they also have the torture rack known as the 'no foreclosure' clause in this contract, by which they would be enabled to further compel this government to protect their enterprise. In view of these facts, is it not perfectly apparent to any person who would give the matter careful consideration, that the eastern division of this road has no connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific Company whatever? There is neither community of interest, community of property, nor community of profit. Why then burden this railway with the name Grand Trunk Pacific at all? Why not at least give it a name that will indicate to the world that it is built by the Canadian people, owned by the Canadian people, and will be operated for the benefit of the Canadian people? Let it be shown forth in its true colours, and if it is to be a valuable asset of this country, as hon. members of the government side of the House would have us believe, then in all conscience let the people of this country at least have the benefit that will be derived from a Canadian name being given to the road. But no; this government has seen fit to deny even this modicum of comfort, or that advantage to the Canadian people. But there is method in the madness of this government, and herein lies the strongest possible evidence of the iniquity of this whole scheme. Had this government dared to dissociate this part of the scheme with the business-like portion of it, as originally advanced by the Grand Trunk Railway, or to honour it with a name that would show it to be a purely government enterprise; it would carry upon its face its own condemnation. There would be absolutely nothing to recommend it to the people of this country;

it would be apparent that going from nowhere to no place, it would have nothing to support or feed it. It is to run through a portion of this country wholly unknown, so far as appears from the speeches of members on the government side of the House, or so far as any information has been gained by members on this side of the House ; it goes through a country wholly unexplored, wholly unknown as to its adaptability for agriculture, for mining, for timber, or for settlement. Its direct competition with the Intercolonial Railway, and the detrimental effect it would necessarily have on that road, and the great expenditure in its construction for these useless purposes would rise up as mountains of condemnation against such a scheme, and it would be perfectly apparent that the only object that any government could have in foisting such a scheme on this country, would be to satisfy the hungry maw of contractors and jobbers, and supply the government perpetrating such a scheme with the means of retaining itself in power against the honest convictions and opinions of the electors of this country. The connection of this eastern division with the Grand Trunk's original proposition, and giving it the name of the 'Grand Trunk Pacific Railway,' serves the purpose of this government in attracting public attention away from the real objects of the government, and it enables them, when their sins are discovered, to point to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company and to hold themselves blameless. And, Sir, it appears to me that this government is only taking another step to cover up their tracks and to hide their sins, when they adopt a course contrary to the previously declared principles of the Liberal party, of constructing this eastern division under commissioners instead of under a minister of the Crown, responsible alike to this parliament and to the people of this country. No matter what irregularities, or improprieties may arise in the construction of this road, this government can take advantage of that position and point to the commissioners and say : they did it ; they are responsible for it and you cannot hold this government responsible under the circumstances. This government has already in that matter shown its fine Italian hand by offering to the premier of the province of Quebec, the chairmanship of this construction commission.

That gentleman is said to possess no knowledge whatever of railway construction and to have no special qualifications for such a position. At the same time it has been said, and no doubt truly said, that he possesses all the necessary qualifications of a successful liberal politician. Since that hon. gentleman has seen fit to decline the appointment of chairman of that commission, and as it is probable from the appearance of things in Toronto that there will very soon be another Liberal premier out of a job, I might suggest that this government should not allow all the good things in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway to slip through their fingers before the premier of Ontario has been provided for. His well known temperance qualifications and his association with those purists in Toronto would amply qualify him for a position of emolument under this Liberal government.

When the original agreement with the Grand Trunk Pacific was introduced in this House by the premier, with his well known eloquence and force of language, he urged upon us to an unusual degree the necessity of prompt action. Time would not wait and delay in adopting the programme of the government was declared by speakers on the other side of the House to be almost criminal. We were threatened with disaster from the revoking of the bonding privilege and we must avert such a calamity by adopting the government's programme without delay. Stagnation in moving the products of the west was so great that we were told by the government supporters that we were likely to lose the benefit of that traffic altogether if we did not act on the spur of the moment. The opposition were taunted with being obstructionists because they had the courage to offer amendments to this contract which they considered to be in the interests of this country. The government declared that the terms of the contract were as fair as they should be, and unceremoniously rejected every amendment to it that was offered from this side of the House. They said that no alteration could be made and that the contract was binding between the government and the country. Every member on this side of the House felt that the amendments were not offered simply for the purpose of opposing a government measure but were offered in all sincerity, because they were believed to be, and were shown to be, in the interests of this country. The government could not see its way clear to adopting even one of these amendments or to suggest any amendments themselves. Their position then was that of a counsel, with brief in hand, defending the position of the Grand Trunk Pacific as against the people of this country whose advocates they should have been. Under the contract as originally introduced, a deposit of $5,000,000 in cash was to have been made by the Grand Trunk Pacific to the credit of this government, and opportunities were offered for the expenditure of such sums of money as were never equalled in the history of this country. The $5,000,000 was almost in sight, the letting of these contracts to the faithful friends of this government was almost in reach, and as soon as this scheme began to take form, a close student of events could see the change that was coming upon this government. Soon hints were given out that a general election was approaching. When the eastern division from Winnipeg to Quebec was added to this scheme, what had been a hint became a general rumour and when the additional branch from Quebec to Moncton was suggested what was then a general rumour became almost a certainty. Warnings were issued through the public press to the supporters of the government to be ready, conventions were being held all over this country and candidates were placed in the field, literature was sent out by this government in large quantities, although fault was found with the Liberal-Conservative party for doing the same thing and for making preparations. The $5,000,000 was almost within reach and everything was going along serenely when suddenly the startling information came that the Grand Trunk Pacific was not going to make the $5,000,000 deposit in cash and the still more startling announcement was made that the Grand Trunk shareholders were not willing to ratify the contract made with the government. The $5,000,000 and the opportunity of letting contracts were gradually slipping away from the grasp of this government. What was the government to do under these circumstances? The Grand Trunk Pacific had this government by the throat. The government had already expended thousands of dollars of the people of this country in forcing this measure through this parliament.

They had committed themselves by saying that they could not wait. They had practically shut out competition against the Grand Trunk Pacific in the construction of this road, which they had declared to be a necessity. They had assumed obligations in regard to the Quebec bridge, which their friends had acted upon and which could only be justified by the carrying out of this scheme. They had lost their former Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) in the shuffle, who, on leaving them, had subjected them to the most severe criticism that language could possibly express, and therefore to have allowed this scheme to fall through would have justified the condemnation which that hon. minister had visited upon his own government. They had prepared for a general election by putting through their iniquitous gerrymander Bill and this Grand Trunk Pacific contract. Surely this government was at that time in a very sorry plight indeed. What were they to do? Is it any wonder that under these circumstances, at a general meeting of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway in London, Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson should have made use of these words: We expected such a scheme would be carried through without in any way engaging the credit of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk meeting. He pointed out the violent opposition that was offered from this side, which has prevented the cherished object of the Grand Trunk Pacific from being attained, and he alluded to the second agreement entered into between the government and the company as a possible means of still effecting their desires.

And Lord Welby said: 'We have driven the Canadian government into becoming absolute partners with us.' It is no surprise that these gentlemen gave expression to such language. The surprise is that they did not give expression to even stronger language. Their language is moderate compared with the facts, but it may be said in this particular instance, perhaps, without credit to this government, that they have shown themselves equal to the occasion and are not going to be caught twice at the same game. Last session they relied on the undertaking of the Grand Trunk Pacific, that as soon as the necessary legislation was put through this House, a deposit of $5,000,000 in cash would be made by it and the contract entered into carried out. But the government found that the Grand Trunk Pacific did not respect any mere promises that it made any more than has the government paid respect to the many promises it has made to the people of this country. But, Sir, before bringing this supplemental agreement down to this parliament for ratification, the government took pains to see that they would not be caught at the same game again. They took the precaution to see that $5,000,000 in cash was snugly deposited in the bank to their credit and that the subsequent agreement, which they are now asking parliament to affirm, was ratified by the Grand Trunk Railway shareholders. So that now this government are in a position which they did not occupy last session. They will be in a position, after they have forced this legislation through parliament, to demand delivery of the goods for which they have paid the price.

This government has condescended to offer some explanation for the calling of this session at so late a day, and for the modification of the contract with the Grand Trunk Pacific, but I have heard no explanation or excuse made for its subsequent determination to abandon its intention of holding general elections last fall. I do not think, however, that the real reason is very hard to discover. The $5,000,000 cash which were to be deposited by the Grand Trunk Pacific and the opportunities for letting the contracts which would accompany such a scheme had slipped away, and the possibility of gaining an election in this country without those aids seemed very remote. It was no doubt these considerations which determined this government to hold another session and abandon the idea of holding an election last fall.

Let me for a few moments deal with this amended contract, or supplementary agreement as it is called, and to point out some of its features, some of the things which, to my mind, show conclusively that this government is not dealing honestly or fairly or openly with the people. Let me call attention to the clause 2 of this agreement. By clause 2 it is stated, notwithstanding anything contained in the twentieth and twenty-ninth paragraphs of the said contract, the company shall, when it shall have completed the construction of the said western division in accordance with the terms of the said contract as hereby amended, and shall have supplied rolling stock to the amount of $15,000,000, if the eastern division, shall not then have been constructed and completed by the government, be entitled to the return of their deposit.

What I desire to call attention to, with regard to that clause in the contract, is simply this. Why were those words inserted :

> If the eastern division shall not then have been constructed and completed by the government.

If it was the intention, as no doubt it always has been, that as soon as the Grand Trunk Pacific had completed the western division of the road and supplied the rolling stock as provided by the original agreement, the deposit made with the government should be returned, why was not this government satisfied to express this intention in so many words ?

Why not leave the matter as it was expressed in so many words in section 13 of the agreement, as it appears in the statute, chapter 71 of the statutes of last year. Are not the insertion of these words clear notice to the people of Canada that this government does not intend to construct this road in eight years or, perhaps, at all ? At any rate, it leaves this government an opportunity of playing upon the words of this section; it leaves it open for them to say : Oh, we could not build this portion of the road for reasons that have since appeared. But they will not say so until it shall have answered the purpose of the government in deceiving the electors into believing that it will be built. But Liberal members will say : If you do not believe that it is the intention of the government to build this portion of the road, why make such a fuss about it ? The words can do no harm. My answer is that I make a fuss about this clause of the contract, because it is being used by the government of this country to deceive the people into believing that the road will be constructed, though the government have no intention of carrying that out. This is being used for a dishonest purpose, to secure unfairly the support of the electors for the government. As I read this clause, it is practically a guarantee to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway that this government will not build, and, consequently, the Grand Trunk Pacific will not be required to operate or to furnish the rolling stock for this portion of the road. Now, let me refer the House to another clause of this contract—clause 3. This is a most peculiar clause. It reads as follows :

> 3. Pending the completion of the eastern division by the government, the company shall be entitled to lease from the commissioners, to be appointed under said Act, and to operate such portions of the said eastern division as may from time to time be completed, but upon such terms as may be agreed upon between the company and the said commissioners.

Now, what obligation does this clause place upon the railway company ? Absolutely none. It is absolutely nosensical, so far as I am able to understand. What does it provide ? Merely that, until the last spike is driven, until this portion of the road is fully completed in every part, the Grand Trunk Pacific are not under obligation to operate it. The clause does not say that they shall lease and operate it ; it simply says that they may lease and operate it. If this government should build a hundred or five hundred miles of this railway from Winnipeg eastward to nowhere in particular, does any one believe—can any one believe—that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company are going to lease and operate that portion of the road ? If this government builds a hundred or five hundred miles of this railway from Quebec westward to no place, does any one believe, or can any one believe, that the Grand Trunk are going to lease and operate it ? The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company are not such idiots. The clause serves no purpose whatever, except that, on the surface, it looks well and will assist this government in pulling the wool over the eyes of the people. Let me refer also to clauses 7 and 8 of this celebrated contract. I will not take the time of the House to read these clauses, but will merely state the effect of them. Clause 7 provides for the government exercising its rights in case default shall be made by the company in the payments of interest on the western division. And, as has already been pointed out by hon. members on this side, it provides that the government shall not have the ordinary right of foreclosure as against the railway company. It provides that the government may, upon default being made by the railway company, take possession of the road and operate it, paying one-fourth of the net earnings to the railway company and the other three-fourths may be applied by the government in reduction of the debt owed by the Grand Trunk Railway Company to the government. But I desire to point out one thing in this connection. By the original Act, as it passed in this parliament during last session, it was provided that upon the interest becoming in arrears from the Grand Trunk Railway Company to this government, that interest should continue to bear interest until it was paid by the company. But section 8 of this celebrated agreement is inserted here, and it wipes that out altogether. Let me read that section :

8. Should possession be taken as aforesaid, the right of the government to such possession shall terminate if and when the application of the proportion herein provided of the said surplus tolls and revenues shall have paid off——

What ?

—all arrears of interest.

When the government uses the words 'All arrears of such interest,' can they have reference to anything else than the arrears of interest owed to the government by the company at the time the government takes possession and control of the road ? And it is provided by section 6 of the agreement that the government cannot take possession or control of the road until at least five years of interest is in arrears. I need not call the attention of this House to what an enormous sum five years' interest upon the expenditure of this government upon the western section of this road will amount to. But until there has been default for five years the government will have no right to take control or to make any endeavour to pay themselves the debt owed by the Grand Trunk Pacific. And what I desire to point out is that the government will receive no interest on the millions of dollars of debt that will be owing by the Grand Trunk Pacific. From the moment they take possession of the road the payment of interest by the Grand Trunk Pacific to the government will cease notwithstanding the government will continue to pay interest upon it. I ask what justification is there for such a contract between this government and this railway company ? Is there any justice in this government paying the money of the people in the form of interest on a debt owing by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, and the entire exoneration of the company from the payment of interest to the government ? I shall only call attention to one other paragraph of this agreement, as nearly every paragraph has already been brought before the House. I refer to clause 11 of the agreement, which provides :

11. In case, during the currency of the lease of the eastern division, the company shall have constructed a branch line or lines running from a point or points in the said eastern division, the government shall, if at the expiration of the said lease, it shall determine to undertake the operation of the said eastern division, take over such branch line or lines as the company may elect not to retain, at such value as may be agreed upon.

To my mind, that clause is one that cannot be justified or defended. The country is tied hand and foot by that clause to buy and pay for these branch lines. It pledges itself to take such lines as the Grand Trunk Railway have found to be of no use, or found to be unprofitable and disadvantageous, and that too, not at their real value but at a price to be agreed upon. It seems to me that this government cannot acquire any of the other branch lines, no matter how desirable they may be or how necessary they may be for the successful operation of that road by the government. It is entirely a matter of option on the part of the Grand Trunk Pacific, it is a matter of compulsion on the part of this government. How easy, it appears to me, and how equitable it would have been to provide that the government might acquire such of these branch lines as it deemed advisable to take over for the operation of this eastern section, or to preserve the rights of both parties by a provision as to running rights over the same.

I need scarcely point out, Sir, that by the government's present scheme the line is proposed to be built from Quebec to Winnipeg north of Lake Nipigon and Lake Abitibi, no other places than these two being touched, great centres like Fort William and Port Arthur, in Ontario, and Montreal are left entirely unprovided for so far as the rights or interests of this country are concerned. But in order that traffic may reach these points and in order that traffic may be derived from these points, the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company have taken good care to see that they are given a right to build branch lines to these places, and that they will build such branch lines there can be no doubt, and perhaps they will build many more. Now if, at the expiration of fifty years, it appears desirable that this government should operate this eastern section, it could not reach any of these important points by these branch lines unless the Grand Trunk Pacific saw fit to allow them to do so, and it is safe to assume that the Grand Trunk Pacific would not see it in that light. Now while that is the case, the Grand Trunk Pacific would have it in their power to compel this government to buy the branch lines that it did not require for the operation of that road, and that the Grand Trunk Pacific were anxious to get rid of, and thus saddle that further obligation upon the people of this country.

I may also point out on this occasion that before the government can get rid of this jug-handled agreement it will have to declare at the end of fifty years that it will not operate this road, and no matter how advantageous its operation by the government may be, it must either give up the advantages of operating the road, or it must put itself under obligation to buy these useless branch lines. So that no matter which course it may pursue, it is bound to lose and the interests of the country are bound to suffer. To what extent, no one can tell, because it is impossible to foretell or to forecast what profits will be made out of the operation of that road, or what sum of money this government may be condemned to pay for these useless branch lines. In such an event as the government not choosing to operate the road, in order to rid itself of liability in regard to these branch lines, the prior right of operating the road under a renewal of the lease is reserved to the Grand Trunk Pacific, thus having this government tied up so that it is bound to lose no matter which position it may take. The Grand Trunk Pacific is in a position to dictate its own terms to the government as to the renewal of that lease. Now, Sir, within the last day or two there has come to light, through the efforts of that valuable and energetic newspaper, the Montreal 'Daily Star,' an article which impresses itself upon my mind as of such importance that I feel I would be warranted in reading the whole of it to this House in order that it may be placed upon the records for future reference. It is a document which will become a part of the history of this country, it is a document which, to my mind, condemns the policy of the government in regard to this Grand Trunk Pacific scheme, in language perhaps more forcible than has yet been used in the debate on this question. It is a document which shows the dishonesty of this government, a document which shows that from the commencement of this matter this government has not been dealing fairly and honestly with the people of this country. It is a document which not only condemns the principles advocated by the government but which applauds, if I may use the expression, the alternative proposition that has been offered by the leader of the opposition in this matter. At the risk of being somewhat tedious I may be permitted to read this article. The memorandum I may say, which I am about to read, is one which, according to the publication that I have under my hand, was in the possession of this government so long ago as the 10th of December, 1902. This document demonstrates that while the policy of this government is a policy of opportunism in regard to this matter, is one for political party advantage, the policy advocated by the leader of the opposition and his supporters is a policy of construction, a policy of advancement along national, intelligent and patriotic lines. It is a document in which two principal features are involved : First, the principle of government ownership, and secondly, the best and most advantageous manner and location of a third transcontinental line.

This document, I may say, is one which is penned by the hand and is the production of the mind of one who, at the time it was written, was the most able exponent on the government benches of this important transportation problem. This document to my mind, accounts in a large measure, for the extraordinary conduct of this government in not allowing the author of it, the late Minister of Railways and Canals, the Hon. A. G. Blair, access to the councils of the cabinet when this deal was being put through. He was not allowed in on the ground floor, so to speak, in conducting the negotiations with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. It also furnishes some key to the great haste displayed in rushing this Bill through before the matter contained in this document might become public property, and I do not wonder that the hon. member for South Essex, in closing his remarks to-night, felt the importance of this document and realized the condemnation that it visited upon this government. Now, permit me to read this article :

As the attitude which this government will take on applications likely to come before it at an early day to aid one or more large railway projects may possibly depend upon a proper understanding of the question of government ownership of railways in Canada, the undersigned has deemed it to be his duty to lay certain facts and considerations before his colleagues. In doing so, he has only endeavoured to present a summary of the leading facts and arguments which suggest themselves in this connection, without attempting to elaborate the main points or deal at all exhaustively with the subject.

It was only natural when this question has been heretofore mooted that the unsatisfactory showing made by the Intercolonial in times past should be pointed to as conclusive proof of the unwisdom of extending the policy of government ownership in Canada. This system has been deemed unsound because in the only instance in which the experiment has been tried, namely, in the case of the Intercolonial, the direct financial results appear, by comparison between the government road and corporation railways, to have been most unfavourable to the former. In many of the countries of Europe, such as France, Germany, Belgium and Italy; in India, South Africa and notably in the Australian colonies, the principle of government ownership has been recognized and indeed almost exclusively adopted ; and, under conditions just as serious as those prevailing in Canada, so far as political influence is concerned, these railways have been uniformly successful.

Why is it, one may fairly ask, that in Australia, where it is known the stress of political pressure is undoubtedly as great, if not greater, than in Canada, these railways not only pay all operating charges, but yield a return on an enormous capital outlay of from three to five per cent ? while the government railway in this country until very recently, has failed to meet its operating expenses out of earnings. The reason must be sought in other directions than along political lines. So great is the disparity between the results in this country and those in Australia that no amount of waste, leakage and inefficiency, even corruption, if you will, can possibly account for it.

The undersigned admits that it devolves upon him, in making out his case in defence of government ownership in Canada, as compared with that of corporation railways, to furnish a satisfactory reason to account for the financial disparity which exists between the two systems. That such disparity does exist cannot be questioned. But does such disparity exist because the Intercolonial Railway is owned and operated by government ? That is the question. To assume that the policy of government ownership is unsound because the Intercolonial Railway does not show a respectable surplus, as is done by the corporation railways, is to arrive at a hasty and unwarrantable judgment. To reach a proper conclusion one should first ascertain if the circumstances and conditions which obtain in the two systems, and which control results, are identical or, at least, nearly enough alike to make the comparison a fair one. No such inference as that government ownership is a failure can be predicted upon the test which the Intercolonial Railway affords, if a comparison of financial results is simply made and no inquiry is had into the underlying facts.

It is admitted at once that the net earnings of the Intercolonial Railway are trifling as compared with those of the Canadian Pacific and Grand Trunk. The Canadian Pacific and Grand Trunk have been able to pay dividends to their shareholders out of surplus earnings. The Intercolonial has until lately barely paid working expenses. But that ample reason exists for these different results, a few facts and a little reflection will show. First, the location of the Intercolonial road was not governed by commercial, but by political considerations. No one ever expected that the road so located would yield any direct return upon its cost. It was projected to form a political bond between the widely separated maritime provinces and the older provinces of Ontario and Quebec, the western terminus then contemplated being the city of Quebec. For military reasons it was constructed as far away as possible from the American boundary. It pursues an extremely roundabout and tortuous route in reaching its western terminus, and in so doing, it passes along a large portion of its line, through the most sparsely settled and least productive portions of the country. If traffic had been the object aimed at the road would have been built along the valley of the St. John river, but business considerations were subordinated to military and high state reasons.

Neither of the two great railway systems in Canada with which the Intercolonial is compared has been so handicapped ; but, on the contrary, they have traversed the most productive, populous and promising portions of the country. Under such circumstances, if there were no other reasons to be assigned, can the Intercolonial be considered as affording a fair test of the possibilities of government ownership ? The undersigned ventures to affirm, with some confidence, that it does not. In addition, there is scarcely a section of the government railway which is not handicapped by a keen and active water competition. A glance at the map will show how closely the road follows the St. Lawrence and sea coast almost throughout its entire length, and that neither of the two great corporation railways are subject to such a disability.

A much more important fact with respect to the government railway remains, however, to be stated. The operation of the Intercolonial by government has secured to the people of all Canada who have access to it, moderate and stable rates of transport, applied to all alike, and absolutely free from discrimination. That discriminating rates do not exist on the Intercolonial is absolutely proven by the facts that no one ever hears of complaints upon that ground with respect to purely Intercolonial traffic. The same cannot be said with confidence of other great railway systems. Secret and preferential rates are not only possible on corporation roads, but are being from time to time proved to exist on some, notwithstanding that difficulties in the way of proof are considerable ; while on the government road the public are sure of fair and equal treatment.

Mr. Blair continues :

It has no doubt come to be an accepted theory, on account of the persistency with which it has been asserted apparently by both political parties in turn, that a government road cannot be run with any approach to economy and efficiency, and that in the very nature of things government cannot bear favourable comparison with corporate management.

The undersigned is unable to agree with this generally accepted opinion, and, on the contrary, confidently affirms that in his judgment the Intercolonial will bear favourable comparison in any branch or department of its service with any other railway in Canada. There is a prevailing public impression that corporation railways are free from the kind of pressure and influence which many believe enormously prejudice the interests of the Intercolonial. Such an impression, the undersigned believes, is an entire mistake. The Intercolonial has no monopoly in Canada of these conditions, nor are the corporation railways, either in the United States or Canada, free from their effects. It is well known that railway companies are constantly seeking favours from municipal councils, from legislatures, and from parliament, and they naturally desire to stand well with the people of influence. It is only necessary in the support of this statement to mention one fact within the knowledge of many persons, that free passes are distributed by the company railways in Canada with a lavishness which finds no parallel on the Intercolonial.

The president of one of the great railways in the United States gave the undersigned much light on this question in a recent interview. He said it was a great mistake to assume that railways in the United States were free from political and other forms of pressure, that directors and leading stockholders were always pushing to secure appointments for friends, and increases of salaries or wages for persons whose employment they had secured ; that members of state legislatures could do a railway much harm or render it much useful assistance, and the railways found it to their interest to conciliate these and to extend favours to other parties. Percentages and commissions on purchases for the companies, in spite of diligent watchfulness, he was satisfied found their way into the pockets of employees, and ' knocking down,' as it is called, by collectors and conductors in the service, occurred notwithstanding the vigilance of an organized detective system. Whether waste and leakage occur in companies' roads in Canada to the same extent as they are alleged to prevail in the United States cannot be either affirmed or denied by the undersigned ; but he would be a bold man who would say that the government railway suffers from these causes and that the railway companies do not. While referring to this subject the undersigned desires to record his high opinion of the excellent character of the services rendered by the employees of the Intercolonial, and the zeal and courtesy shown by those connected with the train service in particular. If, however, it be assumed that there may be unfaithful employees in the service of the Intercolonial, and notwithstanding careful supervision, the faithless officials cannot be discovered, is it not equally fair to assume that the company railways suffer in precisely the same way and to a proportionate extent ?

Assuming that there are waste and extravagance on the Intercolonial Railway, there must surely be a method of ascertaining where, at least, waste and leakages occur, especially when the amount involved is sufficient to represent the difference between a considerable profit and an actual loss. We are told the Intercolonial Railway is a 'sink hole,' into which hundreds of thousands of dollars of the people's money is annually sunk. If this were true to any appreciable extent whatever, the channels through which the sink hole is reached can surely be traced. The undersigned has exhausted every effort himself, and has called into requisition all the aids he has been able to command in his department, without being successful in discovering either that the waste or the channels exist.

* * * * * * * * * *

The observations thus far made by the undersigned amply justify the conclusion that it is quite misleading to look for a fair test of the principle of government ownership in the experience of the Intercolonial, or to condemn that principle as inherently defective because in the comparison of net results the showing as between the corporation railways and the government railway is unfavourable to the latter. There is no good reason which can be suggested, or which, in the opinion of the undersigned, actually exists, why the government of Canada cannot apply and work out the principle of government ownership as successfully as it is being worked out in other British dependencies and in foreign lands. The main object to be attained in railway administration is the highest efficiency at the lowest cost. The Intercolonial has come closer to that point than any other railway in Canada, and if other than high state considerations had influenced its location, it would now be enjoying a most successful career. Politics have never seriously hurt the government railway since it has been in operation. The deadliest blow ever dealt to this railway through politics was when its present location, between Moncton and Lévis, was decided upon. Politics can never inflict equally serious damage again except by operating against the proper extension of the Intercolonial Railway and preventing the absorption of desirable branches as feeders for the main line. The railway between St. John and Halifax, after the first eight or ten years of its operation, it is believed, has paid interest out of earnings on the capital invested, and has since contributed to keep down the deficiency arising on the less productive portions of the road.

The undersigned may possibly be asked by his colleagues who have followed this memorandum, to what end this argument is leading. The object had in view may be frankly avowed. It is to remove, if possible, any prejudices which may exist against Intercolonial administration, and ensure a fair and open-minded consideration of the policy of further government railway extension. Not a little progress has already been made upon the Intercolonial by improved equipment, heavier engines, larger cars and other means towards securing better net results. Much remains to be done. The trebling of the working capacity of trains without increasing the number of train hands has alone been equivalent to a substantial saving of cost, although this improved equipment has only been partially effected, and is still in course of installation.

The recent cattle traffic secured to the Intercolonial, carried as it has been more rapidly over the greater mileage of the government road, and in a manner extremely satisfactory to the shippers, has been a most excellent advertisement of the Intercolonial Railway throughout the western provinces. It has fully justified the assertion frequently made by the undersigned that the Intercolonial Railway could successfully compete with the Canadian Pacific when the improvements in contemplation were in operation.

And now, Sir, comes what to my mind is the most important part of this valuable document. The ex-minister goes on to say :

There is one certain means of putting the Intercolonial upon an interest-paying basis, and that is by the extension of its line. The Montreal extension has done much, but a further extension will do more. While the government railway has captured the larger part of the traffic originating in Montreal and destined for inland eastern and even export points, it has no connections west and is allowed to take only what traffic the two corporations railways do not care to retain themselves. All winter shipments from the west ordinarily reach the seaports of St. John or Portland via the Canadian Pacific and Grand Trunk, respectively, and, although the Intercolonial is fairly well placed to carry freight to Halifax and St. John, it must always remain excluded from that portion of the business arising west of Montreal, so long as present conditions continue.

The undersigned has long held the opinion that a port on the Georgian Bay should be reached by the Intercolonial, and thus a connection had with the Canadian Northern by water transport, open and practicable for from four to six weeks longer than canal navigation. The Canadian Northern would gladly co-operate with the government railway, as it has no other railway connection nor any interest antagonistic to the government system. Duluth and Chicago would be in touch with the Intercolonial, and direct through rates could be arranged to Montreal or Lévis during the summer season, and to St. John and Halifax during the winter. By the construction of storage elevators on a sufficient scale to hold grain in quantities not going forward until navigation closed, a large and ever-increased traffic would find its way over Canadian territory and by government railway to the ocean through the gateways of Halifax and St. John.

The advantage of such extension to the Intercolonial can hardly be over-estimated. If the Canada Atlantic system were acquired a traffic-producing section of the country, with a growing local business already created, would be found on the western portion of the line ; while St. John, Halifax and Sydney at the other end would equalize the existing conditions and carry the intermediate section—a section which, it is only fair to say, has within the last few years shown signs of considerable progress and before the lapse of many years may be expected to be self-sustaining.

To the undersigned, it has always appeared as if no good reason, founded upon the highest political wisdom, existed why the province of Ontario should not be traversed by the Intercolonial. That province has been the storm centre of all opposition to the government railway. The most violent critics of the Intercolonial in parliament, as well as its most bitter opponents in the press, are to be found there, and this is because no considerable section of the people has any direct friendly interest in the railway. Relatively few people from that province travel over it. It does not touch the province, and Ontarians have been rather brought to look upon it as an ill-run and wasteful, if not corrupt, institution, tied like a mill-stone around the neck of the country, to be endured only because it was a part of the national compact, and as a piece of public property which they would gladly see transferred to the corporations for the relief of the Dominion exchequer. This feeling does not arise from sectionalism, but is rather a prejudice, fostered and accentuated by both political parties, each in their day having made a football of the question in their party conflicts. All this would be eliminated from Ontario politics as completely as the Intercolonial Railway has been eliminated from politics in the maritime provinces as the subject of party controversy, if the extension to the Georgian Bay were effected, and still more surely would this happy condition come about if it were a part of the policy of the government to extend the railway from Ottawa, or any other suitable point on the Canada Atlantic road, to the city of Toronto. Such a line on a favourable location, passing through a desirable section of the country, with a good promise of local business, it is said by persons competent to judge, could easily be found, and the question might well engage the early and serious attention of government.

Nothing, it would seem, could be devised in the way of a railway policy better calculated to strengthen the Liberal party in Ontario than this would do. If evidence were required to support this view it would be found in the enthusiasm with which the people of that province have approved the building of the Temiskaming Railway by the provincial government. Not a word is heard of the folly of government ownership in connection with that project. The fact is, public opinion is ripe to accept such a policy as a boon from the government, and as promising relief to the country from what, rightly or wrongly, people believe are the unreasonable exactions of the corporation railways. The resources of Canada are large enough to justify an enlightened policy with respect to railway and transportation problems in the west; but the government would not be supported in supplying such a policy to the west only. There must be a balancing of the railway favours to be distributed. It would be a grave political blunder to respond to the western cry—and it must be responded to—without seeing to it that the interests of the people of the east are not overlooked.

The memorandum continues:

Adverting again to the subject of rates and tolls on government railways, the opinion has been expressed that similar tolls would necessarily prevail on the government extended railway as are in force on the present main line, and, therefore, no improvement could be anticipated in a financial sense from such extension; but with this opinion the undersigned cannot possibly agree. Varying rates governing different portions of the same railway are not unusual in Canada, and such variations occur as to both local and through-traffic.

The Railway Act, in defining the powers of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, and of the Governor-in-Council, to regulate and control railway tolls, expressly recognizes a difference in tolls on different sections of the same railway; and the Act goes so far as to say that, when differences in the circumstances and conditions exist, such, for instance, rates are permissible. There are two striking as those arising from competition, difference in illustrations of the actual existence of the variations had in view: One is furnished by the Intercolonial Railway itself in respect of the section between Lévis and Ste. Rosalie and Montreal. This is defensible on the ground that when the railway going westerly reaches Lévis it makes that place a common railway point, and the line to Montreal then becomes a commercial line, located on the shortest route, instead of continuing to take a longer and more circuitous course such as the Intercolonial Railway had followed up to that point. The other, a more striking illustration, is to be found in the case of the Canadian Pacific, upon which at least three or four different scales of rates, governing local as well as through-traffic, are recognized and established as between its western and eastern termini, on as many separate and distinct sections of that railway.

If the Canada Atlantic system were taken over by the Intercolonial, the tolls now in force on that line could be maintained. No complaints have been made with respect to these tolls. That they are moderate and acceptable to the people who use the railway is shown by the entire absence of agitation, public or otherwise, against them. That these rates are also profitable is shown by the net results for the year 1902, which amounted to $618,000, or 4 per cent on $15,000,000, after paying all operating expenses for the year and making a large outlay upon betterments.

The undersigned would point out how unreasonable and unwise it would be to reject a proposal for acquiring the Canada Atlantic for the purpose of Intercolonial Railway extension, if it is on its merits a good business proposition, solely because it is feared government may be compelled to cut down rates, already moderate, below a paying basis. Such a fear—founded at best upon mere conjecture—implies a weakness upon the part of government in Canada which is not found elsewhere, and would be an admission that the Canadian government and people are unable to do what has been successfully accomplished by other British colonies and dependencies.

From the Georgian Bay to Montreal the Canada Atlantic Railway line traverses a country which is not affected by water competition, the business upon which is increasing every year, and will continue to increase. Having traffic arrangements with such a railway as the Canadian Northern Railway, the Intercolonial Railway would reach a large traffic-originating section of the western country and would become one of the large produce-carrying, exporting and importing lines of the country.

From the purely Canadian, national point of view the Intercolonial would then have advantages over any other railway in Canada. Its traffic would find an outlet during the summer months at Montreal and Quebec, and during the winter at Halifax and St. John, and there is good reason to believe that it would give the two Atlantic seaports (the Canadian Pacific also serving St. John), all the business they could conveniently handle for some time to come; and, moreover, from the point of view of its paying prospects, the outlook is in the highest degree encouraging. At present there are 400 miles of good paying railway at the eastern end of the Intercolonial Railway. Extension to the Georgian Bay, by way of the Canada Atlantic Railway, would give 300 or 400 miles of profitable railway at the western end, and, as has already been pointed out, these two ends together would be able to carry financially the less productive and intervening section and afford a substantial surplus towards paying interest on the capital outlay.

The undersigned, in concluding his memorandum on the subject of government ownership of railways, would wish to make a short reference to the project now in contemplation by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, or the leading parties connected with that corporation. Since the undersigned first called the attention of his colleagues to the necessity of devising some other method of ensuring the railway development of sections of the country needing railway accommodation, other than by bonusing or subsidizing companies, public opinion has made vast strides and is now very decidedly opposed to the policy, at least, on any large scale, or in respect of important lines which promise to become self-paying undertakings. Assistance in some form or another, it is alleged, must be given if railway needs are to be supplied, and assuming this to be the case. the question is : How shall assistance be rendered ? The undersigned has been of opinion that there are only two methods of assisting companies, in the case of such railways as have been alluded to, which would be seriously considered. One is by way of loan, payment being secured by mortgage upon the railway undertaking—the amount being limited to such sum as is required to put the railway in good working condition after taking into account the capital actually subscribed and paid in, and any sum borrowed on a first mortgage. Such a method would call for very careful supervision of the company's expenditure on construction and equipment, and would necessitate the taking of a second mortgage as security for the government loan. And it would be expected that only such enterprises should be aided in this way as would be likely to ultimately repay both principal and interest.

The other method would be by guarantee of the company's second mortgage bonds. This plan involves the same care and supervision as the first. While either of these alternative modes of aiding railway enterprises is to be preferred to the gift of a bonus or subsidy, even they are not free from grave objections.

The present disturbed state of public opinion with regard to railways and transportation arises from the feeling that tolls are excessive and discriminative. This feeling exists not only west of Lake Superior, but in Ontario as well. West of Lake Superior the great distance to ocean ports is a serious handicap, and any new transcontinental lines should be built under conditions which would make every dollar of bonds and every share of stock available in cash as near the face value as possible. If bonds may be disposed of by companies at a large discount, and stock distributed gratuitously, or on terms which produce little or no cash at all for construction and equipment purposes—which has been forbidden by law—the business, such railways may do will, for dividend purposes, be always unduly burdened and will be a grave handicap for all time to the development of the interior. With capital shares and bonds ultimately coming into the hands of innocent buyers at prices increasing with the growth of the railway traffic, it will be impossible for either a railway commission of the government itself to reduce tolls below a dividend-paying basis. An appeal from the holders of the company's bonds and shares, to fix tolls sufficiently high to insure a moderate dividend, cannot easily be resisted, and as a consequence the country through its business and traffic, is in effect as much charged, though indirectly, with the weight of these obligations as if the amount was covered by an issue of government bonds.

Moreover, the system is not sound. Why should a few people be allowed to make themselves millionaires in such a way ? No one nowadays puts his money into the capital shares of a railway company at the inception of the undertaking. It has been done hitherto ; it is not not done now, and why not ? Because with government assistance supplementing the sale of bonds the railroad can be built. And yet capital shares are issued by the million and appear later, when the enterprise becomes a success, in the hands of the purchasers who clamour for dividends upon them.

The objection to this system applies with great force to railways in our western country, where the drawbacks of a long haul to reach the market must always make a moderate or reasonable railway toll a vital consideration. It may not be possible to repair the errors of the past. It is possible to prevent their repetition in the case of new railway undertakings in the future, and the remedy lies in the immediate adoption of a policy which will ensure the construction of railways running east and west, and traversing our rich undeveloped regions in the west, under conditions which will limit the amount of dividends to be paid based upon the actual cost of these undertakings.

The ideal policy, as it appears to the undersigned, for the government to adopt, so soon as it shall be deemed necessary to take up the subject of a third transcontinental railway, would be to insure, first, that the railway shall be wholly Canadian. That it shall not promote the carriage of our export products or our imports southerly by way of United States lines of railway ; but to and from the St. Lawrence in summer and the ports of Halifax and St. John in winter. That the Quebec bridge be utilized as a part of said line, and that the railway be pushed westerly from that point by degrees to the Peace river district, through the Rockies to the Pacific coast. In the meantime, it would be well to decline all assistance to railways to which government is not already committed, and propose to parliament that railway charters covering this territory be withheld.

Such a policy as that above outlined, the undersigned believes would meet the hearty support of the Canadian people, would materially strengthen the government and would be regarded as both bold and progressive. The country is prepared to-day, as it has never been before, to assume large responsibilities in order to insure its fuller development, and government, if it fails to act, will lose a splendid opportunity of proving its capacity and courage to cope with and solve large problems in a manner commensurate with Canada's marvellous progress.

Can any one, after reading that memorandum, entertain any respect for the honesty, intelligence or patriotism of this government? This memorandum shows beyond peradventure the utter fallacy of the course now pursued by this government and the wisdom of that advocated by the opposition. It demonstrates that the policy of the opposition is in the interests of this country, and even now it would be well for this government to adopt and carry out that policy rather than pursue the course they are now doing.

The policy advocated by the late Minister of Railways in the article I have just read involves two questions. It involves, first, It involves, first, the question of government ownership, and secondly, the most advantageous location of the third transcontinental line. Concerning the first proposition, that relating to government ownership, I shall not trouble the House with any argument at present. As regards the second proposition, it involves the question whether the measure now before the House fills the bill. In the first place, does this proposed line relieve the congestion complained of? Well, no serious congestion east of Port Arthur has ever been found to exist, for the simple reason that from that point to Montreal there already exist several routes. There are the Canadian Pacific Railway, the all-water route, the Canada Atlantic road and the Grand Trunk Railway fleet and rail route. It will not be contended that these lines are not capable of handling all the present freight of the west, for years to come, and it is perfectly apparent that this projected railway cannot serve any purpose of relief except perhaps between Winnipeg and Fort William, but to relieve the congestion felt at these points, it is not necessary to have a long and expensive rail from Winnipeg to Moncton.

The second consideration is, will it reduce the rates? In this connection, I would call attention to this one fact, that four lines of railway already existing between the cities of Chicago and New York, having as perfect a road bed as possible, being equipped with the latest and most modern improvements, with the lowest possible grades and the longest possible curves and able to haul sixty cars in one train, and with the keen competition offered those four railways in the United States, we find that they cannot carry grain from Chicago to New York for less than 11 cents a bushel, and that mark you, for a distance of only 879 miles. I ask will the Grand Trunk Pacific reduce the rates? How can the Grand Trunk Pacific haul the products of the Northwest 1,400 miles, even admitting that it shall enjoy the same class of road bed and equipment as are enjoyed by these magnificent railways. Can it carry that grain 1,400 miles as cheaply as the American roads can carry it 875 miles? Upon the same proposition and figuring it on the same basis, the Grand Trunk Pacific cannot carry the products of that country from Winnipeg to Quebec at a less rate than 15 cents per bushel. It is perfectly evident from that fact alone, that this road will not have the effect of reducing the rates to the farmers of this country.

The third consideration that strikes me as involved in this problem, is; Will it connect the west with the east? It will certainly connect the west with the Quebec bridge; but it will not connect the west with Ontario or Montreal. I need not point out how very detrimental an effect it will have on those portions of the Dominion by reason of its want of connection with them.

The fourth and last consideration that strikes me as being involved in this question: Will this road carry Canadian products to Canadian ports. I shall only offer one observation in this connection. The bill as originally before the House and now in operation provides that unrouted grain shall be carried on Canadian lines. I have taken occasion to inquire from grain men and shippers generally, and they tell me that when they have any commodity to ship, they make inquiries from all lines interested in the carrying of these products and ascertain not only the quickest but the cheapest route by which they can ship. There is nothing in this Act that I can discover that will prevent the Grand Trunk Railway proper from using the Grand Trunk Pacific for a portion of the distance and then diverting the trade from that line to its main line and so carry it to Portland. The Canadian people, in my opinion, will object to being taxed to such an enormous extent as will be necessary to carry out this scheme, in order to build up the city of Portland. But they will not object to being taxed, and taxed heavily, to carry out a scheme in the interest of Canada at large, and build up Canadian ports, such a scheme as that advocated by the hon. leader of the opposition. The article to which I have referred is useful in one other respect—and I shall only make this further brief reference to it. It has been stated in this House by the right hon. Prime Minister that the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals was as strongly opposed to the proposition submitted to this House by the leader of the opposition as he was to the proposition submitted by the government. No stronger answer to that statement, no stronger condemnation of it, could be given than the memorandum I have read to-night penned by the hand of the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals himself. He says there, as distinctly and emphatically as English words can express it, that he is opposed to the scheme proposed by the government. So strongly did he feel on this point and so completely had he the courage of his convictions, that he left the government and the proud position that he occupied rather than advocate the scheme that the government is advancing to-day. And in that document he just as strongly and emphatically endorses the proposition advanced by the leader of the opposition in this House, thus giving à direct and complete contradiction to the words used by the Prime Minister.

There is only one further matter that I will trouble the House with in connection with this railway project. It has more particular relation to the province in which I am particularly interested, the province of Ontario. In making the remarks I am about to make I do not desire it to be understood that I object in any way to the province of Ontario bearing its fair share of the burdens of this country. On the contrary, I say, and I think the history of the province of Ontario and of this Dominion will prove, that Ontario has always been ready and willing, without murmuring, to bear its fair share of the public burdens. But I do object, I most strongly object to, and protest against the province of Ontario being made to bear more than its fair share of the country's burdens, or being discriminated against and its interests sacrificed for the benefit of any other portion of the Dominion. When I say that Ontario has done more than any other province of this Dominion to advance its progress and development, I am not belittling the efforts that have been put forth by other portions of the Dominion. It is only right and fair that Ontario should do so. It possesses the largest population and the greatest wealth and is in a position to do more for the advancement of the country, perhaps, than any other part of the Dominion. But, while Ontario has always shown that willingness and has done these things, it has always received some consideration for the efforts it was putting forth on behalf of the Dominion. But what is there for the province of Ontario in the proposition that is now being advocated by the government. What advantages is Ontario going to derive from the carrying out of the policy of the administration? If the expectation of the hon. members on the government side are realized, Ontario would suffer disadvantages rather than gain advantages. By this scheme the country will be saddled with a debt which is estimated variously at from $150,000,000 to $170,000,000. That debt must be paid by 6,000,000 of Canadian people. It means a debt for every man, woman and child in the Dominion of $26 on the average. The province of Ontario, having a larger population than any other province of the Dominion, will be obliged to pay the greater portion of this obligation. Let me make a brief comparison. Ontario with its population of 2,182,000 as compared with British Columbia and its 178,000, will be paying twelve times as much as that province. Compared with Manitoba, with a population of 250,000, Ontario will be paying eight times as much as that province. It will pay seven times as much as New Brunswick, with its 331,000 of population, and five times as much as the province of Nova Scotia with 459,000. Compared with the province of Quebec with its 1,648,000, Ontario will be paying one and one-third times as much as that province. As compared with the Northwest Territories, with their population of 213,000, Ontario will be paying ten times as much. And compared with the province of Prince Edward Island, Ontario will be paying twenty-one times as much of this debt that is saddled upon the country as the province of Prince Edward Island will pay.

Sir, it is worth noticing in this connection that every one of the provinces except Prince Edward Island and Ontario will meet the government expectations by receiving something for the outlay they will be obliged to undertake. But it is an entirely different proposition with the province of Ontario. To-day, by its magnificent railway system, by its water communication, that province enjoys a larger carrying trade than all the other provinces of the Dominion combined, and in perfecting it the province has expended and is expending millions of dollars. The possession of these facilities has been an important factor in building up the population, wealth, prosperity and contentment that are enjoyed by the people of that province. But what advantage, I ask, is Ontario to derive from the scheme now proposed? Instead of holding as it does now, the key of the transportation question from the west and enjoying that advantage which legitimately belongs to it, the result of this scheme will be to divert that trade from its natural channels through the province of Ontario, and send it hundreds of miles to the north of her business centres, and carry it to Quebec and Moncton to the great detriment of that province. For this reason I submit that this scheme is one that will not be to the advantage of Ontario, but it is one that will be very detrimental to her interests. The alternative scheme advocated by the leader of the opposition steers clear of all these shoals. It would provide what is necessary for her interest, it would preserve to Ontario her rights, yea, it would strengthen them, it would increase the advantages to Quebec and New Brunswick, and it would preserve the life of the Intercolonial. It would give to the government a controlling power over the freight rates to be charged for carrying products, it would give an impetus to our waterways, it would save millions of dollars of expenditure to this country, it would show that the Canadian parliament preferred the interests of the Canadian people to those of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and it would be carrying out that principle which I believe every loyal Canadian advocates of 'Canada for the Canadians.' For these reasons amongst many others, I opppose the resolution introduced by the right hon. the Prime Minister, and I most heartily support the alternative proposition offered by the leader of the opposition.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to make a reference to certain remarks which were made with regard to myself by the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. M. K. Cowan) last evening in my absence. I make this reference by way of personal explanation, as I have no desire to enter into any altercation with that hon. gentleman in regard to the matter to which he refers. In the first place, let me say that he referred more than once during his speech to my absence from the House. My absence from the House from five o'clock until six o'clock was for the purpose of having an interview with a gentleman who had come from a long distance to see me, and who was going away that evening. My absence after six o'clock was owing to a social engagement which I had made long before I knew that the hon. gentleman was going to engage in the debate. I did not know of his remarks until very late last evening, after the House had adjourned. He refers to a document from which I quoted in the course of my speech upon the resolution introduced by my right hon. friend the leader of the government. Let me state how I came to make that quotation and what I did really say—and in this connection I am quoting from revised 'Hansard,' which the hon. member for South Essex did not see fit to refer to in the course of his remarks. My right hon. friend the leader of the government, in the course of the debate on the address, at page 73 of the revised 'Hansard,' had used the following language :

> Mr. Blair stated that he was alone on the question. He could not side with the government on their railway policy, but he could not side with the opposition on theirs, because their scheme was a mad scheme.

On page 766 of revised 'Hansard' I said this :

> Let me quote what I believe to be the words of Mr. Blair, and which, if my information is correct, were communicated by him to his colleagues ; let me quote his views on the subject ; and if I am mistaken in any way as to the authenticity of this memorandum from which I am quoting, let me say that the words which I attribute to Mr. Blair and which, I believe, were used by Mr. Blair in discussing this matter with his colleagues, are words which carry great weight of themselves whether they are uttered by Mr. Blair or by any one else.

Then I went on to quote the words of Mr. Blair from the document to which I referred. Further on, at page 772 of revised 'Hansard,' I said this :

> If he ever used any such language with regard to the extension of the Intercolonial to Georgian Bay, he would have expressed himself absolutely in contradiction to what he said in a carefully prepared memorandum. In that memorandum Mr. Blair said this :

Now, the hon. member for South Essex commenced his remarks with regard to myself by attributing a disposition to me in the course of the debate which I do not think I showed at all ; and in that regard he used this language :

In this whole debate there seems to have been a desire, starting with the leader of the opposition down to the last and least, the hon. member for West Toronto, to throw some stones at reputable men and to indulge in a style of debate that has been hitherto unknown in this House.

I desire to disclaim, in language as strong as the usage of parliament will permit, any such disposition on my part in this debate. The hon. member quotes me in unrevised 'Hansard' as having used this language:

If he ever used any language with regard to the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to the Georgian Bay, he would have expressed himself absolutely in contradiction to what he said in a carefully prepared memo. In a memo. which he published, Mr. Blair said this.

These words do occur in the unrevised 'Hansard,' and as soon as I saw them, I corrected them for the revised 'Hansard'; for, to the best of my recollection and belief, I did not use any such expression as 'which he published.' I believe that to be a clerical error on the party of some member of the 'Hansard' staff; and as soon as I looked over the copy of the report which was supplied to me from the debates office, I corrected that, and it appears as corrected in the revised 'Hansard.' The hon. gentleman further refers to me in this way:

Mr. Speaker, that was an absolutely private memorandum from which the leader of the opposition quoted. It was marked 'confidential' on the top; it was printed for the fellow ministers of a cabinet minister, and for their use only, and it was stolen by some civil servant, the political ally of the hon. gentleman opposite. And on the 5th day of April, the leader of the opposition, having gained possession of that privileged communication; of that confidential memorandum, of that memorandum marked 'confidential' as between cabinet ministers; he read it in this House, and in order to cover up his tracks and in order to save himself from the charge being made against him, one of the grossest breaches of professional conduct and etiquette—not to say anything of political etiquette—that was ever ventured in any parliament wherein the English language was spoken; he said it was published.

If the hon. gentleman had been good enough—I will not say fair enough—to refer to the revised 'Hansard,' he would have seen that I had eliminated the word 'published,' which I believe I did not use. I desire to call attention to the fact that the revised 'Hansard,' containing that correction, had been distributed among hon. members of this House for some days before the hon. member for South Essex made the remarks which he did. He went on further:

The leader of the opposition knew very well that whether he found it or acquired it—and he did not find it; he got it and he got it wrongfully, and he knew when he got it that he had no business with that memorandum, and he knew it was got by reason of being stolen by some person in the employ of this government and to whom the kind hand of charity and forbearance has been extended by this government—the leader of the opposition knew that he might just as well find a private letter belonging to any man or any woman in the street, a letter marked 'private' and 'confidential,' and bring it into this House and read it; and then in order to cover up his tracks, make the misstatement that the matter was published.

I again call attention to the fact that before my hon. friend made this statement in the House, he had the privilege, if he had seen fit to do so, of looking at the revised 'Hansard,' and of seeing that that word, upon which he made the charge of a misstatement against myself, had been eliminated.

Now, coming to the charges of the hon. gentleman, I will pass over the charge which he has made against a large body of civil servants in this country, some one of whom—I do not know to whom he refers—he charges with having stolen this document. So far as I am concerned, I desire to state, in as strong language as the usage of parliament will permit, that that statement, so far as I know and believe, is absolutely untrue. I never at any time had any communication with any civil servant of the government, either directly or indirectly, with regard to any confidential business of this government; I never approached any civil servant of the government; I have never been approached by any civil servant of the government, whether Conservative or Liberal. When the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Cowan) makes the charge which he has made in this regard I say that he is speaking without the book and without any facts upon which to found his statement. My hon. friend (Mr. Cowan) goes on to say:

He got it and he got it wrongfully.

I say I did not get it wrongfully. I got it from a gentleman who was not in the confidence or employ of this government, who gave me that document without any solicitation on my part, without any knowledge on my part that it existed, and I did not even look at it for some hours after it was placed in my hands. It was placed in my hands without any restrictions whatever as to the use which should be made of it.

My hon friend (Mr. Cowan) goes on further to say:

He knew it was got by reason of being stolen by some person in the employ of the government.

I characterize that statement as absolutely and completely false.

There is one other matter which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cowan) also brought to the attention of the House and upon which he has founded a charge against myself for the purpose apparently of making a charge against the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler). He refers to a typewritten document purporting to be a verbatim report of the proceedings at the recent meeting of the Grand Trunk shareholders. My hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Osler) is not in any way responsible for that document. My hon. friend from Essex (Mr. Cowan) said in reference to this :

Then, Sir, I have another precious document in my hands.

He then describes it, and goes on to say :

It came from the hand of the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) who says he hired a stenographer, or that a stenographer was hired, to go into that meeting for the purpose of taking down the actual statements, word for word, as they were uttered.

I did not observe any such remarks in the speech of the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) and I desire to absolve him at once from any charge of that kind by saying that this typewritten document, which was afterwards printed, was handed to Mr. Osler by myself—and that he is not in any way responsible for it. The only connection that my hon. friend for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) had with this document was that I placed it in his hands for the purpose of having it printed in Toronto because it could be done more expeditiously there than in Ottawa. He proceeds as follows :

Is there a man in Canada who believes any such fake report as that ? What was it got up for ?

And then further on he proceeds as follows :

Why the whole thing is put up for the purpose of trying to show that Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson either misrepresented the facts to his shareholders or that this government is disagreeing with his views, and in order to bolster that up, they pretended to have smuggled a shorthand reporter into the meeting, and this is the product of his literary genius. The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) went to considerable expense ; he went to considerable trouble.

As I said before the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) is not in any way responsible for that stenographic report or that typewritten statement which I placed in his hands. The language of the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Cowan) if it means anything, means that I, or the member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler), or some hon. gentleman on this side of the House deliberately got up a false and pretended report and presented it to this House as a true report of what took place at that meeting. Well, Sir, I say as I said before in answer to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) that that document is, to the best of my belief, a bona fide and fair verbatim report of what took place at that meeting. I so placed it before this House, I so delivered it to hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. and if it is shown to me that that is not a fair, genuine and bona fide report, as I believe it to be, I am prepared to make any apology to this House that will be due to the House under those circumstances. Until that is demonstrated to me, I do not think that the language of the hon. member for Essex is called for, and indeed I would have supposed, if it had not been that these remarks were allowed to pass without any rebuke from the Chair, that some of them exceeded the ordinary usages and conventions of parliament. However, of that I do not in any way complain.

I have in my hands a copy of 'The Railway News,' published in London under date of Saturday, March 12th. This is a journal which has been published in London since 1844, as the title page alleges. It is called :

The 'Railway News, Finance and Joint Stock Company's Journal,' with which is incorporated the 'Railway Record, established 1844.

In the editorial columns of this journal there is a reference to the Grand Trunk Railway meeting and the concluding portion of that editorial reference is as follows :

For further details of this important meeting we would refer our readers to the report on another page. Cable advices from Ottawa since received, state that the ratification of the agreement between the company and the Canadian government gives satisfaction there, although the government confidently anticipated this result in view of the favourable arrangement.

I have gone over the report of this meeting in the 'Railway News.' I find that the report given by the 'News' of the speeches of Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson Mr. Hays, Lord Welby and Mr. Alfred W. Smithers from which I quoted in addressing the House on this subject, is, in all cases, substantially the same as that given in the document from which I quoted before this House. I took the pains to verify every quotation I made from the document referred to by the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Cowan) by comparing it with the report in this journal, and I find that in only one case was there any substantial difference. There are of course differences such as those which ordinarily appear between the unrevised and the revised edition of 'Hansard.' I am told by those who know how these meetings are reported that the reports of such meetings are always submitted to the railway company before they are published. In one of the quotations which I made from one of these gentlemen, Lord Welby, I find that the expression :

We have driven the government of Canada to become absolute partners with us in the expenditure on that mountain section.

—or some language of that kind is altered in the report in 'The Railway News' by the omission of the words

We have driven——

That is the only difference which I find between the report which I submitted to this House and that which is published in the 'Railway News.' I, therefore, desire to say, so far as I am concerned, that this is not a fake document. It is what I believe to be a true document and certainly I presented that document to the House in good faith. In order that the House may have before it the report of this meeting as published in the 'Railway News,' and in order that members may appreciate how absolutely similar the report in the 'Railway News' is to that from which I quoted in the House, I am going to ask one of my hon. friends who will follow me in this debate to read the whole of this report from the 'Railway News,' which certainly does not come from any biased source. I should have added one thing further, and that is that in the report in the 'Railway News,' the speeches from the shareholders are not reported in full. The speech of Mr. Seal is not reported in full, nor was that of Mr. A. Smith, Mr. Bennett, Mr. Girdlestone, Dr. Drysdale or Mr. Allen, from the latter of whom I quoted as reported in full in the document I brought to the attention of the House. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I merely have to say in conclusion that, so far as I am concerned, I regard the remarks of the hon. member for South Essex as absolutely and entirely uncalled for; and I take this earliest possible occasion of placing myself right before the House and before the country with regard to the matters to which he referred.

Mr. SPEAKER. I take it that the hon. member (Mr. R. L. Borden) moves the adjournment of the House?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I had not intended to move the adjournment, unless you think it necessary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER. As I understand the practice, it requires that a motion to adjourn be made, even on a question of personal explanation. In any case, if I had not assumed that the hon. member intended to move the adjournment of the House, I think I would have had to call his attention to the point and ask if he intended to put himself in order.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would direct your attention, Sir, to the fact that, when the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Copp) made a personal explanation the other day, no such motion was required of him.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. (Prime Minister). There is a difference between the statement made by my hon. friend from Digby (Mr. Copp) and the observations that have just been made by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden). The hon. member for Digby simply made a statement, without controversial matter, denying an accusation that had been made. He gave an explanation and nothing more. But my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) was not satisfied with merely making a statement, but went into an elaborate discussion in defence of his own position—

An hon. MEMBER. And of that of the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler).

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes, and sought to justify the course of that hon. member. Under the circumstances, I think that the observations of my hon. friend would call for a motion to adjourn. At all events I could not allow the hon. gentleman's observations to pass without comment, and I think a motion to adjourn would be proper. I do not know that I should move that the House adjourn, but I think that the House as well as my hon. friend will expect an answer to the statement he has made. The remarks he offered are significant in more ways than one, and I think they convey a lesson which the House will appreciate. In his impeachment of the language of my hon. friend from South Essex (Mr. Cowan) the first thing to which the leader of the opposition takes exception, is that my hon. friend from South Essex read from the unrevised, instead of the revised edition of 'Hansard.' I am very glad, for my part, that my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) has called attention to this point. He objects, and I think rightly objects, to his words being quoted from the unrevised, instead of the revised report. But I cannot but express some surprise that my hon. friend, under the circumstances, should insist so strongly on this point. What is the difference between the revised and the unrevised 'Hansard,' the unrevised contains the words 'in a memorandum which he published, Mr. Blair said this,' and so on. The hon. leader of the opposition objects to the words 'which he published.' He says he does not recollect having used those words. I can well understand that if he used them it might have been in the heat of debate, and that he did not intend to use them. The fact that they are in 'Hansard' would lead me to suppose that he had used the words without intending to use them. But he has the right to say that he did not intend to utter those words, and so he struck them from 'Hansard,' and that was all right. But, in the very speech to the report of which, in this particular, he takes exception, he used, to a large extent, a private report of a meeting of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk. I would like to ask my hon. friend if any member who took part in the discussion in that meeting of the Grand Trunk shareholders had any opportunity of revising that report? And, if not, should my hon. friend allow himself to read from a report published at first hand, which the persons whose language he intended to quote, had no opportunity to revise? And if the charge made by the leader of the opposition against my hon. friend from South Essex is to be regarded, does it not apply with even greater force to himself, for having allowed himself to quote from a report which neither Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson, nor Mr Hays, nor any one else who was there reported, had an opportunity to revise? I must say that I was surprised that my hon. friend would use such a report. The other day I received as did other members, a printed copy of that report. I am informed that I am indebted for it to the courtesy of the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler). I am prepared to thank that hon. gentleman for his intentions; I cannot thank him for his action. If the hon. member for West Toronto had intended to do me a courtesy, he should not have sent this report to me or anybody else on the floor of this House, but should have sent it to Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson, Mr. Hays and these other gentlemen from whose speeches quotations were to be made, to see whether or not they took exception to the language attributed to them, as my hon. friend the leader of the opposition has taken exception to the words attributed to him in the official report of this House. No hon. gentleman of this House will hold himself responsible for the report of his words unless he has had an opportunity of revising that report. In these days of rapid movement, where everything is done at full speed, the reporting cannot be as accurate as it might otherwise be, and we know that it is not accurate. We have the best staff of reporters on the floor of any parliament. And still my hon. friend the leader of the opposition objects to the manner in which he was reported. Will he deny to others what he claims for himself? My hon. friend need not go to the extent of having the two reports compared. They are substantially the same in the main, just as the unrevised version and the revised version of his speech are the same in the main. There may be a few changes made here and there. But, one of these changes is enough to show that a man may be incorrectly reported and reported to his disadvantage. Under the circumstances, I think that my hon. friend laid himself open to the same charge as that which he has presented against the hon. member for South Essex.

Now, I pass to the other point. My hon. friend tells us that this statement of Mr. Blair, was not published by Mr. Blair. Yet, it is in my hon. friend's hand? How did it come into his hands? My hon friend did not steal it—nobody supposes that he did. He may have got it from somebody who did not steal it, possibly. Yet, it is in my hon. friend's hands. How this memorandum did not get into the hands of the public without the violation of law in some way, I cannot understand. For as I understand it, this is a confidential memorandum presented by a member of the Privy Council to the Privy Council. No member of the Council gave out that report, for that would have been a violation of the oath of secrecy which every member takes on joining the Council. My hon. friend said that Mr. Blair did not publish it. But it is published. Who then published it, who then gave it away? How has it come into the hands of my hon. friend? My hon. friend has not chosen to explain that. Somebody put it into his hands, he says; very true, I am prepared to accept that. But the man who put it into his hands, or who put it into the hands of the individual who gave it to my hon. friend, has surely stolen it somewhere. At all events, it is a purloined document which has been introduced into the debates of this House; as to that there cannot be the shadow of a doubt. It has been published for a party purpose, and somebody is responsible for the publication. But my hon. friend has taken good care to say that he did not affirm that the matter had been published; but he has gone so far as to say this, that somebody put it into his hands. My hon. friend then must have read the document after it was put into his hands, and he must have seen that it was marked 'private and confidential.' A member of the government who uses a public document is bound to lay it upon the table of the house; he is not allowed to divulge only a part of it, if he uses it it must be given entirely to the public so that the public may see what it is. My hon. friend though a private member has not done that. At all events, we are face to face with this fact, that my hon. friend has chosen, for the purpose of his cause, to make use of a document as to the origin of which he cannot answer in any satisfactory manner to this House.

Mr. R .L. BORDEN.—So far as I am concerned——

Mr. SPEAKER. I would remind the hon. gentleman that there is really no question before the chair.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. There is this, Mr. Speaker, that under the circumstances I am entitled to make a personal explanation. If this document which my right hon. friend refers to had not been the production of a public man in regard to a public question, there might be some force in what he says. But I do not regard the statement of a public man in regard to a public question as confidential in the way in which the hon. friend regards it. I say that this is not the first that we have heard of documents 'confidential.' We have heard of this confidence before, when certain statements were made to the public of this country with regard to the fiscal policy that my right hon. friend, if he came into power, would adopt. We have heard of confidential communications made to manufacturers in Montreal and Toronto with regard to some matter, and a statement as to that has been made on the floor of this House in my presence and not contradicted by any member of the government. Are these declarations of policy so made to the manufacturers confidential, if any one becomes aware of them ? Privately expressed opinions of public men regarding great public questions, are they to be always confidential ? Are they to be so regarded when they are intended to affect the political action of those to whom they are addressed ? These statements have been made in the House with regard to this matter. I do not regard Mr. Blair's opinions, speaking as a public man with regard to a public question, as confidential in the sense in which my right hon. friend regards them. There was not in this document any party secret, it was a question of public policy, it was a matter of Mr. Blair's opinion as to a great public question—that is all and no more—which I do not regard as confidential in the sense in which my right hon. friend uses these words.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). If it be necessary to put myself in order I will, at the conclusion of my remarks, move the adjournment of the House. The words I shall use are exceedingly few. It would be a great misfortune if we should allow the real point of this debate to be lost sight of by the introduction of other matters. The document which my hon. and learned friend the leader of the opposition refers to, is not in itself of any importance, because it adds nothing to our information as to Mr. Blair's opinions. The House was aware, the country was aware, that Mr. Blair had favoured the idea of government ownership of railways. Therefore the document, in a sense, adds nothing to what the House and the country knew. But that is not the point. There is a well understood principle governing private and confidential documents, there is a well understood principle governing private property. If a man is found in possession of stolen goods the onus rests upon him of explaining how he received the goods. From that there is no escape. Confessedly, a document not in itself important—but that is not the point—a document bearing on its face the expression 'Private and confidential' came into the hands of the leader of the opposition. We do not accuse the hon. leader of the opposition of stealing the document, as my right hon. friend has explained.

Mr. POPE. You dare not.

Mr. FIELDING. No, because we are more considerate than hon. gentleman opposite, because we on this side dare not make a statement which is not founded on fact. It would be well if some hon. gentleman on the other side were equally considerate—but that is not the point. A public document bearing on its face the evidence that it is private and confidential finds its way into the hands of the leader of the opposition.

Mr. CASGRAIN. My hon. friend should have moved the adjournment of the House before speaking.

Mr. FIELDING. I have already intimated that I intended to do so. I have no intention of wandering over the whole subject and then shirking further debate by failing to move the adjournment. We have no desire to prevent the fairest, fullest and broadest discussion of this most extraordinary breach of the proprieties of public life. Again I say that a document bearing on its face the terms 'private and confidential,' comes into the hands of the leader of the opposition. It has never been published elsewhere, it has never been alluded to elsewhere, he is the first man to publish it—not the whole of it, but as much of it as suits his purpose. I say to my hon. friend that his own sense of fairness and justice must show to him that if he received that document in a proper manner it is due to himself and to his own honour and reputation that he explain how he got it. I say that the hon. gentleman stands in the position of one who has been found in the possession of stolen goods, and until he explains how the goods came into his possession, his honour as a public man is affected in the eyes of the people of Canada.

Mr. T. CHASE CASGRAIN. (Montmorency) Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER. Mr. Fielding moves, seconded by Mr. Fisher, that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CASGRAIN. It seems to me that hon. gentlemen are very much excited over the production of this document, very much excited over the publication of this document. It seems to have wrought upon their feelings considerably that this document, which they say was a private and confidential document, has been brought to the notice of the House. It must be a document which is very condemnatory of their conduct in the past, otherwise we cannot understand how it has become the subject of so excited a debate. Why, I never saw my friend the Minister of Finance so excited as he was when he got up a minute ago, and he is still pale under the emotions into which he wrought himself up. Sir, what are the facts. The facts are simply these—my hon. friend has explained them very candidly to the House. The Minister of Finance has spoken of stolen goods—I will revert to that in a moment—of stolen documents, of stolen letters. We will show where this impeachment should rest about stolen goods, stolen documents and stolen letters. What are the facts of this case ?

The right hon. leader of the government taunted my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition with putting a scheme before this House which had been called mad by the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals, the hon. Mr. Blair, and in answer to that taunt that was thrown over by the right hon. the leader of the government, my hon. friend the leader of the opposition quoted this document, or this memorandum from the hon. Mr. Blair. My right hon. friend says that it is a stolen document. Is it a stolen document? Is there anybody on the floor of this House who can get up and take the responsibility of saying: Who stole this document from Mr. Blair? Is there anybody who will take the responsibility of saying that this document was stolen from Mr. Blair, and of asking who stole it? Stolen from Mr. Blair? I deny this; it was not stolen from Mr. Blair. There is no evidence before this House that this document was stolen from Mr. Blair. My hon. friend says that after the right hon. leader of the government had spoken upon this subject and had declared that Mr. Blair had said that this was a mad scheme of his a gentleman came to him—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Does the hon. member for Saskatchewan know what the term 'gentleman' means?

Mr. SCOTT. May I be allowed to explain that I did not——

Mr. CASGRAIN. It was the hon. gentleman's neighbour to whom I referred; I did not mean you.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CASGRAIN. I cannot allow the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davis) to interrupt me.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. CASGRAIN. The explanation is given, and the explanation is that this document was placed in the hands of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition by a gentleman, and that afterwards my hon. friend the leader of the opposition used it. There is no man in this House who can bring any evidence whatever of the fact that this document was stolen from Mr. Blair. But, talking of stolen documents and stolen letters, we quite remember the fact which came to pass in 1873 or 1874, when letters were stolen from a desk in the House of Commons and put into the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite, who, knowing that these documents and these letters had been stolen, wilfully and wrongfully used them before the House. There is an accusation from which they have never been able to redeem themselves. The accusation which has been brought against them time and again is that they used stolen letters knowing them to have been stolen, and that they used them against this party. We have never rendered ourselves guilty of such a crime, and we will never do it.

Mr. A. B. INGRAM (East Elgin). Mr. Speaker, it is rather a serious matter to have a civil servant charged with the theft of this document, whether the document be a valuable one or not. It might be well to go a little cautiously before we make such a charge as that. I can give my own experience. I came into possession of a document a year or two ago bearing upon the conduct of the militia in South Africa. It came into my possession without the knowledge or consent of any civil servant or of any one connected with the government. I brought it before the House, and my reason was that on perusing the report of the Department of Militia and Defence I did not find in that report, published and circulated by the government, the information that I found in the document that had come into my possession. I brought the contents of that document before the House for the reason that it was in the interests of the militia of this country that it should be brought before the House, and for the reason that the officers of the department evidently reserved to themselves the right of saying what portions of the reports made by the militia in South Africa should be inserted in the departmental report. If the charge had been made that some civil servant in the Militia Department had given a private document to some member of this House it would have been a serious charge, and if any civil servant had suffered by any such charge having been made, he would have suffered innocently. In this present instance we have the statement made by the hon. leader of the opposition that no civil servant placed that document in his hands, and that no civil servant, or no person connected with the government, placed that document in his hands. Therefore, I say that no civil servant, in so far as my hon. friend the leader of the opposition knows, is guilty of that charge. Now, our hon. friends opposite have been worked up over this document having appeared in this House. They treat it as a very serious matter. Why? Because it is a confidential document. Mr. Speaker, I remember that since this government came into power they have not been so very delicate about the publishing of confidential correspondence. I know, as a matter of fact, that one department in particular published a report containing all the private correspondence in connection with that department and marked 'private.' Therefore, I say it does not quite become hon. gentlemen opposite to find fault with the hon. leader of the opposition for presenting that document to this House. I think if I perused the 'Hansard' of last session very carefully I would find some statements made by the right hon. leader of the government himself, in the debate on the Grand Trunk Pacific Bill, that were not in accord with the statements contained in the document presented to the House by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition in this debate; in other words, that the Hon. Mr. Blair, who was then Minister of Railways and Canals, did disagree with the right hon. leader of the government in the matter that was being discussed by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition at that time; but since this document has come to light, I do not think the statement made on that occasion by the right hon. leader of the government was quite in accordance with the facts as we find them in that document. Reference has been made to some letters stolen by one McMullen some years ago in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway. I do not think a fair comparison could be made as between the conduct of hon. gentlemen opposite on that occasion and the conduct of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition to-day; in fact, there is no comparison to be made between the two incidents. In one case these documents were deliberately stolen and used in this House for the purpose of discussing the question then before the House with the knowledge that they had been stolen. In this instance we have my hon. friend's honest, candid statement to the effect that this document was not stolen, as far as any member of the opposition is aware.

Motion (Mr. Fielding) negatived.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, 'That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, for the House to go into committee to consider a certain resolution concerning the ratification of the agreement between His Majesty the King and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, dated the 8th day of March, 1904'; and the proposed motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

Mr. FRANK OLIVER (Alberta). Mr. Speaker, I desire to join in the regreats expressed by so many members of the opposition that the terms of the bargain, as first made with the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, have been modified; but I cannot agree with the conclusion reached by the amendment for which we are asked to vote. If the transportation question is of such great—such immediate and overshadowing importance as the country believes, and as the amendment agrees—I am one to say that mere talk is not good enough; that action—immediate, energetic and effective action—such action as the government proposes, is required. The issue between the government and the opposition on the transportation question, as I understand from the amendment before the House, is as between immediate and definite action, and mere talk, whose object can only be to hinder, and whose only result must be to prevent, such action.

The government's transcontinental proposals have been before the country for nine months. They are the answer of the government to the demand of the western wheat-grower for relief from grain blockades; of the western ranchman for rapid and commodious transportation for his cattle; of the west generally for relief from a condition of transportation monopoly; of the thousands of settlers who have gone far beyond existing railway facilities for the extension to them for those facilities; for the tens of thousands of new settlers who are pouring into the west for the means of reaching and profitably occupying the millions of acres of still vacant lands; of the mercantile, manufacturing and financial interests of eastern Canada for assured and rapid transit and cheap rates between east and west; of the two great eastern provinces for the development of their vast unoccupied areas; and of all Canadians for the transaction, as far as commercially possible, of Canadian business through Canadian ports. They are the answer of the government to the universal demand that Canada shall go forward. Their rejection in favour of amendment, would be a mandate that Canada stand still and wait. Canada has waited many years for the rising tide of progress and prosperity that is now lifting her forward. And she would be waiting yet if she had not during the past seven years acted on the suggestion to 'hustle while you wait.' There are a million native-born Canadians in the United States to-day, not because there was not room and opportunity for them in Canada, but because Canada had not sufficient confidence in herself; and therefore waited and doubted when she should have acted. Under the present conditions and with the present prospects of our country, many of these are coming back, and bringing others with them. But we must give them opportunity, or they cannot stay when they come. Next to Ireland, Canada has sent out more emigrants in proportion to her population than any other country in the world and still we increase, although slowly. We have the people as well as the land, the forest and the mine; but we must have the railway, and it must be competitive and transcontinental in order to do the work required—to build up a new Canada where now are only waste places.

The answer of the opposition after nine months of consideration is given in the amendment proposed by their leader. Although it fills a newspaper column, its meaning is covered by its final paragraph, and that meaning is the present rejection of the government's policy of immediate and energetic action, for a policy which does not commit anybody to anything except delay. After a full recital of what he considers to be the transportation needs of the country—in which that of a competitive transcontinental railway is conspicuous by its absence—the only action which he suggests, or which the party will be committed to by voting for his amendment, is, that the government should at once 'avail itself of the best expert advice and assistance,' or, in other words, as the context shows: Appoint a commission and await its report.

If there is doubt, about any great public question, especially if the doubt is because of a lack of information, a commission is most desirable; but on the need of Canada for a competitive transcontinental railway there is none, except wilful doubt; none as to the need of such a railway and none as to the advantages to result from its construction. There was ample room for question between the government and the opposition as to the ways and means of providing such a railway: but it is not on that point that the opposition, by the amendment of their leader, take issue with the government. By that amendment they are committed to the rejection of the bargain for the completion of a railway from ocean to ocean in seven years from the first of next December—although five millions of dollars have been deposited as security that the work will be done according to agreement—and they offer in place of it a commission of inquiry.

A column of learned talk on the transportation needs of the country does not minimize but accentuates the fact that the opposition scrupulously avoid the offer of a policy by which those needs may be met. This is emphasized the more strongly by the fact that the alternative proposal of last year, whose chief merit was alleged to be that it would relieve existing conditions more quickly than the proposal of the government, and which died a natural death, has not been resurrected in the amendment.

But the real meaning and purpose of the long and intricate amendment of the opposition may be more clearly seen if it is understood what interest is to be served by its adoption. Which of the great interests of the country: farming, mining, lumbering, manufacturing, commerce or finance, will be injured by the construction of the new transcontinental railway as proposed by the government. Which of them will not be benefited in the highest and greatest degree? Opposition to the transcontinental railway is opposition to the welfare of every great interest in Canada, except that of transportation; and to that, so far only as it is a monopoly of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The battle against the transcontinental carried on so determinedly last session and reviewed at this session, is distinctly and only a battle for Canadian Pacific Railway monopoly. The adoption of the opposition amendment would give that company another lease of monopoly in the west which would mean stagnation there and retrogression here. The Canadian Pacific Railway is a great company but far too long under the rule of our friends on the other side; it was all too truthfully described as the 'Dominion on wheels.' The country has outgrown one railway, great though that railway is. We must have competition if we are to have progress.

A reading of the numbered paragraphs in the concluding portion of the amendment will remove any doubt as to the interest in which it has been moved. Subject to the result of the deliberations of a commission, the leader of the opposition (1) Will build railways in the west, (2) Will build railways in the east, (3) Will improve the canals, rivers and ports, and (4) Will explore for a railway through northern Ontario and Quebec—but he will not build or encourage the building of, nor does he even mention the possibility of building, forthwith, or at all, a transcontinental railway, or any part of such a railway, either by government, by a private company or by both together, which would be a competitor, or other than a feeder of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

In his speech and in his amendment the leader of the opposition has hinted guardedly at government ownership, really saying nothing but leaving to be inferred anything that his readers might wish. If the leader of the opposition or his followers are in favour of government ownership, now is the time for them to say so by endorsing the government's proposals; for these go further in the direction of government ownership and control than any measures yet placed before the people of Canada since 1875, when the then Liberal government undertook the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway as a government work and were cried down and finally displaced by the Conservatives for doing so. The government's proposal is absolute government ownership of the whole eastern division, 1,800 miles; a first mortgage with provisions for working control in certain contingencies of the western division; absolute control of rates on both divisions under all circumstances; and the right to run Intercolonial Railway trains and compete for traffic all the way from Halifax and St. John to Port Simpson, from the day the last rail is laid. Friends of government ownership could not and would not have ignored these facts.

That the opposition have most bitterly objected to that part of the railway which is most completely under government control and which most directly competes with the Canadian Pacific Railway, is ample evidence that their battle is for Canadian Pacific Railway monopoly and not for government ownership.

An opportunity to advocate the principle of government ownership occurred when the bargain for the construction of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway was before the House. If I remember rightly, I was the only member of the House who from his place advocated government ownership of that line. Not a word was heard from any member of the opposition on the subject,—and many who are here now were here then. But the Crow's Nest Pass is a valuable feeder to the Canadian Pacific Railway, while the Transcontinental will be a competitor.

The question is not as between a transcontinental railway under one set of conditions and such a railway under another set of conditions. It is whether Canada shall be content with monopoly or shall insist on competition in transcontinental traffic. Last year the bargain was opposed because it was bad for the company. The company could not work its lines and pay its way. Now it is opposed because it is bad for the country. The country is paying a vast amount of money and getting nothing. Any reason is good so long as it is a reason against.

The statement is made—deliberately made and repeated—that the country is incurring liabilities in respect of this enterprise for the advantage of the Grand Trunk and Grand Trunk Pacific of from 150 to 170 million dollars. The impression is conveyed that the liabilities of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and of the government in connection with this enterprise, are respectively 15 and 150 million dollars. This is practically an absolute reversal of the facts. The case is such as that of a citizen, who with a lot, a thousand dollars in cash and a well established and paying business, undertakes to build a ten thousand dollar house. He puts in his thousand dollars, the loan company advances him nine thousand dollars, and takes a mortgage upon the completed house as security for principal and interest. Is the loan company assuming a liability for $10,000 or is the debtor assuming that liability ? If the debtor does not pay, the company gets his thousand dollars and the house. The risk, and therefore the liability is his, not that of the loan company. If the Grand Trunk Pacific does not pay interest on that part of the cost of the road contributed, or guaranteed by the government, the Grand Trunk loses control of the road, and the Grand Trunk Pacific loses any return on the proceeds of the $45,000,000 of preferred and common stock which it is allowed to issue. The government takes control of the road and becomes absolute owner of twenty million dollars worth of rolling stock supplied by the company with which to operate it. Both country and company go into the project in the belief that the traffic will pay interest on the cost ; but if that expectation fails, the company, not the country, loses its investment.

So much has been said of the immense liabilities to be incurred by the country and the vast possibilities of illegitimate profit by the company, that a comparison is fairly in order ; the more so as the question before the House is not only to reject the proposition of the government, but to defeat it and to place in power the opposition—the opposition which, truly Conservative—constantly points to its past record as the assurance of its future course. The proposed transcontinental railway will be less than 3,600 miles long. The leader of the opposition estimates that it will cost the country 150 millions of dollars. Whether it costs the country the 15 or 20 millions, which its bonuses in the way of interest payments will amount to, or the 150 millions which will give it ownership and control of the whole line, the country has absolute control of rates from the start.

The latest report of the Department of Railways and Canals gives the total mileage of the Canadian Pacific Railway as 3,838. This includes some branches and connections besides the main line, which from St. John to Vancouver is 3,387 miles. By a provision of its charter, it is specially exempt from government control of rates. Its cost is stated at $200,000,000. It has been bonussed by the Dominion, the provinces and the municipalities to the amount of 26 millions in cash ; by the Dominion by 574 miles of completed road costing 35 millions ; by the Dominion by 25 million acres of land of an estimated value of say $1.50 an acre for 10 million acres, and $5 an acre for 15 million acres ; a total of 90 million dollars in land—a grand total of 150 million dollars in bonuses—as much as the new transcontinental will cost the country for complete government ownership; and the country does not own a foot of the Canadian Pacific Railway line, a dollar of Canadian Pacific Railway stock, or exercise a feather-weight of control in its affairs.

The Canadian Pacific Railway has a share capital of 84 millions, of which 72 millions is paid up. It has a bond authorization of 142 millions, of which 118 millions have been sold. The total paid-up capital in stock and bonds upon which the traffic now pays interest at 3½, 4 and 5 per cent is 248 millions, or a cost of 200 milions; but the company holds authorization to issue stock and bonds up to 270 millions, and take the dividens and interest on that amount out of the traffic without a shadow of possibility of let or hidrance from the government. As a matter of fact, the interest is being paid in full, and last year there was a surplus of earnings over expenses and all claims for interest and dividends of 5 millions.

The Canadian Pacific Railway is paying interest at an average of 4 per cent on $64,000 for every mile of its lines ; even on the 574 miles which the country built, paid for and handed over to that company. The cost of this part of the Canadian Pacific Railway is estimated at 35 millions. This amount forms part of the debt of Canada, upon which the interest is say 3½ per cent, or 1¼ millions—an amount which comes out of each year's taxes. But besides the traffic pays 4 per cent on a capitalization of $64,000 a mile, or nearly 1½ millions a year. 2¾ millions a year the people pay out of taxes or on traffic for the 574 miles of road which the Liberal government built and the Conservative government gave away.

The 1,800 miles of the eastern division of the new transcontinental is estimated by the leader of the opposition to cost, say, $40,000 a mile, or 72 million dollars. It carries no capitalization except actual cost; and the traffic will only have to pay three per cent on that cost. Under the government's bargain, the people will pay out of traffic two millions a year for absolute government ownership of 1,800 miles of railway, as against 2¾ millions which they pay on 574 miles of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which the company absolutely owns and over which the country has no sort of control. The excess of actual capitalization over stated cost of the Canadian Pacific Railway, altogether outside of bonuses, which paid for the whole road is 48 million dollars, three millions more than the total capitalization which is allowed the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Men and political parties are to be judged by what they do rather than by what they say. In view of the record of the Conservative party in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, no matter how wisely and well that party and its leaders may talk of the great transportation problem; of the over capitalization of railways; or hint darkly and guardedly at government ownership; the country cannot afford to entrust to them the responsibility of providing needed transportation facilities, or at their suggestion reject a proposal of immediately and thoroughly meeting present and pressing requirements; and so leave the Canadian Pacific Railway in sole possession of the field. The government's policy is to build up Canada by breaking monopoly. The opposition policy is, as it has ever been—and never more manifestly than in this discussion, both now and last year—to stand by monopoly though it break Canada.

While I regret that the terms of the bargain with the Grand Trunk Pacific Company have been altered, I am pleased to see that those parts which relate to and affect the use of the road—which are the most important parts,—remain exactly as they were. Provisions for an exact account of cost of construction; for government control of rates; for government ownership of the eastern division and security for its operation; for running powers for the Intercolonial Railway and other roads; are unaltered. The alterations are solely in the parts relating to the financing of the enterprise. As has been said by others, it is only in case of the failure of the enterprise—which none, (least of all those who are opposing it so bitterly) except—will the altered terms entail a cent of increased cost on the taxpayer. It is to be regretted that delay in getting the agreement through the House last year brought it into a period of financial depression which had not been foreseen when the negotiations were entered into, and because of which it became impossible to finance it on the basis intended. Possibly the discredit which was thrown so energetically and systematically upon the merits of the project by the opposition had more than its due effect in rendering financing difficult. It would be strange indeed, if with the ammunition furnished last year by the opposition in parliament, their friends the Canadian Pacific Railway could not scare the British investor from taking up the enterprise on the favourable terms to the country which had been arranged. The necessity for a re-arrangement is to be regretted for many reasons, but chiefly because it has delayed and still delays, active operations. But if the road is to be built some one must pay for it. If money is dear it will necessarily cost more than if it is cheap; and if the country has not confidence enough in the enterprise to see it through under existing unfavourable conditions, it can hardly be expected that the British investor will have greater faith. It is clearly a case of meeting the changed conditions of the money market or letting the enterprise drop. I believe that the government acted wisely and in the public interest in agreeing to the amended bargain, whereby the company has been enabled beyond doubt to finance the road.

The depression in the world's money market which has compelled the new terms, conveys a warning that Canada as well as the rest of the world may soon be on the eve of a serious financial depression. If this should be the case, it is in the highest degree in the public interest that the bargain which will ensure the carrying forward of this great work, be ratified without fail, or unnecessary delay. Thanks chiefly to our friends of the opposition, we have so far been set back one year, and the result is a less favourable bargain. All the signs are that another year's delay would either defeat the enterprise or compel us to accept a bargain still less favourable. If we want the railroad at all, we want it now. Every day's delay in the face of the growing stringency of the money market, strengthens the position of monopoly and weakens the fight for competition. We have had railway monopoly in the west for twenty years; now we want competition; we want it throughout the northwest, and from sea to sea. The sooner we get it the better for the west, and the better for every legitimate interest in Canada, both east and west.

Mr. RUFUS POPE (Compton). After listening to the somewhat able essay which has been read by the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver), to which I noticed you,

Mr. Speaker, paid particular attention, I would suggest to that hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) that in future he speak from the shoulder. I have heard him make many speeches in this House with a great deal of vim and force, and I am sure that every member of the House will agree with me that while he is an interesting speaker, he is not an altogether agreeable reader. Of course, if the hon. member (Mr. Oliver) is pressed for time and has prepared this address for publication in his newspaper in Edmonton, we will excuse him for reading it here before mailing it to the west; we would not wish to prevent its publication in Edmonton. I wish also to congratulate the hon. gentleman on the very independent stand he takes on all questions of a controversial character in this House. He comes from that northern country where men of independence are bred. When I visit that section of the country I am told over and over again of the independent character of their representatives. I have said to some of the residents of that district that it is strange that we who live with him for from three to six months of the year, practically in the same house, never found that out before. We have been associating with him, but we have never found the slightest trace of that independent political character which he is said to possess. I am sure, Sir, that the monopolies, as he styles them, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway, as it is going to become, and all great transportation corporations, will publish the speech which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) has just made. They will all feel thankful to him, because if there is any one thing that these corporations fear, it is a national railway in its truest sense—a road built and owned by the people and operated according to the people's will. And the hon. gentleman, through that beautiful essay he has just read to us, declares that, so far as his influence can effect it, a perpetual barrier shall be raised against the possibility of competition by the nation's railway. For this the hon. gentleman deserves credit, and he will receive it—from those great corporations, which, he says, abuse their powers in the matter of rates charged for transportation. I do not know when any hon. member had a better chance to vindicate his title to the character which some of the hon. gentleman's electors impute to him, that of an independent, thinking public man, than the hon. gentleman had on this occasion. Mr. Speaker, kicking is not independence. Some of these gentlemen who come down from these vast plains seem to imagine that all that is necessary on their part is to kick. What does the government care for a horse that kicks occasionally, so long as he pulls in the collar whenever they shall tell him to? The hon. gentleman has never yet been asked to lift a load from the government but he has put his shoulder to the collar and pulled with a will. He kicks in Alberta, but he works in the collar in parliament. If the hon. gentlemen who assume to have these qualifications of independence would kick for some purpose, let them rise here and make demands that will be in the interest of their great country. Let them give an independent vote, let them raise an independent voice in this House. Let them not only kick, but baulk when the government would drive them. Then we shall appreciate their independent position, and we shall feel that we can afford to be lectured by the hour by such independent representatives of the people. I believe that that great western country would have been advanced very materially in the matter of transportation if there had been more honest labour put forth in this House by men of supposed independence, and less kicking. Visiting that country, as it is my pleasure to do every year, and travelling over its roads, I have been confined in all the journeys I have made to railways built by the government that preceded this, except for one little piece through the Crow's Nest pass. If development has not been more rapid, it is not because these gentlemen were not warned of its necessity. Four or five years ago I raised my humble voice in warning to this government that they were not abreast with the requirements of that vast country. I said then that we should have another transcontinental line. And nobody denied it. But I say that the parties who pay for that road, whether the corporation or the people of Canada, should own the road when it is built. But I will deal with that later on.

Now, with reference to the question that engaged the attention of this House at the opening of this sitting, I would like to say one word. Hon. gentlemen on this side of the House are not above being preached to; they are not above being lectured; they are not above being told that they are wrong. But still, Sir, we have a feeling that we want to have some sort of respect for the men who preach to us. When hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House preach to us about high moral standing and parliamentary propriety and sacred obligations as the hon. member for South Essex did last night, and when we look across the floor and see sitting at the head of these gentlemen the Prime Minister who, last year, according to the hon. Mr. Blair, asked Mr. Blair to remain silent in his seat while resolutions which he did not approve were being put through this House by somebody else, is it to be wondered at that we ask for other lecturers and other preachers on these questions of high political morality? We have not forgotten, as was pointed out to-day, that in the old days, back in the seventies, when the Liberal-Conservatives were driven from power by these hon. gentlemen, the very men who now sit in the front seats in this House went throughout the country preaching to the people from documents that had been stolen and for the stealing of which the thieves were paid—such men as the private secretary of the late John J. C. Abbott, tampered with by Liberal money, bribed, purchased, bought. From the masters of such creatures as these, we do not care to listen to lessons in high morality. They must get other preachers if they wish to gain our attention.

But, Sir, this is not the only evidence we have of the inconsistency of these hon. gentlemen. We have the Prime Minister, in moving the resolutions dealing with the most important question now before the country, quoting from the works of missionaries and travellers of 250 years ago. We find that hon. gentleman taking great pains to insinuate that hon. members on this side of the House enjoy any piece of evidence tending to prove that the country lying between here and the northern sea is not a good country for agriculture or likely to make a prosperous settled part of Canada. He spoke of having mountains of information about that country, and said that we would learn the beauties of that country if we went to those mountains. He said that we were pleased when people said that this was a country of jack pines. Why Sir, who was it first said 'jack pine' in relation to that country in this House. If the right hon. gentleman will read 'Hansard' of last year, page 7684, he will find these words in his own speech introducing the resolutions on the subject of the Grand Trunk Pacific :

> Another point equalled only in importance by the existence of a vast area of agricultural land in this country and its moderate climate is the fact that it is largely covered with extensive forests of spruce, jack pine and poplar. The value of this class of timber, as everybody knows, is increasing every day and the market for it is widening ; and rich, indeed, is the country which has boundless resources in these varieties of woods.

During the recess, at public meetings I have had the honour of addressing, I denied possessing knowledge of that country, yet I felt I was only telling the truth when I said that I knew just as much about it as any public man. But I said to my hearers : You people who are looking forward to immigration from the east to the west, who are looking for new homes for your children, let me read to you the description of that country offered to us in the House by the leader of the government. It is to be presumed that the right hon. gentleman went to his own 'mountains of information,' that he laboured there hard and long. And what did he bring forth ? 'Jack pine and poplar.' Why, Sir, if a man wanted to curse the soil of Canada, he could not do worse than to say it was the mother of jack pine and poplar. So, when the right hon. gentleman twits us with speaking of this as a country of jack pine, I give him his own words. I hope that northern country is everything that we could desire. I hope that events will prove that the centre of Canada is a great and valuable territory, a district of mineral, timber and agricultural land that will maintain, some day, a great population. But we do not know it. One thing we do know. We know what the hon. Prime Minister told us in his speech, and this is something else he said :

> Between these two sections of population, however, there is a gap of several hundred miles of uninhabited and hardly habitable land.

That is a description of the land given by the right hon. gentleman in his speech the other day, as a section of country where this jack pine grows. That is what he gets off in an effort to prove that it is a perfect rose garden, and we find him going to the missionaries and asking from them evidence as to the beauty of that country. Now what did the missionary say :

> I can assert that on the 15th of June there were wild roses here as beautiful and as fragrant as those of Quebec. The season seemed to me further advanced, the air extremely mild and agreeable. There was no night during my visit ; the twilight had not yet faded from the west when the dawn of day appeared in the east.

Pretty far north, Mr. Speaker—six months daylight and six months night. If he wanted them exactly to fade one into the other, he might have gone 100 miles further north. But where did this rose bloom? On the Hudson Bay. This road is not going there. Where was this journey made from ? It was made from Quebec and Tadousac in the St. John district, over to the northern sea, not east and west, not the country to be traversed ; and the Prime Minister takes the responsibility of standing up in this House and insinuating, leaving the inference upon our minds and if possible upon the public mind, that he was describing a route of roses through which this road was to run. Why did'nt he read on :

> On the 6th, we regained our river with great difficulty, due to the swiftness of its current and the frequent waterfalls by which it is broken. . . . Canoes and all the luggage had to be carried through the woods,—now amid mountains, lofty and fearful, and now over vast plains and by paths of extreme difficulty.

The right hon. gentleman ought to have read this :

> All that I write it is but half of what the traveller must endure. There are 200 saults, or waterfalls, and consequently 200 portages, where both canoe and luggage must be carried on the back. There are 400 rapids where a long pole must be constantly in hand in order to surmount them.

But what does the reading of all that amount to ? Sir, that is not the route, that is in an opposite direction to the one this road is going. But it is the route which the right hon. gentleman found roses on in this book. More than that, Mr. Speaker, between the point and the lake where these great prairies are, where the hay grows that was referred to by the Prime Minister the other day, this missionary refers every other day to travelling through mountain ranges, with frequent waterfalls, a difficult section of country to get over. That is not to say that we cannot find a route for a railroad through it, I do not say that, Mr. Speaker; but I am here to say that the right hon. the Prime Minister of Canada has no right to attempt to deceive the people on a question so important as this, on a question involving the expenditure of at least $150,000,000 of our money. He has no right to insinuate that he is giving us the character of the country through which this road is going, when it is only the character of a country that the road is to cross, not the proper description of the district through which it is to travel. Sir, is this purely and simply a game of humbug, or is it a serious question of the construction of this road? Are we to build this road with nine-tenths of our money and one-tenth of the Grand Trunk's money and give it to them? Are we to accept the description given by the right hon. gentleman of the country through which it passes, when as a matter of fact it was not at all such a country as he mentions? Is not the intelligence of this House entitled to be treated with some respect? There must be some points where you and I, as independent members of this House, have a right to demand respectful treatment, even from a man occupying the position of Prime Minister of this country. We have a right to expect that when he stands on his feet in this House and offers to us information of the country through which the road is to pass, that he should properly describe the district through which it is to pass, and not another district. Sir, I object and enter my protest against that sort of thing. We have had enough of it.

Now, Sir, the question whether this road is costing more than the Canadian Pacific or not is not relevant. The Canadian Pacific Railway was built in its own time, it was built in spite of the hon. gentlemen sitting on the other side of the House. It has made it possible for them to be where they are to-day, reaping the reward of great harvests and of great revenues in Canada. It has made it possible for them to spend millions and millions more money than any other government ever thought of spending in this country. They owe it to the people who conceived the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I say to them that if they had been true and loyal men, if they had not derided the country through which the Canadian Pacific Railway passes, if they had not called it a country of frosts, of swamps and of morass, as they did, and their expressions can be found in the 'Hansard' of those days—when this country was paying 5 per cent or 6 per cent for money, when the right hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) was filling the magazines of England with vilifying articles in connection with that road, when we were asking support from the public opinion of Canada and fought that fight out to a successful end—I say if these gentlemen had been loyal and patriotic, and if the gallant knight from South Oxford had been true to the title he has taken, we would not have had to make the sacrifice of land and money that we did have to make to get this road through. More than that the right hon. gentleman knows that even with the big sacrifice of money and land that we made, we did not pay the price that they advertised we would pay when they were in power for four years. But they went, fortunately, and we came in, and we built the road for less money, though at a big expense I must say, but to the tremendous advantage of Canada and its people.

Now, Sir, comes the question of a second transcontinental line. Application was made in the Railway Committee by the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada, asking for a charter from North Bay through to the coast, to connect with their eastern lines at North Bay Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson made a speech, published in this report which the hon. gentleman has seen fit to say was a garbled report. If there are garbled reports made of that meeting, they are to be found in London newspapers that are not above being paid a price to publish what is given to them. We are told about secrets of a great public meeting like that, of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk, dealing with questions of so vital importance to Canada as the construction of this road, where they spoke of going into partnership, forcing, according to one of the directors of this road, compelling this government to enter into partnership with them. I say if it is a partnership, if that is a meeting of one of our partners, if that is a meeting concerning a business in which we as a nation are to become partners, then I say we have a right to have the full report of that meeting so that the people of Canada should be put in possession of all the facts, and the thanks of the people of Canada are due to Mr. Osler, or any other hon. gentleman who obtained this full report for the use of the members of this House. Now, Sir, let me say this much, that when this contract was first asked for as I said a few moments ago, it was to go from North Bay westward.

When was this bargain made? It was made in London, Eng., at the time of the King's coronation when the right hon. gentleman was there. The preparation of this bargain then took place. Mr. Hays was there. The man who could not wait was there, and many others were there. On the journey across the Atlantic, when they were free from the soil of both continents and not knowing that there were birds in the air that could convey information as well on the ocean as on the land, the secrets of this preparation were cut loose and no sooner had these gentlemen landed on the shores of Canada than these secrets were communicated to me. Not stolen! I did not have to rob anybody of them. I did not have to hire anybody to give this information to me. It was stated to me that a great transcontinental scheme associated with the Grand Trunk Railway Company was to be placed before the parliament of this country. This was in November. Parliament did not meet until the following 12th March. There was no talk at that time of any changed condition except that upon the application of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company being made certain elements from the city of Quebec made their appearance. That was the peculiar opposition that was referred to by Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson. I presume the wool had been pulled over that poor old man's eyes here, in the Railway Committee. He was told that the opposition came from us. The opposition on this side of the House was then as now and ever shall be actuated by the determination that the business of Canada shall be done inside of Canada and through the ports of Canada. We ask for nothing more. We demand it now and we say that if we are going to pay for the road with our money we want to own it. Sir Rivers-Wilson found himself baffled by these gentlemen—a mere set of adventurers to some extent from the city of Quebec. I am not now speaking of the Trans-Canada Railway Company, but there are a lot of men associated with the government who are the hangers-on in and out of parliament behind this government, and who are very well known. When the Grand Trunk Pacific people came here they found this stubborn work going on. Finally at the second or third meeting of the committee we found a dotted line on the map from North Bay to Quebec—merely a dotted line. We asked what this was, The reply was: This is a new piece of road. They did not even use ink enough to make a straight line; they dotted it. We were told that this was the extension down to the city of Quebec. We knew it. We did not steal the information. The information was as free as it was in regard to this document. The fact had been well known to me for a long time. Members of this House, newspaper men and others had told me of it. Hon. gentlemen opposite are not half as close as they think they are. They are easy in some respects. We knew that the proposition had been brought forward, that it was due to political conditions and that when the real bona fide men, the Trans-Canada, came here they were told: We cannot consider you at all; we have to build across here. The Trans-Canada people who have devoted a great deal of time to this project and who possess a great deal of valuable information about the country through which this railway is to pass were brushed aside and the wonderful genius of this government was brought to bear to construct in one night a road running through a rose-bed in the northern part of Quebec. Then, we had to have a holiday. We had to have recreation and when I was returning on the train to Ottawa I got into contact with my Liberal friends from the lower provinces who said to me: Mr. Pope, you live down in the east and you must join us in our scheme. I said: What is your scheme? They said: We want to get this road extended down to the maritime provinces. I said: I will hear what you have to say. We heard the argument put up by the Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Emmerson). We have heard no argument put up since by that hon. gentleman. They dare not trust him. Then what was the next proposition? Was it a question of traffic? Not at all. It was purely and simply a question of politics, a question of remaining in power, first in the district of Quebec and next down by the sea. What is the result? The result is that we have this proposition forced upon us by the government to build a road, not from North Bay, but from Winnipeg. The Grand Trunk Railway Company were willing to build a road from North Bay to Winnipeg under the ordinary conditions. Why this government did not wish them to do it is more than I can understand. They had already arranged to do so under the ordinary charter of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, but instead of that in the generosity of their hearts the government set to work and put on another 1,000 miles to Winnipeg, making the total distance 1,900 miles to be built with our money and as a competitor with the $70,000,000 of our money invested in the Intercolonial Railway. The right hon. leader of the government last year said that he did not regard this new road as a competitor with the Intercolonial Railway, that the Intercolonial Railway would have its own traffic, but what was the argument which was advanced to us in favour of the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal and why did I vote for that extension? I voted for that extension because the argument advanced in favour of it was that it would tap the great western centre of the country, bring the Intercolonial Railway into touch with the canals and enable it to carry the freight of the west. Now, if it is true, that, as the right hon. gentleman claims, this road is going to carry wheat over the height of land, how is it going to deliver it to the Intercolonial Railway? But, he says, that the Intercolonial Railway can run up there as well. Fancy the Grand Trunk Railway corporation which owns this railway, owns the track, controlling everything under its lease and under its proprietary rights, coming along and picking up all the passengers and freight and the Intercolonial Railway train coming trundling along afterwards while the people are going ahead on the Grand Trunk train! That will be the position of affairs. In the speech which the right hon. leader made he said that prairie section would be the fruitful section. Mr. Hays says the same thing. Every man who knows anything about railroading knows perfectly well that when you enter the prairie section you get into the fruitful part. Why should not the right hon. gentleman continue on with the road after having built 1,900 miles already, particularly in view of the fact that he is giving a guarantee of three-quarters of the cost of the western section and that he is going to get no interest for the next eighteen years? How long has the Canadian Pacific Railway been built?—about eighteen years. How many dividends has it paid in these eighteen years?—a great many. That shows that the right hon. gentleman is giving these people the whole present life of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Why did he do it? Because he found himself occupying the same position that the hon. member for Alberta did to-day, he found himself between two great corporations, he found the Canadian Pacific Railway and he found the Canadian Northern in the field and he dared not take an independent course and build that road up through that country. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been severe in their criticism of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but there are no people more desirous of utilizing the Canadian Pacific Railway than they are for what they can get out of it. They had not the pluck or the courage to take an independent course. They knew that with the then Minister of Railways and Canals they had pledged themselves to the principles of government ownership when they voted for the extension of the Intercolonial to Montreal. I voted with them upon that question because I believe that the future of Canada depends largely upon the question of transportation, that the future of Canada must be promoted by the development of the great west and that the power of dictation in the matter of freight rates is safer in the hands of the government or of a commission appointed independently of politics than it is in the hands of any great corporation.

Think of the fearful tale which has been told by the member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) in that beautiful essay which he read to us: think of that tale of woe. What guarantee have we in this contract that the Grand Trunk Pacific will not charge the same rates? He said that the Intercolonial Railway can go clear up the whole length of the line; that may be, but it cannot do the business. The business is going to be done by the Grand Trunk, and when the Grand Trunk has cinched this contract they will then have more power over the government than they had when they drove the government into a partnership with them, according to the statement of Lord Welby. If the government wanted to assert its independence of the Grand Trunk Pacific, the time to do it was before the Grand Trunk Pacific put up their deposit. But the government of Canada have entered into a compact with a body not representative in its nature and which cannot be got at. That contract is immoral; it is against the principles which have been announced by the Liberal party for the last twenty-five years. What occurred in the city of Montreal at the recent elections shows the immorality of that contract. The Minister of Finance made a speech in Westmount, and, with all the suavity that he possesses, he said: There is a difficulty between us and the Grand Trunk, we hope the Grand Trunk will come to our terms, but if they do not, why then the road must go on just the same. Now, what is the meaning of 'just the same'? Surely it means nothing else but government ownership. The Minister of Finance discovered that the only way of carrying this constituency was to resurrect the Grand Trunk, which had been as silent as the grave until the Friday morning previous to the election, when it came to life after Mr. Hays and other gentlemen came to this city and communed with hon. gentlemen opposite, and tamed down the wild independent thought of the Minister of Finance and brought him to his own level, and said: You are my partner, my dear friend; you and I have a common interest in this; you furnish the money and we will own the road; if you do that we will elect your man in St. Gabriel; we will take our men by the throat and make them vote against Dr. Barnard, and so it turned out to be, and everybody who was there knows it. There was the first sample of the immoral effect of this contract, and when the people of Canada wake up to the immorality of it they will be astonished. These gentlemen opposite speak of a compact between the Conservative government and the Canadian Pacific Railway for the building of that road. I say that is untrue. We know that after the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, in the case of the Onderdonk section in British Columbia, certain propositions were made, and they resulted in the then Minister of Railways and the general manager of the Canadian Pacific Railway never being on speaking terms again, and the Canadian Pacific Railway had to fight their case out before the arbitration court and get what they could. We built the Canadian Pacific Railway because it was a compact of confederation. We paid a high price to build the Canadian Pacific Railway through the barren section of that great western country. There are two gentlemen sitting on the government benches now who exercised their influence on the financial and political world to hamper the Canadian Pacific Railway undertaking and to make it as difficult as possible to finance. A thorough survey was made by the Conservative government of that western country, and the Grand Trunk Pacific now reaps the benefit of the large sums of money then invested for surveying the Saskatchewan valley. Sir John Macdonald held that that country was fertile enough to furnish its own railway, and that the people of Canada should not be taxed to build through the fertile belt of the Saskatchewan valley. Hence it was that he helped to build a road through the less fertile regions of the North-west, and to make it a highway binding eastern Canada with the Pacific coast. I again repeat, Sir, that no government has the right to stamp a railroad as a national highway unless the people own it. This is the Grand Trunk Railroad to all intents and purposes, and when the Prime Minister says that it is a great national transcontinental railroad his statement is not true. I do not insinuate that the right hon. gentleman intends to delude the public, but I do say that there can be no great national work that is not the property of the people. It may have national results and good effects may flow from it, as have flown from the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but do these gentlemen opposite call the Canadian Pacific Railway a great national work when it is owned by a private company? I have never heard one of these gentlemen on the government benches speak of the Canadian Pacific Railway as a great national work, and neither is the Grand Trunk Pacific a great national work. It is the property of the Grand Trunk Company and, such being the case, it is a bad and a foolish bargain; yea, it is a mad bargain to spend $170,000,000 of our money as against $15,000,000 of theirs, and hand over to them the great railway that that money has created. Why not give the people of Canada a voice in saying whether or not they shall own that road? Last year we were told by the Prime Minister that we could not wait, and we were warned against the man who says: To-morrow, and to-morrow, and to-morrow. There have been two hundred and fifty to-morrows since then, and the gentleman who was told he could not 'wait, wait, wait,' is still waiting if he is not tired. We were told by the Prime Minister that 'the flood gates, or something or other, would come pouring down, but there has been no flood, and we are not drowned. The Rideau river rose a little when the snow went off, but that is all. There has been no great calamity, no great financial downfall, the bonding privileges are no nearer abrogation than they were twenty years ago, but we are waiting yet. And if the Prime Minister lives, as I trust he shall, to be as old as the centenarian senator whose picture is in the lobby, he will not see the abrogation of the bonding privilege. It is of more use to the people of the United States than it is to the people of Canada, just as the reciprocity treaty was of more use to them then it was to us, as they are beginning to find out now, and as we found out long ago.

Why did the right hon. gentleman create us a nation in a single night, if not to be independent of all that? Why did he not leave us as only Canada and not a nation? Why did he waste that time, when as a nation we would be more afraid of our neighbours than we were before? It would have been better to have left us as children. What we have to do in this country is to take advantage of the lessons that are being taught us by the experience of seventy millions of people to the south and millions on the other side of the Atlantic. It is not right that a modern nation like Canada, just springing to her feet, should have to go through all the trouble which old nations have experienced in order to arrive at a position of eminence. She ought to take advantage of the trade conditions, improvements, history and knowledge of the time. She ought to watch the results flowing from the operation of transcontinental lines in the United States. There are five or six transcontinental lines in that country; and they have barren sections there as we have barren sections here; because the whole of the United States is not, like the pathway of this proposed railway, a bed of roses. It has deserts of sand and rock, hill and dale which are not fruitful. We should take advantage of the experience of that country, which, with six or seven transcontinental lines, has not had a lowering of freight rates. The moment competition began between them, we saw a great trust formed to dictate the operation of all those lines. And Sir, that great corporation can just as easily buy the stock of the Canadian Pacific or the Canadian Northern as it did the stock of the Northern Pacific or the Union Pacific; it can extend its operations to this country just as easily as it can remain out. From the experience of that country, I conclude that there is but one safeguard against Canada getting into the same position as the United States, that is, the safeguard of owning and dictating the operation of railroads from ocean to ocean. We should not be above being taught the lesson of experience by those gentlemen on the other side of the line. By this contract, as I read it, we are giving up the right of demanding from the Grand Trunk Pacific Company 3 per cent on the cost of this road for ten years. Then, we must allow the railway to charge the freight rates that will pay that 3 per cent, or else we do not get it. If we do not get the 3 per cent, why should we not own the railroad? The Finance Minister tells us that it is only going to cost us $13,000,000 to build our portion of this road. I do not know any railroad that has been built so cheaply on this continent. Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson says the company's portion will cost them $15,000,000, and the Finance Minister says our portion will cost us $13,000,000 ; that is, $28,000,000 to build a road 3,400 miles long, with its terminals and equipment. I think we had better own it. Was ever a more ridiculous proposition made on the face of the earth ? It has no parallel, and I trust that it never will have one.

I regret exceedingly, Sir, that I do not possess the power of influencing this government in regard to this matter. I may be wrong ; I hope I am ; but I am convinced that we are giving away the people's franchise, and that we are giving the company a bonus of $25,000,000 of stock for taking the present. Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson says his company is going to have that $25,000,000 of stock, although its portion will only cost it $15,000,000. Take all these things into consideration, and I ask you : suppose I go back to my electors and say to them, I had an opportunity of getting a railroad across this continent for you for $15,000,000, and I refused the chance ; I paid the rest of the cost, guaranteed the bonds, built 1,800 miles of the most barren and expensive part of that railway as a government road, and by paying $15,000,000 more, I could have a road for you that would be worth from $150,000,000 to $200,000,000. What do you think they would say to me ? If I did that, I firmly believe my constituents would say to me : Pope, you are a fool ; you don't know how to make a trade, and you will not go back to that House again. And I believe they would be fully justified. That is my opinion of what would happen to me if I made a bargain such as this government is making; and I am sincere when I say that I wish I possessed the power to prevent them carrying out this contract. All the safeguards that were in it last year they have wiped out this year, and where are the ministers who insisted last year on these safeguards being put in. We know that this contract did not go through the cabinet until it was changed; clause after clause had to be put in to suit these hon. gentlemen. Nobody stole this information ; it is public property. We know that some of the ministers of the Crown kicked. Mr. Blair kicked out. He is a man who, when he kicks, goes. But there were some other gentlemen who did some kicking, but who stayed in the cabinet, until a clause was added here and a clause added there to safeguard the public interests, and then the contract was ratified. All these safeguards are missing in the amended Bill or contract. If by staying here for six months or a year, I could get the people of Canada to have the right to say whether they wanted to spend $150,000,000 on this property and then give it away, when by spending $15,000,000 more they could own it, it would be my duty to stay. I do not think the trustees of this country should look lightly upon their responsibilities when they are so grave as they are in this instance not only financially, but with regard to the control of competitive railways across this continent.

One word more, and I am finished. It is in reference to the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Cowan) who, after having made such a speech as he did yesterday, should not have been absent the next day. He refers to the absence of the hon. leader of the opposition. Mr. Speaker, you have been sitting there more or less during this debate, and you have seen how many of the ministers of the Crown have taken the trouble to remain in their seats. We have two here this afternoon—the Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Sometimes we have had only one, and sometimes we have had two.

The hon. the leader of the opposition Mr. R. L. Borden) is alone in the preparation of his policy and the conduct of the fight ; he has no cabinet surrounding him to whom people who wish to see him in connection with political matters may be referred. We see to-day not half a dozen gentlemen on the opposite side, with one or two ministers out of seventeen ; no one knows what has become of the others but they are not here. We want no more such attacks as the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Cowan) delivered yesterday. We can furnish abusive language if necessary, but any man hesitates to do it. I myself did it once in this House with a feeling of repugnance, but I did it because I believed it to be my duty. I believe that the leaders on both sides of this House are entitled to be treated with respect, and I am determined to see, so far as it lies in my power, that the hon. gentleman who leads this side of the House (Mr. R. L. Borden) shall be treated with the same respect and courtesy as I am disposed to extend to the right hon. gentleman who leads the other side of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier).

Mr. WM. ROCHE (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, you may remember at some time in your boyhood an occasion when you found in your pocket in the morning one solitary candy. Perhaps it was the remains of some you had enjoyed at an evening party, or perhaps the day before you might have enjoyed the use of a whole quarter's worth, but it was what was left, and it had special sweetness and value. I wish to extend the same idea to the matter now under discussion. After all the arguments that have taken place, after all the rhetoric and after all the arithmetic that we have heard, what is left ? When all these modifications have been made, does the substantial part of the contract remain, or has any essential part been swept away by the amendments ? The two speeches which were made by the learned leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) and my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Osler) contain the basis of all the speeches, a text for all the criticisms and observations which have since been made by

hon. gentlemen opposite, because they contain the salient points of the objections which can be urged against this measure. It is, therefore, no disparagement to the ingenuity or the rhetoric of hon. gentlemen opposite to say that they have followed on the same lines, because these speeches contain the leading lines of attack against this measure. I give the learned leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) credit for being a lawyer of sufficient ability and discrimination of mind to detect any defect that may exist, either in the contract or the amendments to it, and I know that he would have the ingenuity and the force to display such a defect to the House. He has been fishing with a very long trawl and with every hook baited. The hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Osler) has been fishing with a short trawl, but with a very large bag net. The hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) has said—and he has adduced figures to prove the contenion—that this transcontinental railway is to cost Canada $150,000,000 to $170,000,000. The hon. gentleman from Toronto (Mr. Osler) has said that the eastern section of this railway will not be built. If $150,000,000 or $170,000,000 are paid for the construction of the railway. The money is paid in instalments on certificate of work performed, that disposes of the idea that the railway will not be built, that disposes of the idea that $150,000,000 or $170,000,000 will be spent. I leave these two gentlemen to reconcile these two propositions themselves. Some gentlemen on the opposite side may not be at all captivated by my eloquence or at all influenced by my reasoning, but if any of them may have some new light break upon him, if he may have discovered that the vote he gave last year was given upon erroneous information, or if he may be informed and believe that the country through which this railway passes is not so difficult a railway as was represented, and as, in his ignorance, he believed it to be, he is not bound because he gave a vote last year in opposition to this railway when what is modified was then in it, to again vote against it. New information affords to every impartial mind the opportunity of reversing conclusions and altering decisions. The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) in his speech cavilled somewhat at an argument made by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that some two hundred years ago a Jesuit father, in an account of a visit of exploration, explained that this country which ordinarily would be thought to have a cold climate, and to be very barren, was really warm and mild in climate with a soil capable of cultivation. My hon. friend from Compton (Mr. Pope) has also criticised the premier for advancing that innocent little remark about the roses as a proof that the climate and conditions were such as the right hon. the Prime Minister had said, and he gave the idea that the premier was attempting to deceive the House by making quotations of that kind from an author who had travelled through this region from the south to the north two hundred years ago. The argument of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) was that if this country was so suitable for cultivation and exploitation he could not understand how it was that it had not been exploited during that two hundred years. A gentleman on this side of the House has cited the instance of Manitoba. How was it that, although that vast territory is now known to be so rich and fertile, was under the dominion of the Hudson's Bay Company and of the Northwest Company for so many years and was not opened for exploitation and settlement until a railway was built thirty years ago, after which the country was settled and that whole region developed ?

There is an instance I read in a newspaper the other day, that the site of the Rand Mines in South Africa had once been offered for sale in Johannesburg for £5. Now, that same site could not be bought for £300,000,000 sterling. And, although the British government expended nearly £300,000,000, and I do not know how many thousand lives in gaining and retaining that country, yet, that valuable deposit was unknown and that great country at one time disregarded, just as this region to the north is disregarded still. I do not understand the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite who have reiterated that this railway is going to cost a large amount of money because the country is uninhabitable, when they say also that they know nothing about the country, and they are incapable of judging of its quality. How, then, can they come to the conclusion that this railway will cost a large amount of money ? If they do not know what the country is, they are not acquainted with its capacities and qualities, surely they might admit the possibility of its being a good country for railway construction and give the government the benefit of the doubt. Why not say : We do not know that it is a bad and difficult country ; and we will allow a fair average for the construction of this railway ?

The learned leader of the opposition laid a good deal of stress on the question whether the Grand Trunk Pacific approached the government, or the government approached the Grand Trunk Pacific. And my. hon. friend from Compton has expatiated on the same subject, with a great deal of rhetorical embellishment. To my mind it makes little difference which approached the other. What we have before us is the compact resulting from that meeting, and if it is for parliament to decide whether that contract is a suitable one and to be approved, or whether it is a contract that ought to be rejected, our proceedings of last year reversed, the obligations we entered into last year retracted, and the Grand Trunk Company dismissed with reproach and contempt. As my esteemed colleague, the leader of the opposition, made a financial basis for the conclusions which he drew on this subject, I may be permitted to say that he took on this occasion as his oracle the late Hon. Mr. Blair, the former Minister of Railways and Canals and now chairman of the Railway Commission. He considers that gentleman to be one of the authorities whose declaration on such a subject as this ought to be conclusive, and any figures which he gives, any observations which he makes, to be final upon the subject of the cost of the railway. He quotes on that account this statement of the Prime Minister concerning Mr. Blair :—

> We believed there was not in Canada a better qualified and more competent man to discharge the duties of the office to which we have called him. . . . I recognize him as a man of great ability, as a man of great talent ; and I have no hesitation in saying that you cannot find to-day in Canada any one who is better endowed than Mr. Blair to be the chairman of the commission.

That was not to say that, because Mr. Blair had the qualifications to be chairman of the Railway Commission, to decide questions involving what rates should be charged on railways, or because Mr. Blair was a first class administrator, that for that reason, he had the qualifications to be the projector of a railway, or to be the engineer constructor of a railway, or to give an exact statement of what the construction of any given railway will cost. The qualifications are distinct, and those that fit a man for one office do not necessarily qualify him for the other. For instance, we would gladly assent to the proposal that the hon. leader of the opposition should remain the leader of the opposition during the time of his natural life ; but there are many on this side of the House who would dissent entirely from the proposition that he should become the leader of the government. But, as we are on the question of Mr. Blair's qualification, let me say that, even as an administrator he was not always approved by hon. gentlemen opposite. Everybody remembers the philippic that was poured on the head of the former Minister of Railways by the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House. Everybody will remember how, in that resonant voice, in that plenitude of oro rotundo, he poured out his denunciations upon Mr. Blair until he became almost black in the face, calling him, as they say, everything he could lay his tongue to—doubting his ability, impugning his good faith, openly insinuating his dishonesty and representing him as being totally unfit to be Minister of Railways and Canals of this country.

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition made this estimate :—

Construction of railway from Moncton to Winnipeg, 1,875 miles, at moderate estimate of $40,000 per mile..	$ 75,000,000
Assuming completion in 8 years, there will be an average of at least 4 years for simple interest at 3 per cent during construction, or $2,250,000 per year for four years..	9,000,000
	$84,000,000

The above estimate assumes that the money can be borrowed on 3 per cent securities at par—but if securities are placed at 90 (and the Finance Minister has admitted that they will not bring par) the result would be :

To provide $75,000,000 at 90 per cent as cost of 1,875 miles..	$ 83,333,334
Four years simple interest during construction, at 3 per cent, $2,500,000 per year for 4 years..	10,000,000
	$93,333,334

Now, considering that the latest information has shown that the road will be cheaply constructed, and taking into consideration that a large part of it is over a prairie district, will it not be moderate to fix the price of it at $30,000 per mile ? I observe that the Finance Minister, in his early estimations put down the probable cost at $31,000 per mile. A gentleman of high character and knowledge in railway construction has declared that the railway can be constructed for $31,500 per mile. Later information has rather reduced that figure, and all over the country those who are qualified to give information have declared that under these conditions and considerations the 1,875 miles from Moncton to Winnipeg can be built for $30,000 a mile. If that be so, I assume the figures will stand thus : Supposing the mileage is correct, and I fancy the leader of the opposition has given the correct mileage, the 1,875 miles from Moncton to Winnipeg, at $30,000 per mile, will cost $56,250,000. If completed in eight years, the interest being reckoned at 3 per cent for four years, $1,700,000 per annum, the interest will amount to $6,800,000 making a total of $63,000,000 in place of $84,000,000. Now suppose the rate of interest should increase so that securities will sell at 90 instead of 100, the figures of the leader of the opposition total $93,000,000. But here is what it will be if my figures are correct : $63,000,000 at 90 per cent, $70,000,000 ; four years interest at 3 per cent, $2,100,000 per annum, or $8,400,000, making a total of $78,400,000, instead of $93,000,000 according to the calculation of the leader of the opposition.

Now the question is whether the rate of interest will be 3 per cent or 4 per cent. Probably it will be 3 per cent. Financiers and bankers at the beginning of last year thought money would be so plentiful that the rate of interest would fall even below

3 per cent, and that they could obtain money perhaps for 2½ per cent. But subsequently there was a scare in the United States, and it was expected that the commercial stringency in that country would pass into Canada. Bankers began to realize upon their reserves, they began to collect their reserves to be ready for any calls which might be made upon them. They increased the rate of discount and decreased the discount. I am happy to announce now that yesterday the Bank of England reduced its rate of discount from 4 per cent to considerably less, and that now financiers and bankers are expecting the most prosperous commercial year Canada has ever seen, that money will be plentiful, and that there will be amply sufficient for all the industries and enterprises of the country; and perhaps we may return to the days when money was a drug on the market, and supposed to bring a very small rate of interest.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

HOME BANK OF CANADA.

On the order being called for:

Second Reading of Bill (No. 45) respecting the Home Bank of Canada—Mr. Osler.

Mr. FIELDING. I would ask that this Bill should stand for the present. It is an amendment to the Bank Act and I wish to have an opportunity of looking into it.

Order allowed to stand.

DOMINION FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. MACPHERSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 54) to incorporate the Dominion Fire Insurance Company.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to ask the Minister of Finance if his attention has been drawn to the title of this Bill. The hon. minister objected very much to the use of the word 'Canada' or the word 'Dominion' in the title of a bank. To my mind the same objection applies to the title of an insurance company.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). The question might be seriously considered in the Committee on Banking and Commerce. We do not usually raise questions of that kind on the second reading of a Bill. There is something in the suggestion of my hon. friend, and we can consider it in the Committee on Banking and Commerce, where it frequently happens that a change of title is made.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the proposed motion of Mr. R. L. Borden in amendment thereto.

Mr. WILLIAM ROCHE (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, the rate of interest being high at the present time, we may have to pay four per cent on the bonds for a year or so. Then, very probably, the rate will be reduced to three per cent or even less. On this assumption it is fair to believe that the road from Moncton to Winnipeg can be constructed for $65,000,000.

I beg to call your attention and the attention of the House to the proposal of the hon. leader of the opposition. His proposal is to extend the Intercolonial to Depot Harbour, and I suppose on from that to Winnipeg, buying the Canada Atlantic line and the Canadian Pacific line, and building westward from Winnipeg. These railways are to be bought this year. If they sell, they will expect to be paid immediately. If they are to be paid immediately, the interest to be paid on the purchase money would be at four per cent.

Now assuming the cost from Moncton to Winnipeg to be $65,000,000, and allowing seven years' interest, during which the Grand Trunk Pacific pays no rent, that, at 3½ per cent, would amount to $2,270,000 per annum, or, for the seven years, $16,000,000. That would bring up the total cost to $81,000,000. Then, for the Quebec bridge I will allow a cost of $6,700,000, and interest amounting to $300,000, making in all $7,000,000. It was argued very cogently and successfully by my hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. A. T. Thompson) that two or three railways would participate in the use of that bridge and would contribute to its cost by way of either interest or tolls; so that the sums derived for the use of that bridge would pay the interest on the original cost, and the issue of bonds or other securities for the amount would be simply so much paper, while the interest was being paid to the government.

For the prairie section of 1,000 miles it is fair to assume that nothing is to be paid. On that point Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson further said:

> As regards the prairie section, the government, not unfairly, held that it would be self-sustaining from the day of its completion, and in this view we are willing to concur.

Mr. Chas. M. Hays said:

> Here is the Grand Trunk, the parent company, standing with a large traffic ready to deliver it west bound. This traffic is now given to a competitor. It does not have to wait five, ten or fifteen years to build up a traffic; it starts with a traffic right from the beginning, and that of a most remunerative character. This enterprise which we are advocating today, ladies and gentlemen, combines points and advantages no other transcontinental line in the United States or Canada can have.

It is fair to assume that on this section there would be no liability on the part of the government, and nothing would have to be paid in the way of interest. The traffic from the inception would pay these charges. So we have for these two sections and the bridge a cost of $88,000,000. Taking for the mountain section the large estimate of $50,000 a mile for the 500 miles, this amounts to $25,000,000. Interest on this amount for four years at 3½ per cent amounts to $3,500,000. Three-fourths of the cost of this section is to be borne by the government, that is, $21,000,000. So we have this summary:

Cost of the eastern section	$ 81,000,000
Cost of the bridge	7,000,000
Three-fourths of the cost of the mountain section	21,500,000
Making a total of	$109,500,000

We will be generous; suppose we allow $10,000,000 more for contingencies for unforeseen expenses, and for costly construction. Then you have a total of $120,000,000 for the building of this great railway, for the interest paid during its construction and for all cost incident to it.

Some people always look at the worst that can happen. It is a fair proposition to see at the commencement of an undertaking how much at the worst we will have to pay. Any one who endorses a note for a friend should get ready to pay it if it should not be convenient for his friend to do so. Supposing that no traffic goes over the railway, that the whole line has to be abandoned, then there are from $3,500,000 to $4,000,000 to be paid per annum, and on the other hand you have all the probabilities and all the possibilities of this great railway of the future, when there shall be a population in the west of 7,000,000 to 10,000,000. Here we are at the 'parting of the ways.' I will have to take leave of my colleague the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden), who makes up a statement like an attorney's bill against an estate in chancery and proceeds to calculate simple interest, and uncompounded interest, and to allow for deferred payments, and for loss due to the difference between the sum the government will have to pay for interest and the sum it might be recouped by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway.

My friend from South Grey (Mr. Richardson) remarked with considerable spirit upon the discrepancy in the statements of the hon. the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) and of the member for Haldimand (Mr. A. T. Thompson) that the Finance Minister had declared that this railway was to be constructed at a cost to the government of $13,000,000 while the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. A. T. Thompson) had placed the cost at $80,000,000. My hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. A. T. Thompson) in his argument was making deductions from the statement of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) that the obligations which the government would assume in consequence of this undertaking would be from $150,000,000 to $170,000,000. He lopped off by calculations and by investigation an amount of $70,000,000; and by this cut down the account to $80,000,000. On the other hand the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) gave the cost to the country in interest only. Almost everybody knows the difference between principal and interest, and it is because of this that we have the discrepancy between these two statements, which was so severly commented upon by the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Richardson). The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) gave the assumed amount for which the country was obligated as guarantors of the bonds. The Finance Minister gave the interest that would be paid in the course of the transaction assuming that the bonds would not be paid and that that would be a charge that would be afterwards recouped from the profits of the Grand Trunk Pacific. I gave the cost to the government on eastern section, the bridge and the mountain section. On the latter the cost, twenty-one millions, will have to be repaid from the bonds issued on joint account.

The hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) objected to the partnership in which the Grand Trunk puts in $14,000,000 or $15,000,000 and the government he says puts in $150,000,000. Partnerships are not all founded upon equal amounts of contributed capital ; one partner may put in $1,000 another may put in $10,000 and they may or may not share the profits alike. That would depend upon the terms of the agreement of partnership. One partner may have capital but little business ability, and the other may have great experience, capacity and energy but not a large amount of capital to put in the business. Again there are other partnerships of a highly intellectual nature in which no cash is contributed at all, but which some people say are far more profitable than those in which substantial amounts of money are invested. What is wanted in this undertaking is the practical experience, the connections and the influence of the Grand Trunk Railway. The government can find all the money that is necessary for the undertaking. What it requires is the practical economic operation of the road with its collateral advantages which can be obtained by the widespread operations of a company under favourable management.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) goes on to argue at great length and with many quotations from the speeches of parliamentarians, financiers and others that the Grand Trunk Railway having such a good arrangement ought not to have any further concessions, and amongst other items he objects to their being permitted to dispose of a portion of the common stock. I think it was fair in the first instance that the amount of stock should be regulated and that it should be divided into preferred and common stock, and I say that it makes no great difference whether the $25,000,000 shall be held by the Grand Trunk or the Grand Trunk shall dispose of a part of it. With regard to the value of that common stock I suppose no financier would say what it is likely to be. Many people in this country, perhaps some in parliament, have assumed that they knew a great deal about the value of common stocks in industrials. They have had experience now ; and have found that their knowledge of the value of industrials did not exactly correspond with the amount of capital they had left at the end of the transaction, after these industries had tumbled in the market from 60 or 70 per cent down to 7 or 8 per cent. Thus that argument founded on stocks and the proportion that should be held, is entirely dependent on the earnings of the road and the amount of interest set aside as a contribution to the various kinds of stock. If my eyes do not deceive me and if my ears have not proven treacherous, I remember an argument in the Committee of the Whole, on this Bill wherein the leader of the opposition argued with all his acumen and with a great deal of his force that the Grand Trunk Railway was not a partner in the transaction, and could not be seen in any way in the contract.

Now, Sir, I beg to call your attention briefly to the concessions that are made, I shall not attempt to argue them or to extend my remarks further than to say what the concessions are.

First. The extension of time on the western section for one or two years. I do not believe that any reasonable man would object to this extension of time under the contingencies that have arisen, and considering the prospects we have and the conditions which may arise in the future. Every hon. gentleman who is conversant with the construction of railways and large undertakings where the government is involved, where capital is unlimited, where there is no strike or other disability as in the provision of material for the hastening of the work, and where the stipulation is for construction within a certain length of time, it is reasonable to suppose that the work will be completed far before the end of that time, because corporations of this kind and governments are most anxious that these works of public utility shall be finished with the utmost possible speed.

Second. It is complained that there is no fixed commission on the sale of the bonds. This was a very sore subject with my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Osler). He made much of this omission of fixing the amount of commission for the sale and disposal of these bonds. No person, I think, is more sensitive with regard to the selling of bonds and the amount of commission accepted therefor than the hon. member for West Toronto. This provision is to be found at page 798 of 'Hansard' :—

visions of the said contract, its guarantee of the bonds of the said company to be issued for the cost of construction of the said western division, in such manner as may be agreed upon, so to make the proceeds of the said bonds so as to be guaranteed a sum equal to seventy-five per centum of the cost of construction of the western division ascertained as provided in the said contract, but not exceeding in respect of the prairie section, thirteen thousand dollars ($13,000) per mile.

If the Grand Trunk Railway is ultimately to pay the amount of the bonded indebtedness, it will see to it that no excessive bonds are issued. And, if the government are to be the ultimate possessors of the road, their officers will take pains to prevent any excessive bond issue of the payment of any exorbitant commission to those who are to dispose of the bonds or provide the cash.

Third. A foreclosure in case of default of interest to be paid by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. I am not a lawyer, and have no intimate acquaintance with the mode of foreclosure. I do not wish to add to the learned legal argument made on this question. It has been thoroughly elucidated. My effort would not tend to cast further light upon it, but rather to obscure it. But there was one singular remark made upon this subject by the leader of the opposition. That remark was to the effect that if this portion of the road should prove unremunerative the Grand Trunk Pacific Company would make default, in which case the road might be put in the hands of a receiver; but when business revived and traffic increased, making the road profitable, then the Grand Trunk Pacific Company would take the road back and operate it during the good times;—and, I suppose, they would leave it to the government again when the profits fell off. I may be bold enough to say that if there be any suspicion in the minds of the leader of the opposition or any other gentleman that this kind of sliding scale could be put in force, the matter should be made clear. It would not be creditable to the government of Canada that there should be any such alternating of control. Once default is made for a number of years, after due charity has been extended to the undertaking, if it is found that either wilfully or by reason of inability, the company does not work that section of the road, the government should resume possession of it and operate it for all time.

Fourth. Alteration in the contract as to the common stock of $25,000,000 to be handed over to the Grand Trunk. Part of that item, I have no doubt, was to provide rolling stock, part was for ships and part for other expense, perhaps to provide the balance of capital between what the government would supply and that which the Grand Trunk Company would have to furnish on the two sections. But the learned leader of the opposition goes on to say that these are concessions made to the company, but where are the concessions made to the government? Where, he asks, is the benefit that will accrue to the country? Of course, the benefit to the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific Companies will be in the proceeds of the traffic. They may amount to five per cent, or to seven or eight per cent, on the capital invested. But the great benefit the country receives is not this percentage on the capital invested, whatever it may be, but the opening up of the country through which the railway will pass, the establishing of collateral enterprises and the improvement in the business of the country at large, as well as in the greater facilities offered for commerce.

A speech was made in this debate by my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule). In the course of his very acute and very forcible observation he said that the construction of this railway and the issue of the bonds would involve a very large sum which would be distributed over the farms of Ontario, and he gave the amount of the mortgage on each farm which this expenditure would represent. I object to a gentleman of the experience, industry, and dialetic ability of the hon. member for East Grey appealing to class interests in this way. I do not wish to lecture the House or any member of it; but I say that this country requires that the best services and the most sanguine views of gentlemen of experience in this House should be devoted to the interests of the Dominion as a whole.

He should not take that line, because it savours of class interest, and is not correct. The total amount divided amongst the farmers does not indicate the amount on each farm, because a large proportion of the cost is borne by the cities, by wealthy individuals and by commercial and other interests. The division of the capital sum amongst the farmers does not show that there is any such mortgage on every man's farm. But this spirit and this appeal should be discountenanced in Canada. The country looks to men of that kind to take the most liberal views they can of a great public measure, in order to bring the people up to the patriotic standpoint. Ontario has a great future in this country. It is the leading partner amongst the provinces. It has great obligations to the Dominion also. It is the central province of the confederation. Every effort should be made in Ontario, not to hoard the money and resources of the people, but to use them for the development of that central portion of the Dominion. Look at the map and see the fringe of population along the southern borders, see the vast extent of territory which is unoccupied and undeveloped at the present time. Look to the east and to the west and see the slender line connecting the several divisions of the Dominion. It becomes the province of Ontario, it becomes her sons, behind none others in intelligence and patriotism, to bend their energies to consolidate and broaden Ontario, and fuse its interests with the provinces on each side of her by sending the life-blood from the heart out to the extremities, thus making one whole of the country. Let Ontario no longer be jealous of Quebec, nor Quebec of Ontario, let British Columbia and the western provinces be not jealous of Ontario, nor look to the south for their welfare and development. Ontario should set the example of sacrifice demanded in order to keep the country intact, in which case Ontario will become the centre of every patriotic influence, the centre of every enterprise which is for the benefit of the outlying parts of the Dominion.

Look at the United States when that country had a population no greater than Canada has now. In the early days of the United States as a nation, they spent an immense sum of money upon building what was called the Cumberland road, which was to begin on the Atlantic and run away into the interior. It was not a railroad, it was a common wagon road, and so desirable was it deemed to be to bind the various states together and to harmonize the interests of the east and the west that they spent $70,000,000 in the construction of that road. That was a great and worthy national object at the day, but for the purposes for which it was then constructed it is now worth nothing. Still it was deemed at the time so necessary to bind the east and the west together, and to develop and settle up that country, to carry the commerce of the east to those new settlements, that they spent that large sum of money to carry out this patriotic object. And they did well. That great country that we admire so much has been built up by the patriotism of the people in their early days, looking to a great national future, and each part of the country made its contribution to the welfare of the whole.

Now, Sir, there is another statement put forward by the hon. gentlemen opposite which needs to be looked into. Objection is made to the provision taking over the branch lines in case the government should elect to operate the eastern division. That is a provision which should be well looked into. I do not pretend to say from local knowledge what branch lines will be built, I do not pretend to say that they will be useful to the Grand Trunk, or what lines it may deem expedient to keep or not to keep. But if the company should desire to keep the paying lines and throw over the other lines to the government, the government has sufficient authority to take those lines which are subservient for the main purpose, and to refuse to take those which are purely incidental to the operation of the Grand Trunk and are not a part of the system which the government has assisted.

Now, the learned leader of the opposition goes on to say that this prevents the government for all time from embarking in any other transcontinental road. I would like to ask how the building of this road in part by the government, how the assisting by the government of this road which is to be built by the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific, will prevent the government hereafter from building another transcontinental road ? Is it for the want of money ? Is it assumed that in the future Canada will be so cramped and confined by reason of the interest which she will have to pay that she will be unable to build another road ? Have hon. gentlemen no faith in the future expansion of our country ? Or is it because the Grand Trunk Railway will operate this road, is it because they will monopolize it, is it because they will prevent by their influence any other national transcontinental road being undertaken ? I fail to see any such chimera, I fail to see any valid objection that can be urged to the construction in the future of as many roads as the government thinks expedient for the welfare of the people, of as many roads as the government can afford to subsidize out of its resources which will have grown so vast.

I would like to say a word or two upon the rival routes. On page 786, the leader of the opposition referred to an editorial in the Halifax 'Morning Chronicle,' in which the writer pretended :

> If the canals were so deepened as to permit the lake carriers to reach Montreal or Quebec from Georgian Bay, it is perfectly certain that all railways would be put out of business so far as the grain trade in summer is concerned.

Upon this the contention is made by many hon. gentlemen that this transcontinental railway will abolish the carrying of grain by the lake and river route. The writer in the 'Morning Chronicle' contends that in summer the railways cannot compete with water transportation. But what about the water stretches in winter ? Hon. gentlemen opposite have laid great stress upon the contention that the carriage of grain will depend upon the water route from the lakes to Montreal, as if that were the sole means of transportation. What will become of that means of transport in the winter ? Suppose we had in the future, suppose we had next year, or the year following, or both, a winter such as we had this year ; suppose we were to depend upon river and lake navigation in winters like this, it would be impossible to carry any grain or any commodities over that route. Now, suppose we adopted the proposition of the leader of the opposition, and carried the Intercolonial to the Georgian Bay, suppose we carried it to Depot Harbour, and suppose that was the beginning of the Canada Atlantic Railway.

What would he do to get his grain in the winter time ? Would he be able to navigate the lakes ? The absurdity of the proposition seems to have suggested itself to him. Perhaps he was reading about the conveying of Russian troops and munitions of war over Lake Baikal because he said that navigation might be prolonged a little longer in the fall of the year by ice breakers. I would like to see the commerce of the great lakes, the commerce of the great west, the commerce which goes to the maritime provinces depending upon the water being kept open in a winter like the last one by ice breakers on Lake Superior or any other lake. How would it be in winter along the projected Grand Trunk Pacific Railway? The winter of 1904 will long be remembered in Canada and the northern states on account for the severe weather and continuous snow storms which blocked the railways almost everywhere and especially in western Ontario to an extent without precedent in railway experience, some of the lines being closed for weeks at a time and on this we are to depend to carry out the project of the hon. leader of the opposition. The following editorial from the Toronto 'Globe' on March 3, 1904, shows that northern Quebec, usually looked upon as the region of snow blockades is not so white as it is painted, the most northern railway in the province not having cancelled a single train —freight or passenger—during this exceptional winter, and its tonnage hauled showing increases every week since December last:

The Unblockaded North.

The man with the yardstick is reporting on the snow blockade. Eight feet on the level is a customary figure, but one observer, with a talent for accuracy, announces that the depth in his locality is thirteen feet three inches. Snow stories are the winter counterpart of fish stories in summer. Amid all this talk of the blockade it is pleasant to learn of some part of the country where the snowfall does not interfere with traffic, and, curiously enough, the north country furnishes it. It is now about ten years since the Quebec and Lake St. John Railway was completed from Quebec to Roberval and Chicoutimi, a distance of 240 miles, traversing a portion of the same country, northwest of Quebec, through which the government Pacific road is to pass. During all these years this road has been operated without any interruption whatever from snow. The Quebec papers tell us that during this exceptional winter and through all the storms of this northern country the Lake St. John passenger trains have been running sharp on time, there has been no delay in the freight service, and the earnings show satisfactory increases over last winter. The road has been sending all winter thousands of tons of pulp from the mills of the north to the paper mills in New England, which, owing to the scarcity of water, they cannot get from the pulp mills in their own country.

There is a good argument in all this for the new transcontinental. It shows the wisdom of the government's decision to build the road by the shortest and most direct line from Quebec to Winnipeg, north of the height of land in the James Bay territory of Quebec and Ontario. The objection has been raised that it might be difficult to operate such a road in the winter owing to the excessive snowfall.

The critics seem to have overlooked the fact that the published statistics of Mr. Stupart, of the Toronto Observatory, prove that the average annual snowfall at Moose Factory, on James Bay, is half that of Montreal, showing that the precipitation in the St. Lawrence valley is very much greater than it is north of the height of land. Sir Wilfrid Laurier knew what he was talking about when he said in Montreal a few days ago that the idea and the determination of the government is not only to get the shortest possible line across the continent, and the shortest route to China and Japan, but also to create, north of the Laurentians and beyond the height of land, new provinces of Quebec and Ontario.

I want to ask my hon. friend the leader of the opposition—I asked this question last year and I repeat it now—if he extends the Intercolonial Railway by means of the Canada Atlantic Railway to Depot Harbour where will he get his freight for the Intercolonial Railway stretching away to the maritime provinces? He cannot get it by water during the winter time. Where will he get it? In summer time if he had connections with the west and if he had elevators for the storage of wheat he might find some traffic for the road, but the owners of wheat will not suffer it to remain in storage. It is subject to loss and injury. I ask him how he would get his wheat there? He has no western connection. He has no lake navigation. What will he do with his railway in the winter time? How will he get anything to carry to the maritime provinces? Then he is driven back upon the railway to Winnipeg. He will have to purchase, first of all, the Canadian Pacific Railway connecting Sudbury with Port Arthur, and afterwards he will buy the link from Port Arthur to Winnipeg.

Now, my hon. friend the hon. leader of the opposition implores the government to abandon the great transcontinental railway project and extend the Intercolonial Railway to the Georgina Bay. I ask him what for, I ask him what purpose it will subserve. I ask him what good it will do to the maritime provinces by adding to the length of a railway which has no connections with the west, which cannot produce the traffic to carry over it, which is of no utility during the longest season of the year when it should be employed to the greatest extent in carrying the productions of the west.

My hon. friend went on with extensive and most laborious quotations from the Hon. Mr. Blair to prove that the alternative scheme was not a mad scheme. How he reconciled that with his inner consience, how he drew to himself the flattering unction that the disapproval of Mr. Blair is to be construed into approval, I am at a loss to determine. Time will not suffice to go into it. I do not believe that I have the legal acumen to extract an opinion in one direction and transform it into an opinion in another. Whether Mr. Blair said that it was a mad scheme or whether he now says it is an advantageous scheme I do not care; I will leave it to them to determine for themselves and when they have arrived at a determination I do not expect that there will be a general verdict.

But, whether Mr. Blair is or is not a competent authority on the subject of transportation and of railway construction I know one gentleman who is a competent authority on the subject of railway construction and on the subject of the most economical means of conveying a railway through any territory in which it may be prudent to allocate it. I allude to a gentleman who is now in hale and hearty old age with his faculties unimpaired. I know a gentleman who has had practical experience of a great railway enterprise that spans the continent from ocean to ocean. I allude to Sir Sandford Fleming. He has sent me a copy of his latest work 'Build up Canada' from which I beg to read this extract:

There remains to be opened up, by far the larger half of the productive Northwest. An inspection of the map will satisfy any one that unquestionably the northern half can best be served by the construction of a trunk railway on a northern route.

3. A railway built on the northern route would be the shortest line between the two oceans, besides the most direct for the products of the northern half of the prairie region to the nearest Canadian shipping ports.

4. By establishing on the northern route a modern first-class railway devoid of gradients and every other hindrances to cheap transportation, we would possess the means of carrying the products of the northern half of the prairie region to Canadian tidal ports at all seasons of the year, at less cost than by any other route whatever. The advantages of the lake route have been much extolled. Transportation by water certainly has advantages under certain circumstances, but it also has limitations due to climatic and geographical conditions. In all probability the country west of Winnipeg, and Winnipeg itself, will continue to enjoy during summer all the advantages which the lakes can yield, but there is a vast cultivated country farther north and west, from which it is believed freight may be carried to Quebec by railway on the northern route at less cost than by the lake route. Of course it will be understood that this is conditional upon the line to be constructed being free from such gradients as we find on ordinary Canadian railways, a condition which can only be definitely determined by adequate surveys. Should such a favourable line be established as is believed possible, I venture to state that owing to the reduced total mileage, and still more owing to the reduced gradients on the new line, grain may be carried to Quebec by the direct route at less cost than by the southern route, even if carried almost free of charge across the lakes from Fort William to Depot Harbour, Owen Sound or Sarnia. This of course only applies to the half year of open navigation; during the other half year the northern route would be without a rival worthy of the name.

5. A railway constructed on the northern route would, at all times and seasons, be a reliable outlet from the granary of the empire in the heart of Canada to tide-water. Moreover, at Quebec in summer, and at the open ports of the maritime provinces in winter, the ships transporting produce to Great Britain would, when necessary, be placed under the express protection of the British fleet.

6. Such a railway constructed between Quebec and the western prairies on the northern route would be a national highway in every sense. Its immediate effect would be to broaden the Dominion, to add strength where strength is so much needed, to establish many new centres of industry, and thus the country would steadily become populated and consolidated. What is now a wide-spread wilderness would be converted into one of the most important divisions of the Dominion.

Now, the leader of the opposition having bestowed upon the Grand Trunk that stunning blow upon the solar plexus by his amendment; fearing that there might be a punch left in his old antagonist, he condescends to tell the Grand Trunk, that after he has cast to the winds their contract; after he has constructed his own railway; after he has gained all the advantages; he will condescend to permit the Grand Trunk Railway to build a road to Winnipeg, and perhaps further to the west. But it must have a proviso in its charter, that none of its freight shall be carried to American ports. That is adding insult to injury.

I want to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. R. L. Borden) how the grain of Manitoba is going to be carried out in the winter season. I want information on that point. How will the grain from north and west of Winnipeg be carried to the sea-board in the future? If there be not a railway to tap these northern territories, how will they get their grain and produce to the market? Will it not go by means of the American railways? Will not the enterprise of the American railways control the traffic which will be carried south to meet these American roads, and will not all the objects which we intend to serve by the Grand Trunk Pacific; will not all the prospects of the future be cast aside, if we allow the American railways through their enterprise to connect with these wheat fields which we neglect. Have we not now in our own hands, the opportunity to correct that evil, and should we not avail of it?

In the summarized contentions of the leader of the opposition—a choice bouquet which he flung upon the table and in that there is one orchid whose delicate fragrance I would commend to the House. I refer to his remarks about the Intercolonial Railway. He said that he would like to relieve the Intercolonial Railway—and I suppose the extensions of the Intercolonial Railway to Depot Harbour and everywhere else of political influence. What does he mean by that? Is not the Intercolonial Railway sufficiently Tory now? Is not almost every official on it now a Tory, and does he not think he is bound in duty to oppose the present government in every way, and to use his influence to affect all that are under the management of that railway, so as to create a grievance? All the time that the Tory government was in power, was there a Liberal official that dare call his life his own; was he not harried and persecuted, and was he not abased and treated in every way as if he were an alien and a slave? The Liberal party wants to give every man that is employed on the Intercolonial the benefit of his vote, and the free expression of his opinion; but when he canvasses and when he uses his position detrimental to the government and the department of which he is a servent, I should say that the more political influence you introduce to balance that, the better.

A little further on in the debate the gentleman from Niagara (Mr. Lancaster) said that if the Tories got into power they would cancel the contract which has been made, and I suppose that the country would have to pay damages. I would like to know if that announcement is authenticated by the leader of the Conservative party? Is it to be left for the people of the maritime provinces to consider, that if the Conservative government should come into power, they would be cut off from all connection with the west; is the consideration put before the people of Manitoba, and the Territories, that they would be cut off from all connection with the Atlantic seaboard? Is the announcement to be accepted that the province of Ontario and the province of Quebec are to be cut off from the benefit of a transcontinental railway, and that all these provinces are to have will be colonization railways within the confines of the provinces? Is that an announcement which is made in good faith? Is that the announcement which they make to the people of Canada, and to the inhabitants of these provinces affected? Is that the programme of the Conservative party? We want to know that.

Sir, we heard a great deal about what was conceded in this contract, and let us try to realize now what is actually left. The arguments of learned legal men may not affect us to a great extent; we always expect to find from them the creation of difficulties, and the invention of circumstances and conditions which may never arise. We are not so much affected by them as we are by material things, and plain men like myself and others want to know what remains then of this contract. The contract is there in all its essential features. There is the railway from Moncton to Quebec; there is the bridge; there is the railway from Quebec to Winnipeg, built by the government; there is the railway from Winnipeg to the mountains, built by the Grand Trunk Pacific; there is the section through the mountains to the Pacific; all operated by the Grand Trunk Pacific, with rates to maritime ports the same as to American ports. Are not all these essential clauses in the main contract still? Is not the 42nd clause there? Is not the 44th clause there? They are not affected by these amendments. The rest is a mere bagatelle. What shall we have seven or eight years hence, when this contract has materialized into actual work? We shall have a transcontinental railway in reality, extending from Sydney on the east to Moncton, from Pictou to Moncton, from Halifax to Moncton, from St. John to Moncton, from Moncton to Quebec, from Quebec to Winnipeg, from Winnipeg to the sea—all operated by the Grand Trunk Pacific management, all under the control of government rates, all conducted for the benefit of the country at large. What are the advantages of this road? Its plain, salient advantages are well known. Its advantages to Cape Breton will be in the furnishing of its coal to the railway and the inhabitants of the country; the furnishing of its iron, its steel, its rails, its bridge work, its materials of every kind; the furnishing of labour to the people who are engaged in the industries of that flourishing portion of the Dominion. What will be its advantages to Halifax? Ships coming with inward freight; ships going, laden with grain and other cargoes; labour to the workingman which the workingman desires; employment giving him the means of supporting himself and his family—that is the announcement we want to make to the country; improved terminals in the splendid port of Halifax, the greatest port that will be on the Atlantic at least, either north or south; advantages in many collateral ways; advantages to all branches of commerce; advantages to all the employments and business enterprises of the country and the province. There will be advantages to Pictou and to other parts of Nova Scotia, in their coal, stone, lumber, cars, machinery; and there will be the labour which is incidental to the production of all things, and the payment for skill and enterprise in the factories engaged in these enterprises. What will be the advantages to New Brunswick? St. John, with ships carrying outward grain and other produce, and carrying inward freight. New Brunswick furnishing stone, timber, lumber, produce supplies to the railway building through it; also benefiting by all the influence of the railway when it is completed through the province. What are the advantages to Quebec? Settlement of that vast continent of land lying to the north; utilization of its forest and mineral products; building up of towns and cities in the territory; through traffic on the railway; labour for the teeming inhabitants of that province in building the railway; subsequent commercial operations; supplies for construction, stone, timber, lumber, bridge work, furniture; keeping the factories in operation, giving employment to the people; commerce revived at Quebec and Montreal—inward commerce and outward commerce; and every development which this great work will give to those portions of the country. What will be the advantages to Ontario? Is Ontario to get nothing? Is Ontario to be behind? Employment of manufacturers, setting the tall chimneys smoking; carriage of farm produce and other articles to those engaged in building the railway; interstate commerce as that proceeds; traffic on the railway as it is in course of completion; building of towns and cities in the northern part of the province; improvement of farms and lands, and the promotion of the general happiness and prosperity of the people—that is for Ontario. What are the advantages to the Northwest? Outward freight; the destruction of monopoly and excessive freight charges; prairies turned into farms; the Northwest peopled with farmers, villagers and other inhabitants; homes of millions of prosperous people; inward freight; the balance of trade with the United States adjusted, there being no longer a great excess of imports over exports; the great Northwest receiving more of the productions of Ontario and other manufacturing provinces of the Dominion. Is there anything for British Columbia? There will be a fleet of ships on the Pacific, communication with the coast; utilization of lumber for the road and materials for bridges; carriage of grain through, general development, the development of its immense mineral resources, trade with Japan and the Orient, and a general expansion of the country. Over all the line there will be increased employment for the people. There will be employment for labour in the building of the road. There will be employment for the makers of machines, for engineers and surveyors and clerks, for skilled workmen who will be required for the railway. There will be employment for our young professional men who have aspirations, and whose services are needed in the development of the country—for those who are at present studying in our colleges for engineering and other professions, which will be utilized in a great work like this; and preference will be given to qualified men who are natives of our own country—Nova Scotians, Cape Breton men, New Brunswickers, Quebec men, Ontario men, western men and British Columbia men. Those who are qualified to undertake the execution of this great work will have the preference. Their future is before them, and it is bound to be in this great work. What more? What will be the advantages to Canada as a whole? Unroll the map of Canada now. Now population is doubled along the southern portion of its territory, now it is developed at the ends with an attenuated middle, with a fringe of people along its southern border looking with wonder and alarm at the colossus to the south, with his giant limbs stretching from ocean to ocean and our commerce passing between his wide stretched feet. Look on this large picture painted by faith and hope on every patriotic Canadian heart: the sun is rising at Vancouver but it is noon-high at Halifax shining down upon a proud and prosperous land. There is the railway running through the centre, with its branch lines reaching out in all directions. There are the farms, the hamlets, the villages and towns. There are the stately homes and the cottage homes of an intelligent, industrious, contented and happy people—no longer any jealousy among them; there also is the church and the tall chimney, too. What are the causes of this great expansion? One cause, is that Providence has reserved this country for development in the twentieth century; and one cause of its prosperity is that this year the parliament of Canada gave its consent to the contract to build the National Transcontinental Railway.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE (Marquette) moved the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Fielding, House adjourned at 9.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, April 18, 1904.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Report of the Northwest Mounted Police.—Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

ANTI-CHINESE LEGISLATION.

Mr. AULAY MORRISON (New Westminster). Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the right hon. the First Minister if there is any information before the government to confirm the report that comes from British Columbia that the Emperor of China has made overtures to the imperial government seeking to interfere with the anti-Chinese legislation of this parliament at its last session?

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). There is no information of such a character in the hands of the government.

THE JOINT HIGH COMMISSION.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether or not there is any objection to placing on the table of the House the instructions or commissions issued to the members of the Joint High Commission. We understand that it is uncertain whether or not that commission will again assemble. There is no immediate probability at least of its being convoked. I do not recollect of the instructions or commissions ever having been placed before this House, and I assume that there is no objection now to placing them on the table, for the purpose of informing the House and the country as to the authority which the members of that commission had in conducting their negotiations with representatives of the government of the United States.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. So far as my memory serves me, there are no other instructions than those contained in the commission, which I think was placed on the table of the House some years ago. At all events, there can be no objection to its being again placed on the table.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. My right hon. friend may be correct. If so, it is not my fault that I have not seen the commission, because I made inquiry for it in the library, and was informed that there was no such document there. If it had been laid on the table of the House, I assume that it would have been there.

THE ALASKAN BOUNDARY—CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would like also to call the attention of the Prime Minister to the fact that the papers relating to the Alaskan boundary dispute have not yet been placed before parliament in a very satisfactory condition. My right hon. friend last session expressed himself in this way with regard to those papers :

> I am sorry to say that the whole correspondence which we have had upon this question since 1899 has not yet been placed before parliament ; I am sorry not only that we have not the treaty-making power, but that we are not in such an independent position that it is in my power to place before parliament the whole of the correspondence as it passed between the Canadian government and the British government. But we shall have that correspondence, and it will be placed before parliament at the next session—the whole of it, no matter what protest may come from abroad, we shall have the whole of it, and then this country may know exactly what has taken place, and what share of responsibility must rest upon each of the parties concerned in this matter.

I am not aware that we have the whole of the correspondence at present. I mentioned the matter once before, and at that time my right hon. friend thought it would be down in a few days, or at least later on during this session. I suggest now that we should have the whole of the correspondence, and have it arranged in such order that members of the House will be able thoroughly to understand it, and not in the way in which documents of this character are sometimes brought down.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I may say to the House that at ths moment we are corresponding with the imperial authorities on the subject of this correspondence. I hope that before the session progresses much further we may be able to issue a blue-book containing the whole of it, so far as we have it.

MR. BLAIR'S RESIGNATION—CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would like also to ask the government whether or not all the correspondence between the Hon. Mr. Blair and the government respecting the causes which led to his resignation, has been placed before the House. The correspondence as it was placed before the House by Mr. Blair himself during the past session is contained in pages 6740-6747 of 'Hansard' of last session. There has been no statement so far as I am aware, that the whole of the correspondence has been brought down, and formally laid before the House. I would ask the Prime Minister whether the whole of it has been brought down, and, if not, whether there is any objection to bringing down the remainder ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. So far as I remember, the whole of that correspondence has been brought down ; but I will make further inquiry on the subject.

HOME BANK OF CANADA.

Mr. CLARKE moved second reading of Bill (No. 45) respecting the Home Bank of Canada.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). That Bill is somewhat exceptional in its character. It is a departure from the general principle of the Banking Act, and these departures should only be made for special reasons. We did pass a similar Act respecting the Crown Bank a year ago. I am quite ready to let the Bill go to the committee, when further information may be obtained from the hon. gentleman who is promoting it.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 57) to incorporate the International Railway Bridge Company of New Brunswick.—Mr. C. Marcil.

Bill (No. 58) respecting the Imperial Loan and Investment Company of Canada.—Mr. A. T. Thompson.

Bill (No. 59) respecting the Montreal Park and Island Railway Company.—Mr. Geoffrion.

Bill (No. 60) respecting the Kettle River Valley Railway Company.—Mr. Galliher.

Bill (No. 61) to incorporate the Thorold and Lake Erie Railway Company.—Mr. German.

Bill (No. 62) respecting the Welland and Grand Island Bridge Company.—Mr. German.

Bill (No. 63) respecting the Edmonton and Slave Lake Railway Company.—Mr. Costigan.

Bill (No. 64) respecting the Strait of Canso Bridge Company.—Mr. Wade.

QUESTIONS.

SS. 'LAKE CHAMPLAIN.'

Mr. E. D. SMITH—by Mr. Clarke—asked :

1. In answer to question of April 6th, the Minister of Agriculture said : 'The ss. 'Lake Champlain' had the ordinary system of cowl ventilation.'

2. Has the government examined these cowl ventilators, and found them in proper order and of sufficient size on this boat on each outward voyage, when perishable cargo was aboard ?

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER (Minister of Agriculture). One of the inspectors for the Department of Agriculture has reported on each outward voyage of this steamship, both from the port of Montreal during the past season of navigation and from the port of St. John, N.B., during the winter season, and in each report the ventilation is described as follows :—

'Tween decks : No. 1—2 in-takes, 2 out-takes ; No. 2—2 in-takes ; No. 3—2 in-takes ; No. 4—2 in-takes ; No. 5—2 in-takes, 2 out-takes ; No. 6—2 out-takes.

Orlop : No. 1—2 in-takes, 2 out-takes.

Holds : No. 1—2 in-takes, 2 out-takes : No. 2—2 in-takes ; No. 3—2 in-takes ; No. 4—2 in-takes ; No. 5—2 in-takes, 2 out-takes ; No. 6—2 out-takes.

The ventilators in the 'tween decks were 18 inches in diameter, and those in the holds 14 inches.

Every inspector is instructed to mention in his report the fact of a ventilator being out of order if he so finds it when making his examination. The reports do not state that any of the ventilators were out of order.

RAILWAY CATTLE-GUARD COMMISSION.

Mr. LENNOX asked :

What is the total cost of the Railway Cattle-guard Commission ?

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Minister of Railways and Canals). The total cost of the Cattle-guard Commission was $6,828,68.

FURNISHING ELECTRIC POWER TO UNITED STATES.

Mr. CLARKE asked :

1. Has any application been made to the government, and if so, when and by whom, for permission to obtain electric power generated in Canada, to convey it to the United States ?

2. If such application has been made, what action has the government taken, or what decision has the government come to, in respect to the matter ?

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). No record can be found of any such application.

ALBERTON STATION AND ENTRANCE.

Mr. HACKETT asked :

1. What report, if any, has the government received relative to the survey and appropriation of a new entrance by rail into the town of Alberton, Prince county, Prince Edward Island, and the avoidance of the 'Y' nuisance, under which the place has long suffered ?

2. Before the new station is commenced at Alberton, will this nuisance be removed by selecting a proper line of entrance ?

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Minister of Railways and Canals) :

1. The department has received a report from the General Manager, which does not favour the proposed change.

2. The matter is under consideration as to what shall be done.

IMPERIAL SERVICE COMMISSIONS—CANADIAN MILITIA.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES asked :

1. How many commissions in the imperial service of the British empire are allotted to officers from the Canadian militia annually ?

2. Are these commissions over and above those given graduates of the Royal Military College, of Kingston ?

3. What are the conditions under which the six commissions are supposed to be granted ?

4. What examinations are to be passed ? If this information is too detailed for a question, will the government have it laid upon the Table of the House ?

5. For the non-military examination, that is, for the literary examination, is a standing in one or the other of Canada's universities accepted in lieu thereof ? If so, what is the standing required ?

6. How many Canadian militia officers have received such commissions annually since 1899, inclusive ?

7. Are special commissions in the West African service, or other similar service, given to Canadian officers besides ?

8. If so, what are conditions required for such service ?

Sir FREDERICK W. BORDEN (Minister of Militia and Defence) :

London—The Intermediate Examinations in Arts, Law, Science or Medicine.

Scotch Universities—The 'Examination of Candidates for the Army.'

The Royal University, Ireland—'The Second University Examination in Arts, or the Second Professional Examination in Engineering.'

Or if he has passed some other test which is accepted by the university as exempting him from the above examinations. A certificate that the examination is accepted by the authorities concerned must be produced.

An equivalent examination at the University of Malta, or one of the chartered colonial universities will likely be accepted as a sufficient ground for exemption.

A candidate is also exempted from the literary examination, except in geometrical drawing, if he can produce a certificate from a chartered university that he has—

STE. FLORE VOTERS' LIST.

Mr. CASGRAIN—by Mr. Clarke—asked :

1. Did the depositary of the list of electors, for the purposes of provincial elections, for the parish of Ste. Flore, in the electoral district of Three Rivers and St. Maurice, forward to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, as required by the Franchise Act of 1898, section 10, a copy of the changes or modifications made to the said electoral list by a judgment rendered at Three Rivers, on the 18th January, 1904, by the Hon. Judge Desmarais, erasing eighty-seven names from that list ?

2. On what date did the said depositary of the said list forward the said changes or modifications to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery ?

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister).

1. No.

2. These changes in the list have not been received.

RAILWAY FARES OF AGRICULTURAL DELEGATES.

Mr. HACKETT asked :

1. Is the intention of the government to reduce railway rates to a nominal figure, or admit of free passes, for agricultural delegates over public railways, in accordance with the resolution passed at the annual convention of the Prince Edward Island farmers ?

2. What is the lowest existant rate paid by delegates attending such conventions, and the fares, when formally engaged in promoting the public interests, and thus increasing railway traffic ?

3. Should not those gentlemen, giving their time and brains to the advancement of the country, be provided with free transportation ?

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Minister of Railways and Canals). I cannot very well understand whether this question relates to railways generally or merely to the government railway. I may say further that the deputy minister informs me that no trace of any such resolution as that referred to in the first question can be found in the department. The second question relates to special rates on railways generally throughout Canada. That information is not in the department. The third question involves the free transportation on the government railways of all those who devote their time and brains to the advancement of the country. Our rolling stock might not be sufficient to convey all of these.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, ' That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, for the House to go into committee to consider a certain resolution concerning the ratification of the agreement between His Majesty the King and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, dated the 8th day of March, 1904 ' ; and the proposed amendment of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

Mr. WILLIAM J. ROCHE (Marquette). Mr. Speaker, the Bill which passed this House for the construction of another transcontinental highway, which was heralded with such great acclaim by hon. gentlemen opposite, as being the very acme of perfection and a Bill that could scarcely be improved upon, beneficial alike from the point of view of the country and of the company, is to-day being subjected to criticism in this House among its own friends. We have been summoned to parliament, so we have been informed by the president of the Grand Trunk Railway, for the express purpose of amending that contract, the amendments all being calculated to confer greater advantages and greater benefits on that corporation, but not one of them to further protect the interests of Canada. When the opposition realized last session that it was the intention of this government to force that Bill through parliament, without consulting the country, they introduced a series of resolutions which were intended to further safeguard Canadian interests: In view of the vast expenditure which was being incurred by the Dominion of Canada, the opposition in the performance of its legitimate duties, endeavoured to make that contract as perfect as possible and to close up every possible loophole that might be taken advantage of by the company to the detriment of the country. These resolutions however with, I think, but two exceptions were rejected by the government and its followers on the ground that they were not in the contract, that the company would not accept them and that parliament had either to accept or reject the contract as a whole. The hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Fitzpatrick) and the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) in particular waxed indignant at the mere suggestion that this corporation might not keep faith with the Canadian people. Could we imagine a body of men, said the Minister of the Interior, a body of reputable citizens standing so high in the financial world as these gentlemen who were seeking incorporation under this charter, to have so little regard for their standing and their integrity as to break faith with the parliament of Canada, and go back upon their solemn contract ? The idea in his opinion was preposterous and but the phantom production of the imagination of the members of the opposition. But, Sir, notwithstanding this great faith on the part of the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) scarcely had the ink dried on the contract, not a bit of work had been done in pursuance of it, before we saw these reputable gentlemen going back on their contract and putting up not the deposit in cash or government securities required by the contract, but a deposit of Grand Trunk Railway bonds and this only after the time limit had expired. Thus we find these gentlemen right at the outset breaking their solemn contract and breaking it, not for the reason assigned by the Prime Minister that there was a stringency in the money market, for Mr. Hays very definitely stated that they could have had plenty of money, but merely as a matter of convenience to the company. So we in the opposition find ourselves justified in the position we took last year when we wanted to tie these gentlemen down to black and white, taking nothing for granted, no matter how upright they might be. When we find how lightly they have treated their written contract entered into with all the solemnity spoken of by the hon. gentlemen opposite, we feel perfectly justified in the position we took. The right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in dealing with this matter, this session profited by the criticisms administered to his speech of last year, avoided those mock heroics and that hysterical condition that played such havoc with his mental equilibrium last year. The mountains of information which he was supposed to lay before the House last year to furnish reasons for the construction of this line were found on careful perusal to contain very little practical information. It is true that this has been supplemented by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) this session by a quotation from a report made by a Jesuit missionary 200 years ago, wherein he had said that on a certain day in June, roses were in bloom and that they had no night in that country. That was surely most modern information on the strength of which to build a railway, and when the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has to employ such an argument to bolster up his opinion he can hardly continue to call himself a practical man. It is passing strange, Mr. Speaker, to observe the treatment that has been accorded by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to the various gentlemen who have held the portfolio of Railways and Canals in this government.

The gentleman who occupied that position from 1896 to 1903, Mr. Blair, the only practical man in Canada so far as railways are concerned, the gentleman who knew more about railways than all the other members of the cabinet put together, the gentleman to whom the Prime Minister gives a certificate of character to-day as being the best railway expert in the Dominion of Canada—his information was lightly treated, and he himself was so cavalierly treated, that he was not even invited in when the negotiations that led up to this contract were undertaken. It is true that that gentleman was not slow in expressing his opinion of this contract when it was up for consideration last session. He denounced it in no measured language claimed that it was a mere wilful waste of public money, utterly unjustifiable, without a single redeeming feature. After hearing that expression of opinion, after hearing that strong condemnation of this railway scheme, the Prime Minister valued that opinion so highly that he immediately said, in effect: Mr. Blair, your head is level, you are just the man I have been looking for. I have looked over Canada from one end to the other to find the most competent authority on railways, to find the very best railway expert. After hearing your expression of opinion and valuing it as highly as I do, I ask you to come up higher, to accept one of the best and most important railway positions in the Dominion of Canada, carrying with it emoluments, no small matter in itself, of $10,000 per annum. It is true that if your view were carried into effect it would save the country many millions of dollars, but inasmuch as your hands would be tied so far as this particular scheme is concerned, and inasmuch as your silence would be secured for the next ten years, I think this would be a splendid move, looked at from a party standpoint, and would get a dangerous opponent out of our way. Please overlook those unkind criticisms that your erst-while Liberal friends have made on your conduct, those gentlemen who, when you were Minister of Railways and Canals, were servile supporters of every questionable scheme that has been put up by this government since 1896, lauded you as being one of the best Ministers of Railways and Canals Canada was ever blessed with; but who, no sooner had you turned your guns upon this railway scheme of mine, immediately began to speak of you in violent language, to impute the worst of motives to you, stating that you were animated by a sense of personal pique because you were not allowed to conduct those negotiations—though between you and me, you know well why you were not invited into those negotiations. That celebrated memorandum of yours dated the 10th of December, 1902, placed it out of my power to invite you to participate in those negotiations. Please forget those criticisms, such as that made by the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Russell), wherein he stated you were unworthy to unloose the latchets of my shoes, and many other criticisms of a like character. Write a letter condemning the leader of the opposition's scheme also, even though you may not be able to say anything against it save that his scheme recognizes the necessity for the immediate construction of another transcontinental line while you do not recognize that necessity. Accept this position and I, in the magnanimity of my heart, will overlook your scathing and scorching criticisms of my time and tide utterances, though I will admit you did strike a most cruel blow at my scheme. Well, Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Mr. Blair listened to the voice of the tempter, hesitated, and was lost. But in asking Mr. Blair to assume this important position, no greater compliment could be paid that gentleman's railway abilities, and at the same time no greater condemnation of the railway scheme of the premier could be made.

Now the gentleman who now occupies the position of Minister of Railways and Canals, I may say, has been treated very little better. Instead of alloting to that gentleman, in whose department this transcontinental railway scheme should be conducted—instead of alloting to him the duty, the Prime Minister took it upon himself to introduce these amendments to this parliament: instead of even asking that gentleman to defend the policy of the government against that severe onslaught made upon it by the leader of the opposition, the present Minister of Railways and Canals has been relegated to the background. His colleagues had not sufficient confidence in him to believe that he would make a good presentation of the scheme, and a good defence against attacks upon it. Therefore another gentleman was called in to whom was relegated the impossible task of trying to make reply to that crushing criticism offered by the leader of the opposition; to the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Sifton) was assigned the task, a gentleman who may be recognized as an expert in drawing a herring across the trail, and who amused himself and those surrounding him by setting up men of straw in order that he might show with what facility he could demolish them. But any person taking up the speech of the leader of the opposition, perusing it carefully, and placing it beside the speech which was made in reply by the Minister of the Interior, no matter to what political party that person might belong, could not say that it was in any manner or sense a reply. As was stated by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Daniel), it was an attempted reply, but no answer was contained therein to the attacks made upon it by the leader of the opposition.

Now the Prime Minister assigned as one of the reasons for the immediate construction of this road, in the speech he delivered last session, the necessity of affording relief to the grain congestion of the west, and affording the people of western Canada another outlet to the markets of the world for the products of their farms. So urgent was that necessity that the government could not wait until accurate information was supplied to the members of this House upon which they could base an intelligent opinion as to the character of the country through which it was supposed to run. So great was the haste that they could not even wait until careful surveys had been taken to see if sufficiently favourable gradients and curves could be secured to make the profitable carrying of grain a possibility by that road. There was no time for consideration, there was no time for deliberation, it was a time for action. But notwithstanding this great haste on the part of the government to rush a Bill through Parliament, we have seen the loss of a year without a single step having been taken, without a single survey party having been sent out by the government to survey that portion of the government's line from Winnipeg to Moncton, 1,900 miles in extent. Now, in order that I may not do an injustice to the government in making that statement, I desire to read some questions that were asked on this subject a few weeks ago in the House by various members and the answers that have been given thereto by the Minister of Railways and Canals. On March 17, my hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Baker) moved for :

Copies of all interim and other reports, plans, maps, accounts, statements, papers, documents and correspondence in possession of the government, relating to surveys for the western and eastern divisions of the proposed Transcontinental Railway.

The Minister of Railways and Canals made answer to that question :

There are no such documents on record in the department.

No reports, no plans, no maps and no correspondence—nothing in reference to either the eastern or the western division. My hon. friend from Hamilton next moved for :

Return showing :

1. The number of names of all persons employed by the government or otherwise in surveys for the purposes of the eastern division of the proposed Transcontinental Railway.

2. The date of the employment of each such person, his salary, the nature and term of his employment, and the portion of the survey on which he has been employed.

3. Whether such person was so employed by the government ; and if not, by whom ?

4. The nationality of each person, and his place of residence previous to such employment.

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Minister of Railways and Canals). The government have no persons employed on the eastern division of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway and, of course, the other information is not in the possession of the department.

So here we have the distinct declaration on the part of the minister that they have had no survey parties out on this eastern extension. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Puttee), also, on the 28th March, asked the following questions :

1. Is the government aware that survey parties are at work along the route of the proposed Transcontinental Railway between Winnipeg and Quebec ?

2. Are these parties employed by the government or by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company ?

3. If by the railway company, is there any understanding that the government will adopt the surveys, and pay the expenses incurred in making them ?

To which the following reply was made by the Minister of Railways and Canals :

1. The department is aware that survey parties are in the field north of North Bay and Port Arthur surveying branch lines to connect with the proposed Transcontinental Railway between Winnipeg and Quebec.

2. These parties are employed by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company.

Here is an admission that the only survey parties sent out are survey parties sent out by the company to survey branch lines and having no connection whatever with the main line. Again, on the same date the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Kemp) asked the following questions :

1. How many survey parties, if any, have been engaged upon the eastern division of the Transcontinental Railway ?

2. By whom were such survey parties employed ?

3. Upon which sections have such parties been working ?

The reply of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals was as follows :

1. Not in a position to say how many surveying parties, if any, are engaged upon the trunk line of the eastern division of the Transcontinental Railway ?

2. If any are employed, cannot say by whom.

3. Not aware that any such parties are working on the trunk line on the said section.

Here, we find on three or four different occasions the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals absolutely denying all knowledge, in fact, stating that the government have no parties out on the eastern extension. So, we have lost a whole year without anything having been done notwithstanding that last year we were told that time was so very precious that we could not wait a day or an hour or a minute and in such great haste was the right hon. Prime Minister that he offered up the prayer that Heaven grant it may be not already too late. How ridiculous must that right hon gentleman appear now in the eyes of the people of Canada in view of his declarations of last session when, in the very first clause of this amended contract we find that he is extending the time for the completion of the western extension from Winnipeg to the coast from December 1908 to December 1911. The last year the flood tide was upon us, we could not wait because time would not wait, but apparently the right hon. Prime Minister has gotten over a considerable portion of his haste when he now asks parliament to amend the contract so that the most important section of the road, the part through the congested area that this road was supposed to relieve, is given three years extra time for its completion. So far as the eastern extension is concerned there is no time limit in which the road shall be completed, the clause regarding that being of the most elastic character that can and no doubt will be taken advantage of particularly in regard to that portion of the line east of North Bay. In view of the company having the privilege of leasing any portion of the eastern extension as it is completed, without waiting for the completion of the whole line it is a pretty good index that the government has no serious intention of constructing that portion of the line in the near future, at any rate, east of North Bay. On the 500 miles of the mountain section upon which the government under the original contract had only a limited liability, namely, it undertook to guarantee three quarters of the cost of the construction to the extent of $30,000 a mile, that limited liability has been removed, and a new clause substituted in lieu of the same that obligates the country to pledge its credit to an amount equal to three quarters of the cost of the construction of the road irrespective of what the cost may be. In other words, if the estimate is correct that it is going to take $50,000 a mile to build the mountain section instead of the government guaranteeing $30,000 a mile it will guarantee $37,500 per mile. Nor, is that all ? The government gives a cash bonus to the amount of seven years' interest. I have been somewhat amused in listening to some of the hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House when they have claimed that they were giving no land grant and no cash grant in connection with this road. The very reverse is the fact. Here they are making a present, call it what you may, a bonus or anything else, of seven years' interest not one cent of which they will ever get back and which in the aggregate will amount to $4,882,500. They are granting a cash bonus of that amount of money. Nor even yet is that all. The government guarantees to pay the difference between what the bonds may sell for and their face value —an indefinite amount. We cannot tell how much it will be at this time. This will be a great concession to the company and increase the obligation which the country will be called upon to meet. On the thousand miles of the prairie section the government's guarantee remains the same as in the original contract, namely, guaranteeing the bonds for three-quarters of the cost of construction up to $13,000 per mile. But, Mr. Speaker, this will be sufficient to pay for the construction of the prairie section. Any person who has any experience or knowledge of railway construction through a prairie country knows full well that that line can be constructed for, at the most, $13,000 a mile, and the best evidence of that is, that the Manitoba government has been securing the construction of hundreds of miles of the Canadian Northern Railway through prairie country, similar in character, which is as difficult of construction as the construction of this road will be, by giving a guarantee of $10,000 per mile, $2,000 of which has to be applied towards the equipment of the road. So, by juggling the accounts there is no doubt that the government's guarantee will be made to pay the full cost of the road.

Mr. McCREARY. How much did the government of Manitoba pay for the 350 miles of railway that they secured from the Northern Pacific Railway Company ?

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. The Canadian Northern took it over from the Manitoba government at the same price as that at which the government had taken it from the Northern Pacific. The government is now securing the construction of hundreds of miles of railway with no greater guarantee than $10,000 a mile, $2,000 of which has been expended on equipment.

Mr. McCREARY. How much did the Manitoba government pay to the Northern Pacific for that 350 miles of road ?

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. I would ask my hon. friend if he thinks $13,000 a mile is not sufficient for the construction of this railway through the prairie country in the west ?

Mr. McCREARY. We only guarantee 75 per cent.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. Under this juggling of accounts that corporations know so well how to resort to, the full limit of the government's guarantee, viz., $13,000 per mile will be utilized, which in itself will be an amount sufficient to cover the whole expenditure upon that line. The power of foreclosure which the original contract provided for if the company was in default to the amount of three years' interest, has been impaired. The government enjoyed under the original contract a first mortgage which it could foreclose and thus secure the road if the company did not pay the interest as it fell due. This particular clause received the endorsation of hon. gentlemen opposite last year and great credit was given the government for taking the precaution to provide for the security of the people by placing in the contract a mortgage under which they could foreclose and operate the line, if it came to the worst, as a government road. But, this session, we see these very same hon. gentlemen arising in their places and actually approving of the government doing away with that provision and taking the ground that it would be a misfortune if the government did foreclose and operate the road as a government line. There is now only a remedy under this contract if this company are in default to the amount of five years' interest. The company can be in default to the amount of one, two, three, four or four and a half years' interest which the government will have to pay and it has no remedy at all. Until the company is in default to the amount of five years' interest the government has no option in the matter. Then all the government has the power to do is to appoint a receiver or manager subject to the approval of the company, whose duty it will be to take over and operate the line not in the interests of the country, but in the interest of the company as well. This will be a most convenient way by which the company can get out of operating the road, in a time of depression, and drawing on their treasury to pay any deficit that might ensue, for this road must have capital to operate it and maintain it in a period of depression, just as much as in a period of prosperity. Where is that capital coming from? The country will have to put the capital up, and then the company can take over the line again, as has been pointed out by members on this side of the House, just as soon as an era of prosperity returns,—and the company takes the profits.

Probably there were few clauses that met with more adverse criticism last session from the members on this side of the House, than that clause referring to the $25,000,000 of common stock. The reason of that criticism was, because of the danger pointed out by the Conservative members, that this common stock could be made a marketable product; put upon the market at a fictitious value; the company having acquired it for no cash consideration, but merely the nominal consideration that the support of the Grand Trunk Company would be given to the project in guaranteeing the bonds to the extent of a quarter of the cost of construction. This danger was pointed out by us on this side of the House during the last session of parliament, and it was recognized by hon. gentlemen opposite. The Minister of Finance admitted that it were open to that construction it would be a danger, but he took credit to the government because they had guarded against this danger, and had incorporated a clause which prohibited the Grand Trunk Company from putting a dollar's worth of this stock upon the market and compelled them to hold it for the fifty years during the continuance of their lease. He, therefore told us, that the danger we pointed out existed merely in our imagination. But, Mr. Speaker, under this amended contract, this danger which we were threatened with last session, has now come to be a reality. The company can place, at the very least, $12,000,000 worth of stock upon the market and speculate with it to their own advantage, and to the detriment of the country. And if they maintain a control over the policy of the Grand Trunk Pacific, by retaining their voting power, as was pointed out by the member for West Toronto and the hon. leader of the opposition, they can put the full amount of the $25,000,000 on the market, and speculate in it. Then the danger is, that the holders of that stock may insist on the payment of dividends; that those persons who innocently bought that stock at probably 100 cents on the dollar, and which was secured by the original holder for a nominal consideration, would expect the payment of dividends, and consequently, high freight rates must be charged, which freight rates must come out of the pockets of the people. Well might the Minister of Finance say: as he did when this question was under discussion last year.

> The Grand Trunk Company would be delighted to have that clause stricken out, so that they might be allowed to take that stock up and float it in the money market if they pleased, no doubt.

No doubt.

An hon. MEMBER. They are delighted now all right.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. And the Minister of Finance continued to say:

> But we are protecting the people against any such condition, because we are refusing the company the power to put a dollar's worth of that stock on the market and sell it to any one. It is not negotiable, it cannot go in the stock market, it cannot be the subject of speculation; no innocent third party will be able to come and say: I paid in good faith 100 cents on the dollar for that stock and am entitled to get a dividend on what I paid. We have stipulated that the stock cannot be put on the market. It must remain in the hands of the Grand Trunk Railway during the term of this lease.

Can the Minister of Finance claim as much under the amended contract? Why, the very danger that was there pointed out by the Minister of Finance last year is now a reality under this amended contract, and this stock can be speculated with; and one of the avowed objects of the construction of this line, viz., the reduction of freight rates, will have been done away with, as the company will be morally obligated, having allowed that stock to go on the market, to pay dividends on it. The hon. leader of the opposition was therefore quite correct when he stated, that the loaning of the credit of the Grand Trunk Company to the extent of guaranteeing the bonds on one-quarter of the cost of the road, received by way of compensation $25,000,000 worth of common stock with which they can speculate; the Grand Trunk Company received as well the western extension of the line from Winnipeg to the coast, over the best paying portion of the country, 1,500 miles in extent; and receiving in addition a lease of the eastern extension, ten years of which they were getting for nothing and the balance of the fifty years for the small rental of three per cent on the total cost of construction; while the country, obligating itself to the amount of from $150,000,000 to $170,000,000, is practically getting nothing in return save a huge addition to its public debt. And, Mr. Speaker, this arrangement has been called by the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company 'a partnership,' or as Lord Welby described it: a partnership into which they had driven the Canadian government. Well, Sir, it is a partnership that is very likely to prove a most expensive one so far as the people of Canada are concerned.

Another alteration has been made in this contract is this: that if the government desires at the expiration of the lease of fifty years to operate that eastern division from Winnipeg to Moncton, as a main line, they are compelled under the amended contract, to take over any branch lines from the company that the company may have found by experience, are unprofitable; and the company may retain in its possession any profitable branches which they may desire to retain. I venture to say that a more absurd clause was never incorporated in any deed between contracting parties. What would be the result of this? Take for instance the branch line from the head of Lake Superior tapping this main line; a branch line which the company must have if they are going to haul any grain over that line. That branch will take all the large package freight that goes from the province of Ontario over the Great Lakes in the summer time, and cut through the western country. The company therefore, under this amended contract, will undoubtedly retain this profitable branch in their possession. And so with the branch from North Bay reaching to the heart of the great province of Ontario, and over which practically the greater portion of the freight will go. And so with the branch from the main line to Montreal, reaching the commercial metropolis of Canada. As a result of this, we will have the government left with a long main line of track without any feeders to support it, unless they duplicate those branches at great expense to the country; for, Mr. Speaker, the government has not even taken the precaution to secure running rights over these branch lines at the expiration of the fifty years' lease, whereas, the company has secured running rights over the eastern extension, or any portion of it they desire to utilize, and if the company owns the branch lines, the government would be without their assistance in operating the main line and without terminals as well because the company retains the terminals. And what is worse, the company has running rights over the eastern extension, but the running rights which the government has secured for the country over the western extension only extend to the expiration of the lease, and the lease expires at the end of the first fifty years. I think I am justified in stating that it is the most absurd clause that ever was incorporated in any such contract. Is it any wonder, that Sir Rivers-Wilson, in addressing his shareholders, declared that under this contract the interests of the Grand Trunk Company have been safeguarded in every particular. It is too bad that the members of the government cannot say the same thing, viewed from the standpoint of Canada. The original contract was bad enough, viewed from Canada's standpoint, but the amended contract is infinitely worse.

Here we have a contract that absolutely ties the hands of the government for fifty years, and, if the company so desire, for a century, and puts it beyond their power to respond to that growing sentiment in favour of the government ownership of railways. We cannot shut our eyes to the fact that it is a growing sentiment, and who can tell how strongly it may develop in the course of a very few years? But no matter how strong it may become, or how urgent may be the necessity for a state-owned and controlled road, the government are putting it beyond their power to have any such railroad for that length of time. What right, I ask, has this or any other government to arrogate to themselves the power of denying to future generations this great boon, as it may prove to be? Such arbitrary legislation may prove to be onerous enough in a short time; but to say to the people of Canada that they cannot have state-owned and operated railways for fifty or a hundred years, is autocratic in the extreme, and will no doubt receive condemnation at the hands of the electorate.

Now, it has been demonstrated beyond a doubt that the eastern division, from Winnipeg to Moncton, even if constructed, will never prove a grain-carrying road. The president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company has admitted that fact; the general manager, Mr. Hays, has said the same; even the Minister of the Interior practically admitted it in his speech the other day; and it is the opinion of almost every competent authority on railways in the Dominion of Canada. With greater storage facilities at the head of our great lakes, with greater capacity at our Georgian Bay ports, with more elevators in the interior of our western country, and particularly with a rate of 31 cents a bushel from Port Arthur and Fort William to Montreal and Quebec, as existed during the past summer by water, the idea of this railroad competing with that route is preposterous in the extreme, particularly when you consider that rates on the railway will be treble that which I have just quoted. Owing to the large capitalization on the western extension, there can be no reduction of freight rates even to the head of Lake Superior. I am convinced that the members of the government realize that themselves; otherwise why would they call on their supporters to reject the amendment which I had the honour to introduce last session, which merely provided that the rates on the Grand Trunk Pacific to the head of Lake Superior should not be higher than those charged on the Canadian Northern system? I commend to my hon. friends from the west the reason assigned by the hon. Minister of Justice for refusing to accept that amendment, in view of the stand they took that the control which the Manitoba government had over the rates on the Canadian Northern was a mere paper control, that the actual control was vested in the Governor General in Council, and that the control by the Manitoba government practically amounted to nothing. What was the reason assigned by the Minister of Justice? He called on his supporters in the House to reject that amendment on the ground, as he said, that under the contract existing between the Manitoba government and the Canadian Northern Railway that government could compel that railway to carry grain at as low a rate as 5 cents per 100 pounds, which he stated would be a ruinous rate for the Grand Trunk Pacific. It ought for ever to silence these hon. gentlemen on that particular point, when we have the law officer of the Crown, the Minister of Justice himself, admitting that this contract between the Manitoba government and the Canadian Northern can compel the company to carry grain at that low figure. But, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Minister of Justice if he thinks the Manitoba government are going to be so foolish, notwithstanding the power they have, as to exercise that power so as to make the company carry grain at a losing rate, when under the contract the province would be liable for any deficit that might result after once the rate is below 10 cents per 100 pounds? Does he think they are going to be so unbusinesslike as to enforce such a rate as that? Not at all: and when the sincerity of hon. gentlemen opposite was put to the test, and they were called on to adopt this most moderate amendment, providing that the rates on the Grand Trunk Pacific should not be higher than those on the Canadian Northern, they asked their followers to reject it, which is the best evidence that they have not the least idea that this road will cause a reduction of freight rates.

Now, under this amended contract, the control of rates upon the proposed new line of railway is not one whit greater or less than that already enjoyed under the General Railway Act of the Dominion; and we know how much benefit we have derived from that in the past. What will happen? The company will fix the rates themselves, those rates will be submitted to the board of Railway Commissioners, who will approve of the same, and then they will go into effect. Exactly the same procedure would be followed if the country had not pledged its credit to the extent of guaranteeing a single bond, or putting up a single dollar in aid of the enterprise, or building a single mile of the railway. The control exercised by the Manitoba government over the Canadian Northern is of a vastly different character. It is an effectual control, the proof of which the people themselves have witnessed, saving as they did over $1,000,000 on their incoming and outgoing freights during the past year. This is a control of rates such as is not enjoyed under this contract. The Manitoba government exercises not merely a control of rates, but it actually fixes the rates, notifies the company that on such a day certain rates will come into effect, and the company accepts them. The Board of Railway Commissioners, in taking into consideration what the rates will be under this contract, must also take into consideration, in fixing those rates, the amount of stock issued by the company. Mr. Blair, in his celebrated memorandum dated the 10th of December, 1902, recognizes and practically admits this. If this is not going to be the effect, if the argument of the Minister of the Interor is a genuine argument, and if it is not the intention to have that stock taken into consideration in the fixing of the rates, then this is the time and the place to say so. Why not incorporate such a provision in this contract? Why not put it there in black and white? We know exactly how much reliance we can place upon anything from this corporation that is not in the written contract, particularly in view of our experience with it thus far; and if it is our intention that this stock should not be taken into consideration, let it be so expressed in plain terms. Let not the stock go into general circulation as something of value which will be a burden upon the earning powers of this road.

I was pleased to see that the Prime Minister and the Minister of the Interior did simple justice to the Conservative party when they admitted in their speeches that the Conservatives, like themselves, were anxious to see another transcontinental railway constructed, and further railway development in the west, but that the great bone of contention was in reference to the eastern portion of the line from Winnipeg to Moncton, under the contract as it passed parliament last session and in referenece to the method of its construction. I regret, however, that some of the more unscrupulous organs of the Liberal party, notably the mouthpiece of the Minister of the Interior have not been so honest in this particular, but have been steadily endeavouring to create the impression on the minds of the people of the west that the Conservative party are opposed to another transcontinental railway and to further railway development in western Canada.

Sir, we challenge these gentlemen to point to one expression by any Conservative member which will bear out that contention. The whole record of the Conservative party is opposed to any such contention. What would western Canada be to-day were it not for Conservative statesmanship? Who opened up and developed that western country? Who was it bound together the several provinces of this great Dominion into one mighty whole by means of that great band of steel, our present transcontinental line? Who was it developed other railway systems in that country? It was, Sir, the Conservative party, and that in the face of the strongest opposition from our opponents. Therefore these gentlemen, when they make a statement of the kind I have referred to, are certainly saying something which has not a tittle of foundation, The Conservative party has developed this country in the past, under its great leaders, and if it be given the opportunity, under its present able and gifted leader, the noble traditions of the past will be adhered to and the interests of Canada be made paramount in railway as well as in all other matters. The very best evidence of the good faith of the Conservative party in this respect is to be found in the alternative policy propounded by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. That gentleman has the courage of his convictions. He was not called upon to propound any alternative scheme, and most assuredly, were his opponents in his position, they would not have done it. They would instead have retired behind the lines of Torres Vedras and refused to prescribe until called in. But our leader, having every confidence in his policy, placed it before the Canadian people and challenged comparison, in the interests of this country, with the policy of the government.

Mr. McCREARY. Which policy is it—the policy of last year or the policy of this year?

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. There is practically no difference, no contradiction between the two, but there is a vast difference between the contract of last year and the contract of this year. But if, for the sake of argument, we would admit that there is some difference, are the hon. gentleman and his friends to have the monopoly of changing their views? The hon. gentleman is very considerate of his opponents when he takes that ground, but there is in reality no distinction between the policy propounded last year by the leader of the opposition and that given to him this year, save what was necessary to meet the altered conditions of the original contract. That policy is one which is not meant to stifle our already existing government system of railways from Halifax to Montreal, but one intended to further develop that system. It is one which recognizes the vast amount of capital that Canada has expended already —some $70,000,000—in the enterprise of the Intercolonial Railway, $15,000,000 of which was expended a few years ago for the purpose of introducing that line into Montreal, the commercial metropolis of Quebec, in order, as stated by the present government, that it might be placed on a better paying footing and be able to cope with its competitors, the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway. But contrast that with the policy of the government to-day, which proposes to nullify to a great extent the capital expended on the Intercolonial Railway, which proposes to put that road back again into the position of a local line, by building at the country's expense another line to parallel it through the wilds of New Brunswick and thus take away its traffic. The policy of the opposition, on the other hand, is to increase the importance of the Intercolonial Railway by extending it to Georgian Bay and thus secure to it a share of the traffic coming down over the great lakes. And our policy does not stop there, but goes on to extend our own line to the city of Winnipeg, and that at once. As was pointed out by my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, last year, if his policy had been adopted, the Intercolonial Railway would be inside of this year into the city of Winnipeg, whereas, under the proposition of the government, it will take seven or eight years for their new line to get there. But the policy of the leader of the opposition does not even stop there. Under the proposition of the government, the greater portion of the liability for the new transcontinental line will have to be borne by the government, amounting to $150,000,000 at the least, and the other portion, amounting to $14,500,000, will be paid by the other partner. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition proposes that, in view of the enormous liability which the government is about to assume, it should as well take over that $14,500,000 and construct the line west of Winnipeg at once, to be operated as a government road in the interests of the country. Then we would have a truly national highway.

Mr. SCOTT. Might I interrupt the hon. gentleman?

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. When we touch on the question of government ownership, these gentlemen, who have been advocating it in the past, but who, when the opportunity comes, have thrown it over, become very restive.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the hon. gentleman explain how the appointment of a commission can be reconciled with the plan he suggests?

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. My hon. friend imagines that when the leader of the opposition suggested the appointment of a commission, that commission would be as slow in acting as his own government. He actually supposes that it would take seven or eight years to report. But did not the leader of the opposition point out, both last session and this, that, had his policy been followed, the report of that commission would have been laid on the table at the beginning of this session and would not have delayed construction one month. The commission would have reported and the policy of the leader of the opposition be put into effect, so far as the city of Winnipeg is concerned, inside of this year. That policy would give us a national road, every foot of which would be through Canadian territory, a road which would be the very best controller of rates, and we would not find the government road pooling its rates with any other rival enterprise. These hon. gentlemen were wont to contend in the past that there is nothing would have such a power for dictating rates to other railways as a government system, and with the Intercolonial Railway extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific—as it would, if the policy of the leader of the opposition were carried out—we would have the best control of rates and the best guarantee for low rates you could possibly imagine. We would have a national highway on Canadian territory, and there would be no question of Canadian products going to American seaports. Being deprived of American connections, every pound of traffic over the Intercolonial would go to build up our great ports of Montreal, Quebec, St. John and Halifax.

I was somewhat surprised to hear the reasons given by the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) the other day for supporting the policy of the government. I asked myself, can this be the same man who has been, through the Edmonton 'Bulletin,' disseminating his views among his constituents as the only champion of government railways in parliament? Can this be the same gentleman who last session told us that he preferred government-owned railways, but that inasmuch as he did not get any support, he would take the next best thing? I had to admit that it was the very same gentleman. But, when he gets an opportunity of voting for the policy he advocates, he performs the crawfish act and absolutely refuses to vote for it because it is proposed by a political opponent. I am going to read from a pamphlet which has been circulated in the west as Liberal literature, containing the speech delivered last session by the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) on the Grand Trunk Pacific, in which he gave twenty-two becauses why he should support that road. But not one tittle of evidence did he give to support one of those becauses. He merely, in his somewhat dictatorial style, laid down the proposition that this road was going to do so and so, but never advanced a single argument to back up his assertions. I would ask the House to follow closely what my hon. friend said on this question last session. He did not speak at length but to the point and pungently as usual, and I notice that he has adopted a different practice recently. Probably he has recognized his weakness, not in the manner in which he addresses the House, but in the arguments he uses and the vehemence and extravagance of his language. He probably recognizes that when he speaks off-hand he is apt to defeat the object he has in view of converting political opponents to his way of thinking, and has therefore taken to writing down his speeches and reading them word for word to the House lest he might err in this regard.

I must admit, after listening to his essay of the other day, that I do not think he has improved in this respect for his language teemed with such expressions as 'steal' and 'Canadian Pacific Railway.' The expression Canadian Pacific Railway seems to have the same effect on that gentleman as the proverbial read rag has on a bull, or as the name of the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) has on the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. T. O. Davis) or the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Walter Scott). The hon. gentleman I say did not improve his language by committing it to paper. This is what he read to the House last session:

> I believe Canada's further national development and welfare demands a second transcontinental railway.

So far so good.

> I believe that government ownership throughout of such a railway would be in the best interests of the country and people, both present and future.

And still he is going to vote against the policy of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) which provides for this very thing.

> But as it has been shown——

And here is the amusing part.

> —that only one member of the cabinet as it was supported government ownership throughout and as the feeling in parliament in its favour is confined to a few members of the Liberal side——

Now I never knew the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) whatever else he may have posed as in this House, to pose as a wag, but surely he is doing so in this case in view of the fact that every member of the cabinet except the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Emmerson) who last year declared himself in favour of government ownership, on this occasion declared against government ownership while hon. gentlemen on this side approved of it. The hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) said :

> The feeling in parliament in its favour is confined to a few members on the Liberal side, to wait until belief in government ownership had grown sufficiently to ensure the building of a transcontinental railway as a government work, would mean leaving the western country without a competing outlet, either east or west, too long for the good of either west or east. If we cannot get what we want, the next best thing is to get what we can, on the best terms we can. That being the case, I support the present arrangement.

The hon. gentleman's statement there of the policy of the opposition is directly opposite the facts. The policy of the opposition is in favour of government ownership, the policy of the government is opposed to it, and where is the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver). That hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) has stated that he cannot support the amendment of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) because it means delay. If the hon. member had looked at the speech of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) at page 824 of 'Hansard' he would have seen this declaration.

> I say that the government itself should build this road, it should build it promptly, not within seven or eight years, but within a very much shorter time ; at least so far as that portion of it outside of the mountain section is concerned, and I say that it should build the mountain section as speedily as possible.
> Another important advantage which would be secured to this country by adopting that policy is : that it will put to one side any future application by any other transcontinental railway for aid for a line from Edmonton to the Pacific coast. We will have another application before many years ; we will have it made on the basis upon which this aid is given to this company.
> The government, building the line from Edmonton to the coast can give running powers, controlled by this country, to any other transcontinental railway—and let me say in passing lest I should forget it—that when I advocate the building by the government of this line into the Northwest of Canada, I should desire to express my conviction that the government should by means of that national line, admit the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada into the Northwest ; but it should admit it under such restrictions as will not permit our traffic to be carried to a foreign seaport.

Does that look like delay ? Does that not condemn the government's policy on account of its delay and urge the immediate construction of that line ? Further than that these gentlemen have been claiming that they can get the Intercolonial into that country by the clause providing for running rates over the company's system. If that is the case and if it is feasible, would it not be equally feasible to extend the Intercolonial to the coast and give the Grand Trunk Railway running rights over it ? So, if the one scheme is feasible most assuredly the other is, and then we would have the Intercolonial, the more important road of the two, in the western country and the Grand Trunk Railway enjoying running rights over that portion of the road. The policy of the government is the one that involves delay because the Grand Trunk Railway Company are not called upon under this guarantee to assume a dollar of liability until eight years after the commencement of construction. Mr. Hays and Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson, in addressing the shareholders, have admitted that their liability does not begin until eight years after the beginning of construction of their line. It would be to their advantage to delay completion of the road because their liability only begins when the line is completed. A change has come over the spirit of the dream of the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver). I sat beside him in the Railway Committee and heard him condemning that foolish scheme the Quebec Moncton extension ; he was opposed to it then, but now he lauds the government for having adopted that line.

My namesake the hon. the junior member for Halifax (Mr. William Roche) in that beautiful peroration of his the other day, in which he painted in glowing terms the beauties and advantages to be derived by Canada from the construction of this line, enumerating amongst other advantages the benefit of opening up new avenues for our young men to obtain employment in Canada. If that hon. gentleman (Mr. Roche) had read the circular which has been issued by the Canadian engineers, he would have decided that if the same policy is to continue that has already been inaugurated by the company, a more suitable motto might be 'no Canadians need apply.' These Canadian engineers state that with one exception every important office has been filled by the importation of aliens from the United States. I shall not however burden the 'Hansard' by reading extensively from that document.

There is practically no comparison between the two policies, that propounded by the government and that propounded by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden). The policy of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) does not provide for a one-sided partnership. It does not provide that Canada should furnish ten times the amount of capital that is to be furnished by the other partner, and get practically no benefits, while the other partner shall put up one-tenth of the capital and receive 1,500 miles of railway from Winnipeg to the coast through the heart of the country that will pay from the very first day of its operation, and a lease of the government's extension for 3 per cent on the total cost of construction. On the other hand if the company were to drop out of this enterprise entirely and the country were to take over their liability, we would have the whole line a national line from one coast to the other. Even the branch lines that must be constructed by the company will be constructed largely out of public moneys, for have we not seen that the Ontario government have already voted or are voting large subsidies in land and cash towards building branch lines from North Bay and Port Arthur to tap the main line, and Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson has informed his shareholders that it is the intention of the Dominion government to supplement that grant by the usual subsidy of $6,400 per mile, which in the aggregate will be nearly three million dollars to be paid out of the treasury for the construction of a branch line which the company must have in order to furnish feeders for its main line, and the government has not even secured running rights over those branch lines. Last year we challenged the government before entering into this contract, to go to the country to allow the people to have the privilege of hearing a full and free discussion of that contract, and if the electors of this country, after hearing the discussion from all sides should return this government and approve of the contract, the opposition would be the first to submit to that verdict and would join with their opponents in trying to perfect the contract to the best advantage of our common country.

That challenge was not accepted by the government, they dared not accept it. This amended contract is vastly inferior, and vastly more injurious to the interests of Canada than was the original one. Again we renew that challenge, and we ask the government to go to the country to place the two policies before the people, the scheme propounded by the leader of the opposition and the scheme propounded by the government; and, Sir, so far as the opposition is concerned, we have no fear of the verdict of the intelligent electors of this Dominion.

Mr. McCREARY. Before the hon. gentleman sits down, I would like to ask why the Conservative government in Manitoba did not go to the people before they committed that province to a railway deal guaranteeing $20,000,000 ?

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. Of course, Mr. Speaker, there is a time and place for everything. I am not here at this time for the purpose of entering into a discussion of the railway policy of the Manitoba government. I leave that to the people of Manitoba, who expressed their verdict last July, which verdict was 31 to 9 in favour of the Conservative government.

Mr. JOHN H. SINCLAIR (Guysboro). The hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Roche, Marquette), in common with other hon. gentlemen opposite who have spoken in this debate, seems to be very much alarmed at the extent of the liability the government is undertaking in connection with this railway scheme. They have placed the amount at something like $150,000,000. Now I do not intend to discuss that question, because it has been very ably dealt with by other gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate. I consider, however, that their figures are very greatly exaggerated. I desire to point out that the liability this country is to incur in regard to this railway measure will only arise in the event of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company turning out to be a financial failure. If that company turns out to be successful like the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, it will not only pay working expenses and interest on the capital that will be invested, but it will also pay dividends to the shareholders who will invest their money in this scheme. If, I say, it turns out to be a scheme of that kind, then the liability of the country cannot arise at all. Now in order to ease the mind of the hon. gentleman who has preceded me, and of other hon. gentlemen who feel alarmed on this question, I wish to quote some authorities. I will quote from a source that they will not feel at liberty to question. The source I refer to is that of the leader of the opposition, in the speech he delivered on this question. I did not have the pleasure of hearing that speech, as I had not then the honour of a seat in this House. But I have given myself the pleasure of reading that speech, and I find that the leader of the opposition calls a number of witnesses to prove that the Grand Trunk Pacific Company has excellent financial prospects, and that it is likely to turn out to be a very successful venture, not only for the country but for the shareholders. These are the words the hon. leader of the opposition puts into the mouth of Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson :

> Passing as it will do through the most fertile and promising belt of country in the whole of the Northwest Territories, there cannot be the slightest doubt that this portion of the road, built, as I have said, under such favourable and economical conditions, will immediately produce excellent results, and will itself more than justify the adoption of the scheme in its entirety.

Further on he quotes Sir Charles as saying :

> As regards the prairie section, the government, not unfairly, held that it would be self-sustaining from the day of its completion, and in this view we are willing to concur.

Then we have a quotation from Lord Welby :

With the rapid settlement of the country, which will follow the establishment of the line within a very few years, it will be a very profitable line.

Then we have an opinion from Mr. Hays :

Here is the Grand Trunk, the parent company, standing with a large traffic ready to deliver it west bound. This traffic is now given to a competitor. It does not have to wait five, ten or fifteen years to build up a traffic ; it starts with a traffic right from the beginning, and that is of a most remunerative character. This enterprise which we are advocating to-day, ladies and gentlemen, combines points and advantages that no other transcontinental line in the United States or Canada can have.

Now, Sir, these gentlemen, from whom the leader of the opposition quoted, are railway experts, they are men of very large experience in the management of Canadian railways, they have made a special study of the question for the purpose of embarking their own capital in the venture ; and it is especially gratifying to hon. members on this side of the House to have this point made so clear on such high authority as that of the hon. leader of the opposition. I do not think that the hon. leader of the opposition could have intended to make this point so clear to the House. He reminds me of an old Bible story. A prophet who climbed the mountain side and stretched forth his hand to curse the children of Israel. But instead of cursing them, 'behold he blessed them altogether.' He did not want to bless them, he wanted to curse them, but somehow when it came to the point he couldn't do it. Now we on this side of the House are especially grateful to the leader of the opposition for having made this point so clear. It completely relieves our minds of all anxiety in regard to our liabilities under this contract, in regard to the payment of interest on the bonds, in regard to the mortgage on the rolling stock, in regard to the receiver, and all these other bogeys with which hon. gentlemen opposite have endeavoured to frighten us in this debate. This measure, Sir, whatever may be said about it by hon. gentlemen opposite, is an attempt to do two things : To open up for settlement a very large section of country, some 3,000 miles of new Canadian territory, and to divert the trade of the west into Canadian channels and by way of Canadian ports. Now we all agree that this scheme will accomplish the first of these objects. It is admitted to be one of the greatest colonization schemes that was ever proposed in Canada ; and I submit, without going to the trouble to prove it, that it will also accomplish the second object better than any other scheme that is now available to the people of Canada.

I confess to a feeling of disappointment at the attitude of the Conservative press and leading members of the Conservative party in this House with regard to this measure. There were moderate Canadians of both political parties who, at the inception of this project held the view that we might in a question of this kind, involving such vital interests to the Canadian people, rise above party politics and deal with it as a business proposition in the interests of the whole Canadian people. Everybody will admit, or most people will admit, that it is at all events a progressive measure. We have been reminded by the hon. gentleman who preceded me that the Conservative party claim, or did claim, to be the progressive party of this country. He reminded us that the Conservative party claimed credit for having brought about the Confederation of the provinces, for having built the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now, Sir, we are willing to concede to the great Conservative party any measure of credit that may be due to them in connection with these important national events. But supposing we admit that the Conservative party of thirty years ago was a live and progressive party, what shall we say of them to-day ? Will it be contended that the mantle of the late Sir John A. Macdonald in so far as he was a progressive statesman, has fallen upon the shoulders of any of the hon. gentlemen opposite ? Why, Sir, every argument that they are using to-day against the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific could have been used thirty years ago against the Canadian Pacific Railway. There were certain things done in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway that will not bear investigation, and the less we say about them the better. At the same time, Sir, we all admire the courage and the foresight of the public men who showed their faith at that time in the future of Canada by putting that measure through parliament. The men who are still living, if there are any such, who opposed the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway in 1874, are all of one mind to-day.

If hon. gentlemen opposite should live for twenty years longer, and we hope and trust that they will live much longer than that, they will be so delighted with the splendid development that will have taken place in this country, both east and west, as a result of the railway policy of this government, that they will be surprised that they should have ever raised their voices or recorded their votes against it. At the time the Canadian Pacific Railway was projected, a great deal of doubt existed in the minds of the Canadian people as to whether the country could afford the enormous expenditure involved in that venture, but no one worries to-day over our ability to meet our obligations. There never was a time in the history of this country when we could so well afford to face the expenditure connected with a second transcontinental railway, as we can to-day. The late government in the depressed condition in which they found themselves prior to 1896, could not have very well undertaken it, but instead of the stagnation of eight years ago, we are now living in prosperous times. The trade of the country has doubled, the treasury is overflowing, farm mortages have been paid off by thousands and the farmers' homes are now their own, the exodus has gone for ever, let us hope, and in its place we have the flowing tide of men from the United States and Europe, seeking and finding homes in our western land and eager to help us bear the white man's burden on this continent. With such prospects before us, why should we hesitate? Should we not show our confidence in the future, by taking this forward step? This scheme is especially attractive to the Nova Scotian and he sees in it, increased prosperity for his province. We are all selfish to a certain extent, and while we wish for the general prosperity, we still wish to feel assured that our own people shall share in the benefits of a venture of this kind. The construction of the section between Quebec and Moncton, will involve a very large expenditure. It is estimated that this section will be 400 miles long, and in the able speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) delivered last session, he estimated the cost of that road at about $25,000 a mile. In that case it will involve an expenditure of $10,000,000, which will go for wages and materials, and will largely find its way into the maritime provinces. Then, the coal industry of Nova Scotia will be very much benefited by this venture. The coal used for steam purposes, for the work of the railway, will in itself be a very large item. I estimate that if this road uses Nova Scotia coal as it will no doubt use it between Moncton and Quebec, and also 500 miles west of Quebec, it will use about 300,000 tons of coal each year, which at $2 per ton, means $600,000, distributed in cash in Nova Scotia alone, for coal each year in connection with this road. It will also build up the iron and steel industry of Nova Scotia, and prove a home market for our iron and steel products at the present time, when a home market is very much required indeed. The hon. Senator McGregor, in a very able and interesting speech made in the other chamber of this legislature last session, made a calculation, that it would require all the iron and steel factories in Canada, running full time, over four years to produce the rails and other products of steel that would be required for this railway. It will also be a through line to carry the fresh fish from the maritime provinces to the western provinces. This fresh fish business has immense possibilities, and it has been greatly stimulated within the last two or three years, by a change made by the Intercolonial Railway. A fast freight train has been put on the railway from Mulgrave to Montreal, so that perishable products can be sent forward to that market on schedule time, and this has very largely increased the trade of Nova Scotia. Given improved railway facilities in the west for our fresh fish trade, given a fast freight train between the sea coast and Winnipeg, there is no reason why Winnipeg should not be made a distributing point for Nova Scotia fish. We have on the coast of Nova Scotia some of the finest harbours in the world, some of them in the county which I have the honour to represent, and if a policy of that kind can be carried out, as the west fills up and as our population increases, all these harbours will be required to handle traffic which must find an outlet in that direction. The construction of this railway means prosperity for our farmers, fishermen, miners, artisans and for every other class of our population. The hon. gentleman (Mr. W. J. Roche) who has just sat down, complains that the Dominion of Canada has gone into partnership with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. Now, Sir, let me say that that is largely a figure of speech, that we are not in partnership with the Grand Trunk Railway Company in any legal sense of the term. We are rather in the position of landlord and tenant. We propose building a railway 1,850 miles long, and when we have that railway constructed, we propose renting it to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. We own the road, we control the rates, we take the rent, while they run the road and look after the details of working it. The position is that we are their landlords and they are our tenants. There is a sense in which the people are partners with the Grand Trunk Pacific in this venture. Who is to reap the benefit from this large expenditure of money or from the construction of this road? If I held the view that the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company were only to be benefited by the construction of this road, I would see no reason why the people should share any part of the risk, but I remember that the country stands to receive enormous dividends from this venture in the shape of increased population and an ever increasing home market for manufactures of the eastern provinces, opening up vast areas of agricultural and timber land in New Brunswick, Ontario and Quebec, the widening of the habitable belt across the prairie region of the west, and opening up the rich mineral lands of British Columbia; with all these splendid prospects ahead, we can very well afford to take a share of the risk involved in this venture.

The hon. gentleman who last spoke also stated, as a number of hon. gentlemen have stated in this debate, that this new venture will destroy the Intercolonial Railway. I take issue with these hon. gentlemen on that question. I say that it will not destroy the Intercolonial Railway, but that it will tend to benefit the Intercolonial Railway, that it will build it up and make it a more profitable road than ever it was before. Hon. gentlemen opposite, must not think that the Intercolonial Railway consists of the section between Moncton and Quebec. That is only an insignificant part of the Intercolonial Railway. The government railways of Canada are 1,571 miles in length. Suppose we take off that part of the government railway which is in Prince Edward Island, 211 miles in length, which will not be affected so much by this venture. That leaves a mileage for the Intercolonial Railway of 1,360 miles. What part of that will come into competition with the railway that is proposed to be built? The only part that can compete with the Intercolonial Railway is the section between Moncton and Quebec. The section of the Intercolonial Railway between Moncton and Quebec is 488 miles long. You still have 872 miles of the Intercolonial Railway that will be immensely benefited by the construction of the new road, because it will receive an enormous amount of traffic from the new road. Every passenger that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway will carry from the west will also be delivered over the Intercolonial Railway at Moncton. Every pound of freight that it will carry from the west will also be delivered over to the Intercolonial at Moncton, and this will swell the receipts of the Intercolonial Railway upon its eastern section.

Railway experts say, that it is an accepted doctrine in railway operation, that it is the local traffic which pays best; and that if a railway does not have local traffic it is difficult to make it a paying venture at all. Now, Sir, we do not take away any of the local traffic of the Intercolonial Railway by the project we propose. Any local traffic that exists on this 1,360 miles of railway would still remain. The local traffic that exists on this 488 miles between Moncton and Quebec will remain as it is at present. We do not take that away. And what do we take away? The only two points where competition will arise at all are at Moncton and Quebec, but the traffic originating at Moncton and Quebec would be competed for by both lines as at present, and the return derived from that traffic is a very insignificant part of the profits of the Intercolonial Railway. On the other hand the new transcontinental railway will hand over to the Intercolonial Railway an immense amount of traffic that it does not now receive, so that any injury that could possibly be done to the 488 miles between Moncton and Quebec, will be more than compensated for by what the Intercolonial Railway will receive from the construction of the new line.

Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to have the impression that because less is said this year than last year about the bonding privilege, that it is not considered important on this side of the House. That is a mistake. It is considered of the very first importance by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, that we should secure the construction of a great national highway across Canada from ocean to ocean, free from any entanglements with the United States. That is important not only in connection with the bonding privilege but from a great many other points of view. On this side of the House we stand by the motto: Canada for the Canadians; not Canada for the Yankees; not Canada even for the Canadian Pacific Railway; but Canada for the farmer, Canada for the fisherman, Canada for every man and for every interest on the north of the boundary line. That is our policy. We have no quarrel as Canadians with the people of the United States. I trust we will always be able to maintain friendly relations with that great people. I confess, Sir, that I have had my dreams of reciprocity and of better commercial relations with the people to the south; but the more I think of it, and as time passes on, I am led to the conclusion that our future, even in trade matters, is not with the United States but with our own people. I believe, Sir, that the best contribution we can make to-day to the consolidation of the empire is to build this railway and to place Canada in a position of complete independence from our great neighbour to the south.

I was much interested by an admission made during this debate by the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Northrup), in reply to a question put by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. McCreary). The hon. member for Hastings said:

> The hon. gentleman (Mr. McCreary) has asked a fair question and I will give an answer. I do not of course profess to speak authoritatively for the opposition, but from the views I have heard expressed by dozens of members of the opposition, and speaking my own views, I have no hesitation in saying that I believe that every member of the opposition was in favour then, and is in favour now, of assisting the Grand Trunk Railway Company to build west from North Bay; let them put their line wherever they like providing only that it is a reasonable distance from other lines.

And as the hon. gentleman from Hastings (Mr. Northrup) made that statement, he was cheered by the gentlemen who sat behind him; and looking across the floor triumphantly at the hon. member for Selkirk he continued:

> The hon. gentleman (Mr. McCreary) will see from the expression of assent which has greeted my statement, that I have not altogether misvoiced the opinions of the gentlemen with whom I have the honour to sit.

Now, Sir, that clears the atmosphere, and it shows where the Conservative party stands on this question, and it shows that the determined and persistent opposition that they have offered to this measure last year and this year, arise solely on account of the eastern section. Cut off that section from Moncton to Winnipeg, and hon. gentlemen opposite, according to the member for Hastings will unanimously endorse it. Well, perhaps I should qualify that word 'unanimously' because I do not think that the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. Gourley) would vote for it. What then are we to think of the patriotic sentiments of the hon. leader of the opposition, expressed in his speech and in his resolution, in regard to building up and equipping the ports of the maritime provinces? I suppose they will have to go to that historic scrap heap like so many other things. What is the use of equipping ports in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick; to handle traffic that will not come further east than North Bay? Let me remind the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Northrup), and the gentlemen who cheered him, that the policy they endorse is altogether too narrow to suit the whole Canadian people. Ontario is a great province, and there is no Canadian living outside of Ontario who is prouder of that province than I am; but I wish to remind these gentlemen opposite, that there are four other important provinces lying to the east of the Ottawa river and I venture to say, that no transcontinental railway can be a national scheme in the true sense of the turn that does not take into account the maritime provinces and the great province of Quebec. Besides, Sir, a railway starting at North Bay, and working in conjunction with the existing Grand Trunk system, would divert the whole traffic of the west into American channels. What would be most likely to happen would be, that the Grand Trunk Pacific would deliver its traffic at North Bay to the existing Grand Trunk, and the Grand Trunk would deliver it to the ships at Portland; and so the eastern part of Canada would have no share in it. That is the policy of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House; and if they had their way, two things would happen: the eastern provinces of Canada would be deprived of all share in the future advantages of this railway, and the whole traffic of western Canada would be diverted into American channels.

Referring to the amendment of the leader of the opposition, there is one clause that I wish to speak about for a moment. He proposes to free the management of government railways from political control and interference. Now, Sir, we were jocularly reminded the other day by a member opposite, that great changes come over the spirit of men when they move from one side of the Speaker's chair to the other. That apparently is a fact, and hon. gentlemen on the opposition benches are undergoing a great change. We all remember how the Conservatives managed the Intercolonial Railway when they had control of it. If ever there was a time when the government railways were exploited for political purposes, it was during the eighteen years that the Conservative party had control of its patronage. All sorts of irregularities were rife; passes were used so indiscriminately, especially in Nova Scotia, that they went by the name of shingles. When a prominent Conservative committee man wanted to pass his friends over the line to vote for the Conservative candidate he telegraphed to Moncton: send me another bundle of shingles—and the shingles came. Another diversion was the running of special trains to suit the convenience of the Conservative party. There was a regulation of the Intercolonial Railway then, and perhaps it exists now, by which special passenger trains had to be ordered from the head office at Moncton, but a special freight train could be put on the track at any time by order of the district superintendent. One ardent district superintendent, in the election of 1896, took advantage of this regulation to suit the convenience of the Conservative party, and special freight trains were a very common feature of that campaign. If a Conservative wanted free transportation a freight car was loaded up, and it was attached to an engine, and a passenger car was put on behind, and the freight car and the passenger car were hauled by the engine from point to point, in the interests of the Conservative party. It was seen one morning at Pictou, the next morning at Tatamagouche, and the next morning some place else, until the farmers along the line became so familiar with it, that they recognized it at first sight. It was nothing more nor less than a portable Conservative committee room with a car load of deals in front and another carload of 'deils' (of a totally different description) in the rear. I do not know whether we should hold hon. gentlemen opposite responsible for the sins of the predecessors; but they are the lineal decendants of the men, some of them are the men themselves, who did these things or permitted them to be done. And still these gentlemen cry out for government-owned railways. Why, Sir, the memory of those eighteen years is enough to have settled the question of government ownership of railways in Canada for a generation.

Reference has been made in this debate to a remark made last year by that hon. gentleman, who for the last twelve years so ably represented the county of Guysborough in this House. That hon. gentleman was represented as saying that there are no weak-knees on this side of the House. Now, Sir, that was a pertinent remark, and it is as true this year as it was last year. I fear that the same cannot be said of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. I think there are some weak-knees among them. I do not mean this in an offensive sense at all. What I mean is that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House are not so settled in their opinions; they are not so united on any policy; they have not the same confidence in the policy of their leader that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have. Let me read an extract from the closing sentence of a very able speech delivered the other day by the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart). After reviewing the whole question, that hon. gentleman said :

> I am not here pledging myself to the support of government railways, but I say this, that the money of the country could be expended as proposed by the leader of the opposition in a more economical and better way and in a way that will do more for the betterment of this country than by the scheme which the hon. gentleman proposed to this House.

You will notice that he says : 'I am not pledging myself to the support of government railways.' If the policy of the hon. leader of the opposition, as set forth in the amendment which we are now considering, means anything, it means government railways. Possibly it does not mean anything, and possibly the hon. member for South Lanark knew that it did not mean anything ; but if it does mean anything, it means government railways ; and here is an hon. gentleman who is the railway critic of the opposition, who occupied the important position of Minister of Railways at one time, and who, if anybody, ought to be able to make up his mind on a question of this kind. But that is the condition of mind in which these hon. gentlemen seem to find themselves. We on this side of the House are not like that. We have the courage of our convictions. We know what we want, and we think we know what the people of Canada want. We have a clean-cut proposition to put before the House and the country, and we are not afraid of the result.

A good deal has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite about the adverse feeling that exists among the people of this country in regard to this measure. I do not think there is any such feeling in the country. If it exists, I have not discovered it. I had occasion to discuss this question before my constituents only a few weeks ago, and I assure you, Sir, that the railway policy of the government was well received by the people. My message to this House from the electors of Guysborough is that they are in favour of this policy, and I have not the slightest doubt that the other counties of Nova Scotia—aye, and the other counties of Canada—by an overwhelming majority, when the opportunity offers, will give the same verdict as was given by Guysborough on the 16th of March. This policy, Sir, means progress, it means expansion, it means prosperity to Canada. It is calculated to awaken the patriotism of the Canadian people. It is the well-thought out plan of one of the ablest and most brilliant statesmen that Canada has ever produced. Some writer has said, and truthfully said, that there is nothing paltry about the aims of the right hon. gentleman who leads this House. He works in these days of national prosperity and national expansion for results that will mature later on in days of national strength. Let us stand by him in this emergency. Let us do our part as representatives of the Canadian people in assisting to build up on the northern half of this continent a state worthy of ourselves, worthy of the great heritage left us, worthy of the splendid stock from which we have sprung—a state where in the eloquent language of a great Canadian there will be justice for all, free scope for all, a fair reward for labour, a new home for freedom, and where the hundreds of thousands of new settlers who year by year find homes for themselves in our western lands may be kept in touch with the trade of the older provinces, and may find a road to the sea for their produce over Canadian soil and by way of Canadian ports.

Mr. R. A. PRINGLE (Cornwall and Stormont). Mr. Speaker, having devoted some time during last session to discussing the original agreement that was then before the House, I do not intend at the present time to detain the House with any very lengthy remarks. I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) upon the able manner in which, on this his first occasion of speaking in the House, he has presented his views. The hon. gentleman devoted a good deal of time to discussing the policy of the Liberal party. He stated that it was a policy of Canada for the Canadians. I think that the policy embodied in this contract, which the Liberal party has entered into with the Grand Trunk Pacific, is not a policy for the Canadians, but a policy for the Grand Trunk Railway Company. The policy of the Liberal party for the last few years has been, to my mind, a policy to the detriment of Canadians. We have the Liberal party advocating a lowering of the tariff, with the result that some of our largest manufacturing industries have had to close their doors. As this is not the time nor the occasion for dealing with that question, I will not now pursue the subject any further than to say that to-day the woollen mills of Canada are closed, owing to the fact that this Liberal government, who the hon. member says are legislating for Canadians, have legislated in favour of foreigners instead of in favour of their own people.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). Will my hon. friend permit me to say that I have a circular from that woollen company stating that they are not closed, and inviting orders ?

Mr. PRINGLE. Will the hon. minister permit me to say that the Cornwall Manufacturing Company has closed its doors, that it has been sold out, lock, stock and barrel, and that 150 employees of that town have left for the United States to get employment ; and that the woollen mills in other portions of the country are closing down. Now, that the hon. Minister of Finance has brought that question up, let him go to the returns, where he will see that over $13,000,000 worth of woollen products have been imported into this country, owing to the lowering of the tariff on these goods, to the detriment and destruction of the woollen industry of this country. However, there will be another occasion on which we can discuss that matter.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sinclair) has referred to the bugaboo of the bonding privilege. I thought that that was dead. We heard a good deal about it last session, but not a word this session. Last session we had the First Minister making an impassioned speech on the danger of the bonding privileges being abrogated, but when the people saw the question in its proper light, they realized what a ridiculous bogey had been dangled before them, and hon. gentlemen opposite apparently have come to realize this, for they carefully refrain from any further allusion to the subject and have let it drop out of sight. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) is an exception. He has ventured to revive it, and since he has done so, let me give it a passing reference. I shall simply quote from the language of an eminent American, who disposes of it in these words :

Nature has bound the transportation system of Canada with that of the United States. The waterway extending into the heart of the continent is common to both countries. The southward dip of the boundary allows a portion of the province of Ontario to project far south, with the result that the most direct line between Michigan and northern New York runs across Ontario. Further north it is found that the most direct communication between the northwestern states and New England is by way of Sault Ste. Marie and across Canadian territory. The Canadian territory occupies a position of advantage with regard to combination lake and rail lines. In the portion of Canada lying east of Montreal the conditions are reversed. The northern trend of the boundaries makes the Canadian railway system dependent in some degree on the United States territory. The northeastern portion of Maine divides New Brunswick from Quebec by an intervening neck of United States territory.

The most direct line between Montreal and the maritime province ports is of course the short line of the Canadian Pacific Railway through Maine. When this question was under discussion in the United States, what do we find ? The contention was made that the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway occupied a radically different position. In a great degree the Grand Trunk Railway is part of the American transportation system, while the latter is a much more independent system, in fact entirely a Canadian system with the exception of the short line through the state of Maine. This writer says :

The commercial interests of the eastern states are bound up with the retention of the bonding system both as regards the domestic transit trade and the foreign transit trade. Through the existence of the Grand Trunk, Massachusetts and Boston, which would otherwise have been helpless, were insured the benefit of natural geographical advantages of the position.

I am quoting from the report of the Massachusetts Board of Railway Commissioners, from which I shall make one other quotation :

The Grand Trunk has had a great deal to do with making Boston a competiting point..... Before Canadian lines were established it was practically impossible for shippers of Boston to obtain through rates from western points.

I might go on and give many quotations from leading authorities in the United States, such as the Portland Board of Trade, the Committee of Transportation Interests, the Chicago Board of Trade and several responsible bodies in Canada and the western states, all to the effect that the United States could not afford to interfere in any way with the bonding privileges as they now exist between the two countries. For instance, the Portland Board of Trade says :

The interest of Maine in the maintenance of the bonding system is equally great. When the system was threatened in 1888 the Portland Board of Trade addressed their remonstrance to Congress.

Regarding Detroit, the Board of Trade declares :

The interest of Detroit in the maintenance of the system is similar. The abrogation of the bonding system would impose upon the citizens of Michigan a burden destructive of their material interests.

That is from evidence taken before the Committee on Transportation. Let me also quote from the statement of Mr. G. F. Stone, secretary of the Chicago Board of Trade :

It would also be disastrous to the interests of the railroad systems of Michigan to interfere with the bonding system. The Canadian roads have protected Chicago's interests. The competition has caused the American roads to discontinue the unjust arbitraries charged by them on shipments to New England points.

The 'Journal of Political Economy' has this to say on the subject :

The bonding system rests, not upon sentiment or one-sided favour but upon common interest. It is absolutely necessary to both nations.

I shall not detain the House longer by reference to this bugaboo of the abrogation of the bonding privileges.

My hon. friend said the policy of the opposition would have the effect of connecting the Grand Trunk Pacific at North Bay with the Grand Trunk Railway system as it now stands, and would divert the traffic of the west to the Grand Trunk Railway terminal at Portland. I cannot understand how the hon. gentleman could make any such statement. If he had said that the effect of the amended agreement would be to connect the Grand Trunk Pacific at North Bay with the Grand Trunk Railway, and in that way divert the trade of this country to the American port of Portland, he would have said what was absolutely true. But in making the other statement, he has committed himself to something absolutely improbable. I cannot imagine for a moment how he could construe the policy of the opposition as one which would in any way divert Canadian traffic to Portland. It seems to me that hon. gentleman is not taking that interest in the welfare of his native province which he should. Let me refer him to the Canadian Year-book of 1902, in which he will find that a large quantity of our exports and imports went through American channels and that our ports of St. John and Halifax were being deprived of that traffic to which they are entitled, and which we desire them to have. If he will look at page 294 of the Year-book of 1902, he will find that there was imported into Canada from the motherland and sister colonies, through United States ports, goods to the value of $13,415,052, and from foreign countries $8,898,699, making a total of $22,313,751. He will find also that there was exported to the motherland and sister colonies, through United States ports, $44,860,785 worth of goods, and to foreign countries $3,332,065, making a total of $48,192,850, the grand total being $70,506,601, representing 17 per cent of the whole export and import business of Canada which passed through United States ports.

Now that is a state of affairs which we on the opposition side of the House would like to see corrected. We would like to see that 17 per cent going through Canadian ports. We have in the lower provinces, Halifax and St. John, both grand ocean ports, and we have also our ports of Montreal and Quebec. I contend that the policy of the opposition of extending the Intercolonial Railway from Montreal to Parry Sound will, in a large measure, if not altogether, bring these products to the ports of the lower provinces during the winter months, and to Montreal and Quebec in summer.

We had a speech the other day from the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Cowan). I do not wish to follow his example and say anything unkind of any member on the opposite side of the House, but the hon. member devoted a great deal of his time to that part of the policy of the hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) which deals with the extension of the Intercolonial to Parry Sound and then the acquiring of running rights over a portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway to the west. He opposed that on the ground that the Canadian Pacific Railway wanted to sell that portion of their road to the government at a large price and then to build a line connecting with their Soo road. The argument was rather a weak one because if the Canadian Pacific Railway are now operating that section of their road would it not be more in their interest if other roads were also using it, so that instead of having to pay the whole cost of maintenance they would pay only a part of it? But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cowan) wants to do what? To build another line of railway through that very country. And how does he describe the country north of Lake Superior? He says that there is not a dollar's worth of local trade that the company will ever draw from North Bay to Fort William. He says:

> One eloquent writer described this section of the country as the one over which a crow dare not take flight without carrying a knapsack because there is not enough in it to feed him in his passage.

And yet the hon. gentleman wants to build another road through that section of country. The Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has told us that this section of the country is an uninhabited and hardly habitable land. That is the very contention of the opposition. We say that in that portion of the country there is no local traffic, that it is uninhabited that it is in the language of the Prime Minister a hardly habitable land. Why then have four or five railways built at the expense of this country through that section when they are entirely unnecessary? Would not the scheme of the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) be far better, that running rates be secured through that section of the country and that the Grand Trunk Railway, the Intercolonial Railway, the Canadian Northern and the Canadian Pacific Railway all use that section of road and bear an equal portion of the expense of its maintenance? It seems to me that that scheme is a very much better one and more in the interests of this country.

A great deal has been said about this northern country, I do not wish to say a word detrimental to our country, but in speaking the other day to a gentleman who had been through that district I was told that the country north of Lake Superior is absolutely no good. I was rather astonished to hear that and I am not giving this as my own opinion at all, because there may be here and there a patch of good country. I said: What is it like?

He said: Well, it is largely muskeg and you will find 12 to 15 inches of moss, then you will find a layer of clay a couple of inches thick and then ice.

I said: You don't find ice there in July, do you?

He said: You will find ice there all the year round, and it has been there from time immemorial.

I thought that peculiar and I looked up the reference in the report of the Survey and Exploration of Northern Ontario, 1900, printed by order of the Legislative Assembly of Ontario. In this report issued by our Liberal friends in Ontario, I found this reference :

District No. 1.—In general, the land back from the rivers is low-lying and marshy, and the impervious nature of the soil prevents filtration and promotes the growth of moss, with which much of the land is covered. The effect of this is to absorb moisture and retard evaporation and also to preserve the winter ice through the summer season.

This gentleman was evidently telling me what is absolutely correct, that the ice stays there both winter and summer. I am not an agriculturist and I cannot tell you whether that would be good farming land or not, but those who are agriculturists tell me that it would be absolutely useless. Yet that is the country in which the hon. gentlemen are going to spend millions for the purpose of colonization, for, Sir, it is idle in this day to talk of this road being built through that country for the purpose of carrying the products of the west to the seaports of the east. We have had during this debate an admission from the hon. the Minister of the Interior that 90 per cent of the products of the west will go out from that country in the summer months and will go by the water routes. But if we had not this admission common sense would teach us that when grain can be taken from Port Arthur to Quebec at from 3 to 3½ cents per bushel and cannot be hauled from Port Arthur to Montreal at 15 cents a bushel the grain will go down the water route. But the best indication of what will happen is to see which way the grain is going now. During the season of 1902, there passed through the Soo canal 76,730,695 bushels, showing that almost all the grain which came from the west to the east came down via the water route. One railway man told me that it is a physical and absolute impossibility to haul grain by rail in competition with water route. He said: I have started my train from Port Arthur with 27 cars holding say 27,000 bushels of wheat, and as I started it I have seen a vessel coming into Port Arthur harbour at eight o'clock and leaving again at 12.30 o'clock loaded with 140,000 bushels of grain, for Parry Sound, and that vessel would be at Parry Sound before my train would be at White river. I asked him what it cost to haul a train say to Carleton Place, over six or seven divisions ? He said that the cost of coal was $240, the cost of the crew $30 for each division, and the total cost of hauling that grain was three times the amount charged for hauling it from Port Arthur to Quebec by the water route. Therefore I say it is idle and a mere waste of time to discuss the question of the products of the west being carried to the sea-board by the all-rail route. But, Sir, we find this, and it has been proved, that where you can combine the rail and water route then there is an advantage. We find that grain to-day is taken to Parry Sound and from Parry Sound on the Canada Atlantic Railway down to Montreal, at a comparatively low rate, but still not quite as low as that by the water route.

Now, the hon. gentleman for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) referred to statements made by Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson to show that this enterprise would be a profitable enterprise. Those statements I have looked at, and they certainly do show that it would be a profitable enterprise. But profitable to whom ? Not profitable for the people of Canada, but profitable for the Grand Trunk Railway Company. Let me refer to one on two things said by the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company :

It is calculated that the present uninhabited area of the province of Manitoba and of the territories of Assiniboia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Athabasca, amounts to nearly 300 millions of acres, the greater portion of which is excellent farming land, and that the unoccupied portion of British Columbia amounts to some 200 millions acres, much of which is also suitable for farming and grazing. There is no time to be lost if we are to avail ourselves of the great opportunities presented. Prosperity is flowing rapidly from the east to the west outside and beyond the territory covered by the Grand Trunk. Thus surrounded on all sides by elements of progress, it is absolutely impossible for our company to stand still. We must either continue to advance or we must recede and yield the offered advantages to more enterprising and far-seeing competitors.

I quite agree with every word that the president of the Grand Trunk Company has said. We have a great country, we have a country which, from the moment the first wheel turns on this new road, will make that road a profitable one. For that reason I do not see why the people of Canada should be called upon to pay for the railroad and then hand it over to the Grand Trunk Railway Company. We also have the statement of Mr. Hays in regard to the possibilities of that country. But Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson in referring to the contract which they are entering into with this government, says :

The result therefore of the agreement was a combination of these two interests for the construction of the proposed road, which would thus be carried out, as I have said, by means of a partnership between the government and the Grand Trunk Pacific, supported as that company would be by the influence and connections of the Grand Trunk Company.

Well, Sir, I am opposed in the first place to entering into a partnership with any of these large corporations. But if we are going to enter into such partnership, why do we pay nine-tenths of the expense of that road, the Grand Trunk Railway Company only paying one-tenth and then taking over the road practically as their own ?

I was looking at a little pamphlet which has been sent all through the western country with the frank of the hon. the Minister of the Interior. This was sent out just about when it was understood this government was going to the country last winter, and before the 12th day of January when they got rather panic-stricken over the hitch in the Grand Trunk Pacific proceedings and decided, instead of going to the country, to call on the session which Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson wanted called on for the purpose of completing this agreement. In this little pamphlet I find the following :

> The feature of the bargain in regard to which most of this is done, is the financial arrangement.

I should think so.

> It is an actual fact, an indisputable fact, that $13,000,000 will cover every cent of the country's expenditure in connection with the railway.

Now, Sir, this is the pamphlet which these hon. gentlemen sent forth to the electors of this country, and when we have the election on, speakers will be going up and down the side lines and telling the people of this country : Why, here is a road for $13,000,000. Evidently they have made a mistake. What they should say is this : We are building a great road from the Atlantic to the Pacific and we are giving it to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company for $13,000,000. It is true it will cost us $150,000,000 to $170,000,000, but we are making it a present to them, we are handing it over to them for $13,000,000; although they try to make the people believe it is going to be a transcontinental line, all it is going to cost is $13,000,000. I see sitting before me the hon. the Minister of Finance, and I would like him to say whether the statement that this road is going to be built for $13,000,000 is true or not. He has already told us that this road will cost $70,000,000 or $80,000,000, yet this pamphlet is sent broadcast throughout the country stating that it is only going to cost us $13,000,000. I say it is a ridiculous statement, and one that should not be circulated. Then the pamphlet goes on to say :

> As the premier said in the Commons, there are mountains of information available about this country.

We would like to see these mountains of information. I have been here since parliament opened, and I have heard no information whatever in regard to that country except the statement which was casually made by the Prime Minister in regard to this trip taken, I think by some gentleman who started from Tadousac and went up the Saguenay river and continued on in that direction, and they told us something about roses being found up in that country. We have not yet had any information in regard to that country through which this proposed road is to run. Then the pamphlet goes on to talk of the elaborate surveys that have been made of that country where this railway is to pass. Where are these surveys ? We have asked in this House for these surveys, we have asked hon. gentlemen to say what surveying parties are out, and we have not been able to get any answer. If there are any elaborate surveys, surely the members of this House are entitled to see them, to see the reports from the surveyors that have been on that line.

Then, Sir, I was amused also at their description of the Conservative proposal. While they were going to build the Grand Trunk Pacific for $13,000,000, the Conservative proposal was to cost $266,000,000. That is the statement in this pamphlet which is circulated to all the electors in the western country. Only $266,000,000 was the cost of the opposition proposition. Now, I do not intend to deal with that. It is so absolutely ridiculous on the face of it that I would only be wasting the time of the House if I took up the time to show how ridiculous and unfair a statement of that sort is. But, Sir, they have sent up a mass of these pamphlets, and I am not going to refer to many of them. Just let me refer to one, more because it is one which has interested us in the eastern part of Canada. We have had the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Préfontaine) going to Montreal and other places and stating to the manufacturers of this country that the policy of this government was to give a fair amount of protection. In my constituency we have 1,200 or 1,500 men employed in the cotton industry, which is now depressed owing to the tremendous increase of imports under the preferential tariff. We have in Valleyfield a portion of the mills closed down because of the competition under this preferential tariff. These hon. gentlemen opposite say : Oh, that is going to be all right. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries says that the duty on cottons will be increased so that the industry will be protected. I am told the same thing ; I am told that the government are going to take care of these industries, but when they are circulating their pamphlets they say distinctly that the Liberal party stands for a low tariff, and that the Conservative party stands for a high tariff, and they say that no matter what individuals may say, their party stands distinctly opposed to the Conservative high tariff, and that no voter who is interested in tariff matters can have any difficulty in expressing his opinion at the polls. I think that if hon. gentlemen opposite will go to the country and state this, as they are stating it in this pamphlet, and will go into the manufacturing centres and say : We stand for a lowering of the tariff and the other party stands for a protective tariff, it would not be difficult for the voters to mark their ballots in the proper way. But our experience has always been that there is one of these hon. gentlemen who is a protectionist and who goes to t he manufacturing towns and cities and favours protection, while there are other hon. gentlemen who are free traders who go out to the country and speak in favour of free trade. I see that in this pamphlet they do not say anything about the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson). The great stalwarts for free trade are Sifton, Fielding and Fisher. I suppose it must be assumed from this that the other members of the government are in favour of protection.

Now, I am not going to take up the time of the House by referring to the manifesto of the hon. ex-Minister of Railways and Canals. I see it has been put on 'Hansard,' and I have no doubt everybody is thoroughly familiar with it. I will just say in regard to it, that it was before Council in December, 1902, that in March, 1903, in the speech from the Throne, there was no foreshadowing of any such scheme as we afterwards had brought down to us in the month of July. In the month of May we had the report of Council in favour of a commission to investigate the transportation question. I see, Sir, that the manifesto of Mr. Blair is a very strong one. It is one which, I think, will meet with the favour of the people of this country. He proposes the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to the Georgian Bay, which is exactly the proposition which is made by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. Now, we have heard a good deal about government ownership of railways, and we have had hon. gentlemen in this House speaking in favour of government ownership. But, when the opportunity came, they have voted against that principle. I am not going to say that government ownership in this country has proved to be the success that it might have been, owing, perhaps, to the manner in which the government railways of this country have been managed. I think the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals, in his manifesto, shows very clearly the reason why the Intercolonial Railway has not been a paying investment. We find, as he points out, that there are some 400 or 500 miles of the Intercolonial Railway that have always paid and that are paying to-day. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) referred to that portion of the road. It is not th busy portion of the road that is to be paralleled by this new road. The portion of the road which is to be paralleled by this new road is the portion which Mr. Blair says has not been a very paying road, because there has been little or no local traffic. It simply carries the through traffic.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. PRINGLE. Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at 6 o'clock, I was dealing with the manifesto or memorandum of the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) addressed to the cabinet council in the fall of 1902. I do not intend to quote at any very great length from that memorandum, as it is now published in 'Hansard,' and has also been very thoroughly circulated throughout the country. But let me say, Sir, that the memorandum is important in this respect; that it points to a continuation of the policy which was adopted by this government in extending the Intercolonial Railway system to Montreal. We find from the memorandum that Mr. Blair proposed to continue the work of improving the Intercolonial Railway by extending it to the Georgian Bay, so that the government railway might share in the growing grain trade and carry western business to Canadian seaports. That was the policy of the Liberal government until the month of June or the month of July, 1903. On January 22, 1897, the Prime Minister addressed a public meeting in Montreal, and he pointed to the Canada Atlantic line and he said:

> The Canada Atlantic Railway extending from Parry Sound to Ottawa, is a road that would bring down to Canadian ports the greater part of the grain of the Canadian Northwest, and of the American northwest as well.

There, we have Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1897, practically endorsing the scheme proposed by the leader of the opposition, and what he and his government and his supporters are now opposing. We also have the utterance of the Hon. Mr. Blair, then a minister, made in the hearing of the Finance Minister and in which Mr. Blair advocated the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to the Georgian Bay and ultimately its extension to the Pacific coast. That speech was delivered by Mr. Blair on March 22, 1899, at a banquet given to the Hon. Mr. Fielding at New Glasgow, N.S. Mr. Blair there expounded the government programme. He pointed out that the Intercolonial Railway had reached Montreal and he said:

> It appears to be in entire accord with the national idea to furnish a highway to the sea, for our products all over the Canadian west, and at all seasons of the year to avail ourselves of the Intercolonial Railway.

There are a number of prominent Liberals, and among them members of the present government who are in favour of the very scheme which has been propounded by the leader of the opposition. I feel like apologizing to the House for continuing my remarks at any length, but, Sir, when

I know that this scheme is going to involve the country in an expenditure of from $150,000,000 to $170,000,000; when I know that the constituency which I have the honour to represent will have to bear its share of that burden to the extent of some $800,000; I feel that it is my duty to my constituency and to my country to oppose in every possible way a scheme which will place such an enormous burden upon the people of Canada.

We have had some strong speeches in this House; we have had the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) get up here and in the strongest possible terms advocate this scheme. Why, Sir, he pounded his desk and he said: If there are any weak-kneed Liberals we want them to understand that the Liberal party stakes its political existence upon this scheme. Well, are there any weak-kneed Liberals?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. PRINGLE. There are none; are there not?

Mr. LANG. No.

Mr. PRINGLE. Was the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals, a Liberal; is the present Minister of Railways and Canals a Liberal?

Mr. ALEX. JOHNSTON. You bet your life.

Mr. PRINGLE. Are any of the electors of East Lambton, and East Bruce and St. John city who voted for the Conservative candidate in the by-elections; are any of them Liberals? I know very well that some of the men whom the hon. member from South Essex (Mr. Cowan) was so loudly applauding because he thought they had been attacked; I know that these men are not weak-kneed on this scheme. We learned from the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals nearly a year ago: that Cox can't wait. He and his friends are not weak-kneed Liberals. The men who today, if you go to the Department of the Interior, have located all the timber limits west of Winnipeg; the men who are friends of the hon. Minister of the Interior; they are not weak-kneed Liberals, they are ready to have the road go on. The men who will form a construction company to build this road from Winnipeg; they are not weak-kneed Liberals; they are ready to have the scheme go on. The very men that the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) warned his colleagues about; they are not weak-kneed Liberals; they are ready to have the scheme go on. But how about the agriculturists of this country; how about the ratepayers of Canada who are going to bear the burden for these men who will form the construction company? They may be a little weak in the knees; they may say the day has come when those railroads that are not pioneer roads entering into those fertile fields of the west, should pay for themselves, rather than that the people of this country generally should pay for them. These people may say that we have given to railway corporations in Canada $233,000,000, and that we have given enough. Let me give you the exact figures from the government blue books as to just what we have given to railways in the way of bonuses. It is only fair to say that part of it was a loan; part of it was a loan to the Grand Trunk Railway Company, but I never saw that any of that loan has ever been returned. They have still got it, and I do not suppose that they will return it. Now, Mr. Speaker, we have given the railroads in this country $233,239,876. We have to-day in Canada 18,868 miles of railway. We have given absolutely to the railroad corporations of this country (not including the 1,333 miles of the Intercolonial Railway), $14,000 per mile for every mile of railway in the country. So far as I am concerned, I believe the day is past when the people of Canada should burden themselves to the extent of $14,000 per mile for new railroads. The hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Cowan) referred to the transcontinental lines in the United States, and I quite concede that the United States have been generous to their pioneer roads. But go to the United States to-day and try to get a bonus for a railroad, or try if the government will build a mile of railway for any corporation. Not at all. I say that so far as Canada is concerned we are ahead of the United States in railway development, as the figures prove. In the United States in 1900, they had a population of 76,300,000 with 196,250 miles of railway open for traffic, or 25,257 miles of railway for each 10,000 inhabitants. We have in Canada 18,868 miles of railway, with 6,000,000 people or over 30 miles of railway, for every 10,000 inhabitants.

Then why go to the expense of building a road to parallel the Intercolonial, and build another road from Winnipeg to Quebec? Mr. Speaker, I have not a word to say against the Grand Trunk Railway; I have not a word to say against the officials of that railway. I think the president of the Grand Trunk Railway is a very able man; the general manager, I know is an exceptionally able man. He has shown that in the concessions which he has obtained from the government of this country. When the original agreement was made, we were told by the government that it was final, and would be carried out; but the general manager of the Grand Trunk Railway had to have the last say. He knew that he had these hon. gentlemen in a position where he could squeeze them, and, Sir, he has succeeded in squeezing them pretty effectually. While I am in entire accord with the Grand Trunk Railway getting access to western Canada, I am utterly opposed to the amendments to the agreement under which this road is to be constructed. The general manager knew very well what the Grand Trunk wanted, and what an enormous benefit these amendments would be to his company. He said at the meeting of shareholders :

To my mind it is difficult to conceive that there can be any objection to this scheme which promises so much to the Grand Trunk Railway.

It does promise very much to the Grand Trunk Railway, but it promises very little to the people of Canada.

The ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Blair) has dealt in his memorandum with the question of the government ownership of railways ; and, Sir, I support in its entirety the platform laid down by the hon. leader of the opposition. If we are to expend $150,000,000 or $160,000,000 while the Grand Trunk Pacific Company expend only $14,000,000, we had better spend the other $14,000,000 and own that road whether we operate it as a government road or lease it to a company.

The experience of other countries with government-owned railroads has not been so very bad. Let me just refer you for a moment to the experience of Australia. Owing to the absence of reliable natural waterways in the interior of that country, an extensive railroad system has been built up ; and, as I shall not have time to go into statistics on the subject, I would like the hon. gentleman to examine the report of the commission which was appointed under the Act of 1901, and see whether that railroad has been operated to the advantage of the people of Australia. Now, Australia has made very rapid strides in railway construction. It has 13,497 miles of railway for a population of 3,771,000, which is equal to 35 miles of railway for each 10,000 inhabitants. It exceeds Canada a little in mileage according to population, for the simple reason that in that country they have not, as we have, great natural advantages in the shape of waterways. Notwithstanding the fact that in the year 1902 that country suffered from a drought which made it most expensive to operate the railways, and that they had to reduce the freight rates, they were able to show a net revenue almost equal to the interest which they had to pay on the money which constructed those roads. The same thing has been done this year largely under the management of a Canadian, Mr. Tait. If Australia can do that under government ownership, how much better could we do it in this country.

I might refer you also to the progress which government-owned railways have made in other countries. In Belgium the state roads give the lowest freight rates in the world. On this subject let me quote what Mr. Jeans says :

Notwithstanding the superior financial result the lines worked by the state are those kept in the best order, and the working of which gives the greatest satisfaction to the commercial world and the public in general, as regards regularity of conveyance, cheapness of transit and the comfort of the traveller, state management offers certainly some decided advantages to the public. Above all the position of the road is not conducted for the pecuniary advantage of a few, but for the common good. New lines are not built for speculative purposes, but for the development of the country. Rates are passed more upon the costs of service than upon what the traveller will bear, and the ultimate object of a state policy is not high profits, but a healthy growth of the country's commerce, while the sole aim of a private company is to get the largest revenue possible.

Let me refer to the railway regulations of Austria :

The railroad history of Austria has much in common with that of other nations of Europe. Two truths which are shown by the experience of other countries of Europe are brought out in an especial clearness in that of Austria. The first is that whenever a nation, after leaving to private enterprise the development of a part of the network, itself embarks in a railroad construction, either of two things will happen. Either the private companies will get the most productive territory, the unpaying districts being left to the state, or the private company will in some way make it profitable or necessary for the state to shoulder the whole system.

Well, Sir, that is just our experience here. Mr. Hays, with his great ability, has been able to put this country in the position that the Grand Trunk Railway Company will get the absolute ownership of the productive part of this railway, while the Dominion of Canada will be left with the unproductive part. History will repeat itself in Canada.

I read with some interest the very able lecture delivered by Sir Sandford Fleming to the Canadian Club. That gentleman has been referred to by several speakers in this debate. I have nothing whatever to say against the statements that he makes. In one part of his lecture, he says :

A great statesman of the neighbouring republic, Mr. Alexander Hamilton, bequeathed a precious legacy when he said to them, 'Learn to think continentally.' The late Secretary of State for the Colonies gave an equally precious message to those whom he addressed when he said, 'Learn to think imperially.'

The Conservative party of this country has always thought continentally. We remember the day when the vision of the Liberal party of this country did not extend beyond the Georgian Bay. We remember the day when they stood up in this House and made it almost impossible for the Conservative party to carry through that great national highway which links all the provinces of this Dominion. It is idle, therefore for these hon. gentlemen to say that the Conservative party are afraid to think continentally or imperially. We have always taken the broad point of view and are to-day advocating a scheme with which the continental idea has inspired my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. We are advocating a scheme which will bind together still more closely all the different provinces. We are advocating a scheme which will enable the Intercolonial Railway to make the seaports of Canada those through which the products of this country will naturally flow. The scheme advocated by the leader of the opposition is one which will send Canadian products through Canadian seaports, whereas that of hon. gentlemen opposite is one which will enable the Grand Trunk Railway to carry those products to the American port of Portland. Go to the city of Toronto to-day and ask for a rate on flour, for instance, which is one of our staple exports, via Portland, St. John or Halifax, and the Grand Trunk Railway will give you a rate from two to three cents higher by a Canadian port than by an American port. They favour Portland to-day, and they will always favour that harbour where they have from $20,000,000 to $25,000,000 invested in terminals.

There is another great interest to be considered, the agricultural interest. In what way would that interest benefit if we had a government line from the Atlantic to the Pacific? Take the position as it is to-day. I do not care whether you have one, two, three, or even five transcontinental lines, the same thing will occur here which has taken place in the United States. The railway companies will fix their rates so as to enable them to pay interest and dividends, not upon the money which went into the construction of their roads, but upon their capital stock, and the only way we can control and regulate these rates is to build a national highway from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Let me give you some figures to show the money earned by the railways of this country. In 1902 I find that on a capital of over $900,000,000, which includes watered stock, the railways of this country earned 5·72 per cent. In order that I may make no mistake, let me give the exact figures from the government returns. The net earnings of railways in Canada for the year 1902 were 5·72 per cent. In 1901 they were 5·31; in 1900, 5·62; and in 1899, 5·76. That is upon the capital shares and preferential stock and bonded debt, but if you take simply what it costs to construct these roads, the net earnings during last year amounted to from 10 to 12 per cent on the actual money spent in construction. I only quote this as an evidence to show that the Intercolonial Railway extended to Georgian Bay and thence into the Northwest could earn good interest on the money invested and give to the people lower freight rates than they have ever had. This would be a great boon to our farmers. Why, Sir, the people of the province of Ontario have lost millions of dollars through having been charged higher rates than are charged by the American railways, which are paying dividends on heavily watered stock. In speaking to a merchant in my own town the other day—who, by the way, was a supporter of my friends on the other side—I was amused to hear him tell me that the moment water navigation ceased, the rates of the Grand Trunk Railway went up. I said to him: Why have you not competition over the Canadian Pacific Railway? Well, he said, the rates of the two lines are identical. We thought we would have competition, but I tell you I can take a team of horses and a sleigh and can haul freight from Montreal to Cornwall cheaper than I can get it over the Grand Trunk Railway. A state of affairs such as that should not exist. We should have better control over the rates.

Our Intercolonial Railway has not done so very badly, when we consider that a large portion of that line has no local traffic. On its eastern section it has always paid, not only operating expenses, but a fair interest on the money invested. On the western section it has not been so fortunate, owing to its passing through a country in which there is not a very large local traffic, but we find that the Canada Atlantic has earned good interest on the capital invested, and is doing a very large and profitable business. Then, if that road were added to the Intercolonial Railway, is there any reason to doubt that the Intercolonial Railway, even under its present bad management, would show a fair return on the investment? If that were accomplished, the harbours on the Georgian Bay would do a largely increased business. It has been hinted across the House by some hon. members that the province of Ontario is somewhat selfish in opposing this measure. Sir, Ontario is not opposing this measure, because the burden falls heaviest upon it. Ontario is just as willing to do to-day, as it has always been to bear its share of the burden of any enterprise which is for the benefit of this country, but I say that between this government and the government in Toronto our province is going to be pretty badly hit. We have in the province of Ontario a government which is giving away money by the hundreds of thousands, aye, by the millions. It is endeavouring now with its narrow majority—and I dare say the narrowness of its majority has something to do with it—to give $2,000,000 to an enterprise at the Soo, and is going into partnership in the iron and steel business as this government is going into partnership in the railway business. And as has been said, Mr. Speaker, in each case, it is the partner who puts in the cash who will come out with the experience, and nothing else, and the one who puts in the experience who will get all the profit. And this government are going into the railway business. They are going to guarantee the bonds of the James Bay Railway to the extent of $5,000,000 and they are going to subsidize a branch line of railway, 200 miles long, extending from the main line of the Grand Trunk Transcontinental Line to Port Arthur to the extent of $400,000 in cash and 1,200,000 acres of land. Hon. gentlemen get up in this House and say that the policy of the Liberal party has always been not to give subsidies in land, but our friends in Ontario are giving a small slice of the province to this company.

I do not know that it will injure any hon gentleman if I quote from a paper published in Toronto in the interests of the farmers of this country, 'The Farmers' Sun.' It is true it is only a farmers' paper, and I do not think that these gentlemen opposite take any interest in the farmers of Canada, and perhaps would not care to hear me read this article from their organ, but I shall quote from the issue of last week :

THE RIVAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY POLICIES.

The government and opposition policies, in regard to the building of a second transcontinental line through Canada, are fairly outlined in our parliamentary summary.

The government, in brief, is pledged to build a line of railway from Moncton in New Brunswick to Winnipeg in Manitoba at the public expense. The Grand Trunk, on its part, agrees to extend the line from Winnipeg to the Pacific coast, the government agreeing again to guarantee the bonds of the prairie section of this extension to the extent of $13,000 per mile and the Pacific section to the extent of 75 per cent of the cost, whatever that may be. The whole line is to be operated, when built, by the Grand Trunk. For the first ten years the government will receive no rental for the portion of the road which it is to build, and for the remaining 40 years a very low rental. The opposition proposes, as an alternative policy, to abandon the Moncton to Winnipeg project altogether ; to build, as a national work, such lines of railway in the west as the necessities of the case call for ; to extend the Intercolonial to Georgian Bay and thence to Winnipeg ; to improve our waterways, and explore the country between Winnipeg and Quebec, with a view to such future railway construction in that quarter as the necessities of the case may call for.

The criticism which Mr. Borden offered of the government plan was rather too sweeping, and the effect of what he said was thus made weaker than it otherwise would have been. He did not differentiate with sufficient clearness between the government's obligations in regard to the eastern and western sections respectively—the obligation to spend its own money in construction in the one case and merely to guarantee the money borrowed by the Grand Trunk for construction in the other. But, even after allowing for all this there can be no doubt that the government's partnership scheme with the Grand Trunk is one of the most one-sided bargains which has ever been proposed, even in a country where railways always play a game of 'heads I win, tails you lose.' The government is to build, at a cost of least $118,000,000, the greater half of the whole road (the greater half both in cost per mile and length of line), and is to guarantee to the extent of 75 per cent the bonds required to provide the money for building the other half. In return the country gets nothing save such benefit as will come from the building of a second transcontinental line. It will not become owner of the whole road even in case of default by the company, and it will have no greater control over the rates than it has, in the general law, over all roads. If the government is to assume all the cost of public ownership so far as half the line is concerned, and three-quarters of that risk in the other half, it might better go the whole length, and build and operate the entire road, and thus secure for the people of Canada a transportation service at actual cost.

But there is no reason why the whole road should be built—at least just yet. Concerning the great stretch of country between Quebec and Winnipeg, Sir Wilfrid Laurier says he has 'mountains of information,' but it was an exceeding small hill he placed before the House. He told what a Jesuit missionary reported of the character of the country 200 years ago. That story is interesting, but it hardly affords a sufficient basis on which to spend $118,000,000 of public money. The time probably wil come when all the hinterland of Quebec and Ontario will be required to support our population ; but that time is not yet. The policy of to-day is to provide for the people of to-day ; to consolidate where development has already begun, rather than spread out over a vast area we are not yet in a position to effectively occupy. Looking at the matter in this light, as we think most reasonable men will, the proposal to leave the Winnipeg to Moncton line in abeyance, to extend the Intercolonial to Georgian Bay and thence to Winnipeg, meantime pushing the Winnipeg extension westward seems the wiser plan of the two now before the country. This plan would utilize Georgian Bay and Lake Superior—and it is over this magnificent water stretch the great bulk of western grain must be moved ; it would give us a second completed line from sea to sea at not more than the cost of building the Moncton to Winnipeg line, and it would give us public ownership of an all-across-Canada line—the only really effective means by which transportation charges can be controlled.

I admit frankly that the Intercolonial Railway has been badly managed by the hon. gentlemen. There is no question about that, and we have heard the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) tell us how badly it has been managed. But, notwithstanding all that, they made a profit last year of $130,000, leaving out the Prince Edward Island Railway, on which they made a small loss of some $72,160. Their percentage of expenses to earnings was a little high, 99·02 ; but under proper management—and there is no reason why it should not be managed, if we had a transcontinental government line, by a commission, just as they are managing the Australian system of railways. There is no reason why the road should not be a great success and a great advantage to the people of Canada. We find Canadians going to other colonies and making a great success of railroads ; we find a Canadian at the head of a large system of railways in South Africa ; we find a Canadian, Mr. Tait, in Australia, and we have Canadians in our country who could manage our roads and make them a success.

I take very strong objection to the company having the revenue producing part of this line and the country having the non-productive section. I feel, as the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) has stated, that the government are acting altogether too hastily in pushing the eastern section through an unsurveyed and unexplored district of country of which we know very little. There may be parts of it, and I hope there are, that will turn out to be valuable country for agricultural purposes, but we have millions of acres of land awaiting settlement that have never been, as I may express it, tickled by the plough. Let those lands be filled up before we consider the advisability of building another line into that northern country for colonization purposes. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Wm. Roche) has dealt very fully with the weaknesses in the amended contract. He has emphasized the fact that although the government advances practically all the money for the construction of that western road, they are powerless to foreclose their mortgage. The company may be in arrears for five years before anything can be done, and after that the government cannot foreclose, but the road passes into the hands of a commission, who operate it practically for the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and hand it back as soon as they have earned the fixed charges. I feel that there is nothing to prevent the company's western traffic going to American ports, and it is certainly decidedly in the interests of the Grand Trunk Railway that it should go to American ports. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) has pointed out that there is a difference of only 18 miles between the distance from Quebec to Portland and from Montreal to Portland. What is to prevent the Grand Trunk Pacific from taking Canadian products from Quebec to Portland? The 18 miles is only a trifle, it is a much shorter haul than to St. John or to the Canadian ports, and all they are bound to do is to give the same rate through Canadian ports as they would give through American ports.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am very strongly opposed to this scheme, and will have to vote against the resolution introduced by the hon. Prime Minister. Our aim, the aim of the Conservative party, is to make this Dominion of Canada compact, strong and prosperous, and I believe that aim will be carried out much better by the scheme proposed by the leader of the opposition than by the scheme proposed by the government.

Mr. RALPH SMITH (Vancouver). Mr. Speaker, I had not an opportunity last session when this question was being debated in this House, of giving an opinion upon it. At the present time, after it has been discussed at so great a length, it is difficult for an ordinary member of the House to present any new argument. In listening to the debate on this question as carefully as I was able, I think I have noticed that whilst the government party are united, great difference of opinion exists in the opposition. If I thought it proper to follow for instance the arguments of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Pringle) I think it would be easy to prove that he is not at all satisfied in his own mind as to the scheme put forth by the leader of the opposition. One part of his speech was undoubtedly against the idea of building a second transcontinental railway; another part of his speech was positively in favour of the government owning and operating a transcontinental road; another portion of his speech seemed to indicate that he would support the proposition of the government if the conditions were suitable to his own opinion. So far as the position of the government is concerned, I think it is clear that they have taken it up after having thoroughly thought the matter out, and they have concluded that the scheme is in the interest of the country, and they have determined to put it through. There is almost a complete agreement in the House on the necessity of a second transcontinental railway with the exception perhaps of one or two members who have spoken from the other side of the House. No substantial argument has been presented, with the exception of those of one or two members, against the necessity of a second transcontinental railway.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I have said, I have followed this discussion as closely as I was able, and I have arrived at certain conclusions in my own mind with regard to this question. I desire to say that I have arrived at those conclusions altogether apart from and independent of any considerations other than those of the public interest. In considering this matter I am impressed with the necessity of every member having an individual opinion on a question of such magnitude. Every member representing a constituency ought to have some well founded opinion on this question. In the second place, every member ought to have some clear idea as to the opinion of the district that he represents in this House; in the third place, it is the duty of every member to have some clear idea of the general opinion of the people of this country as a whole in regard to this proposal. The individual opinion of a member of this House ought to be controlled by the general opinion of the district he represents, the aggregate opinion of all the members of the House ought to represent the aggregate opinion of the people of the whole country on this and every other question.

Now, Sir, in coming to a conclusion on this matter I must admit that I have done so as a representative from British Columbia. I have endeavoured to ascertain what the people of the district I represent think of this matter, and also what the people of the whole province from which I come think of it. During the recess between the two sessions of parliament I have had some opportunity of finding out what the opinion of the people of my district was and, to a considerable extent, what the opinion of the people of British Columbia was on this question. I took the opportunity, I may say, of going through my own district for the very purpose of finding out just what the people thought of this great scheme.

Now, Sir, I think it is right to say that if I discovered in my inquiry that the people of my district, or the people of the province, presented certain complaints against this proposal, if I found out that they considered that certain provisions ought to be attached to it to make it more secure in the public interest, it is my duty to present the opinions of the people to this House, and I may say that I am prepared to do so. Before I do so, I desire to say that I found an absolutely unanimous opinion in the whole of my district in regard to one or two important omissions from the agreement, and I shall mention these points. The people of British Columbia consider that some provision should be made in this agreement for commencing the work of construction on the Pacific coast. There is no such provision. They consider that such a provision is necessary, and I may say that I agree with that opinion. One of the important benefits to accrue from the construction of the transcontinental railway is the benefit that results from trade in the several sections of this Dominion during the period of construction. There ought, in my opinion, therefore, to be some provision in the agreement that would give some amount of certainty to the people of the province of British Columbia as to the commencement of the construction work on this railway at its western terminus. The House will be able to see clearly the benefit of such a provision. The furnishing of the supplies necessary for the construction of this work will be guaranteed to the province of British Columbia by such a proposal, and the very surety that this great work is to commence at the Pacific terminus and go eastward through that province is an assurance that would give a stimulus to the trade of that province and promote the financial interests of the merchants of that part of the country. So that I agree with the position taken by the people of British Columbia and the public men of that province on this question.

Another important question that has been the subject of a great deal of discussion in the provincial legislature during the recess of the Dominion parliament is as to the necessity of an amendment to this agreement defining the class of labour to be employed on the construction of the work in that province. There is, perhaps, a considerable number of the members of this House who do not appreciate the importance or necessity of adopting exclusive measures against the employment of Oriental labour in British Columbia. I know from my own experience that the seriousness of this question is not realized by a large number of the members of this House, and I am presenting to this House the objection which is taken in the province of British Columbia to this agreement. In my opinion, such a provision as that which I have indicated is a necessity. But I am bound to mention the precaution that the government has already taken in regard to this matter. The hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Fitzpatrick), who had charge of the Railway Commission Bill last session, provided in that Bill for the application of the fair wage principle. That would mean that if Oriental labour were employed on the British Columbia section of this railway, the contractors having charge of the work would have to pay the current wages of the district even to Orientals. It is fair to mention also that the government, as if in anticipation of this great work, placed an exclusion against the importation of Orientals last session, and I desire to say that the measure has proved to be absolutely exclusive, for this government has not derived a single dollar from the importation of Orientals since the beginning of the operation of the law of 1903 in British Columbia. So far as this matter is concerned I do not think there is very much in the contention of the people of that province in this matter. But I would present this question to the House from another standpoint. In the construction of this railway right through the whole of the Dominion of Canada we have the means of bringing to this country a large number of settlers who may be necessary over and above the present supply of labour to prosecute the construction of this road. It is part of the policy of the present government, and has been for some time, to spend large sums of money upon the importation of agricultural settlers to settle the lands of the Northwest Territories. I do not know of any better opportunity that has ever been presented to this country of encouraging the immigration of people from the British islands than that which the construction of this railway affords, or one which will be more likely to bring to this country a desirable class of British subjects who will become Canadian subjects, and who will settle upon the great areas of land which will be developed by the operation of this great railway. It is for this reason that I will support the proposition. I do not believe that the difficulty in regard to the employment of Oriental labour that our friends anticipate will be met with, but they have learned such a lesson on this question as a result of the policy that the Conservative party pursued in bringing Chinese to British Columbia by the thousands for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway that they are naturally apprehensive. They have learned such a lesson that they do not want to have to deal with the difficulty of a second Oriental invasion in that province. The one great influence that brought this undesirable class of people to British Columbia was the construction of the British Columbia section of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Oriental labourers were brought into the province by the thousands from San Francisco. No restrictive principle as against the importation of these people, no fair wage condition, no obstruction of any kind was provided for when the construction work of the Canadian Pacific Railway was going on, and as a consequence we have been flooded with them up to a recent time, and they would still be coming but for the fact that we have adopted a principle of restriction.

Now, Sir, it is very important for a British Columbia member to know just what the people of that province think of this railway policy. I can conceive of a member of this House having an opinion favourable to an abstract question, but that the demands of his constituents might force him legitimately to support a measure which in his own mind he might not be favourable to. I do not mean to insinuate that that is my position. I wish to say that I have looked into the question to my own satisfaction; that I have investigated as to the opinions of the people of my district; that I have taken an opportunity of testing the people of British Columbia on the question before the House, and I have concluded to support the measure presented by the government, because I believe in it myself, and I believe that my action will be endorsed by the opinion of the people of British Columbia generally. I defy any member in this House to point to a single complaint coming from British Columbia against this proposal, except in regard to the two matters I have mentioned. I have evidence here which will demonstrate to this House what the people of my province think about this scheme, as presented last session. Nay, more, I have the evidence, not of the friends of the Liberal party, but the evidence of the Conservative press of British Columbia, in favour of the policy of the government. Last session when this question was being discussed here, my friend, Mr. Riley, from Victoria, repeatedly received letters and telegrams from the Conservatives of British Columbia, requesting him to support the national transcontinental railway. Here is one telegram, signed by Mr. Helmcken, the president of the Conservative association of the capital city of the province :

Mr. RALPH SMITH.

Railway project warmly appreciated here, push her through.

H. DALLAS HELMCKEN.

I do not think, Sir, that any member of this House can take a higher position than to support a national proposal, when he has reason to believe that it is supported by the general sentiment of the people he represents. I shall test the proposal of the Liberal government on this matter in the light of the opinion of the two leading Conservative papers on the Pacific coast, and the extracts which I shall read have special reference to the question as it was discussed in parliament last session. The Victoria 'Daily Colonist,' the leading Conservative organ of Victoria, on January 5th, 1904, says, editorially:

Although the government carried the Grand Trunk Pacific scheme safely through parliament, the enterprise seems to be still the object of attacks, both open and covert. Undoubtedly there is a good deal to be said against the extension of the proposed road to Moncton, and it is almost impossible to avoid the belief that political reasons and not considerations of a business character were the grounds for the selection of that route. It is almost equally certain that a good deal of the opposition that manifests itself to the enterprise from time to time in the public press, is instigated by the promoters of a rival scheme who see in the carrying out of the Grand Trunk Pacific project the creation of a powerful rival to their own scheme, and the certainty that in such case further aid to them, either from the Dominion or the provinces, would be impossible. It is, however, satisfactory to see that Mr. Hays, the general manager of the Grand Trunk Railway, asserts positively that the enterprise will be carried out, and that the construction will begin in earnest this year. A great deal is being made in certain quarters of the fact that the company has not exactly fulfilled its part of the agreement, because it has made the required deposit of $5,000,000 in guaranteed preference stock of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, instead of in Imperial or Dominion government securities. To our mind, if a deposit be required at all, the form in which the company has made it, should be deemed perfectly satisfactory, and if there be need of parliamentary approval of the modification, it should be given. Not only is the stock a good security, but the fact that it is forthcoming shows that the Grand Trunk Company is behind the new enterprise beyond any doubt. That the money will be secured to build the line to the coast, we have it on the authority of such a competent person as Mr. Clouston, the general manager of the Bank of Montreal. Here, in British Columbia, it is, in our opinion—

I want hon. members opposite to listen to the statements of this representative Conservative paper:

Here, in British Columbia, it is, in our opinion, the duty as it is the interest of every one to avoid doing or saying anything that may put an obstacle in the way of this great enterprise. It is a most extraordinary thing to us that men who two years ago were willing to burden the people of this province with obligations of millions in money and millions of acres in land, in order to make a gift of the same to promoters to build a line to the coast, should now be attempting to oppose a scheme that will give us the desired line under the auspices of one of the great transportation companies in Canada, without costing British Columbia one dollar in money or one acre of land.

The 'News-Advertiser' is the leading Conservative organ of the mainland, and I shall quote its opinion. I do not know anything of greater interest, or greater security to a member of parliament who has to form an opinion on this great question, than to know that both sides of politics in his province are prepared to support the scheme now before the House. The 'News-Advertiser' on the 9th of March, 1904, wrote as follows:—

An opportunity like that which the government's offer now presents, is not likely to recur. Indeed, the chief criticism we have to make against the government's scheme is the doubt as to whether the rapid development of western Canada makes it necessary that anything but the prospect of the abundant traffic being developed should be required to induce capitalists to build railways in order to share in the business now practically a monopoly in the control of the pioneer transcontinental line. Certainly were the offer rejected now, it would never be repeated.

Let me read an extract from the Victoria 'Colonist' of March 10, 1904:

The Dominion parliament meets to-day, and one of the most important matters that will occupy its attention at this session will be the ratification of the amended agreement between the government and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. There can be no reasonable doubt that this will be done, with the result of the actual preliminary work of construction being commenced during the coming season. A few days ago we discussed the details of the proposed amendments in the agreement, and it is not necessary to refer to them again. The most important to British Columbia is that by which the government, instead of limiting its guarantee on bonds for the construction of the mountain section of the road to $30,000 per mile, is authorized to guarantee 75 per cent of the actual cost of that section. The value to British Columbia of a line opening up the northern part of the province can scarcely be over-estimated. That such a scheme was desirable was shown by the action of the provincial legislature three years ago in voting millions of dollars as a subsidy in aid of such a project. Many people questioned the ability of the province to incur such an obligation under its financial position and held that such a work was really a national one and not a provincial affair, and should, if aided at all, be assisted by the Dominion. By the agreement with the Grand Trunk Pacific Company this is now being done without the addition of one dollar to the financial obligations of the province or the surrender of one acre of its lands. Nor can the people of eastern Canada fairly object to this arrangement. While the aid will come from the Dominion as a whole, the people of British Columbia will contribute their share—a share, which it may be pointed out, in passing, is larger per capita of the population than the people of other provinces contribute to the Dominion treasury.

I considered, Mr. Speaker, that in presenting my views to the House on this question, it was very important that I should show what are the views of the Conservative press and people of British Columbia; so that in supporting the proposal of the government, I feel absolutely confident that I am supporting a measure which the people will endorse when I present myself with the other members from that province for re-election at the proper time. The proposed amendment of the leader of the opposition has been reduced by the opposition generally to the principle of government ownership and operation. Now, Sir, I belive that there is at the present time in this country a considerable sentiment in favour of that principle, and I believe that when the government thought out the details of the proposition which they have laid before the House, they took that question into consideration. I think the measure itself demonstrates clearly that the government had in their mind the sentiment existing in this country on the important principle of public ownership. The very fact that they retained the ownership of the railroad from the Atlantic to Winnipeg is an evidence of that. Another evidence of it is the fact that they have provided in these proposals for government regulations which never existed in this country before to any extent, if they existed at all.

Now, Sir, I want to present frankly to the House my view of this question of government ownership. I think hon. gentlemen opposite who have taken a strong position in favour of national ownership and operation of railways have read that principle into the amendment of the hon. leader of the opposition. I do not think that they extracted it from the amendment itself. I do not think that there is anything in the speech which the hon. leader of the opposition delivered at the beginning of this discussion, or anything in his amendment, to indicate that hon. gentlemen opposite were prepared to take the responsibility of inaugurating that tremendous system in this country. Now, I believe in the principle of government ownership. I believe there is a right and a wrong way of initiating it; I believe there is a right and a wrong way of educating the people of this country with regard to it. If I were a member of a government, and had to think out an important national proposal of this kind, I would want to know just what the public sentiment of the country was with regard to a principle that had not yet been brought into practical operation in the country. Why, Sir, if the speeches of certain hon. gentlemen opposite are to be taken seriously, it is surprising that they have so suddenly changed from a policy which handed over to the railway corporations of this country immense privileges without a particle of government regulation, and from a position of extravagantly bonusing and assisting a railway corporation to build a transcontinental railway the operation of which is to-day not subject to any government regulation whatever. These hon. gentlemen have leaped right from the position of giving abundant national assistance to railway corporations to the position of owning and operating the projects ourselves. Now, Sir, the men who cannot regulate cannot own and operate. The man or the party who cannot do small things are not likely to do large ones. The party in this country which has demonstrated by its history that it has not been prepared to regulate the operation of railways in favour of the people, is not likely to inspire the people with confidence that it is willing, if it had the responsibility, to go to the other extreme of owning and operating. In politics, as in everything else, the people do not want to know what you say, but what you really do ; and the public, in forming a conception of what hon. gentlemen opposite are likely to do if they had the power to do it, will look up their record with regard to these projects, and will form their judgment of what they are prepared to do in the future, not from a theoretical amendment which they present at a time when they have not the responsibility of putting it into operation, but from the way they have conducted themselves with reference to these projects when they have had the power to do something.

What is the public sentiment of this country on the question of national government ownership? I believe in municipal government ownership ; I believe in an extension of provincial government ownership : I believe that this government, in coming to a conclusion on this question, were in duty bound to look over the several factional powers in this Dominion and see what these powers have done in relation to projects of this kind. How are we to find out whether the people will endorse the principle of national ownership ? Could I safely arrive at a conclusion by a theory in my own head? Should we endeavour to put into operation an important principle of that kind without first ascertaining the opinion of the people and obtaining some assurance that the people would endorse it? By what process could the government arrive at the conclusion that the people would be willing to support the idea of government operation and control? There is just one way in which that question could be solved. This is my opinion as to the way in which the government could find out what the people think about this matter. There is a large number of municipalities in the Dominion. These contain within themselves given areas, powers just as complete within those areas as are the extensive powers of this parliament within its federal jurisdiction. There is a certain number of provincial parliaments, which have within the areas of their own jurisdiction, powers just as complete as those which the Dominion parliament enjoys within its constitutional limits. If I wanted to know what is the public sentiment of this country on the principle of government ownership, I would try to find out how many municipal railways there are owned and operated by municipalities and how many provincial railways there are owned and operated by the provinces. And if, as I think I can demonstrate, there are not more than two or three municipalities in this Dominion which actually own and operate their own street railways, by what line of reasoning could I conclude that the people would be willing to build and operate a national railway? If I find that in all the provinces there is absolutely not one owned and operated government railway, by what process of reasoning could I conclude that the people of this Dominion in the aggregate would be willing to support the principle of a national owned and operated railway? I consider that that is an unanswerable argument. The right way to find out what the people of this country would endorse as regards the policy of this government would be to find out just what the people are doing to-day in this regard on similar projects concerning which they have very extensive powers, which they could use in the direction in which we are asked now to legislate. In my opinion, the government have adopted the principle of government ownership in the proposal before the House to a greater extent than that principle is applied in any of the municipalities and provinces of this Dominion. I do not think you will find that principle put into effect in any municipality, except the city of Port Arthur, which owns nine miles of government owned and operated railway, and the city of Nelson, which owns a few miles of government owned and operated railway. Apart from these two, I do not think there is a municipality which operates to any extent the principle of government operation, to the extent of spending their own money in building and owning their own railways. I believe that there will never be a national owned and operated road in the Dominion until the people, in the exercise of their own local and municipal powers, endorse this great principle of government ownership. So long as the people of the Dominion refuse to exercise the power which is in their own hands in their own provinces and municipalities, their representatives in this parliament can have no reason for believing that they will endorse the principle of government ownership in federal matters. What they do in their local capacity is a clear indication of what they want us to do in our federal capacity. In England, the government does not own a foot of railway, but there you have the most perfect system of municipal ownership. In England, on this great question, they began at the right end, they put the horse before the cart, and are doing the little things before undertaking the big. They have inaugurated the system of government ownership in Glasgow, and Liverpool, and Birmingham, and will, no doubt, come in time from the smaller experiment then be a public demand from the public in favour of the operation of this system. That, in my opinion, is the course we ought to follow. The example of the old country should, in my opinion, guide our ministers in coming to a determination with regard to this important matter. The first step should be a system of government regulation, and as I have said before, that party in this country which has refused to regulate corporations, which has refused to hold the corporations to their duties, is not in a position to operate and own a railway system themselves. What party was it in this country which inaugurated the system of government control, government system and government regulation? I think I could easily demonstrate that the Liberal party, in 1897, when discussing the charter of the application of the Canadian Pacific railway for an application to build the Crow's Nest Pass railway, was the first to insist on a system of government regulation being inaugurated. In 1885 a charter was obtained from this House by certain mine owners to build a railway in the Northwest. An enormous land subsidy was given them by the Conservative government then in power, as well as large financial assistance. The reason assigned for this was that the government wished to secure for the settlers of the great Northwest a supply of cheap fuel. In 1889 that company came back to this parliament for further assistance, and its land subsidies and financial assistance were both increased. At that time one of the Liberal members, the present Hon. Senator Watson, offered an amendment to this House which sought to force the government to regulate the rates of transportation from the mines, so that the settlers would be enabled to obtain cheap coal. But what attitude did the Conservative party take on that occasion? I could read from the 'Hansard' the declaration of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), that any system of regulation proposed as an amendment, which would put a restriction on that company, would be an unreasonable imposition. In 1897, the question of the authority of the government over these corporations was again brought up in this House when the Canadian Pacific railway applied for a charter to build the Crow's Nest Pass railway.

The Liberal party gave that company a tremendously large cash subsidy. They gave them $3,600,000 as a cash subsidy to assist in its construction, but important regulations were associated with that grant with regard to running powers and the regulation of rates. In fact the only portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway in the west over which there is any government regulation to-day is that portion of the road which was built under that charter. So important were these regulations that the people of the Kootenay District, the consumers of the products of the Crow's Nest Coal Company, received back in three years' time an amount equal to the whole of this subsidy. Let me show what was done. The Conservatives of British Columbia handed over to private persons and to private members of the government of that time the important coal fields of the Crow's Nest Pass, and when the Canadian Pacific Railway Company took possession of the British Columbia Southern charter, and came to this government for an extension of powers, this government appropriated in the interest of the people 50,000 acres of these coal lands given by the Conservative party of British Columbia. They made it a condition in the granting of its charter that they would return to the Crown 50,000 acres of these lands which have proved themselves to be so important. But they went further. They made it a condition that that company should supply coal on the cars for $2 a ton. I am altogether against land subsidies, and against cash subsidies if there is not associated with the granting of such subsidies a guarantee that the public will benefit as a result of this assistance. A cash subsidy given to a company should be an investment on the part of the people, and if it is given to a company without the necessary regulations that would make it a good investment for the people, I contend that the money has been misappropriated by any government that gives it. Now what has been the result in this case. The average output of coal in the Crow's Nest Pass mines has been 2,000 tons a day The price of coal at the mine on Vancouver Island is $4 a ton, so that we have the difference between $2 and $4. If that regulation had not been provided, the Crow's Nest Company could have charged the consumers $4 for every ton of coal, but by a regulation adopted by the Liberal party in 1897, they are compelled to put coal on the cars at $2 a ton. $2 a ton on 2,000 tons a day for 320 days in the year would in three years return to the consumers of the Kootenay far more than the enormous cash subsidy given by this government to assist that great project. That is what I call wise legislation. There is assistance to which you might have an objection but when the assistance is associated with the wise precaution of seeing that it is returned in another form for the public benefit, hon. gentlemen must see that it is money well spent. The same principle of regulation has been continued; the Liberal party seems to have inaugurated the principle of authority over these corporations. They established the principle in 1897 with regard to the project I have been discussing and to a considerable extent the principle of government ownership has been endorsed by the building and ownership of this new railway half way across the continent and by more strict regulations in the public interest than have been included in the case of any other company in Canada. No proposal has emanated from this parliament since confederation, with equal provision for control and regulation of railways. For these reasons I have great pleasure in endorsing the proposal and I believe the people of this country will endorse it. In this proposal there are not only the safeguards and regulations which guarantee a proper return for the investment made by the people of this country, but if the public sentiment of this country ever rises, as some hon. gentlemen think it may, to the position of demanding an absolutely government owned and operated railroad, there are provisions in the charter of the Grand Trunk Pacific Transcontinental Railway that will make it possible for the people of Canada to take over the Transcontinental Railway even against the will of the company. That is a position that will be endorsed by the people of Canada, a principle that has been arrived at by a process of evolution. The Liberals in 1897 saw the folly of the absence of regulations in these matters, and secured a measure of control that will give many of the advantages to be derived from the building and operating of a government owned system of railways, and at the same time will give an opportunity of acquiring the ownership of this railway if the time comes when in their own interest the people feel they should take it over. When hon. gentlemen opposite revile, criticise, and oppose the conditions inserted in this charter by the party who have adopted the principle of government control of railways, they should remember the contract which they made with the Canadian Pacific Railway. No one doubts the importance of that railway throughout the west and the thorough and businesslike management of that railway, but I wish to state that under that charter, in contradistinction to the present transcontinental scheme, you have not a single particle of authority over the operations of that road and when men whose policy has been to support the principle of granting immense subsidies without government control come before this House with the extraordinary proposition to own and operate railways before they have learned to regulate them, I am quite certain the people will judge them from what they do and not from what they say.

Mr. DAVID HENDERSON (Halton). Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman from Nanaimo (Mr. Ralph Smith) who has just taken his seat, if I understood him aright declared, that after carefully listening to the discussion of this question, whether in or outside of this House, I am not very sure, but I rather think outside, he was unable to ascertain where we on this side of the House stood on this question. The hon. gentleman has discussed this question from what he calls an independent standpoint. He talked about everything except what pertained to the construction of the road. He told us something about Chinese immigration, he discussed the construction of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, but Sir, to my mind, if he was at a loss to determine where we on this side of the House stood on this question, I can assure you, I am much more at a loss to understand where the hon. gentleman stands on the question. I feel, however, that when the vote is taken there will be no question as to where the hon. gentleman will be found. Notwithstanding his declaration of independence which we have heard from him to-night, you will certainly find him voting with the government for the road that will cost the most money, voting for the road that will delay construction the longest time, and voting for the road which will charge the highest rates of transportation to the people of western Canada.

Mr. Speaker, the name of the Grand Trunk Railway Company has been a household word in the older provinces of Ontario and Quebec at any rate for well on to half a century. This railway possibly was the pioneer railway, especially in the province of Ontario, and certainly the people of Ontario and Quebec owe a great deal to the Grand Trunk Railway Company. It was through this railway in the earlier days that these provinces were developed. As we all know, the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway was of a later date. But all over the western part of Ontario, we may say, we have ramifications of the Grand Trunk Railway. Its lines are running east and west, north and south, and both Ontario and Quebec, as I say, are indebted to the Grand Trunk Railway for its aid in developing those provinces. It was only natural therefore, in view of this company having extended its system throughout the older provinces, that it should desire to reach out into the new country which is now being developed and to secure some share of the trade which is now arising in the great country to the west of us. I say it was only natural that such men as the enterprising president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company and its general manager should desire to extend their system, and I must confess that I scarcely think the government of the day has treated this company with the courtesy that it demanded. I sympathize with Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson in what he said in the speech which he made to his shareholders in London on the 8th of March last :

Let me recall to you the reasons which prompted the board to enter upon this important scheme. The history of the Grand Trunk Company shows how it has grown with the growth and prospered with the prosperity of Canada. It shows how the company has itself been largely instrumental in promoting the prosperity of the country, and how it has been one of the leading factors in knitting together the various provinces which now constitute the great Dominion of Canada. As it has been in the past, so it should be in the future, and as Canada continues to develop, so it becomes an absolute necessity for the Grand Trunk Company to lend itself to the circumstances which surround it, and not neglect the opportunity of obtaining a share in the growing prosperity of the country.

I say it is only natural that such men as Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson and Mr. Hays should have desired to extend their system, and I say that I do think the company are entitled to better treatment at the hands of the government of the day than they actually received. Let us look at the inception of this scheme. We find on the 10th of January, 1903, in the 'Canada Gazette,' that the Grand Trunk Pacific Company gave notice that they would apply for a charter. That charter was to construct and operate :

A line or lines of railway from a point at or near either Gravenhurst or North Bay, in the province of Ontario ; thence in a north-westerly and westerly direction through the provinces, districts and territories of Ontario, Keewatin, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, Athabasca and British Columbia, or any other province, district or territory of British North America to the Pacific ocean, &c., with power to construct and equip branch lines to Winnipeg, Regina and other points.

There, Sir, was a modest application, something that to my mind should not have been interfered with. Why, the most ordinary application for a charter for the construction or extension of a railway in this country is acceded to by the government of the day. It is seldom indeed that we find a government offering strong opposition to any application for a charter, as long as it believes that the promoters of the scheme are prepared to construct the railway. But what do we find later on ? On the 31st of March, 1903, the company introduced a Bill into this House—

For the purpose of constructing and operating a railway of the gauge of 4 feet 8½ inches from a point at or near the city of Quebec to a point at or near either Gravenhurst or North Bay in the province of Ontario ; thence in a north-westerly and westerly direction passing to the north of Lake Nipigon to a point in or near the city of Winnipeg, &c.

I need not tell you, Mr. Speaker, that this is not what the Grand Trunk Pacific desired. This is not in accordance with the notice they gave in the 'Canada Gazette,' and the present scheme has practically been forced upon them by the government of the day. I refer to this fact because hon. gentlemen to your right have not hesitated to say that the opposition complained of by the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company at the meeting of the shareholders in London, was the opposition in this House. But reading the speech of Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson it is clear that the opposition to which he refers was not the opposition in the parliament of Canada, but the opposition coming from the government of the day. Well, even this charter had to be amended when it came before the Railway Committee, and at the suggestion of supporters of the government, receiving the endorsement of the government, it was made to read that this railway should be constructed—

From a point at or near the city of Moncton, in the province of New Brunswick, through the central portion of said province, and through the province of Quebec to a point at or near the city of Quebec, thence in a north-westerly and westerly direction to a point on the boundary line between the provinces of Quebec and Ontario within fifty miles of Lake Abitibi, thence in a north-westerly and westerly direction passing to the North of Lake Nipigon, in the province of Ontario, to a point at or near the city of Winnipeg.

A very different scheme indeed from that which was propounded by the Grand Trunk Pacific Company in the first instance, a very different scheme from that which the railway company itself desired to construct. As I said before, the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company very fairly complained of the opposition that was presented to the scheme which the Grand Trunk Pacific desired to carry out. They had new conditions imposed upon them, not permitted merely to construct a road from North Bay to Winnipeg and then on to the Pacific coast, but new conditions, that no doubt had never been considered by the promoters of this railway, were imposed upon that company, and Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson justly complains of these new conditions. He said in addressing his shareholders :

Having arrived then at the conclusion that the best interests of the company necessitated some early measure in the direction I have indicated, we caused a Bill to be introduced into the Canadian parliament for securing a charter of incorporation for the creation of a company with an independent organization, but in close connection with and under the control of the Grand Trunk Company, for the purpose of building a line of railway from a point of junction at or on the Grand Trunk line, passing through the most fertile districts of the Northwest, and terminating at a port on the Pacific coast. Under the natural impression that a scheme of this nature would commend itself to the approval, and would obtain the support and encouragement of the government and parliament of Canada, so liberally accorded to other railway enterprises, I ventured to suggest to the shareholders when I addressed them in the month of April last year, that it might reasonably be expected that such a scheme might be carried through without engaging in any way the credit of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Company.

And then he added :

I must confess that when I made that suggestion I appear to have been somewhat over sanguine, not sufficiently considering, perhaps, the weight of political and interested opposition which the scheme was destined to encounter.

I think, Mr. Speaker, I have clearly settled the question as to where the opposition came from, that is complained of by the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company at the meeting of the shareholders in London. It is not from the opposition in this House. We have no quarrel with the Grand Trunk Railway Company in this country. I contend, and I believe every hon. gentleman on this side of the House will say, that the Grand Trunk Railway Company has been a great institution for the older provinces especially where its lines now run. No one desires to interfere with the operations of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. No one, I think can fairly interfere with, or oppose, any desire on the part of the Grand Trunk Railway Company to extend its operations even into the wheat fields of the great prairie country with the view of securing the additional trade and profit that would accrue from the traffic in that country. I say then that I have, I think fairly settled the question as to where the opposition comes from that has interfered with the project that was set forth by the Grand Trunk Railway Company when it gave notice of its application for a charter. Sir Rivers-Wilson says :

Our original idea was to build from a point on the Grand Trunk Railway to the Pacific coast. The intention was that the point of junction should be at or in the neighbourhood of North Bay. It was made, however, by the government a condition of a grant of the charter of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company that the line should be extended eastward from North Bay to Quebec into the city of Moncton in New Brunswick, the point of junction on the Intercolonial Railway, communicating with St. John, New Brunswick to the south-east, and Halifax, Nova Scotia, to the south-east.

Sir Rivers-Wilson plainly states the condition that was imposed upon him and states that that condition was imposed by the government of the day. Was this proposal a reasonable one, because, I think in all fairness that the Grand Trunk, the pioneer railway of Canada, ought to have received the same treatment from the people of this country as any other railway system would receive or any other applicant for a railway charter would receive when making an application to this parliament. Why these new conditions, why these extra conditions imposed upon this railway company ? What was the cause of them ? Whence did they emanate ? The Grand Trunk Railway Company had a road from Quebec to Montreal, from Montreal to Toronto, and from Toronto to North Bay, and all that the company modestly asked was that it should be permittted to construct a road from North Bay to Winnipeg and thence extend it through that vast country to the Pacific coast. That was its modest application ; it wanted to extend to Winnipeg and thence to the coast. If the government desired a new transcontinental railway from ocean to ocean on Canadian soil and if it desired to impose new conditions upon the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway beyond what it has asked for, the government could have given the railway company running rights over the Intercolonial Railway so that this new system would have been a transcontinental railway from the city of Halifax to a port on the Pacific coast. Why did the government intervene, because I think it is only fair to inquire and ascertain what the reason was that prompted the government to do so ? The charter was to be granted only on certain conditions, first, that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company should build the road from Winnipeg west to the coast, and second, that the government should build the road from Winnipeg east to Moncton. These were the new conditions made by the government of the day. True, this would appear to be a saving to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, because it would oblige it to build, not a line from North Bay to Winnipeg, but only to commence at Winnipeg and thence build to the coast saving the construction of possibly a thousand miles of railway, but if it were a saving to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, it was certainly a saving secured at an enormous cost to the people of this country, at a cost which has been variously estimated and I think very fairly estimated by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition when he said that the construction of the road from Moncton to Winnipeg would cost, all told, principal, interest and discount and all other charges in connection with the construction, $130,000,000. I say, that, whilst the Grand Trunk Pacific have been saved the expense of constructing a road from North Bay to Winnipeg the country has been called upon to pay out a great deal more money in order to relieve the Grand Trunk Pacific from the construction of that road. The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company did not ask for the credit of this country to be pledged for the construction of this road. It had, at any rate, not reached that stage and possibly the company did not anticipate anything more than the usual subsidies granted for the construction of roads through new countries. I say then that it was not surprising, with a project of this kind before the government, that the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals showed his determined opposition to the proposal of the government. We have some of his reasons assigned and I propose to read one or two of them because I think they are very cogent and worthy of consideration. The hon. Mr. Blair discussing this question said :

> The only cause that has led me to take that regrettable step——

The step was that he severed himself from his political associates of the government—> —is because I have been unable to justify to my mind, to my own conscience, and to my own duty to my people, the support of the proposal which the government have decided upon making to this House, and the asking of legislation to pass with respect to the project known as the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway.

He further said that he objected to the government constructing another government road from Lévis to Moncton. He proceeds :

> I objected to it because it paralleled the Intercolonial Railway in my opinion without a doubt.

He added :

> Another objection was that I thought we were proceeding with undue haste.

The road not having been surveyed, and no proper estimates having been made as to what the cost would be.

He also said :

> But I am not in favour of impetuously rushing into the construction of a transcontinental line from Quebec, through an unknown country to Winnipeg and the west, until we know something about it—until we have the fullest information about it. The project is one of very great magnitude, and should be dealt with only after the maturest deliberation.

Mr. Blair calls it an unknown country. Is it known to-day any more than it was a year ago ? It may be to some hon. gentlemen. I do not know who they are. I confess that it is unknown to me. The right hon. Prime Minister has told us of the visit of a missionary to that country over 200 years ago. Well, at that time railways were not in contemplation, and the report of this missionary, no doubt made to those who sent him out there, had no reference whatever to the feasibility of the construction of a railway, because practically, railways were unknown in those days. The right hon. Prime Minister told us that it was a country in which wild roses were found to grow in June. This has been frequently referred to and I may be pardoned for referring to it again because I do not regard that as an evidence of the fertility of the country or of the suitableness of the country for settlement or the production of grain and other cereals such as people going into that country to settle would desire to produce.

Botanists tell us that the blooming of flowers in a high latitude is not evidence that if you take a similar flower from a warmer climate and transplant it to the high latitude, it will flourish as would the native flower. The fact that a country would produce native roses is no evidence that it would grow wheat, or barley, or any other of the cereals. I remember once standing within thirty feet of the foot of the Illecillewaet glacier, and in the month of August I saw a bush covered with beautiful flowers, but the cold from the ice of that glacier was so intense that I could only endure it for a few moments, and notwithstanding that flowers were growing there, I am quite sure that you could not produce wheat or barley in the locality. I desire not to say one word derogatory of this country : I hope that the northern part of Ontario and that the northern part of Quebec is all that it has been pictured by those who have spoken favourably of it. I am not here to speak ill of our country ; I would rather speak well of it, but I say that it may perhaps be folly for us to expend the amount of money that we are called upon to spend in building a railway through that country. Even the Prime Minister seems to have doubts as to the character of that territory, because on the 5th of March, when he introduced this resolution, referring to the one section in Manitoba and the other in older Ontario, he said :

> Between these two sections of population, however, there is a gap of several hundred miles of uninhabitable and hardly habitable land.

Even the Prime Minister himself is not so much delighted with the character of this country as are many of his supporters who have spoken. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), speaking in Toronto on the 10th of December last, expressed his opinion of this country. After drawing an imaginary line across the continent from New York to Winnipeg and thence to Edmonton, he spoke of the country lying to the south and, referring to the country on the other side of the line, he said :

> On the east there extends an inhospitable region which lies between Winnipeg and Quebec.

And this is the region, Sir, through which the government are proposing to construct a railway at a cost of possibly $130,000,000 ; a region described by Sir Richard Cartwright as being inhospitable.

I am at a loss to understand why the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company should not have been treated, with respect to its charter, along the same lines that we treat railway projects generally when we consider them in this House or in the Railway Committee. Goldwin Smith, on the 5th of August, 1903, writing on this matter, said :

> But the undertaking is another attempt to force communication and transportation out of their natural and commercial lines into those of political centres. It will ultimately share the fate of other attempts of the same kind.

In the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to which I have already referred, and as published in the 'Globe,' he discloses some reasons why the government should construct this costly road from Winnipeg to Moncton, and perhaps some of those reasons tell us why the government has imposed these new and uncalled for conditions on the Grand Trunk Pacific. In connection with the construction of this road, Sir Richard Cartwright ('Globe,' 11th December, 1903), said :

> Now, I desire to point out to you what the ends and the aims of the government are in this matter. We desire and we have the right to desire, to open up new territory. We desire to add to our population. We desire to add to our wealth, but over and above all these reasons, important and valuable as they undoubtedly are, there are grave political causes at work which have induced the government to propose this policy for your adoption.

We have here the statement of a leading minister of the Crown as to why these new conditions were imposed. The object of opening up new territory is, to my mind, a very excellent reason, although with reference to that there may well be two opinions. I have my own view as to whether it is wise at the present day to open up that territory for colonization. It is alleged that there is to be found there valuable timber, which fifty years or a century hence will be much more valuable than it is to-day, and which will be required by those who come after us. But, Sir, we have in our western prairies an immense country ready for the hand of the tiller of the soil, and why expend our resources now in developing a wooded country and allow our prairie lands to go unpopulated, or allow American citizens or others to take possession of that fertile land, while we are endeavouring to send our sons from Quebec and Ontario into the northern part of these provinces, where in fifty years they cannot produce the results that a pioneer in the wheat fields of the west can produce in ten years ? The Minister of Trade and Commerce further tells us in this extract that the object of the government is to add to our population. Well, it is wise for us to secure population, so long as the immigrants are of the right class. But I ask hon. members to note the further reason which the Minister of Trade and Commerce gives as one which has incited the government to this adventure. He says : There are grave political causes. I confess I am at a loss to know what these political causes are. In this seems to lie the crux of the whole thing. What induced the government to take away from the Grand Trunk Pacific the construction of the road from North Bay to Winnipeg, and to determine that it should be at the cost of the government ? What are these grave political causes ? If it means that the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific is going to benefit one political party at the expense of the other, it is not a justifiable reason. It would seem to me that the expenditure of $150,000,000 for such a political reason is something that Canadians will not approve of. It may be, as has been hinted by one speaker this afternoon, that fat contracts for the friends of the government would be a very good political reason, and I have no doubt that there is a great deal of that kind of thing in view.

It is said there are people who cannot wait. Possibly, there are a great many people who cannot wait. There are people who are anxious to get fat contracts in the construction of this road. That would be a political reason, because it would be helping friends of the government; but that is not a reason that would justify us in voting for this scheme. Another political reason has been suggested. You know how desirous the government are to have aid at the time of a general election. They have no doubt realized that, and possibly look to this scheme as a means of replenishing their exchequer. That would be a political reason. What are we to understand from the speech of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, if such reasons as these are not the political reasons to which he refers? Then, there are great fortunes in sight for political friends—fortunes for the promoters of the scheme. That is an undoubted fact, because $25,000,000 of common stock is to be let loose amongst the promoters, to be disposed of in any manner they may see fit and at whatever price they may determine. If there are fortunes in sight for the promoters of this scheme, and they are prepared, in return, to render to the governmen such services as they may require, that would be a political reason. But I fail to see that any of these political reasons are reasons that we can offer to the people of this country in justification of a vote in favour of this scheme. Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson, in his address to the shareholders, said :

> The result, therefore, of the agreement was a combination of these two interests for the construction of the proposed road, which would thus be carried out, as I have said, by means of a partnership between the government and the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, supported, as that company would be, by the influence and connections of the Grand Trunk Company.

This is a partnership in which the government are to build the most costly part of the road and that part which is likely to produce the smallest results, while the Grand Trunk Pacific Company are to build the road across the prairies, the most easily constructed portion, and also the road through the mountains, but altogether the shorter part of the road. It is an unfair partnership, and I do not think the government acted wisely in going into it. I can understand Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson going into the partnership when it was forced upon him. In going into a partnership, a shrewd man would see that his partner had abundant means to carry on the business. I would always decline going into partnership with a man who had no money or very little, and who would not be able to take his share in carrying out the obligations of the partnership. Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson acted wisely in going into this partnership, when it was forced upon him, with the Dominion of Canada, which has unbounded wealth and is able to meet all the obligations that may be incurred by the partnership. Canada is to put up the larger portion of the money. Practically, as has been demonstrated during this discussion, Canada will be called on to put up, all told, in the neighbourhood of $170,000,000, whereas it is admitted that the Grand Trunk Pacific will be required to put up only $14,500,000. But that is not the most serious part of it. To boil down the conditions of the agreement, it practically comes to this, that the country is to make good all the losses of this partnership, and the railway company is to get all the profits. A more unfair partnership, to my mind, could not be conceived.

Now, why was this railway charter applied for, or why is there a demand for a new railway across the continent at the present time? This is an old question. We had it thoroughly threshed out in the debate on this question last year. We all know that the demand for more railway facilities came from the great west. The complaint from that country was that traffic was congested, and that there were not sufficient facilities for removing the products of the country from the west to the east, or for taking into the country what was required for the comfort and convenience of the people who went in there to settle. Therefore, the Prime Minister, last session, and I am not sure but this session also, stated that the object of this Bill was to provide immediate means for carrying the products of the west to the ocean. Observe his words—the means were to be immediate. We did not want to construct a railway that would not provide immediate relief from the congestion that prevailed; we wanted one that would afford immediate relief. This was the Prime Minister's idea. But we are surprised to find, when the amended project comes down, that the time for the construction of this railway is extended for some three years more than was proposed a year ago—that the road is not to be completed until 1911, or, at any rate, that the time for the completion of the western section is extended to some seven or eight years, instead of being the means of granting the immediate relief to the people of that country which they demanded.

Now, an alternative scheme has been proposed by the hon. leader of the opposition—a scheme which will provide immediate relief; and for that reason that scheme commends itself to me very much more strongly than does the proposition of the Prime Minister. I propose for a moment to lay these two schemes side by side, because I believe that in this way we shall be the better able to decide which of the two we ought to support. The government propose to construct a railway from the city of Moncton, through the province of New Brunswick and the province of Quebec, to the city of Quebec, thence through northern Quebec and northern Ontario, keeping hundreds of miles beyond civilization, to the city of Winnipeg, thence across the great prairie country to Edmonton, and from that point through the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific coast. How does that scheme contrast with the plan suggested by the leader of the opposition? The leader of the opposition says: Canada already owns a railway extending from several seaport towns, including Halifax, St. John and Quebec, to city of Montreal, and it should extend that system from Montreal to the Georgian Bay, where it can make connection with the system of water transportation between Depot Harbour and Port Arthur and Fort William. This can be done, he says, by constructing a short line of railway, about 35 miles in length, from Montreal to Coteau Landing, to connect the Intercolonial railway with the Canada Atlantic railway.

I do not say that you can purchase the Canada Atlantic Railway, but I have not the least doubt that arrangements could be made to run the Intercolonial Railway trains over that road to Depot Harbour. Thus you would have, during all the season of navigation, a road which would carry grain from Winnipeg to the Atlantic coast at the cheapest possible rate over a route partly by water and partly by rail. But if we desired to continue that system so as to have a railway under the control of the government during the winter months, that would only entail the construction of a hundred odd miles from Depot Harbour to Sudbury, where you strike the Canadian Pacific Railway, and no doubt running arrangements could be made over that road. I do not suggest the purchase of that section of the Canadian Pacific Railway road. I have no knowledge that the Canadian Pacific Railway desire to sell it. That section is just as necessary for the continuation of their system as it would be for any other system, but you could arrange with the Canadian Pacific Railway to run trains over that line to Port Arthur and thence to Winnipeg, and you would thus have an extension of the Intercolonial Railway system from Halifax all the way to Winnipeg. To my mind that is something which would cost only a fraction of what the government propose to spend. It would not cost within $75,000,000 or $100,000,000 of what the government project will entail on this country, and would consequently leave us large sums of money with which to improve our great waterways and deepen our harbours and perfect our water transportation generally. This scheme commends itself to my mind in these various ways. It opens practically and immediately a route by which the products of the west can be moved to the east and the congestion that prevails in the west relieved. It provides that means at the lowest rate of freight, because we must all concede that an all-rail route can never carry the products of the west to the east as cheaply as a route partly water and partly rail. Not only would we gain in time and cheapness, but enormously in the cost of construction, and by the saving we would thus effect we could procure greater benefits to the country than can possibly accrue from the carrying out of the government project.

Last year we were told that this government scheme of construction from the town of Moncton to the Pacific coast was only going to cost the people of this country some $13,000,000. I have often wondered whether the right hon. the Prime Minister was really serious when he made that statement. At any rate, we have this fact, that not more than one or two hon. gentlemen on that side have during the present debate made any reference to that $13,000,000 as being the entire charge on the revenue of this country for the construction of that road. Either they were unwilling to risk their reputation or had a little bit of conscience left. The Prime Minister himself did not repeat this session what he said last. Nor has the Finance Minister told us that through a trust or an insurance company he could raise enough money by means of a deposit of $8,000,000 to put through this gigantic scheme. The present Minister of Railways (Mr. Emmerson) has not ventured to make any pronouncement on the question. I do not think for a moment that he would support any such contention. I do not think he would risk his reputation, because he has a reputation as Minister of Railways. He has distinguished himself by keeping out of this House for two weeks while this important project is being discussed. I think I may dismiss this matter, because I fully realize that the country takes no stock in the statement that this road could be constructed without imposing a greater burden on the country than $13,000,000.

We are told by hon. gentlemen opposite that one of the great advantages of their scheme is that the government will control the rates. To my mind such a contention is absurd, because the Grand Trunk Pacific would be called upon to pay three per cent on the cost of construction of the eastern section. That would amount to possibly between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000 rental per year. How is the government to keep down the rates if they are to insist on the company paying the rent? The fact is that the company will charge such rates as will enable them to pay the rent. The rental is to be three per cent on the cost of construction, to be paid annually, so that it is absolutely absurd for us to speak of the government controlling the rates. No one supposes that the eastern portion will be for many years a revenue-producing road. The company will have to do a great deal of business on that section for practically very little and its revenue will be derived chiefly from the western section. But the revenue from that section will not be sufficient to pay dividends to the shareholders and also pay more than a mere fraction of the rental of the eastern section. Therefore, it is useless to expect that this company will ever be able to pay the rental required, if we fix the rates at such a point that they will not furnish sufficient revenue. I need not discuss further the difference between the cost of an all-rail route and a rail and water route, but I desire to place on 'Hansard' my opinion with respect to that difference. From Winnipeg to Fort William, the Canadian Northern is carrying wheat at 6.60 per bushel. From Fort William to Montreal by way of Depot Harbour, grain has been carried for 3·75, making 10·35 as the rate from Winnipeg to Montreal. Again, make another comparison. From Winnipeg to Fort William the rate is 6·60 and from Fort William to Montreal by way of Port Colborne it is 3½. With the proper facilities at Port Colborne and elevators, the rate could be lowered to three cents. This would give the cost of transport by rail and water route by Port Colborne 10·10 cents. From Winnipeg to Fort William, the lowest rate at which grain has been carried yet is 6·60 cents per 100 pounds. Taking as a basis the rate from Winnipeg to Fort William, 425 miles, the rate which the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway would receive for carrying grain from Winnipeg to Quebec, 1,475 miles would be 23 cents, or practically double what it can be carried for by a route partly water and partly rail. I say, therefore, extend the Intercolonial Railway to Depot Harbour, give us the advantage of the double route, the rail and water route, we would then have the Intercolonial to Depot Harbour, then across the water to Port Arthur and Fort William and thence to Winnipeg or we could extend the Intercolonial Railway from Montreal to Depot Harbour and then, by the construction of 100 miles of railway, connect with the Canadian Pacific Railway, obtain running rights over that road and so have the means of carrying grain at a season when it cannot be carried by water. Thus you would conserve the resources of this country; do not spend them in this gigantic scheme, unless it is going to be feasible, but utilize these moneys to improve our waterways, harbours, canals and rivers, and give us the cheapest possible transportation from the west. Thus we would really accomplish the great purpose we have in view of providing transportation for our western country.

We come now to perhaps the essence of the resolution, that is the supplementary agreement, and I am surprised that so little has been said about that in all the discussions that have taken place. We have heard very little of it from hon. gentlemen on your right, Mr. Speaker, I fancy there are few on that side who are prepared to endorse it by a speech. They may be willing to support it by a vote, because you can always explain that a vote is given for party reasons, but no man can ever explain away a speech if he makes a mistake. What is there for Canada in the supplementary agreement? First the time is to be extended to 1911. The people of the west are calling for increased transportation, demanding immediate relief from the congestion of traffic in that country, and the government says to those people in the west: We cannot give you relief this year; we cannot give you relief next year; but we have propounded a big scheme and we propose to help you in 1911 to get out the wheat crop of 1904. What satisfaction would that be? Are these people going to hold their crops, five, six or seven years? These people will still be demanding increased transportation and even with this gigantic scheme before us and with the credit of the country pledged to such an enormous sum, we will be compelled, in order to secure peace, to find some other means of getting out the crop. If there were nothing else in the agrement than that clause providing for the extension of time for the completion of the western division to 1911, I would be compelled to vote against the supplementary agreement.

Another clause provides that the guarantee for the mountain section shall be increased to 75 per cent of its cost. I am not aware that the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in proposing this supplementary agreement, gave us any substantial reason why the resolution brought down this session should be anything different from that of last session. Last year it appeared to be perfectly satisfactory to the Grand Trunk Pacific if their bonds were guaranteed in the extent of 75 per cent, that guarantee not to exceed $30,000 per mile of the mountain section. But now we are to be called upon to guarantee 75 per cent of the entire cost of the mountain section, even if it costs $60,000 per mile. I have been furnished with no reason why the change in these conditions should be made, for that reason I would be obliged to vote against that clause. Another reason which is referred to by the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Pringle) is the fact that in the event of the failure of the Grand Trunk Pacific to meet the interest charges or the rental of this road, the government is not to be permitted to take possession of the road, to foreclose the mortgage or to sell the property which is an ordinary condition of any common mortgage, but the railway company is to be permitted to continue accumulating indebtedness for five years. This rental is to remain until it has increased to an enormous sum, possibly from $15,000,000 to $16,000,000, and then the government will be able to claim the right to interfere. But the government, under the supplementary agreement, surrender the right to foreclose the mortgage, and realize their money; they simply make a condition that the road is to be put into the hands of a receiver who is to run the road, pay 75 per cent of the proceeds to the government and 25 per cent to the railway. Notwithstanding this large accumulation of rental only 75 per cent goes to the government and 25 per cent of the net earnings during those years goes to the railway. Is this an ordinary condition or a common practice? When you take a mortgage on a piece of land to secure a sum of money, do you enter into a condition that you allow the arrearages to accumulate for five years before you can take any proceedings and then that you will not pe allowed to foreclose or to sell under the mortgage, but will simply have power to place your agent in possession of the property and that he will be compelled under the agreement to hand over 25 per cent of the earnings to the mortgagor while the mortgagee will be entitled to receive only 75 per cent. It is a condition such as I venture to say no lawyer, no farmer, no member of this House ever before knew to be inserted in a mortgage.

Then we come to the clause with regard to the distribution of common stock which I think is a most objectionable clause. Under the agreement as it was approved of by parliament last year, the $25,000,000 of common stock was to be held by the Grand Trunk Railway Company as a security against the guarantee by the Dominion of Canada of the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific and this $25,000,000 of common stock was to be held by the Grand Trunk Railway intact so long as any portion of these bonds remained unpaid. It looked to us as if we had some security in the event of the non-payment of the bonds. What does the supplementary agreement do? It absolutely wipes out that security and permits the Grand Trunk Railway Company to dispose of every dollar of this $25,000,000 of common stock of the Grand Trunk Pacific. I ask where is the fairness of it? I ask where the security that we considered a year ago so essential to the country now is ? We permit the Grand Trunk Railway to dispose of every dollar of that stock without imposing any conditions as to how it shall be disposed of.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it always was a trouble to me to discover where the promoters of this road were to be recouped for the use of their name. There are names associated with this project—I do not wish to be personal, I do not wish to mention names—but we all know there are men who do not lend their names to any financial scheme unless there is lots of money behind it. We know there are men whose names are mentioned as promoters of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company who would never for one moment think of allowing their names to be used unless they knew perfectly well they were going to be amply recouped. Now here are $25,000,000 of common stock. Of course, when the scheme is projected this common stock will have very little value, and the Grand Trunk might be perfectly justifiable in putting it on the market and selling it at 5 per cent or 10 per cent. That stock, before the term of 50 years expires, perhaps before 20 years expires, might be worth 50 per cent. At any rate, if the road is a success at all that stock will have a vastly increased commercial value, will have a commercial value that will bring rich returns to those who may be fortunate enough to secure it. I have no doubt that in this way the promoters of this scheme are going to be recouped for allowing their names to be used as promoters of the undertaking. If so, it is simply an attempt to make millionaires of certain men at the expense of the taxpayers of this country. There is no doubt about it, that is what is meant, and those men would never have entered into this scheme unless they believed that large profits were going to come to them out of it as a result of their association with it.

Now, Sir, were it only for that alteration in the original contract, I would be compelled to vote against these resolutions. But there is another objection, there is a clause which provides that the government of Canada, at the expiration of fifty years, shall be obliged to take over such branches of this road as the company desires them to take. In other words, the Dominion of Canada will be compelled to take over at a price to be fixed, all the non-paying branches, and we can readily understand that there may be non-paying branches. In the course of fifty years, if this road is built through large portions of the province of Quebec and a portion of the province of Ontario, branches may run towards the St. Lawrence, towards the great lakes, towards the Georgian Bay, the profits of which would be nothing more than the traffic in timber along these roads. When that timber is once exhausted the revenue of that road would be reduced to practically nothing, and the government of Canada, notwithstanding that fact, would be compelled to take over those useless branches and allow the Grand Trunk Pacific for them, whilst they retained the paying branches for their own benefit. I say this is another reason why we should reject the supplemental agreement that is presented to us by the Prime Minister. Therefore, Sir, viewing this whole project from all standpoints as representing a constituency in Canada I must oppose it. I have avoided speaking of this scheme from a provincial standpoint, I do not want to refer to it for one moment from the point of view of the province of Ontario. I believe the scheme outlined by the leader of the opposition is one that will benefit the province of British Columbia, the Territories and the province of Manitoba, it will benefit the province of Ontario, it will benefit the provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. Perhaps the only one that would not be directly benefited, is the province of Prince Edward Island. But the scheme of the leader of the opposition is not a provincial scheme, it is a scheme that would help all the provinces of the Dominion, though I am sorry that I cannot say that the scheme projected by the government will be of much advantage to my own province. Therefore, looking at the scheme from all points of view, more especially considering the supplemental agreement that we are called upon to vote—because practically we are not called upon to vote on the question we voted on last year as to whether the scheme itself is feasible, at this time we are only called upon to vote approval or disapproval of the supplemental agreement—I say therefore that viewing the situation as a whole, viewing all its merits and demerits, and taking into consideration the character of the supplemental agreement, I am compelled to vote against the proposition of the government, and will heartily support the proposition made by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. ROBERT D. WILMOT (Sudbury and Queen's). At this advanced hour of the night I would prefer not to make the remarks I desired to make, but to move the adjournment of the debate. However I stand in the judgment of my colleagues, and if the government is willing to adjourn the debate now I would prefer to do so.

Hon. L. P. BRODEUR. If the hon. gentleman thinks he cannot complete his remarks to-night we might as well adjourn now, but I thought there were some understanding by which some hon. member on this side of the House would move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. TAYLOR. The understanding was that my hon. friend would speak to-night, and the hon. member for Toronto East (Mr. Kemp) would move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. WILMOT. Then I will have to go on, but I shall not make a long speech, I think,

Mr. Speaker, that the matter under consideration is one of the most important that has ever come before this parliament, involving as it does the expenditure of such a vast amount of money, unknown to any member of this House, unknown to any man in this country. In my opinion it is a most unbusiness like transaction. In the ordinary affairs of life we never undertake any business or operation in the manner in which this country is asked to undertake the building of this Transcontinental Railway. The country to-day is simply paralyzed. Public opinion is like a man who has been sandbagged. The people are stunned, they don't know what to think, they don't know what to say. Ignorance of the scheme and its possible consequence prevails not only in the minds of the people but in the minds of the government. But, if I am not mistaken, public opinion will rise to the occasion and, if it be not too late, will correct the mistake that is now being made. It may be at an increased cost, but I have great faith in the sober common sense of the people of this country, and I believe that right will be done. The principal reason why this measure was placed before this parliament was that there was great pressure from the west. We all know that our western country is filling up very rapidly, that the products of the west are increasing to such an extent that in a few years all the means of transport will be overtaxed. As far as that is concerned, I am fully in accord with the opinion of the government. I believe it is necessary to find further transportation facilities for getting out the products of our great western country, but why we should include in this great scheme the eastern section of the Dominion is more than I can understand without further knowledge. Now, Mr. Speaker, coming from the province of New Brunswick, and being very much interested, as we are in that province, in the utterances of a man occupying the position of Minister of Railways and Canals, I may say that we were very much impressed with the statements of the Hon. Mr. Blair. I may say that I was more than impressed with the statements which that gentleman delivered on the floor of this House. I have been here a number of sessions, and I possess a fair knowledge of the transactions of this parliament and of the important measures that have been passed here, but I never heard or never read a more monumental speech than that made by the Hon. Andrew G. Blair, a speech that appealed to the common sense of every man in this country, including the members of the government. I am bold to say that. The merits of that speech appeal to the people of this country and to the members of this House. Now, it may be said that Mr. Blair's action after the delivery of that speech took from the merits of it. I am here to say that it lessened the merits of that speech not one tittle. I will not say how it affected the position of the man but there is the speech. That speech, in my opinion, should be cut in stone. That is a figure of speech, of course; but I mean to say that it was a most important speech, and that every word of it, to my mind, was befitting the important occasion on which it was delivered. It has been said that this parliament is called together to consider the amendments to this contract. I believe that is a most important consideration. I am not going to deal with these amendments. I am not a business man, and I am not in a position to deal with them in the way they should be dealt with, but there are hon. gentlemen who are thoroughly competent to deal with the questions of a financial nature that apply to this matter who occupy seats on the floor of this House, and some of these hon. gentlemen have already dealt with these considerations of the Bill in a masterly manner, and in a manner that will appeal to the people of this country, and I believe there are others to follow. As far as discussing the main Bill is concerned, my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) was of the opinion, and he may be correct, that we are here to consider mainly the amendments. I contend that time is a great factor in this matter, and that if we were to consider the whole Bill, amendments and all, the time would not be lost. I was almost pained when I heard the right hon. premier state in this House that there was no time for deliberation. What, no time for deliberation! That expression appeared to me to be a terribly reckless one, coming especially from a man in the responsible position that the right hon. premier occupies. Now, I am going to take up a little time in the consideration of this question. It will not be lost in one sense. While it will not perhaps afford much edification to those around me, yet I believe that the more time that is occupied in discussing this matter the better will be the opportunity which the people will have in making up their minds as to this measure. Now, I will quote from that great speech a few of Mr. Blair's sentiments, and I feel that I am justified in doing so. Speaking of the scheme itself, he said:

> The thing was never mooted before, and the government took no action, until the Grand Trunk Railway Company conceived that it would be to their own interest to have the railway project liberally aided by the parliament of Canada which they desired to promote. That is the secret of the whole business; that is where it originated. All the other considerations fell upon unheeding ears. All these dangers never struck our minds, never seem to have entered into our calculations; it never occurred to us that we were under such imminent peril; it never was suggested by any one that the great future of Canada, the very life of Canada was at stake—until the Grand Trunk Railway Company made a call and laid their proposition before my hon. friends and colleagues of the government.

In another part of his speech he says:

I think that a different scheme might have been with greater advantage to the country devised. If we were to consider the interests of the country as being paramount to any desires or any wishes of any railway company, I think a different scheme from this could have been and would have been devised. The whole proposal strikes me as ill-considered. There are facts which should have been ascertained and which when ascertained would have sufficed to show us whether the step to which we were committing ourselves was one which we could safely take.

But we are in the dark. We cannot say that things are not so, because we do not know; we cannot say they are so because we have not any information which would justify us in saying it. We may find, if this thing goes on, that it is a huge blunder, that it is a grave mistake. We may find when it is too late, that the best interests of this country would have been better served by waiting, by putting off till tomorrow, by delaying long enough to make a proper investigation and inquiries.

Now, we have this session—and I think that ought to be borne in mind—made large provisions for a western railway extending through almost the whole of the fertile belt to Edmonton at all events. We are providing this year a guarantee of bonds for 600 miles, and another additional 100 miles in another direction. Now, that is a considerable thing for parliament to have done in one session, seeing, if I am not incorrectly informed, that the country through which that railway passes is not settled, that it remains to be settled, and we hope to invite settlement by means of it. That railway 600 miles long, benefiting a tract of country 15 to 20 miles on each side of it, will ultimately be settled, but it will take a great many people and it will take some time to settle it, even with all the railways to the south of it. It will be some time before you need to make a new railway to the north. I think the case is abundantly clear that we have done amply well this year, at all events, in the way of giving a guarantee amounting to $9,000,000 towards the construction of the Canadian Northern. We have done that after two years of consideration, and only came to a final conclusion during the present session of parliament. Now, my own view would be that if we wanted to do something of advantage for the transportation of the country, if we wanted to secure to our Canadian seaports the transportation of western products, we would have extended the Intercolonial to Georgian Bay by acquiring the Canada Atlantic. Of course, Mr. Speaker, that involves a continuation of the principle of government ownership, a principle to which I know a great many people are hostile. . . . My quarrel with the government so far as this portion of the undertaking is concerned, rests almost entirely upon the consideration that they are plunging headlong into this thing, in a most unwise, injudicious, and unbusinesslike way, when by a little pause, by a year or two of delay to get information, we might be put in possession of facts which would justify us in proceeding. And surely a year or two is not a long time in the life of this Canadian nation; surely Canada is not going to come to an end so soon that two years is a term of any importance to be considered in our national life. I apprehend that we would have needed two years in order to have obtained a thorough, complete, and correct survey and exploration of that whole country. And having that, the government could have come to parliament, and they could have gone to the country and given reasons for the faith that is in them, and given substantial ground for asking the people to encumber themselves with a liability of $40,000,000, or $50,000,000 or $60,000,000, or perhaps more for the construction of this railway. If you delay it in order to obtain this information, you could have come to parliament upon solid ground with your proposition, and if you had that solid ground the country would, I am sure, heartily and readily sustain you. But as you are going now, as you are plunging into it, you may possibly plunge into what is going to be a disaster. I cannot say; no man can say that that country is not of abounding fertility. No man can say that that country will not afford the amplest amount of traffic. No man can say that it is not rich in all the varied resources which distinguish other portions of Canada. No man can say that there would not be a mint of money made by any company that would operate a railway through that country. But the fact of the matter is, that we know nothing about it. We have no information about it. The government is not in possession of any information about it, or at all events if they are I have never known of it and they have not put this House in possession of it. And if it be that this country is not a fertile conutry; if it be that there is no local support for a railway; if it be that settlement cannot be successfully invited into the country; if it be that the rest of Canada will fill up with settlement before settlement will go into it; if there is nothing but pulp wood in that country which will not be hauled out until after all the pulp wood which is handier to the market is taken away from the other vast areas of Canada in which it is to be found; if there is no lumber there except the lumber of British Columbia which is much handier to get and better in quality; if that is all the business that a railway can take out of that country, what a calamitous plunge this government and this parliament would be taking in lending support to this scheme. . . . At all events, I am entitled to ask so far as I represent the people of my own constituency and the people of New Brunswick; I am entitled to ask as any other member of this House is entitled to ask, that I should have enough evidence before me, that I may be satisfied in order to arrive at an honest judgment, so that I shall feel that I am not by any possibility committing a grave and an egregious error which will deal disaster to the future of this country.. . . . .Now, Sir, my proposition is this: We ought to have come before parliament as a government, and we ought to have said to parliament and to the country: We are favourably impressed with the importance of the early construction of another transcontinental railway; but, as business men, as prudent and cautious men, we think that the proper course for us to take is to get an appropriation from parliament in order that this whole country which it is proposed the railway shall traverse, in so far as it has not been officially explored, and in so far as we have not been made familiar with its conditions; shall be ascertained and made known to the people of Canada, laid before parliament at a later day; and then if these reports are favourable it is our fixed purpose to ask parliament to authorize us to go along with railway construction in that territory. My idea would be that we should go as far as we could reasonably and as the necessities would justify, and when we got through to the prairie, that we should then call a halt until the necessity arose for further extension through the western country. We would have our officials on the alert and they would see when the growing needs and prospects of the country would justify a further extension, and when that time came, then if nobody else entertained it, and even if they did, my idea would be that we should continue our road along ; go right along through, go along just as we required to do it in the true interest of the country. Then this discussion, which I have said was so necessary, would have taken place. The public press would take the project up ; the public platform might, perhaps, be used to some extent, parliament would discuss the matter in all its bearings, and you would get the ideas of the people as to whether government ownership and government operation or company ownership and company operation would be the most desirable, and the arguments would be brought pro and con, and you would have the people of Canada put in possession of all the facts of the scheme which was to be adopted, before they were irrevocably committed to it.

The points that I think ought to be inquired into are : Is there a feasible and practicable route north of the height of land between Quebec and the prairies ? What will the railway cost ? What are the prospects for settlement ? What are the natural resources of the territory? Is there a good reason to believe that there will be a local traffic to sustain the road ? These, and cognate questions should, I think, be first inquired into before we are asked by the responsible government of this country to commit ourselves to a work of this magnitude.

The House, I know, will pardon me for reading at some length from the speech of Mr. Blair. He is a New Brunswicker, and some very interesting people come from that province. No public man—I make no exception—could express more clearly and in a more convincing manner than did Mr. Blair, the objections to this extraordinary scheme of the government. But so far as Mr. Blair is concerned, there occurred one of the most remarkable episodes in the political history of this country. He was a representative man, a man who held one of the most important portfolios in the government, a man occupying a high position in the council of the nation; he came forward and he made a speech, the most important speech of his life, and then he suddenly subsided; he took the crawfish movement. But Mr. Blair's subsequent conduct does not lessen the importance of that speech. His words speak to the nation to-day, even though their author is silent. Mr. Blair delivered that the greatest speech of his life, and then he died politically. In my opinion, political heart failure was the cause of his demise. When he resumed his seat after that speech, I counted him the strongest man in Canada. Had he gone out to the people of the country then, he would have defeated this scheme. The government knew it, and they considered that he was too dangerous a man to run at large. Even at the expense of their dignity, they thought they had better secure Mr. Blair's good-will, for they knew that he was in a position to defeat the measure and to defeat the government with it. But, Sir, I believe that it will all come right in the end. I have an abiding faith in the maxim that the thing that is right. Here we are placed face to face with a measure that I believe the majority of Canadians consider not to be in the interest of the country. True, it is backed up by a powerful government supported in this House by every member of the Liberal party, and yet I doubt if that policy is going to be endorsed by the people of Canada. I consider that this government and the Liberal party, which they represent in this House, have abused their power in this matter. They had no moral or political right, under the circumstances, with the little information in their possession, to commit the country to this gigantic scheme, or to impose such a burden upon the people. We hear a great deal about what the Grand Trunk shareholders think, but we do not hear much about what the people think, or what the people are going to do. When the opportunity offers, we shall find out what the people think of this matter. Their turn is to come. They are stunned now. They feel very much as the members of the railway committee felt, when this project was first brought before us, and when we saw that great map stretched across the wall of the room. The members of the committee looked at each other, Liberals and Conservatives alike, with a certain feeling of surprise and shock. I ask any man if he thinks, in his calm moments, right down at the bottom of his heart, that this is a wise and businesslike transaction. I do not believe I could find a man of the Liberal party in this House who would say that he would conduct his private affairs in a similar manner.

Now, we do not get credit for opposing this scheme on its merits or demerits. Hon. gentlemen opposite cast upon us the slur that, in opposing it, we are opposing the development of the country. Well, Mr. Speaker, to say that is like pouring water on a duck's back, because it rolls off of its own accord. The record of the Conservative party is such that a charge of that kind will not stick. The present position of the country in the eyes of the world is due to the policy initiated by the Conservative party in laying the foundations that went to make Canada a great country. In a clever speech the other night by a member on the Liberal side comparisons were made between the cost of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the probable cost of the present scheme ; but it is impossible to make any fair comparison between the two schemes. We all know the difficulties and obstacles which were thrown in the way of the Canadian Pacific Railway project. The country through which that railway was to run was unknown, and it had to endure the strongest opposition on the part of interested politicians of great influence, not only in this country, but in the money markets of the world. But time has proved that these people were mistaken, and that that road has been of vital importance to this country.

The objection to the present scheme has been advanced—and a very strong objection it is—that in building the section from Quebec eastward through that part of the province of Quebec and through New Brunswick we are paralleling the Intercolonial, which has cost this country so much. This objection has been urged over and over again, and it cannot be repeated too often. Hon. members of this House may be tired of hearing it, but the country will not be tired of hearing it, and that fact ought to be impressed upon the people. We do not know anything about the proposed route from Lévis easterly towards the northern extremity of New Brunswick. Surveys have been made of that country, but I do not think they have been made with a view to building a line of railway such as that proposed in this scheme, that is, a line equal to the Grand Trunk between Montreal and Toronto. Any information that I have been able to obtain about that country is unfavourable for a first-class line. I am not opposed to seeing that country opened up and developed. I would like to see the people in the back parishes towards the Maine boundary line supplied with a railway. It would be a great advantage to them ; but I do not think it should be constructed as part of a transcontinental railway, considering the splendid roadbed we have on the Intercolonial, which parallels the proposed road as far east as Rivière du Loup. At that point I think the distance between the Intercolonial Railway and the boundary line is only some thirty miles or less. In that distance there will be no great saving effected by the proposed line, and I do not think that part of it can at all be justified. When it reaches the province of New Brunswick—as I suppose it will by some means—I consider that the easiest and most natural route for a railway would be down the valley of the St. John river to Fredericton, and from that point by a branch to Moncton via Chipman. That country has already been surveyed, it is a level country and well suited for a railway. Another branch could be built to the city of St. John. The Prime Minister's proposition to build a straight line through the province of New Brunswick I do not consider at all practicable. It would be very expensive and, from the knowledge we have of that section of the country, I do not think it could be built without a vast expenditure of money. If you follow the valley of the St. John river, you have a natural roadbed and the most direct route to tidewater. You would hardly call such a road paralleling the Intercolonial Railway, because it is almost a direct route to tidewater, and it will be shorter to go to Moncton in that way than to go down through the wilderness part of the province. However, in any case we have no data on which to proceed, and the government are simply taking a leap in the dark.

Another objection I wish to make is this. I find fault with the scheme because it is allied with the Grand Trunk Railway. Why should not the government proceed in a businesslike way, give notice that its policy is to build a transcontinental road, and then adopt the advice of Mr. Blair and appropriate sufficient money to obtain the information they require. Parliament would support such a course by unanimous vote. The people of both parties would hold up both hands in favour of spending money in a businesslike and proper way for developing this country. Both parties are in favour of building a transcontinental road, but what the people require is that the government should take the proper steps to secure accurate information before laying out the course which this road is to follow. I am very much taken with the idea that we should as soon as possible extend the Intercolonial Railway to Georgian Bay and thence to the great west. It must be evident to every one who has given any attention to the matter that the scheme of the leader of the opposition is the speediest and most effective means of relieving the congestion of traffic in the west that could be devised. It will certainly do so much sooner and at much less cost than by building from Quebec to North Bay and from North Bay to Winnipeg. I have said that I do not approve of the government allying itself with any railway company in building that line. I think that the Grand Trunk Railway, or any railway company which may be allied with the government, will be in the position of a middleman and rake in the profits and financial benefits which the people should enjoy. It is said that a railway cannot be constructed and properly run and managed under government direction, because politics will be sure to creep in. But I think that we could be protected from any pernicious political influence of that kind by the appointment of a commission, which should be made independent of the government, and I believe that a line of railway traversing this country from ocean to ocean could be built and operated by the government much to the advantage of the whole country. Not the least benefit would be the effect it would have in controlling the freight rates on other lines. I have no hope of the government being dissuaded from the course it seems bound to follow, but the people will in time get in their little say, they will raise their voices later on, and I have strong and abiding faith that this scheme will not be carried out.

and it would be a good thing for the country if it should not.

I was very much disappointed at not seeing the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Emmerson) take the part in this dbeate I think he should have. I do not know whether that is due to his own free will or the direction of his colleagues. I hope the time is not far distant when the people will be aroused to the importance of the position in which they are placed and will rise in their might and scatter to the winds the project now before the House, and against which I shall have very much pleasure in voting.

Mr. A. E. KEMP moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would like to call attention to two returns for which I asked some three or four weeks ago. One relates to certain documents connected with the improvement of the dry dock system on the Pacific coast. Another called for copies of contracts for the carriage of the mails from St. Lawrence ports. I would also like to call attention to certain Orders in Council which were alleged to have been passed respecting coasting vessels and the carriage of goods by American vessels between British Columbia ports and ports in the Yukon. The hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) stated that he would have no objection to bringing down the Orders in Council and laying them on the table of the House. They cannot be of any great length and I would suppose might have been laid on the table before now. I bring these matters to the attention of the government because these returns in many cases are brought down so late in the session that it is absolutely impossible to deal with the matters to which they relate. If there is not a sufficient clerical staff to enable them to be brought down with the expedition necessary, I would think it advisable to increase the staff for that purpose but so far as I know there is no reason why, with the present staff, the documents should not be brought down promptly.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). I shall draw the attention of the proper ministers in these matters. If the returns are not very lengthy, I know of no reason why they should not be brought down but I shall call the attention of my colleagues who are at the head of the several departments to the matter.

On motion of Mr. Fielding, House adjourned at 11.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, April 19, 1904.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 65) respecting certain patents of Louis E. Curtis.—Mr. Wm. Ross (Ontario).

Bill (No. 66) respecting the Pacific Northern and Omineca Railway Company.—Mr. Morrison.

Bill (No. 67) respecting the Ontario Accident Insurance Company.—Mr. A. T. Thompson.

Bill (No. 68) respecting the Hudson's Bay and Northwest Railway Company.—Mr. Oliver.

Bill (No. 69) to incorporate the Monarch Life Assurance Company.—Mr. Osler.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, Mr. Speaker, I wish, as a matter of personal explanation, to read a letter which I addressed to the chief of the 'Hansard' staff and his reply:

House of Commons,
Ottawa, 18th April, 1904.

Dear Mr. Horton,—If I am not putting the 'Hansard' staff to too much trouble, I would like to ascertain whether in my speech on the 5th April I really used the word 'published' as reported on page 812 of the unrevised 'Hansard.' Possibly this may be a clerical error, as I know from my own experience of many years in dictating that these are occasionally unavoidable.

Yours faithfully,
R. L. BORDEN.

The Chief, 'Hansard' Staff.

Office of Official Reporters of Debates,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, April 18, 1904.

Dear Mr. Borden,—In reply to your note of to-day, asking whether, in your speech of the 5th April, you used the word 'published,' as reported, I beg to say that I find, on inquiry, that you did not use that word, but that the word you did use was 'prepared.' The use of the word 'published' was an error of this office, which occurred in the course of transcription.

Regretting, on behalf of the staff, the inconvenience this error has occasioned you, I remain,

Very respectfully,
ALBERT HORTON,
Chief Reporter.

R. L. Borden, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN.

Mr. T. CHASE CASGRAIN (Montmorency). I would like to draw my right hon. friend's attention to the promise he made on the 7th of April last to bring down the Order in Council passed in virtue of the Act 3 Edward VII., chapter 53, transferring the management, charge and direction of certain public works to the Department of Marine and Fisheries. My right hon. friend said then that he would lay a copy of the Order in Council on the table. I would call his attention to the fact that on the 19th of March what purports to be a copy of this Order in Council was published in 'Le Canada' at Montreal, and consequently it seems to me we ought to have it in the House. I would call the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr Préfontaine) to the fact that he has not yet laid on the table the account of Mr. P. V. Savard. I do not think I am being fairly treated in this matter. The order of the House was given on the first members' day of this session directing that this account should be laid on the table of the House. I do not want to have a debate on it to-day, but probably some other occasion will present itself.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). I think I can produce that Order in Council to-morrow.

THE TARIFF—WOOLLEN AND COTTON DUTIES.

Mr. ROBERT A. PRINGLE (Cornwall and Stormont). Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called I desire to bring up a matter which occurred in the debate yesterday. And if necessary, at the conclusion of my remarks I will move the adjournment of the House. During the discussion which occurred yesterday, the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) made this statement:

> On this side of the House we stand by the motto: Canada for the Canadians.

In reply to that statement, I having the honour to follow the hon. member for Guysborough, made the statement that the policy of the Liberal party had not been a policy of Canada for Canadians. I used this language:

> The policy of the Liberal party for the last few years has been, to my mind, a policy to the detriment of the Canadians. We have the Liberal party advocating a lowering of the tariff, with the result that some of our largest manufacturing industries have had to close their doors. As this is not the time nor the occasion for dealing with that question, I will not now pursue the subject any further than to say that to-day the woollen mills of Canada are closed, owing to the fact that this Liberal government, who the hon. member says are legislating for Canadians have legislated in favour of foreigners instead of in favour of their own people.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) interrupted me and said:

> Will my hon. friend permit me to say that I have a circular from that woollen company stating that they are not closed, and inviting orders? ?

In reply to the Minister of Finance, I said:

> Will the hon. minister permit me to say that the Cornwall Manufacturing Company has closed its doors, that it has been sold out, lock, stock and barrel.

Now, if the hon. Minister of Finance has a circular from the woollen mills of this country, stating that they are not closing, I think it is only fair that he should have given us the contents of that circular. I have inquired from the president of one of the largest woollen mills in the Dominion, and he tells me that there has been no such circular sent out in Canada, saying that there is no intention of closing their doors. In the course of my remarks yesterday, I made the statement that the woollen industry of this country was suffering owing to the policy of the Liberal party. I made the broad statement that we had imported into this country during the year 1903, woollen goods to the extent of over $13,000,000. I have taken the trouble since making that statement, to see exactly what the importations of woollens into Canada amounted to since the preferential tariff went into force. I find that, in 1897, there were $7,177,954 worth. There has been a steady increase from 1897 up to 1903. In 1903, the importations of woollens amounted to $13,612,942, or an increase during the period that the preferential tariff has been in force of $6,434,988. Now, Mr. Speaker, I say that I was absolutely correct when I stated that the woollen mills of this country are closing and that they have closed. Let us take the census report for 1901, issued by hon. gentlemen opposite. They show that, in 1891, we had 213 woollen mills in this country, and that these produced over $8,000,000 worth of goods. In 1901, we had only 157 woollen mills; and since 1901, a large number of woollen mills have been closed down; but the only available figures are for 1901. I find that in 1901 our woollen mills produced only $7,359,000 worth of goods. Four of the woollen mills forming what is known as the Canadian Woollen Mills, Limited, are closing down. They are going to close their doors on the 12th of May. And I say, that that company has not sent out a circular to the effect that they are not closing down. What that company did, was this—they simply sent out a circular to their customers to the effect that they would complete any orders which they accepted, but they reserved the right to say whether they would accept an order that was brought in or not. That stands to reason. They have the machinery there, they have the employees; and if they can possibly keep these mills running until the 12th of May, when they are to be put up for sale it will be much better. The company would naturally prefer that. Instead of selling the mills as closed establishments they would rather sell them as going concerns. Now, let me show what these mills meant—these four mills to which I have referred, represent an investment of over $1,000,000. For several years these mills have been running at a loss owing to the policy of the government. The representatives of these mills have come here repeatedly. I have stood up in this House since 1901 and advocated the cause of the woollen manufacturers of this country. As I have stated repeatedly in this House—and I do not intend to go beyond a mere statement of it to-day—we had a woollen mill in the town and county I have the honour to represent which employed 150 people, and which had modern machinery—an up-to-date mill and an acquisition to our community. The representatives of the mill came here and repeatedly asked that this tariff should be changed, so as to make it possible for them to live. Every time they came they were turned down. The result was that they got tired of coming and closed their doors and sold out the mill and the machinery. We all know that the woollen industry was the first industry to be attacked by hon. gentlemen opposite. For my part, I do not know why it was singled out in this way; but certainly it was the first industry to be injured by their legislation.

Now, let us take another view of this case. In 1898 the wool not further prepared than washed imported into Canada for the use of our industries was valued at $1,985,489. Last year, 1903, the value of similar imports was $1,239,998. This is a reduction of $650,000, or about one-third. But that figure does not expose the situation fully, because Canadian grown wool is exported in increasing quantities. Thus, in 1897 we sent out $201,481 worth, whereas in 1903 our exports amounted to $382,935, or an increase of about $180,000. Nor does this represent the condition accurately, for it goes without saying that if the demand declines the product is not increased as it otherwise would be. But leave the case as it stands in figures, and we have a decline of $650,000 in imported raw material and of $180,000 in home-grown raw material, or of $830,000 altogether. Now why should this be? There has been a growing demand in this country for woollen goods, and in face of this growing demand there has been a reduction in the quantity of raw materials used in the industry. Of course we understand that the Minister of the Interior, who seems to take the position that these industries must fall, has said that if the woollen industry of this country cannot survive under a tariff of 23½ per cent, it has got to go down. His language is this:

> The sooner they shut up the better.

Now, Sir, that is not the feeling, I am sure, that animates all the members of the Liberal cabinet. While we know there are certain members of that cabinet who would be only too glad to see the industries of this country closed down, I believe there are other members of the Liberal government who would like to see legislation that would foster and encourage the industries of this country? I still have some faith in the Minister of Finance. I remember reading some time ago a speech of his, which was quoted in the Toronto 'Globe,' delivered at a banquet in Halifax on December 12th, 1902:

> Mr. Fielding referring to the tariff said: If there is an inequality which needs to be remedied we are prepared to consider it and remedy it. If there is a new condition created by the establishment of some new industry, if there are conditions abroad which are interfering with our trade, in short, if anything has happened, we do not propose to shut our eyes to established facts. But we do say that where the country has prospered under this tariff there is no reason for getting up excitement for the purpose of having us return to high duties.

Now, Sir, let me state my reasons for calling attention to this question. The woollen industry in this country is not prospering, the woollen industry in this country is going down, mills are being closed throughout the Dominion of Canada, and I say it is high time the government of this country should intervene and do something to assist that industry. Let us look for a moment at the position of the woollen industry in this country as compared with the woollen industry in the United States of America. We in this country have a protective tariff of 23½ per cent: in the United States they have a protective tariff of from 60 per cent to 150 per cent. We know that during the Cleveland administration in the United States of America the woollen industry was depressed, that woollen mills closed all through the United States of America, and it was not until the tariff was increased that that industry revived in the United States. Now we stand in this position in Canada that we have to pay increased wages—when I say increased wages, I mean larger wages—to our Canadian employees than are paid in foreign mills. What are the conditions? Taking the same number of employees, our wages would be $101,730, as against an English mill paying $73,950, and as against a German mill paying $52,590. I believe that the workingmen of this country should be protected, that they should be in a position where they can earn just as good wages as they can earn in the United States of America. The proper way to protect them is to give to the manufacturers of this country a proper protective tariff so that they can give to their working men the same wages as are given in the United States of America. Now, Sir, I referred yesterday to the campaign sheets that have been circulated all through the western country with the frank of the Minister of the Interior. I have another one of them here, and it says :

Never were manufacturers so busy.

When I call the attention of the House to this fact, that the woollen industry of this country is depressed that the woollen mills of this country are being closed down, I am told by the Minister of Finance that this is not true, that he holds in his possession a letter to the effect that these mills are not closing down. I ask the Minister of Finance to put that letter on the table. Let us see that letter—because I am informed there is no such letter, that the only letter which has been sent out to the trade in this country is a letttr simply to the effect that they are still taking orders.

That all orders accepted by us will as heretofore be filled on the terms and at the date agreed upon without fail.

Now, Sir, I referred yesterday to the different statements made by the ministers of this government. We have the Minister of the Interior going into the west advocating a low tariff, we have the Minister of Marine and Fisheries going into the manufacturing centres and advocating a higher tariff. We have had an accession to the cabinet lately, we have had the Hon. Charles S. Hyman, of London. I hope that that hon. gentlemen will stand up for the policy of Canada for the Canadians. I wish to quote some language of his as reported in the Toronto 'Globe,' and I want to know what it means, if it does not mean more protection. I am free to admit that I don't care where the protection comes from, whether it comes from the Liberals or whether it comes from Conservatives. What I do want to see is the workingmen of this country protected. I do not want to see what has occurred in my town last year, numbers of these men who had gathered together a little money, who had comfortable homes, and they have been put out of employment and compelled to leave the town because of the closing of the woollen mill. They were trained specially as operatives of a woollen mill, and they not only had to leave the town, but they had to go to the United States of America. I want to see these people kept in our own country, and we can keep them here if we adopt a proper policy in this country. Now let us see what the hon. member for London (Hon. Mr. Hyman) said :

The Grand Trunk Pacific, in giving cheap transportation in the west, would go a long way towards making a protective tariff popular. Mr. Hyman observed that it had been charged that the Liberal party were inconsistent as regards their fiscal policy ; but he thought they should not be held to account for statements of individual members made at an earlier stage in the country's development.

Who are those individual members ? Is it the hon. the Minister of the Interior, who states that if the woollen mills cannot live they had better close down ? Is it the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries ? Is it the Minister of Trade and Commerce ? Who are these individual members that we are to pay no attention to ? The hon. member for London was them in the great manufacturing centre of the Dominion of Canada, in the metropolis of Canada, in the city of Montreal, and he no doubt felt that it would be pleasant for those people to give them the idea that the Liberal party would stand for protection, and that with the Grand Trunk Pacific scheme as a certainty, protection would be more popular in this country. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have raised this question because I want to know from the Minister of Finance where he got this letter, I want to know if in that letter there is any direct statement—because he makes it as direct as it can be made—

I have a circular from that woollen company stating that they are not closed.

Where is that language ? Where is the statement from this woollen company that they were not closed. I would like the hon. gentleman to produce that letter because I am informed by those in whom I have every confidence that no such letter was ever issued by any of the woollen manufacturers in this country. I would just say to the hon. Minister of Finance that it is rather hard that we should have sent abroad during the last six or seven years, owing to this preferential tariff, nearly $60,000,000 to pay for imported woollen goods, some of them, no doubt, manufactured in Great Britain, but a very large percentage of them manufactured in Germany, these goods getting the advantage of the preferential tariff by reason of passing through England and having a slight amount of work done upon them there. We all know that during the year 1902 there was imported into this country in woollen and cotton goods something over $20,000,000 worth. Our cotton industries are being badly hit to-day owing to this preferential tariff. I am not now going to deal with that question. There will be a day later on during the budget debate, when we will be able to discuss it, but I bring this matter up now before the budget debate comes down to make it clear to the hon. Minister of Finance that the manufacturers of this country, especially the cotton and woollen manufacturers, are suffering owing to the preferential tariff which is in force, and that when he gets up to deliver his budget speech he will not say as he said in former years that the trouble with the manufacturers is that they are too busy to fill their orders. He has notice now that they are not so busy, that a portion of the Valleyfield mills are closed down and that the mills at Cornwall are likely to be running on short time owing to the importation of cotton goods. I hope that he will take this matter into his consideration and that when he comes down with his budget he will give some assistance to these industries. There is no reason why they should be wiped out. I am not asking for assistance for the manufacturers of this country; I am asking for assistance for the operatives, for the men who want to live in Canada, who want to earn wages in Canada, and who, if these mills are closed down, will pack up their traps and move to the eastern states to get employment in the cotton mills there. Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the House.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). Mr. Speaker, if it were of any consequence to show it at the present time I have no doubt that any man might truthfully make the statement that 95 per cent of the manufacturing interests of Canada are flourishing and prospering to-day to a degree vastly in excess of their greatest prosperity in the days of the National Policy. But I do not think any good purpose can be served by my entering into a discussion of this question at the present time. Our system of government and our forms of parliamentary procedure admit of many ways of bringing up questions in reference to the tariff, but I think I am correct in stating that this is the first occasion during the years that I have occupied a seat in this parliament when a motion for the adjournment of the House was moved for the purpose of inviting a discussion on tariff questions. Therefore, I do not propose at this stage to follow my hon. friend (Mr. Pringle) in any discussion of the condition of the manufacturing interests generally or of the particular interest to which he has referred. He has, however, referred to an incident which occurred yesterday and has called upon me to make a statement. I admit that upon the question of fact he has a right to ask for information and I will be glad to gratify my hon. friend to as full a degree as possible. I understood his statement to refer to a recent announcement in the public press that the Canadian Woollen Mills Limited, had closed their business. Whether I was right in so understanding my hon. friend or not is probably a matter for debate, but I see in looking at 'Hansard' to which he has referred that he was speaking of the woollen industries generally and if he did not have that particular corporation in his mind I was mistaken. The observations which I made as well as what followed clearly show that I had reference to that particular corporation. Understanding that my hon. friend's reference was to the recent announcement of the closing or intended closing of the Canadian Woollen Mills, Limited, I inserted in the debate these words :

> Will my hon. friend permit me to say that I have a circular from the woollen company stating that they are not closed and are inviting orders ?

I stated that as the substance of the circular which I had received, which I had seen and which, if necessary, I can see again.

Mr. PRINGLE. The hon. gentleman speaks of a circular. Will he put it on the table ?

Mr. FIELDING. I will be delighted to place a copy of it on the table. I have not a copy of the document in my pocket at this moment. If my hon. friend had given notice that he intended to ask for it I would have produced it. He, no doubt, a few moments before I entered the House said that he intended to raise the question. But my hon. friend admits the document to have been sent out because he asks : Where are the words in the circular stating that they are not closing ? I do not remember those words, but the essence of that circular is that they were inviting orders and if they were closing their mills how could they invite orders ? I say that the company has issued a circular referring to the recent reports, to prevent misunderstanding, stating that they desire to notify their customers that they are still doing business and that they are inviting orders. That is the substance of the circular sent to their customers a copy of which passed under my hand. I think I can obtain the copy again. It has already been published in the newspapers within the last day or two if I am not mistaken. I think I saw a copy of it in one of the Toronto papers. At all events, I gave the statement, not on the authority of a private letter, but on the authority of a circular issued by the company stating that they were still doing business and inviting orders. What effect that may have upon the general question of the woollen trade or the tariff generally I do not propose to discuss to-day. But, I have stated the substance of the circular which is a public letter. I think I can give the hon. gentleman the document itself.

Mr. W. R. BROCK (Centre Toronto). Mr. Speaker, as being directly interested in this matter that is now before the House perhaps I may be permitted to say a few words in explanation. The Canadian Woollen Mills Company have four mills. Two of these mills were closed six months ago and have remained closed ever since because they had no orders. We endeavoured to get some of the operatives of those mills to come to our western mills. We did not succeed in getting one of them. We could not, under the present tariff, pay sufficient wages and the great bulk of them are now living in the United States. We have one large mill at Waterloo and one at Hespeler. These mills are still running but we are preparing to close them. We issued the circular that is spoken of, but we did not say in this circular that these mills were closed. We did not say they were going to continue open. We stated that we were prepared to fill such orders as the authorities at the mill would receive. We took care not to accept any orders that would bind us beyond the 12th of May when these mills are to be sold, but in the meantime we thought we would do what the government declines to do—we would endeavour to protect our operatives even at a loss to ourselves until the change was made believing that the change would be made more to our advantage by having these mills maintained as going concerns. If we chose to accept orders these orders would be transferred to any company buying out our mills and they would certainly be more valuable with orders than without orders.

The idea I got from the remarks of the Finance Minister was, that he endeavoured to make some little capital for his side, by stating that these mills were going; that they were not depressed; that they were not without orders. Now, Sir, I can say positively, and I think it is well that it should be known, that we have run that concern for four years at a loss of $50,000 per year; that that loss commenced when the preference commenced and gradually increased as the preference increased; that as the preference increased our orders from this country became smaller, and those of us who are engaged as merchants in this country sent larger orders to Yorkshire, because we found that the mills in this country were not able to compete under existing circumstances and under the existing tariff with the great mills of Yorkshire and Germany. That is all I require to say at present. As the Minister of Finance has said, I hope that he will have another opportunity of discussing this matter.

Mr. PRINGLE. Before the motion is put Mr. Speaker, I just wish to say, that I am very glad that the Finance Minister has admitted that the circular which he received did not contain the language which he quoted yesterday.

Mr. FIELDING. I did not profess to quote any words; I gave the substance.

Mr. PRINGLE. The Minister of Finance said:

> Will my hon. friend permit me to say, that I have a circular from that woollen company, stating that they are not closed.

Mr. HYMAN. Is that from revised or unrevised 'Hansard'?

Mr. PRINGLE. I am very glad that the Minister of Finance has corrected that, because for the short time I have been in the House, I have endeavoured never to make a statement that I did not think was absolutely correct, and when I made the statement yesterday, that the woollen mills of this country were closing, and that certain of them were closed, I knew exactly what I was talking about, and I knew that that statement was absolutely correct. I was surprised when the Minister of Finance interrupted me, and said, that he had a circular which stated in express language that they were not closed. Now, he has not that circular; he never had that circular, and he cannot produce that circular, because no such circular as that is in existence. The Minister of Finance should not have interrupted me, and he should not have attempted to have it go broadcast throughout the country that these mills had sent forth a circular in which they said they were not closed. I am very glad that this explanation has been made, and that my position has been verified.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would like to say to my hon. friend from London (Mr. Hyman) whose reference was apparently to myself, that when I spoke the other day of that difference between unrevised and revised 'Hansard,' I acted according to the best of my belief, and I was supported by a letter which I to-day read before the Orders of the Day were called.

Hon. C. S. HYMAN (London). I wish to say a word. As I understand it, the other day there was some question in regard to the propriety of quoting from unrevised 'Hansard.' But an hon. gentleman on the other side, now takes the liberty of quoting, not from unrevised 'Hansard' at all, but from a newspaper report. In substance that newspaper report is true. It is quite true that in the speech I made in Montreal, I did point out that the people of the west were great food producers, and that the people of the east had large manufacturing industries. I pointed out that there was a tariff in force at the present time which gave a large meed of protection to the manufacturer, and I pointed out, which I hold to be true, that the building of the Grand Trunk Pacific would to a very great extent lighten the burden of the people of the Northwest who are not manufacturers, while at the same time it would accord more protection to the manufacturers in eastern Canada, from the fact, that there would be cheaper freight rates, and greater celerity in the delivery of Canadian goods in the west. I might have gone further possibly, and said that our friends on the other side of the House are not altogether pleased that we should build that railroad; that they are rising technical objections which are practically of no very great moment, at all events every member on this side of the House feels that the fact which I have referred to, is one of the chief reasons why we are desirious of building that line of railway. To that extent the report in the newspaper is true.

Mr. FIELDING. If the House will permit me; I wish to say that I have found in the public press, the circular to which I have referred. Whether or not it bears out the remarks which I made, it will be for the House to judge. There is nothing private about it; it is already in the press. In 'Le Canada' of the 15th instant, there is published a copy of the document to which I referred, and which says:

To avoid misunderstanding we take this means of informing you, that our company are still taking orders, and all orders accepted by us will be as heretofore filled on the terms and at the date agreed upon without fail. Any repeats——

They not only want present orders, but they want future orders.

Any repeats of present order, should be with us as soon as possible.

Yours truly,
CANADIAN WOOLLEN MILLS, LTD., Per GEORGE DAVIDSON,
Secretary.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BROCK. Mr. Speaker; much ado about nothing.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh!

Mr. BROCK. Under a cloud of noise you cannot get rid of a fact. That the woollen mill merely solicited orders to keep its employees engaged, and to keep them together—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh!

Mr. BROCK. Wait a moment. We merely agreed to take such orders as we accepted, and we only accepted such orders as would keep our employees together, and would work up the material that we at that time had on hand. I contend that the meaning that the Finance Minister is endeavouring to take out of this circular must be apparent to every honest man on the other side. He merely wants to make a little political capital out of it. It is not a fact that we intend to be a going concern, because we have advertised the sale of all our property, and will sell if we get a fair bid for it.

Mr. W. F. McCREARY (Selkirk). Before this debate closes, I wish to get some information which I might possibly use in a further discussion of this question. When these gentlemen opposite say that the woollen mills of Canada are closed, I think it would be well that it should be stated what woollen mills are closed, and what class of goods they manufacture. I have been placed in possession of information within the last few days, to the effect that only one class of goods is seriously affected by the present preferential tariff, and that is the cheap class of tweeds that go to the ready made clothing shops. I am informed that mills making knitted goods, blankets and fine worsteds are running to-day and running full time. I am informed that such goods as sweaters, knitted goods, stockings, mitts, and others, are not only produced in Canada with profit, but that they are actually exported to England and are able to compete on the market there. I can give my authority for that. I believe that from the St. Hyacinthe woollen mills they are now sending goods such as sweaters, &c., to England and competing there. As a matter of fact the mere closing temporarily of a few woollen mills does not prove, that all the woollen mills of Canada are at a stand still. I think I can recollect that a few years ago when under the Conservative tariff, the Rosamond Woollen Mills Company of Almonte, upon several occasions shut down their mills during short periods. Am I not right? That did not indicate by any means that the whole woollen mill industry of Canada had gone to pieces. There may be certain woollen mills in certain particular lines of goods that may require some assistance, and it may be the duty of the government at some time to make inquiry, as to what the nature of protecting these industries should be, but I submit at the same time that the commission to inquire into that, should inquire from the employees themselves and not take the exclusive statements of the men who own these mills. These hon. gentlemen take the statement of the men who own the mill. I know a mill, not more than a hundred miles from here, which has been running for forty years, and has practically paid for itself ten times over. Some of the machinery that was in the mill thirty years ago is still there doing business. If it were a modern mill, that machinery would be on the junk heap. I would ask these hon. gentlemen to supply themselves with more detailed and reliable information before they make the statement that the woollen mill business has gone to pieces.

Mr. PRINGLE. Mr. Speaker——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would remind the hon. member for Cornwall that he has already spoken twice. It seems to me that it would be much more conducive to the proper order of this House if on a matter in the nature of personal explanation the hon. gentleman would content himself with having spoken twice.

Mr. PRINGLE. Mr. Speaker, if you will allow me——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. PRINGLE. Just a moment.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. PRINGLE. The indulgence of this House was granted to the hon. Minister of Finance to make an explanation. I accept your ruling at once, and will not ask for the same indulgence that was granted to him. I would ask one of my friends to read the advertisement of these mills that are for sale.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The hon member for Cornwall had a right to speak twice without any favour from the chair, and the hon. Minister of Finance had a right to speak once, but was given the indulgence of the House to speak again. I think the same indulgence should be extended to the hon. member for Cornwall.

Mr. RICHARD BLAIN (Peel). Mr. Speaker, as soon as you are able to keep the other side of the House in order, I will read this statement from the Toronto 'Globe':

> Woollen mills for sale. The Canada Woollen Mills, Limited, having in contemplation the sale of some or all of their property and supplies, invite sealed tenders (to be opened by the board of directors on the 12th day of May next) for the purchase of the same, either en bloc or separately. Terms cash, &c.
>
> The following are the properties:—
>
> 1. Woollen mill at Hespeler, in the county of Waterloo. 2. Woollen mill at Waterloo, in the county of Waterloo. 3. Woollen mill at Carleton Place, in the county of Lanark. 4. Woollen mill at Carleton Place.
>
> (Sgd.) GEO. DAVIDSON,
> Secretary-treasurer,
> 110 Wellington St., West, Toronto.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that will prove conclusively that what the hon. member for Cornwall stated was correct, that the woollen mills of this country are not in a prosperous condition.

Mr. COWAN. Is that a good time to sell?

Mr. BLAIN. The question is not, Mr. Speaker, whether it is a good time to sell.

Mr. COWAN. A political advertisement, I should say.

Mr. BLAIN. I might invite the attention of the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Cowan) to the fact that the Conservative party during the last four sessions have warned the government that this condition of things would come to pass in this country if a change in the tariff was not made. The hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House paid no attention to these warnings. They claimed that the woollen industry and other industries in this country were in a prosperous condition, and that the tariff which was introduced in 1897 was everything that this country required. They have paid no attention until the condition of the woollen industry has become such as to compel these gentlemen to offer for sale on the 1st of May $1,000,000 worth of mill property in the different parts of Canada. In the county which I have the honour to represent there is a woollen mill which, in the eary days, employed 125 hands. That mill has gone down and down—in fact, it has been closed up, under the preferential tariff which was introduced by this government; and, although it is operating now, it is not in a very prosperous condition. I have nothing further to say on the question, for I recognize that this is not the time for a discussion on the woollen industry of this country.

Mr. M. K. COWAN. (South Essex). Mr. Speaker, I do not rise for the purpose of discussing the woollen industry of Canada. I presume that individual instances can be given of manufacturing concerns which are more prosperous in the hands of some men than in the hands of other men. If the woollen industry of Canada is dead, or almost dead, I cannot see how business men can expect to get a fair price for these mills which are advertised for sale. In the constituency which I have the honour to represent is the Kingsville Woollen Mill. In the elections of 1896 the proprietor of it stated that if the Liberal party were returned to power that mill would be killed. The Kingsville Woollen Mill closed down before there was any change in the tariff, and went into bankruptcy, and the excuse which the proprietor gave was that he could not stand the uncertainty of the tariff—he did not know whether the government were going to reduce it or not. After the present tariff came in that mill was turning out twice the number of goods that it did before, and it has been running constantly ever since.

Mr. DAVID HENDERSON (Halton). I wish to point out, Mr. Speaker, that the woollen manufacturer in the riding of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat did express a fear that in the event of the Liberal party coming to power his business would be ruined, because as we all know the policy which these hon. gentlemen propounded throughout the country was a policy of free trade as it is in England; and if these hon. gentlemen had carried out their policy, there is no doubt that not only the woollen industry, but many other industries in this country would have been closed up. What right had that woollen manufacturer in the county of Essex to suppose that these gentlemen were not equal to their word; he did not know their character. He thought they were men who had respect for their word of honour. It appears that on account of the position they have taken since they came into power a certain amount of liberty has been given to these manufacturers to carry on their business. There is no doubt that certain lines of woollen goods, such as knitted goods, are manufactured in this country possibly at a profitable rate. While these people are not complaining, certain sections of the woollen industry are complaining. I do not rise, however, specially to refer to this question, but to call attention to a statement made by the hon. member for London (Mr. Hyman), which, I think, should not be allowed to go unchallenged, because that hon. gentleman being now a member of the government, his statement going abroad would no doubt have considerable weight attached to it in the country. The hon. gentleman said that in the event of the Grand Trunk Pacific being constructed, it would result in a reduction of rates to the people of the western country. That is a statement which ought not to go the country without being challenged. Where is the evidence of its accuracy? How is the hon. gentleman going to bring the products of the west to the east at a lower rate by an all-rail route through the northern country than they are brought at present over a route partly rail and partly water? If that hon. gentleman had believed for one moment that there was anything in that contention, I have no doubt he would have risen and defended the resolution before the House, but so far he has felt ashamed to do so. Only two cabinet ministers so far have risked their reputation in this House at this time in defending the scheme before it and supporting the construction of the road to which the hon. gentleman refers.

Mr. W. B. NORTHRUP (East Hastings). I rise with deluctance and simply to call attention to the fact that in a cloud of words, the real question before the House is lost sight of. As I understand the hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Pringle), he rose to a personal explanation, and that personal explanation he felt bound to make because of a certain statement which he made to the House last evening and the reply it drew forth from the hon. Minister of Finance. I venture to say that the point made by my hon. friend from Cornwall has not yet been met either by the hon. the Minister of Finance or any other member of this House. My hon. friend from Cornwall said:

> We have the Liberal party advocating a lowering of the tariff, with the result that some of our largest manufacturing industries have had to close their doors.

In answering what he understood to be a specific charge affecting a particular concern, the Minister of Finance said:

> Will my hon. friend permit me to say that I have a circular from that woollen company stating that they are not closed and inviting orders?

It is but fair to say that the hon. the Minister of Finance admits having misunderstood my hon. friend from Cornwall. The Minister of Finance said that he referred to one specific company, and in speaking of that company, he pointed out that it had not closed its doors but was inviting orders, but to-day we have a member of this House, speaking from his own knowledge, explaining the circular which fell into the hands of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. It is only fair to the Minister of Finance to admit that a cursory reading of the circular would justify the conclusion he came to, and I do not see that any blame can attach to him for the interruption he made last night. But on the other hand, when, in the light of the statement made to-day by the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Brock), we find that the facts are that the property is offered for sale on the 12th of May, and that the company are not inviting orders for any other purpose than to keep the concern going until the 12th of May, and that is all the contract meant, it would be only proper that the hon. Minister of Finance should now frankly admit that, in view of the explanation given, it is quite evident that, instead of this particular industry being in a flourishing condition, it is almost in a state of insolvency and is not soliciting orders, except for a limited time, and its mills are being offered for sale at an early date. One other point came from the new member of the ministry, my hon. friend from London (Mr. Hyman), and the House owes that hon. gentleman a debt of gratitude for the information he gave us. He admits that the government desires to give greater protection to the industries of the country, thus implying that these industries are not given sufficient protection. We have therefore the hon. gentleman stating, with the approval of his colleagues, in the presence of his leader, that our manufacturing industries require more protection, and the additional protection which the government proposes to give them, he tells us, is to be given by the building of the Grand Trunk Pacific. If that is not giving a stone in return for the asking of bread, I would like to know what is. It would be difficult to get a better illustration.

Mr. FRANK OLIVER (Alberta). As a very considerable number of different subjects have been introduced into this motion to adjourn and a number of very specific statements made, it will be quite in order I presume to meet those statements and not allow them to pass unchallenged. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson), asked what effect the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific could possibly have in reducing the rates between eastern and western Canada. I am very much surprised that a gentleman of his standing and experience should have put such a question, because the answer must be as evident to him as it is to every other member of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. This is hardly the question before the House at present.

Mr. OLIVER. My object was to answer a question put by the hon. member for Halton, and if I am not within the rules of the House, I shall stand corrected.

Mr. SPEAKER. My only reason for applying the rule is that, if this discussion continues, we will be discussing, on a motion to adjourn, a matter which is the very next Order of the Day.

Mr. OLIVER. I accept your ruling, Mr. Speaker, as an answer to the hon. gentleman. He has made a challenge which the rules of the House will not permit me to answer. The hon. gentleman for Halton (Mr. Henderson) also made the very definite statement that the reason why the woollen industry had not altogether gone to pieces in Canada is because the duties were not reduced by this Liberal government as the Liberal opposition had promised. As a matter of fact, I understand that the duties on woollens under the late government ran from 25 to 35 per cent, and that the competition of which our woollen manufacturers complain is the competition of Great Britain, inasmuch as the British product is imported now into Canada at one-third less duty than was levied before 1896. Instead of our imported woollens to-day paying duties from 25 to 35 per cent, they pay duties from 16⅔ to 23⅓ per cent, being a reduction of one-third in the duties paid on the general classes of woollen goods. The people of this country have received the benefit of that reduction.

Mr. PRINGLE. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman—

Mr. OLIVER. I must ask, you, Mr. Speaker, to rule this time in my favour.

Mr. PRINGLE. I would like to ask—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is not bound to allow another hon. gentleman to put a question.

Mr. OLIVER. I wish to conclude my remarks and then my hon. friend can reply. I say that there has been a substantial reduction in the duties on woollen goods, the benefit of which has been felt by all classes of the consuming public. I further state that this reduction has been of great material advantage to ninety-nine one hundredths of the people of Canada, and I for one desire to strongly support and insist upon a policy which has resulted in such benefit to our consuming public. I would like further to point out that the general tariff policy of the government, while effecting a saving to the consuming public, has resulted in the prosperity of certain branches of the woollen industry to a degree that they did not experience before, and is consequently a policy which is entitled to the support, not only of the consumers, but of the manufacturers, provided the latter are up to date in their methods and system.

There is no particular reason that I know of, from the standpoint of either the consumer or the modern manufacturer, why antiquated methods and antiquated machinery should be kept profitable by a twist of the tariff screw every time the owner sees fit to make the demand. We have seen, in this country of Canada, certain lines of manufacture pass out of existence by reason of the development and improvement in methods and systems of production; and there is no reason why antiquated systems of manufacture, in regard to woollens or any classes of manufacture in which we are not in a position to compete, should be bolstered up at the expense of the people. Let me say to the manufacturers of woollens, and other manufacturers that under this tariff they have enjoyed an era of prosperity, as shown by the returns and other evidence that can be brought forward, such as they never enjoyed before. And the reason was not because the tariff is as it was before; the reason is that the tariff is not as it was before, but permitted the general people of the country to have their fair share of the proceeds of their labour, the work that they had performed. Such an era of prosperity was not possible under the restrictive tariff that prevailed before. It is the general prosperity of the country that is reflected in the conditions of the manufacturer. Because the country is prosperous, the manufacturer is prosperous. And let me point out to the manufacturers that, for some fifteen years, they laboured under a policy based upon the principle that if they were given their way they would be prosperous and everybody else would share in their prosperity. But the fifteen years' experience showed that when the rest of the country was not prosperous, then, no matter how tightly the tariff screw was turned, the manufacturer was not prosperous either. And, when the year 1896 came, the manufacturers of Canada were running on shorter time and turning out less output than they have ever done during the past four or five years, since the preferential tariff was brought to its present point. The tariff under which our country has been prosperous, which permits our consumers to buy the great necessaries of life such as woollen goods at one-third less duty than they paid before, is a tariff that is entitled to the support of the people of this country. And, if certain classes of woollen manufacturers cannot make all the profits under that tariff that they could wish, my suggestion to them would be to put themselves in line with their brother woollen manufacturers who are able to do so.

Mr. HANCE J. LOGAN (Cumberland). I do not think that the manufacturers of woollens in Canada will feel thankful that our friends of the opposition have become their special guardians at the present time. The budget will probably be brought down in a few weeks, and I would like to ask you, Sir, and ask the friends of the woollen manufacturer, if it would not have been better, instead of precipitating this debate, to leave the case of the woollen industry in the hands of the government, particularly in the hands of the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding). I do not think that the woollen manufacturers will appreciate the attempts of the opposition to show that they are the special guardians and friends of the woollen industry of this country. It has been said here to-day by the hon. gentlemen who have spoken that the woollen industry has languished during the last five or six years. I happen to represent a constituency in which there are three woollen manufactories and I deny that these have languished during the last five or six years; certainly if they have languished they have shown no evidence of it. In the town of Oxford, the old, well known Oxford Woollen Mill has not only been running full time, but the proprietors have just completed their new building, one of the largest buildings devoted to woollen manufacturing in eastern Canada, into which they have moved their old machinery, besides acquiring a large quantity of new. In the town of Amherst, a year ago last September, the first sod was turned for the construction of a woollen mill. To-day, that manufactory employs about one hundred hands in the production of woollen cloths. And I see by the newspapers that, to the town of Spring Hill, it is proposed to move the factory, now well established at Southampton and to enlarge the same. I am not here to-day to say that the woollen industry may not be up against too keen competition from Great Britain at the present time. What we want in this country is to impress upon the people that our true policy is, Canada for Canadians; and, to carry out that policy we must endeavour to use goods made in Canada. I have not the slightest doubt that nine-tenths of the members who have spoken here to-day, are wearing English or Scotch tweeds on their backs, while crying out 'Canada for Canadians.' That is not a thing that should be encouraged. I do not encourage it myself. The first principle we should adopt is to direct our individual purchases so as to encourage home industry. 'Made in Canada,' should be the watchword of the people of Canada, so far as it can possibly be carried out. If the competition from Great Britain at present is too keen—and I fear it is—I am willing to leave the woollen industry of Canada and its future welfare in the hands of the present government. I believe they will do what is right and fair. But I desire, Mr. Speaker, to call your attention to one fact which seems to me very strange. These hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House are great Chamberlainites. They are always shouting in favour of Mr. Chamberlain. Yet, the very first principle enunciated by Mr. Chamberlain is that this country should lower its tariff on goods which are peculiarly British. And, Sir, if there is one class of goods imported into this country that is peculiarly British, that class of goods is woollens. The manufacture of woollens is one of the oldest of English industries. Why do not these hon. gentlemen tell the truth? They know as well as you know, Sir, that if to-morrow, Mr. Chamberlain were returned to power and he should ask the people of Canada to lower the duty on woollens which are manufactured in England, these hon. gentlemen opposite would cry their hearts out before they would allow such a lowering to take place.

Mr. T. I. THOMSON (North Grey). If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Logan) will allow me, I would like to ask him a question. Is he opposed to Mr. Chamberlain's policy?

Mr. LOGAN. I am opposed to lowering the duties upon British goods coming into Canada, if that lowering will sacrifice Canadian industries. As to my view of Mr. Chamberlain's policy, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. T. I. Thomson) will tell me what Mr. Chamberlain's policy is, I will answer his question.

Mr. T. I. THOMSON. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Logan) has just charged us with being opposed to Mr. Chamberlain's policy. If he knows that policy so well, why does he not answer my question?

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. Speaker, I am exposing the inconsistency of these hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. member for North Grey (Mr. T. I. Thompson) asks me if I am in favour of Mr. Chamberlain's policy. I am in favour of trying to bind together the interests of the British empire. But if Mr. Chamberlain's policy means the destruction of Canadian industries for the benefit of British industries I am opposed to that policy.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). I wish to refer to just one feature of the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Logan's) argument. As representing the woollen industry, he is quite willing that that industry should be left in the hands of the Finance Minister. We find, however, that the Finance Minister gave the House very imperfect information, and practically admitted that he did not know the condition of the woollen industry. The circular to which the hon. Finance Minister referred he presented as an evidence that the woollen industry was doing well and did not require attention at the hands of the government. Does the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) object to this House presenting such data to the Finance Minister as will enable him to intelligently determine what the woollen industry requires? If that is the case, is he going to object to the man who owns the mills presenting evidence in the House? If he objects to that, he is very unfair to the woollen industry, he is very unfair to this House as well, and unfair to the Finance Minister. The hon. gentleman made another statement, he said he was opposed to lowering the duty on British goods coming into Canada. Yet he has sat there for four years and has supported a reduction of one-third of the duties on these goods. This is the only instance, so far as my knowledge goes, of any protest on his part. He has a strange way of showing his objection to the preference.

Motion to adjourn (Mr. Pringle) negatived.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.
