Mr. URIAH WILSON (Lennox). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the government when I may expect the return moved for with reference to the dismissal of the postmaster at Wilton in the riding of Lennox; also the three returns with reference to immigration. I think it is more than a month since these orders passed the House and we ought to have them down.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). I will call the attention of the Minister of the Interior and of the Postmaster General to the hon. gentleman's question. I hope he will have these papers soon.

RAILWAY CONNECTION AT BROCKVILLE.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR (Leeds). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals and of the Postmaster General to a state of affairs which I think ought to be remedied. I regret these hon. gentlemen are not in their places to-day, but I presume the right hon. the Prime Minister will bring the matter to their attention. Coming down from the west by the Grand Trunk limited yesterday on our way to Ottawa there were some twenty Senators and members of parliament on board. That train was 20 minutes late, and the conductor telegraphed to Brockville that he had eighteen passengers on board for Ottawa, and that he would be at Brockville at 2.50. The time of the Canadian Pacific Railway to leave Brockville is 2.40. He made 30 miles from our station Gananoque to Brockville in 30 minutes, and arrived at Brockville at 2.50. Just as we were coming in we saw the smoke of the Canadian Pacific Railway train leaving Brockville, we were five minutes too late to make the connection. I have come down four times during the present session at midday, and on three different occasions we arrived too late, and I had to go round by Cornwall, as we had to do yesterday. I think the Minister of Railways and Canals should compel those two railway companies to change their time tables so that there would be connections at Brockville. The limited on the Grand Trunk is due at 2.40 p.m. at Brockville, and the Canadian Pacific Railway is timed to leave there at 2.40. So if the train on the Grand Trunk is ten minutes late the passengers are left behind, some have to remain in Brockville, or to reach their destination by some other train. The Postmaster General should see to it that the mails that are gathered between Toronto and Brockville reach Ottawa on schedule time. The mail train gathers mail all the way from Toronto to Brockville, and it is thrown off there and has to remain until next morning and is only delivered here at 9.30 the next morning. We who live on the line of the Grand Trunk west of Brockville only get one mail every 24 hours that comes in during the night. I do not think that the Postmaster General should permit that state of affairs to exist. Last season the Grand Trunk Railway had its mail train arrive at Brockville 10 or 15 minutes before the Ottawa train left. They have changed their time-table and made the mail train arrive later, though intending to make connection at Brockville, one arriving by the Grand Trunk at the same time that the other leaves Brockville. So if the Grand Trunk is ten minutes late, as it was yesterday, the passengers are left. I believe the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Harty) was one of the gentlemen who were instrumental in telegraphing to the Brockville station yesterday to hold the train, that there were eighteen passengers on board; it was either at his request or at the request of Sir Mackenzie Bowell that the conductor did telegraph. That is the way we are treated in reference to our mails. We can get here by Cornwall two or three hours later than if we had made connection at Brockville. I think the Minister of Railways and Canals should say to the Grand Trunk authorities: You must carry your mails and your passengers to Brockville in time to connect with the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Canadian Pacific Railway has not changed their time-table since last year, but the Grand Trunk has changed theirs and put the mail train late, and our mails are left over at Brockville for twelve or eighteen hours, and only get here either by Brockville or Montreal the next day at noon. So we only get one mail a day. I think between these two ministers they should be able to bring about a better state of affairs.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, 'That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, for the House to go into committee to consider a certain resolution concerning the ratification of the agreement between His Majesty the King and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, dated the 8th day of March, 1904'; and the proposed motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

Mr. A. E. KEMP (East Toronto). Mr. Speaker, after listening to the animated debate which has just closed, it is very difficult for one to get their thoughts down to such a dry subject as the Grand Trunk Pacific concessions judging from the interest which members of the government take in the discussion. I may say that I do not propose to discuss the contract, as it came before the House last year, in all its bearings, I only propose to discuss it as it is affected by the supplemental agreement which is now before us. It seems to me very remarkable that in such an important debate as this we have only seen one minister defending the course of the government in making the concessions which we are now asked to sanction; that minister was the Minister of the Interior. It seems to me we should have heard from at least two or three other ministers. But the government have chosen rather to put up private members who sit behind them in the back benches to defend these concessions, which we claim are not in the interest of Canada. I hope before the debate is over that other ministers will get up and explain their position. It seems to me that the course of the government since we met here last session is open to criticism. I propose to deal with this question from that standpoint for a little while. We know that after this contract was passed last year it was the expectation of the government that the contract would go into effect and that the Grand Trunk Railway would carry out their part of it. The Minister of the Interior, in discussing this question a few days ago, found fault with the position taken by the leader of the opposition in regard to what the latter gentleman termed 'a conspiracy of silence.' It seemed to me that there was a good deal of ambiguity in the words which the Minister of the Interior used in regard to this matter. It seemed to those of us who were not on the inside and did not know what was going on in the government, that the government did intend going to the country. They had two courses before them, they had either to call off the negotiations or they had to make known to the people of this country that the Grand Trunk were going to carry out their bargain. We have not only the statement of the government of the 19th of December, but we have Mr. Hays' interview of the 24th of December. It seems to me that when we compare these two statements we can safely make up our minds that there was a conspiracy of silence. The government made their statement on the 19th of December. Mr. Hays returned to this country on the 24th of December, five days later. The hon. Minister of the Interior said:

We, like business men, waited until the return of Mr. Hays.

But, why did the government as business men give out the statement when they did? What was the necessity of giving out the statement that the new concessions which were asked by the Grand Trunk Railway Company were in regard to the deposit. Why could not they have waited five days longer? Then, we have the interview of Mr. Hays that took place on December 24th in which he does not refer to any changes. He does not say that the Grand Trunk are going to ask for any changes, and therefore, I say it seems to me rather peculiar that we have the government not saying that there are any changes to be asked for and the Grand Trunk Railway Company, through their manager, putting them in the same position. On the 16th January the government had changed their minds and decided to call the election off. But, the government knew when this first statement was made, they knew when the second statement was made, and they knew when Mr. Hays gave that interview, they knew previous to the time Mr. Hays went to the old country—that all these concessions were discussed by them; therefore, why should they have attempted to mislead the country in the way in which they did? The government and Mr. Hays pursued precisely the same line. The hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Lemieux) had told us that the elections were going to be on, that the right hon. Prime Minister was going to give this country a New Year's gift. The Liberal press throughout the country had taken up the words of the government, as stated on December 19th, and they had heralded throughout the length and breadth of this country that there were to be no changes made in this contract. It seems to me that the government were open to censure for the course they pursued. It seems like yesterday that we were here passing this Bill. We went to our homes. The government were preparing for the elections. The government had signed this contract with the Grand Trunk Railway Company. The contract was just as good to them as the cash. Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson's name was put to it and Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson's name was as good as his bond. They did not only have Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson's name, but they also had the names of Mr. Hays and of the directors of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and if we follow up the history of this matter we will find that the government have placed themselves in a very humiliating position. Then we have the illegal deposit and the juggling in connection with this deposit. Then, we have the idea placed before us now that the government have been forced into a partnership. They have been forced not only into a partnership, but it seems that the game which has been played with the government has been a very skilful one. It seems to me that the government, owing to political exigencies, have placed themselves absolutely in the hands of the Grand Trunk Railway and of Mr. Hays. No one doubts that the elections were coming on. The chief government organ the 'Globe' always gives out certain signs previous to every election. These signs have been exhibited upon the approach of elections in years gone by. What are these signs? One is that before the election comes about the Toronto 'Globe' sends for the cartoonist that it has employed in years gone by. The management of that organ give the cartoonist instructions in regard to what they want him to do. They wanted him to get away from his old ideas, to put aside his free trade cartoons, his extravagant expenditure cartoons, his blue ruin cartoons and his unrestricted reciprocity cartoons. Something new was required and they have invented something new in the shape of the 'Finger-posts of prosperity.' That was a sure sign that the election was coming on. These 'finger-posts of prosperity' appeared in almost every issue of the 'Globe' until the government decided to call parliament to meet to deal with these concessions. The cartoons published in the 'Globe' were considered to be so good that the Liberal press throughout the country copied them and they even found their way in a somewhat modified form into a certain section of the independent press of this country. The government had had new demands made upon them after they had prepared for the election. They had either to call off the election or call the bargain off. They were between two alternatives; they either had to go to the country or call parliament together to consider these concessions. I contend that the government did right in calling parliament together, but I contend they did wrong in accepting any of these concessions that are embodied in this legislation. The government had made a bargain with a corporation which they thought to be a good bargain. They expected that corporation to carry it out. When this government negotiates a treaty with the United States the Senate of the United States can throw it out. The government have placed themselves in the same position in regard to this contract that this or any other country places itself in when negotiating a treaty with the United States. The country was bound hard and fast but we find the Grand Trunk Railway Company were not bound. Ministers in this House who talked about safeguarding the rights of the country were told to swallow what they had said and make a right about turn. We know what the words of the Finance Minister were in regard to this proposition, how the Grand Trunk were in this contract, and of it, and the whole of it, and we know what else he said and what other members of the government said. There was a panic on December 19 in the government; there is no doubt about that and there must have been some tremendous sighs when the government first found out that the Grand Trunk Railway were not going to carry out their contract. That subsided on January 16th when this House was called. Then it was bargain day for the Grand Trunk Railway Company. They had the government in this unfortunate position and the government were entirely at their mercy. We heard then from London what these concessions were to be. The government seemed reluctant to put the absolute facts before the people of the country and confess to the humiliating position in which they found themselves. The hon. Minister of Finance, seems to have taken a decided stand in regard to these concessions. We find by a report in the Toronto 'Globe' of a speech which he made at Westmount, Montreal, February 10th, that he said:

> Referring to the Grand Trunk Pacific, Mr. Fielding said that he hoped that a satisfactory agreement would be reached with the Grand Trunk interests, and he let it be understood that even should the Grand Trunk Railway not wish to carry out their part of the undertaking, the railway would be built without their co-operation.

That seemed to be the idea of the Liberal press throughout the country. The general opinion seemed to be that if the Grand Trunk were going to take the position which they did we should renounce them and not submit to their dictation. The organ of the hon. Minister of Finance, the Halifax 'Chronicle,' as far back as December 16th, said that:

> There was no hitch in connection with the carrying out of the bargain—that the company is ready to carry out its contract. The government will see that it does so.

But, the Toronto 'Globe' seemed to have the strongest article in regard to what the views of the supporters of the government throughout the country were. On January 29th it said:

> The failure of the promoters of the Transcontinental Railway to fulfil the conditions of their agreement with parliament leaves the government free to consider the whole situation anew. There are two rival plans by which such a project could be carried out. It could be built by private enterprise with public aid, or it could be built wholly as a public enterprise. There is a strong feeling in the country that a cessation of granting bonuses to railways is about due, and that if government must concern themselves about railways it should be as builders of them, not as mere granters of subsidies.
> Public opinion is moving in that direction, and perhaps moving rapidly, but there are several circumstances in the history of Canada which justify the government in doubting whether it has yet reached the point which would warrant assuming the construction and management of a transcontinental railway as a government undertaking. The course that was ultimately adopted was a composite scheme, by which an effort was made to gain the advantage of the best features of the rival propositions. Public ownership would come in due time, while in the critical years of construction and the initial years of operation the enterprise would have the benefit of the skill, economy, and zeal which private self-interest may be depended upon to supply.

The bargain which the government made on this basis was an exceedingly favourable one from the public standpoint. Now there is a proposition to make it less favourable. Mr. Emmerson in his speech at Moncton said the concessions asked for were not material. If that turns out to be the case it will be well. On the other hand, should there be any disposition on the part of the promoters to exact the pound of flesh, we feel sure that the government will indicate that it is not irrevocably committed to any one course or even to a compromise between two courses. We feel sure that public opinion would not be complacent at any considerable changes in the bargain already made. It would be disposed rather to take the risks and disadvantages that are admittedly inherent in public construction and public ownership, along with the equally undoubted advantages.

It seems to me that that article reflected the feeling of the supporters of the government throughout the country; and the Halifax 'Chronicle,' the organ of the Minister of Finance, quoted this article in full on February 5th, and said:

> If the Grand Trunk Pacific have any idea they can hold up Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his colleagues, they had better get rid of it at once.

These are indications of the state of the public mind in regard to the position into which the government have been forced through the Grand Trunk not carrying out its contract. I do not wonder that the Minister of Finance should himself feel like this, when we take into consideration what he said on the floor of the House in regard to this matter. But what seems to be most remarkable of all, is the position taken by Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. The only signed document which we have in all this affair, is the contract which is made between the government and the president and directors of the Grand Trunk Railway Company last session, and in addition to that the letter of Sir Rivers-Wilson to the Prime Minister dated, London, December 15th. I will not stop to read that letter; it is a short letter; it is familiar to every one in this House. It contains no explanation as to why the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and his co-directors went back upon their bargain and their bond, and it seems to me that some explanation is due to the government for the extraordinary course which the Grand Trunk Railway Company took. I would suggest that the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company should have inserted in that letter to the Prime Minister, after paragraph 4, something to this effect, although of course, he need not have used the same language.

I have to offer an apology for what possibly may be considered a ridiculous position in which we as partners in this undertaking might find ourselves, owing to the action which I am now taking.

I am quite sensible of the fact that all the active members of my board signed the contract with your government, consisting of myself, president; Mr. Jos. Price, vice-president; Mr. Chas. M. Hays, 2nd vice-president; Mr. Frank W. Morse, 3rd vice-president; Lord Welby, director; Mr. Alfred W. Smithers, director (now vice-president in place of Mr. Price who resigned); Mr. John A. Clutton-Brock, director; Mr. John Bell, general counsel; Mr. Wm. Wainwright, general assistant and comptroller.

This of course I admit is a slight indication that we did approve of the contract, and presumably intended carrying the same into effect.

I recognize also that after a long and trying session, it was passed by the Canadian parliament, the time of which was taken up to so great an extent with 'unfair opposition' which the Bill encountered.

Yet I repeat that notwithstanding all this, I trust you will meet Mr. Hay's new representations 'with all your usual courtesy and indulgence.'

If you will allow me, I would like to make a suggestion; it is this. In view of the possibility of our motives being misconstrued, I desire to suggest that unless my letter is asked for, that you do not make it public, because, as you are aware, it is the only document, with the single exception of the contract, which has passed between us in the eighteen months of 'anxious negotiations' which have taken place.

It is doubtless as apparent to you as it is to myself, that it would have been better, even had the conditions contained in the contract which was signed, been of a personal and informal nature. I feel, however, that having signed the contract with my co-directors, after carefully weighing all the conditions, and not being able to see you personally, that some slight courtesy by way of an explanation, is due you for our action.

I may say at once that I recognize that both yourself and your government assumed that the bargain would be carried out in good faith; in fact I understand it was so represented by your ministers to parliament, where this measure met with such 'violent and unfair criticism,' and that moreover, it was your intention to call a general election, in order that you might submit, amongst other things, the contract, to the free and independent electors, by whose grace you hold office.

I feel that I am writing under more or less restraint, as you will doubtless imagine, realizing as I do that you might at first glance think, in view of what has taken place, that the position which I now take is an unreasonable one. Still I feel that the interests of the shareholders, being of such momentous importance, I am justified in making, on their behalf, some further demands, and asking for them further concessions from your government.

I am sure in view of what I have said, and in view of what Mr. Hays will tell you when he arrives, you will not hesitate to change your mind about the elections, but on the other hand, you will be willing to call parliament together to deal with this matter and approve of the concessions.

I recognize that distances in Canada are very great, yet all the members, I am informed, with the exception of the representative from the Yukon, live within easy distance from the railway; they are gentlemen, I believe, whose time is of only moderate value, judging from what I observed and the questions I was asked, when I had the pleasure of appearing before the Railway Committee last year.

In any case, if it is not the law of the country that these gentlemen have free transportation over the railways, I shall be glad to suggest to Mr. Hays that they should get a free pass to attend this session over the Grand Trunk on the slow trains.

I think, Sir, that as an apology was due from the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company to the government of Canada, some such language as that, might be incorporated in his letter to the Prime Minister.

Now, Sir, it seems to me that there is too much made of the idea, that it is difficult to get the Grand Trunk Railway Company or the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company to build this transcontinental line. As a matter of fact, is it not the case that the Grand Trunk were very anxious to build this line? Do not the statements made by the directors to their shareholders in London, prove that the Grand Trunk Company is eager to build this railway. Let me quote from their remarks.

Mr. Girdlestone said:

If you do reject it somebody else will undoubtedly get that line, and you will have been forced out of the territory, and for that reason alone I think the board are wise in putting before us the policy they do to-day.

Lord Welby said:

If you say 'No,' there is very little doubt that there are many others ready to avail themselves of the opportunity, and we have every reason to believe that the government of Canada has entirely decided that it will carry out this new line, and, if you refuse to do it, then other parties, without any doubt, are ready to come forward and take up the development which is offered, and the opportunity will pass away from you. (Hear, hear.)

Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson said:

Parliament meeting the day after to-morrow, the agreements will not be ratified, and those advantages, which we sincerely believe will likely accrue to our company, pass into other hands.

It would appear to me that from the moment the Grand Trunk Company discovered that the government were too hasty in regard to the construction of this line; from that moment it was impossible to make fair terms with them in the interests of the people of Canada. If this government had been a little more crafty, or a little more deliberate, and if such language as was used in the House last year by the Prime Minister, when he referred to us as drifting on to the shoals, when he told us that time would not wait; if such language had not been used by the Prime Minister and his ministers and supporters, we would have had a far better chance of making a fair bargain with the Grand Trunk Company. The president of the Grand Trunk Railway informed his shareholders that it had been the intention of the company at the outset to build the road from North Bay to Winnipeg. He said:

I may here remark that the Act, in virtue of which the government construct the road as far west as Winnipeg, relieves the Grand Trunk Pacific Company from the necessity originally contemplated of building that portion of the line from North Bay to Winnipeg.

I think it could be shown that if the government had not proceeded in the way they have done, we could have got the Grand Trunk Company, with the ordinary bonuses, to build that road from North Bay to Winnipeg, if we had decided that it was good policy to build it, and by that means we would have accomplished all that we can expect to accomplish by the tremendous expenditure we are making.

Now, I am of the opinion that we should welcome to Canada clever railway men. We know that the railway men on this continent are among the cleverest men there are. Mr. Hays is a credit to the railway which he manages, and we welcome him among us to assist us in developing this country. When I say that Mr. Hays entirely outwitted the government in connection with this matter, I am paying him a high compliment. I would like to know what experts the government called in for advice on such an important matter as the building of a transcontinental railway. Did they, with their inexperience in matters of this kind, feel able to cope with a man of the ability of Mr. Hays? He saw the trend of matters: he saw that the government were determined to extend a line from the North Bay Junction point to Quebec and Moncton, and he trimmed his sails accordingly. He led the country to believe that the Grand Trunk Company would be willing to build that railroad. But when it came to the question of who should pay for it, Mr. Hays succeeded in throwing the whole burden upon the country. Now, it has been made very clear that the members of the opposition as well as the members of the government side are in favour of greater railway facilities being provided in the Northwest. We are in favour of giving that country all those facilities which it requires for meeting the needs of the great influx of population now going in; but it is unfortunate that we have to tack on to this railway scheme a political railway running from North Bay down to Moncton. The first proposition of the Grand Trunk Company was a business proposition. It was to build a railway from North Bay or Gravenhurst to the Pacific coast. That was well worth the consideration of this House. But I am sorry to say that the government brought political motives to bear on the question, with the result that we have been burdened with this impracticable and unreasonable proposition of the eastern extension. The Grand Trunk Company have told us their position. They required new connections, and moderate assistance would have secured the same for them.

A good deal has been said in regard to the government being forced into a partnership, and I fear that we have to accept the partnership idea. It is logical, from the standpoint of the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. Why do I say that? Because there are so many loose ends in this contract. For instance, there is not a word in the contract with reference to the conditions on which the Grand Trunk shall use the Intercolonial Railway from Moncton to Halifax or to St. John, or to any other seaport in the maritime provinces. This seems to me to be a most important matter. There is nothing in the contract in reference to the use of terminal facilities in the harbours of the maritime provinces. We know that they are not suitable at the present time for the trade of a great transcontinental railway. Who is going to improve these harbours and provide these terminal facilities? Then, there is no provision in the contract in regard to a division of the earnings on the government section of the railway. This is another loose end. There are no penalties provided for failure to carry out the spirit of the agreement in regard to taking to Canadian ports the products which originate on the Grand Trunk Pacific. It will be eight or ten years, and perhaps more, before the Grand Trunk Pacific are asked to carry out that provision. It is all very fine for the ministers to say that the government of the day, whoever they may be, will bring pressure to bear upon the company. The gentlemen who are here to-day are not likely to be here ten years hence; in fact, we know that they will not be. The present manager of the Grand Trunk may not be its manager ten years hence. The president of the Grand Trunk may not be its president ten years hence. Therefore this bargain will be interpreted according to its strict legal wording, and there is nothing in it that obliges the Grand Trunk Company to carry the products of the Northwest to Canadian ports. Suppose the time comes when that question is up for consideration, what will be the position of the Grand Trunk Railway Company? They will naturally say to the government of the day, whoever they may be: True, that clause is in the agreement; but do you expect us to take the products to Canadian ports if it costs us more to do so than it does to take them to Portland, where we have excellent terminal facilities? We never anticipated that that was the way this contract would be interpreted. You provide us with the facilities for taking the products to Canadian ports as cheaply as we can take them to Portland, and we will take them there. Therefore, I say that the contract is full of loose ends, and that the partnership idea will have to be accepted. Then, on the terminals at Winnipeg. They will have no connections with the head of the lakes, as the Grand Trunk will own the line. They will have no connections with North Bay or Ontario points. The government agree after fifty years to take over any branch lines which the Grand Trunk Pacific do not want. Surely this is a partnership idea in the fullest sense of the word. All these things are left to be adjusted afterwards by future governments of this country. The right hon. First Minister tells us that this is a railway running from tide water to tide water. How is it so? Moncton is not on tide water in the sense of a harbour for ocean vessels. It is not a railway which reaches a Canadian port, and there is no provision in the contract to compel under penalty the Grand Trunk to take the products of the west to a Canadian port. There is no necessity for this country going into partnership with any corporation. We are free from such entanglements at the present time. I do not know what it means. I fear that the entanglements will be much more serious than any of us imagine at the present time.

But, Sir, in this partnership the government occupies the position of senior partner and the Grand Trunk Pacific that of junior. The government are furnishing the money and the Grand Trunk Pacific are to get the profits. The government assume all responsibility and the junior partner gets the profits. But in this matter, as well as in others, the government are substantially in the position of a trustee. They are supposed to conduct the affairs of this country as business men would their private affairs, yet I find that they have done nothing of the kind, and sooner or later they will be made to understand by the force of public opinion that the conditions which apply to men in the conduct of their private business must apply to governments in the conduct of the business of the country. We have had no surveys, we have no information which would warrant us with building a railway in those regions far to the north. The government have not employed experts to visit that country and report upon it. The position consequently in which they find themselves is supremely ridiculous. Perhaps most of the members of the cabinet have not had a training in the strict school of personal experience in business which would lead them to be careful so as to avoid the bankruptcy court, and they are entitled no doubt to the benefit of any excuse that may be made in their behalf on that score; but it is difficult, no matter how we may view the situation, to account for their extraordinary manner of conducting business. They seem to be utterly reckless. Finding themselves on easy street, with heavy cash surplus on hand and the credit of the country good, they have not the slightest hesitation in incurring enormous obligations and leaving to future generations the task of redeeming these obligations.

Just consider how they have dealt with the question of surveys. Mr. Hays told us in the Railway Committee last year that he had nine survey parties at work between Winnipeg and North Bay, yet we can scarcely find one member of the government admitting that these surveys are going on. Circulars sent to members of this House by Canadian engineers who complain that these surveys are being carried on by aliens. It seems that a Canadian engineer cannot get a position on the staff of any of these survey parties. I protest against this discrimination in the strongest language. The fact that an engineer or surveyor has graduated from a Canadian college or university should not debar him from obtaining a position on any of these survey parties, and I protest against these parties being manned and directed by aliens. That is a matter to which the government should give careful attention. $500,000 was voted last year for surveys. Is any part of this money to go to these surveyors who have been sent out by the Grand Trunk Pacific? Why should the line from North Bay to Winnipeg be surveyed by the Grand Trunk Pacific at all? Why should not the government take charge of these survey parties? But the government seem to be carried on by an irresistible force, and they seem to be entirely in the hands of a controlling mind from without. They are governed completely in everything they do by a corporation and blindly follow out the policy dictated to them by that corporation. Throughout this matter they have been followers and not leaders. They have taken no initiative, but are practically at the beck and call of this company. Instead of taking the course they did, they should have obtained expert advice, they should have defined their position clearly, and have invited, not only the Grand Trunk Pacific, but other syndicates or corporations to tender for the undertaking. Had they done this, we would have a railway built across the continent for much less than what this line will cost.

What is the excuse given for the concessions which the government have made? The excuse is that the money market has changed and that the Grand Trunk Railway Company cannot, on that account, carry out its bargain. But what is the interest of the Grand Trunk Railway in this contract, as compared with that of the country? We are told by the president of the Grand Trunk Railway, that the interest of his company in this contract is less than $15,000,000, and that the annual interest charge on that company will be only £118,000 per year. That is certainly a small amount of interest per annum when we compare it with the net earnings of either of our two great trunk lines. The net earnings of the Canadian Pacific Railway are about $15,000,000 per annum and of the Grand Trunk Railway about $10,000,000. Therefore, the interest of the Grand Trunk Pacific in this matter is very small indeed compared with that of the government. If the money market keeps in its present condition, the government will be obliged to advance, before the railway is completed, a sum of no less than $170,000,000, including the cost of the Quebec bridge. Therefore, when the excuse is put forward that because of the changed condition of the money market, the Grand Trunk Railway is entitled to concessions, that is a plea which will not hold water. If the rate of interest is advanced, why does not the government say to the Grand Trunk Railway: Very well, our interest is very much greater than yours, and we will charge you four per cent interest for rental on the eastern division instead of three per cent. Although the interests of the government are fully ten times as great as those of the Grand Trunk Railway in this scheme, yet we do not find the government saying to the Grand Trunk Railway: Because the rate of interest is advanced we must insist on advancing our rate from three to four per cent; if we give you concessions, we must have concessions in return.

We have heard something about freight rates and grain shipments over this road. I do not intend to go over what was discussed last year, only as the matter is affected by these new concessions, and possibly to answer one or two points raised by hon. gentlemen opposite. Last year, after Mr. Blair had spoken, the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) contended that you could ship grain by this projected railway, if the proper grades and curvatures could be obtained, to Canadian ports in competition with water routes, and practically a large part of the debate last year was taken up with that point. Not only did the hon. member for Norfolk try to uphold that idea, but the hon. the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) gave figures to show that it was possible to carry it out. This year, however, we do not find that argument advanced by the government side, and therefore it does not call for any discussion. It is now admitted by the hon. Minister of the Interior himself that if grain can be carried at three and a half cents a bushel from the head of the lakes to Quebec, this proposed railway cannot compete with that rate. Thus one argument after the other in favour of this scheme disappears. In the same way disappeared the contention that this new line would carry lumber from New Brunswick to the prairies of the west, and that its construction was also required in order to meet the contingency of the bonding privilege being abrogated. We do not hear anything this session of these three arguments, which were so prominent last year. Mr. Hays said on December 24, after he returned from England, that the first thing the Grand Trunk Pacific would do would be to build a line from Winnipeg to Port Arthur, in order that the Grand Trunk Railway fleet might get the carriage of the products of the west from the head of the lakes.

How then can any one, on the government side of this House at least, say that the Grand Trunk wanted the eastern extension of this road for the purpose of carrying grain to the sea-board in the summer time? It is a ridiculous idea; such a thing cannot be done, and never will be done. The products of the Northwest will be taken to the head of the lakes in the summer, and from there they will find their way to the sea-board. If the government wish to do something for the people, let them make it certain that, in return for this tremendous expenditure of money, these products of the Canadian Northwest shall be taken from the head of the lakes to a Canadian port on the lakes and thence by Canadian channels to the sea-board. In the summer time the sea-board will be Montreal or Quebec. Therefore, Montreal and Quebec are the points to which the government should insist that the Grand Trunk shall bring these products in the summer. But, leaving the contract as it is, these products that come to the head of the lakes will find their way largely as the Grand Trunk's policy now directs—to the city of Portland. But why should not a clause be inserted in the contract covering that point? If this were done, Quebec city, which the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Fitzpatrick) tells us has long sought for justice in this matter, would participate in the summer in the transhipment of the products of the Northwest in a way she has not done in the past and will not in the future, even though the road goes to Quebec, because the road will not carry grain to Quebec in the summer, and Quebec harbour is frozen up in the winter.

The hon. member for West York (Mr. Campbell), in the speech he made on the subject, referred to the reduction in freight rates that we might expect through the building of this road under the contract that has been made. The hon. gentleman complained that when the Canadian Pacific Railway contract was made the government did not reserve the control of the rates, and the people had not been given fair treatment on that account. He instanced certain discrimination in hauling to certain seaports of the Pacific coast, as compared with freight from eastern points in the United States to Pacific coast points. The figures he gave were absolutely correct, I believe. There is a discrimination. But I would remind the hon. gentleman that the rates of freight to the Pacific coast are not regulated by the railways, but are competitive rates; and more than that, they are lower rates than between points of lesser mileage inland. They are regulated by competition over the Isthmus of Panama or around Cape Horne. The figures quoted by the hon. gentleman, it seems to me, have nothing to do with the original contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway. But I would ask the hon. gentleman, who raised this question, if there is any hope for the people of this country that this Grand Trunk Pacific will be the means of reducing the rates of freight from or to the Northwest, and so relieving the people of some of the present burden in respect of rates? I do not think there is any hope whatever. In the east the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Pacific make their rates together, so that at competitive points in the east the rates are the same. And the same system will be brought into effect when the Grand Trunk Pacific reaches the Northwest, and the rates of both lines at competitive points will be the same. But let me ask the hon. gentleman one question as to freight rates. What better position are we in under this contract, which obliges us to spend so much money, than that in which we stand with regard to any other road that is built or that may be built? We are giving very great concessions. Some railroads have had large concessions made to them, while others have received none. I have in mind a project to build a railroad from Toronto to Sudbury as part of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I understand that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company intend to build that road, 227 miles in length, without expecting assistance from this government. I would ask the hon. member from West York, or any other hon. gentleman, in what way this government will control rates over this Grand Trunk Pacific more completely or effectively than they will control rates on roads that receive no government assistance? There is nothing in the contract that gives us any control that we have not already over any other road. It would have been in the interest of the people of this country to insert in this contract a clause that would give the government some practical control of rates on the Grand Trunk Pacific. I have in mind what the Manitoba government did in this respect in the case of the Canadian Northern. When the Manitoba government took over the Northern Pacific and its branches and fused them into the Canadian Northern, the rate of freight on grain from Winnipeg to Port Arthur was 14 cents per 100 pounds. The Manitoba government took power to regulate the freight rates on that road and its branches. The result is that to-day the rate from Winnipeg—taking that as an illustration—to the head of the lakes is 11 cents per 100 pounds, with rates to other points correspondingly low. The effect of the Manitoba government's action has not only been to reduce the cost of carriage of grain on the Canadian Northern, but to reduce it on the Canadian Pacific Railway as well. And so the farmers of the Northwest get a substantial advantage through this bargain. In that case the terms were embodied in the contract. Therefore, I say that it was possible for the government to have inserted certain conditions of this kind in the agreement whereby the rates of freight would be fixed. It would be possible to fix certain rates as a maximum between certain points and the sea-board or the head of the lakes. The people of Manitoba and the Northwest understand this contract made by the Manitoba government, and they see how they are practically benefited by it. But I do not see how the people will benefit by the attempt to govern the freight rates over the Grand Trunk Pacific road.

We often find the conditions of the Canadian Pacific Railway contract cited by hon. members on the other side of the House. They speak of the very generous treatment that the Canadian Pacific Railway received at the hands of the government when the contract with them was made. I would like to draw the attention of these hon. gentlemen to the contrast between the conditions of this country twenty-five years ago, when this contract was made, and its condition at the present time. At that time we had no direct communication with the west as we have to-day. The Dakotas and Minnesota, to the south of our territory, were largely vacant. And as to our own territory, I doubt that the whole population west of the lakes, including Indians, was more than half the population of the city of Winnipeg at the present time. The government of that day had all the obstacles to contend with that one can well imagine. They had the whole Liberal party of this country opposing them, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) even writing letters to the English press trying to defeat the whole scheme. And we know the position which the present Prime Minister took at that time. We can see how little faith he had then in our great Northwest, and we wonder why he has such faith at the present time. We remember that in the discussion in this House he declared his willingness that the Canadian Pacific Railway should be built to the Soo, there to join the American system of railways, and so have Canada utilize the American system to get to our own Northwest. There was no question of the withdrawal of the bonding privilege in his mind at that time. At that day the government were desirous, as this government is desirous, of getting immigrants into the Northwest. They were determined to build north of the lakes, so that the immigrants would be taken to our own country, and not be side-tracked in the Dakotas or Minnesota by the American agents. If the Conservative government had given way to the cries of the opposition in those days, there would have been no reason to discuss in the House to-day such a measure as we have now before us, because there would have been no reason for building another railway. I would like to know what has caused such a change in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite, so that it becomes necessary, in their opinion, to build this second line.

In order to illustrate more definitely what I mean by the tremendous strides this country has made in prosperity since 1879, I would like to read a few figures showing a comparison of that year with 1902 :

Now, Sir, these figures show that the country to-day is in an entirely different position from that which it occupied 25 years ago when the Canadian Pacific Railway was under consideration. How then is it a fair argument for any hon. member to compare the two contracts with each other under these circumstances ?

Now, Sir, there is another matter to which I would like to refer before I take my seat, and it is in reference to the remarks that have been made in this House with respect to my hon. colleague from West Toronto (Mr. Osler), who also occupies a position on the directorate of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I do not quite understand the remarks that are levelled at my hon. friend in a discussion of this Bill. I would like to call the attention of the members of this House to this fact, that my hon. friend from West Toronto, so far as my knowledge goes, and so far as I believe as the knowledge of his colleagues goes, has never on any occasion asked any of his colleagues, either on this side of the House or on the other, to support any measure in which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were interested. I believe that hon. gentleman has never on one occasion voted on any question in which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were interested. Now, Sir, is it not a matter of congratulation to this parliament that we should have amongst us a gentleman who understands these questions so well as my hon. friend from West Toronto, and who is so capable of discussing them intelligently ? That gentleman was not elected to this House because he happens to be on the directorate of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, but he was elected because of his general fitness to occupy this distinguished position. I say it is a fortunate thing that we have in this House an hon. gentleman who understands these questions so well and who, even if he were not a director of the Canadian Pacific Railway, would discuss them in exactly the same way as he does now. I regret very much that hon. gentlemen opposite have seen fit to bring into the debate what seemed to me to be rather personal matters and matters foreign to this discussion. This is not a question of the Grand Trunk vs. the Canadian Pacific Railway. Hon. members on either side of this House wish to treat both these corporations in a fair and honourable manner. But we are discussing a certain bargain that is made with the Grand Trunk Pacific, we are not discussing the affairs of any other railway. At the same time if this great undertaking goes on—and I hope it will go on, but I hope the bargain will be modified before it does. I hope the government will modify it—I hope this railway will be the means of doing as much good to Canada as the Canadian Pacific Railway has done during the time it has been in operation. The management of the Canadian Pacific Railway has conferred great benefits on this country, it has advertised this country, it has done a great deal for Canada. The gentlemen who have taken an active part in its management, Sir William Van Horne and Sir Thomas Shaughnessy, were both Americans. They came into this country and became naturalized. With the exception of three or four gentlemen, I believe the board of that company are Canadians, who understand the affairs of this country ; they have their hands on the pulse of this country, and that is the reason why that railway has tended so greatly to the development of Canada, it has been run in the interests of this country. I hope that the same may be said of the directors of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company. I hope that the directors who will control the policy of the Grand Trunk Pacific—I do not mean the directors who control the policy of the Grand Trunk Company, and who reside in London—but I hope that those who control the policy of the Grand Trunk Pacific will be Canadians, that they will live amongst us here in Canada, that they will have their hands on the pulse of our people, and that they will understand our interests as well as the directorate of the Canadian Pacific Railway has done during all these years of our development.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will appeal once again to the government to withdraw from the entanglements in which they find themselves in regard to the eastern part of this Transcontinental Railway. Every dollar that will be spent on this eastern section we shall require for the development of colonization railroads, not only in the Northwest but also in the eastern parts of this country. The report of the transportation commission will no doubt suggest large expenditure at many points. We have therefore tremendous expenditure in other directions looming up before us. How will we be able to carry out all these necessary improvements if we go on and use up our credit in this scheme, if we sink all these millions on the eastern division ? I say let the government withdraw from the entanglements in which they find themselves with regard to this eastern section. Let them husband our resources, husband our credit, and in that way provide means for carrying out the great undertakings which we shall have to assume in the future in carrying out the recommendations of the transportation commission, and in building railroads in the older provinces as well as in the Northwest. In that way I believe they will win the approbation of the public to a much greater extent than they will by going on with the scheme which is before us at the present time, and by agreeing to these concessions which we find in the supplemental contract and which are so opposed to the interests of our country.

Mr. JAMES J. HUGHES (King's, P. E. I.). Mr. Speaker, I had not the privilege of hearing the earlier speeches delivered on the resolution now before the House. But I have looked carefully over some of those speeches, particularly the one delivered by the leader of the opposition and the one delivered by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler), and as a young member of this House I must say that I was surprised to find that the leader of the opposition, in treating the financial side of this question, was so very unfair and misleading in the statements he made, and that the hon. member for West Toronto was absolutely incorrect in the statements that he made. I admit, Mr. Speaker, that this is rather strong language, but I hope to prove it before I sit down. Before attempting to do so, however, I wish to refer briefly to section 42 of the agreement, a section which is very interesting to us in the maritime provinces. During the recess it has been discussed at considerable length in the newspapers of Prince Edward Island from which I have the honour to come, and also at public meetings that have been held in the by-election in West Queen's. Our Conservative opponents stated very emphatically that this section was not strong enough, or broad enough, or comprehensive enough to compel the Grand Trunk Pacific to carry the freight and traffic that it will gather up in the west and in the middle west and bring it down through Canadian channels to Canadian ocean ports, and that consequently the government should be condemned for not being able to make a better bargain and one more in the interests of the maritime provinces.

Well, Sir, fortunately, we have a very good test by which to measure the strength, ability and comprehensiveness of this particular section. While the Grand Trunk Pacific Bill was before parliament last session the opposition held a caucus and the united wisdom and legal ability of the opposition prepared a resolution, which, in their opinion, would exactly meet the requirements of the case. The resolution was placed in the hands of the hon. member for Kings, N.B., (Mr. Fowler) and he moved it in this House. Our opponents thought it was the best that human ingenuity could devise, I suppose. It reads as follows.

That the order for the third reading of Bill No. 64 be cancelled, and the Bill be referred back to the Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines, in order that the following section may be added to the said Bill :—'All freight originating in Canada, and received along the line of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, intended for export across the Atlantic, shall be shipped through Canadian ports, when the route is not otherwise specially indicated by the shipper ; and that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway shall carry all such freight to the eastern Canadian sea-board as cheaply as to any American port on the Atlantic sea-board.

The apparent object of this resolution submitted and supported by the opposition, was to endeavour to compel the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company to carry all freight originating on their line of railway, down to the Atlantic sea-board as cheaply as to American ports. But, it went no farther. I now wish to refer the House to section 42 of the agreement, which is as follows :—

It is hereby declared and agreed between the parties to this agreement that the aid herein provided for is granted by the government of Canada for the express purpose of encouraging the development of Canadian trade and the transportation of goods through Canadian channels. The company accepts the aid on these conditions, and agrees that all freight originating on the line of the railway, or its branches, not specifically routed otherwise by the shipper, shall, when destined for points in Canada, be carried entirely on Canadian territory, or between Canadian inland ports, and that the through rate on export traffic from the point of origin to the point of destination shall at no time be greater via Canadian ports than via United States ports, and that all such traffic, not specifically routed otherwise by the shipper, shall be carried to Canadian ocean ports.

That is much more comprehensive and much stronger than the resolution submitted by the opposition. Not only does it provide that the traffic shall be carried to Canadian ports as cheaply as to United States ports, but it provides that it shall be carried from the port of origin to the point of destination, wherever that may be, Liverpool, London, or any other point in Europe as cheaply, so that there shall be no discrimination in the ocean rate. Yet, some of our friends from the maritime provinces declared that this was not sufficient. Then, section 43 reads as follows :

The company further agrees that it shall not, in any matter within its power, directly or indirectly, advise or encourage the transportation of such freight by routes other than those above provided, but shall, in all respects, in good faith, use its utmost endeavours to fulfil the conditions upon which public aid is granted, namely,—the development of trade through Canadian channels and Canadian ocean ports.

The agreement with the Grand Trunk Pacific as it is now before parliament, is in all essential particulars what the original agreement was. The modifications that have been made are in favour of the company, provided the enterprise be not a success financially. In such an event they will be in the company's interest, but if the enterprise proves a success, and no reasonable, intelligent man doubts that, then the company will be under the same obligations that it was under by reason of the original contract. It will not cost the country one dollar more than it would have cost under the original contract.

Now, Sir, I desire to refer to the financial statement presented by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden). First and foremost he begins by charging the government with the cost of the eastern division from Moncton to Winnipeg, which, of course, is all right in principle, but he swells the amount very considerably. He charges it at the rate of $40,000 a mile, an outside figure, certainly, and more than it will cost. Then he charges interest during the period of construction at 3½ per cent, and he charges interest for seven years, during the time when the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, the lessees of the road, will not pay interest. That is all right in principle, but it is misleading to the extent that he does not take into consideration the fact that the lessees will pay 3 per cent interest on the cost of construction for 43 years out of the 50, and that during that time this part of the road will be no burden whatever to the Canadian people. But, that is not all. That is only the beginning. He charges to the country the total cost of the Quebec bridge which he figures out at $6,978,719, or in round figures $7,000,000. Now, Sir, this bridge, in all probability, would have been built if the Transcontinental Railway had not been thought of, but in any case, it will be used by five or six other railways, and it would be just as fair to charge the cost of that bridge to any one of the other railways that will use it, as to the Transcontinental Railway. Why did not the hon. leader of the opposition do that? He knows that it would be unfair to do so, that it would be misleading and incorrect. Then why do it in this case? The object is to swell the expenditure that the government will be put to in regard to this enterprise. But that is not all. He goes on and charges to this enterprise the cost of the prairie section to the amount of $13,000,000. The hon. gentleman himself, has said that the enterprise will be a success. He has quoted approvingly and endorsed the statements made by Lord Welby, Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson, Mr. Hays and others which go to show that the western division of this road will be a success from start to finish. He has made it clear that at least the western division will be a success.

and he knows that if it is a success, the government will not have to pay one cent of the expenditure on the prairie section. Yet, he charges $13,000,000 for the construction of that section. Is that fair? Is that not misleading? Of course the government guarantees the bonds upon that section, but if it is a success, the government will never be called upon to implement that guarantee. Again, he charges the government with the cost of the mountain section which he puts at $25,000,000. He knows that the prairie and mountain sections hang together and that the only amount which the government will ever have to make up in regard to the mountain section will be the interest on the bonds which they guarantee for seven years and which he himself makes up to be $4,882,500. Yet, he charges $25,000,000 to the mountain section which is decidedly unfair and misleading. I am confident that my hon. friend would not make such a statement in regard to any other financial question that he was called upon to determine. If we take these amounts into consideration as we have a legitimate right to do and deduct them from his total of $150,000,000, and also deduct the $20,000,000 or more, by which he swelled the expenditure on the eastern division, we will find that the total cost, according to his own figures, will be considerably under $100,000,000.

Now, Sir, what are the facts in connection with the financial aspect of this question, and what will it cost this country to build this Transcontinental Railway? We will begin with the eastern division, and I will take the mileage at 1,875 miles, as given by the hon. leader of the opposition himself. That estimate may be a little over the mark, but at all events I will take his own figures. According to the statement made by the engineer in charge of the surveying parties that surveyed from Winnipeg down to the longitude of North Bay, a liberal estimate for the cost of this section would be $30,000 per mile. It is known that the topography of the country from North Bay to Quebec, is about the same as it is from North Bay west, and according to the estimate of Mr. Stephens, the chief engineer, other things being equal, it should cost less to build the road from North Bay to Quebec, and from Quebec to Moncton than it would from North Bay to Winnipeg, because it will be easier to get materials and supplies to the eastern section than in the case of the construction west. Last session the Minister of Finance estimated that the road from Moncton to Winnipeg would cost on an average $30,000 per mile; and the Minister of Finance has the reputation in this country of being very careful in any estimate he makes. But, Sir, in order to give an outside liberal estimate—and I have made up these figures myself—we will put it at $35,000 per mile for the 1,875 miles, and that would amount to $65,625,000. Now, suppose that we also add the interest on that during the time of construction at three and a half per cent; or for four years on the whole amount during half the time of construction, that interest would amount to $9,187,500. Of course the capital sum will not be expended at the commencement of the work but the expenditure will be made as the work proceeds, and hence I am in the judgment of the House when I calculate that taking a fair average, the interest charged would amount of $9,187,500. Add that to the first cost of construction, and then we have a total of $74,812,500 for the eastern division. Now, the government will have to provide interest on that sum at 3 per cent for seven years, or until the Grand Trunk Pacific begins to pay the interest. There is no man in this country who does not know, that this government will be able to borrow money within the next six or seven years at three per cent, and perhaps less. A year or two ago the government could borrow easily at a fraction under three per cent, but within the next six or seven years, there is no doubt whatever that money will be obtained in the money markets of the world by the Canadian government for 3 per cent or less. Now, the interest on that at 3 per cent for seven years would be $15,710,625. That is all the government will have to pay in regard to the eastern division. Of course, eventually the bonds which will be issued to raise the money to build the road will have to be provided for, but the people own the road, and when these bonds will have matured fifty years hence, and the road will revert to the government, then they will have a very much more valuable property, and they can re-lease it to better advantage if they think it advisable to do so, or they can do anything they please with it. Therefore the original cost of the road will never be felt by the people of Canada. The road will pay for itself; it is the people's road; they own it, and the rent obtained from it will always pay the interest charges for the cost. Therefore, in addition to the interest for the first seven years on the eastern division, the interest on the bonds that the government will guarantee on the mountain section, is all this country will have to pay in connection with this enterprise. I will take the interest on the bonds guaranteed by the government, and I will accept the figures submitted by the leader of the opposition. The interest on the bonds on the mountain section will therefore amount to $4,882,500. Add that to the interest charge of $15,710,625 on the eastern division, and it makes in all $20,593,125. That is what this enterprise will cost the people of this country. And what have we got in return for that? We have got a railorad extending from ocean to ocean opening up immense areas of valuable timber and mineral lands opening up for cultivation millions and tens of millions of acres of the most valuable agricultural lands in the world. What will $20,000,000 be to the people of this country? Our population is now about 6,000,000, but long before we are called upon to meet this obligation, our population will be 7,000,000 or 8,000,000, that $20,000,000 divided amongst our population will be less than $3 per head of the population, or $15 for every family of five persons. In view of this, how can the member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) and the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor), and the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart); how can intelligent men like these stand up in this House and say that this enterprise will put a mortgage of $125 on every man's farm?

Mr. HEYD. They would say anything.

Mr. JAMES J. HUGHES. Well, Sir, even if we had to meet all this obligation in one year, it would not be a very considerable matter after all; it would be very little more than the surplus of last year, and possibly not more than the surplus of the present year. But, Sir, we will not have to meet it in one year. The payment will be extended over a period of fifteen years. It will take seven or eight years for the government to construct the railway, and we will be paying the interest for seven years more, so that it will be spread over a period of fifteen years, and hence it will amount to about one dollar per year for each family in the Dominion of Canada during fifteen years.

But, Sir, this enterprise will not cost the people of Canada one single dollar, because I hold—and I believe I can maintain it successfully—that the increased business that we shall do, the profit we will make on our increased business because of the construction of this railway, will pay for the railway four or five times over. I need not refer to the augmented value that will be given to the lands through which this railway will pass. No matter whether these lands belong to the provinces or to the Dominion government, they will be increased in value so that if these lands be sold for what they will bring, the increased value will go into the exchequers of the provinces or into the Dominion exchequer. They will benefit by ten-fold what the road will cost. Therefore, so far from this National Transcontinental Railway being a drain on the resources of the country, it will on the contrary be a source of profit and revenue.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. JAMES J. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock, I was discussing the financial aspects of this great question, the Transcontinental Railway, and particularly the financial statement in relation to it presented to the House by the hon. leader of the opposition. I had shown that the actual cost of this great project to the people of this country during the next fifteen years would not exceed, and might be less than, $20,000,000; whereas, the hon. leader of the opposition has declared that the obligations which the government were assuming amounted to from $150,000,000 to $170,000,000. The hon. gentleman carefully sheltered himself behind the word 'obligations,' and that is where the unfairness of his statement came in. That is how the people would be misled by it. In order to make up this $150,000,000 or $170,000,000, he charged against the project the total expenditure on the Quebec bridge, which might as well be charged to any of the other five or six railways that will use that bridge. He charged against this project the total cost of the prairie section, although, as he well knew, the government is only guaranteeing the bonds on three-fourths of the cost of that section to an amount not exceeding $13,000 a mile, and will never be called upon to pay one dollar in connection with that guarantee. He also charged against the enterprise the $25,000,000 which he said the mountain section would cost, whereas he knew that all the government would be called on to pay in connection with that section would be the interest for seven years on the bonds. Of course, it was an indirect liability of the government; but very few people in the country would have the time or be able to go into the matter and discover the difference. Therefore, I charge that his statement was very misleading.

But there is another way of looking at this great question. I would be glad to hear the hon. leader of the opposition speaking from a brief for the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific on this matter. Of course, his statement would be very much stronger and couched in very much better language than I can employ; but I fancy that it would be something like this: 'My clients of the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific he would say are assuming enormous obligations in this contract compared with that which the government of Canada are assuming. First, they are entering into a lease to operate the eastern division for fifty years, to provide all the betterments on that division, to keep it in a proper state of efficiency and repair, and to pay the interest on the cost of construction for forty-three years out of the fifty—an obligation which, even calculating the cost of that road at $35,000 a mile, will amount to the enormous sum of $96,508,125. In addition to that, my clients are undertaking to build the western division. The prairie section alone, according to my estimate, will cost $20,000,000. For that they are directly responsible. My clients also undertake to build the mountain section, which, according to my estimate, will cost $25,000,000; and for that my clients are directly responsible. We also have to put on this road, when it is completed, $20,000,000 worth of rolling stock. Adding these four amounts together, the obligations of my clients will amount to $161,508,125. The betterments that we will have to provide for the eastern division during fifty years, the maintenance and the repairs required, will, in all human probability, amount to 50 or 75 per cent of the original cost. Say they amount to only $40,000,000. That would be over $200,000,000 of obligations which my clients are assuming, while the direct obligations of the government may be only some $20,000,000 apart from the original cost of the eastern division.' I suppose the hon. gentleman would say that this would be unfair to his clients. Of course, the cost of the eastern division will be met by the issue of bonds. Say they have to run for fifty years, but at the expiration of that time the road will revert to the government. It will then be a very much better and more valuable property than it will be when first leased. It will be worth more than the bonded debt.

There is also another way of looking at this contract to see what it means for the people of this country, that is, by the comparative method. We can compare its cost with the cost of the Canadian Pacilc Railway to the people of Canada. There was given to the Canadian Pacific Railway, to begin with, a cash subsidy of $25,000,000 and completed railways to the value of $37,750,000; in other words, a total cash subsidy of $62,750,000, together with 25,000,000 acres of land, which, at a low valuation, would be worth $3 an acre, or $75,000,000 more; or a total of $137,750,000 which the Canadian Pacific Railway directly cost the people of this country. There were also enormous privileges given to the Canadian Pacific Railway, none of which are given to the Grand Trunk Pacific. It had the privilege of importing free of duty all the materials which entered into the construction of the road. There was no control over freight or passenger rates, practically for ever—until the earnings of the road would amount to 10 per cent upon the bonded and stock indebtedness. More than that there was this enormous privilege, that all the property of Canadian Pacific Railway —stocks, bonds, real estate and everything else—was to be exempted from all taxation for ever—federal, provincial or municipal taxation. What these enormous privileges would amount to it is impossible to compute. The last exemption would probably reach $1,000,000 or $2,000,000 a year. The cash subsidy alone to the Canadian Pacific Railway would be more than three times what the present railway will cost the people of this country; and the cash subsidy and the land grant taken together will amount to seven times as much, not to count the exemptions and privileges at all. And yet our hon. friends opposite will say that the bargain with the Canadian Pacific Railway was a good bargain, and that that railway was a large factor in the development of this country and of great benefit to the country. I believe that is true, notwithstanding the improvidence of the bargain. I believe the Canadian Pacific Railway was a large factor in the development of this country; and what the Canadian Pacific Railway did for the country, the Grand Trunk Pacific will do, but in a tenfold greater degree.

And, now, I come to the statements made by another gentleman, a leading member of the opposition, the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler). I stated in my opening remarks that I was surprised to find that that hon. member had appeared to think it necessary to make a statement that was absolutely inaccurate in connection with the financial side of this question. I also stated that before I would sit down I would endeavour to prove my statement, and I will proceed to do so now. When I read in the unrevised 'Hansard' the statement made by the hon. gentleman, I thought surely there must be some mistake. Surely, I said, this must be a slip of the tongue or a slip of the pen, and it will be corrected in the revised 'Hansard.' But, to my surprise, the hon. gentleman did not see fit to correct it in the revised 'Hansard,' so I assume that he intended the statement to go to the country. Consequently, I quote from the revised edition, at page 862, where the hon. gentleman says:

> Now, Mr. Speaker, eighteen years is a good long time to have a railway built free. Let us assume for the sake of argument that the government build the road as they propose from Winnipeg eastward to Quebec and Moncton. I will take the figures that are given by the president of the Grand Trunk Railway in his report to his shareholders and which are the lowest figures I have seen yet. He gives the cost of the section from Winnipeg to Moncton as $76,000,000, from Winnipeg to the mountains as $20,000,000 and from the mountains to the Pacific as $25,000,000. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), I think, will agree with me, that these figures are away below the actual liability of the country.

I do not know that Mr. Fielding would agree to anything of the kind. However, we will let that pass.

> Under the present agreement with the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the Grand Trunk Pacific the interest——

Bear this in mind—

—the interest on $76,000,000 at 3½ per cent—and that I think is a low rate to calculate upon—will be $4,245,000 a year.

There is a clear cut statement, and it is not a calculation difficult to make either. Well, how much do you think the hon. gentleman was out in that statement? He was just out $1,585,000. The interest on $76,000,000 at 3½ per cent, would amount to $2,660,000 a year, and the hon. gentleman says that it will amount to $4,245,000. Of course, I think I can see what he is trying to get at, and I do not want to be unfair to the hon. gentleman. What I think he really wished to convey was that the interest on $76,000,000, which he said the eastern division would cost, and the interest on the prairie and mountain sections, all combined, would equal $4,245,000, and that would be correct. But would it be fair for the hon. gentleman to charge the government with the interest on the prairie section? It certainly would not, because he goes on further to say that he makes this calculation based on the event of the enterprise being a success. But if the enterprise be a success, the government will never be called on to spend a dollar in interest on the prairie section. It would be, however, fair to charge the interest on the eastern division and the bonds guaranteed by the government for the mountain section. But even then, he would be astray. The interest on the eastern division for one year at 3½ per cent would be $2,660,000, and the interest on the bonds guaranteed by the government on the mountain section, according to the figures of the hon. leader of the opposition, would be $697,500. These two combined would give $3,357,500, so that even assuming that that was what the hon. gentleman meant, he would still be astray in his calculations $887,500.

Mr. SPROULE. What about the guarantee for the prairie section?

Mr. JAMES J. HUGHES. I have disposed of that. I have said that if the road be a success—and that is the premise from which the hon. member for West Toronto is arguing—the government will not have to expend one dollar in interest on the prairie section. But the hon. gentleman proceeds to make another calculation. He calculates the interest at four per cent, and he says:

> If the bonds have to be issued at four per cent the total will be $4,840,000.

The total will be nothing of the kind. Calculated at four per cent, the interest on the eastern division would be $3,040,000, and taking again the interest made up by the leader of the opposition on the mountain section, and adding both together, you will have $3,737,500. So that the hon. member for West Toronto is here astray again to the tune of $1,102,500. But there is something better to follow. He goes on to make another calculation. He says:

> Under the agreement the government undertake to build from Winnipeg to Quebec and to Moncton, and the lowest computation of the cost that I have seen is $76,000,000. The Grand Trunk Railway pay what? Three per cent interest on that money only, no matter what that money costs the government. Suppose the government have to borrow that money at three and a half per cent, a very low rate looking at it from a business point of view in carrying out the transaction five years from now, and assuming that the Grand Trunk Railway pays interest at three per cent, in fifty years the difference between three per cent, which the government receive, and the three and a half per cent which the government pay, will amount to $59,324,000.

How much do you think the hon. gentleman is astray in that calculation? He is just $40,324,000 astray. But read what the hon. gentleman says. He says:

> You cannot get over that by any juggling you may resort to.

Well, Sir, I do not think there is any other man in Canada, or in all Christendom for that matter, who could get such a result by any kind of juggling. But there is another calculation still to come. The hon. gentleman says:

> That is the actual difference between the rate of interest which the Grand Trunk Railway pay on the capital expended of $76,000,000, and I believe it will be more like $150,000,000, and the rate of interest which the government have to pay for the money. To-day if the government went on the market to borrow that sum of money, they could not get it under four per cent. Assuming that the government have to pay four per cent for the money, the difference between four per cent which the government would pay, and the three per cent which the Grand Trunk Railway would pay, would amount in fifty years to $118,648,000.

Well, Mr. Speaker, how much do you think our hon. friend is astray in that calculation? Just a trifle of $80,000,000, or to be exactly correct, $80,648,000. And still he went on to say:

> Yet, Mr. Speaker, we almost hear the echo of the right hon. Prime Minister's statement in this Chamber that the total commitment of this country for this huge enterprise is about $13,000,000, half the surplus revenue of a year.

The hon. gentleman says that $13,000,000 would be half the surplus revenue of a year. Well although this government has had good surpluses since it has managed the affairs of the country, it has not yet succeeded in obtaining a surplus of $26,000,000 in any one year. The hon. member for West Toronto, however, that eminent financial authority, says that it has. These are the calculations given us by this financial critic of the opposition, the man who in all human probability—if ever by any unfavourable combination of circumstances the Conservative party should come into power—would probably be the Finance Minister of the Dominion. But there are still other calculations which the hon. gentleman has given us. Now, he says:

> Bonds on the mountain section are to be issued to the extent of $50,000 a mile on the Grand Trunk's estimate of total cost which is $25,000,000.

And further:

> Three per cent bonds, putting it at the outside price, would require an issue of $30,000,000, to realize $25,000,000.

I do not know exactly what he means by 'the outside price.' He has not given the rate for the bonds. The leader of the opposition and others have assumed that 3 per cent bonds would sell in the market at 90. Assuming that that is what the hon. member for West Toronto meant, in saying that to raise $25,000,000 cash would require the issue of $30,000,000 in bonds, how much do you think, Mr. Speaker, he was out in his calculation? The hon. gentleman does not appear to know how to make up the simplest sum in arithmetic. It would not require the issue of $30,000,000 but of $27,777,777. The hon. gentleman is only $2,222,223 astray in that calculation. That is not so very bad. But he goes on and makes a calculation upon his own estimate. He says:

> The government portion would be $22,500,000. The Grand Trunk are to pay no interest on that for seven years after completion, and possibly for three years more, if it does not earn interest—I quote the statement of the president of the Grand Trunk—and as they have eight years to build, then for eighteen years they will have to pay no interest. We will assume that the average time for building the road will not be eight years but four years, and so we will take fourteen years as the average time of the expenditure of the $22,000,000. On that expenditure the government pays interest and charges, and the Grand Trunk pays nothing, and it amounts to $16,672,500.

That is what the hon. gentleman says. We do not know what the charges will be. He has charged the government already with discount on the bonds so that cannot be included in the charges again. There would be the interest only at three per cent. The hon. gentleman says it would amount to $16,672,500. It would not amount to anything of the kind. It would amount to $9,240,000. The hon. gentleman is just $7,432,500 astray there. It would, I think, be charitable to suppose that he did not understand the subject he was discussing. Although he is a shareholder and bondholder of the Canadian Pacific Railway, a director of that company, a man of large financial interests, it seems that he could not have understood the subject. I saw, however, in the Toronto 'News' a statement that he understood the question thoroughly and that when the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Wade) had presented an incautious question it drew from the hon. member for West Toronto a statement which showed he was thoroughly at home in the subject he was discussing. Well, Sir, if he was thoroughly at home in the subject, I do not know how any hon. gentleman could be thoroughly abroad on any subject. So much, then, for the financial aspect of this question as presented by the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for West Toronto.

There is, however, another feature of this question which appeals very strongly to us from the maritime provinces. We see the Conservatives in this House particularly those from the great province of Ontario in favour of building this road only as far east as North Bay and shutting out the maritime provinces entirely from the operation of the road.

These gentlemen claim to be great patriots and to take all the provinces in their view. What then have the maritime provinces done that they should be shut out from the operation of this transcontinental road? What would be the effect of stopping this line at North Bay? The hon. member for West Toronto has told us what the effect would be, and I will read his statement:

> Suppose the eastern section is not built for ten years, what will happen? The whole trade of the Grand Trunk accumulated west of Winnipeg goes either to Port Arthur or Duluth, goes across the lakes and goes to Portland to increase and enrich the harvest of our friends in the United States.

And then he prayed to Heaven that the eastern section would never be built. A more unpatriotic, I was going to say a more unrighteous prayer was never offered to Heaven. But the hon. member for West Hastings (Mr. Northrup) I believe, reiterated that statement some evenings afterwards, and the whole opposition, I understand, cheered him. We in the maritime provinces know then what we have to expect if, by any unforeseen and unfortunate combination of circumstances the Conservative party attain power. We would have expected that at least the Conservative members from the maritime provinces would protest against such a statement as this of their friends, but they have not done so. They will have to render an account of their stewardship in this regard when they go before the people for re-election. We are prepared to take issue with the opposition on this question.

Now, Sir, looking at this whole question, viewing the project in all its bearings, it seems strange that there should be such opposition in this House, and, apparently in some sections of the country. Whence comes this opposition? Not from the business men of this country; because, wherever a board of trade has spoken it has pronounced in favour of this enterprise. Not from the farmers of this country; because, though there are farmers' institutes scattered all over the country from the Atlantic to the Pacific, I have yet to hear of one that has spoken against this project. Not from the lumbering industry or the mining industry of this country has this opposition come, nor from the mechanics and artisans or labouring men. Whence, then, comes this opposition? It comes from that corporatian for which the people of this country have done so much. It comes from that corporation which has received from this country concessions and privileges, cash subsidies and land grants, which have made of its directors, or many of them, millionaires. And the mouthpieces of that company in this House are the men who lead and engineer this opposition. They would chain the Canadian people to the car wheels of the Canadian Pacific Railway, if they could. Now, Sir, the hon. member for West Hastings—I think it was he—threw out a challenge to this side of the House. He challenged the government to go to the country on this issue. Sir, that was an idle and a boastful challenge. The hon. gentleman knows well that we shall go to the country upon this issue. He knows that this will be the leading subject of discussion before the people. He knows well that the record of the government in every particular cannot be successfully assailed, and he knows also that we are quite prepared to meet our opposition friends upon this issue. We are confident of the verdict. We know what the verdict of this generation will be; we feel confident what the verdict of the next generation will be; and we believe that the population of cities yet unbuilt will do honour to the memory of the men who had the ability to conceive and the courage to carry through this great undertaking—an undertaking, Sir, that will go far to make of Canada a nation among the nations of the earth. I have therefore no hesitation in saying that I shall vote for the resolution and against the amendment now before the House.

Mr. A. A. LEFURGEY (East Prince, P.E.I.). The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Hughes, King's, P.E.I.) interjected into the first part of his speech so many ifs and ands that to attempt to follow out his reasoning would take the greater part of several hours. I think the best way to answer such statements as the hon. gentleman introduced into the first part of his speech is simply to say that—

> If ifs and ands were pots and pans,
> What would be the good of tinkers?

We are not here to deal with ifs and ands when $150,000,000 to $170,000,000 of the people's money is to be expended, and when a question involving as this one does the transportation problem of this country is before the House for determination. Why, Sir, the hon. member for King's might well be trying to usurp the position that was given last session to the hon member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) as the railway expert of the government. The hon. gentleman has assumed to himself the position accorded to that gentleman, and from the manner in which he told this House how the eastern portion of this line could be built for $30,000 a mile, and how to overcome the grades that it would have to overcome in order to make it a success in taking the products of the west to the east, one would think he had been a railway expert all his life. Why, the hon. gentleman figures this line from $150,000,000 to $170,000,000 down below what the hon. gentleman from Haldimand (Mr. Thompson) had it, $80,000,000, down below what the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Roche) had it, $120,000,000, and even down below what the Minister of Finance had it, $13,000,000, and these are all supporters of the government, and finally he got it down so that it would not cost one dollar. Now, when the members of the cabinet next assemble in solemn conclave, they will recognize what a mistake they made when they did not pick upon the hon. member for King's county, P.E.I., to present this phase of the question last year before they made the statement that the railway would cost $13,000,000.

The hon. gentleman talks about the knowledge we have of this country from Winnipeg to Quebec, about the immense valuable timber limits and mineral lands, and the millions of acres of fertile arable lands through which this railway will pass. Mr. Speaker, we heard of mountains of information last year, but these mountains of information have not been produced, and when the hon. gentleman talks of these fertile fields along the route from Winnipeg to Quebec, when he talks of the valuable timber limits and mineral lands, he should be prepared to produce the reports showing that these things exist in that country, showing that the line has been surveyed, and that it will not cost over $30,000 per mile. If the hon. gentleman knows anything about railway construction he will understand that a railway going through a rugged country like that, in order to find the grades that the member for North Norfolk supposed that we would get last year, would cost upwards, in some cases of $150,000 per mile. The Pennsylvania Railway, one of the greatest systems in the United States, is at the present time spending $100,000,000 merely for the purpose of improving its grades, I have here an article on that subject, and I will read a few paragraphs of it for the edification of the railway expert who has just taken his seat:

FIGHTING THE GRADES.

The Pennsylvania, one of the great American trunk railways, is spending one hundred million dollars in improving its roadbed. Steel bridges have been replaced by masonry structures, huge cuttings have ploughed through mountains, valleys have been filled, and all to eliminate curves and secure the lowest possible grades. . . . . 'The Booklovers' Magazine' contains a striking exposition of the reason for incurring the enormous expenditures at the price of which mountains are torn asunder and rivers diverted to make easier and ever easier the path of the iron horse.

The financial reason comes first. 'Experience has shown,' says Mr. W. L. Webb, the writer of one of the articles, 'that the total cost of operating trains is, roughly, the same per train-mile whether the traffic is heavy or light, the trains many or few, long or short.'

Again—

The ideal towards which this railway system is working is also set forth. The summit level of the railway is at Gallitzin. Between that point and tide-water there will be no place where the grade against eastbound traffic will be greater than three feet per thousand, or 15·8 feet per mile.

The application of these facts to present Canadian conditions is obvious. The Pennsylvania Railroad runs through a rugged mountain district like that through which the Grand Trunk Pacific will run from Winnipeg to Quebec.

To get easy grades it has resorted to stupendous works. In one place, within a distance of little over a mile, cuts of one hundred and six, eighty, one hundred and five, and one hundred and twenty feet have been made, and the last and largest of these cuts is followed by a fill of seventy-three feet. Such are the works to which this railway has been driven in the battle against steep grades, and such are the prizes offered. Canada is undertaking the building of a new trunk line across the continent. The pains which should be taken with the location of the line, the resolute facing of expenditure to get minimum grades, are impressed upon us in this example.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I won't bore the House by reading any more of this article, but it shows that the conditions which the Pennsylvania Railroad is overcoming at a cost of $100,000,000, are the same conditions that face the construction of this line from Winnipeg to Quebec and from Quebec down to Moncton. I have it from competent engineers who have been over the New Brunswick section of this proposed line that the point where the Grand Trunk Pacific will have to pass from Quebec into New Brunswick is twice as high as the point where the Intercolonial Railway passes into New Brunswick, and that cuttings will have to be made there to get anywhere near the grades proposed by our railway expert of last year, the member for North Norfolk, will put the cost to upwards of $150,000 per mile. Now from the character of the country that we actually know, we may readily suppose that such conditions will face us when we get up into that northern country; and the fact that we have not got the data before the House, and that the government has not seen fit to bring down this data, is very good proof that we will have to face these conditions, and that we absolutely don't know what this railway will cost in the section between Winnipeg and Quebec.

There are several other questions that the hon. member touched upon, but I think I will pick them up as I go along with my speech. Last session the government brought in the Grand Trunk Pacific Bill, and succeeded in whipping almost all their followers into line, and among them the hon. member for King's, P.E.I. Many of them, I believe, voted much against their own better knowledge. We all remember, indeed none of us who were present on that occasion when the Prime Minister introduced his scheme, will forget the opening scene of what I shall call a parliamentary farce comedy. Shall we forget the musical voice, the gestures, the theatrical appearance and utterances of the right hon. gentleman, when in the words of Edward Farrar, he said:

> The first of these objections, that is to the immediate construction of such a road, can be disposed of, I believe, with a single observation. To those who urge upon us the policy of to-morrow, and to-morrow, and to-morrow; to those who tell us, wait, wait, wait; to those who advise us to pause, to consider, to reflect, to calculate and to inquire, our answer is: No, this is not a time for deliberation, this is a time for action. The flood of tide is upon us that leads on to fortune; if we let it pass it may never recur again. If we let it pass, the voyage of our national life, bright as it is to-day, will be bound in shallows. We cannot wait, because time does not wait; we cannot wait because, in these days of wonderful development, time lost is doubly lost; we cannot wait, because at this moment there is a transformation going on in the conditions of our national life which it would be folly to ignore and a crime to overlook; we cannot wait, because the prairies of the Northwest, which for countless ages have been roamed over by the wild herds of the bison, or by the scarcely less wild tribes of red men, are now invaded from all sides by the white race.

The measure passed this House in its then form. In view of the fact that time could not wait, in view of the fact that the arteries of this great country to the west were clogged, in view of the fact that the government had announced their intention after mature deliberation at the opening of parliament, as indicated by the speech from the Throne and later by a comprehensive Order in Council, to have a commission appointed to thoroughly investigate the transportation question, which, however, they departed from, in view of the fact that the protestations of the opposition availed naught, and in view of the fact that the Minister of Railways and Canals resigned from the cabinet because he could not see eye to eye with the government, not only in respect to the assertion that time could not wait, but in regard to other vital parts of the proposed scheme—in view, Mr. Speaker, of all these facts, one would have thought, nay, it should have been a foregone conclusion, that the government, the promoters and the grafters would have put their whole force and energy into a united effort to bring this project forward to a rapid conclusion. But now we see the nigger in the fence. The bluff of the right hon. leader of the government—for what else can we term it but a bluff—was made to the people of the country, because, I verily believe that it was the intention of the government right straight along to go to the country, and it was apparently felt to be necessary that the people should be made to believe that a crisis was actually at hand and that we must put through this scheme without any hinderance, without any investigation, that it must be railroaded through the House, so that the government might go to the country and get a snap verdict from the people. The partnership had been formed. They were all in the same boat and then they began to quarrel over the spoils. It takes a thief to catch a thief, and the grafters now have the upper hand in the case. Elections had to be run and it was the assured intention of the government to run the elections. But the partner was not willing to put up the funds. Conferences were held ; the Grand Trunk and the promoters, now having the partnership established, having the control of the situation, take the lead. The government is not consulted but the others go to England and from the reports of the meeting of the shareholders held at the Terminus Hotel, Cannon Street, London, the adroit and wily Sir Rivers-Wilson and other officers of the company, had no difficulty in showing the shareholders that the government was hand and glove with them. And that they had the opportunity of their lives. Now was the time to accept the opportunity or it would be lost and others would step in and reap the harvest. What do we find the president of the Grand Trunk Railway saying to the shareholders on that occasion ?

We caused a Bill to be introduced into the Canadian parliament for securing a charter of incorporation for the creation of a company with an independent organization, but in close connection with and under the control of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, for the purpose of building a line of railway from a point of junction at or on the Grand Trunk line, passing through the most fertile districts of the Northwest and terminating at a port on the Pacific coast. Under the natural impression that a scheme of this nature would commend itself to the approval, and would obtain the support and encouragement of the government and parliament of Canada, so liberally accorded to other railway enterprises. I ventured to suggest to the shareholders, when I addressed them in the month of April last year, that it might reasonably be expected that such a scheme must be carried through without in any way engaging the credit of the Grand Trunk Company shareholders.

Why, from the report going about the country in regard to the introduction of this scheme by the right hon. leader of the government last session one would have supposed that the right hon. leader and his advisers in the government brought this scheme forward and recommended pushing it through the House. But, we find that instead of that the scheme was hatched and prepared by Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson and the promoters who were with him, and that it was introduced into this House by them. Think of it—the golden opportunity that he told his shareholders was before them ; the simple faith he had that all they had to do was to come to this Canadian government and get this vast scheme through parliament, so as to make money for another 40,000 shareholders and rake off to promoters without engaging at all the credit of the Grand Trunk Railway or its shareholders. He proceeds :

Such was my conviction at the time (A voice : I hope it is so now) founded upon reasonable data, and in view of the proceedings to which I have alluded, I must confess that when I made that suggestion I appear to have been somewhat over sanguine, not sufficiently considering, perhaps, the weight of political opposition which the scheme was destined to encounter.

It has been accordingly found impossible to carry the measure through the Canadian parliamen without imposing some limited obligation on the Grand Trunk Company ; not by any means however as I think I shall satisfy you—to be weighed against the advantages which, I think, shall result to the company. *

* * * *

Our original idea was to build from a point on the Grand Trunk Railway to the Pacific coast. The intention was that the point of junction should be at or in the neighbourhood of North Bay. It was made, however, by the government a condition of the grant of the charter of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company that the line should be extended eastward from North Bay to Quebec into the city of Moncton, in New Brunswick. . . . As a result, however, of the negotiations with the government, another Bill was introduced by the government——

This time it was introduced by the government itself.

——itself for ensuring the construction of the contemplated line from New Brunswick to the Pacific in joint partnership between the government and the Grand Trunk Pacific Company. The result therefore, of the agreement was a combination of these two interests for the construction of the proposed road which would thus be carried out, as I have said, by means of a partnership between the government and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, supported as that company would be by the influence and connections of the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

Mr. Alfred Smithers, vice-president of the Grand Trunk Railway, also said :

As the president has told you—and as I was in Winnipeg last year with him, I am able to confirm what he says—as the president has told you, we are wanted in the Northwest ; the government have entered into a partnership to take us to the Northwest——

Again Lord Welby says :

We have driven, I may say, the Canadian government into becoming absolute partners with us in the expenditure on that mountain section ; that means that we have made their interests one with ours, and we are, therefore, assured of their hearty co-operation and assent to any reasonable proposition on their part.

And he might well have said : 'On our part also.' Why, Mr. Speaker, it is hardly possible to imagine the government of the Dominion of Canada entering into a partnership with a private railway corporation to construct and operate a railroad. The government of Canada should be the controlling spirit in such a scheme ; the government of Canada should control the railway corporation; it should control the freight rates; it should control the operation of the road, in the interests of the people of the west, who are now suffering from grievances in connection with transportation, and in the interests of the people of this Dominion. There should be government ownership and control of this railway, and not Grand Trunk control of both the railway and the government. The Grand Trunk, having got the government in the same boat as themselves, they were able to demand the changes which were proposed in this supplemental agreement. The speeches of the directors of the Grand Trunk to their shareholders prove that the company assume no responsibility, and that, in vulgar parlance, they have a cinch. They were not satisfied with the first agreement, generous as it was to them, and having the government in their power they asked for more, and they got it. On their part, the government found that they had gone too far, and they resolved to let the tail go with the hide, under the impression that if the Grand Trunk got everything, the Liberal party would have a large campaign fund in the elections. And so, Sir, the government filched from the unsuspecting people of Canada, not only their money, but their rights as a free people by depriving them of the opportunity to pronounce upon the question of whether this scheme should be carried out or not. And imagine also the Grand Trunk Railway Company announcing, first, that a special meeting of the parliament of Canada would be called to ratify this supplemental agreement and to enable the government to go down deeper into the pockets of the people. Here is what Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson said on that score :

> Negotiations were accordingly resumed, and the result is embodied in the second or supplemental agreement which is now in your hands, and which reads together with the first agreement we now submit for your approval. Should it receive that approval—as I do not doubt will be the case—it will be brought before the parliament of Canada—which has been specially summoned to meet on the 10th March, the day after to-morrow—for consideration and, I hope, confirmation.

Imagine a private corporation assuming the responsibility of calling the parliament of Canada together. Why, Sir, it shows the length to which this corporation will go, seeing that it has the present government in its power. The hon. member for King's (Mr. Hughes) said that the people of the country were assuming no responsibility for this huge railway scheme and the Grand Trunk Company had enormous objections, but against this statement we have the statement of Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson, that the Grand Trunk Company were assuming no responsibility, that they had received a contract, the like of which possibly would never be offered to a railway corporation again—and I hope and trust, Sir, that no government will ever again offer such a contract to a railway corporation in this Canada of ours. As between the statement of the member for King's (Mr. Hughes) and the statement of Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson, who says his company is assuming no responsibility, I leave the public to judge, and I have no doubt that on a fair consideration of the facts, they will believe that Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson is right and that the hon. member for King's does not know what he is talking about. But, Mr. Speaker, is all this government by the people and for the people ? Is it not rather a usurpation of the rights of the people ; is it not depriving the electors of Canada of their birthright as freemen to pronounce an opinion upon this, which is probably the most important public question since confederation. Let me point out to these gentlemen on the government benches that the Canadian Pacific Railway scheme was not railroaded through parliament by the Conservative government without information being at hand. A million dollars was spent on surveys ; the people of Canada pronounced on the undertaking, and the Conservative party, when they came back to power in 1878, were pledged to carry it to completion. Indeed, if I remember aright, before the Conservatives completed the agreement, the Liberal party had made more generous offers to the company than they were to receive from the Conservative government.

We were told last year by the Prime Minister that the Grand Trunk Pacific scheme had two objects : one to protect us in case the bonding privileges were abrogated ; the other object being to cheapen the transportation of grain from the west. The bonding bugaboo has disappeared, and the idea of cheap transportation, all rail, in competition with our water system has been so far exploded by statistics of rates and other data produced last session by hon. members on this side of the House, that no government supporter ventures to mention it as an argument to-day. Last year, speaking in the House, I went into some detail as to the cost of water transportation compared with rail transportation, and it is unnecessary for me to repeat what I said. I then pointed out that the state of New York was contemplating the expenditure of $100,000,000 for the deepening of the Erie canal, so that they might carry grain from the great lakes to the sea-board, and in order to prevent it from being carried through Canadian channels. I pointed out that if we were true Canadians, it was our duty to develop Canadian transportation via the lake route and to keep Canadian trade in Canadian channels. In connection with this matter, let me refer to some opinions of Edward Farrer, set forth this time under his own name, and before he became speech dictator to the Prime Minister. Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House are all familiar with Edward Farrer's name, and I have here, in the 'Canadian Magazine' of 1898, page 376, an article in which he advocates entirely different ideas from those which he now backs as pusher for the Grand Trunk Pacific scheme. Mr. Farrer here advocates the lake route as the only means for transportation out of the west, and he says :

Some maintain that the opening of the railway to Parry Sound will restore the traffic to Montreal. It is difficult to see how. The Canadian Pacific, which in railroad parlance originates the traffic, has elevators at Owen Sound, to which port its passenger steamers run from Fort William, and rail connection from Owen Sound with Montreal. Yet, except in a year like 1897, when prices were higher than usual, it has not been able to carry much export grain from Owen Sound to Montreal in competition with the Buffalo route. It carries next to none all-rail from Fort William to Montreal ; the all-rail traffic could not be made to pay and was abandoned years ago.

And yet this gentleman put into the mouth of the Prime Minister last year the statement that you can carry wheat all rail from the wheat fields of Manitoba and the west down to St. John and Halifax and compete with the water route.

The grain brought to Owen Sound by the Canadian Pacific steamers, which, however, are not grain carriers in the proper sense, is mostly for Ontario millers, although last year, as just observed, a considerable quantity was for export from Montreal and St. John. The line from Parry Sound to Montreal will be a trifle shorter than the Canadian Pacific line from Owen Sound, but that will make no difference. Since, in ordinary seasons, the Canadian Pacific cannot make money by hauling Manitoba wheat for export from Owen Sound to Montreal and St. John in competition with the Buffalo route, notwithstanding that it has to haul from the place of growth to Owen Sound, I do not see how the Parry Sound road can be made to cut much of a swath in the trade.

I am happy to inform the House that this prediction of Mr. Farrer as regards the Canada Atlantic road has not been verified by actual experience that it has fortunately not been borne out by the facts. The Canada Atlantic Railway has built up a large and profitable traffic, and last year carried some 20,000,000 bushels of grain. It has demonstrated itself as holding the position of greatest strategic advantage between the east and west. Mr. Willison of the 'News,' whose paper last year was devoted to the interests of these promoters, has found his position untenable, and now strongly advocates Mr. Borden's policy. Let me read a short paragraph on what he had to say regarding the extension of the Canada Atlantic Railway :

The Canada Atlantic has not completed its line between Ottawa and Montreal, and in getting its grain east is compelled to resort to what must be a most annoying and expensive transhipment. Yet it already has built up a large and profitable trade, including last year the carriage of about twenty million bushels of grain, and it obviously is only at the threshold of its usefulness as the shortest of all the rail-and-water routes from the west. The advantage its acquisition would be to the Intercolonial scarcely needs statement. The national railway stops at Montreal. The trade from Canada west of Montreal is immensely valuable, and it is a national object to send it over the Intercolonial, partly because the country's money is invested in the road, partly because we wish our trade to be all-Canadian, partly because we wish to build up our Canadian seaports. But the Intercolonial, to secure western trade, must get freight which reaches Montreal, either by the St. Lawrence route, or over rival railways which have sea-board connection of their own. A line from Depot Harbour to Halifax and St. John would be a business proposition which any railway man would regard as highly promising. The Port Arthur-Depot Harbour-Montreal route is so decisively the shortest and easiest that only by gross mismanagement could the trade be kept away from it.

The national railway would gain (1) the carriage of freight from Depot Harbour to Montreal for shipment at that port—in itself a large traffic, profitable to the present owners of the Canada Atlantic ; (2), the carriage of all-rail freight from Depot Harbour to Montreal ; (3), greatly increased and probably more profitable business between Montreal and our Atlantic seaports. All these advantages we can give our line by coming to terms with Mr. Booth. It will be worth the fifteen or twenty millions which would be invested in the purchase.

The government may be expected, after its purchase of the railway, immediately to lower the heavy Madawaska grade and to construct the thirty-seven mile link from Coteau to Montreal. The attractions of the route will increase enormously when trains of sixty cars can be run from Depot Harbour to Montreal.

No more statesmanlike course now presents itself than the sending of the Intercolonial west to the lakes. It would give Ontario and western Canada an interest in what has been suffered to remain too exclusively a public work for the benefit of the maritime provinces. It would give a fair trial to public ownership, not only in the eyes of all Canada, but in a field in which all Canada is interested. It would give the country an opportunity to improve the all-Canadian lake-and-rail outlet, which for some years must be the main reliance of the west.

I could quote further from Mr. Farrer's article, but it would only go to further strengthen the argument in favour of water and rail route as a means of cheap transportation, and this Mr. Farrer advocates by practical arguments. If we need further evidence that Mr. Farrer's predictions were not true, we have only to take the statements of the Minister of Public Works made in answer to a question on the order paper this year. In substance he states that grain was hauled from Depot Harbour over the Canada Atlantic, 346 miles ; over the Grand Trunk Railway, 34 miles, and over the Intercolonial Railway to Halifax, 828 miles, for five cents, proportioned as follows : the Canada Atlantic and Grand Trunk getting about 2·75 cents for 380 miles, and the Intercolonial Railway about 2·25 cents for 828 miles, and the Intercolonial Railway lost nothing at this rate. This means that for 1,208 miles from Parry Sound to Halifax, at the rate received by the Intercolonial Railway, a bushel of wheat would cost 3·31 cents. The difference between the total haul of 5 cents and 3·31 cents would be 1·69 cents, which would represent the profit made if the Intercolonial Railway owned the whole line. This means simply that we are robbing the government road of a just profit which any private corporation owning the Intercolonial Railway would undoubtedly covet, or, on the other hand, we are robbing the farmers by not having the rates reduced. The people stand to benefit in either case if the Intercolonial Railway were extended to Georgian Bay.

On the last occasion on which I had the privilege of addressing this House on the transportation question, I spoke somewhat on the subject of government ownership, and I will deal more fully with that subject at the present time. The crowning wrong of this bargain, if consummated, is that it absolutely takes out of the hands of the people for fifty years—yes, one hundred years —any possibility of government ownership of this great public utility. I do not think this House fully realizes our position, and the wrong we are doing to the present and future peoples of this country. We have now the opportunity which may never occur again. The words of the right honourable leader of this House, in introducing the measure last year, where he said, ' the flood of tide is upon us that leads to fortune ; if we let it pass it may never recur again,' would be prophetic as applied to government ownership. He should have said, however, that the flood-tide is upon us that leads to freedom from corporate bondage, to control of rates and protection to the farmers and pioneers of this great country. To my mind, and I think I voice the opinions of possibly the majority of the independent electors of this country, the sentiment in favour of state control and ownership of railways, is assuming immense proportions, and the time is ripe for the government to step in and assume control of the transportation of this country, before the transportation companies assume control of the government. I say the time is opportune, and we are on the crest of the wave. I say the rumbling of this sentiment, this belief in controlling this great utility, is heard from west to east, and will bring disaster on the party that ignores it.

The people are strong now, and growing stronger every day, in their desire to be free from abuses of private ownership. I have here a resolution adopted unanimously and enthusiastically at a meeting of the electors of North Alberta, which shows the sentiment of the Northwest. That resolution is as follows :

Resolved that it is the opinion of this meeting of farmers, mechanics and working men assembled in Ross' Hall this Feb. 25, that we consider it to our interest that the government should abandon the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway scheme, and that the Intercolonial Railway, the people's road, be extended from ocean to ocean. And that the time has now come when the people should own and operate all the railway systems of Canada, and that we urge upon the government the necessity of taking steps at once to secure all the roads that are necessary, either by building or purchasing roads already built, to make the entire system as practicable as possible; and that we the producing classes assembled here who create all the wealth and pay the taxes, do not consider that the amount which a road is bonded or capitalized for has any consideration in fixing the purchase price of the road. As we do not want to pay for watered stock, but what the road is actually worth to the country and what the people can build it for, this should be the only basis on which to fix the price. We believe with J. J. Hill, Sir Thomas Shaughnessy and other railroad magnates, that the amalgamation of many roads under one management is a great saving in the expense of the carrying trade of the country. We believe the people, instead of the railroad stockholders should enjoy the benefits of that reduction and saving to the country. The whole railroad question should be shelved and the people be given a chance to vote on it at the next general election.

This shows the trend of feeling of people in the west. They call upon the government to delay their present scheme until the people have an opportunity to pronounce upon it ; and if the government have faith in their project, they should not hesitate to put it before the country, and appeal to the country for its endorsation, and let the people have a chance to give their verdict in the matter. Public opinion in favour of government ownership is rising rapidly. Against railway monopoly, high rates and discrimination in rates, some remedy must be applied, and to my mind that remedy is public ownership. By acquiring the Canada Atlantic and adding it to the Intercolonial Railway system, and then extending the Intercolonial Railway from the lakes to the Pacific coast, the people will have in their hands an effective weapon to use against other railway companies. The people are becoming aroused over the immense treasures lavished on railway companies in the shape of moneys, land subsidies and other privileges without compensating advantages to the people, without even any real control. James G. Blaine of the United States estimated that the total advanced to the United States railway companies, together with all the outright gifts by towns, counties, states, and the nation, would total one billion dollars, yet had these same railways been subsidized at the average given to Canadian railways, the total would have been three and a half billion dollars. The Federal government of the United States never gave cash bounties and has made no land grants since 1871.

Is it any wonder, when we see the generosity of Canadian governments in this regard, that we should have charter mongers and promoters, railway presidents and their officials, the president of the Grand Trunk Railway and his staff, coming to the Dominion government in all confidence and then being placed by this government in a position to report to their shareholders that they can float a scheme which will put money into their pockets without requiring in the slightest degree their own credit? That is the position in which the Grand Trunk Pacific have been placed. Sir, the total amount of aid in various ways given by the people of Canada to railways would in all likelihood have built every mile of railway in the country. The grand total amount of aid to the 17,000 miles owned by private corporations is as follows:

Cash subsidies and bonuses	$225,000,000
Loans and subscriptions	27,000,000
Land at $2. per acre	104,000,000
Lines already built	35,000,000
Total	$391,000,000

$23,000 per mile for every mile in operation. This does not include 1,500 miles of the Intercolonial Railway. Large additional grants both federal and provincial have been granted and are yet to be paid. $13,000,000 for example to the Canadian Northern and millions more to follow to other corporations.

Subsidies alone $225,000,000, and land at $2 making a total of $329,000,000, amount to $18,000 a mile, which in many instances would have built the road. Loans of $24,000,000 and subscriptions of $3,000,000 not included. The cash subsidies, loans and subscriptions amount to $252,000,000, nearly equal to the net national debt of Canada, on which you pay upwards of $9,000,000.

This is a virtual tax, taking everything into account, of $10,000,000 annually. On top of this we pay some $1,350,000 for carrying the mails.

One would have thought that before this last scheme, every means had been exhausted in giving public funds and control of railways to private corporations, but this honest government have devised a method of not only giving the public funds which in cash were limited by the government to $6,400 a mile, but by a method of their own have succeeded in giving $16,000 cash. This is very well shown in the speech of the hon. the member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) and I can not do better than give his figures:

> I say that every one of these aids and encouragements granted to this road is a subsidy and that it is a subsidy concealed. We are paying, first a subsidy by the way of payment of interest for the first seven years for the company on the bonds guaranteed on the mountain section of $952,000 a year, or $6,667,500 in all. This is a sum of money that is paid in cash out of the pockets of the people and is a tax upon them. It is, I repeat, a sum of money that is paid in cash just as directly as if it were paid over to the company. The next is a subsidy by way of rebate to the company of seven years rent on the eastern section amounting to $2,490,000 a year, or to a total of $17,430,000. That sum also must be paid by the people as interest on construction for the first seven years. Not one dollar of it goes to the eastern section; every dollar of it goes by way of encouragement to the western section and to the Grand Trunk Railway. Therefore, it is a subsidy, concealed as it is, in the most direct sense. I wish to say here that I have carefully avoided making any estimate that has not been based upon statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite in the past. The statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite during last session, and the statements made by the Grand Trunk Railway shareholders perfectly agree that the 1,000 miles of prairie section will cost $20,000 a mile, and that the mountain section will cost $50,000 a mile. We find that the average cost of the 1,500 miles of the western section, 1,000 miles of the prairie section, and 500 miles of the mountain section, from Winnipeg to the Pacific coast is $30,000 a mile. We have, therefore, contributed by way of the subsidy I have referred to, $16,000 a mile for the whole 1,500 miles. The maximum that we can give under the present law to any railway is $6,400 a mile. Therefore, instead of giving the usual aid to railways we are giving the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company $16,000 a mile for the western section as against $6,400 a mile that we give to other railways. But that is not all of the encouragement we give them

Do you suppose, Mr. Speaker, that the people are not thinking seriously on this matter? Do you suppose that they are not considering seriously whether it were not better that we should own and control the railways of this country instead of practically paying to corporations, by way of cash and land subsidies, all that it costs to build these lines, and thus putting these corporations in such a position that they will eventually control the government and be at full liberty to give the people an inefficient and expensive service?

The Grand Trunk Pacific has exercised its control in the matter of this supplementary agreement. Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson went over and told these people. we are going to get practically all we want; only a few restrictions are put upon us by this Bill that went through the House, and they are of such a minor character that they do not affect the contract to any appreciable degree. Yet, they say they want more, and they come down with this supplementary agreement by which they enter into a partnership with the government and will exercise their control over this government in all their future dealings. Corporations naturally align themselves against the State and rates are pooled and other abuses practised to make dividends on watered stocks. Competition between private corporations has been a failure in bringing tolls to a reasonable basis and remedying the numerous other evils of private transportation. To build up a great corporation and give it charge of a certain territory, and then build up another large corporation alongside of it in the same territory is not an economic proposition, nor is it the method, in the light of the railway history of the United States and Great Britain, to secure a reduction of tolls.

Government ownership of railways is simply the application by the state of the principle of municipal ownership of such utilities as light and power, water works, electric railways and so forth, and in regard to which there is an immense wave of popular feeling and support that has been crystallized in all the large cities of the United States and in many of our Canadian cities. Chicago is a notable example, having just voted to take over the the entire plant of the street railway system, while an agitation is in progress to take over the lighting and other works. Why are hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House afraid to meet this question of public ownership fairly? There has not been an hon. member on that side who has treated this question adequately, or even treated it at all. We have not heard a word from any member of the cabinet on the subject. I am going to take up the document of one of the retired members of the cabinet, Hon. Mr. Blair, in a few moments. But, outside of Mr. Blair, there has not been a word from this government to indicate any knowledge of, or any consideration for the rising feeling in this country in favour of government ownership and control of this great public utility. One would have supposed that at least the leaders of hon. gentlemen would have taken the trouble to try to meet the arguments in favour of this great movement. Instead of that, we have such arguments as that which the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Cowan) gave us in the House about a deal for a gravel pit in some back woods settlement. Does he mean to say that the language in summing up this point by a former member of this House in the following language applies to him and his party?

To boil it down, it simply means that owing to our political system and the tendency of the electorate to be distracted from the great interests of the country by prejudices, by personal likings, or animosities, by stump speech oratory, and little factional struggles, the character of man, which as a rule, is found in control of governments, is unfit by reason of want of business capacity, and not infrequently of business integrity, to successfully grapple with so great and so complex a question as the transportation interests of the country.

The hon. member for Essex took up some dirty little scandal about a gravel pit down in some back woods settlement and put this up against the great idea of government ownership in this country. That is the only argument we have had from the other side against the operation of this great principle. But certain hon. gentlemen opposite harp upon the experience of government ownership and control, and tell you that the Intercolonial Railway has been a failure, and that it has been a boodling concern. But, as against this, what are they doing in this case? According to their own showing they are putting through one of the most gigantic boodling operations ever known in Canada in the building of this line from Moncton to Winnipeg. The only difference between government ownership and control as advocated by Hon. Mr. Blair and Mr. Borden and the system that is to be used in this case is that they here are building a line to enrich a private corporation, handing it over to them for fifty years. We have by their scheme the government ownership with all its attendant evils but as they claim without any control. It is incomprehensible to me, and I believe it will be incomprehensible to all fair-minded people in this Dominion, how this government can vote down resolutions in favour of government ownership and control, and then put through this scheme involving an expenditure of millions of the people's money, the work when built, to be handed over to a private corporation. The hon. member for South Essex dwelt upon the danger of political influence in this state control. But, Sir, under the scheme of government ownership outlined by the leader of the opposition, it was not intended to hand over the control of this great public utility to such men as the hon. member for South Essex and his colleagues on the other side of the House, who feel themselves not honest enough to carry it through successfully. It was intended to give it into the hands of a commission, outside of parliament altogether. This experiment has been successfully tried in nearly all European countries. Is the political morality of this country so low that we cannot operate such a system as other countries are doing? Now, I have talked corruption on the Intercolonial Railway at election times as much as anybody. I want to say here that political mismanagement in the administration of the Intercolonial Railway is not such a grievous evil as we make it out to be. While it may, to an extent, exist, it is used and dwelt upon largely as a matter for election material and at election times. It has been availed of by both political parties, and is spoken of in the province of Ontario as making the Intercolonial a millstone round the neck of the country. I can state in this House, and I verily believe my statement to be accurate, that the maladministration on the government system of railroads in this country, would not weigh a particle in the scale—or should not—against government ownership of railways in this country. To listen to the hon. member for South Essex, one would suppose that we were entering upon an untried field—that there had been no advocates of the principle of government ownership in this country or in this House. The government cannot plead that they were not warned in time. They had this memorandum of Hon. Mr. Blair, a document that, more than any other, is an unanswerable condemnation of the action of the members of the government, a document that warns them against just such a lot of promoters as are, apparently, behind this scheme and with whom the government have formed a partnership —a document that deals in a masterly way with transportation, and advocates unreservedly the principle of government ownership as the means of remedying not only the evils oppressing the people of the west by private corporations and discriminations in rates, but also as the means of giving cheap transportation for products both east and west, and as the means of making the government road a paying proposition. This document was not presented to this government by an outsider; it is a document presented to his colleagues by the man selected by the right hon. leader and his colleagues as the one to whom knowledge and foresight the great railway problems of this counrty are entrusted, the then Minister of Railways, Hon. Mr. Blair. It is a prophetic document, pointing out in advance everything that has occurred, forecasting all the evils that have occurred. The government feared the effect of this document upon the members of this House and upon the public that they suppressed its publication and committed an unpardonable and unwarranted wrong—a breach of trust to the people of this country, and what did they do with this same hon. gentleman who advocated this principle of government ownership? They appointed him to one of the first positions in the land, they appointed him head over the great Railway Commission that has been established in this country. Did they do it as we would naturally suppose, because he merited the situation, because of his ability? Let us hope so. But I am sorry to believe that they did it to get rid of a formidable opponent to their scheme down in the province of New Brunswick, where they expected last year to face the electors. Forced to resign from the cabinet on account of views absolutely antagonistic to the policy of the administration, Mr. Speaker what must you, what must we as representatives of the people, what must the people themselves think of such an anomaly? We shall see. Now let us look for a few minutes at this document submitted by the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals to his colleagues, dated December 10, 1902. This document written at that date will surely protect the ex-Minister of Railways from the unworthy epithets hurled at him, and absolve him from the unworthy motives ascribed to him by hon. gentlemen from the present Minister of Railways down to the backbenchers. This document, I say, puts the matter fairly. Now what appears in this document? One of the first things that strikes us is the similarity of the Hon. Mr. Blair's policy to that set forth by the leader of the opposition. In fact, in nearly every one of the leading particulars the two policies are absolutely identical. It has been asserted that Mr. Blair was opposed to the policy of the leader of the opposition just as much as he was opposed to the ministerial policy. In the election down in Queen's county where the hon. gentleman who sits in front of me was elected, this cry went up from every public platform, and the hon. gentleman no doubt himself stated that Mr. Blair was as much opposed to the scheme of the leader of the opposition as he was to the ministerial policy. Now I am glad to be able to state that this document puts the case fairly and ends all doubt on this point. Mr. Blair advocated the extension of the Intercolonial to the Georgian Bay by the acquisition of the Canada Atlantic Railway to be controlled and operated by the government, and the leader of the opposition does precisely the same thing. Mr. Blair says: Extend the railway from Quebec to Peace river by easy stages and after thorough survey and as needs of country and colonization require; the leader of the opposition says the same thing. Mr. Blair favours the final extension of the Intercolonial to the coast, again we have the policy of the leader of the opposition. Mr. Blair warned his colleagues that chartermongers would be around after just such a scheme as this, and warned them against adopting it, counselling them that government ownership was both popular and economical, was a broad-minded policy, that it was a popular and broad minded policy, and in the interest of the people of this country; the leader of the opposition and his followers have been for months working along the same lines. Mr. Blair pronounced in favour of government ownership of a system from ocean to ocean, and the leader of the opposition has undeniably pronounced in favour of the same principle. Now, I hope that hon. gentlemen in this House and gentlemen throughout this country will not any more have the effrontery to get up and state to intelligent audiences that Mr. Blair was not in favour of the policy put forward by the leader of the opposition. In speaking of the government road, Mr. Blair points out that the conditions governing the construction of the Intercolonial were not calculated to make it a profitable investment, and that it should not be taken as an argument against government ownership and control, much less shoud it be taken as an argument against the extension of our present government system in order to get a share of the western traffic. Now let me quote from this valuable document of Mr. Blair's. I am going to read somewhat fully from it, because I think the document puts the matter so fairly and because it is written by a man who has apparently given a great deal of study to it. I will read it for the edification and consideration of his colleagues, who apparently think that he is a worthy man because they have put him at the head of a very important department in the government of this country. Mr. Blair says :

It was only natural when this question has been heretofore mooted that the unsatisfactory showing made by the Intercolonial in times past should be pointed to as conclusive proof of the unwisdom of extending the policy of government ownership in Canada. This system has been deemed unsound because in the only instance in which the experiment has been tried, namely, in the case of the Intercolonial, the direct financial results appear, by comparison between the government road and corporation railways, to have been most unfavourable to the former. In many of the countries of Europe, such as France, Germany, Belgium and Italy ; in India, South Africa and notably in the Australian colonies, the principle of government ownership has been recognized and indeed almost exclusively adopted ; and, under conditions just as serious as those prevailing in Canada, so far as political influence is concerned, these railways have been uniformly successful.

Why is it, one may fairly ask, that in Australia, where it is known the stress of political pressure is undoubtedly as great, if not greater, than in Canada, these railways not only pay all operating charges, but yield a return on an enormous capital outlay of from three to five per cent ? while the government railway in this country until very recently, has failed to meet its operating expenses out of earnings. The reason must be sought in other directions than along political lines. So great is the disparity between the results in this country and those in Australia that no amount of waste, leakage and inefficiency, even corruption, if you will, can possibly account for it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Mr. Blair has made an extensive study of the conditions that governed the building of the railway system in the Australasian colonies where, from the nature of the undertaking, there was a great deal more capital invested in its railroads than would have been invested had they been able to foresee the mistakes they made. In spite of the vast expenditure of capital in this sparsely settled country, having to overcome a great many natural obstacles, the government railway system paid its operating expenses almost from the very start, and besides paid 2 per cent to 5 per cent upon the amount of capital invested. Mr. Blair points out that an apparent disparity exists between the net results of government ownership as shown by the Intercolonial and the corporate ownership of the Grand Trunk and Canadian Pacific Railway ; but he shows that this is not due to government control, and that if the corporations were handicapped in the same way as the government system is handicapped they would show no bette results. I cannot do better than quote the hon. gentleman's language upon that point also :

First, the location of the Intercolonial road was not governed by commercial, but by political considerations. No one ever expected that the road so located would yield any direct return upon its cost. It was projected to form a political bond between the widely separated maritime provinces and the older provinces of Ontario and Quebec, the western termiuus then contemplated being the city of Quebec. For military reasons it was constructed as far away as possible from the American boundary. It pursues an extremely roundabout and tortuous route in reaching its western terminus, and in so doing, it passes along a large portion of its line, through the most sparsely settled and least productive portions of the country. If traffic had been the object aimed at, the road would have been built along the valley of the St. John river, but business considerations were subordinated to military and high state reasons.

Neither of the two great railway systems in Canada with which the Intercolonial is compared has been so handicapped ; but, on the contrary, they have traversed the most productive, populous and promising portions of the country. Under such circumstances, if there were no other reasons to be assigned, can the Intercolonial be considered as affording a fair test of the possibilities of government ownership ? The undersigned ventures to affirm, with some confidence, that it does not. In addition, there is scarcely a section of the government railway which is not handicapped by a keen and active water competition. A glance at the map will show how closely the road follows the St. Lawrence and sea coast almost throughout its entire length, and that neither of the two great corporation railways are subject to such a disability.

A much more important fact with respect to the government railway remains, however, to be stated. The operation of the Intercolonial by government has secured to the people of all Canada who have access to it, moderate and stable rates of transport, applied to all alike, and absolutely free from discrimination. That discriminating rates do not exist on the Intercolonial is absolutely proven by the facts that no one ever hears of complaints upon that ground with respect to purely Intercolonial traffic. The same cannot be said with confidence of other great railway systems. Secret and preferential rates are not only possible on corporation roads, but are being from time to time proved to exist on some, notwithstanding that difficulties in the way of proof are considerable; while on the government road the public are sure of fair and equal treatment.

Mr. Blair compares the tolls charged on the government and corporate systems, and shows that if the same tolls were charged on the government as on the corporation roads cut off even as it is from western traffic connections, it would pay a handsome profit. The Intercolonial Railway is paying its way now, and for the past few years has had quite a substantial surplus. Mr. Blair says in regard to this :

The undersigned is unable to agree with this generally accepted opinion, and, on the contrary, confidently affirms that in his judgment the Intercolonial will bear favourable comparison in any branch or department of its service with any other railway in Canada. There is a prevailing public impression that corporation railways are free from the kind of pressure and influence which many believe enormously prejudice the interests of the Intercolonial. Such an impression, the undersigned believes, is an entire mistake. The Intercolonial has no monopoly in Canada of these conditions, nor are the corporation railways, either in the United States or Canada, free from their effects. It is well known that railway companies are constantly seeking favours from municipal councils, from legislatures, and from parliament, and they naturally desire to stand well with the people of influence. It is only necessary in the support of this statement to mention one fact within the knowledeg of many persons, that free passes are distributed by the company railways in Canada with a lavishness which finds no parallel on the Intercolonial.

Now as to cost of management of the Intercolonial Railway in comparison with other Canadian roads, what do we find ? Let me again quote from Mr. Blair. He says :

The observations thus far made by the undersigned amply justify the conclusion that it is quite misleading to look for a fair test of the principle of government ownership in the experience of the Intercolonial, or to condemn that principle as inherently defective because in the comparison of net results the showing as between the corporation railways and the government railways is unfavourable to the latter. There is no good reason which can be suggested, or which, in the opinion of the undersigned, actually exists, why the government of Canada cannot apply and work out the principle of government ownership as successfully as it is being worked out in other British dependencies and in foreign lands. The main object to be attained in railway administration is the highest efficiency at the lowest cost. The Intercolonial has come closer to that point than any other railway in Canada, and if other than high state considerations had influenced its location, it would now be enjoying a most successful career. Politics have never seriously hurt the government railway since it has been in operation. The deadliest blow ever dealt to this railway through politics was when its present location, between Moncton and Lévis, was decided upon. Politics can never inflict equally serious damage again except by operating against the proper extension of the Intercolonial Railway and preventing the absorption of desirable branches as feeders for the main line. The railway between St. John and Halifax, after the first eight or ten years of its operation, it is believed, has paid interest out of earnings on the capital invested, and has since contributed to keep down the deficiency arising on the less productive portions of the road.

Mr. Blair says that he is going into this matter to relieve, if possible, any prejudice that may exist against the Intercolonial Railway administration, and to ensure a fair and open-minded consideration of the policy of government railway extension. He says :

There is one certain means of putting the Intercolonial upon an interest-paying basis, and that is by the extension of its line. The Montreal extension has done much, but a further extension will do more. While the government railway has captured the larger part of the traffic originating in Montreal and destined for inland eastern and even export points, it has no connections west and is allowed to take only what traffic the two corporation railways do not care to retain themselves. All winter shipments from the west ordinarily reach the seaports of St. John or Portland via the Canadian Pacific and Grand Trunk, respectively, and, although the Intercolonial is fairly well placed to carry freight to Halifax and St. John, it must always remain excluded from that portion of the business arising west of Montreal, so long as present conditions continue.

The undersigned has long held the opinion that a port on the Georgian Bay should be reached by the Intercolonial, and thus a connection had with the Canadian Northern by water transport, open and practicable for from four to six weeks longer than canal navigation. The Canadian Northern would gladly co-operate with the government railway, as it has no other railway connection nor any interest antagonistic to the government system. Duluth and Chicago would be in touch with the Intercolonial, and direct through rates could be arranged to Montreal or Lévis during the summer season, and to St. John and Halifax during the winter. By the construction of storage elevators on a sufficient scale to hold grain in quantities not going forward until navigation closed, a large and ever-increased traffic would find its way over Canadian territory and by government railway to the ocean through the gateways of Halifax and St. John.

When the hon. member for King's, P.E.I. (Mr. Hughes) gets up and talks about carrying grain down from the prairies over this 1,800 miles of railway that it is proposed to construct in competition with the waterways to maritime province ports, I say that the hon. gentleman does not understand the situation thoroughly, and I do not believe that such a justification for the scheme will be seriously put forth even by the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. Johnston), who is smiling so blandly across the floor of the House. I do not believe it will be contended by any hon. members on the other side of the House that this new line is going to carry grain from Halifax and St. John for export shipment in competition with the water-ways. The only means of getting this grain down to the ports of Halifax and St. John is by the scheme outlined by the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair). That can be done by extending the Intercolonial Railway west to the Georgian Bay, and then the grain can be carried, according to the estimate of the Minister of Public Works, at a profit of 1·69 cents per bushel. Again Mr. Blair says :

To the undersigned, it has always appeared as if no reason, founded upon the highest political wisdom, existed why the province of Ontario should not be traversed by the Intercolonial. That province has been the storm centre of all opposition to the government railway. The most violent critics of the Intercolonial in parliament, as well as its most bitter opponents in the press, are to be found there, and this is because no considerable section of the people has any direct friendly interest in the railway. Relatively few people from that province travel over it. It does not touch the province, and Ontarians have been rather brought to look upon it as an ill-run and wasteful, if not corrupt, institution, tied like a millstone around the neck of the country, to be endured only because it was a part of the national compact and as a piece of public property which they would gladly see transferred to the corporations for the relief of the Dominion exchequer.

Again he says :

All this would be eliminated from Ontario politics as completely as the Intercolonial Railway has been eliminated from politics in the maritime provinces as the subject of party controversy, if the extension to the Georgian Bay were affected.

Again he says :

The fact is, public opinion is ripe to accept such a policy as a boon from the government and as promising relief to the country from what, rightly or wrongly, people believe are the unreasonable exactions of the corporation railways. The resources of Canada are large enough to justify an enlightened policy with respect to railway and transportation problems in the west ; but the government would not be supported in the supplying such a policy to the west only. There must be a balancing of the railway favours to be distributed. It would be a grave political blunder to respond to the western cry—and it must be responded to—without seeing to it that the interests of the people of the east are not overlooked.

Mr. Blair protects maritime province ports.

From the purely Canadian, national point of view, the Intercolonial would then have advantages over any other railway in Canada. Its traffic would find an outlet during the summer months at Montreal and Quebec, and during the winter at Halifax and St. John, and there is good reason to believe that it would give the two Atlantic seaports (the Canadian Pacific also serving St. John), all the business they could conveniently handle for some time to come ; and, moreover, from the point of view of its paying prospects, the outlook is in the highest degree encouraging. At present there are 400 miles of good paying railway at the eastern end of the Intercolonial Railway. Extension to the Georgian Bay by way of the Canada Atlantic Railway, would give 300 or 400 miles of profitable railway at the western end, and, as has already been pointed out, these two ends together would be able to carry financially the less productive and intervening section and afford a substantial surplus towards paying interest on the capital outlay.

Speaking of the extension of the Intercolonial Railway, Mr. Blair touches a very tender point with Ontario people, but in this proposal Mr. Blair is looking after the interests of the east as well as of the west. Last year I pointed out that this transcontinental scheme was passing right over the heads of the manufacturing industries of Ontario, and that in order to properly solidify the east and the west, some other railroad policy should be adopted. It is not only the products of the west that we have to get to the sea-board, but we have also to supply a means of getting the manufactured products of the east into the west at cheap rates. The other day a long article appeared in the Toronto 'World,' showing that the manufacturers of the east were at such a disadvantage on account of high freight rates, that the people of the west could afford to pay 33 per cent duty on a great many articles, and bring them into Manitoba and the Northwest Territories by American roads, rather than pay the freight rates charged by Canadian roads. Speaking of building these railways with the wealth of the country, and handing them over to private corporations, Mr. Blair said :

Moreover, the system is not sound. Why should a few people be allowed to make themselves millionaires in such a way ? No one nowadays puts his money into the capital shares of a railway company at the inception of the undertaking. It has been done hitherto ; it is not done now, and why not ? Because with government assistance supplementing the sale of bonds the railroad can be built. And yet capital shares are issued by the million and appear later, when the enterprise becomes a success, in the hands of the purchasers who clamour for dividends upon them.

Mr. Blair summarizes his argument as follows :

The ideal policy, as it appears to the undersigned, for the government to adopt, so soon as it shall be deemed necessary to take up the subject to a third transcontinental railway, would be to insure, first, that the railway shall be wholly Canadian. That it shall not promote the carriage of our export products or our imports southerly by way of United States lines of railway ; but to and from the St. Lawrence in summer and the ports of Halifax and St. John in winter. That the Quebec bridge be utilized as a part of said line, and that the railway be pushed westerly from that point by degrees to the Peace river district, through the Rockies to the Pacific coast. In the meantime, it would be well to decline all assistance to railways to which government is not already committed, and propose to parliament that railway charters covering this territory be withheld.

In this document, Mr. Blair is advocating a policy of Canada for the Canadians, and a policy of a truly national railroad. He is advocating a policy by which our government railway would become a paying investment, by which there would be cheap transportation to and from the west, with countervailing advantages to manufacturers in the east, and securing beyond peradventure that the harbours of the St. Lawrence and the maritime provinces would be utilized for Canadian trade. Mr. Blair wants that there should be no mistake, that the harbours of the maritime provinces would be nationalized ; that the grain of the west shall reach them, and as he points out, that the only way to do that is to extend the Intercolonial Railway to the shores of the Georgian Bay. Then, the money earned on the government roads would be spent amongst our own people. Seventy per cent of the earnings of the railroad would go to operating expenses, and thirty per cent would be returned in the shape of dividends to the treasury of Canada. But instead of that; under this scheme of the government, the grain of the west will be transferred over the Northern Pacific, passing out by way of Winnipeg across the International boundary at Emerson, and connecting with the Chicago and Grand Trunk. The earnings of the road will go to the people of the United States; the dividends will go to maintain United States railway corporations, and the Canadian people will be the sufferers. These are the views of the government's own man; these are the views of the ex-Minister of Railways, and judging from the high position in which the government has placed Mr. Blair, we must consider that he is their own man. They are also, Sir, the views of the leader of the opposition and his supporters in this House. Nor do the Conservatives, and Mr. Blair stand alone in this matter of government ownership. For years both in the United States and in England, they have been trying to get some control over these immense railway corporations. I quote from the Statesman's Year-book, 1898, these statistics regarding railways.

* Government line in view.

Thus of all the railway mileage of the world 87,834 miles are privately owned, while 146,813 miles are owned by governments. This comparison, of course, excludes the United States.

We find, too, that out of the total number of countries considered, namely, 51, 42 have public railways, while but 29 have private railways. Twenty-one have public railways only, while but 9 countries rely upon private railways alone. Out of 51 countries 41 own their railways in whole or in part, and this calculation takes no account of the nearly habitual government subsidies by which private roads have been built, but which nevertheless retain their private character.

In nearly if not quite all of the privately owned railways it is found that the state has intervened by way of guaranty of dividends, interest, or cost of construction, recognizing thus the public character of the railway service.

From this statement we find that in European countries the extent of public- owned lines is very much greater than that of private-owned lines, and that in only one instance, that of Italy, have the people turned back to private operation; and even in Italy the state owns and operates. Since this statement was published France has acquired nearly all lines in that country. I do not want to weary this House with statistics. Information showing the operation of state owned lines in Europe can be readily had by honourable members on the other side of the House who will take the trouble to go into the library and look it up. There is a fund of information there on the subject, if not mountains. From a further study of the information which I have been able to glean from books and statistics on railway management by government in comparison with private ownership, I find that about four-fifths of the stock and one-fifth of the bonds of American railways go fruitless every year, and have done so for the last eight years. It is well known that the bonding liabilities of the railroads considered as a whole, represent the actual cost value, element. I shall here give you authentic data relating to railway capitalizations, taken from Poor's Railway Manual:

1897—Miles operated, 181,133.

Capital stock	$5,453,782,046
Bonded debt	5,411,058,524
Gross earnings	1,133,546,666
Net earnings	338,170,195
Interest paid	231,046,819
Dividends paid	82,630,9?9

From the above statement we learn that in 1897 a total railway mileage of 181,133 miles was capitalized in about equal amounts of bonds and stocks aggregating $10,859,239,923. To show how largely fictitious and worthless the stock is, I take the following table from the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission:

known to railway management in order to try and make dividends for this over capitalization. I am going to read just a few paragraphs—

Hon. WM. ROSS. Don't, don't.

Mr. LEFURGEY. The honourable gentleman does not want to hear it. Possibly he is like some of the others—he does not take an interest in this question. But our duty in this House is, I think, to present this matter as fairly and intelligently as we can, in order that the public may know that we are trying to serve their interest. If the honourable gentleman does not want to listen to it, he can leave the House. I wish to read the following from the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission:

We are satisfied from investigations conducted during the past year and referred to in another portion of this report, as well as from information which is perfectly convincing to a moral intent, that a large part of the business at the present time is transacted upon illegal rates. Indeed, so general has this rule become that in certain quarters the exaction of the published rate is the exception. From this

Per cent paid.	Stocks.	Per cent of total stocks.	Funded debt (exclusive of equipment trust obligations).	Per cent of total funded debt.
Nothing paid	$3,570,155,239	66·26	$852,402,622	15·82

From this statement we see that $3,500,000,000 of the five and a half billions of railway stock paid no dividends, while nearly a billion of the bonds received no interest, and that six hundred millions more of the stocks and bonds paid only a return of between one and three per cent. An equal proportion of the total railway capital has been thus barren during every year of the last ten. This fact means that there never has been behind this part of the capitalization a real earning capacity, that this capital is not commercially valuable. I give this to show that the watering of stocks and over-capitalization have not only placed securities in the hands of the people as investments, that are largely worthless, but have placed these corporations in the position of having to resort to discriminations, poolings and the other numerous evils two things naturally and frequently result. First, gross discrimination between individuals and gross preferences between localities; and these discriminations and preferences are almost always in favour of the strong and against the weak. There is probably no one thing today which does so much to force out the small operator, and to build up those trusts and monopolies against which law and public opinion alike beat in vain, as discrimination in freight rates. Second, the business of railroad transportation is carried on to a very large extent in conceded violations of law. Men, who in every other respect are reputable citizens, are guilty of acts which, if the statute law of the land were enforced, would subject them to fine or imprisonment. This is true both of the traffic operator and the shipper. It is difficult to estimate the moral effect of such a condition of things upon a great section of the community, and almost impossible to believe that it can be allowed to continue without some attempt at reformation.

This condition the present law is powerless to control. If it is asked why the criminal remedies are not applied, the answer is that they have been, and without success. The most earnest efforts have been made by the commission and by prosecuting officers in various parts of the United States to punish infractions of this law. While some fines have been imposed, no substantial effect has been produced. It is plain to the commission that satisfactory results cannot be obtained from this course. The difficulties in the way of securing legal evidence necessary to a conviction are such as to be in most cases insurmountable.

These are the very conditions which will, at the end of fifty years, when this lease with the Grand Trunk Pacific will have expired, face the people of Canada. As I have already pointed out, we are now on the crest of the wave, and the opportunity now at hand may never occur again. It certainly will not for fifty years or one hundred years, if this deal of the government is consummated. In another section of this report of the Interstate Commission, I find the following :

We are of the opinion that to avoid the discriminations and grievous inequalities now existing, the government must ultimately, in some form or other, assume such measure of control over railroad rates and management as will restrict excessive competition and insure to all shippers, large and small, rich and poor, strong and weak, the same rights and privileges in everything pertaining to railway service.

Whoever will read the report of the special committee of the United States Senate, commonly called 'the Cullom committee', will be astounded at the magnitude and extent of railroad abuses brought to light by their investigation. Those unfamiliar with the facts made public at that time can hardly believe the outrages which were proven to exist and the manifold devices by which the most flagrant injustice was perpetrated. A single illustration will furnish a better reminder than extended comment. It appears from that report that the Standard Oil Company in one instance at least, boldly demanded from a certain railroad that its shipments should be carried for 10 cents a barrel ; that all other shippers should be charged 35 cents a barrel on the same article, and that 25 cents of the 35 paid by such other shippers should be handed over by the railroad to the Standard Oil Company; and the penalty threatened for non-compliance with this impudent extortion was the withdrawal of its entire business.

This is only one instance of what has been going on in the United States and England, under private ownership and control, for years past, and which will continue to go on. These are the conditions which we will have to face in this country. We will find a repetition here of what the Standard Oil Company has been doing in the United States for years. We will find these strong corporations oppressing the weak. We will find the weak and struggling man at their mercy. But what we require to do is to make Canada a country for free men. We are inviting thousands of people from other countries to come and settle on our fertile lands. Let us not then lose this opportunity of making this a country where every man will have a fair chance. Let us not lose this opportunity of crippling the power of private corporations and preventing our people from being subjected to the same conditions as those which have operated so detrimentally to the interests of our neighbours on the other side of the line. On the question of discrimination in rates, monopolies, favouritism and so forth, I could give quotations from the commission ad infinitum. The reports on railway nationalization and the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission of both England and the United States are full of such data as I have already given to the House this evening. In the case of passenger traffic, the abuses are even greater. Let me read just a few words from Mr. Justice Harlan, who thus expressed himself in a case in the United States :

Taken in connection with other decisions defining the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the present decision, it seems to me, goes far to make that commission a useless body for all practical purposes, and to defeat many of the important objects designed to be accomplished by the various enactments of Congress relating to interstate commerce. The commission was established to protect the public against the improper practices of transportation companies engaged in commerce among the several States. It has been left, it is true, with power to make reports and to issue protests. But it has been shorn, by judicial interpretation, of authority to do anything of an effective character. It is denied many of the powers which, in my judgment, were intended to be conferred upon it. Besides, the acts of Congress are now so construed as to place communities on the lines of Interstate Commerce at the mercy of competing railroad companies engaged in such commerce.

I quote this simply to show that although some hon. member opposite may get up and say that the government has control of the railways, that all the public facilities of this country are subordinate to the will of parliament, we have the fact staring us in the face that in spite of all the efforts of the people of the United States to control these corporations, in spite of the appointment of the Interstate Commission, in spite of the restrictions passed by Congress, it has been found impossible to make any headway against these immense corporations because they control, not only the transportation systems, but the governments and courts as well.

Let me give just a few statistics, showing the cost of administration.

Can we treat this question on a commercial basis ? The test of experience will show. Taking the countries having state and private owned lines side by side I get this comparative statement from a book on Railway Nationalization by Edward Clemens, published in 1898, showing the percentage of total working expenses expended on administration on the state and private lines respectively of different European countries :

Countries.	State Lines.	Companies' Lines.
	Per cent.	Per cent.
Germany	9·40	13·10
Austria-Hungary	6·50	8·47
Belgium	5·05	10·13
Denmark	6·89	5·77
France	16·16	9·56
Italy	6·49	8·76
Norway	7·30	7·00
Holland	5·30	10·35
Roumania	4·40	10·80
Russia	9·27	13·70

France alone shows a cost of state administration greater than private administration, but this is accounted for by the fact that at this time France had only the feeders while the companies held the main trunk lines. In all cases, however, where the conditions for comparison are parallel, the state lines will be seen to be more economically managed.

The following statement shows the comparative statement of working expenditure applied to the maintenance of way and traffic expenses respectively :

Countries.	Maintenance of Way.		Traffic Expenses.
	State Lines.	Private Lines.	State Lines.	Private Lines.
	p. c.	p. c.	p. c.	p. c.
Germany	35·90	28·20	31·10	35·30

From this we find that the cost of maintenance of way is generally higher on the state lines and secondly that the traffic expenses have a higher range on private companies' lines. The first proves beyond all doubt the condition in which the state keeps the permanent way and so is of general advantage to the public. I will give you a few statistics as regards a comparison of rates between some of the English lines and the Belgian lines covering the same distance :

—	British.	German.	Belgian.	Dutch.
Bar iron, &c.—
Brettle Lane to Liverpool	11·0	8·8	6·8	8·3
Ironware—
Birmingham to London { Packed	24·4	10·4 to 11·2	8·11	8·2

And these are government operated lines in comparison with the company operated lines.

Mr. ALEXANDER JOHNSTONE. Will my hon. friend (Mr. Lefurgey) permit me to ask him a question in connection with these rates ? I would like to ask if he has made a comparison with the American rates as well as the English and continental rates ?

Mr. LEFURGEY. As I told the hon. gentleman, if he wishes to get any information as to government controlled railways in comparison with others there is a fund of information—if not mountains of information—in the library. I have not found it necessary, nor do I think it fair to go into a comparison with American lines, which operate under entirely different conditions. I have given him statements showing the operation of government and company owned lines in the same country and under the same conditions. That is a fair comparison to make, but a comparison of rates where the conditions are so different as those in European countries and the United States would be merely misleading. From the information I have gained in such study as I have been able to make of the comparison of the state owned lines of the continent with the English lines, I have found that the rates and charges on the state owned lines are much lower than the others. The cost of administering state owned lines is much less than that of adminstering lines privately owned in the same country. This fact is an answer to the contention that state administration is more costly than private administration. I have shown that preferential treatment of foreign trade, such as our roads are accused of giving, does not exist in countries where the roads are owned by the state. These are three important facts that I have found in my study of this question. And I can assure hon. members that I have only touched upon the fringe of information that is to be had in favour of government owned and government controlled lines. If hon. members wish to verify the statements of the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals, all they have to do is to go to the library, or go and consult that gentleman himself, and he will give them the information. This scheme of the government does not give us any of these advantages. On the contrary, in the first place, it practically ties the hands of the people from protecting themselves. The government enter into a partnership with this corporation, the government supplying from $150,000,000 to $170,000,000, while the corporation supplies, as Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson says, $14,500,000; yet the advantage and profit go to the company. Secondly, the additional conditions under the supplementary agreement remove every vestige of control—there is absolutely no provision to compel the Grand Trunk to ship freight originating along the new line to Canadian ports. And the hon. member for King's, P. E. I., (Mr. J. J. Hughes) went on to show us that this phase of the subject had been amply protected by clauses in the agreement. Now, the hon. gentleman had apparently not followed the debate of last year, when this point was frequently mentioned. We have the expression of two ministers of the Crown on these questions, and I will just read what they say. At page 9014 of 'Hansard' of 1903, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fitzpatrick) is reported as follows:

> What is the use of talking? Can we shut our eyes to geography? Can we shut our eyes to facts? How much of the trade of Montreal has gone to Halifax? How much grain has gone from Montreal to Halifax or to St. John? How much of our food products have gone that way? Invariably they have gone to Portland or to Boston or to New York. As Portland is to the Grand Trunk Railway so Boston is going to be to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

In other words, the Minister of Justice pooh-poohs the idea of there being any possibility of our ports getting any share of this western traffic. And yet the hon. member for King's (Mr. J. J. Hughes) says we are protected on this point. And when sections 42 and 43 of the contract, which the hon. gentleman believes to protect the interests of the national ports of the Maritime Provinces were under consideration last year, the following discussion took place:

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax) The hon. Minister of Finance said that the reason why sections 42 and 43 were required was because the Grand Trunk Railway had a terminus at Portland, and might otherwise carry freight to that port. Where is there anything in sections 42 and 43 to prevent them doing so?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There is nothing to prevent them, but they must charge no higher rate for traffic to Canadian ports than they charge for traffic to American ports.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). And Portland being so much nearer than St. John or Halifax, they would necessarily carry it to Portland.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE.——

Trying to evade the issue——

—They might carry it to Portland if they were perfectly free; but under the present contract they are obliged to give the same rate to St. John or Halifax as to Portland.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). They will give the same rate, but it will be to their interest to carry it to Portland.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE.——

At last cornered——

—Undoubtedly they would make more money by carrying it to Portland, but we do not intend to permit them to carry it there.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Where is the restriction to prevent them?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE.——

Gives in finally—

—By the fact that the Canadian rate is not greater than the American rate, and we will trust to the patriotism of the Canadian shipper that when the rate to a Canadian port is not greater than to an American port, he will ship by the Canadian port.

What an unbounded simplicity of faith the hon. gentleman has in the average Canadian shipper. He believes that the shipper will go down to the railway operators and say: I want to be a good Canadian and ship by the Canadian route; it does not make any difference to me if my goods are delayed ten days longer than they would be by another route. This is the protection the hon. Minister of Finance is relying upon to nationalize the ports of Halifax and St. John.

What will the shipper say when he goes to the Grand Trunk agent and asks him about shipping 50,000 bushels of grain? The agent will say: How do you want it shipped? The answer will be: I want it shipped in the most expeditious manner and at the lowest possible rate. The agent tells him: The rates are the same over the Grand Trunk system to Montreal and Quebec as by Portland. But which is the quickest route—supposing I have perishable goods ?—Oh, well, of course Portland is the quickest route. Now, Mr. Speaker, what do you suppose that man is going to do ? He is going to ship by the route that will give him the most satisfaction and the most satisfaction to his consignees. These commercial transactions are not governed by patriotic considerations. People do not carry on their business from that standpoint at all. The very fact that this thing can be done, the very fact that this is a soulless corporation, that it is earning money for watered capital, that it is earning money for its shareholders, will lead them to route the goods that will put the most money into their pockets, and that is by the Portland route, on which they have expended $25,000,000 or $30,000,000. The hon. member for King's, when he was speaking, conjured up figures to represent the cost of the Grand Trunk Pacific scheme. Although other hon. gentlemen admitted that it would cost, one $120,000,000, another, $80,000,000 ; another, $13,000,000 : he thought it would not cost $1. Now, I want you to know that this hon. gentleman has been a bank manager, and, of course, he can conjure with figures. He has been able to get the cost of this railroad down to $1, in fact he made the assertion later on that it would not cost one cent to the people of this country, because all this money would be paid back and there will be no liability. Does the hon. gentleman forget that we loaned to the Grand Trunk Railway $25,000,000 at confederation on which we have received no interest, and that the interest and principle now amount to $50,000,000? Can we expect any better results from the present scheme?

Now, in regard to this question of routing the traffic and making it impossible for the Grand Trunk Pacific to carry grain to other than our national ports, when this question was brought up last year, I think the Minister of Finance said that the contract was closed now, and that they could not put any additional clauses in it. But, Mr. Speaker, the contract has been opened up by this supplemental agreement, and has the hon. gentleman and his colleagues thought fit to protect the interests of the maritime provinces in this regard ? Will the members from the maritime provinces on the government side of the House get up and insist upon the maritime ports being protected beyond peradventure? Will the hon. gentleman from King's, P.E.I., or any of his colleagues will get up after I sit down and state that they believe the maritime ports are protected by this clause after what I have shown from the words of the Finance Minister, why will they not make assurance doubly sure and cause a stipulation to be put into the agreement that will compel this grain to be brought to our Atlantic ports ? Thirdly, this government has acted hastily and ill-advised—hastily in throwing a scheme like this into parliament as they did last year without due deliberation, without that deliberation which any body of men would give to a private undertaking that did not involve anything near as great a sum or on which so much depended as this. They acted ill-advisedly in that they did not heed the advice of the ex-Minister of Railways, but on the contrary excluded him from their council when they met in solemn conclave on this question, concealing from the people and from the other members of this House his opinion in favour of government ownership. Fourthly, they have secured no control of rates, no reciprocal trade facilities by this agreement. Fifthly, they are encouraging gambling in public utilities by allowing the greater part of this $25,000,000 of stock to be held and sold to the public while it represents no real value in the road. Sixthly, the liability undertaken will practically build the whole road, while the profitable parts of it become the property of a private corporation. Seventhly, it expends unprofitably the resources of the country, to the detriment of our natural shipping transportation routes and waterways. Eigthly, and the most dangerous feature of all, it throttles the will of the people by postponing government ownership for one hundred years.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have spoken on this question from a sense of duty. I believe that I have been sent up here to represent the best interests of the people of Canada, and I realize that I shall have to go back to my own constituents and give an account of my stewardship in this House. I believe that in getting up on this occasion and in advocating, as I have done, government ownership of railways, and in asking the government to reconsider this scheme, I am simply doing what the people who have placed their confidence in me expect me to do. I say of this scheme, as I said of it last year, that this government cannot place their finger upon one great work that they have attemped or put into operation since they came into power. They are now endeavouring to erect a political tombstone for themselves, and I believe they will succeed in doing it.

Mr. T. I. THOMSON (North Grey). Mr. Speaker, the fact that the government have not a speaker to answer the arguments of my hon. friend from East Prince (Mr. Lefurgey), to my mind, indicates one of two things : either the government do not enjoy the hearty support of their followers in connection with this policy or else that they display a great deal of indifference in regard to this, the most important matter that has come before parliament for a great many years. I took the opportunity of speaking upon this question at the last session of parliament, and I promise you to-night that I shall be very brief indeed. During the interim it has been my pleasure to talk with a great many people in the constituency which I have the honour to represent in this House, and on all hands I find the expression of opinion to be that if it is the duty of the government to construct another transcontinental railway it is their duty to own and operate that railway in the interests of the people. I submit that it is not our duty to construct another line of railway and give it to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company to operate, control the rates and pocket the profits. The people of Canada have borne great burdens in order to bring about confederation. We constructed the Intercolonial Railway to bind the maritime provinces together, at the enormous cost of $70,000,000. That was one of the terms of confederation. In later years we gave large subsidies for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway to bind the western provinces together, and also to carry out the terms under which British Columbia came into the cofederation. This expenditure also has another aspect, and a most important one from the fact that our young people who were unable to get land for themselves in Ontario, were driven to the states of Kansas and Dakota instead of settling in our own western territory. By the granting of liberal subsidies to the Canadian Pacific Railway, we not only complied with the terms of confederation, but we also opened up the large western territory for settlement by our own people and those from other lands. To-day you can traverse Canada from the tide waters of the Pacific to the tide waters of the Atlantic and never touch American territory. When the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) introduced his Bill at the last session of parliament, he stated that one of the most important reasons for the immediate completion of this work was the fear that the Americans would abrogate the bonding privilege. We have built a line of railway from tide water to tide water, we have the Intercolonial Railway to Quebec and Montreal, we have the Canadian Pacific Railway stretching from the Pacific to Montreal and Quebec, so that in case of the abrogation of the bonding privilege, we have the winter ports of Halifax and St. John and the summer ports of Quebec and Montreal, and at no time can this country be incapacitated on account of the abrogation of the bonding privilege. It would, to a certain extent, cause inconveniences, but I can assure you that the inconveniences would be greater for the American people than for the people of Canada. But, it does seem remarkable in the face of these immense sacrifices on the part of the people of Canada, that we should be asked at this late date and under very much different conditions to burden ourselves with an expenditure of $170,000,000 for another transcontinental railway and then make a present of it to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. The Canadian Pacific Railway has proved a great financial success. The company, since the construction of the road, has been paying interest on the bonds and for years it has been paying from 4 to 6 per cent on the common stock; in fact, it has achieved the greatest financial success that has ever been achieved in this country. If the Canadian Pacific Railway, which received a liberal amount of assistance from the people of Canada has been such a great financial success, more particularly as that road was built through a new country in which it had to build up its trade, I ask you is it not unreasonable that we should be asked at this late date under more favourable conditions to construct another transcontinental railway which must be a profitable enterprise, provided the proper route is taken and the proper methods adopted in its construction.

I am satisfied the farmers of Canada are weary of the continuous burdens that are being placed upon them for these purposes.

During the 18 years these gentlemen who now occupy the treasury benches, were in opposition, they expressed great solicitude for the farmers. Foremost within their ranks was the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) whom I do not see in his place at the present time, but now his solicitude is for another class. We find him like Alexander the Great, weeping because he has no more relations—to place in the public service.

The promotion and construction of railways has been a great source of wealth to a few in this country, at the expense of the many. Having obtained a charter, the Dominion gives them a subsidy, the local governments also grants a subsidy. Then the municipalities through which the road passes give bonuses. From these sources they receive enough money to build the road. Next they mortgage or issue bonds for every dollar the road costs for construction. Every reasonable man would think they had realized enough to satisfy their craving for wealth, but, Sir, this is not so. They have another card to play. That is their issue of half or two-thirds of the whole cost of the railway in stock. Hence the railway is loaded up with debt of more than twice the cost of construction. Under these conditions the farmer cannot obtain any reduction in freight rates until this vast amount of watered stock is satisfied with a good dividend. It is no wonder that the farmers of Canada are dissatisfied with this government. They will be obliged to pay the greater portion of the bounties voted last session by parliament: $10,000,000 to the producers of steel, $2,500,000 to the producers of lead and $150,000 to the manufacturers of binder twine.

This parliament also voted 10½ million dollars in subsidies to railway projects in the older provinces, chiefly in Quebec and in the maritime provinces. All this is in addition to the $170,000,000 for the proposed transcontinental railway, which is to be given to the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think that you realize the importance of these matters and the position that the farmer will likely assume in the next election when the government will regret that they have entered so hastily into a contract of this kind.

But, Sir, our liabilities do not end here. By this agreement with the Grand Trunk Pacific, we are to do all permanent improvements on the eastern portion of the road for the next fifty years, which railway experts declare will amount to a greater sum than the original cost of construction. I read in the agreement, section 16 :—

> In case, after completion of the said eastern division and the taking possession thereof by the company under the lease thereof, hereinafter referred to, or at any time thereafter during the continuance of the said lease, the government shall deem it necessary to expend any sums of money for the improvement of the said eastern division, the replacement of structures by others more modern, or otherwise upon capital account for betterments, and not being 'working expenses'.

Hence the government agrees to do all the betterments on the eastern division extending over 1,900 miles, for the next fifty years, and as I have said, railway experts declare that the cost of betterments or improvements of a permanent character made in the road during the first fifteen years after its construction, is equivalent to the cost of the original construction. This will be clearly understood when we see the great change that has taken place in railroad conditions during the last few years. To-day you have cars carrying 60,000 pounds and 80,000 pounds as against cars carrying 10,000 pounds a few years ago ; you have large locomotives ; where formerly you had fifty or sixty pound rails to-day you have ninety pounds or one hundred pound rails ; and Sir, after you have made all these changes in your rolling stock and roadbed you will find that your bridges will not carry your heavy cars and your mogul engines, and you will have to reconstruct them and build them anew. Hence, the rail road has to be practically reconstructed in fifteen years, and hon. gentlemen will at once see that the opinion of the railway experts in this connection is perfectly correct and reliable.

Now Mr. Speaker, as the representative of North Grey, I would ask : what advantage will the construction of this road be to my constituents ?

It will place an indebtness on the riding of North Grey $800,000 of $100,000 on each township, or $125 on every hundred acre farm. On the other hand, if this proposed railway can haul grain, flour, &c., at the rate given by the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) who spoke as the government critic last year, it will injure the commerce of the great port of Owen Sound, of the port of Meaford and all other ports on the Georgian Bay. The vast traffic which passes through these ports to-day will pass to and from the seaboard 300 miles to the north. The 600 longshoremen of Owen Sound will no longer be required, and all the interests which are connected with the great shipping industry of Owen Sound will be a thing of the past. In like manner, the prosperity and growth of the town being blighted, the whole country tributary to Owen Sound and to Meaford will no longer have the remunerative market it has to-day. And on the other hand if this eastern division should not prove a success, but a loss, the people of North Grey will have to pay the $800,000 just the same. No matter how I view the scheme it is bound to be detrimental to the best interests of North Grey.

It is remarkable to what an extent the members of the government differ as to the cost of this road. The ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) places the cost to the people for the construction of this road at $129,000,000, but this was before the Grand Trunk Pacific secured the changes in the agreement. Some of the government supporters place the cost at $80,000,000 or $100,000,000. The statement of the Prime Minister, however, is the most remarkable of all, coming as it does from the leader of the government. I quote his words from 'Hansard,' 1903, page 7691.

> The sum total of the money to be paid by the governement for the construction of this line of railway from Moncton to the Pacific Ocean will be in the neighbourhood of 12 or 13 million dollars and not a cent more.

Mr. Speaker, when the right hon. gentleman made this statement, I observed a smile on the faces of the opposition members, and I asked the reason. They replied 'Oh, you are a new member, and you don't know the Prime Minister,' and the thought occurred to me that while the members of the opposition might know the Prime Minister, the people in the country did not. It would appear, if we are to judge by the right hon. gentleman's statement as to the cost of this line of railway, that his judgment in matters of this kind is very unreliable. The vagueness and the indefiniteness of the figures of the Prime Minister, remind us of the story of the school inspector who was examining a class in arithmetic. He put this question : supposing I were to loan your father $100 at 5 per cent interest, and he were to pay me back $50 with interest at the end of six months ; how much would he still owe me ? The boy answered: He would still owe you $100 and the interest; No you stupid child, said the inspector, you know that I mentioned in the sum that your father had paid me back $50 with interest at the end of six months. Oh, said the boy, that's in the sum, but you don't know father. Well, Mr. Speaker, the people of the country don't know the Prime Minister. I prefer to take the estimate as given by the leader of the opposition as to the cost of construction of this railway and I quote from revised 'Hansard' (1904) page 728. I ask the permission of the House to hand it into 'Hansard' without wearying hon. gentlemen by reading at at length. The hon. the leader of the opposition says :—

My estimate is as follows :—
Construction of railway from Moncton to Winnipeg, 1,875 miles, at moderate estimate of $40,000 per mile	$ 75,000,000
	$84,000,000

The above estimate assumes that the money can be borrowed on 3 per cent securities at par—but if securities are placed at 90 (and the Finance Minister has admitted that they will not bring par) the result would be :

To provide $75,000,000 at 90 per cent as cost of 1,875 miles..	$ 83,333,334
Four years simple interest during construction, at 3 per cent, $2,500,000 per year for 4 years..	10,000.000
	$92,333,334
Assuming the cost of the railway to completion to be..	$84,000,000
We must add seven years' interest (not compounded) after completion, during which the Grand Trunk Pacific is to pay no rent..	17,640,000
	$101,640,000
Interest on this sum for three years additional, during which no rent is collectable, unless earnings are sufficient (not compounded)	9,147,600
	$110,787,600
But, as above stated, if the securities are placed at 90, instead of at par the cost of the railway will be....	$ 93,333,334
Seven years' interest after completion (not compounded)..	19,600,000
	$112,933,334
Interest on this sum for three years additional, during which no rent is collectable (not compounded).. ..	10,164,000
	$123,097,334

QUEBEC BRIDGE.

(Hansard 14526, sec. 6.)

Bonds to be guaranteed by the government, to be issued monthly, as work proceeds, and bridge to be completed 1st December, 1906.. ..	$ 6,678,200
Eighteen months' interest at 3 per cent for half of the period between December, 1903, and December, 1906, during which the work will be in progress..	$ 300,519
	$ 6,978,719

Thus we have the cost of the eastern division, including the Quebec Bridge, as follows :—

If securities bearing three per cent interest are sold at par, then our liabilities in respect of the railway from Moncton to Winnipeg will be..	$110,787,600
Our liabilities in respect of the Quebec bridge will be..	6,978,719
	$117,766,319
If our securities bearing three per cent interest are sold at not more than 90, after payment of commission and charges, then our liabilities on railway from Moncton to Winnipeg will be..	$123,097,334
Quebec bridge..	6,978,719

This does not include any interest on the twenty half-yearly payments of interest which the government will be obliged to make during the period of ten years in which the Grand Trunk Pacific will pay no rental.

And it does not include $18,850,000 estimated by Mr. Blair as our loss during forty years in which we shall receive from the Grand Trunk Pacific three per cent, while we shall probably be paying at least three and one-half per cent on the money borrowed for the purpose of constructing the road.

But the engagements of the country do not stop there. To the sum total for the eastern division and the bridge, whether we take the figures at $117,000,000 or $130,000,000, must be added the obligations to which the country is committed for the prairie and mountain sections.

For the 1,000 miles of prairie section, the country will guarantee three per cent to the extent of $13,000 per mile. For 1,000 miles, this would amount to $13,000,000.

For the 500 miles of mountain section, we guarantee three per cent bonds sufficient to provide seventy-five per cent of the whole cost, including interest during construction, and any discount on the sale of the bonds.

The president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company puts the actual cost of the whole at $50,000 per mile.

500 miles at $50,000 per mile..	$ 25,000,000
Interest at 3 per cent for four years, being on the whole amount for one half the period of construction.. ..	3,000,000
	$ 28,000,000
Seventy-five per cent of the above to be guaranteed by the government for the construction of mountain section..	$ 21,000,000
	$ 25,410,000
But if bonds sold at 90 per cent, then to provide above $28,000,000 there would be required..	$ 31,000,000

Seventy-five per cent of above to be guaranteed by the government for the construction of mountain section..	$ 23,250,000
	$ 28 132,500

SUMMARY OF OBLIGATIONS.

	If 3 p.c. bonds are sold at par.	If 3 p.c. bonds are sold at 90 p.c.
Eastern division and Quebec bridge..	$117,750,000	or $130,000,000
Prairie section..	13,000,000	or 13,000,000
Mountain section	25,000,000	or 28,000,000
	$155,750,000	or $171,000,000

Thus if three per cent bonds are sold at par, the eastern division and Quebec bridge would cost $117,750,000 ; the prairie section would cost $13,000,000 ; the mountain section would cost $25,000,000 ; total $155,750,000. If three per cent bonds are sold at 90 ; the eastern division and Quebec bridge will cost $130,000,000 ; the prairie section will cost $13,000,000, and the mountain section $28,000,000, making a total of $171,000,000.

The leader of the opposition as will be seen figures out the cost of the road at $170,000,000. Let me place on record what $170,000,000 means. One hundred and seventy million dollars in gold will weigh no less than 708,333 pounds or 354 tons. It would require a train of thirty-six cars of ten tons to haul this amount of gold. The train would be a half mile in length. In dollar bills it will extend 18,400 miles. It is equal to $6 per foot for every foot of railway. Imagine thirty-six cars of ten tons each loaded with gold a present from the people of Canada to the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

Mr. Speaker, while we have to incur this vast expenditure, we have the statement of Sir Rivers-Wilson at the meeting of the Grand Trunk shareholders in London on March 8, 1904, that they forced the Canadian government into a partnership in which they put up $15,000,000 as their portion. This is what he said :

If you have followed the figures which I have just mentioned, you will find that the result shows an amount of principal bonds guaranteed in respect of both sections of £2,968,000, and of annual interest of £118,720, but even this interest liability, comparatively small as it is, need not accrue until the expiration of eight years—the period allowed for construction—the interest on cost during construction being provided for out of capital. This, then, constitutes the responsibility of the Grand Trunk Company, and I hope this statement will allay the apprehensions, which have been already expressed by a few critics, who may not have sufficiently studied or accurately understood the provisions of the agreements. (Hear, hear.)

This is a partnership in which Canada puts up 170 millions of dollars, the Grand Trunk 15 millions, and the Grand Trunk people own the road, control the rates and take the profits. I do not believe the country is in favour of such a partnership. The policy of the opposition is to extend the Intercolonial Railway to the Pacific coast. It will cost us 50 millions of dollars less than the proposed agreement. We will own the road, control the rates and operate it in the best interests of the people of Canada. This to my mind is a policy that will meet with the approval of the people of this country.

The member for South Essex (Mr .Cowan) quoted from a speech delivered by Sir John A. Macdonald 34 years ago declaring that government ownership was inconvenient. The member for South Essex, like Rip Van Winkle, has been sleeping for the past 34 years ; he has not taken stock of the great change in the opinions of public men of late years as regards public ownership. Why, Sir, to-day municipal corporations, towns and cities, not only in Canada, but also in Europe, are operating these public franchises instead of letting them pass into private hands. The city of Glasgow has shown what may be done in the interest of the people in this respect. Why, Sir, the town of Owen Sound, in which I live, owns and operates to the advantage of the people their water system, the electric light, the gas light system, and have refused to allow the street car franchise to pass out of their hands. In France, Australia and other countries we find state-owned railways, owned and controlled by the people to their own advantage. This is an age of progress, and the public demand the control of these franchises as far as possible. The day is not far distant when the Canadian people will demand the control of all the railways in this country, as they to-day have control of our canals and waterways.

Mr. Speaker, I question the right of this government to commit the country to this scheme until it has received the endorsation of the people. In the elections of 1900 no mention was made of such an undertaking, and where the people have had an opportunity of passing judgment since the scheme was proposed in parliament, they have voted against the government. I ask you, is it reasonable that a country where the whole annual revenue derived from customs and excise amounts to $49,000,000, should be committed to an expenditure of $170,000,000 without the people being first consulted ?

The present government have certainly a very checkered record in this respect. The contract for the Yukon Railway, which involved the giving away of four million acres of the richest gold lands in the world, was signed a few weeks before parliament met. The people's representatives were not even consulted before the deal was consummated.

A few years later this same government refused to send Canadian troops to South Africa because parliament had made no provisions for doing so. It would appear that this government is moved more by expediency than by precedent or sound constitutional principles.

Mr. Speaker, I will vote against the Grand Trunk Pacific Bill because I believe it is detrimental to the best interests of my constituents and also to Canada. I am opposed to burdening the people with an indebtedness of $170,000,000 for the benefit of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company. If another transcontinental railway is necessary, I am in favour of extending the Intercolonial Railway, which we built and own, from Montreal to Port Simpson, and of controlling and operating it to the best interests of the people of Canada.

Mr. SAMUEL BARKER moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Fielding, House adjourned at 11.20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, April 20, 1904.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 70) respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—Mr. Douglas.

Bill (No. 71) respecting the Ottawa, Brockville and St. Lawrence Railway Company.—Mr. Logan.

QUESTIONS.

WEIGHING OF BUTTER AND CHEESE.

Mr. POPE—by Mr. Taylor—asked :

1. Was there a commission appointed to investigate the weighing of butter and cheese ?
2. If so, when was this commission appointed, and what was the name of the person or persons who constituted the commission ?
3. At what places, if any, did the said commission hold sittings ?
4. Did they take evidence, and were reporters and newspaper representatives admitted ?
5. Has the commission reported ? If not, why not ?
6. At whose request was the commission appointed ?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT (Minister of Trade and Commerce) :

1. Yes.
2. The commission was dated the 7th December, 1901. Mr. W. G. Parmelee, Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce, was the person appointed.

Mr. THOMSON

3. Sittings were held at Montreal, St. Hyacinthe, Victoriaville, Brockville and Cowansville.
4. Evidence was taken. Reporters and newspaper representatives were present during the sittings at Montreal. None appeared at any of the other sittings.
5. Yes.
6. The commission was appointed in consequence of numerous complaints having reached the government in re the weighing of butter and cheese.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to bring to the attention of the government the desirability of having an early meeting of the Committee on Public Accounts.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). I shall call the attention of the chairman to the matter.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY—CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the government whether there is or is not any correspondence between the government and either the Grand Trunk Railway Company or the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company relating to the Transcontinental Railway project, which has not yet been brought down, and also whether there are any papers or documents relating to that project or negotiations with these companies, or either of them, which have not yet been brought down ?

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). As to correspondence with either the Grand Trunk Pacific or Grand Trunk Railway Company, I have to inform my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) that there is no correspondence—everything has been brought down.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, for the House to go into committee to consider a certain resolution concerning the ratification of the agreement between His Majesty the King and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, dated the 8th day of March, 1904; and the proposed motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

Mr. SAMUEL BARKER (Hamilton). Mr. Speaker, before I enter upon the discussion of the resolutions, I desire to say a few words in answer to the criticism of the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. A. T. Thompson), in which he treated so severely the financial statement of the leader of the opposition. The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. A. T. Thompson) was so positive about his figures, so sure and so certain of the subject with which he was dealing, and his remarks were received with so much applause not only by the hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches, but by every gentleman sitting behind them, that they are certainly worthy of some comment from this side of the House. The hon. member (Mr. Thompson) seemed to have either overlooked or not fully understood the object of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) in presenting a statement of the whole obligation of the country in connection with this transcontinental scheme. That object, as I understand it, was to show the whole amount of obligation incurred by the country whether in direct payments or in the shape of guarantees, to contrast the whole sum of these obligations with the comparatively small amount of those undertaken by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and thus to demonstrate to the people of Canada that having regard to this disproportion in responsibility and the very small sum undertaken by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, it would be a wise thing for the country to assume the whole and own the property. I wish first of all to deal with the item of $15,250,000 which the member for Haldimand struck off from the estimate of the hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) and which had been included by the leader of the opposition as representing what he estimated to be the loss on the sale of 50 year bonds at 3 per cent payable half yearly. He evidently assumed that these three per cent bonds were going to bring their par value and that therefore the discount charged by the leader of the opposition ought to be deducted from the total amount of the obligation. As to the question whether 3 per cent bonds would realize par, let me read the correspondence with the Grand Trunk Railway Company brought down by the government. We find there among the statements laid before the government by the Grand Trunk, these words :

> Inasmuch as bonds issued by the company bearing 3 per cent interest and guaranteed by the government will not realize par——

The hon. gentleman (Mr. A. T. Thompson) assumes that they will realize par. Let me also refer to some remarks of his leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), the right hon. the first minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in his speech as reported at page 721 of 'Hansard' used these words :

> It is notorious that even with the endorsation of the Canadian government, whose credit is as high as that of any government in the world to-day, these bonds could not be sold except at a heavy discount, and the government therefore has undertaken to implement the difference which may exist between the price realized by the bonds and their face value. How this is to be done we are not prepared to say at the moment.

I think these two quotations pretty well dispose of the easy manner in which the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. A. T. Thompson), struck off that trifle of $15,250,000. But, Sir, in order to see how far the position taken by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) was reasonable, I have caused a calculation to be made of the difference between the par value of 3 per cent bonds and the value of these bonds purchased to pay 4 per cent on the price. I have done this because when Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson, president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, was laying before his shareholders the cost to them of their guarantee, he computed that at 4 per cent. I have great respect for the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. A. T. Thompson) and for his knowledge of finance and of what securities of this character are likely to bring in England. But I really do think more of the judgment in that respect of the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. That gentleman had by his side his vice-president, a very prominent member of the Stock Exchange of London, than whom there is no man in England more capable to judge of such a question. He had also by his side eminent London bankers, his fellow directors, and in laying before the Grand Trunk shareholders the obligations they were undertaking, desirous as Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson was, to place the most favourable aspect of the case before them, he had to admit that he would have to allow 4 per cent upon the par of the bonds to be assumed by the Grand Trunk. To ascertain the comparative value of 3 per cent bonds under these circumstances, I have had a calculation made, and I find that allowing for a return of 4 per cent on the investment, the value of the 3 per cent bond, payable half yearly, is 79·16. If you compute the 4 per cent interest half-yearly the value is 78·45. Taking it at round figures the value would be 80 and surely when the hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) allowed 90 for these bonds he was doing a reasonable thing, and his computation was made on a basis of 90. The first deduction of the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. A. T. Thompson) was made on this item, and I leave it to the House and to the country to judge whether he is right in his opinion or whether we should accept the opinions of Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson, the declared declaration of the right hon. the first Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and the result of an actuarial computation. What was the position in that respect of the hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) ? He candidly and frankly stated to the House that if the bonds did sell at par, the whole cost to the country would be $155,000,000. He put before the House the alternative of a cost of $155,000,000 if the bonds sold at par and of $171,000,000 if they sold at a discount of 90.

The next point made by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. A. T. Thompson) was in regard to the cost of the mountain section, $25,000,000; this he strikes off. I believe this idea was suggested by the happy thought of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), who argued: Oh, the property is all right, it will pay; what matters what you guarantee, it is a guarantee only. The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. A. T. Thompson) said it was like a man endorsing a note of a millionaire and so, apparently, that it made no difference whether you guarantee or not. When these gentlemen come to talk about the guarantee by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, it is all right for them to talk of the obligation thereby assumed by that company. It is all right on one side but very absurd on the other. So the hon. gentleman (Mr. A. T. Thompson) strikes off with a dash of his pen $25,000,000. The most extraordinary thing about it is that the $25,000,000 was divided by the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) into two portions 75 per cent and 25 per cent, the country undertaking the obligation of 18¾ millions, and the Grand Trunk taking an obligation of 6¼ millions. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. A. T. Thompson) strikes off the whole 25 millions from the calculation of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden).

Now, the hon. gentleman for Haldimand was very profuse in his remarks about blunders of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. He said they were egregious blunders and he made some severe remarks. He was very sarcastic at times. He said that my hon. friend the leader of the opposition had shown that he was not capable of considering or discussing large financial transactions. The hon. member for Haldimand apparently is not, because at the very first step he takes he makes a slip of $6,250,000. He could not make that sort of an error about the prairie section because there is a maximum amount, but he does strike off the whole of the $13,000,000 the country is to guarantee on that section. Again I say that the Grand Trunk get full credit for every dollar they guarantee, as to them it is an obligation assumed, not so as to the country. And they are going to do pretty well from that guarantee in addition. They are going to get $45,000,000 of stock as compensation for their guarantee. What is the country going to get? The country is going to guarantee all this money without a dollar of compensation in the way of stock; yet it is not to be treated as an obligation, according to the hon. gentleman. The next item is $15,739,000 which the hon. gentleman strikes off as an over-estimate by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition of the cost of the eastern division. The hon. gentleman goes into figures. He satisfies himself that $31,000 a mile will be a fair average cost for the eastern division. We have had wonderful reports of surveys. According to the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) we have full and complete returns of the survey of the eastern division from Winnipeg to the boundary line between Ontario and Quebec. I will deal with that presently when I come to make some remarks in regard to the hon. gentleman's speech. But the hon. member for Haldimand knows exactly what the eastern division is going to cost—some $31,000 per mile instead of $40,000—and he strikes off the estimate of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, $15,739,000. I would like to test the opinion of these hon. gentlemen in this way. Last session these hon. gentlemen were sure the mountain section of the western division would cost only $40,000 per mile. They had the opinion of the railway expert of the other side of the House, an hon. gentleman, who, I am sorry to say is not here, having been away all session through illness, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). That hon. gentleman was quite confident that $40,000 a mile was more than ample to construct the mountain section. Well, we have now the opinion of some experts who are highly eulogized by these hon. gentlemen. We have the opinion of Sir Rivers-Wilson who has beside him the expert, Mr. Hays. Mr. Hays has had before him for months all the old surveys of the Canadian government, the original surveys of Sir Sandford Fleming. They have more information about that mountain section than about any other portion of the whole system and after months and months of consideration these gentlemen say that the mountain section is going to cost what? —$50,000 a mile plus the interest during construction. One hon. gentleman, when these figures were quoted, spoke of a fake report. I do not know that is is very material what that hon. gentleman said about the report, but I would like to quote from the 'Railway News,' the chief railway newspaper published in England. This paper has given the only full account of the proceedings of the Grand Trunk meeting. We will find there what Sir Rivers-Wilson says about the cost of the mountain section. He says:

> Assuming again the cost of building of 500 miles on the mountain section to be $50,000 a mile——

This is repeating his previous statement on the subject.

> —or $25,000,000, that is to say, £5,000,000 in all, the one-fourth amount of bonds to be guaranteed by the company will be £1,250,000, or, adding interest during construction, say £150,000, a total of £1,400,000 carrying interest at the rate of £56,000 a year.

There, the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company adds to the $50,000 a mile three years' interest at 4 per cent as the interest during construction, making his estimate of the cost of the mountain section $56,000 a mile, instead of the $40,000 so easily settled upon last year by hon. gentlemen opposite. If the hon. member for Haldimand is as far out about the eastern division as the hon. member for North Norfolk was last year about the mountain division, no great reliance can be placed upon his estimate. There is a difference of 40 per cent. If you add 40 per cent to the $31,000 a mile that the hon. gentleman bases his calculation upon, you will find that the eastern division will cost about $43,000 a mile, a higher cost for that division than was assumed by the leader of the opposition. So, I think, there is not much room for the hon. gentleman to use his little knife to whittle down these figures to what he said were comfortable figures. Next, the hon. gentleman strikes off $3,304,000 for interest upon that over-charge upon the eastern division. I am quite prepared to admit that is the only thing I have been able to agree with him in, because, if you strike off $15,000,000 as excessive you must strike off the interest, but on the other hand if you leave in the $15,000,000 you must leave in the $3,000,000. The next item is a peculiar one. It relates to the Quebec bridge. The hon. gentleman said that my hon. friend the leader of the opposition should have taken from his estimate $4,978,200. He says that the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) put the amount to be charged to the construction of this railway by reason of the added subsidy given to the Quebec bridge at about $2,000,000 and apparently he bases upon that the reduction of the $6,978,000 by $4,978,000. Let us see exactly what the arrangement was. The agreement with the Quebec Bridge Company is set forth in chap. 54 of the statutes of last session, vol. 1. The hon. gentleman did not take the trouble to look at the agreement or he would not have deducted that $4,978,000. I quite admit, that, perhaps, the statement of $6,978,000, as given by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, might well have been reduced by the $1,000,000 I am now about to refer to. The agreement recites this :

> And whereas the government has granted a subsidy towards the construction of the said bridge to the amount not exceeding one million dollars ($1,000,000), and has paid to the company on account of the said subsidy the sum of three hundred and seventy-four thousand three hundred and fifty-three dollars ($374,353).

That was the position when this agreement was made. Under the old arrangement the country was pledged to the payment of $1,000,000, of which it had only advanced $374,353. Under this agreement the balance of that million is released. Here is the recital :

> And whereas the amount necessary to complete the said bridge and the said lines of railway and to provide the necessary terminal and other facilities as well as to pay off the aforesaid amount of the present indebtedness of the company is estimated at the sum of $6,866,882.

* * * * * * * * * *

> The company releases and foregoes any claim which it may have upon the government for any balance now remaining unpaid of the said subsidy of $1,000,000 so granted by the government as aforesaid . . . The company shall be at liberty to issue such bonds, debentures or other securities as hereinafter provided to an amount not exceeding $6,678,200.
> When and so soon as the company shall have completed all the arrangements mentioned in the two preceding clauses, and the proceeds of the said issue of $200,000 stock shall have been paid in full to the company, the company shall be at liberty to issue such bonds, debentures or other securities as hereinafter provided to an amount not exceeding $6,678,200.
> The said bonds, debentures or other securities shall be issued by the company upon the credit of the company and upon the security of its undertaking and property, and upon the franchises, tolls, rents and revenue thereof, and shall form the first charge upon the same, and shall be secured by a mortgage thereon, as hereinafter provided. They shall be issued payable in fifty years from the date thereof, and shall bear interest at the rate of three per cent per annum, payable half yearly, and shall be issued as hereinafter provided.

You will notice the rather remarkable correspondence between the terms of this guarantee for this bridge, and the terms of the guarantee on the other portions of the railway contract.

> The government shall guarantee the payment of the principal and the interest of the bonds, debentures and other securities to an amount not exceeding $6,678,200.

And then there follows a provision for paying interest on that money during the construction of the bridge. That, altogether, came to the amount that the leader of the opposition charged in connection with this transcontinental scheme, and the only question is, whether the hon. leader of the opposition should have taken off $1,000,000, leaving nearly $6,000,000 to be charged up to this company, instead of $2,000,000 as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Thompson) put it.

Well, Sir, the next point made by the hon. member for Haldiman (Mr. Thompson) is a perfect gem in the way of criticism. He strikes of $9,147,600, because he says the eastern division may earn it, but if it is not earned it is to be capitalized, and therefore it is not to be charged. His words were :

> It is added in the cost of the road.

And therefore the government paying money as part of the cost of the road, it is not part of the cost of the road according to the hon. gentleman. Why, it is as much a part of the cost of the road as any other dollar put in the construction, and yet the hon. gentleman (Mr. Thompson) strikes it off. That is a most brilliant effort on his part, and if he had only gone a little further in that way he could have wiped off the whole cost of the road. As to another matter dealt with by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Thompson) I feel that I can speak even with a little more confidence, because this time the member for Haldimand is running up against two hon. gentlemen; he is criticising not only the leader of the opposition, but the hon. Mr. Blair, and of course, as these two gentlemen do not know much about finance, the criticism of the hon. member for Haldimand is expected to go. Mr. Blair pointed out that such were the terms of the lease proposed by the government, that in addition to all other charges incurred by the government, the government was bound to lose $18,000,000 through the arrangement that they had made for the financing of the rent of the Grand Trunk Railway Company during the period of 40 years. It is so plain that a school boy can understand it. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Thompson) says: Oh! the leader of the opposition is cutting off at both ends; why, he took off the discount on the bonds and now he is charging the $18,000,000 on the interest. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Thompson) seems to think that one loss compensates another. The beauty of it is, that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Thompson) struck off the discount too, and then he strikes off the $18,000,000. The position taken by the leader of the opposition as to that $18,000,000, is a perfectly simple and reasonable one, and I am surprised that the hon. gentleman from Haldimand should not have seen it at once. The discount on the bonds after the first ten years of the lease the rent begins to become payable, the government is in this position, it has issued bonds bearing three per cent; it has to meet the interest on these bonds every six months; the government cannot afford to have any doubt on the market about its paying to the hour; it must be ready every six months with its gale of interest. The Grand Trunk does not pay its rent until the end of the year; the government, on the 1st of July let us say, has to provide something like $1,690,000 to meet the half yearly payment on the interest of the bonds. At the end of the year the Grand Trunk returns precisely that sum, but the government has been carrying that temporary loan for six months and the Grand Trunk does not pay cost of it. Under this most extraordinary arrangement which probably the Minister of Finance has devised, the government, every six months for forty years, has got to raise $1,690,000 in the bank, in advance of the rent, and that is a loss of money. You cannot raise temporary loans of that kind without paying interest, and the sum of your loss is said to be $18,000,000 in the forty years. I have not myself calculated the loss. But the hon. gentleman, (Mr. Thompson) says: you are cutting us at both ends.

I observed that the first minister was in an ecstasy of delight at the wonderful way in which the hon. member for Haldimand had brought down the estimate of the cost to what he called comfortable figures. He got his cue from the Minister of the Interior. The Minister of the Interior thought that it did not matter; that it did not matter in the least how much we guaranteed, that they were only giving a little confidence to weak-kneed shareholders in England. But the hon. member for Haldimand went one better, and he began whittling off the guarantees, the loss or discount on bonds, the interest capitalized and interest lost; and so he was applauded by his friends who were in ecstasy. There was one minister, however, who did not seem to take it all in. I watched the Minister of Finance, and if ever misery was depicted on the face of any man, it was on that of the Minister of Finance during this financial criticism. I did intend to follow the hon. gentleman (Mr. Thompson) in some other of his arguments, but I really do not think it is necessary.

Before I take up the agreements, I want to say a word or two about two points that seem to exercise the hon. gentlemen opposite very seriously. They are very much concerned about the attitude of the opposition with regard to the question of government ownership, and they are also very much concerned as to our opinion of the proposal submitted to this House by the Grand Trunk Railway Company in the name of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company. Well, as to government ownership, I think that is an open question at present. I think that it is a matter of the greatest importance to this country and to the future of this country, and I think it ought to be kept an open question until it can receive from the people, a fair and impartial consideration. In my opinion, Sir, it is a wrong for the government to enter into any arrangement such as this which must hinder and impede any proper consideration of that subject. For that reason alone I object to this agreement. I object to it upon its own demerits. If it became a question of at once accepting government ownership or this agreement, whatever hesitation I might have in regard to government ownership, I would at once accept it rather than impose this scheme upon the country.

As to the scheme of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, that was the only scheme before this House up to the end of June or the beginning of July last. In general terms, the position of the Grand Trunk Railway Company at that time was this. Their system of railways permeated almost every portion of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, reaching all the important points in those provinces. It also served by its connection with the Intercolonial Railway to furnish to some extent trade and facilities for the maritime provinces. The chief difficulty of the Grand Trunk was that it had no connection with the great wheat fields of the west. It is true, it had received only last year, as Mr. Hays stated, 24,000,000 bushels from the far west by the water route ; but it was so tied up by its lack of rail connection that the company had been considering for eighteen months how they could best get relief. On the other hand there was a fear on the part of the country that if the Grand Trunk Railway Company made untrammelled connection with the west, there would be a danger to Canada in the fact that the Grand Trunk had an interest in diverting the trade from this country to Portland and other United States ports. That, in a general way, was the position of the company towards this House and the country. Now, what did the Grand Trunk Company do ? The Grand Trunk Company having, as Mr. Hays puts it, fully considered this matter for eighteen months, submitted a Bill to this House. They proposed to construct a railway from North Bay or Gravenhurst through Manitoba to the Pacific Ocean. That, Sir, assuming that this country would have granted fair and reasonable assistance, would have been a magnificent proposition for the Grand Trunk Company ; it would also have been, I think, a good proposition for the Dominion of Canada, proper and reasonable conditions being attached to any subsidy we might grant. Therefore it is that we on this side of the House say that it is a matter for regret that the original prososition submitted to his House by the Grand Trunk Railway Company was not carried out. Some hon. gentlemen think that we, by accepting that proposition, would have put ourselves in the position of allowing the Grand Trunk to divert the traffic of the Northwest to Portland. Why should that be so ? If the Grand Trunk had got that charter, and had applied to this House for a subsidy, does anybody suppose that they would have got such a subsidy without having imposed on them proper and full conditions to protect the country against diversion ? We on this side of the House would have taken care of that, no matter what hon. gentlemen on the opposite side might have chosen to do. We would have brought it to their attention, at all events. But, Sir, what conditions have hon. gentlemen opposite sought to impose upon the Grand Trunk by the contract which they have entered into, to protect the country against this diversion to Portland, that could not have been as well made part of any subsidy contracts? Not only could these conditions have been inserted in a contract relating to a subsidy, but much more might have been added of a far more protective nature for the people of this country than anything that is contained in this contract. There is no doubt that had the Grand Trunk undertaken to build their line of railway from North Bay, we would have been justified in granting more than usually liberal terms for the section from that point to Winnipeg, and it might have been provided as a condition of that subsidy, that any money this country should pay to the company to assist in that work would, in the event of parliament becoming satisfied that the company were not honestly and fairly carrying the traffic through Canadian channels to the maritime seaports, become a charge against the railway and a debt to the country. That would have been a very simple matter to provide for in a contract relating to such a subsidy. Therefore I for one regret that the proposition of the Grand Trunk Company was not carried out.

The hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Wade) takes great credit to the government for having compelled the Grand Trunk Company to accept the eastern division. Well, that is a most remarkable statement coming from that hon. gentleman, who was present, I think, at almost every meeting of the Railway Committee, and who knows perfectly well that in the first Bill introduced by the Grand Trunk into this House, the proposition was that they should build from North Bay through Winnipeg to the Pacific Ocean. I think the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. McCreary) wants to make out that the Bill provided for a railway to run north of Lake Winnipeg. I have the Bill here. It was introduced by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and it provided for a main line through Winnipeg. We approved of that. We never had anything else to consider. It is quite true, away back in November, 1902, there was some discussion in the country about a line proposed by the Grand Trunk Company, to run north of the lake. That was never before this House ; but if the hon. member for Selkirk wants to find out who approved of that route, let him turn to the columns of the 'Globe' in November, 1902, and he will find that that route was approved of not only by the 'Globe' but by the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) and two of his colleagues. It was not approved of on this side of the House. It was never before us. The first proposition that we had before us was to run the line through Winnipeg.

When the Bill was before the committee, a number of gentlemen from the city and district of Quebec, interested in another line, set up opposition to the Grand Trunk Bill, because the line terminated at North Bay. Without the intervention of the government —the government took no part in what was going on in that committee—some of the members representing the district of Quebec asked Mr. Hays the question : Will you extend your line from North Bay to Quebec ? Mr. Hays at once said, yes. There is not an hon. gentleman on the other side who does not know that what I state is correct. The moment it was suggested by some gentlemen from the district of Quebec that the line should be continued to that city, Mr. Hays at once agreed. Then some gentlemen from the province of New Brunswick, thinking that if railways were going so easily, they might as well have one built down their way, said to Mr. Hays: Will you continue your line to Moncton? Mr. Hays said: Yes, we will. Where is the compulsion exercised by the government on the Grand Trunk Railway? Mr. Hays voluntarily and at once agreed to extend the line to Quebec and to Moncton, and my hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Wade) thinks that the government made him do it. Why, it is the other way. Mr. Hays, having become cornered, having agreed to build these extensions which he did not want; immediately went into private negotiations with the First Minister, and the government took them off his hands. The government took off his hands not only the extensions from North Bay to Moncton, but also the line from Winnipeg to North Bay which the Grand Trunk had itself proposed to build. The government actually compelled the Grand Trunk Railway to let it build the line from Winnipeg to North Bay! That is the wonderful compulsion of which the hon. member for Annapolis boasts. The result of Mr. Hays' negotiations with the First Minister was the breaking up of the whole Grand Trunk original proposition. The Grand Trunk Railway induced the government to take over, not only the Moncton to Quebec and the Quebec to North Bay sections, but actually to take over nearly a thousand miles of railway from North Bay to Winnipeg which the Grand Trunk were willing to build themselves; the government immediately got down into these unfortunate negotiations which the country will probably never hear the end of.

We had a notable speech from the hon. the Minister of the Interior, and I must say that the points he made received the rapturous applause of his colleagues and the gentlemen about him. He said that the surveys had really been made on the eastern division from Winnipeg to a point within 500 or 550 miles from the city of Quebec. He made that positive statement to this House. He said that there were full and complete surveys to the boundary line between Ontario and Quebec, a point about 500 or 550 miles from the city of Quebec. We had urged the government to bring down a return which would show us what surveys were going on. Again and again the request was made to the government, but the government told us there were no surveys to their knowledge. They had no information about surveys. At last we got an answer from the Minister of Railways (Mr. Emmerson). In reply to a formal question, which was put the other day by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Puttee) the Minister of Railways answered that the surveys going on were on the branch lines. The answer given by the Minister of Railways, who, of all men, should have a special and particular knowledge of this matter, was that the surveys were going on along the branch lines. But the Minister of the Interior, who knows more about the Department of Railways than does the Minister of Railways, comes down and tell us that the main line is surveyed from Winnipeg to the boundary line between Ontario and Quebec. He felt that something more was required from the government than the answer given by the Minister of Railways. It was a subject of comment in the House and country that although the First Minister last year was so ardent and pressing and so fearful lest he might lose an hour, he did not at this moment even know what was going on. He did not know that a survey was going on. He did not take steps himself to have even an exploration of the country made, concerning which he knew nothing except from the pile of books which he described as a mountain of information. The right hon. the leader of the government appeared to be utterly indifferent. Nobody can doubt that the government knew that surveys were being made by somebody. The public press, the Liberal portion of it, at all events, talked in general terms of the splendid results which were being obtained. But the right hon. gentleman does not know anything about such surveys. Does any one believe that the results of the Grand Trunk Railway surveys would not have been upon this table for our examination if the government believed them favourable? Were they favourable we would not have had to ask for them. Does any one imagine that if the government went to the Grand Trunk Railway and said, we want copies of your plans, field notes and reports, the Grand Trunk, asking, as they were for enormous assistance, would have dared to refuse the request? It would have cost a very small sum to furnish copies, and we could have had on this table all the information about that survey which the Grand Trunk Railway has. We would not then have to trust to the notes of a geographer for the results of it. What did the hon. minister do? Did he go to the Minister of Railways and say: Lend me one of your railway engineers? They have half a dozen of them over there, experienced men who have passed their whole lives in such work, who could have gone to the Grand Trunk Railway and got all the information and examined it. But no, the Minister of the Interior did not do that. He took a gentleman who draws maps in his own office and sent him to examine the maps, plans, profiles and field notes—a work which requires a life study.

He would have done better to send his stenographer there than his geographer. If you take this gentleman's report, you will see that all he did was to talk with Mr. Stephens of the Grand Trunk. Mr. Stephens tells him a story and the geographer puts that into writing for the Minister of the Interior. And this is read to us gravely as a serious report of a survey upon the strength of which millions of money are to be spent. We find the words of the Minister of the Interior on this subject at page 815 of the revised version of 'Hansard' he says :

It is to be regretted that the surveys which have been made were not returned from the Grand Trunk Railway Company to the government in such a way that they could be laid before the House.

I think so too. But what a condemnation of the Minister of Railways. Is there going to be another flight ? Apparently what the First Minister did last year with respect to the hon. Mr. Blair, the hon. Minister of the Interior is doing now with respect to the present Minister of Railways (Mr. Emmerson). He goes behind that gentleman's back, sends his officer to get information that the Minister of Railways ought to have got, and then comes into the House and says 'It is to be regretted' that these surveys were not got. That was the sly dig at his colleague. He goes on :

But a few days ago——

Just a casual thought of his to send for this information—

——I sent the geographer——

'I' sent the geographer—

——of the Department of the Interior——

He was quite precise, you see.

——who is himself a competent surveyor and a thoroughly qualified man——

He could have got half a dozen men qualified for that business in the railway department. But, if he had gone there, perhaps he would have been told, rudely—but properly—to mind his own business and not meddle. But he has meddled, and I suppose we should be grateful, because we have the report. We shall see how far the Minister of the Interior was entitled to represent this as a complete and full survey from Winnipeg to the provincial line of Ontario and Quebec. The report of the geographer begins in this way :

Memorandum.

During the summer of 1903 preliminary surveys were made of the line between North Bay and Winnipeg and location surveys were made of a large portion of the line between Winnipeg and White Earth Lake, about 200 miles.

That figure is a clerical error, though it appears in the revised 'Hansard.' The report itself says 300 miles. I do not want to cut the hon. Minister of the Interior down. He has not much here, and I want to give him the whole of it. This location survey to White Earth Lake is a singular circumstance having regard to the comments made by many hon. gentlemen on this side of the House as to the probability of the so-called 'premature section' being built. White Earth Lake is just about the point where the main line diverges to Lake Superior—that is, where it will diverge as a branch to Thunder Bay. They have locations that far, and evidently that is all they have that they can do much computation upon. The report goes on :

The extraordinary wet weather not only interfered with the work and movements of the survey parties but made the carriage of supplies extremely difficult and expensive. Enough work has been done, however, to show that it is possible to get a line from Winnipeg to the point at which the North Bay branch diverges from the main line.

There is the other strategic point. First he gets a location survey to where the roads will diverge to Port Arthur and then a 'preliminary survey' to the next point where it will diverge to North Bay. And that is all he gets. Even then, he has only preliminary surveys—a sort of walking surveys through the woods and over the rocks—for most of the ways to where he turns down to North Bay. And the Minister of the Interior tells us that this is a complete survey all the way to the province line between Ontario and Quebec. The geographer goes on to give some details, not from the location surveys but from preliminary surveys, to certain points down to the 733 mile post. And then comes a paragraph that the hon. Minister did not read :

From the eastern end of the last section——

That is, from the 733rd road mile, post.

——the survey line turns south eastward by the Metagami and other rivers to North Bay.

There is where the survey has been coming to and the only survey that has been made. They have surveyed from Winnipeg to White Earth Lake, 300 miles; the location survey—probably most of it had already been done in the surveys for the Canadian Pacific Railway years ago, and then they have made some preliminary survey for part of the distance to where they want to diverge to North Bay. And that is the report that the Minister of the Interior reads to this House as a satisfactory report to be laid by the government before the House, upon which we are to determine so important a question as that now before us. Then the hon. minister goes on to speak of the increased guarantee as a matter of no importance—Mr. Toots would say it was 'of no consequence.' It was given to create confidence in the Grand Trunk shareholders, gentlemen who do not know as much as we do. It can make no difference apparently whether the guarantee is larger or smaller, for the road will pay its way ! And another gentleman adds, 'It will not cost us a dollar.' I shall have something to say later on about the question whether it will cost us a dollar or not. But I wish to read again, on page 799, the exact words of the Minister of the Interior. I would like to give these words because they are of considerable importance as being the words of the Minister of the Interior and have been accepted by his colleagues. Every hon. gentleman who has followed on that side has been trying to say a little more in the same line, and say it a little stronger :

> But, for ourselves, having gone into this enterprise with the profound conviction that it was going to be profitable in every sense of the word, including that of upbuilding Canada, and we are prepared to meet these gentlemen who, for their part, are afraid, and show our confidence by releasing the old provision and inserting provisions which can only come into effect in case of default which we do not anticipate.

I draw your attention, Sir, and the attention of the House to these words. They are a distinct statement that the alterations made in this contract can have no effect—they add nothing to the obligations of the country, unless there is default made by the company in the payment of interest. I shall remark upon that later on. He says further:

> The concessions have been made for the purpose of meeting the views of those who fear that our anticipations of success might not be realized.

Now, I will say no more at present as to the speech of the Minister of the Interior except a few words as to the extraordinary inaction of the government with regard to the surveys and with regard to obtaining the information from the Grand Trunk. I repeat what I said a few moments ago that no one can doubt that the government deliberately abstained from asking for the information. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Emmerson) must have had it brought to his daily attention that this matter was probably the most urgent subject before the country, the one in which the people were most interested. The government knew that these surveys were going on but they were determined that they would not know the results. They were afraid to ask the question lest they might get some information that would not suit them and so they remained in ignorance. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Emmerson) felt that

> Where ignorance is bliss
> 'Tis folly to be wise.

And so he curbed his curiosity.

On this side of the House we have expressed our deep regret that the government did not proceed with the commission on transportation which was promised in the speech from the Throne in 1903. A very valuable paper upon that subject was prepared by the Minister of Public Works. I read it in full last year, and as it is now upon 'Hansard' I do not propose to read it again, but I do propose to state here the substance of what that paper contained. It was prepared in April, it was before the Governor in Council in May and was adopted unanimously by the First Minister and all his colleagues. It dealt with transportation as affecting our exports, our importations and our interprovincial trade; transport by all Canadian routes to and from the ocean; transport by our existing railways and by lake, river, and canal routes. New surveys were to be made to determine whether more economical and efficient channels could be opened up by land and water. We were to consider the improvement of our present channels and the Order in Council pointed out

> That the forces operating against all-Canadian transport were competition by United States railroads and by United States vessels and the diversion of Canadian products through eastern and western outlets to Portland, Boston and other United States ports.

The difficulties that were to be met were presented to the House and to the country and it was set forth that in order to consider how these difficulties should be met, it was proposed to appoint a commission to investigate and report. The order declared that before any satisfactory conclusion could be reached on these questions a thorough inquiry and investigation should be made by competent experts. This was a very important, a very far reaching and a most statesmanlike paper, which was presented to the government by the Minister of Public Works and surely we may ask in the words of the order, that before the country is committed to this scheme, experts shall consider whether the route in the far north will ever serve the purpose that this transcontinental system professes to serve. Surely the people in the older settlements who have built up the country, are entitled to know before they build that line, 300 or 400 miles to the north, that it is going to accomplish some good for the Dominion of Canada. The people of Ontario and Quebec are not cheese-paring about these matters; they are willing to spend their money freely for the good of the Dominion, but they do not want to spend it wastefully or uselessly. If this line is to be regarded as a colonization system let it be so treated. Ontario is to-day spending millions, for colonization in the north, and Quebec also is spending money for the same purpose. Let the people who are providing that money get the benefit of it, and if there is any trade to be obtained in the north land let it be brought down to them; and let us ascertain whether, after all, for through traffic and interprovincial trade, the present channels, the route through Ontario and Quebec and the maritime provinces, is not the best route. Is it not important for us to ascertain before building a railway of any class away up in the north, whether after all the traffic must come down through the lakes and by the routes now existing throughout Ontario and Quebec? What does Mr. Hays propose to do? Is there one thing from first to last to show that he is even thinking of any line to eastward of North Bay? Every act, every word he utters, shows that he is thinking only of his original proposition. The surveys he is making and this report which the Minister of the Interior brings in show that Mr. Hays is thinking of two points only. He wants first a branch line to Thunder Bay, near Port Arthur. Why does he go there? There is no local traffic at Thunder Bay or anywhere near it. He wishes the line to Thunder Bay to reach the water in order that the wheat may be transported 550 miles by lake to Grand Trunk rails at the port of Midland. He is seeking secondly a line for his winter route to North Bay, so that traffic that will not go by the lakes at any time, and all traffic during the winter months, may be taken to North Bay whence it will be hauled over the existing Grand Trunk lines through the older provinces. There is not the slightest indication that he ever intends to use that premature line to Quebec and Moncton. Every person who has had any knowledge or experience of railway carriage knows perfectly well that the line which commands the lake route parallel to its rails has an immense advantage over any other. It can carry traffic by all-rail or by part water and part rail as may be most advantageous. What do we find Mr. Hay saying? I again read not from that paper which somebody referred to as a fake report; I am reading from the report published in the 'Railway News' which is in exactly the same words. I am very glad to have it here, and I am sure that the hon. gentlemen who were so doubtful about what they called the fake report will be delighted to have every word confirmed by the report in the 'Railway News.' Mr. Hays, haying been called 3,000 miles across the Atlantic to appear before the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company in order to convince them of the desirability of this project, making a speech as his president had done before him, and any hon. gentleman may take this paper, which belongs to the library of parliament, and about which there can be no pretense of privacy and he will find that from beginning to end of Mr. Hays' speech that gentleman never uttered one word about the extension beyond North Bay. He discussed only the scheme which he brought before this House in the spring of last year, he deals with the question of traffic as we do, and it is clear from his statements that he expects the traffic will go by North Bay, or by the lakes, and not otherwise. Every body knows that any railway which wants to compete with its rivals or to carry traffic cheaply or to give effective service to the public must have traffic both ways.

If the company hauls traffic one way and gets nothing but empty cars back it cannot live. If you have a line away up in the north land carrying cheap through traffic and nothing returning, no merchandise, none of that high class traffic which is the backbone of the earnings of a road, it will be left idle, and the route which has traffic both ways will be used. Mr. Hays knows that. In order to convince the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway that this North Bay scheme of his is a good one he points out where the west bound traffic will come from—not a word about any west bound traffic over that northern line. It will never get it; he knows that and he very carefully avoids saying anything about it. He says:

> Now, gentlemen, the Grand Trunk Pacific is going to be in quite a different position from that of an ordinary new enterprise stretching across the territory I have explained to you. Here is the Grand Trunk, the parent company, standing with a large traffic ready to deliver it westbound. This traffic is now given to a competitor. It does not have to wait five, ten, or fifteen years to build up a traffic; it starts with a traffic right from the beginning, and that is of a most remunerative character,—a high class traffic——

Let us see where it comes from.

> —consisting of agricultural material, dry goods, boots and shoes and all class of merchandise that a new and rapidly developing country requires.

Where does the Grand Trunk get that class of traffic? It is the cream of the business. It will get it in the province of Quebec, in the cities of the maritime provinces, in the province of Ontario and through the old settled districts. Cars that come down loaded with wheat will go through these old settled districts and they will go back loaded with this merchandise. The Grand Trunk will not send that traffic 400 miles to the north. The cars will return by the route they have come by and the traffic will be by way of North Bay or the lake route. Mr. Hays knew what he was speaking of. He knew that these men were aware that through the older provinces they reaped all their earnings and he was pointing out that the life of the new line, the line from North Bay to Winnipeg and onward, will be the return westbound traffic that it will get to enable them to haul wheat cheaply to the east. But some hon. gentlemen ask: What have we to do with what passes at the Grand Trunk meeting? Surely hon. gentlemen in this House who do not profess to be experts would like to get the opinion of an expert like Mr. Hays. When Mr. Hays points out where the traffic will come from, that it will come from these old settled portions of the country, that it is here that he gets all the best rates on merchandise, boots, dry goods and clothing, everything that is manufactured in our own land and that he is going to take that up to the west filling the returning cars he has brought down with wheat surely he knows what he is talking about. He was pointing out to the shareholders of the Grand Trunk what he knew would catch them ; he was pointing out that the traffic coming down from Winnipeg would reach the parent line at North Bay going over the whole of the parent line and earn profits for the old Grand Trunk shareholders instead of earning 3 per cent for the government 400 miles north. Are they going to deprive their own proprietors of the fat traffic, the good traffic in order that the government may get 3 per cent ? Why, Sir, the government have given the utmost inducement to the Grand Trunk Railway Company not to carry the traffic up there, because, if the Grand Trunk Railway Company do not earn 3 per cent for a certain time it will be capitalized. It will pay them not to make that line profitable. I might mention, however, that the government have also taken very good care that the parent line is going to control the baby. It is going to control the Grand Trunk Pacific. The Grand Trunk Pacific will not get a pound of the traffic that will afford any profit to the Grand Trunk Railway Company. If the profits go to the Grand Trunk Railway Company which ever way the traffic goes and if there is more profit going by way of North Bay than by the northern route which way is the Grand Trunk going to send the traffic ? Is it going to send it up north just to please the right hon. leader of the government and prove that there is something in the remarks that he made last year in the House as to the magnificent country through which this road is to pass and the wonderful traffic it was going to furnish ? No, Sir, railway men are rather practical, and if Mr. Hays wants to earn dividends for his main line the traffic will go just where it will best pay. The company can carry the traffic cheaper, and with greater profit to itself even at low rates, by having it upon a line that has business to and fro, rather than upon a line with business in one direction only. Surely that must be the case. Supposing the wheat traffic which must be large goes by way of the northern route is there any possibility that the westbound tonnage will in any material degree correspond with it, and must there not be an enormous mileage of empty cars over a thousand miles to the prairies ? By the North Bay route the returning cars will pick up traffic from station to station which is the most profitable kind of traffic and they will be employed most of the way back. How are you going to use these cars from station to station away up at Lake Abitibi ?

Now, Sir, as to the western division : Sir Rivers-Wilson puts the total guarantee of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, which he admits to be an obligation, for both the prairie and mountain sections at $14,840,000 —say $15,000,000. These are careful estimates made by him in the presence and no doubt with the assistance of Mr. Hays. Therefore, I think that we may take it for granted that when my hon. friend the leader of the opposition bases the charge to be borne by the government on the same figures that he is as nearly correct as it is possible for any man to be in making an estimate. So, Sir, I say, having regard to the argument used by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, if we are to incur an obligation of $155,000,000, throwing aside for the moment the even larger sum, and if the Grand Trunk only incurs an obligation of $15,000,000, it is far better for us to undertake the whole responsibility, to throw aside all these negotiations and all these questions of agreements yet to be settled—because there are two or three agreements yet to be settled, yes, it is far better to build the whole line even if we lease it next day to the Grand Trunk Railway Company. We can build that line cheaper than it will be built under these complicated arrangements. We can save money by building and owning the line. We only undertake the liability of a very few millions more and if we build the road ourselves does any hon. gentleman doubt that the Grand Trunk Railway Company would be glad to lease it from us next day on better terms for the country than are proposed here ?

And then, Sir, we would protect ourselves by the conditions of a lease done far more effectively than is done here. We could make conditions, and if the Grand Trunk should fail to carry them out, the lease would be forfeited. But, Sir, it has been assumed that the only additional burden upon the people was that $15,000,000. If the country undertakes the work itself, and provides that $15,000,000 instead of the Grand Trunk doing so, will the people have to bear one dollar more for the service of that railway, than if the Grand Trunk puts in the $15,000,000. The amount of the burden is the same in either case, the people pay the interest in one case—in the other they pay the rates to meet the Grand Trunk interest. But what more ? If we build the railroad, that is the whole expenditure, but according to this arrangement that is not the whole. Sir, in addition to that extra $15,000,000, there is $45,000,000 of share capital, which the people of the country will have to provide dividends for, because you may depend upon it, the company are not going to have that $45,000,000 unless they see that something is made out of it, if it is possible to make it. Therefore, instead of the country undertaking $15,000,000 extra to build this road and adding so much more as a burden upon the people, we find the burden is made $15,000,000 of bonds by the Grand Trunk and $45,000,000 of stock. That is the position—$60,000,000 added instead of $15,000,000. But, one gentleman opposite says : what difference does the stock make ; you don't base your rates upon stock. I would like him to point out any company in existence where the stock is not taken into consideration. How could you get a dollar investment in stock of any institution, railway or otherwise, if you told the people you are not going to allow any dividends. Why—I do not like to use the word—it is absolute nonsense. But the thing is placed beyond all question, because in the statutes creating this company, the 11th section says :

The stock may be issued as paid-up stock.

And, is it to be supposed that you would have hard cash invested in a railway undertaking, or any other undertaking, and you would tell the people who put their money in it, that they would not make a dollar on that investment. Is any one to be able to say that the words 'paid-up stock' in that statute are a sham ? Why, it is as clear as noon-day, that they are no sham, as I intend to show.

Last year the First Minister was absolutely shocked at the suggestion that any of this stock could be given away for privileges accorded by the Grand Trunk to the Grand Trunk Pacific. He said : it must be sold at market value, and he said that, as if any company sold its stock. Why, you subscribe for stock in all corporations and you pay your calls. That is the system of issuing the stock, and it is to get over that, that this remarkable 11th section was drawn. That section was struck out of the General Railway Act as an improper one, and it is put in here to enable the deal to be accomplished. Last year, the right hon. gentleman said that it was impossible, and he rather scouted the idea that the Grand Trunk Railway Company could accord privileges to the Grand Trunk Pacific, and that the Grand Trunk Pacific in return for these privileges would give them the stock as 'paid up stock'. It was quite shocking to the right hon. gentleman. I reminded him that the gentleman who would act for the Grand Trunk Railway in the negotiation in selling the privileges, would be the same man that would be selling the stock. Sir Rivers-Wilson, will sit upon one side of the table as the president of the Grand Trunk Railway, and his shadow will be on the other side as the president of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and it will be delightful to hear these two gentlemen arguing the question as to how much stock should be given for the privileges. That is exactly it. Oh, no, it was not to be so given, said the Prime Minister ; I think he said it was for construction purposes, or engineering, or right of way ; at all events it was for everything but for the Grand Trunk Railway. Well, the cat is out of the bag. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) introduced a little Bill the other day, and he was asked to explain his little Bill, and he did. He said the object of it was simply to enable the Grand Trunk Pacific to carry out the terms of the agreement ; a mere matter of form. Well, the hon. gentleman omitted, or he forgot, or he didn't know about two important clauses of this little Bill of his. One clause says :

The directors of the company elected by the shareholders may make and issue as paid-up stock, shares of the common stock of the company, whether subscribed for or not, and may allot and hand over in payment, for plant, rolling stock, docks, elevators, wharfs, warehouses——

All that is in the old clause. I have not come to it yet—

—or materials of any kind, or as consideration for rights——

All that was in the old one.

—powers—

That was in the old one.

—guarantees—

That is new. They want to make it quite sure ; they are going to guarantee this $15,000,000, and for that they are going to get $45,000,000 of stock. That is a very innocent looking provision. They had everything else in the clause before, except that one word 'guarantees,' and they were a little doubtful lest perhaps what the right hon. gentleman said last year, might have affected their title to accept the stock, as compensation for rights and privileges, and so they come here and put in the word 'guarantees.' And it is now $25,000,000 only that they can thus deal with.

The directors of the company elected by the shareholders may make and issue as paid-up stock, shares of the common stock of the company.

The common stock of the company is $45,000,000. The agreement compels the Grand Trunk to take $25,000,000, but the agreement does not say that the Grand Trunk Railway may not take $45,000,000, the amount authorized by the statute. The gentlemen connected with the Grand Trunk will understand it thoroughly ; I am afraid the Prime Minister is yet in his youth in railways dealings. In connection with this, I might mention that although the Grand Trunk Railway is permitted to sell one-half of the twenty-five millions, it must by the contract still retain enough to control the company. Well, the other half of the twenty-five millions would not control a company with $45,000,000 of stock. They must hold more than $22,500,000 to control that company ; so that they must have enough after selling the twelve and a half millions, to bring their holding up to $22,500,000. So there is at least thirty-five million dollars of stock which they are going to get, as indicated by the supplemental agreement. I do not know why they should stop at $35,000,000, when they have the power to take the whole $45,000,000. The Pacific Company have the power to give the Grand Trunk Company or anybody else, the whole $45,000,000, and if the Grand Trunk Company do not take all they can get, I am very much mistaken.

There is another little clause in the new Bill just introduced which is very significant. In the original charter passed less than a year ago, it was provided that this Pacific company, which was going to have such an important undertaking on its hands, should begin operations when it had subscribed $2,000,000 of stock, and when $200,000 of it was paid up. That was not very much for such a company. One would have thought that they would have been content; but they were not content. Section 6 of chapter 122 of 1903, is amended by striking out in the first line thereof the word 'two' and substituting the word 'one;' so that the company will have to get subscribed only $1,000,000 of stock before they begin this undertaking and the amount to be paid up is reduced to $100,000. The $2,000,000 was so startling that they had to come to parliament and get the amount reduced to $1,000,000; and when 10 per cent is paid on that, they will have $100,000 with which to begin the undertaking. I wonder if they expect the country to subscribe the $1,000,000 and pay up the $100,000.

Then, there is the question of the $20,000,000 of rolling stock. If that were to be paid for out of the bonds or stock, it would form part of the $60,000,000 I have mentioned. But it is not. A trust company is to provide that rolling stock, and no doubt it will be rented to the railway company. I do not wonder that the Grand Trunk Company wanted to have a few alterations of such an unimportant character as these. The right hon. First Minister said they were of such trifling importance that he thought it was hardly worth while for us to discuss them. That $20,000,000 is now reduced to $15,000,000. I do not make much of that. Of course, the government were not obliged to sign their guarantee until the $20,000,000 of rolling stock should be—not paid for or acquired, but supplied; and all the security they will now have for the last five millions of the rolling stock, is the covenant of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company. But what is the value of the Grand Trunk Pacific's covenant. The whole thing is in the hands of the Grand Trunk Company. You cannot call on anybody to pay up stock, because the stock is all 'paid up'. There is no liability of the Grand Trunk, and the covenant of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company is not worth anything. Yet this is all you have got for your extra $5,000,000. It is a small point, but it is worth nothing!

We pointed out last year that the clause relating to the rolling stock simply called on the company to equip the road with a certain amount of rolling stock and did not say that the rolling stock was to be acquired and paid for, that it might be rented. We pointed out that there was a good deal of danger in that, because clause 14, provides that any rent payable for rolling stock provided for the eastern division shall be charged to working expenses. That is even worse than paying for it out of bonds, because working expenses are ahead of bonds and everything else. But hon. gentlemen say there is the 35th section which makes the rolling stock subject to mortgage and that therefore the company must own it. Well, clause 112 of the General Railway Act gives the company power to execute a mortgage, and says the mortgage is subject to the working expenses; and section 2 of the same Act says that working expenses include rental of rolling stock. So that rental of rolling stock is ahead of the mortgage which the General Railway Act authorizes this company to execute. We asked hon. gentlemen opposite last session to place the matter beyond a doubt—two or three words would have done it. We suggested that they should provide that the company should equip, acquire and pay for the rolling stock; that was all that was necessary. But no, they said, the agreement had been accepted by the Grand Trunk Company, and they could not alter a letter of it. They would not even put such a provision in the statute. We moved amendments to that, and hon. gentlemen opposite called on their followers to vote them down, and they did vote them down. Well, suppose there was something in their excuse that they had concluded an arrangement with the Grand Trunk Company, and did not want to alter it. What about their position when the Grand Trunk Company themselves threw up the agreement? Why did hon. gentlemen not then put beyond a doubt this matter on which there was so much dispute between the legal gentlemen in this House? If both sides had the same intention, if the government and the Grand Trunk Pacific Company were agreed that the rolling stock was to be acquired and paid for, so that it could be mortgaged to the government, why not say so? When the right hon. gentleman was settling this supplementary agreement, every word of which is in favour of the Grand Trunk Company, why did he not put in two or three words which would have placed this question beyond a doubt? It is not a trifle. It is a question of rental on $20,000,000. Surely that was worth the consideration of hon. gentlemen opposite. But they were above that. They were only considering what the Grand Trunk wanted.

But, Sir, the matter is not even so simple as that. We find now that the Grand Trunk Company have taken our view of it. Some hon. gentleman opposite says, what do we care what Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson says?

We are going to stand by the agreement just as it is; the agreement provides that the company must mortgage the rolling stock to the government, and therefore they must acquire it! In reply, we on this side say, when you are talking about that, you are talking about working expenses and rental in an awkward way, and you had better have no doubt about it. Sir Rivers-Wilson tells his shareholders, with Mr. Hays sitting by his side, having come fresh from his negotiations with the right hon. the First Minister, that cost of rolling stock is to be no part of the capital of the company, but that they have arranged to have it under a trust. When that was stated the other day, some hon. gentlemen said, that is that faked report. Well, let us return to the 'Railway News.'

As regards the £5,000,000 for rolling stock—in the first place, the estimate is not £5,000,000, but £3,000,000. With that the Grand Trunk has nothing to do. That rolling stock will be provided by the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, and, as the general manager will tell you, they have laid their plans for providing that rolling stock by a trust fund.

But hon. gentlemen opposite say: What have we to do with what Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson may say? In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, we have a great deal to do with what Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson says. This agreement is as yet incomplete. There is no confirmed agreement to-day. The right hon. gentleman knows that the Grand Trunk shareholders, when asked to assent to this agreement, were told what is meant by that clause, and are we to be asked to affirm this agreement now on the basis of an interpretation differing from that given to the Grand Trunk shareholders? If the agreement had been executed and ratified before that question was raised, of course it would speak for itself. But is it an honourable course to confirm an agreement when we know that the other side take a particular view of a very important clause, involving an expenditure of some $20,000,000, very different from that which we take? Is it honourable to say to these people: We are going to confirm that agreement and are going to stand by our interpretation of it, and not by yours? Suppose the right hon. gentleman and myself were to enter into negotiations and engage lawyers to draft an agreement, and suppose my right hon. friend signed that agreement under the conviction, which he openly expressed, and which I knew he entertained, that it had a certain effect, and supposing my interpretation of the language was quite different, would it be honourable on my part that I should then sign that agreement and determine to hold the right hon. gentleman to my understanding of it? In my opinion, that would be the trick of a sharper, it would be a thing which no honest man would do, and yet we are asked to do the very same thing. We are asked to confirm an agreement on the interpretation we put upon it, although that interpretation is essentially different from that which induced the other party to sign it.

I come now to this famous supplemental agreement, all the clauses of which I do not propose to discuss. Some of these clauses can be better discussed when the Bill is in committee, but there are others which I think we ought to discuss now, as they affect the principle of the whole thing. The third clause provides that the commissioners shall have power, without reference to parliament, to give an interim lease on the constructed portions of the eastern division, pending the completion of the whole 1,900 miles. The first portion of this line to be completed, you may depend upon it, will be that part from Winnipeg to the junction with the branch to North Bay. That is, the Grand Trunk Railway's own project, and no doubt that will be constructed years before the rest, if the rest is ever constructed. The Grand Trunk are at work now on the survey, but they have not gone beyond that portion of the line, and will not. But in what position are we putting ourselves? That 900 or 1,000 miles will be completed first. I do not suppose that anybody on either side has any doubts on that point. The other portion, the premature section, may drag on for seven years after completion of the section from Winnipeg to North Bay. In what position will we be? Pending the completion of the whole 1,900 miles of the eastern section, the commissioners may, without reference to parliament, give a lease to the Grand Trunk Pacific on the section from Winnipeg to North Bay. Parliament cannot say a word. The Grand Trunk Railway have taken care that the commissioners cannot compel them to do anything, but the commissioners may do what they like so far as the country is concerned, and even parliament cannot intervene. They may grant lease after lease, until every mile of the 1,900 is completed. Upon what terms? Upon terms which will not be more onerous on the Grand Trunk than the lease of the whole eastern section. What terms are those? Seven years for nothing, to begin with. The commissioners have the power to lease that 900 or 1,000 miles of railway, which is the only part of the eastern section worth anything, for any number of years, pending completion of the whole, and will not be able to charge any rent, for 7 years, because, if they should, the terms would be more onerous than those of the lease of the whole division. When the whole 1,900 miles of the eastern division is completed, the company will get it free for seven years, so that these commissioners can give that valuable portion between Winnipeg and North Bay for, perhaps, seven years for nothing; and then, when the main lease comes to be made, the company will get another seven years on that same portion also for nothing. Yet we are told by hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches that all these alterations are exceedingly trivial. Why, they were so trivial that it was a wonder these hon. gentlemen took any trouble to explain them at all. I believe that the right hon. the First Minister did say that the opposition were so perverse they would try to find some ground for objection, but he did not think we should find any. We should have swallowed the whole thing. That 1,000 miles of railway, built by the country, with the hard cash of the country, we should give free to the Grand Trunk Pacific for six or seven years, or whatever period elapses before the whole 1,900 miles are completed; and then, when we come to make a lease for the whole division, they will have it for seven years more for nothing and three years after that on the same terms, because, according to the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. A. T. Thompson), capitalization does not count. And this is the marvellous third section of the supplemental agreement. I think that the Grand Trunk Railway must have laughed in their sleeves when they got that clause accepted by the government. I would like to see the private correspondence between Mr. Hays and the directors of the Grand Trunk Railway. If we could, by an order of the House, have Mr. Hays brought up here with his letter-book, it would be delightful reading to have his view of how successfully the government had forced the company to accept the use of this line during seven years for nothing. But that is only a trifle to what is coming. Take clause 4.

Well, Sir, the change made by this clause is highly important. And, read with clauses 5 and 6 of the supplemental agreement and with section 32 of the original agreement it is so far-reaching that not one gentleman on the other side has understood the effect of it. By the old agreement the government was to guarantee the bonds up to 75 per cent of the cost of the prairie section and the mountain section also, the maximum guarantee for the prairie section to be $13,000 per mile and for the mountain section $30,000 per mile. But some notable changes have been made. The limitation of $30,000 per mile has been wiped out. Then the guarantee is to be not merely 75 per cent of the cost, but a guarantee of bonds to an amount that will produce the money on the market. I think that applies also to the $13,000 per mile of the prairie section. That point has not been discussed, and the charge was not made in the statement of the leader of the opposition. But I have no doubt at all that the government is bound to guarantee the bonds that will produce that $13,000 per mile, which will mean a million and a half more—another little addition made by these trifling alterations. The Grand Trunk people say that the mountain section will cost $50,000 per mile. Let me call your attention to the fact that Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson had every motive not to add a dollar unnecessarily to the estimated cost.

He showed in his speech great anxiety to reduce the obligation of the Grand Trunk Railway to the lowest point. He took Mr. Allen's statement and tore it to pieces to cut a few millions off. In every way he tried to represent the Grand Trunk's shareholders' liability as small as possible. And he had Mr. Hays by his side who, as they tell us had the benefit of the information in the surveys of Sir Sanford Fleming for the mountain section. I have no doubt that they had accurate information as to the cost of the mountain section. Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson said that he had not exaggerated it.

So under the original agreement the government was to guarantee for:

Mountain section, 500 miles at $30,000.	$15,000,000
The interest on that sum for 7 years would be	$ 3,150,000

That interest the government agreed to pay without recourse. The government also agreed to pay the interest for the next three years and if not earned, to capitalize the sum, and accept repayment in the course of forty years.

Three years' interest on $15,000,000	$1,350,000

Now, how do we stand under the supplemental agreement. The Grand Trunk people say the mountain section will cost $50,000 per mile plus interest during construction. For four years at 3 per cent, or, as Sir Rivers-Wilson has it, three years at 4 per cent, the interest would be $6,000 per mile, or a total cost per mile of $56,000.

$56,000 by 500 miles	$28,000,000
Of which the government guarantee 75 per cent or	$21,000,000
Then under clause 32 we pay, without recourse, 3 per cent interest for 7 years on the $21,000,000	$ 4,410,000
And we capitalize 3 years interest	$ 1,890,000
And under new clause 6 government cannot enforce repayment of further interest if default less than five years—say 4½ years' interest on $21,000,000	$ 2,835,000

Therefore, contrasting results of supplemental agreement with results of 1903 agreement we have:

Principal guaranteed—
Supplemental agreement	$21,000,000
1903 agreement	15,000,000
Increase	$ 6,000,000
7 years' interest paid without recourse—
Supplemental agreement	$ 4,410,000
1903 agreement	3,150,000
Increase	$ 1,260,000

Three years capitalized—
Supplemental agreement	$ 1,890,000
1903 agreement	1,350,000
Increase	$ 540,000
And by clause 6 of the supplemental agreement repayment of 4½ years' interest on the $21,000,000 cannot be enforced	$ 2,835,000

Thus the change in terms—even if 3 per cent bonds sell at par—involves the following increases:

	Increases.
In principal guaranteed	$ 6,000,000

In cash payments—

	Increases.
7 years' interest without recourse	$ 1,260,000
3 years' interest capitalized	540,000
4½ years' default	2,835,000
	$ 4,635,000

All this is assuming that the bonds will sell at par. We have not touched on the discount. Hon. gentlemen have dealt with the question of 'implementing', that comes in addition. We must guarantee to produce $21,000,000. If the bonds sell at 90, the results will be as shown by the following figures:

Guarantee to produce $21,000,000	$23,250,000
1903 agreement	15,000,000
Increase	$ 8,250,000

	Increases.
In cash payments—
7 years' interest without recourse—
Supplemental agreement	$ 4,882,500
1903 agreement	3,150,000
Increase	$ 1,732,500
Three years' interest capitalized—
Supplemental agreement	$ 2,092,500
1903 agreement	1,350,000
Increase	$ 742,500
Aud by clause 6 of the supplementary agreement repayment of 4½ years' interest on the $23,250,000 cannot be enforced	$ 3,138,750

Thus if 3 per cent bonds sold at 90, the change in terms involves following increases:

	Increases.
In principal guaranteed	$ 8,250,000

In cash payments—

	Increases.
7 years' interest without recourse	$ 1,732,500
3 years' interest capitalized	742,500
4½ years' default	3,138.75
	$5,613,750

I may add that if the bonds sell at 90 the guarantee for the prairie section will be increased from $13,000,000 to $14,500,000. Although, as we do not pay seven years' interest there, it is not so important. I do not deal with any increase on the prairie section, because I am dealing mainly and particularly with the interest account which involves cash outlay.

I have already read from the words of the Minister of the Interior. It will be remembered that he said—page 799:

> By releasing the old provision and inserting provisions which can only come into effect in case of default which we do not anticipate.

That is all. They can throw the burden upon the country only in case of default. But the Minister of the Interior seems to be oblivious to the fact that whether there is default or not, if you increase the principal of your guarantee by $6,000,000 or $8,000,000 you have to pay the interest on that for seven years and you do not get it back. And yet, one after another these hon. gentlemen get up and boast, as the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Wade) did, that these changes would not cost the country anything. At page 872, he says:

> I wish to place myself on record as saying that the agreement as amended will not cost the Dominion one extra dollar.

It was as the hon. member for Haldimand said, as if they were backing the note of a millionaire and it would not matter. But if the millionaire wanted you to pay the interest on his note for seven years you would soon find out that it mattered? The hon. gentlemen overlook the fact that under ne clause of the agreement, clause 32 I think, we agree to pay the interest for seven years upon every dollar we guarantee, and when you add six or eight million dollars to the guarantee you agree to pay interest on that amount for seven years. The hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Wade) was satisfied that it was quite right to guarantee the additional amount. He said:

> I think that this is reasonable; I think it is fair that the government should guarantee the full three quarters of the cost and it was scarcely necessary that any discrimination should be made in this connection.

If the government had said: 'We are not to pay the interest for seven years on the increased amount,' then there would be something in the statement of the hon. the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) that it would make no difference, that the property was good for it, and that you were only guaranteeing it. But when the Grand Trunk call upon you to pay the interest on the increase, and without recourse, the laugh will be against the government.

Mr. CLANCY. Or against the people rather.

Mr. BARKER. The people will have to pay. That is one result of it. When the hon. member for Annapolis made that statement and when the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) spoke on that subject and made the suggestion that the increase in guarantee really made no difference, the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) evidently approved, the Postmaster General (Sir William Mulock) sat by his side and called out, 'hear, hear' in stentorian tones, the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) was present and applauded ; he seemed to regard it as a happy thought ; and all of the government supporters were applauding. I am sorry that the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is not here. I intended to ask him if he was going to ask this House to validate this agreement without showing that I am mistaken in my statement that the interest on the additional amount of guarantee has to be paid by the government. How is he going to ask the House to adopt an agreement which puts that additional cash burden upon the people of this country when the hon. gentleman did not know that he was imposing any such burden? Is the right hon. the premier going to ask his followers to swallow that. Is he going to ask his followers to adopt an agreement which does not express what it was intended to express ? Is the right hon. gentleman going that far ? Is the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) going that far ? Is the Solicitor General (Mr. Lemieux) going to commence his career by doing that ? What position will hon. gentlemen be in. They are either going to do that, or else they are going to say that they knew that this was the intention of the agreement, but they sat silent and applauded when the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Wade) and the Minister of the Interior said that that was not the agreement at all. Is the right hon. the premier going to take the position that he had done right to deceive this House—not intentionally but to deceive the House in fact and to deceive the country, by representing that this change did not mean one dollar of additional expense to the country ? Will they dare to say to this House that they knew it did impose large cash payments upon the country and not only remained silent while the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Wade) spoke but applauded him ? Surely not. I do not think that the right hon. the premier is going that far and if he cannot take either horn of the dilemma what is he going to do about it ? I would like to know what the government are going to do about this ? If we are to endorse an agreement that does not express the intention of the parties to it, what is the use of our being here ? The government might as well send us home and transact the business by Order in Council, and not put us to the ignominy of validating an agreement under such circumstances. We ought not to be asked to do it ; the hon. gentleman's followers should not be asked to do it. I do not know whether they are going to respond to the whip and kiss the rod.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes, they are.

Mr. BARKER. I should hope not, I should hope that among hon. gentlemen opposite there is one man with backbone enough to stand up and say, if not here, then in caucus, that they are not all invertebrate, but that there is some one among them who has an opinion of his own and is not going to be led into such a thing as this.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Do not be alarmed about this side.

Mr. BARKER. I am not hitting at the hon. member for West York (Mr. Campbell).

Mr. BELL. He will vote all right.

Mr. BARKER. I may be asked why I assume that in the 8th, 9th and 10th years the mountain section will not pay, and that the interest on its cost will have to be capitalized. I have no more doubt that that section will not pay at that time than that I am standing here in the presence of the right hon. gentleman. The government have given the Grand Trunk every possible motive not to make it pay. We all know that when a railway is about seven or eight years old the heavy expenses of renewals are just beginning. A railway is started with brand new ties and woodwork. In about seven or eight years these begin to go, but the time has not yet come for averaging renewals and there is a tremendous expense about that time in the life of a railway. That is about the time when the question will arise as to whether the mountain section is earning 3 per cent. Do you suppose that the Grand Trunk in those three years will not put that line in apple pie order ? Even if it should not leave a dollar to pay the bond interest guaranteed by the government they will take enough to pay the interest guaranteed by the Grand Trunk. They will pay interest on the 25 per cent guaranteed by the Grand Trunk, but there will not be anything to pay the interest on the bonds guaranteed by the government. Why should there be ? If they can let the government pay it, if they can renew the ties and woodwork all along the line and put everything in apple pie order and thus use up three-quarters of the revenue, they are in this comfortable position that the government has to supply the money and wait for its repayment in the course of 40 years. They would be fools to earn money under these circumstances and not use it and you may depend on it they will apply it where it will do most good. They know what they are about and the money will not be earned or if earned, it will be wanted for maintenance. But there is another feature of this. Under this agreement the Grand Trunk Railway will control the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway ; in fact the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway will be a mere figure head. The Grand Trunk Railway Company will be in possession of all the revenue, and having itself guaranteed a certain number of bonds, it will first pay the interest on these bonds and there is not a word in this agreement to enable the government to compel the Grand Trunk Railway to do otherwise. The result will be that interest for the three years will be paid by government and having advanced that cash we will take the bonds for forty years at 3 per cent. It is a first rate deal for the Grand Trunk Railway; they will need all the money they can get about the seventh or eight year of their operation of this mountain section and will not be able to borrow elsewhere on such terms.

I have been referring to the increasing guarantee by reason of the increased cost of construction. I now want to refer particularly to the probable discount on the bonds and the clause of the supplemental agreement which deals with the implementing of the government's guarantee. I looked up the imperial dictionary and I found that to implement is to fulfil or satisfy the conditions. So, the government say in effect: We have agreed to guarantee 3 per cent bonds to produce a certain amount of money. If the bonds are sold at a discount and do not produce that amount we must implement the difference. There are two or three ways in which you can implement it. In order to carry out the guarantee, that is to furnish so much money, you can do it by increasing the number of 3 per cent bonds to a sufficient extent to produce at the selling price, the amount of money required. That is the way my hon. friend the hon. leader of the opposition dealt with it. Supposing the bonds are selling at ninety you issue an amount of bonds sufficient to produce the amount required. Another way was that which Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson put forth in a short argument that he laid before his people—issue the bonds at par but at a higher rate of interest—he says 4 per cent. Then, we would be met with this difficulty. If we increase the rate of interest to 4 per cent we will have to pay interest at 4 per cent for seven years without recourse, and capitalize it for three years more at 4 per cent. We will be worse off than under the proposition of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. Then, the right hon. First Minister has another way of doing it. I will quote his words: The right hon. gentleman deals with the subject in his speech at page 721 of 'Hansard': I have already read one sentence or two which I must read again:

> It is notorious that even with the endorsation of the Canadian government, whose credit is as high as that of any government in the world today, these bonds could not be sold except at a heavy discount, and the government therefore has undertaken to implement the difference which may exist between the price realized by the bonds and their face value. How this is to be done we are not prepared to say at the moment.

Then, he continues a little later on:

> If the market is to continue as it is, and bonds have to be sold at a heavy discount, the government will have to advance a little more in order to make up the difference between the face value and the price realized.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman is dealing with the implementing of thirty-four millions of money, and if the bonds sell at a heavy discount the money he will have to pay to make up the loss will be a little more than the hon. gentleman gives us to understand. Why, if the bonds sell at ninety, the discount is 10 per cent, and the 'little more' will be $3,400,000. He speaks of a heavy discount; I do not know whether he would regard 5 per cent as heavy or not, but even if it is only 5 per cent there would be $1,700,000 to be handed over by the government in cash to the happy syndicate which is to handle these bonds. That is what is in the right hon. gentleman's mind. That is the way he puts it. That is probably the worst of the three methods proposed. The right hon. gentleman says that he does not know how they are going to do it, that it is to be done later on by the government and that we must trust them to deal with this question. I can understand that this syndicate which is going to have the dealing with all these bonds is blessing itself because it has such an easy government to deal with. This proposition of the right hon. the First Minister is entirely distinct and in addition to the question of the seven years interest on the extra cost of construction guaranteed. At par that extra amount would be $1,260,000 and if you add to that even this $1,700,000 you will have $3,000,000 of money to pay, part for the seven years interest and part for implementing the bonds. This is another trifling matter that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House are not expected to cavil at. I do not know what the right hon. gentleman will think is the best mode of dealing with this question. I think that he ought to entrust the House with it. I think he should postpone this resolution until he has made an agreement with the Grand Trunk Railway Company as to how he is going to do it and then we will be able to judge. He ought, at least, to have allowed the House to understand in his speech when submitting this resolution what the probable result of the implementing would be. The right hon. gentleman knew that he had under any circumstances to deal with an enormous amount of bonds. We have heard what he says regarding the possibility of a heavy discount. Why did not the right hon. gentleman point out the extent of it approximately? Any one hearing the words of the right hon. gentleman would think that it was a few thousands of dollars. He is dealing with millions and he does not tell us how much the implement is to cost us.

Under the old contract the country knew pretty well where it was. We had nothing to do with the selling of the bonds under the old contract. We guaranteed them to the maximum amount of $30,000 per mile for the mountain section, and it did not matter to us in the least what the bonds were sold at. We guaranteed $13,000 per mile for the prairie section and it did not matter to us in the least what the bonds sold for.

Mr. WILLIAM ROCHE (Halifax). How much of the bonds on the western section will be sold this year or next year on which the hon. gentleman anticipates there will be a discount?

Mr. BARKER. I can answer that very quickly. I do not think there will be a dollar's worth sold this year or probably next year, but I take it with the right hon. gentleman that there will be a heavy discount. I do not profess to say whether it will be 1 per cent, or 5 per cent, or 10 per cent, but whatever it is the country takes the risk of it.

Mr. A. T. THOMPSON. They may be at a premium.

Mr. BARKER. You have to endorse the issue. You do not get any premium, but let me point out the position that the government have placed the country in. Supposing that four years hence, or at any time you like, the members of the syndicate dealing with these bonds come to the government and say: We can get 95 for these bonds. The government say: We think that is too big a discount; we will not agree to that. What will the Grand Trunk say? They will say: if you, the government refuse to deal now when we can dispose of these bonds at 95 you must take the risk of it, and if we must sell them at a lower rate you will have to pay the difference and hold us harmless. We are more interested in this than you are. We say now that we have made a bargain with brokers to place these bonds at a certain rate. If you say you object to that rate you must take the risk yourselves. We may yet have to accept 90 for them.

You have not only guaranteed the 75 per cent of the cost whatever it may be, including interest during construction, but you have guaranteed that you will implement the loss in selling the bonds whatever it may be. You have virtually guaranteed that the bonds will produce par, although you do not control the sale. That is the practical working out of the operation. Well, Sir, taking it in as favourable a light as the first minister may choose to put it, the right hon. gentleman can hardly contend that he does not expect there will be a discount on these bonds. Having undertaken to implement that discount whatever it may be, what justification is there for the member for Annapolis (Mr. Wade) to say that it won't cost the country a dollar. The right hon. gentleman knew perfectly well that he looked forward to having to implement that loss, and yet the hon. member for Annapolis was applauded when he said that it will not cost us a dollar. And the gentleman opposite applauded, as if it were some trifling thing that did not involve any consequence to this country.

Clause six of the supplemental agreement reads:

> 6. Notwithstanding anything in the said contract contained, the government shall not exercise any rights in respect of possession, foreclosure or sale, by reason of non-payment of interest by the company under the thirty-first, thirty-second or thirty-third paragraphs of the said contract, or under all or any of them, unless and until there shall be such default to the extent in the whole of a sum equal to five years of such interest, as the company is not relieved from payment of or permitted to defer or capitalize by the provisions of the said paragraphs.

You will notice that it is not, that the government shall not enforce interest until the company is five years in arrear. That I could have understood. But:

> Until there shall have been such default to the extent of the whole of a sum equal to five years.

As long as they keep the default under five years, you cannot do anything to recover the money. The Grand Trunk, having charge of the revenues of this company, can, half year after half year for nine half years, go into default and you cannot do anything. In the tenth half year, they can pay the interest on the bonds; the four and a half years remain in default; they will never let it exceed the four and one half years in default, and they can continue that for 35 years and you cannot help it. Why was it put in that shape in the agreement? So long as there is not five years default you cannot take any action. Well, that being the case, I suppose they will make four and a half years' default, they will then begin to pay the current coupons, and you will have four and a half years' coupons on which you cannot take any action. You have to pay the money out under your guarantee to holders of coupons for those four and a half years, you become the holders but you cannot take action to recover the money; and the company do not pay any interest on the amount you have advanced because there is not a word here that they shall pay it.

Then, there is the seventh clause of this supplemental agreement. Under the original agreement the government was guaranteeing first mortgage bonds, and the Grand Trunk second mortgage bonds; but under this last agreement the first mortgage has got into what printers call 'pi,' and the second mortgage is quite as good, and perhaps a little better than the first. The government are restricted ; they cannot foreclose or sell. They cannot take any of the ordinary proceedings of a mortgage bond holder ; they can only put an agent in possession who must distribute the whole of the revenue over the whole of the bonds ; he canont pay in priority the first mortgage bonds, and therefore what value is it as a first mortgage ? He must distribute it ratably over the whole lot. The government can take no proceedings. But the Grand Trunk Company can have proceedings taken on the bonds they guarantee ; they may seize anything they can get hold of belonging to the Grand Trunk Pacific, but the government cannot. The Grand Trunk are put in absolute control ; the government says : you must keep control ; and the company thus in control are the second mortgage guarantors. They can use the money as they please, and if they do not realize money to pay, and have to pay on behalf of the Grand Trunk Pacific, they can take any remedy that the law allows and it is only the government that is tied up. Everywhere, from beginning to end of this contract, the government is bound hand and foot, and the Grand Trunk is absolutely free. The hon. the leader of the opposition dealt with clauses nine, ten and eleven, pretty fully, and I do not want to take time in discussing them.

Under original clause 21, if, at the end of the fifty years, the government did not decide to operate the eastern division, the Grand Trunk Pacific were to have the first option of the new fifty years' lease. But the Grand Trunk Railway were not content with that. It is now provided, that even if the government does at the end of the fifty years, decide to operate its own line, it nevertheless must then give to the Grand Trunk Pacific for another fifty years, such running powers and haulage rights as may be necessary to keep up the continuity of operation between the Pacific western system and the Grand Trunk Railway system. What is the effect of that from a railway point of view? The Grand Trunk being deprived of the eastern division, wants the privilege to use it as far as may be necessary. It will want the privilege of using the North Bay to Winnipeg section. The Grand Trunk Railway has the command of all traffic up to Winnipeg in the west ; it commands all the traffic from Ontario and Quebec to North Bay ; it will have the right to have its traffic hauled between North Bay and Winnipeg by the government ; it will virtually control the whole traffic and deprive the government of any value in the line, because the government will have no feeders for its system. The Grand Trunk will have the traffic at both ends ; it will have its line in the prairie section and in the mountain section, gathering up the traffic and bringing it to Winnipeg ; it will have its own lines all over Ontario and Quebec, gathering up all the available traffic to hand it over to the railway at North Bay ; it will thus control all the traffic going over the Winnipeg North Bay section, and will leave a barren piece of property to the government. I do not know what the hon. gentlemen were thinking of. It ought to have occurred to them, when the Grand Trunk Company were making such proposals, that there was something behind them. But they quite innocently—I do not charge them with anything worse—agreed to almost everything that was proposed.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 33) respecting the Vancouver, Victoria and Eastern Railway and Navigation Company.—Mr. Morrison.

Bill (No. 10) to incorporate the Campbellford, Lake Ontario and Western Railway Company.—Mr. Wm. Ross (Ontario).

Bill (No. 18) respecting the Manitoba and Northwestern Railway Company of Canada. —Mr. McCreary.

Bill (No. 25) to incorporate the Whitehorse and Alsek Railway Company.—Mr. Macpherson.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the proposed motion of Mr. R. L. Borden in amendment thereto.

Mr. BARKER. As my hon. friend the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) is in his place, I desire to repeat to him a question that I put to my right hon. friend the First Minister before six o'clock. I had pointed out to the House that it was admitted—admitted beyond controversy—that under the supplementary agreement, the country was obliged to guarantee a larger amount of bonds than under the agreement of 1903. I pointed out that under clause 32 of the agreement of 1903, this country undertook to pay for seven years the interest on every dollar of the guarantee, and therefore that this country has had imposed upon it by the supplemental agreement, an additional cash obligation, amounting, on the basis of the cost of the mountain section, as estimated by the president of the Grand Trunk Railway, to $1,260,000. That is quite apart from the three years interest which is to be capitalized, and quite apart also from the additional amount which may be imposed on this country under that unfortunate clause No. 6 of the supplemental agreement, and I reminded the right hon. gentleman that in the discussion the other day, his colleague the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Wade) and other gentlemen, asserted again and again that the amount of the guarantee undertaken by this country was of no consequence, that the property would pay its way, and therefore, whether the government guaranty was more or less, made no difference. I pointed out that the right hon. the First Minister and the Postmaster General (Sir William Mulock) and the Finance Minister himself applauded those remarks as expressing the truth.

The hon .gentleman was silent and never denied the assertion. The hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Wade) said: What matters it? The amount of our guarantee will not cost this country one dollar. And the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) was there and never denied the statement. He allowed that statement to go as one to influence us as representatives of the people in the decision we are to come to with reference to this agreement. I asked the right hon. gentleman then, and I ask the Finance Minister now, if he knew, when the hon. member for Annapolis was speaking, that the result of the increased guarantee was that the country had to pay for seven years the interest on that increase?

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). I will answer at once, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Barker) will allow me. I quite realize that we are to pay seven years' interest on our portion of that guarantee and, inasmuch as it is somewhat increased as respects the mountain section by this agreement, our seven years' interest is somewhat increased. I understood nobody to make any statement at variance with that; but if any one did make such a statement, I do not agree with him.

Mr. BARKER. I am glad to get that admission from the hon. Minister of Finance. But the hon. Minister of Finance was present when the hon. member for Annapolis said that it did not make a dollar's difference to this country, and he never——

Mr. FIELDING. If the hon. gentleman will permit me—I have no recollection of hearing the hon. member for Annapolis make any such statement. I did hear him state, in general terms, that this enterprise would be profitable to the country, but I did not catch the observation to which the hon. member (Mr. Barker) refers. But if the hon. member for Annapolis stated what the hon. member for Hamilton attributes to him, I can only say that I do not agree with the hon. member for Annapolis on that point

Mr. BARKER. The right hon. Prime Minister (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier), this afternoon, did not deny that he was present. I put that to him, as I put it to the Finance Minister now, and he was silent. He applauded the hon. member for Annapolis when he made that statement. He, the First Minister, who had undertaken to place this question before the House, led this House, by his silence, to believe that what the hon. member for Annapolis said was true. The Finance Minister also was present. I watched him. All the hon. gentlemen opposite applauded what the hon. member for Annapolis said, and the Prime Minister did not deny a word of it. And it would never have been denied at all had I not pointed out this afternoon that the result of the 32nd clause of that agreement was that we had to pay for seven years the interest upon the increased guarantee. It is very extraordinary that the Finance Minister of Canada could remain in his seat when statements of that nature were made in his hearing and in his presence and not deny them. It is strange that the country is to be deceived and this House is to be misled by such statements, and no denial made by the Minister of Finance. The very fact that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) was in his seat when that statement was made by the hon. member for Annapolis and did not deny it, was enough to convince everybody on either side of this House that what the hon. member for Annapolis said was correct. And other hon. gentlemen re-echoed the same statement. The Minister of Finance must have heard his colleague the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) make the statement which I quoted this afternoon, yet he never denied or questioned that statement—that the only intention of the increase in the guarantee was to strengthen the knees of those weak-kneed people in England, who did not know as much as these hon. gentlemen do. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) heard that——

Mr. FIELDING. I heard no statement at variance with what I have stated.

Mr. BARKER. I can say that the hon. gentleman was present.

Mr. FIELDING. I was not present throughout the whole discussion I am sorry to say.

Mr. BARKER. The statement of the hon. member for Annapolis was made in the presence and hearing of the Finance Minister. I do not assert that he heard it; but I do assert that he was present and listening.

Mr. FIELDING. Not in the sense that——

Mr. BARKER. The hon. member for Annapolis was only a few feet behind the Minister of Finance. His words were uttered in stentorian tones, easily to be heard in any part of the House. And this is the statement he made:

> With regard to these concessions I wish to place myself on record as saying that the agreement as amended will not cost the Dominion one dollar. (Hansard, 872).

The Finance Minister was present and he never denied that statement. He says now he does not agree with the hon. member for Annapolis, and admits that that hon. gentleman was wrong. Why did he not rise at the moment ? This was a statement made to the House on a matter of the utmost importance. It involved $1,260,000 of hard cash to be taken from the pockets of the people to pay that interest, relieving the Grand Trunk of the payment of that amount, which, in 1903, they agreed to pay. And this is the conduct of the Minister of Finance, the one minister to whom the people look for protection in such a matter as this. By whom are the interests of the people in such a matter to be looked after, if not by the Minister of Finance ? The people might not expect, perhaps, that the Prime Minister should be particularly expert in such matters. He certainly did not seem to understand the point up to an hour ago. I called his attention to it, and he evidently did not know there had been such a change. He was in the same position as the hon. member for Annapolis, who—quite truthfully, no doubt—stated that it did not make one dollar of difference to this country. Of course, it did not make 'one dollar' of difference, but it does make $1,260,000 of difference. And the Finance Minister gave colour and support to that statement by remaining silent. That is the position in which he has placed himself. But in what position has he placed the government ? We have the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) speaking, and he seems to act in these matters for all the departments, speaking of the financial aspect and of the railway aspect of this question. The minister who is silent and who, up to this hour has never uttered one word on this subject in the House, is the Finance Minister of Canada. Sir, I have great personal respect for the Finance Minister, but it is a matter of the utmost astonishment to me that the hon. gentleman should say now that he knew the statement of the hon. member for Annapolis to be untrue, and yet he was silent.

Mr. FIELDING. I do not believe that anybody was misled. We agreed before to guarantee three-quarters, not exceeding $30,000 per mile. We now agree to guarantee three-quarters of the cost, whatever it may be, and if the cost exceeds $30,000 a mile we have to guarantee the difference, and we give seven years' interest upon it. I do not believe anybody ever understood anything else.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BARKER. Hear, hear ! Why, the hon. gentlemen said 'hear, hear,' when the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Wade) said just the opposite. 'Hear, hear,' said they. Let the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) say something and 'hear, hear,' say the hon. gentlemen ; let the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Wade) say the opposite, and 'hear, hear' say they. That is the dignified position taken by hon. gentlemen in this matter.

But, Sir, it is not a question whether the hon. gentleman from Annapolis stated in his speech, or whether the Minister of the Interior stated in his speech that we were guaranteeing a larger sum. Nobody doubts that we are. There was an entirely different question arising under clause 32. Hon. gentlemen have overlooked that clause, they forgot all about it, and until this afternoon, although this thing has been discussed day after day in this House, not one gentleman on the other side has found out that because we guaranteed a larger sum we had to pay seven years' interest upon that larger sum. Not one, and now the hon. the Finance Minister stands up at the last moment and admits it. We are bound to accept his word that he knew it, but the other gentlemen have not denied that they did not know it.

There are some clauses in the supplemental agreement that I might have discussed, but nearly all of them have been very fully dealt with by other hon. gentlemen who have addressed the House and there are still others that can be better discussed at a later stage ; therefore, I do not desire to occupy the time of the House in dealing with them now. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) as he is in his seat, and as he appears to know something more about the agreement than other members of the cabinet do, where is the agreement called for by the Transcontinental Railway Act under section 7, subclauses 2 and 3? I would like to know where it is.

Mr. FIELDING. I have not had my attention called to this matter and therefore I do not fully apprehend my hon. friend's question.

Mr. BARKER. It is not in existence, that is the trouble. The government have produced all the documents. In the Transcontinental Railway Act there was a clause, inserted at the instance of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden) which provided :

Notwithstanding anything in this Act or in the agreement contained, His Majesty the King, acting in respect of the Dominion of Canada, shall not be bound or obliged to perform, carry out or fulfil any of the covenants, undertakings, conditions or stipulations in the agreement contained on behalf of His Majesty, acting as aforesaid, unless and until the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada covenants and agrees as follows with His Majesty acting as aforesaid :

(a) That it will guarantee the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company for the balance required for the complete construction of the western division in the agreement mentioned, as provided in clause 34 of the agreement ;

(b) That it will acquire and take the common stock of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company to the amount of not less than $24,900,000, as in clause 27 of the agreement provided.

Now, Sir, I would ask the hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is this something that the other members of the cabinet have forgotten ? Has it been forgotten that these agreements which we are now supposed to be validating are to be subject to such an agreement being entered into by and with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada ? I would like to know, Sir, whether the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada have entered into such an agreement with the government. They have not produced it ; I do not know that they have even obtained the consent of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company to the entering into such an agreement.

Mr. FIELDING. While I am willing to answer my hon. friend occasionally, I think he would find it inconvenient if he should occupy his time in catechising the members of the government. On this occasion, however, I may say to the hon. gentleman that the time has not yet arrived for entering into that agreement. That agreement was to be made in accordance with the original contract and that contract having been modified we have not yet reached the time when it becomes necessary to carry out that agreement, and therefore it has not been entered into. That is my recollection, I do not think it has been entered into.

Mr. BARKER. At page 3 of the correspondence brought down by the government there is this clause :

> The terms upon which the Grand Trunk is to acquire the common stock of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the liability to be incurred by such acquisition to be fully determined and made the subject of an agreement.

Are the hon. gentlemen keeping that open ? Is that to be a subject for further consideration ? We have been discussing last year and this year the terms upon which the Grand Trunk Railway is to acquire that $25,000,000 of stock. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) mean to say that they have got to this stage of the negotiations and do not know what these terms are to be, although the Grand Trunk Railway point out in this correspondence that it must be settled ? Is there any understanding as to what the Grand Trunk Railway is to give for that $25,000,000, or is that something that is forgotten ? I think, Sir, that this is very much like the payment of the seven years' interest, they never thought of it. It is perfectly new, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) has never discussed it, and he knows nothing about it. It is like the surveys on the eastern division, the government were ignorant of it. Minister after minister stood up in this House and told us they knew nothing about the surveys on the Grand Trunk Pacific. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Emmerson) told us the surveys were going on upon the branches. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) told us that the line from Winnipeg to the boundary line between Ontario and Quebec had been fully and completely surveyed. Which are we to believe ? The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) said he knew the seven years' interest had to be paid.

Mr. FIELDING. And so did every person else.

Mr. BARKER. If everybody else understood it, I can only say that the language used by the Minister of the Interior was the most uncandid language a minister could use to this House. It was an outrage to the House that such language should be used, if the minister knew that the increased guarantee involved the payment of over 1¼ millions of money of this country. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) says that they knew it ; I do not believe they knew it. I do not believe the Minister of the Interior would have the audacity to stand up in this House and make such a statement if he knew it to be untrue. I do not believe it. I have to accept the hon. gentleman's statement that he knew it, but I am very very sorry for his sake that I have to accept it, because he ought not to have remained silent if he knew it.

But hon. gentleman after hon. gentleman made the statement and it remained uncontradicted and even the right hon. leader of the government sat in his seat and did not contradict it. Now, the hon. Minister of Finance who sits in his seat cannot afford to deny it.

I have not the right to cross-examine the hon. Minister of Finance in his place. I do not pretend to any such right. It would be very interesting to ascertain from the hon. Minister of Finance whether there is any controversy between the government and the Grand Trunk Railway Company about the acquisition of that stock. There is ample room for strife and controversy, between the government and the Grand Trunk Railway Company as to what they are going to do about it. A clause in the supplemental agreement is so worded that no man can say now what the government's rights are and what the Grand Trunk Railway Company's rights are. The Grand Trunk has the right to sell half of the $24,900,000 stock, but, it must retain control of the policy of the Pacific Company. It must retain control of a company with $45,000,000 of stock ! How is it going to do it without a majority of the $45,000,000 of stock ? There is only one way it can do it and that is by introducing into this country a system that has been adopted in the United States, that gives an opening for more fraud, more trusts and more monopolies than is to be found in any other nation. Does this government propose to enter into an arrangement with the Grand Trunk Railway Company to have a trust established so that the Grand Trunk Railway will sell millions of stock under a secret agreement by which, though it shall not own the stock, it will control the votes of those who owned it? If not the Grand Trunk after sale of $12,500,000 must still hold $22,500,000—and one more share—or it will not hold the control of the Pacific Company, whose capital stock is $45,000,000. The twelve and a half millions that it sells and the twenty-two and a half millions that it will hold make thirty-five million dollars of stock. The contract obliges the Grand Trunk to acquire $25,000,000; but that will not prevent it obtaining the whole $45,000,000 in exchange for its guarantee. The hon. gentleman may find a good deal of difficulty in settling little discrepancies between what the Grand Trunk contemplated and what the government contemplated. There will be a good deal of difficulty in settling this little agreement and whatever hon. gentlemen may say I have no doubt the law department of the government is in a good deal of trouble about it. I am reminded of the language used by the hon. Minister of Finance last year on the subject of this stock. The hon. gentleman declared that the great protection that the agreement of last year afforded to the people of Canada was that the Grand Trunk Railway Company had to hold every dollar of that $25,000,000 of stock, that they would not be allowed to sell one dollar of that stock—not one dollar, said the hon. gentleman. He said: Not a dollar, not a dollar and it was re-echoed the other day by the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Wade). The not a dollar, not a dollar of the hon. Finance Minister was worth about as much as the not a dollar, not a dollar that we heard the other day from the hon. member for Annapolis. The provision that was of such vital consequence to the interests of this country some months ago, is now not worth discussion! It is wiped out without a word of explanation. It is so trivial! The hon. Finance Minister undertook to say that the Grand Trunk Railway Company would not be allowed to speculate with it—that it must hold it. These are the words of the hon. gentleman:

> The strength of this enterprise is to be found in the fact that the Grand Trunk Railway Company are not only behind it but they are in it and of it. If the Grand Trunk Railway Company take over this new stock of 25 cents on the dollar they cannot sell it to anybody at 26 cents on the dollar next day, and they cannot sell it later on for 100 cents on the dollar. It must stay in the treasury of the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

Perhaps the hon. gentleman did not mean that. Will the hon. gentleman tell us what change has occurred in favour of the country in the later agreement that justifies the government in abandoning what was 'the strength of the enterprise'? The Grand Trunk Railway Company has reduced its guarantee. The Grand Trunk Railway Company is accorded further privileges in regard to the stock and the people of Canada do not get a cent of stock. If the Grand Trunk Railway Company is to guarantee a small portion of the obligations and get stock for doing so, why should not the people of Canada who guarantee a much larger portion get a part of that stock or all of it? The whole of the stock, Sir, is going to the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and the hon. gentlemen have not seen fit to so far take care of the interests of the people that the people should have an interest in proportion to their guarantee. Then the hon. Minister of Finance went on:

> The stock will not be allowed to go into the market and pass into the hands of other persons, and possibly at a later stage be treated, in the fixing of freight rates, as capital at a fictitious value.

What did the hon. gentleman mean then and what does he mean now? Twelve and a-half million dollars worth of stock are to go on the market, perhaps at fictitious value, to be possibly at a later stage treated in the fixing of freight rates; yet, the hon. member for Annapolis tells us the stock has nothing to do with freight rates. It is a great pity that the hon. gentlemen opposite cannot agree among themselves. Ministers come in one at a time. We have two of them to-day.

An hon. MEMBER. Three.

Mr. BARKER. I beg pardon.

An hon. MEMBER. Four.

Mr. BARKER. Yes, four. Sometimes we have only one. But, they are never the same. It is somewhat of a kaleidoscope. They are constantly changing and you are never quite sure who is taking care of the interests of the government or of the country. I think there is hardly an hon. gentleman who sits on the treasury benches at this moment who was here in the afternoon—not one. When we are discussing a question involving an obligation of $155,000,000 upon this country we cannot get any two of them to agree. The hon. Minister of the Interior gets up and makes an assertion which is immediately seized upon by his followers, one after another. The hon. member for Annapolis endorses the hon. Minister of the Interior. The hon. member for Hants (Mr. Russell) endorses the hon. member for Annapolis and the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Thompson) tells us a story about a man who backs the note of a millionaire. This is the sort of business that we have in connection with this enormous transaction, the greatest, as hon. gentlemen will admit, that we have had since Confederation. Last year the minister said:

> We think it important for several reasons—

He didn't mention the reasons.

—that the Grand Trunk should take and hold that stock and not dispose of it. Therefore we insist that they shall acquire and take and hold that stock.

But now they are going to sell twelve and a half millions of it, and that is only half of the twenty-five millions of stock, while there is another twenty millions the government have made no provision for, and which the Grand Trunk can acquire in exchange for its guarantee and sell without the permission of the government. The Grand Trunk can take from the Grand Trunk Pacific the whole $45,000,000 of common stock in exchange for the guarantee, as is provided for in the Bill now before the House. Why, the Grand Trunk Railway, under this section 10, could sell just as much of that stock as they please, so long as they keep the majority voting power under some voting trust, by which the man who does not own the stock can vote, and the man who owns it cannot vote. Well, Sir, considering the extreme skill with which the government has hitherto conducted the negotiations, I have no doubt they feel that they ought be entrusted with the continuation of them ; I have no doubt the Finance Minister thinks that the House and the country should entrust him and his colleagues with the settlement of the whole question of what is to be done with this stock—and so, he says, the time has not arrived for the agreement with the Grand Trunk ! We are to give the government a power of attorney to do as they please in the interest of the government acting of course for the people. And not only that but the right hon. gentleman told us that he wants to reserve further power to deal hereafter as the government sees fit with the terms and conditions and the mode in which the implementing $34,000,000 of bonds shall be carried out. Why, Sir, the hon. gentlemen must feel that the country is willing to submit to government by Order in Council. There is no use calling parliament together ; the government want absolute power to do as they please, they want power to settle terms about a sale of $12,500,000 of stock, in spite of the most solemn statement of the Finance Minister that such a sale should not be allowed. They want power to deal with a syndicate as to the terms upon which $34,000,000 of bonds shall be issued, and as to how much the government shall pay in the hard cash of the people of Canada for the loss upon the transaction. They ask that seriously of this parliament. Well, all I can say is ; if that is the way the affairs of Canada are to be conducted under a Liberal government ; God help Canada.

I want to say a few words in addition to what I have said already, on the question of government ownership. I have taken some figures from the report of the Minister of Railways, who I am sorry to see is as usual absent. I looked into these figures in order to see what might be the consequences to this country of our railways being handed over to a few companies. I find that the Grand Trunk Railway to-day has 3,079 miles of railway in Canada (I do not include their mileage in the United States), and if they get this transcontinental line, it will add to their mileage 3,400 miles, making their total mileage 6,479 miles. The Canadian Pacific Railway have to-day 6,928 miles, and they are constructing 364 miles, making their mileage 7,292 miles. The Canadian Northern have completed and under way 1,650 miles ; their line to Edmonton will be 900 miles, and their extension to Port Simpson 500 miles, making their mileage 3,050. The total mileage controlled by these companies will be 16,821 miles. Now, Sir, I wish to call the attention of this House and the country to the fact, that under three men ; managers of these three railways, there will be 16,821 miles of railway with an army of men; an army of electors, controlled by these companies. Three men : the manager of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the manager of the Grand Trunk, and the manager of the Canadian Northern, will control 16,821 miles of railway with every man in the employment of the companies. Now, Sir, I am quite aware that no railway manager absolutely controls the vote of the employees of the company, but no one can doubt the influence—the improper, the unjust influence, that such manager can exercise and too frequently does exercise over the men in his employ. It must be remembered, that nearly every man in the employ of these companies is a grown man ; a voter. Not only that, but everybody who knows the business of this country, knows the influence that railway managers possess over merchants and manufacturers, especially if two or three companies in a particular place have common interest, and choose to combine. It may be said that these railways will always be in rivalry, but when once the railway interest happens to be opposed to the interests of the people, these three managers will combine, and with divided political parties, those three men may virtually rule this country. I would ask : is that not a serious question for us to consider before we finally and for all time deal with this question of government ownership. I do not think any man doubts, that if you enter into this contract for fifty years, and perhaps a century, with the Grand Trunk Railway Company, it is good-bye to government ownership. You put the whole power of that tremendous mileage in the hands of the companies, and so good-bye to government ownership. Let me put it in another way ; supposing that on some occasion these three managers choose to put their influence along with the influence of the Minister of Railways of the day who commands 1,550 miles of railway with all the employees under his control, then you will have 18,371 miles of railway controlled by four men. Why, Sir, let these men combine, and a dishonest, a corrupt and an extravagant government, whether it be Liberal or Conservative, could be kept in power by them despite the will of the people, divided politically, as the people would be. I do not mean to say that that settles the question of government ownership, but it is a most important consideration. Now, I do not propose to discuss the whole question of government ownership. As I said before, I think that is at present an open question in this country. It is a question under development. The people of all classes are discussing it, and it ought to be kept open, and it is a wrong to the people of this country for this contract to be entered into, if it will, as I think it will prejudice the consideration of that question .

I hope that in the allusions which I have made to the two or three gentlemen who control our great railways, it will not be supposed that I have any personal feeling against any one of them. It happens that two of these gentlemen come from an alien nation. I do not desire to put that forward as a reason for distrusting them, nor do I say we should distrust any other railway managers. But, Sir, it is a subject to be considered, whether the commercial interests and the political interests of this country should be subject to the influence of two or three men, whether the present men or others, who may not be citizens of this country, and whose actions may affect the national status of Canada.

Now, Sir, I have endeavoured to point out what I consider fatal defects in the agreement referred to in the resolution. If at times I have used some strong words, it is because I feel very strongly on the subject, and I think that the comments I have made show that I am justified in using strong words in characterizing the nature of the negotiations that have been carried on. I am not surprised that there have been blunders. Rather would I have been surprised if there had been no blunders. What has taken place ? The right hon. First Minister virtually dismissed the only man in his cabinet who had a railway experience that enabled him to deal with this question. The ex-Minister of Railways was so treated, that he was compelled to retire from the government. And then what happened ? The right hon. gentleman, utterly inexperienced in railway affairs, without the slightest knowledge of the thing he was undertaking, entered the lists with Mr. Hays, who is an acknowledged expert, one of the ablest in the country. The right hon. gentleman, Sir, went out of his class, and he got knocked out. Who could have expected anything else ? The right hon. gentleman relied on his supporters to carry him through, and apparently he has had some justification for that confidence. But, Sir, it is a lamentable thing to think that in a matter involving so many millions of money to this country, the negotiations were undertaken by a gentleman who is absolutely without knowledge of the least detail of the matter. He not only deprived himself of the railway minister, but he deprived himself of the assistance of the staff of the railway office, whereas the Grand Trunk manager had behind him a competent, experienced and able staff of officers to assist him in the negotiations. That is amply shown in the result. The right hon. gentleman had not a man behind him. Up to this hour he has not, so far as we can see, appealed to the professional staff in the Railway Department. Even to the last moment, when the government want some information, it is not the railway minister who gets it. It is the Minister of the Interior who sends for it, to Montreal, a gentleman who is engaged in drawing maps in his office. That is how business is conducted that is under this government. That is the kind of thing the House and the country are called upon to approve. I say it is no wonder that these negotiations have resulted as they have. The question now is : Who shall suffer? Will the right hon. gentleman admit the errors he has committed, or must the country pay for them ? That is the question before the country at this moment. There is no use pointing out to hon. gentlemen opposite how many or how serious these blunders are. These hon. gentlemen are always ready to 'hear, hear' to any statement made on their own side. There are some hon. gentlemen here who will have the enjoyment shortly of appearing before their constituents and explaining these matters. I do not think they will smile then. If they do, they will smile on the other side of their faces. To appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite is useless. We can only appeal to the country.

Mr. Speaker, I have spoken perhaps a great deal longer than I ought to have done. I have considered these agreements very carefully. I profess—I do not say it boastfully—to have had some little experience in such agreements ; I profess to have had for 20 years some acquaintance with such negotiations ; and I have never in my life seen any agreement which had in its four corners so many blunders as appear on the part of the government in this one. The negotiations from beginning to end present a wretched, deplorable, miserable picture, the only bright spot in which is the right hon. gentleman's story of a flower that bloomed in the spring.

Mr. A. W. PUTTEE (Winnipeg). Mr. Speaker, when the main question of this contract was before this House last year, I took occasion at considerable length to state my position with regard to it and with regard to the policy which I thought ought to be adopted in place of this contract; and I concluded by moving an amendment calling for government ownership and operation of railways in Canada. I am still of opinion that the government would have been well advised if they had accepted that amendment; and there are many other gentlemen in this House, and many more in the country to-day than there were at that time, who believe that would have been the best course for the government to have taken. I do not intend, Mr. Speaker, on the present occasion to deal at any length with that subject. We are discussing, or should be discussing, a number of concessions that are now to be granted to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company in the contract which was made last year; and you will have noticed, Mr. Speaker, that the various members on the government side who have spoken in this debate have paid very little attention to those concessions.

But before each one of them seems to rise this very natural question: Why not own the line as well as pay for it? It is also noticeable that all those who supported the contract last year are going to support the concessions. That, I think, is a fair conclusion to draw. All those gentlemen who could bring themselves at this date, under present conditions in this country, to support a contract between the government and a private orporation for the construction of a new transcontinential line, will no doubt be prepared to accept and endorse all the modifications that have since been made to it. The principle appears to be that the tail goes with the hide. The concessions made are material, important, and valuable, and yet the supporters of the contract have, with few exceptions, failed to deal with the details of those concessions. It is one of the defects of this system, which I pointed out last session, that in this, the first year of the life of the contract, before operations have started at all, we are called upon to consider a batch of concessions to the company. Some gentlemen argue that that shows that the contract which was made was not in favour of the corporation, but more in favour of the government. I could not see it in that light last session and cannot now. One of the defects of a contract of this kind is that we have got to measure our progress, our rule of development in this country, by what some far-away investors think of our prospects. It was not because the contract was not a good one that the Grand Trunk Railway directors did not dare go before their shareholders with it as it was. The Grand Trunk Railway shareholders in Great Britain have never been supposed to be optimistic regarding the future of this country. It is not possible for us to suppose that they would have the same appreciation of its prospects, the same trust in its future, as our own government and people, and yet by these concessions we are practically putting our future into their power. We are asked to assume now practically an unstated liability. By the contract of last year we were to guarantee the bonds on the mountain section to the extent of 75 per cent of its cost, but we are now asked to leave to the other parties the power of determining to what extent we will be liable. We are to vacate, to forego the right of foreclosure and adopt some other system, and a system foreign to this country. It is evident to me that the directors of the Grand Trunk Railway were watching the debate in this parliament last year and came to the conclusion, from the mountains of information produced and the discussion on both sides, that it was very uncertain whether this project will be carried through and whether the line from Winnipeg to Moncton is going to be constructed. We have evidence of this in the fact that they are now asking to be granted the privilege of renting a part of that line, which means getting the right of using that part of the line from Winnipeg east, which will connect with their branch to North Bay, and thus obtain exactly what they asked for at first, a western system with connections with their eastern system, leading to their ports on the other side of the line.

We had the proposition put forward in this House last year that this contract meant government ownership in fifty years. That it did not necessarily do so is not to the point, but the company evidently thought there was some danger of that, and they are now providing that they will be guaranteed the use of the road for a hundred years. It seems to me that although from this on the work may commence under this contract; as obstacles arise, as they will do in works of this magnitude, this government will be asked to meet them again and again and make still further concessions. That seems to me a natural conclusion, and the very fact that the government has yielded in this instance will but strengthen them to ask for more. Our position is analogous to that of the farmer in the story, who undertook to lead a frisky and rather fractious bull. In order to make more sure of going with the bull, he tied the rope securely around his own body. Presently the bull began to run helter-skelter across the country, and as it approached a neighbour's farm the neighbour called out: Hello, Smith, where are you going? And as the bull took a short cut around the corner, Smith replied: Ask the bull. It seems to me that before we can find out where this contract will bring us, we will have to ask the Grand Trunk Pacific shareholders.

The government supporters very properly have dwelt on the fact that the carrying out of a large work of this kind should do a great deal for the building up of this country. By giving employment to our own people and furnishing a market for manufactured products, this undertaking would be of incalculable benefit. But some two or three years ago complaints were made that, under its new management, the Grand Trunk Railway was becoming Americanized. I have never had any acquaintance with the Grand Trunk Railway, and am willing to agree to all praise given by both sides to that company for what it has done, but there were complaints made some two or three years ago that in its new management, and in its officials at all events, the company was becoming Americanized. Last year I drew the attention of the then acting Minister of Railways, the Finance Minister, to the likelihood of our being subjected, under this contract, to an invasion of people from across the line to take up the best positions on the construction of this road.

I pointed out at that time that, as a matter of fact, the Canadian Pacific, in its engineering department, had practically become Americanized. The Finance Minister admitted that he had heard something of the matter and promised to inquire into it. During the last year, it appears, these fears have been more than justified. Many rumours have been current and many statements made on the subject. I am not prepared to say that they are correct or incorrect; but I have been informed, at all events, by men who are in a far better position than I to know the condition of affairs, that, as a matter of fact, we were already subjected to this invasion, and that our own Canadian citizens, competent and equipped to do the work, were idle during the past year, while Americans were engaged on these surveys. Now, I know—I suspect at all events—that this matter has been brought to the attention of the government. I thought we had a right to know whether the government were inquiring into the matter. I took it for granted that they would be keen to check-mate such a move and to check-mate it early. I was informed, on what seemed to me fairly reliable authority, that, altogether, on the eastern and western sections, 270 surveyors were at work in the employ of the Grand Trunk, of whom only 17 were Canadians. I do not know whether that is true or not. But, like several other members of this House, I endeavoured to ascertain whether the government knew anything of this matter. I put questions on the order paper, as did other members. But so far, it seems to me, the government has been loath to give even a fair reply. On March 28th, I asked this question.

1. Is the government aware that survey parties are at work along the route of the proposed Transcontinental Railway between Winnipeg and Quebec?

2. Are these parties employed by the government or by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company?

3. If by the railway company, is there any understanding that the government will adopt the surveys, and pay the expenses incurred in making them?

The Minister of Railways replied:

1. The department is aware that survey parties are in the field north of North Bay and Port Arthur surveying branch lines to connect with the proposed Transcontinental Railway between Winnipeg and Quebec.

2. These parties are employed by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company.

It will be observed that the minister stated that he was aware that the Grand Trunk employees were surveying branch lines, these being purely Grand Trunk branch lines. And, of course, I had to take that as a sufficient reply. Less than a week after that, when this debate had begun, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), in the course of his speech, told the House that, as a matter of fact, the Grand Trunk had been surveying the main line, and had been carrying on the work all winter; and he regretted that their survey was not sufficiently complete to be laid before the House. He told us that he had sent an officer of his department to overlook the report of the surveying officers and to present to him a report which he presented to the House. In that report, which was based upon information furnished by Mr. Stephens, it was stated:

During the summer of 1903 preliminary surveys were made of the line between North Bay and Winnipeg and location surveys were made of a large portion of the line between Winnipeg and White Earth lake, about 200 miles. The extraordinary wet weather not only interfered with the work and movements of the survey parties but made the carriage of supplies extremely difficult and expensive. Enough work has been done, however, to show that it is possible to get a line from Winnipeg to the point at which the North Bay branch diverges from the main line.

Later on, there are reports made of the survey by sections of about one hundred miles each, showing that surveys had been made covering about 530 miles. And it is evidently on these surveys that the parties are employed who, the amalgamated engineers of this country claim, are in fact, aliens brought in by the Grand Trunk officers to do the work, Canadians being discriminated against. There is in the possession of many hon. members of this House, I believe, a considerable mass of literature on this subject, the same having been sent to us. But it has the fatal defect that it bears no signature, so that nobody has to take the responsibility of

it. A good deal of information it contains is similar to that given to me at various times during the winter. I have here a copy of a petition that has been forwarded to the Prime Minister and members of the government. I understand that it is properly signed on behalf of the Dominion Institute of Amalgamated Engineers. It is a somewhat lengthy petition, so I shall not read it all through, but will merely give some of the points, which, it seems to me, justify any hon. member in insisting that the government should be prepared to give us some assurance either that investigation has been made and has disproved these statements, or else that the matter will be thoroughly investigated and the correctness of these statements ascertained. I am aware, perfectly well aware, that complaints of this kind often dwindle very considerably in the light of investigation. But I am also aware that on works of this kind that are far from centres of population, investigation often exposes facts which prove that the complaints are well founded or even that the grievances are greater than they have been represented to be. The petition says :

The wholesale importations of college graduates from American schools has been effected, said graduates possessing absolutely no experience nor requisite training for the responsible positions and large salaries given them.

The greatest secrecy has been adopted in filling up all the survey parties in the field by large numbers of youths from American schools and none have been employed from any one of our own universities.

These imported employees are all strange to the existing conditions of this country, and their work performed east of Winnipeg has totalled an expenditure largely in excess of work done over similar ground by Canadians ; in addition to this these surveys were in most cases worthless.

It seems to me that the importance of this charge lies in the fact that it is made by a Canadian society of engineers. I should attach hardly any importance to such a statement if it were made by persons not actually and practically in touch with this work. The petition goes on :

Winnipeg from its central position in the Dominion has been made the main recruiting ground and focussing point for the immigration of American youths as draughtsmen, and even stenographers have been imported from the United States and been pressed into service in place of Canadians and local men, willing and competent to fill the positions, and at a time when, owing to the long and arctic winter, such work would greatly assist and provide support for local men.

Many thousands of dollars worth of surveying instruments and supplies, manufactured in the United States have been brought for the use of the engineering department and 33 per cent duty paid theron, but not one bona fide British or Canadian manufacturer has been asked to tender for same.

We mention this fact particularly for the reason that the spending power of one hundred and fifty millions of dollars will be placed in the hands of these men who will use every effort to monopolize the control of this enormous sum, involving thereby great loss and detriment to the people of this Dominion.

The petition then goes on to call attention to other things, such, for instance, as that free passes are given to men who come from the other side of the line, some of whom travel thousands of miles to reach the scene of their work, while the few men who are engaged in Canada, even if they have to travel from east to the far west, must pay their own travelling expenses—apparently a case of most unjust discrimination. The conclusion of the petition reads :

Your petitioners earnestly believe that if investigated, the above statements made can not only be thoroughly substantiated, but that it will also become evident that the entire railroad scheme is being exploited (evidently unknown to your government) for the exclusive benefit of American engineers, American contractors and American interests in general, to the exclusion, if possible, of everything Canadian or British, and your petitioners pray that you will earnestly take this matter into your most serious consideration at an early date.

We have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servants,
THE DOMINION INSTITUTE OF AMALGAMATED ENGINEERING, for British Columbia, Manitoba and Northwest Territories.
Per GEO. L. GRIFFITH, Provincial Secretary.

Great as may be my love and admiration for our neighbors to the south, it does not extend to the length of being willing to see them and their factories derive greater benefit from the expenditure of this vast sum of money in Canada than the factories and people of our own country. It is incumbent upon the government to deal fairly and frankly with the members of this House and to tell us whether they are going to investigate this matter, or if they have investigated it, whether they have found these grievances well founded or not. This matter should be put upon a proper basis before the contract is finally settled.

I have observed with some pleasure, and more interest, the arguments that have been brought forward during this debate to condemn government ownership of railways as against this scheme. One argument in connection with the financing of this proposition has been continually advanced. It has been explained to us that by the present arrangement this country will obtain a transcontinental line with very little expenditure. We are told that the eastern section of it is to be government owned, and that the country will own it without paying for it ; all it is to cost us is the $15,000,000 of interest for the ten years during which the company have the free use of that line. After that, the company will pay the 3 per cent and we, having borrowed the money for its construction, will simply hand that interest over to the people from whom we borrowed the money. So far as the western part of the road is concerned, we are simply guaranteeing the bonds and it is laid down that this section of the road will be a paying section from the start; that there will be sufficient traffic and business to support it and that, at all events within ten years, there will be sufficient revenue to meet the interest on the bonds. We are told that this is an obligation which we assume but which we shall never be called upon to meet. In this way the total expenditure by Canada is estimated at $20,000,000. But even if this is so, and applying that reasoning to my proposal that this road be government owned and government operated, all we do is to borrow the money. We construct the line and as soon as it is in operation it will pay. There will be business enough for it under my proposal exactly as under the other. The rates will be sufficient to pay the 3 per cent interest, therefore the receipts of the railway over operating expenses will pay the interest on the bonds, and under government ownership, as I propose it, you can get a new transcontinental line without costing Canada one cent. Surely if by the same process of reasoning you can get a government-owned transcontinental line for nothing and a company's line for $20,000,000 it is better to choose the cheaper of the two.

Since the commencement of this debate, there has been made public and used in this House a document whose existence was not suspected by the majority of us at the time of its commencement. Without knowing anything of the manner in which that document came to be published, I wish to express my satisfaction and pleasure that it has been possible to publish that document at this time. State documents of this kind that affect governments, that are brought out by crises invariably, sooner or later, become public property. This one, in the ordinary course of events, would have become public property at a time far enough distant to be of no effect and of no value. I am glad it has come out at this time, while the question is in the public mind, and when it can be made valuable to the people of this country. I am glad also for the reputation of its author that it became public. It was charged here last year by members on the government side—and I could never see any justification for the charge—that the Minister of Railways (Hon. Mr. Blair) had taken the action he did simply out of personal resentment, that, feeling that he had been slighted in the negotiations he resigned his portfolio and appealed to the House to sustain him. I believe the publication of this document at this time is simply a fair treatment of that honourable gentleman (Mr. Blair). The document is, at all events, a valuable addition to the current literature of the Dominion on the question of government railways, and I admire now, as I have done for some time the author of it, not only because he could prepare such a document, but because he had evidently, while Minister of Railways, been where so many of us refuse to go, in a position where he could learn, and that he had come to the conclusion that not only was the proposition for a government road across the continent a feasible one, but that the time had come for it. He said:

> The operation of the Intercolonial Railway by government has secured to the people of all Canada who have access to it, moderate and stable rates of transport, applied to all alike, and absolutely free from discrimination.

He said further:

> The fact is, public opinion is ripe to accept such a policy as a boon from the government and as promising relief to the country from what, rightly or wrongly, people believe are the unreasonable exactions of the corporation railways.

That was the opinion of the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals of this country. The time is ripe, the people are ready and the opportunity has come. That brings me to note shortly the speech delivered in this House the other evening by the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Smith), being his first speech on this subject, he not having been in the House last session when it was brought up. This hon. gentleman told the House, first, that he was an advocate of the principle of government ownership; a kind of platonic admirer of the principle, I might imagine. He laid down this condition, that although an advocate of government ownership it appeared to him that neither this parliament nor this government would be justified in adopting the principle of constructing and operating a road passing through all the provinces of this confederation until such time as all the towns and cities in the country operated their own street railway systems, and until the provinces took possession of and operated all the provincial railways under their jurisdiction. Then, the other condition was that we should first perfect ourselves in the art of controlling railway corporations; not, mark you, that we should afterwards go on controlling them, but that we should first undertake to control railway corporations and thus fit ourselves for the duty of operating railways afterwards. It appears to me that this is a scheme of government ownership that we can leave to our descendants. I can see no force in the argument, and I should not be disposed to pay any attention to it if it had not been put forward by one who first declared himself to be an advocate of the principle of government ownership. To show the weakness of the argument, let me just for a moment reverse the conditions. Let me suppose, that, last year at this time, say, when, I believe, this question of government ownership was in the balance, when the government was contending within itself on the question, the principle of government ownership won, and the government came down proposing to build this road through Canada and to operate it publicly. Now, suppose that the hon. member for Vancouver should get up and say as an advocate of government ownership : I cannot support this policy because the cities and towns of Canada have not municipalized their roads and because we have not yet mastered the art of controlling railway corporations. It will be apparent to any one at once that the hon. gentleman could not have taken that position and would not have taken that position, and it breaks down immediately the force of his argument that he is bound to support the contract at this time instead of the principle of publicly constructing and operating the road. Having in mind the position that the Intercolonial Railway is at the present time and having in mind the statement of the late Minister of Railways and Canals that the one sure way we have of making the Intercolonial Railway a dividend-earning concern, would be to extend it to the west, let me say to those who would support this contract and yet avow themselves as supporters of the principle of government ownership, that you cannot in Canada support government ownership by choking out the new life of the Intercolonial Railway. In the city which I represent, in the province from which I come and in the great west that is beyond, there is hardly a person of any political faith but what believes the time has come when we can support further transcontinental lines. In other parts of the country there may be here and there people who are still debating the question as to whether it is necessary, or as to whether it is called for, but in the west there is no hesitation at all on that point. We believe that the field is now open, that, as a matter of fact, further railway facilities have to be afforded, and there is no doubt in my mind, and I have taken considerable trouble to ascertain what the people are thinking about it, that our people will say that we should have a government road through to the west. When the intimation was made to the country last year that the government had decided that the time had come for the construction of a new road, it appeared to me then, as it appears to me now, that the only effective opposition that could be offered to it is that there should be a proposition to construct and operate the road by the government. I can see, myself, no intermediate ground. Our people, even though they would accept the road under any conditions, want a government road. I take up the amendment that has been put before you, Mr. Speaker, by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) and I must confess that I do not find in that a very clear cut or even reasonably clear-cut expression of the principle of government ownership and operation. I wish that it had been so. I notice that many of the supporters of the hon. leader of the opposition, in speaking to this question, have undoubtedly and very forcibly committed themselves to the principle of government ownership and operation and I am glad they have done so. I hope the time will come when they will be successful in persuading their party to take a step forward to the line of clean, clear-cut government ownership and operation of railways. But, I do not find it in the present amendment. I have tried to look at it in this way. Supposing in that famous programme drawn up in 1893 by the party then in opposition, they had included or tacked on at the end of it the words of the amendment that is now before the House and that afterwards they had come into power and proposed this measure that is now before us. Would any hon. gentleman say that it might not be included within the words of the amendent? I think I understand some of the difficulties that a political party has to contend with in this country in still holding to the past and binding itself to the future.

But the one thing that has surprised me most of all is, that this government should have allowed itself to throw away the golden opportunities it had ; being in power at a period of expansion in this country, and when the moment had arrived that it was possible to propose another transcontinental line. It was within their power to have proposed a policy that would have aroused enthusiasm in Canada ; a policy that would have appealed to the pride, and the patriotism, and the independence and the self-governing instinct of all people of this country. They had it within their power to propose the inspiring policy of a government railroad, a people's road from ocean to ocean; a railroad that would at all times be in competition with the railroads owned by private corporations, and which would have inevitably led in the future to the nationalization of the railways in this country. And, had this government committed themselves to that policy, they could turn around to their supporters, and to the opposition, and to the people of Canada and say : we must have some well advised scheme to put the civil service of the country on a proper basis, so that we may ensure that this government road can be operated in the public interest and cannot be used by politicians purely for political purposes. Had the government carried out this twin object, they would have brought upon themselves honour, and they would have done a lasting good to Canada.

Mr. G. O. ALCORN (Prince Edward). Mr. Speaker, after so many hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have so fully, so ably, and so exhaustively discussed this question, and more particularly, the terms of the two agreements between the government and the Grand Trunk Railway, I do not propose, in the dying hours of this debate, to say more than a very few words. It is not my intention to enter into a discussion of the demerits of the clauses of the contracts, but I shall confine myself to indicating some of the many reasons not arising on the specific terms of the contracts, why the resolution now before the House should not be adopted. The first of the reasons which I assign, is that the course taken by the government in introducing this measure to parliament and to the country, is unconstitutional. I am aware that constitutional questions are not regarded with special favour, and that they are looked upon as practical and somewhat pedantic. But, Sir, if it can be shown, as in my humble opinion it can, that the course pursued by the government in bringing in this measure—which is one of the most momentous in the history of parliament—is diametrically opposed to that laid down by the authorities, and that the effect of that course is to enable the government improperly to accomplish a purpose which they probably otherwise could not have attained, and that the rights and privileges of parliament are thereby infringed, and the people unduly burdened; if that can be shown, then it is a highly practical matter to which to direct the attention of the House and the country.

It is within the personal memory of every member of this House and of every elector in Canada, that last session the Prime Minister in an ever to be remembered and most dramatic speech introduced this subject to parliament. He did so by bringing in a Bill attached to which was a schedule, being a copy of an agreement, which he announced had been made and completed between the government and the Grand Trunk Railway Company. That agreement or contract had been absolutely concluded, signed, sealed and delivered inter partes; it was a consummated contract, and the Bill was simply intended to call upon the House to ratify that contract as previously concluded. It is to this, Mr. Speaker, to which I propose to direct the attention of the House as being an improper course, viz., the making of a prior contract behind the backs of parliament, unknown to the representatives of the people, and in which they had no part, lot or share. The first intimation, which parliament had that that agreement was in existence, or was even contemplated, was the introduction of this Bill of last session. Again this session the right hon. gentleman brought in a resolution (and that is a more proper course) upon which he will no doubt subsequently base a Bill to have the amended agreement with the Grand Trunk Company adopted by this parliament, and given effect to. Both of these agreements have been made in the same manner, unknown to any one, except the government themselves, and those gentlemen who are acting on behalf of the railway interests concerned. I propose to show that the proper and constitutional course would have been not to make and conclude an agreement between the parties beforehand; not to attempt to bind the country by a consummated contract; but to first come to this parliament with an explanation as to the negotiations being carried on between the government and the railway company; a statement as to the position of these negotiations, of the agreements to which they pointed, and which the government desired to accomplish. Hon. gentlemen will see at once the very vast difference which exists between these two courses. The right hon. gentleman, in introducing the Bill last session did so, as I have said, in a most dramatic fashion. In effect, he was calling on his followers in clarion tones to rally to his support, and to vote this Bill through parliament. To-day, he is doing the same thing in regard to this resolution and the Bill which will follow. What the right hon. gentleman has done in this transaction, is in effect to say: I the Premier of Canada, the leader of the great Reform party, the policy maker of that party in this country,—I have made and concluded an agreement with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada; I have taken my political life in my hand, I have staked the fortunes of myself and my party upon that scheme, and I now present this Bill to my followers in the House with the request that they should vote it through, and I appeal to my supporters in the press and in the country, that they should support the party in so doing.

If, instead of that he had followed what I very humbly conceive to be the proper constitutional course, the right hon. gentleman last session and now would simply have come to this parliament and stated the negotiations which were being carried forward. the point at which they had arrived, and the climax to which they were directed; and would have submitted to the judgment, the business acumen and the common sense of the members of this House on both sides, whether or not the interests of the country would be subserved by bringing those negotiations to a close in any manner approaching that in which that object has been effected by the agreements in question. It may be answered that the first agreement contains a clause providing that it should be hereafter confirmed by the parliament of Canada. For the purposes of my argument, Mr. Speaker, I submit that it makes no practical difference whether such a clause is introduced or not. The point to which I direct the attention of hon. gentlemen is that the government, by concluding the agreement first, and insisting that their followers support that agreement as something by which the country is already bound, —to the extent to which the executive may bind parliament,—have taken an unwarranted course. The difference between the two courses is so vast that no minister could hope to have passed through this House, in the form in which it was passed, the Bill of last session. This subject is treated of by Mr. Todd, in volume 1 of his well-known work, where after discussing certain methods by which the executive is allowed certain rights of quasi-legislation by the issue of Orders in Council, minutes of committees of council, and departmental regulations, he says :

There are certain forms of procedure, of ordinary occurrence in the administration of public affairs by the ministers of the Crown, which need to be strictly confined within constitutional limits, lest they should become the instruments of oppression or misgovernment. These are :— The issue of Orders in Council and royal proclamations ; and of minutes of committees of council and other departmental regulations; and (in the next chapter) legislation by public departments ; and the entering into contracts by government departments for the public service.

He then gives a history of the contest which took place in the imperial parliament with regard to the length to which the executive might go in the way of this quasi legislation, and shows that that parliament, after a long discussion on the question, adopted certain standing orders by which parliament was afterwards guided. He says, at page 488 :

An important question—kin in principle to that which has been just considered—has arisen of late years with regard to contracts, to be entered into between any department of the executive government and other parties, for the performance of any work or service, the undertaking of which has been, or may afterwards be, authorized by parliament. It is manifest that the responsibility of entering into such contracts properly rests upon the executive alone. But it is equally clear that the government have no constitutional authority to make a contract which shall be binding on the House of Commons, by whom the necessary funds for carrying on the contract must be supplied ; and that the consent of parliament should be first obtained to all new contracts.

At page 492, speaking again with regard to the standing orders to which I have alluded, and which were made in consequence of certain contracts with reference to ocean postal service which had been the subject of discussion in the House, and with respect to which the authority of ministers who had made them had been questioned, the author continues :

Though confined, in the letter, to a particular class of contracts, the above-mentioned resolution,—requiring that parliament shall be notified of the intention of the government to enter into contracts which involve prospective expenditure, not limited to the service of the current financial year—embodies a principle which is susceptible of general application.

A perusal of the two chapters from which these extracts are taken, in connection with the subsequent chapter upon the subject of the control of parliament over supplies, will show that the proper rule to be observed is this, that while it is competent for a government or a minister to make contracts in the course of strictly departmental routine, with regard to matters pertaining to a particular department, or to make contracts with regard to expenditures which have been in principle authorized by parliament, yet no government or minister have or has any right to make any contract with regard to new work, involving new expenditure, the principle of which has not been sanctioned by the House of Commons. In my humble opinion, the reason for the adoption of that rule—and it is a very excellent reason—is this, that it is not consistent with public policy or the public good or the proper conduct of public affairs in the House of Commons, that a government or a minister should have the right to bind parliament or to affect the expenditure of the country by making a contract which is first heard of when an attempt is made to force it through the House by means of a party majority supporting that government or that minister. The evil pointed out is the use of the party lash upon members of the House with respect to a project which the government have, as far as it has been able, taken out of the legislative grasp of parliament itself. I think, Mr. Speaker, that if hon. gentlemen would consider the rule and the reason for it, as I have very briefly expressed it, they will agree with me that had the government felt themselves bound last session by the rule as I have endeavoured to state it, had the right hon. leader of the government submitted this matter as one to be discussed solely upon its merits and without regard to the interests of the Reform party, it would not have passed this House. At any rate, it would not have passed in anything like the form it now assumes. Much less could the right hon. gentleman have hoped to pass the resolution now submitted to us, because that resolution calls upon us to adopt an amended agreement which eliminates from the first contract every safeguard for the interests of the country which that document contains. You cannot find an instance in which the interests of the people were attempted to be served by the original agreement, which is not, so far as the people of Canada are concerned, injuriously affected by the supplemental contract. Had the contract of last year been presented, as it should have been, to the intelligent consideration of this House, and not on strict party lines, I have no hesitation in saying that even the followers of the right hon. gentleman would have refused to endorse it. As a matter of fact, many of them were opposed to it. One gentleman who was then in the cabinet, and whom the right hon. the First Minister has declared, in the most emphatic manner, to be a man eminently worthy of passing judgment on the scheme, left the government rather than support it. During the debate of last session, the dissatisfaction which prevailed in the ranks of the Reform party was quite evident. It did not require a very close observer to detect numerous gentlemen on that side who were being dragooned into supporting the Bill. It was commonly reported that certain prominent gentlemen, up to a very late day in the history of the debate, refused to support the measure, and if current rumour is to be trusted, there are yet some members of the government itself representing Ontario, who have failed up to the present to give any very active support to either the Bill of last session or the resolution now before the House. Every one conversant at all with the state of public opinion in Ontario, must know that this project has failed to be received in that province with anything like the acclaim which the government expected. In fact, so very coldly was it received, that, according to general belief, the people will fail to endorse it at the polls. It is for that reason that these gentlemen to whom I refer have refused up to the present to give more than a passive support to this measure, and this must be a very weak spot indeed in the government armour.

Undeniably one of the most important and sacred of the rights, privileges and duties of the House of Commons is to stand between the executive and the people they represent, more particularly with regard to the finances of the country, and its expenditure, present and prospective, submitted to the consideration of parliament. Therefore, though the point may be a dry constitutional one, I think it is a most practical point if we are able to show that not alone in this matter, but in every similar project dealing with the finances of Canada or other assets of this country, the universal practice of the government has been to pursue an unconstitutional course, and I think we would be derelict in our duty to the electors of Canada if we failed to point that out and submit it to the consideration of the electorate. One notable instance of the result of the unconstitutional methods pursued by the government arose in connection with the Yukon Railway deal. During the session of 1902, in the consideration of the estimates, an item was reached of some $300,000, proposed to be paid to Mackenzie & Mann as compensation for the expenses they had incurred in furnishing materials and work preparatory to the construction of the Yukon Railway. The item was explained by the right hon. the First Minister, who said (See 'Hansard,' p. 4870)—that he did not pretend that Mackenzie & Mann had any legal authority or right to call upon Canada for the payment of the money, but he thought there was a moral obligation resting upon us to discharge this debt. But that debt was due to the unconstitutional course pursued by the government. The government had made an absolute agreement with Mackenzie & Mann for the building of that railway. The first notice we had of the agreement was when it was brought up to this House in the shape of a Bill, and the supporters of the government were, for the first time, called upon to put the measure through. Subsequently that Bill failed to become law, and Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann put in a claim based upon a contract, which should never have been made, and which on its face required to be affirmed by parliament. That is an instance of the effect of the disregard by the government of the constitutional rule to which I have referred. This government, however, has always, ever since it came into power in 1896, when dealing with projects of this nature, first dealt with them by passing an Order in Council or by conducting a secret contract and have then come to parliament to force the measure through with the aid of the party whip. To this practice we owe the Drummond County deal, the Yukon Railway deal, the Treadgold concession, and now this contract, overshadowing all previous transactions, and involving interests greater than 'have been'.

This course, no doubt, has been adopted by the government because it suited political exigencies. It suits political exigencies, in this case, because we have the evidence of the president of the Grand Trunk Railway, that he has entered into a partnership with this government. And the evidences are that it is a political partnership, for hon. gentlemen are all aware of the very prominent part taken by the senior partner of this firm (the G.T.R.) in a late election in the province of Quebec. In these other cases also, there were political exigencies to be provided for. The partnership is expected to extend over a great many years; it is expected, in fact, to keep this government in power for many years to come. That is, no doubt, the primary object of the government in entering into the arrangement which they have made with the railway company. This government has never, so far as I am aware, held itself bound by constitutional rules, or even by the statutes of the country. An instance of that, and a striking one, was afforded last session when the matter of the Treadgold concession was under discussion. In a certain minute of council, it had been stated for the information of His Excellency the Governor General, that a certain statute—I believe it was the Dominion Lands Act—directly authorized the particular course which council was then recommending. On turning to the section of the statute indicated, it was found that that section absolutely forbade the precise thing as authority for which the government cited it.

That is a striking instance; and it seems to me that the matter under discussion discloses a no less flagrant departure from proper methods.

The second ground which I propose to urge, very shortly, with regard to this measure, is that the scheme ought not to have been brought down until it had been examined and reported on by the transportation commission or some similar board. Hon. gentlemen are aware that, for over three years, this government had been promising the country the appointment of a commission to be composed of master minds on questions of transportation, the best experts whose services could be secured. Presumably the recommendations of expert minds of that description given after the most minute inquiry into the whole subject, would be a most valuable state document. We should then have precisely what hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have always been asking for; full information. We on this side of the House have never stated that there should be no railway, or that a railway should not be constructed over a route to some extent approaching that described by the government though under very widely different conditions. But we have said, we continue to say, and we must say in the future, that we consider it impolitic, unwise and improper to call upon the parliament of Canada to vote means for the enormous expenditures which this scheme will involve without one particle of adequate information upon the thousand and one points which present themselves for consideration, and of which the members of the House should be seized before they are called upon to exercise their judgment by way of voting either for or against the scheme presented. If that commission had been appointed; if it had taken evidence, as it was represented that it would, if it had examined all phases of the transportation question, we should have had full information. We were told that they were to examine the entire question of transportation by land and by water—transcontinental and other. That is what the country expected. On the 9th of May last, this government issued an Order in Council very fully, very wisely and very adequately dealing with the entire question, promising the appointment of this commission, prescribing the purview of its duties, and stating that upon the report of the commissioners it was hoped the government would be able to take action with regard to the transportation interests of Canada. The members of this House and the electors of Canada relied as they had a right to do, upon the representations made in that Order in Council. It seems to me, in the light of subsequent events, that this Order dealing with the transportation question in the intelligent manner in which it did, was, in all probability, the product of the gentleman who subsequently left the government because he was unable to give his adhesion to the scheme now before the House. Had that Order in Council been followed up, implemented by proper action on the part of the government by the appointment of the commission, and had the commission gone to work in the manner they should, we should have, perhaps not by this time, but in due time, such a body of evidence as would enable members of this House to vote intelligently upon any scheme of transcontinental transportation which might be submitted. But, though that Order in Council was passed on the 19th of May, in the month of July following and before any appointments to that commission were made, the government deliberately took out of the purview of the work of the commission the one main question which would have been the principal reason for its existence. Surely Sir, the question of transcontinental transportation overshadowed the mere examination—which is all that this commission has done in the meantime—of certain harbours, the discussion of the placing of certain lights and petty matters of that kind with regard to a few of the harbours in Quebec and Ontario. Surely it would have been a reasonable course to leave within the purview of the duties of this commission, this transcontinental scheme, and to allow the commission—as everybody expected it would be allowed—to make the most minute inquiries by taking evidence of all persons from ocean to ocean, having expert knowledge on the subject of transportation and to formulate all that evidence into a report which might reasonably have been made the basis of future action upon that vast question. But we find that, instead of having that commission do the work, which the country expected it to do, we find, I say, the government, taking in their own hands the one principal subject with which the commission should have dealt. It therefore appears to me that we must come to the conclusion that the appointment of that commission was never seriously intended as a bona fide step towards the solution of the transportation question.

The very ineffective manner in which the commission has entered upon its duties, or rather has neglected those duties, appears to corroborate that opinion. Not only does the government remove from the list of subjects to be considered by the commission the question of transcontinental transportation, but it comes to this House with a scheme which it presents as a perfect scheme both as a whole and in all its details. Although the one expert in the government, the one gentleman whom the government themselves have quite lately told us in the most emphatic terms was and is to-day an expert in railway matters, and by whose judgment the railway interests of the people of Canada are to be hereafter guided, opposes the scheme, the government presents it as a perfect scheme and calls upon its followers to vote it through, thus implying that without the aid of Mr. Blair, the government themselves were more competent to deal with such a question than a board composed of the best experts to be obtained in Canada. The fact that the commission has been appointed appears to me to be a very good reason why this scheme should not be passed until it be reported upon. But we have it upon the evidence of the president of the Grand Trunk Railway that the negotiations between the government and that railway were actually in progress during a period of eighteen months next before the 8th of March last; that is, these negotiations were well under way before the government announced its intention to appoint this commission. Therefore, we are justified in coming to the conclusion that the appointment of the commission was never intended as a bona fide step towards the solution of the transcontinental problem. If the government intended to bring forward this scheme why was the commission ever appointed; I can see no object in appointing a commission simply to look into questions of harbours and breakwaters and lights and matters of that kind as to which the Minister of Marine has certain duties which he will no doubt perform. This is a great and vast scheme, great in the interests involved, in its consequences to future generations of Canadians, and in the expenditure which it entails. Surely, therefore, it should have the fullest and most careful consideration and all necessary time should be taken to give it the most minute inquiry. As the scheme has not received anything approaching that consideration which it deserves, I am of opinion that until the government can show by actual survey that a route can be secured so short and practicable as to enable the best railway experts to say that a railway of the highest type can be constructed on the proposed route and that therefore a rate can be made so cheap as to compete with any existing route, there is no justification for bringing forward this scheme. We were told by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) during the last session when he discussed this question at great length as the railway expert of the government, that money expended in the construction of any class of railroad upon any portion of the proposed route, would be money actually thrown away unless that railroad was of the highest type and of the most modern construction. We have no information yet whether any kind of railroad can be constructed upon the very lengthy route between Quebec and Winnipeg; much less have we any information as to the feasibility of building in any portion of that country a road of the class described by that gentleman, as the only class which should be constructed. This scheme deals not alone with the Canada of to-day, but with the Canada of fifty or one hundred years to come. Even if the scheme or any portion of it is expedient to-day it may not be expedient twenty or thirty years from now; no man can say. The movement of wheat from the west to the east is in its infancy. It cannot be said what trade route will be followed in days to come by the golden treasures of the west. Hon. gentlemen are aware that a number of charters have been granted for the construction of railways from the neighbourhood of Winnipeg to Hudson's Bay. It cannot be said with certainty that the route for the removal of the grain from the wheat fields of the west will not be by the Hudson's Bay route. What would be the result of the establishment of that trade route, as upon the railway now proposed to be constructed by this government, especially considering the fact that we already have a railroad covering the entire route from Montreal to the Atlantic, constructed by the people of Canada at an expense of something like $71,000,000? This is not the only thing to be considered; the wheat or the flour, the product of the wheat, may go west. Mr. Hays points that out on page 32 of the pamphlet with which hon. members of the House are familiar, as the report of the meeting of the Grand Trunk shareholders. He says:

> There are many of you here to-day who will live to see the Grand Trunk Pacific hauling as much of its grain towards the Pacific for consumption in China, Japan and that territory as will be hauled in this eastern direction.

These are matters which are to be taken into consideration in discussing the enormous expenditure which the government is now seeking to force upon this country.

The fourth ground to which I propose to call your attention for an instant, is that this parliament is in its last stages. This we presume is the last session of this parliament. It cannot be reasonably said that this parliament has the right or any mandate to force upon the people of Canada a measure of the tremendous importance and the enormous cost of this scheme, introduced in the dying hours of this legislature. It appears to me that it is not necessary to argue that question at all. It is manifestly highly improper and the last thing that the government should undertake to do to force upon the country a scheme for which no one has called, for many features of which no necessity appears, and which has never been mooted until proposed by the right hon. leader of the government himself who seeks to force that scheme upon the country by the aid of his following in parliament in the last days of the government and of this parliament. But, Mr. Speaker, if that is so, much more and upon much higher grounds is it improper for another reason: During last session this government of its own motion, by its own deliberate act and through its majority forced upon this parliament a most drastic and outrageous Redistribution Bill. By so doing the government publicly announced that this parliament as at present constituted does not fully, fairly, equitably, and properly represent the people of Canada. Surely, after passing an Act such as that and after taking such a position as that before the people of this country, the very last thing that the government should do is to ask this parliament, which it declares is not properly constituted, to pass an Act of this transcendant importance.

Another matter which I wish to speak about is that of route. The question of route is one very material to all the provinces of confederation. But, let me point out that one of the provinces, the province of Ontario, has been absolutely and deliberately left out of the scheme. When the next general election takes place the electors of Ontario will view this matter in this light. They will say to themselves: What interest have we, in this province of Ontario, in a line of railway running through a wilderness which will supply no local traffic 400, or if recent statements be true, 700 miles north of the business centres of that province? Surely, we have not the most remote interest in a line of that description and yet we of Ontario must pay 3-5ths of the cost. I think that will be the view which the people of Ontario will take of this project. During the discussion of this matter in the Railway Committee, hon. gentlemen will recollect that the hon. Minister of Finance was asked about this question of route. His answer was that it will be time enough to discuss that question when the matter of aid, if ever, came before this House. The matter of aid did come before this House and was discussed for many weeks. The same hon. minister, asked the same question in the House during the debate on aid, replied that the route as far as the eastern division was concerned would be where the government, with the concurrence of the company upon the advice of its engineers and surveyors, might see fit hereafter to place it. The effect of that is that the representatives of the people in parliament have absolutely nothing whatever to say in regard to this very important question; in fact, Sir, not only in regard to the route are the representatives of the people absolutely excluded from a voice in this measure, but in regard to various other matters the government has taken the subject absolutely into its own hands. Reading the emendatory agreement now submitted to this House one is struck by this feature. A number of agreements, not one or two, but a number, is to be concluded by the government and the railway company without any intervention from parliament whatever. The phrases 'as hereafter agreed upon' and 'as may be hereafter agreed between the parties' run through a number of the clauses. So that the government is actually taking out of the hands of parliament the decision of one of the most vital questions which, I submit, should be left to this House.

In regard to the aid given, to the western division, it appears to me that unless the company saw fit to take the far northern route and so open up new territory it should have had no aid from this government whatever. What possible reason can there be, what good ground can be assigned for granting aid to a railway to be constructed through a thousand miles of the most magnificently productive territory on the face of the earth? In speaking of the prairie section Mr. Hays says also at page 32 of the report, before quoted:

> There cannot be the slighest doubt as to what the returns will be from the prairie section.

And Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson, as reported at page 12 of the same report, says:

> As regards the prairie section, the government, not unfairly, held that it would be self-sustaining from the day of its completion, and in this view we are willing to concur.

If, on this prairie section, every mile of the road will be productive the moment the rails are laid I can see no reason, and I think the people of the country will agree with the view, no aid should have been given on that section of the road at all.

There is another matter to which I propose drawing the attention of the House for a few moments, and that is the question of the suitability of the hinterland of Quebec and Ontario for the construction of a railway, its adaptability for settlement, and its agricultural capacities. A few days ago, in speaking in this House, the right hon. leader of the government twitted members of the opposition with what he in effect said was their unpatriotic course in seizing with avidity upon every scintilla of evidence which went to show that the country to the north through which this line is proposed to be built was not the land flowing with milk and honey which he and his party represented it to be. In regard to that I would say that we are simply investigating a matter of fact and surely members of the opposition would be derelict in their duty if they failed to point out the evidence emanating from the government and which contradicts the position taken by the government that this country is what they represent it to be. Hon. gentlemen are aware that during last session a book was placed in the hands of members of this House which has become familiarly known as "The mountains of information." I ask the House to bear with me for a moment while I make some observations in regard to this book. It is prefaced by a note signed by Henry M. Ami addressed to the right hon. the leader of the government in these terms:

In compliance with your request, I have the honour to transmit to you an account of the resources of the country between Quebec and Winnipeg along the line of the National Transcontinental Railway.

On the next page he says :

With a view of better understanding the character of the country traversed, its physical features, soil, timber, mineral and other resources, the district has been divided into sections, 100 miles in length, taking in a belt of country seventy-five miles on each side of the proposed line of railway.

Then we have attached to the document a map of Canada across which is traced a line, the deduction from which is that that line represents the intended route of the railway. But, Mr. Speaker, I fail to discover between the covers of this book, or from any official, or other source, that the route of this railway has ever been in any way defined. Therefore it is very difficult to see how Mr. Ami was able to fix it so exactly and to give us the alleged physical features along the line of the National Transcontinental Railway, and to deal in a similar manner with a belt of country one hundred and fifty miles in breadth from Quebec to Winnipeg, along its route—a route never determined. However, he has done so, and I ask hon. gentlemen to turn to page six of that book for the purpose of seeing what evidence the government have placed in our hands with regard to the three reasons they gave for selecting this northern country as the site for their railway. The first of these reasons is, that it is excellently adapted to railway construction ; the second is, that it is a most fertile district of the greatest agricultural possibilities ; and the third, that it is an excellent territory for settlement. On page 6, Mr. Joseph Bouchette, dealing with explorations on the St. Maurice says :

I find it intersected by rivers and their innumerable tributaries rising more generally in the lakes and the immense swamps which cover this section of the province. The essential feature of the land is its unfitness for cultivation, being composed for the most part of light sandy soil, or partaking of a rocky nature. It is frequently broken by chains of hills of no continuity. The cliffs which in many cases discover their barren nature are principally composed of granite of irregular stratification.

On the next page he says : under the heading of 'timber.'

The prevalent timber to be met with is spruce, tamarack, fir, white birch, pine and some cedar.

Around some of the large lakes some arable land is to be found, but so uncomeatable that it must ever remain waste and uncultivated. Indeed, upon the whole, this portion of the country appears to me to be yet in the primitive stage of its formation which I believe could be easily traced by a geologist, and therefore ages may perfect a tract which now is absolutely unfit for cultivation.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Is that in a government report ?

Mr. ALCORN. This is in the Prime Minister's mountains of information. Turning to page 14 dealing with the Gatineau district, the report of Mr. James Richardson says :

Here, about 230 miles northward of Ottawa city, and 1,090 feet above the sea appears to be the northern limit of pine on this branch of the Gatineau.

And yet, we were told that this railway was to be constructed some four hundred miles north of settled Ontario. On the next page, under the heading 'Head Waters of Gatineau and St. Maurice rivers' the same gentleman proceeds :

Along Hair-cutting lake, which is about seven miles in length and from two chains to about two miles wide, is a level plain rising over the lake from ten to twenty feet, composed of brown sand, and mostly bare of vegetation. Along the lake shore, where the waves have acted on the sand, iron sands like those of the Lower St. Lawrence are met with. Proceeding down Hair-cutting river to Great and Little Beaver lakes, the country continues comparatively level and consists of sandy plains, rising in terraces sometimes sixty feet over the river, and covered mostly with blueberry bushes, and here and there remains of small burned spruce. From these lakes to where the traverse leaves Hair-cutting river and thence to Kirkendatch on the St. Maurice, a distance of about eighteen miles, the country is still covered with brown sand, and the inequalities of the surface are from twenty to one hundred and twenty feet high.

Turning to page 19 where the river Desert district is referred to under the head of Agriculture it is stated :

For agricultural purposes, this tract of land has no value whatever.

At page 20, dealing with the upper Ottawa district, Mr. H. C. Symmes says :

The frost begins about the 1st of September, and the ice disappears about the end of May, when vegetation proceeds with great activity.

On page 23, dealing again with the upper Ottawa, we find this statement under the heading of 'Soil.'

Although the district as a whole in its southern portion cannot be said to be suitable for agricultural purposes, still, in many places, considerable areas of good land are known to exist.

At page 27, Dr. A. E. Barlow, dealing with the survey of the district of Nipissing, and the county of Pontiac says :

Summer frosts, so much dreaded by the farmers, especially in districts newly opened for settlement, have in the past proved a rather serious barrier to the successful raising of wheat, while oats have suffered severely, particularly in clearances situated some distance from the larger bodies of water. Frosts generally occur from the 18th to the 25th of August on the calm, clear nights following the heavy north winds.

Further on he says :

The red pine seems to flourish on the apparently sterile sand plains which are a feature in many parts of this district.

On page 28, we find this statement :

Jack pine, called by some pitch pine, is very often encountered in the more barren rocky areas, and its presence seems an almost certain indication of the extreme poverty of the underlying soil.

Turning to page 34, still referring to the upper Ottawa, as the result of Lindsay Russell's and H. C. Symmes' surveys, it is said of them :

They give the general character and aspect of the country they observed in their respective traverses of the rivers and lakes assigned to them, representing it as a whole to be a rocky barren country, unfit for agricultural purposes, and as chiefly timbered with a stunted growth of spruce, tamarack, white birch and balsam.

Under the head of 'soil' they say :

The soil in general and with few exceptions is sandy and rocky.

Turning to page 26, dealing with the Gatineau district we find the following :

The Gatineau and Jean des Terres sections, are both rugged and mountainous, and much less adapted for cultivation, and the characteristic features of the latter section are very similar to those described in the lake and river explorations.

At page 38, dealing with the Ottawa river, Mr. Lindsay Russell says :

The portion of the Ottawa river covered by my survey flows through a country of very uniform character in nature of surface, kind and quality of soil, and prevalent growth of wood. The surface is everywhere uneven, being broken by the low and generally rocky hills of the Laurentian formation which extends throughout ; any of the small comparatively level areas are usually spruce and tamarack swamps.

Under the head of 'soil' he says :

The hills, in many cases, were bare, rocky ridges ; in others, but lightly covered with soil and growth. In the valleys and low grounds adjoining streams the soil was deeper, though generally similar in character if dry. The greater part of the level or low gronds was either tamarack or spruce or open mossy swamps. In a few exceptional cases a narrow border of richer soil was observed along the edges of streams, being the alluvium thrown up by them during floods.

At page 40, under the head of 'climate,' he states :

As to climate, the country traversed would seem to be nearly three weeks behind in spring that of the city of Ottawa, with a corresponding earlier setting in of winter.

As to the intensity and duration of the summer heat, I do not think it would ever be sufficient to ripen wheat ; oats and barley might, perhaps, come to maturity ; potatoes of medium size and excellent quality are grown at the Hudson Bay Company's post on Victoria lake.

Of the fitness for settlement or other future resources of the country it is hard to draw any favourable picture.

Apart from climate, the nature of the surface and soil is such that with the exception of the small area before mentioned, at the junction of the Abitibi, I neither know nor have been told of any portion of it fit for profitable cultivation in the sense understood by settlers of the present day in Canada.

At page 41, Mr. John Sullivan says, under the head of the 'good agricultural land :

Several of the Indians, about fifteen or eighteen, I am told, died of starvation last winter within a circuit of thirty miles of where I was surveying.

At page 44 we have the statement of Mr. John Bignell, dealing with the Upper Ottawa, in which he says :

The country is level and no hills are to be seen ; how far the growth of timber and good land extend back from the river I was not instructed to ascertain.

One is naturally lead to the inquiry what he went there for, because this was one of the material points to be investigated.

At page 48 Mr. Walter McOuat, reporting on the country between Lakes Temiscaming and Abitibi, under the head of 'timber,' says :

White and red pine are found over the whole region examined, and are by no means rare even as far north as Lake Abitibi ;, but on this lake, with the exception of a few healthy looking individuals, about six feet in circumference, observed near the outlet, they are all very small and scraggy.

Further down, he says :

From the summit of the hill groves of white pine were observed in all directions. White spruce, yellow birch and cedar, are also tolerably abundant and of good size.

But if we turn to page 137 and compare the statement I have just read with a statement made by William Ogilvy, D.L.S., dealing with a survey of the same section, we shall find that these gentlemen are by no means agreed among themselves. Mr. Ogilvy says :

As we approach Lake Abitibi, the pine gradually thins out, until six miles below it on Abitibi river, the last white pine is seen and thence forward we have only spruce, poplar and some birch and tamarack, of which only the first named is large enough to be of any commercial value, and only a small percentage of that is large enough for lumber in the common acceptation of the term. On Moose river there are many spruce trees fifteen inches and upwards in diameter and some balsam and poplar, which could be utilized for fuel purposes. Very few trees were seen around James Bay of large enough size for other use than fuel. In the vicinity of Rupert's House some building timber might be found but not much suitable for any other purposes, and the same remark applies to East Main and all the intervening country.

At page 51, in a report of a survey of the Abitibi river, by A. S. Cochrane, he gives the route through which he travelled, and which was simply up and down the lakes and rivers. He made no examination of the country itself. It was simply a water expedition. Dr. Bell, at page 53, dealing with the soil, says :

The country around the lakes at the heads of the Michipicoten, Magpie and Kabinakagami rivers is generally hilly and broken. Some patches of fair land, mostly of sandy and gravelly loam, were found among the hills in the neighbourhood of all these lakes.

Then on page 57, we find the following in Mr. Parks' report of an exploration along the Abitibi, Moose and Missanabie rivers in 1889, in which he says :

North of this bend the country is decidedly wetter at any distance from the river, and cannot be described as any but muskeg. The river bank is still dry and high, but it is not composed of as good soil, being far more sandy and covered with less luxuriant vegetation. No considerable areas of arable soil exist on the lower river. The line itself for the last 100 miles traverses almost continuous muskegs. The climate permits the raising of roots, but it is a question whether the cereals will ripen. Barley has been raised at Moose Factory, but its maturing cannot be depended on.

With regard to timber resources, he says :

With the exception of a few small isolated trees no pine was seen in the whole district. Along the rivers and on the shores of lakes the timber is uniformly poplar and birch, the rough bark variety of the former tree increasing to the north. In the wet clay flats, spruce of fair size extends over large areas. This timber will eventually be of great value for pulp wood. Trees of a large size are not numerous, the average being about ten inches. In the muskegs very small and useless red spruce predominates, extending over hundreds of square miles in the northern part.

At page 69, in a report by W. A. Charlton on the Hudson's Bay Railway route via Missanabie and the valley of the Moose river—and this, I may state, is an Ontario surveyor's report—we find the following :

The Indians inform me that the country west of the Missanabie is principally level country, through which a railway could be easily constructed.

Just fancy the government of the country putting forward a report such as this, that the Indians informed a certain surveyor that a portion of the country he was then surveying was an excellent one for railroad construction, and asking the members of this House to come to a conclusion favourable to the contention of the government on evidence of this character ; and not only so, but printing this report by the hundreds of thousands and sending it broadcast throughout the country.

The Indians inform me that the country west of the Missanabie is principally level country, through which a railway could be easily constructed, and that the Missanabie river and its tributaries furnish immense water power at various points all the way down to the Big Falls ; that the middle and the east branches of the Moose, although not so large, furnish abundant water power, and that the country along these branches is more broken than along the Missanabie and westerly therefrom, although all is well timbered with spruce and poplar of fine quality, some pine, tamarack, cedar, birch, balsam, &c. The soil on all branches, more particularly the west branch, is good soil for farming.

Hon. gentlemen from Ontario are well aware that about this time, in 1898, the Reform government of Ontario, wishing to take refuge from the storm of indignation caused by the electoral enormities of which they had been guilty, and seeking to throw dust in the eyes of the people, organized what is known as the New Ontario boom, and we had New Ontario ad nauseam for a very long period. For the purpose of furthering their scheme, they sent out a number of surveyors, and this is one of the reports made by the surveyors. This whole business was simply a matter of political exigency. The government needed a diversion of public opinion from their iniquities and took this means of procuring it, and no doubt these gentlemen who went to explore this northern country had an excellent idea, before they left Toronto, what they were expected to find. And their reports show conclusively that they found what they were sent out to discover. We find Mr. Charlton further saying :

I noticed that a great portion of the way down the river the soil is clay and with favourable climate would be very productive.

From Missanabie to New Brunswick House, fifty miles by water, the country is considerably broken, although the hills are not very high. The timber is small and some portions of it have been destroyed by fire. I would suppose there is more rock than tillable land along that part of our journey.

At New Brunswick House the soil is clay. I am informed that they grow hay, oats and potatoes, but have not tried wheat.

Surely, one would have thought that this gentleman would have taken personal observations on that point and not given hearesay evidence.

Mr. E. B. Borron, on page 70, says :

He expresses the opinion——

This is evidently a summary written by somebody else, probably by some official of the government.

He expresses the opinion that a tract of dry and fertile land extends across the territory from east to west not less than 400 miles long and 50 miles wide, comprising 20,000 square miles or 12,800,000 acres. Making every reasonable deduction for lakes, marshes, swamps, muskegs and unarable land, a very large quantity is fit for settlement, the climate and soil favourable to a mixed system of husbandry ; stock-raising and dairy farming will be the most successful.

The summary thus continues :

On page 46 he expresses the opinion that there is a larger area of arable land along the Missanabie river than on any other, the Kenogami excepted.

So we find these Ontario surveyors brought back what no doubt they knew they were expected to bring back, namely, most excellent reports with regard to that northern country. At page 76, we find a very extraordinary production, one which upon its face would appear to have been made by some Ontario cabinet minister, calmly sitting in his office and summing up the situation from the notes of Ontario surveyors and so excellent was this summary considered by this government, that they took the trouble of repeating it in its entirety at page 108 :

At the last session of the legislature the sum of $40,000 was voted for that part of the province lying between the Canadian Pacific Railway and James Bay. The knowledge possessed of this country, its topography and the character and extent of its resources in minerals, timber and agricultural land, was of a general nature and was limited indeed. It was believed from official and other information that there were in this country extensive forests of woods suitable for the making of pulp and paper, and great areas of tillable land. Early in the summer ten exploration parties were organized and sent out by the department, each being assigned a different and distinct section, and while it was not anticipated or hoped that they would succeed in penetrating every corner of so extensive a region, yet it was expected that enough would be learned to show that in the region north of the height of land dividing the James Bay from the St. Lawrence river waters, there are great areas of fertile country and immense forests of spruce and pulp woods.

The result of this exploration is——

This is the statement made by the minister :

The result of the exploration is that a tract of arable land has been found north of the height of land, stretching from Quebec boundary west across the districts of Nipissing, Algoma and Thunder Bay, comprising an area of about 24,500 square miles, or 15,680,000 acres. The soil is a clay or clay loam, nearly all suitable for farming purposes, and the region is watered by the Moose and its tributaries, the Abitibi, Mattagami and Missanabie, and the Albany and its tributaries, the Kenogami and Ogoke. Along this latter stream alone, about which nothing was known, a tract of good land was found extending on both sides of the river for a distance of over 40 miles, and in the district of the Rainy river, between the surveyed townships around Dryden and Lac Seul, another extensive area of good land was found, about 600 square miles or 384,000 acres in extent.

The use of such extravagant language 'nearly all suitable for farming purposes' shows the total unreliability of the entire statement. Would any hon. gentleman picture to himself any county in his own province, and can he truthfully say that nearly all the land in that county is suitable for farming purposes ? I have the honour to represent a notably fruitful agricultural county, but I would by no means undertake to use such an expression in describing the land situated in it. Even in the best districts there are immense areas of land unfit for agriculture, and surely it is absurd to make such a statement regarding a country, concerning which it is admitted we had absolutely no information before these surveyors went out to it. I call attention to the fact that no such language as this is used by any surveyor, whose evidence is contained in this book, and who is connected with the Dominion survey. No surveyor sent out by the Dominion authorities brought back any such report, but this man from Ontario was evidently sent out for a certain purpose, and that purpose was to divert public attention from the political sins of the government.

On the whole the information brought in by these exploration parties has been extremely gratifying, and the benefit to the province of conducting the exploration of so extensive a country has been abundantly demonstrated.

On page 78, dealing with the Long Lake district, we have this summary as to the soil :

Productive. Abundant vegetation everywhere. Good timber.

Timber—tamarack, spruce, balsam, white birch, pine, poplar abounds throughout this district. Hardwood in the southern portion and jack pine along the sandy stretches.

Then look at page 116, and we have this report from a Dominion source dealing with the same district.

The district is generally rocky and barren, and not adapted for agricultural settlement. Small tracts of arable land exist at the head of Lower Wabinosh lake and along Highland lake and river. Along Little Mud river the soil is fitted for root crops and fodder, but not for general agriculture. In other parts potatoes and hay are grown. On Little Mud river, near Lake Nepigon, there are deposits of a fibrous peaty character, but of no great depth or area.

With regard to the timber, I find this statement in contradistinction to the last mentioned Ontario Report :

There is little timber of commercial value, and such tracts as are intrinsically valuable, are practically unavailable on account of location, and the limited quantity of the different areas, except along Mud river, where large spruce and tamarack were found.

Then, at page 79, dealing with the Nepigon district, it is said :

The Nepigon region constitutes a dissected plane. Good agricultural land, clay soil and clay loam and sandy loam.

A little north of Lake Nepigon the country is heavily timbered with spruce, banksian pine, poplar and balsam, with occasional birch, also tamarack.

A comparison of that with what is stated at page 116, shows that the two accounts do not by any means agree. Turn then to page 81, which is a report of the country between Lake Superior and the Albany river by Mr. Robert Bell. He speaks of the Nepigon district, and with regard to the soil, he says :

The country which we passed through by the route just described is generally rocky and of little value for agricultural purposes. The only good land which came under our observation was on the west and north sides of Wabinosh lakes, where the soil consists of fine sandy and clay loam.

On the next page he describes the route he took, and this shows that his exploration was conducted entirely by water, and therefore it may be presumed that he had little opportunity to make a proper examination of the soil of that country and ascertain whether or not it was adapted to agricultural purposes. At page 117, we have an Ontario report with regard to the Lake St. Joseph division. It says :

There are some areas of good land, but they are small and scattered, and most of the district is unsuited for successful agriculture. There is a great deal of rocky, broken country, and the soil in some places is scanty, the underlying rock being covered with sand, sandy loam or clay, the surface soil sufficing for the growth of timber.

There is no pine except in isolated clumps. Spruce timber is thickly scattered throughout the territory, but much of it is too small to be marketable, though on the higher land it reaches a good size.

Then, at page 118, which is also an Ontario report, covering the Lac Seul and Lake of the Woods division, it is said :

Owing to the rocky character of the greater portion of the area in this district, the opportunities for agricultural settlement are limited.

Then, turn to page 140. In a letter from Doctor R. Bell, of the Geological Survey, it is said, under the head 'Good Land':

This would comprise about one-third the region between Lake Superior and James Bay.

—which by no means concurs with the Ontario survey, extracts from which I have read to the House. Looking at page 152, we find extracts from a report of Mr. E. B. Barron, stipendiary magistrate of a certain section. At page 156, we find him stating, under the head 'Muskegs':

While, however, there is in the aggregate a larger quantity of arable land as may be seen at New Brunswick and at Flying Post, and a very much larger area still of land that would form fine pastures and meadows, I am, notwithstanding, strongly of the opinion that muskegs or peat mosses overspread by far the greater part of this belt or plateau also. This is more particularly the case as regards the lower or northern part.

On the next page, dealing with 'Climate' he says :

It is only from observations recorded at the Hudson Bay Company's posts, from the statements of parties who either live or have lived in the country and from our limited experience, that we can obtain any knowledge of the climate of the two latter divisions of this territory. As regards the crops which may or may not grow in the territory, much contradictory evidence has been given. Neither is the climate the same in all parts of the territory.

On the next page he continues.

I may candidly state that I was greatly disappointed with the appearance of the country bordering on Albany river, and fear that neither in respect of soil or climate is that portion of it below the Kenogami branch of much value in an agricultural point of view.

At page 160, dealing with 'Timber' he says :

In what has been called 'the level clay country', which embraces all of the first plain or plateau and most of the second, the forest is restricted in a great measure to the narrow belt of good soil reported as extending along the margin of the rivers and streams, and to the banks of the lakes. The alluvial bottoms on the rivers and islands, both in the rivers and lakes are generally well clothed with timber.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is to be remembered that this book, from which I have quoted rather extensive extracts, is the only body of evidence which the government has furnished us, dealing with this subject. We have absolutely no other information, unless the extract which the right hon. leader of the government read to the House a few days ago descriptive of the journey of Father Albanel, is regarded in that light. But, as has been pointed out, that extract shows on its face that the writer was dealing with a country through no portion of which can this railway by any possibility be projected. He left Tadousac, went up the Saguenay to Lake St. John, around that lake and to the country north of it; and it was there that the roses are said to have been in bloom. Looking at any map that has been issued, and taking all the information we have on the subject, it is perfectly evident that that country is far to the east and north of any possible route that this railway can traverse. At all events, even if one were seriously to consider—and no doubt, the right hon. gentleman did not so intend—that this extract should be taken as supporting the government case, it will not be contended that the statement of an enthusiastic missionary two hundred and forty years ago, when the agriculture of to-day was not in existence, when methods were entirely different and machinery had not been adopted for agricultural purposes, is to be seriously considered in coming to a conclusion on this question.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). Mr. Speaker, though this debate has been protracted almost beyond the limit of human endurance, and though nothing—or very little—has been said which we had not heard on previous occasions, perhaps it will not be amiss if I endeavour to review the situation, to ascertain how far we have drifted and to learn in what position the two parties are, in relation to the question before the House, especially in view of the amendment which has been moved by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) as an alternative to the proposition which we made. Sir, we are now in the third week of this debate. We have been treated by our friends on the other side of the House to a concert of speeches in which there has been an endeavour to keep all the voices in harmony, though I may say that they have been rather discordant, the fiddles have not always been tuned to the same key. Yet in one thing there has been remarkable uniformity. All the speeches we have heard from hon. gentlemen opposite—and one that has just been concluded is no exception—have been characterized by a redundance of quotations. In fact, we have had mountains of quotations. On a previous occasion I said that we had given the House 'mountains of information.' My statement was received with a good deal of incredulity.

But if I say to-day that gentlemen opposite have given us mountains of quotations, no one could be sceptical upon that statement, because from day to day we have seen the pile going up and up like the tower of Babel, and like the tower of Babel ending in nothing but a confusion of tongues. If I rightly apprehended, the speech of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) at the opening of the discussion, he did not appreciate the compliment I paid him on a previous occasion, when I said that he was not a bad hand at scrap-book oratory, not yet equal in that respect to his predecessor but not a bad second to him. On this occasion I must say my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) has excelled himself. He quoted and quoted and quoted; he quoted from speeches delivered in this House; he quoted from speeches delivered outside of this House; he quoted from blue-books; he quoted from editorials in newspapers; he quoted from anonymous correspondence and newspapers; he quoted from an unrevised and private report of the last meeting of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway; he quoted from a document which purported to be a confidential memo. prepared by the late Minister of Railways and submitted confidentially to his colleagues which came into his hands in some manner unascertained and I believe unascertainable, and last, though not least, he quoted from a quotation—he quoted from a circular quoted in a speech delivered at the last meeting of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, a circular, unknown, uncertain, and undescribed, sent by somebody to somebody but who was the sending body and who was the receiving body, no body ever knew and therefore no body need have a care. No, this was not the last quotation. My hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) quoted poetry. In this, my hon. friend followed illustrious example, for it has been the habit of some masters of debate in the English parliament to reach a climax and emphasize a point by some apt citation from the classics. There is this difference, however, between my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) and these English masters of debate, that he did not quote from the classics, but from his own poetical effusions and perhaps it may be pleasing to him if I should re-quote his verse. Here it is:

POETRY.

To-morrow and to-morrow and to-morrow
Creeps on this petty pace from day to day,
And all our yesterdays have seen the route
Unknown and unsurveyed.

Well, Sir, my hon. friend assuredly reached a climax when, in a grave discussion of this character, bristling with figures and intended to be serious, he so far relaxed as to introduce into this debate this effusion, of which in a moment of weakness, flirting desperately with the muse, he had become the guilty progenitor. My hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) will allow me to say—and I believe he will agree with me in this—that quotations are an adjunct of parliamentary debates; they are often useful, they are sometimes indispensable, they may be necessary to clinch an argument or to found an argument, but quotations have no value, quotations should not be indulged in, quotations should not be received nor introduced in the debate, unless they are of such a character that they can be canvassed, controverted, contradicted by the parties against whom they are used; unless their source is pure and unimpeachable, unless they are of such a character that the party who makes use of them can put them before the House, so that if there is anything in them that can be made use of by those on the other side, it can be used. My hon. friend quoted from a private report of the meeting of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, but we had not come to the end of this debate before he himself recognized that in so doing he had taken a course which should not be followed in this House or in debate. My hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) would not be responsible for an unrevised report, and if he could not be bound himself by an unrevised report, why should he quote such a report against any one else? My hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Osler) whom I regret not to see in his place, thought that he would improve the matter by having the report printed and circulated in the House, but I am sure that the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) himself would be the first to acknowledge that in this he was wrong. The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) is one of these moneyed men and ownied men of whom Scott speaks in a famous passage. He is a shareholder and a director of many companies. Would he think it fair to himself if at a meeting of a company of which he is a director and a shareholder, some reporter, paid for the occasion, were to sneak in, take a report, and send it across the ocean to be used against him. He would be the first to say that such a proceeding was not fair. My hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Osler) commented strongly upon the fact that a statement was contained in this report that this session of parliament had been called in order to ratify this agreement which is now before the House. This session of parliament has been called to transact the public business of this country ; it has been called at the usual season, and it is part of the business of the country either to ratify or not to ratify, at all events to take cognizance of, the agreement we have made with the Grand Trunk Railway Company. But there are some men whose memory is very short, and I should have expected that my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Osler) is not one of these men. Does he not remember—he had more reason than any member of this House to remember—that once on a time, in 1880, parliament was called not in the usual season, but out of season, in December, to ratify a contract with a syndicate of men, which eventually became the company of which the hon. gentleman is now one of the most prominent stockholders and directors. Now it is against the dignity of the House, it shocks the dignity of a director of the Canadian Pacific Railway who happens to be a member of parliament, if parliament is summoned to do a thing which is not done for his company. To do something for his company was no indignity to parliament ; to do it for any company but the Canadian Pacific Railway is a thing which a director of the Canadian Pacific Railway holds to be an indignity to parliament.

The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) also quoted from a circular prepared by Mr. Blair. I shall not say more about this than I have said on a former occasion in this debate. I do not think my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) should have made use of this document ; it was a private document, one of those documents which were sacred, which were covered by an oath of secrecy.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh ; hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Does any hon. gentleman opposite take exception to the statement that that was a sacred document. Is it not a fact that it was given confidentially, that every member of the Privy Council is bound by his oath not to give it out, is it not a fact that this document could not go out of the Privy Council except with the sanction of the Governor General in Council and that if it came out in any other way it came out by a breaking of the law by somebody ? Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman also quoted a statement I made in the debate last session when I introduced to the House the contract with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. The hon. gentleman made that quotation in order to show that in one particular and important respect the new contract which we had made involved a large departure from the old one. This is the statement which the hon. gentleman quoted from the remarks which I made last year :

> I do not deny that the Grand Trunk Railway is at the bottom of this enterprise..... It cannot default upon the eastern part, because, if it defaults upon the eastern part, it defaults upon the western part. It cannot default upon the one part without defaulting upon the whole, and therefore we hold them tight to their bargain and they cannot deviate from it.

My hon. friend stated then that we had not held them tight to their bargain, that we had, if anything loosened the bargain. I say to the hon. gentleman that in this respect we have not loosened the bargain. It is true that we have provided another method of enforcing the penalty of default. I presented that argument then in answer to the objection made that we had entered into an incompetent bargain, that whereas we had taken, as it was called by some persons, the lean portion of the road we had given the fat end to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, and that if the portion which they had, the eastern end, was unprofitable and if the western end was profitable, the Grand Trunk Pacific could default on the eastern end without our having any remedy against them. I pointed out that the Grand Trunk Pacific could not default upon the eastern end without making default on the whole and that therefore for this reason I stated that we held them tight to their bargain. Again I say, in face of the new agreement before the House, that if they default upon the eastern end they default upon the whole and therefore I am still justified in saying that we hold them tight to their bargain.

Now, referring to the debate which we have listened to for three weeks and referring to the speeches which we have heard from the other side of the House, am I going beyond the mark, Mr. Speaker, when I ask you if you have heard from the other side of the House the enunciation of a single generic idea, of a single constructive thought, if you have heard the expression of a national aspiration or observed the recognition of a single national duty ? No, Sir, I think I am within the mark, and I place myself in the judgment of the House, when I say that the front and rear of the whole discussion which we have heard on this occasion upon this important question has been a continuous pettifogging and quibbling, quibbling and pettifogging as to the meaning of phrases, words and syllables, all with the view of most extravagantly magnifying the assistance which is to be given by the country to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company and the Grand Trunk Railway Company for the carrying out of this great enterprise. But, Sir, I admit that in one respect we are fortunate. We are fortunate in this, that my hon. friend the leader of the opposition spoke and concluded by putting his ideas in the shape of an amendment. We are fortunate in this, because, in my humble judgment, and again in this I place myself in the judgment of the House, the best justification, the fullest vindication that we can have as to the policy for which we are now asking the support of the House is the very speech and especially the amendment made by my hon. friend. I must say at once, however, that I would not pronounce this encomium upon the whole policy introduced by my hon. friend because the policy of my hon. friend, as it has been embodied and crystallized into the amendment which he has submitted to the House and upon which we shall be called upon to vote in a few minutes, is like the coat of Joseph. It is of many colours. There are more hues in it than in the rainbow, but like the rainbow it is evanescent, fluid. It has been designed and devised to give pleasure to one corporation, to give hope to some of the friends of my hon. friend and to prevent some from falling from discouragement into despair. There is in it enough not to close the door altogether to the friends of my hon. friend in the maritime provinces because my hon. friend, in regard to the Moncton branch, says that he will have no objection to the building of it provided the grades are sufficient. There is in it something to give some hope, at any rate not to discourage absolutely, the friends of my hon. friend in the province of Quebec because he says that he is ready to build the section between Quebec and Winnipeg provided the land is found of good quality. But, there is everything in it to give the most pleasant anticipations to the shareholders and directors of the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is not necessary at this time that I should review the whole policy of my hon. friend. It will be sufficient if I dwell upon one or two particulars. First, let me say that my hon. friend does not object to the Grand Trunk building a railway across the prairies. He is quite satisfied that the present system of the Grand Trunk Railway Company should go into the prairies and there help to develop that great growing country, taking its share of the traffic, but my hon. friend objects, and to this I call especially the attention of the House, that the Grand Trunk Railway should reach the prairie by a line which it can control itself. The plan of my hon. friend is that the Grand Trunk Railway should reach the prairie by using the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The plan of my hon. friend is that the government and the people of Canada out of their own resources and taxes should buy the part of the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway from North Bay to Fort William, improve it and thus make a highway that can be used by all railways, including the Grand Trunk. This is a proposition so extraordinary that in order to do no injustice to my hon. friend perhaps it is better that I should put it in his own words. These are the words which he made use of in this House last session and which he repeated in a modified form this year :

That railway——

Speaking of the Canadian Pacific Railway—

From Fort William to North Bay is a line which doubtless could be improved which has cost a great deal of money, and upon which some more money might be advantageously expended. The grades, I understood, are not bad ; the curves are in many respects, very favourable, but could be remedied at no very great expense. This railway undoubtedly is capable of carrying five times, or perhaps with the improvements which I have suggested, ten times the traffic which is carried over it at present. I say it would be a wise thing and a proper thing for this government to acquire that railway from North Bay to Fort William and make it a national highway of Canada, and operate it by means of an independent commission, giving to the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Canadian Northern and the Intercolonial, as well as the Canadian Pacific, equal running powers over it.

Now, this conclusion is very clear. It is in my estimation, and I submit it to the judgment of the House, very innocent also, but if the conclusion be innocent I must say that the proposition is not based on sound principles. In order again to do no injustice to my hon. friend let me quote the language made use of by him on that occasion which I submit for the development of the plan which I have just given to the House. On that occasion my hon. friend made use of this language :

There are in Canada, two great national divisions, the west and the east. These at present are, in some respects, two separate communities. They have business interests, which, though different in some respects would fit harmoniously into each other. These two divisions of our country are connected in summer, by a magnificent highway, the water-way of two great lakes ; in winter they are separated by a thousand miles of uninhabited country, and there is some tendency, with excellent railway communication to the south of us, for two lines of trade to run north and south, instead of east and west, as they showed. Now we have in the west, at the present time, two great railway systems, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian Northern. We have in the east, three great railway systems, the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Grand Trunk Railway and the Intercolonial Railway. This great uninhabited country between the east and the west—which I hope some day, so far as the northern part of it is concerned, may answer the expectations of hon. gentlemen on both sides who have addressed the House, and may become a prosperous and thickly settled country, is bridged over in the winter by the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Sir, in this language of the leader of the opposition, we have the best justification of our policy. The basis of the policy which we have submitted to the House and to the country ; the basis of the policy upon which we rely for support in this House and out of it, is: that the present means of communication between the two great sections of the country, are inadequate and sufficient, and must be supplemented ; and supplemented by public assistance. If that is not true, nothing is true in our policy ; if we are wrong in that we are wrong in everything in our policy. But, Sir, the statements we made are true, the policy we have laid down is true ; the basis of it is correct, and the best justification of it is the very language of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition which I have quoted. The hon. gentleman tells us, that the country is divided into two great sections, east and west ; that in winter time they are connected by the Canadian Pacific Railway, but that the present means of communication is insufficient, and that it has to be implemented. Well, that is what we have said all along. That is the very basis of the policy which we submit to parliament, and I am proud to say that we have the absolute endorsation of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. And if it be true that the present mode of communication between the east and the west is not adequate and is insufficient, and that it has to be supplemented ; then the question arises, how is that to be done ? Which shall the country endorse : the policy of the leader of the opposition or the policy of the government ? The policy of the government is, that this improved communication between the east and the west, should be by the construction of another transcontinental line of railway. This would seem to be the most natural remedy for the evil which was admitted by the leader of the opposition, but such is not the remedy which he proposes. His proposal is, that instead of we ourselves building a second transcontinental railway, we should simply acquire part of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and make it a common highway. The position of the leader of the opposition is therefore : that after having made a gift of that line of railway to the Canadian Pacific Railway in the first place, we should now expend money to get it back from them, then expend more money to improve it, and then make it convenient for the Canadian Pacific Railway and all other railways to use it as a single transcontinental line. This proposition of the leader of the opposition was so crude —if I may use the crude without offence— that some person thought that he could not have made it on his own initiative, but that it had been suggested to him by the Canadian Pacific Railway. The hon. gentleman resented that imputation and in order that I may do him no injustice, I shall read his words :

It has been suggested that I desired to put this country to an enormous expense for the benefit of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and it has been hinted, if not asserted, in this House that I, standing as a public man in parliament, made that suggestion at the instance of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Sir, I desire to repudiate, in the strongest possible language which the usages of parliament will permit, any such suggestions as that.

We admit at once and without any qualification, the repudiation of my hon. friend, and we accept his statement that he did not make that proposition at the suggestion of the Canadian Pacific Railway. But, Sir, I would ask who is the Mephistopheles who has whispered to the leader of the opposition, a project so at variance with not only all the rules of common sense, but of patriotism ? Who is the Mephistopheles who has suggested to the leader of the opposition the idea, that we should force on a single line of railway the whole trade of this growing nation? Who is the Mephistopheles who could have persuaded the leader of the opposition, that the growing trade of this nation of 6,000,000 people to-day; soon to be 10,000,000 and 12,000,000, and 20,000,000 at no very distant date; who said to him, that we should not have another transcontinental railway to provide for the fast growing trade of the Canadian nation ; but that we should have only one transcontinental road, and that the Grand Trunk Railway Company should be forced nolens volens to use that line and no other ? If such a policy were to be adopted by the Canadian people and the Canadian parliament, what would be the effect of it, in view of the national aspirations which we all cherish and entertain? It is the hope of all of us; it is the hope of gentlemen on the other side of the House as well as on this, that Canada will grow by leaps and bounds, and that between the east and the west there will be a constant and ever growing interchange of traffic : It is further our hope that the traffic of the west will not be carried to American ports, but that it will be carried to Canadian ports alone. If it be the hope of gentlemen on the other side of the House, that the trade of the west shall be carried to our Canadian harbours, and since it is part of the policy of my hon. friend that the Grand Trunk should have a line of railway in the prairie country, I want to ask him and to ask his friends behind him, what chance is there to have this trade carried to Canadian harbours if the plan of the leader of the opposition is accepted, and if the Grand trunk is forced to use the Canadian Pacific Railway line from Fort William to North Bay ? Where will the traffic go then, when it reaches North Bay ?

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. The same place as now.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend (Mr. Hughes) says : the same place as now ; and I thank him for the interruption.

Let it be understood then that from this moment, the Canadian parliament and the Canadian nation, have to choose between the plan of the leader of the opposition, which would force the Grand Trunk to carry its freight on the Canadian Pacific Railway line from Winnipeg to North Bay, and thence to American ports; and the plan which we propose that we should have a line of our own, every inch of it in Canadian territory, and carrying the trade to Canadian seaports.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. It would still go to Portland.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Well, let us discuss that idea for a moment. What we want to do is to give the trade a chance of going to St. John and Halifax. We want to build a line upon Canadian territory which will give the trade an opportunity to go to Halifax and St. John, but my hon. friend (Mr. Sam. Hughes) says it will still go to Portland. Well that statement shows the inconsistency of gentlemen on the other side of the House. We have been reproached, that we have not bound the Grand Trunk with ties adamantine; that we have not taken precautions to force them beyond doubt to go to St. John and Halifax. We think we have taken all proper precautions. But hon. gentlemen say: No, you have not, and therefore we cannot support your scheme; but while we cannot support your scheme, we ask you to support our scheme for bringing the traffic from Winnipeg to North Bay—and surely then it will go to Portland. Sir, I want to know—and I ask it now—was there ever a scheme more unpatriotic—I use the word advisedly—than the scheme which these hon. gentlemen have submitted to this parliament? I submit that our duty at this moment is to endeavour to correct the errors of the past; and the great error of the past has been not to build the connections of the Grand Trunk to maritime province harbours, but to Portland. We are now doing our best to correct that error; we are endeavouring to build a line the object of which is to take the trade to St. John and Halifax. Although this is acknowledged by hon. gentlemen opposite, the only answer they can give us is: Your scheme is not strong enough, but take our scheme, which is absolutely bad. This is the answer and the logic which hon. gentlemen opposite have to give us.

I pass from this aspect of the question, and take up another argument. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition wants to force all the trade of all the companies now doing business in Canada over a single line of railway from Winnipeg to North Bay. The Grand Trunk, the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian Northern will all have to use that line and that line alone; they will not be allowed to use others. Sir, it is a trite saying that competition is the life of trade. This is true of railway traffic as of every kind of trade. In the early days of the province of Manitoba, after it had been saddled with the incubus of the monopoly given to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, when the people of Manitoba had no power to have a competing line, they begged and begged this parliament to relieve them of that incubus. They begged in vain. Then they had to take the matter into their own hands. They went to their own legislature, and it passed a Bill to give them competition by bringing in the Northern Pacific Railway from the south to compete with the Canadian Pacific Railway; and, Sir, the day came when bloodshed was within measurable distance over that question. The Canadian Pacific would not give up its monopoly, while the people of Manitoba insisted on having competition, and one day in the autumn of 1887, if I remember rightly, two or three hundred of the most respectable citizens of Winnipeg went to the point of crossing of two railways in order to enforce, by force, if necessary, their rights to competition of railway traffic. But the Canadian government and parliament of that day gave way—the people had competition, and immediately the rates came down. I am proud to say that some few years later, during the existence of this government, we gave a charter to the Canadian Northern Railway, and from Port Arthur westward that railway has now a magnificent system, and the rates have been going down still further; and when the Grand Trunk is on the prairies, as it shall be and must be, then, Sir, there will be a further decrease of rates. But, Sir, I ask any man of common sense, if all these railways—the Canadian Pacific, the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk—were forced to use the same line to obtain communication with the east, does he believe that that would promote the cause of competition? Does any man of common sense believe that if these railways came over the same line of railway from Winnipeg to North Bay, they would not have the same tariff? Would he expect to see a lowering of rates under such circumstances? The thing is not practicable. If we want to invite a combine of these three railways, not only on the lines they may use in common, but on the lines which they may use separately, my hon. friends opposite are taking the very best way of bringing that about by proposing the resolution which they have proposed, and which is so crude that I am surprised to see them put it before the House and ask us to adopt it.

But more than that. I do not believe that hon. gentlemen sitting behind the hon. leader of the opposition at all relish the plan which he has proposed.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not believe so. I know very well that they will vote for it in a few minutes; but, Sir, they will not vote for it with cheerful hearts. Let me quote the language which was uttered by one of them only a few days ago: I refer to my hon. friend from East Hastings (Mr. Northrup). The plan he proposed and favoured was not the plan proposed by the hon. leader of the opposition, but the original plan of the Grand Trunk—to build a second line from North Bay westward. This plan has also been advocated by my hon. friend from Centre Toronto (Mr. Brock), who I am sorry to see is absent from his place to-day under painful circumstances. This is their pet scheme, for which they would like to vote. But they will not do so, because they have not been able to induce their leader to adopt it. But if their leader has spoken a different language from their own, their heart has been too strong, and the language has come out in spite of themselves. Let me quote the language of my hon. friend from East Hastings. Speaking of the opposition of which Sir Rivers-Wilson complained, my hon. friend went on in this way :

> And encountered from whom ? Not from His Majesty's loyal opposition, for we always to a man have been in favour of the original proposition of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. All the difficulties, all the trouble of which he complains, and to which he refers the premier, and on the successful overcoming of which he congratulates him, every one of these troubles and difficulties came from the colleagues of the Prime Minister in his government, from his supporters in the caucus, from his followers in this House, and not from the members of the opposition. We never had a chance to express our views on this point, any further than to announce that we were in favour then, as we now are, of a Grand Trunk line from North Bay to the Pacific, as the Grand Trunk itself wished.
> Not a line over the Canadian Pacific Railway, but an independent line.
> When we had this document written to the premier congratulating him on overcoming the difficulties, it is well that we should know what these difficulties were, so that they may not be laid at the doors of the opposition in this parliament, for the opposition had nothing to do with this matter ; and so that the burden of the blame shall be laid upon the shoulders which should properly bear it.

This language seemed to my hon. friend from Selkirk (Mr. McCreary) to be so extraordinary, especially in view of the amendment of the hon. leader of the opposition, for which the hon. member for East Hastings expects to vote in a few moments, that my hon. friend from Selkirk put to him the following question :

> Mr. McCREARY. Do I understand the hon. gentleman (Mr. Northrup) to say, speaking for the opposition, that they would have endorsed the application of the Grand Trunk Railway Company to build a railway from North Bay to the Pacific coast north of Lake Winnipeg ? That was the original proposition of the Grand Trunk. Does the hon. gentleman speak for the Conservative party when he says he endorses that policy ?
> Mr. NORTHRUP. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McCreary) has asked a fair question and I will give an answer. I do not of course profess to speak authoritatively for the opposition, but from the views I have heard expressed by dozens of members of the opposition, and speaking my own views, I have no hesitation in saying that I believe that every member of the opposition was in favour then, and is in favour now, of assisting the Grand Trunk Railway Company to build west from North Bay.

This would at all events, to some extent, have been a national proposition, but the proposition which my hon. friend has submitted is one which, I humbly submit, cannot be entertained for one moment. We must have—and that is the policy of the government—a transcontinental railway, a railway from ocean to ocean, from tidal water to tidal water.

I heard some days ago with pleasure, the speech of my hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Jabez Robinson). He is in favour of a national railway. He is not in favour of the plan of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. He is not in favour of putting all our eggs into the basket of the Canadian Pacific Railway. He wants an independent route, but his only objection to the scheme of the government is this, that he wants this road administered and carried on by the government. This is the next proposition I propose to deal with. If we are to have another transcontinental railway, what is the best for the country ? Is it better that it should be administered by the government or by a company ?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Before my hon. friend leaves that point, I would like to point out to him that it would be only fair for him to know that in proposing assistance to the Grand Trunk Pacific to extend into the west, I used this language :

> This assistance should be coupled with complete control of rates and with all the stipulations now contained in the proposed contract as to carriage through Canadian channels and ports. Furthermore, the Grand Trunk Pacific as well as the Grand Trunk Railway, should covenant that traffic as far as possible should be carried through these ports. We should not only have such a covenant from the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway but also from the Grand Trunk Railway if it be of any value.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have read those words of my hon. friend and they sound well ; but if he will explain to me how the Grand Trunk Railway built to North Bay and to Portland, will carry trade to Canadian ports without a railway to the maritime provinces, I will be glad to have his explanation.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Does my right hon. friend wish me to answer now ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend will have his opportunity later. This is not a very convenient way of proceeding. If he wishes to make a speech, I would ask him to defer it until I have closed. My hon. friend will then have an opportunity of explaining what he means. For my part I have read his speech carefully, and I must say—it may be my fault and I shall be glad to be illuminated—if he will explain how, having brought the freight from the west to North Bay, he can send it on to St. John and Halifax, over the Grand Trunk, I will be glad to hear him.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am quite ready to give the answer.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Very good, in proper time. I was stating that the proposition of my hon. friend from West Elgin is that we should have another transcontinental railway, but that we should have it administered by the government and not by a company. Before I proceed with that, let me show my hon. friend that it is rather difficult to have a road of this kind administered by the government, and before I proceed further, I may perhaps allude to a proposition made last year, and repeated this year by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, with regard to the acquisition by the government of the Canada Atlantic Railway. Since he has again made his proposition this year, I will endeavour to show him that it would be of the greatest possible disadvantage to the Canada Atlantic Railway if it were administered by the government. Three-fourths of the business of that railway is done by way of carrying goods from American ports to American ports. These are carried in bond. Under the laws of the United States no goods can be carried in bond over the Canadian lakes unless they are taken in American bottoms; and in order to carry on that trade, Mr. Booth has acquired a fleet of American vessels. My hon. friend the other day spoke rather jocosely of the objections I pointed out to him in this respect, and in order that I may not do him an injustice, I will quote his very words:

> The only reason that has ever been given to the House by my right hon. friend, I think, was that celebrated vision of his when he stood at Depot Harbour and looking out upon the wild waste of waters, came to the conclusion that the government could not engage agents to canvass for freight and could not have anything to do with steamships.

This is not exactly what I said. The Canadian government could very well buy Mr. Booth's fleet, so far as concerns Canadian vessels under Canadian register, but my hon. friend forgets that Mr. Booth is owner of a large fleet of American bottoms, and that no goods taken from one American city and carried to another can be carried in bond over the Canada Atlantic except they came over the water in American bottoms. If we were to acquire the Canada Atlantic Railway and do the work which Mr. Booth is doing, we would have to acquire the fleet of American bottoms which he owns, and I ask how it is possible for the Canadian government to become the owner of vessels under an American register. This is the difficulty I see in the way. In order that there may be no misapprehension, I must refer the House again to what took place last year, because, when I said that the Canada Atlantic could not carry goods from American ports to American ports in bond unless these goods came over the water in American bottoms, my statement was disputed by the hon. member for Leeds and my hon friend the leader of the opposition. Let us make this point perfectly clear. This is the American law:

> Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled: That no merchandise shall be transported by water under penalty of forfeiture thereof from one part of the United States, either directly or via a foreign port or for any part of the voyage in any other vessel than a vessel of the United States.

Nothing could ever be clearer. But as the law would not be accepted by hon. gentlemen opposite, my hon. friend the Minister of Customs sent the following dispatch to our customs agent at Depot Harbour regarding freight originating in Boston:

> Regarding freight originating in Boston destined for Duluth, carried by railway to Depot Harbour, will American officer allow this to be carried from Depot Harbour to Duluth in British vessel? Wire reply.

The reply was as follows:

> Depot Harbour, Ont., Oct., 1903.
> To John McDougald,
> Commissioner of Customs, Ottawa.
> American customs officer will not allow freight originating in Boston destined for Duluth to be carried in British vessels from Depot Harbour to Duluth.
> F. J. DREWITT.

So that the point is clear. If we are to become the owner of the Canada Atlantic and that railway is to be administered by the government, one of two things must happen. Either we shall lose all the trade carried on over that railway from one American city to another or we must become the owners of an American fleet. I do not see how the latter is possible. Perhaps, when hon. gentlemen on the other side come to answer, they will show how a Canadian government could become the owner of an American fleet of steamers. If they do not do that, then, should we become owners of the Canada Atlantic, we would at once lose three-fourths of the trade now carried on over that railway.

Now, Sir, I have always contended that, so long as the bonding system remains in force, it is a valuable means of supply for Canadian railways. The railways we have to-day, the Canada Atlantic, the Canadian Pacific and the Grand Trunk, are all doing a large share of their business by carrying American freights from American cities to Canadian cities. So far so good. But, as the Canada Atlantic ends upon the shores of the lake and has to collect freight from the other side and, to bring freight from the other side, water transportation must be used, therefore, it becomes indispensable that we should make use of American vessels. Do hon. gentlemen, then, think it would be a good bargain—does my hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Jabel Robinson) think it would be a good business stroke for the government to become the owner of a railway and give up at once three-quarters of the business that is done over it? I believe that at the present time the Canada Atlantic is a successful concern. I think it is doing a large business. But take away its American business, and it would not have enough to enable it to carry on its operations successfully. I do not pretend, Sir, that the Canadian trade of the Canada Atlantic cannot be improved. It can be improved to a very large extent, and, in course of time, it will be improved. But, in the meantime, while we say that the Canada Atlantic must carry more Canadian freights, we have no intention of giving up the American business that it does. It can do the American business and the Canadian business as well. But, at the present time, when it does a large American business and a small Canadian business, it would be a most lamentable business transaction for the Canadian government to buy the Canada Atlantic Railway and administer it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. When the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) speaks of three-quarters of the business of the Canada Atlantic Railway being between American points, is he speaking off hand, or from exact data?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I speak from exact data, which I will be glad to give to my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) privately. I am sorry I cannot give it publicly, but I will furnish it to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Quite satisfactory.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. With regard to the proposition that the Intercolonial should be extended westward, I do not propose to say much at the present time. But I would call the attention of hon. gentlemen on the other side, who say that we should extend the Intercolonial to Winnipeg, and further west if possible, to one point. I do not wish to reproach anybody. The Intercolonial has been administered by Conservative administrations and by Liberal administrations. It has been controlled by six or seven Ministers of Railways, but the result has been invariably this—that, up to the present time the Intercolonial has never earned a dollar on the capital invested in it. Up to this time, four years out of five, it has been necessary to spend a dollar in order to earn a dollar on the road. I do not mean to say that it will never be a financial success. I hope and believe that it will be. But until we have found the secret of making the Intercolonial a financial success, until we have found the way, at all events, to make the Intercolonial pay its running expenses, I do not think it would be advisable or wise to extend that railway further than at the present time. We may have to improve, and, no doubt, in course of time, we must improve, the Intercolonial in many different ways. We may have to extend it westward. But, for my part, I shall be chary of doing so so long as the financial results of the road's operations are not better than they are at the present time.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have spoken of the tremendous expense in which this Grand Trunk Pacific Railway will involve the country. We had this in mind. We knew that if we undertook this railway, we should have to spend a great deal of money. But we thought that, by the plan adopted, of helping the Grand Trunk, a powerful railway company, by forcing it to take the eastern section and pay us three per cent on the cost of it, we should confine the expense of the country to a few millions. One of two things will happen. Either there will be default or there will be no default. If our calculations are correct the Grand Trunk, with the lines it will have in the Northwest serving the prairie region and developing a large trade, will be in a position not only to meet the liabilities of the western section, but to pay three per cent upon the eastern section. If that be true, our expectations will be realized and we shall have a new transcontinental railway at a minimum cost. Suppose that we had adopted the plan suggested by hon. gentlemen opposite and had extended the Intercolonial. Had the results been the same as on the Intercolonial at present, we should have saddled the country with an enormous increase in the public debt, every cent of which we should have had to provide ourselves paying the interest on it annually. That is the reason we thought it preferable to adopt the plan we have adopted rather than go into government ownership which seems to be a fad that is rather developing on the other side of the House.

I have said already that the task we have before us is to correct the errors of the past. It has been stated, and stated truly, that when the Grand Trunk came to us with a project it was different from the project that we have to-day, now the project before the House. Nothing is truer than that. When the Grand Trunk Railway Company came to us it was not with the object of building a railway from ocean to ocean, such as we have imposed upon them, but it was, as stated by my hon. friend from East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) simply to build a railway from North Bay to the west. But, Sir, we told the Grand Trunk that for that proposition, for the building of a railway from North Bay to the Pacific Ocean, so long as the present government was in office, they could not have a dollar of public money for such a line. We told them we were anxious to have their railway extended into the prairie country, that we were anxious that their immense system, connecting as it does with all parts of old Canada, having a station in every city, town and village in Ontario and Quebec, should have connection with the Northwest. We told them we were anxious to have them extend, to take their share of the trade of the growing country in the west and to help in the development of it. But we told them that the trade collected from that section would have to be taken not to Portland, as on their old system, but must be taken over a new system every inch of which should be upon Canadian territory, to tide water in the maritime provinces. That is the policy imposed upon them; that is the policy upon which we stood then, it is the policy upon which we stand now; and upon that policy—I declare it as the head of the party—upon that policy we stand or fall.

Upon that policy we stand or fall. But fall we shall not. The heart of the people is with us.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh, oh.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not care for the jibes that may come from the other side of the House. Blind is he who does not read the signs of the times. Blind is he who does not realize that the Canadian people have made up their mind that they will have another transcontinental railway.

Fifty years ago, when the Grand Trunk was first projected the terminus was in the city of Montreal. But the harbour of Montreal, unfortunately, is closed with ice for five months in the year. An extension had to be made somewhere, to some Atlantic port. Where should it be? There was Portland within 300 miles of Montreal, but in foreign territory. There were Halifax and St. John almost double that distance away but in British territory. Where should the winter terminus be? It was decided, unfortunately, so go to Portland and not to St. John or Halifax. The railway should have been extended then, as it was extended afterwards, by the building of the Intercolonial.

And instead of sending the railway to a foreign port it should have been sent to what was not then a Canadian but was a British port. This was not done. There were men at that time as there are now on the other side of the House, biased and perjudiced and with a false idea of economy. It was cheaper to send the road to Portland, and this was done; a great mistake was made commercially and politically, chiefly politically. Then the Grand Trunk Railway was extended westerly to Chicago, and so it happens that the Grand Trunk, the company which has more of Canadian traffic than any other company and which to-day has its foothold in every city, town and village of Ontario and Quebec, has both its termini in foreign territory. We represented to the Grand Trunk that these errors of the past must be corrected. We represented to them that they must become a national company, that they must extend their line to the Northwest, to the prairie country and become here a great factor in the development of our national life, but that the same time they must build eastward to tide water in Canadian territory. Our voice was heeded, the project has been accepted, and there it is now for confirmation or rejection by the Canadian parliament. Friend and foe must admit that during the last fifty years the Grand Trunk Railway has done a great deal for the development of Canadian life. But it is nothing but the truth to say that during the next fifty years the Grand Trunk will do more for that development than it has done in the past. It will no longer be a foreign company; it will become a Canadian company with its termini at Canadian ports on both oceans, at Port Simpson and at St. John, Halifax and Quebec, and fifty years from to-day, no, less than fifty, in ten, fifteen or twenty years we shall have another transcontinental railway, every inch of it in Canadian territory, with immense terminals on both the Pacific and the Atlantic, with the trade flowing over it, not of Canada alone, but of Eastern Asia towards Europe, and of Europe towards Asia. This is the statement which I make to the House; this is the mandate which I have to give to the House and to the people, and I repeat what I said a moment ago, upon that policy of a national railway from east to west on Canadian territory, we stand or we fall.

Mr. A. C. BELL (Pictou). Mr. Speaker, I need scarcely say that it is very gratifying to the gentlemen on this side of the House that after all their efforts to induce some members of the government to say something in reference to the important proposal now under discussion we should at last have had the pleasure and the honour of hearing the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Not to fall short of the very agreeable and pleasant manner in which the right hon. gentleman commenced his speech I may say that it was a somewhat extraordinary spectacle to find a gentleman who is at the head of the government of Canada who is defending a proposal of the magnitude of that now before the House indulging in so much humourous and not very apropos criticism of the manner in which the discussion had been carried on from this side of the House. The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) on this occasion was evidently exceedingly hard to please. He did not like the arguments advanced from this side of the House and was somewhat critical even in reference to the somewhat harmless verses with which the hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) enlivened the debate. I would remind him that there was a very decided smack of Shakespeare both in the verses extemporized by the hon. the leader of the opposition and in the figure with which the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) himself adorned the early part of his speech last year when he introduced this subject to the House. My right hon. friend on this occasion was apparently a purist; he thought that nothing should be introduced in this discussion that was not strictly and severely of a business character. He was more particularly a purist in dealing with some of the material of which the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) availed himself in discussing this matter, notably the document of which my right hon friend spoke as being in the highest degree confidential; in fact he spoke of it as being in a sense a sacred document which should not have been made use of under any circumstances whatever in this discussion. I do not know exactly to what extent my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) is entitled to maintain that this is a confidential document. It was in the first instance unquestionably prepared as a memo. by one minister to be submitted to the council and therefore might originally have been confidential, but it has been suggested and I think not improbably, that the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) or some member of the cabinet saw fit to communicate a copy of that document to some gentleman, not sworn of His Majesty's Privy Council and that in that way the instrument became accessible to the public. Thus I think the instrument had been entirely deprived by the government of its sacred and confidential character. I do not say absolutely that this is the way the document became public, but it has been suggested that possibly the perusal of this document was not confined strictly to members of council and that copies of it were in some cases entrusted to gentlemen in sympathy with my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and his followers. That being the case to my mind the sacred or confidential character of that document was to a large extent taken from it by the act of the right hon. gentleman and his friends. Whilst my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was in decidedly good form and good voice, and began his speech very happily, he was less happy when he described the great body of argument addressed to this House against the proposal as pettifogging. Was the speech of the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Barker) addressed to the House this afternoon and listened to very carefully by the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) pettifogging? Was his demonstration therein that statements have been made by gentlemen opposite and applauded by the Prime Minister and at any rate listened to without contradiction by the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) which on this occasion that hon. gentleman felt called on to repudiate—was that able, logical, and conclusive argument, such a one as should be described as pettifogging? My right hon. friend did not do himself justice in his strictures on the criticisms addressed to the House from this side upon the project now before us. I do not propose at this late hour to go very fully into a reply to the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier); I rather prefer to call attention to the manner in which he has thought it his duty to deal with the subject on this occasion.

How has he met the argument that has been addressed to the House from this side? He has practically ignored every portion of the sound criticism which has been addressed to the House from this side. All the arguments that have been produced on this side of the House against the sincerity, the soundness and the value of the proposition which the government have put before the House having been ignored by my right hon. friend. He has confined himself to a certain extent to the criticism, and to my mind not very strong criticism, of the alternative proposition of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. He has challenged the propriety of acquiring the Canada Atlantic Railway and that upon one ground only, upon the ground that it would not be competent or advisable for the government to become the possessor of, or remain in the ownership of, American bottoms. If it can be shown that there is some other way in which the results that are obtained at the present time by the owners of American bottoms, can be achieved, I take it then that the whole argument of the right hon. gentleman will fall to the ground because it rests solely upon that. What is to prevent the government owning a certain number of vessels of Canadian register and leasing vessels or by any other means they choose, making arrangements with the owners of American ships upon the great lakes to carry cargoes to and fro between Canadian and American ports to be transported through Canada over the line of the Canada Atlantic Railway? It seems to me to be the most obvious thing in the world and yet that is the only argument which the right hon. gentleman has advanced against the purchase of the Canada Atlantic Railway and the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to the great lakes. A little later on the right hon. gentleman addressed a little different argument to the House, not against that particular part of the scheme, but against the extension of the Intercolonial Railway in any direction, giving as his reason, that the Intercolonial Railway has not paid. I would go to a little greater length in order to unfold to the right hon. gentleman what my views were as to the reason the Intercolonial Railway has not paid, if I did not know that he has had the advantage for over a year of a very important and conclusive memorandum prepared by the hon. Mr. Blair, former colleague of his own, in which he demonstrates the fact that there was every probability that the Intercolonial Railway could be made to pay. Carrying out Mr. Blair's argument in which he goes on to say, that the portions of the Intercolonial Railway in the maritime province are profitable, that the portion between Quebec and Montreal is profitable, and that the line is only weighted down and kept in that position inasmuch as the large central body is unproductive, is that not evidence that the further extension of the Intercolonial Railway, largely increasing the area of productive country through which the line would run, would still further tend to overcome the non-productive character of that central piece, and that what is necessary to make it pay is to extend it further west, so as to give it a western terminus in a portion of the country in which it would be profitable ? I am sure that the right hon. leader of the government has only to refer again to the memorandum prepared by the hon. Mr. Blair, to see that the hon. gentleman shows very plainly that the Intercolonial Railway, if not profitable in all its portions, is at least profitable to the people of the country through which it runs—and that to a large extent, it might be made a profitable railway if equal rates of charges and tolls were adopted as those which prevail upon company railways generally. But the right hon. gentleman found absolutely great fault with the proposition of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, because he suggested that it might be feasible to buy or acquire, or to become possessed of that portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway which runs between North Bay and Winnipeg, or between North Bay and Port Arthur, and utilize that for all companies, which, doing business in the west, want to haul traffic to the east and all companies being in the east which want to haul traffic to the west. I need scarcely say that when my right hon. friend affirms that it is profitable to build a road 300 miles to the north of and paralleling the road which already exists, and that it is unprofitable to use the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, he makes a statement that would require to be supported by proof before it could receive general acceptance. What is the reason that my hon. friend states that a line from Winnipeg to North Bay paralleling the Canadian Pacific Railway, and 300 miles north of it should be more profitable than the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway ? They are both to carry the same traffic. They are supposed to carry the grain traffic from the west and to carry the merchandise from the east to the west. Why should one road be an absolutely unprofitable and hopeless scheme, and why should we believe for one minute, as my right hon. friend is disposed to believe, that the future greatness and destiny of Canada are altogether bound up in the other proposition ? I can see no reason. It would seem very plain, that, in preference to another road running through that country beside the Canadian Pacific Railway, which is capable of doing five or ten times the amount of business that it now does, it certainly would be more in the interest of the people of Canada and would tend rather to the reduction of rates and the cheaper carriage of goods to send more traffic over this road than to build a rival road beside it, for the purpose of sharing the traffic with it, thereby making it necessary to earn dividends for two roads instead of one. For my part, instead of seeing anything in the argument of the right hon. gentleman it seems to me that everything is against him, because if one road with the whole of the traffic which it is capable of carrying will not pay, how does he expect that two roads competing one with another for the same traffic are going to pay, and if they do not pay, in what direction does the right hon. gentleman look for a lowering of rates on the freight which is going to be carried from the west to the east ? Then, the right hon. gentleman comes to the most remarkable conclusion. He says, and this is really the crux of the position which he takes, this is really the statement upon which he elicited great applause from his supporters, that if the Grand Trunk Railway is taken into the west, establishes a system of railways there, carries freight from that district to the east over the Canadian Pacific Railway, and comes to North Bay, there is an end to all hope of an all-Canadian railway and of the transfer of Canadian products through Canadian harbours and over Canadian soil. How can the right hon. gentleman come to that conclusion ? He must know that in the position in which this scheme stands to-day, as far as the people of the country know what is going to be realized, if anything ever is realized out of this project, if the Grand Trunk Railway Company were able to build their road to the west, they would carry the products of the west to North Bay. They are going to build the main line far enough to come to a point—and that is all the survey that has been made yet—to obtain a connection with North Bay and the traffic is going to be delivered at the precise point from which the right hon. gentleman says it cannot be carried to Canadian ports. Now, it is all very well for the right hon. gentleman to make this assertion and he does make it with a great deal of authority. He is the Premier of Canada, he is supposed to know the country and its requirements and conditions, and when he says that freight brought by the Grand Trunk Railway Company to North Bay, over one of two parallel lines will go to Canadian ports, will help to develop Canadian traffic, will help to build up the maritime ports of this country and that freight brought to North Bay by another of two parallel lines will not have one of these effects, I cannot frankly concede to him every vestige of authority which he claims for himself. It strikes me that I would like some more evidence than that bare statement of the right hon. gentleman. The right hon. gentleman has seen fit to ignore every bit of the legitimate criticism made against this measure. Some of it might be called small criticism as it dealt with details, but none of it can be called pettifogging nor in any instance was the argument forced. It was a fair and legitimate argument, and it has not been answered ?

Mr. COCHRANE. And cannot be answered.

Mr. BELL. What is the position of this scheme to-day ? The right hon. gentleman, practically declares to the world, that at this moment there is traffic in this country which cannot be accommodated over the lines which at present exist. Does he not know that Mr. Hays and Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson, speaking to their shareholders with a view to persuade them to accept this agreement, stated that in summer, all the freight would be brought across the lakes, and that not one ton of it will come over this railway. Does the Prime Minister not know, that if the freight comes to this end of Lake Huron and is there delivered into trains—not of the Grand Trunk Pacific but of the Grand Trunk Railway—that there is every probability that it will continue to go to Portland as it has gone in the past. If the right hon. gentleman is in a position to show to the people of this country that his Bill contains any clause binding the Grand Trunk Railway to carry the water-borne freight that they receive at this end of Lake Huron to Canadian ports, he could have very profitably spent some time to-night in pointing out to us that clause of the contract. But the Prime Minister has not seen fit to do that. He has simply closed the discussion on this Bill in the same manner in which he opened it, with an appeal to the sentiment of the people of Canada. Well, we are all delighted to know that there are such hopes in his soul and in the souls of his followers for the future of Canada. We are delighted to welcome the right hon. gentleman and his followers into a faith in Canada, and to receive them in the confession of that faith. It is the faith which the Conservative party in this country have held for all time, and which they have supported in days of trial, and have maintained in the face of bitter opposition. There never has been an hour since Canada has become a country, when the loyalty and devotion of the Conservative party, to Canada, and to the great British empire could ever have been held in question for one instant. And, when we saw the Prime Minister so heartily cheered by his supporters to-night, when he talked about national sentiment and national growth, we were delighted with that evidence of the fact, that a sound national sentiment has at last found a home in the hearts of Canadian Liberals.

Certain hon. gentlemen from the lower provinces have seen fit to lay great stress on the fact, that this scheme is going to confer benefits on the province which I have the honour to in part represent. There have been a great many threats, some of them very plain, that members from the maritime provinces who do not support this scheme—vague as it is and remote as it is, because its consummation may be twenty-five years in the future—are taking their political lives in their hands. That evidence alone would be sufficient to convince me that the whole conception of the thing is a political scheme and nothing else. We are here to-day engaged in discussing a Bill which we spent months discussing last year, and why are we discussing it again ? The scheme is here before us now, because it broke down ; it is here, because when it was set up and had to stand by its own strength it proved to be a weakling and a failure. The right hon. gentleman with his majority in this House, can vote it through ; he can vote anything through; but when it passed out on the stage and the sustaining hand of the right hon. gentleman's majority was taken from it, it collapsed. What guarantee have we that it will not collapse again to-morrow. There is not much more to be given to it ; there is not much more which the right hon. gentleman can do for it.

I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that the views of the Grand Trunk directors expressed before their shareholders are in direct variance to the views presented to this House by the right hon. gentleman and his supporters. And in this divergence of opinion there is great probability that the scheme will collapse again. If it becomes known to the Grand Trunk shareholders and to the financiers who are to supply money for the scheme, that their scheme for equipping that road with $20,000,000, of rolling stock, as they present it, cannot be carried out because the Prime Minister of Canada and his supporters have declared that it shall not be done ; if that becomes known it seems to me that that scheme is likely once more to prove that its own strength never can carry it forward to completion. And it is to be borne in mind—and this is an argument which the right hon. gentleman took great care to keep far far away—it is to be borne in mind, that there is evidence in every portion of the new contract and in the knowledge that has come to our cognizance as to what has been done in the interval: that practically speaking, the great scheme of the Prime Minister of a line from Moncton to Port Simpson is abandoned at this moment. That right hon. gentleman saw fit to sneer at the memorandum which was circulated among certain shareholders of the Grand Trunk Company. The right hon. gentleman should not have sneered at that because, the evidence that there was such a memorandum circulated and seen by shareholders of the Grand Trunk Company is conclusive. It was not by any effort on the part of any gentleman on this side of the House that the extract was published, which says that one of the directors saw a circular handed about, which said that the line from North Bay to Quebec was premature. That evidence could not be procured by any gentleman on this side of the House, nor by any interested party whatsoever. The evidence is strong that the statement that that portion of the line was not to be proceeded with at the present time, induced the shareholders of the Grand Trunk to authorize the directors to proceed with this contract. Then again, we have in the original contract provision for $20,000,000 worth of rolling stock; $5,000,000 of which is to go on the eastern portion of the road. But what have we to-day in this supplemental contract? We have a provision for $20,000,000 worth of rolling stock, less $5,000,000; less that precise quantity which was to go to the eastern division of the road. So far as that $5,000,000 worth of rolling stock for the eastern division is concerned, the argument has been modified, and the government is not going to require the company to provide rolling stock for the whole system, but only for three-fourths of it. Then we have the evidence as to the surveys. We have the announcement made that surveys were conducted by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, not over their own western division while they are going to build but over the eastern division which is going to be built by the government, and the survey of which must be paid for by the government. Unquestionably it must have been on the authority of the government that the Grand Trunk Railway Company undertook to prosecute surveys over the eastern division, and still, the Minister of Railways in reply to a question avowed absolute ignorance of the fact that such surveys were being made, and declared that they were being made only on branches to be constructed by the Grand Trunk Pacific. Three times was that declaration made, and then we had another minister coming here and stating that in the possession of the Grand Trunk Company are certain surveys, which a geographer of his department found to be of such a character as to confirm the idea that a successful location for that road can be obtained. Would it not have become the Prime Minister to spend a few minutes in explaining that most amazing fact?

The surveys made over hundreds of miles of the road which this government is going to build, surveys for which this government must pay every cent of the cost, were made without his knowledge. He has no evidence to show that they were ever made, until it suits the government to make the discovery; and then they will get the geographer of the Department of the Interior to pronounce on the merits of the railway scheme. All these things go to show that what we are going to have is precisely that scheme which the right hon. gentleman has asserted most positively to-day, will disappoint the hopes of Canada—a line built for the Grand Trunk on the prairies and terminating at North Bay; a line which the right hon. gentleman has said will preclude any hope of establishing an all Canadian line, terminating at Canadian ports, and over which Canadian traffic is to be carried. In fact, the right hon. gentleman has done himself scant justice on this occasion. There was ample material provided from this side of this House for a reply from him extending over a considerable time. But he has ignored all that criticism, and has repeated the objections which he advanced last year to the proposals of the hon. leader of the opposition, and has ended his speech with the same heroics that he indulged in then. My right hon. friend should remember that this is a business proposal. It is all very well for him to go through the country shouting Canada for ever! an all Canadian line! Canada is going to have so many millions of people on the prairies! We know all that; but is that any reason why we should spend $150,000,000 to build a line of railway where it should not go, and as to which he has not produced a single bit of evidence to-day that we had not last year to show the character of the route? It would be far more satisfactory to members of this House to have some evidence. Last year he promised to give us mountains of information, and he did the best he could in that regard. On this occasion, he laughed at those mountains of information himself; it was the only thing he could do. Last year I took the opportunity to place on 'Hansard' a list of the mountains of information which the right hon. gentleman had laid on the table. That information was contained in eleven or twelve volumes, which dated from 1865 or earlier. From all the years since then, he had not added even one molehill of information to these mountains. But this year he has introduced another piece of evidence, more than thirty-five years old; and if we are to revere authorities according to their age, this is most important and valuable, and ought to be looked upon as the most respectable and authoritative evidence with respect to the character of the country through which this railway is to be built that has ever been presented to any parliament; apart from the somewhat sacred character which it assumes from having been taken from one of the relations of the Jesuit Fathers. It is 240 years old. This venerable evidence reminds me of a story of a gentleman who had a guest to whom he offered a bottle of wine. He said 'This is very good wine; it is twenty-five years old.' The friend, who had a good appreciation of wine, looked at it and said, 'Well, it strikes me that it is very small for its age.' Now, it strikes me that the amount of evidence which the right hon. gentleman has been able to give here, and which we have all agreed to dignify with the title of mountains of information, is entitled to the same designation—it is rather small for its age. I have discovered, by a little geographical inquiry—and not through the geographer of the Interior Department either—that the country described by this Jesuit Father is 200 miles north-east of the line of the Grand Trunk Pacific. At the present time they do great execution in war with long distance projectiles, and the right hon. gentleman has improved on the ordinary method of engineering. He has adopted the long-distance method of doing his surveying. By a providential interposition 240 years ago a Jesuit Father went into the North-east, and from the observations which he made of that region we are able to define the character of a country 200 miles to the south-west, for the construction of a transcontinental railway. If this should not prove to be an absolute failure as a mode of locating railways, it is likely to lead to great economy in the future, because we will do away with the great expense of surveyors, theodolites, woodmen and chainmen, and simply send a reverend gentleman 200 miles northeast of the proper line, and he will tell us that 200 miles to the southwest is the proper place to run the line of railway. The fact is that if this is the best information the right hon. gentleman can give us, he leaves the case just in the position in which he found it. There may be a country there through which a railway can be built, or there may not; and here are 214 representatives of the people of this country invited, on two separate occasions, at two different sessions of the House of Commons, to deliberate on a project for spending $150,000,000 of the money of Canada for the purpose of building a railway over a country which the right hon. gentleman has not taken the trouble to have surveyed. It is evident that this government is carried on by faith; and if their works should prove to be equal to their faith, perhaps they may be able to build a railway some time. If not, we must come to the conclusion that their faith is not much better than their works.

There was a very definite proposition made by the hon. leader of the opposition, and he gave his reason for it; and so far as the maritime provinces are concerned, it was a very good reason. He said. If you are going to derive any advantage from the possibility of receiving more cargoes from the west, the scheme of the leader of the government, if it should ever descend from the clouds, may give it to you in eight or nine years. Eight years is the time he has fixed for the construction of the western section of the line, on which there will probably be some progress made. But the hon. leader of the opposition is in a position to say: I will give you that advantage to-morrow. I will buy the Canada Atlantic Railway, and as soon as vessels begin to go into Depot Harbour in April or May this year, the city of St. John and the city of Halifax will be placed in direct communication over one line of railway with the ports to which cargoes are brought by those vessels. That is a more practical proposal and I would expect to see the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Wade) grow enthusiastic over that rather than over the vague and unsatisfactory proposal of the right hon. leader of the government, which apparently may not be realized for twenty years to come.

But there was another exceedingly definite proposal made, not only by the hon. leader of the opposition, but by several others on this side of the House. That was this. If the government is going to spend $150,000,000 on the railway as its contribution to the partnership into which is has entered, while the Grand Trunk Railway Company, the other member of the partnership, is going to contribute only $14,500,000, why should not the government spend the whole $165,000,000 and own the road? The right hon. gentleman could not have forgotten that proposal. It formed a very important part of the speech of the hon. leader of the opposition; yet the right hon. gentleman saw fit, I think very prudently, from his point of view, to ignore it and pass it over altogether. But the people of this country will expect him to give an answer to that question. Why should the government contribute nine-tenths of the cost of this road and leave it in the hands of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, who are practically independent of the government for all time to come—who cannot be interfered with for a period of fourteen and a half years, even though they do not pay a dollar of interest in that time?

They get seven years' interest for nothing, three years in which the default is to be added to the capital, and four and a half years further in which the government will not be warranted by any further default in taking possession of the road. Why did not the right hon. gentleman give a little attention to that proposal? Why does he think that the Grand Trunk Railway, in addition to managing its present system, can take over this line of railway, 3,400 miles in length, and make sufficient profit to enable it to meet all the obligations it is incurring, and at the same time come to the conclusion that he himself and his cabinet are incapable of so managing that property that it will give a good return to the country for the money invested? Is he not aware that the maritime provinces are at present in the enjoyment of a government owned line of road and would not for any consideration part with it? When the suggestion was made some years ago to sell that property to the Canadian Pacific Railway, there was a universal chorus of dissent and opposition, not only from the maritime provinces, but from every part of Canada. Does the right hon. gentleman not know that the time is coming when it will be very imprudent for any public man to speak of government ownership as the right hon. gentleman has done this evening, when he described it as a fad? There is no reason why the people of Canada should not manage their railways just as well as the people of Australia or Austro-Hungary or France. There is nothing in their constitution or make-up which makes them less fitted to manage their own railways than the people of those other countries. Our people have shown themselves capable of self-government. No people have achieved so much in the way of organization, of self-government, and constitutional government as the people of Canada. Though comparatively untrained in public affairs, though young and inexperienced in constitutional government, they have effected a union which is a model for any group of states who wish to join together and to form a commonwealth. They have gathered together the scattered fragments of British power on this northern continent and in the course of a few years have welded them into a homogeneous compact state. Has there ever been an hour from the time of confederation in which our public men have not shown themselves capable of coping with every problem of statesmanship that may have confronted them? Have our people ever failed to respond to any appeal made to them in the interests of good, broad statesmanlike government and honest and good measures? There is nothing at all in the conditions of this country to frighten the right hon. gentleman. But there is some monstrous influence which induces him to surrender himself and the party he leads into the hands of two or three men who have gained his ear and to gratify whom he has parted with one of the ablest men in his cabinet. True, he has since then rewarded his ex-colleague by a very important appointment, but the country looks rather askance on the course taken by the right hon. gentleman. To gratify these men who have gained his ear, he is willing to see his party disrupted. Just observe his attitude to-night. He pleaded with his own party to carry through this measure, on which he staked his political existence, but which he could not and did not try to defend. Why does the right hon. gentleman feel inclined to abdicate in favour of the directors and managers of the Grand Trunk Railway? That is practically what he is doing. He calls this a great national scheme, which is going to call into being a new nation. That is the high-pitched statement which the hon. gentleman has made, but he is not doing that work by means of the cabinet which he has gathered around him and by his own ability. No, he is devolving that task on the shoulders of the Grand Trunk Railway, a corporation which has been perhaps fairly managed but which certainly has not acquired, in any way that I know of, the right to govern Canada. Why has he seen fit to treat the Grand Trunk Railway differently from the Canadian Northern or the Canadian Pacific Railway? Why does he, if he wishes a railway company to build a new transcontinental line, select the Grand Trunk Railway Company of all others to do the work? Of all others, the Grand Trunk Railway Company is the one which is the least interested in Canada and which has the greatest interests outside of Canada. The Canadian Pacific Railway, of which the hon. gentleman spoke rather slightingly to-night, can claim to be a truly Canadian road and company. That road, constructed largely by the capital of foreigners, has always been a truly Canadian road. It has no interests outside of Canada. Its whole interests are in the prosperity and growth of Canada. Why did he pass over the Canadian Pacific Railway and choose the Grand Trunk Railway as the medium by which this government would carry out its scheme of nation building? Or if he did not choose to take the Canadian Pacific Railway, there is another Canadian company—an all-Canadian company, in which two Canadians have shown not only the possession of great ability, but great courage as well. I refer to the Canadian Northern. There is a company which has achieved wonders and is going on quietly to achieve further wonders at this moment. Why did not the hon. gentleman, when that company was given a government guarantee for the prairie section last year, say to it, we will give you connection with North Bay, and you will later on go to Quebec and Moncton and we will make you a great transcontinental all-Canadian railway line? Why did he not do that? These were Canadian roads, both of them.

They have no great interests outside of Canada. But here you have a line selected which has large interests in the United States, and which, if it is going to fulfil the promises made by the right hon. gentleman, is going to make a large part of its property unproductive in the United States, which will make unremunerative the vast expenditure of capital it has invested in Portland. But you have the statement of the right hon. gentleman squarely contradicted by the managers of the Grand Trunk Railway. Mr. Hays said to his shareholders: You have received fair dividends. If I hoped you would continue to receive them, I would not be in favour of this scheme. It is in order that we may continue paying these dividends that I am in favour of this scheme. But where is that line on which Mr. Hays is going to continue these dividends? It is evidently the Grand Trunk Railway which terminates at Portland; and if the right hon. gentleman is going to force the Grand Trunk Pacific to take all the freight which the Grand Trunk and its branches gather in the west and carry it to our maritime ports—for that is what he has said, and I would advise him to go over it carefully in the revised 'Hansard'—then I should think there is a hopeless clash between the right hon. gentleman and Mr. Hays. Either the Grand Trunk shareholders are being deceived by Mr. Hays or the people of Canada and their representatives are being deceived by the right hon. gentleman.

There is not, in all the speech made by the right hon. gentleman to-night, one additional fact or argument to enable us the better to decide how we should vote on this occasion. His speech is open to the same charge as was made against his speech of last year—flowery and graceful, but strictly unbusinesslike. The right hon. gentleman ought to know that he cannot, either by a stroke of the pen or an Order in Council, force trade to go to any particular port in Canada. He must know that the difference of half a cent in the cost of freight will divert trade from one port to another. Still he made the statement, and apparently made it in earnest, that he will force the Grand Trunk Pacific to carry all the traffic it brings to North Bay, to the maritime provinces. Does he believe he can do it? Does he believe that he will force the farmers of the Northwest to bring their grain over a route which will compel them to lose from 5 to 10 cents a bushel on it? His own scheme shows that he does not believe it, because by it he gives the shippers of the west the privilege of routing their freight which ever way they like, and they will route it the cheapest way.

It is not necessary at this time to go any further in the direction of this discussion. My right hon. friend at last did make up his mind to enlighten the House; he at last came to the front and became the government Poo Bah, because he here represents the Minister of Railways; he represents the Minister of Finance; he represents the Postmaster General; he represents the Minister of Trade and Commerce. All these gentlemen, last year could, in some way, be dragged up, willing or unwilling, to say something for the Bill. I do not wonder that the Minister of Finance could not be caught a second time. I know that hon. gentleman has never had such unpleasant reading in his life as the extracts from his speeches which my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, by a stretch of courtesy has done him the honour to embalm in the pages of 'Hansard.' The Minister of Finance, as we who come from the maritime provinces well know, is an exceedingly cautious gentleman. I have had the pleasure of knowing him for many years. I never knew him to be so neatly caught before; and from what I know of him I can well understand that he does not intend to be caught a second time. So, the right hon. Prime Minister had to represent the whole cabinet. There was no Minister of Railways to speak on this subject. Even the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) would not speak on this occasion. Neither would the Minister of Trade and Commerce, nor the Minister of Finance. No member of the cabinet could be persuaded to come forward. And at last the right hon. premier said to himself: I will undertake this forlorn hope; I will go up against this deadly breach and will do the best I can. And he came, Mr. Speaker. But he did not see, nor did he conquer. He must have had in mind the old proverb:

> He who fights and runs away
> May live to fight another day.

House divided on amendment (Mr. R. L. Borden).

Amendment negatived.

Mr. SPEAKER. I declare the motion carried on the same division reversed.

Mr. PUTTEE. I object to having the motion carried on the same division reversed, because if it is put to the vote I must vote against the motion also.

House went into committee on the proposed resolution.

Progress reported.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I suppose the intention is to go on with this Bill to-morrow ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 1.55 a.m., Thursday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, April 21, 1904.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

PIER AT POINT PRIM, P.E.I.

Mr. HACKETT—by Mr. Sproule—asked :

1. What engineer made survey and report with regard to the construction of a pier at Point Prim, Queen's county, Prince Edward Island ?

2. When was the survey made, and what is the date of the report ?

3. Did the engineer making the survey recommend the construction of this work ?

4. What is the depth of water where the pier is to be built ; and of what nature is the bottom formation, rock, mud or sand ?

5. Will the construction of this pier be of advantage to the shipping interests ?

6. What is the estimated total cost of said pier ?

Hon. JAS. SUTHERLAND (Minister of Public Works) :

1. James B. Higgin.
2. December, 1902. The report was dated January 2nd, 1902.
3. I am not aware that the local engineer recommended the work as now under construction.
4. Six feet at low water and fifteen feet at high water or spring tide.
5. Yes.
6. $15,000.

I.C.R.—EARNINGS AND EXPENSES.

Mr. BARKER asked :

1. What were the gross earnings on the Intercolonial Railway for the eight months ending 29th February, 1904, and the operating expenses for the same period ?
2. For the same period, what were the expenses of operating under the following heads :—(a) locomotive power ; (b) car expenses ; (c) maintenance of way and works ; (d) station expenses ; (e) general charges ; (f) car mileage (g) rental of leased lands ?
3. For the same period, what were the earnings under the following heads :—(a) passenger earnings ; (b) freight earnings ; (c) mails and express ; (d) all other earnings ?

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Minister of Railways and Canals) :

1. Gross earnings of the Intercolonial Railway for eight months ending February 29th, 1904, $4,179,145.58 ; operating expenses for the same period, $4,840,817.77.
2. (a). Locomotive power, $1,677,884.87 ; (b). Car expenses, $1,048,064.40 ; (c). Maintenance of way and works, $1,169,034.59 ; (d). Station expenses, $596,944.24 ; (e). General charges, $330,766.18 ; (f). Car mileage, credit of, $75,209.87 ; (g). Rental of leased lines, $93,333.36.
3. (a). Passenger earnings, $1,394,522.11 ; (b). Freight earnings, $2,598,588.33 ; (c). Mails and sundries, $186,035.14.

SUCTION DREDGE FOR LOWER PROVINCES.

Mr. BELL—by Mr. Sproule—asked :

1. Has any contract been placed for the construction of the new suction dredge for the lower provinces, for which provision was made in the estimates of last session ?
2. Have contracts been placed for the construction of steel scows, for use of dredge 'Cape Breton' ?
3. If not, have tenders been asked for this work ?
4. What firms have tendered, and what is the amount of such tenders ?

Hon. JAS. S. HAGGERLAND (Minister of Public Works) :

1. No.
2. No.
3 and 4. Yes. Tenders have been asked, but contract has not been awarded.

DRESS REGULATIONS FOR ACTIVE MILITIA.

Mr. BELL—by Mr. Sproule—asked :

1. Is it the practice of the Department of Militia and Defence to reimburse officers who have been required to procure certain uniforms, when the style and colours of such uniforms are afterwards changed by regulation, thus necessitating a change of dress ?
2. Are khaki uniforms still worn in the active militia ; and if so, in what regiments, and under what conditions ?
3. What dress regulations exist at present for the active militia ?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN (Minister of Militia and Defence) :

1. No.
2. Khaki uniforms are regulation for permanent and city corps, and will be issued as supplies become available. It has been decided not to issue this dress to the rural corps for the present, but officers of these corps who have got the dress will be permitted to wear it out.
3. Dress regulations are contained in Regulations and Orders, 1898, and such changes as have been made since then have been promulgated in General Orders.

HEADGEAR FOR REGULAR MILITIA.

Mr. CLARKE—by Mr. Osler—asked :

1. Has any contract or order been given by the Militia Department for forage caps, or head gear, for the regular or militia forces, within the past three months ?
2. If so, to whom has the contract or order been given, and on what terms ?
3. Were public tenders or bids asked for from Canadian firms generally ? If not, from whom were tenders procured, and what were the figures of each of the tenderers ?
4. When was the order given, and when are the goods to be delivered ?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN (Minister of Militia and Defence) :

1. (a). No contract has been given ; (b). Orders have been given from time to time.
2. To Christy & Co., London, for helmets and field service caps ; to Hicks & Sons, London, for forage caps ; to J. B. Laliberté, Quebec, for Persian lamb caps ; to R. Z. Bloomfield, London, for field service caps, at the prices fixed by the contracts of the previous year.
3. No. The firms named have been contractors of the Department of Militia and Defence for some years past.

Tenders for Persian lamb caps were asked from A. A. Allan & Co., Toronto, and J. B. Laliberté, Quebec. Prices quoted were $6.45 and $4.50, respectively. Laliberté's tender of $4.50 was accepted.

4. Orders were given to Christy & Co. on February 10th, February 13th and April 8th, 1904 ; to Hicks & Sons, February 17th ; to Laliberté, January 23rd and 26th and February 6th ; to R. Z. Bloomfield, February 13th. No specific time was set for delivery.

GRAZING LICENSES.

Mr. REID (Grenville)—by Mr. Carscallen—asked :

1. What is the number and at what date was the last grazing license issued in Assiniboia or Alberta ?

2. To whom was it issued, and for how many acres ?

Hon. CLIFFORD SIFTON (Minister of the Interior). The last lease issued for grazing lands in Alberta or Assiniboia was numbered 1919 and covers an area of 1,921 acres, designated as ranch No. 2657. Date of lease, 19th of April, 1904. The name of the lessee is Robert H. Roe, of Medicine Hat, Assiniboia, N.W.T.

POSTMASTER AT PUGWASH, N.S.

Mr. BELL asked :

1. Who is the postmaster at Pugwash, N.S. ?

2. How long is it since the death of the late postmaster ?

3. Who is now doing the work ?

4. Is it the intention to appoint the postmaster ?

5. If not, who is to be appointed ?

Hon. JAS. SUTHERLAND (Minister of Public Works). On behalf of my hon. colleague the Postmaster General I beg to reply :

Mr. Peter McLean, jr., is postmaster of Pugwash, county of Cumberland. The death of the late postmaster was reported to the department on the 15th September last. The work of the office is being performed by the postmaster.

ELECTORAL LISTS—PROVINCE OF QUEBEC.

Mr. LEONARD asked :

1. How many of the electoral lists, revised last September, for the province of Quebec, have been printed by the King's Printer ? And what lists have been so printed ?

2. How many have been distributed, and to whom ?

3. What system does the King's Printer follow in the printing of electoral lists ?

The Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister) :

1. The following lists for the province of Quebec have been distributed :—Bonaventure, Berthier, Beauharnois, Bagot, Chateauguay, Gaspé, Huntingdon, Hochelaga, Jacques Cartier, Kamouraska, Lévis, L'Islet, Maisonneuve, Montmorency, Missisquoi, Montmagny, Pontiac, Portneuf, Quebec East, Quebec West, Quebec Centre, Rouville, St. James, Montreal ; St. Antoine, Montreal ; St. Lawrence, Montreal ; Ste. Anne, Montreal ; Ste. Marie, Montreal ; Shefford, St. Hyacinthe, Temiscouata.

2. Twenty copies have been sent to the sitting member and twenty copies to the defeated candidate of each constituency.

3. The lists are taken up and printed one after the other as fast as they can be done.

CHIEF JUSTICESHIP OF NOVA SCOTIA.

Mr. FOWLER asked :

1. Is the office of chief justice of Nova Scotia vacant ?

Mr. REID (Grenville).

2. If so, how long has it been vacant ?

3. Is it the intention of the government to fill that office before the end of the present session ?

4. What is the cause of the delay in filling the said office ?

5. Has the government any difficulty in procuring a suitable and qualified person to accept the said office ?

Hon. CHAS. FITZPATRICK (Minister of Justice). I beg to say that the Hon. James Macdonald sent in his resignation some time ago. It was the intention of the government to fill the office at the earliest possible moment, but at the same time the filling of the office will depend to some extent upon another position held by the late Chief Justice, that of judge of the Exchequer Court in Admiralty.

I.C.R.—MARITIME EXPRESS.

Mr. GERVAIS asked :

1. Since what date has the Intercolonial Railway maritime express been leaving its Montreal terminus at noon, each day ?

2. Has the change of hour of departure of this train from evening to noon been found detrimental to the convenience of the travelling public ?

3. Has the department noted any material falling off in the passenger traffic since such change was instituted ?

4. Is it within the knowledge of the minister that all passenger trains coming from the south and west, particularly from Toronto, arrive in Montreal in the evening ?

5. Is the minister aware that pasengers coming into Montreal by such trains, and wishing to make connection with the Intercolonial Railway maritime express, have to wait over until next day, or take the Canadian Pacific Railway train ?

6. Can the minister inform this House of any trains, outside of suburban, which leave in the middle of the day in any country outside of Canada ? If so, where, and at what time ?

7. Is it the intention of the minister to have the hour of departure of the Intercolonial Railway maritime express restored to its former time, that is, after 7 o'clock in the evening ?

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Minister of Railways and Canals) :

1. Since the 14th of January, 1900.

2. Not to the knowledge of the general manager.

3. No.

4. No. It is understood a number arrive in the morning, as well as i the evening.

5. Passengers coming in y the evening trains, and wishing to make onnection with the Intercolonial Railway would have to wait over until next day.

6. There are very many mid-day trains in the United States, especially in the New England and middle states.

7. It is the hope of the minister to have a second maritime express (so-called) installed between Montreal and the maritime provinces, leaving Montreal daily in the evening.

P.E.I.RY.—MURRAY HARBOUR BRANCH.

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Minister of Railways and Canals). The other day when the following question was put by the hon. member for East Prince (Mr. Lefurgey),

1. What was the estimated cost of the first eleven miles of the Murray Harbour branch of the Prince Edward Island Railway from Southport east ?

I gave a reply, in which I stated, through a clerical error of the department, that the cost was $45,628.95. The reply should have been :

The estimated cost of the first 11½ miles of the Murray Harbour branch of the Prince Edward Island Railway from Southport East was, $145,628.93.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY.

House again in committee, on the following resolution :

That it is expedient to ratify the agreement between His Majesty the King and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, dated the eighth day of March, 1904, transmitted by His Excellency the Governor General to this House, by his message of March the eleventh ; and which varies in some respects the provisions of the agreement between His Majesty and Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson and others, representing the said company ; a copy of which forms the schedule to the Act, 3 Edward VII, chapter 71 ; and to authorize the government to do whatever is necessary to give full effect to the first mentioned agreement.—Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I understood, Mr. Chairman, that the Prime Minister was going to make a certain statement. I was in hopes that after the exhibition of the fallacies in the resolution and agreement, which was made during the very excellent debate we have just had, and in view especially of the fact that the right hon. gentleman was unable to obtain the assistance of any of his colleagues, in view also of the further fact that but a very few members of his party, and those gentlemen who do not represent the public sentiment of the country, came to his assistance—in view of all these facts, I was in hopes that the Prime Minister would rise and inform the House that he proposed withdrawing this resolution. The right hon. gentleman pointed out last year, with a great flourish of trumpets, that this Bill provides for the establishment of a national transcontinental road. Well, words are very easily uttered, expecially when required to cover up the defects of a measure and mislead the public. Into this question of a national character of the road, I shall not enter at present further than to cite the language of one of the right hon. gentleman's own followers, who took the ground that this proposed road is in no sense a national one. We find that one of his followers, who is accustomed to dealing in highways, not only upon this mundane sphere but also in a superior region, pointed out fatal defects in the claim of this project to be considered national. I refer to the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Holmes). On an occasion not very long since that gentleman pointed out that this road was not in any sense to be a great national railway. Speaking before a certain body, within the last six months, he used this language :

For some reason or other, not known to all the members of the committee, some members of this committee from the lower provinces have evidently compromised on Moncton. They seem to lose sight of the country as a whole in preference for those of the lower provinces. Now it seems to me this railway is being built for the country as a whole. If there is one question on which the Liberal party has lambasted the life out of the Conservatives it was in reference to the terminus of the Intercolonial Railway. It landed nowhere and now this railway is going to land at an interior point.

Thus, from the mouth of one of the premier's own friends, the transcontinental aspect of his road is condemned ; it lands nowhere. It might just as well connect with the Intercolonial to Quebec or Montreal as with the Intercolonial at Moncton. It has to connect with the Intercolonial, therefore I was in hopes that the arguments which have been advanced by hon. gentlemen on this side, as well as the calm reflection of the right hon. the Prime Minister himself—because we would not like to charge him with being under the hypnotic influence of any evil disposed person with designs on Canada—had dissuaded the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) from pursuing this measure. We were in hopes that he would rally and allow his name to be perpetuated in connection with a genuine national transcontinental railway, built, owned and operated by the people of Canada. We were in hopes that the right hon. the Prime Minister was going at the last minute to assert his manhood and obey the mandate of the great mass of his own followers at the same time that he would meet the wishes of the Liberal party of Canada, and take that course. I was, in hopes when a pause occurred at the beginning of this debate, that the right hon. the Prime Minister was going to rise in his place and frankly tell the House and the country that owing to the fact that he had not the endorsation of his colleagues and his own party following in the House—and he dare not call a caucus of his followers.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Order.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Did I hear the musical voice of my hon. friend from West York (Mr. Campbell) ? He is always ready, always aspiring to a position in the cabinet to which his colleagues say he will never attain, always ready to dance when any one touches the button to have him interrupt, always ready to be a hewer of wood and carrier of water for his party. The hon. gentleman, however, can never attain to the position to which he aspires, that of cabinet rank. Personally, I regret this very much, because I have the highest regard for the hon. member for West York (Mr. Campbell), and I regret to see that he has so reduced himself in the estimation of his own colleagues, that they to-day have passed him by and promoted the hon. member for London (Mr. Hyman) over his head. Then too, we know that the hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Calvert) the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. A. T. Thompson), the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) and a half dozen other members are now leading him in the race for cabinet rank, all owing to the fact that the hon. member for West York (Mr. Campbell) is always ready to play second fiddle when any one touches the button. I can assure him that his own Prime Minister does not regard him with any greater respect owing to the fact that he has played that role.

I am anxious to see the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) withdraw this Bill. He knows right well that I have always had a very high regard for him personally, therefore I want to see if I cannot persuade him to withdraw this Bill even though all my colleagues on this side have failed to impress him sufficiently to induce him to do that. I have great faith also in being able to win over the hon. the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton). These are the only two gentlemen in the cabinet who have had the hardihood to stand up and defend this measure before the country, and they both know that I have great respect for their ability, and desire to have them perpetuate something that will be for the benefit of Canada. Therefore they know that when I am thus appealing to them I am endeavouring to win them away from the erroneous path on which they have set out, and to have this measure so altered that the best interests of Canada will be served. Look at the countenances of the ministers around them ; not one of them endorses the movement. I trust that these hon. gentlemen will be able to stand in their places and with the approval of both sides of the House and of the country, withdraw these resolutions and introduce a measure providing for a great national transcontinental railway, built, owned and operated by the people of Canada. I believe that we have made some impression on the right hon. the premier (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). He knows he has been buncoed in relation to the rolling stock trust. He knows that in relation to the operation of the line west of Winnipeg, the operation of the western division, he has secured nothing that will be in the interests of the people of Canada. He knows that when he reaches Quebec, supposing the road is ever constructed to Quebec. then the freight will be at that point 150 miles nearer Portland than it will be to St. John or Halifax. I care not what route he takes. He knows also that there is not one line in his Bill that will cause that freight to go to St. John or Halifax in preference to Portland.

We know in relation to tariff matters that secret and confidential letters have been sent to a dozen gentlemen in almost every city in the Dominion of Canada, private and confidential, signed with the name of the present First Minister, telling these people : You need have no fear, return us to power and we will see that you are all right under the tariff. The Prime Minister shakes his head very faintly. He knows that a document prepared by the late Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) marked 'confidential' was printed in cold type in the Printing Bureau of the Dominion of Canada in numbers and sent out to him and his colleagues for consideration. That document was suppressed so far as they could keep it from the general public. He knows moreover, that at the public meeting of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company—for it is not a private meeting, but is reported in the fullest manner—in financial papers on the other side, statements were made which were not intended to reach the people of Canada. Does any one pretend to say that the Grand Trunk shareholders went there and deliberately voted away their dividends from the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada in return for a sentimental control of the Grand Trunk Pacific from Winnipeg to the coast ? Where is the poor unfortunate shareholder of the Grand Trunk in England or anywhere in the world going to reap a return of one dollar of interest on his dividends under this scheme ?

If the theory of the First Minister is carried out, where are the Grand Trunk Railway shareholders going to get one dollar of dividend from this road ? The poor Grand Trunk Railway shareholder does not own the Grand Trunk Pacific ; it is owned by Senator Cox, Mr. Hays and a few of these gentlemen. The dividends on that road will not go to the hard-pressed shareholder of the Grand Trunk Railway ; it will go to the others. Does the First Minister think that unless the Grand Trunk Railway shareholders had some confidential or secret assurance, they would deliberately sit down in meeting and vote away the dividends on their investment in the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, and especially in the line to Portland. I am satisfied that the First Minister does not for a moment believe anything of the kind. The fact is that this Grand Trunk Pacific is not a transcontinental road, and it is not a national road, because to be a national road it must be owned by the nation. The nation builds it and hands it over to the Grand Trunk Pacific : the nation gives to the Grand Trunk Pacific a guarantee on its construction from Winnipeg to the west, and the Grand Trunk Pacific is just as much independent of the government as either the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Canadian Northern. It is neither a national nor transcontinental road; it is an ordinary hybrid road.

Mr. BENNETT. For highwaymen.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Yes; but, of course, that does not apply to the First Minister who has been carried away by sentiment only. The men who engineered this thing knew the open heart of the Prime Minister well; they appealed to the sentimental end of his character, and I am glad to admit that there is much sentiment in the make-up of the First Minister. They have tickled his fancy by saying that this would be a grand thing for Canada, and they are winking their off-eye, to see how they have humbugged the Prime Minister. However, I have great faith in him, and I believe that before this debate is closed he will rise in his place and withdraw this whole business.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Perhaps you think I should do it now?

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I hope you will before the debate is closed. The Grand Trunk Pacific has its charter from Winnipeg to the Pacific coast and that road must be completed inside of eight years. Meantime, in a year or two; their line will be completed through the prairies and what is the company going to do with the freight they collect on the prairie section? Undoubtedly they will send it over their American connections. The directors and the shareholders are looking for dividends on the Grand Trunk and undoubtedly they will get their own railway at the nearest point. There is not one word or line in this whole contract to prevent the Grand Trunk Pacific from diverting that freight at Winnipeg and sending it via Chicago. There it will go, at all events until the other line is built, and the other line will not be built until most of us are translated to a higher and better sphere. And suppose that the government road from Winnipeg east is constructed as far as North Bay; what then? Under this amended agreement, the Grand Trunk Pacific need not send one wheel over that road except upon terms to be agreed upon between them and the commissioners appointed by this government, and these terms are to be arranged irrespective of the government and irrespective of the wishes of the people of Canada. In the meantime the Grand Trunk Pacific is built to the Pacific coast; it has a magnificent traffic from the prairies which it is sending over its own line via Chicago, and the trade is directed into that channel. The commissioners will go to the Grand Trunk Pacific and say, when the section is built to North Bay: Now, gentlemen we want you to take this section over; and the Grand Trunk Pacific will reply: Thank you very much; that is a little out of our way, the haul is much longer; it is very difficult to get coal in that region, the snows of winter are more expensive to handle than on our southern line via Chicago, but nevertheless we will be delighted to operate that section if you will allow us ordinary wheelage on car mileage, and if you pay the cost on interest and maintenance account. The government is absolutely at the mercy of the Grand Trunk Pacific. Even supposing that line is built from Winnipeg to North Bay, and from North Bay to Quebec, and from Quebec to within a mile of Moncton; until the last spike is driven in the eastern division for the entire distance, the government is absolutely and entirely under the control of the Grand Trunk Pacific. Let the Prime Minister point out anything that proves the contrary in this agreement. I assert, therefore, that the Grand Trunk Pacific will undoubtedly demand that they be paid for operating any portion of this government road from Winnipeg east, from time to time as it may be completed. Am I right?

Mr. COWAN. No.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Excuse me; I was not addressing myself to the distinguished gentleman who comes from the suburbs of Detroit; I was addressing myself to the First Minister.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I would give you the same answer.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. The last gentleman in the world I would think of asking for a legal opinion or a sensible opinion on anything, would be the hon. gentleman for Essex (Mr. Cowan). Of course our friends who are interested in the Quebec bridge, would be anxious to have that road pressed on to Quebec. I have looked in vain in the Bill and in the resolutions for anything that guarantees the construction of the eastern division. In spite of all the protestations made by the First Minister last night, and in spite of all the inspiration and Dutch courage he enthused into his followers, I do not believe that the First Minister believes that that eastern section will ever be completed; at all events, within the lifetime of an ordinary man. There is no guarantee that the eastern division will be constructed, and there is no guarantee that the Grand Trunk Pacific will operate any portion of it until the whole thing is completed, nor is there any penalty imposed on the Grand Trunk Pacific in case it undertakes to operate it and fails.

The right hon. the First Minister must know that, and why he has allowed these gentlemen to get the start of him I fail to see. But the most important part of all, the part that is intended to tickle the fancy of the people of the maritime provinces, is the claim that the freight will go to a winter port in Canadian territory—in other words, to St. John or Halifax. We admit that it will go to a Canadian port in summer; it cannot go elsewhere. In a few years the whole freight of the western states will go through Canada to Canadian ports. When the policy of the hon. leader of the opposition is carried out; when we have a truly national transcontinental railway built, owned and operated by the people of Canada; when we have the Intercolonial Railway extended to the Georgian Bay to meet the lake and rail traffic of grain not only from western Canada, but from the western states; when we have our grand system of canals completed—the Trent canal and the Ottawa and Georgian Bay canal—so that vessels of ocean draught shall be able to sail past this city to the Georgian Bay and the great ports of the west; when we have these and many other magnificent improvements completed, and all at a cost of many millions of dollars less than the First Minister is going to throw away on this hybrid scheme of his, then there will be a guarantee that the freight of the west will go through Canadian channels to Canadian ports. Where is there anything in this Bill that will guarantee this? Of course, whether the Grand Trunk Pacific runs to Duluth, where it intends to run, or Nepigon Bay or somewhere else where brother Conmee has a railway charter, or wherever it touches the water, the grain from that point will be carried to Midland by water, and be carried over the Grand Trunk Railway system to Montreal or Portland. But when the winter traffic reaches North Bay, where will it go to? Does any one suppose that that freight will be diverted from the Grand Trunk to the government road? Why should the Grand Trunk shareholder deprive himself of dividends by turning freight away from his own road and sending it over the government road to Halifax? What interest will he have in sending it to Halifax? His interest lies in sending it to Portland or to Montreal. That is where he has put his good money from which he has waited so long for a dividend. That is why he has put so many millions into terminals at Portland. The Grand Trunk shareholder can bring his directors to time and compel them to send the freight to Portland either from North Bay or Quebec. Let us suppose that the line is ultimately constructed to the city of Quebec, and crosses the Quebec bridge. From that point a car requires to be hauled 150 miles less distance to Portland than to St. John, and over a better road than the First Minister is going to provide, and hundreds of miles less distance than to Halifax. Is the shareholder of the Grand Trunk Railway Company going to let his directors send the freight over a road in which he has not a particle of interest rather than over the Grand Trunk Railway, which he controls? To use the right hon. First Minister's own language, they are going to send it where their interest lies, and I fail to see how any man of ordinary understanding can imagine that one dollar of that traffic is going over any other road than the Grand Trunk Railway, even if the proposed line should be constructed as far as Quebec. The right hon. First Minister may say, we are going to control that sort of thing. Well, I will not ask him to take my word. I did see the Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Emmerson) in his place in the House inside of a week. It was the general impression that they were keeping him locked up for fear he would say something; but they let him out occasionally. They have taken him away again.

Mr. MORIN. He is on the strike.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. No, I do not think he is on the strike. I think they keep him locked up, perhaps with a guard over him. He may be in cold storage; but certainly he is not in the House. We are told that it is necessary to build the Grand Trunk Pacific to Quebec in order to encourage traffic to go that way, because the Intercolonial, which has been such a burden on the country for so many years, will be unable to carry the traffic. Now, I will quote what was said by a gentleman whom the right hon. the First Minister himself has declared to be the greatest railway expert in the country. I do this to show that he thought that the Intercolonial Railway, passing along the shore of the St. Laurence and the gulf, is amply sufficient to handle the traffic.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What is his name?

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. His name is not Campbell, but Blair. I refer to the Hon. Mr. Blair, late Minister of Railways and Canals. Although the name of Campbell is magnetic and carries a great deal of weight in some ways, nevertheless, on railway matters, I think the name of Blair in the Liberal ranks even yet carries greater weight.

An hon. MEMBER. The Campbells are coming.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Not yet—the Campbells are not coming. The mandate has gone out, so far as one Campbell is concerned, that no seat in the cabinet can fall to his lot. I regret that, because personally I have a very warm place in my heart for him, and if another Liberal from Ontario should be called to the cabinet, I think the hon. member for West York, for his long work for the party, would be entitled to the place. But the mandate has gone forth that there is no seat for him there, and he must remain among the rank and file of the party ready to interrupt, ready to get up and make a speech whenever he is called upon, whether he believes in it or not. Mr. Blair, speaking before the committee last session in answer to a question by an hon. member of the House, said :

I would say without any hesitation or reluctance whatever that we can handle by the Intercolonial for the two ports of Halifax and St. John all the traffic that the Grand Trunk Pacific would be able to give us at the city of Quebec.

Mr. LOGAN. All they would have to give you ?

Hon. Mr. BLAIR. All they would have to give us or all that they might give us.

Then a gentleman of the name of Talbot says :

But suppose they were not anxious to give it to you ?

Hon. Mr. BRODEUR. Order, order.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I am quoting from the report, and I hope the newly-fledged minister will try to recall the dignity he used to show in the Speaker's chair :

Hon. Mr. BLAIR. We cannot take them by the throat. There is no question in my mind, however, from the nature of the road and the improvements that are taking place, that we would be fully equal to the capabilities of the Grand Trunk Pacific at any time and under any circumstances.

Therefore this new road which is being built from Quebec to Moncton as a part of a great transcontinental line, is in the opinion of this expert of the government absolutely unnecessary. But lest our friends from that part of Quebec should feel that the Conservative party, in opposing this part of the transcontinental project, are objecting to a road through that part of the country, let it be understood that the Conservative party are on record as having voted four years ago for a subsidy of $6,400 a mile for a colonization road through that part of the country. We have placed ourselves on record. We have given to that region, so far as we are concerned, more consideration than has been given to any part of the province of Ontario under similar conditions.

Mr. LEMIEUX. What road ?

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I do not recollect the name, but the name does not matter. It is a road running by the Etchemin Valley around the Maine border. By the route by which it must go, there is a part of the line, from St. Anselm to a point on the River Noire, a distance of 38 miles. To connect these points, the road will have to traverse no less than 63 miles in order to get even a one per cent grade ; and if it is to get a half per cent grade, such as is estimated for the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, it will have to cover about twice that mileage. We have placed ourselves on record and no charge can be made against us that we are opposed to developing that part of the country. I am advised that the name of the road to which I have referred is the Quebec and New Brunswick.

Now, as to the question whether the Intercolonial would be able to control the freight or whether the Grand Trunk Pacific would be able to control it, so as to send it to the maritime province ports, I would quote briefly :

Mr. FOWLER. I would like to ask Mr. Hays if he would be willing to have incorporated in this charter a clause to the effect that all the Canadian trade developed along the route of the Grand Trunk Pacific should go through Canadian ports—that is, all the freight which is intended for export ?

Mr. HAYS. Does the hon. member wish me to say we would disregard the routing of the shipper ?

Then, Mr. Fowler repeated his question, and Mr. Hays answers :

I would say to the hon. gentleman that we find the largest portion of our shipments are routed by the shipper, and we are legally compelled to observe his route.

We will suppose that this government road is completed as far as Quebec—it will never be built there, though—and the freight goes over it to Quebec. Then, according to Mr. Hays, the manager of the Grand Trunk Railway, this road cannot prevent it being sent to Portland or any other place the shippers chose to direct. In that case, there is no guarantee in the Bill, or in the government's control of rates, or anywhere else, that the freight will be sent over this road to St. John or Halifax, unless the shipper routes it by that way—and the Grand Trunk Railway Company always sees to it that the shipper sends it where it suits the Grand Trunk shareholders. They wish to keep on sending traffic to Portland. There is no man of common sense whom I have met yet, but believes that the stockholders of the Grand Trunk Pacific want the traffic to go where it will bring them a dividend. So, even if the traffic goes to Quebec, it will still go to Portland by rail.

Then, we find that the hon. member for West York (Mr. Campbell)—always getting himself into hot water ; always putting in his oar where he has no business to—got himself into trouble here again. On this question he says :

I would like to say a word or two as to whether the Grand Trunk Pacific will put a clause in their charter that all freight originating in Canada would be transported to a Canadian port. That clause would be utterly absurd if it were put in, because the Grand Trunk Railway nor any other railway controls the freights. It is the shippers that control the freights, and if I want to ship 1,000 barrels of flour via New York or Portland, it is not the Grand Trunk Railway that is going to determine that, they have to carry it just where I send it. If the people of the Northwest choose to send their wheat via Portland or New York, how could the Grand Trunk prevent it ? It is the shippers that control the route by which the freight goes, and so the whole question comes down to the shippers. A firm wishing to ship wheat or flour will certainly always send it by the route that will carry it cheapest.

That car of flour, let me say, is shipped over this government road and reaches Quebec. I would like the First Minister, or any other minister, or any man in this House or out of it, to point out how that flour is going to be sent to the maritime provinces in preference to taking it, by a haul of 150 miles less, to Portland. There is only one way, and that is for the government to operate the road, if they are going to build it by Quebec. And so I again appeal to the First Minister. I know that he knows I am sincere in my confidence in him. I again appeal to him to stand up in his place and make as energetic—I am glad to see our dear old friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) is getting some life in him. This is the first time I have seen a smile on his countenance for weeks, much less observed him mutter a word as prompter, to the First Minister. I say, I again appeal to the First Minister to stand up and make one of these sentimental speeches such as only he can make, but on the reasonable lines I suggest. I venture to say, there is not a man of his following but will support him. And, wild as was their enthusiasm last evening, they will be infinitely more enthusiastic over such a speech, because their hearts will be in it. They will be glad to hear that the government has determined to throw aside this scheme of a line under Grand Trunk Pacific ownership from the coast to Winnipeg and under government ownership from Winnipeg eastward. I know right well, and the country knows right well, and these hon. gentlemen themselves know right well, that they are whipped into line. Do we not recollect how, when the First Minister rose to present these resolutions—and we were glad to see him in such good health—the chill of the reception accorded him by his own followers. Throughout his whole speech he was applauded only three times, and then very mildly. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) came on a little later. There is more the master hand about him. He is the ring master in the circus, so to speak. He told the government's following : Look here, you terriers, fall into line and cheer as you never cheered before, or not a man jack of you who is looking for judgeship or a collectorship of customs, or any other good place need expect to warm the office chair he is looking for.

Mr. Deputy Speaker left the chair and it was taken by Mr. Archibald Campbell.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I am a little sorry, Mr. Chairman, that they have played this game of giving you the place in the chair, to deprive me of any further reference which I might wish to make. But we will endeavour to get on nicely. And, as I was saying, the Minister of the Interior says to the government's following : If you wish to come here again, you must toe the line. And, as he was speaking he would turn and shake his fist at his followers as much as to say : Now cheer. And they would cheer, but their hearts were not in it. I appeal to the First Minister to go to the Minister of the Interior, if he is the master-mind, or to go to Mr. Hays, if he is the mysterious power behind the scenes—go to whoever may wield control, and say : You must release me from this ridiculous bargain. Let him stand before the members of this House and before the people of Canada and say : We wash our hands of the iniquitous bargain, we find we have been deceived—and I pledge him that we on this side of the House, every man of us, will back him. It is not too late to save the country, it is not yet too late to save the honour of the First Minister. That is the only position he can take : let him stand up and wash his hands of this affair, and the people of this country, and the members of both sides will endorse him. But, Sir, there were others. Speaking of the utter absurdity of the contention that because the railroad would run in any one place that of necessity freight must follow that route and be diverted from the Grand Trunk, I find no less an authority than the hon. gentleman who has been selected by the First Minister to succeed this expert of his—Hon. Mr. Blair—I find no less a gentleman than the present Minister of Railways and Canals taking this ground. Possibly that is the reason why the present Minister of Railways and Canals cannot be driven, cannot be dragged so far, to speak on this subject. We find him on record against this, and really it touched the hearts of members on this side of the House to see the Prime Minister not as strong as he used to be, obliged to stand up before this House and the country last night without one solitary minister at his back to defend this project, to see him turning to appeal to his followers, to see him through with the scheme. On a former occasion the present Minister of Railways and Canals, then the private member for Westmoreland (Hon. Mr. Emmerson), said :

> To my mind we talk about whether Mr. Hays is prepared to do this or prepared to do that, and we ask him questions, but I for one, and I take the responsibility of my attitude on the question, believe that you can never guarantee either in this proposition or any other that it shall be through all-Canadian territory and that it shall be at the minimum cost, unless you are prepared to build and to extend the system of railways into the wheat fields of the west.

The very proposition that has been advanced by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. If we are going to pledge this road, if we are going to pledge the country to these enormous sums, then let us own it and operate it as well as build it. I see that the Minister of Railways and Canals has just come into the House. This is the fourth time that hon. gentleman has shown himself in the House while this debate was going on during the last three or four weeks. I was just reading from some remarks made by the hon. member from Westmoreland last year in refutation of the arguments advanced by the First Minister. The First Minister was claiming that the freight would necessarily have to go to a port in the maritime provinces if the road was built via Quebec. In refutation of that I have quoted from two or three members on the government side to show that the First Minister was entirely in the wrong, and among them I quoted from the hon. member for Westmoreland. He goes on to say :

Several hon. MEMBERS. That is the proper thing.

Mr. EMMERSON. Without you do that you cannot guarantee. We must recognize the fact that as far as the interests of the Grand Trunk Railway are concerned, their interests lie in utilizing the facilities which they have at Portland. They claim that it is a shorter haul, and probably it is, and they may claim that they have spent large sums of money in providing terminal facilities which they would wish to utilize. The question is : Can this committee furnish to them, can the committee point out to them, that they can with advantage to themselves, because we must recognize that these gentlemen are looking after their own interests, and we cannot blame them, can we show them that it will be to their interests to carry the products of the west, the products which they will gather in Canada, entirely through Canadian territory to Canadian seaports at all seasons of the year. If not, they are not likely to accept our view of the matter at all, no matter what you may put in the Bill, even if you are to amend their Bill for that purpose. You have to bind them down to that, and it would be evaded in my judgment, unless indeed, they propose to carry their railway to some point in the maritime provinces for their winter traffic, and to a point at Quebec for the summer traffic. They have not in this Bill proposed to do that.

Those were the views of the present Minister of Railways and Canals, and I believe they are his views to-day, and I say to his credit that the government have not been able to drive him in this House into disclaiming those views. The Prime Minister himself, with all the magic power he has over his followers has not been able to compel the present Minister of Railways and Canals to rise in his place and defend this ridiculous Bill. I trust he will still stand to his guns. I trust he will recognize that this is a free country, and that the time has passed when the Minister of the Interior could turn around and tell his followers : If there are any weak-kneed members among you you must fall into line. The time has passed when the Prime Minister can say to them : Unless you stand up and fall into line we will wipe you out of political existence. I trust that the Minister of Railways and Canals, recognizing that this country is ruled by parliamentary government, will decline to bow the knee, and that like his predecessor in office, rather than retract his views, he will walk out of the cabinet.

Some hon. MEMBERS. He won't do it.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I have some faith in him. Now then, there is much more. I will give another little extract from the speech made by the present Minister of Railways and Canals on that occasion. He said :

I for one am not in favour of granting the privilege to this railway under the terms which they have asked, and I think that this country, that this parliament, should be ready to grapple with this question in the way that will ensure what we all want from a national standpoint, and in the only way in which it can be successfully done, and the only way in which it will ever be done will be by the government of Canada undertaking to extend the government system of railways into the wheat fields of the west.

Those were the views held by the hon. gentleman at that date. Now there was another maritime province member who spoke on this subject, and I am proud of him too. I am proud to know that with all the pressure the cabinet have been exerting on their followers they have not been able to force him into line—I refer to the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan). He is thus reported :

Coming to the winter shipments, they say : We will give it over to the Intercolonial Railway if we can make a satisfactory arrangement with the Intercolonial. Is any man so childish as to believe that if the Grand Trunk Pacific has a car of wheat at North Bay it will take it to Quebec and hand it over to the Intercolonial when they can take it right through to Portland. It is absolutely ridiculous to make such a suggestion. We have had some experience with the Grand Trunk in dealings with the Grand Trunk system. When the Drummond County Railway was purchased they made certain promises ; we had it signed, sealed and delivered and I am bound to say they have broken every promise. Now we are asked to-day to take their word that they will give us a preference for Canadian ports.

When we are dealing with the Grand Trunk Pacific or any other railway we do not want promises or preferences to depend upon. We want it in such a way that it is to their material advantage to take that grain through Canadian ports.

These are splendid words, and I believe the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) endorses them to-day. I believe that in his heart he is endeavouring to win the First Minister back from those who have this unfortunate influence over him, and that he is endeavouring to make the Prime Minister repudiate such an iniquitous measure. Let us look at the eloquent words uttered by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) on that occasion :

Coming to the winter shipments, they say : We will give it over to the Intercolonial Railway if we can make a satisfactory arrangement with the Intercolonial Railway.

We know that the Grand Trunk Pacific will have but a short haul from a point on its main line north of North Bay to North Bay, where it will make connections with the Ontario system of the Grand Trunk Railway. When the Grand Trunk Pacific have their traffic at this point, is it conceivable that the Grand Trunk shareholder who bosses the directors is going to allow that traffic to be hauled over the Intercolonial, from which he will not receive one dollar of return from the freight rates ? Is he not going to force the directors to send that freight down over the Grand Trunk system to Portland, in order that he may get a dividend from it ? I endorse this language of the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan. He proceeds :

Is any man so childish as to believe that if the Grand Trunk Pacific has a car of wheat at North Bay it will take it through to Quebec and hand it over to the Intercolonial when they can take it right through to Portland. It is absolutely ridiculous to make such a suggestion.

I endorse in its entirety this noble language of the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan). Why then did we find him last night bowing to the party lash, to the demand of the Minister of the Interior and to the sentimental appeal—and I do not know what other influence—of the First Minister ? Why did he sacrifice the first principles of responsible government by going back on the noble language he used a year ago, and fall into line behind these men at the beck of the party lash ? Let us hope it is because of a determination to privately win the right hon. the Prime Minister over from this scheme.

I regret that the right hon. the Prime Minister was absent while I was reading the noble language of the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan), but as he is now in his place I shall read it for him.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I will take it as read.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. No, no ; I know the First Minister has a warm spot for the member for Cumberland, and if the hon. member for Cumberland would only persevere in his course of last year, if the Minister of Railways (Mr. Emmerson) would only stand to his guns as he did last year, and unite with us who have the welfare of the country and of the First Minister at heart, I believe that we can yet get him to repudiate this iniquitous measure.

I noticed that the moment the Prime Minister entered the chamber the Minister of Railways left it. I hope that there is not between them that repellant influence which sometimes exists in magnetic bodies that forces them apart. Possibly they are afraid to leave the management of the House to the great old Knight of Oxford and the newly fledged Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Brodeur). I would be very sorry if there should be that repellant influence of which I spoke.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Perhaps he is on the same hinge as I am.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. He may be. I shall quote from the language of the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) :

Coming to the winter shipments they say : We will give it over to the Intercolonial Railway if we can make a satisfactory arrangement with the Intercolonial. Is any man so childish as to believe that if the Grand Trunk Pacific has a car of wheat at North Bay it will take it through to Quebec and hand it over to the Intercolonial when they can take it right through to Portland. It is absolutely ridiculous to make such a suggestion. We have had some experience with the Grand Trunk Railway in dealings with the Grand Trunk system. When the Drummond County Railway was purchased, they made certain promises ; we had it signed, sealed and delivered and I am bound to say they have broken every promise.

This is from the lips of the hon. member for Cumberland when he was not under the party lash, but was exercising the rights and privileges of a free man. Of course, I admit that the party system may demand such a vote as the hon. member (Mr. Logan) gave last night, but I hope that the hon. member gave it while thinking it his duty to endeavour to persuade the Prime Minister to abandon this iniquitous measure.

We are asked to-day to take the word of the Grand Trunk that they will give us a preference for Canadian ports.

When we are dealing with the Grand Trunk or any other railway we do not want promises or preferences to depend upon ; we want it in such a way that it is to their material advantage to take that grain to Canadian ports.

I endorse this statement of the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan). We know that the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway, who control the districts—

Mr. COCHRANE. And the government.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. And the government. The shareholders control the directors, the directors control the road and the road controls the government. The directors, we know, will compel all freight to be carried to Portland in order that they may receive dividends.

Is there a man of common sense in the country, who would not do the same thing ? Why, if the Grand Trunk directors would permit the traffic to go on any other but their own road, they should be locked up, the same as some of the hon. gentleman's supporters are locked up here for fear they would say something. There is only one way that freight can be guaranteed to the maritime ports, and that is by the construction of a road that will have no interest in sending freight to American ports. We already have the Intercolonial Railway, and the only way you can guarantee to carry freight to Canadian ports, is to extend the Intercolonial Railway to the west and that the government shall build, own and operate the whole system. Then and not till then, may the people of the maritime provinces rest assured, that the freight of the west will go through their ports, and that the country will have some return for the expenditure made. There is the member for Annapolis (Mr. Wade), who was also a member of the committee last year, and who said :

I agree also with the statements made by Mr. Hays and Mr. Campbell (West York), that you cannot control the routing of the products or goods of the shipper. We are fully aware of this fact however, that a transportation company has a good deal to do with the fixing of the routes for the shipper, and in nine cases out of ten it is a matter of supreme indifference to the shipper as to which route his goods take, provided they go by the cheapest route.

The Grand Trunk Pacific will have its agents in the west, and even if the goods are shipped to Quebec, the Grand Trunk is going to get a rake off some way or other, and they will see that when the goods get to Quebec they will be sent over the Grand Trunk Railway, to Portland, which is about 150 miles nearer to the sea-board, than the nearest Canadian port by the shortest route you can take. I cannot, for the life of me see how it is, that the Prime Minister has been deceived in this matter, because he is usually a very shrewd and astute gentleman. I again appeal to him to look at the matter from any view he chooses, and he will see that there is no possibility, under his present scheme of diverting this freight from being carried over the Grand Trunk line to Portland. The only way that can be done, is by giving us an all-Canadian route, built by the people of Canada, owned by the people of Canada, and controlled by the people of Canada. The people of the west might then rest assured that they will get the cheapest rates possible to an ocean port, and that the Grand Trunk, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian Northern, will each have a fair chance of competing with the others. If the Prime Minister adopts such a policy, it will redound to the benefit, not only of eastern Canada, but of western Canada as well. In the hope that the First Minister will withdraw this measure, I shall resume my seat for the time being.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Before the resolution is adopted, I would like to ask the Prime Minister, whether he is aware of any meeting of the Grand Trunk shareholders, at which the original agreement was presented to them and rejected. I refer to a remark made in the course of the debate by my hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Thompson), who used this language :

Has anybody in this House impeached the sincerity of Mr. Hays or of Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson when they made that promise ? Not at all. They went to their shareholders and they said everything in their power to induce them to meet their views ; they had to put up this money in order that that contract might be carried out as it was originally framed. But the shareholders point blank refused to do so.

I asked :

Might I ask the hon. gentleman when this meeting of the shareholders took place to which he has referred ?

And the hon. gentleman (Mr. Thompson) dismissed me with a somewhat lordly wave of his hand in this way :

I have not got the exact date, but I can supply the hon. gentleman with it after I have finished my speech.

I have not yet had any intimation of the date at which that meeting was held, nor was I aware, until the hon. member mentioned it, that such a meeting had been held. Can the right hon. gentleman give me any information on the subject ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I am not aware that there was any meeting of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Company, other than that which took place on the 8th of March.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Then the original agreement was never submitted to any meeting until the original and amended agreements were submitted to this meeting.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend from Haldimand may have information as to that, but perhaps these words do not cover exactly what he meant, as sometimes happens. Perhaps he meant to say that the shareholders had been canvassed. But as my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) has asked me a precise question, I am bound to give him a precise answer. I am not aware of any other meeting.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. My right hon. friend paid me a very tremendous compliment last night, but I feel it absolutely necessary that I should disclaim it. He stated that I was responsible for certain quotations which I introduced into my remarks, and in order that I may do him no injustice let me follow his own course and quote exactly what he did say. By the way, let me say in passing, that while my right hon. friend has objections to much quotation, I think he did very well in that line last night.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Sometimes.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I think that with a little practice he will soon have about nine-tenths quotation, and one-tenth his own speech.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Perhaps the bad example has affected me.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I must say that I was a little surprised, that after we heard on this side of the House, that the right hon. gentleman was only going to make a few remarks, he came in with a carefully prepared speech, and spoke for nearly an hour. He surpassed our expectations in that regard. But my right hon. friend was in very good form, and we were very glad indeed to hear him. My right hon. friend spoke first of great masters of debate, using quotation, and then he went on to state that I had used quotation, and that I had dropped into poetry. Here is the right hon. gentleman's language.

> There is this difference, however, between my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) and these English masters of debate, that he did not quote from the classics, but from his own poetical effusions and perhaps it may be pleasing to him if I should read his verse. Here it is :
> POETRY.
> To-morrow and to-morrow and to-morrow
> Creeps on this petty pace from day to day,
> And all our yesterdays have seen the route
> Unknown and unsurveyed.

Well, Sir, my hon. friend assuredly reached a climax when, in a grave discussion of this character, bristling with figures and intended to be serious, he so far relaxed as to introduce into this debate this effusion, of which in a moment of weakness, flirting with the spirit of the muse, he had become the guilty progenitor.

I must not take this compliment, Mr. Chairman. Let me refer my right hon. friend, who seems to be in doubt about this, to act 5, scene 5 of Macbeth—I dare say he may have heard of the author of that play.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Oh, yes. I am familiar with the quotation.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Well the right hon. gentleman did not seem to be so familiar with it last night, because he attributed the quotation to me :

> To-morow and to-morrow and to-morrow
> Creeps in this petty pace from day to day,
> To the last syllable of recorded time ;
> And all our yesterdays have lighted fools
> The way to dusty death.

I changed seven words at the end, adapted them, and my right hon. friend gives me credit for the whole. Might I quote the passage further :

> Out, out, brief candle !
> Life's but a walking shadow ; a poor player,
> That struts and frets his hour upon the stage,
> And then is heard no more : it is a tale
> Told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, > Signifying nothing.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

I would not for one moment apply that epithet to my right hon. friend, for whose ability I have every respect ; but I think his speech of last night might be characterized as a tale told by a premier, full of eloquence and poetry, signifying nothing.

Now, my right hon. friend was good enough to point out once more, as he has endeavoured to point out on previous occasions, that the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to the Georgian Bay would be an act of perfect madness. One might pause to observe that it is a remarkably curious thing that a gentleman who has been commended by my right hon. friend as one of the most expert railway men in Canada, should regard a project of that kind as the most perfect wisdom, while my right hon. friend regards it as the most perfect madness. If Mr. Blair is the best man in Canada to fill the position which he now does fill ; if he, of all men in Canada, is the most competent to consider questions of railway policy and development, how is it that he entertains so absolutely different an opinion on this point from that which my right hon. friend entertains ? I am not unwilling to meet my right hon. friend on that point.

But apart from any argument which may be derived from Mr. Blair's suggestion to extend the Intercolonial to the Georgian Bay, either by the acquisition of the Canada Atlantic or otherwise, my right hon. friend says it would be a foolish thing to do so, because three-fourths of the traffic that goes westward over the Canada Atlantic, comes from United States points and must be carried to United States points in the west. I have not examined very carefully, although my right hon. friend was good enough to show me the figures on which he relied last night; but I do not think he pretends that there is any such proportion as that of the freight going the other way to American ports. If we extended the Intercolonial to the Georgian Bay, my right hon. friend says we could not get any of that traffic, because there would be no steamers to carry it to American points in the west. Are there not American steamers under American registry now ? Why would there not be American steamers then just as there are now ? Why must these steamers vanish from the lakes the moment the Intercolonial is extended to the Georgian Bay ? It is a mere matter of detail how that line of steamers should be arranged. It could be arranged in half a dozen ways—by a company such as I suggested last year controlled by the government, or by an independent company altogether. If the Intercolonial brings to the Georgian Bay that traffic destined for American points in the west, my right hon. friend can rest assured that there will be steamers under the American flag to carry it to its destination.

After I had brought to my right hon. friend's attention a certain quotation from my speech of last year, he said this :

I have read those words of my hon. friend and they sound well ; but if he will explain to me how the Grand Trunk Railway built to North Bay and to Portland, will carry trade to Canadian ports without a railway to the maritime provinces I will be glad to have his explanation.

Well, my right hon. friend has an exceedingly short memory. Does he not remember that five or six years ago, his Minister of Railways brought down to this House a proposal to extend the Intercolonial Railway from Lévis to Montreal for the very purpose of taking from the Grand Trunk Railway the traffic from the west, and that his Minister of Railways justified the enormous expenditure of public money on that occasion by the argument that he had made such an arrangement with the Grand Trunk Company that they were bound to give to the Intercolonial the traffic from the west destined for the maritime provinces or for Europe via maritime province ports ? Has my right hon. friend so soon forgotten his own project that he asks me a question of that kind, in view of the fact that fifteen or twenty millions of dollars were expended by this government for the purpose of extending the Intercolonial to Montreal, and with the express object that this traffic should be taken from the Grand Trunk, and that as a result of that arrangement we would see traffic brought from the west to the maritime province ports in larger quantities ? I am free to admit that the expectations of the government in that respect have not been fulfilled, as we all hoped they would be. Let me say in passing that when the hon. Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Sifton)—who, I regret is not in his place now—said the other day that the Conservative party—and he alluded particularly to myself—had opposed the extension of the Intercolonial Railway from Lévis to Montreal, he spoke without warrant. I have more than one reference under my hand in which I declared myself strongly in favour of the extension of the Intercolonial to Montreal. What I did object to was the improvident bargain which was made by this government with the Drummond Counties Railway Company, and certain gentlemen behind them, and with the Grand Trunk Railway Company, but so far as the proposal to extend the Intercolonial to Montreal was concerned, I did not oppose it, but supported it. But I pointed out that a bad bargain had been made ; and in that view I was sustained by a supporter of the government now in the Senate, who said that the rejection by the Senate of the first proposal of the government had saved to this country no less than $400,000.

My right hon. friend has introduced the question how to keep the traffic to be gathered up in the Northwest for the maritime provinces., I will say once more to my right hon. friend, at the risk of being wearisome, that the only way to secure that favour for the maritime provinces, I know of, is to extend the Intercolonial Railway to the shores of the Georgian Bay.

The people, controlling their own railway reaching to the shores of Georgian Bay, surely will see to it that the traffic brought across these lakes to the eastern shores of Georgian Bay, will go on the people's railway to Canadian ports, whether on the St. Lawrence or in the maritime provinces. That is the only solution of the difficulty, and I invite the attention to it of my hon friend from Annapolis (Mr. Wade) who professes a great interest in this subject, and my hon. friend from Hants (Mr. Russell), my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair), both of whom, I regret, are not in their place. All these gentlemen profess great interest in the maritime ports. I invite any one of them to show me one line or stipulation in this contract which will prevent the Grand Trunk Railway from taking that traffic from the eastern shores of Georgian Bay and carrying every pound of it to Portland. The Grand Trunk Railway can do that and be in absolute consistency with this contract. There is not a line or stipulation in the contract to prevent them. There is a stipulation binding upon the Grand Trunk Pacific, but the Grand Trunk Pacific does not reach the shores of Georgian Bay. It is the Grand Trunk Railway which reaches the shores of Georgian Bay and has its terminus in Portland, and although we asked last year that this same stipulation should be imposed upon the Grand Trunk Railway, these hon. gentlemen, who are professing so great interest in the maritime ports and such great distress about the attitude of the opposition, all stood up and voted against my resolution. We asked that this contract should be amended by imposing at least that stipulation upon the Grand Trunk Railway. My hon. friend from Annapolis voted against it. My hon. friend from Hants voted against it, and I suppose, if it be proposed again this year, my hon. friend from Guysborough will vote against it. Yet every one of these gentlemen will profess the greatest anxiety that freight should be brought from western Canada to St. John and Halifax. I would rather observe some practical evidence of the interest these hon. gentlemen profess in our maritime ports, such as their support of the policy I advocate, than mere controversial displays of that interest. Halifax and St. John are entitled to their share of the western traffic. They are entitled to have the Intercolonial Railway extended to the shores of Georgian Bay, and the government, by an answer to a question put during the present session, demonstrated, in the plainest possible way, the possibility of carrying through-traffic from the shores of Georgian Bay to Halifax by the Intercolonial at a good profit. There is no doubt about that. The figures are there and I shall not go over them again. I gave them when I previously spoke on this subject. Therefore, if my right hon. friend is so solicitous, as he says he is, about the maritime ports of Canada, there is just one way to preserve the trade for those ports, and that is to extend the Intercolonial to the shores of Georgian Bay, and by that means absolutely control the traffic which will come from the west and be gathered at the shores of Georgian Bay by whatever railways may be there to reach out for it.

I have not very much more to say about the speech of my right hon. friend last night, because it was very fully and ably answered by my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Bell), but there is just one other matter to which I would like to refer, and that is the report of the proceedings at the meeting of the Grand Trunk Railway shareholders. My right hon. friend reproached us for having disclosed to this House a report of the proceedings at that meeting. I would like to know why these proceedings should not be disclosed? Is there anything private about them? Were they not published in the newspapers? Has not the 'Railway News' given a report of the meeting, which is, to all intents and purposes, the same as that which I quoted? Why does my right hon. friend say there is anything improper in disclosing these proceedings? Was there anything secret about that meeting? Was it intended that there should be anything transacted at it which the people of Canada ought not to know? I do not understand the suggestion of my right hon. friend in that regard, and lest I should do him an injustice, let me quote his words:—

> My hon. friend quoted from a private report of the meeting of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, but we had not come to the end of this debate before he himself recognized that in so doing he had taken a course which should not be followed in this House or in debate.

I recognized nothing of the kind. I say that we are entitled to have the proceedings of the meeting of the Grand Trunk Railway before this House. Their proceedings have been published in the public press, and there is no possible reason that I am aware of why they should not be printed and distributed to the country.

But my right hon. friend also referred to another matter. He referred to the memorandum of Mr. Blair, to which some reference has been made in this House. Let me say a word or two on that point. It seems to me that my right hon. friend is much more sensitive on this subject than he was in times gone by. I recollect very well when he did not seem to be so particular. When it was the object of hon. gentlemen opposite to discredit a gentleman by the name of Mr. Hamilton Smith, a certain telegram was sent to Lord Strathcona, and as soon as the answer was received, my right hon. friend, through his secretary, sent it out to ever Liberal paper. Sir Charles Tupper, who was then leader of the opposition, asked my right hon. friend across the floor whether or not he would bring down the telegram to which that reply was an answer. My right hon. friend's statement can be found on page 939 of the 'Hansard' of 1898. He said he would bring down that telegram and lay it on the table of the House the next day. But the next day he changed his mind and told us that, despite his promise, he would not do anything of the kind. And he refused to bring it down on the ground that the telegram he sent was confidential. The answer was not confidential, you will observe, but the telegram sent was. That was a rather extraordinary view to take of the position, but when he was reproached by Sir Charles Tupper, what did my right hon. friend reply? He said: I am the guardian of my own honour. Well, so far as I am concerned, I am equally the guardian of my own honour. And should I ever desire to put that honour in trust, I will select myself the gentleman to whom I shall entrust it. Let me point out further that my right hon. friend was not so particular on this subject some time after. Let us consider the position of Mr. Blair's memorandum. What was the position? Mr. Blair left this government on a certain question of policy. While that question of policy was being discussed by this government, Mr. Blair's views, communicated to his colleagues, I suppose, would have been regarded as confidential, but they were not so regarded even by himself, when he differed from his colleagues, and ministerial explanations were in order. We have the statement of Mr. Blair himself in his letter published in this House, in which he refers to the very negotiations which were intimately connected at least with this document read to the House. In his letter of the 10th of July, 1896, Mr. Blair says this:

> Let me state our position on the main question. My decided preference is for a government owned and government operated railway across the continent, and my chief reason for favouring it is that it will have an equalizing and regulating influence upon all other railways throughout the western territories. In this view I am practically alone, and therefore I admit at once that this proposition must be laid aside. But the cabinet has decided that the government shall build half way across the continent as a government road, namely, between Quebec and Winnipeg.

Mr. Blair, on that occasion, went into two things. In the first place, he went into a statement of what his own policy, advocated by him to the members of the cabinet, was; and in the next place, he went into a statement of what the policy of the cabinet, to which he alone was opposed, was to be with regard to this great question Mr. Blair would have been at perfect liberty, when he made that statement in this House, to repeat every word of the memorandum. And I say that every word of that memorandum ought to have been brought down with the correspondence laid before this House, because that memorandum is directly and closely connected with the cause which led to the resignation of Mr. Blair. There were two causes which led to that resignation. The first was that he was opposed to the policy of the government as now laid down, and the second was that he himself had proposed a policy to the cabinet, but his colleagues had not seen fit to accept it. So the House and the country were informed of one half of the reason for that resignation, but the other half was kept absolutely secret, in order that this government might be able to tell the people that Mr. Blair was as much opposed to the policy of the leader of the opposition as he was to the policy of the leader of the government. I would like to ask my right hon. friend why it was that that carefully prepared memorandum was suppressed instead of being brought down with the rest of the correspondence? Suppose it had been in the form of a letter to the Prime Minister, as it might have been, it is evident that it would have been the duty of the government to bring it down with the correspondence. And is the situation altered because, instead of publishing it in the form of a letter to the Prime Minister, Mr. Blair saw fit to print it as he did, and hand the copies to his colleagues? Why is it that the Prime Minister has seen fit, on this occasion, to bring down what I say is only part of the correspondence and to withhold that which, according to any fair, and reasonable, and honest view of the circumstances, is as much a part of the communications between Mr. Blair and his colleagues on this question of public policy as is the correspondence which has actually been brought down? My right hon. friend will have to justify himself, when he refers to this document, and point out to the people of this country some reason why he should have said that Mr. Blair, professing the view set forth in this correspondence and set forth more fully in the document to which I have referred, was as much opposed to the policy advocated on this side of the House as he was to the policy advocated by the government.

My right hon. friend should not forget another thing. This document related to a matter of public policy, a matter that has been settled and determined by the government. That matter of public policy was the cause of the resignation of Mr. Blair. As I have said before, I think that all the reasons which induced Mr. Blair to leave the cabinet should have been placed fairly and fully before the people of this country. And, speaking with deference and without any desire to be in any way offensive, it does not seem to me that that was done, or that the government in that regard discharged the duties which they owe to the people and especially to this parliament. But does my right hon. friend recollect an occasion when he himself had private documents printed and distributed in this House? I have here the sessional papers of 1897, and I find in them a confidential letter, duly marked 'confidential,' from Hon. N. Clarke Wallace to Colonel William White, Deputy Postmaster General, and printed by my right hon. friend—and printed, too, at the public expense—and placed before parliament and the country for the purpose of securing, if possible, a paltry party advantage. The letter to which I refer is to be found at page 26 of Sessional Paper 12A of 1897. Then, I find at page 27, another private letter—also duly marked 'private.' This is from Hon. N. Clarke Wallace to Colonel William White, dated 24th October, 1895. And this is printed and placed before parliament and the people of this country for the same purpose. Did not my right hon. friend get up in this House and justify that action? Is he not as much responsible for it as the Postmaster General (Sir William Mulock), by whose direction, it would appear, this document was printed? And how does my right hon. friend justify that, if his sense of delicacy with regard to these things is so fine as he professed last night? I find at page 30 another letter marked 'private.' It is from Hon. W. H. Montague to Sir A. P. Caron. And at page 44 of the same sessional paper there is another letter headed 'private' from Colonel William White to the Hon. Dr. Montague. The printing of this my right hon. friend justified on that occasion. I wonder, in view of the professions he makes with regard to these matters, that he could have found it possible to justify that action. Because, let it be understood, these letters did not relate to matters of public policy; they related to matters of party arrangement and party patronage. They were essentially and in every respect private and confidential letters. They were letters between members of the same party, left by inadvertence in the rooms occupied by the Post Office Department here, and they were seized upon by this government after it came into power, and printed and placed before parliament and the public. There is a clear distinction between such letters and this document of Mr. Blair's. And I should think that in the sense of delicacy that would forbid the publication of this would still more strongly forbid the printing of private correspondence of this kind between members of the same party and not relating to any great question of public policy or public interest, such as we have had discussed this afternoon.

There are many more of these letters in this sessional paper. At page 58 there is a letter from Hon. David Tisdale to Coloniel White, dated 1st December, 1891, and there is a postscript especially marked 'private,' yet that postscript is published with the rest of the letter. At page 68 there is a letter, dated 1st April, 1896, from Colonel William White to H. H. Ross, M.P. That letter was marked 'private,' yet it was published on that occasion by the Postmaster General. At page 84 of this sessional paper there is a letter which is especially noteworthy. It was from a gentleman who was very much respected in public life, Hon. Thomas White. At the time of this publication Mr. White had been for many years in his grave. And this government did not even stop at the publication of this private letter of Hon. Thomas White eight or ten years after his death. That letter, though marked 'private,' is to be found in this sessional paper published by the Postmaster General, and its publication was justified by my right hon. friend at the time. Let me go on and give a few more. At page 98 there is a letter from A. B. Ingram to Hon. Mr. Haggart, dated 19th November, 1891, and marked 'private.' This also was published by the Postmaster General at the public expense, and its publication was justified by the right hon. Prime Minister. It relates to a matter which, it is true, regarded the mail service, which was of no great public interest and which was confidential between the Hon. Mr. Haggart and Mr. Ingram. On page 117 a private letter from Mr. Wm. White to Mr. H. H. Ross, M.P., is published with the other letters in the sessional papers to which I have referred. On page 130 a letter from J. C. Rykert, a long time out of public life, to Mr. Haggart, dated 24th of November, 1888, marked 'private.' On page 131 a further letter from Mr. Rykert marked 'private' addressed to Mr. Wm. White, and also published. A further letter on page 132 from J. C. Rykert to Mr. White marked 'private,' and also published in this series to which I have referred. On page 163 a private letter from Mr. Wm. White to Mr. Joncas, marked 'private,' published with these other letters. On page 164 a letter from the Hon. Louis Pelletier, to Sir Adolphe Caron, marked 'private,' and not only published but translated in order that the publication of it should be as wide as possible. On page 178 a further letter dated 31st of August, 1895, from Hon. Louis Pelletier to Sir Adolphe Caron, also marked 'private,' and also translated into English in order that there should not be the slightest difficulty about its publication being made as wide as possible. There are many others mentioned in this book. I will give one or two more. A letter from Mr. Wm. White to Mr. Kaulbach, marked 'private,' and published by my hon. friend's government, a letter from Mr. Wm. White to Mr. Foster, on page 260, marked 'private' and published with these other letters. A letter from Mr. D. W. Davis, M.P., to Lieut.-Col. White, marked 'private,' and published on page 279 of the sessional papers. A letter from Mr. T. Mayne Daly to Sir Adolphe Caron, marked 'private,' and dated the 15th of May, 1895. Now, these letters did not concern any great public question, they were private letters as between members of the same party. They were left by inadvertence, I think, by Sir Adolphe Caron, in the Post Office Department when he gave up that department. They were found by my hon. friend the Postmaster General, and they were published by the government of the right hon. gentleman, but my right hon. friend stood up in the House and justified their publication. Under these circumstances I must say that I do not feel very much the strictures which my right hon. friend has been good enough to pass upon me, and I think under the circumstances he might well, even at this late date, consider a little the motives and reasons which induced the publication of these letters, and whether they stand in any different position from the document which has been read to the House, and if they do stand in a different position, whether it is not very much to the advantage of the position I have taken than to the advantage of the position which the right hon. gentleman has taken.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). I do not intend at this moment to enter very fully into a controversy with my hon. friend with regard to the ethics of parliamentary life. I think a few observations will be quite sufficient, and even more than sufficient, to show him that in the way he has treated this question he is altogether in the wrong. My hon. friend has introduced a new doctrine to justify his course, a doctrine which I leave in the judgment of his own friends and followers, and I ask them to say whether they want it to be observed or not. The justification which my hon. friend makes for the course which he took a few days ago when he made public a private and confidential memorandum of Mr. Blair, addressed to his colleagues when he was a member of the Privy Council—the justification which he makes is to say: You have done somethings worse, you have published private letters addressed to ministers. Well, let me make one remark. I do not at this moment well remember the matters to which he has referred, but taking the statement made by the hon. gentleman to-day, what does it amount to? If the Postmaster-General brought private letters to the attention of this House in the session of 1897, he did not do it in a surreptitious manner, he did not spring them upon the House. They were introduced after being called for, in answer to a resolution passed by this House to have all the correspondence in the archives brought down upon a certain date. All the letters which my hon. friend has quoted here a moment ago are letters which I am sure, without looking at the papers myself, were brought down in answer to resolutions moved in this House and passed calling for the correspondence. Now, Sir, I ask my hon. friend this question: It is one of the most valuable privileges of an opposition to be able to call upon the government for correspondence which is in the archives of the government, which may throw light upon some subject of public concern, or even of private concern to somebody. It is a privilege of every British subject to have his grievances ventilated. If any man in the country writes to the member of his riding and asks for correspondence referring to a certain question in which he is interested, it is not only the privilege, but it is the duty of the member so addressed to move in the House for that correspondence. This is a privilege which is used every day. As I said, it is one of the safeguards of the opposition. Now, I ask the hon. gentleman: How do they want the government to answer this resolution, how do they want the government to obey this mandate of the House? When the House has given its mandate to the government to bring down certain correspondence, is it the intention and meaning of my hon. friend that the minister should discriminate in the correspondence which is on file, and tear off from the file those papers which the minister thinks proper to bring down and leave the others? Is that the way the mandate of the House is to be obeyed?

Mr. INGRAM. That is not the way it is done.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That is the way it is done every session. I agree with him that the papers on file ought to be brought down, but this is not what my hon. friend wants. He says: I leave it to the discrimination of the government to tear off this paper or that paper, and bring down only what will suit them. Sir, if the government were to obey a mandate of the House in the manner suggested by the leader of the opposition, the opposition would be the first to complain of such a course, and rightly to complain.

Mr. SPROULE. Is it not a fact that when a motion is simply for papers, the responsible minister of the department usually says he will bring down such papers as are not confidential?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes, Sir.

Mr. SPROULE. That is all the House looks for.

Mr. HAGGART. Where does the right hon. gentleman get his information that these papers were brought down in answer to a motion for correspondence?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not know how they could have been brought down otherwise.

Mr. HAGGART. Not at all.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not see how they could be brought down otherwise. If they were not brought down in answer to a resolution of the House, will the hon. gentleman tell me how they were brought down?

Mr. HAGGART. They were brought down by the Postmaster General off his own bat, without any request at all.

Mr. INGRAM. Published in every Grit paper in the country.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Pure malice aforethought.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Here is the reference:

Correspondence relating to certain mail contract, sessional papers of 1896.

I shall inquire further how they were brought down, but they were brought down as an official correspondence and were taken from the files which were in the department of the Postmaster General. It cannot be anything else. Wherever a motion for papers is made, it is always understood that those papers which are confidential are not to be brought down; the papers which are confidential to the minister alone are not put on file. Some of that correspondence is of a confidential nature, and if it is of a confidential nature to himself it is not put on file. It may happen that a confidential paper is of a public character and such a document must be put on file in order to have something like an intelligent record. Under such circumstances if an officer of the department places private papers on the file because they relate to the matter in hand, then such papers become public property. I do not think it would be possible to transact public business otherwise, or to carry on the correspondence in any other way than this. I believe the opposition would be the first to blame the government and to attack it if they did not bring down all the papers on record in relation to the question for which papers were moved.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Does my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) say that the bringing down of private papers depends on the accident of their being put on file by some officer of the department?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I did not say they were placed there by accident. My hon. friend (Mr. Borden) will understand that although a letter is marked private it may be necessary to have it become part of a public record because if that letter is not included, the record will not be complete, the transaction will not be intelligible. I assume that these papers were brought down upon a motion.

Mr. HAGGART. No.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If they were not brought down upon a motion, I shall have to correct myself. I assume they were brought down in the ordinary course of business and if I was wrong I shall have to say that I was in error. I shall look at the record however, as to how they were brought down.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would like to ask what justification there was for their production if there was not an order for a return ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend (Mr. Borden) will not expect me to say at this moment what the justification for it was, because it is a matter of seven years ago, and I did not charge my memory with it and I do not know that my attention was called to it before.

My hon. friend (Mr. Borden) will expect me to give an answer upon the point he has brought to the attention of the House, that he was justified in bringing that letter of Mr. Blair's to the House, as he did. The point he endeavoured to make was that this memo. of Mr. Blair's should have been brought down as part of the correspondence which took place between Mr. Blair and myself at the time of Mr. Blair's resignation. Mr. Blair resigned as a member of the cabinet in June, 1903 ; the memo. to which my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) referred and from which he quoted, is a memo. which was written and given to the government in December, 1902, or about that time. It had nothing to do with the project of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company because at that time the project of the Grand Trunk Pacific had not been discussed. To make that perfectly clear let me say that Mr. Blair when he resigned was himself the master in the choice as to what portion of the correspondence he wished to have brought down to the House. The paper from which the hon. gentleman quoted was one of the general subject of railways and had no reference to the concrete question on which Mr. Blair's resignation took place. When the concrete question came up, Mr. Blair did not agree with his colleagues and his severance from them was so far that he thought it due to himself to resign. If Mr. Blair had thought it due to himself to bring down a paper which he had given to his colleagues a few months before, it was open to him to ask of His Excellency the Governor General the privilege of bringing down the correspondence in the House. Mr. Blair stated that before bringing down the correspondence which he did he had asked permission from the Governor General to publish it, but Mr. Blair did not think it advisable to ask the permission of the Governor General to publish that paper, and therefore it is evident that he did not believe it was part of the difference that existed between him and his colleagues. That is surely the best reason why the paper was not brought down. The government did not bring down any papers on that occasion, but Mr. Blair saw fit, for his own justification, to ask leave of His Excellency to bring down certain papers, and of course under such circumstances, when a minister asks the privilege of bringing down correspondence which up to that moment had been private, that permission is never denied, and therefore when my hon. friend says we should have brought down that paper, I have to state that the man who of all men was interested in that question, Mr. Blair, who my hon. friend said was the guardian of his own honour—and in that I agree, for every man is the guardian of his own honour—did not think it advisable to bring down the correspondence to the House and if he did not choose to do it, nobody else had the right to do so.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would like to ask if there is not something further to be considered besides Mr. Blair and the remaining members of the government. Are not parliament and the country interested in knowing the exact causes and all the causes of Mr. Blair's resignation ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The exact causes were brought down to the House and no one was a better judge of the exact causes than Mr. Blair himself. No man had a greater interest to make his record and position as favourable in the eyes of the country than Mr. Blair himself, and if Mr. Blair thought that this correspondence was not germane to the causes of his resignation, I say that so far as this paper is concerned the matter is concluded. My hon. friend said a moment ago that in Mr. Blair's paper there would have been something to justify him. I do not see how my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) intends to justify himself by anything in the statement addressed by Mr. Blair to the electorate of St. John, his constituents, before he signed his mandate. This letter was addressed to Mr. McAvity, chairman of the Liberal Association, St. John, N.B. I am now quoting what Mr. Blair says in that letter in order to show that my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) cannot take refuge in the opinion expressed by Mr. Blair in regard to the acquisition of the Canada Atlantic Railway because Mr. Blair stated in that letter in so many words that he did not agree with the project of my hon. friend (Mr. Borden). Mr. Blair first of all gave the reason why he severed his connection with the government. He proceeded :

I was also of opinion that my duty as a retiring minister did not demand that I should take part, in any controversial discussion which should ensue between the government and the opposition, during the passage of the details of the Bill through its committee stage.

Upon this view I acted, and in the light of all that has occurred of the amendments proposed to the Bill and the discussion which took place after the second reading had been carried by a large majority, I cannot see that I would have strengthened my attitude in opposition to the project, had I participated in subsequent debates.

The opposition itself very much complicated the situation by proposing an alternative scheme to that of the ministry. This alternative proposal involved a distinct admission that the necessity for a new railway from the Atlantic to the Pacific was one of immediate and pressing urgency. To this view I could not subscribe. I had contended strongly that the few months' consideration given by the government to its measure during the pressure of parliamentary session was quite insufficient to justify the country in embarking upon so great an undertaking. How then could I endorse the alternative which the opposition had adopted after two or three weeks consideration only, and to which it was prepared to commit the country ?

Sir, this language of Mr. Blair shows conclusively that my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) can take no comfort from the memo. which Mr. Blair had prepared for the consideration of his colleagues alone. Of course it goes without saying that in a cabinet or in any assembly of men with common interests, some matters are discussed, and must be discussed confidentially. It cannot be otherwise and these confidential memos. must be the property of those to whom they are addressed until they are released in some way by those who are parties to them. This course was not adopted, and I must repeat that I do not think my hon. friend, in acting as he did, consulted the best rules of parliamentary government. Judging from the manner in which my hon friend (Mr. Borden) generally conducts the business of this House, I am led to think that if he had followed his own instincts in this matter, he would have abstained from bringing to public light a document which was not his own property, and which therefore he had not the right to lay his hands on.

Mr. HAGGART. The rule observed in England is, that the contents of a document are the proof whether or not it is private and confidential. If a document is of such a nature that in the public interest it should be made public, then the fact of it being marked 'confidential' or being read in the Privy Council, does not entitle it to immunity from getting into the hands of another gentleman and being made public by him.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. HAGGART. Yes ; that is the rule observed in England. Ministers of the Crown have done it in England, and they have specially drawn attention of parliament to the fact, that the mark 'private and confidential' on a matter which affects the interests of the public, does not entitle it to secrecy, but that they themselves are the judges as to whether it shall be made public. The Minister of Finance in this case has stated that this document was stolen, and that my hon friend the leader of the opposition is in the position of a receiver of stolen goods and equally guilty with the thief. Did any one ever hear such a monstrous and nonsensical accusation as that ? Is there a lawyer or a man of common sense in the House, who does not realize the absurdity of it. Are there not a hundred ways in which he might have got that document ; might he not have got it from the ex-Minister of Railways himself.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. HAGGART. Before you can accuse a person of being the receiver of stolen goods, you must first prove that the goods have been stolen. Nobody has charged that the document was stolen, except the Finance Minister. There are a hundred ways in which the leader of the opposition might have got it, and when he has it in his possession, he is the judge of his own honour, and he is the person to say whether the seal of 'confidential' should be removed or not. This is a document that it was in the public interests to publish ; it is a document that should be published. But the First Minister says that the 'tu quoque' argument should not be applied. These gentlemen opposite are very fond of giving advice and lectures on the rules of propriety. It is so nice to think that such great authorities on honour are kind enough to draw attention to subjects of this kind. But let us look at some of their own little lapses. What do they think of the confidential documents that were published by the Postmaster General in his report ? The excuse of the First Minister is, that the House ordered these documents to be brought down, and that the Postmaster General had no option. Although this publication by the Postmaster General was undignified and dishonourable and in the worst possible taste, it was justified by the right hon. gentleman.

Now, as a matter of fact, these papers were published without a motion of the House to bring them down. Let us see what the Postmaster General himself says about it ? Here it is published in his report :

In explanation of the supplementary report, it may be proper to state the circumstances which call for it.

That is all off his own bat.

Shortly after entering upon my duties as Postmaster General information reached me from persons who had tendered for mail services, but who had not been awarded the contracts, to the effect that their lower tenders had been passed over, and the contracts awarded at higher prices, and I accordingly called upon the officers of the department to produce and enter in a register all tenders so passed over. This was accordingly done, when it appeared that tenders for 330 services had not been considered when the contracts were awarded, and in upwards of 100 instances the department, at the time of awarding the contracts, had received tenders to perform the services at lower rates than those at which the contracts had been awarded.

The Postmaster General goes on in that style, and he winds up for the information of parliament:

I beg to submit the foregoing statements and certain correspondence in connection with various contracts referred to, as a supplement to the Departmental Report for the fiscal year 1895-96.

These are the reasons which induced the Postmaster General to bring down letters marked 'private'; bearing the impress of privacy upon them, and addressed to myself and to Sir Adolphe Caron. I did not know that I had left one of them in the department. My instructions were that every private document and letter was to be taken off the file, and a memo. placed there instead. Here we have it announced that Mr. Ingram says that he recommends a postmaster for a certain place, and adds that he is a good friend of ours, and a strong supporter of his. Letters in that direction writen by Col. Tisdale and others were published, and they even went to the private file of the Deputy Minister, and his private copy book must have been ransacked for the purpose of publishing private letters which were addressed to the minister by different members of parliament. Not only that, but in the debate that took place, the right hon. gentleman who talks to the leader of the opposition about propriety, justified the course of his Postmaster General. And the Finance Minister, who has been reading a lecture to the leader of the opposition; we all know what he did. A confidential memo. prepared for my colleagues containing an estimate, based on all the applications, no matter from whom, that had been made for subsidies for different railways and sent by me to council, was used openly in the House, and the statement was added, that I had submitted to my colleagues a certain estimate for financial requirements which was greatly in excess of that brought down by the Finance Minister himself. Not only did they make use of a private memo. which was prepared for council, but they justified it and falsified it too. I hope we will hear the last of this from such gentlemen. The correct principle is, that if a person is in possession of a document which appertains to the public interest, he can make it public without committing any impropriety, and the person in possession is the best judge of whether he ought to do it or not. The principle is well known, and it has been done a hundred times in England by ministers of the Crown. The responsibility is with the person who reads the document, without him being open to the accusation of his being a thief or a receiver of stolen goods.

Mr. INGRAM. Mr. Chairman, I would not have risen to say anything more on this question were it not that I think I have fair ground for complaining of the want of courtesy on the part of the right hon. leader of the government, who I must say is usually very courteous to gentlemen on this side of the House. The right hon. gentleman has based his argument on false premises when he states that the reason of this correspondence being brought before this House is that a resolution was passed by the House ordering these documents to be brought down. Now, I have been a good many years in this House, and I challenge the right hon. gentleman or any hon. gentleman opposite to point to one document published by the Conservative government of which I was supporter during all these years, or by his own government, containing private correspondence. The right hon. gentleman's statement only goes to show his idea of a high moral standard. He uses an argument without knowing whether the premises on which he bases it are correct or not. That would be bad enough in a follower of the right hon. gentleman; but he must be hard pressed for arguments to carry this legislation through this House when he has to use arguments based on false premises. Is that the state of affairs? It would certainly appear so. Now, while I do not profess to be governed by that high moral standard which the right hon. gentleman professes——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. INGRAM—Nevertheless I practice what I preach. I do not pretend to be a saint. I have no wings. Some hon. gentlemen opposite have wings, or try to lead the people to believe they have. Whatever my faults may be—and God knows they are not any better than they ought to be—I am willing to admit that, if it is any satisfaction to hon. gentlemen opposite—my idea of private conversation or of private and confidential correspondence is that it ought to be regarded as strictly sacred, and not for public use in any shape or form. So far as my name is associated with the correspondence in the document which has been laid before this House, I do not care personally if all Canada knows what it contains. I am not ashamed of the contents of the letters in that document. What I object to is the principle of submitting private correspondence to this House. The right hon. gentleman tries to justify his course by saying that this is the custom of the Post Office Department—to go over the file, and when they come across a private and confidential letter, to submit it to the House. I deny that statement. That has never been done during the time I have been a member of this House, unless it may have been under an order of the House that some member of the opposition obtained. If hon. gentlemen opposite could take advantage of hon. gentlemen on this side they were not very particular, so long as they could serve the party interests. But I deny that any private letter written by a Conservative member to the Conservative government was ever brought down to this House during the time of that government. They reserved to themselves the right to say whether they would produce such a document or not. Now, I wish to call attention to the debate which occurred the other day, when the Finance Minister got livid and white in the face with rage on account of the hon. leader of the opposition submitting this memorandum to the House. But that I expected that the ex-Minister of Railways was going to speak on that occasion, I would have referred to the very incident to which the ex-Minister of Railways has referred to-day. I was going to point out that the Finance Minister himself was guilty of a worse charge than the leader of the opposition. I have been long enough in this House to know that when hon. gentlemen opposite howl about purity and morality, and all that sort of thing, that is the time to keep an eye on them.

Mr. CLANCY. It is rather refreshing to hear hon. gentlemen opposite attempt to lecture this House on political ethics. I think the country and the House can well afford to take the right hon. gentleman on his own rule ground. He attempts to justify the publication of the correspondence by the Postmaster General on the ground that it was in the public interest. That was the sole ground, if there was any, but he added that there was an order of the House for that correspondence. I want to ask the right hon. gentleman and his friends behind him: If it is justifiable on public grounds to lay before the House these private letters relating to trivial matters and in a very indifferent sense, what is the position of this memorandum which was held back, and why was it not brought down? And if it was not brought down, and afterwards came into the hands of myself or any other member of this House, why should it not be used in the public interest? There is absolutely no escape from the position which the right hon. gentleman himself has taken. Hon. gentlemen who profess such virtue and talk about sacred documents, simply regard them as sacred so far as it serves their purpose to do so. The taxpayers of this country have a right to know everything that transpires affecting the public interest. But the right hon. gentleman sought to find refuge in a letter which Mr. Blair had sent to Mr. McAvity with relation to his resignation. The whole pith of that letter was that Mr. Blair was opposed to the immediate construction of another transcontinental railway. That did not imply in any sense that he was opposed to the details of the scheme brought down by the leader of the opposition. His letter simply shows that Mr. Blair was not prepared to support the undertaking of the construction of a transcontinental line on any grounds at that moment, but that did not in the slightest degree affect the details of the scheme now involved, and the question as to which of the two schemes is the better is a live one.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I must explain to the House that I have looked at the blue book which was quoted by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, from which it appears that certain private letters were brought down. I said that this was done in answer to a motion of this House, but in saying this, I was in error. The letters were brought down, not at the instance of this House, but by my hon. friend the Postmaster General, on his own motion.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Not on a motion made in this House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have just said it was not. But coming to the point which has given rise to this debate, the contention of my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, that he was justified in bringing to the attention of the House a confidential document written by a Minister of the Crown to his colleagues, let me quote from a standard authority, namely, parliamentary government in England, by Todd, Vol. 2nd, page 240. Mr. Todd uses this language:

> The deliberations of the cabinet upon all matters which engage their attention are strictly private and confidential; being kept secret even from the other members of the administration, who have no seat in the cabinet, and who therefore are not directly responsible for the conduct of the government. Upon their first introduction into the Privy Council, ministers are invariably sworn to secrecy. Hence they are not at liberty, thenceforth, to divulge conversations of proceedings in Council—or to reveal to others any confidential communications they may have had, either with the sovereign or with a colleague in office—without express permission from the Crown. This applies equally to those who have ceased to form part of an administration, as to members of an existing government.

Nothing could be clearer than this. The writer lays down the rule that no communication of that kind can be given away except with the previous sanction of the sovereign, and in a note on this very subject, Todd goes on further to say:

> See observations in parliament upon a letter from the lord-lieutenant of Ireland (Marquess of Anglesey) to the prime minister (Earl Grey) pointing out, for information of the cabinet, views entertained by his lordship in regard to Ireland ; which letter was read in the House of Commons by Mr. Hume and other members. The unauthorized publication of this letter was stigmatized as 'a most foul and scandalous breach of confidence.'

There can be no doubt that whatever passes between members of an administration in the conduct of the affiairs of government, is privileged and sacred, covered even by the oath of secrecy, which oath cannot be removed except with the sanction of the representative of the sovereign himself.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What difficulty would there have been in getting permission of the Crown to bring down this memorandum and make it a part of this correspondence ? The same permission of the Crown would have been granted with regard to this which was already granted with regard to the correspondence produced by Mr. Blair. But my right hon. friend, who is to-day so punctilious, has not given us any justification for the printing of the private correspondence of the Postmaster General of the late Conservative administration, which was ordered by his successor in the present government. Let us have my right hon. friend's views with regard to that, since we are going into the question of ethics. The reason my right hon. friend first gave why this correspondence was brought down was that the House had ordered it. I do not think that that would have justified the publishing of that correspondence in the eyes of my right hon. friend, if it had consisted of letters from his own followers, but it evidently was complete justification in his eyes when the correspondence was from hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. But the right hon. gentleman finds now that the correspondence was brought down by his honourable colleague the Postmaster General of his own motion—private and confidential correspondence. The only ground, therefore, which he offered to the House in extenuation of the conduct of his own colleague and himself, for he is equally responsible, is one which has now disappeared. If we are to have a discussion of the ethics of this matter, if we are to go into this question exhaustively so as to guide our conduct in the future, let us have some justification for this extraordinary conduct in 1897. Let my right hon. friend state his view of the action of the Postmaster General and his own on that occasion, when the Postmaster General brought down this secret and private correspondence.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to me that the right hon. the First Minister appears to imagine that there ought to be one code of honour for this side and another for the government side. But in the opinion of many the same code ought to apply to both sides. If the sending of correspondence marked 'private and confidential' out to the world is wrong in the one party, it must be equally wrong in the other. Much of the correspondence of the Postmaster General in the late government, which was laid on the table of this House, and thus published to the world, was marked private and confidential. That correspondence was discussed in this House more than once, yet the First Minister never rose in his place to condemn its publication, but when a certain document, which is regarded by the right hon. gentleman as confidential, is quoted from this side, no matter in what way it came into the possession of the hon. member who used it, he regards it as stolen goods, and the one who used it was stigmatized by the Minister of Finance as the receiver of stolen goods. That is what was said by the hon. Minister of Finance, but that hon. gentleman, I assume, does not care to have it revived now and applied to his own government and colleagues. I would ask him if he has any recollection of a transaction which took place some years ago, when the private correspondence of the late hon. Mr. Abbott was abstracted from his desk and used in this House by one of the First Minister's own friends, the late Mr. Huntington. The right hon. gentleman had no condemnation to express then. By what code of honour was he and his friends actuated at that time when he did not get up and condemn the making public of correspondence which was stolen from another man's private desk ? He had nothing to say in condemnation of that act at that time, but when he finds his chickens coming home to roost, he feels a little sore and his conscience is very tender on the question of ethics.

Now, a word as to the Postmaster General. I went into his office the other day to get certain information. My request was to be informed what the inspector had recommended with regard to an application that had been made for a change of mail service to a certain office. I was told by the party in charge of the report that he could not give it, that his instructions were that it was a confidential report. It was not marked private so far as I know. Besides, it related to a matter of the public service, and certainly should have been available to a representative of the people. The Postmaster General knows nothing of private and confidential correspondence in his department when he desires to give documents to the public in order to make political capital. These hon. gentlemen apply one code of honour to their own side and another to this side. I think we should have a better understanding as to what is to be considered private and confidential and what is not. Is it to be said that a representative of the people who goes into a department and inquires what recommendation is made with regard to the service of a certain post office cannot get that information—and yet the Postmaster General can come down afterwards and give it to the world when it suits his purpose for political ends ? There seems to be a very crude idea in the minds of some hon. gentlemen on the other side as to what should be considered private and confidential and what should be made public. If it suits their purpose that a thing should be private, they declare it private. But another document of exactly the same character, and under similar circumstances, they will make public, if by so doing they help their party. The same code of honour should apply to both sides, and it should be observed by both alike.

At six o'clock, Committee took recess.

After Recess.

Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GEO. W. FOWLER. Before this resolution is carried, I would like to say a word or two as to the matter that was under discussion when the Committee took recess. A statement was made the other day by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), in which he charged the leader of the opposition with being almost, if not quite, in the position of a receiver of stolen goods, in connection with this memorandum which was submitted by Mr. Blair, while he was a member of the administration, to his colleagues. It seems to me a cardinal principle that before one can receive stolen goods those goods must be stolen. And before the minister made that statement he should have satisfied himself that there had been some stealing of goods. Now, it is to be presumed that Mr. Blair, in having this memorandum printed, would only have a sufficient number printed for circulation among the members of the cabinet. I am not in a position at this moment to say how many members there are in this cabinet—I fancy seventeen or eighteen.

An hon. MEMBER. Thirteen.

Mr. FOWLER. It is suggested that there are thirteen. A very unlucky number. I think it would be well for the Prime Minister to line up the members of his cabinet and ascertain which of them has lost his copy of this document. I hope the right hon. gentleman will take this hint into his careful consideration. As soon as this memorandum was printed, as a matter of law, it was published ; and it is a public document which should have been submitted to the House along with the other papers in the case. That being the case, the Minister of Finance should withdraw the remarks he made until he can show to this committee that some member of the cabinet has had his copy of the memorandum stolen from him. Now, the First Minister stated that the Hon. Mr. Blair was not in accord with the position taken by the leader of the opposition on this transportation question. In order to prove that statement, he read from a letter which Hon. Mr. Blair had addressed to his constituents on resigning his seat. But, in taking that letter into consideration, we should remember that Hon. Mr. Blair wrote it after he had received from this government a position worth $10,000 a year. It is a good deal like the patent medicine advertisements with their examples 'before taking' and 'after taking.' The memorandum was written before he got this ten thousand-dollar job, and the other after he had been appointed.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. His photograph——

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; his photograph should be published showing him as he was when writing the one and as he was when writing the other. But even in that letter to his constituents he does not condemn his former position. He could not do it without stultifying himself. And that is why the government is so touchy and so sore about the publication of this statement that was made by this expert, whom they have lauded to the skies for his knowledge of railway matters, justifying the position that the leader of the opposition has taken in regard to the transportation question. In that letter Hon. Mr. Blair does not say that he has altered his former opinion on the question. So I think the Prime Minister would do well to inquire, as I have suggested, and learn which of his colleagues has lost his copy of the memorandum.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I desire to say to my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that I am most anxious to be instructed by him in this matter. He is an older man in public life than I am.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am saying this in perfect sincerity across the floor. I am perfectly willing to have the matter debated, and am perfectly willing to have the opinion of my right hon. friend with regard to it. If there is anything improper about the course which has been taken by myself I am perfectly ready and willing to consider it, but up to the present time I have not found anything in the argument of my right hon. friend to convince me that my course was wrong. I hope that if, either in public or private life, I commit any impropriety I shall not be too small a man to acknowledge it and try to do better for the future. But I have looked at the reference which was handed to the Minister of Justice a little while ago—and it was read by my right hon. friend—out of Todd's Parliamentary Practice, and I find on looking at the references upon which that citation is founded that the wrong thing, the principal part of the iniquity charged, was the reading of a confidential letter. It is true that the other point is mentioned. The point is made that these matters were to be submitted to the council.

I do not want to minimize that, but the fact that it was a confidential letter is mentioned as a reason why it was a great impropriety to publish it. Now I referred to at least thirty confidential letters, some of them written by one member of the cabinet to another. I think Dr. Montague was a member of the cabinet at the time he wrote to Sir Adolphe Caron, and I think one of the letters from Colonel Tisdale, was written to a member of the cabinet. Several of them were addressed to members of the cabinet, and they were all marked 'private' and 'confidential.' And the extraordinary course was taken of publishing a letter from the Hon. Thomas White, then eight years in his grave, a private and confidential letter written by that gentleman respecting a matter not of a very public nature, but more a matter of party patronage. We had the extraordinary course of having that letter published. Well, it would almost seem to me that political animus ought to stop at the grave at least, and that when the Hon. Thomas White had been dead eight years before this letter was found on the files of the department, even if the letters had to be published, that letter might at least have been excepted, because there could be no object in publishing it except to cast discredit upon his memory, and in that way incidentally to injure the Conservative party. I think Mr. White was regarded by my right hon. friend as a fair and generous opponent in his lifetime, and even if he were not so, one would think that after he had been eight years in the grave his private letters might have been spared. I would like to ask my right hon. friend in all sincerity to tell me what his opinion now, upon reflection, really is with regard to the publication of these letters, because if I am to receive instructions from him in what is right in public life, I certainly am at least entitled to know what his views are as to these confidential communications. I think I have a right to say this to my hon. friend across the House, and I think he will recognize it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. When this matter arose this afternoon and when the publication of these documents was called to my attention, I spoke under the assumption then that these letters had been brought down upon a return moved for in the House. In that I was mistaken. They were brought down by my hon. friend the Postmaster General, who happens at this moment to be out of the House, and I would not presume to express any opinion on his action, or to offer any criticism in his absence. But I will put the question in another way to my hon. friend. My hon. friend criticised the action taken by the Postmaster General, and he is of opinion that these letters should not have been brought down at all because they were under the seal of secrecy. He finds fault especially with the fact that the letter of the Hon. Thomas White was brought down. I agree with everything my hon. friend said of Mr. White. Mr. White was an honourable man. I have nothing to say against his memory, far from it. I would say nothing but good of him, and I cherish his memory so far as my personal relations with him were concerned. But if my hon. friend finds fault with the Postmaster General for having brought down these letters which were marked 'private' and 'confidential' he cannot take that as a precedent for his own course. My hon. friend will admit with me that he is not justified in following a wrong example. But I understand him to say that the Postmaster General was wrong in that matter, that the Postmaster General not only exceeded his duty but committed a breach of propriety in bringing down those letters. If that be the opinion of my hon. friend, surely he cannot find a justification for his own course in the present matter. Moreover, I think my hon. friend will see the difference between a private letter and a communication to council, which is not only private, but is made under oath. I do not want to carry this discussion any further, but I think on reflection he will agree with me that whether the Postmaster General was right or wrong he cannot himself justify his own course.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am afraid I am not getting much assistance from my hon. friend with regard to the general doctrine of ethics. I appealed to him for his own views. I did not criticise the Postmaster General, not at all; I pointed out that here were some thirty confidential letters, one of them written by a man eight years in his grave, and that those letters were published with the sanction of my right hon. friend, and the publication was as much his act as that of the Postmaster General because he justified it afterwards. I wanted to get his views on the general question of the ethics of that act, because it seems to me it is pushing matters to the extreme when, for the purpose of making political capital, the government publish the private letter of a man who was recognized by my right hon. friend as a fair and generous opponent, and who had been eight years in his grave, the only object of which was to cast discredit on Mr. White's memory and indirectly upon the Conservative party. However, I will let that pass. We have talked a good deal about it, possibly we have gained some valuable information on both sides of the House. My right hon. friend has been speaking rather plainly sometimes during this session, I may call to his recollection that early in this session he referred to the Conservative party as an old battered, leaky hulk that stank in the nostrils of the country, even in the nostrils of the Conservatives themselves in his own province. Well, I would perhaps be inclined to think a remark of that kind was a little coarse, but as it comes out of the mouth of my right hon. friend I am bound to assume that it is refined and dignified. But be that as it may, I do think perhaps my hon. friend had better not set that example to hon. gentlemen in the House, because even as it is we are a little inclined sometimes to let our language, in moments of excitement, go beyond the limits of parliamentary decorum. I do not think it is a very good example to hon. gentlemen on either side of the House, because I am bound to say that it is a very easy thing to give way to remarks of this kind and to use language that will cause bitter feeling. We do not want any more bitter feeling in this House than we can help. We are ready to fight with each other, but it is not necessary to use insulting language for that purpose. My hon. friend made a remark last night that I did not think was in very good taste when he referred to my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Osler) in this way :

> The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) is one of the moneyed men and ownied men of whom Scott speaks in a famous passage.

Well, I was inclined to think that possibly a reference to the private affairs of any gentleman on either side of the House is a little gratuitous, and possibly might be regarded as a little offensive. I do not suppose my right hon. friend intends to invite discussion of that kind, I trust that he is not inviting discussion of that kind. If he is inviting discussion of that kind when he makes remarks of that nature with regard to the private affairs of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, why he cannot complain if the challenge is taken up, that is all. But I trust we will not have a repetition of an incident of that kind, because I do not think that the remark of my right hon. friend, with regard to my hon. friend from West Toronto, was justified by anything that has taken place in this House during this session or during past sessions. I think we will get on a great deal better in this House if we avoid discussions of that kind. But it will have to be understood that if references of that kind are made by the Prime Minister, the gentleman to whom we all look as an example of dignity and refinement in debate, if they are made on that side of the House, there cannot be any just cause of complaint if they are made on this side of the House as well. I wish to make these remarks in all good feeling to my right hon. friend. I trust he will not have occasion to indulge in language of that kind in future, and that we may be able during the balance of this session to conduct the debate in the fairly harmonious spirit which has characterized the proceedings of this parliament for the most part, I think, during the past three years.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It is certainly my intention, so far as my share of the business of the House is concerned, to carry it on with the dignity that is due to the House. I am not infallible, far from it. It may be that sometimes I make mistakes in that regard. If ever I make mistakes I do not ask my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) or any one else to spare me. I am prepared to receive whatever blows may be due me ; all I can say is that I shall endeavour to return them. If I invite blows, my hon. friend will not find me wailing if I have to take the punishment. But I must say that I do not think the reflections which my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) endeavoured to cast upon me on this occasion are at all justified. My hon. friend referred to my statement upon the Address, when I spoke of the Conservative party as an old hulk. My hon. friend knows that I should not be called upon to make any explanation of that remark, it was a purely metaphorical expression and did not apply to any one in particular. There was nothing in it to which any one could take the slightest objection.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Just the latter part of it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It was purely metaphorical and in that way some latitude may be allowed.

With regard to the reference which I made yesterday to the member for West Toronto I may say that I had no intention of saying anything offensive to him. I applied to him an expression employed by Sir Walter Scott in a famous letter which was published in newspapers some few months ago. Sir Walter Scott had been made a director of an assurance company, and he wrote that he had found himself in the company of moneyed men and ownied men. I applied that to the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Osler) and it was far from my mind to say anything offensive to him or to any one else. If the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) has the good fortune to be a wealthy man that is not a crime or a fault. If I had any feeling in the matter, it would be rather one of envy than of anything else. I may err in matters of this kind, as in many others, but if I err my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) will not find me wailing if I am taken to task for my errors.

Mr. BENNETT. When this matter was under discussion last year, I made some remarks on the main motion. I did not do so this year owing to the large number of gentlemen on this side of the House who desired to speak. This afternoon I waited hoping to see the hon. the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) in his place in order to get from him a little information which I desired. Perhaps, however, the First Minister and the other members of the cabinet who are present will be able, as they have given so much attention to this matter, to give me the information I desire.

Since the last session two by-elections have been held in Ontario. I had the pleasure of being in both of these ridings, and I can tell the government that no question was more discussed or listened to with greater interest than this Grand Trunk Pacific proposition, and the hon. gentlemen opposite must see from the verdict there, that the people are not in favour of the project now before the House. When the question was up last year and throughout the debate this session, a great hue and cry has been raised on the ground of sentiment, that this was to be a great national railway. The First Minister dwelt at great length on this last year and he and others have done so again this year, and yet when the whole contract is reviewed and sifted, I venture to say that neither the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fitzpatrick) who no doubt had had charge of the legal end of this Bill, the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) nor any other gentleman on that side of the House is able to show a single clause in that Bill that will compel the shipment of one bushel of grain by a Canadian port. If the Minister of Justice will point out a clause of that kind, I shall take my seat and permit him to do so. The Minister of Justice knows and every gentleman opposite knows that there is not a single letter, clause or tittle that will compel any shipper to ship by way of a Canadian port. It is a notorious fact that the Grand Trunk Railway have laid all their pipes for shipment by North Bay and Portland. Any gentleman conversant with what has been done by the Grand Trunk Railway proper, knows that at North Bay the Grand Trunk are making immense preparations for the trade they intend to divert from the Grand Trunk Pacific down the main line of the Grand Trunk Railway. Every bushel of grain that will be carried by the Grand Trunk Pacific during the winter is to go to North Bay, then to Orillia, and then on by the so-called Midland division through to Montreal, crossing over the bridge and so on to Portland for winter transportation. As to summer transportation, the Grand Trunk Railway Company have in the last two years laid and are to-day laying plans for the expenditure of thousands and tens of thousands of dollars on the so-called Midland division of the Grand Trunk Railway. That means simply that it is their intention as hon. gentlemen opposite have been forced to admit, to carry all their grain from the head of the lake to Midland and to other points on the Georgian Bay, and from there to carry it through to Portland, as they have been doing in the past few years. All the talk of taking this grain down to the maritime ports is absurd on its face. When this Bill came before the Railway Committee, Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson or Mr. Hays was asked: Do you intend to construct your road beyond Quebec? The answer came at once: No, because we have excellent arrangements with the Intercolonial Railway for an interchange of commerce at that point. It was the clear intention of the Grand Trunk Railway people, after they had been taken by the throat by the Quebec city people who possessed the trans-Canada charter, and by the Quebec bridge people, never to go beyond Quebec.

The present proposition of the Grand Trunk Railway is to carry all this grain by way of the Georgian Bay, Midland, Collingwood and other ports—chiefly Midland, because it is most favourably situated, being closer to Montreal and having other advantages—over the Midland division because that line of railway will be used primarily as a freight line. There is not a single clause in the agreement to compel the shipping of grain by a Canadian port and by the conjunction of the interests of the Grand Trunk Railway and the Grand Trunk Pacific, it will certainly go by way of Portland, as in the past.

I have here the report of the port of Buffalo for the past year and I find that the farmers of the Northwest and the grain shippers of the Northwest shipped from Fort William to Buffalo last year no less than 5,198,277 bushels of wheat and from Port Arthur 2,946,476 bushels. I am now going to ask some gentleman in the cabinet to explain how it was that there were shipped from Fort William 1,349,300 bushels of corn. I am sorry the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) is not in his place, as it is hardly fair to ask other members of the cabinet to answer this question. But my hon. friend from Selkirk (Mr. McCreary) is in his seat and he knows that there is no export of corn from Manitoba or the Northwest Territories. I am sure that he will assent to that.

It means that there were brought into western Canada from some point on the American side, nearly one and a half million bushels of corn which found an outlet by Fort William. I have been informed that large quantities of lumber are brought from the United States into British Columbia, and that they again go out at certain points to the American side. In view of the fact that the American people are actually shipping on Canadian railways in bond through Canada, and on to the lakes and Buffalo, is it not folly to say that the farmer of the Canadian west is going to burden himself with an extra charge, in order that this grain may be carried to St. John and Halifax, simply to please this government or because of a feeling of sentiment? The hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Wade) gave the whole case away when he said in effect: The people of the maritime provinces want the people of the rest of this Dominion to understand that if anything is going around we want our share. Any one who attended the Railway Committee meetings last year must have seen that it was a case of hold-up on the part of the Quebec members first, and afterwards on the part of the members from the maritime provinces, to drive the government into coercing the Grand Trunk Pacific into this scheme. This thing is going to cut both ways. The province of Ontario has to pay the bulk of the taxes on this proposition, and if the maritime provinces representatives tell us that Ontario and the rest of the Dominion are going to be coerced, then I suppose the people of Ontario will understand that members like the hon. member from Annapolis (Mr. Wade) come here, not to represent the Dominion as a whole, but to represent the selfish interests of their own province in the distribution of vast sums of money. I believe that this railway scheme of the government is not in the interests of the Dominion as a whole; I believe that in the great province of Ontario the public opinion on it was reflected in the Bruce and the Lambton elections, and I believe further, that it is not the intention of the government to keep faith with the people of the maritime provinces and extend the road further than North Bay. We see that from the circular issued to the shareholders of the Grand Trunk. The old Grand Trunk Company deemed it necessary to issue a circular to their directors stating that there was no intention on the part of the government to ever build this so-called premature section eastward to Moncton. That means that the government are using this scheme for a political emergency. They have had ample opportunity to get this statement contradicted by Mr. Hays, but they have never done so. It means that the government intend to go to the province of Quebec and say to the people: You had a charter for this Trans-Canada Railway, and you were in a position to ask for a government subsidy, but this Grand Trunk Pacific has brushed your scheme to one side, and it is a better line for your province; it means they can go to the people of the maritime provinces and say: The government intends to keep faith with you; there cannot be a doubt that the Grand Trunk Pacific will take the railway over after it is built. These gentlemen on the treasury benches have played on the credulity of the people for the past seven years, with, I am sorry to say, moderate success; they have humbugged the people for seven years and to-day they are not ashamed of their broken pledges and their broken promises. Why, I remember on one occasion when the Hon. Mr. Foster taunted them with a list of their broken pledges, the answer of the Prime Minister was: We are here and you are there, and what are you going to do about it? But the government to-day are afraid of the people of Canada, and they are afraid to let them express their opinion on this great question. The time will come, however, when the people will record their votes, and I trust that the government of Canada as a result will never undertake the construction of the road east of North Bay, because I believe it would be a fatal mistake and a grievous loss not only to the people of Canada, but to the Grand Trunk itself, if ever it is done.

Mr. McCREARY. Where did the hon. gentleman get the information that 1,300,000 bushels of corn were shipped from Duluth.

Mr. BENNETT. Not from Duluth, but from Fort William. I will send the report of the Buffalo Chamber of Commerce to the hon. gentleman, and it contains the information.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Where did the hon. gentleman find the report of the proceedings of the Grand Trunk Pacific shareholders, that this line is not to be built east to Moncton. I have the report here, and I cannot find the reference.

Mr. BENNETT. It says:

In the official memo. I read that the 500 miles——

Mr. FITZPATRICK. From whose speech are you quoting?

Mr. BENNETT. From Mr. Allen's letter.

In the official memorandum I read that the 500 miles, Quebec to North Bay, is probably premature.

It was evidently stated in this document that was handed to Mr. Allen, one of the directors of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, that no construction of the road would be continued to Quebec, at least for the present.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Allen was not at the meeting at all.

Mr. BENNETT. It was Mr. Allen's son, as I understand.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I have his words here; will my hon. friend read them?

Mr. BENNETT (reading):

In the official report I read that the 500 miles, Quebec to North Bay, is probably premature——

I am at a loss to understand what these last words mean, probably the reference is to Winnipeg.

The words 'probably premature' are italicised here.

—and that the 1,000 miles from North Bay to Quebec is not throughout the country.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. It is the gentleman who resigned, who is alleged to have made that statement.

Mr. BENNETT. Yes, but he is quoting the exact words that appear in a document that was issued by the directors to the shareholders, and as I understand it, Mr. Allen was one of the directors.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Let me see that document.

Mr. BENNETT. I will hand it over.

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) stated, that a monster expenditure was being made by the Grand Trunk Railway Company at North Bay. Is he certain of that fact? I was there on Sunday last and I saw a great lot of improvements being made, but I understood that they were being made by the Candian Pacific Railway. Whether my information is correct or not, it can easily be ascertained who is making the expenditure. I believe, however, that at present it is being made entirely by the Canadian Pacific Railway, as the place is used as a terminal point by the Grand Trunk.

Mr. BENNETT. I have not been to North Bay for about a year, but I have repeatedly heard from people who have been there that large improvements are being made, and I assumed that they were being made by the Grand Trunk Railway Company. But there is no doubt that they have been doing work there, which shows quite plainly that they intend to carry an immense quantity of grain over that line to Montreal and from Montreal to Portland, as they have done in the past.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That report, to which reference has just been made, has been criticised more or less on the other side of the House, and more than one hon. gentleman, from ministers of the Crown down, have cast discredit on its genuineness. One hon. gentleman went so far as to call it a fake report, and to allege that it was a mere pretense to say that a reporter had been at that meeting; and he practically charged gentlemen on this side of the House with having produced as a genuine report of that meeting a document which they knew was not a genuine report. Under these circumstances, I think I shall have to ask the ministers of the Crown who are present, or whomsoever is leading the House, to say whether or not they persist in that assertion, or whether they regard that as a fair and genuine report of the meeting. Because, if not, I must have a report from an unbiased source spread on the pages of 'Hansard,' in order that there may be no doubt about it.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. So far as I am concerned, I know nothing of the report in question. I have never challenged it or referred to it in any way. But the report of the meeting of shareholders does not bear out the statement that it was not the intention of the company to proceed further than North Bay. Mr. Allen is reported in this document to have said, in a rather hazy way, speaking of the disbursements:

> This may mean an additional heavy burden. Now, what is there to pay this? In an official memorandum I read that the 500 miles—Quebec to North Bay—'is probably premature' and that the 1,000 miles from North Bay to Quebec 'is not throughout the country.'

Hon. gentlemen may make what they like out of that; I cannot make much of it; but I do not find in it any justification for the statement made by my hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT. Perhaps I did not make myself plain. I understand that Mr. Allen, senior, was a director of the old Grand Trunk Railway Company, and that he had received a circular as a member of the board, and that in that circular, in order to allay the feeling of opposition that existed against this proposition, it was stated, among other things, that the question of construction from Quebec to North Bay is probably premature.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. My hon. friend will admit that that is a mere assumption on his part. It is not in the document. That is my point.

Mr. BENNETT. I can only say that it is marked as a question from the circular; and I infer that that was the case from certain remarks which dropped from hon. gentlemen in this House during the discussion.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I have myself an official report of the proceedings, which has been supplied to me, and I presume to other hon. gentlemen. It is described as follows:

> Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada—Report of the proceedings at the ordinary general meeting of the company, held at the City Terminus Hotel, Cannon Street, London, E.C., on Tuesday, 8th March, 1904.

This purports to be an official report of the proceedings of that day, containing all the motions and everything that occurred, and I can find in it no such statement as my hon. friend has referred to. But I would like to say that the question is not whether the Grand Trunk Railway Company or the Grand Trunk Pacific intend to proceed east of North Bay. The question is whether this government will build that connection from Winnipeg to Quebec and from Quebec to Moncton. It is whether, having entered into this undertaking, the government of Canada will carry it out. There is no desire to coerce Ontario. I can quite understand that my hon. friend wants this traffic to stop at North Bay and to come down in the channels in which it comes now and go to Portland. That is a clear, well-defined issue between our hon. friends opposite and ourselves—whether that trade is to go to Portland or to Quebec and the maritime provinces. That is the issue which our hon. friends opposite put forward. We accept that issue, and we want to go to the country upon it. We do not want to coerce Ontario. We believe that Ontario is entitled to have additional facilities. We believe that this road should be constructed for 1,000 miles through Ontario and for 500 miles through Quebec. We want Ontario to get the benefit of 1,000 miles of it, but we also want Quebec to get the benefit of 500 miles of it, and the maritime provinces the benefit of about 400 miles of it. That is what we want, and our hon. friends opposite do not want that. Let the issue be understood, and let us abide by the result, whatever it may be.

Mr. BENNETT. The argument of the Minister of Justice is this, that had the Grand Trunk Pacific a line constructed to North Bay, but no further eastward, all the trade would go to Portland.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Yes, that is my argument.

Mr. BENNETT. That being the case, the Grand Trunk Pacific Company are not compelled under this agreement, when they reach a point directly north of North Bay, from which point the agreement calls for the construction of a branch to North Bay, to send the grain to North Bay and then to Portland. There is nothing to compel them to bring it in that way.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Nothing, except the geographical conditions.

Mr. BENNETT. Then the geographical conditions are such that it would be a shorter route to bring that grain by that branch to North Bay and then to Portland.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. No.

Mr. BENNETT. I beg pardon. That has been threshed out.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. No; I have the official figures.

Mr. BENNETT. Assuming, for the sake of argument, that the distances are equal, what would be the result? The result would be that the Grand Trunk Company, with their hundreds of thousands of dollars invested in terminal facilities at Portland, are expected to brush them all aside and carry the traffic, not to North Bay, but eastward to some point in the maritime provinces. But after all was said and done, what a trifling amount is going to be carried by all-rail through the winter months. The right hon. the Prime Minister and other hon. gentlemen on that side have been forced to admit that in the spring of the year the grain held over from the preceding winter will be brought down by water, and in the fall of the year the rush of grain will also be brought down by water. How can my hon. friend the Minister of Justice ever hope, with his railway from Winnipeg to Quebec, much less to St. John or Halifax, to compete in carrying grain, when he remembers that during the past season of navigation there was carried from the head of the lakes through to Quebec grain at three cents a bushel? The most sanguine admirer of the Grand Trunk Pacific, in his maddest and most delirious moments, will not say that grain can ever be carried from Winnipeg to Halifax by rail for three cents a bushel.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. It is true that grain was carried last season to Quebec from Duluth for three and a half cents a bushel, but the result was that the company which carried that grain became practically insolvent last autumn and has gone out of business. That company was the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence Transportation Company. It has removed all its business to Montreal, and the reason it carried that grain to Quebec at that figure was because it carried that freight merely as a makeshift all the way down. What it really came down from Duluth for was to get pulp wood at Quebec, and carry it back to the mills at Niagara. That is the reason why it carried the grain at this low freight last year. I do not pretend to be an expert on freight traffic or transportation, but there are certain geographical conditions which everyone can take into account. When we compare an all-water route with a mixed rail and water route, there are questions which experts on traffic arrangements alone can decide. I cannot put myself up as an authority against my hon. friend, when he makes the very emphatic assertion that grain cannot be carried by an all-rail route as against a mixed rail and water route, but I can put against him the authority of Sir Sandford Fleming, who says that it can be done.

Mr. BENNETT. Do I understand my hon. friend to say that grain can be carried from Halifax to Winnipeg at a less rate than I have mentioned?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. My hon. friend must not endeavour to obscure the issue. The question is as to whether an all-rail route can compete against a mixed rail and water route, and Sir Sandford Fleming says that a mixed rail and water route is at a disadvantage as compared with an all-rail route. Let me endeavour to illustrate this to my hon. friend. Assuming that this line will be built from Winnipeg to Quebec, my hon. friend says that the grain will be brought down to North Bay and go from North Bay to Portland. Well, in my opinion there are geographical conditions against that. From North Bay to Quebec by the present Grand Trunk Railway route is 657 miles. From North Bay north to where connection will be made with the proposed Grand Trunk Pacific, the distance is 150 miles, which you must add to the 657 miles. But from that point of junction north of North Bay to Quebec, by the projected Grand Trunk Pacific, the distance is 500 miles, so that you will have an advantage by this proposed line of almost 300 miles of direct communication compared with the route by the way of North Bay over the Grand Trunk Railway to Quebec. I have this on the authority of gentlemen connected with the Grand Trunk Railway, and if my hon. friend wants to verify it, all he need do is look at the time table of the Grand Trunk Railway. If my figures are accurate, the advantage is with the projected line of the Grand Trunk Pacific, because it is the shortest. In so far as water-borne traffic is concerned, it is possible my hon. friend is right when he says that the line from Winnipeg to Port Arthur will carry a large amount of freight and from Port Arthur to Midland. If I would care to express a personal opinion, I would say that the line from Winnipeg to Port Arthur, from Port Arthur to Midland and from Midland to Montreal, is the route that would be commercially preferable in the season of navigation. But the other question remains. What is to become of the freight that has to be carried during the winter months ? If you have a short line from Winnipeg to Quebec, why not utilize it ? If a train will go by way of North Bay, what is the objection to giving the line from Quebec to Moncton a fair opportunity to compete with Portland ? That is all we ask. We have no desire to compete with the Ontario ports.

Mr. FOWLER. Is there any difference in the distance between Quebec and Halifax or Quebec and St. John or between Quebec and Portland ?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Very slight. I speak from memory, and I must say perhaps that my memory is not very good. But the line from Quebec to Portland is 311 miles.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. 317½.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. There are two lines which might be taken, and I think my hon. friend has in mind the line to Richmond.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Yes.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. And then around by Richmond down to Portland, but there is another route by the valley of the Chaudière and out by the Maine Central, which would shorten the distance some six miles. I think that the distance to St. John is a very little greater than that. It is provided by the contract that where the grain is not routed it must go by Canadian ports. My hon. friend said a moment ago that there is no provision which will force grain over this route. Of course there is not. No express provision could be made which would force a shipper to close a particular route, Why should we try to do it ? After all, we must bear in mind that every farthing added to the cost of transportation comes out of the pockets of the farmers of the Northwest. What we want to do is to create facilities such as will enable Canadian ports to compete on equal terms with American ports, and we have provided for that by creating geographical conditions which will operate in favour of Canadian ports. We have inserted, therefore, in this contract a clause to the effect that when grain is not routed, then the carrier will be obliged to bring it to Canadian ports. What more can we do ? If the shipper is silent, then it is the obligation of the carrier to carry the grain through to a Canadian port.

Mr. BENNETT. Does that ever happen ?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. That is the obligation of the carrier, and it will be the duty of this government, whether it be in the hands of Liberals or Conservatives, to see that that obligation is carried out.

Mr. COCHRANE. Does any man ever ship grain without directing where it is to go ?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Let me put the answer in this form. We are dealing with the farmers of the Northwest, and they must be our first consideration. Our first consideration must be to develop that country and create facilities for the carriage of the grain, and what we are attempting to do is to give such facilities to our Canadian ports that our farmers will be able to ship to them on equal terms as to the American ports. When we have done that, all that we can do is leave the choice to the patriotism of our Canadian farmer.

Mr. COCHRANE. The hon. minister has evaded the question. I sympathize with the farmers of the Northwest just as much as he does. He and his friends are very solicitous for the farmers when they want their votes, but once they have got their votes, they proceed to spend lavishly the money they take out of their pockets. I asked if grain is ever shipped without being routed. The farmers have nothing to do with the routing of the grain. I am a farmer myself, and I sell my grain to the grain buyer who ships it by what channel he sees fit. So, when he talks about a farmer shipping grain, he is talking through his hat, as the boys say.

An hon. MEMBER. No, you are wrong.

Mr. COCHRANE. Some think that nobody is right but themselves.

Mr. COWAN. That is yourself.

Mr. COCHRANE. They are so conceited that they lose control of their judgment. I suppose the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cowan) never raised a bushel of grain in his life. If it were not for the fact that he is reputed to have some knowledge of law, he would go hungry sometimes. It is absurd to say that farmers ship grain—they sell it to the dealers and the dealers ship it as they see fit. The Minister of Justice was making an argument based upon the theory that if grain was unrouted this company would be obliged to take it to a Canadian port, and I ask the hon. gentleman if that contingency arose—if grain was ever put aboard train without being routed ?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I did not ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cochrane) to rely upon my information. I do not pretend a monopoly of information on all subjects—that I must leave to others. I can only give the answer which is supplied by Mr. Hays, of the Grand Trunk, who, in this report, says that seventy-five per cent of the grain is routed and twenty-five per cent is unrouted.

Mr. COCHRANE. I will ask the hon. gentleman another question if he will allow me. I understand him to say he has an official report of that meeting. If so, cannot he lay it on the table, or tell us what that report says ?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I should be trespassing unusually upon the time of the House if I were to do what so many hon. gentlemen have done—read documents to the House for the benefit of 'Hansard.'

Mr. BENNETT. The Prime Minister last night made a great appeal on behalf of the Grand Trunk Pacific, that every city, town and village in Ontario would get the benefit of this communication, that so much freight would be brought down from the Northwest and Manitoba through Ontario. But how is it to be carried ? If it goes to Moncton, Halifax or St. John, then, the cars must go back empty to a point about two hundred miles north of North Bay, and from there taken down to Toronto and distributed to the different points in older Ontario. But, if they carry their freight through to Portland the empty cars will come back to Montreal, whence they can be scattered through Ontario. Does any man of common sense doubt that the Grand Trunk Pacific would prefer the Portland route as being the more convenient one for them ?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I do not intend to get into a controversy on the question of transportation. It would appear from the debate that there are experts here, more competent to speak on the subject than I am. But let me read from the 'Queen's Quarterly' for April, page 414 :

> By establishing on the northern route a modern first-class railway devoid of gradients and every other hindrances to cheap transportation, we would possess the means of carrying the products of the northern half of the prairie region to Canadian tidal ports at all seasons of the year at less rates than by any other route whatever.

Mr. BARKER. Who says that ?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Sir Sandford Fleming.

Mr. BENNETT. Of course we all have a great admiration for Sir Sandford Fleming's ability. But, as against what he says let me mention one fact in modern transportation. Now, I believe the railways south of Lake Erie are as perfect as money will make them. They have been constructed for quick carrying and also with a view to carrying cheaply. Yet, the reports of the Buffalo Board of Trade show that every year grain is brought by rail to Toledo, and there it is taken from the cars, placed in vessels and taken to Buffalo, where it is elevated, transferred to the cars and so taken to New York. Now, I do not know the exact mileage from Toledo to Buffalo, but I should think it would be not more than 200 miles—probably not more than 150 miles. If there are such advantages in handling grain by rail, how is it that the grain is handled twice in order to make this trip of 150 or 200 miles by water ? Last year no less than 5,000,000 bushels of grain were received at Buffalo from Toledo. The men in Toledo who owned the grain must have found it to their advantage to send it by this rail and water route.

Mr. McCARTHY. How much of that would be circulated for consumption in New York state ?

Mr. BENNETT. That is easily answered. If it were intended for consumption in New York state why would they not take it through in the cars from Toledo to its destination ? Apparently, however, this grain was for export.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I do not think that ends the controversy. Let me state another fact for the benefit of my hon. friend (Mr. Bennett). If this all-water route is so absolutely advantageous, how does it come to pass that last year, 15,000,000 bushels of Canadian grain—I have this on the authority of Sir Thomas Shaughnessy—were carried from Port Arthur and Fort William to Buffalo, there to be put on cars, though you have the magnificent stretches of the St. Lawrence to carry it to Montreal ?

Mr. BENNETT. I will answer that at once. It goes to prove that the Canadian Pacific Railway had that grain at Winnipeg to carry through to St. John, a Canadian port, by all-rail, if they wished to. But they could not possibly carry it at a rate that would pay.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. How about Montreal and the intervening distance ?

Mr. BENNETT. When the grain reaches the head of Lake Superior at Fort William or Port Arthur, there is the option given, the American carrier may go on and take it to Buffalo, or the Canadian carrier may come in and take it to some points on the Georgian Bay. That is the reason the Grand Trunk were not able to compete by the all-rail route, and they were obliged, I suppose regretfully, to hand it over to the American vessel carrier who took it on down to Buffalo.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What does the Minister of Justice understand by the northern route to which Sir Sandford Fleming refers ?

A railway built on the northern route would be the shortest line between the two oceans.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Along the Trans-Canadian route, which would be practically, so far as the country north of North Bay is concerned, the same as the Grand Trunk Pacific. The point in dispute was as between an all-rail route and a mixed rail and water route.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Not at all, my hon. friend is absolutely mistaken. I will read on and see what Sir Sandford Fleming says :

A railway built on the northern route——

That is to say, north of Lake Abitibi and Lake Winnipeg, as I understand it.

—would be the shortest line between the two oceans, besides being the most direct for the markets of the northern half of the prairie regions to the nearest Canadian shipping port.

Then he goes on further :

By establishing on the northern route a modern first-class railway, devoid of gradients and every other hindrance to cheap transportation, we would possess the means of carrying the products of the northern half of the prairie region to Canadian tidal ports at all seasons of the year, at less cost than by any other route whatever. The advantages of the lake route have been much extolled. Transportation by water certainly has advantages under certain circumstances, but it also has limitations due to climatic and geographical conditions. In all probability the country west of Winnipeg, and Winnipeg itself, will continue to enjoy during summer all the advantages which the lakes can yield, but there is a vast cultivable country farther north and west, from which it is believed freight may be carried to Quebec by railway on the northern route at less cost than by the lake route. Of course it will be understood that this is conditional upon the line to be constructed being free from such gradients as we find on ordinary Canadian railways, a condition which can only be definitively determined by adequate surveys.

Well, have we any of those surveys yet ? I think not. If we have, why are they not on the table of the House ? Why has the government not taken steps to make them ? He continues :

Should such a favourable line be established as is believed possible, I venture to state that owing to the reduced total mileage, and still more owing to the reduced gradients on the new line, grain may be carried to Quebec by the direct route at less cost than by the southern route, even if carried almost free of charge across the lakes from Fort William to Depot Harbour, Owen Sound or Sarnia. This of course only applies to the half year of open navigation; during the other half year the northern route would be without a rival worthy of the name.

Now that is altogether dependent upon your having a railway in the north which is absolutely free of gradients, and is Sir Sandford Fleming or any one else able to estimate within $20,000,000 what such a road would cost ? Can the Minister of Justice give us any estimate ? What then is the use of talking about something that they have not surveyed, something which is not in the government project at all ? That is not the project of the government, that is not the national transcontinental railway that we are discussing in this House ; that is, as the Minister of Justice truly says, the Trans-Canada route, a different line altogether, a different route altogether. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice says that there is an issue between the two parties as to whether freight shall go from Quebec to Halifax and St. John or whether it shall go to Portland. It is the issue, but it is he who is supporting Portland's claims and we on this side of the House who are supporting the claims of maritime ports. Does my hon. friend deny that ?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Yes. I refer you to the speech of the member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler), and to the cheers which greeted it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I will read from a speech of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice :

Our great competitor in the English market is the United States, and for six months in the year, yes, for seven months in the year, we are depending upon our chief competitor for an outlet to that market for our Canadian products.

That is the gentleman who is standing up so strongly for the maritime ports. He ignores them absolutely. Now all of a sudden he has a change of heart, I am glad to know that he is at present a great advocate of the maritime ports. He was no great advocate of them last year.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Yes I was.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I will go on and read the rest of it :

Is that wise or is it prudent ? How can you get out from Montreal in winter except by way of Portland or Boston or New York ?

Mr. BROCK. By way of Halifax.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Halifax competing with Portland ? It is double the distance practically.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. That has reference to existing conditions, that under existing conditions the company cannot carry freight from Montreal to Halifax in competition with Portland. That is what I said. It is not fair to misrepresent me.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Let me see if I am misrepresenting my hon. friend.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I am entitled to the page of the reference the hon. gentleman is reading. I want to see what my statement was.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am reading from the reference before me, I will send out to my room and get the page of the reference. I will show my hon. friend that it is literally correct. Does he know how far it is from Quebec to Halifax by these lines which he is advocating ? Does he know at this moment ?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Is St. John in the interval ?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am talking about Halifax, and that is what my hon. friend was talking about when he made this reference. He is a pronounced advocate of the maritime ports, does he know how far it is from Quebec to Halifax by the line which he proposes ? I do not think he does. But I will tell him. Take the lowest estimate that can be made, the estimate of the Minister of Finance last year. You find that the distance from Quebec to Moncton, according to the Minister of Finance, a very favourable estimate for the government, is 400 miles. How far is it from Moncton to Halifax by the Intercolonial? 186 miles. So then you have the distance by this transcontinental railway to Halifax, 586 miles, and you have the distance from Quebec to Portland according to the statement of my hon. friend to-night, 311 miles. So that my hon. friend cannot explain his statement that it was practically double the distance, because that is exactly what the figures turn out to be, according to the estimate of his colleagues. It is more than double the distance by the Intercolonial at present. Well, my hon. friend says the issue is whether we shall go to Portland or to Halifax. Does he not know that his colleague the Minister of Finance last year admitted, as the Minister of Justice himself admits, that the Grand Trunk can make more money by carrying that traffic to Portland than by carrying it to Halifax ? Has he any doubt that his own colleague admitted that last year ? Let me read what the Minister of Finance said :

Mr. FIELDING. No doubt they would make more money by carrying the traffic to Portland, but we do not intend to permit them to carry it there.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Where is the restriction to prevent them.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. By the fact that the Canadian rate is not greater than the American rate, and we will trust to the patriotism of the Canadian shipper that when the rate to a Canadian port is not greater than to an American port, he will ship by the Canadian port.

Now, that is the safeguard we are to have. We are to incur obligations to the extent of $150,000,000 to make these ports national ports of Canada, and then trust to the patriotism of the Canadian shipper to accomplish that which the government pretend is accomplished by this measure. Is there any escape from that, I ask the Minister of Justice ? When they get the freight to Quebec, the Grand Trunk Railway can carry it to Portland without infringing one line or stipulation in this contract.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I do not know it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. He ought to know it if he does not. The Grand Trunk Railway is not a party to this contract, and therefore is not bound by any stipulations in it, and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fitzpatrick) ought to know that. It was argued out here at great length last year. How is it possible that the Grand Trunk can be bound by any stipulation in the contract to which it is not asked to be a party ? I would like to ask the Minister of Justice that. How can he pretend that any action or proceeding can be taken against the Grand Trunk Railway upon a contract to which it is not a party ? It is not the Grand Trunk Pacific that will be carrying freight from Quebec to Portland, but the Grand Trunk Railway, and that company is not bound by any stipulation in this contract, although last year we urged over and over again, and moved resolutions in this House asking that the company should have imposed upon it all the stipulations imposed in this contract upon the Grand Trunk Pacific. These resolutions were not accepted by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fitzpatrick), who was leading the House on that side with regard to that particular aspect of the case. We argued the matter over and over again, and I have not previously heard any hon. gentleman on the opposite side take such a position as that which my hon. friend seems inclined to take to-night. It is impossible that the Grand Trunk Railway can be bound by a contract to which it is not a party. If my hon. friend desired to give to the maritime ports of Canada even the feeble protection which would be conferred by the stipulations of this contract, he should have made these stipulations binding, not upon the Grand Trunk Pacific only, but upon the Grand Trunk Railway as well. The reference which I gave is to be found at page 9014 of 'Hansard' of last year.

Mr. KEMP. I would like to ask the Minister of Justice if he seriously contends now that grain can be carried to Quebec by this route in the summer time as cheaply as it can be carried to the sea-board, either at Montreal or at Quebec, by all water route or water and rail route ?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. My hon. friend must not look to me for expert opinion on matters of transportation. As I said before, there are so many amateur experts on that question in the House that I do not think it necessary to add to the number. I will, however, make a few statments of facts. At the present time the Canadian Pacific Railway carry grain from Winnipeg to Port Arthur. They have a line from Port Arthur to Montreal, but I have it on the authority of the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway that last year, notwithstanding the fact that there is direct water communication between Port Arthur and Montreal, 15,000,000 bushels of grain were carried from Port Arthur to Buffalo and from Buffalo by rail to New York. That is a fact. If the water rate is so cheap, I would like to know why the grain did not go direct to Montreal. That is the first question I would submit. The second is the expert opinion of Sir Sandford Fleming, who says :

An all-rail route can compete on advantageous terms with a water and rail route.

Now, I do not give my opinion as against the expert opinion of the hon. gentleman from East Toronto (Mr. Kemp), but I put against it the expert opinion of Sir Sandford Fleming, and leave the people of Canada to judge between them. I do not put my opinion against his.

Mr. KEMP. I do not claim to be an expert, because I am not ; I do not ship any grain, I merely judge from such things as the Minister of Justice would form his opinion from. In respect to the shipments of grain by the Canadian Pacific Railway via Fort William and Port Arthur, I may say that all of this was carefully gone into last year. There were about 15,000,000 bushels shipped from that point, but I think if the Minister of Justice looks more carefully he will find that part of that grain went to Ontario points for milling purposes and part to St. John.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Not one bushel of that went by Canadian ports.

Mr. KEMP. I have very full information on that subject, and I have no information at all with reference to any grain shipped from Port Arthur to Buffalo. I think the Minister of Justice will find he is mistaken, as this was discussed last year.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. It could not be discussed last year, as these were last year's shipments.

Mr. KEMP. The grain that went to Port Arthur in the winter went partly to St. John and partly to Ontario points for milling purposes.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Sir Sandford Fleming says :

Does not a large bulk of Manitoba grain now find its way through the United States to be shipped from United States seaports ?

That is clear, is it not ?

Mr. KEMP. That is clear enough.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. He continues :

According to reliable authority, six, eight and ten million bushels a year have been so shipped ; Sir Thomas Shaughnessy stated to the Canadian Club a few weeks ago that last year it reached nearly 15 million bushels and it may be expected that this transfer from Canadian to United States channels will go on increasing with the increase in the total yield.

There is no question about that, it is in the summer time.

Mr. KEMP. The question I asked the Minister of Justice was if, in his opinion, it was possible for this railway to compete during the summer time, taking grain to Quebec in competition with the water route, or the water and rail route, to Quebec.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I gave an answer to that also on the authority of Sir Sandford Fleming.

Mr. KEMP. I cannot see that Sir Sandford Fleming states anything of the kind.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. My hon. friend had better read it again.

Mr. KEMP. I hardly think that conclusion can be drawn from what Sir Sandford Fleming states. The Minister of Justice says that in summer grain has been carried from Port Arthur to Quebec at 3½ cents a bushel, but that it was a losing game and the people are now bankrupt. Grain has been carried to Georgian Bay ports all this season for one cent a bushel from Port Arthur, and it has been carried from Port Arthur to Buffalo for from 1¼ to 1½ cents. We are building improvements at Port Colborne, and grain can be carried there as cheaply as to Buffalo. If you can carry grain to Port Colborne for 1½ cents a bushel and pay dividends on the capital invested in the ships, you can carry it to Quebec for 3½ cents a bushel and make a profit. What I said last year was that I hoped that Quebec would be a port for the transhipment of grain, that I believed it was by an all-rail route, or a water and rail route, that this would be done, but I said that in the summer time it was impossible for Quebec to compete by all-rail route, because grain in the summer is not carried by all-rail on this continent. I thought this question had been settled, and would not be up for discussion this year. When the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) spoke on this question, he admitted to the House that it was impracticable, and that we should not expect to take grain in summer by all-rail route to the sea-board. Here is what he said :

What I say is, that when the wheat gets to Port Arthur and Fort William it does not make any difference what the Grand Trunk Railway will or will not do. In summer time the wheat will go out by water to Montreal or Quebec or by the Erie canal to New York, so that the question of what the contract with the Grand Trunk is, in respect of summer traffic in wheat is absolutely immaterial ; it has nothing to do with what will happen to the traffic. We expect that owing to the improvements that have been made to the waterways of this country, Montreal and Quebec will be able to compete successfully with the route to the south. It is now competing successfully. Wheat was hauled last season from Duluth to Quebec for 3½ cents a bushel and certainly a railway will not compete with this ; that may be taken as evident. But during the winter months, during the four and a half or five months when rolling stock would otherwise be idle and when ships are coming to our ports and demanding cargoes, then the railways will and do haul wheat all-rail.

I am just as anxious as the Minister of Justice to see Quebec become a port for the shipment of the products of the west, but I say that in the summer time, that cannot be accomplished by this proposed government railway scheme. I know it is the hope of the people of Quebec, but I regret that it cannot be so in the natural course of events. Another argument used by the Minister of Justice was that according to geographical conditions, the trade would go to Quebec even if there were no stipulation in the contract. Let me point out to him that Portland is 317½ miles from Quebec, and that Halifax,—even according to the figures given by the most sanguine on that side of the House—is 286½ miles further from Quebec than is Portland from Quebec ; St. John will be 150 or 175 miles further from Quebec than is Portland, and therefore what we contend is, that as there is no penalty in the agreement to compel the Grand Trunk Pacific to take that grain to a Canadian port—even though the cost of taking it to a Canadian port be no greater than to an American port—the Grand Trunk will of course take the grain to Portland where they have their facilities, and where they can ship it at so much better advantage to themselves.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I do not intend to inflict any further remarks upon the House, but I may say to the gentlemen who are interested in having some knowledge of the views I expressed on this question last year, that if they will consult vol. 4 of 'Hansard' pp. 9013 and 9014, they will see that there is slight justification indeed for the opinions expressed by the leader of the opposition as to myself.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Does the hon. gentleman say that I did not quote him literally ?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The hon. gentleman extracted one or two sentences without the context, and of course they might bear the construction he put upon them, but last year, speaking of the scheme that was then put forward by the opposition as to carriage by way of North Bay and then by the Intercolonial Railway, I said :

It is a good scheme for the summer, but where is your winter port ? It brings the trade to Montreal and the winter port for Montreal is Boston, or Portland, or New York. These are the winter ports for Montreal from the month of November to the month of April, both months inclusive. We take issue with hon. gentlemen opposite who say : Benefit Ontario, benefit the particular section we are interested in, and then let the trade drift southward if it may. We take issue with these hon. gentlemen, and we say : benefit Ontario, give equal advantages to Quebec, and let the maritime provinces not be forgotten.

That is what I said last year, and that is what I say now.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Are we not forgetting the maritime provinces a little ?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The issue now is, what I said last year.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Let me see the book.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Oh, yes, you can find it all there.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The Minister of Justice seems a little excited.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Not at all. When the hon. gentleman tells us that we ought to know this, and we ought to know that, and we ought to know the other thing ; it is time for some of us to think that we know a little of something—not very much, but a little.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The Minister of Justice said that the terms of this contract were binding on the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I never said anything of the sort ; except in so far as the guarantee is concerned.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Then I misunderstood my hon. friend, and we will see to-morrow whether or not I was justified, in misunderstanding him. I accept his statement that he did not say it. I distinctly understood him to dissent from my statement, that this contract was not binding on the Grand Trunk Railway Company, so far as those stipulations in it are concerned. I am glad that the Minister of Justice now admits that they are not binding; and his admission amounts to this : that the Grand Trunk Railway Company is at perfect liberty, to take every pound of freight that comes to Quebec, and to carry it to Portland, instead of to St. John or Halifax.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I don't admit anything of the sort.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. My hon. friend does not admit that ?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. No, I do not.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. It is very hard to know what he does admit. Does the Minister of Justice say, that there is any stipulation in this contract binding upon the Grand Trunk Railway, which would prevent it from taking that freight to Quebec, and carrying it to Portland.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. No, but there is on the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Oh, yes, there is on the Grand Trunk Pacific, and I had always supposed that it was the Grand Trunk Railway Company that ran from Quebec to Portland.

Mr. FITZPATRICK My hon. friend is supposing things that are not in the contract.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Am I ?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Yes, you are.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Oh, indeed ; the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company then, is to run from Quebec to Portland ; that is my hon. friend's position ?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. That's nonsense.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I do not know what he means ; I am trying to understand my hon. friend ; I suppose it must be my fault.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I am sure it is.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The Minister of Justice is good enough to compliment himself ; no one else is doing so at present. I repeat, that there is not one line or one stipulation in that contract which prevents the Grand Trunk Railway Company from taking that freight at Quebec, and carrying it to Portland. And if the Minister of Justice can point to one line or stipulation in that contract which does prevent that, I will pause and give him an opportunity to do so. He knows he cannot do it ; he knows that the Grand Trunk Railway Company is not a party to that contract, and that it is at perfect liberty to take every pound of that freight, and carry it to Portland, and he himself has stated in the passage to which I refer—I will read it again.

How can you get out from Montreal in winter except by way of Portland or Boston or New York ?

Mr. BROCK. By way of Halifax.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Halifax competing with Portland ? It is double the distance practically.

Mr. BROCK. What is the use of talikng ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. What is the use of talking ? Can we shut our eyes to geography ? Can we shut our eyes to facts ? How much of the trade of Montreal has gone to Halifax ? How much grain has gone from Montreal to Halifax or to St. John ? How much of our food products have gone that way ? Invariably they have gone to Portland or to Boston or to New York. As Portland is to the Grand Trunk Railway so Boston is going to be to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

In that passage the Minister of Justice seems to entirely ignore the maritime ports. I have been trying to urge upon this government that if there is any value in these stipulations which were paraded before the country as the acme of statemanship, upon which the right hon. gentleman relied and as to which he has not been able to give any better explanation than has been given by the Minister of Justice to-night ;—I have endeavoured to point out over and over again that if these stipulations are to be of any service at all, we must make them binding on the Grand Trunk Railway Company. The government, for some reason known to itself, absolutely refuses to do that ; it prefers for some reason which no one can comprehend, that the Grand Trunk Railway Company shall be at perfect liberty to carry this freight to Portland instead of to Canadian maritime ports. And these hon. gentlemen opposite from my own province, and from New Brunswick, who are so solicitous with regard to the interests of our maritime ports, stand up and vote against any amendment which we offer for the purpose of inserting these stipulations in the contract. And then, they have the inconsistency to stand up in the House and pretend before the country, that the opposition is not prepared to do justice to the ports in the maritime provinces. There is only one effective way of controlling the sending of the western products through to our Canadian maritime ports, and that is to extend the Intercolonial Railway to Georgian Bay, where it can get a share of that traffic. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice knows that as well as I do; my right hon. friend the Prime Minister knows that as well as I do——

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Well, if he does not know it he ought to know it, and I hope he will learn it before we get through this session. It shall not be for want of effort on our part that he will not learn it, because we shall endeavour to press that idea upon him at frequent intervals in the hope that in some lucid moment, the idea may get possession of his mind. There is only one way to get control of the traffic and to be sure that it will go to Canadian ports, and that is to extend the Intercolonial Railway to the Georgian Bay. But as long as you adhere to this plan which Mr. Hays puts forward in a perfectly candid manner, of carrying that grain by the Grand Trunk Pacific to Thunder Bay, taking it across the lakes by steamer, landing it on the shores of Georgian Bay, and handing it to the Grand Trunk Railway Company ; you hand it to a corporation whose interests are in Portland ; and you hand it to a corporation which will have the unrestricted right under this contract to carry it to Portland, and will enjoy a greater advantage by carrying it there than it would by carrying it to any port in the maritime provinces. Even if you bring it around the head of Lake Superior by this all-rail route, you have it in precisely the same position. You bring it to the city of Quebec. There the Grand Trunk Railway has its choice between carrying it to St. John or Halifax on the one hand, or to Portland on the other hand. As the Minister of Justice and the Finance Minister have pointed out, Portland is about half the distance from Quebec that Halifax is, and the company will make more money by carrying it to Portland, and there is no stipulation in the contract to prevent them doing that. Under these circumstances there is no question that the Grand Trunk will carry the traffic to Portland.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have only one word to say in reply to my hon. friend. I presume that we may expect to have an amendment moved to this contract, perhaps in the line of what my hon. friend has just stated; and when my hon. friend brings that amendment, for my part I shall be glad to discuss the question with him. If my mind is not lucid enough to see the force of his argument, and if we cannot agree on the conclusion, we shall have to leave it to somebody else to decide who is in the right and who is in the wrong. I am afraid I cannot convince him, whatever argument I may use, and I doubt if he can move me from my present position.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That is the reason I hope for a lucid interval for my right hon. friend. I daresay it will be more pertinent to discuss the question when we have the amendment. My right hon. friend talks about argument to convince me. I have not heard any argument so far.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Perhaps my hon. friend had not a lucid interval.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I have heard specious suggestions, but no argument. There is the position—what has my right hon. friend to say about it? When the traffic reaches Quebec, the Grand Trunk is at liberty to take it to Portland.

Mr. FIELDING. But not the Grand Trunk Pacific. They are not at liberty.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I understand that the Grand Trunk Pacific does not operate a line from Quebec to Portland; but the Grand Trunk Pacific, which will be controlled by the Grand Trunk, will have the freight delivered at Quebec; and then, instead of the Grand Trunk Pacific carrying it to Moncton, it can be carried by the Grand Trunk to Portland without violating any stipulation of this contract. Every condition of this contract is fulfilled when it is carried to Quebec.

Mr. FIELDING. Not in winter.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Quebec is a Canadian port.

Mr. FIELDING. So is Port Arthur.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Quite so, and when the Grand Trunk Pacific has carried the freight to Port Arthur, it has performed everything that it is required to perform under the contract.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The words of the contract are 'a Canadian ocean port.'

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The Minister of Finance did not say a Canadian ocean port, he said a Canadian port. Quebec happens to be closed during part of the year, and the freight must be carried somewhere else. The point I am making is that the Grand Trunk will be at liberty to carry it to Portland. However, I am quite willing to act on the suggestion of my right hon. friend. We cannot move amendments to this resolution in committee, because it is a single resolution relating to the whole contract. We can move amendments by and by, when the Bill is in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LOGAN. May I ask the hon. leader of the opposition a question? Suppose a car of grain came from the west in winter time unrouted by the Grand Trunk Pacific, the railway being built into the maritime provinces. Does he say that that car of grain could be handed over by the Grand Trunk Pacific at Quebec to the Grand Trunk Railway to be taken to Portland without violating any part of the contract?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I do not know what my hon. friend means by unrouted. I do not see how a carload of grain can be carried on the Grand Trunk Pacific and be unrouted.

Mr. LOGAN. Unrouted by the shipper. Suppose it were shipped to Liverpool.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. If it were shipped to Liverpool, it would be routed. I do not know what my hon. friend means. Will he make himself clear?

Mr. LOGAN. I will try to make myself clear. If a car of grain were shipped from the west to Liverpool, and it were carried to Quebec by the Grand Trunk Pacific, does the hon. gentleman say that the Grand Trunk Pacific could hand that car of grain to the Grand Trunk Railway to be carried to Portland without violating any part of their contract?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Well, that is a rather remarkable question. If it be routed, it must be routed by some particular line. If it were routed by the Grand Trunk Pacific to Moncton or Halifax, it would have to go that way. If it were routed to Liverpool by the Grand Trunk going to Portland, it would go that way.

Mr. FIELDING. Suppose a car of grain is committed to the Grand Trunk Pacific at any point in the west on a through Bill to Liverpool, but not specifically routed, does my hon. friend claim that the Grand Trunk Pacific Company could send that carload of grain over the Grand Trunk line to Portland without violating their contract ?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I do not understand that that is the practice. I understand that the line is always designated. If not, I would ask my hon. friend to give me some proof of that. If it were routed by the Grand Trunk Pacific, and there were no other stipulation in the Bill of lading, I would say that the Grand Trunk Pacific would very likely be found to carry it to Moncton or St. John or Halifax. That is not the point I am making at present. What I say is that the Grand Trunk can always control the traffic, and see that it is routed to Quebec, and that when it is delivered there it shall be handled over to the Grand Trunk, which can carry it to Portland without violating any provision of this contract.

Mr. FIELDING. I differ from the hon. gentleman's statement that the Grand Trunk can control the traffic. The traffic can be controlled by the shipper of the grain. It is his right to ship it by any route he chooses, and we cannot deprive him of that right. No legislation we can devise could interfere with his right in that respect. If a man at Winnipeg says, I want my grain to go by Portland, his decision must be respected. But, if he does not specify the route, then the Grand Trunk Pacific is obliged to carry it over Canadian soil to a Canadian ocean port.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I say that the Grand Trunk Railway, controlling as it does the policy of the Grand Trunk Pacific, can so manage that the grain will be routed to Quebec ; and when it is once routed to Quebec, the Grand Trunk Railway can take possession of it there and carry it to Portland in spite of any stipulation in the contract.

Mr. FIELDING. The Grand Trunk Railway can only control this enterprise within the four corners of this contract, and the contract specifically declares that the Grand Trunk Pacific shall not send traffic originating on its lines or branches in the western part of our country to any other than a Canadian seaport, unless it be specifically routed otherwise. If the owner of the freight simply asks a quotation to an ocean port and does not specify that it shall go to Portland, the Grand Trunk Pacific are obligated, in the plainest terms, to carry it to a Canadian port and cannot do otherwise. Let me read the two clauses, 42 and 43. Section 42 provides :

It is hereby declared and agreed between the parties to this agreement that the aid herein provided for is granted by the government of Canada for the express purpose of encouraging the development of Canadian trade and the transportation of goods through Canadian channels.

That is a declaration of policy carried into a statute, in order that there may be no misunderstanding of the principle, the intention and the purpose of the agreement. Then we go on to say :

The company accepts the aid on these conditions and agrees that all freight originating on the line of the railway, or its branches, not specifically routed otherwise by the shipper, shall, when destined for points in Canada, be carried entirely on Canadian territory, or between Canadian inland ports, and that the through rate on export traffic from the point of origin to the point of destination shall at no time be greater via Canadian ports than via United States ports, and that all such traffic, not specifically routed otherwise by the shipper, shall be carried to Canadian ocean ports.

Then section 43 provides :

The company further agrees that it shall not, in any matter within its power, directly or indirectly, advise or encourage the transportation of such freight by routes other than those above provided, but shall, in all respects, in good faith, use its utmost endeavours to fulfil the conditions upon which public aid is granted, namely—the development of trade through Canadian channels and Canadian ocean ports.

No words could be used in the English language, which could be more full, comprehensive or specific. They are certainly fuller, more comprehensive and more specific than those which were employed for the same purpose by one of my hon. friends opposite, who, at an earlier stage, prepared an amendment to the same end.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. And when we asked that these important, comprehensive and effective words should be made binding, not only on the Grand Trunk Pacific, but on the Grand Trunk Railway itself, my hon. friend stood up in this House and voted down the amendment.

Mr. FIELDING. Because this scheme contemplates traffic originating in the western part of our country on the line of the Grand Trunk Pacific—not on the line of the Grand Trunk Railway—to be constructed, coming down to Winnipeg and from Winnipeg over the government line leased by Grand Trunk Pacific down to Quebec and thence to Moncton. There is no Grand Trunk Railway in that part of the business at all. The traffic goes over the Grand Trunk Pacific new road and the government new road and connects with the Intercolonial Railway at Moncton, and does not touch the old Grand Trunk Ralway at all.

Mr. CLANCY. Are the relations between the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Grand Trunk Railway the same as those between the Grand Trunk Pacific and other railways? Are not the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Grand Trunk Railway, although separate in name, precisely the same corporation? Suppose a man wants to ship a carload of grain to Liverpool and makes inquiry at the Grand Trunk Pacific office for the quickest and cheapest route, will not the man in the Grand Trunk Pacific office tell him that if he sends it by Portland, it will get there twelve to twenty-four hours sooner over the Grand Trunk Railway than if he sent it on to Moncton and thence to St. John or Halifax, and the price would be the same? Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the shipper, in that case would not play into the hands of the Grand Trunk Pacific and Grand Trunk Railway? The fact, is that the Grand Trunk Railway is practically free to do just as it pleases with the Grand Trunk Pacific. If the Grand Trunk Railway were bound in the same manner as the Grand Trunk Pacific, my hon. friend might have something to argue on. The difficulty is that having entered into a contract with a railway, which is controlled by the Grand Trunk Railway, we must expect that the Grand Trunk Pacific will do all in its power to send grain freight over the Grand Trunk Railway to Portland. These hon. gentlemen have fallen into a trap and bound themselves up with a railway company, whose every interest it is to take freight to an American port. Is there any other railway in Canada which these hon. gentlemen could choose which it would be so difficult to prevent from taking freight to American ports? Can the Finance Minister point to one other railway in Canada which it would be as difficult to prevent taking Canadian products to American ports. It seems to that the hon. gentleman has put himself, so to speak out of court, when he fails to bind the corporation that is behind this whole affiair. The Grand Trunk Pacific has no interest in this country and has not a dollar invested. It is a mere name, a mere fiction so far as the control of rates is concerned. It will never have any existence except in name in this regard. Yet, the hon. gentleman stubbornly refuses to bind the Grand Trunk, the real corporation that must be controlled, the one with which we are entering into a partnership.

Mr. FIELDING. In reply to the hon. gentleman's statement that this company is only a name and has not a dollar invested in this country, perhaps the most effective answer is that I hold, in my official capacity, $5,000,000 that has been put up by this company.

Mr. CLANCY. What does that mean?

Mr. FIELDING. This is the best evidence that I can give my hon. friend, and I am sorry that he does not like it. With regard to the relative position of the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific, it seems to me the hon. gentleman is making the mistake of confusing two things. The traffic we are talking of will not pass over the Grand Trunk; it will come from the west over the new Grand Trunk Pacific, and so will be subject to this contract. It will come from Winnipeg over the new government road which will be leased to the Grand Trunk Pacific. And so it will come under this contract.

Mr. CLANCY. Does the hon. minister say that, after the traffic reaches Winnipeg the Grand Trunk will not follow their own interest and offer better inducements for the traffic to go to Portland?

Mr. FIELDING. The shipper must have absolute control over his own products, and no legislation that this House can devise can or should interfere with his right to ship it as he pleases. We do not profess to interfere with the rights of the shipper. So far as the Grand Trunk Pacific is concerned, which company will have possession of the trade, receiving it in the west, it can not make any arrangement to divert that traffic from Canadian ports without violating the conditions of this contract.

Mr. CLANCY. And the Grand Trunk, though it does not nominally go into the west, will control this freight from the very day it is taken.

Mr. FIELDING. No, the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. CLANCY. If my hon. friend will wait a moment he will understand what I am saying. The traffic will be controlled in name by the Grand Trunk Pacific, in fact by the Grand Trunk. This will be the case from the first day an officer is placed in the west. Now, does the minister think it will be a matter of business, according to everyday practice, for the Grand Trunk Railway, controlling this traffic, to send it in a way that would not be advantageous to themselves? If it can be done, this traffic will be diverted to Grand Trunk lines.

Mr. FIELDING. I say it cannot be done.

Mr. CLANCY. I will not ask the hon. minister to assent to that. But wherever they can do it, they will seek to draw the freight over their own line. The hon. minister will admit that?

Mr. FIELDING. It is a selfish world, I will admit.

Mr. CLANCY. What is the opportunity for selfishness to have full play in this case: It is clear that, if they can prevent it, the Grand Trunk Pacific will never send a dollar's worth of traffic over any other railway than the Grand Trunk. That is business. The very day the Grand Trunk Pacific goes into the west, that day the Grand Trunk goes into the west, and they will offer such facilities and opportunities and rates as will make it to the advantage of the shipper to go over the Grand Trunk Railway. And they are waiting at Quebec to take the traffic to their own terminals. They are not going to spend money to carry it further than is necessary. Now, the distance from Quebec to St. John is 489 miles. From Quebec to Portland it is only 316 miles. Does the hon. gentleman pretend to say that the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific together will not send the traffic to Portland, rather than to St. John ? It is absurd, it seems to me, to argue that such a thing could take place in business ; and it does not and will not. As the hon. gentlemen knows, if there were no Grand Trunk Railway terminals in the city of Portland, the hon. gentleman might say : We have nothing to do with binding the Grand Trunk. But the Grand Trunk is a railway with its terminals in the city of Portland. And it is a railway at the city of Quebec ready to take that traffic. And they have all the advantage of the shorter lines as a means of competing, and, if their competition is successful they can carry the traffic to Portland. They are not going to carry a pound of freight to St. John if it costs them more to take it there than it costs to take it to Portland. It is pointed out to me by an hon. friend that the Grand Trunk Railway controls the policy of the Grand Trunk Pacific. That is perfectly clear. And, of course, the Grand Trunk will control that policy to the benefit of the Grand Trunk, and not to the benefit of the country. Very often the interest of the Grand Trunk and the interest of the country are at variance. The hon. gentleman knows that arises every day. And the hon. gentleman says, in effect, that in this case men will act differently from the way they act in every day affairs. Is not that a strange position to take ? If the hon. gentleman could point out that, by the construction of this road and by entering into this partnership, there is greater reason than already exists why Canadian products should be carried to Canadian ports, I could understand that. Does the hon. gentleman pretend to tell us that he has overcome this difficulty of going to Portland because the city of Quebec is eighteen or nineteen miles further from Portland than the city of Montreal—does he mean to say that that is a factor in railway traffic and will induce the Grand Trunk to send the freight to St. John any more than they did before ?

Mr. FIELDING. I think the contract contains every provision to that end.

Mr. CLANCY. But I ask, apart from the contract. Is there any inducement ? Is there any substantial difference whether freight is landed in Quebec or Montreal as determining whether it will go to Portland or St. John ?

Mr. FIELDING. I am afraid I do not understand my hon. friend.

Mr. CLANCY. It may be my fault if the hon. gentleman cannot understand me. I was asking if there was any better security that freight landed at the city of Quebec over the Grand Trunk Pacific, or landed at Montreal say, if a line was constructed from North Bay to Montreal—is there any reason, by advantages to the shipper, that it should go to Portland from Quebec ? In other words, if there is any inducement why it should not as readily go to Portland from Quebec as from Montreal ?

Mr. FIELDING. Suppose the shipper gets a quotation for a rate from Winnipeg, as a common point, to Liverpool, it is not, as a pure matter of business, much concern to him whether that freight goes over a Canadian road or any other road. But, as I pointed out to the leader of the opposition last session when we were discussing this matter, we think that where we have provided a Canadian route with the stipulation that the rate from Winnipeg, for example, to Liverpool—treating them as common points—that the rate by way of Canadian ports is no higher than the rate by way of United States ports, we are willing to believe that the Canadian shipper's own patriotism will lead him to give the preference to the Canadian route when it does not cost him anything more. We have more faith in the willingness of the western shipper to send his produce by the Canadian port in preference to the American port than my hon. friends opposite seem to have.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman must have more faith in what would seem to be the stupidity of people than we have. People always do the intelligent thing, as a rule. The hon. gentlemen have made it impossible for the people of Canada to carry out their views. He knows that the Grand Trunk Company will take care to favour the Grand Trunk Pacific, and the Grand Trunk Pacific will take care to favour the Grand Trunk. If that be the case, how will the freight be routed ? It will always be routed so that these two roads will mutually help each other. The Grand Trunk Pacific has an interest in the Grand Trunk financially outside the rates, and they will so shape matters, in spite of the government or any legislation we can pass, as to direct freight into channels that best suit these two lines. Now, what is the remedy ? The remedy was not to have entered into this contract. It is no use saying now : We have passed stringent laws, we have bound the Grand Trunk, we have bound the Grand Trunk Pacific. The hon. gentleman knows it is impossible to bind them. What is the use of entering into a contract with a party that you cannot bind ? The whole difficulty is that the hon. gentleman has entered into a partnership with a great railway corporation, and he now comes down to this House and confesses that he is utterly unable to bind it.

Mr. HEYD. Won't self-interest bind them?

Mr. BENNETT. It bound them to send 8,000,000 bushels last year to Buffalo.

Mr. CLANCY. I will answer the hon. gentleman in the words of the Finance Minister. He says the Grand Trunk is in and of the Grand Trunk Pacific, that the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific are one and the same thing—the same red-headed boy.

Mr. HEYD. Supposing their interests were identical, and it could be demonstrated that it would be to their mutual interest to carry it by Canadian ports, would that be satisfactory ?

Mr. CLANCY. If the hon. gentleman will demonstrate that freight can be carried a longer distance and in a shorter time, then he has a good case. I am afraid the hon. gentleman is in rather an awkward position. We now have the Finance Minister compelled, unwillingly, I believe, to confess to the House that he has entered into a contract with a great railway corporation that he is utterly helpless to control, because they will send their freight just as they like, and under this contract we make it to their interest to take freight to American channels and to American ports. That is what the contract means, unless it can be controlled by the previous contract.

Mr. HEYD. Or by self-interest.

Mr. CLANCY. I do not think the hon. gentleman has any interest separate from his own, has he ? If he is the one and the same red-headed boy, he has no interest apart from himself. Neither have these two corporations any interest separate from each other. The Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific are one and the same concern, and the Grand Trunk will find it to its interest to take freight to American ports, where they have $25,000,000 invested in railways and terminal facilities.

Mr. FIELDING. I suppose the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) would admit that if the Grand Trunk would not be inclined to bring its traffic down to the maritime ports over the section from Winnipeg to Quebec and Moncton, they certainly would not be disposed to bring it over the present road. If the hon. gentleman claims that the Grand Trunk would not bring this western traffic down for Canadian shippers over the proposed new road that the government are going to build, then they would not bring it down over their present existing road. The hon. gentleman will have to admit that. Now, I want to ask the hon. gentleman to explain this extraordinary transaction. He has pictured this Grand Trunk as a very dreadful concern ; he says we cannot control them. He says neither by this legislation nor by any legislation can we control the Grand Trunk Company in matters of that sort. Now, my hon. friend has made a strong statement, I do not say it is too strong, but in the presence of that statement, what are we to say when we recall what passed here two or three days ago, when the hon. member for North Hastings stood up in his place and used these words—I am quoting from memory :

> We, the opposition, have been to a man prepared to aid the Grand Trunk to build a road from North Bay to the Pacific, leaving the whole matter in the hands of that wicked Grand Trunk Company.

That is the declaration of a member of the opposition.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. FIELDING. I am glad we have woke up some hon. gentlemen to say 'no.' It is time they said 'no.' But the 'no' comes too late. No one will question the fact that the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) is a very capable, and able, and influential member of the opposition. We always listen to him with great respect, and he states his case forcibly. That hon. gentleman, without any qualification, declares that the opposition to a man—I am quoting his words from memory—We to a man are prepared to aid the Grand Trunk Company to build their original scheme from North Bay to Winnipeg and the Pacific. Yes, and the hon. members applauded. The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. McCreary), whom I do not see in his place, rose and asked a question. I shall give the whole context lest I be accused of misquoting—I do not like any gentleman to say 'no' when I make a reference——

Mr. POPE. When you try to bind us all you get 'nos.'

Mr. FIELDING. I am not binding my hon. friend ; it was the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) who was binding him. I was lectured by the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Barker) because when some things were said by hon. members I did not get up and quarrel with them, but hon. gentlemen sat in their seats while the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Northrup)——

Mr. POPE. I did not.

Mr. FIELDING. I do not know about the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope), but scores of them sat in the House and applauded the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Northrup).

Mr. FOWLER. We would generally be out if we followed your example.

Mr. FIELDING. I go out of work.

An hon. MEMBER. We get good evidence of it.

Mr. FIELDING. I give good evidence of it

Mr. TARTE. You do not give it away.

Mr. FIELDING. I do not give it away, that is quite true. The hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) was quoting a speech of Sir Rivers-Wilson which has frequently been referred to. Sir Rivers-Wilson had made some reference to the opposition which the Grand Trunk project had encountered in this House, and after quoting from that speech the hon. member (Mr. Northrup) proceeded :

And encountered from whom ? Not from His Majesty's loyal opposition, for we always to a man have been in favour of the original proposition of the Grand Trunk Company.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read on.

Mr. FIELDING (reading)—

All the difficulties, all the trouble of which he complains, and to which he refers the premier, and on the successful overcoming of which he congratulates him, every one of these troubles and difficulties came from the colleagues of the Prime Minister in his government, from his supporters in the caucus, from his followers in this House, and not from the members of the opposition.

We are told at one stage of this discussion that the government have given to the Grand Trunk everything they want : all they have to do is to ask something and they get it. Then a member like the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) spends half an hour in proving that the Grand Trunk Railway Company wanted something different and that this government forced upon them a scheme that they did not want at all. How you are going to reconcile these two views is not clear to me. I continue to quote :

We never had a chance to express our views on this point, any further than to announce that we were in favour then, as we now are——

Of course that was three or four days ago, and we must make allowances for changes.

—of a Grand Trunk line from North Bay to the Pacific, as the Grand Trunk itself wished.

Think of the action of my hon. friend from King's (Mr. Fowler) who before the Railway Committee of this House badgered the Grand Trunk day by day and said that on no condition should they be allowed to have that scheme as they wished, but we are told by the member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) that the opposition to a man, every one of them, including the hon. member for King's (Mr. Fowler), including the member for Compton (Mr. Pope), including them all to a man, were in favour of the original scheme of the Grand Trunk Railway.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read on.

Mr. FIELDING. It is too good to miss a piece of it.

When we find this document written to the premier congratulating him on overcoming the difficulties, it is well that we should know what these difficulties were, so that they may not be laid at the doors of the opposition in this parliament, for the opposition had nothing to do with this matter ; and so that the burden of the blame shall be laid upon the shoulders which should properly bear it.

It is not the opposition who have been standing in the way of the Grand Trunk scheme ; here is a public declaration that the Grand Trunk Railway could have anything they wanted from the opposition—all they had to do was to ask for it. And then Mr. McCreary interrupted :

Mr. McCREARY. Do I understand the hon. gentleman (Mr. Northrup) to say, speaking for the opposition, that they would have endorsed the application of the Grand Trunk Railway Company to build a railway from North Bay to the Pacific coast north to Lake Winnipeg? That was the original proposition of the Grand Trunk. Does the hon. gentleman speak for the Conservative party when he says he endorses that policy ?

The hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Northrup) had already said one and all, he made no exceptions, were for that policy. Mr. Northrup continues :

Mr. NORTHRUP. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McCreary) has asked a fair question and I will give an answer. I do not of course profess to speak authoritatively for the opposition, but from the views I have heard expressed by dozens of members of the opposition, and speaking my own views, I have no hesitation in saying that I believe that every member of the opposition was in favour then, and is in favour now, of assisting the Grand Trunk Railway Company to build west from North Bay ; let them put their line wherever they like providing only that it is a reasonable distance from other lines.

Mr. CLANCY. Where is the hon. gentleman's comfort in that ?

Mr. FIELDING. My comfort in that is a fact that when that passage occurred in this House, we had not the 'no, no,' that we got to-night when hon. gentlemen have had this pressed home to them. It was not 'no, no,' it was 'yes, yes.' There was a storm of applause, and the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) realized that the applause was a confirmation of his utterance for he proceeded :

Mr. NORTHRUP. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McCreary) will see from the expression of assent which has greeted my statement, that I have not altogether misvoiced the opinions of the gentlemen with whom I have the honour to sit.

I notice the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) trying to find a loophole to escape the consequences of that most damaging statement made as respects the opposition—

Every one of us, to a man.

My hon. friend made some allusion to some terms and conditions that he would make with the Grand Trunk Company though just what they are I do not know, but they will not serve as a defence at this stage of the discussion, because the hon. mem ber for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) in the observations he has made within the last few minutes, has laid it down that there is no use making any bargain with the Grand Trunk Railway, that they will override any legislation you can put on the statute-book. But the hon. gentleman is prepared to give to the wicked Grand Trunk people the whole management of the business. The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) declared that these men were fakirs. Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson was a fakir, Lord Welby was a fakir, Mr. Charles M. Hays was a fakir, Mr. Wm. Wainwright was a fakir, Mr. John Bell was a fakir. They were all fakirs, but these are the gentlemen to whom the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) tells us, the opposition, one and all, to a man, were prepared to deliver over the whole scheme.

Mr. LEFURGEY. There seems to be rather a dearth of information upon this subject. All afternoon and evening we have been trying to elicit information from the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Finance and the leader of the government, but with no result. It is strange that when such a project as this is before the country, a project which professes to be for the purpose of nationalizing the ports of the maritime provinces and to build up the ports of Montreal and Quebec, we are not able to obtain information from the government. The mountains of information which the hon. the premier professes to have upon this scheme have turned out to be very small.

I had a good deal of trouble in chasing after this paper I hold in my hand, the Railway News, to try to get a comprehensive idea of what took place at that meeting. Every one seems to want this railway news. Apparently it gives an idea of what the president of the Grand Trunk Railway and his colleagues think of the scheme, and apparently from the statement of Sir Rivers-Wilson and some others, in this scheme involving an expenditure of from $150,000,000 to $170,000,000, the obligations of the Grand Trunk Railway Company were not going to infringe upon their credit to any extent. It is only fair that the report of this meeting, important as it is, should be in the hands of every member of this House. I would suggest to the leader of the government, that this report, published in the Railway News, Financial and Joint Stock Company's Journal, in which is incorporated the Railway Record. Established 1844, No. 297, vol. 91, Registered at the General Post Office as a Newspaper, Saturday, March 12th, 1904. Price six pence.

Mr. BENNETT. What is the colour of the ink ?

Mr. LEFURGEY. It is published in London, England. The price of it is not so much if we were where we could get a copy, but we cannot get copies of it. Discussing this meeting in an editorial they say :

For fuller details of this important meeting we would refer our readers to the report on another page. Cable advices from Ottawa, since received, state that the ratification of the agreement between the company and the Canadian government gives satisfaction there, although the government confidently expected this result in view of the favourable terms of the new arrangement.

I would suggest to the right hon. gentleman that instead of having this document read, I should lay it on the table and have it incorporated in Hansard, as is done when other important documents are presented by the Finance Minister and others.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That is against the rules.

Mr. FIELDING. I have been refused the privilege.

Mr. BENNETT. Read it in French first.

Mr. LEFURGEY. I shall be compelled to read it in the interest of the country.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have a suggestion to make which will perhaps help my hon. friend. I understand that during this session, there was a report read by the leader of the opposition and proceedings of this meeting of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. It came here, as I understand typewritten, but my friend from Toronto the other day informed us, or perhaps it was my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, that he had it printed in Toronto ; it would mean only a few cents more to have some extra copies printed.

Mr. BENNETT. The printing houses are all burnt up.

Mr. LEFURGEY. I am glad that some one had sufficient interest in the matter to have this document printed and circulated at his private expense. It would be well to have this document and the document prepared by Hon. Mr. Blair presented to members of this House for their perusal.

MEETINGS OF SHAREHOLDERS OF THE GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY COMPANY OF CANADA.

The ordinary half yearly general meeting of the proprietors of this railway was held at the Cannon Street Hotel, on Tuesday, March 8th, 1904 ; Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson, G.C.M.G., C.B., president in the chair.

Mr. FIELDING. Has my hon. friend got the name of the hotel correctly ?

Mr. LEFURGEY. I think so.

Mr. FIELDING : Our report is defferent, we have another hotel.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Was it not the Terminus Hotel ?

Mr. LEFURGEY (reading) :

The President—Mr. Norman will now read the notice convening the meeting.

The Secretary (Mr. H. H. Norman) read the notice accordingly.

The President (who was received with applause)—Ladies and gentlemen, it has been our agreeable duty at many general meetings to report that the operation of each half-year showed an augmentation of the prosperity of the company. Our report upon the half-year, terminating 31st December last, proves to be no exception, for we can again say that the revenue and profits are in excess of those of any previous year. (Applause.) I trust that you will not allow the satisfaction you must naturally feel at such a result to be diminished by the inauspicious opening of the year 1904. The large falling away of the revenue during the last two months is solely attributable to the extraordinary severity of the weather which has prevailed both in Canada and the United States, in Canada with a continuity hardly ever known within the memory of man. A state of things so abnormal and transitory affords not the least reason for the discouragement which it seems to have caused to some shareholders. (Applause.)

Mr. FITZPATRICK. You left out the word 'timid.'

Mr. LEFURGEY (reading) :

Indeed, I am at a loss to understand the fears expressed in some quarters which a little reflection will show to be entirely unreasonable Up to the very last hour almost of 1903, business was progressing with its usual activity, and there is no reason to suppose that when the unusual stress of weather ceases, traffic will not be returned in the same proportion as before. (Applause.) We shall have some leeway to make up, but the year is young. We have still some ten months before us, and our last reports as to weather and general conditions are improving, and the delayed traffic is coming forward. However, our business to-day is not with the current half-year, but with the half-year just expired, and to that I will now address myself. The gross receipts of the half-year amounted to £3,138,468, being an increase of £326,590 compared with the corresponding period of 1902, or 11·61 per cent. The receipts from passenger traffic show an increase of £93,533, or 10·72 per cent——

Mr. FIELDING. £90,533 ; you read it £93,000.

Mr. LEFURGEY (reading) :

—and the number of passengers carried increased from 4,687,651 in the half-year ended December, 1902, to 5,139,073 in 1903. and this increase in numbers was accompanied by a slight increase in the average fare per passenger, the rate being 3s. 7¼d. in 1902, and 3s. 7⅔d. in 1903. In connection with this improvement in the passenger traffic, you will observe that although the receipts increased by 10·72 per cent, the passenger train mileage only increased by 4·75 per cent, the receipts per passenger train mile increasing from 4s. 5⅔d. in 1902 to 4s. 9d. in 1903. It is expected that considerable benefit will accrue to this branch of our business from the inducements to travel offered by the exhibition in St. Louis to be opened on the 1st May, and that not only the people of Canada, but also those from the New England states will take advantage of the special rates and accommodation provided by us, and our connections for the purpose of enabling them to visit the exhibition. The receipts derived from the mails and express traffic showed the very satisfactory increase of £16,820, being in practically the same ratio as the increase in the passenger traffic. The freight and live stock traffic, as usual, provided us with the greater proportion of the increase in our gross revenue. The receipts from this traffic amounted to £1,971,955 during the past half-year, compared with £1,755,488 in the corresponding period of 1902, showing an increase of £216,467, or 12:33 per cent, the number of tons carried being 6,738,702 compared with 6,148,530, an increase of 590,172 tons. There was also an increase in the average rate received per ton of 1⅔d., the figures being 5s. 10¼d. in the past half-year, as against 5s. 8½d. in the corresponding period. There is also a very satisfactory increase in the rate received per ton per mile, which was the highest rate received by the company for any corresponding half-year in the past five years, being 0·68 of a cent per ton per mile, compared with 0·64 of a cent per ton mile in the corresponding period. There is one other satisfactory feature which I ought to mention in connection with the freight traffic, and that is the average load per car, 9·84 tons, which is the highest average load we have ever carried. No doubt some portion of this increased load is due to the larger capacity of the cars we are now constructing in place of the old cars of lighter capacity, but it is also due, in a great measure, to the great care exercised by our officers in the matter of loading the cars. Before leaving the subject of the receipts for the past half-year, I think I ought to say that they are the largest the company has ever received in the December half of any year, and that the number of tons of freight moved and the number of passengers carried also reached the maximum. (Applause.) I now come to a less pleasant portion of our accounts, that of the working expenses, which, I regret to say, from causes which are common to all railroads in the United States and Canada, continued to show a considerable increase, although I am glad to say not to so great an extent in proportion to the increase in the gross receipts as in the two previous half-years. Of course, it cannot be expected that the large increases in gross receipts, to which I have just referred, can be earned without a more or less proportionate augmentation of working expenses, but this increase has been accentuated by an advance in price of materials generally, and to a still greater extent by the increased wages of all classes of employees which we have been compelled to grant, owing to the great demand for labour of every description. The total working expenses for the half-year amounted to £2,214,084, compared with £1,974,821 in the corresponding period, an increase of £239,263, the proportion to gross receipts being 70·55 per cent, compared with 70·23 per cent, or an increase of 0·32 per cent. The expenditure on maintenance of way and structures is the only item in the working expenses which shows a decrease, the decrease being £814, but even under this head there was an increase of £24,000 in wages arising from advances granted in the rate per day paid for labour. This increase in wages was, however, counterbalanc-

ed by reductions in other items of expenditure in that department, principally in materials owing to a greater proportion of the work than usual having been done in the first half of the year. The expenditure on the maintenance of equipment shows an increase of £52,485. Some portion of this increase was due to the increased mileage run, and there was also a greater amount of work done in the repairs of engines and cars, but a considerable portion of the increase was due to the advances made in the wages of all shop employees. During the year 1903, 49 locomotives, 20 passenger cars and 1,341 freight cars of various descriptions have been constructed in the company's shops, which cannot but be considered a very creditable performance. The thanks of the board, and of the company, are due to those excellent officers, Mr. McWood, superintendent of our car department, and to Mr. Robb, superintendent of motive power. They are entitled to all praise for the excellent results I have just stated to you. The cost of conducting transportation is responsible for three-fourths of the total increase in our expenses during the half-year, or £179,616.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that hon. gentlemen opposite are paying attention to this.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend is a very poor reader.

Mr. CLARKE. I would suggest that the hon. gentleman might commence again.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. My hon. friend has skipped about seven lines in succession.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I rise to a point of order. I insist that the report be taken by the reporters, and my hon. friend must read so that they can hear him.

Mr. LEFURGEY. I am speaking very much louder than the ordinary member speaks when addressing this House. I may say to the right hon. leader of the House that I do not intend to impair the usefulness of my articulative organs by shouting at the top of my voice. I do not think there is any parliamentary law that can compel any member of this House to impair his health in any possible way.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend speaks very much better than he reads. It is a pleasure to listen to him, but not to-night. It is quite a task to follow him to-night.

Mr. LEFURGEY. I was doing that out of particular compliment to the right hon. leader of the House.

(reading.) Applause.

Mr. FIELDING. The reason we want my hon. friend to be exact is that we expect afterwards to put the official report on record too, and it is a pity that the two should differ. Therefore I hope that my hon. friend will not skip, as he has been doing.

Mr. LEFURGEY. I would like the hon. Minister of Finance to understand that I am reading this report as it is here, and that I have not been skipping anything.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend may not have meant to, but I can assure him he skipped some.

Mr. LEFURGEY. I beg the Finance Minister's pardon. I have read all that is on this page so far. Perhaps my hon. friend is measuring me by his own bushel—by what he would do under similar circumstances.

Mr. FIELDING. Yes, I would skip the whole of it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I will insist on the report being taken down as my hon. friend reads it, and no correction will be allowed unless the reporters say it is what they heard; but they will not be allowed to copy from that book.

Mr. LEFURGEY. The right hon. Prime Minister is rather arbitrary.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That is the rule.

Mr. LEFURGEY. We are allowed to make corrections in 'Hansard.'

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Not to that extent. If anything in the report is found to be incorrect, the speaker can change a word here and there to make his meaning clear; but my hon. friend knows that it is one of the rules of the House that the reporters are not allowed to insert in the report anything that they do not hear, and I will insist on that rule being observed.

Mr. LEFURGEY. The reporter is paying attention to this.

Mr. FOWLER. I rise to a point of order. It seems to me that the right hon. the First Minister cannot be stating the rule correctly when he says that there can be no correction of a quotation simply because the reporter might not happen to hear it. As the hon. member says, he is reading every word, and should the reporter not happen to hear some sentence, does the right hon. gentleman say that a correction cannot be made?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The reporter knows his duty, and I expect him to do it.

Mr. FOWLER. The right hon. gentleman raised a point of order, and I expect you, Mr. Chairman, to decide it.

Mr. CLANCY. It seems to me that the First Minister is laying down a new rule. I have noticed that when hon. gentlemen read extracts, the reporters follow them closely, but as a matter of convenience to them, and in order that there may be no mistake, they are allowed to see the original. But my right hon. friend is now laying down the rule that the reporter is not to see the original at all.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The reporter knows his duty, and I do not want to dictate to him.

Mr. CLANCY. Then the right hon. gentleman should not have seen fit to dictate to him.

Mr. LEFURGEY. With the permission of the right hon. leader of the House, I shall resume :

Of this amount, no less than £92,712—or more than one-half, is in the item of fuel for locomotives. On this amount £15,800 is due to the additional engine mileage which had to be run to provide for the increased traffic, and the remainder, £76,912, is, with the exception of a slight increase in the amount paid for labour in handling, due to higher prices. I explained to you in October last that the prices we were then paying for fuel were higher than those paid in the corresponding period of 1902, but that the price at which contracts had been made was considerably less than the prices we had been compelled to pay from November, 1902, to April, 1903, and that during the early months of 1904 we should derive considerable benefit from the reduced prices, but I am afraid that our anticipations in this respect will be disappointed to a considerable extent—at any rate, for the first two months—owing to the exceptionally severe weather during that period, which has necessitated the duplicating, and even triplicating, the engines on the trains we have been able to run, which, together with the extreme cold, has, of course, had the effect of considerably increasing the consumption of fuel. I may say the unusual demand and unprecedented prices resulting from the hard coal strike two years ago, and its effect in advancing the price of bituminous coal, have stimulated an over-production of the latter, and an effort is already being made by the proprietors of the bituminous coal mines to secure a reduction in the price of mining. Whether or not this can be accomplished has not yet been determined, but be that as it may, we are certain to eventually secure lower prices in the near future. (Applause.) The wages of employees of various descriptions included under the head of conducting transportation showed an increase of £49,762, or about 11 per cent, some portion of which is attributable to increased rates of pay, but which is principally due to the increased traffic handled, which has necessitated large additions to the clerical staff and a number of freight handlers employed at all principal stations, as well as in the yard forces. The result of the operation of the railway for the past half-year was a net profit of £924,383, which was increased by the credits to net revenue to £1,013,254, an increase of £76,771 compared with 1902.

Mr. SCOTT. The hon. gentleman is reading the statement at a faster rate than it is possible for any stenographer to follow, and I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Campbell). I am afraid that is not a point of order.

Mr. LEFURGEY. I shall proceed to read :

(Applause). The net revenue charges were £614,874, compared with £608,357, an increase of £6,517, leaving the surplus on the Grand Trunk proper £398,380, against £328,126, an increase of £70,254. (Applause.) The Detroit, Grand Haven and Milwaukee Railway showed a surplus of £464, which, added to the surplus on the Grand Trunk proper, makes a total amount of £398,844, and including the balance brought forward from the previous half-year, we have a total amount available for dividend of £404,386, out of which we recommend the payment of the full dividends for the half-year on the guaranteed and first and second preference stocks, and a dividend of 2 per cent for the year on the third preference stock for the first time in the history of the company. (Applause.) The actual expenditure on capital account, amounting to £494,200, was heavier than we had been accustomed to, but having regard to the enormous increase in traffic in recent years, and the necessity of handling it efficiently and economically, the outlay was absolutely essential. The principal item of £299,877 was in respect of 1,000 double-hopper coal cars of 50 tons capacity, 500 box freight cars of 30 tons capacity, and 300 cattle cars. We have, for a considerable time past, been very much inconvenienced even in obtaining our own coal supply owing to the stock being inadequate for our requirements, and have had to pay large sums for mileage of cars belonging to other companies from the neighbourhood of whose lines our principal supplies are obtained, and it is anticipated that a considerable saving will be made in consequence of this necessary addition to our stock. (Applause.) As an evidence of the conservative policy which we have consistently pursued in regard to capital expenditure, I should like to say that although from 1895, when we took office, to 1903, the freight traffic receipts of the company increased by about 70 per cent, the additions to the freight car stock at the cost of capital only amounted to 20 per cent. (Applause.) No locomotives or passenger cars have been charged to capital during that period. The only other important charge to capital is for double track, amounting to £144,164.

We have, during the half-year, completed the doubling of the track of the remaining link between Montreal and Toronto—from Whitby to Port Hope—and we have now a continuous double track between Montreal and Niagara Falls, a distance of over 400 miles, which will be of very great assistance in the operation of the road, and the expenditure incurred will be amply repaid by the savings which will be effective in the handling of the traffic. So much then, ladies and gentlemen, for the accounts of the past half-year ; but before leaving that subject, I must allude with great regret—a regret which I cannot help thinking will be fully shared by the shareholders of the company—at the retirement of our friend, Mr. Joseph Price, from the vice-presidency of the company (Applause.) Mr. Price has been associated more or less with this company for many years. As far back as the year 1864 he became treasurer, and afterwards general manager, of the Great Western Railway of Canada. Afterwards he continued to take a great interest in our company, and during the past nine years you know he has been a director of the company. I speak feelingly of the great assistance which he has rendered to the board, and more especially to myself, and whilst deeply lamenting the cause of his retirement from the more active duties of the vice-presidency on account of ill-health, we still cherish the expectation and hope that he may still remain with us to guide us by his advice and experience as an ordinary director of the board. (Applause.) We have, with much satisfaction, chosen as his successor in the vice-presidency, Mr. Alfred Smithers. Mr. Smithers' name, is, no doubt, well known to many of you. To those to whom he is not so well known I should like to say that he has consistently during the time he has been a member of your board, namely, for the last nine years, been of invaluable use to the company, and I may say, again speaking personally, of the greatest possible assistance to the president —(Applause)—especially during the late arduous and difficult negotiations which we have been carrying on with the Canadian government with reference to the establishment of the new transcontinental line. Mr. Smithers has shown a good will and an ability, I may say, which have been of very great assistance to us all throughout this anxious time. (Hear. hear.)

Mr. BRODEUR. The hon. gentleman is passing over a part. In the copy which Mr. Osler had printed, there are these words :

I think we will have reason to congratulate ourselves very much—

Mr. LEFURGEY. This is the report I want to have on Hansard.

Mr. BRODEUR. Then the copies distributed by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) are not correct.

Mr. LEFURGEY. That does not follow. The hon. gentleman will be at liberty to compare them when this one is on Hansard. One of the great advantages of my reading this is that you will have the report before you at all times to compare with the other.

Mr. SCOTT. The hon. gentleman is reading at a rate which no shorthand reporter could be expected to follow acurately.

Mr. LEFURGEY (reading) :

I now approach a question which forms the subject of the special report issued to you a few days ago dealing with the proposed construction of a transcontinental line of railway—a question which has occupied the continuous and most anxious attention of your directors for the last eighteen months—a question which is or greater interest and of more far-reaching importance to the Grand Trunk Company than any which has ever been presented to the shareholders. (Applause.) Let me recall to you the reasons which prompted the board to enter upon this important scheme. The history of the Grand Trunk Company shows how it has grown with the growth and prospered with the prosperity of Canada.

It shows how the company has itself been largely instrumental in promoting prosperity of the country, and how it has been one of the leading factors in knitting together the various provinces which now constitute the great Dominion of Canada. As it has been in the past, so it should be in the future, and as Canada continues to develop, so it becomes an absolute necessity for the Grand Trunk Company to lend itself to the circumstances which surround it, and not neglect the oportunity of obtaining a share in the growing prosperity of the country. (Applause.) The chief feature of the progress of Canada during a recent period has been the rapid development of the North-west Territory. Emigrants are crowding into the country—the number for 1903 is calculated at 110,000. A notable feature of the emigration is that it consists in a large measure of farmers crossing the border from the United States, who bring with them not only capital, but agricultural knowledge and experience. Millions of acres are being thus occupied and brought under cultivation. Already the grain crop has risen from 56 million bushels in 1898 to 124 millions bushels in 1902. This vast agricultural production has been obtained upon a comparatively small acreage of about 6 millions, and by means of a very scanty population. It is certain that the increase of population and production continue in a progessing ratio, and imagination fails to conceive what the result may be when this great area has been filled up, and has been brought under cultivation. (Applause.) It is calculated that the present uninhabited area of the province of Manitoba and the Territories of Assiniboia. Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Athabaska amounts to nearly 300 millions of acres, the greater portion of which is excellent farming land, and that the unoccupied portion of British Columbia amounts to some 200 millions of acres, much of which is also suitable for farming and grazing. There is no time to be lost, if we are to avail ourselves of the great opportunities presented. Prosperity is flowing rapidly from the east to the west, outside and beyond the territory covered by the Grand Trunk. Thus, surrounded on all sides by elements of progress, it is absolutely impossible for our company to stand still. We must either continue to advance, or we must recede and yield the offered advantages to more enterprising and far-seeing competitors. Having arrived, then, at the conclusion that the best interests of the company necessitated some early measure in the direction I have indicated, we caused a Bill to be introduced into the Canadian parliament for securing a charter of incorporation for the creation of a company with an independent organization, but in close connection with, and under the control of, the Grand Trunk Company, for the purpose of building a line of railway from a point of junction at or on the Grand Trunk line, passing through the most fertile districts of the north-west, and terminating at a port on the Pacific coast. Under the natural impression that a scheme of this nature would commend itself to the approval, and would obtain the support and encouragement of, the government and parliament of Canada, so liberally accorded to other railway enterprises, I ventured to suggest to the shareholders, when I addressed them in the month of April, last year, that it might reasonably be expected that such a scheme might be carried through without engaging in any way the credit of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Company. (Hear, hear.) Such was my conviction at that time, founded,——

Such was my conviction at that time, founded——

Mr. BRODEUR. Do I understand that the words do not appear in that hon. gentleman's copy which appears in the copy which I have in my hands——

A VOICE.—I hope it is now.

—are these words included, or not ?

Mr. LEFURGEY. I think it was pointed out to the House in a previous debate that those words were not in this copy, but that that copy was the earlier copy. That is the authentic copy.

Mr. BRODEUR. Which one ?

Mr. LEFURGEY. The paragraph taken from there is authentic, and, what you would possibly call the unrevised.

Mr. BRODEUR. Do I understand, then, that the copy which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lefurgey) is reading from is not a correct one ?

Mr. LEFURGEY. We will be willing to abide by any of the changes which you will find in that record.

Mr. CLARKE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Lefurgey) is reading from the 'Railway News,' published in London.

Mr. LEFURGEY. (reading).

Such was my conviction at that time, founded upon reasonable data, and in view of the precedents to which I have alluded, I must confess that when I made that suggestion I appear to have been somewhat over-sanguine, not sufficiently considering, perhaps, the weight of political and interested opposition which the scheme was destined to encounter. It has been accordingly found impossible to carry the measure through the Canadian parliament without imposing some limited obligations on the Grand Trunk Company, not by any means, however—as I think I shall satisfy you—to be weighed against the advantages which we anticipate will result to the company. We certainly could not hope to obtain such generous terms as were granted to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, but without claiming to receive assistance from the government, which, in the case of that company, reached, I believe, something —in cash, or representing cash—like $120,000,000—we did reasonably expect to obtain liberal treatment at the hands of the parliament of Canada. (Hear, hear.) Our original idea was to build from a point on the Grand Trunk Railway to the Pacific coast. The intention was that the point of junction should be at or in the neighbourhood of North Bay. It was made, however, by the government a condition of the grant of the charter of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company that the line should be extended eastward from North Bay to Quebec into the city of Moncton, in New Brunswick, the point of junction on the Intercolonial, communicating with St. John, New Brunswick, to the southwest, and Halifax, Nova Scotia, to the southeast. As a result, however, of the negotiations with the government, another Bill was introduced by the government itself for ensuring the construction of the contemplated line from New Brunswick to the Pacific in joint partnership between the government and the Grand Trunk Pacific Company. An agreement under which this line would be constructed and worked was embodied in the government Bill, and it is the first of the two agreements which are submitted to you to-day, so far as they affect the interests of the Grand Trunk Company. The Bills and agreements were discussed by parliament during the whole of an unprecedentedly prolonged session. They met with strong opposition from the usual political opponents of the government, supplemented by the hostility of competitors who imagined that they saw in the proposed arrangement with the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, a measure which would be detrimental to their own interests ; and I may say, in passing, that I consider that this latter opposition which I have alluded to may be taken as in some degree a measure of the advantages which are well recognized in Canada as likely to accrue to us from this scheme. (Applause.) I think it is only due to Sir Wilfrid Laurier to express my appreciation of his patriotic and statesmanlike conduct of this great measure through parliament. Treating the question as he did, exclusively as one of national importance, it might have been not unreasonably expected that the question would have been lifted out of the sphere of party politics, but that was not the case, and it was only after encountering every sort of obstruction and exercising the greatest forbearance, patience, and ability, that he was able eventually to carry the measure. His leading object was to secure additional facilities for enabling the growing population of the Northwest to bring the products of the western prairies to the eastern sea-board by means of a trunk railroad passing exclusively through Canadian territory. He pointed out the advantages of the contemplated line, which would not only open up fresh districts of fertility in the west, but would afford further facilities for eventually giving an outlet for those products at Canadian ports on the Atlantic, as well as eventually to the countries beyond the Pacific, the route in question being, indeed, the shortest route between the manufacturing centres of Canada and China and Japan. While, then, the objects of the premier were of this large and essentially national character, your directors, on their part, saw in the accomplishment of such an undertaking great benefits to be obtained for their own company by securing a permanent connection with the Northwest, which would otherwise pass under other control, and by enabling the company to participate in the prospective advantage offered by that vast and fertile territory. The result, therefore, of the agreement was a combination of these two interests for the construction of the proposed road which would thus be carried out, as I have said, by means of a partnership between the government and the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, supported, as that company would be, by the influence and connections of the Grand Trunk Company. The Act which embodied the first agreement, as well as the Act incorporating the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, received the Royal Assent on October 24, 1903. The directors had been in consultation, through their general manager, with the government throughout the lengthened discussion of these measures, and we are bound to acknowledge the fairness with which we were met by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his colleagues in their endeavour to meet the views of the boards so far as they could do so conformably with their own views, of which they were very tenacious, and having regard to the great pressure brought to bear upon them by the opposition. And here, I must say, that if these negotiations reach, as I hope they will reach, a successful issue, it has been in a great measure owing to the efforts and great ability shown by our general manager, Mr. Hays. (Applause.) It is imposible to speak too highly of the assistance which Mr. Hays has rendered in this matter. His merits are well known to you already. You have only to contemplate the past history of the company during the last nine years to see what sort of a man Mr. Hays is. He seems to have put all his activity and energy into this particular negotiation, and I ask you to concur with me in expressing your gratitude to him for the good work he has done for us. (Applause.) Mr. Hays, in his anxiety to see the thing through, has come over here at some inconvenience, and he sits beside me now, and I have no doubt you will be glad to hear from him, after I have addressed you, what he thinks generally of the condition of the company, and of the prospects of the company as connected with this scheme. (Applause.)

In the meantime a great and unfavourable change has occurred in the financial position throughout the markets of the world, and the directors, in the interests of the shareholders, came to the conclusion that modifications in the agreement were imperative in order to safeguard the credit of the company, one important modification being that relating to the conditions which were imposed on the Grand Trunk Pacific Company for making the deposit, to which I will refer more particularly later on. Negotiations were accordingly resumed, and the result is embodied in the second or supplemental agreement, which is now in your hands, and which, read together with the first agreement, we now submit for your approval.

Should it receive that approval—as I do not doubt will be the case—it will be brought before the parliament of Canada—which has been specially summoned to meet on the 10th March, the day after to-morrow—for consideration and, I hope, confirmation. I will now proceed to explain to you the leading features of the agreements, especially as relating to the participation of the Grand Trunk Company in the scheme. I think, in the first place, it will be of interest to you that I should describe the course of the proposed railroad. The whole distance covered by the road from its extreme eastern point at Moncton to Port Simpson on the Pacific is about 3,400 miles, and for the clearer comprehension of the scheme, I will ask you to consider it as divided into two portions—the eastern and western divisions—the western portion being subdivided into two sections. It is intended that the eastern division, i.e., from Winnipeg through Quebec to Moncton, shall be owned by the government, and that it shall be constructed by them under joint supervision of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company and the government, and leased wholly when completed—or in sections pending such completion—to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company. The distance of 3,400 miles, which I mentioned just now, is divided as follows: The distance from Moncton to Quebec, about 400 miles; from Quebec to North Bay from the point of junction in connection with North Bay, about 500 miles—and then to Winnipeg another 1,000 miles. Therefore, you will observe that the length of the government portion of the road is about 1,900 miles. Proceeding to the west—the prairie section—that is to say, the section from Winnipeg to the proximity of the Rocky Mountains, is about 1,000 miles, and the section through the Mountains about 500. Thus observe the distance of the Grand Trunk Pacific road proper will be about 1,500 miles as compared with the 1,900 miles of the government road. The line will pass from 100 to 150 miles north of North Bay, whence a branch line will connect it with the Grand Trunk system, and another branch line will be constructed from some point between Winnipeg and North Bay to a point on Lake Superior. The Grand Trunk Pacific Company will, undoubtedly, receive the usual subsidies per mile from the Dominion and Ontario governments in aid of the construction of these two branches. From Winnipeg to the Pacific Coast (the western division) the road will be constructed by, and be, as I have said, the exclusive property of, the Grand Trunk Pacific Company. It is divided into two sections—one from Winnipeg to a point where the Rocky Mountains commence, which will be known as the prairie section, and the other passing over or through the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific Coast, which will be known as the mountain section. It is provided that the western division from Winnipeg to the Pacific Coast shall be completed within eight years. No special time is provided for the completion of the eastern division, but the work of construction on both divisions will, of course, be prosecuted with good judgment, hastening or retarding its progress as financial conditions, price of material, labour conditions and so forth, may make it desirable. I will now state what are the terms under which the eastern division of the road is to be leased to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company. In the first place the lease is to be for a period of fifty years. At the end of that time, it is open to the government to take over the operation of the road themselves in which case running and haulage powers are reserved to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company for another term of fifty years, or, in the event of the government not electing to take over the road, the right of priority over any other company is reserved to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company for a renewal of the lease. The rent payable by the Grand Trunk Pacific Company is to be 3 per cent upon the cost of construction, but for the first seven years after completion, no rent is payable, and for the next succeeding three years only so much as may be earned in excess of working expenses up to 3 per cent, any deficit during such three years being capitalized and added to the cost of construction; consequently, there will be no liability on the Grand Trunk Pacific Company for rent for ten years from completion. For the last forty years of the lease, the full rent of 3 per cent on the cost of construction is payable by the Grand Trunk Pacific Company. I may here remark that the Act, in virtue of which the government construct the road as far west as Winnipeg, relieves the Grand Trunk Pacific Company from the necessity originally contemplated of building that portion of the line from North Bay to Winnipeg, which, although passing through a district which I believe is infinitely more promising than that through which the Canadian Pacific line passes some 100 or 150 miles south, yet is of a character requiring longer time for development than the western and more favoured portion of the line which will be the property of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company. Coming now to the western division, i.e., the Grand Trunk Pacific line proper, the government undertake to guarantee interest at 3 per cent on first mortgage bonds to be issued for three-fourths of the entire cost of construction of the road, but in respect to the prairie section such guarantee is not to exceed $13,000 per mile. The detailed surveys have not been perfected on this portion of the road, but the country and its facilities for railroad construction are well known, and we are advised there can be little doubt that an excellent line can be built at a figure not to exceed more than $20,000 per mile. The balance of the cost of construction, that is to say, one-fourth, will be provided by an issue of bonds by the Grand Trunk Pacific Company on a second mortgage to be guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Company. Passing as it will do through the most fertile and most promising belt of country in the whole of the North-west Territory, there cannot be the slightest doubt that this portion of the road, built, as I have said, under such favourable and economical conditions, will immediately produce excellent results, and will by itself more than justify the adoption of the scheme in its entirety. (Applause.) The mountain section, as its name implies, naturally presents features of greater difficulty and cost, but here again, although the survey parties have not completed their work, the country has been quite sufficiently explored to enable us to say that its general features are well known, and our advisers are satisfied that the cost of laying the road will be considerably less than that of other roads traversing these mountains, and notably, the Canadian Pacific which passes through the same range of mountains under conditions of far greater difficulty than are presented by the more northern route. The government surveys which were made prior to the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway under the auspices of the government, and conducted by their distinguished engineer, Sir Sandford Fleming, afford conclusive evidence to this effect, and if the Canadian Pacific Company chose a more southern and more expensive road, it was, I believe, for the reason that the location was considered at that time to be much more advantageously situated, especially on account of its close proximity to the American frontier than that of the routes by the Peace and Pine River passes. I need only add that the maximum elevation by way of the Peace River or Pine River routes—one of which we shall probably select as the route of our line, is only 2,400 feet, that by the Canadian Pacific Railway 5,299 feet, the Great Northern Railway 5,202 feet, and the Northern Pacific Railway 5,567 feet. The maximum gradients both east and west by way of the proposed Grand Trunk Pacific route are estimated at 91 feet in the mile, as contrasted with 116 east and 237 west on the Canadian Pacific, and 116 respectively on the Great Northern, Northern Pacific and Union Pacific. You will, therefore, at once see by contrast the favourable conditions under which the proposed new road will be built. The financial conditions under which the mountain section will be constructed are that the Canadian government guarantee 3 per cent interest on the bonds to be issued to the extent of 75 per cent of the cost of construction, the remaining 25 per cent being obtained by bonds to be issued by the Grand Trunk Pacific Company and guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Company. For the first seven years, however, after completion of the mountain section, the government will pay the interest on the bonds guaranteed by them, without recourse to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, and during the next succeeding three years only so much as may be earned over working expenses towards making up 3 per cent will be paid by the

Grand Trunk Pacific Company, so that in effect, for the term of ten years from the completion of the line—or, assuming that the western division should not be completed until the expiration of the full period of eight years allowed by the agreement, for a term of 18 years from now—no claim will arise against the Grand Trunk Pacific Company in respect of three-fourths of the cost of construction. (Applause.) It is natural to most new enterprises that the earlier periods of operation are not likely to be immediately or largely productive, and this remark applies with particular force to one of this special character and magnitude. However rapidly the development of the country may proceed, a certain amount of time must elapse before the Grand Trunk Pacific Company can expect to reap any substantial measure of benefit in respect of a considerable portion of the country to be traversed by the new road, and this view has been recognized by the government accordingly. As you will have gathered from my preceding remarks, neither in respect of the lease of the eastern division or any of the sections, nor in respect of the working of the mountain section of the western division will any charge for rent in the one case, or, in the order case, for interest on three-quarters of the cost of construction be imposed upon the Grand Trunk Pacific Company for a period of ten years after completion. As regards the prairie section, the government, not unfairly, held that it would be self-sustaining from the day of its completion, and in this view we are willing to concur. (Applause.) I alluded just now to the obligation imposed on the Grand Trunk Pacific Company of making a deposit as evidence of its bona fides. This deposit which was to be made within 30 days of the passing of the government Act, was to consist of $5,000,000 in cash or government securities. I am bound to record my opinion that this was an extremely unnecessary and unreasonable demand, and I may, in passing, contrast it with the similar obligation imposed upon the Canadian Pacific Company at the inception of their undertaking, which was confined to a deposit of $1,000,000 in cash or approved securities, without having behind it the support of a powerful corporation like that of the company which is promoting the Grand Trunk Pacific Company. The obligation was, however, reluctantly accepted in view of the concession required by us on other essential points. It must have been obvious that the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, which had not even been organized, was not in a position, within the limited period exacted, to make the deposit, and the Grand Trunk Company, of course, was unable to afford assistance without first obtaining the sanction of its shareholders, for which a certain time was required. In order, however, to show no lack of good faith on the part of the promoters, and in order to satisfy the conditions of the contract, an interim and conditional deposit was made by the Grand Trunk Company of £1,000,000 4 per cent guaranteed stock, subject to the subsequent approval of the shareholders, and confirmation by parliament. The approval, however, of the arrangement in that precise form by the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Company will not now be required, and the condition deposit of guaranteed stock already made will be cancelled. In substitution thereof, it is now provided by the supplemental agreement that the deposit shall be made in cash or approved securities, and the Grand Trunk Company will—subject to your approval—make the necessary arrangements for complying with the requirements of the agreements. The deposit itself will be released as soon as the rolling stock for the equipment of the road has been provided, and there only remains £1,000,000 required for the completion of the western division. I must not forget to mention that in return for the support which we ask you to accord to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, the Grand Trunk Company will retain a controlling interest in that company, and will become the possessors of the whole of the common stock, amounting to $25,000,000, or £5,000,000.

What may be the prospective value of that security, or when it may acquire a substantial value, I cannot precisely predict, but you must bear in mind the certain and rapid development of the Northwest on the one hand, and the actual and very profitable results on the other hand, which have attended the working of other railroads operated under conditions and in districts not dissimilar from those contemplated for the Grand Trunk Pacific Company. I think I have now enumerated the essential features and conditions of the agreements, and you will reasonably ask what we calculate will be the liability which may be incurred by the Grand Trunk Company. (Applause.) The obligation proposed to be assumed by the Grand Trunk Company, is, as I have explained, limited to a guarantee of bonds representing one-fourth of the cost of constructing the western division, with the reservation that in respect to the prairie section—inasmuch as the government guarantee is limited to $13,000 per mile—the company's guarantee may somewhat exceed the one-fourth proportion. Assuming, therefore, the cost of construction on the prairie section, over a distance of 1,000 miles, to be at the rate of $20,000 per mile, the amount to be guaranteed by the company will be of bonds at the rate of $7,000 per mile, and in the whole $7,000,000, or £1,400,000. Interest on this amount at 4 per cent during the period of construction may be taken at £168,000, making a total principal to be guaranteed of £1,568,000, representing an annual interest of £62,720. Assuming again the cost of building of 500 miles on the mountain section to be $50,000 a mile, or $25,000,000, that is to say, £5,000,000 in all, the one-fourth amount of bonds to be guaranteed by the company will be £1,250,000, or, adding interest during construction, say, £150,000, a total of £1,400,000 carrying interest at the rate of £56,000 a year. If you have followed the figures which I have just mentioned, you will find that the result shows an amount of principal bonds to be guaranteed in respect of both sections of £2,968,000, and of annual interest of £118,720, but even this interest liability, comparatively small as it is, need not accrue until the expiration of eight years—the period allowed for construction—the interest on cost during construction being provided for out of capital. This, then, constitutes the responsibility of the Grand Trunk Company, and I hope this statement will allay the apprehensions which have been already expressed by a few critics, who may not have sufficiently studied or accurately understood the provisions of the agreements. (Hear, hear.) As fairly as I can, and without exaggerating, I have stated to you, on the one hand, the risk which the Grand Trunk would assume, and, on the other hand, I have pointed out the certain accretion of a great and valuable traffic to our company in the future, and the almost equally certain loss of existing traffic should the connections, which might be permanently ours, pass into the hands of rivals and competitors, who would promptly occupy the place which is now offered to us. We claim for the scheme that it is a fair and business-like arrangement, most carefully thought out, and surrounded by every safeguard that prudence can suggest for the protection and enhancement of the interests of our shareholders. We consider it alike as a measure of necessity, and as affording an opportunity which, if neglected, will never again occur of assuring and improving the fortunes of our company, and as such your board unanimously and confidently commend it to your approval. (Applause.) I shall have to present two resolutions covering the matters which I have been speaking of. The first resolution is the ordinary resolution approving of the reports and accounts for the last half-year, and then I shall ask you to vote upon the special resolution affecting the question of the Grand Trunk Pacific road. Therefore, in the first instance, I will ask you to vote upon the following resolution :—'That the report of the directors and the accounts for the half-year ended December 31, 1903, now presented be and the same are hereby approved and adopted, and that the following dividends be paid, namely, to the holders of the four per cent guaranteed stock of £2 10s. per cent, to the holders of the first preference stock of £2 10 s. per cent, to the holders of the second preference stock of £2 10s. per cent to the holders of the third preference stock of £2 per cent.' I will ask Mr. Smithers, our vice-president, to second that resolution. (Applause.)

Mr. Alfred Smithers—I beg to second the resolution with regard to the report and accounts and the payment of the dividends.

The President—I will just ask the shareholders who are present, if they have any remark to make upon this resolution to kindly confine their remarks to the reports and accounts of the half-year, so that we may not wander into a general discussion upon the other question. After I have put the resolution with regard to the Pacific Company, we shall discuss that by itself.

Mr. Seal referred at some length to the increased ratio of expenditure, which he regarded as an extremely unsatisfactory feature.

The president stated that no reasonable business man could expect enormous increases in revenue to be attained without some additional increased expenditure.

Mr. BRODEUR. Will the hon. gentleman permit me ? In the copy I have here, which was furnished by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler), there is a whole page devoted to the speech of Mr. Seal which my hon. friend (Mr. Lefurgey) has not read. Do I understand that my hon. friend (Mr. Lefurgey) is reading from the copy which he holds exactly as it is printed ?

Mr. LEFURGEY. I am reading it word for word.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I would draw the attention of the hon. member (Mr. Lefurgey) to what I think is an abuse on his part of the privileges of the House, in reading continuously and for so long under the rule which permits the reading of extracts.

Mr. POPE. What is the limit ?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think that is largely in the discretion of the presiding officer. A case came up in 1885, and a decision was then given by the late Speaker (Mr. Kirkpatrick), who said :

I think it is an abuse of the privilege when a member occupies the greater part of his speech by reading a whole essay on the subject. It is taking up the time of the House contrary to the meaning of the rule, and to the interpretation which I would put on the rule, prohibiting the reading of newspapers except as extracts. It is an abuse of the rule which I shall endeavour to stop.

Further on he says :

I have ruled that the hon. gentleman is entitled by the rules of the House to read extracts, but to read continuously I consider an abuse of the rules.

If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lefurgey) concludes the reading of the extract, he will be in order, but to continue reading for the whole length of time which he has been reading, is an abuse of the rules of the House.

Mr. POPE. What is your decision ?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. My decision is that this is not an extract ; the hon. gentleman purposes reading the whole article, and if I understand the meaning of the word 'extract,' it is only a portion or part of an article ; for the hon. gentleman to continue reading and to detain the Committee for an hour or an hour and a half, is surely an abuse of the privileges of the House.

Mr. CLANCY. It is evident that in the case to which the Chairman has referred, the member was reading his whole speech, but the Speaker then distinctly stated that there is no objection to reading an extract. The hon. gentleman has been reading an extract.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. He is reading the whole article.

Mr. CLANCY. The whole article is an extract.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. An extract is a part, but not the whole. An extract does not include the whole.

Mr. CLANCY. Why not ?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Because then it would not be an extract. The hon. gentleman will not argue that point.

Mr. LEFURGEY. I may say that I intend reading the balance of the extract now, and as I am——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. There is no special rule which will apply to the extract. If the Committee is willing to sit and listen to the reading of long articles of that kind, there is no particular rule from Bourinot which I can apply ; there is only the judgment which I would bring to bear upon each particular case as it arose, and the opinions given by other presiding officers.

Mr. CLANCY. I understand that an extract does not mean a part or a whole ; it does not mean a part any more than the whole. An extract is what is printed in a book, or newspaper, and which is read to the House, whether it be the whole or a portion of it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Bourinot lays down the rule :

It is not regular to quote a whole essay or pamphlet of a general character.

It is evident that under the heading of 'extracts' Sir John Bourinot does not mean the whole of an article, or the whole of a pamphlet, but extracts or excerpts from it.

Mr. LEFURGEY. This is not an article of a general character, but of a particular character and germane to the subject under consideration.

Mr. HOLMES. Before you rule upon this point of order, may I say——

Mr. LEFURGEY. Have I the floor ?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I did not give any ruling ; I merely drew the attention of the committee in a general way, with the object that hon. gentlemen might follow the usages of parliament in this respect, and I quoted the opinion of a very able speaker. I leave it to the committee to decide.

Mr. HOLMES. Unless you decide against me, Sir, I think I have the floor, while you are discussing this point of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Do you raise a point of order ?

Mr. HOLMES. The point of order was raised by the member for Bothwell.

Mr. CLANCY. The chairman raised the point of order himself.

Mr. LEFURGEY. I have the floor, and I have no desire to infringe upon the rules of the House. This is a most important document, bearing upon the subject under discussion, and I will go on to read :

Mr. HAYS (general manager) challenged comparison in the matter of working expenses with any of the railways in the United States or Canada, worked under similar conditions to the Grand Trunk.

The PRESIDENT.—I will now ask you to vote on the resolution I have read to you just now. All those who are in favour of the resolution kindly signify their approval by holding up their hands. Those of the contrary opinion ? The resolution is adopted. It is now my duty to read to you, and to ask you to vote upon the special resolution relating to the other question which I dealt with in my statement. The resolution is as follows :

'That the agreement dated July 29, 1903, between the government of Canada and the promoters of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company as amended by a supplemental agreement thereto dated the 18th day of February, 1904. (copies of which agreements are now submitted to this meeting), be, and the same is hereby approved and the directors are hereby authorized and empowered to carry the same into effect so far as the said agreements relate to or affect this company, and in particular the directors are authorized to make such arrangements as they may think fit with the government and the Grand Trunk Pacific Company for providing or securing deposit of $5,000,000, either in cash or securities and are further empowered to guarantee the second mortgage bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company both for principal and interest to be issued pursuant to the provisions of the agreements and to enter into any contract or contracts relating thereto.'

That is the resolution, ladies and gentlemen, which I have the honour to propose to you, and which I will ask Lord Welby to be good enough to second.

Lord WELBY.—Ladies and gentlemen, I am sure that every citizen of the empire has rejoiced in times past at the rapid development of Canada, and it is evident to anybody who studies the question of Canada that her development is in rapid progress, and that the great line of the development will be along the prairie section, to which allusion has been made already. The government of Canada has decided that the time has come for the further development of that enormous belt of wheat-growing country. They have decided that a line should be made, and practically, they have made us the offer of carrying out that development. The discussion which has taken place at your board upon the subject has been long and most anxious I can only assure you, ladies and gentlemen, that the board are deeply alive to the responsibility which they incur when they are placing this scheme before you. The fact of the matter is, that we have arrived now at the parting of the ways. You have to decide whether in the future you think it best to restrict yourselves to the comparatively limited sphere of action in which your railroad is now operating, or whether, in view of the development which is taking place towards the west, you will think it right to obtain your share in that development, as I hope and think, we may fairly trust your share in the great profits which will accrue to Canada. Well, the offer is placed before you, and you have to decide to-day whether or not you will accept it. The government of Canada has come to a provisional arrangement, subject to your approval, with the board. If you say 'No,' there is very little doubt that there are many others ready to avail themselves of the opportunity, and we have every reason to believe that the government of Canada has entirely decided that it will carry out this new line, and, if you refuse to do it then other parties, without any doubt, are ready to come forward and take up the work which is offered, and the opportunity will pass away from you. (Hear, hear.) It is under these circumstances that the board, as I say, with the fullest sense of their responsibility to you, have come to the conclusion that the wisest course, the most prudent course, and the right course for them to pursue, is to submit this scheme to you for your ratification. With regard to the risk that is incurred—and, of course, when a great work of this kind is in progress there must be some risk—the board think that that risk is really reduced to a minimum. From every source of information which they can obtain there can be but little doubt, first of all, that the carrying out of that part of the line which runs over the prairie section is a line that can be easily and cheaply made, and from the information that we can derive from that is going on all round us there—because that prairie section has hardly been scratched, I may say, as yet—from the influx of the Americans into that country, and from the fact that the Americans themselves, with their immense increase of population, are already, to a certain extent, limiting their great supplies—or will be limiting them within a few years—of corn, which they have to place at the disposal of the old countries of Europe, the consequence is that we may confidently and absolutely expect that the supply of grain of this country and of the old countries of Europe, will within a very few years be in a large measure derived from Canada. (Hear, hear.) That being the case, when we ask you, so far as this prairie section is concerned, in laying this scheme before you, we are speaking of a certainty that, from the time the line is accomplished, it will produce a very considerable revenue, and that from the rapid settlement of the country, which will follow the establishment of the line it will within a very few years, be a very profitable line. So far as that is concerned, your directors have not the slightest hesitation in submitting to your acceptance that part of the scheme. Of course, the question of the mountain section is a more difficult one, but, as I think you will hear from Mr. Hays, and as you have heard from the president, there are many circumstances which make even this part of the undertaking, the subject at all events, of a reasonable estimate even at the present moment. You will have heard first of all, that the passes over which the line will go are really not more than half the height of those over which the more southern railways have gone, and we know, at all events, that they are at the present moment paying lines ; and, further than that, we have got one indispensable condition connected with it, as the result of the long and intricate negotiations—the Canadian government has become absolute partners with us in the expenditure on that mountain section ; that means that we have made their interests one with ours, and we are, therefore, assured of their hearty cooperation and assent to any reasonable proposition on their part. On these grounds we think we are entitled to place that part of our scheme before you for ratification. And, now, I have to repeat to you the great sense which we have of our own responsibility to you. If you go back to nine years, I think your board of directors, with their very able manager, Mr. Hays, may fairly point out the results of the last nine years as justifying, up to the present, the confidence which you have so generously reposed in us. (Applause.) The situation of the Grand Trunk at the present moment, it must be evident to every one, is a very different one to what it was in 1895. (Applause.) Now, your directors and your general manager are not likely to jeopardize lightly that result, nor the confidence you have reposed in them. We think that you will, at all events, give us credit for this, that, having seen what has been the action of the board, and what have been the results during the past nine years, you will be convinced that we have entered seriously and most carefully into the proposition which has been laid before us, that we have conducted these negotiations with a rather hard taskmaster—the Canadian government—entirely with a view to your interests, and it is only because we are satisfied that the Grand Trunk Railway would be losing a very great opportunity of profitable development in the future, and would be limiting itself to a degree which we think the shareholders would in a very few years repent, that we have come to the conclusion that we are justified in laying before you the scheme which we confidently recommend to your acceptance. (Applause.)

Mr. ALLEN read a statement on behalf of his father, George Allen, a late member of the board setting forth his reasons for objecting to the scheme. He had objected from July 24 last to proceed further with the Grand Trunk Pacific scheme without having a great deal of necessary information afforded to the board, and believing firmly, as he did, that the scheme, if carried out, will gradually ruin the Grand Trunk. There are two courses open to them now : (1) To reject the agreements altogether ; (2) to postpone the consideration of the agreements until the board and the proprietors have sufficient facts before them to enable them to form an opinion on their merits. (Applause.)

Mr. ALLEN concluded by moving an amendment for the postponement of the further consideration of the agreements until the board had been supplied with certain information specified in the amendment.

Mr. MERLYN seconded the amendment.

Mr. BRODEUR. Has the hon. member read the amendment ?

Mr. LEFURGEY. That is all that is here.

Mr. BRODEUR. Will he read it again if he pleases ?

Mr. LEFURGEY. I don't think we have come to the amendment yet.

Mr. BRODEUR. No, I think the hon. gentleman began to read the amendment.

Mr. LEFURGEY. That is exactly as it is here :

Mr. SEAL suggested that the board should consent to the adjournment of the meeting so as to give the proprietors time to consider the matter.

Mr. LEA SMITH and Mr. BENNET concurred in this view.

Mr. GIRDLESTONE and Dr. DRYSDALE spoke in support of the board's policy.

The PRESIDENT—I should like to say, first of all, on the question of adjournment, I can assure you it is really out of the question. The thing for good or for bad—I hope for good—must be settled now. ('Hear, hear,' and applause.) It is open, of course, for the meeting to declare, in consequence of there not being sufficient information, that they do not accept the scheme, but the idea of adjournment is out of the question, I am afraid ; and for this reason, the parliament of Canada meets the day after to-morrow for the special purpose of discussing what I hope will be, the favourable decision of this meeting, but under any circumstances parliament will meet ; therefore, in the event of an adjournment taking place, and parliament meeting the day after to-morrow, the agreements will not be ratified, and those advantages which we sincerely believe likely to accrue to our company, will pass into other hands. Therefore, I am afraid we cannot agree to adjourn the discussion. The decision must be taken by your vote, and taken now.

Mr. MACPHERSON. I rise to a point of order. I believe the hon. gentleman is not speaking from his place in the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. LEFURGEY. Mr. Chairman, I think it is your duty to keep the members in order. While the business of the House is going on in the satisfactory manner in which it is now, we should not be subject to interruptions from hon. members who have been spending the evening in gaiety outside.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. member is in perfect order in rising to a point of order ; but I do not think the hon. member (Mr. Lefurgey) is out of order in speaking from where he is now standing.

Mr. LEFURGEY. (reading).

I should like—and it is only due to our late colleague, for whom I have, notwithstanding his having severed his connection with us, sincere regard—I should like to say a few words with reference to the remarks which were made by Mr. Allen's son, and with reference to the points raised in the paper which he read. I very much regret that Mr. Allen, jun., and some other gentlemen here present should have taken up an attitude which I cannot help thinking is very likely to be very detrimental to the interests of this company and therefore very detrimental to their own interests as shareholders. (Hear, hear.) Mr. Allen differed in opinion from the rest of the board, and he showed his conviction that we were wrong and that he was right, by leaving the board. The matter treated of in the paper read and the remarks made by Mr. Allen, jun., show me conclusively that Mr. Allen has not studied the second agreement, the modified agreement, but that he has founded his criticisms upon the first agreement which was laid before the board when he was a member of it. I will only take one instance of the inaccuracy of his criticisms. He boldly states that the liability upon the Grand Trunk will amount to nine millions sterling, and he divides that nine millions sterling into three millions liability in respect of guarantees, five millions in respect of rolling stock, and one million in respect of the deposit. As regards the three millions of guarantee, that, as I stated to you, will undoubtedly be a liability. As regards the five millions for rolling stock—in the first place, the estimate is not five millions, but three millions. With that the Grand Trunk has nothing to do. That rolling stock will be provided by the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, and, as the general manager will tell you, they have laid their plans for providing that rolling stock by a trust fund. As regards the one million deposit, that deposit will not cost you one single halfpenny. Therefore, the liability comes back to the sum which I have just mentioned—namely, about three millions, and I have stated distinctly and clearly that that is what we estimate the liability of the Grand Trunk to be—eventually a possibility of three millions of capital and £118,000 of annual interest. I really do not think I need go into the other matters which have been raised, for I think I have sufficiently dwelt upon the benefits we are sincerely convinced will accrue from the acceptance of this scheme. I should like you now to hear from Mr. Hays, who has so ably negotiated this matter, his general views upon the situation, and I have no doubt he will endorse more or less what I have stated; but, coming as he does fresh from Canada, and from his negotiations with Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the cabinet, I know he will speak to you with considerable weight, and no doubt carry conviction to you.

Mr. HAYS—Ladies and gentlemen, it is not unnatural that before embarking on an enterprise of this character you should have some hesitation, some doubt, and begin to query amongst yourselves as to what interest and what advantage this undertaking will be to the Grand Trunk Railway. I can see the holders of the first preference, of the second preference, and of the third preference securities saying to themselves 'Why, we are pretty well contented with our portion as it is; we are getting dividends year after year in an increasing ratio. Why should we, therefore, proceed to risk these dividends; why should we take any chance that may work in the end to a diminution of these dividends? Let us stay just where we are. We are doing well now; why take any chances at all?' Ladies and gentlemen, if I thought I could assure you that those dividends on the first, second and third preferences, to the extent they have been paid, would continue, then I would not be here to-day advocating this new enterprise. I cannot but feel that any objection that arises in this body to this project arises largely from a failure to fully recognize the situation. (Hear, hear.) The Grand Trunk to-day is drawing from this country that we are now seeking to enter, and seeking to tie up to the system, a very large portion of its traffic which we stand to lose if we do not embrace this enterprise. We cannot hold it. We are to-day handling from fifteen to twenty million—last year it reached 24,000,000—bushels of grain, which came across the lake from Lake Superior down to our ports, feeding the whole Grand Trunk system throughout Ontario, and this gives us the whole of the way from Montreal, thus contributing a very large portion of our earnings. We cannot hold that to our system if we do not take some means of fastening it to us. (Hear, hear.) That business to-day, gentlemen, is given to us by our competitors. It is not collected by the Grand Trunk Railway itself. The Grand Trunk Railway is in this rather ridiculous position from a business standpoint of gathering up traffic from the largest and most prosperous portion of Canada, taking it to North Bay, our connection with the Canadian Pacific, and from there giving it to the Canadian Pacific to haul across the country into this prosperous and rapidly developing district we are speaking of. And what do we get back? Nothing at all. Simply because the Canadian Pacific with its own line to the east, naturally as we would do if we were in their place, takes it away and gives nothing back. Now, we have another rival in that same territory which is competing with us to a certain extent now, that brings the grain down to the lake and conveys it by water across from Port Arthur and Fort William to these Ontario ports of ours. That line we do not control, and there is no likelihood or possibility of our controlling it in the near future; and that railway is making its connections with the United States lines to the south of St. Paul and Minneapolis up to Winnipeg, and drawing this grain and traffic, but is the only direction in which we can look for an increasing traffic. That traffic will be lost to us if we do not tie it up, so that to-day the question is not what your position is going to be if you embark on this enterprise, but what it is going to be if you do not embark on this enterprise. (Hear, hear.) That is the question that this meeting must decide to-day; that is the question to which you must give serious consideration. Your directors and your management have spent eighteen months at it. Some shareholders said 'Give us time to consider it.' Your directors and management have been going into this question detail by detail for eighteen months. Surely, that is enough to warrant them coming to some business-like conclusion as to the enterprise, and they stand here to-day, and not only advocate it, but say to you: 'If you lose it you cannot maintain your present position'; and that is what I say, and what I am willing to stake my reputation—whatever it may be—upon as a railway manager. (Applause.) Now, gentlemen, the Grand Trunk Pacific is going to be in quite a different position from that of an ordinary new enterprise stretching across the territory I have explained to you. Here is the Grand Trunk, the parent company, standing with a large traffic ready to deliver it westbound. This traffic is now given to a competitor. It does not have to wait five, ten or fifteen years to build up a traffic; it starts with a traffic right from the beginning, and that is of a most remunerative character,—a high class traffic, consisting of agricultural material, dry goods, boots and shoes, and all that class of merchandise that a new and rapidly developing country requires. The Grand Trunk as it is to-day hauls it 200 miles and hands it over to a competitor and gets nothing back. Is that a business-like position to be in? Is that a position for the directors and management of the Grand Trunk to maintain and to acquiesce in? I do not think you will say so. This enterprise which we are advocating to-day, ladies and gentlemen, combines points and advantages that no other transcontinental line in the United States of Canada can have. I will briefly enumerate a few of them. In the first place, I have already indicated that they start with a traffic under their control ready to go over this new line. The line stretches one thousand miles through the wheat belt of the country further than any other transcontinental line. It goes through that country on level grades, on practically what in railway parlance is called 1½ per cent grade, twenty-six feet to the mile. It crosses the mountains at the lowest elevation of any other transcontinental line of the country—2,500 feet at a maximum by the Pine pass, and 2,200 feet only by the Peace river—we have not decided which will be adopted—as against an elevation of 8,000 feet by some of the lower routes. You can determine in more careful detail the cost of a road when you know the elevation that you must attain. When you know the gradients that you adopt it is simply a matter of calculation what the cost of the road is going to be. You take the price of rails, the price of ties, the price of labour ; it is not a mathematical problem at all what the cost will be. It may be varied by deflections one way or another, but you can tell within a very close amount what it is going to be. Then, in addition to the advantages of grade, location and so on, the line will be shortest one between the east—China and Japan and all of that country to which we must look for our future development—the road is 1,500 miles shorter from Montreal to Yokohama than via New York and San Francisco. It is 500 miles shorter than the Canadian Pacific route to Victoria. We will have taken a passenger half-away across the territory, before he could be far on his way by other routes. In all these great questions arising to-day in connection with Russia, Japan and all that territory, the importance of the shortest route must be apparent to you. There are many of you here to-day who will live to see the Grand Trunk Pacific hauling as much of its grain towards the Pacific for consumption in China, Japan and that territory as will be hauled in this eastern direction. The route will give the Grand Trunk Railway control of the rapidly growing business of the Yukon territory. That traffic all goes down now either by Vancouver, Seattle or the southern coast towns, and there is takes steamer some 2,000 miles. We shall have shortened that distance by rail in that neighbourhood by 1,000 miles. One shareholder a minute ago, in speaking of the obligation the Grand Trunk was to assume in this conection, seemed to have the impression that his interests, whatever they may be in whatever class of securities, were jeopardized from the outset, and I fear that there is a general impression arising entirely from this misunderstanding. The Grand Trunk Railway is not going to be called upon under its guarantees for one cent for eight years after this enterprise is started—after the construction of the line is commenced—the cost of the line during construction being added to capital and provided out of capital, and the securities which the Grand Trunk will guarantee will not be issued for eight years, and then after that eight years have rolled by, you have seven years yet on the mountain section, a part on which there seems to be some doubt. There can be not the slightest doubt as to what the returns will be from the prairie section, but on the mountain section you have seven years without any claim at all, three years after that only a claim on what is earned, making, therefore, before the mountain section becomes anything of a burden on the railway, eighteen years. All I have to do is to to ask you to look back at meetings and discussions which took place of a similar character in connection with the Canadian Pacific, where it was freely prophecied by gentlemen who were doubters, as we have doubters here to-day, that it would not earn the axle grease. (Laughter.) The gentlemen who were fortunate enough to buy the securities from those who held that impression have profited. We are going into the territory which was originally selected as the route of the Canadian Pacific. The surveys were made by the Canadian government who spent $3,000,000 in determining and selecting what was the most easy and direct route for a transcontinental line. This route was selected, but a change of government took place just about the time the report was made, and the idea was abandoned. A lower route was taken through a less desirable country than that which we are now taking, so that we are simply confirming the judgment of fifteen or twenty years ago as to the desirableness of the route, and the character of the country we are going through. To my mind it is difficult to conceive that there can be any objection to this scheme which promises so much to the Grand Trunk Railway, and which links its fortunes with those of the government of Canada in a way that the two must work together, not only for the benefit of the country at large, but for the joint benefit of the country and the Grand Trunk Railroad. Gentlemen, I shall be very glad to answer any other question, but I think I have covered the whole ground. The question is not what is going to happen to you if you adopt this enterprise, but what is going to happen if you do not adopt it. (Loud applause.)

A shareholder—I should like to ask Mr. Hays if he will tell us something about the climate of Port Simpson.

Mr. Hays—The gentleman asks about the climate along the proposed line and at Port Simpson. You will all understand that the question of climate and its severity is largely one of elevation. The country through which we are going commences to slope down towards Hudson Bay—the trend is all towards the Hudson Bay. The waters of that portion all drain to the north instead of to the south. Our line is on a very much lower elevation, and therefore there is a very much less rigorous climate than that followed by the lines not only south of us in Canada, but in the United States, which reach elevations of 5,000, 6,000 and 8,000 feet. In the neighbourhood of Edmonton where some of our officers were last winter, there were only six inches of snow. They rarely have six or eight inches of snow through all their territory. They have not begun to have the snow west of Winnipeg this year that we have had on our lines in Ontario where the storm centre seems to have been located principally. As to Port Simpson, there are several ports in that immediate vicinity which may be adopted for the final terminal of the road. In the agreement we speak of Port Simpson, but that would cover a radius of fifty miles, but the exact location of the terminal would be determined by anchorage facilities and advantages of harbourage. The climate at Port Simpson rarely exceeds a mean temperature of 50 to 55. It is on a degree of latitude about midway between that of London and Glasgow.

A shareholder—Is it an open port ?

Mr. Hays—Yes.

Mr. Alfred W. Smithers—I do not wish to detain the meeting after this long discussion for another moment, but I want to call the attention of the meeting to the position in in which we stand in regard to the government. There is no disposition on the part of the Grand Trunk Board, or its management, to hurry this discussion, but I may say that we have not been placed in this position by ourselves, but by the government of Canada. The government are going to bring this question before parliament the day after to-morrow, and we had to make the very greatest efforts to bring the thing into shape. It had to be put before you to-day, and I can only say, on the part of the board, and on the part of Mr. Hays, that the position of this company with the government of Canada, and in the estimation of the people of Canada, is of the closest description, and, after the way in which we have looked at this thing from every point of view, our position with the government of Canada and the people of Canada would be very seriously imperilled for many years to come if we did not carry out this agreement. (Hear, hear.) A great corporation like this must be guided by its management and by its directors. It is not good for this company to have all its reasons and policies proclaimed on the housetops. (Applause.) I presume that every speech that has been made here to-day has been made solely in the interests of the Grand Trunk, and solely with a view to helping us; but there have been such things known as views being put forward, even within a Company, that were not wholly guided by the interest of that company. I can tell you—and Mr. Hays will support me in saying it—that there are many schemes in Canada, which are only waiting to come out, but we consider the scheme we propose to you to-day, after long examination, is the best means for defeating those competing schemes —(hear, hear)—and we believe—not that we are leading you into new dangers to-day, by asking you to pass this scheme, but that we are putting the Grand Trunk into a position in which it has never been before, that we are strengthening it from the large increase of points from which we shall draw traffic, and to which we shall give traffic ; and, with regard to those holders of the junior securities, who have complained to-day, I consider the junior securities of this company, are only valuable because of the reversion for the future, and it is to the junior security holders I would commend this scheme more than to any others, as immensely increasing the value of their reversion. I have been rather led off the subject by my anxiety to put this question before you, but I will now go back to the question of the exact position of the board to-day. I do not know wheher Mr. Allen feels that he could—his father not being here to-day—having fully ventilated his father's reason for leaving us—whether he could see his way to withdraw the amendment he has put before us. (Cries of 'No.') Mr. Allen was a colleague of ours for eight or nine years, and the most pleasant relations existed between us, and I am only sorry that Mr. Allen is not here to-day. I am only sorry that Mr. Allen has not taken the trouble of asking us for an interview. I myself would have gladly gone and seen him, and gone through the amended agreement we have obtained since he left office; and I wish to say, with all respect to Mr. Allen, that the statement which he has put forward to-day really relates to the agreement, or what he thought was the agreement, when he left the board, but it does not relate to the agreement which we present to you to-day. That which we present you to-day is a modified and a much more favourable agreement—(applause)—and it seems a hard thing that our late colleague, acting within his perfect right in leaving us should now set himself against the most anxious consideration that eleven of his colleagues have given to this matter, to which I venture to say his colleagues have given a great deal more attention to it than he ever was able to do, and he has also set his opinion against the opinion of Mr. Hays.

Now you know, gentlemen, it is no use telling us that we have done well for the last nine years, it is no use telling us that Mr. Hays is a very clever manager—I believe him to be one of the cleverest railway managers in the United States—but is it reasonable that Mr. Allen who, as I say, is a great friend of mine, is it reasonable or likely that, living in England, brought up, no doubt, in a strictly legal and somewhat conservative atmosphere, that his opinion is to be more correct than the unanimous opinion of eleven of his colleagues, and, above all, more correct than the opinion of such an expert as we have got in Mr. Hays. Now, with regard to the question of voting to-day. It is not our fault that we are in this position. We have got to send Sir Wilfrid Laurier the result of this meeting. As the president has told you—and as I was in Winnipeg last year with him, I am able to confirm what he says—as the president has told you, we are wanted in the Northwest ; the government have entered into a partnership to take us to the Northwest under conditions which amply safeguard the Grand Trunk. But your company, if you reject this to-day will not be in the position it was before. You will lose power and prestige with the people of Canada and with the government of Canada, and you will be looked upon as having no lot or part in the development of that country. They will say 'There is that old fogey of a board in England who cannot settle upon anything ; we must rely upon the Canadian Pacific or some other line.' I wish to impress that upon you that the condition to-day is a very serious one. We have given the very best attention we can to this thing. The government has made us what we consider to be a fair offer, and we believe we can do business with them profitably to you. We believe that by this means, and by no other means, you will get into the Northwest, and we also believe that unless railways do get into the Northwest that territory can never be properly developed, and that railways getting there will have a great future in Canada. Therefore I ask you seriously to pause before you refuse to ratify the agreements for which the board and Mr. Hays have worked with the government and negotiated with the government for the last eighteen months, and which they now lay before you with a full sense of their responsibility.

The PRESIDENT.—Do you wish me to again read the resolution, or rather the amendment to the motion ? (Cries of 'No.') I will only remark that the tendency of the amendment is that the discussion should be further adjourned until certain information of a very detailed description has been furnished. Upon a mere glance at the amendment, I see that a large portion of it asks for information which under no circumstances can be obtained. Therefore, on that ground the meeting, if it were passed, would be stultifying itself. There can be no question of postponement. I have told you the position. The question is, do you, or do you not, accept the scheme ? We, all of us, regret that there has not been more time for consideration, but circumstances have been too strong for us—they have been explained by Mr. Smithers and Mr. Hays. I think you have before you all the material for coming to a decision, and I will ask you to come to a decision immediately. But it is my duty to put before you the amendment which has been proposed by and seconded by another gentleman. Shall I read it again ? (Cries of 'No.') Well, those who are in favour of the amendment be good enough to signify their approval. Those who are of the contrary opinion. The amendment is lost. I now have to propose the substantive resolution which I read to you just now. Those of opinion that that resolution be approved, be good enough to signify in the usual way. (Cries of 'All.') Those of the contrary opinion. The resolution is carried. (Loud applause.)

The retiring directors and auditors having been re-elected, the proceedings terminated with a vote of thanks to the president and directors.

Mr. Chairman, I am pleased with the attention the hon. leader of the House, the Finance Minister, the Minister of Justice and the hon. member for London (Mr. Hyman) and the other members of the government have paid to this very important document. I can only say that I hope they will read it over again very carefully, with more leisure to consider the different clauses than they have had to-night, I think they will profit by the reading.

Mr. FIELDING. I think we ought to say that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lefurgey) has contributed the most interesting statement that has come from that side of the House on this subject.

Resolution reported, read the second time and agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR. I suppose the House will rise now.

Mr. FIELDING. We will just introduce the Bill and take the first reading.

Mr. TAYLOR. We should only proceed one stage to-day.

Mr. FIELDING. That is all—the introduction of the Bill usually follows the resolution.

Mr. TAYLOR. Introduce the Bill to-morrow. When it is introduced it will probably provoke discussion.

Mr. FIELDING. Not on the introduction.

Mr. TAYLOR. It may. There are one or two hon. gentlemen who are absent now but who had purposed saying something before the resolution passed.

Mr. BRODEUR. On the second reading of the Bill full discussion can take place. The usual course is, after the resolution is reported the Bill is introduced.

Mr. FIELDING. But not proceeded with.

Mr. FITZPATRICK moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 72) to amend the National Transcontinental Railway Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

Mr. TAYLOR: Is the Bill printed? Is it to be proceeded with to-morrow?

Mr. FIELDING. I understand that it is printed and will be distributed to-night; and, if there is no objection, it will be proceeded with to-morrow. The Bill is a very small one, and is no substantial addition to what is already before the House.

Mr. LEFURGEY.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPROULE. It would be forcing this Grand Trunk Pacific measure through the House very rapidly to proceed with it to-morrow. We must have some time to consider it.

Mr. FIELDING. If to-morrow objection is taken, no doubt the Prime Minister will meet the views of hon. gentlemen. Before he left this evening, I asked what business would be taken up to-morrow, and he said we would proceed with this Bill. But, if any suggestion is made I have no doubt he will readily agree to it.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.10 a.m., Friday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, April 22, 1904.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. HAUGHTON LENNOX (South Simcoe) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 73) to amend the Railway Act.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). Explain.

Mr. LENNOX. This is a Bill very much on the same lines as the Bill introduced by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr Guthrie) last session. It was then Bill No. 74. That Bill went to the Railway Committee and was reported on favourably. An Act was passed in 1874 and another in 1878, enabling the Grand Trunk Railway Company to provide insurance for their employees. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fitzpatrick) will recollect that there is a question as to the jurisdiction of the two parliaments. The object of the Bill I introduce to-day is the same as that of the Bill introduced last session.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. RAYMOND PREFONTAINE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 74) to amend the Fisheries Act.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Will the hon. gentleman kindly explain briefly?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. The main object of the Bill is to provide for the licensing of whale fishing establishments. At the present time we have in the Dominion no law regulating the establishment of whale factories. The idea of this Bill has come to the government from legislation of the same kind which exists in Newfoundland. During the past year quite a number of demands have been made for whale factory licenses. As there are no regulations, the department has thought it proper to introduce this Bill so as to regulate this industry in the future. The legislation does not seek to license whale fishing or whale fishing areas but merely to regulate and control the whaling industry.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

JOINT STOCK COMPANIES' ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. M. K. COWAN (South Essex) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 75) to amend the Companies' Act, 1902.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Explain.

Mr. COWAN. The Bill is to amend section 40, chapter 15, of the Joint Stock Companies' Act. Under the section as it now reads you can reduce shares by by-law below the par value of $100, but if the shares are below par value there is no power to raise them up to $100 shares. This is simply to permit you by by-law to group a number of shares and thereby raise them up to $100 shares.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

Mr. F. B. WADE (Annapolis) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 76) to amend the Criminal Code.

Mr. LENNOX. Explain.

Mr. WADE. The object of the Bill is to amend the Criminal Code, as far as it relates to the province of Nova Scotia, so as to provide a better and speedier way of punishing parties who are caught stealing, or who are found in possession of gold quartz or amalgam. Under the law as it stands at the present time it is almost impossible to convict the parties. The principal provision of this Bill is that if a party is found with gold amalgam or gold-bearing quartz in his possession the burden is put upon him of proving that he has come by it honestly, a provision largely taken from the Act in force in western Australia. It was discussed in the House at some length last session, and was introduced as a part of the government amendments at that time. As the Bill did not get through then, I have taken the responsibility of having the amendments introduced this year in exactly the same form they were last session.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ALLOWANCES OF STAFF OFFICERS.

Sir FREDERICK W. BORDEN (Minister of Militia and Defence) moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole on Monday next to consider the following resolution :

That the pay and allowances of the officers of the general staff, headquarters staff, and district staff, respectively, not provided for in the Bill respecting the militia of Canada, shall be fixed by the Governor in Council.

He said : In reference to the notice of motion which has just been moved for consideration, I beg to say that I have received the consent of His Excellency the Governor General to its introduction.

Motion agreed to.

THE ESSEX FUSILIERS.

Mr. M. K. COWAN (South Essex). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call attention to a paragraph in the Ottawa 'Citizen' of this morning and if necessary in order to put myself in order I shall conclude with a motion. The paragraph is as follows :

The Essex Fusiliers are to represent the Canadian militia at the St. Louis exposition. The Fusiliers are a fairly good regiment, but they are not exactly the class of corps to be put on exhibition before the world as a representative corps.

I desire to say that while I have no knowledge of the Essex Fusiliers having been chosen to represent the Canadian militia at the St. Louis exposition, if any regiment is to be chosen that no wiser or better course could be made from regiments of the same number of companies as the Fusiliers. I feel that I must remonstrate against the aspersion cast upon that regiment by the paragraph in question. While I am not going to say that the Essex Fusiliers, for the number of companies, is the best regiment in Canada, I do say that it is second to none. The Essex Fusiliers have already on one occasion represented the Dominion of Canada in the United States. A year or so ago, when President Roosevelt visited Detroit, the Essex Fusiliers, crossed the river and participated in the review. President Roosevelt spoke in the highest terms of them. It was a gala day in Detroit, as you may imagine. Every newspaper in the state of Michigan was represented and they were unanimous in stating that so far as the bearing of the officers, fine physique of the men, the nattiness of their appearance, the perfection of their marching, they were surpassed by none of the American regiments present on that occasion. I wish to place myself on record in regard to this matter and to say that no aspersion of that character shall be allowed to pass while I have the honour to hold a seat in this House without my protest and something being said in favour of the officers and men of a regiment whose merits and position any language of mine would be inadequate to express. I therefore move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CLARKE. Might I ask the hon the Minister of Militia (Sir Frederick Borden) if the selection of this Fusilier regiment—and I agree with all that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cowan) has said respecting it—has been made by the militia authorities ?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. No.

Mr. CLARKE. This regiment has not been selected by the militia authorities to represent the Canadian militia at St. Louis.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. No, no regiment so far as I know has been selected for this duty.

Motion (Mr. Cowan) to adjourn, negatived.

THE TARIFF AND SHIPS' CABLES.

Mr. C. E. KAULBACH. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw the attention of the hon. the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) for a few moments to a matter respecting the customs tariff which materially interests the fishermen of the maritime provinces. I observe that by tariff item 542, ships' cables are admitted free of duty, whilst fishermen's ships' cables are charged 25 per cent. The fishermen are a class who contribute very largely to the revenue of the country. They are a class who should be looked after very carefully. The farmer is cared for to the greatest possible extent, and his binder twine is admitted free. I do not see why ships' cables for fishing purposes should not be admitted free as well. I wish to ask the minister if he will kindly give this matter his attention and view it as favourably as he can in the interests of the fishermen. I would also ask that the hon. minister consider this matter carefully and give the benefit they desire at as early a date as possible, as many new vessels are being built this year and it would be a great advantage to the fishermen if their ships' hawsers for fishing purposes were admitted free of duty as ships' cables are. I cannot see why the difference should exist.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). My hon. friend (Mr. Kaulbach) is of course aware that his request would require a tariff change. It is pleasant to hear hon. gentlemen on that side of the House express the desire to have something admitted free. We promise to give favourable consideration to all these matters.

Mr. COCHRANE. It must affect your heart I know.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister) moved second reading of Bill (No. 72) to amend the National Transcontiental Railway Act.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood last night that the second reading of this Bill was not to be gone on with to-day. As it was only presented to the House at 12 o'clock last night, it seems hardly reasonable to go on with the second reading now.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) will remember that I said last night that the right hon. the Prime Minister wished me to say that it was the intention of the government to proceed with the Bill to-day, and therefore I announced that as the day's business. I said that if to-day reasonable grounds were shown why we should take a different course I had no doubt, the right hon. the Premier would be prepared to give the suggestion favourable consideration.

Mr. SPROULE. That is exactly what the minister said, but I understood him to say that if any reasonable objections were raised it would not be gone on with.

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. gentleman might present his objections.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I made more than one application to obtain a copy of the Bill, but was unable to do so up to one o'clock to-day. I sent to the post office twice, it was not ready, and I have not yet received, it, and therefore, under these circumstances think the Bill should not be proceeded with.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Under such circumstances I withdraw my motion, and will say that I would like, if possible, to take that Bill up again on Tuesday next.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That will be quite satisfactory.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. There is a good deal of private business to be disposed of on Monday. We might dispose of it, and then take up this Bill on Tuesday again and then proceed with it from day to day until it is disposed of.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. So far as proceeding with it on Tuesday is concerned, I am quite ready ; so far as the other part of the right hon. gentleman's suggestion is concerned, I shall let him know on Monday what I think. I did not understand that it was covered by the terms of the resolution, and therefore I did not take that into consideration.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It is not. I have just given notice of a motion to have the Bill taken up from day to day until it is disposed of, and on Tuesday I intend to move this order.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. We shall be ready to go on with the Bill on Tuesday.

Motion withdrawn.

PETITION OF RIGHT ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. CHARLES FITZPATRICK (Minister of Justice) moved second reading of Bill (No. 38) to amend the petition of Right Act.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. What is the effect of the Bill ?

Hon. Mr. FITZPATRICK. It is of no great importance. The practice now is, when a petition for a fiat is presented, after the fiat is granted, to hand over the petition with the fiat to the solicitor for the petitioner, who takes it to the Exchequer Court and files it there. We have no control over the petition in the interval after the fiat is granted and before it reaches the Exchequer Court. The intention of the amendment is to keep control of the petition until it forms part of the record of the court. After the fiat is granted the Secretary of State will deposit the petition in the Exchequer Court office, and in that way any possibility of tampering with the petition will be avoided, and we shall be sure that it will reach the Exchequer Court in the form in which it was granted.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

YUKON TERRITORY ACT AMENDED.

Hon. CHARLES FITZPATRICK moved second reading of Bill (No. 39) to amend the Yukon Territory Act.

Mr. HAGGART. Explain.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Subsection 3 of section 5 of the Yukon Territory Act provides as follows :

> The natural-born and naturalized male British subjects in the territory, who have attained the full age of twenty-one years and continuously resided there for a period of not less than twelve months, shall elect two representatives to the Territorial Council, and such representatives shall have the same power and be charged with the same duties as those members of the council who are appointed by the Governor in Council ; and any person qualified to vote shall be eligible for election.

That section taken literally means that five representatives to the Territorial Council are to be chosen by the electors at large ; that is to say, every elector would have the right to vote for each of the five members. Acting upon what I conceive to be an improper construction of the Yukon Territory Act, the Yukon council have proceeded to divide the territory into five electoral divisions, and have given to the electors for each division the right to elect one man. I have some doubts as to their right to do that, although I concede it to be convenient for the purposes of an election ; and in order to set the matter at rest and to avoid all doubt as to the regularity of the ordinance passed by the Yukon council, I have introduced this Bill sanctioning what they have done.

Mr. HAGGART. We do not know what the divisions are. Perhaps the Minister of Justice can let us have a report showing them on the third reading.

Mr. LANCASTER. Has the Minister of Justice an explanation to make to the House on the latter part of the Bill, in regard to the qualifications of voters ?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. It refers merely to qualification as to residence. The council have the right to give the power to vote to any British subject who has resided in the district any time within twelve months prior to the time of voting. The ordinance of the Yukon council, No. 29, provides that, and has fixed the period of three months residence within the territorial district.

Mr. LANCASTER. Does the minister intend that this shall mean that a person who was entitled to be a voter at any time within twelve months, even if he has left the territory, should still be entitled to vote at an election. Because that is what it means, taken literally.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The Commissioner in Council in 1902, by ordinance 28, provided for the division of the territory into electoral districts, and for the election of a representative from each district instead of from the country at large ; and by ordinance 29 of the same year, a person tendering his vote is required to swear that he is a British subject and has resided for twelve months in the electoral district where he desires to exercise his right to vote. Since that time that period has been shortened to three months residence within the district ; so that in order that a man may vote in any one of these five electoral districts it is necessary that he should be a British subject, and if required, should prove that he has lived in the electoral district for three months immediately preceding the time of the election.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House went into committee thereon.

On section 1,

> 1. Notwithstanding anything contained in the Yukon Territory Act, chapter 6 of the statutes of 1898, or in any Act in amendment thereof, the Commissioner in Council may make ordinances providing for the division of the territory into electoral districts for the purposes of the election of the representative members of the council of the territory, each of such districts to be represented by one or more of such members, and ordinances prescribing, as a qualification necessary to entitle any person to vote at an election of a representative member for an electoral district, residence in the district at the time of the election or for any period not longer than twelve months prior thereto ; and any ordinance heretofore made by the Commissioner in Council in so far as it did or does so provide or prescribe, is hereby declared to have been valid and effectual from the date when it was passed.

Mr. LANCASTER. This Bill practically makes but one qualification to entitle any one to vote, and it is doubtful whether it therefore does not override the other provision on the same subject which my hon. friend says exists. We are prescribing what may be done by ordinances, and we are providing that a Commissioner in Council, may make ordinances prescribing, as a qualification necessary to entitle any person to vote at an election, residence in the district at the time of the election or for any period not longer than twelve months prior thereto. It seems to me that by this we are giving a chance for a very strong argument that we thereby exclude other qualifications. Suppose a person had been a resident for three months, during the twelve months prior to the election and then went away to Ontario, he could, under this Act, come back and claim the right to vote, notwithstanding the fact that he had given up his residence and gone to live somewhere else and he need not even be a British subject or of age.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The intention is to ratify and confirm the ordinances passed by the Territorial Council of the Yukon. My Bill was drafted from the ordinance and my desire is to follow the words as closely as I can. I should not like to amend it without having the ordinance before me. My hon. friend's objection is that the quality of British subject and residence in any territorial district at any time within the twelve months prior to the election, would justify a vote by a person who may no longer be a resident. In order to avoid the difficulty, I would be glad to ask that the committee rise for the purpose of considering the objection and seeing how far I can meet it.

Mr. SPROULE. Has there been any litigation ?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I want to anticipate any trouble of that sort.

Progress reported.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT.

Bill (No. 37) to amend the Exchequer Court Act (Mr. Fitzpatrick) read the second time, and House went into committee thereon.

On section 1,

1. Section 4 of chapter 8 of the statutes of 1902 is repealed, and the following is substituted therefor :—

4. Notwithstanding anything contained in section 51 (as enacted by section 1 of chapter 35 of the statutes of 1890) or section 52 of the Exchequer Court Act, where the Crown is a party to any action, suit, cause, matter, or other judicial proceeding, an appeal shall lie on behalf of the Crown from any judgment, decree or order of the Exchequer Court or of any judge thereof.

Mr. HAGGART. What is the reason for this ?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. When the Exchequer Court was first established, the right of appeal from it was given only in cases in which the amount at issue exceeded $500. Since then we have enlarged the scope of the Act so as to give the Crown the right to appeal, irrespective of the amount, subject to the control of a judge of the Supreme Court. We are now giving the right absolutely in all cases. We conceive that to be in the public interest. For instance, there may be cases in which the amount involved is very trivial and the principle at issue an important one, and we desire to have the right to appeal in all cases at the discretion of the minister.

Mr. HAGGART. I can quite understand that in exercising the right of expropriation, though the property may not be worth more than fifteen or twenty dollars, there may be a principle involved, and the Crown might like to have that principle decided otherwise than according to the judgment of the Exchequer Court. But what about the poor litigant, who has only twenty dollars worth of property in contestation. The modern principle is that where the litigation is for a small amount, the judgment shall be final. There are hundreds of cases of expropriation for the purposes of a canal or railway, in which a principle may be involved, but the poor devil whose property is being taken, does not care much about the principle. He wants the money.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. It seems to me that—if my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) will pardon me for borrowing his expression—the poor devil would be glad of a decision ; but what about the forty or fifty other poor devils who are dependent upon the points determined in the case ? My hon. friend is best qualified to speak on that point, because he must have in mind cases that occur on the canals. For instance, I have in mind a case that occurred recently, I think, in the vicinity of Cornwall canal, where a whole village was affected as a result of a diversion of a highway, and we had forty or fifty petitions for fiats to sue the Crown. One case was tried, but the others were held in suspense, because we wanted to have the question determined how far we were liable. The principle being determined for one, all the other cases could be settled. It may be that the amount involved in any of these cases is not large, but all the claims would aggregate a considerable amount. This amendment is for the purpose of avoiding litigation. I can well understand that it is not in the interest of lawyers ; but it is in the interest of litigants that we should endeavour to have some principle settled that will avoid what is going on now. There may be forty or fifty cases brought, in which the same principle is involved.

Mr. LANCASTER. Will not the same rule apply as applies in cases between subject and subject? We have many small claims for instance, arising in railway cases. We can trust the judges to learn what judgments have been given on appeal and to take the law from those cases. There must be enough cases decided by the Exchequer Court in which the amount is large enough to allow an appeal, and the decisions given in these cases appealed will guide the judgments of the court itself. There is this difference in favour of the contention of the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) that, whereas in cases between subject and subject you have the decisions of many judges, in cases of the Exchequer Court you have always the same judge.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. He is not always the same man.

Mr. LANCASTER. Nearly always. At any rate, we have a number of judges presiding over county courts who take different views of the decisions of the higher courts on questions of principle. I think there is a good deal in what the hon. member for South Lanark says; and the litigant, whether you call him by the name that has been applied to him in this debate or whether you call him 'the poor fellow,' or 'the persecuted individual,' ought to be treated with a little more consideration in these matters than this Bill will allow him. Suppose that a poor man has a small claim against the government, he ought not to be asked to have appeals in regard to that, more numerous than he would have in a suit between subject and subject. If the minimum for which an appeal is allowed is too large, it might be made lower. I do not recollect what the limit is in the Exchequer Court.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Five hundred dollars.

Mr. LANCASTER. It seems to me that would be a fair amount to leave it at. The Exchequer Court ought not to be appealed from in cases of less than $500. But, if the minister thinks the amount should be $300 or $400, that might be discussed. But, up to a certain amount the Crown ought to be satisfied, if the decision goes against it, that it owes the amount. There may be circumstances under which you wish to make a test case and, for that reason to appeal the decision in a small suit. But would not any existing difficulty be overcome in practice by the number of cases which would go above the minimum. And, could not we trust the Exchequer Court judge, knowing the law as shown by the appeals in these larger cases, to do justice in the smaller cases?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. My hon. friend (Mr. Lancaster) would be quite correct if this were dependent upon a mere question of law. But he must bear in mind that, under our Expropriation Act the judge determines in particular cases whether or not the work done by the government may not have benefited property, and if that may not be taken into consideration in diminution of damages. So, you have not only the difficulty my hon. friend pointed out, but you have the difficulty that the question may be a mixed one of law and facts, and so it is important to have each of the class of cases determined to which the same law and class of facts apply, so as to avoid litigation with an unnecessary number of people. Hon. gentlemen need not be afraid that the government will take an appeal in cases in which it is not justified. I can assure them there is much more difficulty in getting these cases tried in court than in settling them. It is more convenient to settle them, and much more pressure is brought upon the government to settle than to litigate. And it is only because we feel it necessary, at times, to have the question of law and fact tried out that we insist upon petitions of right. My hon. friend will bear in mind the principle that he enunciated that would apply in ordinary cases does not apply in a case of mixed law and fact.

Mr. LANCASTER. I do not know whether I am right or not—the minister can tell me. Is it not usual for the Exchequer Court judge to refer questions to some referee to ascertain the facts, the judge then deciding upon those facts? If so, we have in the Exchequer Court practically an appeal within the court. The high court judges often leave questions of fact to the county judge or to some referee to decide the facts while the judges themselves apply the law. This would be a guarantee against the mixing up of the law and fact. If this practice prevails in the Exchequer Court, it seems to me it would be a fairly safe rule it being understood, of course, that the Exchequer Court judge need not adopt the report of the referee, if he thinks it not right.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. There is a practice of referring these matters, I think, as a rule, to the registrar of the court. I think this is exclusively for evidence as to the facts. But that would not apply in the case I pointed out. I shall have to ask the committee to allow me to amend the Bill by adding a section which will have the effect of authorizing by law a practice which has grown up in the court, but which, if not authorized may expose us to trouble some day. The practice of the Exchequer Court is for the judge to settle the question of liability or non-liability, without assessing damages, and thereupon an appeal is taken to the Supreme Court upon that judgment. In such a case, you will observe, the amount of the claim is not assessed. There are cases in England, which I have recently come across, in which it is held that there is no appeal under those circumstances because there is no definite liability ascertained. I am afraid of difficulty arising some day if some cute lawyer raises this objection. In order to avoid that I want to establish by statute what has been established by practice up to the present time, in regard to these railway appeals.

Section 1 agreed to.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I move to add the following section :

Section 2 of chapter 8 of the statutes of 1902 is repealed and the following substituted therefor :—

2. The section substituted for section 51 of the said Act by section 1, of chapter 35, of the statutes of 1890, is amended by inserting after the word 'judgment' in the fourth line of the said section, the words 'or with any judgment on any demurrer or with any judgment which determines the rights of the parties, although the amount of liabilities or damages remains to be subsequently ascertained or assessed.'

Mr. HAGGART. Will this have any ex post facto effect ?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Only for the future. I do not think it would be fair to apply it to a lis pendens.

Amendment agreed to, and Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER. When shall the Bill be read the third time ?

Mr. HAGGART. The leader of the opposition is not here. He has a purview of all these Bills. I would like him to see it before the third reading.

Mr. SPEAKER. At the next meeting of the House.

SUPPLY.

House again in Committee of Supply.

Department of Customs, salaries, $57,160.

Mr. CLARKE. Are there any increases provided for ?

Hon. WILLIAM PATERSON (Minister of Customs). Yes, you will notice in this item there is an increase of $3,185 in the estimates for 1903-4. In the comparative statement of the clerical and other assistance under the estimates for contingencies last year, $5,625 are included in the vote for the permanent salaries this year. You will notice there is no corresponding item for clerical or other assistance in the contingencies this year, the reason being that these men have been made permanent employees. In a comparison of these two amendments added together there is an increase of $3,185, when you take it in that way.

Mr. CLARKE. To whom are these increases to be given ?

Mr. PATERSON. This item deals with the inside service entirely, the estimates for the outside service come later.

Mr. CLARKE. Have you any particulars as to whom these increases are to be given?

Mr. PATERSON. Yes. Under the provision of the Civil Service Bill of last session the temporary clerks in the department were appointed third class clerks. The hon. gentleman will remember the change in the law. On the 1st of January. 1904, the estimates for their salaries for the coming year ceased to be found in the contingencies.

Mr. CLARKE. How much of the increase will that account for ?

Mr. PATERSON. Some $700 is provided for increases. Mr. J. R. K. Bristol is raised from $1,400 to $1,500 ; John A. Watson is raised from $1,400 to $1,500 ; Charles Scofield from $700 to $800 ; Miss J. Young from $600 to $800 ; William Wall from $600 to $800. That makes $700.

Mr. COCHRANE. Why should you give to some an increase of $200 and to others an increase of only $100 ?

Mr. PATERSON. Because $800 is the minimum salary of a junior second and they were all put up to the minimum of a junior second. Then there was $1,200 for what are termed statutory increases. All the officers of the department who were entitled to it have received their increases of $50.

Mr. CLARKE. All of them have received it ?

Mr. PATERSON. All who were entitled to it. Some are at the maximum.

Mr. SPROULE. I notice you have three more junior second-class clerks. Were these raised from the other class ?

Mr. PATERSON. No, these are in the service at the present time but they are paid from the outside vote, and we are making provision now that they may be paid from the vote for the inside service. Of course, they will not be paid from the vote for the outside service. They are working in the office. The work in the office has increased so that we had to bring in some from the statistical branch.

Mr. COCHRANE. They would have been out of a job if you had not given them one.

Mr. PATERSON. No, they are now in the service and get their salaries. They were working in the statistical department, but the work in the inside has developed so much that we had to avail ourselves of their services.

Mr. COCHRANE. We hear a great deal about development. I do not think there is any place in Canada where it is going on so much as around this part of the country. You have not only got the buildings so overcrowded, that, as you used to say when we were in power, the roofs were almost lifted off, but you have every shack around the city rented as well. I see that your department has taken the old building vacated by Mr. Wood. What development there must be in the country when you require all this space!

Mr. PATERSON. That cannot be charged against the department very well.

Mr. COCHRANE. I think it is chargeable to the department. You have so many political heelers around that you cannot find room to accommodate them. You declaimed so loudly when we were in power that you made your voice heard almost up to the riding which I have the honour to represent in regard to this matter, but now you have the departments which we used to occupy so full that you have to rent places outside to accommodate all the people whom you have in the service. I go along the street and I see the customs located in a big building that the owner vacated to rent to the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence.

Mr. PATERSON. I still maintain the ground that we cannot be blamed for that very well. The customs house in Ottawa was burned down and the city of Ottawa had to get some place in which to transact its business. The local customs office had to get into quarters somewhere. We had to have some customs-house in the city where people could transact their business I think the local customs office has rented a portion of the Woods building for that purpose. If it had not rented that building it would have been obliged to have rented one some place else.

Mr. COCHRANE. You are quite ingenious at framing excuses.

Mr. PATERSON. Well, the hon. gentleman admits that it is an excuse anyway.

Mr. CLARKE. But he thinks it a very bad excuse.

Mr. HAGGART. I suppose the hon. Minister of Customs has the report of the deputy head of the department in favour of this change and the approval of council?

Mr. PATERSON. These estimates have passed council.

Mr. HAGGART. I beg pardon; I am asking you if you have performed what the law requires, that is to say, if you have secured a report from the deputy head of your department approving of the changes and if you have the sanction of council. If not, you have no right to ask for this vote.

Mr. PATERSON. If the hon. gentleman's question is as to whether the commissioner approves of this, I can only tell him yes.

Mr. HAGGART. Not at all; I am asking you if you have the report of the deptuy head of the department approving of this and if you have the approbation of council.

Mr. WILSON. Is the commissioner the deputy minister of the department and did he participate in the raise given to the deputy ministers generally last year?

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, the Commissioner of Customs is the deputy head.

Mr. WILSON. What is his salary now?

Mr. PATERSON. $4,000.

Mr. WILSON. That is a raise of $1,200.

Mr. PATERSON. No.

Mr. WILSON. According to the Auditor General's Report.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman will find that he appears before that. He got $800 as chairman of the board of customs in addition to that. The advance he actually gets is that while he had $3,600 before he now has $4,000. He gets that under the new Act that was passed.

Mr. WILSON. In the Auditor General's Report his salary is given for twelve months.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman will find another item of $800 as chairman of the Board of Customs.

Mr. WILSON. Does he still get that $800 as chairman of the Board of Customs?

Mr. PATERSON. No.

Mr. WILSON. It is all covered by the $4,000?

Mr. LANCASTER. I would like to know from the hon. minister exactly in plain language whether he has got a report from the deputy head of the department and the authority of an Order in Council which are necessary in order to enable him to legally grant these increases. I think the committee ought to know that.

Mr. PATERSON. These are not granted yet; these are estimates that are not being prepared. Before these increases are passed by Order in Council of course there will be a report from the deputy minister recommending them.

Mr. LANCASTER. I think that these things are required by law as necessary conditions precedent to our being asked to sanction the payment of this money. I do not think that the hon. Minister of Customs ought to ask the committee to pass these items in this way without these things that the law requires as conditions precedent.

Mr. FIELDING. You must first get your parliamentary authority.

Mr. SPROULE. No, no.

Mr. FIELDING. I think so. I have not the Act at hand but I think these conditions must be complied with. The hon. Minister of Customs cannot increase any salary without first getting the money voted.

Mr. SPROULE. You are now providing for the increases.

Mr. FIELDING. We are providing for increases which the hon. Minister of Customs proposes to make from the first day of July next.

Mr. LANCASTER. I cannot understand how it could be as the hon. Minister of Finance puts it. We are asked here to vote the money on the faith of something that the statute requires to have been done. We should not be asked to vote this money unless the increases have been legally and properly brought about. This committee ought to know whether the conditions precedent have been observed, before we are asked to grant these increases. We have no power to pass this item unless the deputy head has recommended these increases and unless an Order in Council has been passed. How do we know that these conditions will be observed? How do we know that the deputy head of the department is not going to say: Out of respect to the House of Commons I will certify to these increases? He is not obliged to do so and he ought not to do it for that reason. He ought to act upon his own opinion. He should not do it because parliament has given him an invitation to do so. I think we are beginning at the wrong end. The deputy head is supposed to say to parliament and to the country through parliament: In my opinion as the chief officer of these people, they are entitled to increases in salary. We give weight to his recommendation and vote money for such increases. We are supposed to give increases to officials because their superior officer, knowing their fitness and faithfulness, recommends them for increases.

Mr. FIELDING. I think my hon. friend has a mistaken conception of the situation. We are really not increasing the salaries of these gentlemen by this vote at all; we are giving the department power to increase them, subject to the requirements of the statutes.

Mr. COCHRANE. No, no.

Mr. FIELDING. Before the Minister of Customs can effectively recommend these increases, the recommendation of the deputy minister must intervene, but the recommendation of the deputy and the minister would alike be worthless if parliament did not provide the money.

Mr. CLARKE. Are you proceeding in the usual course?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE.

Mr. CLARKE. We are placing so much money, as I understand it, at the disposal of the minister, but we have not the recommendation of the deputy and do not know to whom these increases are to be paid. Is it not reasonable when we are asked to vote money, that we should have this recommendation of the deputy or a statement from the minister of the officers to whom it is intended to give the increases?

Mr. FIELDING. The Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) has given the names of the officers to whom it is proposed to give the increases. The House is not granting these increases at this moment, and if these estimates are passed and nothing more is done, these men cannot get the increases. They can only get the increase when it is recommended to the Treasury Board and to Council by the minister, and the minister can only do that when a recommendation is made by the deputy minister.

Mr. CLARKE. Is not parliament entitled to ask for that recommendation before voting the money?

Mr. FIELDING. I think the intention is altogether the reverse. You must get your appropriation of money in the first place.

Mr. CLARKE. It is in the power of the department to ask for it. In the way it is now being done, the minister can say to his deputy: I have so much money at my disposal to increase salaries; I would suggest to you—and a wink is often as good as a nod—that so and so, and so and so, should have an increase in salary. In this way he could go over the list until the appropriation given by parliament was exhausted. I would ask the Finance Minister if that is the intention. Is it unreasonable to ask that parliament should be in possession of the information we are now asking, the names of the persons to whom these increases are to be paid? We have received no specific information on this, but are merely providing money in advance, without knowing to whom it is to be paid.

Mr. FIELDING. There are sometimes proposals for increases outside the ordinary form and these have to be stated but I understand that we are now dealing entirely with statutory increases.

Mr. HAGGART. There is a change in the number of the staff, an increase from 34 to 45, and my argument was that it is absolutely necessary, before a vote is made, that the report of the head of the department shall be approved of by the minister and receive the support of council before any change can be made in the staff.

Mr. FIELDING. I agree that before a change in staff can be made there must be these reports, but they are not required before the money is asked from parliament.

Mr. CLARKE. I appeal to the minister if this does not place the matter absolutely in the hands of the minister of the department; that the opposition have to go it blind? All we are asked to do is to vote a lump sum.

Mr. FIELDING. Not at all.

Mr. CLARKE. We do not know to whom these moneys are being paid, and I think we are entirely reasonable in asking for definite information as to who are to receive these increases.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend (Mr. Clarke) is entirely wrong when he says we are to go it blind. These are statutory increases which are regulated by the statute. I understand the hon. minister (Mr. Paterson) to say that every man in his department who is eligible is to receive an increase.

Mr. CLARKE. Do the ordinary statutory increases exhaust the amount asked for?

Mr. PATERSON. Seven hundred dollars of the increase is accounted for by the fact that the minimum salary was increased $100 by the Act of last year. With reference to the $1,200, if the hon. gentleman has a civil service list and will turn to page 51, he will find the names of all the officers who have been permanent in the department hitherto. Next year there will be some more.

Mr. CLARKE. Does the Act contemplate that before an increase is given, a report must be had from the deputy minister recommending it?

Mr. FIELDING. Before it is given, but not before it is voted.

Mr. CLARKE. The argument was made for many years that worthy civil servants were discriminated against. If this is an automatic business, it will be possible for the minister to say that these increases have occurred all along the line.

Mr. PATERSON. Certainly we have had such an increase.

Mr. CLARKE. Where is the deputy's recommendation?

Mr. PATERSON. I have never known that the estimates as prepared by the deputy minister should be submitted to the House.

Mr. CLARKE. These are not estimates, they are increases.

Mr. PATERSON. They are increases founded on estimates. They have to be prepared and submitted to council and passed upon.

Mr. SPROULE. That is not the real question.

Mr. PATERSON. The real question is, am I doing it on my own responsibility or does the commissioner recommend these increases?

Mr. COCHRANE. No, you are trying to evade the question.

Mr. PATERSON. I am not trying to evade the question; the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cochrane) does not understand what he is talking about.

Mr. COCHRANE. I am glad the minister has wakened up. He did not know much until the Minister of Finance woke him up.

Mr. SPROULE. Last year there were nine junior second-class clerks, now there are 12, an increase of three. There were no second-class clerks, but some will have to be paid this year. The Civil Service Act provides:

> The government shall, from time to time, decide the number of officers, clerks, junior clerks, and messengers required for the work in the several departments of each division of the civil service.

Upon the basis of this estimate, an item is put in the estimates asking for so much money to pay these employees, but precedent to voting the money, the government must determine the number of servants they require or, otherwise, how could they ask for any specific sum of money? They must determine how many employees are required and then, when additional ones are needed they must say: We want money to pay for so many more employees.

Mr. ALCORN. The Minister of Finance argues the matter as if it were dealing merely with automatic statutory increases. As I understand, there is an addition of eleven officers to the staff, and therefore that part of his argument falls to the ground. The Minister of Customs says that these are estimates now being prepared; but he is applying to parliament for an appropriation, an entirely different matter. From the moment this is adopted by parliament it becomes an appropriation and ceases to be an estimate; and those in whose favour the hon. minister is asking for increases, or whom he is seeking to appoint, may, if this irregular proceeding is allowed, find themselves in the unpleasant position of having the Auditor General hereafter say that the whole thing is irregular and he may refuse to issue cheques.

Mr. FIELDING. I must protest against this statement that the matter is irregular. It is perfectly regular, in accordance with custom, practice and law. These statutory increases can only be made when the deputy recommends them.

Mr. ALCORN. I must call the minister's attention to the fact that it is not only in regard to statutory increases.

Mr. FIELDING. The Act says you shall not create clerkships until you have done certain things ; but you do not create them by passing this Act. You are simply giving authority to the minister, who must have the recommendation of the deputy after the money is voted by parliament.

Mr. LENNOX. No.

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. gentleman had better read the Act.

Mr. LENNOX. The Minister of Finance says this is perfectly regular, as a matter of law and also as a matter of practice. As a matter of practice, it is perfectly regular, for year after year, for the last three or four sessions, at all events, we have been calling the attention of the government to this irregularity, which, by long practice, they have attempted to make regular. That is what we object to. The Minister of Finance is entitled to great deference when he makes a statement on a question of law, although he is not a lawyer ; but I submit myself to the judgment of this committee when I read this section and endeavour to show that he is absolutely wrong :

A second class clerkship shall only be created by Order in Council passed on the report of the deputy head, concurred in by the head of the department, setting forth the reasons for creating the office, and after the salary has been voted by parliament.

Mr. FIELDING. 'After.'

Mr. LENNOX. Yes, after the salary has been voted by parliament. I wish to emphasize as strongly as I can exactly the point on which the minister proposes to hinge his argument. Now, what is perfectly clear to any reasonable intelligence is this, that before anything shall be done in the way of asking parliament to appropriate money for a position, it shall be ascertained, in a certain way defined by the Act, whether that office is necessary or not. The first step to be taken is that the deputy head is to report to his official head that there is a necessity for a clerkship. The next step is that that report shall be concurred in by the head of the department. If the deputy head does not take the initial step, you can not come before this House and ask for an appropriation. Something more than that is required. I argued last year or the year before that the report of the deputy head must be in writing. Hon. gentlemen opposite said that it need not be. They are going a step further now. They want to argue that it need not be done at all before the money is voted. My reason for holding that the report must be in writing is that it must set forth the reasons for creating the office, so that when the minister comes to this committee and asks for an appropriation we, as representatives of the people, shall be in a position to judge whether those reasons are good or not. If this committee grant the appropriation, then the government can create the office and appoint a person to the position, but not otherwise.

Mr. FIELDING.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend from South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) is a lawyer and I am only a layman. It may be presumption on my part to differ with him, but I am obliged to say, lawyer as he is, partly from my own common sense, and partly from information which I have obtained from lawyers, that he is absolutely and without a shadow of doubt wrong from beginning to end. The hon. gentleman proves himself wrong by his own quotation ; he has simply argued himself out of court. We are not creating any clerkships by our action here to-day. We are simply providing the money which is placed at the disposal of the Minister of Customs, subject to the terms of the Civil Service Act. I would like my hon. friend to observe that parliament does not create the office at all. We are not now creating a new clerkship or half a dozen clerkships.

Mr. LENNOX. You are asking us to create them.

Mr. FIELDING. We are not asking this committee to create them. We ask the committee to provide the money on which they may be created hereafter by the proper authority for creating them ; and that authority is not the committee of the House of Commons, but the Governor in Council, upon a report of the minister. When the minister comes to the Governor General in Council and asks that a new clerkship be created, he must submit the report of his deputy, and he must further show the council that parliament has voted the money.

Mr. CLANCY. Do you not think that parliament ought to be in possession of that report ?

Mr. FIELDING. I am not dealing with what ought to be, but with the statute as it is, and the practice followed is good law and common sense and according to the view of the Department of Justice, and is one which has always been followed.

Mr. HAGGART. Is it the view of the Department of Justice ?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes, and it is the view my hon. friend acted upon for years. My hon. friend, when he was Minister of Railways, never came to this House with a written report from his deputy when he was submitting his estimates. Of course, the estimates of the civil service are always prepared in conference between the minister and his deputy, and in that sense the deputy gives his approval, as no doubt he has done in this case, but that is not what we are dealing with. We are dealing with a demand for his written report, and it is plain, according to the statute, that the time for producing that written report is not when parliament is asked for the money, but when the proper tribunal, the Governor General in Council, is asked to fill the office. Then, and not until then, does the need arise for that written report. That report will be of no avail, unless parliament votes the money, and that is what we are asking parliament to do.

Mr. ALCORN. The Minister of Finance bases his view of the law not only on what he says is the effect of the section, but also on the custom of the department, which has obtained, not only under this regime, but under former administrations. I submit that we are not concerned in the least with what has been done heretofore, either by this or any preceding administration. What we are concerned with is the statute itself, and I agree with the hon. member for Simcoe.

Mr. HEYD. Of course you do.

Mr. ALCORN. I certainly do, when as in this case, his opinion is according to common sense and the fair construction which the language of the section clearly bears out. The section is as follows :

A second-class clerkship shall only be created by Order in Council passed on the report of the deputy head, concurred in by the head of the department, setting forth the reasons for creating the office, and after the salary has been voted by parliament.

The first step prescribed is the report of the deputy head setting forth the reasons for creating the office. It is perfectly senseless to say that the various steps prescribed may be taken in any order which the minister may see fit. It is surely according to common sense to say that the steps must be taken in the order laid down by the section. The second step is the concurrence by the head of the department. The third step is the Order in Council.

Mr. FIELDING. The money must be first voted by parliament.

Mr. ALCORN. The crucial point comes precisely then. The whole thing turns on the single word 'and.' I take it that after the action of the Governor General in Council is complete, then parliament is asked to vote the money.

Mr. FIELDING. That comes first and all the other things come after it.

Mr. ALCORN. The argument of my hon. friend from Simcoe is proved by the word 'and.'

Mr. FIELDING. The important word is not 'and,' but 'after.'

Mr. ALCORN. In my opinion the word 'and' shows that the argument of my hon. friend from Simcoe is correct, because otherwise that word would be wholly unnecessary. The section would then simply read : 'Setting forth the reasons for creating the office after the salary has been voted by parliament.' But the section is divided into two distinct parts. First, there is the action of the department and of His Excellency, and then there is the voting of money by parliament.

Mr. FOWLER. The statute prescribes three separate and distinct steps. First, the report of the deputy minister, which must be concurred in by the minister. Then there is the creation of the office by the council, for parliament has no authority to create the office. Then the money must be voted by parliament, or the act of the council becomes ineffective.

Mr. FIELDING. We are asking parliament for the money now.

Mr. FOWLER. But the statute prescribes the order in which the thing shall be done, and that is just the point. The initiative must come, not from the head of the department, but from his deputy. The report of the deputy must be concurred in by the head. Then after that is done and has been approved by council, parliament is asked for the money. But we have no report from the deputy minister, we do not know whether there is any such report in existence. If the initiative was taken by the minister and concurred in by the deputy, that would not be the proper way. The initiative must come from the deputy, who makes a written report, in which the minister must concur. The minister comes down with that report, concurred in by him, and asks parliament for the money. Then the minister can go before the council and have the clerk appointed. It is absurd for the Minister of Finance to argue that you can put the cart before the horse and take the last step first. The statute prescribes what steps should be taken and in what order, and we have here the Minister of Justice, who is the law authority of the government.

Mr. HAGGART. The Finance Minister is usurping his functions.

Mr. FOWLER. My hon. friend the Finance Minister assumes to be the law authority, but I do not know on what ground. Perhaps it is on the ground on which judges are appointed in Nova Scotia—because of their lack of knowledge of law. According to what we heard from an hon. member the other day, that seems to be the qualification for which the last appointment to a seat on the bench of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia was lately made. But it seems to me that the government had better produce an authority who would carry more weight in the country on legal questions than the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Customs asks us to vote this money without out having anything to show that the preliminary steps have been taken. He says that his deputy is in accord with him, but we want something besides the mere word of a minister to show whether these different steps have all been taken or not.

Mr. PATERSON. It seems to me that as hon. gentlemen opposite do not seem to understand this thing clearly, we might pass this item and they will have plenty of time to look into the matter and bring it up, if they choose, on another item. In the meantime, any information I can give the committee, I shall be pleased to give it. If there was any irregularity in what was being done here by us, it might be that what we considered necessary to submit for the committee's approval would be frustrated——

Mr. HAGGART. You ought to take your authority from the Minister of Justice.

Mr. PATERSON. If there was anything irregular the Auditor General, who so closely watches these matters, would refuse to sanction it. And as the Auditor General has sanctioned this course for the last thirty years under different administrations, I think that should pretty well settle it that this is the law. But if there is any information that I can give the committee I shall be glad to give it, and will pass on.

Mr. HAGGART. Before the minister passes on, will he allow me to correct him and to correct also the Minister of Finance. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) speaks of a practice for thirty years. He says that this is the course that I always adopted when I was a minister. I never did anything of that kind.

Mr. PATERSON. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that when, as a minister, he brought his estimates down to the House, he laid on the table the report of his deputy specifically recommending these things ?

Mr. HAGGART. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) imagine that I said anything of that kind ?

Mr. PATERSON. I certainly so understood.

Mr. HAGGART. I thought that I had stated the point clearly, but perhaps I put it so badly that it could not be comprehended by the hon. Minister of Customs. If there was to be a change in the cadre, there was a consultation between the deputy head and the minister. The matter was put in due form to be submitted to council—every one had to do it. It does not follow that the report of the deputy minister had to be brought to the House, but it was always ready to be produced and laid on the table, if asked for by the House. Why, look at the absurd interpretation the Minister of Finance puts upon the Act. The committee is to be asked to vote estimates, but the reasons for making those estimates is not to be known to the committee. There must have been reasons influencing the deputy head to recommend these changes and the minister to approve them. But the Minister of Finance would have parliament vote the estimates, then they will be passed by council, and then we will get the Governor General to make the appointment. The hon. gentleman, like myself, is not a lawyer, yet after all, it is a question of the meaning of plain English. But when the hon. Minister of Finance quoted the Minister of Justice as his authority for his interpretation, I think he went a little too far. I would allow the Minister of Justice to speak for himself. I doubt very much if he will stand as authority for the interpretation given by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. FIELDING. Let us see.

Mr. HAGGART. However, the course pursued when I was a member of the government was as I have described, notwithstanding what the Minister of Finance says. It is very essential that the council should have control over the different departments, and that cannot be done if parliament is to vote the money blindly, and then leave it to the deputy minister and the minister to make arrangements to spend it. You always should look forward to the criticism of council and the criticism of parliament afterwards. I believe that if the hon. Minister of Finance will look in the Privy Council he will find that there are regulations in regard to this particular point and how the thing is to be done in accordance with the statute.

Mr. LANCASTER. I will accept the invitation of the hon. Minister of Customs and will ask for information on this subject. I thought that the Minister of Customs would understand something about the law, and so, when I was speaking, half an hour or so ago, I did not think it necessary to elaborate the point. I thought that he would tell the House what the interpretaion of the section was, if I only called his attention to it. And, within, the last ten minutes he has volunteered two or three times to give us the information we require. I assume, then, that he has a fund of information—perhaps mountains of information. The information I wish relates to the interpretation of section 17, and I want that information in order that I may know what I am voting for. That section says :

> A first-class clerkship shall only be created by Order in Council, passed on the report of the deputy head, concurred in by the head of the department, setting forth the reasons for creating the office, and after the salary has been voted by parliament.

I will ask a few questions, and, if the hon. Minister of Customs cannot keep them in mind, will he kindly make a note of them. In the first place I would like to know if the report of the deputy head has been obtained ? Then, is it concurred in by the head of the department with reasons given ? And, if, so, I want to know what the reasons were.

If these things have been done, we come to the point where we can discuss whether the money should be voted or not. The Minister of Finance tells us, apparently, that it does not make any difference whether we vote the money first and then ask the deputy head to make a report, then the head of the department if he will concur in it, or whether we proceed in the other way. The Minister of Finance gives us a lecture on common sense. Well, my ideas of common sense may not concur with those of the minister. My own opinion, Mr. Speaker, is that the common sense among members in this House is pretty well confined to those on your left. It seems to me that common sense would indicate that there must be some reasons for asking parliament to vote this money, and some statement made pre-supposing that those reasons would be asked for. I concur with those hon. gentlemen on this side who have spoken on the matter, that we must infer that these things that are required are to be done in the order indicated in the statute. I appeal to the Minister of Customs—I have about given up hope of the Minister of Finance ; he thinks it enough to say that we cannot create the office in parliament, and he pays us the poor compliment of attributing to us arguments which we never used, and answering them. The Minister of Customs ought not to agree with the Minister of Finance in proposing these estimates. He ought to see that it does make a difference whether the requirements of this section are complied with before parliament is asked to vote this money or whether they are not.

To any member of common sense it would seem that parliament should have some reason for voting this money. Surely we are not to vote money here simply because the Minister of Customs prints the blue-book of estimates and puts some words in it and lays it before the House and asks for the money, telling us that he will give us the details afterwards. Now I want to know from the Minister of Customs whether there is any reason to suppose that these recommendations are going to be made by his deputy. We are not going to vote this money without any reason to suppose that it will be needed simply because the hon. gentleman says this was sometimes the practice under a former government. We certainly do want the opinion of the Minister of Customs as a part of this information, we want him to tell us whether his deputy will make that report and whether the minister is likely to sanction it. Unless that is going to be done we are making a senseless vote. There are four things required by this statute, as I understand it, for the creation of this office. The first is that the deputy head shall make the report ; the second is that the head of the department, the Minister of Customs I presume in this case, shall concur in it; third, that that report shall set forth the reason for creating the office ; and fourth, that the salary required shall be voted by parliament. We are asked, apparently by the Minister of Customs and by the Minister of Finance, to put the roof on the House before we have dug the foundations, before we have bought the land practically to build on. We have got to vote this salary without being shown that there is any requirement for it. I do not think the Minister of Customs has a right to ask the public money of this country to be voted, out of which to pay an instalment of these salaries, until we have that information.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Reference has been made to myself so frequently in the course of this debate that it might be considered an act of discourtesy if I did not say one or two words. I have been in charge of the estimates of the Department of Justice since 1896. For eight successive sessions I have brought the estimates here. When I came to the department I found there a deputy minister that had been appointed in 1893, when Sir John Thompson was Minister of Justice. So far as the practice of my department is concerned, and which is in accordance with the practice suggested here by the Minister of Customs, when it is found necessary to increase the staff of the department, application is made for an item in the estimates. That application goes to Council in the regular way, then we come to the House and the item is voted or refused. When the item is voted and placed at our disposal, then of course the deputy minister makes a report, and in that report I concur or dissent. If I concur in the report it goes to the Governor in Council who then passes on the matter. That is the practice which has been in existence ever since 1896, at least, but I am not quite sure that the practice was initiated in 1896. I have not heard it suggested that we should follow any other course.

Mr. FOWLER. Are you following that course in the present case ?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. This session I am creating a new position in the Supreme Court, and the practice I have mentioned has been followed with regard to it.

Mr. FOWLER. Do you think that is in compliance with the statute ?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. This is not a new departure, it is a practice which at all events has been in existence so far as the Department of Justice is concerned, ever since I took charge of it, and I am certain it was the practice followed during a time anterior to my taking charge of the department. Now I have given to the House what is the practice of the Department of Justice. It seems to me that had it not been for the arguments to which I have listened here this afternoon I never would have entertained a doubt that that was a proper practise, and I will give my reasons for that—because this is rather a serious legal question and I would like to follow out my argument.

Mr. ALCORN. In regard to the question of practice, does the minister refer to an estimate for a specific sum or to a general sum ?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The estimate is for a specific sum. I come here and ask for so many first-class clerks, so many second-class clerks and so much money to pay them. It may be at the time I ask for four first-class clerks, that I ask that provision be made for four first-class clerks ; it may be at the time I only ask for three, or two. When the item is voted then the money is made available to the Department of Justice, and when that amount is made available by the estimate being adopted, then a report is made by the deputy minister setting forth the reasons for the office to be created by the Governor General, provision for which has already been made by the estimate. It appears that some hon. gentlemen opposite have a doubt, but we cannot get away from section 6 of the Civil Service Act, which says :

> The Governor in Council shall, from time to time determine the number of officers, chief clerks, clerks, messengers and other employees that are required for the work of the several departments in each division of the civil service——

And so forth. Now mark these words :

> —but the collective amount of the salaries of each department shall, in no case, exceed that provided for by vote of parliament for that purpose.

The first thing you will see is a provision by parliament for the money.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Give me an opportunity of expressing my views. Now it is apparent to me that it is absolutely impossible to give effect to that section, to expect the Governor General to determine how many clerks he must appoint, and to be sure that the collective amount to be paid for them is not in excess of the vote of parliament, unless he knows what that vote of parliament is ; otherwise how can he determine the correct amount of the salaries ? It seems to me the section is absolutely conclusive on that point, and in so far as my humble opinion goes—and I give it with all due deference to my hon. friends opposite—I say it is absolutely in accordance with the practice that has prevailed in my department for all these years ; and I assume, and my hon. friends will admit, that the gentleman who is responsible for the preparation of the estimates under my control, knows what he is talking about, not only as the result of the long experience he has had in that department, but also because of his eminent ability. I would not say that I have ever consulted him specifically upon that point. If my hon. friend attaches any importance to it I shall be glad to consult him so as to get an opinion from him on the subject. I give the practice of the department as established by long usage and I am quite sure, in addition to that, that the deputy minister would say that the practice is founded on the law. I have given his opinion off-hand. It never would have entered my mind that there was any question in regard to the point if it were not for the discussion which has taken place to-day.

Mr. LANCASTER. Take section 6 ; how does the hon. Minister of Justice say that parliament would know the amount to vote unless they first had this estimate ?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Very simply by following out what the hon. Minister of Customs has done. He comes to parliament and says : I want so much money for so many first-class clerks.

Mr. LANCASTER. How do we know the amount ?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. He says I have so many first-class clerks in the department. It works out like a mathematical problem You only require to know the multiplication table to see how it works out. Say for instance that the hon. Minister of Customs has four first-class clerks in his department and that he wants two more. He turns up the statute and finds that two first-class clerks mean so much money. The statute determines the amount due to each. You cannot take a first-class clerk into your department except at the minimum rate.

Mr. LANCASTER. How does the Governor in Council know that he wants those clerks ?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. It is not the Governor in Council who knows it. It is the minister who knows it. The minister with his practical experience and his knowledge of the necessities of the department knows that he wants them. As far as I am personally concerned, I knew that I wanted two additional clerks myself without going to the deputy to find it out. Every minister knows after he has been in a department seven or eight years what assistance he requires.

Mr. LANCASTER. Does not section 17 of the statute tell him what to do ?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. No, we are getting back to the old subject. I can see it is not a serious discussion at all because my hon. friend (Mr. Lancaster) is too good a lawyer to press this matter further. What he really intends to do is to take up the time between now and six o'clock and to give my hon. friend the Minister of Customs a lesson in what he should have known long ago that he cannot pass his estimates through by simply saying what he wants.

Mr. CLARKE. If it would not be any reflection upon the Minister of Justice who has just given us an opinion off-hand and who, I am sure, desires to make progress, I would ask that the deputy minister should give us his considered opinion, and allow these items to stand in the meantime.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT (Minister of Trade and Commerce). Possibly the committee will permit me to state what I remember was the practice, certainly, for thirty-six years. During all that time I have had experience on both sides of the House, and this is the first time I have ever known either party to demand the information that my hon. friend from South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) has been asking for. I will not say that in no case have the preliminaries that he spoke of been observed under his regime, but I will say that they were not usually complied with and I think that he will not contradict the statement. The practice always has been in my time that the minister and his deputy confer as to what is required for the service of the department. That is always reported before council who passed upon it. When council has passed upon it, with the approval of the Governor in Council the estimates are brought down and laid on the table of the House.

Mr. COCHRANE. That is just what we want done.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have never yet heard that it was customary or necessary to produce the concurrence of the deputy minister for each particular appointment that is asked for. I do not think that I ever asked for it during the eighteen years I had the pleasure of being in opposition and I am perfectly certain that if it had been asked for it would not have been granted by hon. gentlemen opposite. I am merely speaking, not as to the question of law that was raised—I leave that to my hon. friend the Minister of Justice—but I am simply speaking as to the practice known to me for certainly thirty-six years.

Mr. HAGGART. The right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) has stated the case, because he has stated what has been the practice and no doubt it is the practice up to the present time. One would think this was a new question that had never been heard of in the House before. It has been discussed a dozen times in the House. I discussed it two or three sessions ago—I think the session before last. I did not ask that the report of the deputy head of the department shall be placed upon the table. I asked the hon. Minister of Customs if he had obtained the report of the deputy minister, if he sanctioned it himself and produced it before council—preliminaries which the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce admits must be observed before an appointment can be made. He says this has always been the practice.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I did not say it was the practice to have a written report from the deputy. My hon. friend knows that these matters are always sent to the Finance Department initialled by the Minister of Customs or the minister to whose department they belong. But, as to the formal report that is referred to in the statute, that has always been made in my time—I speak of a good many years ago as well as of the present time—after the vote in parliament has been obtained.

Mr. HAGGART. After the vote has been obtained ?

Sir RICHARD CATRWRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. HAGGART. The practice was the other way when I was in the government. Arguments have been advanced to show why it should be made before. However, this question has been threshed out in parliament—my right hon. friend must remember it—again and again and this is the first time I have ever heard any doubt expressed as to what the requirements are before an appointment can be made. This is the first time I ever heard doubt expressed by the hon. the Finance Minister. We can excuse him, however, because he is not always right especially on a law question. I was astounded when he told us that he had the assurance of the hon. Minister of Justice that he was right. I heard the Minister of Justice get up and make the statement that he would not have had any doubt about it if some of the legal gentlemen in the House had not raised the question and he was not positive in the matter. I do not think he is positive in the matter. If he looks at the debates in the House he will find that this question has been debated three or four times and he will find that his most distinguished predecessors have held opinions similar to my own.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Really, as a matter of curiosity, would my hon. friend bear in mind the request I made and give me the reference to a Minister of Justice who has ever given an opinion on the subject ?

Mr. HAGGART. Yes, I am going to hunt up the debates on the subject and I will be prepared to show to the hon. Minister of Justice that the consensus of opinion in the House is in the direction of that which I have stated.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I want to get the opinion of a distinguished Minister of Justice. Do not forget that.

Mr. HAGGART. Yes, I will get you one. My contention is that it has been debated again and again in the House. I raised the question two or three sessions ago. It was brought up in the House four or five sessions ago; it has been debated in the House in preceding parliaments, and I never had a doubt as to what the law was on the subject until I heard hon. gentlemen opposite to-night. There is a possible way of evading it. The Minister of Customs might have said: I have not taken these preliminary steps but I will see that they are taken before my estimates are passed. As a rule the law requires that the estimate be prepared in the manner contended on this side of the House.

Mr. COCHRANE. Until the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fitzpatrick) took a contrary view I always understood that the law was based on common sense and justice. Would not common sense say that it was absurd for the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) to ask for a sum of money to pay the salary of an officer whom he has not in his employ and cannot have until the preliminaries are complied with? As I understood the minister, he required a recommendation from his deputy minister for a certain number of additional clerks. The minister obtained an Order in Council creating that number of extra officials, then would not common sense say that, until the minister has that recommendation from his deputy and an Order in Council based upon it, it would be deceiving the House—and if business has been conducted in this way before I must often have been deceived—to come to the committee and ask for a sum of money to pay so many clerks when he had not the clerks in his employment? Does not the hon. minister see how easily an unsuspecting member like myself can be deceived; he tells me he has four clerks, and that he wants a thousand dollars to pay for them when he has not these clerks at all and has not taken the first step to obtain their appointment.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. My hon. friend is partly right and partly wrong; he says that I cannot create a clerkship without the assistance of the deputy minister; he is right about that. I come here and ask parliament to vote me the salaries of, for instance, four first-class clerks. At the time I make that application it is my duty to give to parliament the information necessary to enable them to determine whether it is proper that I should have that amount of money for the appointment of these clerks. That is the right of parliament, and it is the duty of parliament to demand it. But then I cannot take that money, I cannot dispose of it, I cannot create these offices when the money is voted for me, I cannot do anything of that sort until I have complied with the statute. When the money is placed at my disposal by parliament, it is necessary for me to obtain a report from the deputy minister, but that has to be done afterwards. It has always been done, and must be done, in this way parliament does not create the officer, it provides money for an officer to be created, and that officer is to be created on a report from the deputy minister of the department by the Governor General in Council

Mr. CLANCY. I am endeavouring to reach the common sense side of this matter. How is the necessity for the appointment of an additional clerk to be known by parliament? By not having the recommendation of the deputy are we not neglecting an important safeguard?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The responsibility to parliament for statements made here does not rest on the deputy head of the department but on the minister. The minister is responsible to parliament for the statement that he requires so many clerks.

Mr. CLANCY. Under certain conditions.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. For the responsibility of that statement he cannot shield himself behind his deputy; he alone is responsible to parliament and he cannot escape his responsibility

Mr. CLANCY. The mere responsibility of a minister to parliament does not seem to be sufficient; parliament should have better information and a better safeguard. The minister may suffer afterwards, but the treasury may suffer in the meantime and the safeguard for that is what I have pointed out.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I shall not labour with the question further, but I may say that I have a present recollection of a vote having been asked from parliament by Sir John Macdonald—I forget now who was Minister of Justice at the time—for a judgeship, which had not been created by statute. The vote was asked for even before the statute had been passed. That is the established usage and practice, and we must bear in mind that parliament makes the law. It is a very interesting question whether or not the estimates do not amend any law in existence which conflicts with them. The estimates are a Bill, the Supply Bill is an Act of parliament just as much as any other Act we pass, and if the Supply Bill is in contradiction with an Act then existing it is a debatable question whether the Supply Bill does not amend the Act.

Mr. COCHRANE. Is that not a reason why we should be very cautious in passing estimates? If our action in voting money repeals a very healthy Act, then we should exercise every care in passing supplies.

Mr. LENNOX. The minister says it is a very interesting subject of debate whether the Supply Bill does not override an existing Act of parliament. Am I right in that?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. My hon. friend will supplement what I said I am sure. Every session we pass Acts of parliament and we put in the Supply Bill the phrase: 'Notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act.'

That is an amendment of the Civil Service Act.

Mr. LENNOX. I understand the minister to mean that when at the close of the session we pass the Supply Bill, that Bill is absolute so far as it goes and so far as it conflicts with any other Act it supersedes the other Act, as in the case which he mentions: 'Notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act.' I do not understand that the minister will go so far as to say that it supersedes it for the purpose of effecting the object it has in view.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Quite right.

Mr. LENNOX. It does not prevail from session to session, but is effective only for the purpose of validating what is provided in the four corners of the Act.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I agree.

Mr. LENNOX. Of course, the fact that I agree with the minister on that point does not do away with the proposition that we have a general Act to govern us from session to session.

Mr. LANCASTER. I think the Minister of Justice has much strengthened my claim on the Minister of Customs for this information. The Minister of Justice says, and I agree with him, that the responsibility is on the Minister of Customs with respect to this item; but I cannot see that he has any responsibility in the way the matter now stands. I am trying to put some responsibility on somebody. The Minister of Customs is trying to put the responsibility on the opposition for letting this item go through without giving any reason for it. The Minister of Justice says the Minister of Customs is responsible for giving us the information which we are entitled to, and nothing more. Half an hour ago I asked the minister of Customs whether there was any likelihood of these clerkships being created, and he will not tell us. I object as one member of this House to this item passing without some information on this point. If the Minister of Customs is not going to give us that information, he might say so. It would be more courteous to this House than to allow this discussion to go on, which is more or less a waste of time unless we get it. If the hon. minister thinks that he can get these items through without giving us reasonable information, I think he is taking a wrong course. How do we know what is required—how many clerkships the minister has in mind or whether this is the right amount practically or approximately? The colleagues of the Minister of Customs, both the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Justice, have given him a strong hint that he ought to give us some assurance of this kind. The difference between the hon. member for South Lanark and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce seems to amount to this, that one contends that the information should be before us, while the other contends that it should exist. The Minister of Trade and Commerce admits that the report should exist and should have been approved of by the head of the department, but he does not remember anybody insisting that it should be brought before the House and laid on the table. The Minister of Customs goes a great deal further: he wants us to provide these salaries without giving us any information whatever. If he will take a hint from his colleagues, if not from us, as to what should be done, I think he could get this item passed in half a minute; but if he thinks that by keeping silent he can do as he likes in the matter, I join issue with him. If the Minister of Customs wants the item to go through, I think he should give some reasonable assurance that these requirements are going to be complied with.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman is a hard taskmaster. He asks me a lot of questions, and I have wanted to say a word or two, but I have not had the opportunity, because hon. gentlemen opposite talk and argue so much. I said I would be glad to give any information in my power; but after the hon. gentleman asked the question, the debate passed into other hands and I had not an opportunity to answer him. I understand that he asks me if I have any serious belief that the extra officers we are asking provision to appoint during the coming year commencing on the 1st of July, will be appointed. I answer, yes, I have the most serious belief that they will be. If I had not, I would not ask parliament to place the money at the disposal of the department; because every minister is anxious for his own reputation to work his department as economically as he can, and when he asks parliament for an additional appropriation, he expects to give a reason for it. If the hon. gentleman asked any other question, I lost it in the multiplicity of his words. If it is whether I believe that the deputy will sanction the creation of these officers, I say most unhesitatingly that I believe he will.

Mr. SPROULE. I asked that an hour ago.

Mr. PATERSON. Because the deputy is the gentleman with whom I take conference, and who suggests that this extra help is necessary for the working of the department. When he makes that suggestion to me, and it is reported to council and obtains the sanction of council, we shall submit it for the approval of parliament. My hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) who has sat in this House for many years, will not, I am sure, say that this question was ever brought up until it was raised by the hon. member for Lanark some two or three years ago. I have no recollection that the legal question which has been debated this afternoon was ever argued here. I would ask my hon. friend from East Grey to say if he ever knew of a minister in any government, who, when he brought down his estimates, produced more than I am producing now? The deputy minister must be consulted in the preparation of the estimates. They know whether extra help is required or not, and it is after conference with them that the estimates are submitted to council and then, if approved, brought before parliament. If extra men and appropriations are asked for, hon. gentlemen are quite within their right in saying that the department is overmanned, and we are bound to explain why these extra appropriations are required.

Mr. LANCASTER. Will the hon. gentleman tell us whether he and his deputy have discussed this question already?

Mr. PATERSON. Certainly we have.

Mr. LANCASTER. Then why has he not got the report of his deputy? Such a report is necessary, and we are entitled to have it.

Mr. PATERSON. The report, after it is prepared, goes before council to be sanctioned. Then the substance of that report is found in the estimates submitted to the House.

Mr. LANCASTER. How can the substance of that report be found in the estimates unless it is made? I am asking whether one has been made, as required by the statute. If it has, let the hon. minister say so.

Mr. FOWLER. I wish to point out——

Mr. LANCASTER. I should like first to have a reply from the hon. minister.

Mr. FOWLER. If my hon. friend will wait a moment——

Mr. PATERSON. I only ask my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) to bear testimony to the fact that his hon. friend from Kings, N. B. (Mr. Fowler), will not allow me to reply. I mention this so that my hon. friend may not read me another lecture. If I do not answer, it is because I cannot.

Mr. FOWLER. I want to point out that the Minister of Customs seems to have the right idea of what his duty is in the premises. He says that he has already had a report from his deputy, in which he concurred, and that he laid it before council. So far he has followed the statute. But our pretension is that we should have that report itself and not merely its substance. We require that report in order to determine whether requirements of the statute have been complied with, and we should have it before being asked to vote this money.

That is the point at issue between the Minister of Customs and the gentlemen on this side of the House. I congratulate the Minister of Customs upon having followed the statute so far as he has, I congratulate him upon not having taken his law from the Minister of Finance, or in having followed, as the Minister of Justice stated, the practice that the latter gentleman has followed in the Department of Justice. I presume that practice is as the Minister of Justice has stated it to be, or he would not have made the statement; but I say the Minister of Customs has not followed that practice, because he has followed the statute, if we are to make the distinction as it has been made here. That being the case, the only point between us is as to whether he could produce the authority upon which the recommendation to council was given about the estimate. But this committee asks for the authority, the ground he has for claiming the extra amount. We have not before us anything at all to show whether this statute is being complied with, or whether it has been merely a recommendation of the deputy minister; and there must be more than mere talk over the matter, there must be some evidence produced, something beyond the simple word of the minister—however good it may be, and I do not wish to impeach it—but I say there must be some evidence beyond that and beside that to show that this is the opinion of the deputy head of the department. I think it is a very wise provision of the statute. I think that statute was wisely drawn in order that politics should be as much as possible eliminated from the management of this department, in order that promotions should be earned, in order that no new clerkships should be created to satisfy political exigencies, or in order to reward some party heeler for services he may have performed for the party, which are not always services to the country, but in order that only the necessary service of the country should be met and provided for. Therefore it was left to the initiative of the deputy head of the department, the responsible officer, the gentleman who is supposed to be non-political in his character, a non-partisan, the man who would only have to consider the good of the service and not the good of the party as well as the good of the service, which is the position of the minister of course, and the position in which the political head of any department is always placed. The minister has not only to consider the good of the service over which he is presiding. Our party government is such and our party system is such that it is unfortunately necessary for him, no matter what side of politics he belongs to, to consider as well the good of his party. For that reason we see, as the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane) has pointed out, that a great many more persons are being employed in the various departments of the public service than are absolutely necessary, employed in order that these men who have devoted their time, and attention, and their services to the welfare of the party, may be provided for and rewarded for those services that they have rendered to the party. As I say, that is a very wise provision of the statute. I again congratulate the Minister of Customs on having followed that statute according to the letter of it and according to the spirit of it as well. But I am only sorry that he has not gone further, and before he brought these estimates down, that he had not provided himself with that recommendation of the deputy minister, bearing upon its face his own endorsement showing his concurrence as the statute requires. The fact that the estimate is brought down in itself shows that the matter has been before the council; then, if the provisions of the statute, both the letter and the spirit of it, had been complied with, the minister would not be in the position which he now finds himself, and this item would have been passed long ago, and this discussion would not have arisen.

Mr. PATERSON. I have not followed all the provisions of the statute yet, that is simply impossible under the law, because the law requires that this money must be voted first. As I understand it, the deputy is not authorized to recommend for my concurrence the creation of a clerkship until the money has been voted.

Mr. FOWLER. Oh.

Mr. PATERSON. That is what I think. The hon. gentlemen have read time and again——

Mr. CLARKE. Oh no.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, the hon. member for King's, N.B., asked me if I believed that this would be carried out, if I would carry out this myself.

Mr. LANCASTER. I did not put it that way. I said I still was of the opinion that if these things had to be done in the reversed order to what the Minister of Justice had said, if the Minister of Justice was right, then the Minister of Customs ought to tell this House how far these negotiations have progressed. I did not say that it would be done in that way; I was careful to say that in my opinion these requirements ought to be followed in the order in which they have been discussed.

Mr. PATERSON. That is my recollection. Then supposing the hon. gentleman would refer the matter to the Minister of Justice for his opinion, that would have settled that point.

Mr. FOWLER. I am sorry the Minister of Customs does not seem to understand the statement he made himself a moment ago. He does not seem to have got a grasp of the situation. I do not wonder that the Minister of Finance felt it necessary to come to his rescue, because the Minister of Finance realized that the Minister of Justice was entirely at sea with respect to the question. Now I congratulated the Minister of Customs, because I thought by what he had said that he really did understand the question and that he had been honestly trying to follow the statute, and that so far as this matter had proceeded he had followed the statute with the exception of not having brought that report before the House. But the minister now seems to have the idea that we had been contending that this committee has the right to make the appointment or that his deputy minister has the right to make the appointment. That is not the contention we have been making. Our contention is that in the beginning the deputy minister, who is probably thoroughly conversant with the wants of the department and with the requirements of the service, looking over the situation, makes up his mind that in the interest of the public service, and in the interest of the Department of Customs, so many men are needed of a certain kind to perform efficiently the service of that department. Then the minister knowing that to be the case——

Mr. PATERSON. Don't you find that fact in the estimates themselves?

Mr. FOWLER. Not at all.

Mr. PATERSON. Why not?

Mr. FOWLER. If the minister chooses to bring down a certain estimate and we know that before he can bring it down he must have been to council, is it for us to find out whether the necessary preliminaries have been gone through? We have not that confidence in the government of this country to promise that of them. The very fact that it had been recommended by this present administration would be sufficient to create a suspicion about it, the very fact of their recommendation would be an extra reason for us to scan most carefully this estimate and the grounds upon which the estimate was made.

At six o'clock, committee took recess.

PRIVATE BILLS.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 24) respecting the Canadian Fire Insurance Company.—Mr. McCreary.

REAL ESTATE TITLE GUARANTEE AND TRUST COMPANY.

House went into Committee on Bill (No. 27) respecting the Real Estate Title Guarantee and Trust Company.—Mr. L. P. Demers.

On the preamble.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to me that we are in danger of complicating matters here. This is a Bill relating to a company already incorporated under the provincial authority of Quebec, and now it is sought to extend the powers of the company to all the provinces. There may be something in the laws of Quebec, or the powers which this company has, not applicable to the other provinces. I know there has been a good deal of discussion in the past about taking up these provincial companies and giving them incorporation under the authority of this parliament.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). This follows the charter we granted last session to the Royal Trust Company. The matter was thoroughly investigated at that time, and the Bill was changed and adapted to meet the views of the Department of Justice, and they advised us that it was an entirely legitimate and proper Bill. After careful examination in the department and in the Comuittee on Banking and Commerce the Royal Trust Company's Bill was accepted.

Mr. SPROULE. And this is a similar case ?

Mr. FIELDING. Substantially the same, and follows what parliament has granted under like circumstances to the Royal Trust Company.

Mr. SPROULE. It was because I did not know whether it had been considered along those lines that I asked the question. I remember the discussion that took place last session, and some of the grounds on which it was concluded that it was proper to grant such power. If this follows the same lines—

Mr. FIELDING. I have had it examined with that view, and I am assured that it follows the lines of the other Bill.

Bill reported ; read the third time and passed.

BRANTFORD AND HAMILTON RAILWAY COMPANY.

House went into Committee on Bill (No. 22) to incorporate the Brantford and Hamilton Railway Company.—Mr. Calvert.

On the preamble.

Mr. HENDERSON. I would like to ask the Chairman of the Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines, what has been done about the clause that was to be prepared by a sub-committee consisting of the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Barker), the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Emmerson) and the chairman of the committee (Mr. Hyman) ? Has it been dealt with in accordance with the instructions of the committee ?

Mr. HYMAN. In accordance with the instructions of the committee the clause was prepared, and when it is reached it will be read to this committee.

On section 7, subsection 5.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. This is a new clause, and it reads as follows :

Before making application to the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada, under section 186 of the Railway Act of 1903 for leave to construct the railway across any existing highway, the company shall apply to the municipality wherein such highway lies for leave to make such crossing, and, if such leave be not granted shall give such municipality at least ten days' notice of its intention to apply to the board for permission to make such crossing.

Mr. CLARKE. By the Railway Act of last year, these trams were prohibited from laying their tracks along highways. What was the procedure adopted if they desired to cross highways under the Act of last year ? What was the rule laid down ?

Mr. HYMAN. They would have to make application in the usual way to the Railway Commission.

Mr. CLARKE. What is the object of this subsection ?

Mr. HYMAN. This subsection 5 of section 7 is an amendment. Section 7 is the result of an agreement reached between the promoters of the Bill and the municipalities through which the railway projected by this Bill is intended to operate. In addition to that I understand that Mr. Lighthall, the secretary of the Municipal Association, was further consulted and as the Bill was considered to safeguard the municipalities, it was agreed to by all parties.

Mr. CLARKE. Does the fact of this clause being inserted in this Bill give this company any powers or privileges that it would not have enjoyed under the Act of last session, and which it would not have enjoyed if this clause had not been in the Bill ? If the Railway Act of last session provides a modus by means of which these trams can obtain power to cross highways, does this clause grant any greater powers?

Mr. HYMAN. If you will allow the chairman to go on with the other clauses of the Bill, I will send for the Act and see what it says.

On section 8,

Mr. CLARKE. What is clause 8 ?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. There is no change.

Mr. SPROULE. Why do you put in the word 'securities' instead of the usual term 'bonding powers.' ?

Mr. HYMAN. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) will find that is the word which is adopted in the Railway Act. There has been a model bill prepared and this practically uses the language of the bill which was framed at the time of the passing of the Railway Act of 1903.

Mr. SPROULE. Then, I understand that the word 'securities' would include mortgages and bonds whether they were first, second or third preference.

Mr. HYMAN. That is the idea.

On section 13,

Mr. HENDERSON. I think the clause goes considerably farther than we agreed upon at the Railway Committee. I think it would be well that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Emmerson) and the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Barker), who were the parties who were instructed to prepare this clause, should be present, at any rate, before the final stages of this Bill are taken.

Mr HYMAN. I have no objection to that. The clause was prepared by the hon. member for Hamilton and handed to the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals and myself. We both agreed with the clause, but I have no objection to adopting the suggesion of the hon. member for Halton.

Mr. CLARKE. I think a compromise was reached at the committee on the suggestion of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. J. Sutherland) that this Bill should not become operative if the parties who have a charter already to construct a line over the same route built and completed five miles within six months. They have until the 17th March under their charter to complete the road between Hamilton and Brantford. The committee thought it would be only reasonable that they should show some evidence of their bona fides by completing five miles of the road within six months. Under this clause they have to complete the whole road in six months.

Mr. SPROULE. No, five miles.

Mr. HYMAN. It is expressly stated that they have to complete five miles. If they do complete five miles in six months, this Act will not come into operation.

Mr. SPROULE. The Order in Council will not be passed.

Mr. HENDERSON. Do I understand that the Order in Council may pass before the expiration of the six months ?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I will read it again.

Mr. HENDERSON. I would like the chairman to read it again.

Section 13c re-read.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think, perhaps, that is giving the Governor in Council rather too much power and might lead to complications. I think it would be well to adhere to the decision that we came to in the committee, that the proclamation should not issue until after the expiration of six months. In my opinion the time is brief enough. The company have claims that we are not permitted to ignore. I do not think the disposition of the company is to ignore them and therefore in their absence we should not be too severe.

Mr. HYMAN. Of course, we all understand in the first place that the citizens of these municipalities are very anxious for the completion of this railway and it was felt that if you put a clause in by which there was no possibility of their going on for six months, notwithstanding the fact that they might make an arrangement with the company, which, whether it is acknowledged or not, asserts a prior claim, it would be entirely unfair to say that for six months they should take no step to proceed under this charter. Therefore this clause was adopted by the committee.

Mr. SPROULE. That was not the understanding in the committee.

Mr. HYMAN. I have no objection to the clause going back to the Railway Committee. I may say that the representative of the Hamilton and Ancaster Company saw this clause, and that it was in accordance with their desire in the matter. It is intended simply to permit the new company, if they make such arrangements as are satisfactory to the old company, to take action before the end of six months and to go on with the work.

Mr. CLARKE. The committee were certainly seized of the impression that the municipalities interested were desirous of having the work done, but having heard counsel for those who have the charter for the Hamilton and Ancaster railroad, they thought a case had been made out for some consideration and that a reasonable time should be given them to show their bona fides and to go on with the work. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Hyman) says that counsel for the Hamilton and Ancaster road and Mr Leslie, who appeared on behalf of the company, are both satisfied with the clause, so I am perfectly satisfied with it too.

Mr. INGRAM. I can testify to the solicitor and Mr. Leslie both being satisfied. This Bill has the remarkable feature of being satisfactory to both sides of the controversy. The only point I see deserving of comment is the clause providing that the Order in Council may issue before the 31st of October, and I can see a good reason why that should be so. Supposing on the 1st of October these gentleman had not proceeded at all, is there any good reason then why this Order in Council should not issue on the 1st of October ? It would be impossible to complete the five miles in thirty-one days. As this is satisfactory to Mr. Leslie, and the other gentlemen who appeared on behalf of the parties, I think the whole thing is satisfactory.

Mr. HENDERSON. The hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Ingram) has said it would be impossible to complete this road in a month and therefore in the event of no action being taken by the parties on the 1st of October, he has said it would be proper to issue the Order in Council on the 31st of October. As a matter of fact the road could not be completed within three months. If Mr. Leslie is a party to this arrangement and has concurred in this clause, I have nothing further to say.

On section 13b.

Mr. SPROULE. I would ask the hon. minister (Mr. Hyman) why this clause appears here now. When this Bill was under consideration I drew attention to the fact that it contained no time limit for beginning or ending the railway. His answer to me was that as the General Railway Act provides for this, it should not be put in the Bill. I am not objecting to it going in, but we should adopt either one course or the other and always either put it in or not put it in unless there is some special reason.

Mr. HYMAN. There is this reason in this case that in the ordinary course an Act goes into effect from the time it receives the assent of the Governor General. But in this particular case the Act was brought into force at a subsequent date.

Mr. SPROULE. That does not make any difference.

Mr. HYMAN. The hon. gentleman may be perfectly right ; I do not remember saying that in the Railway Committee. The secretary of the Railway Committee had this clause prepared and I had it before me, and I do not remember saying there was no necessity for the clause.

Mr. SPROULE. The Bill was reported without it.

Mr. HYMAN. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I had this clause before me, prepared by the secretary, at the time it was under discussion, and my understanding was that it was to be put in.

Mr. INGRAM. It was understood in the Railway Committee that the secretary was to draft that clause, but I do not remember it being afterwards submitted to the committee as drawn up. It was well understood by the committee what the clause was to be.

Mr. HYMAN. This clause is not in the exact wording of the clause in the Railway Act. This clause reads :

If the construction of this railway is not commenced and 15 per cent of the capital stock is not expended within two years from the issue of the proclamation.

On subsection 5 of section 7,

Mr. HYMAN. The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke) asked some questions about this clause which reads :

Before making application to the Board of Railway Commissioners under section 186 of the Railway Act of 1903 for leave to construct the railway across any existing highway, the company shall apply to the municipality wherein such highway lies, for leave to construct, and if such leave is not granted shall give at least ten days' notice to the municipality of application to the Board of Railway Commissioners for leave.

The General Railway Act, clause 186, reads :

Upon any application for leave to construct the railway upon, along, or across an existing highway, or to construct a highway across an existing railway, the applicant shall submit a plan and profile of such crossing, showing the portion of railway or highway affected, to the board. The board may by order grant such application upon such terms and conditions as to protection, safety and convenience of the public, as it may deem expedient, or may order that the highway be carried over or under the railway, or be temporarily or permanently diverted, and that such works be executed, watchmen or other persons employed, or measures taken as under the circumstances appear to the board best adapted to remove or diminish the danger or obstruction arising or likely to arise therefrom.

So that the effect of this clause must be to make the applicants go in the first place to the municipal authorities. Thus it is simply a greater measure of protection to the municipalities.

Mr. CLARKE. It is the intention of the subsection to give the municipalities greater protection.

Mr. HYMAN. It would seem that they cannot make direct application to the Railway Committee.

Mr. INGRAM. In case of refusal they can go to the Railway Committee. It sets forth in the clause what they must do. They must give certain notice and then go to the committee.

Mr. SPROULE. The original clause says 'go along or across'; but this I take it, would apply only to a crossing.

Mr. HYMAN. If the hon. gentleman will look at subsection 4, he will find that the question of the right to construct and operate on any highway, is dealt with there, and is left entirely in the hands of the municipality. It is only the crossing of the road that is protected in this way in subsection 5.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

SUPPLY.

Department of Customs—salaries, $57,160.

Mr. LENNOX. The consideration of this item does not involve merely the amount of money, but a great constitutional question. From time to time it appears to me that these constitutional safeguards are being infringed upon or dropped or beclouded by the present administration; and, important as it is in itself that His Majesty's opposition should guard the interests of the people of Canada in the matter of the expenditure of money, it is perhaps even more important that we should see that these safeguards are rigidly adhered to. Now, this is not a temporary question at all; it is a question of far-reaching importance, and the fact, if it is a fact, that the safeguard provided has been disregarded in the past is no argument that it should be disregarded at present or in the future. Although we sometimes forget perhaps the usages of parliament, I think we can congratulate ourselves that we never forget this important principle, that the statement of a member of this House is accepted as undoubted and incontrovertible; and when we have the statement of the hon. member for South Lanark (Hon. Mr. Haggart) as to what the practice was prior to 1896 under the administration, we may take it as a fact, established beyond question, that that was the practice that then prevailed. Whether it was or not, however, is not fundamental to the determination of this question. I repeat and it cannot be too emphatically enunciated, that there is a great constitutional safeguard of the people of Canada at issue in the question we are discussing to-night. If hon. gentlemen who are familiar with the laws and practices of parliament will for one moment reflect, they will see that three great safeguards stand out conspicuously in the constitution of Canada. One concerns the paying out of money of the people of Canada. The great safeguard in reference to that, which prevents the administration to a large extent, though not fully, I am sorry to say, from squandering the resources of the people of Canada, was the institution of the Audit Office, and the administration of that office by the present incumbent. Too much cannot be said of the efficient manner in which that gentleman has administered that office, and of the sturdy and loyal way in which he has stood up for the rights of the people as against the acts of the present administration. In some instances, in one instance that occurs to mind, into which I shall not go at present, as large a sum as over half a million dollars was saved to the people by the activity and loyalty of this officer. And even then he failed to accomplish all he thought should have been accomplished on behalf of the people. That is one of the safeguards which stands out conspicuously. Another safeguard is that when any impost or tax is to be put on the people, the first step to be taken by the government is to announce to the House that they have the consent of His Excellency to the introduction of a measure. That is a safeguard which, according to all constitutional authorities, is of vast interest to the people. In fact, too many steps cannot be taken in putting these measures through the House, so that the attention of the people's representatives shall be called to them in all their various stages. But this constitutional safeguard is one which has been more honoured in the breach than in the observance by the present administration. I do not mean that it is completely ignored. But in important questions, such as the building of the Yukon Railway and this new transcontinental line, this safeguard was not observed until its observance was forced on the administration by the activity of members on this side.

A similar safeguard of the interests of the people is involved in the question we are now discussing. The procedure as outlined in the Civil Service Act requires that there shall be first a report of the deputy head in writing, setting out the reasons why the additional clerkship is required. That safeguard is required because of the political influences that are apt to surround the head of the department. It is no secret in public life that ministers of the Crown are besieged by office-seekers, and it was thought wise that some one, removed from the political arena, and who has immediate supervision and control of the department, should be the one to recommend that an additional clerkship is required. Then, after the head of the department has passed upon the report and submitted it to council, and the council has approved of it, the final determination is left with parliament, the people's representatives in the House of Commons. It is said that the reason for the additional clerkship will be given after the vote is taken. But what possible benefit could there be in stating the reasons then. The deputy head would simply say that the money having been voted by parliament, all he had to do was to recommend the additional new clerk. The abuses that could creep in if such a course were followed are innumerable. I need only mention one. A minister of the Crown may have relatives,—which is something not unknown to the present administration,—he may have nephews, sons and others who would be of inestimable value to the public service in his estimation, but who would hamper and impede the administration of the department in the opinion of the deputy head, and they may be the last persons whom he would think of recommending if he were consulted, as he should be, according to the statute. Then the next step is the concurrence in the report of the deputy head by the head of the department. Perhaps ministers of the Crown do not like to think that these matters have to originate with the deputy head, but, acording to the statute, they must be initiated by him.

If then, the head of the department concurs in the opinion of the deputy head, the matter is advanced another stage—a second step toward the appointment has been consummated. The third matter is one of the great safeguards to which I have referred and to which I will specifically refer now—and I hope I shall have the attention of the ministers of the Crown, because I believe that any deviation from the rule has been a matter of oversight rather than of intention. It is provided, in the first place, that this report shall be laid before His Excellency the Governor General. There must be a recommendation in writing, concurred in by the minister, and, as a third step, laid before the Governor General. This is a great safeguard provided by the statute. It is the duty of the Governor General, when this matter comes before him, to consider the propriety of having this matter brought down to parliament at all. Ministers of the Crown, from habit may conclude that they are sovereign in these matters, that of their mere will they can bring down estimates of such size and such a character as they may see fit. Reflection will teach them that it is the mandate of the Governor General, after this matter has been submitted to and considered by him, that authorizes the introduction of it into this House. This is the fourth step, and it is only after we have all these preliminary steps, all these statutory requirements observed, that the minister of the Crown has the right to introduce the matter to the committee, or that, as representatives of the people we have the right to consider it. Do not forget this, because it is an important point, which we shall have to consider later on. Again I submit it as an undoubted fact, notwithstanding my high regard for the Minister of Justice, that not only is it true that the department cannot constitutionally and fairly bring down these estimates until these steps are taken, but the opposition are derelict in their duties if they allow these items to pass in that shape without, at all events, doing all they can to prevent their passing. Now, when all these steps have been taken, and when the committee have considered the reasons accompanying the application for this money, and if the reasons given by the deputy head seem just and fair, the funds are provided, and then the matter is in a position for the creation of the office. Now, it is not a question of production at all. It is immaterial whether we have the original report as prepared by the deputy head, and sent through the proper channel to the Governor General, or not. But, it is our duty to see that these steps are taken. We should have before the committee at least a copy or at least a statement of what the reasons were upon which this vote is asked.

The reason I have argued the question on this line is that this is one of three great constitutional safeguards of the people in a matter vital to the interests of the country, namely the question of taxation. There is no subject around which fiercer passions have raged than this very subject of the imposition of taxes. In Great Britain, in the old days the storm centre of political affairs, was the question which more than any other imperilled the safety of the British empire this question of taxation. Of course, I am not going to say what I do not believe—I do not think the question before us to-night imperils in any way the stability of Canada. But I say, and say advisedly, that it involves the same principle upon which these great agitations have risen in the past, and that the strict adherence to the constitution is just as vital to the preservation of our rights now, as at any time in the history of the empire.

I have an object in reviewing to some extent the line of argument that has been taken. I do not wish to delay unnecessarily the estimates of the hon. minister; but I do not want to be understood as arrogating to myself great importance or special knowledge when I say that I cannot accept the opinion expressed by the Minister of Justice on this question. Notwithstanding what I have heard from that hon. gentleman, I am, if anything, more convinced than I was before, I am absolutely convinced, that the true and only construction of the provisions I have referred to is the construction I have ventured to place before the committee. In doing so, I am paying a tribute rather than otherwise to the Minister of Justice, whom I respect very highly, and for whose ability I have the very greatest regard. So great is my faith in the ability of the Minister of Justice upon most questions, that it seems clear to me that he must be swayed by what has been transpiring in the various offices since 1896. His judgment must be so warped by prejudice upon this subject that here is a clear case in which I can show that, upon this question at all events, my judgment is more reliable even than that of the Minister of Justice. I hope I shall not be misunderstood in that regard. I intend to look up the authorities that have been suggested, and we shall have this matter discussed further. But, looking at the various provisions of this statute, I cannot but be impressed with the peculiarly apt and proper language in which the various sections of it are couched, sections which, by reason of their happy phraseology and peculiar fitness for the purpose for which they are intended, I venture to submit, are in strange and striking contrast to the puny, inconsequent and incongruous laws of the present administration.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to draw attention to one thing, that, it seems to me, must strengthen the conviction that the opinion expressed on this side is right. Some years ago we passed an amendment to the Civil Service Act, and established what was called a board. And that is part and parcel of the Civil Service Act to-day. Now, in working out that Act, here is one of the provisions ; and it was in consequence of this that I drew attention to it to-day, remembering the duty that was imposed upon the deputy head :

Once in each year, and not later than the fifteenth day of March, the deputy head of each department shall make and lay before the board, through the Department of the Secretary of State, an estimate of the number of vacancies likely to occur therein during the ensuing year, in the first division, in the classes of——

(a) Chief clerks ;
(b) First-class clerks ;
(c) Second-class clerks.

3. A similar estimate shall be made at the same time of the number of vacancies likely to occur in the second division to which promotions can be made.

Now this is intended to provide for the succeeding year. The number of vacancies that have taken place on account of death, promotions or increase of work, has to be, before the 20th day of March, made out and laid before the board through the head of the department. What was that for ? So as to enable the board to present this information to the council, and upon the basis of that, to make the calculation of how much money was needed for the civil service in that department. That information was regarded as sufficient to justify the council in putting in the estimates the items necessary to provide salaries for those parties, and that was the only case in which they had to do it. I asked the minister upon what data or ground he has come here for so much money, because I notice that he provides three more civil servants in one class than were in that class last year ; he provides eight in a new class that were not there last year at all. I assumed at once that they must have been recommended by the deputy head of the department, or otherwise the item would not have found its way to council, and we would not be providing the money for it to-day. It is the initiatory steps that I want to find out. Who is responsible for making the recommendation to the department, and through the department to the council, for this additional amount of money we are asked for ?

Mr. BARKER. I was not here this afternoon when this item arose, and would not now intervene were it not that I understand that the item contains the salaries of some new appointments such as a first-class clerk, or a second-class clerk, that did not exist before. Am I right, Mr. Chairman ? I understand that is the bone of contention now. Now, Sir, this question arose last year, and it was very fully debated, as will be found at page 2727 of 'Hansard.' On that occasion I took exception to the use that was being made by the government of the words 'notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act,' which little phrase appeared on almost every page of the estimates. It turned out that that phrase was being used by the government to repeal the Civil Service Act, and by some hocus pocus that nobody could understand, it not only repealed the Civil Service Act, but immediately afterwards the Civil Service Act took effect again. I called attention to it on that occasion, and I discussed the several provisions as to the procedure under which new offices were created, and the hon. the Minister of Finance answered, and he was replied to by the leader of the opposition. The whole subject was discussed very fully there, and I propose to read a remark or two on that occasion by the hon. the Finance Minister and one or two remarks made in reply to him by the leader of the opposition. I referred on that occasion to the very distinct words in the Civil Service Act describing the routine, the order of procedure for the creation of these extra or new offices. To my mind then, and I think to every man's mind, there could be no doubt whatever as to what the Civil Service Act contemplated. Not only was I confident in my own mind on that question, but I was confirmed in my opinion by the admission of the Minister of Finance on that occasion. The hon. the Minister of Finance did not dispute that these offices could not be created by Order in Council except under the strict regulations and provisions of that Act. But the hon. the Minister of Finance said this, that the Civil Service Act was capable of amendment, and that when, in the estimates every year, something new was added that was inconsistent with the Civil Service Act, the very fact that the words were inconsistent with the Civil Service Act made them an amendment to that Act. Well, it was one of the most extraordinary remarks I ever heard from a gentleman in the position of a minister of the Crown. The hon. gentleman gravely stated that when there was an evasion of the Act, it was an amendment to the Act. The hon. gentleman assumed that the words introduced into the estimates could form an amendment to the Act, and the amendment being enacted by this parliament, the instant the words passed the lips of parliament, their effect ended and the Act was restored. The argument only requires to be stated to show its utter absurdity. The hon. gentleman said :

> Every Act of parliament is capable of being amended, and when we introduce into the Supply Bill the words 'Notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act,' undoubtedly to the extent of these words, and in the case to which they refer, we amend the Civil Service Act.

The Act being amended it stood as it was before.

Mr. FIELDING. Not as respects that particular case.

Mr. BARKER. Would it not have been wise to say, so that there could be no doubt what you meant ; that this item being passed the Act went back to the old condition ?

Mr. COCHRANE. It is automatic.

Mr. BARKER. The leader of the opposition replied to that statement, to the position taken by the government, to the act committed by the government, in words that were very strong, but not one whit too strong under the circumstances. The hon. leader of the opposition said :

> I say that it was a most disgraceful piece of business.

I do not think those words were too strong. If stronger words could be used within the limits of what is allowed by the rules of debate, they ought to be used. It was a discreditable piece of business. The idea of hon. gentlemen professing that they, by a number of figures in the schedule attached to a Supply Bill, repealed an Act formerly passed years ago and remaining upon the statutes of this country, and that they do so notwithstanding the provisions of the Civil Service Act. Why, they are doing more than that, they are doing the same thing without using those words, they are actually putting in items in the Supply Bill that they have no authority to put in. They pass orders in council for estimates asking for supply from this parliament, and actually under the Act they have no authority whatever to pas those orders in council. The Act is as clear as the sun at noon-day that the government have no power even to consider the question of the creation of these offices until the deputy minister certifies that the officers are necessary. This is not a matter of political discretion to be exercised by the ministers for their advantage or for the advantage of the government. The whole object of the Civil Service Act is to remove that sort of thing and to make the responsible deputy minister, a life officer, responsible for the recommendations which he makes and no cabinet, no ministry can create these offices until the responsible, life-serving officer who risks his office if guilty of improper conduct, certifies that the office is necessary. When that is done the matter comes before council and then council passes an order, the proper officer having certified as to the necessity for the appointment. Council having adopted that report of the deputy minister it comes before parliament to vote the money. That is the procedure and the hon. gentleman knows it. The hon. gentleman did not pretend to the contrary; there was not a word of this to the contrary. He says :

> I quite agree with the hon. gentleman—

I happen to be the hon. gentleman.

> —that we ought to give careful attention to these words and see what they mean in each case.

He goes on to say :

> Every Act of parliament is capable of being amended.

Nobody doubts that. Every Act of parliament is capable of being amended, but when you want to amend the Civil Service Act, in Heaven's name, amend it. Take the responsibility of asking for an amendment and see if you can get parliament to adopt it, but do not, in council, behind the back of parliament, attempt to enact what parliament has never considered. You are altering the Act every hour of the day and you are altering the Act by every item you put into these estimates, when parliament has never considered whether the Act should be altered. The hon. gentleman may say what he likes. He knows that by inserting these items in the estimates he is amending the Civil Service Act, and if he wants to amend the Act let him do so openly by coming before parliament and proposing an amendment and not putting it in by this side wind, this violation of an Act of parliament.

Mr. FIELDING. Most of my hon. friend's observations touch a point which is not before the committee at this moment; that is to say, the use in the estimates from time to time of the words 'notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act.' I find that I stated the facts of the case, and under advice the law of the case, so clearly, so plainly and correctly last session, as has been read by my hon. friend, that I could not add a single word to it to-night, and I do not propose to do so. On the other point which has been the subject of discussion to-day, if my hon. friend were called upon outside in his professional capacity to give an opinion on that, I would attach great importance to his opinion, but I am unable to do so to-night, because I am afraid he is a little biassed by his surroundings. If he entertains the view to which he has just given expression, all I can tell him is that the legal authorities whose opinions we are bound to take differ from him. I cannot give him any better answer than that.

Mr. FOWLER. I suppose the hon. Minister of Finance refers to the hon. Minister of Justice ?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes, I do.

Mr. FOWLER. Well, the hon. Minister of Justice did not give an opinion. He said that he would take the matter into consideration. Would the hon. Minister of Finance pardon me for a moment ?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. The hon. Minister of Justice said he was very much impressed with the arguments from the other side of the House. The matter had not come to his attention, he had not taken it into consideration before, but he would take it into consideration and fortify himself with the opinion of the deputy minister. This is how the matter stands. That is all the opinion that we have from the other side of the House, even from the Minister of Finance himself, who does profess on most occasions to state the law on that side of the House, but as the hon. gentleman has not been trained in the law, naturally we do not give to his opinions the credit and consideration that we would if he had the advantage of a legal training.

Mr. FIELDING. I am inclined to think that amongst those who know us both, my legal opinion would not be much worse than that of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fowler) himself. Let me add, however, that the hon. member entirely misunderstands the position taken by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice. I heard the hon. Minister of Justice say distinctly. that if hon. gentlemen opposite had not raised the question this afternoon, and if courtesy had not obliged him to treat them with consideration, he would not have considered that the question admitted of a moment's debate.

Mr. CLARKE. He got new light from this side this afternoon.

Mr. FOWLER. I have not the advantage that the hon. Minister of Finance has of such an overweening conceit as he has, and in consequence, I would not put forward my own attainments in the profession to which I have the honour to belong. But, Sir, if the matter were left to the opinion of my clients, I do not think I would suffer by any statement they might make in reference to my legal attainments. The hon. gentleman may be a very fine lawyer, as a layman he may have a knowledge of the class of law which is commonly known as fireside law, which is a very dangerous class of law, he may be a very good journalist, which is his profession, although I do not think that he has achieved very much eminence in that profession, but, judging from the samples of law that we have heard from the hon. gentleman from time to time, I do not think anybody would have very much confidence in his legal attainments or in any statement he might make as to the law of this or any other country. As to the moral law, I do not think we can draw a more favourable conclusion judging from the exhibition we had from the hon. gentleman the other day, and judging from the statement of the hon. ex-Minister of Railways and Canals as to his conduct in reference to some memoranda which he found in the Privy Council after the advent of this administration.

Mr. BARKER. I understand the hon. Minister of Finance to say that there is some distinction between the discussion of last session and that upon the item now before the committee, because last session the words 'notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act' were used. Does that make any difference ? The only point is that this is a further concealment of the intention to evade. The hon. gentleman is seeking to amend the Civil Service Act. He is creating second-class clerkships. What does the Act say ?

> A second-class clerkship shall only be created by Order in Council, passed on the report of the deputy head.

Where is the report of the deputy head on which the Order in Council was based ? Does the hon. gentleman pretend that there is any such report in existence ? If the hon. gentleman says there is the argument can cease at once. We have not another word to say. But there is no such order in council. The hon. gentleman in assuming to pass the order in council without the report of the deputy head is deliberately violating an express provision of parliament. It does not require a lawyer to understand that much, I hope. It is simply a matter of common sense. I will read the words again. I am afraid the hon. gentleman is so busy in his department that he does not read these Acts or that somebody in getting orders in council through, does not take the trouble to look at the authority on which they pass the order in council.

Section 19 says :

> A second-class clerkship shall only be created by order in council, passed on the report of the deputy head, concurred in by the head of the department, setting forth the reasons for creating the office, and after the salary has been voted by parliament.

So that before council can consider the question they must have the report of the responsible deputy the man who knows whether the office is needed. This report having been approved by council then they are in a position to have the money voted by parliament but not until then. What an absurdity it would be for us to pass millions of dollars for ministers when they do not know that they will ever get a report of the deputy head! If the deputy head should report that the office is not needed, what is the hon. gentleman going to do about it? Parliament is gravely asked to vote money for an office which may not be created. As has been said the hon. gentleman is putting the cart before the horse. Why should we vote money to add to the obligations and taxes of this country including in these votes salaries for men whom they have no right to employ? It is absolutely folly even to take time to argue the matter.

Mr. FIELDING. Lest it might seem discourteous to the hon. gentleman not to reply to him, I may say that he was not in his seat when the whole question was thoroughly threshed out this afternoon.

Mr. BARKER. You cannot thresh it out, there is nothing to thresh.

Mr. FIELDING. Hear, hear.

Mr. BARKER. If the hon. gentleman says that the item includes salaries for second-class clerks who have not been recommended by the deputy head there is nothing to talk about.

Mr. FIELDING. Then why insist on talking?

Mr. INGRAM. The only explanation I could obtain this afternoon was the statement made by the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) that the submission of an item by a minister should be a sufficient reason for that item passing. That is a very clever explanation, but there is not much information in it. This item is for $57,160, an increase of $8,810. We find on page 17 that there is an increase of eleven clerks, three junior second-class clerks and eight of the third-class. No explanation is given of what the three new junior second-class clerks are to receive, or what the eight third-class clerks are to receive. This is a very large increase and the House has a right to know before we pass these estimates the necessity for these clerks in the department and the branch of that department and the particular service that these men are to be employed in. Who are they and what are their duties? I for one shall decline to vote for this item until this information is furnished. The argument this afternoon was as to whether the minister has a right to secure an order in council without a report being submitted to him by his deputy. I can readily see that the head of the department is open to political influence, and the fact of this check being placed upon him should be a great relief to him as when his friends come to him and put forth every effort to induce him to appoint unnecessary and incompetent men to office at good salaries, he can shelter himself behind his deputy and say: I require a report from my deputy, and I must concur in that before the man can be appointed. Of course we all know the usual chestnut that such men cannot be appointed because they have not passed the civil service examination, but men have been appointed who have not passed the civil service examination, and the law has sometimes been violated in that respect by these gentlemen.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Ingram) has brought the question down to a business basis. The discussion this afternoon was what some gentlemen opposite termed a constitutional point, but there is no constitutional point involved in this. The hon. gentleman is right in saying that it is my duty to give information to the House in reference to this proposed increase, because if the House is not satisfied they should not pass it. With reference to the three junior second-class clerks who are being employed I may state that the work of the inside department became so great that for some time past we have been utilizing in the office these three men who were already in the service in the outside department. One is in the accountant's branch, one I think in the correspondence branch, and the other in the checking branch. Their salaries have been paid from the outside vote. The intention is that as they are to be continuously employed in the inside service, they should be paid from a vote from the inside service.

Mr. INGRAM. What becomes of the items for their salaries in the outside service? Will they lapse?

Mr. PATERSON. The salaries for the outside service are taken in a bulk vote under the name of Customs under which are included the clerks engaged in statistical work, inspectors, &c. Owing to the increase in the work of the department I am afraid that instead of being able to reduce the amount of that outside vote, I will have to ask the committee to be kind and generous enough to give me even more than they gave me last year.

Mr. CLARKE. In addition to these extra sums?

Mr. PATERSON. Were it not that the business is increasing, we would be able to reduce the outside vote by paying these men from the inside instead of from the outside vote. I think the House will agree that this will be more regular and better. In the inside service, there were also what are known as temporary clerks. We had $5,000 voted for contingencies last year out of which we paid those temporary clerks. A change was made in the law last year which permitted the temporary clerks to be put on the permanent list as third-class clerks. It was desirable, instead of having them as temporary clerks, that they should be placed on the permanent list as third-class clerks. Therefore you find eight third-class clerks, of whom six have been in the employ of the department for many years, and the deputy head thinks that we shall require two extra. These temporary clerks have been paid out of the contingencies to the amount of over $5,000. We do not ask that item in contingencies, but it is included in this vote.

Mr. INGRAM. Who are these three outside men, and where were the located ?

Mr. PATERSON. W. H. Robertson, Alexander Ross and Charles B. Patton. They were in the statistical department. A large part of the work of that department used to be done at the various ports throughout the Dominion, which reported to the central office here. By that means we were never able to get out the trade and navigation returns until some months after the close of the financial year, sometimes as late as February or March. It was thought that with the expenditure of some thousands of dollars extra, which parliament thought was wise, we would bring from the larger outside ports the men who had been engaged in that work, and have all the returns sent to Ottawa and tabulated here, so that monthly statements could be got out. I may say in a general way that we have been able to accomplish that. As the men we brought from the outside ports were not enough to do the work, we had to supplement the staff with some new appointments, and it is from that branch that these three gentlemen have been brought into the inside service.

Mr. INGRAM. The hon. gentleman has referred to the unrevised monthly statement and places great stress upon it. I do not know where it is of service, because being unrevised, very little reliance can be placed on its accuracy ; so that you spend a large amount of money on it for very little good.

Mr. PATERSON. I am sorry the hon. gentleman made that remark. Until the final revision takes place it is unrevised, but for all practical purposes it may be relied on almost as fully as the revised report.

Mr. INGRAM. Then I would suggest that you strike out the word 'unrevised.'

Mr. PATERSON. I would not like to do that, because when the report for the twelve months is made up, it is possible that a slight error may be found in the monthly reports ; but for all practical purposes, it may safely be taken.

Mr. HENDERSON. With reference to the unrevised report sent out monthly, I think it does not contain all the information that would be desirable. I can see the advantage to the department of having these reports from month to month in the same form as the Trade and Navigation returns, because in that way no doubt the department is able to turn out the complete returns at a much earlier date than was formerly done, and that is very acceptable to members of parliament. But, if my memory serves me rightly, I think the column of duties is lacking in the unrevised report, and it would be very desirable if that could be included.

Mr. PATERSON. While it does not give the amount of duty, it gives the rates, I believe.

Mr. BARKER. The question we are discussing in committee is not about the particular value of the reports of the department, but as to the principle of the creation of these offices. That is what I would like to confine the minister to for the present. The minister tells us that these three gentlemen have been brought here from a distance, and have been performing their services here. Are they second-class clerks ?

Mr. PATERSON. No, they have not yet been appointed to those positions. We are asking for a vote in order that we may appoint them.

Mr. BARKER. Has there been any report from the deputy ?

Mr. PATERSON. There will have to be before they are appointed.

Mr. BARKER. I did not ask that. I asked if there has been a report from the deputy ?

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman is asking the question that has been discussed all the afternoon.

Mr. BARKER. I would like a statement from the minister if there has been a report from the deputy that these clerks are required ?

Mr. PATERSON. It was the deputy head who brought these gentlemen in, as I understand it. If he did that, he must have considered that their services were required.

Mr. BARKER. Is that the way the business of the department is conducted ? The deputy minister brings in these gentlemen and does not even make a report as to the necessity for employing them. This seems to be going still further away from the provisions of the Act. Last year we discussed all this and tried to get some rule of procedure adopted. The Finance Minister told us then that the estimates repealed the Civil Service Act. I hope he is not going to adhere to that. I am sure he will not seriously say that he is going to repeal the Civil Service Act twenty times every session. If the hon. gentleman claims absolutely the right to do this, let him say so. Last year he supported it simply on the ground that every time that appeared in the estimates, it was equivalent to an Act of parliament and was pro tanto an amendment of the Civil Service Act. We want to know just where we are in this matter. These gentlemen are already established in the office, and there has apparently been neither a report from the deputy head or anything else.

Mr. INGRAM. Had these three men a roving commission? The hon. gentleman did not say where they were located—those gentlemen who were collecting statistics.

Mr. PATERSON. They had been engaged in the statistics in the city here, and were brought into the inside department. They had been there over a year.

Mr. BARKER. They have been second-class clerks for a year and there is nothing to authorize their appointment?

Mr. PATERSON. My hon. friend from Hamilton was not here this afternoon and does not know the discussion that took place. I am not on that point at all. These gentlemen are not yet appointed junior second-class clerks. Before they can be appointed, there will have to be a report from the deputy, concurred in by the minister, and the office created according to law.

Mr. BARKER. But they have been here twelve months.

Mr. PATERSON. It cannot be done otherwise. If the hon. gentleman will only think for a moment, he will realize that the hundreds of clerks appointed during the past thirty or forty years were all appointed in this way. Will the hon. gentleman point to one who has not been legally appointed?

Mr. COCHRANE. How do we know?

Mr. PATERSON. My hon. friend from South Simcoe says that we have constitutional safeguards. There must be the sanction of His Excellency, which is one safeguard, and we have another very valuable safe-guard in the Auditor General, who has to pass upon all these matters. In all these years, the Auditor General has sanctioned every one of these appointments. Not one of these men can be appointed if we vote their salaries now, unless the law be complied with. If any one of them is not appointed to the position according to the statute, he cannot get the money. The deputy head cannot recommend the appointment, the minister cannot concur in his recommendation, the council cannot take action until parliament has voted the money. After parliament has voted the money, then all the steps will be taken which are required by the statute. If not, the Auditor General will refuse to sanction the payment. In every department the same rule is followed, but if hon. gentlemen want to amend the Civil Service Act——

Mr. FOWLER . We do not, but we want you to carry it out.

Mr. PATERSON. Is it not an answer to say that it is being carried out as it has been for years?

Mr. CLARKE. That is no answer.

Mr. PATERSON. Does the hon. gentleman say that the Auditor General has been passing salaries he should not?

Mr. BARKER. Yes, he has been compelled to do it.

Mr. PATERSON. Oh, no, I think the hon. gentleman will not say that the Auditor General has been compelled to pass one of these salaries which he did not approve of.

Mr. BARKER. Let me remind the Minister of Customs of what gave occasion to the debate last year. It arose out of a protest of the Auditor General against the appointment of a clerk contrary to the provisions of the Act. When he was called upon to certify and pass the salary of that particular gentleman, he objected and wrote to the department concerned asking the authority upon which that gentleman had been made a first-class clerk. The department took the position practically that it was none of his business. They did not use those words, but that was the effect of them. If the hon. gentleman wants to get the facts, he ought to get them before complaining that we are taking up time. He makes the assertion that never has such a thing occurred. Why, only a year ago we had the question brought up which gave rise to the debate from which I have just read. The Auditor General wrote to the Railway Department about a gentleman whose name, I think, was Mr. Dixon. He asked the authority by which Mr. Dixon had been appointed to a first-class clerkship, and why he was entitled to the money which the department was demanding for him. What was the reply of the Law Department to the Auditor General? Why, the reply was that parliament had passed the estimate and that was the end of it. We cannot go on for ever arguing in a circle. One session we are told that the Auditor General has nothing to do with it because the estimates were passed by parliament. The next time we are told that we must pass the estimate because the Auditor General will look after it. We want to know where the government stand. Last year the Finance Minister justified the payment of Mr. Dixon's salary on the ground that the Auditor General was shut out because the estimate had been passed and it was none of his business. He says, you have got to pay that money. It is none of your business, there are the estimates. The Minister of Customs says, oh, pass the estimates and the Auditor General will look into it. These gentlemen, I understand, have been here for twelve months. I suppose they have been acting probably in the class they are going into. They are now brought here as rambling officers of the civil service, they have been brought here for a purpose, and the hon. gentleman now puts them in these estimates. Mr. Dixon last year was made a first-class clerk, there had been no report from the deputy, not one, not a word from the deputy. The estimates had been passed, the gentleman was drawing this salary. The Auditor General protested. This is not a matter of rumour. Hon. gentlemen will find it all set out at length in the Auditor General's Report. He applied to the department and he was practically snubbed. He was told : What have you got to say to it ? Parliament passed the estimates, all you have got to do is to sign the cheques. Now the hon. gentleman says : Oh, we have passed the estimate, and the Auditor General won't sign the cheques unless this is right. But if he does not sign them they will go to the Treasury Board, who will overrule the Auditor General, and the moneys will go on being paid. That is the way the business of this country is being done.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) pointed out the constitutional safeguards we have. I do not remember the case my hon. friend refers to that the Auditor General brought before the House. But that case would hardly be a case where the exception proves the rule, because that might have been where there were the words : 'Notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act.'

Mr. BARKER. What difference does that make ?

Mr. PATERSON. Because I have not those words in the estimates I am submitting now.

Mr. BARKER. The hon. gentlemen left out those words so that our attention might not be called to the matter.

Mr. PATERSON. I am not asking for anything outside the Civil Service Act. If I were asking for that, and that was the subject under discussion, the hon. gentleman's remarks would be in order. But I am only asking for money to pay the regular statutory increases, that will permit me to pay the temporary clerks on the permanent list, and that will enable me to appoint other junior second-class clerks who, as I have stated, are already in the service. If parliament was refusing to do that, I would simply have to go on and use these men as we have been using them, paying them out of the outside vote as we have been doing. But I think it is more regular that, if they are to be engaged in the inside service, the money to pay them should be taken from the inside vote instead of the outside. That is all I am asking.

Mr. COCHRANE. But you cannot do it legally.

Mr. PATERSON. Certainly, we cannot take money illegally, and if we could, I am sure the hon. gentleman would not think that I would do it. This is a matter of paying these officers. I may say to the hon. member, we are just asking to give them what they are entitled to under the law, the money is being asked for within the law. There is not a single case this year, though it has not always been so in my department, there is not a single case in which I am asking for anything notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act. This is all covered by the Act.

Mr. INGRAM. I would ask the hon. gentleman for an explanation concerning the eight clerks. He said there would be six provided by the department, and the department would likely have to get two more new men. If you are going to get two new men how are you going to do it ? How are you going to provide the money for them in the way you have described in this item ?

Mr. PATERSON. Because I am taking a vote in that item not only to pay the six that have been paid out of contingencies, which vote is dropped in the contingencies this year, but I am asking $1,000 extra in order to pay for two new men that the department think are necessary to carry on the work, and that will have to be appointed during the ensuing year after July next.

Mr. BARKER. I do not want to occupy the time of the House needlessly but this is not a small question, it is a question affecting the procedure in all departments of the civil service. Now this question was discussed last year on the very point that the Minister of Customs now takes up, as voiding the statute. At page 49 of volume 1 of the Auditor General's Report of last year, there was this request sent by him to the Department of Railway and Canals. As I said, I think the officer concerned was Mr. Dixon, but no question was raised about the qualifications of Mr. Dixon, nor was any question raised as to the necessity of the appointment. We did not go into that. The only question was whether the government were doing their duty under the Act. That is the question now. Now the Auditor General wrote this to the Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals—which will be found on page 2727 of the 'Hansard' of last year :

> I have the honour to request to be furnished with a copy of the report referred to in section 15 of the Civil Service Act, recommending the creation of an additional chief clerkship in your department.

Now that letter was written in consequence of the department sending in a demand for the gentleman's salary. Then Mr. Jones of the Railway Department writes to the Department of Justice inclosing these letters, and he says :

> I am to request that you will be pleased to advise whether it is necessary in this instance to comply with the provisions of section 15 of the Civil Service Act as requested by the Auditor General.

Section 15 of the Civil Service Act reads as follows :

(a) The deputy head has reported that such an officer is necessary for the proper performance of the public business of the department, stating the reasons on which he has arrived at that conclusion.
(b) The concurrence of the head of the department in such report ; and—
(c) The salary has been voted by parliament.

That is the statement by the Deputy Minister of Justice of the provisions of the Civil Service Act. Then he goes on to say :

In schedule B of the estimates for the year ending June 30, 1903, there is an item :—
'For the promotion of F. A. Dixon to the rank of chief clerk, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, $1,800.'
Parliament has thus voted the salary as required by paragraph 'c' above, and it has done more, it has waived all the provisions of the Civil Service Act which affect the promotion.

Therefore the estimates have not been passed. No attempt has been made to alter the Civil Service Act, merely to pass the estimates. The Minister of Justice told the Auditor General that these estimates had been passed, it was a matter that did not concern him whether the provisions of the Act as to the report of the deputy had been complied with or not. Now we want to know just where the government are on this question. The hon. Minister of Finance said that that was an amendment to the Civil Service Act. We want to know whether that is the position the government are taking to-day on this question? If so, we will have to discuss in the committee everything that ought to be discussed by the deputy minister and his head, and laid before the cabinet. I think the government would find it very desirable to proceed according to the provisions of the Act, to obtain a report from the deputy head, to let the chief of the department pass upon that, and then they will know whether they want such an officer or not. But when we are told that, if we here pass an estimate for the salary that makes it obligatory upon the country to pay the salary whether the deputy head wants the officer appointed or not, I think it is about time we should inquire what the ministry are doing in this regard.

Mr. ALCORN. We are dealing here with certain sections of this statute relating to the appointment of certain classes of clerks. A certain procedure is prescribed in these sections. The question of whether the appointment may be made legally or not, if the sequence of the various steps is not observed, is another matter. But it is admitted by the Minister of Justice that that procedure is not observed and the Minister of Justice this afternoon made the same admission—in fact, the Minister of Customs tells us now that he has no intention of observing it and will not observe it in future. The statute provides that the deputy head shall make a recommendation, this shall be endorsed by the head of the department, it then goes before the Governor General, and, finally parliament is to be called upon to vote the money.

Mr. PATERSON. These steps are taken after parliament has voted the money. The deputy has to take the first step and the minister has to concur in his report after the money has been voted by parliament.

Mr. ALCORN. I am pointing out that the statute is the very opposite.

Mr. PATERSON. The Minister of Justice has stated that the hon. gentleman's reading is not a correct reading.

Mr. ALCORN. It is perfectly clear what the order of procedure is. The deputy head makes the recommendation, and the head of the department endorses it. This goes to council and the last clause is in these words 'and the salary has been voted by parliament.'

Mr. PATERSON. That is it—after the salary has been voted by parliament.

Mr. ALCORN. We have been arguing all afternoon whether the head of the department has the right to invert—because that is what they have been doing—the order of procedure laid down by this and kindred sections.

Mr. PATERSON. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Alcorn) allow me to ask him a question ? In that way I can better get at what he says. Suppose a case ;—suppose my deputy comes to me to-morrow and makes a report that he requires three extra junior clerks. I concur in the report, knowing that the work of the department has increased. That report goes to council. What I ask the hon. gentleman is this—would it be legal for council to pass that, the money not having been voted by parliament ?

Mr. ALCORN. Yes. That is exactly what I am pointing out—that the executive here is absolutely inverting the method of procedure laid down by the statute, and not only that, but we have the statement of two ministers that they have been in the habit of doing it and that they intend to continue the practice in future. I have heard it stated on this side of the House, when this matter was up during prior sessions, that the object in departing in this way from the procedure laid down in the statutes was to afford an opportunity for hon. gentlemen opposite to place their friends in office on the mere dictum of the minister himself. I would like to ask the minister if he can suggest any other reason why the statute is departed from in the method that, it is submitted, it has been ?

Mr. PATERSON. That has nothing to to do with it. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Alcorn) would only think for a moment he would see how it is. He has taken the ground that the deputy head of the Customs Department could to-morrow, in the month of April, recommend to me the creation of three new junior class clerkships and recommend the names of men fitted to fill those positions ; that I might concur in that report and send to council ; that council could create these junior class clerkships, and that these men could be appointed. If appointed they have to be paid their salaries. But parliament has not voted the money. The Auditor General, then, would have to sanction the payment of money to men for whom it had not been voted by this parliament. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Alcorn) as a legal man, take that position ?

Mr. ALCORN. Yes. But the case the hon. gentleman speaks of could not arise, for the simple reason that the statute lays down the manner in which appointment is to be made. If parliament does not vote the money, the money cannot be paid.

Mr. PATERSON. But if the men have been appointed ?

Mr. ALCORN. It does not make any difference. If they are properly appointed, the minister is in a position to come and ask for the money to be voted. But he is not in a position to come here until that has been done. But the minister has not answered my question I asked whether he could assign any other reason than the political reason why this practice has sprung up and why it is to be maintained ?

Mr. PATERSON. It has not sprung up. It has been in force ever since there has been a Dominion government.

Mr. ALCORN. We have the statement of the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Haggart) to the contrary.

Mr. PATERSON. It is the law.

Mr. BARKER. Let me ask the hon. Minister of Customs a question. How does he know that these extra clerks are required ?

Mr. PATERSON. How would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Barker) know, if he were conducting a business ?

Mr. BARKER. I did not ask the hon. gentleman to ask me a question, I asked him how did he know? The statute says that he must get the report of his deputy stating the reasons.

Mr. PATERSON. My deputy asks me for these men.

Mr. BARKER. That is not a report. The statute provides that he must make a report and state his reasons. The hon. gentleman is creating offices, so far as he can, without going through the preliminary of finding out whether his deputy will recommend appointments. The deputy must first recommend that the officers are needed and state the reasons why they are needed, and the minister cannot move until he has that.

Mr. PATERSON. I can only answer as I answered before, and I do not see what good can be done by merely repeating it. My deputy could speak for himself if he were permitted. He asks for the appointment of these men. And what can you do when he prepares the estimates and proposes in them that provisions be made ?

Mr. BARKER. Do these estimates state that the men are needed and why they are needed ? The statute is specific.

Mr. SPROULE. The wording is this :

> Once in each year, and not later than the fifteenth day of March, the deputy head of each department shall make and lay before the board——

Mr. FIELDING. What board ?

Mr. SPROULE. The board established under the amended Civil Service Act which is part of the Civil Service Act.

Mr. FIELDING. That refers to the board of examiners and deals only with questions of promotions.

Mr. BARKER. I will read, if the hon. gentleman will allow me the clause which has been cited by the Department of Justice. The Act provides that this office cannot be created until—

> (a) The deputy head has reported that such an officer is necessary for the proper performance of the public business in the department, stating the reasons on which he has arrived at that conclusion.

Does the hon. minister mean to say that because he had a chat with his deputy, he complies with the statute providing that he must make a report, stating the reasons on which he has arrived at the conclusion that such an officer is necessary ? Parliament holds the deputy minister responsible for his reports. We do not want to trust to the political head of the department. There is a business head of the department, the real head of the department, a gentleman who knows what clerks are necessary, what work is done, and we look to him to tell us how many clerks he wants. He is a responsible man. He must state that he needs these clerks and why he needs them, and not till then has the hon. gentleman the right to say one word in this House. He can only confirm that report.

Mr. FIELDING. I am glad to agree with my hon. friend from Hamilton on one point, and that is that a conversation between the minister and his deputy is not a compliance with the statute. But, the time for that compliance, as we are advised, has not yet arrived. We differ from my hon. friend, but we differ from him upon good legal advice, and with the practice of many years to sustain us.

Mr. COCHRANE. I do not understand the hon. Minister of Justice to give any such advice to me or to this committee. He said that he had followed a very eminent man as Minister of Justice, that he has found that practice existing after that eminent jurist had left, and that he thought he was right in following it. But he refused to give his opinion until he consulted his deputy. The absurdity which strikes an ordinary man is that in this case a minister of the Crown comes down and asks money to pay an officer whom he cannot appoint because he has not complied with the statute.

Mr. FIELDING. He certainly could not appoint him at present. That is correct.

Mr. COCHRANE. Yes, but you take the ground that the salary must be voted. I say that the deputy minister must first report, that the head of the department must confirm the report, that he must then get the order in council passed, and in the fourth place ask parliament to confirm it. Would not the same question arise as has risen before, when the Auditor General was told that the money had been voted and that therefore he had nothing to say? If we vote this money I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Finance, how do we know that these necessary conditions are going to be complied with? If the Auditor General refuses to authorize the payment of the money would he not get the same answer that he got before, that is to say, that the money has been voted and that it is none of his business?

Mr. FIELDING. The case to which my hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Barker) refers is a case where a salary was voted to a gentleman by name, of a greater sum than was authorized by the Civil Service Act, and therefore, words were inserted in the vote which had the effect for the time being, if you will, of amending the Civil Service Act as far as that officer was concerned. Nobody said that the Auditor General had no business with it. The Auditor General was quite within his right and power in calling attention to it. The proper legal authority advised that the Auditor General was mistaken and he was overruled. That is not the case here. We are not voting any sum in excess of that authorized by the Civil Service Act, we are not voting any sum to any person by name, but we are taking authority to appoint so many clerks, and before they can be appointed the provisions of the statute must be complied with.

Mr. BARKER. The hon. Minister of Finance is not quite accurate. The request of the Auditor General was not about a gentleman who was getting more salary than the clerkship to which he was appointed entitled him. The Auditor General formally wrote to the department as follows :

I have the honour to request you to furnish me with a copy of the report required under section 15 of the Civil Service Act recommending the creation of an additional chief clerkship in your department.

This is not a question of paying some gentleman a little more money than the Act authorizes ; it was the question of the creation of a clerkship and he wanted a copy of the report of the Deputy Minister of Railways.

Mr. FIELDING. The reason assigned by the Department of Justice, was that words were inserted in the estimates which distinctly dealt with that particular case. Upon the application of the Auditor General, the matter was inquired into and the proper legal officer advised that the Auditor General's objections should not be upheld. It was because of the insertion of these words. There are no such words in this case. There is no comparison between the two cases at all.

Mr. LANCASTER. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Finance if he does not think as representing the people and not the government, that the Auditor General's opinion is just that which the people would expect to be given by the Auditor General, and that which they would expect to be carried out by every member of this House. Parliament is vested with the decision as to whether these salaries shall be paid or not and as parliament has taken upon itself to say that they should be paid, the Auditor General naturally accepts that decision. Parliament is a body appointed for that purpose. That is what the trouble is about to-day. You ask parliament to appropriate money belonging to the King and belonging to the people also, because they have to pay it, for the purpose of paying some salaries. The Auditor General apparently thinks that he has to protect the people a little. He apparently thinks that the members of this House should also protect the people a little, and he thinks that if the members of this House choose to take it upon themselves to say that these salaries should be paid, it is then his duty to pay them. He thought perhaps that parliament had not noticed that these things were necessary, that have been pointed out, and he therefore drew the government's attention to them. The Governor in Council promptly overruled him and he will promptly overrule him if we pass this item now.

Mr. FIELDING. How would the point arise on which we could overrule him? Would the hon. gentleman point out in what way it would come to the notice of the Auditor General at all ?

Mr. LANCASTER. If the Auditor General scans these things, and I presume they will come before him. We were told this afternoon that we might trust the Auditor

General, so that we must understand that the Auditor General has something to say about this. I do not think he will refuse. I think he will say: Having been overruled, before and as parliament has voted this money, that therefore he must recommend it to be paid. If he did not say that he would be promptly overruled. The hon. Minister of Customs says that he is not inverting the order as to these requirements of the statute. He says that the fourth requirement, the vote of parliament, should come first. Why can he not equally well say that the third one should come before the first and second? There is just as much force in that contention. Why does he not say that the Governor in Council should say that this money ought to be paid before the deputy head recommends it and before he, as head of the department, confines the deputy's report? The first thing named in the statute is the recommendation of the deputy head, the second the confirmation by the head of the department, the third the approval of the Governor in Council and the fourth that parliament should vote the money. There is just as much room to contend that the Governor in Council can do his part before the deputy head does anything in regard to the matter, as there is to say that parliament can come in first and assume that these other things must be done. The statute clearly puts it in a certain order. The hon. Minister of Customs seems to think that he has made a complete disposition of the matter by his statement to my hon. friend the member for Prince Edward county (Mr. Alcorn). Supposing that the deputy head had a conversation with the hon. Minister of Customs, that they agreed that a gentleman should be appointed, and that the Governor then made an order in council, what would then happen? All that could then happen would be too late. They would have to wait until next session before they could pay that salary and would have no right to do such a thing except in anticipation of next year's votes. The government have no right to say that they intend to do a certain thing ten or eleven or twelve months before it is practicable for them to do so. The hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) is not informed by his deputy before parliament meets what the requirements are to be, but he knows when parliament meets that all estimates for the next year will have to be passed then. He does not see to these matters in time and therefore does not provide for the extra clerkships before asking for the vote, and he should have to wait and not employ the man till the proper time. I have not yet understood that the Minister of Justice has given his opinion that we were wrong in this matter. He said frankly there was a good deal to be said on both sides and did not say that he had given any opinion to the department. I presume if he has given an opinion to the department which is to be binding, it will be in writing, and that we will have a chance to see it and to examine its wording. I still say that notwithstanding all the minister says, the merits of this matter are with the contention of hon. gentlemen on this side. Not only is that the order of procedure as set forth, but I do not see how any other order could be adopted which would do justice to the people. Why should the minister ask to have money appropriated when he does not know that it would be required for the year? If the deputy does not yet know whether it is to be required, then next year would be time enough to ask for it, after the deputy and the minister have recommended it and have had it approved by an order in council.

Mr. BARKER. Quite apart from procedure and from the questions as to whether the order in council should be the last or the first step, the important thing is that parliament, after all, is the judge of the necessity and propriety of the employment and payment of the particular officer. In order that we may judge of that the Civil Service Act has provided facilities for us to obtain particular information; the only trustworthy information is the report of one officer, the permanent deputy head of the department. It is only on his opinion that we can act. That gentleman is an officer who is responsible to parliament; if he gives improper advice, he does so at his own risk. We should have his report, not verbal but written, which cannot be denied or forgotten, but for which he is responsible, stating the necessity, in his opinion, for the particular office. Even with this report it is our duty to consider whether we should grant the money, but without that report, which the Act of parliament declares an essential, we are not in a position and ought not to be expected to vote this money.

Mr. PATERSON. I can only repeat that my life and my legal training do not enable me to see the point, but, as a layman, I am absolutely amazed to find legal gentleman in this House take the position which has been taken by the member for Prince Edward county (Mr. Alcorn) who states that it might have been possible for us away back in August last, if the deputy head of the Department of Customs reported that he required three junior second-class clerks, if he brought that report to me, and I concurred in it, and that report went to council, that the council could appoint these three men.

Mr. BARKER. Nobody says that.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, the member for Prince Edward county (Mr. Alcorn) says so. Then from August until the next July, three men, properly appointed according to hon. gentlemen opposite, are doing what? One of two things, either drawing salaries illegally which are passed by the Auditor General, who is paying money which has not been voted by parliament, or they have been working for six months for nothing. These are the two alternatives under the position taken by legal gentlemen opposite. That is the argument of the member for Prince Edward county.

Mr. LANCASTER. No.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, he distinctly stated that to-morrow, if the deputy head were to recommend the appointment of these three men and the recommendation should be concurred in by myself they could be appointed.

Mr. LANCASTER. But not that they could be paid salaries till parliament votes them.

Mr. PATERSON. That is, we can appoint them but they must work for nothing.

Mr. LANCASTER. Yes, you can appoint them, their appointment to take effect when parliament met.

Mr. PATERSON. They can be appointed, but then they are members of the civil service.

Mr. ALCORN. The hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) rests his argument on the period when these men are appointed. The regular procedure of the report by the deputy, &c., should be taken and then the salary could be voted.

Mr. FIELDING. In the meantime you have them working.

Mr. PATERSON. If the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Ingram), who is discussing the merits of the case, desires to ask any further questions I shall be pleased to answer him.

Mr. INGRAM. I was not quite clear about the explanation about the three junior second-class clerks. I understood that they were taken in to the outside service and have been since engaged in the statistical branch of the Customs Department. I wish to know where they were employed before they were engaged in the statistical branch ?

Mr. PATERSON. Two of them came from the Toronto customs office and one was appointed to the Statistical Department in Ottawa at the time it was established.

Mr. INGRAM. How long is it since the Statistical Department Office was established ?

Mr. PATERSON. About three or four years ago.

Mr. INGRAM. And since that they have been temporary clerks?

Mr. PATERSON. They have not been for that length of time in the inside service, they have been on the outside work.

Mr. PATERSON.

Mr. INGRAM. As temporary clerks in the outside service ?

Mr. PATERSON. No, two of them were appointed permanently by order in council.

Mr. INGRAM. What are the names of the other six, and where were they employed ?

Mr. PATERSON. Their names are Miss B. F. Sixsmith, Madame Jolivet, Miss B. L. Masson, Miss J. G. Low, Miss F. M. Burt and F. Lessard. These are the six who were paid out of contingencies.

Mr. BLAIN. When will their appointment to the inside service commence ? What salaries have they been paid, and what increase of salary will they be paid now ?

Mr. PATERSON. They were appointed on the 1st of January, 1904, and at the following salaries : Miss Sixsmith at $600, Madam Jolivet at $600, Miss Masson at $600 ; Miss Low at $600, Miss Burt at $500 and F. Lessard at $500, amounting altogether to $3,400.

Mr. BLAIN. Have they been paid any salary up to this date, and if so out of what appropriation ?

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, they have been paid, I think under the clause of the Civil Service Act passed last year.

Mr. FOWLER. Was any question raised as to the payment of their salaries ?

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, there was some objection on the part of the Auditor at first, but he has paid them now.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the minister explain the objection which the Auditor had ?

Mr. PATERSON. It did not arise in my department, but in another department, and after the matter was determined there, they were paid.

Mr. FOWLER. These people were in the hon. minister's department, and I understand that a question was raised with respect to the payment of these particular parties.

Mr. PATERSON. The objection was raised with reference to the Post Office Department, and a decision was arrived at there under which the Auditor has agreed to the payment of these people.

Mr. FOWLER. There salaries were held up along with the others ?

Mr. PATERSON. We paid them temporarily while that question was in abeyance. We paid them out of contingencies.

Mr. FOWLER. But you have been paying them all along out of contingencies, and it is in order to avoid that we are now taking votes for their salaries. What was the question raised by the Auditor General ?

Mr. FIELDING. I think the question was whether the sums of money voted in the contingencies could be made available for the payment of these clerks when they were transferred to the permanent list.

Mr. SPROULE. Was it not on this ground? They had been temporary clerks before, and they were transferred to the permanent list. Then the question was whether they would come under section 20 of the amended Act, which says that their salaries shall not be paid unless there has been a full compliance with the Civil Service Act in their appointment and payment. In the Auditor General's Report, I find this statement from the Post Office Department.

This department is in receipt of a letter from Mr. J. L. McDougall, Auditor General, under date of the 24th instant, drawing attention to the fact that certain temporary clerks in this department had been appointed third-class clerks, and stating that the supplementary pay-list for the month of December, covering the salaries of the said clerks from December 12 to 31 had been amended by striking out the names of those whose age exceeded 35 years and those who had not passed the qualifying examination, and further stating that before authorizing the payment of the salaries of these clerks as third-class clerks, he would like to see some interpretation of the proviso contained in section 20 of the Civil Service Act amendment of last session.

Mr. FOWLER. It is rather strange that it is necessary for a gentleman on this side of the House to come to the rescue of the minister and supply the explanation that he is apparently unable to supply, although he had the assistance of the self-constituted wet-nurse near him. It is very kind on the part of the hon. member for East Grey, and I trust that the minister will properly appreciate it, to explain this point about which the Minister of Customs has just a faint glimmer in his mind. After the very lucid explanation which has been given by the hon. member for East Grey, he must be perfectly satisfied that it was the correct one.

Mr. PATERSON. I can assure the hon. gentleman that it was not at all necessary for him to point out to the House the superior knowledge which he possesses over that possessed by the minister. The House, of course, fully recognized my hon. friend's superiority in this respect. But it was very kind of him to give a certificate of character to the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) and for that reason his remarks are valuable. But of course his remarks with reference to myself were entirely unnecessary. The objection of the Auditor General to the payment of some salaries was removed by the section passed last year, section 28 :

All sums of money voted by parliament for the financial year ending on the thirtieth day of June, 1904, and applicable for the payment of the salaries or the increases to the salaries of any persons in the public service, shall, in the event of the promotion of any such persons to higher classes or grades, or on their transfer to other positions in the public service, or their becoming entitled to, or being granted, increases of salary under the provisions of this Act, be applicable in or towards payment of the salaries or increases to the salaries of such persons so promoted or transferred, or becoming entitled to or being granted increases as aforesaid ; and during the financial year ending on the thirtieth day of June, 1904, there may be paid from and out of the consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada such sums of money as have not been voted by parliament but are required for payment of such salaries and increases of salaries as are authorized by this Act.

Mr. FOWLER. I regret that the hon. minister is obstructing his estimates in this way. We had a full explanation from the hon. member from East Grey which was perfectly satisfactory. We want to pass the estimates as rapidly as we can so as to shorten the session, and I regret that the hon. gentleman is obstructing the estimates by reading something which the hon. member for East Grey has already read.

Mr. PATERSON. I beg pardon of hon. member for Grey. I was not listening at the time, but I am glad to have the support of his authority. It was certainly a valuable waste of the time of the hon. member for King's, that he should have been forced to listen to the same clause the second time.

Mr. SPROULE. That money is voted contingent on a compliance in every respect with the Act, and the Auditor General took the ground that the promotion was not according to the provisions of the Act.

Mr. PATERSON. I am sure my hon. friend from East Grey is perfectly satisfied that the argument advanced by this side meets the case. I do not think he would argue that the deputy head would recommend me to make a new appointment before parliament voted the money, because in such case either the Auditor General would have to sanction his payment when the money was not voted by parliament, or this man would have to work for nothing until the vote was passed.

Mr. BLAIN. What would be the increase in salaries over the salaries which these different officers had been receiving in their former positions ?

Mr. PATERSON. They get the statutory increase of $50.

Mr. BLAIN. What I want to know is the salaries they had been receiving and the salaries now proposed to be paid them in their new position.

Mr. PATERSON. They are getting the same salaries as last year with the $50 statutory increase.

Mr. BLAIN. I notice that the number of clerks in the department was 34 last year and it is to be 45 this coming year, an increase of 11.

Mr. PATERSON. There is really not an increase of 11. Six of these were in the department and paid out of contingencies, and we are not renewing the vote for contingencies this year, so that there are only five more.

Mr. BLAIN. Then the hon. gentleman is increasing the number by five over last year.

Mr. PATERSON. We propose to make junior second-class clerks of three who were in the outside service and are providing for two additional third-class clerks.

Mr. BLAIN. How many clerks were in his department when the hon. gentleman took office ?

Mr. PATERSON. I think there were 29 permanent, but I do not know how many temporary.

Mr. BLAIN. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will bring a statement of that down ?

Mr. PATERSON. Yes. I think it was 29 permanent and something like the same number that we have had in the temporaries.

Mr. BLAIN. How many permanent now?

Mr. PATERSON. Thirty-one are on the list. There were 33, but one has died and Mr. Code has been transferred from the Customs Department to the Department of Trade and Commerce. Their places, of course, have been filled. For instance, Mr. Code, who was a first-class clerk and assistant accountant, has been replaced in the Customs Department by Mr. Frost, who was next to him in the office.

Mr. BLAIN. Do I understand that the number of permanent clerks when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) took office was twenty-nine and the number now is thirty-one ?

Mr. PATERSON. The number now is thirty-four. When I spoke of the number being twenty-nine before, that was subject to correction.

Mr. BLAIN. How many temporary clerks were employed when the hon. gentleman first took office and how many are there now ?

Mr. PATERSON. I could not give that.

Mr. BLAIN. Can the hon. gentleman give me the number now ?

Mr. PATERSON. There are six. But there will be none if the House votes the estimates as prepared, because the temporary officers will be made permanent. They go to swell this number of thirty-four.

Mr. BLAIN. Will the hon. minister bring down a statement of the permanent clerks now and when he took office.

Mr. INGRAM. And add also the number of temporary clerks. I understand that he is now going to do away with temporary clerks.

Mr. PATERSON. I understand the hon. gentlemen want the number of permanent and temporary clerks in the department when I took charge of it, and at the present time. I will bring that down.

Mr. SPROULE. I desire to refer to a question to which my attention has been called. The Minister of Finance is here, and he may be able to answer my question. According to the amendment made last year to the Civil Service Act, assented to on the 24th October, the statutory increases were given from the 1st of January last. Provision was made last session for the $50 increase that would cover the current year from January last up to January next. Only $25 to be provided for in the financial year 1904-05, that is, for the six months ending 30th June, 1904, and it was only necessary to provide for the second six months of this year. But it seems that in the Railways and Canals Department the clerks are to get $50 for the fiscal year, so that, in all, for the eighteen months, they would receive $100. So, either some receive more than the statutory increase or others receive less. I am informed that the Minister of Finance would be likely to know what has been done.

Mr. FIELDING. I do not remember any question having arisen as respects this item, and I would not like to answer without having had an opportunity to look into the matter more carefully.

Mr. SPROULE. I am told that it is the fact. I have given the example of the Department of Railways and Canals. But I assume it applies to other departments, but not to all. So, it would appear all are not being considered equally.

Mr. FIELDING. I will make closer inquiry into the matter. I may say that the intention was to have it work evenly and not to discriminate.

Mr. BLAIN. I would like to ask with regard to the amount of money paid to the guarantee companies for the officers in the Customs Department.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blain) would like a statement of it ?

Mr. BLAIN. Yes, a statement of how much money was paid last year to the guarantee companies, and what losses, if any, the government sustained.

Mr. PATERSON. I will bring that down with pleasure.

Mr. SPROULE. Is it the custom to pay the premiums on these guarantees for civil servants ?

Mr. PATERSON. We pay but the amount is deducted from their salaries.

Mr. SPROULE. In all cases, and in all the departments ?

Mr. PATERSON. It is so in my department, but I cannot speak for all. I am not sure whether they have a different system in the Post Office Department or not.

Mr. INGRAM. Did I understand the Minister of Finance to say that it applied to all the departments ?

Mr. FIELDING. I think the Post Office Department has a special Act, but I am not quite clear as to its operation, as to whether the money is deducted from the salaries or not. The Post Office Act differs from the others and I would not answer definitely without further inquiry.

Mr. BARKER. Once or twice, the question was asked about the junior second-class clerks, and I have not heard the answer. Where are these three extra junior second-class clerks ?

Mr. PATERSON. Their work is in the inside service, but they are paid out of the vote for the outside service.

Mr. BARKER. Are they employed as junior second-class clerks ?

Mr. PATERSON. One is employed in the accountant's branch, one in check branch and one in the correspondence.

Mr. BARKER. But are they junior second-class clerks ?

Mr. PATERSON. There are no junior second-class in the outside service.

Mr. BARKER. Then, they are not junior second-class clerks ?

Mr. PATERSON. No.

Mr. SPROULE. Are we dealing with the whole vote ? The member for Hamilton (Mr. Barker) asked if these are second-class clerks——

Mr. PATERSON. They are not appointed to the inside service yet. But the hon. gentleman will see that I am asking permission to create three more junior second-class clerkships. And, when parliament votes the money, these men will become junior second-class clerks. At present, they are clerks in the outside service but working temporarily in the inside service.

Mr. SPROULE. It does not seem to me that voting the money is creating the office. it is one of the requirements of the law.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, it is a preliminary step.

Mr. INGRAM. This allowance for private secretary, $600—I think one of the officers of the department was acting in a dual capacity. Would the hon. gentleman give us the particulars of that ?

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, Mr. Bain, my private secretary, was made assistant commissioner. He remains my private secretary yet, but he does not draw any portion of the secretary's allowance. His salary is $2,800. In my office there are two shorthand writers. One of them, I am told, has her salary supplemented by $150 and another by $100. The hon. gentleman will understand that they work very long hours, very often up till six o'clock and after.

Mr. INGRAM. What are the special duties of the assistant commissioner, or has he any other duties than that of secretary ?

Mr. PATERSON. He acts under the commissioner. When the commisioner is away he takes the commissioner's place, and does such work as is assigned to him.

Mr. INGRAM. Then I understand the duty of the assistant commissioner is sometimes the same as that of the commissioner?

Mr. PATERSON. In the commissioner's absence.

Mr. INGRAM. In case the commissioner is busy at any time and the assistant can perform his duties, I suppose he is approached for that purpose ?

Mr. PATERSON. Yes.

Mr. INGRAM. Are there any other duties the hon. gentleman knows of that the assistant performs now that are not in keeping with the duties of assistant ? Does the hon. gentleman know of any other duties Mr. Bain performs other than those of assistant commissioner and of private secretary ?

Mr. PATERSON. No.

Mr. INGRAM. The hon. gentleman never heard of that gentleman performing any other duties while engaged in this department ?

Mr. PATERSON. I do not know what the hon. gentleman refers to.

Mr. INGRAM. The assistant commissioner is of a literary turn of mind, I understand.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes.

Mr. INGRAM. Does he at any time prepare any campaign literature for instance ? I put that plain question, because if he was appointed assistant commissioner and is performing other duties than those parliament pays him for, he is doing wrong. If he wishes to prepare campaign literature, I think he had better step down and out of his position, and go into the business with the rest of us. It is going entirely too far. If the young man is guilty of that—because I charge it as being improper— he is being paid by the money of both political parties in this country, and has no right, as long as he holds the position of assistant commissioner, to perform that work. I am merely drawing the attention of the minister to the fact, and ask him, if that be the case, that the hon. gentleman will see that he cease doing so.

Mr. PATERSON. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to ask if, while he is engaged in his duties, in business hours, he is engaged otherwise ?

Mr. INGRAM. No, I say he is a civil servant and that he is paid quite a large salary for performing his duties as a civil servant in the Department of Customs. He is paid by this country, and no portion of his time should be given towards preparing political literature. When he does that kind of thing he should step out and come into the political arena with the rest of us. But he has no right to be on the pay-roll of this country and do that kind of thing, any more than any other civil servant.

Mr. CLANCY. The Minister of Customs sits there with great complacency in face of this startling statement, and does not even give a smile of dissent. We should have some declaration from the Minister of Customs whether there is a civil servant drawing $2,800 and doing this thing, before or after hours. If he is able to perform the duties of assistant commissioner and private secretary of the minister, and as a sort of pastime writes campaign literature for the Liberal party, then it is a very grave matter. I think we should have some explicit declaration from the minister on this matter. We on this side of the House have very definite information that such is the case, and we should like to know from the minister if it has ever come to his knowledge that such a state of things exist. I am sure he will acknowledge that it is an impropriety for a single member of the civil service to be permitted to engage directly or indirectly in work of that kind. I am sure the minister himself would not plead for him if he had done it during hours, or while he was engaged in his work, or during the hours that he is expected to devote in his office as private secretary or as assistant commissioner. I am going to ask the hon. gentleman to make the statement in full, if he would see any difference between that position and the position of a civil servant going out and taking the stump for the Liberal party. Now that is the privilege of every man in this country who is not by some other reason prevented from doing so. The committee, I am sure, will wait with much anxiety for a clear statement from the hon. gentleman on this question.

Mr. PATERSON. Well, if the hon. gentleman, asks me what his duties are and how they are discharged, I may say that I think he is a most efficient public servant, that he discharges his duty, his whole duty to this country in the position he fills. I do not think there is a better civil servant in the country than he is, one more attentive to his duty, more courteous, and that gives stricter attention to it. As to what he does in all his spare hours, I do not know, but I do not think he neglects any public duty whatever that is committed to him, and that fairly comes within the sphere of the duty he is paid to perform. That I can say. The gentleman to whom reference is made will no doubt see the remarks the hon. gentleman has made and he may see fit to answer them. I can ask him with reference to that matter, whether his duties have been neglected in any way. But that is not charged.

Mr. CLANCY. I expected quite a different answer from the hon. gentleman. No person has made any complaint of neglect of duty. What I ask the hon. gentleman is if he is aware that a civil servant, his private secretary and Assistant Commissioner of Customs, has written any literature for the Liberal party during the period he has been in that position—if he is aware of it. I was rather amazed to hear the hon. gentleman say that the civil servant who is at present under a cloud of that kind would see the item and probably take notice of it. I think the Minister of Customs is the one to take notice of it.

Mr. FOWLER. That was to scare him.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman knows I am timid, but it would take something very different from that to frighten me.

Mr. FOWLER. I would ask if the hon. Minister of Customs has any knowledge directly or indirectly that Mr. Bain his private secretary and the assistant Commissioner of Customs, who is drawing $2,800 a year, has at any time during the period he has held that position, or since he has been a civil servant, engaged in writing campaign literature for the Liberal party ?

Mr. PATERSON. In what I have said I had no intention of in any way making a threat, but what was in my mind was that he would notice the remarks that the hon. gentleman has made and that the hon. would speak on the matter and tell me what he has done in reference to it.

Mr. FOWLER. It is most astounding that the hon. minister should say that this man would probably speak to him on the subject. Does the hon. minister not recognize his duty of speaking to this civil servant when this charge is made against him ? That he has engaged in this occupation and who, if he has done any such thing as that, has been guilty of violating every decency of the service ? Paid $2,800 a year of the money of the people of this country and employing his time, whether it be spare time or not is not the question, in writing campaign literature for the Liberal party and for the government. Where is the difference between this gentleman's conduct and any civil servant taking the stump in a campaign ? Where is the difference between this gentleman's conduct and any civil servant engaging in political work ? I am surprised that the hon. minister should take the stand he has taken, and I am surprised that he did not recognize it to be his duty to stand up in the House and say: I will make strict inquiries into the matter, and if I find that there is a tittle of fact in the statement that is made, if I find that this civil servant has been doing any such thing as that which has been charged, I will see at once that he is dismissed from the service which he has disgraced. I do not know what the hon. gentleman meant by his statement if he did not mean that it was a sort of threat that the hon. gentleman who brought this matter up should be afraid lest this man with his literary ability should lash him through the press.

Mr. COWAN. Oh.

Mr. FOWLER. That is the hon. member for South Essex——

Mr. COWAN. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER—who gave utterance to that melodious note just now. I can quite understand how the hon. member can appreciate a remark of this sort. We need not appeal to him as long as his party is receiving some benefit from this gentleman's breach of duty, but if the boot were on the other foot there would be no one who would exhibit so much virtuous indignation as the hon. gentleman. You would be able to hear him down as far as Queen street if the case were reversed. The hon. minister ought to recognize his full duty in the premises and see that this man shall be brought to book in this matter. He says : Probably the gentleman will speak to me about it when he reads the words uttered by my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) to-morrow. I am really surprised. Thousands and thousands of dollars of the public money of this country were expended by these hon. gentlemen in commissions roving all over the country bringing officers of the government to book and examining into whether they have been guilty of partisan practices or not, but here is the private secretary of the hon. gentleman promoted to the position of assistant commissioner of customs, a man receiving a salary of $2,800 a year and the hon. minister in whose department he is, is unable to specify the duties that he performs. He says that he is acting commissioner when the commissioner is away. I do not know what takes the commissioner of customs away. I fancy the commissioner of customs is here all the time except when he is away on his holidays. There are inspectors to inspect the offices. It is not the duty of the commissioner to wander all over Canada inspecting the different offices. His duty is to be here, and I venture to say he is here all the time excepting when he is on his holidays. Yet, this man is appointed at a salary of $2,800 a year. Surely the Liberal party is able to raise a sufficient campaign fund to pay literary hacks to write their campaign literature without taking public money to pay for it in the guise of filling a position in the civil service. I trust the hon. minister will upon reflection see the matter in a different light. I trust that he will remove the political speck from his eye and see the matter more clearly. If this young man is not guilty he should be absolved, but if he is guilty he certainly should be severely punished. If he had happened to be a Conservative he would have lost his position. He deserves to lose his office if he is really guilty of the offence that has been charged against him.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman admits that it is only right and proper that I should ask him.

Mr. FOWLER. The hon. minister did not say he was going to ask him, but he said that probably the young man would speak to him about it.

Mr. PATERSON. I think it is probable he will, but if he does not I will speak to him.

Mr. FOWLER. If the hon. minister states to this committee that he will inquire into this matter and ascertain as to the truth of the charge then I have nothing further to say. He takes a perfectly satisfactory position as far as I am concerned if he makes that statement and carries it out and says that this young man, if he is guilty of this charge, will be punished.

Mr. CLANCY. I shall have to press for an answer from the hon. gentleman. I shall repeat my question to the hon. gentleman because he has been somewhat engaged by the hon. member for Kings. I wish to ask the hon. gentleman if it has come to his knowledge, directly or indirectly, that Mr. John Bain, private secretary and assistant commissioner of Customs, has been engaged in writing campaign literature for the Liberal party since he was appointed to the service on the 6th August, 1896.

Mr. PATERSON. I will speak to him about it.

Mr. CLANCY. But I have not asked the hon. minister to speak to him. Perhaps I have not made myself clear. I asked the hon. gentleman if he had any knowledge either directly or indirectly that Mr. Bain has been engaged in writing campaign literature for the Liberal party ? That is the point, not that the hon. minister will ask Mr. Bain.

Mr. PATERSON. What does the hon. gentleman call campaign literature ?

Mr. HENDERSON. To make it stronger, for example, I would say that 'political pointers Nos. 1, 2 and 3' would be regarded as campaign literature. Some people would attribute this to a celebrated gentleman named Farrer. I have the statement, not under any oath of secrecy, and I have heard it rumoured around these rooms that 'pointers 1, 2 and 3' were the production of this gentleman, I hope the hon. gentleman will understand what campaign literature is.

Mr. PATERSON. I do not know that I remember what 'pointers 1, 2 and 3' are just now.

Mr. HENDERSON. If the hon. minister discovers that his own officer is the author of these documents and they are properly government documents would he be kind enough to lay them on the table so that we can have access to them ?

Mr. CLANCY. I think the hon. minister is surely taking a very extraordinary position. The hon. gentleman instead of rising in his place and saying frankly : I have no knowledge in any shape or form that my private secretary has been engaged in writing campaign or any other literature in the interest of the Liberal party—I am not going to haggle over words whether this was campaign literature or not—but I would ask if it is literature of any description written in the interest and for the use of the Liberal party. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) must feel bound as a minister of the Crown, to answer, unless he wishes to leave himself under a serious charge, because he is responsible for the work and the conduct of every servant in his department. The committee, the House and the country are entitled to an answer.

Mr. PATERSON. I have answered.

Mr. CLANCY. You have not answered. Does the hon. gentleman refuse to answer.

Mr. PATERSON. I have answered ; I said I would speak with him.

Mr. FOWLER. Do you know ?

Mr. CLANCY. Does the hon. gentleman know anything of the matter to which we are referring ?

Mr. PATERSON. I would like to know what you term campaign literature.

Mr. CLANCY. Does the hon. gentleman know of any literature being written by Mr. Bain in the interest or for the use of the Liberal party ?

Mr. PATERSON. Do I know any?

Mr. CLANCY. Does he know that Mr. Bain has been engaged in writing any literature in the interest or for the use of the Liberal party ?

Mr. PATERSON. I know that Mr. Bain has prepared tables for my use.

Mr. PATERSON

Mr. CLANCY. That is shuffling, unworthy of a minister of the Crown. We are entitled to a very much better answer than we are now receiving. The hon. gentleman does not dare to deny it. It is quite well known in Ottawa that Mr. Bain has been engaged in writing literature for the Liberal party, that that literature is being used by the Liberal party, and the hon. minister himself knows it.

Mr. FOWLER. And directed it to be done.

Mr. CLANCY. I shall not say he directed it, but he knows of it. I shall take his silence as a confession that the hon. gentleman is aware of it, that he has not dismissed this officer and that by this means he has encouraged him and is as guilty as the officer.

Mr. FOWLER. I go further and say that the minister is not only aware that this work is being done by this young man, but that it is being done under his direction and I challenge the minister to deny it.

Mr. PATERSON. I do deny it. 'Under his direction' what do you mean ?

Mr. FOWLER. Under your direction. I say that this work is being done under your direction.

Mr. PATERSON. What work.

Mr. FOWLER. The writing of this campaign literature.

Mr. PATERSON. Of pointers 1, 2, and 3?

Mr. FOWLER. Of this campaign literature that has been written by this assistant commissioner of yours. Do you say it was not done under your direction ? The minister sits in his seat and does not even deny that this work is being done by a civil servant under his direction, with his knowledge. I think we had better leave it right at that point.

Mr. BLAIN. I see an item here.

Allowance for private secretary, $600.

There is also an item for assistant commissioner, $2,800. If I understood the minister correctly, $2,800 pays for both of these duties. Why then does the minister put in $600 for private secretary and ask the committee to pass it ?

Mr. PATERSON. It is kept there in order that a portion of it may be used as I explained to supplement the salaries of the stenographers and typewriters in my own department. One of them gets from this vote $150 and the other $100.

Mr. BLAIN. Would not the minister think it more correct to ask the committee to pass the item for what the money is used, rather than pass it as an appropriation for a private secretary when on the confession of the minister himself, it is not for that purpose at all ? That is very misleading. I accept the words of the minister that no part of the $600 is used for the purpose of a private secretary, that the salary of the private secretary is included in the $2,800 ; that he holds a dual position with that salary.

Mr. PATERSON. These ladies are engaged as my private secretaries in typewriting and doing stenographic work. They do my correspondence and are to be regarded in that light. They are employed in my own personal department.

Mr. BLAIN. They are not the hon. gentleman's private secretaries, because he has already stated that the assistant commissioner is his private secretary.

Mr. PATERSON. They do the clerical work.

Mr. BLAIN. Then put it in for clerical work. Why does the hon. gentleman not say that this $600 is for stenographers in his department rather than for a private secretary, why not put the item in for what the money is paid for.

Mr. PATERSON. There can be no objection to that although in all the departments there is an item of $600 for a private secretary, but it is not all expended and this will not all be expended this year.

Mr. BLAIN. What part of the private secretary's work does the private secretary do ? Is his duty to write campaign literature ?

Mr. PATERSON. Oh, no.

Mr. BLAIN. That is the point the committee want to get at.

Mr. PATERSON. If you knew the duties discharged by my private secretary as assistant commissioner, you would readily admit that he has enough to do and does enough to warrant any payment that is made. When he was appointed assistant commissioner, I did not ask for another private secretary, but he continues to do such of my work as it is necessary for him to do in that capacity aided by these two young ladies.

Mr. BLAIN. I am not questioning whether the secretary is doing his duty or not; I am asking the minister why he does not put this item for the payment of stenographers in his office when the money goes for that purpose rather than putting it for private secretary when it does not pay for a private secretary at all ?

Mr. PATERSON. I do not see that there is anything improper in taking it under that head, because it is clerical work for the private secretary in the department of the minister himself. The vote has been continued there and would be available if another private secretary was appointed, but in that case no part of it could go to those who are doing the clerical work, and it is thought that they are entitled to have their salaries supplemented for the extra work they are doing, and out of this vote, they are given the amount which I mentioned to the hon. gentleman just now.

Mr. BLAIN. What are the names of the ladies to whom this money is paid ?

Mr. PATERSON. Miss Dawes and Miss Cram.

Mr. BLAIN. And what are their total salaries ?

Mr. PATERSON. $800 for Miss Dawes and $450 for Miss Cram.

Mr. COCHRANE. Why the difference ?

Mr. PATERSON. Longer in the service.

Mr. BLAIN. The $600 will not pay the total salaries of the officers ?

Mr. PATERSON. What they get is an addition to what I have stated.

Mr. BLAIN. If the minister wishes to use the money for the private secretary when it is voted for some other purpose, I will not quarrel with him. What are the duties of the assistant commissioner ? When the office was created, I understood the minister to say that he was to travel through the country and visit certain custom offices. Is that his duty now ?

Mr. PATERSON. That was not what I said. I said that it was desirable that the commissioner should be at liberty to visit the larger ports at times. I thought it would have a good effect on the work of the department. He has been away not by any means his whole time, and in his absence the duty of the assistant commissioner would be to take his place. While here the commissioner is a very busy man, and many items have to be dealt with by the assistant commissioner. They have both got all they can do.

Mr. COCHRANE. What at ?

Mr. PATERSON. I could not tell what at, but the hon. gentleman must have some idea.

Mr. COCHRANE. The minister himself does not appear to have much idea of what they are doing. What is the fact, as it strikes an ordinary person ? We have an item of $2,800 to pay the minister's private secretary and assistant commissioner ; and when we ask what are his duties, the minister says he sometimes goes to outside places.

Mr. PATERSON. No.

Mr. COCHRANE. What do you shake your head for ? That is what you have been saying ; and when we ask what is his duty here, the minister says he is a very busy man.

Mr. PATERSON. What I said was this——

Mr. COCHRANE. I know what you said.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order, one at a time.

Mr. COCHRANE. Who are you talking to? I remember, Mr. Chairman, when you were on this side of the House——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I did not call the hon. gentleman to order. I called order when two were on the floor.

Mr. COCHRANE. I know what you meant when you looked around. What is the fact? We are deceived by these estimates. It is a perfect piece of deception for the minister to put a certain amount in for the private secretary when he does not get it at all. What is the fact? He knows that the private secretary is writing campaign literature for the Grit party. They were contemptible enough to tell their officers that they could go and vote, and when they did not vote as they were wanted, very often they were turned out. We are voting $2,800 to pay the private secretary to write campaign literature, and when we ask what this $600 of allowance for private secretary is for, the minister says it is to pay the ladies while the secretary is writing campaign literature. When the hon. gentleman considers what he did on this side of the House, he should blush instead of smiling.

An hon. MEMBER. He cannot blush.

Mr. COCHRANE. No, they have too much brass in their faces. They have not carried out a principle which they advocated when in opposition; and now the hon. gentleman comes down and deceives me by asking me to vote money out of the hard earnings of the people of this country, to pay a private secretary when he does not do a thing; and he is hiring these ladies to do the work of a private secretary while he is writing campaign literature. What part of this $600 does the lady get who receives $800? Can you tell me that?

Mr. BRODEUR. Order. Address the chair.

Mr. COCHRANE. I would like to look over the Auditor General's report to see how much you got for cab-hire and dinners. You had better keep still, instead of calling me to order. I would ask the Minister of Customs how much of this $600 goes to the lady who gets $800?

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman has a perfect right to ask, but I do not understand that a member has a right to insult the chairman or attempt to, or to insult the minister either. A question may be asked properly and a proper answer given. I have answered that question twice. I do not object to answer it again. Miss Dawes gets $150 extra above her salary out of this $600, and Miss Cram gets $100. I would have been perfectly justified, under the vote of last year, when Mr. Bain was made assistant commissioner, in appointing another person to act as private secretary, and, in using the whole $600 for that purpose. I did not choose to do that. I thought Mr. Bain could still do what private secretarial work it is necessary for me to have him do and discharge the duties of assistant commissioner and relieve the commissioner of a portion of his work at the same time; and we have been able to accomplish that. But if during the present year it should be found necessary to have a private secretary appointed, the salaries of these young ladies could not be supplemented out of this vote. That is the reason the vote is there, not with the slightest intention to deceive, and not with the intention of giving Mr. Bain any more salary than the $2,800.

Mr. BLAIN. The minister has given us a statement of what he does with $250 of the $600. What does he propose to do with the balance?

Mr. PATERSON. It simply lapses.

Mr. INGRAM. In view of the attitude of the Minister of Customs with respect to Assistant Commissioner of Customs, I wish to move that the item be reduced by $2,800, that being the salary of the assistant commissioner. I may say further that as a member of this opposition, representing for the time being a portion of the Conservative party of Canada, I decline to be one who would vote to pay money for the purpose of circulating campaign literature. I beg to move therefore:

That the item of $67,160 be reduced by the amount of $2,800, that being the salary of the Assistant Commissioner of Customs.

Motion negatived, yeas 13, nays 23.

Mr. INGRAM. I wish to congratulate hon. gentlemen opposite for again showing that their position is reversed, compared with what it was previous to 1896. At that time they found great fault with the Conservative party for allowing civil servants to take part in political campaigns, and pledged themselves to change all that kind of thing when they came into power. To-night, however, we have another illustration of the fact that these hon. gentlemen are prepared to do just the reverse of what they promised, on every occasion when it suits their purposes.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman has only explained $250 of the $600. Why does he ask for $600 when he proposes only to spend $250.

Mr. PATERSON. In case it should be found necessary to appoint an assistant to Mr. Bain, I ask for this amount.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman wants to put on one or two more assistants to address campaign literature. He cannot say that he will require further assistance, but asks the vote and declares that if he does not use it all, that portion which he does not use will lapse. He cannot expect the opposition to support votes of that kind, for they will move amendments to reduce them to the amount required. The hon. gentleman ought to know what he will require and not ask for more.

Mr. FOWLER. What salaries do these assistants to Mr. Bain receive now ?

Mr. PATERSON. One gets $800 and the other $450.

Mr. FOWLER. What hours have these clerks to work ?

Mr. PATERSON. The office hours are from 9.30 to 5, but these ladies are very often at work long after that closing hour.

Mr. FOWLER. What particular work ?

Mr. PATERSON. The necessary work of the department.

Mr. FOWLER. This lady who gets the $800 is a stenographer, and I venture to say that there are more stenographers receiving a salary half that amount than there are who receive that sum. It is all right for the hon. minister to be chivalrous and gallant, but he is a trustee of the people's money and has no right to be so very generous with the public funds.

Mr. INGRAM. Is it not a fact that Mr. Bain was here when I put the question I did a short time ago, and is he not in this chamber now ?

Mr. PATERSON. No, he is not.

Mr. INGRAM. Was he not here when I asked this question ?

Mr. PATERSON. No, he was in before that.

Mr. INGRAM. He was in since that. If the hon. minister were sincere in desiring to know whether his commissioner was preparing campaign literature, he could have received the information from that gentleman himself. The hon. minister is pursuing a course which is not at all creditable to him. He sets himself up to be particularly honest—and I do not wish to charge him with anything dishonourable or dishonest—but it is unbecoming conduct on his part to allow that kind of thing to continue in his department. I make this charge to-night to show that the hon. gentleman is not sincere in his expression of a desire to find out whether or not that kind of thing is going on in his department. I made the statement I did, in view of what I have seen with my own eyes.

Mr. CLANCY. When did Mr. Bain first come into the service ?

Mr. PATERSON. In 1896.

Mr. CLANCY. On what salary ?

Mr. PATERSON. About $1,200.

Mr. CLANCY. Was he in the service before that ?

Mr. PATERSON. No.

Mr. CLANCY. What is he getting now ?

Mr. PATERSON. He is getting $2,800.

Mr. CLANCY. Is there any other chief clerk or officer of this department who has been in the service so short a time getting $2,800 ?

Mr. PATERSON. No.

Mr. SPROULE. There seems to be an anomaly in this proposition of the Minister of Customs. I understood him to say that two young ladies were doing part of the private secretary's work. Are they appointed as his private secretaries ?

Mr. PATERSON. No. They do the clerical work of stenography and typewriting in that branch of the department's work which receives my own personal attention.

Mr. SPROULE. How does the minister reconcile this with the Act, which says :

> Any member of the civil service may be appointed private secretary to the head of the department, and may be paid an additional salary not exceeding $600 a year when so acting.

I take it there is no compliance with the Act unless an appointment is made. The hon. minister takes a vote of money and distributes it among three or four who are not appointed private secretaries at his own will. I venture to say that if this came to the Auditor General's attention, he would be reluctant to pay the money.

Mr. PATERSON. The Auditor General has knowledge of it ?

Mr. SPROULE. Has he assented to it ?

Mr. PATERSON. He pays it.

Mr. SPROULE. Does he authorize it, or is he overruled by the Treasury Board, as in so many other cases ?

Mr. PATERSON. I am informed that he never raised the question.

Mr. FOWLER. But does not the minister see any force in the objection himself ? The Act requires that the appointment shall be made of some person in the civil service as private secretary. But the minister takes a vote of $600, and, without the appointment of any private secretary, he does as he likes with the money, showing favouritism, apparently, because one young lady gets $150 and the other only $100. I am surprised at the Auditor General paying this without protest.

Mr. PATERSON. Section 48 of the Act provides :

Any member of the civil service may be appointed private secretary to the head of a department, and may be paid an additional salary not exceeding six hundred dollars a year whilst so acting.

2. No salary shall be payable to any private secretary unless the amount has been voted by parliament.

Mr. FOWLER. Yes, but the hon. gentleman has told us that he made no appointment of private secretary, but that these young ladies who are not private secretaries, do certain clerical work. He takes his vote of $600 and out of it pays $250 to persons who do this clerical work. That is not a compliance with the Act, and if the gentleman who has been acting as his legal adviser this evening, the Finance Minister were here, I am sure he would not say it was. Well—I take that back, for the Minister of Finance made some strange statements along legal lines.

Mr. SPROULE. Who is the minister's private secretary to-day ?

Mr. PATERSON. Mr. Bain.

Mr. SPROULE. And does the minister think that the money can be paid to any one but Mr. Bain ?

Mr. PATERSON. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. The law says that any member of the service may be appointed private secretary and may be paid $600 in addition to his salary. But the law does not say that the minister may pay it to any one else.

Mr. PATERSON. Mr. Bain was appointed my private secretary and has remained so ever since. Before he was appointed assistant commissioner, he was a first-class clerk, receiving $1,500 and also this $600 as private secretary—a total of $2,100. When he was promoted to be assistant commissioner at $2,800, he did not draw any of the $600. But, out of that amount, as I have said, we have paid these two ladies, who assist in the work that comes under my own attention. The question has not crossed my mind as to there being anything irregular in it, nor has the Auditor General, I am informed, taken exception to it. Neither has my attention been called to the matter.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman is asking $600 in order that he may pay it to his private secretary. That is making members of the House, and particularly members of the opposition believe that the private secretary will be given the money. But, instead of paying it to his private secretary, he gives $250 of it to these young ladies. But he cannot divert that $600 in that way, nor can the Auditor General authorize the diversion of it to anybody who is not the minister's private secretary, if the law is to be complied with. It would be better for the hon. minister to reserve the item and refer the question to the Minister of Justice to see whether this is within the meaning of the Act. Otherwise, now that the attention of the Auditor General has been called to it, it is very likely he may refuse to authorize it, and these young ladies may not be able to draw pay for the work they have done. The minister asks $600 to pay to his private secretary. But his private secretary is already paid $2,800, and his time, I understand, is largely employed in preparing campaign literature. The hon. gentleman had better submit this question to the Minister of Justice before the item is put through.

Mr. PATERSON. The Auditor General has not objected.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not understand how the minister can get over this clause of the Act, which says :

No extra salary or additional remuneration of any kind whatsoever shall be paid to any deputy head, officer or employee in the civil service of Canada, or to any other person permanently employed in the public service.

I ask how the minister can square his conduct with the requirements of that section.

Mr. PATERSON. I can only say that it has been done, and that it has been sanctioned. The Auditor General has called my attention to the rule. It has been done during past years, and I think it has always been done. I do not know that it is done alone in my department.

Mr. SPROULE. Does the minister not think it would be better to leave this item until we get some information to justify us in passing it ?

Mr. PATERSON. I might have to appoint a private secretary, and would have no vote to do it. I may have to employ an officer in the department as deputy head, as there is no one in that position now. Supposing the duties of the office were increased so that he would not be able to do any part of my work at all, but that his whole time were taken up by other work, I might then wish to appoint a private secretary, and in order to be in a position to do so I would need the salary to be voted here. If you strike out this salary you take that out of my hands. If I do make an appointment, then this salary will be available. I suppose there is no objection to these young ladies being paid.

Mr. SPROULE. Not at all. But we desire to have the money spent in compliance with the provisions of the law.

Mr. BIRKETT. I desire to ask the minister if provision has been made in this vote of $57,160 for payments of the statutory allowances to the different classes of clerks mentioned in this item.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes. I think the statutory increase is being given this year to every one on the permanent list entitled to it and eligible for it. There are two others I think who are at the maximum of their class. Of course they cannot be paid more. But every one who is eligible will receive an increase of $50.

Mr. BIRKETT. In the item for clerical assistance here, I see that the amounts in the vote is $14,700. That is only $350 above the amount voted last year. Now, the statutory increase is $50, and how you are going to pay $1,050 out of $350, I am puzzled to know. How are you going to pay the statutory increase to eleven clerks at $50 out of $350 ?

Mr. PATERSON. In some cases the statutory increase only begins on the 1st of January, 1905.

Mr. BIRKETT. I see eight first-class clerks here. Last year, for statutory increases, the amount voted was $13,150, but here you only have $13,000.

Mr. PATERSON. We saved $400 by the death of Mr. McKiel this year, and who was in receipt of $1,800. His place was filled by the promotion of a second-class clerk at a salary of $200 now. He has been appointed at the minimum salary of $1,500. Then there is a vacancy in the accountant's branch which we propose to fill by the promotion of Mr. Frost to a first-class clerkship at the minimum salary of $1,500. Mr. Frost is now a second-class clerk at a salary of $1,200, and was appointed on the 1st of November, 1900. So in these two promotions there is a saving of $400.

Mr. BIRKETT. I see that, but I also see that in the Auditor General's Report for the year ending June 31, 1903, there were three first-class clerks at $1,800, one at $1,750, two at $1,550, one at $1,450 and one at $1,500. I notice now in these estimates there are two at $1,900, one at $1,650 and four at the minimum of $1,500. It is hard to understand by a comparison of these estimates and those of last year, why the mutilation of this class has taken place.

Mr. PATERSON. Under the new Bill, the accountant informs me, the maximum of $1,800 was increased to $1,900 and two of them get the extra.

Mr. BIRKETT. What became of the other one ? There were three.

Mr. PATERSON. There was Mr. Bleakney and Mr. Fawcett, and then there was Mr. McKiel, who died a short time ago.

Mr. BIRKETT. He was getting $1,750 ?

Mr. PATERSON. No, $1,800. They were all getting $1,800.

Some resolutions reported.

MESSAGE FROM THE GOVERNOR GENERAL—SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance) delivered a message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER read the message as follows :

MINTO.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons supplementary estimates of sums required for the service of the Dominion for the year ending 30th June, 1904, and in accordance with the provisions of the British North America Act, 1867, the Governor General recommends these estimates to the House of Commons.

Mr. FIELDING moved—

That the message of His Excellency, together with supplementary estimates be referred to the Committee of Supply.

He said : I may say that these are two or three items of emergency, but they are not the general estimates for the balance of the year.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Fielding, House adjourned at 12.30 a.m., Saturday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, April 25, 1904.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to know whether the return with respect to the Vancouver dry dock has been brought down?

Hon. JAS. SUTHERLAND (Minister of Public Works). The correspondence is being prepared as quickly as possible. There was some difficulty in understanding from the hon. gentleman's motion, what correspondence is referred to, but I suppose it is the correspondence with Mr. Jackson. It will be brought down in probably a day or two.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I thought it was easy to comprehend the order of the House. It was understood to include all correspondence relating to the matter.

Mr. JAS. SUTHERLAND. I have no doubt it was to my hon. friend and to me, but some of the officials did not seem to understand it, as most of the correspondence is with another party of a very similar, or almost the same name.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. A month ago, an order was granted for copies of all contracts respecting the carriage of the mails from the St. Lawrence during the past four or five years. I would suppose that there ought to be printed copies of these contracts on file, and it would be easy to bring down. Another matter, which has not been standing quite so long, relates to the correspondence concerning the appointment of a postmaster in the town of Huntingdon.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). That motion is on the order paper for to-day ; it has not yet been moved.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Very well, I understood it had been moved in my absence.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I asked the Secretary of State this morning to expedite all these orders that had been moved for by my hon. friend, and he said he would do so, but he thought they had all been brought down.

Hon. Sir WILLIAM MULOCK (Postmaster General). The return with regard to the mail contract from the St. Lawrence, has to do with the Department of Trade and Commerce. Lest it might be inferred it was in my department, I wish to say that I do not know anything about it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I quite understand.

Mr. DAVID HENDERSON (Halton). When may I expect a return ordered by the House on the 23rd of March respecting the payment of certain wages in connection with Bronte harbour ?

Mr. JAS. SUTHERLAND. Instructions have been given to get the information as quickly as possible.

Mr. HENDERSON. It ought to be very easy to get ; I apprehend it is in the department.

Mr. JAS. SUTHERLAND. Perhaps the engineer in Toronto will have the information ; there will be no unnecessary delay.

QUESTIONS.

AMERICAN CATTLE IN BOND.

Mr. CLARKE—by Mr. Lancaster—asked :

1. Has permission been given, by Order in Council or otherwise, to any person or company to import American cattle in bond, slaughter them in Canada, and export the meat and other products ?

2. If so, to whom was this permission given, on what date, for what length of time, and on what terms and conditions ?

3. At what ports may the cattle be entered, and where must they be slaughtered ?

Hon. WM. PATERSON (Minister of Customs). Under an Order in Council of 1880 and regulations thereunder, the slaughter of swine in bond is permitted, but not of any other live stock or cattle.

CENSUS, 1901—INDUSTRIAL ESTABLISHMENTS.

Mr. KEMP—by Mr. Lancaster—asked :

1. What was the number of industrial establishments in Canada, according to the census of 1901 ?
2. What was the total fixed capital ?
3. What was the total working capital ?
4. What was the total number of employees ?
5. What was the total amount in wages paid during the year ?
6. What was the total value of raw material ?
7. What was the total value of articles produced ?

Hon. Sir FREDERICK BORDEN (Minister of Militia and Defence). The Minister of Agriculture has left the following answer with me :

1. $14,650.
2. $209,378,638.
3. $237,537,849.
4. 313,314 on wages ; and 17,453 on salaries.
5. $89,573,204 for wages ; and $13,411,464 for salaries.
6. $266,527,858.
7. $481,053,375.

With the exception of butter and cheese factories, the census of manufactures in1901 was taken for establishments employing five hands and over.

KEREMEOS INDIAN RESERVE.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN asked :

1. Have the government received a petition or proposal with regard to the sale or the exchange of the Indian Reserve at or near Keremeos, in the Similkameen Valley, B.C., and if so, from whom ?
2. Have the government offered to sell or exchange the said Indian Reserve ?
3. If so, to whom, and at what price ?
4. What is the intention of the government with respect to the request contained in the prayer of the said petition ?

Hon. CLIFFORD SIFTON (Minister of the Interior) :

1. Yes ; from residents of Headley City and vicinity.
2. No.
3. Answered by No. 2.
4. The petition is under consideration. It is hoped that a satisfactory adjustment of the matter may be made shortly, so as to permit of the construction of the smelter for which a site is sought.

POST OFFICE AT ST. JOHN D'IBERVILLE.

Mr. MONK—by Mr. Lancaster—asked :

1. How many petitions have been addressed to the government, relating to the selection of a site for the new post office at St. John d'Iberville ?
2. Has the government selected the said site, and if so, what is that site ?
3. When will the new post office be commenced ?

4. Has the contract for the construction been given out, and to whom ?

Hon. JAS. SUTHERLAND (Minister of Public Works) :

1. Two.
2. No.
3. Date not fixed.
4. No.

TOBACCO CULTURE.

Mr. MONK—by Mr. Lancaster—asked :

1. Has the government sent an agent to the state of Wisconsin, or anywhere else, to investigate the question of tobacco culture ?
2. If so, who is the said agent, what were his instructions, and what are his salary and expense allowance ?

Hon. Sir FREDERICK BORDEN (Minister of Militia and Defence). In the absence of the Minister of Agriculture, I beg to answer :

1. Yes, two to the state of Wisconsin.
2. Pierre Denis and J. B. Dugas. Their instructions were to investigate the methods practised in that state of cultivating, curing and preparing for the market the tobacco grown there, and to report on the same to the Minister of Agriculture. Their salaries are at the rate of one hundred dollars per month each with necessary expenses of living and transportation.

LIGHTING OF THE WELLAND CANAL.

Mr. BENNETT—by Mr. Lancaster—asked :

1. Has any contract been entered into by the government with any person, or persons, for the lighting of the Welland canal ?
2. If such a contract has been made, who are the contractors, price for lighting, and duration of such contract ?

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister) :

1. A contract has been entered into for supplying power to light the Welland canal by electricity.
2. The contractors are the Lincoln Electric Light and Power Company. Price for the power is on a basis of $14 per h. p. per annum. The contract is for a term of ten years.

PURCHASES FROM LAMONTAGNE & CO.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria) asked :

1. Were the goods supplied by Messrs. H. Lamontagne & Company, Montreal, amounting to $45,956.35, as shown by the Auditor General's Report, on page 2105, purchased by tender ?
2. If tenders were called for, who were the parties tendering ?
3. Was the lowest tender accepted ?

Hon. Sir FREDERICK BORDEN (Minister of Militia and Defence). Nearly all this amount represents artillery harness supplied by Messrs. H. Lamontagne & Co. to the department. This had hitherto been supplied by the War Office or by English firms, with the guns with which it was to be used. Upon consideration, the government thought it advisable to adopt the principle of having all work of this kind done by Canadian concerns so far as possible. The goods supplied by this firm were made according to samples furnished by the War Office, and the prices therefore were based upon War Office rates, and the firm was selected because of its having had experience in doing similar work to the satisfaction of the department.

PURCHASES FROM THE OTTAWA CAR COMPANY.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES asked :

1. Were the goods supplied by the Ottawa Car Company, Limited, amounting to $21,163.93, as shown by the Auditor General's Report, on page 2105, purchased by tender ?
2. If tenders were called for, who were the parties tendering ?
3. Was the lowest tender accepted ?

Hon. Sir FREDERICK BORDEN (Minister of Militia and Defence). This amount represents repairs to artillery equipment and other similar work which had hitherto been done in England, and which could not be done by any Canadian concern until special equipment had been provided for the purpose. It was thought advisable to have the work done in Canada at some convenient point in Ontario. The Ottawa Car Company equipped their works for this purpose at a very considerable expense, upon the understanding that they would receive work of this kind at prices based upon War Office rates. The company is now able, not only to do the necessary repairs, but also to undertake the manufacture of new wagons, limbers and similar artillery equipment. Similar work is also being done at the Dominion government arsenal at Quebec.

TOBACCO TRADE WITH BELGIUM.

Mr. MONK—by Mr. Lancaster—asked :

1. What is the total amount paid to Mr. Blaise Dugas, of the county of Montcalm, in connection with his last mission to Belgium, regarding the tobacco trade ?
2. Did said Dugas make a written report to the government upon the result of his mission to Belgium ? If so, what date does report bear, and when was it handed in to the government ?
3. Has there been export trade in tobacco from Canada to Belgium ?

Hon. Sir FREDERICK BORDEN (Minister of Militia and Defence). In the absence of the Minister of Agriculture, I beg to answer :

1. $470.25.
2. Yes. Mr. Dugas' report is dated January 19th, 1903, and was received on January 21st, 1903.
3. Only a small export trade as yet, averaging about 7,340 pounds of tobacco annually from 1898 to 1902, inclusive, but Belgium imports large quantities, of which we hope to increase Canada's share.

ST. JOHNS, P.Q., POST OFFICE SITE.

Mr. MONK—by Mr. Lancaster—asked :

1. Is it the intention of the government, before selecting a site for the new post office, in the town of St. Johns, P.Q., to consult the municipal authorities of said town, the bankers, manufacturers, and particularly the business men of Richelieu street, as to which would be the most convenient site available ?

2. When will the said site be finally decided upon ?

Hon. JAS. SUTHERLAND (Minister of Public Works). The question of the purchase of this site is still under consideration.

Mr. MONK—by Mr. Lancaster—asked :

1. Has the government inquired from real estate owners in the town of St. Johns, P.Q., as to the price of their properties, in connection with the site of a new post office ; and if so, from whom has the government sought such information ?

2. What are the prices asked by such real estate owners ?

Hon. JAS. SUTHERLAND (Minister of Public Works). Offers have been received and are now being considered. It does not appear advisable at the present stage of negotiations to disclose the prices given.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 68) respecting the Hudson's Bay and Northwest Railway's Company.—Mr. Oliver.

CHANGE IN PUBLIC WORKS DEPARTMENT.

Mr. T. CHASE CASGRAIN (Montmorency)—by Mr. Sproule—moved :

For copies of all Orders in Council passed under and by virtue of the statute 3 Edward VII., chapter 53, entitled 'An Act respecting the management and control of public and other works.'

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). I would suggest to my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) that it might be better not to press this motion because my hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) desires to speak upon it. The Order in Council asked for in the motion has already been brought down.

Motion allowed to stand.

COMPAGNIES DE CREDIT.

Mr. L. P. DEMERS (St. John and Iberville). (Translation.) I move :

That the government take immediate steps to put an end to unlawful transactions carried on by firms known as ' Compagnies de Crédit ' and other such concerns.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw the attention of the House to the business done by a number of firms known under the name of ' Compagnies de Crédit,' and which have been incorporated by the government of Canada. The avowed object of those companies is to facilitate for their clients the purchase of diamonds, watches, jewels, furs, furniture and other wares, in accordance with a scale of prices and terms laid down by them.

They call themselves ' Compagnies de Crédit,' possibly,—as suggested by ' Le Prix Courant,'—for the very reason that they do not grant credit to any one. As a matter of fact, they are so-called capitalizing institutions. To the person who deposits with them two dollars a week for fifteen weeks, that is $30 altogether, they agree to pay $75. Deposits may be continued for a term of 150 weeks, or three consecutive years, if desired. After having thus deposited $300, the depositor, under the agreement, will be entitled to $750. The same rule applies to all subscribers ; there is no drawing of lots ; every depositor has the promise that he will receive 150 per cent on his investment.

The business carried on by these firms may seem wonderful, and they are aware of it. Here, for instance, is the circular issued by one of these companies called 'La Société de Crédit Hebdomadaire, limitée,' which guarantees not more than 100 per cent profit. The manager of that company gives the following answer to question No. 4 :

4th question :—What means have 'La société de Crédit Hebdomadaire limitée,' of paying such large dividends to their subscribers ?

Answer : La Société de Crédit Hebdomadaire, limitée," is to small capitalists what railway companies, steamship, street car, insurance companies and banks, etc., etc., are to people of wealth. As a matter of fact, every one of these last named companies spends hundreds of thousands, and even millions, of dollars in expenses each year, and notwithstanding this enormous expenditure, provides for its shareholders a high rate of interest on every share they own. But only people of large means, semi-millionaires, hold stock in such companies while small capitalists are in a position to secure only a low rate of interest on their investments. 'La Société de Crédit Hebdomadaire, limitée," incorporated by the Dominion government, and supported by reliable as well as shrewd business men, financiers, in a word, enables all persons of good will, through its various kinds of agreements, to reap large profits on their investments. That company puts large rates of interest within the reach of small capitalists ; but, we repeat it once more, we do not promise fabulous returns ; we secure from investments only what business men can secure from them, as stated on the back of each agreement.

As will be noticed, the manager is very careful not to state through the use of what business methods it is possible to obtain such large returns. That answer given by 'La Société de Crédit Hebdomadaire, limitée,' by that sedate company, made up of reliable and shrewd business men, reminds me of that given by William T. Miller, who won universal notoriety in connection with the Franklin syndicate : 'The way to wealth is as plain as the road to market.'

However, he did not promise such large returns ; he was content with 100 per cent a year, while some of the firms we have to deal with promise 700 per cent a year. That same Miller stated elsewhere :

This may look impossible to you, but you know there must be a way where one can double their money in a short time, or else there would be no Jay Gould, Vanderbilt, or Flower Syndicate and other millionaires.

That was the only explanation offered ; that is to say, no explanation was given. The effects of these schemes are being felt just now in Montreal and vicinity. Workingmen and others who have taken an interest in these concerns and deposited with them part of their earnings are facing a sure loss. Some of them deposit as much as twenty or even twenty-five dollars a week. If, as I believe, the companies are being operated on a wrong principle, it will mean ruin for a number of these poor people of Montreal and other districts of the province.

Mr. L. P. DEMERS.

Since this motion appeared on the Order sheet, some papers have taken and referred to it. By the way, I may state that some papers have advertised these firms by printing their notices and lists of winners. The motion appearing on the Order paper caused the press to take up the question. 'Le Prix Courant' and 'Le Moniteur du Commerce,' having studied the manner in which these firms carried on their business, both reached the conclusion which I shall now lay before the House by reading what they published on April 22 last.

The article in 'Le Prix Courant' starts as follows :—

There is one species of swindling introduced lately into Canada, which we might have very well dispensed with. We refer to those concerns or companies called credit companies, very likely because they give no credit to any one, as will be seen presently.

Further on, the writer goes on to say :

The company realises it profits,—we use that word for want of another,—by despoiling, without any compensation, those of its shareholders of agreements who cease making deposits previous to the date at which they would be entitled to a refund. And it is out of the earnings of these unfortunate improvident people, that provision is made for reimbursing those who go on paying to the last.

On account of the length of this article, we shall not go into further details—however interesting they might prove to be—as to the steps taken to secure the greatest possible number of cancellations, so as to permit paying those who go on making their instalments.

On the other hand, 'Le Moniteur du Commerce' claims that these institutions come under the head of lotteries, and in its issue of April 22 states :

Those companies which advertise profits of 500 per cent within a few weeks time ; those which, having obtained letters-patent from governments to carry on a paying business above board, and which, under cover of the great seal of Canada or that of one of the provinces, go on drawing lots every week or every month, without any control on behalf of the parties interested, all these are mere lotteries as defined by the criminal code.

The financial editor of the 'Witness' had previously replied as follows to a correspondent who inquired as to how these concerns were managed :

A correspondent sends us the weekly bulletin of the 'Compagnie de Crédit du Canada,' for March 7, for us to comment upon. Last week we replied to a correspondent concerning this and kindred companies, of which we understand there are half a dozen in this city alone, licensed by the government. Conspicuously on the front page of the weekly bulletin before us there is a fac-simile of a cheque for $540 made out to a well-known druggist, who had paid in the sum of $216, and thus made a profit of a hundred and fifty per cent in a few months Where does the money come from ? It has to be considered, too, that the company did not get all Mr. Druggist's $216. On the same page as the fac-simile of the cheque, agents are advertised for "exposer le système dans tous ses détails.' and it is promised that 'C'est une position très lucrative et de tout repos.' An enviable position, indeed, well paid and an easy job, so that the subscriptions do not all go the company. The company also advertises that it commenced business in May, 1903, and has since that time paid 1,830 clients the sum of $142,735. Those who have received this money must have thought themselves standing upon a veritable 'Tom Tiddler's ground, picking up gold and silver.' And to prove that it actually did pay the money the names of the 'clients,' the number of the 'contracts,' the addresses of the clients, the sums they paid and the amounts they received, are all set out in detail. Thus number 835 paid in $33 in thirty-three weeks, and at the end of that time received $108, or a profit of nearly 700 per cent per annum. We suppose that the government, which has licensed this business, is satisfied that this can be done and is legitimate, but, so far as we can judge, a prophet of great far-seeing qualities is not required to see the end. The company says that the system is based on co-operation, and so it is in a sense. Any 'client' can be paid $108 in thirty-three weeks, or get merchandise to that amount if others paid in enough after him. But suppose new subscribers do not come in in rapidly multiplying numbers ; what then ? What happened to Hooley, to the South Sea Bubble, or to John Law and the Mississippi scheme ? It is as impossible to pay 360 per cent. for ever as it is to make candy without sugar.

But the most thorough view of the whole matter is perhaps to be found in 'Le Nationaliste.' In its issue of Sunday last, that paper, in rather violent terms,—which, however, circumstances, to my mind, warranted, —condemned these frauds in an article headed : 'Robbery in full daylight' :

'La Compagnie de Crédit du Canada,' to mention only the most impudent of them, is not a lottery. The holder of a lottery ticket has not much of a chance to win ; but for that very reason, the scheme may be kept on going indefinitely. Under that would-be credit system, on the contrary, the refund and profits accruing are ensured by agreements maturing in numerical order ; so that it is possible to compute at what date the whole scheme will fall to pieces, provided subscribers pay their instalments regularly—which they always do when the prospective gain is large enough—and provided the company has no other means of meeting its obligations apart from the deposits of its subscribers.

If the company agrees to pay two dollars for every dollar it receives, even though its deposits should increase by leaps and bounds, they will never keep pace with its liabilities, which go increasing twice as fast. For any man of common sense, for any journalist who has not enlisted in the service of robbers and swindlers, the outcome is as apparent as daylight.

Well, 'La Compagnie de Crédit du Canada,' as a number of others which work in the dark, has no other resources but the instalments of its subscribers. It does not own any real estate; it does not loan money on long or short term ; it does not deal in movables, although that kind of speculation is the only one allowed by its charter. So there can be only two classes of people among its clients : robbers and their victims.

The robbers are those who, knowing that the company cannot keep on, that its business is not only unlawful and deceitful, but financially unsound, enter into a compact with the directors of the company to lay hands on the funds deposited by subscribers whose agreements will mature after the company is bankrupt.

The victims are those honest people, simple-minded, whose purse has for all time been the aim of schemers.

As for us, we are satisfied that those poor fellows who will be the losers through the failure of 'La Compagnie de Crédit uu Canada,' will have the right to sue before the civil courts and possibly before the criminal courts, such subscribers as have had the luck.

Those companies claim that they have a capital of $10,000,—I cannot say whether a single shareholder has paid his subscription. They boast of receiving $60,000 in deposits per week. There is no doubt that transactions of that kind cannot be carried on for a longer period than a year and a quarter. Indeed, even leaving aside the expenditure for agencies which takes up twenty-five per cent, the enormous amount spent in advertising and working expenses, —as it must be presumed that the promoters of the scheme expected to reap some profit for themselves—everything goes to show that it is impossible for these companies to keep on paying ; so that they are bound to go bankrupt some day or other.

In view of these facts, it seems to me that the government are in duty bound to interfere. Of course, the government are not to blame in the matter. However, the people are apt to find fault with the government. They believe these companies have been empowered by the government to carry on that kind of business, and from the article published in the 'Witness,' it would appear that people are under the impression that the government approve of them, while, on the contrary, these companies have obtained their charter by stating that their sole object is to facilitate for their clients the purchase of diamonds, jewels, furniture and other wares in common use.

They are not described as financial undertakings, but rather as companies having for their object the sale of goods, which is legitimate business, and they have easily been granted incorporation at Ottawa. To engage in this legitimate business, it is not necessary to be incorporated ; any person can carry on transactions of that kind. Incorporation has been sought with the object only of deceiving the public, and safeguarding the directors. However, all these companies in their prospectuses draw attention to the fact that they are in possession of a charter from the Dominion government, and I think the government should take the means at their disposal to suppress them. These companies are putting their charters to wrongful usage. They are not fulfilling the purpose for which they were established.

I think the government should cancel their letters patent. Possibly, the Minister of Justice, after studying their legal status, may reach the conclusion that criminal proceedings should be instituted for conspiracy and fraud. There is no doubt the promoters know that they will be unable to pay what they promise. They are aware that it is a fake. So that a charge for conspiracy with a view to swindling the people, would be in order. I shall not undertake to point out to the Minister of Justice what proceedings should be taken; I am satisfied he will readily find some way of remedying this evil. All I wish is that the imposition practised on the people by these companies be promptly put an end to.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister) (Translation). Before my hon. friend resumes his seat, will he say whether he is in a position to suggest the means which the government might adopt.

Mr. L. P. DEMERS. (Translation.) I think an efficient means would be a writ of 'scire facias' for the purpose of cancelling the letters patent granted to these companies. They are content with taking in the people's money, and the government would be warranted in taking out a 'scire facias,' in case they do not deem it advisable to institute a criminal action. At all events, in my humble opinion, there are grounds for government interference.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. (Translation). Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that the companies to which the hon. member has just drawn the attention of the House are simply cases of organized fraud. It seems evident that they are not fulfilling the purpose for which they were incorporated. They are openly infringing on their charters. Their existence is sanctioned by law; but their transactions are unlawful. Instead of carrying out the object for which they were incorporated, they are deliberately going against it. And I agree with my hon. friend that there are only two classes of people in these concerns, those who rob, and those who are robbed, as stated in the newspaper article which he has just read. The difficulty is to find a remedy to this evil. My hon. friend suggests that the government should at once take steps to cancel the charters of these companies by means of a writ of 'scire facias.' That means is available to any subject of the king.

At all events, the attention of the government having been drawn to that point, I shall request the hon. Minister of Justice to take it up at once with a view to putting a stop to such an unfortunate state of affairs. And as my hon. friend has thereby, I think, attained his object, I shall ask him to withdraw his motion.

Motion withdrawn.

Mr. L. P. DEMERS.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

On the Order being called for :

Resuming adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fitzpatrick, that Bill (No. 2), An Act to amend the Railway Act, be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER (The Prime Minister). The motion of the Minister of Justice was to have this Bill referred to the Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines. As I remember, the leader of the opposition wanted this Bill referred back to the Committee of the Whole because he wanted to discuss the phraseology, or something like that.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. My idea was that while I saw considerable force in the suggestion that various corporations would have a right to be heard before the Bill passed, nevertheless I thought there might be some advantage in sending it to the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of discussing some aspects of this question.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I ask that this item stand, as the Minister of Justice is absent to-day.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. My right hon. friend will have no objection to our going into Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No, with the understanding that ultimately the Bill will go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I do not want to be understood as wishing to control the action of my hon. friend from Lincoln and Niagara (Mr. Lancaster). My suggestion was made in what I thought was the public interest, that we should discuss the details of the Bill in Committee of the Whole. I know my hon. friend from Lincoln and Niagara has strong opinions on the subject.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I would not like to undertake, either, to control the action of the hon. member for Lincoln and Niagara. But perhaps we may induce him later on to reconsider his purpose.

Order allowed to stand.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

On the Order being called for :

Resuming adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Lancaster that Bill (No. 3) An Act to amend the Criminal Code, 1892, be now read the second time.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I think the Minister of Justice asked my hon. friend from Lincoln and Niagara (Mr. Lancaster) to withdraw this Bill. He is aware that the government cannot accept this Bill. Still, if he wants to move it he has a right to do so. The Minister of Justice expressed the hope some time ago that the hon. gentleman would withdraw it.

Mr. LANCASTER. The Minister of Justice said he was going to deal with this matter in a general Bill that he was going to bring down, and he could see no objection to taking the two up at the same time.

Order allowed to stand.

SUPPLY.

House in Committee of Supply.

Customs—salaries and contingent expenses of the several ports in the various provinces and in the Northwest Territories, including pay for overtime of officers, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, $1,184,865.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Will the hon. gentleman explain in the first place the increase of $25,000.

Hon. WILLIAM PATERSON (Minister of Customs). In a general way this is to provide for an increased service that will be required at various outlaying ports. The business of the department is increasing very fast, as the hon. gentleman knows, and it is estimated that we shall require a larger staff at some of the ports. Included in that amount is a sum which it is thought would be well to devote, or a portion of it, toward increasing in a small degree the salaries of our officers whose services, in the opinion of the department, warrant an increase being given them. It is estimated that $25,000 will be absorbed in that way during the coming year.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I suppose the hon. gentleman has had some estimate presented to him by his department naming the ports where the staff requires to be increased, showing the additional number of officers which will be required at each port. Perhaps it would be well to let the House have that information.

Mr. PATERSON. This is the least amount that it is thought we would be justified in asking for. Of course we have numerous requests for increases of salary, and they will be kindly considered before any of this money is paid. But we will not be able to meet all the requests, and it will depend upon the reports of the superior officers of the merits of individual cases, what increases will be made and to whom. Last year, in the port of Montreal all the men who were getting less than $500 were brought up to $500, or perhaps it was $550. In Toronto also I think they were brought up to $550. Of course, it was to the lower paid officers that we gave most of the advances. Then, where the business of the smaller ports has increased there have been increases granted to some of the officers in connection with these.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I do not exactly gather from the remarks made by my hon. friend whether this, after all, is due to the increase in the personnel of the staff or whether it is proposed to utilize the increased vote for the purpose of increasing the salaries of the staff as it exists at the present time. My hon. friend seems to be a little too indefinite about that. We ought to know whether this is required for additions to the staff or whether it is required for the purpose of increasing the remuneration of the present staff. It seems to me that my hon. friend ought to be able to show, how much, if any, is for additions to the staff, and how much is for increases in the salaries of the existing officers, because it does not seem to be proper that we should vote money for one purpose which may be devoted by the hon. gentleman to another purpose. That would be regarded by an ordinary business corporation as a very loose way of presenting such a matter to the shareholders and it seems to me that my hon. friend is not quite explicit. If there are any salaries to be increased should he not have a statement here to present to the committee showing the increases that are to be made, and if there are to be any additions to the staff, should he not be prepared, when he asks for $25,000 additional, to say what additions are to be made, where they are to be made, and for what purpose? We did not get very much from my hon. friend except a rather indefinite reference to the increases in the staff and then some equally indefinite references to increases in the salaries of the staff. For which is this ? Is it for both ? If so, how much for one and how much for the other ? If increases in salaries, how much are they and why are they to be given ? If increases in the personnel of the staff, where are they to be made, and what is the justification for making them ?

Mr. PATERSON. I thought I explained that. This is the amount estimated to be required to provide for the extra business that it may be found necessary to provide for at the outside ports and leave a margin that will permit us to increase, if they are found to be deserving, the salaries of some of the officers in the service. The hon. gentleman asks for some particulars. I will be glad to give him all the information I can, but it is impossible to give him the details that he asks for. He will see that it is impossible. These moneys are to be expended during 1904-5, extending a year beyond now. We may find that, during the course of the financial year for which these estimates are taken, circumstances arise under which, perhaps, we have to appoint officers that we had not thought would be required. Business has suddenly developed at some new port. Some place, not yet a port, has presented claims to the department for the convenience of the public and in the interest of the public it is desirable to establish a port. Then we have to appoint an officer for that place. This must be so with the business increasing so rapidly, and it is evident that there cannot be given the particulars that the hon. gentleman asks for now. It would be impossible to work the department in that way. It is therefore for the committee to consider, whether, in view of the increasing revenue, and the increasing work of the Customs Department, it is an excessive sum to place at the discretion of the department in order to provide for the expenditure that may be found necessary during the twelve months of the next fiscal year.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The difficulty I have with the hon. gentleman's position is that he does not place the committee in a position to judge, for itself. Suppose my hon. friend asked the committee for $250,000, instead of for $25,000, the committee would have just as much justification for voting that amount as for voting the $25,000, because, it would have to rest on something that is in the mind of my hon. friend and his officers, and which is not before the committee. The committee has no information about it. The committee, I am sure, is disposed to give to the hon. gentleman a sufficient appropriation to carry on the business of the country, and to properly deal with the increasing business. The criticism I am making is that my hon. friend does not come with any sufficient information beyond a very general statement that this money will be required and his appeal to the committee for an increase would be just as valid if he said $250,000 instead of $25,000. The committee would be just as much justified in voting that as in voting him $25,000. The fact is that we have no real information before the committee that would justify it in voting either one or the other of these sums. I would have supposed that my hon. friend would have received a report from his subordinate officers and that report would have set out certain facts to be presented to the committee upon which the committee would be justified in voting an additional sum over and above the amount which was found necessary last year. Would my hon. friend tell me how much was expended last year under this vote?

Mr. PATERSON. I presume the estimate of last year was very close. It has to run to the first of July, and it is expected that by that time it will have been virtually expended. In reference to my hon. friend saying that you might as well ask for $250,000 as for $25,000, if he gives it a moment's consideration, he will see that that would not follow at all.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I was paying my hon. friend a compliment, when I said he would have just as much justification in one case as in the other, because, my hon. friend would have said that it was necessary. I meant to put it in this way, that my hon. friend's word is just as good for $250,000 as for $25,000.

Mr. PATERSON. If it is designed as a compliment I should not resent anything in that way. If we had asked for $250,000 of an increase on a total of $1,159,000, there would have been more necessity for the hon. gentleman to ask for details than at present, when we are only asking for $25,000. The hon. gentleman has some idea of the way in which the business of this department is increasing. I will just give some figures which will show the progress which has been made.

Customs outside service for fiscal year, 1904-5 :

The estimate for 1903-4 was..	$1,402,105 00
The estimate for 1904-5 is....	1,436,565 00
Increase..	$ 34,460 00

The proposed increase in the estimate is therefore 2·45 per cent.

The customs revenue in 1901-2 was	$32,425,532 31
The customs revenue in 1902-3 was..	37,110,354 59
Increase in 1902-3	$ 4,684,822 28

The increase in the revenue of 1902-3 over that of 1901-2 was 14·44 per cent. The customs revenue for the nine months ending 31st March, 1904, was $30,163,263.79. Assuming the revenue for the full current fiscal year on the basis of the collections for the first nine months, the revenue for the year will be $40,217,685.04, or an increase of $3,107,330.45, or 8·37 per cent. It will therefore be seen that while the increase in the estimate of expenditure is only 2·45, the increase in the revenue will be over three times greater. While the revenue is increasing the volume of business is also increasing as shown by the following figures, viz. :

The entries inwards in 1901-2 were 797,911, in 1902-3 they were 840,477, an increase of 5·33 per cent. The entries outwards in 1901-2 were 231,672, in 1902-3 they were 250,599, an increase of 8·17 per cent. The railway reports inwards in 1901-2 were 709,791, in 1902-3 they were 801,713, an increase of 12·95 per cent.

The shipping returns also show that business has increased, as I find that in 1901-2 the number of vessels, sea-going and coasting, arriving at customs ports in Canada was 110,368, and in 1902-3 126,474, an increase of 14·59 per cent. The number of vessels, sea-going and coasting, departing from customs ports in Canada in 1901-2 was 105,452, and in 1902-3 120,502, an increase of 14·27 per cent.

The cost of collection of customs revenue in the last fiscal year 1902-3, was 3·31 per cent, which is the lowest cost of collection in any fiscal year since 1868 except the year

1883, when the percentage was 3·26. In the fiscal year 1894-95 the cost of collection was 5·13 per cent, and if you apply the cost of collection for that year to the revenue for 1902-3 you will find that it would have taken the sum of $1,903,761.19 to collect last fiscal year's revenue, or $674,732.48 more than was actually spent for that service.

In the fiscal year 1894-95, the customs revenue was $17,890,516.94.

In the fiscal year 1902-3, the customs revenue was $37,110,354.59, an increase of $19,219,837.65, or over 107 per cent.

In the fiscal year 1894-95 the number of entries inwards and outwards combined was 591,487, and in 1902-3 1,091,047, an increase of over 84 per cent. In the fiscal year 1894-95, the number of railway reports inwards and outwards combined, was 574,721, and in 1902-3 1,048,845, an increase of over 82 per cent.

For salaries and contingent expenses at the various ports in the Dominion I am only asking for an increase of $25,000, which is not a large amount when you consider that in the outside service of my department there are over 1,700 officers.

For inspection board of customs, statistics and preventive service I am asking an increase of $10,000.

On the statistical staff alone there are 53 officers whose salaries are chargeable to this vote, and an increase of $50 to each officer would mean $2,650.

There are a number of other officers whose salaries are small and in addition I am trying to strengthen the board of customs staff in order to obtain full information as to market values of imports.

There is some force in the argument of gentlemen on the other side, that an increase of revenue does not necessarily mean a corresponding amount of extra work, and that it would not require more clerical labour to collect $10, than it would to collect a hundred dollars. That is true in a sense, but the figures given in my statement show that the volume of business has also largely increased. I think it is not time wasted that I should stop to give these figures to the committee. I believe these figures to be absolutely correct, and they show that while there is a very gratifying increase of the receipts from customs, there has been a large augmentation of work. We know from our past experience that it is impossible to accurately estimate the amount that will be required fifteen months ahead. There may be some ports which it will be in the public interest to open, and to which officers will have to be appointed, and as to which we cannot foresee at the present time the circumstances which may develop. The figures I have given show that the work is increasing in greater ratio now, than even during the last two or three years. We thought some time ago that we had perhaps reached the climax, but it would appear not, because the revenue from the customs seems to be as buoyant as ever. I think that for each month of the past nine months of the fiscal year, there has been a large increase in the customs revenue. It will probably be found that at the end of the fiscal year there will be $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 of revenue greater even than last year, which was supposed to be a big year. I again impress upon the leader of the opposition, that these are estimates and only estimates. In the case of a department as large as the Customs Department; spread as it is over the entire Dominion; with the currents of trade changing; with requests from the Northwest and other points for customs facilities which we have not been able to meet yet, and as to which it may be found that it will be in the interest of the country to meet; it would be unreasonable to ask, that we would be able to discount what changes may be necessitated within the next fifteen months. The officers of the department think that this $25,000 increase is the lowest amount that it would be safe to ask. I have been most anxious, as the hon. gentleman can understand any minister would be, that my estimates should be as low as possible, but the officers of the department think that it would not be advisable to ask less and to carry over into a future estimate, sums which it may be necessary to expend on the current service during the period these estimates extend over.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I did not expect that my hon. friend (Mr. Paterson) would be inspired with the spirit of prophecy, such as he apparently thinks would be necessary. No one imagines for one moment that he or any officer in the department, would be able to tell absolutely what changes must be made during the next fifteen months. However, as a fact, it would be only eight or nine months, because if the next session of parliament is called in the ordinary course in January he could bring down a supplementary estimate. Even for that period of eight months I do not ask him to judge of everything infallibly or to be able to prophesy, but I do ask him to show me one place where his department expects an increase of the staff or an increase of salaries to be necessary. He must know something about the present conditions. There is an estimate of what the increased revenue will amount to up to the end of the present fiscal year; and whoever attends to that work ought to be able to give some of the information that I am asking for. My hon. friend speaks of the statistical staff, which I think he says numbers fifty-three. Has the labour of that staff been confined entirely to the work which we see in the report of the hon. gentleman's department, or have they ever endeavourd to estimate anything of this kind We have largely increasing importations. Are there any statistics in the department which would indicate how much labour is involved in the manufacture or production of these goods? That would be a very valuable piece of information for the public to have. Have the hon. gentleman's staff also considered whether or not any material portion of that labour might be profitably employed in Canada in the production or manufacture of those goods? It is of course desirable to have produced in Canada all articles which we can possibly produce here. Would it not be important for his department to investigate these importations, especially in new lines of goods, with the view of judging to what extent they could be produced in the country? I do not know whether this question has ever been taken up by my hon. friend since he has been in charge of the department, or indeed by any of his predecessors. At any rate, I should be glad to have him give the committee any information, if there be any, on that subject, and in default of that, let me know what he thinks of the suggestion.

Mr. PATERSON. What the hon. gentleman refers to, so far as I apprehend his meaning correctly, is not within the scope of the duties of the statistical branch of the Department of Customs. I think their work has been confined exclusively to compiling statistics relating to our own department. Possibly the Dominion statistician, who gets out the Year-book, may have paid some attention to that matter; but of that I cannot speak positively, because I have not read his book lately. The Department of Trade and Commerce keeps track of the statistics of trade with foreign countries more than we do, but I do not know that it has done anything in the direction of what the hon. gentleman suggests. As to what I think about it, I can only say in a general way that any information that can be got in relation to the trade and commerce of the country is valuable; but I fancy there would be a good deal of difficulty in accomplishing what the hon. gentleman is seeking. For instance. all parties are agreed that raw cotton, which comes into Canada very largely, is an article that cannot be produced in this country and should therefore come in free. I presume that my hon. friend refers more to manufactured goods. That is an involved question, because a great many manufactured goods are placed on the free list or on the 5 or 10 per cent list for the purpose of promoting trade in this country and giving employment. This is the raw material from which other things are manufactured in this country, and the people engaged in that work are desirous of having it on the low scale of duties or else absolutely on the free list. So that I see difficulties in the way of getting accurate information as to the amount of labour that might be spent on these goods. As an illustration, take the large printing presses and paper mill machinery. I suppose we shall all agree that for many years, until there are millions more people in the country than at present, even one establishment or the manufacturer of these articles could not be started with advantage to the country. Parties using this machinery ask us why we charge duties, as we do impose duties, on paper machinery and a lower duty upon printing presses, &c., not produced in Canada, and that probably cannot from the circumstances be produced in Canada for some time to come. These users of machinery say that we are only putting a burden on them although they are giving employment to many people. Thus the question is many sided. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. R. L. Borden) asks me to give the question consideration and to discuss it with my officers, I can only say that I shall be glad to do anything I can in the matter. The more complete information we get in regard to all matters connected with trade and commerce the better equipped we shall be.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am not entering into any discussion as to whether or not we can enter into the manufacture of certain articles in Canada. I agree with what my hon. friend (Mr. Paterson) has said with regard to the complexity of the question, and I will add that it is a question on which it is sometimes difficult to obtain satisfactory information. But because it is a complex question and because it is difficult to obtain information from any particular source upon the very point he has mentioned, it seems to me that it would be wise for the government, not only in the interests of the country but in the interests of the administration of my hon. friend's own department, in the interests of those who have to deal with the question of tariff framing, to have information of this kind. When you come to revise the tariff, the first difficulty that confronts you is the very point we have been discussing. You have to go all over the country to the various people engaged in these industries and gather the information piecemeal. It would be a great aid and assistance in such work if there was in the Department of Customs or in the Department of Trade and Commerce some men who would be investigating these matters, compiling these returns and gathering information which would be of use to those who desired to know whether or not the manufacture of a particular product could be profitably undertaken in Canada—and in using the word profitably I mean with profit to the country as a whole and not simply to the men who may wish to engage in it under a high tariff. I mean whether or not it is worth while for this country, in regard to a particular product, to impose such tariff as will enable that product to be manufactured in Canada.

At present that information can be obtained only in meagre form and piecemeal. But if the government had in some department a statistical branch which would investigate questions of this kind, it would be of great advantage, so long as we propose to give to manufacturers in this country a certain measure of protection. I do not criticise my hon. friend (Mr. Paterson) for not being able to give this information, but I would suggest to him that he should not only discuss this with his officers but that he should see that it is done, either in his own department or in some other department. I thought that possibly one of the additions to his department last year, Mr. Bain, the assistant commissioner, might have been engaged in work of this kind, but apparently he has not had leisure to attend to it. Possibly there are in the hon. gentleman's department some officers who are not overworked, and who might undertake this work in connection with their present duties. If all of the officers of the department are now fully occupied and working up to a fair limit, I for one would think it extremely desirable that some statistical branch of this kind should be organized.

My hon. friend (Mr. Paterson) has referred me to some extent to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). That hon. gentleman has matters of a kindred character under his charge but I do not know if he has thought it worth while to take up this subject; if so, he has not vouchsafed to give the information to the House.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT (Minister of Trade and Commerce). We have been inquiring into it more or less. As regards the amount of labour employed in the various industries, my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) will find in the latest census returns that this question has been pretty fully investigated. As far as the statements made by the various manufacturers may be depended upon as to the amount of raw material they use, the proportion of labour and interest on capital and on plant, &c., the information has been fully set forth. These reports of course have not yet been placed in the hand of my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) but I hope they will be in a few weeks. They give a very large amount of information on the subject.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That would be an assistance, of course, in so far as we manufacture in Canada articles which we also import into Canada, but in respect to articles which are not manufactured in this country at all, perhaps the census returns would not give us all the information.

Mr. PATERSON. That, I think, is when the solution will come, in the census department.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. It would be of no use at all in regard to a great many articles; it would be of use only in respect of articles now manufactured in Canada.

Mr. PATERSON. Precisely; but that would be the best index you could have, a census of the various industries of the country, which would give you their raw material, the number of hands employed, the total product, &c. Deductions could be drawn from that. I fancy that this is work to which the Dominion statistician devotes himself. The census return would perhaps be the nearest approach you could hope to get to full information. In that way you could obtain information as to the value of the industries in the country; you would get to know whether a certain number of men employed in a certain industry were enhancing the value of certain materials to a certain degree, and whether that enhancement in value would more than compensate for the increased labour. You could draw your deductions in that way.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. You might get assistance from the Department of Trade and Commerce. Then there are I suppose permanent officers in connection with the census.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My hon. friend's suggestion seems to me a very good one to have carried out. I would submit to him that it could be better done by establishing a certain branch in connection with the census department.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Curiously enough, I was about to make the same suggestion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is well worthy of consideration.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I was going to make exactly the suggestion the Minister of Trade and Commerce has made. You have to organize the census staff every ten years. At present you have it in apparently a very unorganized condition, although of course our views may be prejudiced. You have not had it very well organized during the past three years, but I shall pass over that as I do not wish to make this matter controversial. If you had a department of this kind which would be continually investigating these subjects from year to year you would be much more likely to have an efficient staff when the time comes round, at the end of the next ten years, to take the census. Because, these will be trained men, accustomed to work of this kind and they might be made heads of different branches of the census staff when the time comes for doing the work at the end of ten years. And the work in the meantime would be of the greatest service to the country, if we intend to maintain a tariff which affords protection to our manufacturers. I trust the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) as well as the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) will give this serious consideration.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Personally, I am very well disposed towards the hon. gentleman's suggestion, if it appears to our colleagues that it can be carried out for a reasonable sum. It is more especially desirable because, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. R. L. Borden) knows, we have to take the census in the Northwest Territories every five years.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to me that we have hardly all the information that ought to be given us on this item. We have not the basis of calculation on which the minister concludes that he will require $25,000 more. He tells us that the customs collections have increased and that the importations have increased, but he has not told us what relationship this additional expenditure bears to the increase in the work. I suppose that the majority of the officers are remunerated by a yearly salary. In that case the minister ought to be able to judge at which ports the increase of business makes the increase of salaries necessary. Or the minister ought to be able to tell us what class of officers are to receive increases. No doubt, a part of this increased vote would be required for contingencies which cannot be exactly foreseen, but the bulk of it must be for salaries to men of certain classes or in certain places. This information the minister ought to give us. He must have made some sort of calculation to reach the conclusion that $25,000 will be necessary, and we would like to know what he bases that calculation upon.

Mr. PATERSON. Well, for instance, in the port of Montreal, a very large port, as the hon. gentleman knows, we are meditating a change. The clerks making the entries in what is called the 'long room' have been there a considerable time. But the salaries have not been uniform. Some of these men have been bearing the title of landing waiter or preventive officer, and so on. They have been doing work inside, but at salaries which they consider insufficient. Therefore, they asked to have a share of extra hours. The hon. gentleman knows that extra services used to be rendered by certain officers to shipping and railway companies and the officers remunerated by these companies. But last year the sanction of the committee was asked to a change under which the government would pay all that was paid to its officers. The clerks in the long room claimed that their salaries were not enough to maintain them properly, so they asked for a share of that night work or overtime. But we have not thought it desirable that they should do other work. Their work is important—receiving the entries of the merchants. Despatch is needed and correctness also; and in this work the revenue is directly involved. We have concluded that, if a clerk puts in his time from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m., as a rule, his mental energies will have been taxed enough for that day. It is proposed now to increase the salaries in this department, so as to pay $900 as a minimum, and to require these officers not to work extra hours or share in the extra pay.

Mr. SPROULE. How much will be required for that in the port of Montreal?

Mr. PATERSON. About $3,500. Then the port of Toronto is increasing very rapidly—in fact, nearly all the ports are increasing. Take Winnipeg, for instance. When I first entered the department, I think the receipts would not be more than about half a million—I speak subject to correction. By the end of this year the receipts will probably be nearly two millions of dollars. Last year the committee were kind enough to place an increase at our disposal, with which we have been able to add to the staff in Winnipeg. I think that during last year we found it absolutely necessary to add eight or ten to the staff at the port. But for this, I do not see how we should have got along. The increase in the business of the port is exceedingly gratifying, of course; but it is better than could have been anticipated. Yet, I have by no means reached the conclusion that Winnipeg will not require, during the year 1904-5, still further increases. The leader of the opposition reminded us that this vote will cover a period ending fifteen months from now, and suggests that a supplementary vote might be taken next session. But last year the leader of the opposition said he did not like so many different estimates, and asked why we did not estimate for enough at once, and avoid these supplementary estimates. We are endeavouring to do that. But with the revenue increasing and the cost of collection also necessarily increasing, it is impossible to estimate in advance more closely than we have done. When we ask for an increase of only $25,000, I think hon. gentlemen will admit that we are estimating as closely as we should be asked to do.

Mr. McCREARY. The hon. minister (Mr. Paterson) has spoken of the port of Winnipeg. I would like to ask him if there are not complaints from that port that the staff is insufficient, and that the salaries paid are not sufficient considering the cost of living? Any one living in Winnipeg and having his family there, as I have, must know that, during the last six months or a year, the cost of living has increased from 25 to 33⅓ per cent. I was told recently by a gentleman who moved from Ottawa to Winnipeg that for the same house accommodation that would cost in Ottawa $20 a month he would have to pay $45 in Winnipeg. I know of houses that rented two years ago for $25 a month and are now bringing $75 a month. You find that when a good house is put up for rent it is in great demand. For instance, when the house of the late Dr. Lynch not long ago was advertised for rent there were no less than 89 applicants for it. I have heard of complaints from the clerks in the Winnipeg custom-house that they are not able to earn three meals a day on the present scale of wages. The hon. minister should increase the staff at Winnipeg, and not only at Winnipeg, but at North Portal, Regina, Moosejaw, and all those ports where the American immigration is coming in and where the immigrants report for entry. And he will have to increase the wages, or he will not be able to get the proper men to fill the positions.

We know as a matter of fact that during last year nearly fifty per cent of the employees of the post office left and went to other employments. A great many clerks on the staffs of the banks left and went to other employments because they get more than the bank wages. If there are any places where the clerks should be better paid and where there should be more of them it is those ports in the west where an increasing revenue is being shown. I think it is a low estimate to say that the immigration this year from the United States will be probably 60,000 or 70,000. Of course that does not show a large increased revenue for this reason: Supposing this number represents 12,000 families, each family has a car of settlers' effects on the average. You will understand therefore that a large amount of work will have to be done by the Customs Department from which there would be no revenue at all because settlers effects all come in duty free. The staff at Winnipeg have to do probably ten times more work with less showing as far as revenue is concerned than any other port in Canada. I submit there should be an increase of from 20 per cent to 25 per cent in the present number of hands employed as well as in the amounts of salaries paid, not only at Winnipeg, but at all points on the frontier such as Gretna, Emerson, Moosejaw, where many of these settlers enter their goods going up to Alberta and other western points.

Mr. PATERSON. What the hon. gentleman says is quite correct. I think three at least of our officers at Winnipeg if not more have left during the year.

Mr. McCREARY. Others are going to leave.

Mr. PATERSON. One was getting $950 a year, and he wrote saying that he was going to leave. He was a valuable officer, and we asked him if he would remain if we would give him $1,100. He said, no, that he was offered considerably more than that, and he left. At least two others left in the same way, if not more.

Mr. INGRAM. What was his name?

Mr. PATERSON. R. D. Waugh.

Mr. McCREARY. He is getting $3,000 a year now.

Mr. PATERSON. I think it is very probable that before the termination of the time in which this money is to be expended we may have to increase the staff—I cannot say by how much. While I have no desire whatever to withhold any information from the committee, the difficulty is that when we happen to mention in parliament a port where we propose to increase the number of employees, we are immediately deluged with applications for the positions, accompanied wth notices of reports and proceedings of parliament stating that there were to be extra officers employed. All this necessitates a great deal of correspondence on our part.

Mr. BLAIN. I think the minister was to bring down a statement of the number of temporary and permanent officers in his department. Has that statement been prepared?

Mr. PATERSON. The accountant informs me that when I took charge of the department there were thirty permanents and seven extras. The hon. gentleman will remember that my statement referred to a question we had up the other night on a civil service estimate. The hon. gentleman will see, if he turns to that item, the number of permanents that is mentioned; on page 17 he will see the details with reference to what is now proposed. There were thirty-four last year—the present year—and six extras. But as I explained at the time, we propose that these six extras that were paid out of contingencies shall cease to be extras and become permanents. With them added, during the year 1904-5, with the addition of three junior seconds and two thirds, the permanent staff will be forty-five with no extras.

Mr. BLAIN. An increase of twenty-five.

Mr. PATERSON. No, there were thirty permanents and seven extras—thirty-seven when I took charge ,and now there are forty-five altogether, an increase of eight.

Mr. INGRAM. I understood the hon. gentleman was to bring down a statement of the permanent and temporary employees in the outside service as well as the inside.

Mr. PATERSON. That was not asked for.

Mr. INGRAM. I would ask for that now.

Mr. BLAIN. The minister has given the committee some reasons for the enormous increase in his department during the last year. The explanation seems to cover only the larger cities of Canada, Montreal, Toronto, and Winnipeg. It is a reasonable explanation of the increase in those cities. But I would like the minister to direct his attention for a moment or two to the towns in the province of Ontario and explain the increase of expenditure in some of them. Take for instance, the town of Berlin. The minister will notice by the return that the increase in the revenue collected has doubled in the last five or six years ; perhaps he will state how much the cost of the service and the number of employees have increased in that town. Then take the town of Chatham for another instance, and the town of Cobourg. Perhaps the minister could tell us how it comes there is such an enormous increase in the expenditure as compared with the increased revenue in the cities, and practically nothing in the towns while the same condition of things prevail.

Mr. PATERSON. At Berlin, if I remember right, an extra officer has been put on. I think an extra officer has been put on at Chatham since the department has come under my charge. If I am not mistaken, I think the department is asking for another officer now. There has been some increase in the towns which show larger revenues. But we have endeavoured to be as economical as we could, and not increase the salaries faster than we found necessary. While we are trying to do justice, we have been able to meet the requirements of all. I suppose there are a great many who now point to the fact that living is more expensive, that the business has increased at their ports, and that they have a fair claim for increase of salary. As I am pointing out to the hon. gentlemen if these were all met, and perhaps it would not be an extravagant thing if their wishes were met, it would send the expenditure up by many tens and tens of thousands of dollars beyond what we are asking for now.

Mr. BLAIN. Would the hon. minister give the towns in Ontario where extra officers have been appointed during the past year ?

Mr. PATERSON. Brantford and Chatham are the two towns that I can mention now. There are two at London.

Mr. BLAIN. My question was confined to the towns of Ontario.

Mr. PATERSON. There was one at Niagara Falls. There have not been very many increases in the towns.

Mr. BLAIN. I would like the hon. minister to give me the correct information upon that point.

Mr. PATERSON. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to take a memo. of it and I will bring down the information ?

Mr. BLAIN. Yes, that will be all right.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman, in reference to the item that was before us a moment ago, I would like to call the attention of the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) and of the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) to the increase which has taken place since 1896 in the dutiable imports into Canada from Great Britain and the United States. During the years from 1896 to 1902 our importations from Great Britain increased by $8,614,489, while during the same period, the increase in our importations of the same articles from the United States was $26,163,670. The principal articles included in these importations were as follows :—carriages, cement, cotton and manufactures, drugs, &c., earthen and chinaware, electrical apparatus, fancy goods, flax, &c., glass and manufactures, hats and caps, leather and manufactures, iron, steel, metals and manufactures of brass, copper, gold, silver and manufactures of agricultural implements, paints and oils, paper and manufactures, wood and manufactures, wool and manufactures, rubber and manufactures, silks. The hon. Minister of Customs had his attention called to the fact that it would be wise for us to obtain some idea as to how many men are employed in the manufacture of these goods brought into this country, and I entirely agree that it would be well for us to know that in view of the fact that the total increase of importations from Great Britain and the United States during these six years has been $34,778,159. It would be a desirable thing to have a statistical statement showing the number of men employed in foreign countries manufacturing these goods and sending them into our country.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. minister told us that there would be an increase in Montreal of probably $3,500 to provide for the needs there and he told us as well that it was intended to discontinue the practice hitherto followed of providing for the extra service which is required to be done there. What provision is he making for doing that extra work ?

Mr. PATERSON. That will be divided among the men who are receiving the lowest salaries. We propose to increase the salaries of the men who will be deprived of a share of this extra work so that they will be recompensed for the loss of anything they get in the way of extra work. This work will be divided amongst others who are not enjoying as high salaries as they are. These are landing and tide waiters.

Mr. SPROULE. I thought that the hon. minister proposed to provide for a new class of men ?

Mr. PATERSON. No, we do not wish to increase the staff if we can help it. If they are able to do more and to supplement their salaries in that way we would prefer to have the work done in that way rather than that we should add to the permanent list.

Mr. SPROULE. Would the hon. minister be good enough to tell us what estimate he has made for increases in the staff or increases in salaries at Winnipeg ?

Mr. PATERSON. Well, I cannot give the hon. gentleman that.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman has no estimate of that at all ?

Mr. PATERSON. It would be impossible for me to give the hon. gentleman the figures in regard to Winnipeg now. If I were to give him the figures and he were to hold me to them next year, I might not be able to carry out the estimate. I am willing to give all the information I can in reference to the growing trade of the country and the demands that are made upon us. I suppose that we have applications now from a score of places that want to be created ports. With all these applications coming in, with the trade increasing as it is within the North-west Territories, and with towns springing up, I think it will be admitted that in asking for $25,000 to provide for all this, we are making a very moderate request. I do not think the committee is running any risk at all in placing the money at our disposal.

Mr. SPROULE. The question at issue is not as to the exact amount of the vote. It might require a great deal more than that to satisfy the needs created by the development of the country, but it is the business principle involved in it. When the hon minister submits to this committee an estimate of the amount which he wants for the purpose of carrying on the custom-house business all over the country, we very naturally ask upon what principle is this estimate made up. What is the basis of the calculation that enables him to reach the conclusion that he wants $25,000 more ? It surely cannot be that he is content to say: Oh, there is a development in the trade of the country and we will ask for $25,000. That would not be a very business-like way of reaching a conclusion. He might find that he had very much too little or that he had more than he needed at the end of the year. Surely his officers have made some kind of an estimate as to what the increase will be in each province, or at each port, at the great cities of the country where the large bulk of the importations are made, as to the number of new ports that will be required to be opened up. I do not know how the hon. minister can go before council and say : We want more money for our custom-houses. Council, I should think, would ask : How much do you want for this place, how much for that place and how do you make up this estimate ? Surely the hon. gentleman was able to submit some estimate to council and if he was able to submit it to council, he should be able to submit it to this committee.

Mr. PATERSON. It is impossible wholly to do that. I do say that we anticipate that we will have expenditures to meet in some of the main ports, in the way of paying the extra officers who will be required. What those will amount to, I cannot estimate now. I believe that in order to retain officers at some of our ports, we will have to increase their salaries. In other cases where they are presenting their applications for increases, I do not say that we will lose their services, but I think it is only just that their claims should receive consideration. When this matter was discussed with the officers of the department, it was considered that $25,000 was the least, that, from our past experience, we would be justified in asking the House to grant. From our past experience it is felt that the $25,000, increase, is the lowest we would be justified in asking. I would remind the leader of the opposition that he at one time remarked that he did not like to see these supplementary estimates come down time after time, and that we should include all our wants in the one estimate. I believe in that myself so far as it can be done, but I am afraid that before the session ends, it may be found that the growing business of the country will necessitate our taking another vote in the suppplementary estimates for next year.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. A great many matters which are brought down in supplementary estimates, should be included in the main estimate, but these are matters about which ministers should be able to give the House the necessary information, and not have the committee go it blind as it were. I do not ask that the minister should bring down estimates which would necessitate his being endowed with the gift of prophecy; but he certainly should be able to give the committee some definite information about the vote which he now asks. If the minister gives us the facts, we will vote the money without one moment's hesitation.

Mr. PATERSON. I gave the facts when the hon. gentleman was out of the chamber.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am glad the hon. gentleman gave some facts, because up to the time I had left, he had not given one fact, and whatever facts he did give, do not seem to have made much impression on my friends around me.

Mr. FOWLER. Last year the minister took an increased vote over the year before. Was the whole of that increased vote expended?

Mr. PATERSON. I am informed that the expenditure will be very close to the vote taken, but the year is not ended yet.

Mr. FOWLER. What was the increase taken last year over the year previously ?

Mr. PATERSON. $100,000. But I should explain that we took over extra service which was hitherto defrayed by transportation companies, and that was estimated at $75,000. The ordinary increase this year will be about the same as the ordinary increase last year.

Mr. TAYLOR. I understood the minister to say that the vote was $1,400,000 last year.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR. The estimate only shows $1,159,865.

Mr. PATERSON. I included all the estimates last year.

Mr. BLAIN. When the increased vote was taken last year, the minister stated that he proposed to establish a considerable number of out-ports that had been asked for. What number of additional out-ports have been established during the past year ?

Mr. PATERSON. I will get the information in a minute or two.

Mr. FOWLER. You are asking $10,000 additional under the heading of salaries and travelling expenses of inspectors of ports, and officers of the preventive service. That is about ten per cent increase for this particular service, and if your whole increase is $25,000, that particular item seems to be out of proportion.

Mr. TAYLOR. Under this item the Minister of Customs did not ask for $1,400,000 last year at all; he only asked for $1,159,865. Surely the minister should give us a detailed explanation of what he intends doing with this $25,000 extra. Is he going to appoint new officers and has he the authority of his deputy minister and of the government for doing so? I see a new name here in the Auditor General's report; a Mr. McNeill, at Gananoque, who was put in the place of Mr. David Hodge. Why do you displace Mr. Hodge, a good faithful officer, and put McNeill in his place ? Is that what you want the $25,000 for—I made a mistake in saying that Mr. Hodge was at Gananoque, he was at Pools Resort.

Mr. PATERSON. I am informed that he was just an extra officer getting $100 a year.

Mr. TAYLOR. And so is Mr. McNeill a temporary officer. Why did you displace Mr. Hodge and put in Mr. McNeill?

Mr. PATERSON. I really cannot say.

Mr. TAYLOR. Well, can you say what you are taking this $25,000 extra for ?

Mr. PATERSON. I may say that Mr. McNeill replaced Mr. Hodge in 1898. So the accountant tells me.

Mr. TAYLOR. He is quite wrong. Was there any complaint against Mr. Hodge ?

Mr. PATERSON. I could not tell.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then, will the hon. gentleman tell us what he is going to do with this $25,000 ? Is any part of it going to pay persons to write pointers 4, 5 and 6 ?

Mr. PATERSON. No.

Mr. PATERSON.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then, will the hon. gentleman tell us what he is going to do with it—in detail ?

Mr. PATERSON. I have told the hon. gentleman that I cannot give it in detail.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then let it stand until you can.

Mr. PATERSON. I cannot do it at all.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then, what is the minister asking it for.

Mr. PATERSON. I am asking it because we believe it will be required to carry on the service efficiently during the year that will elapse from the 1st of July next. With the expansion of trade and commerce which we anticipate, we shall require in some places some extra officers, and we expect that some officers will deserve a slight increase in their salaries. I am asking this $25,000 in anticipation of these two events.

Mr. FOWLER. It seems to me that the minister is quite right as to the first reason he gives. There may be a necessity for new officers which he cannot anticipate now; but he can certainly settle beforehand the question of an increase of salary to any official now in the service. Does the hon. gentleman have these officials perform extra work ?

Mr. PATERSON. No.

Mr. FOWLER. In other departments of the public service, in which any increases of salary have been looked forward to, the names of the officials and the amount of salary to be paid in each case, have been stated. I do not know why the hon. gentleman does not deal with his officials on the same basis as other departments deal with theirs. I think we ought to have an explanation, and a very full and complete explanation on this point, before we go any further with this item, and I for my part will not be inclined to vote for it until we receive that explanation. The hon. gentleman is scarcely treating the House with the consideration that he should when he gives such a paltry and miserable excuse for this vote. I would ask him to explain why it is necessary for him to adopt a different method from that adopted by the ministers of other departments when they ask for votes to increase the salaries of their officials ?

Mr. PATERSON. If the hon. gentleman insists on that being done, I will simply tell him it cannot be done. I have a list of the increases which were granted last year, and I am perfectly willing to submit it to the committee.

Mr. COCHRANE. What has that to do with this item ?

Mr. PATERSON. It has this to do with it, that if the money granted last year was expended improperly, in the judgment of the committee, there is an opportunity to criticise it ; and next year, when I shall be able to give similar details about this item, I can be called to account if the money has not been expended properly.

Mr. SPROULE. That will be locking the stable door after the horse is stolen.

Mr. PATERSON. Hon. gentleman will then have the information on which they can condemn the administration if they do not approve of the way in which the money has been expended.

Mr. FOWLER. That is not what is done in the other departments. When the money is being voted, the minister give the names of the clerks and the amounts of the proposed increases.

Mr. PATERSON. That is in civil government. It does not apply to the outside service.

Mr. FOWLER. Why should it not apply ? Where is the difference ? Why could you not tell whether a man, by his past record, is worthy of an increase ? It is absurd to suppose that we are to go it blind, and leave this matter in the hands of the minister without any information. How do we know but there may be another case like that of Assistant Commissioner Bain ? How do we know that a part of this money will not be spent in getting written pointers 4, 5 and 6, just as in the case of pointers 1, 2 and 3 ?—which, by the way, are not very creditable literary productions, whoever wrote them. I say the reason the hon. gentleman has given for this vote is not a valid or business reason ; and his conduct the other night, when he was brought face to face with the fact that this Assistant Commissioner Bain, while paid $2,800 out of the public revenues of this country, was employing his time in writing campaign literature for the Liberal party, was not such as to justify us in voting the money blindly, because the natural inference would be that a portion of it would be used to enhance the salaries of some civil servants who would be willing—I was going to say prostitute themselves—to engage themselves as political hacks for the purpose of writing campaign literature for the Liberal party. The hon gentleman should give us in detail the names of the officers of his department whom he intends to promote, what salaries he intends to pay them, and what portion of this $25,000 he requires for that purpose.

Mr. PATERSON. What does the hon. gentleman mean by a reference to political hacks ?

Mr. FOWLER. Just exactly what I said.

Mr. PATERSON. What you said ?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes ; I made it very plain, I thought.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, he makes it very plain as he thinks sometimes. The hon. gentleman had better be sure of his facts. Nothing discreditable has been done by Mr. Bain, and if the hon. gentleman knows of anything discreditable he had better make the statement.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOWLER. I would be very sorry indeed to have the hon. minister, or the gentlemen behind him who cry 'hear, hear,' be the judges of political morality in so far as I am concerned. 'Nothing discreditable,' the hon. minister says, 'in Mr. Bain acting as he has done in respect to this matter ; nothing discreditable.' says the hon. minister !

Mr. PATERSON. What has he done ?

Mr. FOWLER. He dares to justify it. I made the charge the other night that the minister, having directed Mr. Bain to do this work, and having knowledge that this work was being done by a man in his department, whom he had promoted over the heads of other men of longer standing in the department and at least as worthy of promotion, and that this man was taking his salary of $2,800 from the public revenue and employing his time writing campaign literature for the Liberal party, but yet the hon. gentleman says there was nothing discreditable about that. His party have had commission after commission going through the length and breadth of this country trying to find cause to dismiss Conservatives who were holding office when hon. gentlemen opposite came into power. And why did they dismiss them ? Because they had voted as their consciences had dictated, although they were men who had never taken any part in politics. Expensive commissions were appointed to try these men, who were put to tremendous expense to defend themselves. In one case in my own county, officials had to spend $500 or $600 to defend themselves from a charge of partisanship. They had done nothing but vote as their consciences dictated. And here we have a man, a minister of the same party, attempting to justify and saying there is nothing discreditable in the conduct of a man in receipt of $2,800 of the public revenue of this country in doing what I have charged. The hon. gentleman admitted it, because he could not deny it and dare not deny it, because he knew that the man was sitting within the sound of his own voice, who knew that he knew that that work is being done—and yet he says there is nothing discreditable or wrong in it. I was surprised—although I thought the time had passed when one could be surprised at any statement that might come from hon. gentlemen opposite, but there is still room for surprise—when I heard the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson), from whom we might naturally expect better things, make a statement of this kind. Coming from some of the colleagues of the hon. gentleman it would not cause as much surprise as it did coming from him, because from him we expected better things. Yet he says there is nothing wrong about it, and want to know what I mean by speaking of this partisan as a political hack. I meant exactly what I said, and what I say now; I thought I put it as plainly as it could be put in the English at my command. It is wrong, it is discreditable. Judged by the standards the hon. gentlemen laid down, it is very discreditable on the part of any civil servant, employed and paid out of the public treasury, to devote his time to writing political campaign literature for any political party, whether Liberal or Conservative.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman has not told us what Mr. Bain did.

Mr. FOWLER. He wrote pointers Nos. 1, 2 and 3.

Mr. PATERSON. He wrote pointers Nos. 1, 2 and 3! Does the hon. gentleman know that? Does he say he did?

Mr. FOWLER. I——

Mr. PATERSON. Sit down, if you please, till I am through.

Mr. FOWLER. You asked me to answer.

Mr. PATERSON. And you cannot play the political bully with me; understand that. I am ready for this discussion. Hon. gentlemen brought it up very suddenly the other night, and wanted to press me for an answer right off, without giving me permission to speak to the gentleman who was assailed in order to ascertain whether it was so or not. I asked them: What are your charges? Finally, the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) mentioned, for instance, so and so. Very well, said I, I will speak with Mr. Bain. I have done it. I have spoken with him, and I am ready to meet the hon. gentlemen. But let me point out, first of all, that these gentlemen, unable to prove their statements, or not daring to make their statements—because they did not dare to make them—moved that Mr. Bain be discharged. They admit that we sent deputations and commissions through the country to investigate cases of political partisanship, and that some of those charged were dismissed, but here there was to be no investigation, no word from Mr. Bain; cut his head off right here! Thirteen of them stood up to vote for it, and that gentleman stood up among them.

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. PATERSON. Now, what did Mr. Bain do—for I have spoken with him? Mr. Bain has prepared statistical statements for me time and again. These statistical statements have been used in this House in my speeches; they are part of the public record. He has prepared these, and he has handed them out when he was asked for them, and they could have been found in my speeches, the greater part of them, if the gentlemen had sought them. I would like to tell the hon. gentleman opposite, if he does not know it, that a minister's private secretary is necessarily engaged to some extent in political matters, for he is the confidential man of the minister, and I want to tell him that there are gentlemen who have been private secretaries to ministers in days gone by who are now in the public service of this country. Ask these gentlemen if they have ever prepared any statistics for their ministers. Ask them what they have done in reference to this matter, and if doing the work of a private secretary, the work that a minister has the right to ask his secretary to do, is to result in the summary dismissal of that secretary, all I have to tell the hon. gentleman opposite is that I think the fairest way will be to begin with the oldest offender in that respect—and it would not commence with the private secretaries. Do hon. gentlemen opposite mean to tell me that statements which they have used in this House have not been prepared by members of the civil service, or upon information furnished by members of the civil service? Will all of the gentlemen on the other side rise and tell me that?

Mr. CLANCY. Yes.

Mr. PATERSON. Will you speak for all?

Mr. CLANCY. I speak for myself, and I say that I have never had one letter or figure or hint from any person in his department since I have been here.

Mr. PATERSON. Perhaps the members opposite will rise one after the other and state that they have never received information from public servants.

Mr. INGRAM. Here is one.

Mr. PATERSON. There is one who moved without any full knowledge of what was done to discharge as efficient a public servant as there is in this country. He would not allow him to be asked a question, to make a statement. Mr. Bain has made a statement; he tells the truth and is not ashamed to tell it. He has prepared statements that have been used by me in the House. I have got political pointers from him, but would disclaim that he is responsible for all that is in these pamphlets, but he will admit that he did prepare the financial statements that are there. After six o'clock, if hon. gentlemen will permit me and if this discussion is regular, I will read those statements or some of them, because I believe they are true in fact, and that if there are any persons in the country who ought to have the benefit of them it is the Tory party. If it can be shown that any statements for which Mr. Bain is responsible are lacking in fact and in truth then let them be pointed out. But, if they are mere recitals of instances showing the marvellous progress and development of the country, as they are, then every Canadian who has any patriotism in him ought to rejoice that these things are plainly set forth. Such work I say, is a service done to the country. I am quite ready for the discussion with hon. gentlemen opposite; but let me tell you this, Mr. Chairman, that when this was taken up the other night, a certain gentleman arose here and attempted to enact a role not at all credible to him. The Chairman was deliberately insulted by one of these gentlemen, and that same hon. gentleman thought he might also insult ministers of the Crown. Now, ministers of the Crown have equal rights on this floor with other members. They represent constituencies as well as hon. gentlemen opposite. When ministers are asked questions in a proper manner they are bound to answer. But I want it to be understood that when any hon. gentleman opposite presumes to trangress the rules of ordinary parliamentary courtesy and decency he is entitled only to such an answer as the minister feels it proper to give him. And hon. gentlemen opposite have no right to complain if some of their questions are ignored, if some of their questions are passed by in silence. I will say no other word.

At six o'clock, committee took recess.

After Recess.

Committee resumed a eight o'clock.

Mr. FOWLER. There is a historic question that has been for many years, I might almost say for centuries, awaiting an answer. That question is, 'Who struck Billy Paterson?' Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not think that that question awaits an answer any longer; it has been answered this afternoon, if we are to judge by the huge volumes of sound from the hon. gentleman to whom I might refer as the ministerial megaphone, and the rage and fury he exhibited during the remarks he made before recess. I do not know what was said to call forth such an exhibition of temper on the part of the hon. gentleman. I am at a loss to discover why he should work himself into such a passion. But it was simulated rage; it was feigned passion; for certainly nothing was said to justify it. The hon. gentleman was placed in a very difficult position. Allegations had been made affecting an officer who was under the hon. gentleman's peculiar care and who was the subject of the hon. gentleman's peculiar regard. Statements had been made reflecting upon that officer, who had been brought into the department by the minister, who was at one time private secretary to the minister and for whom that minister had shown his love and regard by promoting him—wrongfully promoting him—over the heads of officers in the department who were quite as efficient and far better qualified than was that person for the position to which he was promoted. And, so the hon. gentleman had no real answer to the charge. He could not even deny it. Was it that he would not deny it if he could? Not at all. But he knew that the truth of the allegation was known to too many persons within sound of his own voice for him to dare to deny it. And so, he tries to draw the proverbial red herring across the trail by working himself up into a rage and seeking in that way to arouse the enthusiasm of his followers who, in contradistinction to thinking men, are always carried away by noise. The hon. gentleman said that it was a proper thing for a private secretary to perform certain services for his minister. Has anybody attempted to dispute that assertion? Not at all. But the officer who fills the position of assistant commissioner of customs is not the private secretary of the Minister of Customs. He is the assistant commissioner. The hon. minister attempted to define that officer's duties, but he was not able to say that he had done much except, perhaps in getting out pointers, 1, 2 and 3. But, as a matter of fact, during the whole of last year, instead of this gentleman acting as private secretary or being appointed as private secretary to the minister, two young ladies performed that duty.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Much more congenial.

Mr. FOWLER. As the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Sam. Hughes) points out, no doubt it was much more congenial to the hon. minister. I can understand that an hon. gentleman of the chivalrous nature of the Minister of Customs would prefer to have the services of beautiful young ladies rather than those of one of his own sex.

Mr. BUREAU. Good for him.

Mr. FOWLER. The hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) says 'Good for him.' This strikes a responsive chord in the heart of that hon. gentleman. I congratulate the hon. member for Three Rivers upon having such feelings with regard to the sex; I believe it is characteristic of the race to which the hon. gentleman has the honour to belong.

Mr. BUREAU. Thank you for the compliment.

Mr. FOWLER. There is no reason why I should not pay it. The hon. minister (Mr. Paterson) did not deny the charge that was made, but he insinuated that this officer had the right to perform these services because he was the minister's private secretary. But on Friday afternoon, when this subject was under discussion the hon. gentleman himself, admitted that this young man was not now his private secretary, and that of the $600, that had been paid the year before for the purpose of providing the minister with a private secretary, he had only expended $250, which he had divided between two young ladies who had preformed that service for him. When the hon. gentleman was speaking before 6 o'clock, he asked me two or three questions and I rose to answer him, supposing that he wanted me to answer him, and he said to me in those tones which I will not attempt to imitate, because my voice is not strong enough—he said: 'You cannot bully me.' Now I leave it to the sober judgment of the hon. gentlemen in this House to say who showed the part of a bully, whether it was myself who, as a matter of politeness, endeavoured to answer him the question which I supposed he was putting to me, or whether it was the hon. gentleman who so far forgot the courtesies of debate as to call out to another hon. member: 'Sit down.' Yet this hon. minister of the Crown, this cabinet minister, who fills the position, or attempts to fill the position, of a minister of the Crown, as I say so forgot himself, forgot these courtesies which should characterize the debates of this House, as to act in that manner towards a private member on this side of the House. I think the appellation of bully belongs rather to the man who does that, rather than to the man who attempts to conduct himself according to the decencies of the public life.

Now, Sir, remember that the minister has not attempted for one moment to deny, the minister cannot deny, why, so far from denying it the minister has admitted that this young man did do the very thing that he was charged with doing, that he did assist in this work, and he says, not only did he do that, but I will read, before the committee rises, the result of that young man's labour, I will read these pointers 1, 2 and 3, to show just what he has done. Now it does seem to me strange that the hon. gentleman is not ashamed of the position which he takes in this matter. It seems to me it should be a matter of shame to him rather than he should glory in it, that this civil servant, who is not by his own admission his private secretary, has engaged in political hack work—I speak that not offensively—political hack work while he still receives a salary of $2,800 from the public revenues of this country, that he is engaged in that work on behalf of a political party. I say again that it is not right under these circumstances, for him to engage in any such work, that he has no right to take part in any such work, which is the most violent form of political partisanship, and that, as I understand, is a disqualification for any civil servant, according to the rule adopted by the hon. gentlemen when they came into power. Surely, Mr, Chairman, that rule was not adopted for the purpose of getting rid of certain Conservative civil servants in order to make places for the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite to reward them for their party services. Surely they were not dishonest enough to put forward a pretense of that sort, to deprive efficient men of their livelihood merely for the sake of making places for their own political favourites. The country naturally supposed the hon. gentlemen were honest in respect to that, and that a person who was guilty of political partisanship, no matter on which side of politics he happened to be, would be dismissed. The hon. gentleman says: You have not proved a single thing, and you hope to deprive this young man of his salary by putting him out of his position. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman knows that when a thing is admitted, it is not necessary to prove it. The hon. gentleman admitted it on Friday night, he was even more honest on Friday night than he has been this afternoon. Perhaps some of his colleagues have given him a pointer that he should not be quite so honest, not quite so open, that silence is sometimes more prudent than frankness. So the hon. gentleman was not quite so open this afternoon as he was on Friday; but even this afternoon the hon. gentleman admitted that this young man was a civil servant, and that he was really guilty of the breach of duty that had been charged against him. But on Friday night he admitted, by his silence if not in words, that he not only had absolute knowledge of what was going on but that he had directed it. That was charged and he did not deny it. If a charge of that kind is made in the hearing of a man it is his duty to deny it if it is not true. But the hon. gentleman knew it was true, and he had not the hardihood—if he had the desire—I do not say that he had the desire, but if he had the desire, at least the circumstances show that he had not the hardihood to deny it. Now that is just where this matter stands, and we heard the sound, and the noise, and the boisterousness of the hon. gentleman this afternoon when he spoke, and he has not brought forward one thing to prove the innocence of the party who has been charged. Not only that, but as I said, he has admitted that every charge we made in respect to him was absolutely true. Now, I trust the hon. gentleman will properly discipline this young man. On Friday night if he had said: I will inquire into this matter, I will investigate it, I will ascertain if these things are true, and if I find he is guilty, I will discipline him—if he had said that, there would have been no more trouble about this thing. But on the contrary what did he say? He said: I have no doubt the young man will see what has been said and he will speak to me on the subject. The young man will come and speak to him on the subject! Surely the hon. gentleman has a better conception of his duty than to take a stand like that. Now, Mr. Chairman, I trust the hon. gentleman will, before it is too late, see what it is proper to do in this matter and will do it.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman demands certain courtesy at my hands. When a question is asked or when a charge is made, if it is not denied then he says he takes it for granted that the charge is true. I grant him that if a distinct charge and statement is made by some gentleman, it would be incumbent to deny it at the time, it is not necessary in all cases—in all cases. The character of the gentleman making the charge determines that. If there was a gentleman whose opinion I valued and cared for, whose word I thought would carry weight in the country, then I would think it necessary to set my word against his word. Well, Sir, my hon. friend seems to think that in matters of moral perception, in matters of right and wrong, of propriety and impropriety, I am deficient. Well, I will have to labour under that disadvantage. If the hon. gentleman has been gifted by nature with a nicer moral perception of what is right and wrong, a nicer moral perception of the necessity of statements being made that are in accordance with the facts, let him rejoice in that; but let him not pour obloquy on another hon. gentleman not so highly gifted by nature. The hon. gentleman is assuming a role in this House. Although this discussion is rather out of order, I am rather glad to have it renewed, for when this subject was under discussion on Friday night, certain statements were made which I was not in a position, not having the necessary knowledge to answer correctly. I thought when certain charges were made against an officer in my department, that it would be well for me to have a conference with that gentleman and ascertain what he had to say in reply to the statements. I said: No doubt he would see what had been said in parliament, and would take note of it, and that no doubt he would speak to me about it.

I was not mistaken in the character of the hon. gentleman. He did speak to me and he spoke very freely and I want to say now in the hearing of this House, and I care not who receives it or who does not receive it, because I believe that my word will be taken by members on both sides of the House whose opinion I value and if it is not taken by others, I will be content to abide by it, that there was no attempt on the part of that officer to hide even what he had done. There is no attempt on the part of the officer to hide even what he had done. There is no attempt on my part to hide what he has informed me has been his connection with this matter. I have stated that to the committee: I have stated that he frankly admits that in days gone by he prepared information which had been used by a person compiling these 'political pointers' as they are termed and which have been referred to as campaign literature. Why, Sir, many of these statements were prepared at my request for use in this House, and have been used in this House. I think you will find statements in these 'pointers' dealing with the trade and commerce of the country that I gave to the House in the session of 1902. Some of the statements that are to be found here, if I am not mistaken, and I think I am not mistaken, were borne with us to England when we went to confer in reference to trade matters and were made use of in our discussions with the Board of Trade. These statements were not prepared on the eve of an election, because many of them will be found in my speeches if hon. gentlemen will take the trouble to look them up. It may be that they are brought down to a later period when comparisons are made between one year and another, but substantially these figures are true. What objection is there to be taken to a gentleman who prepares statements, which statements have been used on the floor of this House and which statements, if you will, go out to the public in a printed pamphlet if they are true and correct? Who says that a minister does not avail himself of the services of his private secretary to look up details for him in reference to matters with which he has to deal? Perhaps hon. gentlemen opposite believe that a minister's duties are very light, that he has the same time as when he was a member of the opposition to delve into trade and navigation returns and find these matters out for himself. For many years when I was a member of the opposition, I did that and I have not the slightest doubt that members of the government at that time were forced to avail themselves of the information compiled by those in whom they had confidence in their departments in order that they might use it in public debate. Take our foreign trade. Here is one of the statements that which there was no attempt to deny the responsibility of having originally prepared.

First, we will look at, and illustrate by comparison, our foreign trade, which is declared by all exponents of the science of political economy to be the best indication of the welfare of the country, the following are the figures:

18 years Conservative..	1878..	$172,405,454
	1896..	203,025,360
7 years Liberal.....	1903..	467,064,685

Now, the point is this: Are these figures correct? Are they the figures of a partisan? Are they the records of the history of this country? If they be true, if they be correct, then, I hold that every patriot in this country, be his politics what they may, ought to rejoice in the knowledge that is imparted in the publication of these figures. True, there is a comment upon them. I myself made a comment upon them in the House. I have done it upon the platform, I can remember that, in those days gone by.

Here we have an increase of 66 millions in 18 years under the national policy, compared with an increase of 228 millions in the short period of seven years under the Liberal policy.

And the question is asked:

Astonishing, is it not?

And is it not? Is there anything wrong in that, anything that the public records and the history of the country do not bear out ? Comparing the last seven years of Conservative administration with the first seven under the Liberals, we find a tremendous increase under the Liberal policy. Here are the details:

Total foreign trade for seven years from 1897 to 1903, inclusive.... ..	$2,542,701,333
Total foreign trade for seven years from 1890 to 1896, inclusive.... ..	1,630,446,121
Increase last seven years under Liberal policy	$ 912,255,212

I ask again, are the figures true, are the figures correct and if they are, should not every hon. gentleman in whose breast patriotic emotions swell rejoice that these facts are made patent, they are known ?

Some people prefer to judge our material progress by our exports ; that is to say, the goods we produce in Canada and sell abroad for gold or exchange.

Mr. LANCASTER. Does the hon. gentleman say that these figures are correct that he has just mentioned ?

Mr. PATERSON. I believe them to be correct.

Mr. LANCASTER. Does the hon. gentleman know whether they are correct or not ?

Mr. PATERSON. I believe them to be correct.

Mr. LANCASTER. The hon. gentleman does not know whether they are correct or not.

Mr. PATERSON. I used these figures in the House, if I am not mistaken, and I will warrant you that I assured myself, whether right or wrong, that I believe them to be correct. The hon. gentleman can turn up and see whether I did so or not. At any rate as we are discussing the kind of information that was prepared, not with the view particularly of this campaign, but with the view of being used in this House and on the platform, I think that those hon. gentlemen opposite who have met me on the platform will admit that as far as the figures are concerned they have not been seriously controverted or attempted to be set aside.

Some people prefer to judge our material progress by our exports ; that is to say, the goods we produce in Canada and sell abroad for gold or exchange. Well ! How do they stand ?

18 years Conservative..	1878...	$67,989,800
	1896...	109,915,337
7 years Liberal.....	1903...	214,401,674

In eighteen years there had been an increase from $67,000,000 to $109,000,000. Then, in the seven years from 1896 to 1903 it went up to $214,000,000. Or to view the matter in another light ; we sent abroad during the latter seven years, $470,000,000 worth more than during the previous seven years. That is an astonishing rate of progress ; it is something the country has reason to rejoice in, no matter what government may be in power. Will any one complain if that should be called attention to ; will any one say that that statement is partisan ? If so, you will have to prove that it is not an actual fact recorded in the history of this country ; a fact that the present generation points to with pride as evidence that this Canada of ours has entered upon an era of progress and prosperity, such as few countries enjoy ; and that future generations will read with pride. Then follow other tables : giving the produce of the mines ; the fisheries, the forest, the farms, the manufactures; dealing with the bank circulation, bank discounts, the assets of the banks ; showing the increased number of letters posted ; showing the increase in immigrants ; showing that from 1890 to 1896, 271,216 immigrants were recorded ; that for the seven years 1897 to 1893 inclusive, 366,946, or an increase in the last seven years of 95,730 immigrants. That is a gratifying fact, if the figures are true, and if they are not true hon. gentlemen opposite will be able to point out the error. Then there is a return of settlers' effects taken from the trade and navigation returns ; a return of the homestead entries, showing that for the eighteen years from 1879 to 1896 there were 62,661 homesteads entries, but in the last seven years there have been 75,530. Just think of that—nearly 13,000 more homestead entries for land during the last seven years than for the eighteen preceding years. That is gratifying ; that is something that ought to be pleasant reading for us all. This statement was prepared and used in the House a year or two ago, and the last year was added to bring down 1903. The preparation of these figures was for the purpose of being used in the House, and they were used in the House, and I venture to say that their correctness has never been successfully attacked. Here are other tables, comparing the progress of Canada with that of other countries, and this I believe I have used on the platform in times gone by. It states that in the case of Canada and the United States the figures are made up to the end of June of the fiscal years June 30, 1896 and 1903 respectively, while in the case of all the countries with which a comparison is made, the figures are brought down to December 31, 1905 and 1902 respectively. This table was, I think, prepared, as far as I remember, before Mr. Bain had been promoted to the position of Assistant Commissioner of Customs. Hon. gentlemen opposite ought to be pleased to know that in this percentage of growth, Canada stands in the first place ; ahead of Japan, the United States, Cape Colony, Italy, Germany, Belgium, the Argentine Republic, Switzerland, Great Britain and France. Canada's percentage of growth was 107·43 per cent while the next highest, Japan, was 97·20 per cent; Cape Colony 59·50 and the United States only 47·18 as against Canada's 107·43. Do hon. gentlemen opposite object to information like that, being given to the people? Do they object to that information going to foreign countries to show how Canada is progressing? Then here is a table with reference to British preferential trade. That table was, I believe, prepared before we went to England and was used in England in our conference with the board of trade there, in which we were showing the average duty, and how it had been lowered on many important lines under the preferential tariff. That you will find at page 17 of 'Political Pointers No. 1,' as it is termed. These figures only come down to 1902, and they were prepared I believe before that and were made use of in England. I say here, with reference to these tables, that I have been reading that Mr. Bain said: yes, I originally prepared them; they were prepared for use in the House, and you have used some of them; when asked for them I have given out these figures, I believe they are absolutely correct; I believe I was wholly within my duty in preparing them for you as your private secretary. To ask that the private secretary of a minister shall not have anything whatever to do in the way of confidential relations with this minister in matters political, is to deny what is the well understood principle both in England and Canada. Mr. Bain occupied the position of private secretary to me. Mr. Bain occupies the position of my acting private secretary, to this day, and I ask gentlemen opposite if it has not been the rule under all ministers and under all ministries, to have their private secretaries furnish them with information? I would ask if private secretaries have not gone further than that, and have not made information public with reference to matters political? But, hon. gentlemen opposite say: Mr. Bain is Assistant Commissioner of Customs. True; he has been in that position since the 1st of July last. Many of these statements were originally prepared, a considerable time in some cases, before he became assistant commissioner. But even if he were assistant commissioner at the time, what does the Civil Service Act say:

> Any member of the civil service may be appointed private secretary to the head of the department, and may be paid an additional salary not exceeding $600 a year while so acting. The salary shall be payable to no private secretary unless the amount has been voted by parliament.

That amount was voted by parliament, and as I say, Mr. Bain continues to be my private secretary and to act in the capacity of private secretary to me. When he was raised from being a first-class clerk to be assistant commissioner of customs at a salary of $2,800, I said to him: I will not pay you anything of the amount of $600 for private secretary that parliament has sanctioned, but I will keep that standing there; it may be that the work will so increase that I will find it necessary to engage another in that capacity, and that vote will be available. I am trying to get along in that way and therefore this is money saved to the country; except as I have said, that I have used part of it to supplement the salaries of two lady stenographers and typewriters who are assisting in private secretarial work. I have nothing to hide. If we have done wrong, I do not object to the censuring. True, the hon. gentleman who has taken his seat seems to have higher conceptions of right and wrong, if we are to believe him, than I have; he seems to think that I am deficient in that respect. I can only say that my private secretary has not done anything which I believe was inconsistent with his duties; and when hon. gentlemen opposite spoke of him as a political hack, if I did wax a little warm, it was the honest indignation of a man who knows the value of a faithful public officer, and I am not inclined to sit still and hear a gentleman whom I know intimately, whose value I know, whose character I appreciate, who I believe will not swerve from the line of rectitude—I am not going to sit still and hear him spoken of in terms of reproach by a gentleman who, I venture to say, from the remarks he has made, has not the first proper conception of the work that pertains to the Customs Department or its various officers. Any member who thinks that the work of the Customs Department is light work, or who thinks that this young man is not entitled to the salary he is receiving, or worthy of the position to which I have exalted him, is, in my judgment, mistaken. So long as I am the head of that department, the deputy head concurring in my views, promotions and increase of salaries will be given to the officers who we believe deserve it on their merits; and I venture to think that fair-minded men, watching my course in the department, will admit that the increases and promotions which have been made have been made, not from a party point of view, but on consideration of the merits of each case. Men who entered the department before I took charge of it have been advanced in their salaries and in their positions. If it be a charge against me that since I took charge of the department not many of the Conservative faith have been appointed to office there, I plead guilty. I think that is perfectly known to be constitutional under party government; but I am not conscious of having done an injustice to faithful men who were not appointed by myself, but who have done their work faithfully and well. This I say in all confidence. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) asked me if any one in the department had been promoted as fast as Mr. Bain, and I candidly told him no. I know not who prompted him to ask that question.

Mr. CLANCY. I did not need any prompting.

Mr. PATERSON. He does not say no one did prompt him.

Mr. CLANCY. I say no one did prompt me.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman has alluded to the fact that I passed over the heads of men who had been longer in the service—I do not know whether he said more worthy or not; but I think that was his inference. I deny that. According to my judgment, I did not do so. None of the other officers in the department have spoken to me or intimated to me that they thought an injustice had been done to them by the promotion of Mr. Bain. If there are any such—and perhaps the hon. gentleman knows whether or not any such have made complaint to him——

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. That is a cowardly insinuation.

Mr. PATERSON. I say if he makes that statement—perhaps he does—and if he shows me that injustice has been done to any one, I will endeavour to rectify it. But I do not believe that an injustice has been done to any one. Mr. Bain was promoted on his merits. He is there now earning his money. Do not think any of the public money went into the publication of this pamphlet. Mr. Bain has given hours and hours more than his official hours to the discharge of his strictly official duties. I challenge any one to say that there has been any negligence on his part in attending to the duties of his office. Now, I have stated openly and squarely what has been my course. I was not prepared to see gentlemen rise and make insinuations, or bold statements that did not charge anything, without having an opportunity to ask Mr. Bain what the particulars were, allowing him to make an explanation for himself which I could give to the House. Hon. gentlemen opposite admitted that commissioners had been appointed by this government to inquire into the cases of some officers who had been relieved from the public service; but they were not willing to wait even till the minister could ask Mr. Bain for his explanation, or to say whether what was alleged here was true or not; but they demanded that he be summarily dismissed and that his salary be cut down by $1,800, which was as far as they could go. The hon. gentleman lays stress upon the fact that Mr. Bain is assistant commissioner. What has that to do with the question? He was appointed private secretary, was for a time a second-class clerk, then a first-class clerk, and then promoted, all the time continuing to be my private secretary. In the case of every minister, a salary of $600 is provided for a private secretary; but do hon. gentlemen presume to say that under the late government or under any government the private secretary of a minister has received $600 and no more? Do they suppose that there was ever a private secretary who did not hold another office in the department, for which he received a salary? Why, where could you get a man with the abilities required of a private secretary for $600? And, as far as my recollection goes, away back through the years since I have been in parliament, the usual standing vote for private secretaries has been $600.

Mr. SPROULE. Does the hon. gentleman think he is strictly complying with the Act in taking the $600 voted for a private secretary, who must be appointed by Order in Council, and then dividing that amongst other members of the civil service?

Mr. PATERSON. That is leading to another branch of the question.

Mr. SPROULE. Is it a strict compliance with the law?

Mr. PATERSON. That is another point. If the hon. gentleman is right in the position he now takes, then the practice I have been following is wrong and I am to blame; but what we are discussing now is whether or not my private secretary did wrong. I am quite prepared to discuss the question when it arises, and whether the course I am now following is right or wrong, I suppose it has been the course in the department in days gone by. The accounts, of course, have to pass the Auditor General, and we all know that he criticises them very closely, yet he has raised no objection and the same practice has been followed in other departments. Of course, the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) may be right and the departments and the Auditor General may be wrong. To hear the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite you would think that the private secretary of a minister should receive the $600 and no more; that he must not occupy a position of a first, second or third-class clerk, or of assistant commissioner.

Mr. SPROULE. Not at all.

Mr. PATERSON. Not at all? Then what is the objection? If it was right for him to prepare these statements for me when he was a first-class clerk, would it not also be right for him to prepare them after being appointed assistant commissioner? Do hon. gentlemen take the position that he must not occupy the position of civil servant and draw a salary as an officer of the service, and at the same time act as private secretary? The statute says distinctly that any officer may be appointed to that position. Mr. Bain was appointed to that position in days gone by, by Order in Council, and has continued to act for me in that capacity to the present time. As I said before, the private secretary to the minister stands in a different relation to the public and to the minister than do others in the service, and he must necessarily be connected with matters political and matters financial that engage the attention of the minister. That fact is so apparent that it must be realized by every one.

Coming to the statements he has prepared for me which I have used in the House and which have been used by the compiler and publisher of this document which has been alluded to, if they are wrong, if there are falsifications of the public accounts, if there are errors even in them, I should be glad to have the errors pointed out, but if not, I am unable to see that he has done anything which deserves censure much less the punishment proposed by hon. gentlemen opposite, that because of what he has done, his salary should be summarily cut off, that in fact he should at once be dismissed from the public service. Let me tell the hon. gentleman opposite who speaks of him as a public hack, that if they should both go into the world to-day and seek positions at what they are worth, I venture to say that man will command a higher remuneration than the hon. gentleman. I may be wrong—

Mr. FOWLER. You are.

Mr. PATERSON. But that is my estimate of the two men. I know one intimately, and I have formed an estimate of the abilities of the other gentleman by the efforts he has made in this House. I can tell him more; my belief is that Mr. Bain could leave the public service and in a very short time could command a larger remuneration as a reward for his labours than he gets in the civil service at the present time, and it was not so long ago that I was somewhat afraid I was going to lose his services.

An hon. MEMBER. Do not fear.

Mr. PATERSON. They are not accustomed to having men like that in days gone by, but I tell them that it is a fact, and that his services are known and appreciated by me—and I think I am some judge, and have some reason to be a judge of the merits of the men who are engaged in the public service. If I was a little warm, if I did speak a little loudly, all I can say is that sometimes I feel a little touched when reflections are cast upon a gentleman who, I think, does not deserve them. To hear a man who is as faithful a public servant as Mr. Bain, a man who, like many others in the public service, gives good return for the salary he receives, described as a political hack, and the inference sought to be drawn that all he does—for that seems to me to be the impression that hon. gentlemen opposite desire to leave—is to write partisan literature for distribution, makes me feel that hon. gentlemen are doing a monstrous injustice. I know that to be a fact and when it was done I got a little warm and spoke as I felt. Do not consider this as an apology by any means; it is only an explanation of my use of a tone a little louder than my ordinary complaisant tone of speech.

Mr. FOWLER. The hon. minister (Mr. Paterson) says that he felt a little touched. It seems to me that the treasury is the thing that has been touched. The minister has done me the honour to compare my abilities with those of the officer under discussion, and he says that if we were turned out into the world together I would not be able to achieve one half as good a position as would that gentleman, nor would I be worthy of filling so good a position. The hon. gentleman I suppose sizes up the advantage of the position by the amount of salary connected with it. I think it would be perhaps as well if the hon. gentleman had compared himself with that officer. My judgment of that would be as follows. I do not know what position, outside of the cabinet, the hon. gentleman could fill, in which he would get anything like the salary he gets to-day. There is one position I believe which the hon. gentleman could fill with a very great deal of ability—just one position. While he was speaking I was thinking over all the various walks of life open to men of this country and trying to fit the hon. gentleman into some position for which he would be eminently qualified. Then I remembered that on occasions I had attended the circus and I had heard persons outside the circus tent where the curiosities were, describing the wonders to be found therein.

It struck me that the hon. minister would be eminently qualified to fill such a position. I do not know what the salary ought to be, but I should judge it would not be so large as that he pays his assistant commissioner whom he lauds so highly in this House. I have not made it a practice in this House since I entered it to refer to hon. gentlemen opposite as I have to the Minister of Customs. But I want to let that hon. gentleman know, and to let every supporter of his know, that when I am attacked in this House, when insulting references, gratuitously insulting references, are made to me, I shall protect myself; I shall take very good care to treat hon. gentlemen opposite just as they treat me. I do not know that it tends to improve the tone of debate to have the minister indulge in this sort of banter, or badinage, or repartee across the floor. However, that is a matter for the hon. minister to settle with his own conscience. He is assuming to set up as a moral censor. He says his moral principles are wonderfully good, and assumes to reproach me for having moral principles not so good as his own. Well, I am not here to belaud myself, but I am prepared to leave it to those who know us both to say which is the more entitled to credit on this ground.

Now, to come to the question. The hon. gentleman set out, as I supposed, to repel a certain allegation made against an official, in his department. And how has he attempted to do this? By reading to this committee certain figures that were compiled by that official, thereby admitting that this officer had done the very things we charged him with doing. And the hon. minister tells us that we cannot dispute the truth of these figures. I have not had an opportunity to look over the book that the hon. gentleman read from, and so I am not in a position to say whether the statements in it are true or false. But I have had some experience with Grit literature in times past, and, if the statements in pointers 1, 2 and 3 are no more true and honest than the statements contained in the Grit literature that I have previously had the opportunity to examine, they are false indeed. But, whether these statements are true or false has nothing to do with the question. The minister tells us that he has no private secretary, but that the work is done by two young ladies. And he attempted to take credit for saving $350 by employing no private secretary. But now the hon. gentleman sees the hole he is in, and so he tells us that this man is acting private secretary.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Charles Marcil, Bonaventure). Hon. gentlemen will please keep order.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES (Victoria). There is too much noise with desks.

Mr. FOWLER. Let them make all the noise they like.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. No, they must keep order.

Mr. FOWLER. 'Let the galled jade wince, our withers are unwrung.' I say the hon. minister made no answer whatever to the allegation from this side of the House. Every word he himself uttered was a complete confirmation of the charge. As he read these figures, whenever he wanted his hearers behind him to applaud—naturally they would not have known it from his statements—he raised his voice an octavo or two, and, taking that as a signal, they would bang their desks. These figures show the prosperity that Canada is enjoying, a prosperity that we are all glad and proud of—differing in that respect from hon. gentlemen opposite, who, when in opposition, were always crying blue ruin and trying to injure the credit of the country. We are as patriotic when in opposition as we are when in power, and we rejoice in the prosperity which Canada is now enjoying in common with the rest of the world. But the hon. minister did not state—because he could not—one thing that this government had done to bring about this prosperity. In that respect, he is like his leaders in front of him, who have sat dumb as oysters when the leader of the opposition, on more than one occasion, has challenged them to state one act of this government that has helped to bring about the prosperity which Canada enjoys. And the minister reads these figures showing the prosperity of the country as though they were an answer to the charge that was made. Surely, the hon. gentleman, in his heart, knows better than that. I believe he does. I would not wish to think that a gentleman occupying the position he does has a mind so trivial as to put forward a contention of that kind if a better argument could be produced. But he had no argument, and so he tries to throw dust in the people's eyes by bringing forward this silly argument, the only thing he has to say in answer to the allegation we made.

Mr. INGRAM. Perhaps I am the innocent cause of all this turmoil; perhaps I have brought down upon the heads of hon. gentlemen the denunciations of the Minister of Customs this afternoon. I think the hon. gentleman will do me the credit of saying that, in the discussion of his estimates last Friday and to-day, I have not uttered one word that was not pertinent to the subject under discussion, the items of supply then before the Chair. The hon. gentleman has charged me, as mover of a motion to cut the head of this civil servant, with condemning the man without trial. May I ask, what would be the object of a trial if not to prove whether he is innocent or guilty? The hon. gentleman is braver to-night than he was on Friday night. Then he would not answer whether this man was guilty or not, and whether he had knowledge of his guilt or innocence. But to-night he comes out boldly and admits that the man is guilty of the charge of preparing campaign literature. Now, when we were discussing the item of $600 on Friday evening, what did the hon. Minister of Customs say? Here is the question I asked and the hon. minister's answer:

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, Mr. Bain, my private secretary, $600—I think one of the officers of the department was acting in a dual capacity. Would the hon. gentleman give us the particulars of that?

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, Mr. Blain, my private secretary, was made assistant commissioner. He remains my private secretary yet, but he does not draw any portion of the secretary's allowance. His salary is $2,800. In my office there are two shorthand writers. One of them, I am told, has her salary supplemented by $150 and another by $100. The hon. gentleman will understand that they work very long hours, very often up till six o'clock and after.

The hon. gentleman puts an item in the estimates to raise $600, not to pay his private secretary, but to pay typewriters that are in his office. I asked if this gentleman performed duties in a dual capacity, and the minister said that he did, being both assistant commissioner and acting private secretary. I then asked the hon. gentleman if this man was in the habit of preparing campaign literature. But the minister could not answer the question, and did not answer. I want to point out, as I did point out, that the very gentleman who was then under discussion was sitting on the floor of this House, and the hon. gentleman is not honest, because he did not ask his assistant commissioner whether he was guilty of that charge or not. I hope the hon Minister of Customs will give me his ear. I may say that I shall also have some remarks to make to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) before I get through.

I would like to find out the opinion of the Minister of Customs on this point. He has stated that the assistant commissioner performs the duties of commissioner of customs in the absence of the latter. I do not know what that means, whether those duties are confined to the office here, or whether he may go outside and perform the duties of the commissioner. Now, I would like to point this out to the hon. gentleman. He has in his department an assistant commissioner, a gentleman who is receiving public money from both political parties, a gentleman who prepares campaign literature, who is a political partisan. Suppose he meets on official business an importer or manufacturer who may be a strong Conservative, who may have an invoice over which there is some trouble, or who is importing goods that may not be fully valued, and that he may have got into difficulty with the department for some reason or other. Now would it be in the public interest that this partisan commissioner could go to the importer or manufacturer and say: You would not be prosecuted in the way you are if you knew on which side your bread is buttered—in other words, if you were not an active Conservative the department might deal with you more leniently than they are doing ? Would that not be a consistent course for a partisan commissioner to take ? Now if that be so, we say that so long as Mr. Bain is employed in the department he has no right to prepare campaign literature for either the Liberal or the Conservative party in this country. On the strength of the position that we take on this side of the House, I moved last Friday night that the salary of Mr. Bain be struck out of the item in the estimates. I consider that I was doing my duty, I consider it was the proper thing to do. In support of my action I could quote the First Minister, I could quote the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I could quote gentlemen occupying cabinet positions since 1896, to the effect that whenever a civil servant undertakes to perform political work for a party he is liable to be dismissed. That principle is laid down by the right hon. gentleman himself. In view of that, I say I was justified in making that motion. Now the Minister of Customs speaks of the figures prepared by this gentleman. I do not care whether these figures are true or false, that is not the point at issue between the two parties in this House. The point at issue is the principle involved in the matter, and the minister should not forget that. Then speaking of promotions, I was surprised to hear my right hon. friend. He reminded me somewhat of the Russians at Port Arthur. When the Japanese are attacking Port Arthur the Russians are afraid to move out of the harbour to meet them for fear of their own mines. When we bring charges of this kind before the government, from the suspicious way in which they allude to them, they appear to be conscious that there are mines under them prepared by themselves that are liable to explode. I could go on and refer to some other things that I have marked out here to show that hon. gentlemen are not carrying out the principles they laid down in 1896. I could go further and show by documents I have marked here, that the only recommendation any civil servant requires to secure a good position in this government, is to do something that is exactly in opposition to what they advocated previous to 1896, something of a partisan character, stronger and more pronounced than they ever charged their opponets with doing.

Mr. CLANCY. We have rarely witnessed such any exhibition as we have had here to-night. The Minister of Customs has acted many parts in this House, and has always over-acted every one of them. I think the committee to-night will conclude that the hon. gentleman has excelled himself in that respect. I know of nothing that is more disgusting than a martyr with no prosecutors. The hon. gentleman has been acting the part of injured innocence here to-night. I desire to say to the hon. gentleman that so far as I am concerned, I have not a word to say against Mr. Bain. The guilty party seems to be the minister himself from start to finish, and I want to show to the hon. gentleman that from the first day Mr. Bain came into the department, he has treated Mr. Bain in a way he did not deserve, and he has treated the civil servants in his department in a most shameless manner. I say that without having had any communication with any of them in any shape or form. I say the hon. gentleman has scandalously treated the civil servants in his own department, and he has elevated Mr. Bain, a gentleman who came into the service without even an examination, and I will prove my statements. Now let us look into the history of Mr. Bain. I say the hon. gentleman has done more, he, as a minister, has connived unfairly to put Mr. Bain forward beyond all experience in his own department in the past, and I fancy even beyond the experience of any other department in the service. Now how did Mr. Bain get into the service ? He came in as an extra clerk in June, 1896 Mr. Bristol, who was acting up to that time as priate secretary and second-class clerk, was put aside. I am not going to argue for a moment that the hon. gentleman should take the private secretary of the former minister, but I say that he should have been well treated at least. Mr. Bain had an allowance in addition to his salary of private secretary, he had $600 for the balance of that year. The next year he came in as private secretary at $600 and was paid $600 more as an extra clerk in contingencies. The next year he had a private secretary's salary of $400, and an additional salary for 1897-8 of $300. In the same year 1898-9 he was elevated to the position of second-class clerk at $1,100, making in all $1,800. The hon. gentleman was careful to go back to pay Mr. Bain a sum of $300, hidden by some means, I cannot imagine in what service it was, but he increased his salary in 1897-8 by $300 in order to give Mr. Bain a salary to which he was not entitled. Then in 1900 Mr. Bain got the salary of a private secretary, $600, and he got $1,150, including no doubt his statutory increase. In 1901, he was made a first-class clerk and put over the heads of other clerks in the hon. gentleman's department. He got his salary of $1,400 along with $400 as private secretary. In 1902, he got the salary of a first-class clerk and he got the statutory increase. He did not have to wait one year, he got the statutory increase of $50, and the secretary's salary of $400, which made $1,850. In 1903, he got the salary of a first-class clerk, $1,500, and his statutory increase of course and $400, making $1,900. the accounts for 1904 are not down yet, but the sum for the last year is, $2.800 for Mr. Bain, then assistant commissioner, not as private secretary to the hon. gentleman, and the hon. gentleman comes down with the same item this year. Now let us see how Mr. Bristol was treated. the gentleman who occupied the position of second-class clerk and private secretary to the former Minister of Customs or rather the Controller of Customs for some years. For some years after the hon. gentleman came in Mr. Bristol got $1,100. He was entitled to his statutory increases, but I want the hon. gentleman to attend to what I am saying now, the hon. gentleman deliberately, unfairly, and I say cowardly, on the part of a minister, refused to Mr. Bristol even his statutory allowance. He refused Mr. Bristol even his statutory allowance and Mr. Bristol did not get his statutory increase until 1901. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman, if I could get the hon. gentleman's attention—of course, the hon. gentleman says that he does not want to listen, but I want to tell him the country is listening—I want to ask the hon. gentleman why Mr. Bristol, who occupied a position with the former minister similar to that occupied by Mr. Bain, with the present minister, was deprived of his statutory increase from 1896 to 1901. The hon. gentleman refuses to answer. The hon. gentleman knows there is no explanation of it except that he wilfully deprived a civil servant, who was under his control and who had no option but to leave the service or submit to what the hon. gentleman was disposed to impose upon him.

Mr. PATERSON. I cannot answer the hon. gentleman right off, but it strikes me from what he says that it would look as if Mr. Bristol had gone five years without any statutory increase. I think it will be found if that be so that it was because he had been at the maximum of his salary just as it happens this year. I am asking for increases for all that I have in my department except two, and if these two were not at the maximum of their class, I would ask for them also. I am not asking for increases for them because they are at the maximum of their class. I do not know that this is the fact in regard to Mr. Bristol, but I think that it is the explanation. The accountant tells me that there was one year that he did not get his increase, but nothing like five years. Now, Mr. Bristol is being promoted from $1,300 to $1,500, and I want to say that Mr. Bristol is a very good officer.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman dealt out very tardy justice to Mr. Bristol. The hon. gentleman ought to know, and if he does not, his officer is beside him and can tell him, that Mr. Bristol had $1,100 in 1896, and that in 1903 he only got $1,250.

Mr. PATERSON. I am sure the hon. gentleman is wrong.

Mr. CLANCY. I am not at all depending upon hearsay. If the hon. gentleman will turn to the Auditor General's Report for 1903, he will see that Mr. Bristol only got $1,250, or three statutory increases since 1896. Therefore, Mr. Bristol has been deprived of $500. That is equal to four years' statutory increase. Had he received the statutory increases from year to year, Mr. Bristol would have received $1,450 in 1903. The hon. gentleman spoke about morals a moment ago. Has the hon. gentleman two codes, one a set of political morals and the other the morals of a private citizen? I would like to ask which set of morals is applied to the case of Mr. Bristol. If he applied his political conscience to Mr. Bristol we can understand that when he speaks of conscience and morals he does not mean political conscience or morals. Mr. Bain has been brought into the department and put over the heads of others, when, if experience is worth anything, he was not entitled to be put over their heads. However, that is a choice that the minister may be permitted to make. Now, we will come to the grave charge of the hon. gentleman. That hon. gentleman was asked if he had any knowledge directly or indirectly that Mr. Bain had been writing literature for the Liberal party, and he sat dumb as if there was no life in his body. The hon. gentleman refused to answer. He did not need to ask Mr. Bain. He knew what Mr. Bain was doing. Mr. Bain is not the guilty party. The hon.

gentleman is guilty of having introduced into the service for the first time the defence of a man holding a high position and drawing a large salary, on the plea that he was a good officer, and that what he had said was true. The present Commissioner of Customs (Mr. McDougal), could just as consistently go out on the stump to-morrow and advocate the principles of the Liberal party, if they had any, and he would be no more censurable than Mr. Bain. But the hon. gentleman has shown to the country that the service is permeated with corruption. I do not know of a more corrupt thing than to take the people's money and prostitute the service as the hon. gentleman has prostituted it. He did not do it unwittingly, and he unblushingly defends it now. We have never witnessed a spectacle like this since we have been privileged to have a parliament in Canada, and I hope we will never witness it again. What is the paltry, miserable excuse that the hon. gentleman gives ? It is that this gentleman has done good service. A collector of customs who is a good officer might as well go on the stump and say what he likes, or write campaign literature and then come back and render the excuse which the hon. gentleman has given by saying that he was a good officer. That has nothing to do with it. The hon. minister has not done himself justice and he certainly has not done his department justice. The hon. gentleman did elevate himself somewhat the other evening when he refused to get up and make a point blank denial of what he knew to be a fact. The hon. gentleman chose on that occasion to be silent. But, the hon. gentleman has not improved with the lapse of time. He comes back with the defence that the officer is a good one, and the literature he prepared is true. We might just as well take one of the hon. gentleman's officers to-morrow and allow him to go out on the stump, telling the people that the hon. Minister of Customs in the House of Commons had defended that course of conduct, that he was perfectly at liberty to pursue that course and that the minister would justify him. There is no single officer in his department who could not to-morrow go on stump after what the hon. gentleman has said, discuss politics and take any active part in politics he chose. He could say : Have I not done my part well in my department ? Is all I have said and written perfectly true ? Is that not a perfect justification ? I would like the hon. gentleman just to see how it would appear in his eyes if any hon. gentleman on this side of the House should take the position he has taken to-night. No one would more readily rebuke a course of conduct like that than the hon. gentleman himself. I want to say that the hon. Minister of Customs has laid down the most vicious rule that was ever laid down in this House. He has told the people plainly that you may spend public money for any purpose you like, that you may employ political hacks, and employ them with the public money, although, I say that the man who has been writing this literature is not the hack. If you were to ask who the hack was, I would be forced to name the hon. gentleman who defends this conduct in this House to-night. I do not believe that in the whole history of the parliament of Canada, a minister has ever made such an exhibition as that which the hon. gentleman has made here to-night. I do not know one who has ever laid down so vicious a principle. I do not know one who has ever so unblushingly defended it.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. Minister of Customs read us several pages from ' Political Pointers No. 1, ' which he admits was prepared by the Assistant Commissioner of Customs. The Minister of Customs not only read the tables, but he read a great many of the remarks in connection with them, and he asked us if we could prove that these statements are not correct. I hold in my hand ' Political Pointers No. 3 ' prepared by the same gentleman and if the minister will grant me a commission, I am satisfied that I can prove that this gentleman prepared every word of this document. This is what he says here, on page 12, Customs Department. He shows the gross revenue, 1903, $37,110,354 ; gross revenue, 1895, $17, 887,269; increase, $19,223,085.

Then on page 5. He says :

> Under the head of capital the Liberals spent in the last seven years $64,885,608, as compared with $37,082,642 expended during the last seven year term of office of the Conservatives.
> Now, if it could be shown that this increased expenditure had been met by imposing additional burdens in the shape of taxation on the people, or by unduly increasing the public debt, the government might be fairly criticised.

Then he follows it up by saying :

> But the fact is, and it is worthy of very special consideration, that the increased expenditure, necessitated by the great development and progress of the country, has been met without increasing the rate of taxation, without imposing additional burdens on the people, and without unduly increasing the public debt.

On one page he says that the taxation has been increased by $19,000,000, and on another page he says that this vast increase of revenue has taken place without increasing the taxation a single cent. Is that statement correct that has been written by this political hack, or by the instructions of the political hack who instructed him to prepare this campaign document ? Then he makes another statement which I am sure every farmer in this country will repudiate. Dealing with the Department of Agriculture he says :

> Of the increase stated $150.000 represents increased expenditure for the promotion of agricultural and dairying interests, including experimental farm expense. The amount spent for such purposes in 1903 being $300,000 as against only $150,000 in 1895. Under the Conservatives the assistance of these interests consisted chiefly in advances for the purchase of butter for export, and for winter dairying, and in providing for the administrative staff, the members of which went about the country lecturing. The present Minister of Agriculture—practical farmer as he is——

Is that statement correct ? Is it correct to say that the Minister of Agriculture is a practical farmer ? Why, there is not a farmer in the country who will not say that that statement is untrue.

The present Minister of Agriculture—practical farmer as he is—has gone farther than his predecessors, and has instituted many new and improved methods to aid the agricultural community. For instance he established a live stock branch, with a capable commissioner to promote live stock interests of the country. A poultry division was provided to spread education as to the best methods of fattening and preparing poultry for export.

Did the Minister of Customs authorize the Assistant Commissioner of Customs to write such trash as that ? The Minister of Customs has admitted that the assistant commissioner prepared 'Political Pointers No. 1,' but he says it was before he was assistant commissioner. However, here is 'Political Pointers No. 3,' written by the same man, 20 cases of which have been brought to the House of Commons to-day to be franked through the mails. The opposition were abused last year for sending out a little literature through the mails, but here we have Liberal political pointers franked through the mails in car loads, and prepared by a civil servant who is drawing $2,800 a year of the people's money, to get this trash printed and published in order to try to delude the farmers of this country. This civil servant shows by his figures that the farmers of this country are paying $19,000,000 a year more in revenue than they were paying in 1895, and yet he has the cheek to try to make out that the farmers are not paying any more taxes now than they were then.

Hon. JAS. SUTHERLAND (Minister of Public Works). I did not intend to take part in this debate, but I think every member in this House must have a feeling in his breast, that he should be fair and honest to his fellow being. It is only fair to say that Mr. Bain is in no way responsible, and has not had anything to do with the items which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) has been reading. It is a very unfair, and a very improper charge to make against Mr. Bain.

Mr. TAYLOR. I stated that if I am granted a commission, I will endeavour to prove it.

Mr. JAS. SUTHERLAND. The hon. gentleman can have all the commissions he wants, but he cannot prove it. I state here on my responsibility as a member of this House, that Mr. Bain is not responsible for writing the sentences that the hon. member (Mr. Taylor) has read. The Minister of Customs has stated that Mr. Bain did furnish him with certain statistics, just the same as other deputy ministers or officials in various other departments furnish departmental statistics to Conservatives and Liberals alike.

Mr. TAYLOR. The Minister of Customs did not deny it.

Mr. JAS. SUTHERLAND. I am not speaking for the Minister of Customs, I am speaking for myself.

Mr. TAYLOR. The Minister of Customs should know better than the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sutherland).

Mr. JAS. SUTHERLAND. That may be your way of debating, but it is not mine. I have made the statement on my responsibility as a minister, and I say that Mr. Bain had nothing to do with the publication of that pamphlet. I appeal to my hon. friend, as I do to other members of the House to be fair and honest ; let them blame a man if he should be blamed, but let them give credit where credit is due. It is unfair and improper for a member of this House to accuse a man improperly, either by direct charge or by insinuation. I rose for the purpose of making the statement that Mr. Bain is in no way responsible ; that he did not write the literature that the hon gentleman has been quoting, and that he is not responsible for it in any way.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then we have one minister contradicting the other ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. JAS. SUTHERLAND. No, you have not. I have applications from Conservatives for information, and I am always glad to allow it to be furnished by officials of the department, and I have no reason to believe that Mr. Bain went any further than to furnish the information he was asked for. If the Minister of Customs is mistaken in the matter, it may be that it is not within his knowledge. I know whereof I speak, and I rose for the purpose of doing what I thought was fair and just and honest towards Mr. Bain. If any member has any misconception or misunderstanding of the matter from what has taken place in the House, I wish to say that Mr. Bain is not responsible for this literature, and I know it.

Mr. TAYLOR. I understood the Minister of Customs to say that before Mr. Bain was appointed assistant commissioner he prepared 'Political Pointers No. 1,' which the Minister of Customs read from.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. TAYLOR. The Minister of Customs read many passages from that, to try and make out they were correct. The Minister of Customs admitted that the assistant commissioner wrote 'Political Pointers No. 1,' but he said it was before Mr. Bain was assistant commissioner; and I say that 'Political Pointers No. 3' was prepared by the same gentleman since he was appointed assistant commissioner.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. TAYLOR. The Minister of Customs will not get up and deny it himself, because he has the reputation of telling the truth, although he may equivocate a little and get around the corners, but when it comes down to the straight point, he will not deny it. If he gives me a commission of three honest men, I will prove that Mr. Bain prepared that document.

Mr. PATERSON. My statement was, that when I asked Mr. Bain: is there any of your work in that; he said: there are figures in that which I prepared for your use, and which you have used; it was my duty, as your private secrtary, to prepare them for you and what I did prepare for you has found a place in these political pointers. I never said that Mr. Bain said that he was the publisher or the author of these political pointers.

Mr. TAYLOR. You did not say that; but after quoting the tables, you read a lot of statements and said they were correct information to go to the people of this country; and that document was prepared by this gentleman before he was appointed assistant commissioner.

Mr. PATERSON. Not for this purpose.

Mr. CLANCY. I want a word with the hon. Minister of Public Works, who contradicts the Minister of Customs.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. CLANCY. Let us see where the Minister of Customs left off on Friday evening. He was asked if he had any knowledge, directly or indirectly, as to whether Mr. Bain had prepared any literature to be used or circulated by the Liberal party. The hon. gentleman refused to answer, but said: 'I will ask Mr. Bain.' Could not the hon. gentleman have said, I have no knowledge; it never came to my notice, and therefore I do not know? Why should he ask Mr. Bain, if he did not know whether it was written by Mr. Bain or not? Could not the hon. gentleman have said he did not know? But the hon. gentleman, with quite as many scruples as the Minister of Public Works—and I repeat, it was somewhat to his credit—refused to state that he had no knowledge directly or indirectly that the Assistant Commissioner of Customs had been engaged in preparing literature for the Liberal party, and preferred to sit in his seat and refuse to make an answer. Now, the Minister of Public Works says: I know all about it. Does he know any more about it than the Minister of Customs himself? Did he not on Friday evening last sit in this House where he does now without making any statement when the Minister of Customs refused to answer the question? Now he says Mr. Bain is in no way responsible. We do not hold Mr. Bain responsible; we hold the Minister of Customs responsible. Mr. Bain is not his private secretary, and if he uses him as such, he uses him for a purpose for which this House has not voted money. The hon. gentleman has no right to use Mr. Bain as his private secretary. Mr. Bain is not his private secretary; he is Assistant Commissioner of Customs, and his salary was voted for him as such. The fact that the Minister of Customs used Mr. Bain as his private secretary does not condone the crime in any sense. I congratulate the two ministers—one who will not make the denial, and the other who says he knows better than the hon. gentleman who refuses to make the denial—on the spectacle they present to the House and the country.

Mr. HEYD. I have listened to this debate with a great deal of interest, and it is only just now that I am beginning to understand what it is all about. The Assistant Commissioner of Customs is charged with having compiled 1, 2 and 3 of what are known as Political Pointers; and I have been trying to find out whether Mr. Bain compiled this book or not. If he compiled it, I should think he did wrong. If he did not compile it, I do not see wherein he is guilty. If the compiler of this book used figures which were prepared by Mr. Bain for Mr. Paterson's use, he is not guilty of a crime. Mr. Coulson, of the bank, the Postmaster General's Reports, and dozens of outsiders are quoted in this book, and are equally guilty with Mr. Bain, because they supplied the information as well as he. They did not compile the book, neither did Mr. Bain. I had the pleasure of seeing this book, or a great deal of it, before it ever appeared in its present shape, when it was in manuscript form; and it was not in Mr. Bain's writing, but in the writing of another man. I have no doubt that in the compilation of this book information was got which Mr. Bain supplied. Anybody could get that information. Our hon. friends opposite take credit that they did not go and get information from that source. That is why they are always wrong. If, instead of relying upon their own judgment and resources, they would do exactly what the gentleman did who wrote this book—go to the fountain head for information—they would not so often go astray; because, when they rely upon their own judgment, they are invariably wrong. I have had occasion frequently in this House to notice that when our friends are left to their own resources, like sheep, they go astray. They accuse Mr. Bain of issuing a book. Mr. Bain had nothing to do with the book. If he were here to defend himself, he could tell our friends that this book is made up of extracts from speeches made by Mr. Paterson and other extracts prepared for other members of the House. I do not think it is a crime for any of the officials of the government, if I ask them to do so for my own information, to prepare a table which I want to use in the interest of this country; and when I quote figures here, probably sometimes too many for some people, I rely upon their correctness, because I get them from official sources. All this talk, in an attempt to fasten on Mr. Bain the charge of having compiled this book, has been so much time wasted, because it is a false charge. Mr. Bain is not guilty of compiling this book or issuing campaign circulars 1, 2 and 3. If our hon. friends would quietly go to work and show where there is in this book one single misstatement, that would be of more importance to the country. So far as I can judge, and I have read it with great care, and have compared it with figures which I have myself used, its statements are absolutely true. But when hon. gentlemen accuse Mr. Bain of having compiled this book, I can say that on his own testimony that he is not guilty, and this is an attempt to fasten a false charge upon an innocent man. The whole thing is politics. They do not care whether Mr. Bain compiles political literature or not. It only depends on which side he compiles it for. We would not have heard one whimper if it had been got up in the interest of the Conservative party. But this document being true, and giving the legislative history of the Conservative party for eighteen years, and a correct statement of the progress of the country during the last seven years, is what hurts hon. gentlemen opposite; and they think that if they can discredit Mr. Bain they discredit this document, which has been issued by an entirely different person, and therefore weaken the political effect it might produce. I hope that every citizen of Canada will read Campaign Literature, Nos. 1, 2 and 3, and then they will find that the statements that have been made by our friends on the opposite side during the past six or seven years are absolute bosh.

Mr. SPROULE. The evidence which this House is asked to accept to satisfy them that Mr. Bain did not write this book reminds one very much of what is said to have taken place in a court where the Crown prosecutor said that he was prepared to put two witnesses in the box to swear that they saw a man commit a crime. The reply from the other side was that they could put in a dozen witnesses who could swear that they did not see him commit the crime, and the evidence of the twelve should be accepted against that of the two.

Mr. HEYD. Do you say Mr. Bain wrote the book?

Mr. SPROULE. I am not making statements.

Mr. HEYD. Do you say so?

Mr. SPROULE. I am not, like the hon. gentleman opposite, making positive statements about something I do not know. When the hon. gentleman (Mr. Heyd) said that Mr. Bain did not write that book, how did he know?

Mr. HEYD. He told me so.

Mr. SPROULE. Where did the hon. gentleman get the information. Was not the gentleman sitting there on Friday night when the Minister of Customs was challenged?

Mr. HEYD. No.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes.

An hon. MEMBER. I saw him.

Mr. SPROULE. The best evidence in the world could have been provided then and there, and the very fact that it was not denied by the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) who, practically, by his silence gave consent, went a long way to prove what was said from this side of the House. Now the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Sutherland) says that Mr. Bain did not write the book. Mr. Bain was working in the office of the Minister of Customs, not in that of the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) who would know best, was challenged across the floor of the House to say that Mr. Bain did not write it, he did not deny it and practically assented to it. What was his first defence? He practically admitted the charge, by refusing to deny it, and I am told, whether correctly or not that the gentleman impunged was sitting at his hand within hearing and could have given the minister an answer in fifteen seconds. However the first time the charge was made he did not deny it, and he could have denied it because no one would know the facts better than the Minister of Customs in whose office Mr. Bain was employed. The second time he defended it, and said: I had a perfect right to employ my private secretary to collect these figures for my use in the House. Then he quoted the figures and said: Does any one say they are not correct? He defended Mr. Bain's conduct, thereby admitting it. And now the Minister of Public Works gets up and denies it. I would rather have the denial of the man who above all others, was in a position to know whether it was or was not done by Mr. Bain, yet up to the present he has not pretended to deny it.

Mr. HEYD. How could he deny it without making inquiries?

Mr. SPROULE. He could ask the man at his elbow.

Mr. PATERSON. You say that Mr. Bain was there?

Mr. SPROULE. I do not know the gentleman.

Mr. PATERSON. You said he was.

Mr. SPROULE. I did not, I beg your pardon.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. I said it was alleged from this side of the House that he was there ; I did not say he was there because I do not know him from Adam.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman says he was there. Mr. Bain I think you will find, had been there, but at the time when this subject came up he was not here.

Mr. SPROULE. He got out at a very convenient time.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman says he was there.

Mr. SPROULE. I say I did not ; I deny it. I said it was alleged from this side of the House that he was there, but I was very careful in the language I used, because I do not know him. I do not want the minister to put anything down my throat. He tried to justify the compilation of this book and said that the figures were correct. It is not the figures that we dispute, it is the argument in the compilation of this work. Will any one pretend to say that the argument there is correct ? There is not a reasonable man in Canada who will go through that argument and say it is correct. What we object to is this : A young man goes into the public service, his duties are laid down by order in council, he is expected to do these duties and nothing outside of these duties. A young man is paid a certain salary for working for the country and when he goes into the service he takes an oath to do his duty faithfully. He swears :

I (A.B.), solemnly and sincerely swear that I will faithfully and honestly fulfil the duties which devolved upon me as and that I will not ask, or receive any sum of money, services, recompense or matter or thing whatsoever, directly or indirectly, in return for what I have done or may do in the discharge of any of the duties of my said office, except my salary or what may be allowed me by law or by an order of the Governor in Council.

And the order in council states his salary. I want to direct attention to two things in this . The minister has stated that this young man was his private secretary, and he justifies what he had done on the ground of economy, because he said the secretarial work was not done by his private secretary but by two young girls in his department. The minister claimed that in this way he saved $300 to the country which otherwise would have been given to the secretary. But he distributed the work to other employees who were not appointed as his private secretary and therefore according to that oath he was making them, if they took the oath at all, deliberately perjure themselves.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. SPROULE. I say it and I say it advisedly. The hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Wade) says 'oh.' No one knows better than the hon. gentleman who is a lawyer that my statement is correct.

Mr. WADE. The statement is not correct.

Mr. SPROULE. If the Minister of Customs set them to work for him, and paid them a salary for it, he made them perjure themselves. They took money outside of their salaries. What does the Act say with regard to this ?

No extra salary or additional remuneration of any kind whatever shall be paid to any deputy head, officer, or employee in the civil service of Canada or to any person permanently employed in the public service.

None except a private secretary for whom the provision is made for the payment of $600. This money was not for a private secretary who was appointed. This money was given to them in addition to their salaries as clerks. They got the salary stipulated in the Act and also got this in addition. The hon. gentleman is demoralizing his own service. Does he propose to justify that ? When he thinks over it he will not be prepared to justify it. How are these people appointed ? They must be appointed by order in council. Were they appointed by order in council ? It seems to me the way that hon. gentlemen do everything here is in a haphazard way ; they do not adopt the usual procedure of parliament, or keep within the bounds laid down by law. They seem to be a law unto themselves. They do things merely at haphazard, and when they find that they have acted illegally and improperly they have no excuse to give. That is what we have to complain of. These officers are appointed by order in council, and if they are paid higher salaries than the law provides for the offices to which they are appointed, they are given what they are not entitled to, and the minister is spending money which he has no right to spend. But there is another question involved in this, it seems to me, a question requiring a little attention. The question is not whether these figures compiled by the private secretary are right or wrong. In bringing forward that point the minister is merely begging the question, or he is trying to draw a red herring across the trail. The correctness of these figures has not been challenged. Nor is it denied that it is not the duty of a private secretary to compile the figures for the minister when instructed to do so. But what we say is that it was wrong for him to compile a campaign document——

Mr. HEYD. But he did not do so.

Mr. SPROULE. Who says so ?

Mr. HEYD. I say so.

Mr. SPROULE. I cannot take the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Heyd's) word for it. The man who ought to know the facts has not denied it.

Mr. HEYD. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) say that Mr. Bain compiled this pamphlet ?

Mr. SPROULE. I am not here to be cross-questioned by the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Heyd). If that hon. gentleman has anything to say, let him get up and say it like a man. I cannot take the denial of a man who does not know, when the man who does know not only does not deny it, but practically admits it—that is, he defends it, and in defending it admits it by implication at least. The question, as I say, is not whether the private secretary ought to compile these figures ; the question is whether a man employed as private secretary, or assistant commissioner, or first-class clerk, has the right to take the money of the country to pay his salary during the time which he employs in writing campaign literature for a political party. We say that no civil servant has the right to do this, and many of those employed before 1896 were put out of office for doing much less. If it was right for this government to put a man out of office for exercising his right to vote, surely a civil servant who receives the money of the country for writing political pointers ought to be more severely dealt with. The hon. minister, in speaking of it the other night defended it on other grounds which I thought of dealing with, but which I will leave out of consideration for the present. I have only this to say in regard to this matter ;—let the same principles be applied to all ; do not apply one rule to Conservatives and another to Reformers. Many Conservatives, for doing much less than this gentleman has done, were dealt with very harshly by the present government. I do not blame the present Minister of Customs at present on that ground, because I have not in mind any such cases in his department. But I say that his friends and colleagues dealt very harshly with Conservative office holders for doing much less. But there was one statement of the Minister of Customs which I thought was entirely infra dig, coming from him. He went on to say that he had no doubt that many civil servants were giving information to members on this side of the House.

Mr. PATERSON. I did not say that.

Mr. SPROULE. That statement was denied on this side, and I understood that it was denied because the Minister of Customs had made it. The hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Ingram) denied it so did other hon. gentleman. And I understand that the hon. minister went on to say that if giving of information to this side was to continue the government had better commence with old offenders. In other words, the government had better commence with putting out Conservatives. Is not that rather an unworthy utterance ? Is it intended to hold up this side of the House, to prevent us speaking for fear that some of our friends in the service will be turned out for some supposed information ? I want to say as one member of this House that I never either applied for or received from a civil servant of this government a word or a figure. I would not apply to such a source. But if I were to do so, I should do no worse than hon. gentlemen opposite did when they were on this side. But I say this was an unworthy utterance if it was intended to close the mouths of the opposition in this House for fear that some condign punishment would be visited upon their friends in the service for imaginary wrong-doing on their part. If the hon. minister thinks he is going to stop us from the argument by that means, he is entirely mistaken. This doing of political work by men in the civil service, is wrong, and the country will condemn it. When a man goes into the public service, he undertakes to do work for all the people and not for one party alone. He has no right to take the money of the people for time devoted to preparing campaign literature to be distributed throughout the country. We were justified in moving to reduce this item to the extent of this salary, and I am mistaken if we do not move in this House to have it reduced, and if the minister does not hear more about it before he is through with it.

Mr. INGRAM. It would be very interesting, to know what view the Minister of Customs takes of the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Comerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) as expressed in these words :

> With members of the civil service eating the bread of both parties and deliberately interfering with the elections for the purposes of aiding one political party, if they so act they must be considered as taking their political lives in their hands and they must accept the consequence of their own acts, and the good sense of the people of the country and their natural sense of equal justice will not merely justify but demand at the hands of the government that they should make an example of them.

I should gather from that that, if any civil servant prepares a campaign document, he is guilty and must suffer the consequences. It is admitted by the Minister of Customs that a portion of this political document at least is prepared by Mr. Bain

Mr. HEYD. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ingram) will allow me, I do not think the Minister of Customs went so far as that.

Mr. SPROULE. Order. The Minister of Customs can speak for himself.

Mr. HEYD. I will take my seat when the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Ingram) asks me to. In the meantime, the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) will keep quiet. I understood the minister to say that in this pamphlet were figures prepared by Mr. Bain. There is quite a difference between that and what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ingram) has said.

Mr. INGRAM. I am surprised that it is found necessary for the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Heyd) to speak, when the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) sits as his desk mate at this moment. Has it come to this, that the Minister of Customs is not able to defend himself in this House? Is it necessary to bring in a man from the county of Brant who says that Mr. Bain told him so and so, and as a consequence Mr. Bain is not guilty? Imagine it being said in a court of law that the prisoner had said that he was not guilty and that this must be taken as conclusive evidence. If my hon. friend from South Brant has no more idea of defending Mr. Bain than by making a statement of that kind, he knows very little about taking evidence in a court of law. Now I wish to quote from page 27 of this pamphlet, pointer No. 3:

> The Public Accounts Committee is a medium for investigating, but as the Liberal Finance Minister showed in a speech delivered towards the close of last session the meetings of that committee during the session resolved themselves into a farce.

And let me say right here that no person contributed more to make them a farce than the Minister of Finance did.

> The Conservative members of it could not be got to attend with any degree of regularity and they accomplished absolutely nothing. They, however, recognized the fairness and impartiality shown by the Liberal chairman of the committee, and passed him a vote of acknowledgment together with their thanks.

Now I would like to point out to the Minister of Finance that if this gentleman is guilty towards contributing to the preparation of this pamphlet that is circulated through this country, then he is contributing his quota as a civil servant to this charge against the Public Accounts Committee. I want to go further and state that the usual custom in the Public Accounts Committee is for ministers of the Crown to attend that committee, and whenever a witness is called to give evidence, which they fear, they are the first to say to the witness: It is not necessary for you to answer that question. I say the Minister of Finance has been guilty time and time again of requesting witnesses not to answer questions put to them by members of that committee. During the present session we have repeatedly seen questions put by the leader of the opposition to the leader of the government asking when the Public Accounts Committee was going to meet, and although parliament has now been in session from the 12th of March to the 24th of April, not one meeting of that committee has yet been held.

Mr. WADE. Would the hon. gentleman allow me a word? I am chairman of the Public Accounts Committee. I have been prepared to call the committee at any time since its first meeting for organization, but to-day for the first time, some hon. gentlemen opposite intimated to me their desire that the committee should be called, and it will be called on Thursday.

Mr. INGRAM. Then the hon. gentleman was not in the House when he heard the leader of the opposition put these questions to the Prime Minister. Now, Sir, what makes the Public Accounts Committee a farce in the House, is the fact that whenever a witness is called for the purpose of giving testimony, and whenever it is thought by the government that his testimony is liable to involve some department of the government to their detriment, then ministers are there telling him that he may not answer, and defending him in his refusal. I want to tell the Minister of Finance and others who attend that committee, that the people of this country do not expect that their expenditures are to be controlled in that way. The people want to get at the honest facts in connection with the public accounts, and they expect that when witnesses are called to give their evidence, they will be allowed to do so whether the result may be detrimental to the government or not. That is the proper method of conducting the Committee of Public Accounts, and if that method is pursued we will not see any more campaign literature going forth declaring that the meetings of the Public Accounts Committee of this House are a farce.

Mr. ALEX. JOHNSTON. I do not rise for the purpose of prolonging this discussion, but merely to say a word or two on behalf of a worthy civil servant who is not here, and in a position to answer for himself the various charges made against him. It has been repeatedly charged by hon. gentlemen opposite that the campaign documents exhibited here to-day were prepared by Mr. John Bain, Assistant Commissioner of Customs. Now I am here to state in a most positive manner that such is not a fact. I happen to know something about the preparation of these documents. It happens that I, along with some other gentlemen were a committee to prepare some campaign literature. I know the origin of these documents, and I say in the most positive manner, that Mr. Bain is not the author of the documents. I repeat what was said in the earlier part of the discussion by the Minister of Customs, that the committee who were engaged in publishing these documents availed themselves of the figures prepared in the Customs Department for the use of the Minister of Customs in this House, and outside of it. We availed ourselves of these figures, they are to be found in these pamphlets that are being placed on exhibition. The comments that are made on these pamphlets do not affect Mr. Bain, that I am here to say in the most positive manner. I desire to say, whether hon. gentlemen opposite take my word for it or not, that the charge that has been so repeatedly made that Mr. Bain is the author of this document in not a fair or correct charge. I say, moreover, that when a statement has been denied over and over again, on this side of the House, it is rather unfair for hon. gentlemen opposite to persist in it, especially when the gentleman against whom the charge is levelled is not here to defend himself.

Mr. FIELDING. Not as to the main question concerning Mr. Bain, but as to two other matters that have recently been referred to, I would ask the House to bear with me for a moment. The hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Ingram) has made the statement that in the Public Accounts Committee, during all these years, whenever a witness was called to give evidence that was likely to be embarrassing, ministers of the Crown were there to warn the witnesses not to answer. I think I have substantially stated what my hon. friend said, though I do not pretend to repeat his exact words. Now, after looking back at the meetings of the Public Accounts Committee with an experience of seven or eight years, I can recall only one case where any instance occurred upon which the hon. gentleman could base such a statement. There may be others, but I cannot recall them. There was one case that I can recall, one case in which I think I myself was concerned. Now it is not an uncommon thing in any tribunal to find a witness asked questions which he is not obliged to answer. It is not an uncommon thing to have judges tell a witness that he is not obliged to answer, it is not an uncommon thing to have legal gentlemen engaged in the case to tell the witness that he is not obliged to answer; and it would not be a surprising thing if members of the committee, most of them laymen like myself, sometimes ask questions which are open to objection. In that particular case hon. gentlemen opposite were trying to press a charge against an hon. member on this side of the House. I need not go into the merits of the case on that occasion. I thought the question put was unreasonable, and I told the witness he was free to answer if he wished, but he was not bound to answer, because it related to his private affairs. The only comment I have to make upon that now, is that the minister against whom they were trying to press that charge of corruption is now their bosom friend. The other point to which I wish to refer was an observation made by the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) with regard to the private secretaries. My hon. friend argued that this sum must be paid to a particular private secretary, and any attempt to distribute it among other officials in the office he thought was irregular and improper. I want to say to my hon. friend that I think he is mistaken. I will not discuss the legality of the matter with him, but I can tell him that it has been the practice for many years to divide the private secretary's allowance among several officials. I know it was done in the times of my predecessors, and it is done now, and I confess I can see no wrong in it. It is being done in my own time at this moment. I know it was done under the late government, and I myself can see no harm in it. At all events, it is a practice that has the authority of precedent.

Mr. PATERSON. Just on this point the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) spoke very strongly. He said that a person would perjure himself if he asserted that it had been the custom for years for the Auditor General to pass these accounts. Now let him look at the Auditor General's Report of 1896, at the details of what was done between 1895 and 1896.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood the Civil Service Act was binding in that case.

Mr. PATERSON. I want to point out what was understood by our predecessor in the Finance Department that was being administered by Mr. Foster. In that year he will find on page 3-D of the Auditor General's Report this item: He will find there, 'Jenkins, L. J., first-class clerk.' He was getting $1,400 as a first-class clerk and as private secretary for 12 months to June 30, less seven days in January, he got $391.35, out of a vote of $600 for the private secretary. Then Miss B. Stark, as private secretary, 12 months to June 30, less seven days in January, received $195.62. So that the $600 allowance for a private secretary was divided by Mr. Foster. If there had not been seven days of a loss—I think that is the time that the ministers went out of the government when work was stopped for a few days—the gentleman would have received $400 and the lady would have received $200. Whether that is right or wrong, I am not going to argue the legal point with my hon. friend from East Grey, but we must be acquitted of doing what we know to be wrong, because we do not think it is wrong. The previous government did not consider it wrong. The Auditor General evidently does not consider it wrong and I think, perhaps, we cannot all be wrong and the hon. member for East Grey right. If it should turn out to be the case, he will have scored one.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The provisions of the law seems to be very plain. Section 51 of the Civil Service Act is as follows:—

No extra salary or additional remuneration of any kind whatsoever shall be paid to any deputy head, officer or employee in the civil service of Canada, or to any other person permanently employed in the public service.

Then, there is an oath, a part of which material to this question is as follows :—

I will not ask or receive any sum of money, services, recompense or matter or thing whatsoever, directly or indirectly in return for what I have done or may do in the discharge of any of the duties of my said office, except my salary or what may be allowed me by law or by an order of the Governor in Council.

I do not understand that these allowances have been made under an Order in Council.

Mr. FIELDING. I think so ; they are in my case, I know.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Are they in the case of the hon. Minister of Customs ? I do not so understand it.

Mr. PATERSON. The commissioner assures me that they are. I cannot state from my own memory, but the commissioner says they are.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood the hon. gentleman to say the other night that they were not.

Mr. PATERSON. I do not think I said so. I was trying to say nothing that I did not know to be perfectly correct, and I would not be positive of it. However, the commissioner tells me now that these payments are made under Order in Council.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That disposes of the matter as far as the oath is concerned, because there is a direct reference to an Order in Council. But, I do not know how you deal with section 51. The position of the hon. Minister of Customs is somewhat peculiar because he has an officer who is called the assistant commissioner of customs, and who, he says, is not his private secretary.

Mr. PATERSON. No.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. He is his private secretary ?

Mr. PATERSON. Yes.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Well then he is entitled under the law to this allowance and the hon. gentleman has no right to give it to any one else. There is a sum of money voted by parliament for the private secretary of the minister, and if this gentleman is his private secretary, he is entitled to it and no one else is entitled to it. That follows logically and conclusively. But I understood him in one portion of his remarks to say that he was not private secretary, but sometimes performed the duties of private secretary. Then he said there were two ladies in the office who were on salary, and that he had distributed a portion of the salary of his private secretary to these ladies. I understood him to say that he had not done that by order in council, but that it was merely a departmental proceeding. I consider that an irregular proceeding and I do not know how you can get over the provisions of section 51. We vote the salaries for all these officers, and if the statute says that you shall not give them any extra allowance, I suppose it means what it says, and that the government is bound to carry out the terms of the statute. Then, in regard to the other point which has been dealt with very fully to-night, I have only to say a very few words. I certainly gathered as distinctly as could be from what the hon. Minister of Customs said that Mr. Bain had practically written the whole pamphlet known as 'Political Pointers No. I.' If the hon. minister did not mean that he certainly did not express himself with the clearness which usually characterizes his utterances. Indeed, I understood him not only to admit it but to quote from the pamphlet then in his hands and to justify the work of this gentleman because he said you could not find any fault with the accuracy of the statements made. He said that it was a good thing that this gentleman had been employed to do this work, because it was right that the people should know the facts set forth in this pamphlet. He said further that he was perfectly justified in doing it because that was naturally the work of a private secretary. He said that a private secretary might prepare figures of that kind for a minister, and having prepared figures of that kind it necessarily followed that it was no harm for him to prepare them for a campaign sheet such as that which the hon. minister quoted. Well, I think that opens up a pretty wide question regarding the operations of any department in this country. What would it lead to ? It would lead to this that the minister could take $600 voted by parliament for his private secretary, and divide it amongst six or twelve men in his department calling them private secretaries, then set every one of them at work to prepare campaign literature for the political party of which he is a member, and distribute that through the country and no one would be entitled to find one item of fault with such a proceeding, provided the statements contained in that literature were true. In other words words, the only qualification necessary to the employment of a civil servant in the preparation of campaign literature is that he must not insert any falsehoods in any document that he may prepare. That is the argument of the hon. gentleman. You can take a dozen men, give them $50 each out of the salary of the private secretary, call every one of them a private secretary and set every one of them at work preparing campaign literature for the Liberal party. Does not the hon. member think it would be fairer after all to put his hand in his pocket and for other members of the government to put their hands in their pockets for the purpose of paying men to do this work just as we have to do on this side of the House ? Is it the fair or proper thing in this country that the public money to the extent of $2,800 and an additional sum of $600 should be utilized in order that the time of this gentleman—a very worthy gentleman he may be, I have no doubt—may be employed in the preparation of campaign literature ? I suppose that there are not a great many mistatements of fact in the campaign literature of either side ; we certainly hope that there are no intentional mistatements of fact, but does that make it any the less campaign literature and does that make it any the less partisan for a gentleman in the employ of a department to do the work ? Looking over the document to which my hon. friend referred, if that document is the work of Mr. Bain—I do not know whether it is or not—then it is the work of a man who is not acting as a civil servant, but who is acting as a strong political partisan in putting before the people of this country, views which are not views of a civil servant, but the views of a partisan employed to write partisan literature for party purposes.

Mr. A. JOHNSTON. I would like to ask my hon. friend whether he will not accept the assurance in this House that the comments that are made upon the figures presented in these campaign sheets are not the work of Mr. John Bain. It happens that I know something about it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am perfectly willing to accept the word of my hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. Johnston), although sometimes I have not had a courtesy of that kind extended to me from that side of the House. I will accept the word of my hon. friend so far as his knowledge goes, but I have something more than the word of my hon. friend. According to the usage and courtesy of this House, I have also to accept the word of the Minister of Customs. I trust that my hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. Johnston) will not regard me as casting any aspersions upon his absolute truthfulness when I suggest that I must also pay some regard to the statement of the Minister of Customs who is an older man in public life, who holds cabinet rank, and whose word must carry at least as much weight as the word of my hon. friend (Mr. Johnston).

Mr. PATERSON. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that I said anything contradictory to what my friend from Cape Breton said ? Did the leader of the opposition mean to give this House and the country the understanding, that Mr. Bain was drawing $2,800 a year for the purpose of writing campaign literature ?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I did not understand the Minister of Customs to say that Mr. Bain was paid $2,800 for writing campaign literature, but I did understand the Minister of Customs to say, that while Mr. Bain was receiving that emolument he had been engaged in preparing a portion, or the whole, of this document called 'Political Pointers, No. 1'; and I understood the Minister of Customs to justify that by saying that the statements in the document were accurate, and that Mr. Bain being a private secretary could properly be engaged in work of that kind. I say in all sincerity and perfect good faith, that that was the conclusion I drew from the statement of the Minister of Customs this afternoon, and also from his statement on Friday which I have had the pleasure of reading. I have tried to draw a fair conclusion from his remarks and my conclusion is corroborated by that which other men have drawn. I do not think that an official ought to be engaged in work of that kind, and I do not think it alters the case if it be as stated, that Mr. Bain prepared only a portion of this document, and that other portions relating to other departments were prepared by other gentlemen in the public service. That only makes it worse. None of these gentlemen ought to be engaged in this work; it should be done by some one outside, and it should not be directly or indirectly paid for by the money of this country. I think I drew a fair conclusion from the remarks of the Minister of Customs, and if I am wrong I will be glad to be corrected.

Mr. PATERSON. I am surprised that the hon. gentleman should have misunderstood me, but I am glad that he wishes to be corrected. I knew nothing of these pointers. I am not on any publication committee, or any pamphlet committee or anything else. Gentlemen who say that they know something about the preparation of this literature, have made their statement. I was asked the other night whether any literature of this kind had been prepared by Mr. Bain, and I promised to inquire. Mr. Bain told me that there were embraced in these political pointers, certain statements which he had prepared for me ; that some of them were prepared a long time ago, probably before any campaign literature, as it is called, had been thought of ; and that I had made use of them in the House, and had made use of them in England some time ago. I take that to be the fullest confession that possibly could be made. There was no reservation, or holding back, or trying to evade in any way on Mr. Bain's part. Mr. Bain took refuge in no subterfuge ; he found in the document certain statements that had been prepared by him ; perhaps statements which had been prepared by others, but he knew that some of the statements that were there had been prepared for me, and had been used by me on the platform and in the House, and some of them in England.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I certainly understood the Minister of Customs to-day to say before six o'clock : That Mr. Bain had handed out for the purpose of this pamphlet, certain statements which were of the same character as statements which he had prepared for the Minister of Customs. I followed the Minister of Customs very carefully, and he certainly said that before six o'clock, when in his excitement he was somewhat endangering the venerable head of the Minister of Trade and Commerce who sat in front of him. That statement is not consistent with the statement which the Minister of Customs is making to the House now.

Mr. PATERSON. So far as I am aware, I said nothing inconsistent with what I am saying now. I said that Mr. Bain said, that he had been requested by parties for information on these points; he had given them statements which had been prepared for me and which I had used. We were not in many campaigns together, but I think I used some of these figures in the campaign in North Ontario.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Did you use them in South Lambton.

Mr. FIELDING. He must have forgotten them there.

Mr. PATERSON. Well, I don't know what happened there.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The people of East Lambton had a correct view of the situation.

Mr. FIELDING. They struck oil.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Will the Minister of Customs say, that Mr. Bain's only connection with this pamphlet, was the handing out of statements which had been already prepared by him for his minister?

Mr. PATERSON. I am not in a position to state more than I have stated. The hon. gentleman who has prepared this literature has stated all about it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The hon. gentleman who prepared this literature knows something about it, but I am inclined to think that the Minister of Customs knows more. I do not think that the Minister of Customs will deny that after all, a portion of that pamphlet is the work of his private secretary.

Mr. WADE. Will some one charge Mr. Bain?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. My hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Taylor) has distinctly said, that he was prepared to prove that Mr. Bain did write these statements. I do not know that you want very much more of a charge than that, even to suit the fastidious taste of my hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Wade). That was distinctly stated in the House two or three times this evening.

Mr. HEYD. He will take that back now.

Mr. TAYLOR. No, I won't.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. As my hon. friend the Minister of Customs has made some statements in the House regarding this matter, he really should go a little further. He has had an interview with Mr. Bain, and he knows about it; I suppose he knew a good deal about it before he had that interview; and he is not prepared to state that Mr. Bain did not prepare statements which were inserted in that pamphlet, and which were prepared for the purpose of being inserted in it. My hon. friend cannot say that, and therefore I presume that is a polite and easy way of informing this side of the House that he knows that Mr. Bain did prepare these statements. After all, when we come to that, have we not reached the stage when my hon. friend the Minister of Customs admitted that Mr. Bain did prepare at least a portion of that campaign literature? I do not wish to press this point unduly, but will the hon. gentleman deny that that is the condition of affairs?

Mr. PATERSON. He admitted that he had prepared for my use at different times some of the statements which were incorporated by whomsoever published these documents; but he refused to be held responsible for all that was in these pamphlets. He assumed the responsibility for what he had prepared himself.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I understand it perfectly, I think. A portion of this pamphlet relates to matters with which the Department of Customs is concerned, and this gentleman prepared that portion.

Mr. HEYD. Oh, no.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am trying to state, as fairly as I can, what I gather. Another gentleman has come to the aid of the Minister of Customs. Might I suggest to both of these hon. gentlemen that the Minister of Customs is an old parliamentary hand, and, with all deference to them, he knows how to manage this case a great deal better than either of them does. Let me say to the Minister of Customs that if that is the case, it does not alter the condition of affairs. This gentleman has prepared that portion of the pamphlet which relates to the Department of Customs; there cannot be any doubt of that, in view of what my hon. friend has said. But there is one thing more that we ought to know about, in justice to Mr. Bain himself. We ought to know whether he did that by the direction of the Minister of Customs and with his knowledge. In order to clear Mr. Bain, my hon. friend should make himself perfectly clear upon that question. I do not think this is a matter which concerns Mr. Bain so much as it does the administration of the government, especially my hon. friend's department. I am not inclined to criticise Mr. Bain very much about it, because he is under the direction of his minister; but I am inclined to criticise the principle of procuring this work to be done by public servants and practically at the expense of the country. I am not going to become violent about it, but I am endeavouring to get at the facts, and to criticise, in a moderate way, what I think is wrong. Will the Minister of Customs deny that the view I have taken of the situation is correct ?

Mr. PATERSON. I do not intend to prolong this discussion. I think I have made myself perfectly plain. What I have said is on record, and there is no use of going over it again. The leader of the opposition now absolves Mr. Bain and says I am to blame. Then why did the hon. member for East Elgin move to strike out the salary of $2,800 for Mr. Bain instead of moving that my salary be reduced ?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. It is perfectly plain, and I thought it would occur to the hon. gentleman at once. My hon. friend from East Elgin simply desired to transfer the liability from the country to the Minister of Customs. I would not suppose that Mr. Bain would lose his salary, but the Minister of Customs would see that it was paid from the source to which Mr. Bain should have looked in the first instance.

Mr. PATERSON. I am sorry to find that an hon. gentleman who leads one of the great parties of this country does not understand parliamentary government better than to know that when an officer's salary is struck out of the estimates he does not get it.

Mr. INGRAM. I would like to say that the reason I moved the motion was this, that if the Liberal party have a civil servant who is preparing campaign literature for them, the least they can do is to pay for it themselves. I am here to represent a portion of the Conservative party, and I know that they decline to pay any civil servant for issuing campaign literature in the interest of the Liberal party.

Mr. CLANCY. It is worthy of note how much the compilers of this literature, if it was not Mr. Bain, are indebted to him for. There are some thirty pages of this literature, of which less than one page is devoted to the hon. gentleman's department, and what is that ? First, the total expenditure for 1903. Did they have to go to Mr. Bain for that, or did the hon. gentleman use it in his speech ? There was not a word of it in his speech. Then there is stated the total expenditure for 1895—did they need to go to Mr. Bain for that ?

Mr. PATERSON. I do not know that they did.

Mr. CLANCY. But the gentlemen who are making the apologies to-night said they did go to Mr. Bain for the information. The hon. member for Cape Breton said so.

Mr. A. JOHNSTON. I did not say that the gentlemen who compiled this literature went to Mr. Bain. What I did say was that the committee having it in charge availed themselves of some material prepared by Mr. Bain and to be found in the minister's speech.

Mr. CLANCY. This is not found in the minister's speech at all ; I defy the hon. gentleman to find it in any speech of the minister available to members of this House. The hon. gentleman says they availed themselves of material prepared by Mr. Bain. Did Mr. Bain prepare the figures relating to the public debt or the surpluses ? That is not in his department. Did he prepare the material in regard to how the money was spent, or the Yukon matter, or the Intercolonial Railway matter ?

Mr. A. JOHNSTON. No.

Mr. CLANCY. Did these gentlemen avail themselves of information prepared by Mr. Bain in regard to the Department of Agriculture, or in regard to a number of items of public works, or with regard to the Marine and Fisheries Department, and so on ? On page 12 of this pamphlet there are only two or three items referred to. I have mentioned two of them, namely, the expenditure of the Customs Department in 1903 and the same in 1895, and the revenues for the same years compared. Did these gentlemen avail themselves of Mr. Bain's work for the purpose of finding that out ?

Mr. A. JOHNSTON. No.

Mr. CLANCY. Then what did they get that came from Mr. Bain ? Because all the other statements belong to other departments. How did they come in possession of Mr. Bain's figures in regard to these other matters if they were not prepared by Mr. Bain ? The hon. gentleman has unwittingly become a good witness.

I expected my hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) to extricate himself from this position because he has it in his power to do so. I was sorry to have to believe that the hon. gentleman had a knowledge of Mr. Bain having been employed at work of that kind, and did so because that hon. gentleman left that impression by his silence and his refusal to answer. The hon. gentleman was asked a straight question if he had any personal knowledge, directly or indirectly, that Mr. Bain had been engaged in preparing literature for use or distribution by the Liberal party. The hon. gentleman has not said up to this moment that he had absolutely no knowledge of this. He admits that Mr. Bain prepared the tables for him but that is not an answer, with all due deference to the minister that is a very equivocal defence. He should say that he has no knowledge that Mr. Bain was in any sense connected with it. We have here the pamphlet and we have the statement that the compilers used the material furnished by Mr. Bain and this pamphlet shows that Mr. Bain has been providing for all the departments. Out of 30 pages less than one is devoted to this department.

Mr. PATERSON. What number is that ?

Mr. CLANCY. This is pointer No. 3.

Mr. PATERSON. Oh, number 3.

Mr. CLANCY. Is the hon. gentleman acquitting Mr. Bain of the others and not of No. 3.

Mr. PATERSON. I quoted from No. 1, I think.

Mr. CLANCY. Then the hon. gentleman does not deny that Mr. Bain prepared No. 3 ? The hon. gentleman by his refusal to answer made it perfectly clear that he had knowledge of the facts and he cannot blame any one if an impression goes to the country which he could prevent going to the country by a point blank denial that Mr. Bain is connected with this pamphlet. He says that Mr. Bain is connected with the tables. I defy the hon. gentleman to give one table in connection with his own department in political pointer No. 3 that has ever been used by him in a speech in this House. If the hon. gentleman cannot do that he stands in the position of admitting that Mr. Bain prepared this pamphlet and of defending Mr. Bain's conduct.

Mr. PATERSON. I do not intend to continue the discussion. If I am to blame, I have said all I shall say and will have to accept the hon. gentleman's blame. I merely wish to state that when Mr. Clancy said no increase had been granted to Mr. Bristol for five years I thought it was only one year. I have had the accountant look it up and find there were three years Mr. Bristol did not get the increase. I asked the reason and found that in one year none of the officers got it, and in two other years the officers who were receiving lower salaries than Mr. Bristol had received their shares. This the hon. gentleman is correct in reference to three years. I am glad to say however, that through changes that have taken place in the department, unfortunately some of them by death, Mr. Bristol, whom I before said I consider a good officer—can now be raised from $1,300 to $1,500 this year.

Mr. CLANCY. And in the meantime for these three years the hon. gentleman deprived him of those $500.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman knows the policy with reference to statutory increases that was adopted when the government first came into power, and the difference of opinion as to whether it was obligatory or not. I suppose if we were wrong in this I shall have to take my share of the blame along with the other members of the government.

Mr. CLANCY. The trouble was that Mr. Bain was given a statutory increase at the very moment it was withheld from Mr. Bristol. I should like to know why when a statutory increase was given to Mr. Bain it was not also given to Mr. Bristol.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman evidently has not the highest appreciation of my doing what is right and fair in my department. I shall have to remain under his censure ; it will be rather grievous to bear but I shall have to suffer under it.

Mr. CLANCY. It would be much more pleasant if the hon. gentleman would candidly admit he had done wrong. He has not given us as dignified an answer as one would expect. I think the country would expect a better defence than that. Two courses are open—and I am not going to lecture the hon. gentleman on political ethics or morality—but there are just two things which he could do, either give a defence that is worthy or to make a confession that is equally worthy. The hon. gentleman I am sorry to say, has done neither. He has given an equivocal answer. It is unfortunate that the hon. gentleman can be placed in the category neither of very honest men, politically speaking,—nor on the other hand of those who will brave out a matter that has no defence. The hon. gentleman has chosen a middle course and is I fear in a very awkward position. I hope this discussion, as far as it has gone, will bear some fruit. The hon. gentleman in his cooler moments will see that the doctrine he laid down here this evening is a wholesale doctrine of abuse and one that can be applied throughout his department, so that by merely calling a gentleman in the department a private secretary he can be engaged in wriing campaign literature or what would be no worse going out and canvassing for the hon. gentleman in his own riding. I would like the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) to compare this with a case that came under my notice in which a collector of customs receiving $400 a year was found riding with a man putting up bills. A conspiracy was formed against him. He was given no trial, and no opportunity to deny the charge against him or to prove that he was not guilty. He was given no opportunity for that, but was dragged to the block, the political axe was brought down and that gentleman was dismissed. I challenge the hon. gentleman to deny the statement I now make. If he denies it, I will give him the case and I will undertake to say that the gentleman was dismissed for no better reason than that he was found driving in a rig with a man who was putting up bills. Yet the hon. gentleman sees no impropriety now in allowing one of his chief officers to engage in writing political literature for his party.

Mr. TAYLOR. I hope the hon. minister has brought the information we asked for before six o'clock, and is ready to tell us what he proposes to do with this extra $25,000 that he is asking for.

Mr. PATERSON. I explained that once or twice. I intend to use part of it in strengthening the force at some of the ports ; part to provide for the contingency of other ports that need to be opened before this money is all expended ; and part of it in augmenting the salaries of officers in those cases in which that increase seems warranted.

Mr. TAYLOR. I submit that this is no answer to the question. When the minister made up these estimates he must have made it up on the basis of certain items—so much for opening this new port, and so much for salaries in the other, and so on. We should have this in detail so that when the record of expenditure is given we may see whether the minister's estimate is verified or not. The hon. gentleman takes great credit to himself for running this department economically. I find that, in 1904-5, he is asking, for the first item of salaries and contingent expenses, $1,159,865. In 1895, the same service was rendered for $836,631, so there is an increase of that item of $348,000. In the next item, salaries and travelling expenses of inspectors, he is asking for $139,200. In 1895, this service cost only $70,506—an increase of $68,694. So, altogether he is asking for $1,430,565, whereas in 1895 these services were carried on as efficiently as they are to-day for $921,530. There has been an increase of $515,035. Where has all this money been expended ? And the hon. minister asks $25,000 more this year than last. Yet he refuses to give a single detail as to where he intends to spend even $100 of it. He gives only a general statement that he wants it to use at his discretion. I have never seen money voted in that way for any department. The practice is, when a minister asks for an increase, he tells us in detail what he intends to do with it. That is all we want, and we must have some detail of how he intends to spend this extra $25,000 on the first item and $10,000 on the second.

Mr. BLAIN. Would the hon. minister give a statement of the number of ports and outports opened last year ?

Mr. PATERSON. Six new officers were employed in Ontario since 1st June 1903 :— Mr. Richardson, Chatham ; Mr. Deacon, Fort William ; Mr. George E. Buckley, Niagara Falls ; A. E. Guerard, Port Arthur ; J. B. Watson, Sarnia ; Thos. Fournier, Sturgeon Falls.

Mr. BLAIN. What was the number of outports ?

Mr. PATERSON. Four. There was one in Ontario, one in Quebec, one in Nova Scotia, and one in the Northwest Territories.

Mr. BLAIN. At what towns ?

Mr. PATERSON. Sturgeon Falls, Ontario ; Marieville, Quebec ; Oxford, Nova Scotia, and Saskatoon, Northwest Territory.

Mr. CLANCY. Has the hon. minister in mind at this moment any officers to whom he intends to give increases for the year for that which this money is voted ?

Mr. PATERSON. I explained that there is to be an advance to a number of clerks in the Long Room at Montreal. We intend to bring them up to a minimum of $900. I explained the reason : that these men receive the entries; that their work must be done very quickly and very correctly ; that we thought that if they worked from nine to four they would sufficiently tax their mental energies, and they should not be allowed to share with the landing waiters and preventive officers in performing extra services and receiving extra pay ; therefore, we intend to augment their salaries. We are not able to carry out the same system in Toronto as in Montreal owing to the nature of the building. But we are having changes made which, we hope, will enable us to inaugurate the same system. That may necessitate, if we are to do the business as quickly, another man or two there. We expect that we shall require to open some outports. As I said before, we have a score or more of applications all making out as good a case as they can, and none without merit. We do not feel justified, however, in granting them all, but it is difficult to make a selection, and we are deferring it as long as we can. But we anticipate that, in the Northwest at least, it may become imperative that we should create new ports before the time for which this money is voted elapses. Of course, hon. gentlemen can understand that in that section of the country the towns are a long way apart, and that with rapid immigration and large importations it may be found only just and right that additional facilities should be given. As to the officers whose salaries we hope to augment, does it not, in the last analysis, come down to this—that the department must determine. If I were to say that the department proposed to increase the salary of such and such a one in Toronto, that would be no information to the members of the House, because they do not know the individuals, nor do they know whether they are deserving of higher remuneration or not. Surely hon. gentlemen will admit that that much confidence must be reposed in the department. Even the officers of the inside department here cannot know these cases themselves. But we avail ourselves of the reports of our inspectors and others who visit the ports, and also of any other information which we may gather bearing on these points. And, necessarily the department must be trusted to exercise its discretion.

If I said that we proposed to increase the salary of Mr. Smith, or Mr. Brown, or Mr.

Jones, or any one else, hon. gentlemen opposite would not know the merits of these men. But it is possible they might have personal knowledge of cases that were not receiving proper remuneration and that were entitled to an increase. They would express their views, and I would be glad to avail myself of the information they might give me with reference to the duties performed within their own knowledge, and these cases would be taken into consideration, as I trust will be found to be the case with many of the officers whom they have brought to my attention. But hon. gentlemen must understand that it is impossible for me to mention every man whose salary we propose to increase. There may be some men whose salary we could not increase because they are stationed at ports where the amount of revenue is decreasing, as is the case in one or two of the western ports. Of course hon. gentlemen will not ask me to mention the names of those ports where, from changing conditions, the revenue is falling, it would not be in the public interest that I should do so, and hon. gentlemen would not wish the world to know that the revenue was diminishing at those ports.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman has mentioned the city of Montreal as one instance where the increased expenditure is necessary. If my memory serves me right, I think Montreal showed a diminished revenue during the last month as compared with the previous year.

Mr. PATERSON. That is only for one month.

Mr. CLANCY. However, I am not urging that. No doubt the hon. gentleman has some information as to the necessity of the increased expenditure in Montreal.

Mr. PATERSON. The expenditure there would be between $3,000 and $4,000.

Mr. CLANCY. Then in the city of Toronto the hon. gentleman contemplates the possibility of some change that might require one or two men extra. No doubt he has also information with regard to the number of new outports that will be opened during the present year. Surely he could say about how much he intends to devote to cases of that kind without giving the names of every officer he intends to appoint. He is asking us for $25,000 to apply in salaries, and he has only told us of one case where he expects to apply $3,000 or $4,000. The balance he has left a complete blank.

Mr. PATERSON. The department have not yet arrived at a determination. I have pointed out that by the time this money will be available we will be in a position to know what the business of the current year has been. The department desire to get along with as few new ports as possible. We have a great many new ports in Canada. we are trying to give all the facilities we can to trade and commerce. People are often asking us for the establishment of a new port, pointing out that at present they have to go too far to make their entries. Many such cases are made out that we cannot hope to fulfil at present. The hon. gentleman has brought to my attention the necessity for an outport in his own riding. If we do not see our way to meeting his views at present that is not saying that it may not be necessary, or that it may not be done in the future. But there are many other ports situated just as disadvantageously.

Mr. CLANCY. Can the hon. gentleman hold out any hope now that justice will be done to the locality I mentioned, the town of Dresden? It is a very deserving town. Can he told out any hope that any portion of this large sum will be devoted to the purpose of an outport there?

Mr. PATERSON. It is on the list and will be considered with others but I cannot promise further. I know it will be considered on its merits.

Mr. CLANCY. I want to remind the hon. gentleman that it has been on the list for a long time.

Mr. PATERSON. There are a lot more.

Mr. CLANCY. Although it is on the list there is no attention paid to it. The hon. gentleman asked $10,000 last year for this same purpose. He is asking an increase of $15,000 this year over last. I am not going to quarrel with the hon. gentleman as to where he spent the money. I am not prepared even to say that the hon. gentleman has wasted any money in opening any new ports, because I think the public ought to be served, but the hon. gentleman will not conclude that because that is the case the committee has no right to know where the money is going. The hon. minister, with the money that was voted in bulk last year has made a distribution of it which some hon. members of this House don't believe to be fair. I will take the case of the subcollector at Walpole Island. His home is at Port Lambton. He resides there during the winter months and during the summer months he resides on the island. The subcollector at Port Lambton gets $400. The collector at Walpole Island gets $50 more than the collector at Port Lambton. I desire to ask the hon. minister what the revenue from Walpole Island amounted to during the past year and why an extra $50 has been given in that case. I refer to this because the increase has been taken out of a fund somewhat similar to that which the hon. gentleman is asking for now.

Mr. PATERSON. The officer at Port Lambton, I am told, gets $450 and there is $50 allowed for house rent while the officer at Walpole Island gets $500 and no house rent. The revenue at Walpole Island is only $121. The salary is more than the revenue received but as the hon. gentleman knows it is a preventive service that is maintained there. There is an Indian settlement and parties were in the habit of smuggling liquor which was demoralizing to the people using it. It was reported to us that it was desirable in the interests of the Indian population that an officer should be stationed there so that naturally we could more effectively counteract the illicit trade that was going on.

Mr. CLANCY. The officer does not reside there during the winter months. I was unaware that the officer at Port Lambton received $450. That must have been paid during the present year, 1903-4.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, the accountant says that he was given an increase, perhaps on representations made by the hon. gentleman, of $50 on the 1st of January, 1903.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman is quite mistaken. I am afraid that any interference on my part will not be very much welcomed. It was not on my recommendation at all.

Mr. PATERSON. Well, I do not know. I do not affirm that.

Mr. CLANCY. These gentlemen live in their own houses. Has there been an increase at Sombra, which is another out port ?

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, the sub-collector there was amongst the increases granted last year. He gets $50 more.

Mr. CLANCY. Now, we have pretty good evidence of how the hon. gentleman will make use of this $25,000. Here are three cases where there is no additional work, and where I doubt if there is any increase of revenue ; yet, the hon. gentleman gets us to vote him a bulk sum which he hands out in this manner. I am not going to offer any criticism as to whether these officers are too well paid or not. I have nothing to say in regard to that, but I do say that the hon. gentleman should give the members of this House who reside in the localities where these increases are granted an opportunity of expressing an opinion as to whether they are meritorious or not. I do not know anything that will more fairly illustrate the position that the hon. gentleman is taking now than the three cases that I have mentioned. Does the hon. gentleman say that there has been any increase in the duties performed by these officers because that is the only explanation he can offer for having increased their salaries ?

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, there has been an increase but it has been slight. A salary of $400 is a very small salary for a collector of customs. The receipts are not large but still all these ports are important where there has to be prevention of the illicit introduction of goods into the country. We have ports where the revenue is not very large in which we have to maintain officers although the receipts would not seem to justify their maintenance. But if they devote their whole time to the duties of the office four or five hundred dollars is not a very large sum. If that gentleman wants to know what was done, instead of giving in advance what we anticipate doing, I can give him a statement of what we did with the money last year so that he will be in a position to judge whether or not it was properly expended, and so that he may be able to censure those who are responsible if he thinks that any mistake on the part of the department has been made. I have the list which is long and I am a little tired but I have no objection to going through it and giving the hon. gentleman the information as to how this money was expended last year. Next year after this money is voted if the hon. gentleman asks for an explanation I can give him the information although he may say that it is locking the door after the money is stolen. But, I cannot give him all the information now. I think it is unreasonable for him to ask it. I have given him all the information that I could fairly be expected to furnish at the present time. Considering the growing trade of the country and the importance of the work that the Department of Customs is performing, I think that the head of the department and the officers of the department can be trusted to exercise their judgment in regard to the expenditure of an increase of $25,000.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman must have known last year that he intended to give an increase to each of these officers that I have referred to. It is not necessary to say one word by way of criticism as to whether these salaries are too large or too small ? The hon. gentleman says that the growing trade of the country is the reason for this increase. The growing trade of the country was not the reason for these cases. If the hon. gentleman has entered upon a general rearrangement of an advance in the salaries of his officers throughout the country that is a question that may be fairly considered. I have never taken the ground that any public servant should be put on starvation salaries, nor shall I ever take such a position. But, when the minister proposes to increase salaries he should tell the House what are his reasons for so doing. I would be the last to insist on the minister giving specific details, but I do say that he ought be able to tell us whether he intends to increase the salaries of officers at certain places, where the increase of revenue would not justify it. I do not mean to say that these cases are devoid of merit ; in fact I think that very often, considering the increased cost of living and other things, officers serving at these small ports where the collection is light, but where they may render preventive service, are deserving to have their salaries increased.

Mr. PATERSON. I cannot give the hon. gentleman the decision that will be arrived at, but I can say that while it is difficult to increase salaries in case of a falling or insufficient revenue, we do recognize the fact that preventive work is necessary, and in such cases we would not hesitate to increase the salaries of these officers, if we considered them deserving.

Mr. CLANCY. Why, when the minister gives an increase to an officer, does he call it house rent ? If an officer is entitled to it, give him an increase of salary on his merits, and do not delude the public by calling it house rent.

Mr. PATERSON. If I said a house rent, I made a mistake ; I should have said office rent.

Mr. CLANCY. There is no excuse necessary for giving a man a decent salary, and whether you call it house rent or office rent, is just as deceptive. You should increase his salary and give him the increase under its proper name if the case is meritorious. I am inclined to give the Minister of Customs a good deal of credit, but I do not think it is fair to the committee for him to treat it in this way.

Mr. PATERSON. I do not desire to treat the committee with any discoutesy, and I have tried in good faith to give all the information I possibly could. I would point out, that it is getting late, and that we have not passed an item. I do not say that in any fault finding spirit, nor do I wish to curtail any remarks which hon. gentlemen have to make. The hon. gentleman from Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) has impressed me with the fact that he has not the fullest confidence in me as Minister of Customs ; and that I do not carry on that department as he thinks it should be carried on. I regret that I have to suffer under that condemnation, but he having expressed that view, and in consideration of the depressing influence it will have on me, and the beneficial influence which I trust may flow from it ; I do hope that we may be allowed to pass an item or two.

Mr. CLANCY. I have more confidence in the Minister of Customs than he seems to think. My confidence in him has been somewhat shaken by what has occurred within the last week, but if he promises to repent, and if he acts better than he has spoken, the confidence I formerly had in him may be restored. My confidence in him has been shaken but I have not abandoned hope. I want to say to the hon. Minister of Customs, and I state it here publicly, that I think the hon. gentleman has administered his department fairly well. The little incident which has occurred here, I regard as a mistake on his part, but nevertheless I think my confidence in him may be revived. It is however not fair for him to say when I ask for information, that I ask it as a want of confidence. It is a want of knowledge and information as to which the House is entitled. Should the legislation which the hon. gentleman has passed fail to have its effect and should I be permitted to come back to this House again, I hope we shall have the minister in a better mood, and able to give us some of the details which he is not able to give us at this moment.

Mr. SPROULE. I want to refer to the hon. gentleman's method of doling out information to the House. He practically admits that he is unable to give us any information beyond the fact that there is a great increase in the work, and that there must necessarily be a great increase in the number of hands in some of the cities like Montreal, Toronto and Winnipeg. That is about all he has given us to account for the increase of $25,000. He thinks we ought to be willing to grant this money if he tells us what he did with the money voted last year. We are not dealing with the money voted last year. He is making a request for money for the coming year, and it seems to us that he ought to be able to tell us what he proposes to do with it. If he is keeping pace with the development of population and the increase of exports and imports, he ought to be able to give us some idea of the number of new offices he intends to open, the number of additional collectors he requires, and the number of employees who are likely to receive increases in their salary. We do not want the names, but we think he should give us this information approximately to justify the House in voting the money. Suppose the Minister of Public Works came to the House for an increased vote of money, and said : The country is increasing rapidly in population, and it will naturally require more public works. Would the House be satisfied with that ? Would they not ask him where he proposes to spend the money, and what new works he proposes to undertake in the coming year ? Take the Post Office Department. Suppose the Postmaster General said : We have to open out new post offices, we require to extend our mail service in various directions, and I ask for a bulk sum for these purposes. Would the House be satisfied ? I think not. We would require more detailed information. So with the Militia Department. The minister tells us that so much more is required for the staff, so much for the pay of the men, so much for clothing, and so on, giving us the various items to show the needs of the department for the coming year. If he did not do that, I am afraid the House would be very reluctant to give him the money he asked. Take the Department of Railways and Canals. Suppose the minister of that department used the same reasoning as the hon. Minister of Customs, saying: We spent the money wisely last year, and I think you should trust me for the next year with so much more money. These are parallel cases, and I mention them only to show the absurdity of the position the Minister of Customs takes in asking us to vote this lump sum without giving us detailed information. He asks us to take him on trust. That is not businesslike, and it leads to the impression that he has not a very intelligent knowledge of his own department. We do not want to be unreasonable with the hon. gentleman; but the very way he started created a bad impression on our minds. The very fact that some of the money voted last year was used in getting campaign pamphlets written made us feel that, although he desires to do what is right, he is not handling his department in a businesslike way. Nor is he giving the people's representatives the detailed information which they are entitled to have before they grant him $25,000 more for the service next year than he had last year.

Mr. BLAIN. How much was expended last year for postage?

Mr. PATERSON. The accountant tells me we have it for each port, but not the totals. Does the hon. gentleman want it totalled up.

Mr. BLAIN. The total amount yes. My reason is that last year the hon. gentleman asked an increased item of $6,000 for postage.

Mr. PATERSON. That was accounted for. There was a change in the postal arrangement by which the amount of postage on the great number of manifests and documents that we have sent out was enhanced, but we have now gone back to the rule that previously prevailed.

Mr. BLAIN. The hon. minister seems to be unable to give the items on which he proposes to spend the money next year. Was the $6,000 additional voted for postage last year used for that purpose, and if not what portion of it was expended?

Mr. PATERSON. I cannot give the information in detail. It has been spent in the general expenditure, but I cannot give the exact amount spent in postage alone.

Mr. BLAIN. Could not the minister give some little explanation? He said last year:—

> There is also an increase in postage of some $6,000, owing to increased business.

It seems to me to be rather a reasonable request to ask the minister if the $6,000 was expended for postage last year and if not, what became of the balance of the money?

Mr. SPROULE.

Mr. PATERSON. That estimate was based on our expenditure for six months, and whether it worked out just exactly to the amount we asked, I am unable to say.

Mr. BLAIN. If the hon. minister cannot give us this information, it is rather difficult for the committee to tell what becomes of the money which we vote.

Mr. PATERSON. The postage was included in the general vote for contingent expenses; it was not confined to postage but in making up the estimates, it was estimated that $6,000 was required for postage. If it was not all used for that, the balance of the $6,000 may have been expended in other contingencies.

Mr. BLAIN. Was any of the $6,000 spent in postage?

Mr. PATERSON. The accountant states that $3,000 was expended in six months, whether the whole $6,000 was expended in the 12 months he is not able to say.

Mr. BLAIN. How long was the changed postal regulation in operation?

Mr. PATERSON. I think about six months.

Mr. BLAIN. The minister then states that in the six months $3,000 was expended. Will he tell us what the other $3,000 was expended for?

Mr. PATERSON. It would be in general contingencies.

Mr. BLAIN. Is that the policy of the hon. gentleman?

Mr. PATERSON. That is the way it was always done.

Mr. BLAIN. The hon. gentleman stated last year that he was asking the committee for $6,000 for increased expenditure for postage. Then he says that only $3,000 was expended for postage and the rest was distributed around in other departments.

Mr. PATERSON. The $3,000 was expended in six months.

Mr. BLAIN. He says the postage regulation was only in operation six months and the balance was expended in some other way? In what other way?

Mr. PATERSON. There is still postage to be paid, but the change back to the old rate reduces the amount of postage.

Mr. INGRAM. Are we to understand that the balance of this unexpended money can be expended for anything else?

Mr. PATERSON. It was a vote for general contingencies.

Mr. BLAIN. It was a specific amount.

Mr. PATERSON. No, no.

Mr. BLAIN. I have quoted his words; it was a specific amount for increased postage, and now the minister says that only $3,000 was expended in postage and the balance in some other way.

Mr. PATERSON. I did not say that.

Mr. BLAIN. I misunderstood the hon. gentleman. Does he say the $3,000 was expended or not expended ?

Mr. PATERSON. $3,000 was expended under this appropriation on postage during six months.

Mr. TAYLOR. But the other six months have not expired yet.

Mr. PATERSON. No, the other six months have not expired yet. This was a general contingencies item, and the statement to which my hon. friend (Mr. Blain) has referred would be given in the course of a rough statement of how the contingencies estimate was made up. And it was estimated that $6,000 would be required for postage. It is voted as one item for contingencies, which is perfectly right. We could not expect to estimate to a cent the postage account for the whole Dominion government. The actual expenditure for six months was $3,000, and you naturally assume, unless conditions change, unless there is a larger business or some thing of that kind, that the yearly postage for a year will cost $6,000.

Mr. TAYLOR. The trouble is that we have not the details of money expended. The details that we have are for money spent up to 1st July, 1903. Last year, the hon. minister asked us to vote $1,159,865. That was an increase over the preceding year. He was asked what he was going to do with the money and he instanced this item of $6,000 postage. But now we ask what is he going to do with $25,000 more than last year that he asks for. He tells us that he wants something for Montreal, something for Toronto, and something for Winnipeg, and something for new ports that he may open, and tells us that we must trust him for all this. We have not the details of the latest expenditures, but we have the plain fact staring us in the face that, since he became Minister of Customs, the expenditure has increased by about half a million. Of course the hon. gentleman has collected more money. But, in many ports that I could name the same officers as before, and paid no higher salaries, have collected much larger sums than before. But, simply because he gets more money the hon. gentleman says he is justified in asking an increase. He does not give the explanations that the committee are entitled to. Before he arrived at these estimates, he must have had some details of what he intended to do with this $25,000, and he should give us details as the Minister of Public Works or any other minister is accustomed to do.

Mr. CLANCY. I understood the Minister of Customs to state that he had under his hand a list showing the increases in salaries last year. The list is a long one, I believe, and the hon. gentleman did not care to read it unless the committee insisted upon it. Perhaps the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) would have no objection to handing it to the 'Hansard' reporter, and we could agree to take it as read. That course would save the hon. gentleman trouble and we should all be able to have a copy.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman will see there have not been very extravagant advances in many cases. I think some 400 officers had their salaries augmented. If they were augmented by only $50 each, that would make a considerable total. In the port of Toronto, I think all the men were brought up to a minimum of $550, and those who had been receiving $550 were put up to $600.

Mr. BLAIN. All?

Mr. PATERSON. I believe there was no distinction. While some officers might be more valuable and more active than others, yet they were all engaged in about the same work, and we thought that those in the same class should draw equal pay. In Montreal we follow a similar rule, except that the minimum is $500, instead of $550. A good many were working at $1.50 per working day, and these were brought up to $500. The reason why they were not brought up as high as the Toronto men, was not that they were not as faithful officers, but because in Toronto there is little or no extra work. Montreal being a large seaport, with ships arriving day and night, the salaries of the lower paid men are supplemented by their earnings for extra services. I believe it was the sense of the committee last year that these increases should be made. I believe that the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke) expressed the opinion that $600 a year was only a fair amount for men living in cities like Toronto or Montreal. We did not bring it up that high, but made an advance towards it. There were sixty in Toronto that were increased.

Mr. CLANCY. I mentioned this matter because the hon. gentleman said that he had a statement of the changes that had been made. Hon. gentlemen on this side, I am sure, are not disposed to insist on the minister reading that statement. I would suggest that, in order that we may all have the information, we should consider the statement read and the hon. gentleman should hand it to 'Hansard.' Perhaps the hon. gentleman will assent to that, especially as he said he was prepared to read it if the committee insisted upon it.

Mr. PATERSON. It will be the proper way, I suppose, if hon. gentlemen want the information, for me to read——

Mr. CLANCY. Will the hon. gentleman pardon me? I have not insisted that he should read it, but have been disposed to spare him the trouble, especially as I understood him to say that he was somewhat fatigued. If there is anything of a private or confidential nature in the statement he has under his hand, let him have a statement of the changes prepared, which can be given another time. I simply took the hon. gentleman at his word about his willingness to give the information; and if he does not object, we do not object, to consider it read.

Mr. PATERSON. There is a large number of names, and it is not quite regular to put in 'Hansard' anything of this kind that has not been read. Perhaps I could, with the consent of the committee, lay it on the table——

Mr. INGRAM. If the consent of the House is obtained, this document can be put in 'Hansard' without reading. There is only one copy laid on the Table, but if it is published in the 'Hansard' we can all have a copy.

Mr. PATERSON. I have no objections to putting it into the 'Hansard' if the Chairman is willing. With the permission of the committee I will hand it to the reporter to be taken as read.

Salaries and travelling expenses of inspectors of ports and of other officers on inspection and preventive service, including salaries and expenditure in connection with the Board of Customs and for the compiling of statistical returns of imports and exports, $139,200.

Mr. PATERSON. There is an increase of $10,000 here. There are fifty-three officers in the statistical department, the most of whom I presume will receive the advance of $50 they are entitled to. Then we want to make provision for strengthening the inspectors' force, that is, we want more men engaged in ascertaining values in neighbouring countries than we have now, and we want provision for their travelling expenses. Our intention is to have men in the leading centres of business in the United States to keep us thoroughly posted as to home values. We had Mr. Atkinson for some time, we have lately engaged Mr. Milne, one of the appraisers at Toronto.

Mr. PATERSON.

Mr. BLAIN. What are the duties of inspector ?

Mr. PATERSON. These gentlemen I am speaking of now will visit the various centres of trade in the United States and thoroughly post themselves on the home values of goods shipped into Canada, so that we may be able to collect duties on the home values as the law requires in respect to all goods exported to this country. We require them to state on the invoice now the home price, and the duties collected on that are stated on the invoice. But we want to have our own officers in a position to know in all cases that the law is carried out.

Mr. INGRAM. Will the hon. gentleman so give us some explanation about the Board of Customs and their duties ?

Mr. PATERSON. The board as constituted under the law consists of a commissioner, an assistant commissioner and three Dominion appraisers. At the present time there are four Dominion appraisers. Their duties are laid down in the Act. They meet at intervals to decide questions that arise as to the interpretation of tariffs and as to what rates of duty certain articles should come in.

Mr. INGRAM. Do they perform all these duties at Ottawa ?

Mr. PATERSON. They meet here only. They only deal with rates.

Mr. INGRAM. When a man buys goods in the United States and the invoice is claimed to be lower than the actual selling price in the United States, does that invoice come to the notice of the board ?

Mr. PATERSON. No, the appraiser deals with that at the port of entry and then we have our check department here. Mr. Breadner is at the head of the check department and it is between the appraiser at the port and the check department here.

Mr. INGRAM. So that the importer has nothing to do with the board under the circumstances which the hon. gentleman has stated ?

Mr. PATERSON. The commissioner of course is the deputy head of the department and he is also commissioner of the board. By virtue of being deputy head he is necessarily over the check department.

Mr. INGRAM. I do not mean in that light at all because he would not be acting as chairman of the board in doing that.

Mr. PATERSON. No, he would be acting as deputy head.

Mr. SPROULE. How many inspectors have you now and how many will you require for next year ?

Mr. PATERSON. We have twelve inspectors in the Dominion and one assistant inspector.

Mr. SPROULE. How many additional do you want for next year ?

Mr. PATERSON. This is to strengthen the staff in the United States which is composed of officers who are not called inspectors but investigating officers.

Mr. SPROULE. Then you do not require any more inspectors ?

Mr. PATERSON. No.

Mr. SPROULE. How many additional do you require for the staff that you employ to ascertain values ?

Mr. PATERSON. We have now got down to one and we have taken one of the appraisers who was at Toronto formerly. I think that probably he will be continued in the work. I would like to have two or three more.

Mr. TAYLOR. What is the salary ?

Mr. PATERSON. Well, we have to pay them pretty liberal salaries. We want capable men for this work. We want men who know how to approach the manufacturer courteously and one who will understand the business with which he is dealing.

Mr. SPROULE. What salary are you paying at the present time ?

Mr. PATERSON. Mr. Miller as appraiser was getting $1,800. He was not appointed to this position. The expenses run about $2,000 beyond the salary.

Mr. TAYLOR. Who are the inspectors now ?

Mr. PATERSON. Mr. Atkinson and Mr. Miller.

Mr. SPROULE. You want some of this money for completing statistical returns ? Is the work to be done in a branch that you are going to add to the department or in a branch that is already in existence ?

Mr. PATERSON. This is just to increase the salaries. There are no new men.

Mr. TAYLOR. I see that Mr. Atkinson gets $1,100 salary.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes.

Mr. INGRAM. On Friday night last we were discussing an item of $57,167 on page 10, and I find that a portion of this item that we are now considering is also to be devoted to the collection of statistics. The hon. gentleman explained that the item of $57,000 was to provide for additional clerks whose duties were to be the collection of statistics in order that the monthly returns should be brought down promptly.

Mr. PATERSON. This is to provide for three men who were employed in the statistical work and who have been brought into the inside service, as I explained then, but their salaries were voted in the outside service and they were paid out of that vote. They will, after the 1st of July, be paid out of the inside vote. Their places have been filled by three others at not quite the same salaries that these gentlemen were getting. There is an extra expense but it is clearly shown in the estimate here.

Mr. SPROULE. How many statistical officers have you in your employ ?

Mr. PATERSON. Fifty-three.

Mr. SPROULE. I thought the statistics were managed in the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. PATERSON. I am not acquainted with the working of the other departments. We collect the statistics that you find in the trade and navigation returns. We get out these monthly returns and also the yearly returns.

Mr. SPROULE. Do not the monthly returns come from the Department of Trade and Commerce ?

Mr. PATERSON. No, we issue our own returns.

Mr. SPROULE. Is this work duplicated in the two departments ?

Mr. PATERSON. Our work is entirely original.

Mr. SPROULE. I cannot understand why you should require a double set of officers to get out these returns in the two departments.

Mr. PATERSON. There are very few officers in the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. SPROULE. But they get out the same figures do they not ?

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, but they compile them in a somewhat different form. They have reports from agents abroad but they have no statistical branch properly so-called.

Mr. SPROULE. We vote money for a statistical staff over there.

Mr. PATERSON. They have a very small staff.

Mr. BLAIN. When was the first officer appointed in the United States ?

Mr. PATERSON. Many years ago, before I came into the department at all.

Mr. BLAIN. Under what item do we find that gentleman ?

Mr. PATERSON. His salary is paid out of this vote 'Board of Customs.'

Mr. BLAIN. Is he called an inspector ?

Mr. PATERSON. No, a special officer; first appointed April, 1895; permanently appointed in 1899.

Mr. BLAIN. Is the explanation of this increase, that a large quantity of goods are coming in from the United States under valuation?

Mr. PATERSON. There has been complaint of under-valuation.

Mr. BLAIN. The minister would not admit that last year.

Mr. PATERSON. I think the discussion last year was with reference to goods coming in under the preference. We have unfortunately found cases of under valuation of goods coming from the United States.

Mr. BLAIN. What line of goods?

Mr. PATERSON. Almost all lines, except perhaps groceries.

Mr. BLAIN. And you want two extra officers on that account?

Mr. PATERSON. We want to get fuller information.

Mr. BLAIN. Do these inspectors in the United States report to the department directly?

Mr. PATERSON. Yes.

Mr. BLAIN. Monthly reports?

Mr. PATERSON. Almost daily, and if there is any case under adjudication they may have to make a special mission.

Mr. BLAIN. How much of this item is for the twelve inspectors and their expenses?

Mr. PATERSON. Salaries, $26,350; expenses, $8,500.

Mr. CLANCY. Were the salaries of any of these increased last year?

Mr. PATERSON. I think not. There is one new assistant inspector, but the Department of Customs will be recouped for his services by the Department of Trade and Commerce. He was specially charged to look after importation of machinery coming to the Sydney works, some of which were dutiable and some free. He became well posted in the work, and when the payment of the bounty was transferred from Customs to Trade and Commerce, the minister was anxious to have an able officer and one conversant with the work, and it was thought that perhaps Mr. Russell would be the best fitted of any one in the public service to do that work. We, therefore, lent him to the Department of Trade and Commerce, and we will be recouped for his salary.

Mr. INGRAM. How much money will be spent for the Board of Customs and the collection of statistics, as distinct from the other services included in the vote?

Mr. PATERSON. About $40,000 for the Board of Customs and $45,500 for statistics.

Mr. BLAIN.

Mr. INGRAM. I cannot understand why these accounts are kept separately. At F—3. Auditor General's Report, you will find Board of Customs and statistical office, $59,510.49, and at F—34 you will find Board of Customs and statistical office, $74,715, or a total of $134,259.15. What is the object of keeping these accounts apart?

Mr. PATERSON. That is the Auditor General's Report.

Mr. INGRAM. I know it is; but why should they not appear page after page consecutively, instead of having them distributed all over the Auditor General's Report in this way?

Mr. PATERSON. The accountant says our accounts go to the Auditor General separately from those of the Board of Customs.

Mr. INGRAM. Why should they not go together, so that they will be entered consecutively in the Auditor General's Report? As they appear, it is very difficult for us to gather from them what is done.

Mr. PATERSON. That is the auditor's way of entering them. Many of the officers whose salaries are entered under the head of Board of Customs are not living in Ottawa, but in Toronto, and it may be that that is the reason they are entered separately from those of the department.

Mr. SPROULE. How many preventive officers have you?

Mr. PATERSON. We have fifteen this year, an increase of three over last year.

Mr. BLAIN. For the Board of Customs, the salaries and expenses this year amount to $30,500. The hon. minister is asking for $40,000 for next year. Why the increase?

Mr. PATERSON. The vote includes the salaries of the Dominion appraisers at Ottawa and those of the men on Mr. McMichael's staff at Toronto, though not Mr. McMichael himself.

Mr. BLAIN. On page 3949 of Hansard we find:

> Customs, 27 officers salaries, $23,500; expenses, $7,000.

Which makes a total of $30,500 voted last year, but the figures the minister gives tonight is $40,000 an increase of $9,500, and I am asking why the increase takes place.

Mr. PATERSON. The explanation is that last year that covered only the officers in Ottawa and did not include the officers at Toronto. The salaries and expenses there are about $10,000 but the amounts item for item are about the same this year as last.

Mr. INGRAM. Some new names have been added to the Toronto list.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, three have been added, Mr. W. G. Livingston, Mr. Capreol and Mr. J. M. Sullivan. Carried.

Mr. SPROULE. Carried if the committee will rise now.

Mr. PATERSON. You do not want to give me the other items ?

Mr. SPROULE. It would only be detaining the House because there will be a great deal of discussion on the other items.

Mr. PATERSON. There are four or five items just the same as last year.

Mr. TAYLOR. The next item is miscellaneous, which includes :

Printing and stationery, subscriptions to commercial papers, flags, dating stamps, locks, instruments, &c., for various ports of entry, legal expenses and uniforms for customs officers.

In the Auditor's Report I find salaries of men in Washington and St. Paul at $3 a day, for 365 days in the year, men who have been hidden away about whom we know nothing.

Mr. PATERSON. The explanation is that all of that is paid back to us. The people of Canada do not pay it. They are Canadian officers who are placed there for the convenience of the American roads and the American roads have to pay their salaries. The people of Canada do not pay them.

Mr. TAYLOR. I will read one other item. We have here this entry :

Woodyatt, T. Brantford : services arranging for and conducting investigations of charges against customs officials, 18 days at $10 ; board and lodgings, $17.50 ; fares $28.70 ; telegrams and postage, $1.60—$227.80.

What did he do for that money ?

Mr. PATERSON. I think that was back in 1896, and he did not render his bill for a long time.

Mr. TAYLOR. We want to know what he did during those eighteen days.

Mr. INGRAM. I still insist that it is a reasonable hour to adjourn. If the minister has not his estimates passed I do not hold myself responsible for that. The Minister of Customs, I understand is consulting the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) about it. That hon. gentleman takes no part in this discussion. But if he had to watch these matters as closely as some of us on this side do, he would find it pretty hard work. I think I am within my rights in objecting to going on any longer.

Mr. PATERSON. I think I have given the explanation the hon. gentleman wanted.

Mr. SPROULE. This item will require some discussion and it is now one o'clock. The minister complains that the items are not passed, but I think we have greater right to complain that the information that we ask for is not given. I think we have done a good long day's work.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I am sure that there is no disposition to press the passage of items unduly. At the same time I think there should be some regard for time on the part of hon. gentlemen on the other side. What has taken place to-day ? We began the discussion of these items about five o'clock and we have been actually at work six hours on these few items. And I am sure that if hon. gentlemen will read 'Hansard' to-morrow, they will find that this discussion could have been greatly condensed. If hon. gentlemen will, unintentionally perhaps, waste time they must not complain if the government wish to proceed with the public business and make substantial progress. We could have accomplished the useful part of this discussion in one-third of the time occupied and could have disposed of a much larger volume of business than has been done. If the opposition kill time they must not complain if the government ask them to go on and do a legitimate day's work.

Mr. TAYLOR. Go on, then.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Very well.

Mr. SPROULE. I object to the statement that the opposition are wasting time, I say the government are wasting time.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Who is wasting time at this monent ?

Mr. SPROULE. The government. If the Minister of Customs had given the information asked for, we could have done three times as much as we have done. The Postmaster General complains that we have done little. We have voted over a million and a quarter of dollars to be spent in salaries all over the country, and we have done it, I must say, on the most meagre information I ever heard given by a department. And because we occupy time in trying to pry the information out of the minister, we are accused of wasting time.

Mr. TAYLOR. The Postmaster General lectures the members of the opposition. He was not in the House at half past five, when the Minister of Customs took the floor and talked until five minutes past six. And when we came back at eight o'clock he talked till five minutes to nine. The members of the opposition can hardly be expected to listen quietly to a charge that they have wasted time, when 'Hansard' will show that three-quarters of the time was taken up by the Minister of Customs making a campaign speech. The Postmaster General was not here to hear the lecture that the Minister of Customs read us. We are not going to take such lecturing without resenting it.

Mr. INGRAM. So far as I am concerned, I had no idea of killing time. Every question I asked was pertinent to the subject under discussion. We have voted $1,324,000 since five o'clock. Many of us have to be at a committee meeting at ten o'clock and when we have attended to our correspondence and then sat here until a late hour to-morrow, we shall have done pretty well.

Sir WILLLIAM MULOCK. Better finish this resolution.

Mr. INGRAM. As I understand it, $139,200 has just been voted. The items remaining in this section are $37,500, $30,000, $5,000 and $40,000. The amounts are not large, but each cover a number of items upon which an explanation will be required. When the Postmaster General was in opposition he was one of those who insisted most strongly upon all information being given.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I was very reasonable.

Mr. INGRAM. Not always. I have been here long enough to remember the hon. gentleman for some years in opposition.

Mr. PATERSON. I would like to give an explanation of this item of $37,500 for miscellaneous. But before doing so, I desire to say that I do not think that fuller explanations were ever given than have been given to-night. If hon. gentlemen will go over 'Hansard' of former years, I think they will find that never has information been insisted upon in such detail as on these estimates. I have endeavoured to meet the demand for information so far as possible, and I think hon. gentlemen themselves must be convinced that the explanations were intended to be full and were fairly reasonable. Now, after this item the hon. member for Leeds brought forward the names of the men in the United States. But, if he will look at the bottom of the page, he will find deductions as follows :

Grand Trunk Railway, services at Portland, Maine, $1,095 ; Grand Trunk Railway, services at Chicago, Ill., $1,080 ; Great Northern Railway services at Seattle, Washington, $1,157 ; Great Northern Railway, services at Tacoma, Washington, $1,095 ; Northern Pacific Railway, services at Duluth, Maine, $1,288.50 ; Minnesota Transfer Company., services at St. Paul, Minn., $1,095 ; Wabash Railway, services at Chicago, Ill., $1,095 ; amounts received from various officers for premium on guarantee bonds, $4,768.50—total, $12,674.

This is the amount which we are recouped by these roads to which services have been rendered.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is an explanation, but the question I asked was why is this account kept in miscellaneous ? Because in the estimates we are told what miscellaneous means and here we have a number of items that do not come in here. For instance this account paid to Mr. Woodyatt, Brandon, $227. What is this ?

Mr. PATERSON. It was an investigation that was held.

Mr. TAYLOR. What is the $37,000 wanted for ?

Mr. PATERSON. We estimate that it will be wanted for different purposes under this heading. If it is not required it will not be expended.

Mr. SPROULE. How much do you want for printing ?

Mr. PATERSON. Last year the expense for printing and stationery was $17,500, of which the stationery alone was about $10,000.

Mr. BLAIN. Would the minister give us a detailed statement of the larger items of expenditure last year ?

Mr. PATERSON. The details are to be found in the Auditor General's Report, F-36, 37 and 38.

Mr. BLAIN. I would like the minister to tell us something about that book that was published last year for the instruction of the customs officers, and how much it cost.

Mr. PATERSON. That is the book the commissioner is working on. It is not completed yet.

Mr. BLAIN. Perhaps the minister would state how much it is going to cost.

Mr. PATERSON. It will cost nothing but the printing. The commissioner is not receiving anything extra for his work.

Mr. BLAIN. The hon. gentleman, as I understand, is preparing a book for the better information of the different customs officers in Canada in order that each one may understand his own duty. Will the hon. gentleman state how much he expects to expend in publishing that book so that it will be ready for distribution amongst the officers ?

Mr. PATERSON. It would depend on the number of copies. The officials estimated the amount required at $2,500. The expenditure would be in connection with the printing and stationery only. When it is finished it will be a very useful book. There have been no instructions issued for the guidance of customs officers since 1876.

Mr. BLAIN. The minister stated last year, as will be found on page 3962 of 'Hansard':

There is an increase of $2,500 here which is required to meet the cost of printing a book now in course of preparation by the assistant commissioner——

Mr. PATERSON. Not the assistant commissioner. Does it say so ?

Mr. BLAIN. The assistant commissioner.

Mr. PATERSON. That is a mistake.

Mr. BLAIN. (reading).

—contains instructions to the customs officers on their respective duties. We have 1,617 officials and I suppose each one should have a copy.

Now the minister got last year $2,500 for the purpose of preparing this book. He says that nothing has been expended so far for that purpose. Now will he tell us what he did with that $2,500 ?

Mr. PATERSON. We did not use it, it lapsed.

Mr. BLAIN. Is this a revote, then ?

Mr. PATERSON. Practically, yes.

Mr. BLAIN. Am I correct then in understanding the minister to say that the $2,500 voted last year was not any of it expended?

Mr. PATERSON. It has not been expended this current year. It is not expected any part of it will be used.

Mr. TAYLOR. Will the hon. gentleman give us the details of the expenditure of this $37,500 this year ?

Mr. PATERSON. The expenses are about the same each year.

Mr. BLAIN. I do not wish to weary the minister, but I have another question. I have read what he said last year about the $2,500. I would like the minister to state emphatically, if he is able, that no part of the $2,500 was expended last year for any purpose.

Mr. PATERSON. I say emphatically it will not be.

Mr. BLAIN. What was done with the $2,500 that was voted last year ?

Mr. PATERSON. Nothing done.

Mr. INGRAM. The hon. gentleman has this item of $37,500 placed under seven or eight different headings under which he proposes to expend the money. Will the hon. gentleman give the figures under the different items making up the total of $37,500 ? If the hon. minister will give the explanation under each item as it is called it would facilitate the progress of business. We have been trying to get this information for hour after hour and yet these hon. gentlemen opposite tell us we are killing time. I think it is high time the hon. gentleman should give us this information. There is no reason in asking us to sit here until two o'clock in the morning, and I protest against this kind of thing. Of all the estimates that it was ever attempted to get through this House, I have never known of there having been less effort to give an explanation than that made by the hon. minister to-night. We have to drag it out of him. When other hon. gentlemen come down with estimates, they give an explanation upon each item as it is called without being asked for it. Either the hon. gentleman is holding back the information or he is not posted on his own estimates, because if he were he could give a better explanation than that which he has given.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman has the Auditor General's Report there in which the expenditure is given for the previous year. The estimates for the coming year are based upon the expenditures of the past year. The hon. gentleman can see how these expenditures were made. We anticipate there will be equal expenses upon equal lines, from the same operations as those shown upon the book before the hon. gentleman. Therefore we ask for $37,500. The details of the expenditures are in the hon. gentleman's hand. He is asking for information which he has in his hand and can get. There is no desire to withhold information. There have been as complete explanations given as can be given. The hon. gentleman is insisting upon getting from me, what he has already and he is insisting upon something that is not necessary for the proper understanding of the subject. The expenditures do not vary in any considerable degree. He can see that this estimate must be approximately correct, but if it varies in any respect and there is more estimated for than will be expended the vote simply lapses and the money is not expended.

Mr. INGRAM. The hon. gentleman has not enlightened us very much. What is the hon. gentleman paid for if he is not paid to come down to this House and give information ? When he goes to council and asks for a certain amount of money to carry on the affairs of the department, does he tell the other ministers to look at the Auditor General's report and see what the expenditure was last year ? If he went over to the council and asked for so much on these various items we assume that he would be in a position to tell the other ministers what the items are and how he makes up the total of $37,500. I am not here to peruse two volumes of the Auditor General's Report—

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, you are; it is printed for you.

Mr. INGRAM. The hon. minister is paid for that. We have on page 75 of the estimates, an item of $37,500 for miscellaneous, consisting of printing and stationery, subscriptions to commercial papers, flags, dating stamps, locks, instruments, &c., for various ports of entry, legal expenses, and uniforms for the customs officers. I want to know how much the hon. gentleman requires for each of these items. I do not want to be told that I am to come to this House and read page after page of the Auditor General's Report to see what you expended last year. I want to know what you propose to do for the coming year. You may expend twice as much during the incoming year as you did last year or you may not. It is not for me to give the answer to that question. That is what the hon. minister is here for, it is what we want to know and it is what we will know before he gets this item through.

Mr. PATERSON. We are asking for this amount. It is based on the expenditure under a similar head last year and it runs about the same thing.

Mr. INGRAM. Why don't you tell us what the expenditure is?

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman has it in his hand. It amounts to $37,500. He seeks to know what transpires in council. I am not at liberty to tell him what transpires in council, but the fact that the amount is in the estimates will be taken as an evidence that it has received the approval of council and I do not know that the hon. gentleman would be any wiser. I may say that I consider his questions are captious, without any public benefit, that they are of no use and that no good purpose will be served. He may delay the proceedings but he is certainly not accomplishing anything more, and cannot hope to accomplish anything more.

Mr. INGRAM. I understand the minister to say that the expenditure is included in this report which is brought down to the 30th June last year. The hon. gentleman is asking for money to be expended from the 30th of June next until the 30th June, 1905, he wants to lead the House and the country to believe that because we have a document before us that will soon be a year old, we should be in a position to judge from that what he is going to expend next year. The hon. gentleman talks about me wanting to know what he does in council. Was the hon. gentleman joking?

Mr. PATERSON. No, the hon. gentleman asked if I went to council and did so and so.

Mr. INGRAM. The hon. gentleman must be joking when he talks like that. Nobody wants to know what the hon. gentleman does in council. I have never asked him such a question. I have been too long here to ask any such question because I know better. I would be quite satisfied to get from the hon. gentleman an explanation of his estimates in this House, without endeavouring to ascertain what he does in council. If he is as particular in withholding information from council as he is in this House the hon. gentleman will never divulge what took place in council. I am perfectly reasonable in the question I am asking.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman wants to know how much I am going to expend on padlocks this year?

Mr. INGRAM. Well, is there anything unreasonable in that?

Mr. SPROULE. Here is an item for printing and stationery, subscriptions to commercial papers, flags, dating stamps, locks, instruments, &c., for various ports of entry, legal expenses and uniforms for customs officers. Let us suppose that he took this whole vote and expended it upon two of these items. It is the duty of the minister to give explanations as to the various items, and when he tells the House how he spent the money last year, the House decides whether it is wise to vote it or not. We are asking for no more information than we have a right to ask, and the minister is giving us less information than he should give us. I cannot conceive how any minister could ask council to pass these items on such limited information as is presented to the House.

Mr. BLAIN. What is the explanation about the legal expenses. Mr. T. Woodyatt of Brantford was paid $264 for investigating charges against officials. What was the outcome of the investigation?

Mr. PATERSON. That was for an investigation in 1897. Mr. Woodyatt was a long time in rendering his account, but he had not been paid before.

Mr. BLAIN. Did the department not ask for the account?

Mr. PATERSON. He was asked repeatedly for it.

Mr. BLAIN. What was the trouble?

Mr. PATERSON. There was no trouble. He was asked time and again for his account, but he did not send it in. I grant you it looks strange, but it is a fact.

Mr. BLAIN. Perhaps the minister would bring down the correspondence.

Mr. PATERSON. I do not know that there is any, except that there may be letters asking him to send in his account.

Mr. BLAIN. What was the outcome of the investigation?

Mr. PATERSON. I do not remember the facts as it is so long ago, but the accountant's memory is that the services of one officer at Parry Sound were dispensed with, and the charges against a man named Campbell at Meaford were not sustained.

Mr. BLAIN. It would save time if the minister would give a full explanation.

Mr. PATERSON. I cannot be expected to remember the details of an investigation that took place several years ago. Mr. Woodyatt is the police magistrate of Brantford, who occupies a very good judicial position, and I think it will be generally admitted that whatever his findings were, they were correct. It looks strange that he did not send in his account before, but that is the bald fact. He is not like other lawyers in that respect.

Mr. BLAIN. Are there any more outstanding accounts ?

Mr. PATERSON. None of that nature.

Mr. FOWLER. What is the case of Ross vs. King, at page F—36 ?

Mr. PATERSON. That was a suit with reference to duty on steel rails, in connection with an account which arose under the late government in 1895. The parties were made to pay duty on steel rails for a street railway. It was explained that they should be free, but the Customs Department of that day ruled them dutiable. The parties sued for recovery, and carried the case to the Privy Council and succeeded against the Crown in the principal sum. This suit arose out of a claim for interest on the money. In that case, which also went to the Privy Council, the Crown succeeded.

Mr. FOWLER. I notice several items relating to guarantee bonds. What is the principle that guides you in that matter ? Do you pay the premium ?

Mr. PATERSON. Yes. The officers of the Customs Department who handle funds are insured in the four Canadian guarantee companies, one of which takes the maritime provinces, another Quebec, another Ontario, and the other all west of Ontario. We have arranged for a special rate of $3.60 per year per $1,000. The department pays the companies and deducts the amount from the salaries of the officers. By this arrangement, which operates very well, we avoid the trouble incident to private bondsmen. Last year we expended on the guarantee fund $4,347 and received $4,315.65. There were no losses.

Mr. CLANCY. I want to ask whether the money we are now voting is accounted for on page F—5 and page F—36 to 38, inclusive ?

Mr. PATERSON. F—5 comes under the first item, which is passed.

Mr. TAYLOR. I have a number of questions which I wish to put to the hon. minister, and I am going to get on my feet every time, and I expect the hon. gentleman to do the same. The hon. minister informed the member for East Elgin (Mr. Ingram) that he would obtain information on these votes in the Auditor General's Report. I see here there is an item of $27 for legal expenses, Bickerdike & Trahee. Is the same item in the present estimates for these legal gentlemen ?

Mr. PATERSON. The total expenses under that head were $264, which was divided among different firms, and it does not necessarily follow that these same men will have the same amounts, but it is assumed that there will be that much required for that purpose. I suppose that this item has been passing through in the shape in which it is for the last thirty years for anything that I know, and I do not know that any further information has been given about it than I have given to-night.

Mr. TAYLOR. We have asked the hon. gentleman to give details of his estimated expenditure, and he tells us that his estimate is based upon the expenditure of last year as shown in the Auditor General's Report. Well, we turn to the Auditor General's Report to see how he spent his money last year. If we take up the item of advertising, we find that the St. John 'Globe' received $4.80 and the St. John 'Telegraph' $4.80 for notices re conscience money—a total of $9.60 for this service. Does he expect to spend $9.60 next year ?

Mr. PATERSON . Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) expect me to answer such questions as that ?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes. The hon. gentleman has referred it to the Auditor General's Report and I want to see what he expects to do with this money next year. Had he based his estimate on this estimate of $9 for advertising ?

Mr. PATERSON. Does the hon. gentleman want to stand in the position of asking whether accounts that have been paid are to be paid again ? Surely he must understand, what I think any man of ordinary intelligence would understand, that we estimate that if printing and stationery cost a certain amount this year, the probability is that it will cost about the same next year. But certainly we shall not pay again accounts that have already been paid. If the hon. gentleman cannot understand that I think I am not bound to answer any further.

Mr. TAYLOR. I understand this point as well as the hon. minister does. I have as much intelligence as the hon. gentleman, and know as much of bookkeeping. But the hon. opposition have asked three or four times——

Mr. PATERSON. Forty times.

Mr. TAYLOR. Well, forty times if the hon. gentleman's conscience will permit that figure—we have asked him to give us the approximate amount he is going to spend under each head, and he refers us to these accounts that I have before me. Does he expect to pay Mr. Woodyatt $10 a day for eighteen days ?

Mr. PATERSON. No, he is settled with.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then, it would appear that this is an item which was not used as the basis of the estimate, and so we are that far from finding out what the minister will do with $37,500. Before he gets this through he will have to give us an approximate estimate of what he intends to spend this $37,500 for. According to the Auditor General's Report, he only required $33,458. He has told us that he does not expect to repeat this expenditure to Mr. Woodyatt. Does he expect to spend $9.60 for advertising in the St. John 'Globe' and the St. John 'Telegraph'?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I have had some little experience in this House, and I think I am right in saying that this is the first time since I came to parliament that the examination of any minister has taken place on the lines pursued to-night. There is nothing to guide the minister in his estimate of expenditure but the experience of the past. My hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) is a householder. He has a fair idea of how much he spent last year for the maintenance of himself and his family. He knows what he pays, in bulk to his butcher and baker and candlestick maker—how much it cost him to maintain his house last year. He probably figures on spending a similar amount next year. But if he were asked if he intended to spend the same amounts on the same people he would say: No, I may change my butcher or my baker; I may change my bill of fare; I may wear different garments and have different personal expenditure; but I shall probably spend in the current year about as much as last year. Nobody can tell exactly what items will be incurred as contingencies in the public service. This sum is voted to cover a miscellaneous collection of expenditure which cannot be foreseen in detail. And if my hon. friend, having had full explanation from the Minister of Customs, threatens this House with obstructive tactics unless he gets certain statements made to him, I think this committee should respect themselves enough not to tolerate the success of such tactics. This is not an unusual thing with the hon. gentleman. In fact, it is part of his programme to declare that nothing shall be done unless his particular demands are complied with.

There is an effort made on the part of the government to be reasonable at all times, it is our desire to do so on all occasions. But when an hon. gentleman persists in asking a question that has never been asked, as far as I remember, during my experience of 23 sessions, I think the committee is warranted in concluding that no public good is going to come from the prosecution of any such inquiry. Now we are told by the hon. member for Leeds that he will not let this item pass until he gets information that cannot be given. He has asked a lot of absurd questions. He has asked the Minister of Customs to state how much he is going to pay for this and for that item, how much he is going to pay this man and that man in the future because similar services were paid in the past—a question I think on reflection he will be ready to acknowledge was not reasonable. He has asked the Minister of Customs to do the impossible, to tell this committee how this item is going to be made up in the various contingencies. Since the hon. gentleman has told us that he will not allow this committee to proceed until that information is furnished, we have come to a deadlock. The hon. gentleman has threatened to obstruct because the minister will not answer a question impossible to be answered.

Mr. INGRAM. When the hon. gentleman talks about the Auditor General's report showing us the expenditure up to the 30th of June last, it was my duty as a member of this House to go through these items and investigate them. If there is anything we do not understand we come to this committee when these items are under discussion, and ask the minister to explain them to us. Now here is an item of $37,500 the details of which the minister says have not been asked for before. Is that a good reason why the minister should not answer?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. How can he give the details of a future expenditure of this kind? It has been the practice to group in contingencies a number of expenditures of an indefinable character, it has been done by all governments, and it is the only possible way of carrying on the business. The hon. gentleman knows quite well that never before in the passage of Customs items did any member ever ask what is being asked for to-night. There is no particle of good coming from it. The government side are quite as able to remain here as the opposition side. We have had many of these contests in the past, I have taken part in them in opposition, and I have come to the conclusion that there is no practical good in them. Hon. gentlemen are expected to give reasonable criticism to our items, but at the same time to allow us to make substantial progress. This desultory, pointless debate has been prolonged now into the small hours, and to all appearance we are to be kept here indefinitely because at the present time the hon. member for South Leeds will not recede from that position. The opposition cannot dominate this House. There is no disposition on the part of the majority to do it. The majority is as conciliatory and reasonable as it is possible for it to be. It is only in that spirit that we meet the House. But, there comes a time when discussion ceases, when there is no profit any longer in discussion and I submit that we reached that point long ago in connection with this item. It is impossible to define in any more detail than the Auditor General report defines the prospective expenditure of this money. Why persist in asking for what it is impossible to give?

Mr. INGRAM. If the hon. minister had said in the first place that he had not an itemized statement, that would have ended it, because he could not have given it, but the hon. gentleman led us to believe that he had these different items particularized, and if he had given the statement then that would have been an end to any discussion as far as the $37,500 item is concerned. As far as these estimates are concerned, I think we made very good headway until we struck this item of $37,500. When we had passed a million and some odd dollars I think it was time to adjourn. The hon. Postmaster General and the hon. Minister of Customs were both active members of the opposition, and I think I am not saying too much when I say that when it came to an unreasonable hour and they asked for an adjournment and our friends did not grant an adjournment there was only one method left for them to pursue, and that was to act stubbornly and say : We will not allow any items to pass. Knowing this, these hon. gentlemen ought to have some respect for the opposition now. If we had adjourned at 10.30 or 11 o'clock, I think we would have accomplished just as much as we are doing now.

Mr. SPROULE. I submit to the hon. Postmaster General that the information given us is not the information we are accustomed to have in this House. He will remember that when Sir Mackenzie Bowell occupied the position of Minister of Customs he came down to this House with a book containing all the details, and as soon as an item was called he read from his book the explanation of how much he wanted for this and how much for that. We have passed the item providing for the ordinary expenditure on civil government salaries. What does it say in the Auditor General's Report ? I asked the hon. Minister of Customs how much he wanted for salaries in the different provinces. He could give no information whatever. The Auditor General's Report shows that for salaries and contingencies there was an expenditure in Ontario of $324,329. Surely the hon. gentleman had that information. Then I find that there was an expenditure of $261,905 for Quebec, and there is a separate item for each of the other provinces. Yet the hon. minister could give us no information about this item of $1,184,865 under this head. Is it fair to ask an opposition, which is doing its proper duty, to allow items of this kind and size to pass on such meagre information ? It is not an answer to say you have it in the Auditor General's Report. My hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Taylor) gave an illustration of the absurdity of presenting this as an argument and of saying we should be satisfied with that. There was no more unreasonable man in this House than the hon. Postmaster General when he and his friends were in opposition. There was no more unreasonable man in this House than he was. We are doing our duty as we conceive it, and we shall exercise our own judgment as to what we conceive to be our duty. The hon. Minister of Customs stands up without any information and says : I want $1,184,865 for salaries and contingencies, and you can find the explanation of it in the Auditor General's Report. I say that we will not be doing our duty by allowing these items to pass. No opposition can faithfully discharge its duty without more information as to what the money is required for than that which the hon. Minister of Customs has given to-night. We are amply justified in the demand that we shall get the information which has been so unreasonably denied us.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I pledge my word that never since the hon. gentleman was in this House was the information he asked for denied or asked for. I say that never since this House has sat, and never since Canada had a parliament, were such details demanded or furinshed to parliament. My hon. friend says that I myself made these demands, and that I was very unreasonable in having done so. Then, why follow such an unreasonable precedent ?

Mr. TAYLOR. We have not begun to follow it yet. The hon. Postmaster General lectured me a few moments ago, saying that he had been so long in public life and that he never saw such tactics pursued as those which he witnessed to-night. I have been in this House as long as the hon. gentleman, and I would remind him that the hon. Postmaster General and the hon. Minister of Customs and their friends kept us here from Wednesday until Saturday night at twelve o'clock. I never left the House till Saturday night at twelve o'clock, because these hon. gentlemen talked and talked from Wednesday until Saturday. A strong appeal was made by my hon. friends from Grey and Elgin to adjourn at 1 o'clock this morning, after we had voted nearly $2,000,000, but it was refused. We have been trying ever since to get information. As the minister in charge is not present, I will wait until he returns.

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. gentleman can not detain the House unless he is addressing it.

Mr. INGRAM. In order to save time, I will point out that in the 'Hansard' for 1895, Mr. Mulock now Sir William Mulock, and then in opposition, strongly insisted on getting information about certain items, and the report in the 'Hansard' shows that Mr. Foster then Minister of Finance gave full explanations to Mr. Mulock. We, the members of the opposition, are constantly met in our campaigns with statements by supporters of the government, that these items are passed year after year without criticism, and they even go so far as to say that we do not record a single vote against them. When reasonable questions are asked by gentlemen of the opposition, the least the minister should do is to answer them. If he has not the information in his possession he can promise to bring it down, at a later date, and so far as I am concerned it will satisfy me.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. There is nothing to warrant the conclusion that we on this side of the House have accorded anything but the most courteous treatment to gentlemen opposite. The Minister of Customs has told the committee that there is uncertainty as to this expenditure, which can only be cleared up with time and experience as the business of the department proceeds. He has also told us that the only guide as to future expenditure is the experience furnished by the past, and hon. gentlemen have got in their hands the record of past expenditure. That is the only guide we have. Under these circumstances, nothing can be gained in persisting in this contention. I may point out that long before a single item was passed an adjournment was asked for, and most of the time this evening has been spent in asking for an adjournment.

Mr. BLAIN. How much of this was spent last year for uniforms ?

Mr. FIELDING. $2,500.

Mr. BLAIN. And how much will be spent this year for the same ?

Mr. FIELDING. It is estimated that the expenditure will be about the same.

Mr. BLAIN. Are they purchased by tender ?

Mr. FIELDING. An allowance of $8 is given each officer and they purchase for themselves.

Mr. BLAIN. What officers wear these uniforms ?

Mr. FIELDING. Landing waiters attending on the arrival of vessels and officers examining baggage at the principal stations.

Mr. SPROULE. The Postmaster General has stated that no such questions were ever before asked in this House, and no such answers given as we desire. I beg to refer the Postmaster General to the ' Hansard ' of 1884, when Sir Mackenzie Bowell was Minister of Customs, and there it will be found that in reply to Sir Richard Cartwright, Sir Mackenzie Bowell went into the most minute details as to the services for which a vote of $35,430 would be expended. He gave full explanations as to the additional number of employees and their classes, where they were to be employed, and all other particulars. And yet the Postmaster General says he never heard of such information being asked for in this House before. If I went through the various items I could show him that the same principle has been invariably carried out.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. By the analysis of the expenditure which I have had made for the last fiscal year I find that there was expended some $46,000 under the following heads : transfer officers, $7,927.50 ; legal expenses, $264 ; advertising, $9.60 ; guarantee bonds, $4,786.65; stationery, $9,889.02; printing, $17,500; uniforms, $2,355.06; newspaper subscriptions, $367.05 ; general account, $2,983.25. The railways contributed, $12,000 odd towards that expenditure, leaving the sum of $34,000 odd of disbursements out of the Dominion treasury.

Mr. SPROULE. The Postmaster General has given the very information we have been trying to get for two hours.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. It is all in the Auditor General's Report.

Mr. SPROULE. It is not our duty to hunt up these items. The ministers should be ready to give us the information.

Some resolutions reported.

On motion of Mr. Fielding, House adjourned at 2.55 a.m., Tuesday.
